as the interview was conducted to make the child feel comfortable, which contributed to the adequacy of the examination. However, similar statements made to a Child Protective Services caseworker were not admissible under the Rule, because the caseworker did not diagnose or treat the child, but only made an investigation before referring her to other professionals. In United States v. Joe, 8 F.3d 1488 (10th Cir. 1993) , the Court held that a murder victim's statement to a physician identifying the defendant as her assailant was reasonably pertinent to her treatment for sexual abuse injuries. However, it was error (but harmless) to admit statements to the physician that she was afraid sometimes because the defendant had threatened to kill her, as the statement did not describe medical history, symptoms, etc., of the injury for which she was being treated. In Moss v. Feldmeyer, n55 a malpractice action against a physician for alleged misdiagnosis leading to death from a heart attack, the defendant testified that he had encouraged the patient to enter a hospital and that she, directly and through her husband, had refused. The Court held that the statements of the patient and her husband were properly admitted as statements made to a physician for purposes of treatment.

[h] Rule 803(4) -- Statements to Nonphysicians

Davignon v. Clemmey, 322 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2003) : In an action for civil rights violations and intentional infliction of emotional distress, statements regarding the distress that were made during family therapy sessions to a family therapist and social worker not licensed to practice medicine were admitted. The Court noted that "the ambit of Rule 803(4) is not limited to statements made to a licensed physician, but instead may encompass those made to social workers, provided that the declarant intended to procure medical treatment." In this case the plaintiffs sought counsel from the therapist to address mental health issues associated with the defendants' harassment of them. In Navarro de Cosme v. Hospital Pavia, 922 F.2d 926 (1st Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendants in an action by the parents of a stillborn fetus, holding there was no error in admitting a social worker's notes written on medical records, as they recounted statements made by a plaintiff for the purpose of obtaining treatment.

United States v. Kappell, 418 F.3d 550 (6th Cir. 2005) : Affirming convictions for child sex abuse, the Court found no error in the admission of hearsay statements made by the victims to a psychotherapist/social worker. The Court noted that Rule 803(4) is broad enough to cover statements made to non-physicians. Furthermore, the fact that the psychotherapist was not treating the victims was not dispositive, as the exception "covers statements to non-treating persons who provide a diagnosis." The Court found that the "critical inquiry" was whether the psychotherapist undertook the interview "for the primary purpose of medical diagnosis, rather than for some other purpose, such as determining whether to notify state authorities of suspected abuse, or obtaining evidence." The Court also emphasized that the victims were informed of the importance of telling the truth to the psychotherapist.

United States v. Newman, 965 F.2d 206 (7th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed the sentence imposed on the defendant's fraud conviction, noting that statements to a psychologist are admissible under the Rule, as there is the same strong incentive to tell the truth in order to receive treatment as there is with statements to medical doctors.

United States v. Bear, 357 F.3d 730 (8th Cir. 2004) : The Court reversed the defendant's conviction for aggravated sexual abuse of his children because a 12-minute videotape recording of an interview of one child by a forensic interviewer was erroneously admitted. The interview took place after the children had been taken into custody by the department of social services; it was conducted at a center for child evaluation before a physical examination by a doctor. In it, the child (aged three years and ten months) identified her abuser and provided descriptive details of the abuse, violated the defendant's confrontation rights. The Court found there was insufficient evidence that the child understood that the inquiry into identity was important to diagnosis and treatment; there was no evidence that the child was aware she had an injury or that she understood that telling the truth was important to the treatment of that injury. In United States v. Balfany, 965 F.2d 575 (8th Cir. 1992) , more than six months after alleged abuse, the child victim was examined by a physician and interviewed by a psychologist and a social worker, all three of whom gave testimony recounting the child's descriptions of the assaults and identification of the defendant as her attacker. The Court held the testimony was properly admitted for purposes of diagnosis and treatment, even though a general practitioner with little experience in abuse cases had previously examined the victim and found no evidence of abuse. The later examinations by experienced specialists were not simply designed to generate evidence for trial and were not shown to be untrustworthy. See also United States v. Yellow n56(a clinical psychologist was permitted to testify to statements made during diagnosis and treatment of a 13-year-old sister and her disabled brother, who were raped by the defendant).

People of Terr. of Guam v. Ignacio, 10 F.3d 608 (9th Cir. 1993) : The three-year-old victim of a criminal sexual assault disclosed the assault and identified the defendant in statements to a social worker. The Court held that the statements to the social worker were aimed only at ensuring the child's safety, not treatment, so they did not come within the medical statements exception; furthermore, there was no affirmative reason to believe the statements were particularly trustworthy. The error in admitting the statements to the social worker was harmless, however.

United States v. Tome, 61 F.3d 1446 (10th Cir. 1995) : On remand after the Supreme Court held that hearsay statements made when the declarant had a motive to falsify could not be admitted as prior consistent statements (see the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 801, § 801.02[4][c]), the Court held that statements by the child sexual abuse victim identifying the defendant made to a Child Protective Services caseworker were not admissible under the Rule, because the caseworker did not diagnose or treat the child, but only made an investigation before referring her to other professionals.

[i] Rule 803(4) -- Summaries of Medical History

Swinton v. Potomac Corp., 270 F.3d 794 (9th Cir. 2001) : The Court affirmed a judgment for an African-American plaintiff who alleged racial harassment in the workplace. The Trial Judge admitted medical summaries prepared by psychologists contacted by the plaintiff after leaving the defendant's employment under Rule 803(4), and the Court held that the collection of a medical history was a routine part of a medical diagnosis.

[5] Rule 803(5) -- Recorded Recollection

[a] Rule 803(5) -- Contemporaneous Recording Required

United States v. Green, 258 F.3d 683 (7th Cir. 2001) : In a trial for a crack cocaine distribution conspiracy, an investigator was permitted to read his notes of interviews with the defendant and with a cooperating witness. The Court held that the notes were properly admitted as past recollection recorded, even though they were not made until 11 days after the interview with the defendant, since there was no showing of circumstances making it likely that the declarant's memory was inaccurate and the delay was not so long as to make accurate recall unlikely.

United States v. Sollars, 979 F.2d 1294 (8th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed convictions for arson, holding there was no error in permitting the government to play a tape recording in which a defendant's stepdaughter told a BATF agent two months after the fire that she saw the defendant on the building's roof that night. The stepdaughter remembered at trial talking to the agent but could not remember what she told him, and the statement was made while her memory was still fresh.

[b] Rule 803(5) -- Diaries

Greger v. International Jensen, Inc., 820 F.2d 937 (8th Cir. 1987) : Although the Court reversed a judgment awarding compensatory and punitive damages to property owners who filed a nuisance action against a manufacturing plant, it held the Trial Judge properly permitted one plaintiff to read a portion of a diary into the record, since the diary qualified as past recollection recorded.

[c] Rule 803(5) -- Expert's Report

United States v. Marshall, 532 F.2d 1279 (9th Cir. 1976) : Affirming the defendant's conviction for possession of cocaine, the Court upheld the admission of a chemist's report identifying the white powder found in a codefendant's apartment as cocaine. The police chemist testified that he did not have any independent recollection of the test that he performed on the powder, and the Trial Judge permitted the introduction of the report as past recollection recorded. Citing Rule 803(5), the Court stated that the introduction of a report when a witness acknowledges it as an accurate recordation of events and one that was prepared "contemporaneously" with the event does not violate the right of confrontation protected by the Sixth Amendment.

[d] Rule 803(5) -- Foundation

Parker v. Reda, 327 F.3d 211 (2d Cir. 2003) : Affirming a judgment for corrections officers sued by an inmate who alleged use of excessive force, the Court held that a memorandum prepared by a corrections sergeant was properly permitted to be read to the jury. The memorandum bore the sergeant's signature and the date of the incident, and the sergeant testified that he wrote it when he had personal knowledge and that it accurately reflected his knowledge. The fact that the officer did not specifically remember the underlying event or writing the memorandum was not disqualifying as long as the witness could testify to his practice for preparing such memoranda.

United States v. Mornan, 413 F.3d 372 (3d Cir. 2005) : During a trial for mail and wire fraud growing out of a cross-border telemarketing scheme, the government offered videotaped deposition testimony of a woman who had worked for her cousin at his check-cashing service, which had allegedly been used by the defendant to cash money orders sent in response to the scheme. During the woman's testimony, she claimed that she no longer remembered details of her employment with her cousin. The government then directed her attention to an earlier statement she had given to the prosecutor and a Postal Inspector, in which she identified the defendant as the person who had cashed money orders. She asserted, however, that she did not remember the particulars of that statement either, attributing her memory loss to back and neck injuries suffered in an automobile accident. Affirming, the Court held that the Judge's rejection of the statement as a past recollection recorded was correct, since there was no evidence that the witness made the record containing the statement or that she had adopted the record after reviewing it. However, there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the statement as a prior inconsistent statement.

United States v. Humphrey, 279 F.3d 372 (6th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed a bank embezzlement conviction, finding no error in the exclusion of a bank memo about a shipment of food stamps from one branch to another. The head teller of the recipient bank testified that he recalled the event that took place, so the memo was not admissible as past recollection recorded. See also United States v. Porter, 986 F.2d 1014 (6th Cir. 1993) , discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 803.02[6][d].

United States v. Cash, 394 F.3d 560 (7th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a conviction for threatening a federal employee, finding no error when the employee was permitted to quote the defendant's threats as she had recorded them during telephone conversations with him. The foundation for past recollections recorded was satisfied by the witness' testimony regarding each of the defendant's statements that he made it directly to her during their telephone conversation, that she could not remember the statement verbatim, and that she had recorded the defendant's exact words during the course of the conversation. In United States v. Severson, 49 F.3d 268 (7th Cir. 1995) , to support their motion for a new trial in a marijuana prosecution, the defendants offered a memorandum dictated by an Assistant U.S. Attorney recounting a conversation with a detective, who indicated that she had observed the arresting officers threaten the defendants and induce them to cooperate by false promises not to prosecute. At a hearing on the motion, the detective denied making the statements and the AUSA had no independent or refreshed recollection of the conversation. The Court affirmed denial of the motion, holding that the memorandum would not be admissible as substantive evidence since the detective never adopted the statements, denying both their accuracy and having made them. In United States v. Schoenborn, n57 the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit as past recollection recorded a statement by a witness to a prison assault, where the witness had refused to sign the statement when the FBI agent who took it showed it to him and had disavowed its accuracy on the stand.

United States v. Benson, 961 F.2d 707 (8th Cir. 1992) : The Court held it was error (but harmless) when the prosecutor in a kidnapping prosecution read into evidence reports by an FBI agent and a probation officer allegedly recounting statements made by the defendant. The declarants did not testify and the defendant maintained he had no recollection of what he said to them, so the requirement that the records be made or adopted by the witness had not been met.

[e] Rule 803(5) -- Fresh in Memory When Statement Made

United States v. Smith, 197 F.3d 225 (6th Cir. 1999) : In a prosecution of a scheme to defraud insurance companies by staging fake accidents, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting a statement given by a cooperating witness to a detective 15 months after the incident described in the statement. The Rule has no contemporaneity requirement, the defendant showed no reason why the matter was not fresh in the witness' memory when the statement was made, and the Rule's requirements were otherwise satisfied.

United States v. Patterson, 678 F.2d 774 (9th Cir. 1982) : Upholding a conviction for receiving stolen property, the Court approved the admission of a transcript of a witness' grand jury testimony when the witness had memory problems at trial. Although the grand jury testimony related a conversation between the witness and the defendant that had occurred ten months earlier, the Court said that the incident was sufficiently fresh to make the grand jury testimony prior recollection recorded. In our view, this case stretches the exception to the breaking point. The witness admitted hostility towards the defendant at the time he testified before the grand jury. Ten months had passed between the conversation and the testimony, there was no showing that anything in the interim had reminded the witness about the conversation, and the witness was evasive at trial about what he remembered. The fact that the grand jury transcript accurately recorded what the witness said does not signify that the witness testified before the grand jury while his memory of the underlying events was fresh.

[f] Rule 803(5) -- Intoxicated Declarant

United States v. Edwards, 539 F.2d 689 (9th Cir. 1976) : A witness in a rape prosecution had been with the defendant and the victim shortly before the rape and gave a statement to government investigators about the incident the next day. At trial the witness had no recollection of the matter, so the statement was introduced under Rule 803(5). Although the witness was quite drunk when he made the statement, the Court found no error, since he affirmed in the statement and testified at trial that the statement accurately reflected his recollection at the time it was made.

[g] Rule 803(5) -- Invocation of Self-Incrimination Privilege

In re Corrugated Container Antitrust Litig., 756 F.2d 411 (5th Cir. 1985) : Affirming a judgment absolving manufacturers from liability for damages in an antitrust case, the Court held that the Trial Judge properly rejected the plaintiffs' attempt to introduce an interview conducted by government attorneys with a witness pursuant to an immunity grant as substantive or impeachment evidence. The plaintiffs deposed the witness and used his deposition as evidence, but at a second deposition the witness invoked his privilege against self-incrimination. The Court reasoned that the interview statements could not be used under Rule 803(5) because there was no showing that the witness had memory problems or that the interview correctly reflected his memory.

[h] Rule 803(5) -- Memory Problems

Collins v. Kibort, 143 F.3d 331 (7th Cir. 1998) : Vacating in part a judgment for the plaintiff in a Title VII race discrimination case, the Court found, inter alia, that the plaintiff was erroneously permitted to introduce a diary recording his version of various episodes at issue in the case. The plaintiff did not state that he could not recall the events recorded -- in fact, he gave testimony recalling those events in detail -- so the proper foundation was not laid for the diary as past recollection recorded. In any event, the diary was inadmissible as an exhibit unless offered by the adverse party. The errors were harmless, however. In United States v. Micke, n58 the Court held that an affidavit of a government witness was not admissible as recorded recollection absent a showing that the witness could not recall matters.

United States v. Ray, 768 F.2d 991 (8th Cir. 1985) , supplemented, 777 F.2d 423 (8th Cir. 1985) : In a prosecution for failure to appear, the Court found that a transcript of a lawyer's statements in Court concerning a telephone call made four days earlier was admissible where the lawyer testified that the transcript was accurate and he had no present recollection of the call.

United States v. Felix-Jerez, 667 F.2d 1297 (9th Cir. 1982) : In a prosecution for prison escape, an interpreter, who was present while a marshal interrogated the Spanish-speaking defendant in prison, testified that he interpreted accurately the marshal's questions and the defendant's answers, although he had no present recollection of what was said. The marshal, who testified that he made accurate notes of his questions and the translated answers and later typed them, was not asked whether he had an independent recollection of the questions and answers. The Court held that reading the typewritten summary was improper, since the defendant never adopted the statement and the government did not lay the proper foundation for past recollection recorded of the marshal.

[i] Rule 803(5) -- Not Receivable as Exhibit

Research Sys. Corp. v. IPSOS Publicite, 276 F.3d 914 (7th Cir. 2002) : Affirming a judgment for the defendants in an action for misappropriation of trade secrets, fraud, and breach of contract, the Court found no error in the exclusion of two memoranda written by an employer of the plaintiff which were offered as prior recollection recorded, noting that the Rule provides that documents qualifying as past recollection recorded may be read but not introduced into evidence.

[j] Rule 803(5) -- Personal Knowledge

Hynes v. Coughlin, 79 F.3d 285 (2d Cir. 1996) : In an inmate's § 1983 action against prison guards, the defendants offered a "Use of Force" report prepared by one of the guards purporting to describe the beginning of the altercation, although she testified that she had not seen the incident until she heard a scream and observed another guard holding his genitals. The Court said the report was not admissible under Rule 803(5) because the witness did not have personal knowledge of the start of the incident.

[k] Rule 803(5) -- Police Reports

Newton v. Ryder Transp. Servs., Inc., 206 F.3d 772 (8th Cir. 2000) : Reversing a judgment for the lessee of a truck who alleged that the lessor negligently failed to complete repairs on the truck, the Court held it was error to refuse to permit the defendant to rely upon deposition testimony of a police officer. The officer was unable to recall the accident but read into the record his accident report, which referred to the plaintiff's falling asleep behind the wheel while wearing a seatbelt. The officer testified that there were no other witnesses and that he would not have put the plaintiff's statement in the block in his report where he put it unless the statement was made by the plaintiff. The officer testified that he prepared and signed the report on the day of the accident and that it was accurate to the best of his knowledge.

[l] Rule 803(5) -- Refreshing Recollection

United States v. Casoni, 950 F.2d 893 (3d Cir. 1991) : The Court held, in a racketeering prosecution, that it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to admit an attorney's interview notes to prove a witness' prior consistent statements. Had the attorney been unable to testify fully after refreshing his recollection with the notes, they might have been read to the jury under the Rule, but it was an abuse of discretion to admit them where the attorney was able to testify fully about their contents after refreshing his recollection.

[m] Rule 803(5) -- Two-Witness Voucher

United States v. Green, 258 F.3d 683 (7th Cir. 2001) : In a trial for a crack cocaine distribution conspiracy, an investigator was permitted to read his notes of interviews with the defendant and with a cooperating witness. The Court held that the notes were properly admitted as past recollection recorded. The included statements of the defendant and the cooperating witness were admissible without being adopted by the declarants, since they were independently admissible as a party-admission and a prior consistent statement, respectively. In United States v. Williams, 951 F.2d 853 (7th Cir. 1992) , to prove that the defendant had called the post office to inquire about a parcel that contained cocaine, a postal clerk's statement to inspectors was admitted under the Rule to allow the clerk to identify the label number provided by the caller. Because the clerk was vacationing when the statement was prepared, the label number had been written in the statement by the clerk's supervisor from the clerk's notepad, and the clerk did not compare the notepad and the statement. Although it recognized that when one person perceives an event and the other records it, ordinarily the former must testify to the accuracy of his report and the latter to the accuracy of his recordation, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion here even though the supervisor did not testify. The record on the notepad would be admissible as a recorded recollection and the statement filled in by the supervisor was admissible under Rule 1004 as a copy used to prove the contents of a lost or destroyed original writing. In United States v. Lewis, n59 the Court affirmed a conviction for a cocaine conspiracy, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting as past recollection a recorded statement given by a fellow inmate to an FBI agent. Although the six-month delay between the events referred to and the statement was significant, it was not so long that the declarant could not have accurately recalled the events. Although the 15-month interval between the statement and the time the declarant said he told the agent the truth essentially meant that the trier was forced to rely totally on the agent's rendering of what the declarant said, there was no abuse of discretion since the agent vouched for making an accurate recording, there were no indications the report was inaccurate, and the substance was corroborated by other evidence.

United States v. Hernandez, 333 F.3d 1168 (10th Cir. 2003) : To prove the serial number of a gun in an illegal firearm possession case, the government offered the contents of two memoranda and the testimony of three witnesses,

A, B, and C. When C had heard that her brother was keeping a gun at A's house, she called A to ask for the serial number. A refused, but later called B and asked her to write down the number as A read it off the gun. Sometime later, C again called A to ask for the number, and A agreed to provide it. However, by that time the gun was no longer at A's house, so A called B and asked her to recite the number back to her. After B did this, A called C and recited the number to her; C wrote down the number as A was saying it. At trial the three all testified that they performed their roles accurately: A said she accurately read the number from the gun to B, and that she accurately recited to C what B had told her. B testified that she accurately wrote down the number from A, and accurately read that number back to A in the later call. C testified that she accurately wrote down the number as A recited it to her. When B's and C's notes were read into evidence, the defendant objected that A, who had observed the number on the gun, never confirmed the notes, so they had not been "adopted" by the observer, as Rule 803(5) requires. Affirming, the Court held that the testimony of the three witnesses provided sufficient indicia of reliability to bring the notes within the ambit of the Rule.

[n] Rule 803(5) -- Weight

United States v. Williams, 571 F.2d 344 (6th Cir. 1978) : After a witness testifying at trial indicated some lapses of memory, the Trial Judge permitted the government to introduce a statement made by the witness to a Secret Service agent 15 months prior to trial. Although the defendant, in cross-examining the witness about the statement, elicited testimony that the witness did not think that his prior statement incriminated the defendant, the Court held that once the Trial Judge found from the testimony of the witness and the Secret Service agent that the statement had been shown to the witness, who subscribed it when made, the statement was admissible. The defendant's cross-examination went to the weight that the jury would give the evidence, not to its admissibility.

[6] Rule 803(6) -- Records Of Regularly Conducted Activity

[a] Rule 803(6) -- Affidavits

United States v. Ismoila, 100 F.3d 380 (5th Cir. 1996) : The Court held, in a credit-card fraud prosecution, that affidavits and other notices to the issuing banks from credit card holders indicating that their cards had been stolen and charges were not authorized were not admissible as business records, as it was not the holders' business to fill out the affidavits, and the holders had no business duty with respect to the banks.

[b] Rule 803(6) -- At or Near the Time

United States v. Lemire, 720 F.2d 1327 (D.C. Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed convictions for wire fraud and other offenses. It upheld the exclusion of a memorandum written by one defendant for a superior, finding that the document was not a business record, because it was not made in the regular practice of the business and it summarized events that had taken place some time before.

[c] Rule 803(6) -- Audit Reports

United States v. Polishan, 336 F.3d 234 (3d Cir. 2003) : Affirming the conspiracy and securities fraud convictions of a business executive, the Court, noting a division on the question whether the document would be admissible as a business record, found no plain error in the admission of a 369-page audit committee report which concluded that the companies had overstated their pre-tax net income for three years by more than $75 million.

[d] Rule 803(6) -- Bills and Invoices

Morrison Grain Co. v. Utica Mut. Ins. Co., 632 F.2d 424 (5th Cir. 1980) : In an action brought by an insured against the insurer to recover for damage to a cargo, the Court held that a clean bill of lading was admissible as a business record.

Redken Labs. v. Levin, 843 F.2d 226 (6th Cir. 1988) : The Court held sales slips inadmissible where they were undated, did not indicate to whom goods were sold, and were not in the possession of the regular custodian, and the company did not save all the slips.

Collins v. Kibort, 143 F.3d 331 (7th Cir. 1998) : The Court vacated in part a judgment for the plaintiff in a Title VII race discrimination case, on the ground that hospital bills had been erroneously admitted solely on the basis of the plaintiff's testimony. Although the Rule does not require a foundation witness who prepared the record or who has personal knowledge of the entries in the record, the witness must have knowledge of the organization's regular business practices in making and keeping the record, which the plaintiff did not have.

United States v. Henneberry, 719 F.2d 941 (8th Cir. 1983) : The Court found the testimony of a warehouse manager sufficient to lay the foundation for the introduction of bills of lading as business records. In In re King Enterprises,, n60 an action by a bankrupt construction company against an airplane manufacturer in connection with a contract for construction of an aircraft hangar, the Court held that it was proper to admit invoices that the construction company received from businesses that supplied materials and services for work performed.

NLRB v. First Termite Control Co., 646 F.2d 424 (9th Cir. 1981) : In order to establish an interstate commerce nexus, the Board offered a railroad freight bill into evidence to prove the amount of interstate business done by the defendant company. The bill was hearsay and inadmissible as a business record, however, because the company's bookkeeper could not lay a foundation for the railroad's business records.

United States v. Carranco, 551 F.2d 1197 (10th Cir. 1977) : The Court upheld the introduction of a freight bill containing penciled notations since the notations were made in the regular course of business and were adopted as part of the bill by the business.

United States v. Atchley, 699 F.2d 1055 (11th Cir. 1983) : Affirming convictions arising out of a scheme to destroy property and to defraud an insurance company, the Court found that telephone company toll records were properly admitted as business records when they were the company's microfiche copies and the originals were sent to the customers.

[e] Rule 803(6) -- Computerized Records

United States v. Loney, 959 F.2d 1332 (5th Cir. 1992) : In a prosecution of a scheme to defraud a frequent flyer program, the Court held that a report based on a search of the airline's frequent flyer records was properly admitted. Although the report was prepared in anticipation of the litigation, the underlying data it summarized was kept in the regular course of business. In an embezzlement prosecution, United States v. Hutson, n61 the Court affirmed the admission of computerized bank records, finding that the records were properly authenticated, even though the custodian who testified had not personally entered the data and could not attest to their accuracy. The Court observed that the printouts indicated the date of each banking transaction, which was sufficient to show that the entries were made at or near the time of relevant events, and it rejected the defendant's argument that, since she had manipulated the records, they were untrustworthy. In United States v. Young Bros., n62 the Court upheld the company's convictions for bid-rigging and mail fraud, rejecting athe company's claim that computer-generated business records are less reliable than other kinds of records because they depend on the accuracy of the software as well as on the person feeding data to the computer. See also United States v. Sanders n63(computerized records of the Texas Department of Human Resources, representing reimbursement claims filed by the defendant and showing payment of those claims, were properly admitted). In Capital Marine Supply v. Thomas, n64 a maritime action to secure judgment upon a defaulted note, the Court found that the balance due on the promissory note was adequately proved through testimony of the plaintiff's manager of industrial receivables, who testified concerning computerized business records prepared by an accounting clerk working under his supervision. The Court said that "[c]omputer business records are admissible if (1) they are kept pursuant to a routine procedure designed to assure their accuracy, (2) they are created for motives that tend to assure accuracy (e.g., not including those prepared for litigation), and (3) they are not themselves mere accumulations of hearsay." See also United States v. Vela n65(telephone company records were properly admitted in a drug case, even without testimony that the computers were in proper working order).

United States v. Salgado, 250 F.3d 438 (6th Cir. 2001) : In the prosecution of a drug conspiracy, the Court found no error in the admission of a computerized printout of telephone toll records that tended to prove a connection between the defendants and the conspiracy. The foundation was sufficiently provided by a witness who testified that the telephone company relied on these computer-generated records to ensure the accuracy of its billing; there was no need to present evidence of any programming features in place to guarantee the accuracy of the records, nor was there a requirement that the foundation witness be a computer programmer, so long as the foundation witness simply demonstrates familiarity with the recordkeeping system.

United States v. Fujii, 301 F.3d 535 (7th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed convictions for smuggling aliens, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting printouts of airline check-in and reservation records. Even though the printouts themselves were prepared specifically for trial and were not kept in the ordinary course of business, there was sufficient evidence that the computerized records from which the printouts were derived satisfied the business records exception. In United States v. Briscoe, 896 F.2d 1476 (7th Cir. 1990) , the Court affirmed convictions for a heroin importing and distribution conspiracy, holding that there was sufficient foundation for computerized records regarding wiretapped telephone calls. In United States v. Croft, n66 the Court held that computerized payroll data were admissible as business records, where printouts were made at or near the time that payments were made, and a university made and kept the records in the course of its business.

United States v. Scholle, 553 F.2d 1109 (8th Cir. 1977) : In a drug conspiracy case, the Court approved the admission of a computer printout prepared by the DEA revealing the physical characteristics of drugs seized and tested in eight regional laboratories across the country, offered in order to show that a rare adulterant was used in the instant case in cutting cocaine, and thus that the cocaine sold at the distribution end of the conspiracy was the same cocaine acquired at the importation end. The Court found that the evidence was relevant and admissible as a business record. It emphasized, however, that not only must the requirements of the Rule have been satisfied, "but in addition the original source of the computer program must be delineated, and the procedures for input control including tests used to assure accuracy and reliability must be presented."

Sea-Land Service, Inc. v. Lozen Int'l, LLC, 285 F.3d 808 (9th Cir. 2002) : Reversing summary judgment for a carrier on a claim by a shipper seeking damages for the carrier's failure to deliver a shipment in a timely manner, the Court held that the bills of lading of the carrier were properly admitted as business records, even though the physical documents were not generated when the contract was entered into but rather were generated later from computer records. The bills of lading "were produced from the same electronic information that was generated contemporaneously," and they were the type that would have been issued in the regular course of business had the shipper not requested that the transaction be performed electronically. In United States v. Catabran, n67 the Court held that a computer printout of a business ledger kept via computer was admissible and that a proper foundation had been laid. Although the records were not kept for inventory purposes, the printouts provided accurate inventory figures. Errors in the records attributable to incorrect data entry or the operation of the computer program went to weight, not admissibility. In United States v. Bonallo, n68 the Court held that evidence of alterations in computerized business records was properly received, since the records were made by a business and were offered to prove that the defendant was responsible for their alteration. In United States v. Miller, n69 the Court affirmed criminal antitrust convictions, holding that a custodian could lay the foundation for computerized records even though he had no knowledge of the maintenance and technical operation of the computer. See also Kennedy v. Los Angeles Police Dep't n70(computer printouts of time records kept by the plaintiff's attorney were admissible as business records in determining an award of attorney's fees); United States v. Linn n71(a hotel's director of communications could lay the foundation for a computer printout recording telephone calls, even though he was not a computer programmer).

United States v. Hernandez, 913 F.2d 1506 (10th Cir. 1990) : Affirming a conviction for firearms offenses while an illegal alien, the Court rejected the defendant's argument that a computer printout of INS records prepared for the trial was not within the exception. So long as the original computer data compilation was prepared pursuant to a business duty in accordance with regular business practice, the fact that the hard copy offered as evidence was printed for purposes of litigation does not affect its admissibility.

[f] Rule 803(6) -- Diaries

Zenith Radio Corp. v. Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co., 723 F.2d 238 (3d Cir. 1983) , rev'd on other grounds, 475 U.S. 574 (1986) : In a massive antitrust case in which the plaintiffs alleged that the defendants conspired to drive them out of the market for television receivers, the Court reversed most of the summary judgment entered for the defendants. The Court found that the Trial Judge had improperly excluded minutes of association meetings, and diaries kept on a regular basis were found to be admissible.

United States v. Ramsey, 785 F.2d 184 (7th Cir. 1986) : The Court found error in the admission of occasional jottings on desk calendars as business records in a prosecution for mail and wire fraud. The entries were not made with sufficient regularity to satisfy the hearsay exception. But, the error was harmless because the entries could have been read to the jury as prior recollection recorded. In United States v. McPartlin, n72 the Court affirmed convictions growing out of a bribery scheme involving local officials, upholding the introduction of diaries compiled by an unindicted coconspirator who testified as a prosecution witness. The desk calendar appointment diaries qualified as business records, even though several entries were made out of sequence and even if no one relied on them other than the person who prepared them.

[g] Rule 803(6) -- Electronic Mail

Monotype Corp. v. International Typeface Corp., 43 F.3d 443 (9th Cir. 1994) : Affirming a judgment for a designer accused of breaching a license dealing with typefaces, the Court held there was no error in excluding electronic mail from an employee of Microsoft Corp. to a superior. The email contained some derogatory remarks and, according to the Court, "is far less of a systematic activity than a monthly printout," which had been admitted in United States v. Catabran, 836 F.2d 453 (9th Cir. 1988) .

[h] Rule 803(6) -- Estimates

United States v. Scholl, 166 F.3d 964 (9th Cir. 1999) : As proof of the defendant's gambling activities in his trial for tax fraud and structuring, the government offered reports prepared by casinos' floor workers keeping track of cash or chips that the gambler has when he arrives at the table, recording the average bet made by the gambler, and, to the extent possible, keeping track of how much money the gambler is winning or losing. The Court held that since the records were made at the time of the activity they recorded by a person with knowledge, were kept in the ordinary course of business, and were made as part of the regular practice of the casinos' operations, any inaccuracies went to the weight of the evidence and not its admissibility.

[i] Rule 803(6) -- Financial Statements

Ollag Constr. Equip. Corp. v. Manufacturers & Traders Trust Co., 665 F.2d 43 (2d Cir. 1981) : Affirming the judgment below in a bankruptcy action, the Court held that financial statements were business records of the bank since they were integrated into its records and relied upon in the bank's day-to-day operations.

United States v. Fawaz, 881 F.2d 259 (6th Cir. 1989) : Affirming a tax evasion conviction, the Court held that a balance sheet summarizing the defendant's financial condition that was prepared and used in the regular course of an accountant's business from information provided by the defendant had been properly admitted as a business record.

[j] Rule 803(6) -- Foreign Records

United States v. Doyle, 130 F.3d 523 (2d Cir. 1997) : The Court held in a prosecution for illegal exportation of fuel pumps to Libya that official certifications were sufficient to authenticate copies of privately-generated, as well as public, documents recorded in the Maltese Customs Department, but that there was insufficient showing that the procedures by which the documents were made, recorded, or monitored assured sufficient reliability to permit their admission under a hearsay exception. In an insurance coverage action arising out of the alleged disappearance of coffee from warehouses in Mexico, In re Balfour MacLaine Int'l Ltd., 85 F.3d 68 (2d Cir. 1996) , the Court held warehouse receipts issued for the coffee were admissible as business records of the amount of coffee received, even though they were contradicted by other "receiving reports," since there was evidence that they were based on information received from warehouse employees at the time of delivery. In Raphaely Int'l, Inc. v. Waterman S.S. Corp., n73 the Court affirmed a shipper's claims for negligent damage to cargo, holding that inspection documents issued by a company that had been nationalized by the Sudanese government were properly admitted as business records upon a foundation provided by an employee of the Swiss company for which the Sudanese company was acting as agent.

[k] Rule 803(6) -- Foundation

[i] Rule 803(6) -- Circumstantial Evidence or Judicial Notice

United States v. Mendel, 746 F.2d 155 (2d Cir. 1984) : The Court sustained convictions for making false representations to the United States Department of Agriculture, as it found that business records prepared by a slaughterhouse were properly admitted even though no employee of the business testified. The defendant company's own records corroborated the entries on the business records.

FDIC v. Staudinger, 797 F.2d 908 (10th Cir. 1986) : Affirming a judgment upon a directed verdict for the FDIC in an action to collect on a note, the Court found an adequate foundation for the admission of bank records. It observed that the author of records need not testify and indicated agreement with a commentary's suggestion that a foundation for admissibility of a business record could be predicated upon judicial notice of the nature of the business and the nature of the records.

[ii] Rule 803(6) -- Foundation -- Custodian or Qualified Witness

[A] Rule 803(6) -- Civil Cases

Belber v. Lipson, 905 F.2d 549 (1st Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff in a medical malpractice action, holding that medical records offered by the defendants were properly excluded because the custodian had received them from prior counsel, not the purported maker, and there was no other qualified witness who could establish the required foundation. In Wallace Motor Sales, Inc. v. American Motor Sales Corp., n74 a dispute between a dealership and an auto manufacturer, the Court held that the president and sole stockholder of the dealership was a qualified witness for purposes of laying the foundation for business records, since he could explain and be cross-examined concerning the manner in which the records were made and kept.

Phoenix Assocs. III v. Stone, 60 F.3d 95 (2d Cir. 1995) : Reversing a judgment for the defendant in an oral contract dispute between a partnership and a business associate, the Court held that a record generated by an investment partnership's employees upon the receipt of transfer of funds made by the business associate was admissible as a business record. Concluding that an accountant for the partnership was qualified to lay a foundation, the Court emphasized that to be qualified within the meaning of the Rule, a witness need not have knowledge of which employee filled out a particular record nor need he have prepared the records; the witness need only testify that it was the business entity's regular practice to get information from the person who created the document.

Dyno Constr. Co. v. McWane, Inc., 198 F.3d 567 (6th Cir. 1999) : Affirming a judgment for the seller of ductile iron pipe who was sued for breach of contract by the buyer, the Court held there was no error in the admission of FedEx delivery records generated from FedEx's computer system after testimony by the manager of a FedEx office in Ohio regarding the company's records system. Although the manager was not a custodian of the records, he fell within the term "other qualified witness," since "[a]ll that is required of the witness is that he or she be familiar with the record-keeping procedures of the organization."

Collins v. Kibort, 143 F.3d 331 (7th Cir. 1998) : The Court vacated in part a judgment for the plaintiff in a Title VII race discrimination case, on the ground that hospital bills had been erroneously admitted solely on the basis of the plaintiff's testimony. The Rule does not require a foundation witness who prepared the record or who has personal knowledge of the entries in the record, but here the plaintiff did not have knowledge of the hospital's regular business practices in making and keeping the record, which is required for the foundation.

Latman v. Burdette, 366 F.3d 774 (9th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed a judgment holding that the Bankruptcy Court had erroneously admitted bank records submitted as an attachment to a supplemental declaration of the Trustee's counsel. Although a witness who only understood the record-keeping system could be an "other qualified witness" providing the foundation for business records, the Trustee's counsel here had no regular connection to the bank and no knowledge of the account except that gained by hearsay. In Miller v. Fairchild Indus., n75 the Court held that the defendant's CFO was a "qualified person" to testify in Title VII case that termination clearance documents were regularly prepared when an employee turns in his security badge and that such documents offered in this case were prepared by the company's personnel department and signed by the department of finance, of which he was in charge. In NLRB v. First Termite Control Co., n76 a railroad freight bill offered to show interstate commerce nexus was held inadmissible as a business record because the defendant company's bookkeeper could not lay a foundation for the railroad's business records.

Allen v. Safeco Ins. Co., 782 F.2d 1517 (11th Cir. 1986) , vacated in part on other grounds, 793 F.2d 1195 (11th Cir. 1986) : Affirming a judgment that a fire that destroyed a home was accidental, the Court held that a fire marshal's testimony concerning a lab report was sufficient to lay a foundation for the report, even though the marshal did not prepare it, since the marshal's office relied upon the reports, they were prepared by the state agency in the regular course of business, and there was no indication that they lacked trustworthiness.

Conoco, Inc. v. Department of Energy, 99 F.3d 387 (Fed. Cir. 1996) : Although the Court vacated a summary judgment for DOE in an action for restitution of crude oil pricing overcharges, the Court held that a DOE auditor could lay the foundation for admission of certain oil company records based upon his experience with the types of documents that oil companies routinely maintain and the procedures used to prepare those documents.

[B] Rule 803(6) -- Foundation -- Custodian or Qualified Witness -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Lauersen, 343 F.3d 604 (2d Cir. 2003) : In a trial for health care fraud, an anesthesiologist testifying for the government explained how he prepared charts and reports in which he disguised the true nature of the procedures employed by the defendant and sent them to a record-keeping business operated by his father. The government obtained the records from the business, and an FBI agent used the code supplied by the anesthesiologist to create a summary chart of the disguised procedures contained in the records. The Court held that the anesthesiologist was qualified to lay a foundation for the records as business records, and the father's testimony was not required. The anesthesiologist designed the procedures for maintaining the records and observed them being implemented.

United States v. Console, 13 F.3d 641 (3d Cir. 1993) : The Court affirmed RICO convictions of attorneys and a physician for a scheme to defraud insurance companies, holding records of the physician were sufficiently shown to be business records by the testimony of a witness familiar with the office's record keeping system, even though she was not the custodian of the records.

United States v. Parsee, 178 F.3d 374 (5th Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed narcotics convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting certain business records that had been generated by a company different from the one by which they were offered at trial. Where Enterprise Leasing Company of Houston generated the records, it was sufficient that the witness from Enterprise Leasing Company of New Orleans testified that the records in all Enterprise offices nationwide are generated and maintained in the same manner, and that the witness understood and could explain the system, point out any errors, and respond meaningfully on cross-examination. Likewise, regional telephone operating companies could provide a sufficient foundation for records containing information collected and generated by long distance carriers. Affirming convictions in an extortion prosecution, United States v. Box, 50 F.3d 345 (5th Cir. 1995) , the Court held that a County Attorney, who could testify that records came from his office and vouch that the requirements of Rule 803(6) were met, was properly permitted to provide the foundation for the records, even though he did not hold the position when the records were made. In United States v. Iredia, n77 the Court held that bank employees could lay the foundation for records, even though they could not attest personally to their accuracy.

United States v. Jenkins, 345 F.3d 928 (6th Cir. 2003) : Although it reversed a conviction for crack cocaine distribution because other crimes evidence was erroneously admitted, the Court found no abuse of discretion when express mail package labels were admitted as business records. The postal inspector who provided the foundation did not have knowledge of the record keeping system at the post office where the packages were received, but he did have familiarity with the record keeping procedures of the U.S. Postal Service and he had instructed the local USPS supervisor to maintain the very records in question and had instructed the supervisor about how those records were to be maintained. Thus, the inspector was an "otherwise qualified witness." In United States v. Laster, 258 F.3d 525 (6th Cir.

2001) , the defendant was charged with drug offenses after ordering a component of methamphetamine from a chemical company using his employer's company name without its permission. The Court held that records of the chemical company were not admissible under Rule 803(6) because the foundation witness, a detective for a state drug task force, had no personal knowledge of or any familiarity with the company's record-keeping practices. In the prosecution of a kickback scheme involving a gambling casino, United States v. Dakota, n78 the Court found it was error (but harmless) to admit documents seized from the office of the brother of one of the defendants as business records. The witness offering foundation testimony was a law enforcement agent who was present when the documents were seized and who had analyzed them, but who did not have knowledge of the recordkeeping procedures, "and was certainly not the custodian of those records for the business." In United States v. Weinstock, n79 a prosecution of a podiatrist for defrauding Blue Cross, the government introduced a Physician Practice Profile, based on data from the Blue Cross computers, which listed all the similar procedures performed by the defendant and other participating podiatrists in the community. Affirming, the Court found no error when a Blue Cross fraud investigator was permitted to give the foundation for the evidence, since he was acquainted with Blue Cross' use of the data and the procedures followed to ensure its reliability. Affirming fraud convictions in United States v. Hathaway, n80 the Court held that the government properly laid the foundation for admission of business records through the testimony of an FBI agent. Since the agent was familiar with the record-keeping system, the Court stated there was no reason why he could not lay the requisite foundation.

United States v. Spiller, 261 F.3d 683 (7th Cir. 2001) : Affirming a conviction for distributing crack cocaine, the Court held that handwritten ledgers were not admissible as business records because the government experts who introduced them did not have personal knowledge that they had been kept in the ordinary course of business or were otherwise trustworthy. However, there was sufficient evidence connecting the ledgers to the defendant that they were admissible as party admissions under Rule 801(d)(2)(A). In United States v. Muhammad, 928 F.2d 1461 (7th Cir. 1991) , to prove that a beeper was rented to the defendant in a drug conspiracy case, the government had a local service manager provide the foundation for records, the originals of which were kept by the beeper company at a central location. The Court held that the foundation was adequate, as the witness had knowledge of the procedures used in the creation and maintenance of the records and the defendant was afforded an opportunity to inquire into the accuracy of the records offered and the reliability of the procedures used for creating and maintaining them. In United States v. Franco, n81 the Court held that a narcotics agent was qualified to testify about the manner in which money exchange employees prepared and maintained records. It rejected the argument that a custodian of the records is required and concluded that the agent could testify on the basis of his conversations with knowledgeable people and his own observations of the records. In United States v. Wables, n82 the Court affirmed marijuana convictions and held that records seized by government agents were properly admitted. That a witness who explained portions of the records did not have personal knowledge of all the entries did not matter, since the witness could testify as to the procedures by which the records were prepared. In United States v. Chappell, n83 the Court affirmed mail fraud convictions arising out of misrepresentations that the defendant made to investors in his company, finding no error in the admission of certain corporate business records whose custodian had died before trial. Two former employees of the company testified that the deceased custodian had charge of the records, and an SEC agent testified that the defendant told him the same thing. The agent, a trained CPA, also testified that he examined the books and records obtained from the deceased custodian, that they appeared to have been made in the ordinary course of business, and that he corroborated the records with checks, bank statements, and other records. Finally, the Court found that testimony given by the deceased custodian before the SEC concerning his custody of the records was an agent's admission.

United States v. Riley, 236 F.3d 982 (8th Cir. 2001) : To prove the chemical identity of the substance sold to undercover officers, the government intended to offer the testimony of a state crime-lab chemist and a document entitled "State Crime Laboratory: Report of Laboratory Analysis." When the chemist had to leave the trial for medical reasons, the government prepared a stipulation form, but the defendant refused to sign it. The prosecutor then offered the report on the basis of testimony by an officer that he had delivered the substance to the crime lab, received the report from the lab, and that the numbers on the sample and the report matched. Reversing the defendant's conviction, the Court held that the foundation for the report was inadequate. The officers had no personal knowledge of how the lab reports were prepared or maintained and thus could not testify that the documents had been kept in the course of a regularly conducted business activity or that it was the regular practice of that business to make the report. In United States v. Turner, 189 F.3d 712 (8th Cir. 1999) , the Court affirmed convictions in a scheme by off-duty police officers to submit false time cards, thereby defrauding a low-income housing project where they were security guards. The Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting time cards and payroll records showing overlaps between the time the defendants claimed to have been working at the project and the times reflected on their police department duty rosters. Although the records custodian called to lay the foundation for the time cards and payroll records had never seen the documents until shortly before the trial, the Court observed that "[a] sponsoring witness need not possess or even see the records in question before trial." In United States v. Page, n84 the Court affirmed a conviction for interstate transportation of a stolen motor vehicle, holding that a custodian of a business record could lay the proper foundation for its introduction whether or not the custodian was familiar with the circumstances underlying the preparation of the particular document. In United States v. Pfeiffer, n85 the Court emphasized that, in laying the foundation for a business record, a custodian is all that is necessary. The persons responsible for making the record need not testify.

United States v. Ray, 930 F.2d 1368 (9th Cir. 1990) , amended (9th Cir. 1991): The Court, affirming a conviction for manufacturing methamphetamine, held that a welfare fraud investigator familiar with filing and reporting requirements for public assistance benefits and forms was a qualified witness to establish the foundation for admitting certain documents in the defendant's welfare file tending to show his recently acquired wealth following a period of relative poverty.

United States v. Dickerson, 248 F.3d 1036 (10th Cir. 2001) : The Court affirmed drug convictions, but found (harmless) error in the admission of hotel records. The records were admitted under Rule 803(6), but the Court noted that the government presented no custodian or other qualified witness to authenticate the records, so it was an abuse of discretion to admit them "without any basis for determining their reliability." In United States v. Johnson, 971 F.2d 562 (10th Cir. 1992) , the Court, affirming a conviction for money laundering in a fraud scheme, held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting bank records of deposits through the testimony of individual investors rather than through a bank custodian of records, as there was ample direct and circumstantial evidence of the documents' trustworthiness.

United States v. Parker, 749 F.2d 628 (11th Cir. 1984) : Affirming a conviction for stealing from an interstate shipment, the Court held that a document identified as a certificate of export to the United States was properly admitted as a business record of a Scottish distiller when a vice president of the United States importer of the distiller's Scotch whiskey testified that the document was prepared in the ordinary course of the distiller's business so that the purchaser could avoid taxation in the United Kingdom. The Court stated, "That the witness and his company had neither prepared the certificate nor had first-hand knowledge of the preparation does not contravene Rule 803(6)."

[iii] Rule 803(6) -- Foundation -- Examples

[A] Rule 803(6) -- Admissible Records

United States v. Tafoya, 757 F.2d 1522 (5th Cir. 1985) : The Trial Judge properly admitted an employer's memoranda regarding bills to Libya for the defendant's salary in a tax prosecution, where a secretary authenticated the memoranda and another employee testified they were typical of those made by the employer. See also Gulf South Mach. Co. v. Kearney & Trecker Corp. n86(upholding introduction of a machine purchaser's logbook of the machine's malfunctions in a suit alleging manufacturing defects).

White v. Godinez, 301 F.3d 796 (7th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed habeas corpus relief for a state defendant convicted of murder and conspiracy to commit murder, finding ineffective assistance of counsel. The petitioner offered jail logs to show that his trial counsel had visited him in jail for less than an hour. The sheriff testified that it was the jail's practice to record all inmate visits and that he could not remember a single incident of an officer's failing to record an attorney's visit during his 20-year tenure. The Court held that the sheriff's testimony was sufficient to support the jail logs as business records. In United States v. Kasvin, n87 the Court sustained a conviction for conspiracy to distribute and possess marijuana, finding that business records of an organization's marijuana purchases and sales were admissible. See also Stone v. Morris n88(admitting in a prisoner's civil rights action a memorandum written by a correctional counselor containing an account of the events leading to the injuries, where counselors made similar memoranda as part of their routine duties; that the memo did not reveal the source of the information contained within it went to weight and not admissibility).

Firemen's Fund Ins. Co. v. Thien, 63 F.3d 754 (8th Cir. 1995) : In a declaratory judgment action to determine whether a fellow-employee exclusion in a liability policy applied to a fatal crash of a company plane, the Court held that paychecks and supporting documents related to the decedent whose status was at issue were properly admitted as business records upon the testimony of the payroll administrator and the secretary responsible for recording employees' hours. In Hoselton v. Metz Baking Co., 48 F.3d 1056 (8th Cir. 1995) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant shareholders in an action for breach of fiduciary duty in a business transaction. An accountant's notes containing statements made by others during a negotiation session were admissible as business records to prove what the accountant heard, because the accountant testified in his deposition that the notes were prepared by him in the course of his accounting and consulting business and that it was his practice to take notes for his clients at negotiation sessions. The statements included in the notes were not hearsay but were offered only to show that the plaintiffs were on notice of certain expectations that the defendants had in the negotiations.

Haygood v. Auto-Owners Ins. Co., 995 F.2d 1512 (11th Cir. 1993) : As evidence that the plaintiff, who was claiming for fire damage to his house, had a motive to commit arson, the defendant insurer offered a letter from the mortgagee bank's attorney announcing that foreclosure was imminent. The Court held that the exhibit should have been admitted as a business record, but the error was harmless. In Itel Capital Corp. v. Cups Coal Co., n89 the Court, in the course of affirming a plaintiff's judgment for money owed under equipment leases and for possession of leased equipment, reiterated that "the person who actually prepared the documents need not have testified so long as other circumstantial evidence and testimony suggests their trustworthiness."

[B] Rule 803(6) -- Foundation -- Examples -- Inadmissible Records

Willco Kuwait (Trading) S.A.K. v. deSavary, 843 F.2d 618 (1st Cir. 1988) : The Court upheld the exclusion of a telex from a person employed by a Kuwait petroleum company in a suit alleging securities and common-law fraud. The telex was not made in the routine course of business, it made reference to an investigation and report that had been made three months earlier and was not made at or near the time of the investigation, and it was sent just two days prior to a letter by the company to the defendant in which the company alleged that the defendant had made misrepresentations.

United States v. Garcia-Duarte, 718 F.2d 42 (2d Cir. 1983) : The Court held that a customer record book of drug transactions could not be admitted as a business record where the government failed to show who made the entries, the circumstances under which they were made, or their relationship to the person whom the government believed was involved in dispensing drugs.

United States v. Pelullo, 964 F.2d 193 (3d Cir. 1992) : The Court reversed convictions for wire fraud because wire-transfer documents that had been subpoenaed from banks were erroneously admitted. No custodial or noncustodial witness familiar with the record keeping system laid an adequate foundation for their admission as business records. In United States v. Furst, n90 the Court held, in reviewing a conviction for embezzlement from pension funds, that a commodities firm's records, offered to show the value of securities traded, were not sufficiently established as business records by the testimony of an employee of a bank who testified they were accurate as to money transferred between the firm and the bank or by an employee of a data processing company who testified the records had been accurately prepared from data supplied by the firm.

Positive Black Talk Inc. v. Cash Money Records Inc., 394 F.3d 357 (5th Cir. 2004) : To rebut the claim by a defendant in a copyright suit that he had recorded an album containing the song at issue before hearing the plaintiffs' song, the plaintiffs offered a promotional mailer for the album that did not list the song. Affirming a judgment for the defendants, the Court held that the mailer was properly excluded because it was hearsay and not admissible under the business records exception. The plaintiff offered no witness or other evidence that the mailer was made at or near the time it was said to recount by or from information transmitted by a person with knowledge. In Byrd v. Hunt Tool Shipyards, Inc., n91 the Court held that a medical report in a product liability case was properly excluded when no foundation was laid through a qualified witness.

United States v. Mahar, 801 F.2d 1477 (6th Cir. 1986) : The Court held that a proper foundation had not been laid for 12 pages of handwritten notes found in a medical clinic where a handwriting expert identified five pages as being in the writing of the clinic's doctor and three in the writing of the father of the clinic's president. No witness testified to the record-keeping practices of the clinic and the circumstances under which notes were recorded.

City of Long Beach v. Standard Oil Co., 46 F.3d 929 (9th Cir. 1995) : Affirming a judgment for an oil company in an antitrust case, the Court found no error in the exclusion of handwritten notes offered against the defendant. The plaintiffs had failed to show that the author made the notes pursuant to company procedure rather than as "self-reflective musings."

Chen v. Bouchard, 347 F.3d 1299 (Fed. Cir. 2003) : The Court upheld the Board of Patent Appeals and Interferences' award of priority of inventorship to the senior party. It found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of a nontestifying researcher's notebooks, given that the authentication evidence was weak and there was no evidence as to the company's policies regarding maintenance of laboratory notebooks.

[iv] Rule 803(6) -- Foundation -- Nonbusiness Purpose

United States v. Robinson, 700 F.2d 205 (5th Cir. 1983) : Affirming convictions for misrepresentation, the Court found it was error (but harmless) to admit notes made for his own use by a county purchasing clerk concerning meetings of the Board of Supervisors. The notes were introduced through a records custodian, who authenticated them but did not establish that they were made as part of routine business practice.

[v] Rule 803(6) -- Foundation -- Procedure for Laying Foundation

United States v. Keplinger, 776 F.2d 678 (7th Cir. 1985) : The Court stated that it found nothing inherently wrong in a "wholesale" approach to taking foundation testimony, under which "the government witnesses provided foundation testimony about all of the documents at the same time and testified about large group of documents by type."

[vi] Rule 803(6) -- Foundation -- Produced in Discovery

United States v. Lawrence, 934 F.2d 868 (7th Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed tax evasion convictions arising out of a "skimming" scheme, holding that daily sales sheets were sufficiently authenticated and shown to be business records by proof, inter alia, that the defendants' attorney produced the documents in response to a subpoena calling for their business' records.

[l] Rule 803(6) -- Incomplete Records

United States v. Panza, 750 F.2d 1141 (2d Cir. 1984) : Affirming convictions for a scheme to defraud insurance companies in connection with an assigned risk plan, the Court held that properly authenticated insurance company files were admissible despite the fact that some minor papers were missing.

United States v. Foster, 711 F.2d 871 (9th Cir. 1983) : The Court held that a ledger listing drug transactions was properly admitted even though it was incomplete, had several pages missing, and contained entries made out of sequence, since the entries actually made were made regularly and at or near the time of events.

[m] Rule 803(6) -- Internal Memoranda

Gibbs v. State Farm Mut. Ins. Co., 544 F.2d 423 (9th Cir. 1976) : In a suit against a liability insurer for bad-faith failure to settle, the Court held that an interoffice memorandum stating that an injured child's father would have been happy with a settlement within the policy limits was admissible as a business record, since it was the regular practice of the insurer to prepare memoranda relating to a claim.

[n] Rule 803(6) -- Internet Postings

United States v. Jackson, 208 F.3d 633 (7th Cir. 2000) : The defendant, charged with fraud against the Postal Service in a scheme that included falsely attributing hate mail to white supremacist groups, attempted to introduce website postings from those groups that allegedly indicated responsibility for the hate mail. Affirming, the Court held that the web postings were hearsay that did not qualify as a business record of the Internet service providers, since the ISPs were merely conduits that did not post or monitor the contents of the web sites.

[o] Rule 803(6) -- Investigative Reports

Crimm v. Missouri Pac. R.R., 750 F.2d 703 (8th Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed an employer's judgment in an age discrimination action, finding no error in the admission of handwritten notes and an investigative report prepared by the company's managing agent. The documents qualified as business records because the agent was directed to conduct an investigation and to prepare a report and he did so nine months before any complaint or suit was filed. However, the Court's opinion does not describe any testimony that the documents were prepared as part of the routine of the business.

United States v. Frazier, 53 F.3d 1105 (10th Cir. 1995) : The former president of a corporation providing technical and social services to Native Americans was convicted of misapplying federal funds provided to the corporation. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting an audit report prepared by an independent contractor at the direction of the Department of Labor after the DOL suspected the president of misappropriation. The audit report was not just for purposes of litigation, but also was part of the DOL's ongoing compliance review process;

furthermore, the neutrality of the preparer and the preparer's ten years' experience in preparing such audits lent trustworthiness to the report.

[p] Rule 803(6) -- Laboratory Reports

United States v. Roulette, 75 F.3d 418 (8th Cir. 1996) : Affirming cocaine-related convictions, the Court held that laboratory reports identifying a substance as cocaine base were admissible under the business records exception even though the person who actually conducted the tests did not testify.

United States v. Garnett, 122 F.3d 1016 (11th Cir. 1997) : The defendant, a physician's assistant, was convicted of taking hydrocodone tablets from their bottles and substituting other medications knowing that the substituted medications would be erroneously dispensed to patients. The Trial Judge admitted a report prepared by the FDA Forensic Chemistry Center, which identified the drugs in the bottles that the defendant had tampered with. The Court held that this report was properly admitted under the business records exception. A doctor employed by the FDA testified that reports like the one proffered are regularly prepared at the FDA lab in the normal course of business and that he physically observed the drug samples and reporting in this case.

[q] Rule 803(6) -- Opinions

Holbrook v. Lykes Bros. S.S. Co., 80 F.3d 777 (3d Cir. 1996) : In an action alleging that a seaman's death from mesothelioma was caused by asbestos exposure, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion under Rule 403 in redacting references to mesothelioma in the death certificate, autopsy report, and hospital records. Although documents admissible under Rule 803(6) may contain opinions, the difficulty of diagnosing mesothelioma meant that unexamined references to the disease were not helpful to and could potentially have misled the jury.

[r] Rule 803(6) -- Oral Proof of Missing Records

United States v. Wells, 262 F.3d 455 (5th Cir. 2001) : Reversing a conviction for narcotics offenses, the Court found error in the admission of testimony by a cooperating witness that he and his friend, with whom he sold drugs to the defendant, kept little ledgers of sales and that the ledgers had the defendant's name in them indicating that she purchased drugs over a six-month period. The witness said that he kept the ledger every week to assure that his inventory of supplies and his money would be correct -- which might satisfy the foundation requirements of Rule 803(6) -- and that he threw the ledgers away each week -- which might have justified secondary evidence regarding their contents under Rule 1004. However, because "the rationale underlying this exception to the rule against hearsay is that the inherent reliability of business records is supplied by systematic checking, by regularity and continuity," the Court found that "we simply cannot conclude that the oral testimony of Antoine, a cooperating witness, with respect to his memories of drug sales apparently drafted by someone else several years earlier and destroyed soon thereafter had sufficient indicia of trustworthiness."

[s] Rule 803(6) -- Personal Knowledge

Hynes v. Coughlin, 79 F.3d 285 (2d Cir. 1996) : In an inmate's § 1983 action against prison guards, the defendants offered a "Use of Force" report prepared by one of the guards purporting to describe the beginning of the altercation, although she testified that she had not seen the incident until she heard a scream and observed another guard holding his genitals. Although the Court indicated that the report was not admissible under Rules 803(1), (5), or (8) because the declarant lacked personal knowledge of the start of the incident, it said that the report might be admissible on remand as a business record if the declarant could show that the information was transmitted by a person with knowledge and did not represent just her speculation.

[t] Rule 803(6) -- Records Created by Another Entity

United States v. Doe, 960 F.2d 221 (1st Cir. 1992) : In a prosecution for criminal possession of a firearm, the Court held that an invoice from a South Carolina telemarketing firm was properly admitted as a business record of a Massachusetts sports shop to which it had been sent. No custodian from the telemarketing firm needed to testify, as the invoice was relied on by the sports shop and had become integrated into itsthe shop's records.

United States v. Jakobetz, 955 F.2d 786 (2d Cir. 1992) : Affirming a conviction for kidnapping, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting a bridge toll receipt that had been included in a business' expense account records. Although the document was originally created by another entity, it had been incorporated into the business' records to a sufficient degree to permit an inference that the records were regularly prepared. Furthermore, a toll receipt is not the type of evidence that is so susceptible to fabrication that authentication by a representative of the bridge should be required; in fact, the defendant had relied on its authenticity when he submitted the receipt for reimbursement of his expenses.

United States v. Parsee, 178 F.3d 374 (5th Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed narcotics convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting business records that had been generated by a company different from the one by which they were offered at trial. Where Enterprise Leasing Company of Houston generated the records, it was sufficient that the witness from Enterprise Leasing Company of New Orleans testified that the records in all Enterprise offices nationwide are generated and maintained in the same manner, and that the witness understood and could explain the system, point out any errors, and respond meaningfully on cross-examination. Likewise, regional telephone operating companies could provide a sufficient foundation for records containing information collected and generated by long distance carriers. In a prosecution for defrauding insurance companies, United States v. Duncan, 919 F.2d 981 (5th Cir. 1990) , the government introduced insurance company records containing unauthenticated medical records and statements by doctors. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence, since the insurance company records were compiled from the business records of hospitals. Even though the records were not created by the business having custody of them, they were trustworthy because the hospitals and insurance companies relied on them in conducting business. See also United States v. Ullrich n92(a car dealer made a manufacturer's statement part of the dealer's records). In Snyder v. Whittaker Corp., n93 the Court held that a memorandum written by employees of one company was not a business record of another company that received it and kept it.

MRT Constr. Inc. v. Hardrives, Inc., 158 F.3d 478 (9th Cir. 1998) : In an action for an accounting between two construction companies, the Court found no error in the admission of attorney bills generated by the law firm representing the defendant in a related proceeding over the construction project. The CFO of the defendant was a proper witness for qualifying the records, even though the records were prepared by another entity. The defendant received the bills directly from the law firm and maintained the bills in its files; the defendant relied upon the bills as statements of fees owed to the law firm; and the defendant had a substantial interest in the accuracy of the bills. In United States v. Childs, 5 F.3d 1328 (9th Cir. 1993) , the Court affirmed convictions for interstate transportation of stolen motor vehicles, holding there was no error in admitting an application for Alberta, Canada, license plates as a business record of the Alberta Division of Motor Vehicles. Although the application was made by a private auto club, it was contracted by the DMV to issue licenses, was hooked directly into the DMV's computer system, and could perform transactions on-line, so the private auto club and the DMV were essentially acting as one business entity in issuing license plates. The Court also upheld admission of several types of documentation kept by auto dealers (e.g., certificates of title, purchase orders, and odometer statements) even though they were not made by the dealers, since they were kept in the regular course of business and otherwise trustworthy. In NLRB v. First Termite Control Co., n94 the Labor Board, to establish an interstate commerce nexus by proving the amount of the defendant company's interstate business, offered a railroad freight bill into evidence. The bill was inadmissible as a business record, however, because the company's bookkeeper could not lay a foundation for the railroad's business records.

United States v. Bueno-Sierra, 99 F.3d 375 (11th Cir. 1996) : The Court affirmed convictions for drug-related offenses, finding no error in the admission of a vessel's berth request form that had been prepared by the company owning the vessel and had been kept by the Miami Port. The custodian of the records, who worked for the Port, testified that a vessel's agents personally prepare berth requests, they routinely submit them as a prerequisite to obtaining a docking location, and the reports are routinely maintained by the Port in its office. In United States v. Hawkins, 905 F.2d 1489 (11th Cir. 1990) , the Court affirmed mail fraud convictions, holding that stamped notations, such as "insufficient funds," on returned checks were admissible as the bank's business records, since they were made contemporaneously by an employee with the requisite knowledge in the course of a regularly-conducted business activity in which it was a regular practice to make the record, and there was ample circumstantial evidence of trustworthiness. "It is not necessary ... that the document be prepared by the business which has custody of it, so long as other circumstantial evidence suggests the trustworthiness of the record."

Air Land Forwarders, Inc. v. United States, 172 F.3d 1338 (Fed. Cir. 1999) : When the government paid moving companies for transporting the belongings of military personnel, it offset unresolved property damage claims against charges due the carrier for other shipments. Affirming a judgment for the government in an action for refunds on certain offsets, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting as business records of the military repair estimates prepared by third parties and submitted by the service members in support of damage claims. The estimates had been incorporated into the military's records, they were customarily relied upon by the military in making decisions about proper compensation to be paid to the service member, and there were other assurances of reliability, including criminal penalties for making false claims and the familiarity of Military Claims Office personnel with estimators in the area and the estimating process in general. In a patent dispute, Munoz v. Strahm Farms, Inc., 69 F.3d 501 (Fed. Cir. 1995) , the defendant, to prove that a machine was in public use before a particular date, offered a photographic slide showing the machine, which had been inscribed by Kodak with a date on which it was developed. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the date evidence, even without testimony from Kodak, as the date was part of a business record and the recipient's testimony that it was his regular practice to check the dates on the slides when he received them from Kodak and file them in his office was sufficient foundation to satisfy the Rule.

[u] Rule 803(6) -- Regular Practice To Make and Keep Record

United States v. Lemire, 720 F.2d 1327 (D.C. Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed fraud convictions, finding that a document was not a business record, since it was not made in the regular practice of the business and it summarized events that had taken place some time before.

Kassel v. Gannett Co., 875 F.2d 935 (1st Cir. 1989) : In a defamation action by a Veterans Administration psychologist who alleged that defendant's libelous newspaper story led to the VA's reassigning him to a position where he had nothing to do, the Court held that "report of contact" forms filled out by a VA official recording calls from aides to Senators regarding constituent complaints about the article were properly admitted as business records even though such a form was not "usually" completed, but only when the official "perceive[d] the need."

United States v. Strother, 49 F.3d 869 (2d Cir. 1995) : In a prosecution for obtaining funds from a financial institution by false pretenses, the disputed question was whether the defendant asked a bank official to honor a check for $82,000 drawn on insufficient funds, on the promise that he would wire in money to cover it, or had asked the official to hold the check rather than to pay it and she mistakenly paid it. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of several memoranda, made by bank officials who reviewed the transaction, that tended to support the defendant's contentions. The bank covering a check for $82,000 was not a situation that routinely recurred, and the Court was "reluctant to adopt a rule that would permit the introduction into evidence of memoranda drafted in response to unusual or isolated events." Another memorandum was found properly excluded because it was prepared six months after the relevant event. In United States v. Freidin, n95 the Court reversed a conviction for tax offenses, because of the erroneous admission of a memorandum found in the files of the accounting firm for which the defendant worked. Although a witness testified that the memorandum was made and kept by the firm in the ordinary course of business, the Court reasoned that the business records rule was not satisfied because it was not the regular practice of the business to make or keep similar memoranda. Although it opined that the better result would be to admit trustworthy records, the Court held that the plain language of the Rule required a showing that the record be made pursuant to a regular business practice. Although the Court reversed a Tax Court deficiency judgment in Ruberto v. Commissioner, n96 it upheld the Judge's ruling that receipts from a church offered by the taxpayers were inadmissible because there was no showing that they were made in the regular course of business.

Zenith Radio Corp. v. Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co., 723 F.2d 238 (3d Cir. 1983) , rev'g 505 F. Supp. 1190 (E.D. Pa. 1980) , rev'd on other grounds, 475 U.S. 574 (1986) : In a massive antitrust case in which the plaintiffs alleged that the defendants conspired to drive them out of the market for television receivers, the Court reversed most of the summary judgment entered for the defendants and found that evidence that qualified for admission as business records had been improperly excluded. The Court rejected the Trial Judge's requirement that records must have been "created by routine practices where careful checking and habits of precision and accuracy assure their accuracy," reasoning that "[g]iven the separate treatment in Rule 803(6) of untrustworthiness, we think the regular practice requirement should be generously construed to favor admission."

Rock v. Huffco Gas & Oil Co., 922 F.2d 272 (5th Cir. 1991) : A summary judgment was granted for the defendants in a negligence suit for injuries allegedly suffered by an employee of an offshore catering service. The Court held that statements by the since-deceased employee as to how the accident happened, which were included in records kept by the employer, were properly excluded, as the reports were not made and kept as an integral part of the employee's usual course of business. In Wilander v. McDermott Int'l, Inc., n97 the Court reversed a finding that the plaintiff in this Jones Act case had been contributorily negligent, on the ground that there was no showing that a statement offered by the defendants, which was taken by the barge captain on his own initiative from the supposed sole witness to the accident, was one kept in the regular course of business or that it was the regular practice of the business to make such reports. See also Malley v. United States Fid. & Guar. Co. n98(a report of engineers concerning a mudslide was not admissible as a business record where it was not established that the company regularly wrote reports on the causes of mudslides); United States v. Williams n99(reversing a conviction for transportation of a stolen vehicle where the government attempted to prove value by offering a "verified statement" of a trailer maintenance facility operator without showing that the statement was made in the ordinary course of business).

United States v. Humphrey, 279 F.3d 372 (6th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed bank embezzlement convictions, finding no error in the exclusion of a bank memo about a shipment of food stamps from one branch to another. The memo was not admissible as a business record, because the defense failed to lay a foundation for this exception and there was no evidence that the handwritten memo was kept in the ordinary course of business.

Lust v. Sealy, Inc., 383 F.3d 580 (7th Cir. 2004) : In an action by an employee who claimed that she had been denied a promotion because of gender discrimination, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of memos made by the plaintiff's supervisor after she complained to him about being passed over for discriminatory reasons. The memos said that the supervisor had not promoted her because of deficiencies in her interpersonal skills and that he was planning to promote her soon. The company's regular personnel recordkeeping processes did not include records of employee conversations. These memos had been made only to create evidence for use in the plaintiff's anticipated lawsuit. In an action for age discrimination, Pierce v. Atchison T. & S.F. Ry., 110 F.3d 431 (7th Cir. 1997) , the central question was whether the plaintiff had made a knowing and voluntary release of his ADEA claims. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court found no error in the exclusion of a memorandum prepared by the plaintiff's supervisor, which purportedly summarized the meetings between the supervisor and the plaintiff leading up to the signing of the release. The memorandum memorialized an "unusual incident" and "was not created with the kind of regularity or routine which gives business records their inherent reliability." In United States v. Ramsey, n100 the Court found error (but harmless) in the admission of occasional jottings on desk calendars as business records in a prosecution for mail and wire fraud. The entries were not made with sufficient regularity to satisfy the hearsay exception.

Monotype Corp. v. International Typeface Corp., 43 F.3d 443 (9th Cir. 1994) : In an action by a typeface designer against a licenser of typefaces, the Court held that a document prepared by an employee of the designer's customer expressing the employee's views as to the similarities and differences of typefaces in issue was properly excluded because it was not the type of report the company was in the practice of making in the regular course of its business. In Waddell v. Commissioner, n101 the Court held that the Tax Court did not abuse its discretion in determining that an appraisal report prepared for a health care provider was inadmissible. The appraiser had died before trial, there was no evidence that the appraiser had a practice of making appraisals for the provider, no showing was made that the provider routinely obtained such appraisals, and there was genuine concern about the trustworthiness of the appraisal. In a suit by trustees of employee trust funds for breach of a collective bargaining agreement, Paddack v. Dave Christensen, Inc., n102 the Trial Judge excluded compliance audit reports that were made by an independent accounting firm and offered by the plaintiffs to show contribution deficiencies on the part of the defendants. The Court agreed that the reports were not business records of the accounting firm because they were not part of a regularly conducted activity, but indicated that the reports might be relied upon under Rule 703 to support an expert opinion.

Hertz v. Luzenac America, Inc., 370 F.3d 1014 (10th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed a judgment for a former employee who claimed that the defendant discriminated against him on religious grounds and retaliated against him. It found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence of notes made by a supervisor two days after meeting with the plaintiff to discuss problems with his performance. The supervisor testified that he made the notes because he thought he was going to fire the employee. The Court concluded that there was insufficient evidence that it was the routine practice of the business to make such notes.

United States v. Jacoby, 955 F.2d 1527 (11th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed convictions for fraud involving an insolvent savings and loan, holding that a law firm associate's memorandum to the files in connection with a real estate closing was properly admissible under the Rule. Although the event recorded was not a routine transaction, it was the attorney's routine practice to prepare a memorandum to the file whenever he believed it was necessary to explain something or make a record of an unusual circumstance.

[v] Rule 803(6) -- Relationship to Other Rules

Parker v. Reda, 327 F.3d 211 (2d Cir. 2003) : Affirming a judgment for corrections officers sued by an inmate who alleged use of excessive force, the Court held that a memorandum prepared by a corrections sergeant was properly permitted to be read to the jury as past recollection recorded. The Court concluded that the memorandum could be read to the jury even though the Judge ruled that it lacked sufficient indicia of reliability to be admitted as a business record; the two exceptions "are based on different rationales, and there is nothing inherently inconsistent about the admission, under 803(5), of evidence ruled inadmissible under 803(6)."

United States v. Blackburn, 992 F.2d 666 (7th Cir. 1993) : The Court held there was no error in admitting, in a trial for bank robbery, computer printouts of lensometer readings for eyeglasses left in a stolen getaway car. Because the analysis had been made at the request of the FBI in anticipation of litigation, the records did not have the reliability of business records under Rule 803(6). Because they were made independently by a private company, they were not barred by the criminal-investigation exceptions of Rule 803(8), but since the company was not the equivalent of government investigators, its reports were not records of public offices or agencies admissible under that Rule. However, because the tests were entirely mechanical and objective, and there was no possibility of bias since the investigation had no suspects at the time, the exhibit was reliable enough to be admitted under the residual exception. In Abdel v. United States, n103 the Court upheld a judgment that the Department of Agriculture properly disqualified a supermarket from the food stamp program because it accepted food stamps for nonfood items. The Court held that transaction reports prepared by a DOA agent after visiting the supermarket were properly admitted under Rule 803(6) and rejected an argument that only Rule 803(8) could be used to admit public records.

United States v. Orellana-Blanco, 294 F.3d 1143 (9th Cir. 2002) : The defendant was convicted of marriage fraud and making a false statement on an immigration document, after entering an allegedly sham marriage. Reversing, the Court held that a "Record of Sworn Statement," made when the defendant applied for a green card, was not admissible as a business record: "When public records are used against a defendant in a criminal prosecution, the public records exception [Rule 803(8)] is the exclusive applicable hearsay exception."

Haskell v. United States Dep't of Agriculture, 743 F. Supp. 765 (D. Kan. 1990) , aff'd, 930 F.2d 816 (10th Cir. 1991) : In granting the government's motion for a summary judgment barring a store co-owner from the food stamp program, the Trial Judge held that statements of an Agriculture Department investigative aide who witnessed several of the illegal transactions were admissible under Rule 803(8). The Court of Appeals affirmed, holding that the reports would be admissible under Rule 803(6), so it was not necessary to reach the Rule 803(8) question.

United States v. Brown, 9 F.3d 907 (11th Cir. 1993) : The Court held in a firearms prosecution that a police department property receipt was properly admitted under Rule 803(6), where the police custodian testified that the regular and customary procedure was to fill out a property receipt for any type of evidence. Although the business records exception may not be used as a back door to introduce matters from law enforcement personnel inadmissible under Rule 803(8)(B), routine, nonadversarial police records like this property receipt were not the type of evidence contemplated by the exclusion in Rule 803(8).

[w] Rule 803(6) -- Source of Information

[i] Rule 803(6) -- Business Duty

United States v. Vigneau, 187 F.3d 70 (1st Cir. 1999) : Affirming convictions for participating in a continuing criminal enterprise and drug offenses, but reversing convictions on 21 counts of money laundering, the Court held that it was error to admit, as business records, records of Western Union money transfers which contained the defendant's name, address, and phone number as the sender, because the declarants were not under any business duty to make truthful and accurate statements. In United States v. Patrick, 959 F.2d 991 (D.C. Cir. 1992) , a defendant charged with drug trafficking offenses argued that he was innocently visiting the apartment in which he was arrested, but the government introduced a receipt for a TV set in the room that bore the defendant's name and the address of the apartment. Reversing, the Court held that the receipt was hearsay not coming within any exception when offered to prove the name and address of the purchaser. When the source of information for a business record is not acting under a business duty, there must be a showing that it was the business' standard practice to verify the information if the record containing the information is to be admitted under the Rule.

Romano v. Howarth, 998 F.2d 101 (2d Cir. 1993) : Reversing a judgment for the defendants in a prisoner's civil rights action arising out of his treatment at a medical facility, the Court noted that a nurse's "progress notes" had been improperly admitted. The notes recounted a statement by a defendant corrections officer regarding how an injury to the plaintiff occurred, but it was unclear whether the corrections staff at the facility had any "business duty" to the medical staff so as to ensure the accuracy of the account. In any event, the officer's motive to fudge the truth of what happened meant that the statement lacked reliability. In United States v. Bortnovsky, n104 a RICO and fraud prosecution, the Trial Judge properly excluded an insurance adjuster's report offered by the defendant because the relevant statements in the report were made by a person with no business duty to report. In Gray v. Busch Entertainment Corp., n105 the Court affirmed a judgment for an amusement park sued by an injured patron who fell from a small train, holding that the exception did not cover a hearsay statement in the park's first aid report. The statement was made by the patron's daughter who was not acting in the regular course of business.

Ramrattan v. Burger King Corp., 656 F. Supp. 522 (D. Md. 1987) : Ruling on in limine motions in an automobile accident case, the Court held that portions of a police report recording statements of witnesses were inadmissible because the witnesses were not acting in the regular course of business in making the statements.

United States v. Ismoila, 100 F.3d 380 (5th Cir. 1996) : The Court held, in a credit-card fraud prosecution, that affidavits and other notices to the issuing banks from credit card holders indicating that their cards had been stolen and charges were not authorized were not admissible as business records, as it was not the holders' business to fill out the affidavits, and the holders were not part of the banks' business in making and keeping the records.

United States v. Yates, 553 F.2d 518 (6th Cir. 1977) : Reversing a bank robbery conviction on other grounds, the Court noted that the government properly conceded at oral argument that a letter from bank employees to bank management relating that the FBI called the bank to say that the robber had turned himself in should not have been admitted at trial as a business record. The concession was proper because "[t]he document contained statements made by a third party outside of the scope of the business."

Datamatic Servs. v. United States, 909 F.2d 1029 (7th Cir. 1990) : In a suit by a taxpayer for refund of a penalty assessed by the IRS for abusive tax shelters, the Court held that a report to investors introduced by the government was not a business record because the sources of the information were outsiders with respect to the business, but any error in admitting the report was harmless.

United States v. Turner, 189 F.3d 712 (8th Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed convictions in a scheme by off-duty police officers to submit false time cards, thereby defrauding a low-income housing project where they were security guards. It found no abuse of discretion in admitting time cards and payroll records showing overlaps between the time the defendants claimed to have been working at the project and the times reflected on their police department duty rosters. There was no evidence that any person not acting in the regular course of business provided any of the information in the records. In an FELA case, Grogg v. Missouri Pac. R.R., n106 the plaintiff contended that it was error to exclude a railroad document stating that an air hose was broken on the date of a brake accident. The Court observed that, at a subsequent trial, the Judge must determine whether the person who provided the information recorded in the document was acting in the regular course of business or was an outsider. An outsider's recorded statement would not be admissible under Rule 803(6), while a recorded statement by a person acting for the business would be within the Rule.

United States v. Pazsint, 703 F.2d 420 (9th Cir. 1983) : The Court reversed a conviction for assaulting a federal officer on other grounds, but it ruled that tape-recorded calls that witnesses made to police reporting the actions of the defendant were not properly received as business records, since the callers were not under any business duty to the police.

United States v. McIntyre, 997 F.2d 687 (10th Cir. 1993) : The Court affirmed drug convictions, but observed that a motel's arrival-and-departure log had been erroneously admitted. Because the motel employee who filled out the log relied upon information provided by guests, the essential requirement that each actor in a chain of information be under a duty to provide accurate information to a business was not satisfied. The Court recognized that "[i]f the business entity has adequate verification or other assurance of accuracy of the information provided by the outside person, the exception may still apply." In United States v. Snyder, n107 the Court affirmed a conviction for conveying a weapon in a federal prison, holding that a written report of the incident that contained statements by two prisoners was not admissible as a business record, since the inmates were not under any business duty when making their statements. In United States v. Plum, n108 the Court affirmed a conviction for receiving stolen silver bars, but sustained a claim by the defendant that an exhibit was improperly admitted as a business record because the person submitting the information retained in the business record was under no business duty.

[ii] Rule 803(6) -- Source of Information -- Hearsay Exception

United States v. McGill, 953 F.2d 10 (1st Cir. 1992) : Affirming a conviction for tax evasion, the Court held that a bank employee provided a sufficient foundation for admitting taxpayer identification numbers on deposit tickets prepared by the defendant. It was a regular practice for bank employees to copy the numbers onto the ticket from the envelope prepared by the depositor into which the ticket had been placed.

Bondie v. Bic Corp., 947 F.2d 1531 (6th Cir. 1991) : In a product liability action in which the plaintiff alleged her child started a fire with a cigarette lighter, the defendant introduced the report of a medical social worker, made at the hospital after interviewing the mother and child, which recounted the mother's statement that the fire was set with matches. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court held there was no error in admitting the report, as it was made and kept in the ordinary course of business and the included statement of the mother was a party admission. Unlike some state rules, Rule 803(6) does not require that the ultimate declarant have a business duty to supply the information recorded, so long as the declarant's statements come within a hearsay exception or exemption and recording such statements is part of the regularly conducted activity.

United States v. Johnson, 28 F.3d 1487 (8th Cir. 1994) : Defendants charged with a drug distribution conspiracy objected to the admission of Western Union money transfer applications, which had been offered to prove money-laundering charges, on the ground that they were not business records because the forms were partially filled out by nonemployees. The Court held that the forms were properly admitted, since a sufficient foundation was provided that the defendants had partially filled out and signed the forms (making their portion admissions of a party-opponent), and the remainder of the forms were business records prepared in the ordinary course of business.

Sana v. Hawaiian Cruises, Ltd., 181 F.3d 1041 (9th Cir. 1999) : An employee on a cruise ship brought an action for maintenance and cure, after being diagnosed with encephalitis. To prove that he was ill at the time he worked on the ship, he offered a memorandum prepared by the investigator for the defendant's insurer, which contained statements from the plaintiff's fellow employees indicating that the plaintiff told them that he felt sick one day at work and that he was acting erratically while at work. The Court found it was error to exclude the memorandum, since each level of hearsay in it satisfied an exception to the hearsay rule. The plaintiff's statements to his coworkers about his physical condition were admissible under Rule 803(3); the employees' statements to the investigator were admissible as agency-admissions under Rule 801(d)(2)(D), because the employees had the duty to monitor and report any injuries or illness among the staff; and the memorandum itself was admissible as a record of regularly conducted activity. Affirming a judgment for police officers alleged to have used excessive force, in Bemis v. Edwards, 45 F.3d 1369 (9th Cir. 1995) , the Court held that a 911 tape was properly excluded because the citizen caller apparently lacked personal knowledge of the events that he was reporting. The Court stated that "[h]earsay statements on a 911 tape can be admitted into evidence as either a 'public record,' Fed.R.Evid. 803(8)(B), or a 'business record,' Fed.R.Evid. 803(6)," but that citizen callers are not under any duty to report and thus "a recorded statement by a citizen must satisfy a separate hearsay exception." Although a caller might be reporting a present sense impression or making an excited utterance, both exceptions require that a declarant have personal knowledge of the events described.

[iii] Rule 803(6) -- Source of Information -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Franks, 939 F.2d 600 (8th Cir. 1991) : Affirming a conviction for cocaine possession, the Court held there was no double hearsay problem in admitting Federal Express airbill receipts. The exhibits were offered only to show that the packages were received at the defendant's address by someone who signed her name.

United States v. Johnson, 297 F.3d 845 (9th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed convictions arising from a fraudulent telemarketing scheme, holding that sales orders and tapes were properly admitted as business records. Even though various purchasers supplied some information, the defendants' employees provided most of the information and verified that provided by customers. The Court found that bank records were properly admitted because they revealed the amount deposited. However, it was error (but harmless) to admit checks provided by customers, since there was no indication that the banks sought to verify the name and account on each check. In United States v. Chu Kong Yin, 935 F.2d 990 (9th Cir. 1991) , the Court reversed convictions for making false statements in a permanent resident application, holding that certain reports of Hong Kong police authorities were erroneously admitted to prove the defendant's prior criminal convictions. There was no showing that the declarants had firsthand knowledge or received their information from persons with firsthand knowledge of the facts stated.

United States v. Cestnik, 36 F.3d 904 (10th Cir. 1994) : In a prosecution for narcotics and money-laundering offenses, the Court held that Western Union "to-send-money" forms were properly admitted under the business records exception. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 803.02[7][c]. In United States v. Moreno, 94 F.3d 1453 (10th Cir. 1996) , the Court, relying on Cestnik, found no error in the admission of a hotel registration record showing that a person with a name and address similar but not identical to the defendant's registered in a motel. "The government did not seek admission of the forms to prove that the person named in the forms, Art Morino, actually checked into the motel. Rather, because the name and address in the forms were similar to Mr. Moreno's, the government was attempting to create the inference that Mr. Moreno had checked in under a false name." Thus, there was no "source of information" problem because the underlying information was not being offered for its truth.

[iv] Rule 803(6) -- Source of Information -- Statutory Duty

United States v. Sokolow, 91 F.3d 396 (3d Cir. 1996) : In a mail fraud prosecution brought against the owner of a company, the government offered a third-party administrator's summary of unpaid, valid health insurance claims filed against the company's health plan. The administrator was hired by a State Court to adjust unpaid claims after the plan was ordered liquidated. The defendant argued that this report was inadmissible as a business record, because it relied on information from outside sources (i.e., the claimants) who had no business duty to report. The Court found that the beneficiaries of the plan who filed claims "were under a duty to submit accurate proof of claims in order to be entitled to payment, and subject to criminal and/or civil penalties for submitting fraudulent claims," so the summary of these claims by the adjuster was properly admitted as a business record.

United States v. Bland, 961 F.2d 123 (9th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, holding that a firearms transaction record completed at the time of purchase was properly admitted. Federal regulations requiring that employees verify gun purchasers' names with a picture identification, and imposing a legal duty on purchasers to provide truthful information, obviated any double hearsay problem regarding the statement on the form identifying the purchaser.

[v] Rule 803(6) -- Source of Information -- Third Party Complaints

Cameron v. Otto Bock Orthopedic Indus., Inc., 43 F.3d 14 (1st Cir. 1994) : The Court held that reports of prosthesis failures received by the defendant manufacturer of prostheses were properly excluded because the reports were provided to the defendant by independent prosthetists who themselves derived some or all of their information from their own patients. Distinguishing pre-accident reports that are admitted to show notice, the Court held that the patients were under no business duty to make accurate reports to the manufacturer. The Court found it unnecessary to consider whether the exception might apply if the information were generated solely by the prosthetists in the course of their own business.

United States v. Santos, 201 F.3d 953 (7th Cir. 2000) : The Chicago City Treasurer was charged with illegally soliciting political contributions from banks and securities firms. Reversing for this and other evidentiary errors, the Court held that complaints about the Treasurer filed with the City's Board of Ethics should not have been admitted as business records. Although the complaints were included in the Board's business records, the factual statements were never verified or otherwise adopted by the Board and thus, did not become the Board's own statements.

Baxter Healthcare Corp. v. Healthdyne, Inc., 944 F.2d 1573 (1991) , vacated on settlement, 956 F.2d 226 (11th Cir. 1992) : In a breach of contract action related to allegedly defective hospital equipment, the Court held that records of customer complaints compiled by the plaintiff were properly admitted under the Rule, as the reports carried high indicia of reliability because the hospital employees who were the informants contacted the plaintiff to report a serious defect in a product that was endangering their patients. In our view, this case presents an extremely unusual situation in which customer complaints have sufficient trustworthiness to be admitted for their truth as business records.

[vi] Rule 803(6) -- Source of Information -- Unidentified Source

Rassoulpour v. Washington Metro. Area Transit Auth., 826 F.2d 98 (D.C. Cir. 1987) : The Court held that a statement in a transit authority report that the plaintiff was running down a stationary escalator at the time she fell was hearsay and prejudicial. There was no showing as to who provided the information that was reported in the report. Even though the employees who wrote the report acted for the business, the authority did not show that they saw the accident.

Ricciardi v. Children's Hosp. Med. Center, 811 F.2d 18 (1st Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed a directed verdict for defendants in a medical malpractice case, and found no error in the exclusion of a doctor's handwritten note stating that an aortic cannula had accidentally come out of the patient during an operation. The doctor had no personal knowledge of the event described and could not recall the source of the information, so the necessary foundation for business records was lacking and there was concern about the trustworthiness of the note.

Saks Int'l, Inc. v. M/V Export Champion, 817 F.2d 1011 (2d Cir. 1987) : In an action by a consignee against a shipowner for a cargo shortage and slackage, the Court held it was proper to admit loading tallies prepared by a stevedoring company. It observed that "there is no requirement that the person whose first-hand knowledge was the basis of the entry be identified, so long as it was the business entity's regular practice to get information from such a person." A ship's chief mate provided sufficient foundation testimony, since he supervised the loading of the cargo and had knowledge of the tally system.

Cook v. Hoppin, 783 F.2d 684 (7th Cir. 1986) : The Court reversed a judgment for a landlord in a suit by a tenant's visitor who sustained injuries in a fall from an exterior stairway, because statements in medical records indicating that the plaintiff had fallen from the stairway during a shoving or wrestling match had been improperly admitted. There was no showing of who provided this information, and the Court concluded that it was not made by the hospital staff in the ordinary course of business.

Scheerer v. Hardee's Food Sys., Inc., 92 F.3d 702 (8th Cir. 1996) : The Court reversed a judgment for the defendant in a slip and fall case because an "incident report" by a nonwitness employee of the defendant was improperly admitted. The report attributed to a "friend" of the plaintiff a statement suggesting that the plaintiff's slick shoes were the cause of the accident. Although one of the witnesses at trial might have been the source, she could not remember making the statement, and the absence of any evidence of the identity of the source made it impossible to test the statement's reliability or trustworthiness.

[vii] Rule 803(6) -- Source of Information -- Verification

United States v. Mitchell, 49 F.3d 769 (D.C. Cir. 1995) : In a prosecution for conspiracy to possess and distribute cocaine, the government was allowed to introduce Western Union money transfer records to prove cash flow among the conspirators. A Western Union employee testified that a sender's identity is not verified, but that in order to receive the money a person must either show identification or answer a test question prepared by the sender. The Court relied on United States v. Patrick, infra, for the proposition that the business must verify the information from the customer in order for that information to be admissible under Rule 803(6). The Trial Judge had found that both the identification process and the test question process constituted adequate verification by Western Union of the recipient's identity. The Court, however, doubted that the test question procedure adequately verifies the actual identity of the recipient; rather, the fact that a recipient answered a question posed by the sender indicates only that he "is the sender's intended recipient, not that he actually bears the name presented." Any error was harmless, however, because 80 of the 84 recipients in the records admitted were verified by identification rather than by answering a test question. In United States v. Patrick, 959 F.2d 991 (D.C. Cir. 1992) , a defendant charged with drug trafficking offenses argued that he was innocently visiting the apartment in which he was arrested, but the government introduced a receipt for a TV set in the room that bore the defendant's name and the address of the apartment. Reversing, the Court held that the receipt was hearsay not coming within any exception when offered to prove the name and address of the purchaser, because the purchaser providing information was not acting under a business duty and there was no showing that it was the business' standard practice to verify the information. A dissenting Judge believed that the receipt was not offered for its truth, but only for its circumstantial value in connecting the defendant with the apartment where he, the receipt, and the TV were all found.

United States v. Vigneau, 187 F.3d 70 (1st Cir. 1999) : In a prosecution for drug distribution, the Court held it was error to admit Western Union "To Send Money" forms to prove that the defendant sent money to a coconspirator, since the information concerning the identity of the sender resulted from Western Union's recording of information by a "stranger" to the business and it was not Western Union's practice to verify the sender's identity.

United States v. Reyes, 157 F.3d 949 (2d Cir. 1998) : In a narcotics and racketeering case the government proved that a defendant had ordered murders while in prison, by introducing prison logbooks showing that members of the conspiracy had visited the defendant close to the times of the killings. The Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the logbooks, despite the fact that outsiders with no business duty (i.e., the visitors) were the source of the relevant information, since the foundation witness testified that prison officers checked identification in order to verify the identity of the visitors. In United States v. Lieberman, n109 the Court held that a hotel registration card could qualify as a business record, even if it was filled out by a guest rather than by a business employee, but also concluded that the record could not be used to show who stayed in the hotel when there was no proof that any hotel employee verified identity. The Court found that the card could be used to show that a person using a certain name registered, which evidence could be used with other evidence to connect a defendant to the registration.

United States v. Emenogha, 1 F.3d 473 (7th Cir. 1993) : The Court affirmed convictions for drug offenses, holding there was no error in admitting Currency Transaction Reports to prove currency exchange transactions by a defendant, where there was evidence of the business practice of taking some form of identification, together with the added safeguard of eyewitness testimony for several of the exchanges. See also United States v. Zapata, 871 F.2d 616 (7th Cir. 1989) (hotel guest registration records were admissible where the hotel demonstrated that it verified guest information, even though the guest filled out the form).

United States v. McIntyre, 997 F.2d 687 (10th Cir. 1993) : The Court affirmed drug convictions, but observed that a motel's arrival-and-departure log had been erroneously admitted. Because the motel employee who filled out the log relied upon information provided by guests, the essential requirement that each actor in a chain of information be under a duty to provide accurate information to a business was not satisfied. The Court also held that Western Union "to-send-money" forms were not admissible under Rule 803(6) where the forms were used to prove that the person named on the form actually sent the money, since Western Union did not verify the identity of those who send money. Such forms were admissible to prove the identity of the recipients, however, since Western Union required verification of recipients' names.

[x] Rule 803(6) -- Special Situations

United States v. Grossman, 614 F.2d 295 (1st Cir. 1980) : In a prosecution for receiving stolen property, the Court held that a manufacturer's catalog was properly admitted under Rule 803(6) or 803(17) to assist the jury in deciding whether the lighters offered in evidence were the same as those shipped by the manufacturer and stolen from the shipment.

Twin City Fire Ins. Co. v. Country Mut. Ins. Co., 23 F.3d 1175 (7th Cir. 1994) : In an action by an excess insurer against the primary insurer for failure to settle a claim within the policy limits, the Court held that a letter written by the primary insurer's counsel to the excess insurer was a business record admissible to prove that the claimant's lawyer had made a demand within the limits.

United States v. Beecroft, 608 F.2d 753 (9th Cir. 1979) : The Court said that Dun & Bradstreet credit reports could be admitted as business records.

[y] Rule 803(6) -- Tax Records

Selig v. United States, 740 F.2d 572 (7th Cir. 1984) : In a dispute between a new owner of a baseball team and the IRS concerning the valuation of players, the Court found that appraisals made within several months of the purchase of the club qualified as business records. The fact that the appraisals had tax consequences did not disqualify them as business records, since "[m]ost businesses must prepare as a matter of course documents relevant to tax matters."

United States v. Parker, 749 F.2d 628 (11th Cir. 1984) : Affirming a conviction for stealing from an interstate shipment, the Court held that a document identified as a certificate of export to the United States was properly admitted as a business record of a Scottish distiller when a vice president of the United States importer of the distiller's Scotch whiskey testified that the document was prepared in the ordinary course of the distiller's business so that the purchaser could avoid taxation in the United Kingdom.

[z] Rule 803(6) -- Trustworthiness

[i] Rule 803(6) -- Trustworthiness -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Kim, 595 F.2d 755 (D.C. Cir. 1979) : Convictions for conspiracy to defraud the United States and lying to a grand jury were affirmed, as the Court rejected an argument that the defendant should have been permitted to introduce a telex from the Korean Exchange Bank stating that the defendant had withdrawn a large sum of money from his account on a designated day. The telex was sent instead of the defendant's bank records, which the government had sought to obtain by subpoena. The Court concluded that the telex was inadmissible hearsay that could not qualify as a business record: (1) it was not made at or near the time of the transaction it described; (2) it was not made for a regular business purpose; and (3) the Trial Judge could have concluded that the circumstances of preparation indicated a lack of trustworthiness.

United States v. Cincotta, 689 F.2d 238 (1st Cir. 1982) : Affirming convictions for conspiracy to defraud the United States and other offenses growing out of a scheme whereby the United States paid for shipments of oil it never received, the Court upheld the admission of pages of a notebook kept by a truck driver who made deliveries of oil. It said that a Trial Judge who finds business records trustworthy will not be reversed except for an abuse of discretion.

Romano v. Howarth, 998 F.2d 101 (2d Cir. 1993) : Reversing a judgment for the defendants in a prisoner's civil rights action arising out of his treatment at a medical facility, the Court noted that a nurse's "progress notes" had been improperly admitted. The notes recounted a statement by a defendant corrections officer regarding how an injury to the plaintiff occurred, but it was unclear whether the corrections staff at the facility had any "business duty" to the medical staff so as to ensure the accuracy of the account. In any event, the officer's motive to fudge the truth of what happened meant that the statement lacked reliability.

United States v. Casoni, 950 F.2d 893 (3d Cir. 1991) : The Court held in a racketeering prosecution that it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to admit an attorney's interview notes, and a proffer of testimony he prepared based on the interview, to prove a witness' prior consistent statements. The proffer lacked trustworthiness because in preparing it as part of immunity discussions, the attorney had a motive to minimize his client's, and maximize potential codefendants', criminal responsibility. The interview notes might in other circumstances have qualified as business records, but it was an abuse of discretion to admit them where the attorney was able to testify fully about their contents after refreshing his recollection. In a massive antitrust case in which the plaintiffs alleged that the defendants conspired to drive them out of the market for television receivers, Zenith Radio Corp. v. Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co., n110 the Court reversed most of the summary judgment entered for the defendants. The Trial Judge had improperly excluded evidence that qualified for admission as business records. The Court reasoned that "[g]iven the separate treatment in Rule 803(6) of untrustworthiness, we think the regular practice requirement should be generously construed to favor admission," and that "unintelligibility is a factor extraneous to the trustworthiness inquiry" since "[a]mbiguities in a business record, as with any evidence, may be argued to the jury."

McNeese v. Reading & Bates Drilling Co., 749 F.2d 270 (5th Cir. 1985) : The Court affirmed the exclusion as untrustworthy of an accident report filed with the Coast Guard, where the individual whose name appeared on the report denied preparing and signing it and did not know the sources of information contained therein. In Pan-Islamic Trade Corp. v. Exxon Corp., n111 an antitrust action against oil companies, a memorandum written by one of the plaintiff's officers was not admissible as a business record since it was not written as part of the business routine, but was drafted for the express purpose of preventing another company from canceling a contract and was not reliable under the circumstances.

United States v. Stavroff, 149 F.3d 478 (6th Cir. 1998) : Affirming a tax fraud conviction, the Court found no error in the admission of financial ledgers as business records. Neither the fact that the author of each of the entries was unidentified nor the testimony by one of the declarants that he "was not accountable" for his entries made the ledgers inadmissible as untrustworthy, where the custodians testified to the manner of making the records and there was no evidence that the source information was inaccurately recorded in the ledgers.

Wheeler v. Sims, 951 F.2d 796 (7th Cir. 1992) : In a civil rights action by an inmate who alleged paralysis as a result of a beating, the defendants introduced documents from the inmate's prison master file that documented his ability to move his legs and to walk. Affirming a judgment for the defendants, the Court held that the records were made in the regular course of the prison's business and were not untrustworthy under the Rule, as they were not made by the individual defendants in this case and they were not made in anticipation of litigation.

Lloyd v. Professional Realty Servs., 734 F.2d 1428 (11th Cir. 1984) : Affirming directed verdicts against two plaintiffs alleging securities violations and fraud and against the defendant on a counterclaim, the Court held that the Trial Judge properly excluded as untrustworthy draft minutes of the corporate secretary, which had been "marked and edited" and were quite different from the final copy of the minutes.

[ii] Rule 803(6) -- Trustworthiness -- Records Made in Contemplation of Litigation

United States v. Goodchild, 25 F.3d 55 (1st Cir. 1994) : In a prosecution for credit card fraud, the government introduced computer printouts of debt collection memos prepared by the defrauded credit card company. The qualifying witness testified that such memos were prepared by the debt collection department after telephone calls were made to cardholders of delinquent accounts to collect the outstanding debt. The defendant objected that the memos were untrustworthy because they were prepared in anticipation of litigation, but the Court held that the records were "primarily made to enable the department to track down debtors and collect money owed." Since the records were prepared in order to collect debts so that litigation would be unnecessary, and since they were prepared in the ordinary course of debt collection activity, the Court held that they were properly admitted under Rule 803(6).

Certain Underwriters at Lloyd's, London v. Sinkovich, 232 F.3d 200 (4th Cir. 2000) : In an action by an insured yacht owner for a declaratory judgment seeking insurance coverage under a hull policy, the Court reversed a judgment rendered for the insurer after a bench trial. It held that the Trial Judge erroneously admitted the investigative report (and improper expert testimony) from a marine surveyor/investigator. Rejecting the insurer's argument that the report was more trustworthy than one prepared by the insurer itself because it was prepared by an outside consultant, the Court held that the investigator's report for the insurer was inadmissible because it was prepared in anticipation of litigation.

Lust v. Sealy, Inc., 383 F.3d 580 (7th Cir. 2004) : In an action by an employee who claimed that she had been denied a promotion because of gender discrimination, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of memos made by the plaintiff's supervisor after she complained to him about being passed over for discriminatory reasons. The memos said that the supervisor had not promoted her because of deficiencies in her interpersonal skills and that he was planning to promote her soon. The company's regular personnel recordkeeping processes did not include records of employee conversations. These memos had been made only to create evidence for use in the plaintiff's anticipated lawsuit. In United States v. McPartlin, n112 the Court affirmed convictions growing out of a bribery scheme involving local officials. It held that a bank statement relied upon by the defendants was not admissible as a business record since it was made two years after the transaction and since it was made in anticipation of litigation and therefore lacked trustworthiness.

Chadwell v. Koch Refining Co., 251 F.3d 727 (8th Cir. 2001) : Affirming a judgment for the defendant employer in an action brought by a former employee alleging wrongful termination, the Court held that notes of a meeting between the plaintiff and company representatives were properly excluded, since the notes were taken by a union representative at a time when the plaintiff was about to file a lawsuit against the employer, and the representative's presence at the meeting implied a "protective function, making the notes more analogous to records kept in anticipation of a lawsuit, which do not qualify for the Rule 803(6) hearsay exception." In Scheerer v. Hardee's Food Sys., Inc., 92 F.3d 702 (8th Cir. 1996) , the Court reversed a judgment for the defendant in a slip and fall case because an "incident report" by a nonwitness employee of the defendant was improperly admitted. In the Court's view, the incident report lacked reliability because it was made with the knowledge that the incident could result in litigation and not in the ordinary course of the defendant's usual restaurant business, although such reports were made for all incidents involving premises or product liability, fire, theft, or property damage.

Sana v. Hawaiian Cruises, Ltd., 181 F.3d 1041 (9th Cir. 1999) : An employee on a cruise ship brought an action for maintenance and cure, after being diagnosed with encephalitis. To prove that he was ill at the time he worked on the ship, he offered a memorandum prepared by the investigator for the defendant's insurer, which contained statements from the plaintiff's fellow employees indicating that the plaintiff told them that he felt sick one day at work and that he was acting erratically while at work. The Court found it was error to exclude the memorandum because it was prepared in contemplation of litigation. The rationale for excluding litigation-oriented reports was not applicable here, because this was not a self-serving document prepared by a litigant, but rather a document prepared by the defendant's insurer that was unfavorable to the interests of the defendant. In United States v. Miller, n113 the Court stated that records prepared in response to litigation rather than in the regular course of business are outside of the exception.

Echo Acceptance Corp. v. Household Retail Servs., 267 F.3d 1068 (10th Cir. 2001) : In an action for breach of contract between financing companies, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding three letters the defendant had sent to the plaintiff. The letters had been drafted by lawyers in anticipation of litigation and there was no showing that they were made and kept in the regular course of business. In Timberlake Constr. Co. v. United States Fid. & Guar. Co., 71 F.3d 335 (10th Cir. 1995) , the Court reversed a judgment for a contractor who sued his builder's risk insurer claiming bad faith in the handling of a fire loss claim, holding that it was error to admit letters written by the plaintiff's president and the company's lawyer, which had "all the earmarks of being motivated and generated to further Timberlake's interest, with litigation actually not far around the corner." In United States v. Hernandez, n114 the Court affirmed a conviction for firearms offenses while an illegal alien, rejecting the defendant's argument that a computer printout of INS records prepared for the trial was not within the exception. So long as the original computer data compilation was prepared pursuant to a business duty in accordance with regular business practice, the fact that the hard copy offered as evidence was printed for purposes of litigation does not affect its admissibility. In United States v. Bohrer, n115 the Court affirmed a conviction for failing to file tax returns, but found that a "contact card" prepared by an IRS agent that contained a version of a telephone conversation should not have been admitted as a business record. The Court did not hold that a record prepared by a law enforcement officer could never satisfy the exception. It held instead that "[a]dmission under the business records exception is not available for documents prepared for ultimate purposes of litigation, when offered by the party maintaining the documents."

Noble v. Alabama Dep't of Environmental Mgt., 872 F.2d 361 (11th Cir. 1989) : The Court found error (but harmless) in the admission on behalf of the defendant in an employment discrimination suit of a letter from the defendant's director to another state employee, which addressed the defendant's concern that certain engineering graduates were not qualified for certain jobs, and other letters supporting the defendant's evaluation of the capabilities of these graduates. The defendant failed to show that its director's letter was written in the regular course of business rather than in anticipation of litigation, and offered no evidence of the circumstances in which the other letters were prepared.

[7] Rule 803(7) -- Absence Of Entry In Records

Abernathy v. Superior Hardwoods, Inc., 704 F.2d 963 (7th Cir. 1983) : In a negligence action brought by a truck driver against a forklift operator, the Court found no error in the rejection of testimony by a private investigator, offered to rebut the plaintiff's claim that he had been rejected for employment by Ryder Truck Lines, that the investigator had gone to Ryder's headquarters and had looked through job applications and had not found the plaintiff's name. The Court found that the testimony would have been hearsay. Even though Ryder's custodian of records was outside the 100-mile subpoena range, the custodian could have been deposed and the deposition could have laid the basis for the introduction of the records if the custodian was unwilling to appear at trial. In United States v. Zeidman, n116 the Court affirmed mail fraud convictions and approved the introduction of evidence that a file search of a business indicated that there was no record of monies collected by the defendants and transmitted to the business. The witness who testified about the file search did not himself conduct the search. The Court did not actually decide what the requisite foundation was under Rule 803(7), but simply decided that the test advocated by the defendants was satisfied in this case.

United States v. Lanier, 578 F.2d 1246 (8th Cir. 1978) : This case holds that an auditor could testify that computer records contain no evidence of certain deposits.

United States v. Rich, 580 F.2d 929 (9th Cir. 1978) : A bank robbery defendant claimed that a certain person had borrowed his car on the day of the robbery. An FBI agent was permitted to testify that he examined police records, sheriff's office records, credit records, and city directories and contacted other sources in the town and that there was no trace of a person with the name mentioned by the defendant. The Court held that much of this evidence was admissible under Rule 803(10) and that Rule 803(7) could be used to justify the reference to other records. Noting that in order to utilize the business records exception itself, a foundation must be laid for the business record, the Court assumed, but did not decide, "that such a foundation is a necessary predicate to the admission of evidence of the absence of entries."

[8] Rule 803(8) -- public Records And Reports

[a] Rule 803(8) -- Administrative Findings

[i] Rule 803(8) -- Administrative Findings -- Investigations

[A] Employment Cases

Chandler v. Roudebush, 425 U.S. 840 (1976) : In the final footnote to its opinion extending to federal government employees the same rights as other workers in employment discrimination cases, the Supreme Court noted that the prior administrative findings were of use to the Federal Courts: "Prior administrative findings made with respect to an employment discrimination claim may, of course, be admitted as evidence at a federal-sector trial de novo. See Rule 803 (8)(C) of the Federal Rules of Evidence.

Patten v. Wal-Mart Stores East, Inc., 300 F.3d 21 (1st Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed a judgment for an employer who was sued by a former employee alleging violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act and the Maine Human Rights Act. Finding no abuse of discretion when the right-to-sue letter the plaintiff received from the Maine Human Rights Commission was excluded, the Court rejected the Ninth Circuit's per se admissibility approach (see infra). The Court concluded: "The district court's routine exclusion of the MHRC letter ... reflects a tacit balancing under Rule 403. Although the findings of a fact-finding agency are entitled to deference, we cannot say that the district court abuses its discretion when it concludes that such an agency determination, unaccompanied by relevant facts, tends to be more prejudicial than probative."

Paolitto v. John Brown E. & C., Inc., 151 F.3d 60 (2d Cir. 1998) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff in an age discrimination case, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the decision and record of the state human rights agency that dismissed a charge by the plaintiff for lack of sufficient evidence of age discrimination. Following the majority rule that such findings are not categorically admissible, the Court noted that the plaintiff's evidence at trial undercut many of the agency's factual findings and the defendant had been given a full opportunity to present to the jury all the evidence it had submitted to the agency.

Coleman v. Home Depot, Inc., 306 F.3d 1333 (3d Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed a judgment for an employer sued by a discharged African-American female employee, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of an EEOC right-to-sue letter. The Court noted that the admissibility of such reports under the hearsay exception was dependent in part on an analysis of the Rule 403 factors. In this case, the "proof value could be said to be low, given the fact that it would have been introduced to the jury after all the evidence had been offered (which evidence was at odds with the EEOC report), and was more conclusory than factual in nature," while "a great deal of time would have had to have been consumed to counter the report's conclusion about the fate of other employees, male and female."

Falcon v. General Tel. Co., 626 F.2d 369 (5th Cir. 1980) , vacated on other grounds, 450 U.S. 1036 (1981) : In an employment discrimination action, the Court said that letters from the General Services Administration to the company were admissible under Rule 803(8)(C), since they involved factual findings arising out of contract compliance review procedures, even though the GSA generally does not investigate discrimination claims. See also Local Union No. 59 v. Namco Elec., Inc., 653 F.2d 143 (5th Cir. 1981) (NLRB findings are admissible); Garcia v. Gloor, 618 F.2d 264 (5th Cir. 1980) (a report and evaluations by the EEOC were admissible in an employment discrimination action).

Young v. James Green Mgmt., Inc., 327 F.3d 616 (7th Cir. 2003) : Affirming a judgment for the defendant in an action alleging termination as a result of racial discrimination, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding a determination by the EEOC that the former employees had been discriminated against by the employer, given that the EEOC's investigator incorrectly testified to the number of employees working for the defendant and could not explain his error. The Court also noted that the evidentiary material available to the EEOC for its report had been presented to the jury at trial. In Allen v. Chicago Transit Auth., 317 F.3d 696 (7th Cir. 2003) , the Court reversed summary judgment for the Authority in an employment discrimination action because the Trial Judge failed to give any weight to a finding by the Authority's own investigator that a supervisor's explanation for promoting a white man over the African-American female plaintiffs was not credible. The finding was admissible both as an admission made by an employee of a party opponent within the scope of his employment and as an investigative report of a public agency.

Johnson v. Yellow Freight Sys., 734 F.2d 1304 (8th Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in an employment discrimination case, finding no error in the exclusion of the EEOC's determination that there was reason to believe the plaintiff had been the victim of discrimination. A majority of the Court declined to adopt a per se rule of admissibility of EEOC findings and concluded that the Judge had good reason to exclude the findings in this case, since they were supported by only two conclusory sentences and their admission "would have necessitated the taking of additional evidence to apprise the jury of the nature and extent of the EEOC investigation."

Brown v. Sierra Nevada Memorial Miners Hosp., 849 F.2d 1186 (9th Cir. 1988) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendants in a suit by a doctor who claimed racial discrimination in connection with hospital privileges. Although the Court agreed that a report of a state board was admissible, it found no reversible error in the Trial Judge's refusal to permit the plaintiff to testify as to the board's conclusions. The Court also held that two reports sent to the board by outside consultants were not admissible, since they were not findings of a public agency. In Gilchrist v. Jim Slemons Imports, Inc., 803 F.2d 1488 (9th Cir. 1986) , after noting that it had previously held in Plummer v. Western Int'l Hotels Co., infra, that a plaintiff in a Title VII case has a right to introduce the EEOC's probable cause determination, the Court distinguished that case and held in this age discrimination case that an EEOC letter of violation, which represents a determination that a violation actually occurred, might result in unfair prejudice in some cases. Thus, no automatic rule of admissibility applied. In the instant case, the Court ruled that even though the Trial Judge erroneously believed that the letter had to be admitted, any error was harmless. In Plummer v. Western Int'l Hotels Co., n117 the Court held that there is a "per se rule of admissibility" that applies to EEOC probable cause determinations offered in subsequent civil rights suits charging employment discrimination, whether tried to Judge or jury. In our view, any "absolute right" to introduce this evidence appears to be inconsistent with the part of the Rule that permits exclusion when the circumstances in which particular findings were made suggest a lack of trustworthiness. It is also inconsistent with the notion that evidence that is generally reliable and helpful might be unreliable or prejudicial in a particular case and thus might be excluded under Rule 403.

Figures v. Board of Pub. Utils., 967 F.2d 357 (10th Cir. 1992) : In a Title VII action by an employee involving the employer's failure to promote him, the Court held there was no error in excluding a draft letter from the Office of Federal Contract Compliance Programs indicating race discrimination, as the letter did not represent findings adopted by an agency or government office. In Hall v. Western Prod. Co., 988 F.2d 1050 (10th Cir. 1993) , the Court affirmed a judgment for an employee who sued for age discrimination and breach of contract, holding there was no abuse of discretion when a report of a state fair employment commission finding no discrimination was excluded on the grounds that the evidentiary matter in the report could be presented to the jury by other means and the risk of unfair prejudice outweighed the probative value of the evidence.

Walker v. NationsBank of Fla. N.A., 53 F.3d 1548 (11th Cir. 1995) : In a Title VII and ADEA action by a discharged bank manager, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding a letter from the EEOC finding reasonable cause to believe the bank had discriminated. Although it is well established in the Circuit that EEOC determinations are generally admissible in bench trials, the Trial Judge was properly concerned in this jury trial that the determination by another EEOC office that there was no probable cause would shift the jury's focus away from the issue of whether the bank had discriminated and towards the procedural adequacy of the two investigations. In Barfield v. Orange County, 911 F.2d 644 (11th Cir. 1990) , the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting an EEOC determination of "no reasonable cause" in a race and sex discrimination action, as the plaintiff made no showing of defects in trustworthiness or that the danger of unfair prejudice significantly outweighed the highly probative nature of the evidence. Rejecting a per se rule of admissibility for EEOC reports (see Plummer v. Western Int'l Hotels Co. (9th Cir.), supra) or a rule making such reports subject only to the trustworthiness proviso (see Garcia v. Gloor (5th Cir.), supra), the Court noted that the change from a bench to a jury trial will not affect the analysis under the trustworthiness proviso of the Rule but will affect the balancing under Rule 403.

[B] Rule 803(8) -- Administrative Findings -- Investigations -- Other Cases

City of New York v. Pullman, Inc., 662 F.2d 910 (2d Cir. 1981) : In a breach of warranty action involving the sale of subway cars, the Court upheld the exclusion of a report prepared by the staff of the Urban Mass Transit Administration, a federal agency to which the Secretary of Transportation has delegated his statutory duty to investigate unsafe conditions in federally funded transportation programs. Since the report was an interim report of the staff and did not represent findings by the agency, the Court said that it did not qualify under the Rule. The Court added that because the UMTA did not do its own tests and relied instead upon "hand-outs" prepared by the parties to this case, the report was not trustworthy. Affirming convictions for securities convictions in United States v. Corr, n118 the Court held it was not error to exclude a SEC release concerning the stock controlled by one of the defendants. The evidence was inadmissible hearsay and outside of the exception of Rule 803(8)(C) because the release "was not a determination of facts obtained after administrative proceedings."

In re Complaint of Nautilus Motor Tanker Co., 85 F.3d 105 (3d Cir. 1996) : The Court held that a Coast Guard report of a tanker grounding was admissible in a limitation proceeding, notwithstanding a regulation providing that such reports are not intended to fix civil or criminal responsibility, which the tanker's owner had claimed deprived the report of evidentiary relevance. The Court reasoned, first, that the policy justification for the regulation's evidentiary bar -- ensuring frank disclosure by Coast Guard investigators -- was absent where, as here, the Coast Guard had no interest in the outcome. Second, a federal regulation cannot "trump" a Federal Rule of Evidence enacted by Congress, so Rules 401-402 set the applicable standard of relevant evidence. In so holding, the Court rejected contrary reasoning in Huber v. United States, 838 F.2d 398 (9th Cir. 1988) , which was followed in In re Cleveland Tankers, Inc., 67 F.3d 1200 (6th Cir. 1995) . A concurring Judge argued that the regulation did not purport to govern the admissibility of a report. A dissenting Judge argued that, while regulations cannot "trump" statutes, a regulation promulgated pursuant to congressional authority can create an exception to a general rule of evidence.

Combs v. Wilkinson, 315 F.3d 548 (6th Cir. 2002) : Reversing in part summary judgment granted for correction officers sued for using excessive force when quelling a prison disturbance, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to strike, without explanation, the report of a Use of Force Committee that had investigated the incident for the state corrections department. The report was relevant to the plaintiffs' claims of excessive force, the plaintiffs provided a sufficient foundation for application of the public records and reports exception, and the defendants' argument that the committee members lacked personal knowledge of the incident was misplaced, since personal knowledge of the underlying events is not required for investigative reports. Upon remand, the report could still be excluded if the trustworthiness proviso of Rule 803(8) was found not satisfied.

Vining v. Enterprise Fin. Group, Inc., 148 F.3d 1206 (10th Cir. 1998) : When the surviving spouse made a claim under a credit life insurance policy after the insured died of a sudden heart attack, the insurer refused to pay on the ground that the insured's health condition had been misstated. Affirming a judgment for compensatory and punitive damages against the insurer for breach of contract, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting a report prepared by staff of the state insurance department regarding the defendant's business practices. The report was sufficiently final, since it was attached to and incorporated by reference into an order subsequently issued by the Insurance Commissioner, head of the agency. In a case alleging racial discrimination in housing, Denny v. Hutchinson Sales Corp., n119 the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding a state agency's finding of probable cause in favor of the plaintiffs where the jury was given substantial evidence, including a statistical explanation, concerning relevant events and there was a danger of undue deference to the agency.

[ii] Rule 803(8) -- Administrative Findings -- Quasi-judicial Proceedings

Henry v. Daytop Village, Inc., 42 F.3d 89 (2d Cir. 1994) : The defendant in an employment discrimination action alleged that the plaintiff had been discharged because she misrepresented her husband's insurance coverage. Reversing a summary judgment for the defendant, the Court held that an Administrative Law Judge's determination in a state unemployment benefits hearing that the plaintiff had not misrepresented the insurance coverage was admissible evidence, which, with the plaintiff's affidavits, was sufficient to raise a genuine dispute of material fact.

Zeus Enters., Inc. v. Alphin Aircraft, Inc., 190 F.3d 238 (4th Cir. 1999) : In an action for breach of a contract to restore a damaged aircraft to airworthy condition, the plaintiff introduced the decision of an NTSB administrative law judge finding that the repaired aircraft was not airworthy. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court held that although the ALJ acted as a Judge and presided over a quasi-judicial proceeding, the proceeding was in the executive rather than the judicial branch and the findings were admissible under Rule 803(8)(C). The Court also held it was error (but harmless) to admit an order of the NTSB dismissing an appeal from the ALJ's decision. Since the order merely held the defendant lacked standing to appeal, it was strictly a legal ruling and involved no factual determinations.

In re Plywood Antitrust Litig., 655 F.2d 627 (5th Cir. 1981) : The Court upheld admission of findings of an Administrative Law Judge adopted by the FTC, where the Trial Court edited from the findings any indication of the agency's conclusions or the outcome of the proceedings.

[b] Rule 803(8) -- Agency Manuals, Records, and Reports

United States v. Johnson, 722 F.2d 407 (8th Cir. 1983) : The Court rejected a claim that it was plain error to admit a Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms form to prove that a gun possessed by the defendant had moved in interstate commerce. The gun manufacturer prepared a report on the gun and ATF had custody of this report and the manufacturer's other records as a result of its going out of business. ATF had a duty to keep the report and the Court found that the report was neither a factual finding nor a matter observed by law enforcement officials. The Court also noted that the report was not prepared for this litigation. Thus, it was admissible under Rule 803(8)(A). In United States v. King, n120 the Court found that state department of revenue documents were admissible to show ownership.

McGonigle v. Combs, 968 F.2d 810 (9th Cir. 1992) : In a stock fraud action arising out of a private placement of stock in a California horse breeding company, the Court held that the placement's exemption from Kentucky registration requirements was properly proved by a file memorandum written by a staff member of the Kentucky Director of Securities that noted that the Director had advised counsel for the company there would be no registration requirements.

Blim v. Western Elec. Co., 731 F.2d 1473 (10th Cir. 1984) : In an age discrimination action in which the plaintiffs prevailed below, the Court held that a Department of Labor document that memorialized a conversation between a DOL investigator and an employee of the defendant company concerning the possibility of reconciliation between the defendant and the plaintiffs was properly admitted pursuant to Rules 803(6) and 803(8). The Court reasoned that the defendant's employee was present in Court and carefully reviewed the document for the jury, pointing out portions with which she did not agree; absent the presence of this witness, admission of the report might have been improper.

United States v. Gold, 743 F.2d 800 (11th Cir. 1984) : Affirming convictions for Medicare fraud, the Court found that a manual the government prepared for the intermediaries who process Medicare claims -- e.g., Blue Cross -- was properly admitted as evidence of what types of claims were properly payable under Medicare.

[c] Rule 803(8) -- Congressional and Legislative Findings

Pearce v. E.F. Hutton Group, Inc., 653 F. Supp. 810 (D.D.C. 1987) : The District Court granted a motion to prevent the plaintiff in a libel suit from relying on a draft report of a congressional subcommittee in opposing a summary judgment motion. It commented that it was dealing "with documents produced by the Congress -- a politically motivated, partisan body"; the report was not based upon an adjudicatory proceeding and was not drafted to resolve a factual dispute; the report lacked trustworthiness because of the political nature of the investigating body; and the report would be excluded under Rule 403 even if it satisfied the hearsay exception.

Anderson v. City of New York, 657 F. Supp. 1571 (S.D.N.Y. 1987) : Ruling on a summary judgment motion in a civil rights action alleging various constitutional violations by police officers, the District Court held that a report by a Subcommittee of the House of Representatives that summarized testimony concerning police misconduct in New York City was inadmissible. Only one side's evidence was heard, the Subcommittee lacked personal knowledge of the events that were the subject of testimony, and the witnesses were self-interested. Moreover, the Court observed that "hearings and subsequent reports are frequently marred by political expediency and grandstanding."

Hill v. Marshall, 962 F.2d 1209 (6th Cir. 1992) : The Court held, in a prisoner's civil rights action for inadequate medical care, that a report prepared by a state legislature's institution inspection committee was properly admitted under the Rule. In Bright v. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., n121 the Court affirmed a verdict for the defendant, holding there was no error in excluding a report of a congressional subcommittee, which contained subjective conclusions concerning the defendant's tires rather than factual findings.

Ponce v. Construction Laborers Pension Trust, 774 F.2d 1401 (9th Cir. 1985) : The Court affirmed findings that the trustees of a pension fund violated federal law by adhering to a vesting rule that excluded 96 percent of the workers covered by the pension plan. The Court noted that an interim Senate Report was properly used as corroborative evidence in connection with expert testimony, even though "[i]t might have been error for the trial judge to accept the Senate Report statistics as proof of a disputed fact and rely completely upon the report in deciding that the CLPT exclusion rate was unreasonably high."

Baker v. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., 793 F.2d 1196 (11th Cir. 1986) : Affirming a judgment for an automobile owner in an action against a tire manufacturer, the Court found that a report by a congressional subcommittee was properly excluded, since it did not contain "factual findings necessary to an objective investigation, but consisted of the rather heated conclusions of a politically motivated hearing."

[d] Rule 803(8) -- Constitutional Concerns

United States v. Rosa, 11 F.3d 315 (2d Cir. 1993) : The Court held, in a major narcotics and racketeering case, that admission of factual observations included in an autopsy report from the medical examiner's office did not violate confrontation rights. Using the then-applicable Ohio v. Roberts analysis, the Court concluded that the reports had particularized guarantees of trustworthiness, but we note that under Crawford v. Washington they might well be considered "testimonial," and thus inadmissible as violating the Confrontation Clause.

United States v. DeWater, 846 F.2d 528 (9th Cir. 1988) : Affirming convictions for driving under the influence, the Court held that the results of intoxilyzer tests were admissible under the then-applicable Ohio v. Roberts analysis. We note that under Crawford v. Washington they might well be considered "testimonial," and thus inadmissible as violating the Confrontation Clause.

[e] Rule 803(8) -- Court Records

United States v. McIntosh, 200 F.3d 1168 (8th Cir. 2000) : Affirming a defendant's cocaine conviction, the Court held there was no error in admitting certified court documents identifying a state felony possession conviction as a drug trafficking conviction. Although the defendant claimed that the record misidentified the nature of the conviction, the Court held that "[w]hen an authorized person certifies facts in public records, the records are admissible under Federal Rules of Evidence 803(8) and 902(4)." It added that the records are only prima facie evidence that may be rebutted and that the defendant in this case failed to offer any rebuttal evidence.

[f] Rule 803(8) -- Factual Findings

See also annotations in § 803.03[8][a], "Administrative Findings."

[i] Rule 803(8) -- Accidents and Defective Products

Lubanski v. Coleco Indus., 929 F.2d 42 (1st Cir. 1991) : Affirming a judgment for the defendant toy manufacturer in a product liability action brought by the mother of a child killed when struck by a car while riding on a three-wheeled riding apparatus, the Court held that a report of the investigating officer and his conclusions about the circumstances of the accident should not have been excluded pro forma. Exclusion might have been appropriate, however, because the report was untrustworthy or because it was confusing, misleading or cumulative; in any event, any error in excluding it was rendered harmless by oral testimony.

Lloyd v. American Export Lines, Inc., 580 F.2d 1179 (3d Cir. 1978) : In a Jones Act case arising out of a fight between the plaintiff and a fellow seaman, the Court reversed the judgment for the plaintiff, holding that Rule 803(8)(C) required admission of the factual findings of the hearing examiner at a Coast Guard hearing at which both seamen were represented by counsel and testified under oath.

Diaz v. United States, 655 F. Supp. 411 (E.D. Va. 1987) : In an action by a business invitee who fell aboard a naval vessel, the Court ruled that a report compiled by a Navy officer was admissible where the officer was appointed to conduct the investigation two days after the accident, the investigation was primarily concerned with factfinding, and the officer interviewed the witnesses who signed written statements. Although the plaintiff refused to sign the written summary of his interview, the Court rejected the argument that the report was personally biased against the plaintiff and concluded that the type of report made by the officer was routinely made and did not present the same problems as reports prepared with an eye toward litigation.

Baker v. Elcona Homes Corp., 588 F.2d 551 (6th Cir. 1978) : Affirming a judgment for the defendant truck driver in an automobile negligence case, the Court held that Rule 803(8)(C) authorized the admission of a police report containing findings about the color of a traffic light at the time of an accident.

Simmons v. Chicago & N.W. Transp. Co., 993 F.2d 1326 (8th Cir. 1993) : Distinguishing its decision in Faries v. Atlas Truck Body Mfg. Co., 797 F.2d 619 (8th Cir. 1986) , the Court held that a state trooper's accident investigation report was admissible in a FELA action, since the trooper was experienced and skilled and the report was timely. The officer's testimony was also admitted as expert testimony. In Roth v. Black & Decker, Inc., n122 the Court held Consumer Products Safety Commission reports admissible.

In re Aircrash in Bali, Indonesia, 871 F.2d 812 (9th Cir. 1989) : The Court held that an FAA report on an airline's safety record and procedures was admissible, even though it included evaluative or normative findings.

[ii] Rule 803(8) -- Factual Findings -- Accompanying and Supporting Material

FAA v. Landy, 705 F.2d 624 (2d Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed a finding of violations of federal safety regulations, holding that a telex sent by the German government through the State Department to the FAA, which was incorporated in the FAA's factual findings, was admissible.

In re Air Crash Disaster, 586 F. Supp. 711 (E.D. Pa. 1984) , rev'd on other grounds, 769 F.2d 115 (3d Cir. 1985) : In an opinion denying posttrial motions by a helicopter manufacturer that lost a suit arising out of a helicopter crash, the District Court held that it had not erred in admitting an Army investigation report on the crash accompanied by certain exhibits. The Judge found no problem with the trustworthiness of the exhibits, saw no danger of undue prejudice, and observed that the exhibits had not been sent to the jury room.

McClure v. Mexia Indep. School Dist., 750 F.2d 396 (5th Cir. 1985) : The Court affirmed a judgment for a former school district employee who sued under § 1983 and Title VII, alleging retaliatory discharge for having filed a sex discrimination complaint. The Court held that an EEOC finding of probable cause to believe that the discharge was retaliatory was properly admitted under clause (C), but it was error (albeit harmless) to admit the entire EEOC report, which contained various hearsay statements including newspaper articles.

Keith v. Volpe, 858 F.2d 467 (9th Cir. 1988) : The Court held, in a suit to challenge displacement of residents as a result of a freeway project, that forms completed by state transportation agents and files containing information gathered by the agents were properly admitted in the form of an exhibit. Since federal and state law required the agency to keep data to verify compliance with relocation requirements, the data was not gathered solely for purposes of this litigation.

Fowler v. Blue Bell, Inc., 737 F.2d 1007 (11th Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed a judgment for an employer in an employment discrimination case, finding that the Trial Judge properly admitted affidavits that the EEOC collected during its field investigation -- not for their truth, but to indicate the basis for findings by the EEOC admitted under Rule 803(8)(C).

[iii] Rule 803(8) -- Factual Findings -- Civil Rights Cases

Ariza v. City of New York, 139 F.3d 132 (2d Cir. 1998) : A police officer brought a § 1983 action alleging that he had been retaliated against for exercise of his free speech rights. Affirming a judgment for the defendants, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding a report prepared by the police department's internal affairs department. The report summarized attitudes and beliefs of a small "focus" group of officers toward "integrity-related issues," and thus did not set forth the department's factual findings based on a factual investigation.

Wilson v. Beebe, 770 F.2d 578 (6th Cir. 1985) (en banc): The Court affirmed an arrestee's judgment against a police officer for injuries suffered during an arrest. It found that a police report concerning the incident prepared by the defendant's supervisor was properly admitted against the defendant officer under Rule 803(8)(A) and (C).

Vance v. Peters, 97 F.3d 987 (7th Cir. 1996) : In a prisoner's § 1983 action for excessive force and deliberate indifference to medical needs, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding a hearing officer's final report, which concluded that the corrections officer had used excessive force and recommended a 20-day suspension. Given that the evidence considered by the hearing officer had already been admitted, there was a risk that the jury would be confused by and give inordinate weight to the conclusion, which was not based on Eighth Amendment criteria.

[iv] Rule 803(8) -- Factual Findings -- Employment Discrimination Cases

See annotations in § 803.03[8][a][i][A], "Administrative Findings -- Investigations -- Employment Cases."

[v] Rule 803(8) -- Factual Findings -- Evalutive Findings and Opinions

Beech Aircraft Corp. v. Rainey, 488 U.S. 153 (1988) : This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 803(8), § 803.02[9][f].

Zenith Radio Corp. v. Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co., 723 F.2d 238 (3d Cir. 1983) , rev'd on other grounds, 475 U.S. 574 (1986) : In a massive antitrust case in which the plaintiffs alleged that the defendants conspired to drive them out of the market for television receivers, the Court reversed most of the summary judgment entered for the defendants. The District Judge had set forth certain criteria for assessing trustworthiness; the Court did not reject the criteria, but disagreed with many of the rulings excluding findings by various public agencies. The Court said that there is a presumption that official findings are reliable. In a long analysis of the evidentiary questions presented by official findings, the Court noted that: findings need not be premised on an evidentiary hearing; the fact that the parties who were investigated had opportunities to make written and oral submissions may be significant; no statement of reasons is required as a prerequisite to admitting findings; findings regarding product prices and price differentials may be made industry-wide and still be relevant; findings may be made "at a nascent stage" of an investigation, especially where they are predicates for further government action; findings may be based on confidential information not available to the general public; findings may be admitted when they result from accusatory proceedings; and findings in which parties acquiesce may be thought to be reliable. Applying its analysis, the Court found that various findings were admissible, including findings by the Secretary of the Treasury regarding "dumping" of products and findings by the Japanese Fair Trade Commission (although not a consent agreement, which was inadmissible under Rule 408) that had investigated price fixing.

Hines v. Brandon Steel Decks, Inc., 886 F.2d 299 (11th Cir. 1989) : The Court remanded this wrongful death case in light of the Supreme Court's decision in Rainey. The Trial Judge had admitted only the specific findings of fact in an OSHA report and had excluded all opinions and conclusions. The Court emphasized on remand that the Supreme Court had expressed no view as to whether a legal, as opposed to a factual, conclusion was admissible, and opined that legal conclusions do not fall within the exception. It added that in deciding whether a report is trustworthy, a Trial Judge might consider whether an investigator's expertise covers the questions addressed in the report. The Court reasoned that the unavailability of an OSHA investigator to testify in private civil litigation does not invalidate a report, but the absence of an opportunity for cross-examination is a proper factor to consider in evaluating trustworthiness. It added also that a report might be excluded under Rule 403 even though it is otherwise admissible under Rule 803(8)(C).

[vi] Rule 803(8) -- Factual Findings -- Medical and Scientific

In re "Agent Orange" Product Liab. Litig., 611 F. Supp. 1223, 1267 (E.D.N.Y. 1985) , aff'd, 818 F.2d 187 (2d Cir. 1987) : The Court ruled, in the course of granting summary judgment for manufacturers of a herbicide in a suit by Vietnam veterans and members of their families, that various epidemiological studies by federal, state, and Australian governments would be admissible under Rule 803(8)(C).

Wolf v. Procter & Gamble Co., 555 F. Supp. 613 (D.N.J. 1982) : The Court ruled in limine in an action against the manufacturer and distributor of a vaginal tampon to recover for toxic shock syndrome that studies regarding TSS by the Center for Disease Control and state health agencies would be admitted under Rule 803(8)(C).

Ellis v. International Playtex, Inc., 745 F.2d 292 (4th Cir. 1984) : The Court reversed a judgment for the manufacturer of a tampon sued by the husband of a woman who died from toxic shock syndrome. It found error in the exclusion of studies of the syndrome carried out by the Center for Disease Control and various state health departments. The Court reasoned that the presumption is that public officials will perform their duties properly, so the burden is on a party objecting to admissibility of findings by public agencies to demonstrate that a report is unreliable. It declined to treat "scientific" reports differently from other reports, and it held that tentative conclusions as well as statistical findings could be admitted. Finally, the Court rejected a defense argument that the "inevitable debate over research technique" would have confused the jury.

Boerner v. Brown & Williamson Tobacco Co., 394 F.3d 594 (8th Cir. 2005) : Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff in an action alleging that cigarettes had a design defect, the Court found no error in the admission of reports on smoking by the Surgeon General that contained factual findings made by independent scientists and not on the basis of independent research by the Surgeon General. The reports were admissible under the public records exception, since they were prepared pursuant to a legal obligation, and the defendants made no affirmative showing that they were untrustworthy.

Marsee v. United States Tobacco Co., 866 F.2d 319 (10th Cir. 1989) , aff'g 639 F. Supp. 466 (W.D. Okla. 1986) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in a suit by a plaintiff who claimed that her son developed oral cancer from using snuff, holding that a report by the Surgeon General's Advisory Committee on the health consequences of using smokeless tobacco would be admitted, but reports of the International Agency for Research on Cancer and the Conference of the National Institute of Health would not be. The excluded reports were described as "little more than opinions and conclusions drawn from existing research literature." In a wrongful death action arising from an automobile accident, Crane v. Mekelburg, n123 the Court upheld the introduction of a certificate stating the decedent's blood alcohol level after the accident. Although no witness testified to the conditions under which the blood alcohol tests were made or to the significance of the tests, the Court found that the document satisfied the definition found in Rule 803(8)(C).

[vii] Rule 803(8) -- Factual Findings -- Miscellaneous Cases

Litton Sys. v. American Tel. & Tel. Co., 700 F.2d 785 (2d Cir. 1983) : The Court upheld the admission of various FCC decisions that found the defendant's tariffs to be improper. It noted that the Trial Judge deleted from the documents words like "unlawful" and "illegal" and held that the FCC findings were admissible under Rule 803(8). The Court found that it could not justify the exclusion of a New York State Public Service Commission decision that arguably supported the defendant's position, but its exclusion did not amount to prejudicial error. See also Revlon, Inc. v. Carson Prods. Co. n124(holding patents invalid, the Court admitted an affidavit by an FDA expert that had been used in support of summary judgment in another case; the "affidavit was a statement by one who was in a public office, acting on behalf of the office, giving findings in accordance with an investigation").

Union Pac. R.R. Co. v. Kirby Inland Marine, Inc., 296 F.3d 671 (8th Cir. 2002) : In an action brought after a river barge ran into a bridge, the Court held that a Coast Guard Order which found the bridge to be "an unreasonable obstruction to navigation" was properly admitted. The determination by the Coast Guard was required by statute, and the process included a detailed investigation, a public hearing, and an administrative review.

Farmers & Merchants Nat'l Bank v. Bryan, 902 F.2d 1520 (10th Cir. 1990) : In an action by new owners of a bank against former directors for making unlawful and imprudent loans, the Court held that reports by the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency containing conclusions critical of the defendants' actions were properly admitted.

[g] Rule 803(8) -- Foreign Records

[i] Rule 803(8) -- Civil Cases

In re Korean Air Lines Disaster of Sept. 1, 1983, 932 F.2d 1475 (D.C. Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed in part a plaintiffs' judgment in an action by representatives of passengers on an airline flight shot down in Soviet airspace, holding that a report by the Secretary General of the International Civil Aviation Organization was properly admitted. Even though the report was not adopted by the Council of the ICAO and it included a politically motivated Soviet report as an appendix, it constituted findings of a public official, and its untrustworthiness was not shown sufficiently to require exclusion.

In re Air Disaster at Lockerbie, Scot. on Dec. 21, 1988, 37 F.3d 804 (2d Cir. 1994) : In an action by relatives of passengers killed in an aircraft bombing, the Court affirmed the jury's finding of liability against the airline for willful disregard of safety measures respecting security inspections of baggage. The Court held that a Scottish investigator's report on the bombing, which concluded that the bomb had been placed in a bag not checked by any passenger on the plane, was properly admitted. The report was prepared largely by compiling computerized records of passenger baggage, which records were amassed from reports of passengers' and crew members' friends and relatives. Accordingly, the defendant could not prove that the report was prepared under untrustworthy circumstances.

United States v. Central Gulf Lines, Inc., 575 F. Supp. 1430 (E.D. La. 1983) , aff'd, 747 F.2d 315 (5th Cir. 1984) : In an action by the United States to recover for shortages in a consignment of refined soybean oil loaded aboard the defendant's vessel in the United States and discharged in India, the Court ruled that "shortlanding" certificates and a report prepared by foreign entities were admissible as government documents of the United States when they were prepared under pertinent government regulations and the duty to prepare the report was delegated to the entities by the United States.

In re Oil Spill by Amoco Cadiz, 954 F.2d 1279 (7th Cir. 1992) : Affirming findings of liability arising from an oil spill in the English Channel, the Court held that receipt and disbursement records of French governmental authorities were admissible even though they incorporated information furnished by others, as the Rule is not limited to excusing the declarants' presence but states a multilevel exception.

[ii] Rule 803(8) -- Foreign Records -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Doyle, 130 F.3d 523 (2d Cir. 1997) : The Court held in a prosecution for illegal exportation of fuel pumps to Libya that official certifications were sufficient to authenticate copies of privately-generated, as well as public, documents recorded in the Maltese Customs Department, but that there was insufficient showing that the procedures by which the documents were made, recorded, or monitored assured sufficient reliability to permit their admission under a hearsay exception. In United States v. Grady, n125 the Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to violate federal firearms law and approved the introduction of records of a government agency in Northern Ireland. The Court noted that "Congress was concerned about prosecutors attempting to prove their cases in chief simply by putting into evidence police officers' reports of their contemporaneous observations of crime," but the reports in this case "simply related to the routine function of recording serial numbers and receipt of certain weapons found in Northern Ireland." In United States v. Pinto-Mejia, n126 defendants were found guilty of possessing marijuana on a vessel subject to United States jurisdiction. Jurisdiction depended on a finding that the vessel was stateless, and the determination below was based on a certificate of a Venezuelan agency that stated, inter alia, that the named vessel had been registered, that it had "sailed clandestinely from Venezuelan port," that the Maritime Authority had found grounds to hold that the registration became invalid, and that there was no evidence of a subsequent reregistration. The Court held that this was not a certificate qualifying for admission under Rule 803(10), since it related facts that went beyond a simple statement that there was no record of a certain document in a place where it would be expected to be found. The certificate was also inadmissible under Rule 803(8), because it contained factual findings that could not be offered in a criminal case under part (C) of the Rule.

United States v. Chu Kong Yin, 935 F.2d 990 (9th Cir. 1991) : Reversing convictions for making false statements in a permanent resident application, the Court held that certain reports of Hong Kong police authorities were erroneously admitted to prove the defendant's prior criminal convictions, as there was no showing that the declarants had firsthand knowledge or received their information from persons with firsthand knowledge of the facts stated. In United States v. Perlmuter, n127 the Court overturned a conviction for knowingly procuring naturalization contrary to law. To prove that the defendant did not reveal prior convictions in Israel, the government introduced two documents, one listing four convictions, and the other stating that it contained the fingerprints of the person who was convicted. The Court found that the documents did not qualify as public records because it was possible that they had been specially prepared for this particular case and might involve multiple hearsay.

United States v. Mena, 863 F.2d 1522 (11th Cir. 1989) : Affirming convictions for marijuana offenses, the Court held that a document indicating Honduran registration of a ship was properly admitted as a public agency record. In United States v. Castaneda-Reyes, n128 the Court affirmed a conviction for attempted air piracy. It found that a document from the Cuban Ministry of Public Health, which purportedly showed the defendant's stay in a psychiatric hospital and a diagnosis that he had experienced hallucinations, was properly excluded where it appeared to have been tampered with.

[h] Rule 803(8) -- Foundation

United States v. Loyola-Dominguez, 125 F.3d 1315 (9th Cir. 1997) : In a prosecution for being a deported alien found in the United States following an aggravated felony conviction, the Court held there was no error in admitting records of the defendant's prior arrest warrant, deportation order, and deportation warrant. The records had been introduced by means of an INS agent removing each document from the defendant's INS Alien Registry File and explaining its significance to the jury. This was proper since there is no foundation requirement for public records offered under Rule 803(8).

[i] Rule 803(8) -- Included Hearsay

United States v. Houser, 746 F.2d 55 (D.C. Cir. 1984) : The Court overturned a conviction for illegal possession of a firearm, finding error in the admission of a tracer form that was used to show an interstate nexus by establishing the place where the firearm had been manufactured. A government agent testified concerning government tracing procedures, but he indicated that the form had been filled out by an ATF clerk who phoned the manufacturer. The unidentified clerk was not produced at trial and the person at the manufacturer's office who supplied the information was not produced or identified. Although the Court recognized that the manufacturer's records would have been admissible, it found that the tracer form was not a trustworthy public record.

United States v. Mackey, 117 F.3d 24 (1st Cir. 1997) : Affirming convictions for four bank robberies, the Court ruled that an out-of-court statement by the defendant's bookmaker that the defendant had won $60,000 on baseball bets was inadmissible. Although the FBI report containing the statement might be a public record, the statement in the report was "hearsay within hearsay" and not admissible as a statement against penal interest.

United States v. Sallins, 993 F.2d 344 (3d Cir. 1993) : In a prosecution for possession of a firearm by a felon, the government introduced a 911 record in which the caller reported a black male wearing all black clothing who was carrying a gun. The Court held the 911 record came within Rule 803(8)(B), but it was reversible error to admit the contents of the call, which was hearsay not coming within any exception.

Ramrattan v. Burger King Corp., 656 F. Supp. 522 (D. Md. 1987) : Ruling on in limine motions in an automobile accident case, the Court held that portions of a police report recording statements of witnesses were inadmissible because the witnesses were not acting in the regular course of business in making the statements. The statements were not admissible under Rule 803(8) merely because they were included in a public document.

Reynolds v. Green, 184 F.3d 589 (6th Cir. 1999) : In a prisoner's civil rights action against a corrections officer, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding a report prepared by the Legislative Corrections Ombudsman's Office regarding the incident. Part of the report consisted of the inmate's statement describing his experience and arguing his conclusions about the corrections officer's motivation. The remainder consisted of the investigator's understanding of the events, including many hearsay statements from the participants, which did not come within any hearsay exception and were therefore inadmissible. In Miller v. Field, 35 F.3d 1088 (6th Cir. 1994) , the Court reversed a judgment for defendants in a suit by a prison inmate claiming that their indifference led to his being raped, and held that state police reports concerning the investigation of the alleged rape were improperly admitted. It concluded that statements in the report by alleged assailants and the local prosecutor were not admissible, since they were hearsay contained within a public record. The Court reasoned that factual findings based on inadmissible hearsay are untrustworthy and could not be admitted as public records or under the residual exception to the hearsay rule.

Bemis v. Edwards, 45 F.3d 1369 (9th Cir. 1995) : Affirming a judgment for police officers alleged to have used excessive force, the Court held that a 911 tape was properly excluded because the citizen caller apparently lacked personal knowledge of the events that he was reporting. Although a 911 tape may qualify as either a public record or a business record, citizen callers are not under any duty to report and thus "a recorded statement by a citizen must satisfy a separate hearsay exception." While a caller might be reporting a present sense impression or making an excited utterance, both exceptions require that a declarant have personal knowledge of the events described.

[j] Rule 803(8) -- Judicial Findings

Trustees v. Lexington Ins. Co., 815 F.2d 890 (3d Cir. 1987) : In a suit by an insured hospital to recover the amount of a settlement in a malpractice action from its excess insurance carrier, the Court held that it was error, but harmless, to admit a transcript of a State Court settlement hearing in the malpractice action. It reasoned that judicial findings are not admissible under Rule 803(8)(C) and that, even if they were, the statements of the Judge in the transcript did not amount to findings. The Court also found that statements at the hearing by counsel concerning the reasonableness of the settlement were hearsay and were not admissible simply because they were part of a transcript of a public proceeding.

Zeus Enters., Inc. v. Alphin Aircraft, Inc., 190 F.3d 238 (4th Cir. 1999) : In an action for breach of a contract to restore a damaged aircraft to airworthy condition, the plaintiff introduced the decision of an NTSB administrative law judge finding that the repaired aircraft was not airworthy. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court held that although the ALJ acted as a Judge and presided over a quasi-judicial proceeding, the proceeding was in the executive rather than the judicial branch and the findings were admissible under Rule 803(8)(C). In Nipper v. Snipes, 7 F.3d 415 (4th Cir. 1993) , a judgment for the plaintiffs in a civil fraud action was vacated because findings of fact from another litigation between the parties had been admitted. The Court noted that Rule 803(8)(C) applies to findings "resulting from an investigation," but a Judge in a civil trial is not an investigator, and that nothing in the text of the Rule or the Advisory Committee note hints that it applies to judicial findings of fact. Furthermore, there is a serious danger that the jury might give exaggerated weight to a judgment.

Herrick v. Garvey, 298 F.3d 1184 (10th Cir. 2002) : The plaintiff in an FOIA action to obtain aircraft plans and specifications sought to prove corporate succession by means of a factual finding in a judicial opinion in another case. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant agency, the Court held that the opinion was hearsay and that Rule 803(8) did not apply to judicial findings of fact in an unrelated case.

United States v. Jones, 29 F.3d 1549 (11th Cir. 1994) : In a suit by the government to recover a medical student loan, the Court held it was error to admit findings of fact stated in the opinion from another case between the parties. The Court observed that the legislative history makes it clear that judicial findings are not encompassed by Rule 803(8)(C); when the drafters wanted to admit judgments or their underlying facts, they did so expressly; and a judgment from another case would not be admissible at common law.

[k] Rule 803(8) -- Law Enforcement Reports and Matters Observed by Officials in Criminal Cases

[i] Rule 803(8) -- Admissible

United States v. Union Nacional de Trabajadores, 576 F.2d 388 (1st Cir. 1978) : Affirming a judgment that the defendants were guilty of criminal contempt for violating an anti-strike injunction, the Court held that Rule 803(8)(B) permitted the introduction of a marshal's return of service to prove that certain persons had been served with process. The Court reasoned that "[a] sheriff or marshal reporting the service of process is not reporting in the capacity of a police observer at the scene of a crime, nor is he ordinarily connected with the case in a law enforcement capacity. The 'adversarial' circumstances which might render a law enforcement officer's observations unreliable are unlikely, therefore, to be present."

United States v. Rosa, 11 F.3d 315 (2d Cir. 1993) : The Court held, in a major narcotics and racketeering case, that factual observations included in an autopsy report from the medical examiner's office were properly admitted, as the employees of the office have no responsibilities for enforcing laws and are therefore not "law enforcement personnel" whose observations are excluded under Rule 803(8)(B). The part of the report containing factual findings as to the manner and cause of death was properly held inadmissible under Rule 803(8)(C). In United States v. Grady, n129 the Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to violate federal firearms law and approved the introduction of records of a government agency in Northern Ireland. The Court noted that "Congress was concerned about prosecutors attempting to prove their cases in chief simply by putting into evidence police officers' reports of their contemporaneous observations of crime," but the reports in this case "simply related to the routine function of recording serial numbers and receipt of certain weapons found in Northern Ireland."

United States v. Dudley, 941 F.2d 260 (4th Cir. 1991) : In a perjury prosecution the government offered a report, prepared by a Federal Reserve Bank staff assistant based on an exhaustive review of currency records maintained by the Bank, which concluded that certain bills were not in circulation at the relevant time. Although the report was prepared at the direction of a law enforcement officer, the Court held that when a government agency performs mechanical record keeping and provides a law enforcement officer with a computerized printout of that information, the printout is admissible. We note, however, that under Crawford v. Washington the report might be considered "testimonial," and thus inadmissible.

United States v. Box, 50 F.3d 345 (5th Cir. 1995) : Affirming convictions in an extortion prosecution of a sheriff and others, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting jail cards, arrest reports, record bail books, and jail logs from the sheriff's office, as the records were being admitted against the officers and coconspirators who were keeping the records and, as such, did not implicate the reliability concerns behind the "law enforcement" clause. In United States v. Wiley, 979 F.2d 365 (5th Cir. 1992) , the Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to pass counterfeit IRS obligations, holding there was no error in admitting evidence that the IRS had frozen a taxpayer's account and placed him under investigation because of a large tax refund claim. The report was prepared in a routine, nonadversarial setting, rather than in the arguably more subjective endeavor of investigating a crime and evaluating the results of the investigation. In United States v. Puente, n130 the Court affirmed a conviction for knowingly making a false statement to a grand jury, holding that a computer printout showing that the defendant's son's auto crossed into the United States, at a time the defendant claimed that the auto was in Mexico, was properly admitted. It concluded that Customs agents have no motivation to falsely record the license numbers of vehicles and that Rule 803(8)(B) did not bar the introduction of the evidence. See also United States v. Vidaure n131(certified copies of prior judgments of convictions and the defendant's "pen packets" from the state department of corrections were admissible; they did not include matters observed by law enforcement officers); United States v. Dancy n132(a fingerprint card was properly admitted under Rule 803(8); the Rule does not exclude "records that merely document routine, unambiguous factual matters"); United States v. Quezada n133(a warrant of deportation was admissible notwithstanding subdivision (B); the Court distinguished "law enforcement reports prepared in a routine, nonadversarial setting" from "those resulting from the arguably more subjective endeavor of investigating a crime and evaluating the results of that investigation," and found that the notations on the warrant were admissible as "ministerial, objective observation[s]").

United States v. Brown, 315 F.3d 929 (8th Cir. 2003) : In a prosecution for possessing counterfeit currency, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence from a Secret Service database that bills bearing the same serial numbers had appeared at other locations. Although the source data were initially gathered by law enforcement officials, the data were routinely entered by computer data entry personnel. Furthermore, the witness' testimony was limited to objective information in the database that was not collected in anticipation of the defendant's trial, and did not include information that might have reflected more subjective opinions of law enforcement investigators, such as whether the bills were "counterfeit." In United States v. Smith, 973 F.2d 603 (8th Cir. 1992) , the Court affirmed a bank robbery conviction, holding that a police department computer printout was properly admitted as a public record of police observations in a nonadversarial setting of reports of bank robberies in the surrounding area. In United States v. Enterline, n134 a prosecution of a scheme to change the identification numbers of stolen motor vehicles, an FBI agent testified that a computer check of several vehicles found in a search of the defendant's premises indicated they had been reported stolen. The Court held that the testimony was not excluded under Rule 803(8)(B) because the exclusion in the Rule concerns matters observed by police at the scene of the crime.

United States v. Contreras, 63 F.3d 852 (9th Cir. 1995) : The Court held there was no error when a warrant of deportation was admitted in a trial for illegal reentry, as the notation on the warrant form indicating that an alien has left the country is a routine, objective, indeed mechanical recording of an unambiguous factual matter. In United States v. Wilmer, n135 the Court upheld convictions for driving while intoxicated and with a suspended license, although it found that the Trial Judge erred in relying on state evidence law to admit a breathalyzer calibration certificate. The Court found that federal law applied, but that the calibration report was admissible under Rule 803(8)(B), since that section was not intended to exclude "records of routine, nonadversarial matters." See also United States v. Gilbert n136(a criminologist's note on a latent fingerprint card indicating that prints were lifted from a statuette used in smuggling heroin was admissible under (B), since the routine act of reporting a latent print is ministerial and not evaluative).

United States v. Brown, 9 F.3d 907 (11th Cir. 1993) : The Court held in a firearms prosecution that a police department property receipt was properly admitted under Rule 803(6), where the police custodian testified that the regular and customary procedure was to fill out a property receipt for any type of evidence. Although the business records exception may not be used as a back door to introduce matters from law enforcement personnel inadmissible under Rule 803(8)(B), routine, nonadversarial police records like this property receipt were not the type of evidence contemplated by the exclusion in Rule 803(8). See also United States v. Agustino-Hernandez, 14 F.3d 42 (11th Cir. 1994) (warrants of deportations and records that an alien had been warned of the penalties for reentry, prepared long before the alleged offense and relied on in the daily operations of the Immigration and Naturalization Service, were held admissible).

[ii] Rule 803(8) -- Law Enforcement Reports and Matters Observed by Officials in Criminal Cases -- Inadmissible

United States v. Rosa, 11 F.3d 315 (2d Cir. 1993) : The Court held, in a major narcotics and racketeering case, that factual observations included in an autopsy report from the medical examiner's office were properly admitted under Rule 803(8)(B), but the part of the report containing factual findings as to the manner and cause of death was properly held inadmissible under Rule 803(8)(C). In United States v. Pinto-Mejia, n137 defendants were found guilty of possessing marijuana on a vessel subject to United States jurisdiction. Jurisdiction depended on a finding that the vessel was stateless, and the determination below was based on a certificate of a Venezuelan agency stating that the named vessel had been registered, that it had "sailed clandestinely from Venezuelan port," that the Maritime Authority had found grounds to hold that the registration became invalid, and that there was no evidence of a subsequent reregistration. The Court held that this was not a certificate qualifying for admission under Rule 803(8), because it contained factual findings that could not be offered in a criminal case under subdivision (C) of the Rule.

United States v. Bishop, 264 F.3d 535 (5th Cir. 2001) : The Court affirmed a conviction for income tax offenses, holding it was error to admit IRS agents' notes regarding meetings they had with the defendant. The Court noted that "[p]ersonal notes made by an investigator such as an IRS agent are not ordinarily admissible because they are hearsay. See Rule 801(c), 803(8)(B)." Although it found the error to be harmless in United States v. Stone, n138 the Court concluded that an affidavit of a Treasury Department officer could be used to authenticate under Rule 902(4) a sheet showing checks processed by the Department, but that it could not be used to explain in detail anything about a particular check, including the fact that it was mailed. The Court noted that Rule 803(8)(A) did not authorize introduction of the affidavit because it "is designed to allow admission of official records and reports prepared by an agency or government office for purposes independent of specific litigation" (emphasis added) and not to allow admission of "statements prepared solely for purposes of this litigation."

United States v. Romo, 914 F.2d 889 (7th Cir. 1990) : Affirming convictions for a cocaine distribution conspiracy, the Court held that an entry in a testifying officer's case report stating that a government informant who testified "deals in stolen property" was properly excluded as lacking trustworthiness, since defense counsel provided no evidence as to how the report was prepared or the basis of the information it contained.

United States v. Orellana-Blanco, 294 F.3d 1143 (9th Cir. 2002) : Reversing a conviction for marriage fraud and making a false statement on an immigration document, the Court held it was error to admit a "Record of Sworn Statement," made when the defendant applied for a green card, as a public record, because the record was prepared under adversarial, and therefore untrustworthy, circumstances. In a prosecution for smuggling illegal aliens, United States v. Pena-Gutierrez, 222 F.3d 1080 (9th Cir. 2000) , the government introduced a report prepared by an INS inspector during her interview of one of the aliens, which contained his statements regarding his nationality. The report had been admitted under Rule 803(5), but the Court said law enforcement reports should be admitted, if at all, only under Rule 803(8). Here, because the INS inspector was conducting a criminal investigation, the report was inadmissible under Rule 803(8), but admission was harmless error.

[iii] Rule 803(8) -- Law Enforcement Reports in Criminal Cases -- Offered by Defense

United States v. Smith, 521 F.2d 957 (D.C. Cir. 1975) : This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 803(8), § 803.02[9][c].

United States v. Versaint, 849 F.2d 827 (3d Cir. 1988) : The Court reversed cocaine convictions for the improper exclusion of a police report, written by an officer who identified the defendant at trial, that described an individual other than the defendant who participated in drug sales. Without deciding whether the report might be admissible as a business record, the Court held that the report was admissible against the government unless it demonstrated a lack of trustworthiness.

United States v. Sharpe, 193 F.3d 852 (5th Cir. 1999) : In a prosecution for murder and related offenses, a defendant claimed that exculpatory FBI lab reports relating to hair, fiber, blood, and print analysis were admissible under Rule 803(8)(B). The Court held that the defendant's reliance on the exception was "misplaced" because Rule 803(8)(B) excludes police reports "in criminal cases." We believe this holding is incorrect. See the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 803.02[9][c].

United States v. Sutton, 337 F.3d 792 (7th Cir. 2003) : A defendant charged with several robberies sought to introduce reports made by the police laboratory indicating that the defendant's fingerprints did not match fingerprints taken from the crime scenes. The Court held that under Rule 803(8)(C) the reports were not excludable as hearsay, but there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the reports under Rule 403. Without an expert to explain them, the reports' probative value was outweighed by the risk that the jury would improperly rely on the reports in the absence of context and believe that the reports proved the negative, that the defendant had not been at the crime scene. In United States v. Hatchett, 245 F.3d 625 (7th Cir. 2001) , although the Court affirmed both the defendant's drug-related convictions and the exclusion of a fingerprint laboratory analysis for lack of a foundation, it observed that the Trial Judge erred in saying that Rule 803(8)(C) did not apply because "this isn't a matter against the government." The Rule "requires only that the report be offered against the government, not that the proceeding be one against the government."

[l] Rule 803(8) -- Matters Observed by Officials -- Civil Cases

See also annotations under § 803.03[8][o], "Police Reports -- Civil Cases."

Malkin v. United States, 243 F.3d 120 (2d Cir. 2001) : A taxpayer sued for a refund on the ground that the statute of limitations had run prior to the assessment of a deficiency. The IRS claimed that he had timely consented to extension of the limitations period, but the taxpayer's entire file, which contained the original extension form, had been lost or destroyed before the time of trial. Affirming a judgment for the government, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting IRS computer reports that indicated when items in the file had been entered, since there was no evidence that the unavailability of the original documents was anything other than inadvertent and the secondary evidence was shown to be reliable. IRS employees had the duty to receive extension forms and to record them in the appropriate computer data files, and an automatic dating feature prevents backdating of entries. In an inmate's § 1983 action against prison guards, Hynes v. Coughlin, 79 F.3d 285 (2d Cir. 1996) , the defendants offered a "Use of Force" report prepared by one of the guards purporting to describe the beginning of the altercation, although she testified that she had not seen the incident until she heard a scream and observed another guard holding his genitals. The Court said the report was not admissible under Rule 803(8)(B) because no adequate foundation was laid; the Court also quoted the 1972 Advisory Committee Note that police reports are excluded except when they reflect first-hand observations of the officer.

Williams v. Tri-County Growers, Inc., 747 F.2d 121 (3d Cir. 1984) : In a Fair Labor Standards Act suit, the Court found that a statement by an agent of the defendant company that was recorded in a Department of Labor investigative report should have been admitted on behalf of the plaintiffs. The statement was an agent's admission and the report was a public record under Rule 803. Since the statement was recorded as it was made, the Court concluded that "[i]t was ... very similar to an observation and did not involve the investigator's conclusions."

In re Oil Spill by the Amoco Cadiz, 954 F.2d 1279 (7th Cir. 1992) : Affirming findings of liability arising from an oil spill in the English Channel, the Court held that receipt and disbursement records of French governmental authorities were admissible even though they incorporated information furnished by others, as the Rule is not limited to excusing the declarants' presence but states a multilevel exception.

Hughes v. United States, 953 F.2d 531 (9th Cir. 1992) : Affirming judgments against taxpayers, the Court held that computer-generated IRS Certificates of Assessments and Payments are admissible records of matters observed pursuant to duty imposed by law as to which there is a duty to report.

Haskell v. United States Dep't of Agriculture, 743 F. Supp. 765 (D. Kan. 1990) , aff'd, 930 F.2d 816 (10th Cir. 1991) : In granting the government's motion for a summary judgment barring a store co-owner from the food stamp program, the District Court held that statements of an Agriculture Department investigative aide who witnessed several of the illegal transactions were admissible under the Rule. The Court of Appeals affirmed, holding on authority of Abdel v. United States, 670 F.2d 73 (7th Cir. 1982) , that the reports would be admissible under Rule 803(6), so it was not necessary to reach the Rule 803(8) question.

[m] Rule 803(8) -- Nongovernmental Agencies

Ricciuti v. New York City Transit Auth., 754 F. Supp. 980 (S.D.N.Y. 1990) , vacated on other grounds, 941 F.2d 119 (2d Cir. 1991) : The Court held in a civil rights action that a study made by a small management analysis group that had been commissioned by the Authority to investigate illegal arrests by transit police was not admissible under the Rule, because the group was not a public office or agency and its findings did not result from an investigation made pursuant to authority granted by law.

United States v. Central Gulf Lines, 974 F.2d 621 (5th Cir. 1992) : In an action by the government on cargo damage claims, the Court held there was no error in admitting survey reports made by independent surveyors under Rule 803(8)(C), as survey reports are public documents and the surveyors are performing a duty imposed by law.

United States v. Blackburn, 992 F.2d 666 (7th Cir. 1993) : The Court held there was no error in admitting, in the defendant's trial for bank robbery, computer printouts of lensometer readings for eyeglasses left in a stolen getaway car. Because the analysis had been made at the request of the FBI in anticipation of litigation, the records did not have the reliability of business records under Rule 803(6). Because they were made independently by a private company, they were not barred by the criminal-investigation exceptions of Rule 803(8), but since the company was not the equivalent of government investigators, its reports were not records of public offices or agencies admissible under the Rule. However, because the tests were entirely mechanical and objective, and there was no possibility of bias since the investigation had no suspects at the time, the exhibit was reliable enough to be admitted under the residual exception. We note, however, that under Crawford v. Washington the report might well be considered "testimonial," and thus inadmissible on confrontation grounds.

Marsee v. United States Tobacco Co., 866 F.2d 319 (10th Cir. 1989) : Affirming a judgment for the defendant in a suit by a plaintiff who claimed that her son developed oral cancer from using snuff, the Court held that two published reports -- by the International Agency for Research on Cancer, and the Consensus Development Conference of NIH -- were properly excluded, as neither reflected the findings of a government agency.

[n] Rule 803(8) -- Opinions

Holbrook v. Lykes Bros. S.S. Co., 80 F.3d 777 (3d Cir. 1996) : In an action alleging that a seaman's death from mesothelioma was caused by asbestos exposure, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion under Rule 403 in redacting references to mesothelioma in the death certificate, autopsy report, and hospital records. Although documents admissible under Rule 803(8) may contain opinions, the difficulty of diagnosing mesothelioma meant that unexamined references to the disease were not helpful to and could potentially have misled the jury.

Marsee v. United States Tobacco Co., 866 F.2d 319 (10th Cir. 1989) , aff'g 639 F. Supp. 466 (W.D. Okla. 1986) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in a suit by a plaintiff who claimed that her son developed oral cancer from using snuff, holding that a report by the Surgeon General's Advisory Committee on the health consequences of using smokeless tobacco would be admitted, but reports of the International Agency for Research on Cancer and the Conference of the National Institute of Health would not be. The excluded reports were described as "little more than opinions and conclusions drawn from existing research literature."

Hines v. Brandon Steel Decks, Inc., 886 F.2d 299 (11th Cir. 1989) : The Court remanded this wrongful death case in light of the Supreme Court's decision in Rainey. The Trial Judge had admitted only the specific findings of fact in an OSHA report and had excluded all opinions and conclusions. The Court emphasized on remand that the Supreme Court had expressed no view as to whether a legal, as opposed to a factual, conclusion was admissible, and opined that legal conclusions do not fall within the exception. It added that in deciding whether a report is trustworthy, a Trial Judge might consider whether an investigator's expertise covers the questions addressed in the report. The Court reasoned that the unavailability of an OSHA investigator to testify in private civil litigation does not invalidate a report, but the absence of an opportunity for cross-examination is a proper factor to consider in evaluating trustworthiness. It added also that a report might be excluded under Rule 403 even though it is otherwise admissible under Rule 803(8)(C).

[o] Rule 803(8) -- Police Reports -- Civil Cases

Lubanski v. Coleco Indus., 929 F.2d 42 (1st Cir. 1991) : Affirming a judgment for the defendant toy manufacturer in a product liability action brought by the mother of a child killed when struck by a car while riding on a three-wheeled riding apparatus, the Court held that a report of the investigating officer and his conclusions about the circumstances of the accident should not have been excluded pro forma. Exclusion might have been appropriate, however, because the report was untrustworthy or because it was confusing, misleading or cumulative; in any event, any error in excluding it was rendered harmless by oral testimony.

Parsons v. Honeywell, Inc., 929 F.2d 901 (2d Cir. 1991) : In a product liability action arising out of a gas explosion, the defendants offered a police report containing a statement from an eyewitness recounting the plaintiff's statement that he smelled gas and "shouldn't have lit it up." The police report would be admissible as a public record and the plaintiff's statement would be admissible as an excited utterance, but the Court held the witness' statement could not come within the residual exception because the witness apparently could testify in person. In Lerner v. Seaboard Coast Line R.R., n139 the Court granted summary judgment for a railroad in an action by train passengers injured when a train collided with an auto. It found that there was no evidence that the grade crossing was dangerous and concluded that a police officer's notation on a report concerning the need for railroad crossing arms was inadmissible since the officer was not an expert on railroad crossings.

Baker v. Elcona Homes Corp., 588 F.2d 551 (6th Cir. 1978) : Affirming a judgment for the defendant truck driver in an automobile negligence case, the Court held that Rule 803(8)(C) authorized the admission of a police report containing findings about the color of a traffic light at the time of an accident.

Simmons v. Chicago & N.W. Transp. Co., 993 F.2d 1326 (8th Cir. 1993) : Distinguishing its decision in Faries v. Atlas Truck Body Mfg. Co., infra, the Court held that a state trooper's accident investigation report was admissible in a FELA action, since the trooper was experienced and skilled and the report was timely. In Faries v. Atlas Truck Body Mfg. Co., n140 the Court reversed a judgment for the manufacturers of a motorcycle and a truck in a suit by the motorcycle rider. It concluded that a police report should not have been admitted as a public record where the officer did not measure the position of the vehicles or skid marks, the conclusions were based upon statements of interested persons, and there was no corroboration of the report.

Hill v. Rolleri, 615 F.2d 886 (9th Cir. 1980) : In an automobile accident diversity case, the Court said that the Trial Judge might have erred in admitting a police report containing statements made by one driver as to how the accident occurred, although any error was deemed harmless.

[p] Rule 803(8) -- Preliminary Memoranda

Smith v. Isuzu Motors, Ltd., 137 F.3d 859 (5th Cir. 1998) : In a wrongful death action, the plaintiffs claimed that the vehicle in which the decedent died was not crashworthy. They sought to introduce three memoranda, prepared by staff members of the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration, which supported their position. The agency ultimately declined to accept the position of these staff members. The Court held that the memoranda were properly excluded as hearsay. They could not be introduced under Rule 803(8)(A) because they did not reflect "activities of the agency" within the meaning of that Rule. Nor did the memoranda constitute "factual findings" of the agency within the meaning of Rule 803(8)(C).

[q] Rule 803(8) -- Relationship to Other Rules

United States v. Arias-Santana, 964 F.2d 1262 (1st Cir. 1992) : Affirming convictions for cocaine distribution, the Court held that a police report identifying the defendant at a drug buy, which would normally be inadmissible under the Rule, was admissible as a prior consistent statement under Rule 801(d)(1)(B) after the report was used on cross-examination and the officer was implicitly charged with recent fabrication.

United States v. Oates, 560 F.2d 45 (2d Cir. 1977) : The Court reversed a conviction for possession of heroin with intent to distribute, holding that the exclusionary language of Rule 803(8)(B) and (C) made it error to admit the official report and the accompanying worksheet of the United States Customs Service chemist who analyzed a white powdery substance seized from Oates' codefendant under any other Rule. The case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 803.02[9][d].

United States v. Sokolow, 91 F.3d 396 (3d Cir. 1996) : In a mail fraud prosecution brought against the owner of a company, the government offered a third-party administrator's summary of unpaid health insurance claims filed against the company's health plan. The administrator was hired by a State Court to adjust unpaid claims after the plan was ordered liquidated. The defendant argued that this report was inadmissible in a criminal case due to the exclusionary language of Rule 803(8)(B) and (C). But the Court held that this exclusionary language "does not compel the exclusion of documents properly admitted under Rule 803(6) where the author testifies." Here, the employee of the administrator who supervised the claim adjustments testified and was cross-examined.

United States v. O'Keefe, 426 F.3d 274 (5th Cir. 2005) : The defendant, charged with "seaman's manslaughter" after he capsized a tugboat causing a passenger to drown, proffered the Coast Guard's accident report of the incident. The Trial Judge ruled that the body of the report could be admitted, but that the conclusory headings in the report would be excluded because, among other things, the jury might be confused as to the different burdens of proof used for the report and at the criminal trial. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion and rejected the argument that the analysis was inappropriate under Rule 803(8) because the Rule authorizes exclusion of a public report only if it is untrustworthy and not if it is confusing. The Court stated that Rule 803(8) "is not the only basis upon which a district court may rely to exclude evidence stemming from investigative reports," and it found no error in excluding the report as unduly confusing under Rule 403. In Cortes v. Maxus Exploration Co., 977 F.2d 195 (5th Cir. 1992) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff in a Title VII sexual harassment action, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the EEOC's determination of no probable cause for the charge. Although agency reports are presumptively admissible under Rule 803(8)(C), this report did not contain detailed evidentiary statements and findings of fact; rather it was a conclusory determination that could have unfairly prejudiced the plaintiff's case and so was inadmissible under Rule 403. In an action against an attorney for an insolvent savings and loan association, FDIC v. Mmahat, n141 the Court held that regulatory agency examination reports admissible under Rule 803(8) satisfied Rule 805 as to included hearsay because the statements were party-admissions made by a person who, at the time they were introduced, was a defendant in the action. In United States v. Dancy, n142 the Court affirmed a felon's conviction for firearm possession, holding that a judgment of conviction was admissible under Rule 803(22) whether or not it also fell within Rule 803(8). In United States v. Cain, n143 a conviction for transporting a stolen vehicle was reversed, because an escape report from a federal prison was used to prove that the defendant was at large when the vehicle was stolen. The Court concluded that "statements inadmissible as public agency reports under Rule 803(8) may not be received merely because they satisfy Rule 803(6)."

United States v. Blackburn, 992 F.2d 666 (7th Cir. 1993) : The Court held there was no error in admitting, in the defendant's trial for bank robbery, computer printouts of lensometer readings for eyeglasses left in a stolen getaway car. Because the analysis had been made at the request of the FBI in anticipation of litigation, the records did not have the reliability of business records under Rule 803(6). Because they were made independently by a private company, they were not barred by the criminal-investigation exceptions of Rule 803(8), but since the company was not the equivalent of government investigators, its reports were not records of public offices or agencies admissible under the Rule. However, because the tests were entirely mechanical and objective, and there was no possibility of bias since the investigation had no suspects at the time, the exhibit was reliable enough to be admitted under the residual exception. In United States v. King, n144 the Court affirmed a conviction for making false statements, holding that forms filled out by Social Security claims representatives could be admitted under Rule 803(6) and rejecting the argument that 803(8) was the exclusive rule for government records. In United States v. Sawyer, n145 the Court refused to rely on Oates, supra , and held that a memorandum of an IRS agent concerning a telephone conversation was admissible under Rule 803(5), and that Rule 803(8) did not signify that 803(5) was unavailable in criminal cases.

United States v. Orellana-Blanco, 294 F.3d 1143 (9th Cir. 2002) : The defendant was convicted of marriage fraud and making a false statement on an immigration document, after entering an allegedly sham marriage. Reversing, the Court held that a "Record of Sworn Statement," made when the defendant applied for a green card, was not admissible as a business record. The Court noted that "[w]hen public records are used against a defendant in a criminal prosecution, the public records exception [Rule 803(8)] is the exclusive applicable hearsay exception." In United States v. Loera, 923 F.2d 725 (9th Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed a motorist's assault conviction arising out of a drunk-driving incident, holding that docket entries of prior misdemeanor convictions were not admissible under Rule 803(22) but were admissible under Rule 803(8)(A). In United States v. Orozco, n146 the Court affirmed convictions for possession of cocaine and heroin with intent to distribute, upholding the admission of computer data cards from the Treasury Enforcement Communications System, which cards revealed license plate numbers of vehicles passing through a border location at a particular time. The Court said that public records should be considered under Rule 803(8), not 803(6), and that 803(8)(B) did not exclude "records of routine, nonadversarial matters such as those in question here."

United States v. Brown, 9 F.3d 907 (11th Cir. 1993) : The Court held in a firearms prosecution that a police department property receipt was properly admitted under Rule 803(6), where the police custodian testified that the regular and customary procedure was to fill out a property receipt for any type of evidence. Although the business records exception may not be used as a back door to introduce matters from law enforcement personnel inadmissible under Rule 803(8)(B), routine, nonadversarial police records like this property receipt were not the type of evidence contemplated by the exclusion in the Rule. In Barfield v. Orange County, 911 F.2d 644 (11th Cir. 1990) , the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting an EEOC determination of "no reasonable cause" in a race and sex discrimination action, as the plaintiff made no showing of defects in trustworthiness or that the danger of unfair prejudice significantly outweighed the highly probative nature of the evidence. Rejecting a per se rule of admissibility for EEOC reports or a rule making such reports subject only to the trustworthiness proviso, the Court noted that the change from a bench to a jury trial will not affect the analysis under the trustworthiness proviso of the Rule but will affect the balancing under Rule 403.

[r] Rule 803(8) -- Relevance Requirement

United States v. Kail, 804 F.2d 441 (8th Cir. 1986) : In a prosecution for mail fraud involving the sale of coins, the Court held it was proper to exclude a 1977 Postal Service administrative decision that found that there were no industry-wide standards for the grading and valuation of coins. There was evidence that standards were developed thereafter, which rendered the earlier finding irrelevant.

Kloepfer v. Honda Motor Co., 898 F.2d 1452 (10th Cir. 1990) : In a product liability action arising out of the death of a passenger on an all-terrain vehicle (ATV), the Court held that although there is a strong presumption of admissibility for government reports, there was no abuse of discretion in excluding reports that were not limited to three-wheel vehicles and did not relate to an investigation of this accident or the model involved therein, but rather covered accidents, injuries, and statistics involving ATVs manufactured by over 20 manufacturers.

[s] Rule 803(8) -- Reports Setting Forth Activities

United States v. Koontz, 143 F.3d 408 (8th Cir. 1998) : In a prosecution for drug and weapons offenses, the government sought to rebut the defense contention that a gun found in the defendant's car belonged to a friend of his son by introducing a computerized booking record which indicated that a person by the friend's name was jailed during the relevant time. The Court found no error in admission of the record; it rejected the defendant's argument that a computer-generated booking report was more likely to be inaccurate than, presumably, a manually-prepared document, since the defendant did not explore this issue on examination of the agent presenting the report or cite any case law on the issue.

[t] Rule 803(8) -- Screening Panels

Daigle v. Maine Med. Center, Inc., 14 F.3d 684 (1st Cir. 1994) : The Trial Court in a diversity medical malpractice action ordered that the plaintiff present her case to a prelitigation screening panel as required by state law, and when the panel unanimously found no acts of negligence, followed the state law by admitting the findings into evidence without providing an opportunity for impeachment. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court noted that, Erie principles to one side, because screening panels are administered through the Superior Court, admitting the findings is analogous to admitting the factual findings of public agencies resulting from investigations made pursuant to law.

[u] Rule 803(8) -- State Department Reports

Bridgeway Corp. v. Citibank, 201 F.3d 134 (2d Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed a summary judgment for a judgment debtor in an action to enforce a judgment rendered by the Supreme Court of Liberia. The Court concluded that State Department Country Reports concerning the fairness of the Liberian judicial system were admissible. They were prepared by area specialists at the Department and are annual undertakings. Moreover, the judgment creditor offered no suggestion of any motive of the United States to misrepresent facts about the Liberian civil war or its effect on the country's judicial system. The Court concluded that uncontradicted evidence established that Liberian courts did not provide a judicial system that offered fair and impartial justice and due process at the relevant time.

[v] Rule 803(8) -- State Law

Daigle v. Maine Med. Center, Inc., 14 F.3d 684 (1st Cir. 1994) : The Trial Court in a diversity medical malpractice action ordered that the plaintiff present her case to a prelitigation screening panel as required by state law, and when the panel unanimously found no acts of negligence, followed the state law by admitting the findings into evidence without providing an opportunity for impeachment. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court held that the federal evidence rules governing hearsay and impeachment do not seek to displace the state's substantive policy implemented by the screening panel procedure.

Redmond v. Baxley, 475 F. Supp. 1111 (E.D. Mich. 1979) : The Court denied posttrial motions by defendants who lost a civil rights case brought by a prisoner who was raped while in custody, stating that a report by the state police on the problem of sexual assaults in prison was admissible as nonhearsay evidence to show notice and possibly for its truth also under Rule 803(8)(C). That the report was characterized by the state as "confidential" was properly deemed irrelevant to the hearsay issues.

Johnson v. United States, 780 F.2d 902 (11th Cir. 1986) : Although the Court remanded a wrongful death case brought by the parents of an infant who died after being taken to a military hospital, it found no error in the exclusion of a report prepared by an insurance adjuster on behalf of another hospital to which the infant was taken. A state statute mandated the keeping of such a report, but barred its admission as evidence. Although the state law was not controlling, the Court held that the circumstances in which the report was prepared and its inclusion of improper matter justified the ruling below.

[w] Rule 803(8) -- Statistical Reports

United States v. Hardin, 710 F.2d 1231 (7th Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possession of cocaine with intent to distribute. It found that a graph from a Drug Enforcement Agency statistical report purporting to show the average retail price and purity of illicit cocaine in the United States was properly admitted under subdivision (A) as circumstantial evidence of intent to distribute, and that subdivision (B) did not require its exclusion. The Court noted that "[t]he compilation of such information for the non-litigative purpose of identifying national trends in the illicit drug market provides little incentive for misrepresentation by these agents."

Skaw v. United States, 740 F.2d 932 (Fed. Cir. 1984) : In an action against the United States to recover for the alleged taking of unpatented mining claims, the Court vacated and remanded a summary judgment against the plaintiffs. The Trial Judge erred, inter alia, in refusing to consider a study prepared by the Secretary of Agriculture that estimated the amount of mineral deposits on a river, which was a public report admissible under Rule 803(8).

[x] Rule 803(8) -- Statutes and Regulations

Chiron Corp. v. NTSB, 198 F.3d 935 (D.C. Cir. 1999) : The petitioners sued to compel the NTSB to share information obtained during an investigation of a fire that destroyed an aircraft containing cargo owned and manufactured by them, arguing that they may face civil liability claims for the fire. In an opinion dismissing the petition for lack of standing, the Court observed that the governing statute makes the NTSB's report inadmissible in a civil action, but that factual accident reports by NTSB investigators are, by regulation, not reports of the Board and are thus admissible.

In re Complaint of Nautilus Motor Tanker Co., 85 F.3d 105 (3d Cir. 1996) : The Court held that a Coast Guard report of a tanker grounding was admissible in a limitation proceeding, notwithstanding a regulation providing that such reports are not intended to fix civil or criminal responsibility, which the tanker's owner had claimed deprived the report of evidentiary relevance. The Court reasoned, first, that the policy justification for the regulation's evidentiary bar -- ensuring frank disclosure by Coast Guard investigators -- was absent where, as here, the Coast Guard had no interest in the outcome. Second, a federal regulation cannot "trump" a Federal Rule of Evidence enacted by Congress, so Rules 401-402 set the applicable standard of relevant evidence. In so holding, the Court rejected contrary reasoning in Huber v. United States, infra, which was followed in In re Cleveland Tankers, Inc., infra. A concurring Judge argued that the regulation did not purport to govern the admissibility of a report. A dissenting Judge argued that, while regulations cannot "trump" statutes, a regulation promulgated pursuant to congressional authority can create an exception to a general rule of evidence.

Travelers Ins. Co. v. Riggs, 671 F.2d 810 (4th Cir. 1982) : The Court upheld a judgment against an insurer in a subrogation suit arising out of a plane crash. It found that conclusions in a National Transportation Safety Board report could not be admitted because 49 U.S.C. § 1441(e) explicitly prohibits use of such a report in an action for damages.

Curry v. Chevron, USA, 779 F.2d 272 (5th Cir. 1985) : The Court reversed a directed verdict for a manufacturer in an action arising out of a helicopter crash, but it found no error in the exclusion of opinions and conclusions of the National Transportation Safety Board upon which the plaintiffs' expert sought to rely. The Court noted that "the judicial gloss on 761(e) [49 U.S.C. § 1441(e)], while allowing factual portions of the report to be admitted, forbids the use of any conclusory statements in the NTSB reports."

In re Cleveland Tankers, Inc., 67 F.3d 1200 (6th Cir. 1995) : In a limitation of liability action arising out of an explosion on a ship unloading gasoline, the Court held that the analysis and conclusions section of a Coast Guard accident report was not admissible, since the regulation under which the report was prepared clearly indicates that it is to be a safety-maximizing tool, not a forensic aid.

Huber v. United States, 838 F.2d 398 (9th Cir. 1988) : In an action between the United States and a shipowner for contribution following settlements with dependents of crewmembers of a ship that sank, the Court held that conclusions and recommendations contained in reports by Coast Guard investigating officers were not admissible in light of a regulation forbidding use of the reports to fix civil or criminal liability.

Mullan v. Quickie Aircraft Corp., 797 F.2d 845 (10th Cir. 1986) : Although the Court reversed a judgment for the purchaser of an aircraft kit against the manufacturer and remanded for further proceedings, it upheld the admission of expert testimony for the plaintiff that was based in part on the factual portions of National Transportation Safety Board reports. The Court indicated that only the portions of the reports that contain conclusions are inadmissible under 49 U.S.C. § 1441(e), and that there is no reason why an expert cannot reach the same conclusions as those found in a report.

Wilson v. Attaway, 757 F.2d 1227 (11th Cir. 1985) : In a civil rights action for unlawful arrest, the Court sustained the exclusion of a report prepared by an observer-mediator of the Commerce Department's Community Relations Service. The statute establishing the Service provided that the activities of its employees "shall be conducted in confidence and without publicity," and the Trial Judge found that the report was one man's thoughts and was conclusory.

[y] Rule 803(8) -- Transcripts and Minutes of Hearings and Meetings

Major v. Treen, 574 F. Supp. 325 (E.D. La. 1983) : A three-judge Court found that a redistricting plan that had been cleared by the Attorney-General was unlawful. Among the evidence that the Court considered were transcripts and minutes of public hearings and of legislative committees and subcommittees, which were admissible under Rule 803(8)(A).

[z] Rule 803(8) -- Trustworthiness

[i] Rule 803(8) -- Computerized Records

United States v. Koontz, 143 F.3d 408 (8th Cir. 1998) : In a prosecution for drug and weapons offenses, the government sought to rebut the defense contention that a gun found in the defendant's car belonged to a friend of his son by introducing a computerized booking record which indicated that a person by the friend's name was jailed during the relevant time. The Court found no error in admission of the record; it rejected the defendant's argument that a computer-generated booking report was more likely to be inaccurate than, presumably, a manually-prepared document, since the defendant did not explore this issue on examination of the agent presenting the report or cite any case law on the issue.

[ii] Rule 803(8) -- Trustworthiness -- Miscellaneous Cases

Distaff, Inc. v. Springfield Contracting Corp., 984 F.2d 108 (4th Cir. 1993) : In an action by a contractor arising out of a fire at a Naval Research Lab, the Trial Judge excluded a report by the Lab's Chief Fire Inspector identifying the cause of the accident on the ground that the author of the report was barred by the Navy from testifying as to his opinions and conclusions. The Court held that the inability to cross-examine the author of a report is not a basis for exclusion.

Moss v. Ole South Real Estate, Inc., 933 F.2d 1300 (5th Cir. 1991) : In a civil rights action arising out of an African-American couple's attempt to buy a house, the Magistrate Judge excluded reports of Air Force and HUD investigations into the incident on the ground they were incomplete and misleading and based on evidence from witnesses who were not credible. The Court reversed a judgment for the defendants, holding that credibility is not the focus of the trustworthiness inquiry. The presumption of trustworthiness was overcome as to the HUD report, however, because the investigation was untimely and a key player was not interviewed.

Ponce v. Construction Laborers Pension Trust, 774 F.2d 1401 (9th Cir. 1985) : Affirming findings that the trustees of a pension fund violated federal law regarding vesting rules, the Court noted that an interim Senate Report was properly used as corroborative evidence in connection with expert testimony, even though "[i]t might have been error for the trial judge to accept the Senate Report statistics as proof of a disputed fact and rely completely upon the report in deciding that the CLPT exclusion rate was unreasonably high."

[iii] Rule 803(8) -- Trustworthiness -- Presumption of Trustworthiness

Bradford Trust Co. v. Merrill Lynch Pierce, Fenner & Smith, Inc., 805 F.2d 49 (2d Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed a judgment for a brokerage firm in a suit alleging breach of warranty, but it disagreed with the Trial Judge's handling of an evidence issue. The Court held that a party objecting to evidence under Rule 803(8)(C) must make an affirmative showing of untrustworthiness. In this case, two FBI reports indicating that a signature was genuine based upon a fingerprint analysis and a handwriting comparison should not have been merely admitted and given no weight in bench trial; instead a trier of fact "should be most reluctant to disregard the only expert testimony before it" on a point that it is not otherwise competent to determine.

In re Paducah Towing Co., 692 F.2d 412 (6th Cir. 1982) : Following a tow boat accident, the Coast Guard held a hearing to determine whether to revoke the license of the tow boat's captain. The Court found no error when the hearing examiner's conclusion that the captain had not acted improperly was admitted in a liability action arising from the accident. The finding might have been deemed untrustworthy because of the evidence relied on by the examiner, but the opponent had the burden of demonstrating that the sources of information were untrustworthy, and had not met its burden.

Union Pac. R.R. Co. v. Kirby Inland Marine, Inc., 296 F.3d 671 (8th Cir. 2002) : In an action brought after a river barge ran into a bridge, the Court held that a Coast Guard Order which found the bridge to be "an unreasonable obstruction to navigation" was properly admitted. The determination by the Coast Guard was required by statute, and the process included a detailed investigation, a public hearing, and an administrative review. The Court noted that the party opposing admission has the burden of proving a public report's untrustworthiness, i.e., whether it was compiled or prepared in a way that indicates that its conclusions cannot be relied upon.

Montiel v. City of Los Angeles, 2 F.3d 335 (9th Cir. 1993) : The Court reversed a judgment as a matter of law for the City in a civil rights action alleging excessive force by police. The Trial Judge should not have excluded portions of a report by an independent commission on the Los Angeles Police Department without first presuming the report to be trustworthy and shifting the burden to the City of proving untrustworthiness. In Johnson v. City of Pleasanton, 982 F.2d 350 (9th Cir. 1992) , an action by homeowners challenging a city ordinance regulating satellite-receive-only antennas, the Court reversed a summary judgment for the homeowners on a preemption claim. In opposing summary judgment, the City offered a declaration by a planning director based upon staff reports indicating that the ordinance did not place unreasonable limitations or place excessive costs on use of antennas. The Court reasoned that, even though the City did not submit affidavits listing the staff members' levels of expertise, Rule (803)(8)(C) presumes that public records are trustworthy. Since the homeowners offered no evidence to suggest otherwise, the Court held that the evidence should not have been excluded and summary judgment should not have been granted.

[iv] Rule 803(8) -- Trustworthiness -- Report Admissible or Required To Be Admitted

In re Korean Air Lines Disaster of Sept. 1, 1983, 932 F.2d 1475 (D.C. Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed in part a plaintiffs' judgment in an action by representatives of passengers on an airline flight shot down in Soviet airspace, holding that a report by the Secretary General of the International Civil Aviation Organization was properly admitted. Even though the report was not adopted by the Council of the ICAO and it included a politically motivated Soviet report as an appendix, it constituted findings of a public official, and its untrustworthiness was not shown sufficiently to require exclusion.

Blake v. Pellegrino, 329 F.3d 43 (1st Cir. 2003) : Reviewing a wrongful death action brought by the parents of a disabled patient, the Court held it was error to redact the words "asphyxia by choking" from the death certificate that was admitted in evidence. The Court noted that the Trial Judge was not permitted to deem the evidence untrustworthy simply because he had come to believe that this was not the cause of death. In Robbins v. Whelan, n147 the Court found that a copy of the Department of Transportation National Highway Safety Bureau's report on stopping distances for all cars should have been admitted to bolster the plaintiff's contentions as to the cause of an accident. Although the report was based on tests conducted under controlled conditions, the defendant did not demonstrate that any conditions surrounding the accident were significantly different from the test conditions. The Court found that the report qualified for admission, even though the manufacturers actually had conducted the tests, since the government established detailed standards for the tests.

Gentile v. County of Suffolk, 926 F.2d 142 (2d Cir. 1991) : A judgment for the plaintiffs in a civil rights action against the County and some of its police officers was affirmed, the Court holding there was no error in admitting excerpts from a state investigation commission report outlining the County's failure to investigate and discipline cases of employee misconduct. The Trial Judge had reviewed the timeliness of the investigation, the special skill or experience of the investigating officials, the procedures governing any hearings, the existence of any motivation problems, and the finality of the findings, and had found the report trustworthy.

Clark v. Clabaugh, 20 F.3d 1290 (3d Cir. 1994) : Reversing a summary judgment for the defendants in a civil rights case arising out of a racial riot, the Court concluded that the Trial Judge properly considered a State Police report. The Rule does not require that an investigation leading to a report be undertaken by a person qualified as an expert, and the fact that officers interviewed parties to the litigation who may be biased did not justify imputing bias to the officers.

United States v. Central Gulf Lines, 974 F.2d 621 (5th Cir. 1992) : In an action by the government on cargo damage claims, the Court held there was no error in admitting survey reports made by independent surveyors under the Rule, as there was a sufficient showing that the surveys were based on personal knowledge and there was no showing the surveyors were biased by government ownership or control or by holding any interest in any aspect of the port operations.

Bank of Lexington & Trust Co. v. Vining Sparks Securities, Inc., 959 F.2d 606 (6th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendants in a securities fraud action, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting letters of caution issued by the NASD, as there was no sufficient showing that the investigation they reflected was untrustworthy. In United States v. School Dist. of Ferndale, n148 the Court opined that factual findings of an HEW hearing examiner were admissible under the public records exception. The Court rejected the claim that, because the HEW proceeding was not complete, it was untrustworthy.

Kehm v. Procter & Gamble Mfg. Co., 724 F.2d 613 (8th Cir. 1983) : Affirming a judgment for the plaintiffs in a product liability action arising from a woman's death from toxic shock syndrome, the Court ruled that it was proper to admit reports of epidemiological studies conducted by the Center for Disease Control and various state agencies that analyzed the statistical relationship between tampon use and TSS. The Court rejected the manufacturer's argument that the reports should have been excluded because they reflected various statistical biases and it could not examine the sources of information. It noted "the timeliness of the investigations, the special skills of the agencies conducting them, and their lack of any motive for conducting the studies other than to inform the public fairly and adequately."

Perrin v. Anderson, 784 F.2d 1040 (10th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed a judgment for police officers sued by the estate of a man killed when the officers attempted to obtain information about a traffic accident. It upheld admission of a report by the Oklahoma State Police Shooting Review Board that found that the officers had complied with regulations, stating that it was "unwilling to conclude that an internal investigation is necessarily biased, absent specific evidence."

[v] Rule 803(8) -- Trustworthiness -- Report Excludable or Required To Be Excluded

[A] Rule 803(8) -- Civil Cases

Strobl v. New York Mercantile Exch., 590 F. Supp. 875 (S.D.N.Y. 1984) : In an antitrust case, the Court denied the defendants' posttrial motions on the ground, inter alia, that the new evidence on which the defendants relied, a finding by an Administrative Law Judge that "rubberstamped" the allegations of the enforcement division of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, was not trustworthy enough to be admissible under Rule 803(8)(C).

New Jersey Turnpike Auth. v. PPG Indus., 197 F.3d 96 (3d Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendants in an action by the Turnpike Authority to recover clean-up costs at sites contaminated by chromite ore processing residues. As proof that the defendants were the sources of the pollution at the sites in question, the Authority offered Directives issued by the state Department of Environmental Protection that notified the companies that the DEP believed them to be responsible for hazardous substances that needed to be removed. The Court held that the Directives were not admissible evidence, since even though they were presumably the result of the DEP's investigations, they were more in the nature of notice pleading used to serve as notice of potential liability and were not sufficiently trustworthy to be admitted. In a diversity suit arising out of two accidents involving a plane purchased by the plaintiff from the defendant, John McShain, Inc. v. Cessna Aircraft Co., n149 the plaintiff unsuccessfully appealed rulings that excluded accident reports submitted to the National Transportation Safety Board regarding accidents involving the same plane apparatus involved in the instant case. Some were made by private persons and were not admissible under Rule 803(8), and those that were made by officials presented such difficult trustworthiness problems that the Court found that they were properly excluded under Rule 403.

Anderson v. Westinghouse Savannah R. Co., 406 F.3d 248 (4th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendants in an action by black employees alleging racial discrimination in pay and promotion practices. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding an assessment of the defendants' equal employment opportunity and diversity programs that had been prepared by the Department of Energy, since the assessment "suffered from multiple levels of hearsay," was a draft rather than a final report, and posed significant trustworthiness problems because of its limited factual base (e.g., considering the racial composition of only 30 selection panels during a period in which about 900 panels were utilized) and the failure to verify perceptions of self-selected respondents.

Matthews v. Ashland Chemical, Inc., 770 F.2d 1303 (5th Cir. 1985) : Affirming a directed verdict for a propane user in a suit by a propane deliveryman, the Court held it was not error to exclude a report by a fire investigator where it was unclear how great an inquiry was made and there was no evidence of the investigator's special skill and expertise.

Miller v. Caterpillar Tractor Co., 697 F.2d 141 (6th Cir. 1983) : In the course of affirming a judgment for the defendant manufacturer in an implied warranty negligence action against a truck manufacturer, the Court concluded it was proper to exclude two reports offered under the Rule. The first was made by a mining engineer who worked for the United States Bureau of Mines. His report was based on what people who were not clearly reliable told him, and it included a conclusion that was not independently verifiable. Moreover, his expertise was in mine engineering, not in mechanical operations. The second report was prepared by an investigating police officer. The Court concluded that it was properly excluded because it relied upon hearsay statements of witnesses.

Nachtsheim v. Beech Aircraft Corp., 847 F.2d 1261 (7th Cir. 1988) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the manufacturer in an airplane crash case, holding that evidence of a Forestry Service Pilot's Report was properly excluded, since the relevant portion was written by someone whom the pilot could not identify and might not have been based on personal knowledge. The Court held also that a government bulletin concerning the type of plane involved in the case was properly excluded, since there was no evidence as to the author of the bulletin and the sources of information relied upon, and that another bulletin was properly excluded in view of the fact that it had been withdrawn.

Donald v. Rast, 927 F.2d 379 (8th Cir. 1991) : Affirming a judgment for the defendants in a civil rights action by a motorist who alleged he had been wrongfully administered a breathalyzer test following a collision with a police van, the Court held (2-1) there was no error in excluding evidence that an administrative law Judge had rescinded the suspension of the plaintiff's driver's license. It reasoned that the ex parte nature of the administrative proceedings could indicate lack of trustworthiness and the jury might have given undue consideration to the findings. In O'Dell v. Hercules, Inc., n150 the Court held there had been no abuse of discretion in excluding, in an action for personal injuries from exposure to a toxic landfill, "health assessments" prepared by the Environmental Protection Administration. Although EPA reports are generally admissible under the Rule, these reports explicitly qualified their conclusions and thus lacked trustworthiness.

Jenkins v. Whittaker Corp., 785 F.2d 720 (9th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed most of a judgment holding the defendant liable for the death of a soldier resulting from the explosion of an atomic simulator supplied to the Army by the defendant. It found no error in the exclusion of opinions and conclusions found in investigative reports prepared by Army personnel concerning the simulators and the compliance by Army personnel with rules and regulations. The Trial Judge was concerned with the competence and reliability of the reports because of the questionable qualifications of the authors and their failure to interview everyone with knowledge and also found that the reports were the cumulative opinions of nonexperts that were not needed since the defendant intended to call an expert whom the plaintiffs could cross-examine.

Toole v. McClintock, 999 F.2d 1430 (11th Cir. 1993) : Reversing a judgment for the plaintiffs in a product liability case arising out of breast augmentation surgery in 1981, the Court held it was error to admit a 1990 FDA report setting forth "proposed findings" on risks posed by breast implant devices. The Court found that the report, made nine years after the surgery in this case, was irrelevant and that it was untrustworthy because it was only preliminary and an invitation to public comment. In Wilson v. Attaway, n151 a civil rights action in which the plaintiffs claimed that the defendants had unlawfully arrested them, the Court sustained the exclusion of a report prepared by an observer-mediator of the Commerce Department's Community Relations Service. The statute establishing the Service provided that the activities of its employees "shall be conducted in confidence and without publicity," and the Trial Judge found that the report was one man's thoughts and conclusory.

[B] Rule 803(8) -- Trustworthiness -- Report Excludable or Required To Be Excluded -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Lanese, 890 F.2d 1284 (2d Cir. 1989) : The Court held there was no error in excluding a police report offered by a defendant in an extortion case to show that he was a victim rather than a conspirator in his codefendant's threats. The report, made regarding the alleged arson of the defendant's car, noted the defendant had stated that an associate of the codefendant was a possible suspect; however, the report and the underlying incident occurred after the charged events, the defendant's full statement to police indicated his bias against the associate, and there was no showing why the officers making the report could not be produced.

United States v. D'Anjou, 16 F.3d 604 (4th Cir. 1994) : Affirming a conviction for drug offenses, the Court held there was no error in excluding statements taken by an ATF agent during his investigation that did not mention the defendant in connection with a drug ring. The raw interview transcripts were not "factual findings" under the Rule, since they did not result from any evaluative process. Furthermore, the circumstances in which they were made provided no guarantees of trustworthiness.

United States v. Jackson-Randolph, 282 F.3d 369 (6th Cir. 2002) : Affirming convictions for fraud arising from false claims made to government agencies for meals for economically disadvantaged children, the Court upheld the exclusion of a report regarding the meals program, which had been prepared by an administrative hearing officer and offered by the defendant. The report was untrustworthy because it was based upon the testimony of a codefendant who at the time of her testimony was heavily involved in the criminal activity and not yet charged. She therefore had a significant interest in testifying that there was no fraudulent activity with respect to the meals program.

United States v. Spano, 421 F.3d 599 (7th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed convictions in a public corruption case, finding no error in the exclusion of Town Board minutes as unreliable, where the records were controlled by the defendants themselves rather than by clerks assumed to be disinterested. In United States v. Romo, 914 F.2d 889 (7th Cir. 1990) , the Court affirmed convictions for a cocaine distribution conspiracy, holding that an entry in a testifying officer's case report stating that a government informant who testified "deals in stolen property" was properly excluded as lacking trustworthiness, since defense counsel provided no evidence as to how the report was prepared or the basis of the information it contained.

[9] Rule 803(9) -- Records Of Vital Statistics

[a] Rule 803(9) -- Birth Certificates

Oglesby v. Williams, 484 F. Supp. 865 (M.D. Fla. 1980) : An unmarried mother sued to have the putative father's name entered on her child's birth certificate. Citing Rule 803(9), the Court said that the state's interest in the accuracy of birth certificates, which may be relied on when parentage is a material concern, justifies a statute providing that a father's name may not be entered on the birth certificate of an unmarried woman unless he has been adjudicated the father or agrees in writing to inclusion of his name.

[b] Rule 803(9) -- Death Certificates

Holbrook v. Lykes Bros. S.S. Co., 80 F.3d 777 (3d Cir. 1996) : In an action alleging that a seaman's death from mesothelioma was caused by asbestos exposure, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion under Rule 403 in redacting references to mesothelioma in the death certificate, autopsy report, and hospital records. Although documents admissible under Rule 803(9) may contain opinions, the difficulty of diagnosing mesothelioma meant that unexamined references to the disease were not helpful to and could potentially have misled the jury. In Pollard v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., n152 a plaintiff suing under an accidental death policy proffered a death certificate and a coroner's certificate report describing the cause of death as asphyxia due to acute intoxication and concluding that death was "accidental." The Trial Judge ruled that the certificates would not be admitted unless the conclusions were excised, and the Court held that ruling was not manifestly erroneous. The probative value of the certificates was slight, because they were prepared before a toxicologist's report was completed, and the prejudicial effect was great, because the jury might give them excessive weight and might be confused by the term "accidental," which has a different meaning under the policy than for vital statistics purposes.

Vaughn v. United States, 536 F. Supp. 498 (W.D. Va. 1982) : In an action to recover taxes paid on behalf of an estate, the question of whether certain property was includable in the decedent's estate depended on whether she and her father died simultaneously. The Court admitted their death certificates, which had been issued by different states, and treated them as prima facie evidence that the decedent's father predeceased her by 73 minutes.

[10] Rule 803(10) -- Absence Of Public Record Or Entry

[a] Rule 803(10) -- Confrontation Issues

United States v. Hale, 978 F.2d 1016 (8th Cir. 1992) : Affirming a conviction for possession of unregistered firearms, the Court held there was no confrontation violation, under the then-applicable Ohio v. Roberts analysis, in admitting affidavits that a diligent search of government records had found no record of any registration application. We note that under Crawford v. Washington the affidavits might well be considered "testimonial," and thus inadmissible.

United States v. Rith, 164 F.3d 1323 (10th Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed a conviction for unlawful possession of an unregistered sawed-off shotgun, holding there was no Confrontation Clause violation, under the then-applicable

Ohio v. Roberts analysis, in admitting a certificate by an ATF agent that diligent search of the National Firearms Registration and Transfer Record failed to disclose that the designated firearm had been registered to the defendant. We note, however, that under Crawford v. Washington the certificate might well be considered "testimonial," and thus inadmissible.

[b] Rule 803(10) -- Errors in Search

United States v. Yakobov, 712 F.2d 20 (2d Cir. 1983) : The Court reversed convictions for firearms offenses because of errors in admitting evidence that the defendant was not a licensed dealer. The proof consisted of two documents prepared by the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms -- a statement signed by a regional administrator stating that Frank Hall was the custodian of ATF licensing records for several states, including New York, and another statement by Hall that he had made a diligent search of ATF records and could find no firearms license for Yakobov. At trial the government appeared to rely on Rule 803(8) to obtain admission of the Hall statement. On appeal the government relied instead on Rule 803(10), but the Court found that Rule 803(10)'s requirement of a diligent search had not been satisfied, since the Hall statement indicated that the search was based on misspelled versions of Yakobov's first and last names. The Court indicated that at a second trial a certificate that satisfied Rule 803(10) could be used, notwithstanding Oates, on the ground that statements under Rule 803(8) may have "evaluative aspects" not associated with certificates offered under Rule 803(10).

[c] Rule 803(10) -- Examples of Admissible Statements

United States v. Ventura-Melendez, 275 F.3d 9 (1st Cir. 2001) : Affirming a conviction for trespassing on a military installation, the Court upheld admission of a certificate signed by a Navy Lieutenant Commander stating that a diligent search of the records containing the names of those with permission to enter the installation had been conducted and that the search revealed no record or entry for the defendant. The Court concluded that Rule 803(10) does not require that an agency be under a legal duty to maintain certain records; it is sufficient that the agency has a practice of maintaining the records. We note, however, that under Crawford v. Washington the certificate might be considered "testimonial," and thus inadmissible.

United States v. Alexander, 48 F.3d 1477 (9th Cir. 1995) : The Court affirmed a bank robbery conviction, holding there was no error in admitting a declaration by an Assistant Executive Secretary of the FDIC attesting that a diligent search of the agency's records revealed no entry terminating the bank's insurance on or before the date of the robbery. Although the declaration had been admitted at trial under the residual exception, it was admissible under Rule 803(10). We note, however, that under Crawford v. Washington the declaration might well be considered "testimonial," and thus inadmissible on confrontation grounds.

[d] Rule 803(10) -- Foreign and International Searches

United States v. M'Biye, 655 F.2d 1240 (D.C. Cir. 1981) : A conviction for filing false information to get bank loans was affirmed, as the Court held that an affidavit of a United Nations official, properly authenticated under Rule 902, was properly admitted to show that a search of the records of a U.N. affiliate did not uncover any indication that the defendant was employed there as he claimed on his loan applications. The Court found that the U.N. qualified as a public office or agency. We note, however, that under Crawford v. Washington the affidavit might well be considered "testimonial," and thus inadmissible on confrontation grounds.

United States v. McDonald, 905 F.2d 871 (5th Cir. 1990) : A defendant charged with importing marijuana claimed, when he was stopped at the border, that his wallet had been stolen in Mexico and that he had reported the theft to local authorities. The Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit testimony that an inquiry had been made of Mexican state police and found no report of the stolen wallet, as there was nothing in the record to indicate that such reports were regularly made, transmitted, and preserved by the relevant Mexican officials.

United States v. Regner, 677 F.2d 754 (9th Cir. 1982) : In a mail fraud case involving false claims of hospital expenses in Hungary, the Court found no plain error in the admission of three certified Hungarian documents showing no record of a traffic accident and no record of the defendant's hospitalization. The dissenting Judge argued that the Court knew too little about record keeping in Hungary to warrant acceptance of the documents and urged that Rule 803(10) should not lightly be expanded to foreign documents, especially when the documents deal not with governmental matters but with proprietary matters such as taxi and hospital businesses. We note that under Crawford v. Washington the Hungarian documents might well be considered "testimonial," and thus inadmissible on confrontation grounds.

United States v. Martinez, 700 F.2d 1358 (11th Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed marijuana convictions, finding that a certificate from the General Commander of the Naval Force of Honduras saying that an "extensive" search had been carried out and concluding that a ship was not registered in Honduras was properly admitted under Rules 803(10) and 902(3). The Court rejected an argument that Rule 803(8)(C) required that the certificate be excluded in a criminal case, reasoning that the certificate was not a factual finding. We note, however, that under Crawford v. Washington the certificate might well be considered "testimonial," and thus inadmissible on confrontation grounds.

[e] Rule 803(10) -- Incomplete Search

United States v. Robinson, 544 F.2d 110 (2d Cir. 1976) : A conviction for bank robbery was overturned because of, inter alia, improper impeachment of a defense witness who testified that he had been with the defendant on the day of the bank robbery and that he remembered the date because he had picked up an unemployment check. The government sought to show that the state labor department had no record of the witness' receipt of a check on that date. Because the records were not complete, the Court held that the testimony did not satisfy Rule 803(10): "[A] casual or partial search cannot justify the conclusion that there was no record."

[f] Rule 803(10) -- Intelligence Agency Searches

United States v. Wilson, 732 F.2d 404 (5th Cir. 1984) : In a prosecution for illegally shipping plastic explosives out of the country, the defendant objected to an attempt to call the CIA employee who actually conducted a search of CIA records to testify under a pseudonym in order to protect his identity. The government then presented an affidavit by the third-ranking official in the CIA relating that he had authorized a search for material in the possession of the agency that related to the defendant, and the search uncovered no record indicating that the defendant was directly or indirectly associated with the CIA or acting with that agency's knowledge and approval. The Court rejected a confrontation attack on the affidavit, but we note that under Crawford v. Washington the affidavit might well be considered "testimonial," and thus inadmissible.

United States v. Lee, 589 F.2d 980 (9th Cir. 1979) : The Court upheld the introduction of affidavits of three CIA officials in an espionage case to show that searches of the records of their respective departments failed to disclose that the defendant had ever been employed by that agency. We note, however, that under Crawford v. Washington the affidavits might well be considered "testimonial," and thus inadmissible.

[g] Rule 803(10) -- IRS Searches

United States v. Bowers, 920 F.2d 220 (4th Cir. 1990) : The Court held in a tax evasion prosecution that IRS employees in the Philadelphia Service Center were proper persons to make a certificate under the Rule regarding a search of data stored in the mainframe computer in Martinsburg, West Virginia. We note that under Crawford v. Washington the certificate might well be considered "testimonial," and thus inadmissible on confrontation grounds.

Wiley v. United States, 20 F.3d 222 (6th Cir. 1994) : In an action to set aside a seizure of property for nonpayment of taxes, the Court held that absence of an entry in IRS records that a deficiency notice had been properly delivered to the post office for certified or registered mailing was evidence precluding entry of summary judgment for the IRS. In United States v. Spine, 945 F.2d 143 (6th Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed a conviction for tax evasion, holding there was no error in admitting computer-generated documents stating there was no record of the filing of a return, as well as testimony regarding those documents.

United States v. Hutchison, 22 F.3d 846 (9th Cir. 1993) : Affirming convictions for bank fraud and making false statements to the IRS, the Court held there was no violation of confrontation rights, under the then-applicable Ohio v. Roberts analysis, when a certificate was introduced regarding an unsuccessful search of tax records for the defendant's return. We note, however, that under Crawford v. Washington the certificate might well be considered "testimonial," and thus inadmissible. In United States v. Neff, 615 F.2d 1235 (9th Cir. 1980) , an IRS employee's testimony that a file search revealed no information concerning the defendant's tax liability for certain tax years was properly admitted to show the absence of filings.

Brutsche v. Commissioner, 585 F.2d 436 (10th Cir. 1978) : The Court held that the failure of the IRS to locate a shareholders' consent statement concerning Subchapter S status is evidence that the document was not filed.

[h] Rule 803(10) -- Relationship to Rule 803(8)

United States v. Pinto-Mejia, 720 F.2d 248 (2d Cir. 1983) , modified, 728 F.2d 142 (2d Cir. 1984) : The defendants were found guilty of possessing marijuana on a vessel subject to United States jurisdiction. Jurisdiction depended on a finding that the vessel was stateless, and the determination below was based on a certificate of a Venezuelan agency that stated, inter alia, that the named vessel had been registered, that it had "sailed clandestinely from Venezuelan port," that the Maritime Authority had found grounds to hold that the registration became invalid, and that there was no evidence of a subsequent reregistration. The Court held that this was not a certificate qualifying for admission under Rule 803(10), since it related facts that went beyond a simple statement that there was no record of a certain document in a place where it would be expected to be found. The certificate was also inadmissible under Rule 803(8), because it contained factual findings that could not be offered in a criminal case under part (C) of the Rule.

United States v. Metzger, 778 F.2d 1195 (6th Cir. 1985) : Affirming a conviction for crimes relating to an automobile explosion that killed two people, the Court upheld the admission of evidence that ATF officials conducted a search and found no evidence that two chemical companies were licensed to manufacture explosives in Kentucky. The Court rejected the defendant's argument that the limitation on the use of public record evidence in criminal cases under Rule 803(8)(C) carries over to Rule 803(10).

United States v. Mateo-Mendez, 215 F.3d 1039 (9th Cir. 2000) : To prove that the defendant, charged with illegal reentry into the United States, reentered without the permission of the Attorney General, the government proffered a "Certificate of Non-existence of Record" (CNER), prepared by an immigration official and attesting that she had failed to discover any evidence of the filing of an application for permission to reapply for admission to the United States on the part of the defendant. Holding that the CNER was properly admitted, the Court rejected the defendant's argument that Rule 803(10) imports requirements of "trustworthiness" and "duty imposed by law" from Rule 803(8). The Court stated that nothing in the plain language of Rule 803(10) "supports the inference that the documents whose admission that rule allows must be found 'trustworthy' on precisely the same basis as Rule 803.8 contemplates." The Court concluded that if a certificate satisfies Rule 902, "it satisfies ipso facto the exception to the hearsay rule in Rule 803.10." The Court held in United States v. Cervantes-Flores, 421 F.3d 825 (9th Cir. 2005) , that a CNER was not "testimonial" under Crawford v. Washington, so its admission was not a confrontation violation.

United States v. Martinez, 700 F.2d 1358 (11th Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed marijuana convictions, finding that a certificate from the General Commander of the Naval Force of Honduras concluding that a ship was not registered in Honduras was properly admitted under Rules 803(10) and 902(3). The Court rejected an argument that Rule 803(8)(C) required that the certificate be excluded in a criminal case, reasoning that the certificate was not a factual finding. We question the conclusion that the certificate was not a factual finding and we note, in any event, that under Crawford v. Washington the certificate might well be considered "testimonial," and thus inadmissible on confrontation grounds.

[i] Rule 803(10) -- Relevance of Search

Hunt v. Liberty Lobby, 720 F.2d 631 (11th Cir. 1983) : The plaintiff brought a libel action against the publisher of a weekly newspaper complaining about false statements that suggested he was involved in the assassination of President Kennedy. The Court held that affidavits of CIA officials stating that after diligent searches, they were unable to find any evidence that the plaintiff was in Dallas on the date of the assassination or any memoranda discussing the need to explain his whereabouts on that date were properly admitted under Rules 902(2) and 803(10). The defendant's argument that the affidavits proved only that the material was not in the files after suit was filed, not that it was absent when the story was written, was rejected. The argument went to weight, not admissibility. In United States v. Stout, n153 illegal weapons convictions were reversed because a certification by the custodian of firearms registration records was erroneously used to prove that the defendants had not applied to make or transfer firearms and had not paid a tax. The custodian's records revealed only who was entitled to possession of a firearm and did not cover all of the matters mentioned by the custodian. The certification as to matters not covered was inadmissible hearsay.

[j] Rule 803(10) -- Scope of Search

United States v. City of McAlester, 410 F. Supp. 848 (E.D. Okla. 1976) , modified, 604 F.2d 42 (10th Cir. 1979) : In an action to quiet title to certain Indian lands, an important issue was whether the United States was a party in a condemnation suit in 1903. As part of its proof that it was not a party to the 1903 suit, the government offered an affidavit from an official of the National Archives and Records Service, which stated that he caused a diligent search to be made by his staff of the records of the Department of Justice in the National Archives concerning the period 1902 and 1903 and found no reference to the 1903 litigation. The Court found the affidavit admissible under Rules 902(4) and 803(10).

United States v. Martinez, 700 F.2d 1358 (11th Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed marijuana convictions, finding that a certificate from the General Commander of the Naval Force of Honduras concluding that a ship was not registered in Honduras was properly admitted under Rules 803(10) and 902(3). The certification to an "extensive," as opposed to "diligent," search was held sufficient. We note, however, that under Crawford v. Washington the certificate might well be considered "testimonial," and thus inadmissible on confrontation grounds.

[11] Rule 803(11) -- Records Of Religious Organizations

Hall v. Commissioner, 729 F.2d 632 (9th Cir. 1984) : Upholding a decision that contributions to a congregation did not qualify for charitable deductions, the Court found that the Tax Court properly rejected proffered church records. They were not shown to be business records, and statements of contributions to a church do not qualify as religious records under Rule 803(11).

[12] Rule 803(14) -- records Of Documents Affecting An Interest In Property

[a] Rule 803(14) -- Contents of Records

United States v. Ruffin, 575 F.2d 346 (2d Cir. 1978) : In this tax evasion case, a government expert was permitted to testify as to the contents of various records in the county clerk's office. The Court held that the testimony was hearsay within hearsay and that, although the statements in the records were admissible under Rule 803(14), the testimony as to what the contents were was a violation of the hearsay rule. In our view this confused the Best Evidence rule with a hearsay problem: the witness' testimony stating what he saw was not hearsay at all.

[b] Rule 803(14) -- Deeds

Connecticut Light & Power Co. v. Federal Power Comm'n, 557 F.2d 349 (2d Cir. 1977) : Affirming FPC orders licensing hydroelectric projects, the Court held that the agency properly relied on historic documents, including recorded deeds, to determine the navigability of a river.

Compton v. Davis Oil Co., 607 F. Supp. 1221 (D. Wyo. 1985) : Determining in a quiet-title action that the marriage of an intestate and his purported wife was valid, the Court relied in part upon recitals in two warranty deeds executed as husband and wife and the conduct of the heirs over the years that was fully consistent with those recitals. The Court commented that "such instruments are executed in relation to serious and carefully planned transactions, and the financial stake in the transaction, plus the obvious reliance upon the truth of statements made in such instruments by third parties are adequate to at least imply that the recitals in such instruments are trustworthy."

[13] Rule 803(15) -- Statements In Documents Affecting An Interest In Property

United States v. Boulware, 384 F.3d 794 (9th Cir. 2004) : The Court reversed a conviction on tax charges, finding it was an abuse of discretion to exclude evidence of a State Court judgment in a suit by the defendant against a former girlfriend. The government alleged that the defendant diverted funds from a company by giving the funds to his girlfriend and wife without reporting any of the money on his income tax returns. The state judgment established that money given to the girlfriend was not a gift and was to be held in constructive trust for the corporation. The Court held that statements included in the State Court judgment were admissible pursuant to Rule 803(15), since the judgment affected an interest in the money given to the girlfriend.

[14] Rule 803(16) -- Statements In Ancient Documents

[a] Rule 803(16) -- Business Records

Fulmer v. Connors, 665 F. Supp. 1472 (N.D. Ala. 1987) : In an opinion entering judgment for the widow of a deceased coal miner who sued the union pension fund, the Judge ruled that the company's cash book and time and payroll book, which contained entries for the early 1940s, were admissible as ancient documents.

[b] Rule 803(16) -- Deeds and Official Certificates

Compton v. Davis Oil Co., 607 F. Supp. 1221 (D. Wyo. 1985) : Determining in a quiet-title action that the marriage of an intestate and his purported wife was valid, the Court relied in part upon recitals of marital status in the intestate's death certificate that was made in 1935. The Court commented that statements in ancient documents are admissible due to necessity arising from the disappearance of other evidence, that recitals in documents remove risks of mistransmission of information associated with oral statements, and that the time gap between the statements and the subsequent litigation lessens the likelihood of conscious or unconscious falsehood.

United States v. Koziy, 728 F.2d 1314 (11th Cir. 1984) : The Court upheld a revocation of citizenship on the ground that the defendant procured citizenship by concealing or misrepresenting information concerning his membership in the Organization of Ukranian Nationalists and the Ukranian Police. To prove membership in the police force, the government offered two exhibits that bore the defendant's signature. The Court found that the exhibits were properly authenticated and that they were not inadmissible hearsay since they qualified as ancient documents, having been in existence for 20 years or more.

[c] Rule 803(16) -- Foundation

George v. Celotex Corp., 914 F.2d 26 (2d Cir. 1990) : Affirming a verdict for the plaintiff in an action for injuries from asbestos exposure, the Court said that an unpublished 1947 report regarding the dangers of asbestos could not be admitted for the nonhearsay purpose of showing notice because there was no proof the defendant ever saw the report or that it reasonably should have seen it as part of the published literature in the industry, but the report was properly admitted as an ancient document under Rule 803(16) after authentication pursuant to Rule 901(b)(8). The Court rejected the defendant's argument that the need to test the reliability of the report's conclusions made it inadmissible as an ancient document.

Threadgill v. Armstrong World Indus., 928 F.2d 1366 (3d Cir. 1991) : The Court reversed the denial of a new trial following a jury verdict for the defendants in an asbestos wrongful death action, holding that the plaintiff should have been given the opportunity to authenticate the "Sumner Simpson documents"; if authenticated under Rule 901(b)(8), the documents would automatically be excepted from hearsay under Rule 803(16).

Dartez v. Fibreboard Corp., 765 F.2d 456 (5th Cir. 1985) : In a suit by a worker against various manufacturers alleging injury as a result of exposure to asbestos, the Court held that memoranda offered in connection with a deposition were hearsay, but that the memoranda might have qualified for admission as ancient documents if the plaintiff had laid a proper foundation.

[d] Rule 803(16) -- Letters

Martha Graham School & Dance Found., Inc. v. Martha Graham Center of Contemporary Dance, Inc., 380 F.3d 624 (2d Cir. 2004) : In an action by the legatee of a deceased choreographer's estate against a dance center and affiliated school to determine ownership of copyright in dances, the Court upheld a ruling that the choreographer had assigned 21 dances to the center. It held that the Trial Judge properly admitted 1968 and 1971 letters from the center's executive administrator stating that the rights to the dances were assigned, as the letters qualified as ancient documents and were properly authenticated.

[e] Rule 803(16) -- Newspapers

Bell v. Combined Registry Co., 397 F. Supp. 1241 (N.D. Ill. 1975) , aff'd, 536 F.2d 164 (7th Cir. 1976) : In a copyright suit the Court relied upon letters and newspaper articles from the 1930s and 1940s, treating them as ancient documents.

Ammons v. Dade City, 594 F. Supp. 1274 (M.D. Fla. 1984) , aff'd, 783 F.2d 982 (11th Cir. 1986) : In an action by African-American plaintiffs for an injunction to restrain city officials from providing municipal services in a racially discriminatory manner, the Court received newspaper articles that were more than 20 years old for their truth. It admitted other articles that did not qualify as ancient documents to show "how the events of the day were being recorded."

[f] Rule 803(16) -- Official Records

United States v. Stelmokas, 100 F.3d 302 (3d Cir. 1996) : The Court held, in denaturalization proceedings against an alleged Nazi collaborator, that records of the defendant's employment and activities during World War II, which were found in Lithuanian archives and other locations containing German records, were properly admitted. The records' authenticity and reliability were certified by experts possessing considerable experience with Eastern European Holocaust records.

Kalamazoo River Study Group v. Menasha Corp., 228 F.3d 648 (6th Cir. 2000) : In an action to recover contribution for an environmental clean-up, the plaintiffs offered a document from the files of the state Department of Natural Resources to prove that a defendant purchased a substance containing PCBs in 1970 and 1971. A DNR employee testified that the document had been in the files for over 20 years and that he believed that it was prepared by the federal Environmental Protection Agency. The Court held there was no error in excluding the document, since its reliability was seriously in question, given that the witness was unable to state with certainty that it was prepared by the EPA and did not establish why it was in the DNR files.

United States v. Hajda, 135 F.3d 439 (7th Cir. 1998) : The Court affirmed the denaturalization of an alleged Nazi concentration camp guard, holding there was no error in admitting signed statements given by his sister and concentration camp guards at a trial of family members for collaboration in 1945-46. An unsigned document prepared at the same time from statements by his brother was properly admitted as an ancient document containing a statement against interest.

[15] Rule 803(17) -- Market Reports, Commercial Publications

United States v. Cassiere, 4 F.3d 1006 (1st Cir. 1993) : In a complex wire fraud prosecution arising out of a "land flip" scheme, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting a listing of land sales that was used by real estate brokers, insurance agents, and appraisers. In a prosecution for interstate transportation of manuscripts allegedly stolen from the National Archives, United States v. Mount, 896 F.2d 612 (1st Cir. 1990) , the Court held there was no error in admitting volumes of The Collected Works of Abraham Lincoln, which a witness for the government testified were used by manuscript dealers like herself to locate original Lincoln documents.

Crane v. Crest Tankers, Inc., 47 F.3d 292 (8th Cir. 1995) : The Court reversed a judgment for a seaman in a Jones Act case, finding it was error to admit into evidence a "Future Damage Calculator," which was "a slide rule-type device which has life expectancy and work life expectancy tables on one side, and a 'present value' table on the other." The Court found that no foundation had been laid for the device and that there was no showing that "the exhibit is generally used or relied upon by the public or persons in the legal or other professions."

[16] Rule 803(18) -- Learned Treatises

[a] Rule 803(18) -- Charts

United States v. Mangan, 575 F.2d 32 (2d Cir. 1978) : After a defense lawyer called several charts in a learned treatise to the attention of a government expert, the defendant offered the charts into evidence. The Trial Judge rejected them. The Court suggested that, notwithstanding the last sentence of the Rule, it is difficult to see how a chart can be read into evidence and that "good sense would seem to favor its admission."

[b] Rule 803(18) -- Not Receivable as Exhibits

Alexander v. Conveyors & Dumpers, Inc., 731 F.2d 1221 (5th Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in a wrongful death action arising out of an accident with a conveyor, holding there was no error in the exclusion of the 1957 American Standard Safety Code for Conveyors. Although the Trial Judge permitted the plaintiffs' experts to read from the Code and to display photographic enlargements of it to the jury, he excluded the Code itself on the ground that Rule 803(18) permitted it to be read, but not shown to the jury. In an asbestos injury suit, Dartez v. Fibreboard Corp., n154 the Court held that various articles were improperly introduced as evidence. The articles were not used in connection with the plaintiff's expert testimony and therefore were hearsay. Moreover, as learned treatises they could only be read, not given, to the jury. See also Gordy v. City of Canton n155(error, albeit harmless, for jury to take portions of the National Electrical Safety Code into the jury room).

Graham v. Wyeth Labs., 906 F.2d 1399 (10th Cir. 1990) : Reversing a judgment for the plaintiffs in a suit for personal injuries allegedly caused by DPT vaccine, the Court held that the Trial Judge had committed error, first, in redacting references to compensation from a report of an AMA special panel on vaccine injuries in such a way that it distorted the thrust of the report, and, second, in submitting the redacted report to the jury contrary to the Rule.

[c] Rule 803(18) -- Reliable Authority

Meschino v. North American Drager, Inc., 841 F.2d 429 (1st Cir. 1988) : In a personal injury suit arising from an episode of cardiac arrest during an operation, the Court held that two articles the plaintiff offered as evidence were properly excluded. It rejected both the plaintiff's contention that any article may be used to impeach a witness whether or not it satisfies Rule 803(18), and the "argument that the contents of all issues of a periodical may be qualified wholesale under Rule 803(18) by testimony that the magazine was highly regarded." The Court held also that the fact that one defendant listed one of the articles on a pretrial exhibit list did not bar an objection to the article.

Costantino v. David M. Herzog, M.D., P.C., 203 F.3d 164 (2d Cir. 2000) : In a medical malpractice action against an obstetrician for injuries during delivery, the defendant introduced two articles published in the American Journal of Obstetrics and Gynecology. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court found no error. It noted that no testifying expert need rely on a learned treatise on direct examination, so long as it is called to the expert's attention on cross-examination and its authoritativeness is established, which was done here by testimony that the journal is "probably the most reputable in our field" and its articles are reviewed by obstetricians and gynecologists before publication "for accuracy and believability." In Schneider v. Revici, n156 the Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff in a medical malpractice case and remanded for a trial of an assumption of risk defense, but it upheld the exclusion of a book authored by the defendant. The Trial Judge had repeatedly instructed defense counsel on the required foundation for introducing a text as a learned treatise, but defense counsel never established that the book was recognized as authoritative.

Zenith Radio Corp. v. Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co., 723 F.2d 238 (3d Cir. 1983) , rev'd on other grounds, 475 U.S. 574 (1986) : In a massive antitrust case in which the plaintiffs alleged that the defendants conspired to drive them out of the market for television receivers, the Court reversed most of the summary judgment entered for the defendants, criticizing the Trial Judge's readiness to exclude expert testimony. It observed that an expert might rely upon a treatise, such as a foreign language publication, that might not be admissible under the hearsay exception. The expert might adopt portions of the treatise as part of his own testimony. In Dawson v. Chrysler Corp., n157 the Court found that the authoritativeness of Department of Transportation reports used in a product liability action to cross-examine one of Chrysler's expert witnesses was "inferentially conceded" by the experts and that use of the reports was therefore proper.

United States v. Norman, 415 F.3d 466 (5th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed drug convictions, finding no error when the defense was precluded from cross-examining DEA agents using a Justice Department manual on eyewitness identification. The treatise was not established as a reliable authority because the defense did not offer an expert in this area, the testifying agents did not recognize the manual, and the Judge did not take judicial notice of its reliability. Moreover, the manual was not being used in cross-examination of expert testimony, since the agents' identification testimony was merely the testimony of lay witnesses. In a medical malpractice wrongful death case, Carroll v. Morgan, 17 F.3d 787 (5th Cir. 1994) , the Court held it was error (but harmless) to preclude the plaintiff from using certain medical textbooks and journal articles to cross-examine the defendant's expert witness. Although the witness refused to recognize the materials as authoritative, another medical expert recognized them as reliable. In Dawsey v. Olin Corp., n158 the Court affirmed a judgment for a chemical company sued by workers who claimed damage from a chemical discharge, holding that the Trial Judge properly refused to permit the plaintiffs to question one of the defendant's experts by referring to a National Institute of Occupational Health and Safety manual when there was no testimony that the manual was a reliable authority. In United States v. Jones, n159 the Court upheld convictions for operating an illegal gambling business, holding that cross-examination of a government expert on gambling concerning testimony by another FBI expert in another trial was not permissible under Rule 803(18), since the Rule "is confined to published works that have been subjected to widespread collegial scrutiny." In Johnson v. William C. Ellis & Sons Iron Works, Inc., n160 the Court found error in the exclusion of safety codes established as reliable through the testimony of an expert witness. In a medical malpractice action, Hemingway v. Ochsner Clinic, n161 the Court found that a text written by two nurses was not shown to be reliable.

United States v. Turner, 104 F.3d 217 (8th Cir. 1997) : Affirming drug convictions, the Court found no error in the exclusion of medical texts proffered by the defendant. The texts could not be admitted as learned treatises, because there was no expert testimony that the treatises were authoritative, nor were they admissible as residual hearsay, because to admit them as such would circumvent the general purposes of the Rules.

Burgess v. Premier Corp., 727 F.2d 826 (9th Cir. 1984) : In an action by investors in a tax shelter arrangement involving the purchase and sale of cattle, the Court found that an expert was properly permitted to rely on treatises by an author he indicated was the preeminent industry expert.

Allen v. Safeco Ins. Co., 782 F.2d 1517 (11th Cir. 1986) , modified on other grounds, 793 F.2d 1195 (11th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed a judgment resting on a jury's finding that a fire that destroyed a home was accidental. It held that an expert, who testified that he used a periodical to keep up to date and that articles therein were considered "somewhat" authoritative, could be cross-examined about articles in the periodical.

[d] Rule 803(18) -- Relevance Requirement

Ellis v. International Playtex, Inc., 745 F.2d 292 (4th Cir. 1984) : Although it reversed a judgment for a tampon manufacturer sued by a husband whose wife died of toxic shock syndrome, the Court refused to disturb a ruling that an expert for the plaintiff could not read during direct examination from an article published in a medical journal. The article referred to a procedure that was not employed on the plaintiff's wife and did not indicate which tampon was involved. Thus, the Court concluded that it might invite jury speculation and cause confusion.

[e] Rule 803(18) -- Videotape

Costantino v. David M. Herzog, M.D., P.C., 203 F.3d 164 (2d Cir. 2000) : In a medical malpractice action against an obstetrician for injuries during delivery, the defendant introduced a 15-minute videotape put out by the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists to educate physicians and show various techniques used with the condition at issue. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court held that videotapes can be considered learned treatises under the Rule. The Court also held that a proper foundation was established for the video -- if not by ACOG sponsorship alone, by the plaintiff's expert's implicit concession and the fact that it had won an ACOG award, credentials comparing favorably with any expert testifying at the trial.

[17] Rule 803(19) -- Reputation Concerning Personal Or Family History

[a] Rule 803(19) -- Birthplace

United States v. Jean-Baptiste, 166 F.3d 102 (2d Cir. 1999) : In the defendant's trial for falsely stating her place of birth in a passport application, the Court found it was error to exclude testimony by the defendant's father as to his belief where the defendant was born. There is no requirement under the Rule that the witness be testifying as to the fact of his own birth; the Rule plainly contemplates that members of a family may testify with regard to the common understanding as to the birth of another family member.

[b] Rule 803(19) -- Family Relationship

Blackburn v. United Parcel Serv., Inc., 179 F.3d 81 (3d Cir. 1999) : The plaintiff alleged that he had been discharged from UPS in violation of a state whistleblower statute; the defendant countered that he had violated the company's anti-nepotism policy. In support of his contention that the defense was pretextual, the plaintiff offered testimony that other UPS employees had informed him that certain named employees were related. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant, the Court held that most of the statements were not admissible as reputation concerning personal or family history. Although a workplace may constitute a relevant community for such reputation, the plaintiff did not in this case provide sufficient evidence that the declarants were knowledgeable about the alleged workplace reputations (e.g., there was no showing they worked at the same facility as the allegedly related persons).

[c] Rule 803(19) -- Names

United States v. Allen, 960 F.2d 1055 (D.C. Cir. 1992) (per curiam): Affirming convictions for drug charges, the Court held that if there was any error in admitting evidence of a defendant's alias to connect him with certain drugs, it was undoubtedly harmless. The Court noted that evidence of names is commonly regarded as either not hearsay because it is not an assertion or so imbued with reliability because of its common usage as to make any objection frivolous. Use of names does not fall squarely within any of the exceptions (except possibly Rule 803(19)), but here, where use of the alias was clearly hearsay and was of disputable reliability, it might have been admitted as an admission or under some other specific hearsay exception.

[18] Rule 803(20) -- Reputation Concerning Boundaries Or General History

Ute Indian Tribe v. State of Utah, 521 F. Supp. 1072 (D. Utah 1981) , rev'd in part on other grounds, 716 F.2d 1298 (10th Cir. 1983) : In a dispute about reservation boundaries, the Court found that "reputation in a non-Indian community as to Indian boundaries, rights, etc., is indeed a treacherous ground for decision," since reputation evidence is only reliable when it is of general interest and the Indian boundaries in the instant case were not of general interest before the dispute arose.

[19] Rule 803(22) -- Judgment of Previous Conviction

[a] Rule 803(22) -- Accomplices' Convictions

United States v. Diaz, 936 F.2d 786 (5th Cir. 1991) : The Court reversed a conviction for transporting undocumented aliens, because judicial notice was erroneously taken of an alien's guilty plea to a misdemeanor charge of being present in the United States without the necessary documentation, contrary to the Rule's limitation on judgments against persons other than the accused. See also United States v. Crispin, n162 holding a similar error in admitting aliens' convictions to be harmless.

United States v. Breitkreutz, 977 F.2d 214 (6th Cir. 1992) : In a trial for distributing amphetamines, the defense suggested that a witness had testified for the government in order to assist his stepfather, an alleged coconspirator; in response, the government introduced the judgment and commitment order showing that the stepfather had already been sentenced to the statutory maximum before the witness testified before the grand jury. Affirming, the Court held that Rule 803(22) did not bar the evidence, as it was offered on the issue of credibility, not to prove a fact essential to sustain the conviction. In United States v. Vandetti, n163 a conviction for conducting an illegal gambling business was overturned because the defendant's accomplices, who were convicted in a separate trial, were called to testify and the government elicited evidence of their convictions in violation of Rule 803(22).

United States v. Davis, 838 F.2d 909 (7th Cir. 1988) : The Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit testimony by a government witness that three of her customers pleaded guilty to offenses related to the marijuana conspiracy charged against the defendants.

United States v. Austin, 786 F.2d 986 (10th Cir. 1986) : The Court reversed marijuana convictions because the government informed the jury that ten coconspirators had been previously tried and convicted for their parts in the alleged conspiracy. It concluded that the government engaged in "blatantly impermissible use of these convictions," and that it was plain error to have admitted evidence that two of the conspirators who testified had been convicted without giving the jury a limiting instruction.

[b] Rule 803(22) -- Fact of Conviction

Olsen v. Correiro, 189 F.3d 52 (1st Cir. 1999) : The plaintiff was found guilty of murder, but his conviction was reversed due to the prosecution's failure to disclose exculpatory evidence. Rather than go through another trial, the plaintiff pleaded nolo contendere to a charge of manslaughter, and was sentenced to time served. He then brought a civil rights action, arguing that he was unconstitutionally subjected to imprisonment on murder charges. The defendants pleaded the conviction based on the nolo contendere plea as an affirmative defense, arguing that his imprisonment would have occurred anyway. The Trial Judge ruled that because the plaintiff had pleaded nolo contendere to the lesser charge, he could not collect damages for imprisonment on the murder charge. Affirming, the Court held that the conviction based on the nolo plea was not inadmissible under Rule 803(22), because that Rule only addresses convictions that are offered to prove the facts essential to sustain the judgment.

[c] Rule 803(22) -- Foreign Judgments

Lloyd v. American Export Lines, Inc., 580 F.2d 1179 (3d Cir. 1978) : Reversing a seaman's Jones Act judgment, the Court held it was error to exclude evidence that the seaman was convicted in Japan of a criminal offense for his conduct. The Court said that "[t]he test of acceptance ... of foreign judgments for which domestic recognition is sought, is whether the foreign proceedings accord with civilized jurisprudence, and are stated in a clear and formal record." The Court emphasized the thoroughness of the investigation by Japanese authorities and the right to counsel provided, but noted that in other circumstances, where the foreign country's procedures were unfamiliar, Rule 403 would be a ground to exclude evidence of a foreign conviction.

United States v. Garland, 991 F.2d 328 (6th Cir. 1993) : The Court vacated Garland's conviction for fraud arising out of what he claimed was a failed attempt to buy cocoa beans from Ghana. While his appeal was pending, a Court in Ghana convicted two Ghanians of defrauding Garland in connection with the cocoa bean transaction. The Court determined that judicial notice should be taken of the Ghanian judgment and findings and that the evidence was sufficient newly discovered evidence to warrant a new trial. Drawing an analogy to Rule 803(8), the Court reasoned that "a foreign judgment that shows no sign of being unreliable should be admitted," "there is no reason to distinguish between facts and 'opinions' contained in foreign judgments," and "[e]xcept where foreign judgments appear to lack trustworthiness, the burden should be on the party opposing their admission to show lack of trustworthiness."

[d] Rule 803(22) -- Forfeiture Proceeding

Schwartz v. United States, 582 F. Supp. 224 (D. Md. 1984) : In a RICO prosecution, the jury determined by a general verdict that certain stock belonged to a defendant named Kovens and by special verdict that a certain number of shares should be forfeited to the government. Thereafter, Schwartz brought this action claiming ownership of the stock and objecting to its forfeiture. The Trial Judge ruled in limine that the judgment in the RICO case could be admitted under Rule 803(22) as evidence that Kovens rather than Schwartz owned the stock.

[e] Rule 803(22) -- General Verdict

Columbia Plaza Corp. v. Security Nat'l Bank, 676 F.2d 780 (D.C. Cir. 1982) : In a case involving a claim that the defendants exhausted the proceeds of a construction loan before an office building was completed, the Court upheld the exclusion of judgments in two criminal cases involving two of the defendants. The Court found that since general verdicts were rendered in the criminal cases, it was impossible to tell which overt acts the juries found had been committed.

[f] Rule 803(22) -- Judgments of Acquittal

United States v. Gricco, 277 F.3d 339 (3d Cir. 2002) : Affirming convictions for tax fraud arising from a scheme to skim parking lot revenues, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence that the defendants had been acquitted in a state prosecution for theft in the scheme, since a judgment of acquittal is hearsay not coming within any exception, and any probative value it has would be greatly outweighed by the danger of jury confusion.

United States v. Irvin, 787 F.2d 1506 (11th Cir. 1986) : Affirming a conviction for conspiring to violate another's civil rights, the Court found it was proper to bar the defense from mentioning that the defendant and his three alleged coconspirators had been acquitted in a prior trial.

[g] Rule 803(22) -- Misdemeanor Convictions

United States v. Gotti, 641 F. Supp. 283 (E.D.N.Y. 1986) : In a racketeering case, the Trial Judge held that, although misdemeanor convictions are not admissible under Rule 803(22), he would admit them under the residual exception upon a showing that a defendant had a motivation to defend comparable to the motivation to defend against a felony charge.

Hancock v. Dodson, 958 F.2d 1367 (6th Cir. 1992) : In a civil rights action on behalf of an arrestee rendered incompetent allegedly as a result of the arrest, the Court held that although the arrestee's guilty plea to misdemeanor assault and battery charges arising out of the incident did not come within the Rule, it was admissible as a party admission or under the residual exception. A dissenting Judge believed that the plea was being proved only by the judgment of conviction, which is not admissible under the Rule; that the judgment lacked trustworthiness because it was the result of a plea bargain removing any motivation to defend against the charges; and that the judgment was not admissible under the residual exception because it is covered by a specific exception and is not trustworthy.

United States v. Loera, 923 F.2d 725 (9th Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed a motorist's assault conviction arising out of a drunk-driving incident, holding that docket entries of prior misdemeanor convictions were not admissible under Rule 803(22), but were admissible under Rule 803(8)(A).

[h] Rule 803(22) -- Plea Agreement

Scholes v. Lehmann, 56 F.3d 750 (7th Cir. 1995) : Affirming in part a summary judgment for the plaintiff in a receiver's action to recover funds that had been distributed by the since-convicted mastermind of a Ponzi scheme, the Court said that the mastermind's plea agreement was admissible under Rule 803(22) to establish the defendants' liability.

[i] Rule 803(22) -- Relationship to Other Rules

Rozier v. Ford Motor Co., 573 F.2d 1332 (5th Cir. 1978) : In a product liability action arising out of a fatal automobile accident, the Court held it was improper to admit evidence that the driver of the other car had pleaded guilty to involuntary manslaughter. Although it recognized that the convictions were admissible under Rule 803(22), the Court said that they should have been excluded under Rule 403. The admission of responsibility was made in the context of a criminal action to deter reckless driving and therefore "its relevance in a civil action based on a legal doctrine presumably intended to deter the negligent manufacture of automobiles is attenuated at best." The guilty plea would tend to confuse the jury into thinking that the manufacturer could not be the legal cause, in the civil action, of the plaintiff's decedent's death if the other driver was found to be the cause in the criminal action.

[j] Rule 803(22) -- State Judgments

Calusinski v. Kruger, 24 F.3d 931 (7th Cir. 1994) : The Court held in an arrestee's § 1983 action against police officers that the plaintiff's state conviction for resisting arrest was properly admitted as prima facie evidence that he forcefully resisted attempts by the officers to arrest him. The possible sanctions indicated that the proceedings were of sufficiently serious import to ensure the reliability of the conviction. In Brown v. Green, n164 the Court reversed a plaintiff's judgment in a civil rights action alleging excessive force against a police officer, holding that the plaintiff's convictions for criminal battery and resisting arrest, which resulted from the incident giving rise to the civil rights suit, should have been admitted. The Court based its decision on the full faith and credit statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1738, but we believe that reliance on the statute was mistaken. Under the statute a Federal Court would have to respect a state law making a criminal judgment dispositive in a subsequent civil action. However, where state law treats convictions only as evidentiary, we believe that Rule 803(22) governs. Thus, in the instant case admissibility should have turned on the maximum punishment that might have been imposed by the State Court.

[20] Rule 803(24) -- Other Exceptions

The residual exception formerly stated in this Rule was transferred to Rule 807 in 1997. Cases decided under the former Rule are collected in the Annotations to Rule 807, § 807.03.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. United States v. Portsmouth Paving Corp., 694 F.2d 312 (4th Cir. 1982) .

(n2)Footnote 2. United States v. Cain, 587 F.2d 678 (5th Cir. 1979) .

(n3)Footnote 3. United States v. Parker, 936 F.2d 950 (7th Cir. 1991) .

(n4)Footnote 4. United States v. Blakey, 607 F.2d 779 (7th Cir. 1979) .

(n5)Footnote 5. United States v. Hawkins, 59 F.3d 723 (8th Cir. 1995) , vacated on other grounds, 516 U.S. 1168 (1996) .

(n6)Footnote 6. United States v. Cammisano, 917 F.2d 1057 (8th Cir. 1990) .

(n7)Footnote 7. United States v. Lawrence, 699 F.2d 697 (5th Cir. 1983) .

(n8)Footnote 8. United States v. Baggett, 251 F.3d 1087 (6th Cir. 2001) .

(n9)Footnote 9. United States v. Winters, 33 F.3d 720 (6th Cir. 1994) .

(n10)Footnote 10. United States v. Sowa, 34 F.3d 447 (7th Cir. 1994) .

(n11)Footnote 11. Webb v. Lane, 922 F.2d 390 (7th Cir. 1991) .

(n12)Footnote 12. United States v. Hartmann, 958 F.2d 774 (7th Cir. 1992) .

(n13)Footnote 13. United States v. Phelps, 168 F.3d 1048 (8th Cir. 1999) .

(n14)Footnote 14. United States v. Moses, 15 F.3d 774 (8th Cir. 1994) .

(n15)Footnote 15. United States v. Iron Shell, 633 F.2d 77 (8th Cir. 1980) .

(n16)Footnote 16. United States v. Sherlock, 962 F.2d 1349 (9th Cir. 1989) , amended (9th Cir. 1992).

(n17)Footnote 17. Pau v. Yosemite Park & Curry Co., 928 F.2d 880 (9th Cir. 1991) .

(n18)Footnote 18. Miller v. Keating, 754 F.2d 507 (3d Cir. 1985) .

(n19)Footnote 19. United States v. DiMaria, 727 F.2d 265 (2d Cir. 1984) (see annotation under § 803.03[3][d][v]).

(n20)Footnote 20. Stelwagon Mfg. Co. v. Tarmac Roofing Sys., 63 F.3d 1267 (3d Cir. 1995) .

(n21)Footnote 21. United States v. Margiotta, 688 F.2d 108 (2d Cir. 1982) .

(n22)Footnote 22. United States v. Lawal, 736 F.2d 5 (2d Cir. 1984) .

(n23)Footnote 23. United States v. Hogan, 886 F.2d 1497 (7th Cir. 1989) .

(n24)Footnote 24. United States v. Cohen, 631 F.2d 1223 (5th Cir. 1980) .

(n25)Footnote 25. Cincinnati Fluid Power Co. v. Rexnord, Inc., 797 F.2d 1386 (6th Cir. 1986) .

(n26)Footnote 26. United States v. Carter, 910 F.2d 1524 (7th Cir. 1990) .

(n27)Footnote 27. United States v. Binder, 794 F.2d 1195 (7th Cir. 1986) .

(n28)Footnote 28. United States v. Faust, 850 F.2d 575 (9th Cir. 1988) .

(n29)Footnote 29. United States v. Rodriguez-Pando, 841 F.2d 1014 (10th Cir. 1988) .

(n30)Footnote 30. United States v. Kelly, 722 F.2d 873 (1st Cir. 1983) .

(n31)Footnote 31. United States v. Puglisi, 790 F.2d 240 (2d Cir. 1986) .

(n32)Footnote 32. United States v. Southland Corp., 760 F.2d 1366 (2d Cir. 1985) .

(n33)Footnote 33. United States v. Terry, 702 F.2d 299 (2d Cir. 1983) .

(n34)Footnote 34. United States v. Peak, 856 F.2d 825 (7th Cir. 1988) .

(n35)Footnote 35. United States v. Green, 680 F.2d 520 (7th Cir. 1982) .

(n36)Footnote 36. United States v. Tuchow, 768 F.2d 855 (7th Cir. 1985) .

(n37)Footnote 37. United States v. Udey, 748 F.2d 1231 (8th Cir. 1984) .

(n38)Footnote 38. United States v. Adcock, 558 F.2d 397 (8th Cir. 1977) .

(n39)Footnote 39. United States v. Jackson, 780 F.2d 1305 (7th Cir. 1986) .

(n40)Footnote 40. United States v. Sumner, 204 F.3d 1182 (8th Cir. 2000) .

(n41)Footnote 41. United States v. Beaulieu, 194 F.3d 918 (8th Cir. 1999) .

(n42)Footnote 42. Lovejoy v. United States, 92 F.3d 628 (8th Cir. 1996) .

(n43)Footnote 43. United States v. Balfany, 965 F.2d 575 (8th Cir. 1992) .

(n44)Footnote 44. United States v. Yellow, 18 F.3d 1438 (8th Cir. 1994) .

(n45)Footnote 45. United States v. Longie, 984 F.2d 955 (8th Cir. 1993) .

(n46)Footnote 46. United States v. Whitted, 11 F.3d 782 (8th Cir. 1993) .

(n47)Footnote 47. United States v. George, 960 F.2d 97 (9th Cir. 1992) .

(n48)Footnote 48. United States v. Nick, 604 F.2d 1199 (9th Cir. 1979) .

(n49)Footnote 49. United States v. Pacheco, 154 F.3d 1236, 1240-42 (10th Cir. 1998) .

(n50)Footnote 50. United States v. Norman T., 129 F.3d 1099 (10th Cir. 1997) .

(n51)Footnote 51. United States v. Tome, 61 F.3d 1446 (10th Cir. 1995) . This decision was on remand after the Supreme Court held that hearsay statements made when the declarant had a motive to falsify could not be admitted as prior consistent statements (see the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 801, § 801.02[4][c]).

(n52)Footnote 52. United States v. Farley, 992 F.2d 1122 (10th Cir. 1993) .

(n53)Footnote 53. United States v. Pollard, 790 F.2d 1309 (7th Cir. 1986) .

(n54)Footnote 54. United States v. Iron Thunder, 714 F.2d 765 (8th Cir. 1983) .

(n55)Footnote 55. Moss v. Feldmeyer, 979 F.2d 1454 (10th Cir. 1992) .

(n56)Footnote 56. United States v. Yellow, 18 F.3d 1438 (8th Cir. 1994) .

(n57)Footnote 57. United States v. Schoenborn, 4 F.3d 1424 (7th Cir. 1993) .

(n58)Footnote 58. United States v. Micke, 859 F.2d 473 (7th Cir. 1988) .

(n59)Footnote 59. United States v. Lewis, 954 F.2d 1386 (7th Cir. 1992) .

(n60)Footnote 60. In re King Enterprises, Inc., 678 F.2d 73 (8th Cir. 1982) .

(n61)Footnote 61. United States v. Hutson, 821 F.2d 1015 (5th Cir. 1987) .

(n62)Footnote 62. United States v. Young Bros., 728 F.2d 682 (5th Cir. 1984) .

(n63)Footnote 63. United States v. Sanders, 749 F.2d 195 (5th Cir. 1984) .

(n64)Footnote 64. Capital Marine Supply v. Thomas, 719 F.2d 104 (5th Cir. 1983) .

(n65)Footnote 65. United States v. Vela, 673 F.2d 86 (5th Cir. 1982) .

(n66)Footnote 66. United States v. Croft, 750 F.2d 1354 (7th Cir. 1984) .

(n67)Footnote 67. United States v. Catabran, 836 F.2d 453 (9th Cir. 1988) .

(n68)Footnote 68. United States v. Bonallo, 858 F.2d 1427 (9th Cir. 1988) .

(n69)Footnote 69. United States v. Miller, 771 F.2d 1219 (9th Cir. 1985) .

(n70)Footnote 70. Kennedy v. Los Angeles Police Dep't, 901 F.2d 702 (9th Cir. 1989) , amended (9th Cir. 1990).

(n71)Footnote 71. United States v. Linn, 880 F.2d 209 (9th Cir. 1989) .

(n72)Footnote 72. United States v. McPartlin, 595 F.2d 1321 (7th Cir. 1979) .

(n73)Footnote 73. Raphaely Int'l, Inc. v. Waterman S.S. Corp., 972 F.2d 498 (2d Cir. 1992) .

(n74)Footnote 74. Wallace Motor Sales, Inc. v. American Motor Sales Corp., 780 F.2d 1049 (1st Cir. 1985) .

(n75)Footnote 75. Miller v. Fairchild Indus., 885 F.2d 498 (9th Cir. 1989) .

(n76)Footnote 76. NLRB v. First Termite Control Co., 646 F.2d 424 (9th Cir. 1981) .

(n77)Footnote 77. United States v. Iredia, 866 F.2d 114 (5th Cir. 1989) .

(n78)Footnote 78. United States v. Dakota, 188 F.3d 663 (6th Cir. 1999) .

(n79)Footnote 79. United States v. Weinstock, 153 F.3d 272 (6th Cir. 1998) .

(n80)Footnote 80. United States v. Hathaway, 798 F.2d 902 (6th Cir. 1986) .

(n81)Footnote 81. United States v. Franco, 874 F.2d 1136 (7th Cir. 1989) .

(n82)Footnote 82. United States v. Wables, 731 F.2d 440 (7th Cir. 1984) .

(n83)Footnote 83. United States v. Chappell, 698 F.2d 308 (7th Cir. 1983) .

(n84)Footnote 84. United States v. Page, 544 F.2d 982 (8th Cir. 1976) .

(n85)Footnote 85. United States v. Pfeiffer, 539 F.2d 668 (8th Cir. 1976) .

(n86)Footnote 86. Gulf South Mach. Co. v. Kearney & Trecker Corp., 756 F.2d 377 (5th Cir. 1985) .

(n87)Footnote 87. United States v. Kasvin, 757 F.2d 887 (7th Cir. 1985) .

(n88)Footnote 88. Stone v. Morris, 546 F.2d 730 (7th Cir. 1976) .

(n89)Footnote 89. Itel Capital Corp. v. Cups Coal Co., 707 F.2d 1253 (11th Cir. 1983) .

(n90)Footnote 90. United States v. Furst, 886 F.2d 558 (3d Cir. 1989) .

(n91)Footnote 91. Byrd v. Hunt Tool Shipyards, Inc., 650 F.2d 44 (5th Cir. 1981) .

(n92)Footnote 92. United States v. Ullrich, 580 F.2d 765 (5th Cir. 1978) .

(n93)Footnote 93. Snyder v. Whittaker Corp., 839 F.2d 1085 (5th Cir. 1988) .

(n94)Footnote 94. NLRB v. First Termite Control Co., 646 F.2d 424 (9th Cir. 1981) .

(n95)Footnote 95. United States v. Freidin, 849 F.2d 716 (2d Cir. 1988) .

(n96)Footnote 96. Ruberto v. Commissioner, 774 F.2d 61 (2d Cir. 1985) .

(n97)Footnote 97. Wilander v. McDermott Int'l, Inc., 887 F.2d 88 (5th Cir. 1989) , aff'd, 498 U.S. 337 (1991) .

(n98)Footnote 98. Malley v. United States Fid. & Guar. Co., 776 F.2d 494 (5th Cir. 1985) .

(n99)Footnote 99. United States v. Williams, 661 F.2d 528 (5th Cir. 1981) .

(n100)Footnote 100. United States v. Ramsey, 785 F.2d 184 (7th Cir. 1986) .

(n101)Footnote 101. Waddell v. Commissioner, 841 F.2d 264 (9th Cir. 1988) .

(n102)Footnote 102. Paddack v. Dave Christensen, Inc., 745 F.2d 1254 (9th Cir. 1984) .

(n103)Footnote 103. Abdel v. United States, 670 F.2d 73 (7th Cir. 1982) .

(n104)Footnote 104. United States v. Bortnovsky, 879 F.2d 30 (2d Cir. 1989) .

(n105)Footnote 105. Gray v. Busch Entertainment Corp., 886 F.2d 14 (2d Cir. 1989) .

(n106)Footnote 106. Grogg v. Missouri Pac. R.R., 841 F.2d 210 (8th Cir. 1988) .

(n107)Footnote 107. United States v. Snyder, 787 F.2d 1429 (10th Cir. 1986) .

(n108)Footnote 108. United States v. Plum, 558 F.2d 568 (10th Cir. 1977) .

(n109)Footnote 109. United States v. Lieberman, 637 F.2d 95 (2d Cir. 1980) .

(n110)Footnote 110. Zenith Radio Corp. v. Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co., 723 F.2d 238 (3d Cir. 1983) , rev'g 505 F. Supp. 1190 (E.D. Pa. 1980) , rev'd on other grounds, 475 U.S. 574 (1986) .

(n111)Footnote 111. Pan-Islamic Trade Corp. v. Exxon Corp., 632 F.2d 539 (5th Cir. 1980) .

(n112)Footnote 112. United States v. McPartlin, 595 F.2d 1321 (7th Cir. 1979) .

(n113)Footnote 113. United States v. Miller, 771 F.2d 1219 (9th Cir. 1985) .

(n114)Footnote 114. United States v. Hernandez, 913 F.2d 1506 (10th Cir. 1990) .

(n115)Footnote 115. United States v. Bohrer, 807 F.2d 159 (10th Cir. 1986) .

(n116)Footnote 116. United States v. Zeidman, 540 F.2d 314 (7th Cir. 1976) .

(n117)Footnote 117. Plummer v. Western Int'l Hotels Co., 656 F.2d 502 (9th Cir. 1981) .

(n118)Footnote 118. United States v. Corr, 543 F.2d 1042 (2d Cir. 1976) .

(n119)Footnote 119. Denny v. Hutchinson Sales Corp., 649 F.2d 816 (10th Cir. 1981) .

(n120)Footnote 120. United States v. King, 590 F.2d 253 (8th Cir. 1978) .

(n121)Footnote 121. Bright v. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., 756 F.2d 19 (6th Cir. 1984) .

(n122)Footnote 122. Roth v. Black & Decker, Inc., 737 F.2d 779 (8th Cir. 1984) .

(n123)Footnote 123. Crane v. Mekelburg, 728 F.2d 439 (10th Cir. 1984) .

(n124)Footnote 124. Revlon, Inc. v. Carson Prods. Co., 602 F. Supp. 1071 (S.D.N.Y. 1985) , rev'd in part on other grounds, 803 F.2d 676 (Fed. Cir. 1986) .

(n125)Footnote 125. United States v. Grady, 544 F.2d 598 (2d Cir. 1976) .

(n126)Footnote 126. United States v. Pinto-Mejia, 720 F.2d 248 (2d Cir. 1983) , modified, 728 F.2d 142 (2d Cir.

1984) .

(n127)Footnote 127. United States v. Perlmuter, 693 F.2d 1290 (9th Cir. 1982) .

(n128)Footnote 128. United States v. Castaneda-Reyes, 703 F.2d 522 (11th Cir. 1983) .

(n129)Footnote 129. United States v. Grady, 544 F.2d 598 (2d Cir. 1976) .

(n130)Footnote 130. United States v. Puente, 826 F.2d 1415 (5th Cir. 1987) .

(n131)Footnote 131. United States v. Vidaure, 861 F.2d 1337 (5th Cir. 1988) .

(n132)Footnote 132. United States v. Dancy, 861 F.2d 77 (5th Cir. 1988) .

(n133)Footnote 133. United States v. Quezada, 754 F.2d 1190 (5th Cir. 1985) .

(n134)Footnote 134. United States v. Enterline, 894 F.2d 287 (8th Cir. 1990) .

(n135)Footnote 135. United States v. Wilmer, 799 F.2d 495 (9th Cir. 1986) .

(n136)Footnote 136. United States v. Gilbert, 774 F.2d 962 (9th Cir. 1985) .

(n137)Footnote 137. United States v. Pinto-Mejia, 720 F.2d 248 (2d Cir. 1983) , modified, 728 F.2d 142 (2d Cir. 1984) .

(n138)Footnote 138. United States v. Stone, 604 F.2d 922 (5th Cir. 1979) .

(n139)Footnote 139. Lerner v. Seaboard Coast Line R.R., 594 F. Supp. 963 (S.D.N.Y. 1984) .

(n140)Footnote 140. Faries v. Atlas Truck Body Mfg. Co., 797 F.2d 619 (8th Cir. 1986) .

(n141)Footnote 141. FDIC v. Mmahat, 907 F.2d 546 (5th Cir. 1990) .

(n142)Footnote 142. United States v. Dancy, 861 F.2d 77 (5th Cir. 1988) .

(n143)Footnote 143. United States v. Cain, 615 F.2d 380 (5th Cir. 1980) .

(n144)Footnote 144. United States v. King, 613 F.2d 670 (7th Cir. 1980) .

(n145)Footnote 145. United States v. Sawyer, 607 F.2d 1190 (7th Cir. 1979) .

(n146)Footnote 146. United States v. Orozco, 590 F.2d 789 (9th Cir. 1979) .

(n147)Footnote 147. Robbins v. Whelan, 653 F.2d 47 (1st Cir. 1981) .

(n148)Footnote 148. United States v. School Dist. of Ferndale, 577 F.2d 1339 (6th Cir. 1978) .

(n149)Footnote 149. John McShain, Inc. v. Cessna Aircraft Co., 563 F.2d 632 (3d Cir. 1977) .

(n150)Footnote 150. O'Dell v. Hercules, Inc., 904 F.2d 1194 (8th Cir. 1990) .

(n151)Footnote 151. Wilson v. Attaway, 757 F.2d 1227 (11th Cir. 1985) .

(n152)Footnote 152. Pollard v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 598 F.2d 1284 (3d Cir. 1979) .

(n153)Footnote 153. United States v. Stout, 667 F.2d 1347 (11th Cir. 1982) .

(n154)Footnote 154. Dartez v. Fibreboard Corp., 765 F.2d 456 (5th Cir. 1985) .

(n155)Footnote 155. Gordy v. City of Canton, 543 F.2d 558 (5th Cir. 1976) .

(n156)Footnote 156. Schneider v. Revici, 817 F.2d 987 (2d Cir. 1987) .

(n157)Footnote 157. Dawson v. Chrysler Corp., 630 F.2d 950 (3d Cir. 1980) .

(n158)Footnote 158. Dawsey v. Olin Corp., 782 F.2d 1254 (5th Cir. 1986) .

(n159)Footnote 159. United States v. Jones, 712 F.2d 115 (5th Cir. 1983) .

(n160)Footnote 160. Johnson v. William C. Ellis & Sons Iron Works, Inc., 609 F.2d 820 (5th Cir. 1980) .

(n161)Footnote 161. Hemingway v. Ochsner Clinic, 608 F.2d 1040 (5th Cir. 1979) .

(n162)Footnote 162. United States v. Crispin, 757 F.2d 611 (5th Cir. 1985) .

(n163)Footnote 163. United States v. Vandetti, 623 F.2d 1144 (6th Cir. 1980) .

(n164)Footnote 164. Brown v. Green, 738 F.2d 202 (7th Cir. 1984) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
CHAPTER 803 RULE 803

4-803 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 803.04

803.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Advisory Committee's Note

The exceptions are phrased in terms of nonapplication of the hearsay rule, rather than in positive terms of admissibility, in order to repel any implication that other possible grounds for exclusion are eliminated from consideration.

The present rule proceeds upon the theory that under appropriate circumstances a hearsay statement may possess circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness sufficient to justify nonproduction of the declarant in person at the trial even though he may be available. The theory finds vast support in the many exceptions to the hearsay rule developed by the common law in which unavailability of the declarant is not a relevant factor. The present rule is a synthesis of them, with revision where modern developments and conditions are believed to make that course appropriate.

In a hearsay situation, the declarant is, of course, a witness, and neither this Rule nor Rule 804 dispenses with the requirement of firsthand knowledge. It may appear from his statement or be inferable from circumstances. See Rule 602.

Exceptions (1) and (2). In considerable measure these two examples overlap, though based on somewhat different theories. The most significant practical difference will lie in the time lapse allowable between event and statement.

The underlying theory of Exception (1) is that substantial contemporaneity of event and statement negative the likelihood of deliberate or conscious misrepresentation. Moreover, if the witness is the declarant, he may be examined on the statement. If the witness is not the declarant, he may be examined as to the circumstances as an aid in evaluating the statement. Morgan, Basic Problems of Evidence 340-41 (1962).

The theory of Exception (2) is simply that circumstances may produce a condition of excitement which temporarily stills the capacity of reflection and produces utterances free of conscious fabrication. 6 Wigmore § 1747, p. 135. Spontaneity is the key factor in each instance, though arrived at by somewhat different routes. Both are needed in order to avoid needless niggling.

While the theory of Exception (2) has been criticized on the ground that excitement impairs accuracy of observation as well as eliminating conscious fabrication, Hutchins and Slesinger, Some Observations on the Law of Evidence: Spontaneous Exclamations, 28 Colum. L. Rev. 432 (1928), it finds support in cases without number. See cases in 6 Wigmore § 1750; Annot. 53 A.L.R.2d 1245 (statements as to cause of or responsibility for motor vehicle accident); Annot. 4 A.L.R.3d 149 (accusatory statements by homicide victims). Since unexciting events are less likely to evoke comment, decisions involving Exception (1) are far less numerous. Illustrative are Tampa Elec. Co. v. Getrost, 151 Fla. 558, 10 So. 2d 83 (1942) ; Houston Oxygen Co. v. Davis, 139 Tex. 1, 161 S.W.2d 474 (1942) ; and cases cited in McCormick § 273, p. 585, n. 4.

With respect to the time element, Exception (1) recognizes that in many, if not most, instances precise contemporaneity is not possible, and hence a slight lapse is allowable. Under Exception (2) the standard of measurement is the duration of the state of excitement. "How long can excitement prevail? Obviously there are no pat answers and the character of the transaction or event will largely determine the significance of the time factor." Slough, Spontaneous Statements and State of Mind, 46 Iowa L. Rev. 224, 243 (1961); McCormick § 272, p. 580.

Participation by the declarant is not required: a non-participant may be moved to describe what he perceives, and one may be startled by an event in which he is not an actor. Slough, supra ; McCormick, supra ; 6 Wigmore § 1755; Annot. 78 A.L.R.2d 300 .

Whether proof of the startling event may be made by the statement itself is largely an academic question, since in most cases there is present at least circumstantial evidence that something of a startling nature must have occurred. For cases in which the evidence consists of the condition of the declarant (injuries, state of shock), see Insurance Co. v. Mosely, 75 U.S. (8 Wall.) 397, 19 L. Ed. 437 (1869) ; Wheeler v. United States, 211 F.2d 19, 93 U.S. App. D.C. 159 (1953) , cert. denied, 347 U.S. 1019, 74 S. Ct. 876, 98 L. Ed. 1140 ; Wetherbee v. Safety Casualty Co., 219 F.2d 274 (5th Cir. 1955) ; Lampe v. United States, 229 F.2d 43, 97 U.S. App. D.C. 160 (1956) . Nevertheless, on occasion the only evidence may be the content of the statement itself, and rulings that it may be sufficient are described as "increasing," Slough, supra at 246, and as the "prevailing practice," McCormick § 272, p. 579. Illustrative are Armour & Co. v. Industrial Commission, 78 Colo. 569, 243 P. 546 (1926) ; Young v. Stewart, 191 N.C. 297, 131 S.E. 735 (1926) . Moreover, under Rule 104(a) the judge is not limited by the hearsay rule in passing upon preliminary questions of fact.

Proof of declarant's perception by his statement presents similar considerations when declarant is identified. People v. Poland, 22 Ill. 2d 175, 174 N.E.2d 804 (1961) . However, when declarant is an unidentified bystander, the cases indicate hesitancy in upholding the statement alone as sufficient, Garrett v. Howden, 73 N.M. 307, 387 P.2d 874 (1963) ; Beck v. Dye, 200 Wash. 1, 92 P.2d 1113 (1939) , a result which would under appropriate circumstances be consistent with the rule.

Permissible subject matter of the statement is limited under Exception (1) to description or explanation of the event or condition, the assumption being that spontaneity, in the absence of a startling event, may extend no farther. In Exception (2), however, the statement need only "relate" to the startling event or condition, thus affording a broader scope of subject matter coverage. 6 Wigmore §§ 1750, 1754. See Sanitary Grocery Co. v. Snead, 90 F.2d 374, 67 App. D.C. 129 (1937) , slip-and-fall case sustaining admissibility of clerk's statement, "That has been on the floor for a couple of hours," and Murphy Auto Parts Co., Inc. v. Ball, 249 F.2d 508, 101 U.S. App. D.C. 416 (1957) , upholding admission, on issue of driver's agency, of his statement that he had to call on a customer and was in a hurry to get home. Quick, Hearsay, Excitement, Necessity and the Uniform Rules: A Reappraisal of Rule 63(4), 6 Wayne L. Rev. 204, 206-09 (1960).

Similar provisions are found in Uniform Rule 63(4)(a) and (b); California Evidence Code § 1240 (as to Exception (2) only); Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60-460(d)(1) and (2); New Jersey Evidence Rule 63(4).

Exception (3) is essentially a specialized application of Exception (1), presented separately to enhance its usefulness and accessibility. See McCormick §§ 265, 268.

The exclusion of "statements of memory or belief to prove the fact remembered or believed" is necessary to avoid the virtual destruction of the hearsay rule which would otherwise result from allowing state of mind, provable by a hearsay statement, to serve as the basis for an inference of the happening of the event which produced the state of mind. Shepard v. United States, 290 U.S. 96, 54 S. Ct. 22, 78 L. Ed. 196 (1933) ; Maguire, The Hillmon Case -- Thirty-three Years After, 38 Harv. L. Rev. 709, 719-31 (1925); Hinton, States of Mind and the Hearsay Rule, 1 U. Chi. L.Rev. 394, 421-23 (1934). The rule of Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Hillmon, 145 U.S. 285, 12 S. Ct. 909, 36 L. Ed. 706 (1892) , allowing evidence of intention as tending to prove the doing of the act intended, is, of course, left undisturbed.

The carving out, from the exclusion mentioned in the preceding paragraph, of declarations relating to the execution, revocation, identification, or terms of declarant's will represents an ad hoc judgment which finds ample reinforcement in the decisions, resting on practical grounds of necessity and expediency rather than logic. McCormick § 271, pp. 577-78; Annot., 34 A.L.R.2d 588 , 62 A.L.R.2d 855 . A similar recognition of the need for and practical value of this kind of evidence is found in California Evidence Code § 1260.

Exception (4). Even those few jurisdictions which have shied away from generally admitting statements of present condition have allowed them if made to a physician for purposes of diagnosis and treatment in view of the patient's strong motivation to be truthful. McCormick § 266, p. 563. The same guarantee of trustworthiness extends to statements of past conditions and medical history, made for purposes of diagnosis or treatment. It also extends to statements as to causation, reasonably pertinent to the same purposes, in accord with the current trend, Shell Oil Co. v. Industrial Commission, 2 Ill. 2d 590, 119 N.E.2d 224 (1954) ; McCormick § 266, p. 564; New Jersey Evidence Rule 63(12)(c). Statements as to fault would not ordinarily qualify under this latter language. Thus a patient's statement that he was struck by an automobile would qualify but not his statement that the car was driven through a red light. Under the exception the statement need not have been made to a physician. Statements to hospital attendants, ambulance drivers, or even members of the family might be included.

Conventional doctrine has excluded from the hearsay exception, as not within its guarantee of truthfulness, statements to a physician consulted only for the purpose of enabling him to testify. While these statements were not admissible as substantive evidence, the expert was allowed to state the basis of his opinion, including statements of this kind. The distinction thus called for was one most unlikely to be made by juries. The rule accordingly rejects the limitation. This position is consistent with the provision of Rule 703 that the facts on which expert testimony is based need not be admissible in evidence if of a kind ordinarily relied upon by experts in the field.

Exception (5). A hearsay exception for recorded recollection is generally recognized and has been described as having "long been favored by the federal and practically all the state courts that have had occasion to decide the question." United States v. Kelly, 349 F.2d 720, 770 (2d Cir. 1965) , citing numerous cases and sustaining the exception against a claimed denial of the right of confrontation. Many additional cases are cited in Annot., 82 A.L.R.2d 473, 520 . The guarantee of trustworthiness is found in the reliability inherent in a record made while events were still fresh in mind and accurately reflecting them. Owens v. State, 67 Md. 307, 316, 10 A. 210, 212 (1887) .

The principal controversy attending the exception has centered, not upon the propriety of the exception itself, but upon the question whether a preliminary requirement of impaired memory on the part of the witness should be imposed. The authorities are divided. If regard be had only to the accuracy of the evidence, admittedly impairment of the memory of the witness adds nothing to it and should not be required. McCormick § 277, p. 593; 3 Wigmore § 738, p. 76; Jordan v. People, 151 Colo. 133, 376 P.2d 699 (1962) , cert. denied, 373 U.S. 944, 83 S. Ct. 1553, 10 L. Ed. 2d 699 ; Hall v. State, 223 Md. 158, 162 A.2d 751 (1960) ; State v. Bindhammer, 44 N.J. 372, 209 A.2d 124 (1965) . Nevertheless, the absence of the requirement, it is believed, would encourage the use of statements carefully prepared for purposes of litigation under the supervision of attorneys, investigators, or claim adjusters. Hence the example includes a requirement that the witness not have "sufficient recollection to enable him to testify fully and accurately." To the same effect are California Evidence Code § 1237 and New Jersey Rule 63(1)(b), and this has been the position of the federal courts. Vicksburg & Meridian R. R. v. O'Brien, 119 U.S. 99, 7 S. Ct. 118, 30 L. Ed. 299 (1886) ; Ahern v. Webb, 268 F.2d 45 (10th Cir. 1959) ; and see N.L.R.B. v. Hudson Pulp and Paper Corp., 273 F.2d 660, 665 (5th Cir. 1960) ; N.L.R.B. v. Federal Dairy Co., 297 F.2d 487 (1st Cir. 1962) . But cf. United States v. Adams, 385 F.2d 548 (2d Cir. 1967) .

No attempt is made in the exception to spell out the method of establishing the initial knowledge or the contemporaneity and accuracy of the record, leaving them to be dealt with as the circumstances of the particular case might indicate. Multiple person involvement in the process of observing and recording, as in Rathbun v. Brancatella, 93 N.J.L. 222, 107 A. 279 (1919) , is entirely consistent with the exception.

Locating the exception at this place in the scheme of the rules is a matter of choice. There were two other possibilities. The first was to regard the statement as one of the group of prior statements of a testifying witness which are excluded entirely from the category of hearsay by Rule 801(d)(1). That category, however, requires that declarant be "subject to cross-examination," as to which the impaired memory aspect of the exception raises doubts. The other possibility was to include the exception among those covered by Rule 804. Since unavailability is required by that rule and lack of memory is listed as a species of unavailability by the definition of the term in Rule 804(a)(3), that treatment at first impression would seem appropriate. The fact is, however, that the unavailability requirement of the exception is of a limited and peculiar nature. Accordingly, the exception is located at this point rather than in the context of a rule where unavailability is conceived of more broadly.

Exception (6) represents an area which has received much attention from those seeking to improve the law of evidence. The Commonwealth Fund Act was the result of a study completed in 1927 by a distinguished committee under the chairmanship of Professor Morgan. Morgan et al., The Law of Evidence: Some Proposals for Its Reform 63 (1927). With changes too minor to mention, it was adopted by Congress in 1936 as the rule for federal courts. 28 U.S.C. § 1732. A number of states took similar action. The Commissioners on Uniform State Laws in 1936 promulgated the Uniform Business Records as Evidence Act, 9A U.L.A. 506, which has acquired a substantial following in the states. Model Code Rule 514 and Uniform Rule 63(13) also deal with the subject. Differences of varying degrees of importance exist among these various treatments.

These reform efforts were largely within the context of business and commercial records, as the kind usually encountered, and concentrated considerable attention upon relaxing the requirement of producing as witnesses, or accounting for the nonproduction of, all participants in the process of gathering, transmitting, and recording information which the common law had evolved as a burdensome and crippling aspect of using records of this type. In their areas of primary emphasis on witnesses to be called and the general admissibility of ordinary business and commercial records, the Commonwealth Fund Act and the Uniform Act appear to have worked well. The exception seeks to preserve their advantages.

On the subject of what witnesses must be called, the Commonwealth Fund Act eliminated the common law requirement of calling or accounting for all participants by failing to mention it. United States v. Mortimer, 118 F.2d 266 (2d Cir. 1941) ; La Porte v. United States, 300 F.2d 878 (9th Cir. 1962) ; McCormick § 290, p. 608. Model Code Rule 514 and Uniform Rule 63(13) did likewise. The Uniform Act, however, abolished the common law requirement in express terms, providing that the requisite foundation testimony might be furnished by "the custodian or other qualified witness." Uniform Business Records as Evidence Act, § 2; 9A U.L.A. 506. The exception follows the Uniform Act in this respect.

The element of unusual reliability of business records is said variously to be supplied by systematic checking, by regularity and continuity which produce habits of precision, by actual experience of business in relying upon them, or by a duty to make an accurate record as part of a continuing job or occupation. McCormick §§ 281, 286, 287; Laughlin, Business Entries and the Like, 46 Iowa L. Rev. 276 (1961). The model statutes and rules have sought to capture these factors and to extend their impact by employing the phrase "regular course of business," in conjunction with a definition of "business" far broader than its ordinarily accepted meaning. The result is a tendency unduly to emphasize a requirement of routineness and repetitiveness and an insistence that other types of records be squeezed into the fact patterns which give rise to traditional business records. The rule therefore adopts the phrase "the course of a regularly conducted activity" as capturing the essential basis of the hearsay exception as it has evolved and the essential element which can be abstracted from the various specifications of what is a "business." [This terminology was rejected by the Congress. -- Ed.]

Amplification of the kinds of activities producing admissible records has given rise to problems which conventional business records by their nature avoid. They are problems of the source of the recorded information, of entries in opinion form, of motivation, and of involvement as participant in the matters recorded.

Sources of information presented no substantial problem with ordinary business records. All participants, including the observer or participant furnishing the information to be recorded, were acting routinely, under a duty of accuracy, with employer reliance on the result, or in short "in the regular course of business." If, however, the supplier of the information does not act in the regular course, an essential link is broken; the assurance of accuracy does not extend to the information itself, and the fact that it may be recorded with scrupulous accuracy is of no avail. An illustration is the police report incorporating information obtained from a bystander; the officer qualifies as acting in the regular course but the informant does not. The leading case, Johnson v. Lutz, 253 N.Y. 124, 170 N.E. 517 (1930) , held that a report thus prepared was inadmissible. Most of the authorities have agreed with the decision. Gencarella v. Fyfe, 171 F.2d 419 (1st Cir. 1948) ; Gordon v. Robinson, 210 F.2d 192 (3d Cir. 1954) ; Standard Oil Co. of California v. Moore, 251 F.2d 188, 214 (9th Cir. 1957) , cert. denied, 356 U.S. 975, 78 S. Ct. 1139, 2 L. Ed. 2d 1148 ; Yates v. Bair Transport, Inc., 249 F. Supp. 681 (S.D.N.Y. 1965) ; Annot., 69 A.L.R.2d 1148 . Cf. Hawkins v. Gorea Motor Express, Inc., 360 F.2d 933 (2d Cir. 1966). Contra, 5 Wigmore § 1530a, n. 1, pp. 391-92. The point is not dealt with specifically in the Commonwealth Fund Act, the Uniform Act, or Uniform Rule 63(13). However, Model Code Rule 514 contains the requirement "that it was the regular course of that business for one with personal knowledge ... to make such a memorandum or record or to transmit information thereof to be included in such a memorandum or record ... ." The rule follows this lead in requiring an informant with knowledge acting in the course of the regularly conducted activity. [Editor's Note: Congress' amendment to the Rule makes it unclear whether the informant must be acting in the course of business activity; but Congress does not appear to have intended to reject the business duty requirement.]

Entries in the form of opinions were not encountered in traditional business records in view of the purely factual nature of the items recorded, but they are now commonly encountered with respect to medical diagnoses, prognoses, and test results, as well as occasionally in other areas. The Commonwealth Fund Act provided only for records of an "act, transaction, occurrence, or event," while the Uniform Act, Model Code Rule 514, and Uniform Rule 63(13) merely added the ambiguous term "condition." The limited phrasing of the Commonwealth Fund Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1732, may account for the reluctance of some federal decisions to admit diagnostic entries. New York Life Ins. Co. v. Taylor, 147 F.2d 297, 79 U.S. App. D.C. 66 (1945) ; Lyles v. United States, 254 F.2d 725, 103 U.S. App. D.C. 22 (1957) , cert. denied, 356 U.S. 961, 78 S. Ct. 997, 2 L. Ed. 2d 1067 ; England v. United States, 174 F.2d 466 (5th Cir. 1949) ; Skogen v. Dow Chemical Co., 375 F.2d 692 (8th Cir. 1967) . Other federal decisions, however, experienced no difficulty in freely admitting diagnostic entries. Reed v. Order of United Commercial Travelers, 123 F.2d 252 (2d Cir. 1941) ; Buckminster's Estate v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 147 F.2d 331 (2d Cir. 1944) ; Medina v. Erickson, 226 F.2d 475 (9th Cir. 1955) ; Thomas v. Hogan, 308 F.2d 355 (4th Cir. 1962) ; Glawe v. Rulon, 284 F.2d 495 (8th Cir. 1960) . In the state courts, the trend favors admissibility. Borucki v. MacKenzie Bros. Co., 125 Conn. 92, 3 A.2d 224 (1938) ; Allen v. St. Louis Public Service Co., 365 Mo. 677, 285 S.W.2d 663, 55 A.L.R.2d 1022 (1956) ; People v. Kohlmeyer, 284 N.Y. 366, 31 N.E.2d 490 (1940) ; Weis v. Weis, 147 Ohio St. 416, 72 N.E.2d 245 (1947) . In order to make clear its adherence to the latter position, the rule specifically includes both diagnoses and opinions, in addition to acts, events, and conditions, as proper subjects of admissible entries.

Problems of the motivation of the informant have been a source of difficulty and disagreement. In Palmer v. Hoffman, 318 U.S. 109, 63 S. Ct. 477, 87 L. Ed. 645 (1943) , exclusion of an accident report made by the since deceased engineer, offered by defendant railroad trustees in a grade crossing collision case, was upheld. The report was not "in the regular course of business," not a record of the systematic conduct of the business as a business, said the Court. The report was prepared for use in litigating, not railroading. While the opinion mentions the motivation of the engineer only obliquely, the emphasis on records of routine operations is significant only by virtue of impact on motivation to be accurate. Absence of routineness raises lack of motivation to be accurate. The opinion of the Court of Appeals had gone beyond mere lack of motive to be accurate: the engineer's statement was "dripping with motivations to misrepresent." Hoffman v. Palmer, 129 F.2d 976, 991 (2d Cir. 1942) . The direct introduction of motivation is a disturbing factor, since absence of motive to misrepresent has not traditionally been a requirement of the rule; that records might be self-serving has not been a ground for exclusion. Laughlin, Business Records and the Like, 46 Iowa L. Rev. 276, 285 (1961). As Judge Clark said in his dissent, "I submit that there is hardly a grocer's account book which could not be excluded on that basis." 129 F.2d at 1002 . A physician's evaluation report of a personal injury litigant would appear to be in the routine of his business. If the report is offered by the party at whose instance it was made, however, it has been held inadmissible, Yates v. Bair Transport, Inc., 249 F. Supp. 681 (S.D.N.Y. 1965) , otherwise if offered by the opposite party, Korte v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 191 F.2d 86 (2d Cir. 1951) , cert. denied, 342 U.S. 868, 72 S. Ct. 108, 96 L. Ed. 652 .

The decisions hinge on motivation and which party is entitled to be concerned about it. Professor McCormick believed that the doctor's report or the accident report were sufficiently routine to justify admissibility. McCormick § 287, p. 604. Yet hesitation must be experienced in admitting everything which is observed and recorded in the course of a regularly conducted activity. Efforts to set a limit are illustrated by Hartzog v. United States, 217 F.2d 706 (4th Cir. 1954) , error to admit worksheets made by since deceased deputy collector in preparation for the instant income tax evasion prosecution, and United States v. Ware, 247 F.2d 698 (7th Cir. 1957) , error to admit narcotics agents' records of purchases. See also Exception (8), infra, as to the public record aspects of records of this nature. Some decisions have been satisfied as to motivation of an accident report if made pursuant to statutory duty, United States v. New York Foreign Trade Zone Operators, 304 F.2d 792 (2d Cir. 1962) ; Taylor v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 344 F.2d 281 (2d Cir. 1965) , since the report was oriented in a direction other than the litigation which ensued. Cf. Matthews v. United States, 217 F.2d 409 (5th Cir. 1954) . The formulation of specific terms which would assure satisfactory results in all cases is not possible. Consequently the rule proceeds from the base that records made in the course of a regularly conducted activity will be taken as admissible but subject to authority to exclude if "the sources of information or other circumstances indicate lack of trustworthiness."

Occasional decisions have reached for enhanced accuracy by requiring involvement as a participant in matters reported. Clainos v. United States, 163 F.2d 593, 82 U.S. App. D.C. 278 (1947) , error to admit police records of convictions; Standard Oil Co. of California v. Moore, 251 F.2d 188 (9th Cir. 1957) , cert. denied, 356 U.S. 975, 78 S. Ct. 1139, 2 L. Ed. 2d 1148 , error to admit employees' records of observed business practices of others. The rule includes no requirement of this nature. Wholly acceptable records may involve matters merely observed, e.g., the weather.

The form which the "record" may assume under the rule is described broadly as a "memorandum, report, record, or data compilation, in any form." The expression "data compilation" is used as broadly descriptive of means of storing information other than the conventional words and figures in written or documentary form. It includes, but is by no means limited to, electronic computer storage. The term is borrowed from revised Rule 34(a) of the Rules of Civil Procedure.

Exception (7). Failure of a record to mention a matter which would ordinarily be mentioned is satisfactory evidence of its nonexistence. Uniform Rule 63(14), Comment. While probably not hearsay as defined in Rule 801, supra , decisions may be found which class the evidence not only as hearsay but also as not within any exception. In order to set the question at rest in favor of admissibility, it is specifically treated here. McCormick § 289, p. 609; Morgan, Basic Problems of Evidence 314 (1962); 5 Wigmore § 1531; Uniform Rule 63(14); California Evidence Code § 1272; Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60-460(n); New Jersey Evidence Rule 63(14).

Exception (8). Public records are a recognized hearsay exception at common law and have been the subject of statutes without number. McCormick § 291. See, for example, 28 U.S.C. § 1733, the relative narrowness of which is illustrated by its nonapplicability to nonfederal public agencies, thus necessitating resort to the less appropriate business record exception to the hearsay rule. Kay v. United States, 255 F.2d 476 (4th Cir. 1958) . The rule makes no distinction between federal and nonfederal offices and agencies.

Justification for the exception is the assumption that a public official will perform his duty properly and the unlikelihood that he will remember details independently of the record. Wong Wing Foo v. McGrath, 196 F.2d 120 (9th Cir. 1952) , and see Chesapeake & Delaware Canal Co. v. United States, 250 U.S. 123, 39 S. Ct. 407, 63 L. Ed. 889 (1919) . As to items (a) and (b), further support is found in the reliability factors underlying records of regularly conducted activities generally. See Exception (6) supra.

(a) Cases illustrating the admissibility of records of the office's or agency's own activities are numerous. Chesapeake & Delaware Canal Co. v. United States, 250 U.S. 123, 39 S. Ct. 407, 63 L. Ed. 889 (1919) , Treasury records of miscellaneous receipts and disbursements; Howard v. Perrin, 200 U.S. 71, 26 S. Ct. 195, 50 L. Ed. 374 (1906) , General Land Office records; Ballew v. United States, 160 U.S. 187, 16 S. Ct. 263, 40 L. Ed. 388 (1895) , Pension Office records.

(b) Cases sustaining admissibility of records of matters observed are also numerous. United States v. Van Hook, 284 F.2d 489 (7th Cir. 1960) , remanded for resentencing, 365 U.S. 609, 81 S. Ct. 823, 5 L. Ed. 2d 821 , letter from induction officer to district attorney, pursuant to army regulations, stating fact and circumstances of refusal to be inducted; T'Kach v. United States, 242 F.2d 937 (5th Cir. 1957) , affidavit of White House personnel officer that search of records showed no employment of accused, charged with fraudulently representing himself as an envoy of the president; Minnehaha County v. Kelley, 150 F.2d 356 (8th Cir. 1945) , Weather Bureau records of rainfall; United States v. Meyer, 113 F.2d 387 (7th Cir. 1940) , cert. denied, 311 U.S. 706, 61 S. Ct. 174, 85 L. Ed. 459 , map prepared by government engineer from information furnished by men working under his supervision.

(c) The more controversial area of public records is that of the so-called "evaluative" report. The disagreement among the decisions has been due in part, no doubt, to the variety of situations encountered, as well as to differences in principle. Sustaining admissibility are such cases as United States v. Dumas, 149 U.S. 278, 13 S. Ct. 872, 37 L. Ed. 734 (1893) , statement of account certified by postmaster general in action against postmaster; McCarty v. United States, 185 F.2d 520 (5th Cir. 1950) , rehearing denied, 187 F.2d 234 , certificate of settlement of General Accounting Office showing indebtedness and letter from army official stating government had performed, in action on contract to purchase and remove waste food from army camp; Moran v. Pittsburgh-Des Moines Steel Co., 183 F.2d 467 (3d Cir. 1950) , report of Bureau of Mines as to cause of gas tank explosion; Petition of W --, 164 F. Supp. 659 (E.D. Pa. 1958) , report by Immigration and Naturalization Service investigator that petitioner was known in community as wife of man to whom she was not married. To the opposite effect and denying admissibility are Franklin v. Skelly Oil Co., 141 F.2d 568 (10th Cir. 1944) , state fire marshal's report of cause of gas explosion; Lomax Transp. Co. v. United States, 183 F.2d 331 (9th Cir. 1950) , certificate of settlement from General Accounting Office in action for naval supplies lost in warehouse fire; Yung Jin Teung v. Dulles, 229 F.2d 244 (2d Cir. 1956) , "status reports" offered to justify delay in processing passport applications. Police reports have generally been excluded except to the extent to which they incorporate firsthand observations of the officer. Annot., 69 A.L.R.2d 1148 . Various kinds of evaluative reports are admissible under federal statutes: 7 U.S.C. § 78, findings of secretary of agriculture prima facie evidence of true grade of grain; 7 U.S.C. § 210(f), findings of secretary of agriculture prima facie evidence in action for damages against stockyard owner; 7 U.S.C. § 292, order by secretary of agriculture prima facie evidence in judicial enforcement proceedings against producers association monopoly; 7 U.S.C. § 1622(h), Department of Agriculture inspection certificates of products shipped in interstate commerce prima facie evidence; 8 U.S.C. § 1440(c), separation of alien from military service on conditions other than honorable provable by certificate from department in proceedings to revoke citizenship; 18 U.S.C. § 4245, certificate of director of prisons that convicted person has been examined and found probably incompetent at time of trial prima facie evidence in court hearing on competency; 42 U.S.C. § 269(b), bill of health by appropriate official prima facie evidence of vessel's sanitary history and condition and compliance with regulations; 46 U.S.C. § 679, certificate of consul presumptive evidence of refusal of master to transport destitute seamen to United States. While these statutory exceptions to the hearsay rule are left undisturbed, Rule 802, the willingness of Congress to recognize a substantial measure of admissibility for evaluative reports is a helpful guide.

Factors which may be of assistance in passing upon the admissibility of evaluative reports include: (1) the timeliness of the investigation, McCormick, Can the Courts Make Wider Use of Reports of Official Investigations, 42 Iowa L. Rev. 363 (1957); (2) the special skill or experience of the official, id.; (3) whether a hearing was held and the level at which conducted, Franklin v. Skelly Oil Co., 141 F.2d 568 (10th Cir. 1944) ; (4) possible motivation problems suggested by Palmer v. Hoffman, 318 U.S. 109, 63 S. Ct. 477, 87 L. Ed. 645 (1943) . Others no doubt could be added.

The formulation of an approach which would give appropriate weight to all possible factors in every situation is an obvious impossibility. Hence the rule, as in Exception (6), assumes admissibility in the first instance but with ample provision for escape if sufficient negative factors are present. In one respect, however, the rule with respect to evaluative reports under item (c) is very specific: they are admissible only in civil cases and against the government in criminal cases in view of the almost certain collision with confrontation rights which would result from their use against the accused in a criminal case.

Exception (9). Records of vital statistics are commonly the subject of particular statutes making them admissible in evidence, Uniform Vital Statistics Act, 9C U.L.A. 350 (1957). The rule is in principle narrower than Uniform Rule 63(16) which includes reports required of persons performing functions authorized by statute, yet in practical effect the two are substantially the same. Comment Uniform Rule 63(16). The exception as drafted is in the pattern of California Evidence Code § 1281.

Exception (10). The principle of proving nonoccurrence of an event by evidence of the absence of a record which would regularly be made of its occurrence, developed in Exception (7) with respect to regularly conducted activities, is here extended to public records of the kind mentioned in Exceptions (8) and (9). 5 Wigmore § 1633(6), p. 519. Some harmless duplication no doubt exists with Exception (7). For instances of federal statutes recognizing this method of proof, see 8 U.S.C. § 1284(b), proof of absence of alien crewman's name from outgoing manifest prima facie evidence of failure to detain or deport, and 42 U.S.C. § 405(c)(3), (4)(B), (4)(C), absence of HEW record prima facie evidence of no wages or self-employment income.

The rule includes situations in which absence of a record may itself be the ultimate focal point of inquiry, e.g., People v. Love, 310 Ill. 558, 142 N.E. 204 (1923) , certificate of secretary of state admitted to show failure to file documents required by Securities Law, as well as cases where the absence of a record is offered as proof of the nonoccurrence of an event ordinarily recorded.

The refusal of the common law to allow proof by certificate of the lack of a record or entry has no apparent justification, 5 Wigmore § 1678(7), p. 752. The rule takes the opposite position, as do Uniform Rule 63(17); California Evidence Code § 1284; Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60-460(c); New Jersey Evidence Rule 63(17). Congress has recognized certification as evidence of the lack of a record. 8 U.S.C. § 1360(d), certificate of attorney general or other designated officer that no record of Immigration and Naturalization Service of specified nature or entry therein is found, admissible in alien cases.

Exception (11). Records of activities of religious organizations are currently recognized as admissible at least to the extent of the business records exception to the hearsay rule, 5 Wigmore § 1523, p. 371, and Exception (6) would be applicable. However, both the business record doctrine and Exception (6) require that the person furnishing the information be one in the business or activity. The result is such decisions as Daily v. Grand Lodge, 311 Ill. 184, 142 N.E. 478 (1924) , holding a church record admissible to prove fact, date, and place of baptism, but not age of child except that he had at least been born at the time. In view of the unlikelihood that false information would be furnished on occasions of this kind, the rule contains no requirement that the information be in the course of the activity. See California Evidence Code § 1315 and Comment.

Exception (12). The principle of proof by certification is recognized as to public officials in Exceptions (8) and (10), and with respect to authentication in Rule 902. The present exception is a duplication to the extent that it deals with a certificate by a public official, as in the case of a judge who performs a marriage ceremony. The area covered by the rule is, however, substantially larger and extends the certification procedure to clergymen and the like who perform marriages and other ceremonies or administer sacraments. Thus certificates of such matters as baptism or confirmation, as well as marriage, are included. In principle they are as acceptable evidence as certificates of public officers. See 5 Wigmore § 1645, as to marriage certificates. When the person executing the certificate is not a public official, the self-authenticating character of documents purporting to emanate from public officials, see Rule 902, is lacking and proof is required that the person was authorized and did make the certificate. The time element, however, may safely be taken as supplied by the certificate, once authority and authenticity are established, particularly in view of the presumption that a document was executed on the date it bears.

For similar rules, some limited to certificates of marriage, with variations in foundation requirements, see Uniform Rule 63(18); California Evidence Code § 1316; Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60-460(p); New Jersey Evidence Rule 63(18).

Exception (13). Records of family history kept in family Bibles have by long tradition been received in evidence. 5 Wigmore §§ 1495, 1496, citing numerous statutes and decisions. See also Regulations, Social Security Administration, 20 C.F.R. § 404.703(c), recognizing family Bible entries as proof of age in the absence of public or church records. Opinions in the area also include inscriptions on tombstones, publicly displayed pedigrees, and engravings on rings. Wigmore, supra. The rule is substantially identical in coverage with California Evidence Code § 1312.

Exception (14). The recording of the documents is a purely statutory development. Under any theory of the admissibility of public records, the records would be receivable as evidence of the contents of the recorded document, else the recording process would be reduced to a nullity. When, however, the record is offered for the further purpose of proving execution and delivery, a problem of lack of firsthand knowledge by the recorder, not present as to contents, is presented. This problem is solved, seemingly in all jurisdictions, by qualifying for recording only those documents shown by a specified procedure, either acknowledgment or a form of probate, to have been executed and delivered. 5 Wigmore §§ 1647-1651. Thus what may appear in the rule, at first glance, as endowing the record with an effect independently of local law and inviting difficulties of an Erie nature under Cities Service Oil Co. v. Dunlap, 308 U.S. 208, 60 S. Ct. 201, 84 L. Ed. 196 (1939) , is not present, since the local law in fact governs under the example.

Exception (15). Dispositive documents often contain recitals of fact. Thus a deed purporting to have been executed by an attorney in fact may recite the existence of the power of attorney, or a deed may recite that the grantors are all the heirs of the last record owner. Under the rule, these recitals are exempted from the hearsay rule. The circumstances under which dispositive documents are executed and the requirement that the recital be germane to the purpose of the document are believed to be adequate guarantees of trustworthiness, particularly in view of the nonapplicability of the rule if dealings with the property have been inconsistent with the document. The age of the document is of no significance, though in practical application the document will most often be an ancient one. See Uniform Rule 63(29), Comment.

Similar provisions are contained in Uniform Rule 63(29); California Evidence Code § 1330; Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60-460(aa); New Jersey Evidence Rule 63(29).

Exception (16). Authenticating a document as ancient, essentially in the pattern of the common law, as provided in Rule 901(b) (8), leaves open as a separate question the admissibility of assertive statements contained therein as against a hearsay objection. 7 Wigmore § 2145a. Wigmore further states that the ancient document technique of authentication is universally conceded to apply to all sorts of documents, including letters, records, contracts, maps, and certificates, in addition to title documents, citing numerous decisions. Id. § 2145. Since most of these items are significant evidentially only insofar as they are assertive, their admission in evidence must be as a hearsay exception. But see 5 id. § 1573, p.

429, referring to recitals in ancient deeds as a "limited" hearsay exception. The former position is believed to be the correct one in reason and authority. As pointed out in McCormick § 298, danger of mistake is minimized by authentication requirements, and age affords assurance that the writing antedates the present controversy. See Dallas County v. Commercial Union Assurance Co., Ltd., 286 F.2d 388 (5th Cir. 1961) , upholding admissibility of 58-year-old newspaper story. Cf. Morgan, Basic Problems of Evidence 364 (1962), but see id. 254.

For a similar provision, but with the added requirement that "the statement has since generally been acted upon as true by persons having an interest in the matter," see California Evidence Code § 1331.

Exception (17). Ample authority at common law supported the admission in evidence of items falling in this category. While Wigmore's text is narrowly oriented to lists, etc., prepared for the use of a trade or profession, 6 Wigmore § 1702, authorities are cited which include other kinds of publications, for example, newspaper market reports, telephone directories, and city directories. Id. §§ 1702-1706. The basis of trustworthiness is general reliance by the public or by a particular segment of it, and the motivation of the compiler to foster reliance by being accurate.

For similar provisions, see Uniform Rule 63(30); California Evidence Code § 1340; Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60-460(bb); New Jersey Evidence Rule 63(30). Uniform Commercial Code § 2-724 provides for admissibility in evidence of "reports in official publications or trade journals or in newspapers or periodicals of general circulation published as the reports of such [established commodity] market."

Exception (18). The writers have generally favored the admissibility of learned treatises, McCormick § 296, p. 621; Morgan, Basic Problems of Evidence 366 (1962); 6 Wigmore § 1692, with the support of occasional decisions and rules, City of Dothan v. Hardy, 237 Ala. 603, 188 So. 264 (1939) ; Lewandowski v. Preferred Risk Mut. Ins. Co., 33 Wis. 2d 69, 146 N.W.2d 505 (1966) , 66 Mich. L. Rev. 183 (1967); Uniform Rule 63(31); Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60-460(cc), but the great weight of authority has been that learned treatises are not admissible as substantive evidence though usable in the cross-examination of experts. The foundation of the minority view is that the hearsay objection must be regarded as unimpressive when directed against treatises since a high standard of accuracy is engendered by various factors: the treatise is written primarily and impartially for professionals, subject to scrutiny and exposure for inaccuracy, with the reputation of the writer at stake. 6 Wigmore § 1692. Sound as this position may be with respect to trustworthiness, there is, nevertheless, an additional difficulty in the likelihood that the treatise will be misunderstood and misapplied without expert assistance and supervision. This difficulty is recognized in the cases demonstrating unwillingness to sustain findings relative to disability on the basis of judicially noticed medical texts. Ross v. Gardner, 365 F.2d 554 (6th Cir. 1966) ; Sayers v. Gardner, 380 F.2d 940 (6th Cir. 1967) ; Colwell v. Gardner, 386 F.2d 56 (6th Cir. 1967) ; Glendenning v. Ribicoff, 213 F. Supp. 301 (W.D. Mo. 1962) ; Cook v. Celebrezze, 217 F. Supp. 366 (W.D. Mo. 1963) ; Sosna v. Celebrezze, 234 F. Supp. 289 (E.D. Pa. 1964) ; and see McDaniel v. Celebrezze, 331 F.2d 426 (4th Cir. 1964) . The rule avoids the danger of misunderstanding and misapplication by limiting the use of treatises as substantive evidence to situations in which an expert is on the stand and available to explain and assist in the application of the treatise if desired. The limitation upon receiving the publication itself physically in evidence, contained in the last sentence, is designed to further this policy.

The relevance of the use of treatises on cross-examination is evident. This use of treatises has been the subject of varied views. The most restrictive position is that the witness must have stated expressly on direct his reliance upon the treatise. A slightly more liberal approach still insists upon reliance but allows it to be developed on cross-examination. Further relaxation dispenses with reliance but requires recognition as an authority by the witness, developable on cross-examination. The greatest liberality is found in decisions allowing use of the treatise on cross-examination when its status as an authority is established by any means. Annot., 60 A.L.R.2d 77 . The exception is hinged upon this last position, which is that of the Supreme Court, Reilly v. Pinkus, 338 U.S. 269, 70 S. Ct. 110, 94 L. Ed. 63 (1949) , and of recent well considered state court decisions, City of St. Petersburg v. Ferguson, 193 So. 2d 648 (Fla. App. 1967) , cert. denied, Fla., 201 So.2d 556 ; Darling v. Charleston Memorial Community Hospital, 33 Ill. 2d 326, 211 N.E.2d 253 (1965) ; Dabroe v. Rhodes Co., 64 Wash. 2d 431, 392 P.2d 317 (1964) .

In Reilly v. Pinkus, supra , the Court pointed out that testing of professional knowledge was incomplete without exploration of the witness' knowledge of and attitude toward established treatises in the field. The process works equally well in reverse and furnishes the basis of the rule.

The rule does not require that the witness rely upon or recognize the treatise as authoritative, thus avoiding the possibility that the expert may at the outset block cross-examination by refusing to concede reliance or authoritativeness. Dabroe v. Rhodes Co., supra. Moreover, the rule avoids the unreality of admitting evidence for the purpose of impeachment only, with an instruction to the jury not to consider it otherwise. The parallel to the treatment of prior inconsistent statements will be apparent. See Rules 613(b) and 801(d)(1).

Exceptions (19), (20), and (21). Trustworthiness in reputation evidence is found "when the topic is such that the facts are likely to have been inquired about and that persons having personal knowledge have disclosed facts which have been discussed in the community; and thus the community's conclusion, if any has been formed, is likely to be a trustworthy one." 5 Wigmore § 1580, p. 444, and see also § 1583. On this common foundation, reputation as to land boundaries, customs, general history, character, and marriage have come to be regarded as admissible. The breadth of the underlying principle suggests the formulation of an equally broad exception, but tradition has in fact been much narrower and more particularized, and this is the pattern of these exceptions in the rule.

Exception (19) is concerned with matters of personal and family history. Marriage is universally conceded to be a proper subject of proof by evidence of reputation in the community. 5 Wigmore § 1602. As to such items as legitimacy, relationship, adoption, birth, and death, the decisions are divided. Id. § 1605. All seem to be susceptible to being the subject of well founded repute. The "world" in which the reputation may exist may be family, associates, or community. This world has proved capable of expanding with changing times from the single uncomplicated neighborhood, in which all activities take place, to the multiple and unrelated worlds of work, religious affiliation, and social activity, in each of which a reputation may be generated. People v. Reeves, 360 Ill. 55, 195 N.E. 443 (1935) ; State v. Axilrod, 248 Minn. 204, 79 N.W.2d 677 (1956) ; Mass. Stat. 1947, c. 410, M.G.L.A. c. 233 § 21A; 5 Wigmore § 1616. The family has often served as the point of beginning for allowing community reputation. 5 Wigmore § 1488. For comparable provisions see Uniform Rule 63(26), (27)(c); California Evidence Code §§ 1313, 1314; Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60-460(x), (y)(3); New Jersey Evidence Rule 63(26), (27)(c).

The first portion of Exception (20) is based upon the general admissibility of evidence of reputation as to land boundaries and land customs, expanded in this country to include private as well as public boundaries. McCormick § 299, p. 625. The reputation is required to antedate the controversy, though not to be ancient. The second portion is likewise supported by authority, id., and is designed to facilitate proof of events when judicial notice is not available. The historical character of the subject matter dispenses with any need that the reputation antedate the controversy with respect to which it is offered. For similar provisions see Uniform Rule 63(27)(a), (b); California Evidence Code §§ 1320-1322; Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60-460(y)(1), (2); New Jersey Evidence Rule 63(27)(a), (b).

Exception (21) recognizes the traditional acceptance of reputation evidence as a means of proving human character. McCormick §§ 44, 158. The exception deals only with the hearsay aspect of this kind of evidence. Limitations upon admissibility based on other grounds will be found in Rules 404, relevancy of character evidence generally, and 608, character of witness. The exception is in effect a reiteration, in the context of hearsay, of Rule 405(a). Similar provisions are contained in Uniform Rule 63(28); California Evidence Code § 1324; Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60-460(z); New Jersey Evidence Rule 63(28).

Exception (22). When the status of a former judgment is under consideration in subsequent litigation, three possibilities must be noted: (1) the former judgment is conclusive under the doctrine of res judicata, either as a bar or a collateral estoppel; or (2) it is admissible in evidence for what it is worth; or (3) it may be of no effect at all. The first situation does not involve any problem of evidence except in the way that principles of substantive law generally bear upon the relevancy and materiality of evidence. The rule does not deal with the substantive effect of the judgment as a bar or collateral estoppel. When, however, the doctrine of res judicata does not apply to make the judgment either a bar or a collateral estoppel, a choice is presented between the second and third alternatives. The rule adopts the second for judgments of criminal conviction of felony grade. This is the direction of the decisions, Annot., 18 A.L.R.2d 1287, 1299 , which manifest an increasing reluctance to reject in toto the validity of the law's fact-finding processes outside the confines of res judicata and collateral estoppel. While this may leave a jury with the evidence of conviction but without means to evaluate it, as suggested by Judge Hinton, Note, 27 Ill. L. Rev. 195 (1932), it seems safe to assume that the jury will give it substantial effect unless defendant offers a satisfactory explanation, a possibility not foreclosed by the provision. But see North River Ins. Co. v. Militello, 104 Colo. 28, 88 P.2d 567 (1939) , in which the jury found for plaintiff on a fire policy despite the introduction of his conviction for arson. For supporting federal decisions see Clark, J., in New York & Cuba Mail S. S. Co. v. Continental Cas. Co., 117 F.2d 404, 411 (2d Cir. 1941) ; Connecticut Fire Ins. Co. v. Farrara, 277 F.2d 388 (8th Cir. 1960) .

Practical considerations require exclusion of convictions of minor offenses, not because the administration of justice in its lower echelons must be inferior, but because motivation of defendant at this level is often minimal or nonexistent. Cope v. Goble, 39 Cal. App. 2d 448, 103 P.2d 598 (1940) ; Jones v. Talbot, 87 Idaho 498, 394 P.2d 316 (1964) ; Warren v. Marsh, 215 Minn. 615, 11 N.W.2d 528 (1943) ; Annot. 18 A.L.R.2d 1287, 1295-97 ; 16 Brooklyn L. Rev. 286 (1950); 50 Colum. L. Rev. 529 (1950); 35 Cornell L.Q. 872 (1950). Hence the rule includes only convictions of felony grade, measured by federal standards.

Judgments of conviction based upon pleas of nolo contendere are not included. This position is consistent with the treatment of nolo pleas in Rule 410 and the authorities cited in the Advisory Committee's Note in support thereof.

While these rules do not in general purport to resolve constitutional issues, they have in general been drafted with a view to avoiding collision with constitutional principles. Consequently the exception does not include evidence of the conviction of a third person, offered against the accused in a criminal prosecution to prove any fact essential to sustain the judgment of conviction. A contrary position would seem clearly to violate the right of confrontation. Kirby v. United States, 174 U.S. 47, 19 S. Ct. 574, 43 L. Ed. 890 (1899) , error to convict of possessing stolen postage stamps with the only evidence of theft being the record of conviction of the thieves. The situation is to be distinguished from cases in which conviction of another person is an element of the crime, e.g., 15 U.S.C. § 902(d), interstate shipment of firearms to a known convicted felon, and, as specifically provided, from impeachment.

For comparable provisions see Uniform Rule 63(20); California Evidence Code § 1300; Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60-460(r); New Jersey Evidence Rule 63(20).

Exception (23). A hearsay exception in this area was originally justified on the ground that verdicts were evidence of reputation. As trial by jury graduated from the category of neighborhood inquests, this theory lost its validity. It was never valid as to chancery decrees. Nevertheless the rule persisted, though the judges and writers shifted ground and began saying that the judgment or decree was as good evidence as reputation. See City of London v. Clerke, Carth. 181, 90 Eng. Rep. 710 (K.B. 1691) ; Neill v. Duke of Devonshire, 8 App. Cas. 135 (1882) . The shift appears to be correct, since the process of inquiry, sifting, and scrutiny which is relied upon to render reputation reliable is present in perhaps greater measure in the process of litigation. While this might suggest a broader area of application, the affinity to reputation is strong, and paragraph (23) goes no further, not even including character.

The leading case in the United States, Patterson v. Gaines, 47 U.S. (6 How.) 550, 599, 12 L. Ed. 553 (1847) , follows in the pattern of the English decisions, mentioning as illustrative matters thus provable; manorial rights, public rights of way, immemorial custom, disputed boundary, and pedigree. Most recent recognition of the principle is found in Grant Bros. Constr. Co. v. United States, 232 U.S. 647, 34 S. Ct. 452, 58 L. Ed. 776 (1914) , in action for penalties under Alien Contract Labor Law, decision of board of inquiry of Immigration Service admissible to prove alienage of laborers, as a matter of pedigree; United States v. Mid-Continent Petroleum Corp., 67 F.2d 37 (10th Cir. 1933) , records of commission enrolling Indians admissible on pedigree; Jung Yen Loy v. Cahill, 81 F.2d 809 (9th Cir. 1936) , board decisions as to citizenship of plaintiff's father admissible in proceeding for declaration of citizenship. Contra, In re Estate of Cunha, 49 Haw. 273, 414 P.2d 925 (1966) .

Exception (24). [Editor's Note: Rule 803(24) has been transferred to Rule 807. The Advisory Committee Note on Rule 803(24) has accordingly been transferred to that Rule as well.]

[The entire Advisory Committee Note accompanying the gender-neutralizing changes effective October 1, 1987 is as follows: "The amendments are technical. No substantive change is intended."]

[2] 1997 Amendment Committee Note

1997 Amendment Committee Note

The contents of Rule 803(24) and Rule 804(b)(5) have been combined and transferred to a new Rule 807. This was done to facilitate additions to Rules 803 and 804. No change in meaning is intended.

[3] 2000 Amendment Committee Note

2000 Amendment Committee Note

The amendment provides that the foundation requirements of Rule 803(6) can be satisfied under certain circumstances without the expense and inconvenience of producing time-consuming foundation witnesses. Under current law, courts have generally required foundation witnesses to testify. See, e.g., Tongil Co., Ltd. v. Hyundai Merchant Marine Corp., 968 F.2d 999 (9th Cir. 1992) (reversing a judgment based on business records where a qualified person filed an affidavit but did not testify). Protections are provided by the authentication requirements of Rule 902(11) for domestic records, Rule 902(12) for foreign records in civil cases, and 18 U.S.C. § 3505 for foreign records in criminal cases.

[4] Excerpt from "Advisory Committee Notes to the Federal Rules of Evidence That May Require Clarification," by Daniel Capra, 182 F.R.D. 268, 283 (1999)

Rule 803(6) -- Business Records

The Advisory Committee's proposed exception for business records was somewhat broader than that ultimately adopted by Congress. As a result, the Advisory Committee Note to the business records exception, Rule 803(6), is somewhat misleading. The Advisory Committee proposal covered any record made "in the course of a regularly conducted activity." It specifically eschewed the term "business" on the ground that other types of regularly prepared records should not have to be shoehorned "into the fact patterns which give rise to traditional business records." This was so even though the definition of "business" in the predecessor statute to Rule 803(6) (28 U.S.C. 1732) covered far more than traditional profit-making activity.

Congress was concerned about the breadth of the Advisory Committee proposal. The House Committee believed that there were insufficient guarantees of reliability in records made in the course of activities "falling outside the scope of business activities as that term is broadly defined in 28 U.S.C. 1732." Therefore, the version of Rule 803(6) adopted by Congress covers records "kept in the course of a regularly conducted business activity." "Business" is defined as including "business, institution, association, profession, occupations, and calling of every kind, whether or not conducted for profit."

In the end, there is probably not much difference between the Advisory Committee's proposed Rule 803(6) and the rule ultimately adopted. Whether the term "business" is excised from the language of the rule, or whether it is defined so broadly as to cover all regularly conducted activity, is probably of little moment. Nonetheless, it is confusing to read the Advisory Committee Note and then to look at the rule. The note should be read with the understanding that the Advisory Committee's push to liberalize the hearsay exception was tempered, at least somewhat, by Congress.

[5] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

Subdivision (4) was approved as submitted by the Court, with the understanding that it was not intended in any way adversely to affect substantive privilege laws or any privilege rules which might be adopted.

Subdivision (5) was amended to include a memorandum of statements adopted by a witness as well as those made by him, a treatment consistent with the Jencks Act, 18 U.S.C. 3500. Otherwise, the Rule was approved as submitted by the Court, with the understanding that a memorandum or report, although barred under this Rule, would nonetheless be admissible if it came within another hearsay exception. Moreover, the same principle was deemed applicable to all the hearsay rules.

Subdivision (6) of the Court Rule permitted a record made "in the course of a regularly conducted activity" to be admissible in certain circumstances. The Subcommittee believed there were insufficient guarantees of reliability in records made in the course of activities falling outside the scope of "business" activities as that term is broadly defined in 28 U.S.C. 17322. Moreover, the Subcommittee concluded that the additional requirement of Section 1732 that it must have been the regular practice of a business to make the record is a necessary further assurance of its trustworthiness. The Rule was accordingly redrafted to incorporate these limitations.

Subdivision (7) was amended to reflect the Subcommittee's action with respect to subdivision (6).

Subdivision (8) was approved in substance as submitted by the Court, with the understanding that evaluations or opinions contained in public reports would not be admissible, and intending that the term "factual findings" should be strictly construed.

In subdivision (13) the Subcommittee intends that the phrase "Statements of fact concerning personal or family history" be read to include the specific types of such statements enumerated in subdivision (11).

[6] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

Rule 803(3) was approved in the form submitted by the Court to Congress. However, the Committee intends that the Rule be construed to limit the doctrine of Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Hillmon, 145 U.S. 285, 295-300 (1892) , so as to render statements of intent by a declarant admissible only to prove his future conduct, not the future conduct of another person.

After giving particular attention to the question of physical examination made solely to enable a physician to testify, the Committee approved Rule 803(4) as submitted to Congress, with the understanding that it is not intended in any way to adversely affect present privilege rules or those subsequently adopted.

Rule 803(5) as submitted by the Court permitted the reading into evidence of a memorandum or record concerning a matter about which a witness once had knowledge but now has insufficient recollection to enable him to testify accurately and fully, "shown to have been made when the matter was fresh in his memory and to reflect that knowledge correctly." The Committee amended this Rule to add the words "or adopted by the witness" after the phrase "shown to have been made," a treatment consistent with the definition of "statement" in the Jencks Act, 18 U.S.C. 3500. Moreover, it is the Committee's understanding that a memorandum or report, although barred under this Rule, would nonetheless be admissible if it came within another hearsay exception. This last stated principle is deemed applicable to all the hearsay rules.

Rule 803(6) as submitted by the Court permitted a record made "in the course of a regularly conducted activity" to be admissible in certain circumstances. The Committee believed there were insufficient guarantees of reliability in records made in the course of activities falling outside the scope of "business" activities as that term is broadly defined in 28 U.S.C. 1732. Moreover, the Committee concluded that the additional requirement of Section 1732 that it must have been the regular practice of a business to make the record is a necessary further assurance of its trustworthiness. The Committee accordingly amended the Rule to incorporate these limitations.

Rule 803(7) as submitted by the Court concerned the absence of entry in the records of a "regularly conducted activity." The Committee amended this Rule to conform with its action with respect to Rule 803(6).

The Committee approved Rule 803(8) without substantive change from the form in which it was submitted by the Court. The Committee intends that the phrase "factual findings" be strictly construed and that evaluations or opinions contained in public reports shall not be admissible under this Rule.

The Committee approved this Rule [803(13)] in the form submitted by the Court, intending that the phrase "Statements of fact concerning personal or family history" be read to include the specific types of such statements enumerated in Rule 803(11).

[7] Report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary

The House approved this rule [803(4)] as it was submitted by the Supreme Court "with the understanding that it is not intended in any way to adversely affect present privilege rules." We also approve this rule, and we would point out with respect to the question of its relation to privileges, it must be read in conjunction with rule 35 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure which provides that whenever the physical or mental condition of a party (plaintiff or defendant) is in controversy, the court may require him to submit to an examination by a physician. It is these examinations which will normally be admitted under this exception.

Rule 803(5) as submitted by the Court permitted the reading into evidence of a memorandum or record concerning a matter about which a witness once had knowledge but now has insufficient recollection to enable him to testify accurately and fully, "shown to have been made when the matter was fresh in his memory and to reflect that knowledge correctly." The House amended the rule to add the words "or adopted by the witness" after the phrase "shown to have been made," language parallel to the Jencks Act.

The committee accepts the House amendment with the understanding and belief that it was not intended to narrow the scope of applicability of the rule. In fact, we understand it to clarify the rule's applicability to a memorandum adopted by the witness as well as one made by him. While the rule as submitted by the Court was silent on the question of who made the memorandum, we view the House amendment as a helpful clarification, noting, however, that the Advisory Committee's note to this rule suggests that the important thing is the accuracy of the memorandum rather than who made it.

The committee does not view the House amendment as precluding admissibility in situations in which multiple participants were involved.

When the verifying witness has not prepared the report, but merely examined it and found it accurate, he has adopted the report, and it is therefore admissible. The rule should also be interpreted to cover other situations involving multiple participants, e.g., employer dictating to secretary, secretary making memorandum at direction of employer, or information being passed along a chain of persons, as in Curtis v. Bradley.

The committee also accepts the understanding of the House that a memorandum or report, although barred under this rule, would nonetheless be admissible if it came within another hearsay exception. We consider this principle to be applicable to all the hearsay rules.

[Footnotes deleted.]

...

Rule 803(6) as submitted by the Supreme Court permitted a record made in the course of a regularly conducted activity to be admissible in certain circumstances. This rule constituted a broadening of the traditional business records hearsay exception which has been long advocated by scholars and judges active in the law of evidence.

The House felt there were insufficient guarantees of reliability of records not within a broadly defined business records exception. We disagree. Even under the House definition of "business" including profession, occupation, and "calling of every kind," the records of many regularly conducted activities will, or may be, excluded from evidence. Under the principle of ejusdem generis, the intent of "calling of every kind" would seem to be related to work-related endeavors -- e.g., butcher, baker, artist, etc.

Thus, it appears that the records of many institutions or groups might not be admissible under the House amendments. For example, schools, churches, and hospitals will not normally be considered businesses within the definition. Yet, these are groups which keep financial and other records on a regular basis in a manner similar to business enterprises. We believe these records are of equivalent trustworthiness and should be admitted into evidence.

Three states, which have recently codified their evidence rules, have adopted the Supreme Court version of rule 803(6), providing for admission of memoranda of a "regularly conducted activity." None adopted the words "business activity" used in the House amendment.

Therefore, the committee deleted the word "business" as it appears before the word "activity." The last sentence then is unnecessary and was also deleted.

It is the understanding of the committee that the use of the phrase "person with knowledge" is not intended to imply that the party seeking to introduce the memorandum, report, record, or data compilation must be able to produce, or even identify, the specific individual upon whose first-hand knowledge the memorandum, report, record or data compilation was based. A sufficient foundation for the introduction of such evidence will be laid if the party seeking to introduce the evidence is able to show that it was the regular practice of the activity to base such memorandums, reports, records, or data compilations upon a transmission from a person with knowledge, e.g., in the case of the content of a shipment of goods, upon a report from the company's receiving agent or in the case of a computer printout, upon a report from the company's computer programmer or one who has knowledge of the particular record system. In short, the scope of the phrase "person with knowledge" is meant to be coterminous with the custodian of the evidence or other qualified witness. The committee believes this represents the desired rule in light of the complex nature of modern business organizations.

The House approved rule 803(8), as submitted by the Supreme Court, with one substantive change. It excluded from the hearsay exception reports containing matters observed by police officers and other law enforcement personnel in criminal cases. Ostensibly, the reason for this exclusion is that observations by police officers at the scene of the crime or the apprehension of the defendant are not as reliable as observations by public officials in other cases because of the adversarial nature of the confrontation between the police and the defendant in criminal cases.

The committee accepts the House's decision to exclude such recorded observations where the police officer is available to testify in court about his observation. However, where he is unavailable as unavailability is defined in rule 804(a)(4) and (a)(5), the report should be admitted as the best available evidence. Accordingly, the committee has amended rule 803(8) to refer to the provision of rule 804(b)(5), which allows the admission of such reports, records or other statements where the police officer or other law enforcement officer is unavailable because of death, then existing physical or mental illness or infirmity, or not being successfully subject to legal process. [Latter rule deleted by Conferees. --Ed.]

The House Judiciary Committee report contained a statement of intent that "the phrase 'factual findings' in subdivision (c) be strictly construed and that evaluations or opinions contained in public reports shall not be admissible under this rule." The committee takes strong exception to this limiting understanding of the application of the rule. We do not think it reflects an understanding of the intended operation of the rule as explained in the Advisory Committee notes to this subsection. The Advisory Committee notes on subsection (c) of this subdivision point out that various kinds of evaluative reports are now admissible under Federal statutes. 7 U.S.C. § 78, findings of Secretary of Agriculture prima facie evidence of true grade of grain; 42 U.S.C. § 269(b), bill of health by appropriate official prima facie evidence of vessel's sanitary history and condition and compliance with regulations. These statutory exceptions to the hearsay rule are preserved. Rule 802. The willingness of Congress to recognize these and other such evaluative reports provides a helpful guide in determining the kind of reports which are intended to be admissible under this rule. We think the restrictive interpretation of the House overlooks the fact that while the Advisory Committee assumes admissibility in the first instance of evaluative reports, they are not admissible if, as the rule states, "the sources of information or other circumstances indicate lack of trustworthiness."

The Advisory Committee explains the factors to be considered:

> ...
>
> Factors which may be [of] assistance in passing upon the admissibility of evaluative reports include: (1) the timeliness of the investigation, McCormick, Can the Courts Make Wider Use of Reports of Official Investigations? 42 Iowa L. Rev. 363 (1957); (2) the special skill or experience of the official, id.; (3) whether a hearing was held and the level at which conducted. Franklin v. Skelly Oil Co., 141 F.2d 568 (10th Cir. 1944) ; (4) possible motivation problems suggested by Palmer v. Hoffman, 318 U.S. 109, 63 S. Ct. 477, 87 L. Ed. 645 (1943) . Others no doubt could be added.
>
> ...

The committee concludes that the language of the rule together with the explanation provided by the Advisory Committee furnish sufficient guidance on the admissibility of evaluative reports.

[8] Report of the House and Senate Conferees

Rule 803 defines when hearsay statements are admissible in evidence even though the declarant is available as a witness. The Senate amendments make three changes in this rule.

The House bill provides in subsection (6) that records of a regularly conducted "business" activity qualify for admission into evidence as an exception to the hearsay rule. "Business" is defined as including "business, profession, occupation and calling of every kind." The Senate amendment drops the requirement that the records be those of a "business" activity and eliminates the definition of "business." The Senate amendment provides that records are admissible if they are records of a regularly conducted "activity."

The Conference adopts the House provision that the records must be those of a regularly conducted "business" activity. The Conferees changed the definition of "business" contained in the House provision in order to make it clear that the records of institutions and associations like schools, churches and hospitals are admissible under this provision. The records of public schools and hospitals are also covered by Rule 803(8), which deals with public records and reports.

The Senate amendment adds language, not contained in the House bill, that refers to another rule that was added by the Senate in another amendment (Rule 804(b)(5) -- Criminal law enforcement records and reports, not enacted):

> In view of its action on Rules 804(b)(5) (Criminal law enforcement records and reports, not enacted), the Conference does not adopt the Senate amendment and restores the bill to the House version.

[9] Citations to Hearings and Debates

Letter from Hon. Clifford O'Sullivan to Hon. James Harvey, April 4, 1973, in Supp. to Hearings on Proposed Rules of Evidence Before the Subcomm. on Criminal Justice of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 1st Sess., at 10-11 (1973).

Letter from George A. Spiegelberg to Herbert E. Hoffman, May 7, 1973, and accompanying material, in Supp. to Hearings on Proposed Rules of Evidence Before the Subcomm. on Criminal Justice of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 1st Sess., at 68-71 (1973).

Letter from James F. Schaeffer to Hon. William L. Hungate, June 26, 1973, and accompanying material, in Supp. to Hearings on Proposed Rules of Evidence Before the Subcomm. on Criminal Justice of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 1st Sess., at 134-37 (1973).

Letter from Hon. Clifford O'Sullivan to Hon. William L. Hungate, July 3, 1973, in Supp. to Hearings on Proposed Rules of Evidence Before the Subcomm. on Criminal Justice of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 1st Sess., at 188-89 (1973).

Letter from James F. Schaeffer to Hon. William L. Hungate, July 18, 1973, and accompanying material, in Supp. to Hearings on Proposed Rules of Evidence Before the Subcomm. on Criminal Justice of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 1st Sess., at 212-14 (1973).

Debate in the House of Representatives, 120 Cong. Rec. H563-H567 (daily ed. February 6, 1974).

Letter from Hon. Roszel C. Thomsen to Hon. James O. Eastland, May 22, 1974, and accompanying material, in Hearings on H.R. 5463 (Federal Rules of Evidence) Before the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 2d Sess., at 53-54, 66-68 (1974).

Prepared Statement of W. Vincent Rakestraw, June 5, 1974, in Hearings on H.R. 5463 (Federal Rules of Evidence) Before the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 2d Sess., at 109, 111, 113-14 (1974).

Testimony of Albert E. Jenner, June 5, 1974, Hearings on H.R. 5463 (Federal Rules of Evidence) Before the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 2d Sess., at 210-12 (1974).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
Supp. To CHAPTER 803 RULE 803

4-803 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 803, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 803. Hearsay Exceptions; Availability of Declarant Immaterial	Rule 803. Exceptions to the Rule Against Hearsay -- Regardless of Whether the

	Declarant Is Available as a Witness
The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule, even though the declarant is available as a witness:	The following are not excluded by the rule against hearsay, regardless of whether the declarant is available as a witness:
(1) Present sense impres	(1)	Present Sense Impres

	sion. A statement describing or explaining an event or condition made while the declarant was perceiving the event or condition, or immediately thereafter.		sion. A statement describing or explaining an event or condition, made while or immediately after the declarant perceived it.
(2)	Excited utterance. A state	(2)	Excited Utterance. A statemen men t re- lat- ing to a start ling even t or con- di- tion mad e whil e the de- clar- ant was un- der the stres s of ex- cite- men t caus ed by the even t or con- di- tion.

			t re- lat- ing to a start ling even t or con- di- tion, mad e whil e the de- clar- ant was un- der the stres s of ex- cite- men t that it caus ed.
(3)	The n ex- ist- ing men tal, emo tion al, or phy	(3)	The n- Ex- ist- ing Men tal, Emo tion- al, or Phy sical con-di-tion. A state men t of the de-clar-ant's then ex-ist-ing state of min d, emo tion, sen-satio n, or phys ical con-di-tion (suc h as in-tent, plan, moti ve, desi gn, men tal feel-ing, pain, and bod-ily healt h), but sical Con di-tion . A state men t of the de-clar-ant's then - ex-ist-ing state of min d (suc h as moti ve, in-tent, or plan) or emo tion-al, sens ory, or phys ical con-di-tion (suc h as men tal feel-ing, pain, or bodnot including a statement of memory or belief to prove the fact remembered or believed unless it relates to the execution, revocation, identification, or terms of declarant's will.		ily health), but not including a statement of memory or belief to prove the fact remembered or believed unless it relates to the validity or terms of the declarant's will.

(4)	Statements	(4)	Statement

for purposes of medical diagnosis or treatment. Statements made for purposes of medical diagnosis or treatment and describing medical history, or past or present symptoms, pain, or sensations, or the

Made for Medical Diagnosis or Treatment. A statement that:

inception
or general char acter
of
the caus e or ex-terna
l sour ce there
of
insofar as reason-ably per-tin-ent to diagnos is or treat men
t.

(A) is made for -- and is reasonably pertinent to -- medical diagnosis or treatment; and

		(B)	describes medical history; past or present symptoms or sensations; their inception; or their general cause.
(5) Recorded recollection. A memorandum or re-		(5)	Recorded Recollection. A record that:

cord concerning a matter about which a witness once had knowledge but now has insufficient recollection to enable the witness to testify fully and accurately, shown to have been made or adopted by the witness whe n the matter was fresh

in the witness'
me mor
y and to reflect that kno wled ge correctl
y. If admitted,
the me moran-dum
or record may be read into evid ence but may not itself be received as an exhibit unless offered by an adverse party.

(A) is on a matter the witness once knew about but now cannot recall well enough to testify fully and accurately

;

(B) was made or adopted by the witness when the matter was fresh in the witness's memory; and

(C) accurately reflects the witness's knowledge.

If admitted, the record may be read into evidence but may be received as an exhibit only if offered by an adverse party.

(6) Records of regularly conducted activity. A memorandum, report, record, or data compilation, in any

(6) Records of a Regularly Conducted Activity. A record of an act, event, condition, opinion, or diaform, of acts, events, conditions, opinions, or diagnoses, made at or near the time by, or from information transmitted by, a person with knowledge, if kept in the course of a regularly conducgnosis if:

ted busi ness activ ity, and if it was the reg- ular pract ice of that busi ness activ ity to mak e the me mor- an- dum , re- port, re- cord or data com pila- tion, all as sho wn by the testi mon y of the cus- todi- an or other qual ified wit- ness, or by cer- tific- atio n that com plies with Rule 902(11), Rule 902(12), or a stat- ute per- mit- ting cer- tific- atio n, un- less the sour ce of in- form atio n or the met hod or cir- cum stan ces of prepar-atio n indicate lack of trust worthi-ness.

The term
"bus
iness" as used in this para grap h includ es busi ness,
insti-tution, associatio n, profession, oc-cupati on,
and calling
of ever y kind
,

whether or not conducted for profit.

(A) the record was made at or near the time by -- or from information transmitted by -- someone with knowledge;

(B) the record was kept in the course of a regularl y conducted activity of a business, organization, occupation, or calling, whether or not for profit;

(C) making the record was a regular practice of that activity;

(D) all these conditions are shown by the testimony of the custodian or another qualified witness, or by a certification that complies with Rule 902(11) or (12) or with a statute permitting certification; and

(E) neither the source of information nor the method or circumstances of preparation indicate a lack of trustworthiness.

(7) Absence of entry in records kept in accordance with the provisions of paragraph	(7)	Absence of a Record of a Regularly Conducted Activity. Evidence that a matter is not

(6). Evidence that a matter is not included in the memoranda reports, records, or data compilations, in any form, kept in accordance with the provisions of paragraph (6), to prove the nonoccurrenc in-clud ed in a re-cord de-scrib ed in para grap h (6) if:

e or none xist- ence of the mat- ter, if the mat- ter was of a kind of whic h a me mor- an- dum , re- port, re- cord , or data com pila- tion was reg- ularl y mad e and pre- serv ed, un- less the sour ces of in- form atio n or other circumstances indicate lack of trustworthiness.

(A) the evidence is admitted to prove that the matter did not occur or exist;

(B) a record was regularly kept for a matter of that kind ; and

(C) neither the possible source of the information nor other circumstances indicate a lack of trustworthiness.

(8) Public records and reports. Records, reports, statements, or data

(8) Public Records. A record or statement of a public office if:

com pilations
, in any form
, of public
offices
or agen cies, setting forth (A)
the activ ities
of
the
office
or agen cy,
or (B) matters observ ed pur-su-ant
to duty impose d by law as to whic h matters
there was a duty to report, excluding, however, in criminal cases matters observed by police officers and other law enforcement personnel, or (C) in civil actions and proceedings and agai nst the Gov ern- men t in crim inal case s, fac- tual find- ings res- ult- ing from an in- vest- iga- tion mad e pur- su- ant to au- thor- ity gran ted by law, un- less the sour ces of in- form atio n or oth- er cir- cum stances indicate lack of trustworthiness.

(A) it sets out:

(i) the office's activities;

(ii) a matter observed while under a legal duty to report, but not including, in a criminal case, a matter observed by law-enforcement personnel; or

(iii) in a civil case or against the government in a criminal case, factual findings from a legally authorized investigation; and

(B) neither the source of information nor other circumstances indicate a lack of trust worthiness.

(9) Records of vital statistics. Records or data compilations, in any form, of births, fetal deaths, deaths, or marriages, if the report thereof was made to a public office pursuant	(9)	Public Records of Vital Statistics. A record of a birth, death, or marriage, if reported to a public office in accordance with a legal duty.

to requirements of law.

(10) Absence of public record or entry. To prove the absence of a record, report, statement, or data compilation, in any form, or the nonoccurrence or nonexistence of a matter	(10)	Absence of a Public Record. Testimony -- or a certification under Rule 902 -- that a diligent search failed to disclose a public record or statement if the testi of which a record, report, statement, or data compilation, in any form, was regularly made and preserved by a public office or agency, evidence in the form of a certification in accordance with mony or certification is admitted to prove that:

rule 902, or testimony, that diligent search failed to disclose the record, report, statement, or data compilation, or entry.

(A) the record or statement does not exist; or

(B) a matter did not occur or ex- ist, if a pub- lic of- fice reg- ularl y kept a re- cord or state men t for a mat- ter of that kind .

(11) Records of religious organizations. Statements of births, marriages, divorces, deaths, le-

(11) Records of Religious Organizations Concerning Personal or Family History. A statemen gitimac

y, ances-try, relationship
by bloo d or marriage
, or other similar facts
of personal or family history, con-taine d in a reg-ularl
y kept
record of a reli-giou s organization.

t of birth , legitimac
y, ances-try,
marriage
, divorc
e, deat h, relationship
by bloo d or marriage
, or similar facts
of personal or family history, con-taine
d in a reg-ularl
y kept
record of a reli-giou
s organization.

(12) Marriage, baptismal, and similar certificates. Statements of fact contained in a certificate that the maker performed a marriage or other ceremony or administered a sacrament,	(12)	Certificates of Marriage, Baptism, and Similar Ceremonies. A statement of fact contained in a certificate:

made by a clergyman, public official, or other person authorized by the rules or practices of a religious organization or by law to perform the act certified, and purporting to have been issued at the time of the act or within a reasonable time thereafter.

(A) made by a person who is authorized by a religious organization or by law to perform the act certified;

(B) attesting that the person performed a marriage or similar ceremony or administered a sacrament; and

				(C) purporting to have been issued at the time of the act or within a reasonable time after it.
(13) Family records	(13)		Family Records

cords. Statements of fact concerning personal or family history contained in family Bibles, genealogies, charts, engravings on rings, inscriptions on family portraits, engravings on urns, cryp	cords. A statement of fact about personal or family history contained in a family record, such as a Bible, genealogy, chart, engraving on a ring, inscription on a portrait, or engraving on an urn ts, or tombstones, or the like.		or burial marker.

(14) Records of documents affecting an interest in property. The record of a document purporting to establish or affect an interest in property, as proof of	(14)	Records of Documents That Affect an Interest in Property. The record of a document that purports to establish or affect an interest in property if:

the content of the original recorded document and its execution and delivery by each person by whom it purports to have been executed, if the record is a record of a public office and an applicable statute authorizes the recording of documents of that kind in that office.

(A) the record is admitted to prove the content of the original recorded document, along with its signing and its delivery by each person who purports to have signed it;

(B) the record is kept in a public office; and

(C) a statute authorizes recording documents of that kind in that office.

(15) Statements in documents affecting an interest in property. A statement contained in a document purporting to establish or affect an interest in property if the matter state	(15)	Statements in Documents That Affect an Interest in Property. A statement contained in a document that purports to establish or affect an interest in property if the matter state d was relevant to the purpose of the document, unless dealings with the property since the document was made have been inconsistent with the truth of the statement or the purport of the document

d was relevant to the document's purpose -- unless later dealings with the property are inconsistent with the truth of the statement or the purport of the document.

nt.
(16) Statements in ancient documents. Statements in a document in existence twenty years or more the authenticity of which is established.	(16)	Statements in Ancient Documents. A statement in a document that is at least 20 years old and whose authenticity is established.
(17) Market reports, commercial publications.	(17)	Market Reports and Similar Commercial Publ

Market quotations, tabulations, lists, directories, or other published compilations, generally used and relied upon by the public or by persons in particular occupations.		ications. Market quotations, lists, directories, or other compilations that are generally relied on by the public or by persons in particular occupations.
(18) Learne	(18)	Statemе

d trea tises . To the ex- tent calle d to the at- ten- tion of an ex- pert wit- ness upo n cros s- ex- ami na- tion or re- lied upo n by the ex- pert wit- ness in dir- ect ex- ami na- tion, state men ts con- taine d in nts in Lear ned Trea tises , Peri odic als, or Pam ph- lets. A state men t con- taine d in a treat ise, peri- odic al, or pam ph- let if:

published treatises, periodicals, or pamphlets on a subject of history, medicine, or other science or art, established as a reliable authority by the testimony or admission of the witness or by other expert testimony or by judicial notice. If admitted, the statements may be read into evidence but may not be received as exhibits.

(A) the statement is called to the attention of an expert witness on cross-examination or relied on by the expert on direct examination; and

(B) the publication is established as a reliable authority by the expert's admission or testimony, by another expert's testimony, or by judicial notice. If admitted, the statement may be read into evidence but not received as an exhibit.

(19) Reputation concerning per-

(19) Reputation Concerning Per- son-al or fam-ily his-tory. Rep uta-tion amo ng me mbe rs of a per-son's fam-ily by bloo d, ad-op-tion, or mar-riage, or amo ng a per-son's as-soci-ates, or in the com mu-nity, con-cerni ng a per-son's birth, ad-op-son-al or Fam ily His-tory. A repu ta-tion amo ng a per-son's fam-ily by bloo d, ad-op-tion, or mar-riage -- or amo ng a per-son's as-soci-ates or in the com mu-nity -- con-cerni ng the per-son's birth, ad-op-tion, le-tion, marriage, divorce, death, legitimacy, relationship by blood, adoption, or marriage, ancestry, or other similar fact of personal or family history.		legitimacy, ancestry, marriage, divorce, death, relationship by blood, adoption, or marriage, or similar facts of personal or family history.

(20) Reputation concerning boundaries	(20)	Reputation Concerning Boundaries

or general history. Reputation in a community, arising before the controversy, as to boundaries of or customs affecting lands in the community, and reputation as to events of general history important	or General History. A reputation in a community -- arising before the controversy -- concerning boundaries of land in the community or customs that affect the land, or concerning general

ant to the community or State or nation in which located.		historical events important to that community, state, or nation.
(21) Reputation as to character. Reputation of a person's character among associates or in the community.	(21)	Reputation Concerning Character. A reputation among a person's associates or in the community concerning the person's character

		ter.
(22) Judgment of previous conviction. Evidence of a final judgment, entered after a trial or upon a plea of guilty (but not upon a plea of nolo contendere), adjudging a person guilty of a crime punish-	(22) Judgment of a Previous Conviction.	Evidence of a final judgment of conviction if:

able by death or imprisonment in excess of one year, to prove any fact essential to sustain the judgment, but not including, when offered by the Government in a criminal prosecution for purposes other than impeachment, judgments against persons other than the accused. The pendency of an appeal may be shown but does not affect admissibility.

(A) the judgment was entered after a trial or guilty plea, but not a nolo contendere plea;

(B) the conviction was for a crime punishable by death or by imprisonment for more than a year;

(C) the evidence is admitted to prov e any fact es- sen- tial to the judg men t; and

(D) whe n offer ed by the pro- secu tor in a crim inal case for a pur- pose oth- er than im- peac hme nt, the judg men t was agai nst the de- fend ant.

The pen- denc

y of an appeal may be shown but does not affect admissibility.

(23) Judgment as to personal, family, or general history, or boundaries. Judgments as proof of matters of personal, family or gen-	(23)	Judgments Involving Personal, Family, or General History or a Boundary. A judgment that is admitted to prove a matter eral history, or boundaries, essential to the judgment, if the same would be provable by evidence of reputation.

of personal, family, or general history, or boundaries, if the matter:

(A) was essential to the judgment; and

(B) could be proved by evidence of reputation.

(24)	[Other exceptions.] [Transferred to Rule 807]	(24)	[Other exceptions.] [Transferred to Rule 807.]

Committee Note

The language of Rule 803 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
Supp. To CHAPTER 803 RULE 803

4-803 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 803.02

Supp. to § 803.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[Go To Main]

[26] Confrontation Clause and Rule 803 Exceptions [Go To Main]

In Davis v. Washington, 547 U.S. 813 (2006) (with the companion case of Hammon v. Indiana), the Court considered the admissibility under Crawford of hearsay statements made by two victims of domestic abuse. One was a report by the victim to a 911 operator, made essentially at the time of the assault. The other was a report made to responding police officers; the defendant was in the home and placed in another room, and the officer obtained, through questioning, the victim's account of the event. The Supreme Court held that the statement to the police officer was testimonial, but the statement to the 911 operator was not. Justice Scalia, writing for the majority, explained as follows:

> Without attempting to produce an exhaustive classification of all conceivable statements -- or even all conceivable statements in response to police interrogation -- as either testimonial or nontestimonial, it suffices to decide the present cases to hold as follows: Statements are nontestimonial when made in the course of police interrogation under circumstances objectively indicating that the primary purpose of the interrogation is to enable police assistance to meet an ongoing emergency. They are testimonial when the circumstances objectively indicate that there is no such ongoing emergency, and that the primary purpose of the interrogation is to establish or prove past events potentially relevant to later criminal prosecution

The Court emphasized the limited nature of its holding. It noted that it was not providing an "exhaustive classification of all conceivable statements -- or even all conceivable statements in response to police interrogation, but rather a resolution of the cases before us and those like them." Among other things, the Court stated that "our holding today makes it unnecessary to consider whether and when statements made to someone other than law enforcement personnel are testimonial." Nor did the Court hold that statements made to 911 operators could never be testimonial; statements made to 911 after an emergency has ended might be testimonial under some circumstances. Finally, the Court refused to hold that statements to responding police officers would always be testimonial:

> Although we necessarily reject the Indiana Supreme Court's implication that virtually any "initial

> inquiries" at the crime scene will not be testimonial, we do not hold the opposite -- that no questions at the scene will yield nontestimonial answers. We have already observed of domestic disputes that "[o]fficers called to investigate ... need to know whom they are dealing with in order to assess the situation, the threat to their own safety, and possible danger to the potential victim." Such exigencies may often mean that "initial inquiries" produce nontestimonial statements.

Of course, the Crawford rule applies only to "testimonial" hearsay. What if hearsay admissible under a hearsay exception is not testimonial? In Whorton v. Bockting , 127 S.Ct. 1173 (2007) , the habeas petitioner argued that testimonial hearsay was admitted against him in violation of Crawford. His trial was conducted ten years before Crawford, however, and so the question was whether Crawford applies retroactively to benefit habeas petitioners. Under Supreme Court jurisprudence, a new rule is applicable on habeas only if it is a "watershed" rule that is critical to the truthseeking function of a trial. The Court found that Crawford was a new rule because it overruled Roberts. It further held that Crawford was not essential to the truthseeking function; its analysis on this point is pertinent to whether Roberts retains any vitality with respect to non-testimonial hearsay. The Court declared as follows:

> Crawford overruled Roberts because Roberts was inconsistent with the original understanding of the meaning of the Confrontation Clause, not because the Court reached the conclusion that the overall effect of the Crawford rule would be to improve the accuracy of fact finding in criminal trials. Indeed, in Crawford we recognized that even under the Roberts rule, this Court had never specifically approved the introduction of testimonial hearsay statements. Accordingly, it is not surprising that the overall effect of Crawford with regard to the accuracy of fact-finding in criminal cases is not easy to assess.
>
> With respect to testimonial out-of-court statements, Crawford is more restrictive than was Roberts, and this may improve the accuracy of fact-finding in some criminal cases. Specifically, under Roberts, there may have been cases in which courts erroneously determined that testimonial statements were reliable. But see 418 F.3d at 1058 (O'Scannlain, J., dissenting from denial of rehearing en banc) (observing that it is unlikely that this occurred "in anything but the exceptional case"). But whatever improvement in reliability Crawford produced in this respect must be considered together with Crawford's elimination of Confrontation Clause protection against the admission of unreliable out-of-court nontestimonial statements. Under Roberts, an out-of-court nontestimonial statement not subject to prior cross-examination could not be admitted without a judicial determination regarding reliability. Under Crawford, on the other hand, the Confrontation Clause has no application to such statements and therefore permits their admission even if they lack indicia of reliability. (Emphasis added)

This amounts to a holding that Roberts has been overruled even as to non-testimonial hearsay. One of the main reasons that Crawford is not retroactive (the holding) is that it is not essential to the accuracy of a verdict. And one of the reasons Crawford is not essential to accuracy is that, with respect to non-testimonial statements, Crawford conflicts with accurate factfinding because it lifts all constitutional reliability requirements imposed by Roberts. So after Whorton, if hearsay is not testimonial, the Confrontation Clause provides no limitation on its admission. Put another way, if the hearsay is not testimonial, then whatever reliability guarantees must be met are provided by the hearsay rule and its exceptions, not by the Constitution.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
Supp. To CHAPTER 803 RULE 803

4-803 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 803.03

Supp. to § 803.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[1] Rule 803(1) -- Present Sense Impression [Go To Main]

[a] Rule 803(1) -- Constitutional Concerns

United States v. Danford, 435 F.3d 682 (7th Cir. 2005) : The defendant was convicted of insurance fraud after staging a fake robbery of his jewelry store. At trial, one of the employees testified to a statement made by the store manager, indicating that the defendant had just asked the manager how to disarm the store alarm. The store manager's statement was made well before the robbery occurred. Rejecting the argument that the store manager's statement was testimonial under Crawford v. Washington, the Court stated that "the conversation between [the witness] and the store manager is more akin to a casual remark than it is to testimony in the Crawford-sense. Accordingly, we hold that the district court did not err in admitting this testimony under Fed.R.Evid. 803(1), the present-sense impression exception to the hearsay rule."

[g] Rule 803(1) -- Reports of Conversations

Schindler v. Seiler, 474 F.3d 1008 (7th Cir. 2007) : Affirming summary judgment for the defendant in a defamation action by a neurosurgeon who alleged that the defendant accused him of paralyzing patients, the Court held that testimony by the plaintiff, that another doctor told him that the defendant had said the plaintiff was a bad doctor who had paralyzed four patients, was inadmissible hearsay. Although statements that constitute slander are not hearsay, the doctor's out-of-court assertion that the defendant made the statement was hearsay. Because the statement was "a calculated narration, made for a specific reason," it was not admissible as a present sense impression. The Court observed that a declarant "who deliberates about what to say or provides statements for a particular reason creates the possibility that the statements are not contemporaneous, and, more likely, are calculated interpretations of events rather than near simultaneous perceptions."

[j] Rule 803(1) -- Timing

United States v. Shoup, 476 F.3d 38 (1st Cir. 2007) : Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court held there was no plain error in the admission of a 911 call reporting that the defendant had a gun, which was made immediately after the caller observed the defendant with the gun. "[S]ince the time-lapse delimitation on an 'excited utterance' or a 'present sense impression' is by no means a bright-line test, ... Shoup cannot demonstrate that the district court would have committed 'obvious error' had it determined that the 911 call was admissible under these two hearsay exceptions." By failing to make a contemporaneous objection, the defendant "precluded (thus relieved) the government from presenting its best evidence as to the time-lapse issue, and the district court from making the attendant findings of fact. For these reasons, we perceive no plain error."

United States v. Green, 556 F.3d 151 (3d Cir. 2009) : In a prosecution for distribution of cocaine base, the confidential informant involved in the controlled transaction testified as the sole defense witness, denying that the defendant was the seller. After the CI was extensively cross-examined by the government and was excused, a DEA agent was permitted to introduce as substantive evidence a signed statement by the CI, made 50 minutes after the transaction, after he was brought back to DEA offices and debriefed by case agents, in which he attested that it was the defendant who sold him the drugs. The statement was admitted as a present-sense impression, and no limiting instruction was given. The Court vacated the conviction because of error in admitting the statement, as it was not sufficiently contemporaneous to satisfy the requirements of Rule 803(1), in addition to having been made after the declarant had been questioned by DEA agents. In United States v. Green, 541 F.3d 176 (3d Cir. 2008) , a prosecution for narcotics trafficking, the confidential informant who had participated in the controlled buy testified for the defense that the individual depicted on the video recording of the transaction was not the defendant. The government then introduced the CI's signed statement made about 50 minutes after the transaction, in which he attested that it was the defendant who sold him the drugs. Vacating the conviction, the Court held it was error to admit the statement as a present-sense impression, since the time lapse prevented the statement from satisfying the requirement of substantial contemporaneity. Furthermore, the statement had been made after questioning by DEA agents, so it was made after being expressly asked to reflect on the events in question, which fatally disqualified it for admission as a present-sense impression.

United States v. Davis, 577 F.3d 660 (6th Cir. 2009) : Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court held that the contents of a woman's 911 call, in which she recited the license number, make, and model of the car, were admissible as present sense impressions. The woman made the 911 call within 30 seconds to a minute after seeing a man she recognized as the defendant riding in a vehicle holding a gun, so the call was made "immediately after" the event and was "not distinguishable from one that was contemporaneous with the event itself." In United States v. Penney, 576 F.3d 297 (6th Cir. 2009) , the Court affirmed convictions for felon firearm possession and attempting to kill a federal agent, which arose from an incident in which the defendant shot an agent during execution of a search warrant. It found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of the defendant's statement after his arrest that "you guys don't understand. I thought I was being robbed." The statement was made 10-15 minutes after the incident was over and after EMT vehicles had arrived with sirens blaring, so the defendant "had to have known ... that ... he had shot somebody, and most likely that that was a police officer." The fact that the statement was not made while the defendant was perceiving the events and when he had time and motive to "contrive or misrepresent" meant the statement was unreliable and inadmissible as a present sense impression.

[2] Rule 803(2) -- Excited Utterance [Go To Main]

[a] Rule 803(2) -- Accidents

Biegas v. Quickway Carriers, Inc., 573 F.3d 365 (6th Cir. 2009) : The plaintiff's decedent was killed when a tractor-trailer sideswiped his truck after he stopped it on the shoulder and was inspecting the load. The Court reversed partial summary judgment granted for the defendant on comparative negligence, but found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the passenger accompanying the decedent had within minutes following the accident told other witnesses who had stopped that he had told the decedent prior to the accident to "get out of the road, he was going to get hit." In the Court's view, what the declarant told the decedent was not hearsay because it "was not offered to prove that [the decedent] was in fact standing in the travel lane at the time of the accident, but rather to prove that [he] had been put on notice that he was in imminent danger and should have been aware of the risk he faced." When the declarant recounted this warning to the other witnesses, his statement was admissible as an excited utterance, since he had just witnessed a terrible accident that dismembered and killed his friend and employer and his statement was made before there was an opportunity to fabricate or misrepresent and while he was still under the stress of the excitement.

Brunsting v. Lutsen Mts. Corp., 601 F.3d 813 (8th Cir. 2010) : Reversing summary judgment against a skier who alleged that negligence caused him to collide with a tree, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to exclude a statement by a resort employee that she saw the plaintiff stumble on a stump, then fall into a tree and hit his head. Although the statement was made some time after the accident itself, it was contemporaneous with the "singular startling event," which included the declarant's rushing to the scene and seeing the plaintiff near death, with others trying to stabilize him until medical assistance arrived. The Court also found that the Judge gave inadequate weight to the employee's deposition in which she said that she was "just frantic," "afraid" to go near the injured skier, and "scared" to get too close. Further, the employee's status as an employee "bolsters the conclusion that her immediate statements were not the product of reflective thought," and that although the statement was not an agent's admission, "the relationship is still notable in our analysis." Finally, the inconsistencies between the statement, made on the day of the accident, and statements made two months and four years later "under the tutelage of the [defendants] ... enhance the veracity and credibility of the statements she made the day of the accident."

[b] Rule 803(2) -- Assault Victims

United States v. Rodriguez-Berrios, 573 F.3d 55 (1st Cir. 2009) : The defendant was convicted for the fatal carjacking of his ex-wife, after a witness testified that the victim told her that bruises on her arm were caused by the defendant and that "she was afraid, afraid of him." On appeal, the government "correctly concede[d]" that the statements were improperly admitted as excited utterances, as there was no evidence of a startling event occurring any time near when the statements were made. Testimony by the victim's mother that the victim accused the defendant of stalking her was likewise improperly admitted under the excited utterance exception. The Court nonetheless held that the admissible evidence against the defendant was sufficient, and affirmed.

United States v. Jennings, 496 F.3d 344 (4th Cir. 2007) : Affirming a conviction for abusive sexual contact with a 13-year-old, which arose from groping on a transcontinental flight, the Court found no error in the admission of testimony regarding statements the victim made five minutes after the defendant left the seat beside her and again after deplaning. In each case the victim was in a state of shock, anger, and confusion, and she broke down crying and became hysterical as she began relating the events that had occurred. Although the core acts occurred an hour or two before the deplaning, the victim was still being pursued by the defendant at the time she made her statements.

United States v. Hadley, 431 F.3d 484 (6th Cir. 2005) : In a felon firearm possession prosecution, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of statements made by the defendant's wife to police, when they responded to a domestic disturbance call, that the defendant "has a gun." There was sufficient evidence of a startling event, because the 911 dispatcher could hear the incident in progress when receiving the wife's call. There was also sufficient evidence that the wife made her statement under the influence of the startling event: officers responded within two minutes of receiving the report from the dispatcher, at which point the wife was in a state of panic, crying and shaking. The Court rejected the defendant's argument that the hearsay should be excluded as unreliable because the wife subsequently repudiated her statement. It explained that "a statement that satisfies all of the elements of our test for excited utterances meets the threshold for admissibility under Rule 803(2), even though its reliability might be subject to challenge on such grounds as inconsistency with subsequent statements or the speaker's motive to fabricate." Thus, any challenges to the reliability of the hearsay went to weight and not admissibility.

United States v. DeMarce, 564 F.3d 989 (8th Cir. 2009) : The defendant was convicted for attempted aggravated sexual abuse of his 11-year-old niece after he attempted to rape her in his car. When he dropped her off at home

following the incident, she first lied about the source of her injuries, but a few minutes later told the true story, which her mother related at trial. Affirming, the Court held that admission of most of the testimony was error, but harmless. It rejected the government's argument that the testimony was admissible to explain why the mother contacted the police, because the testimony was not restricted at trial to this purpose and was admitted for its truth. It held that the daughter's statement was inadmissible as an excited utterance because the fact that she first fabricated a statement before correcting it demonstrated a level of reflection inconsistent with an excited utterance. In United States v. Bercier, 506 F.3d 625 (8th Cir. 2007) , although it reversed a defendant's convictions for sexual abuse of his sister's 18-year-old foster daughter, the Court held there was no error in admitting the victim's statements to her boyfriend as excited utterances, as they were made 15-20 minutes after the alleged assault while the victim was shaking and crying uncontrollably. In United States v. Wilcox, 487 F.3d 1163 (8th Cir. 2007) , the court affirmed a conviction for sexual abuse of a minor, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting hearsay statements of the victim as excited utterances. One set of statements were made in a call to the police department. The Court found that the victim had called the police at her first opportunity and that only a brief period of time passed between the abuse and her call to the police. Her continuous excitement was shown in the recording of the call: she was crying and her voice sounded noticeably upset. A second set of statements was made by the victim to her mother. The Court found it was reasonable to conclude these statements were made shortly after the call to the police, that her demeanor evidenced stress and excitement, and that no appreciable amount of time had passed since the startling event of sexual abuse.

United States v. Smith, 606 F.3d 1270 (10th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a sexual assault conviction, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission, as an excited utterance, of the victim's statement, "Help me, help me. He raped me." Although the statement was made two hours after the assault, it was made regarding a stressful event to the first person encountered immediately after the victim had escaped from the defendant and she was still under obvious stress. In United States v. Pursley, 577 F.3d 1204 (10th Cir. 2009) , the victim in a witness-retaliation case had testified against the defendant on tax-fraud charges and, after testifying, was brutally beaten in a cell at the courthouse. A federal marshal was permitted to testify that, while being transported to the hospital after the beating, the victim said that one assailant yelled as he entered the cell that the victim had just entered, and the defendant responded "well, you know what to do." Finding that the overall time between the assault and the statement was one hour, and that for over half of that time the victim was in close quarters with his assailants, the Court concluded that making the statement within 20 to 30 minutes of the end of his ordeal was "well within the temporal range of trauma contemplated by Rule 803(2)." Other factors relevant to a finding that the victim had been continually excited from the time he left the cell until he made the statement included: the victim testified that he was in considerable pain; the marshal testified that the victim seemed excited, nervous, and unable to stop moving; and there was "no intervening event ... that could have diluted the effect of the event's trauma." The Court rejected an argument that the victim might have made the statement in contemplation of a lawsuit against the government for failing to protect him: "[a]t the very least, we find dubious the notion that any such thoughts of a payday would have been sufficiently strong and pervasive to dispel [the victim's] stress occasioned by the assault," and "we question whether the prospect of a lawsuit against the Marshals Service would have provided [the victim] with a motive to lie about who perpetrated the assault." In United States v. Ledford, 443 F.3d 702 (10th Cir. 2005) , in a felon firearm prosecution, the Court found no error in admitting a statement made by the defendant's wife to an officer responding to a domestic violence call. The wife stated that she was afraid that the defendant might kill her for calling the police -- then she led the officer to a bedroom and gave him a handgun from a dresser drawer. The Court found that the wife's statement, if offered for its truth, was admissible as an excited utterance. The domestic dispute was a startling event, and there was also "a future trigger for startling," i.e., that the defendant's threat was contingent on calling the police. The statement to the officer was sufficiently close to both the domestic violence (35 minutes) and the startling event of reporting to the police and triggering the defendant's threat (immediate) to be considered under the influence of both events.

[d] Rule 803(2) -- Constitutional Concerns

Davis v. Washington, 547 U.S. 813 (2006) : The Supreme Court considered the admissibility under Crawford v. Washington of hearsay statements offered as excited utterances that had been made by victims of domestic abuse in two cases. One was a report by the victim to a 911 operator, made essentially at the time of the assault. The other was a report made to responding police officers; the defendant was in the home and placed in another room, and the officer obtained, through questioning, the victim's account of the event. The Supreme Court held that the statement to the police officer was testimonial, but the statement to the 911 operator was not. Justice Scalia, writing for the majority, explained as follows:

> Without attempting to produce an exhaustive classification of all conceivable statements -- or even all conceivable statements in response to police interrogation -- as either testimonial or nontestimonial, it suffices to decide the present cases to hold as follows: Statements are nontestimonial when made in the course of police interrogation under circumstances objectively indicating that the primary purpose of the interrogation is to enable police assistance to meet an ongoing emergency. They are testimonial when the circumstances objectively indicate that there is no such ongoing emergency, and that the primary purpose of the interrogation is to establish or prove past events potentially relevant to later criminal prosecution

The Court emphasized the narrowness of its opinion. It was not attempting to establishing an all-encompassing test of which statements are testimonial and which are not. The Court did not decide, for example, whether statements made to someone other than law enforcement personnel can be testimonial. It did not even decide that all statements to responding police officers are testimonial and all statements to 911 operators are not. According to the Court, whether a statement is "testimonial" even in these narrow circumstances depends on the facts.

United States v. Arnold, 486 F.3d 177 (6th Cir. 2007) (en banc), rev'g 434 F.3d 396 (vacating 410 F.3d 895 (2005) (see Manual § 803.03[2][d])): In a trial for felon firearm possession, the government introduced evidence that Gordon called 911 and stated that the defendant had threatened her with a gun. After police arrived, Gordon, crying and screaming, again named the defendant. Shortly thereafter the defendant showed up as well, and Gordon became upset and identified the defendant as the man who had threatened her. Affirming, the en banc Court held that Gordon's statements qualified as excited utterances, and all were nontestimonial under Crawford and Davis. Gordon was seeking protection, and questioning by the 911 operator and the police officers was directed at resolving the crisis rather than obtaining evidence for a possible later criminal trial. Because Davis held that the Confrontation Clause is "solely concerned with testimonial hearsay," the Court ceased its pre-Davis practice of applying an Ohio v. Roberts analysis to nontestimonial hearsay; thus, it found no error in the admission of Gordon's statements. Dissenting Judges disagreed with the conclusions that the statements qualified as excited utterances and that they (or, according to two Judges, the statements made in response to police questions) were nontestimonial under Crawford.

United States v. Pursley, 577 F.3d 1204 (10th Cir. 2009) : The victim in a witness-retaliation case had been beaten in a jail cell, and thereafter made statements about the beating to a federal marshal on the way to the hospital. The defendant argued that those statements were testimonial under Crawford v. Washington. The Court found the statements to be admissible under the excited utterance exception, but stated that "an excited utterance is not per se excluded from the Confrontation Clause." The Court found it unnecessary to decide whether the victim's hearsay was testimonial, because even if it was, the victim testified at trial and so the defendant had an opportunity to cross-examine the victim about the statement.

United States v. Brown, 441 F.3d 1330 (11th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a conviction for murder of a federal employee, finding no violation of Crawford v. Washington in the admission of testimony that the defendant's mother had received a phone call, apparently from the defendant, had asked the caller whether he had killed the victim, and after receiving an answer had started crying. The mother's reaction was admitted at trial as an excited utterance. The Court held the mother's statements were not testimonial, as the phone conversation "obviously was not made under examination, was not transcribed in a formal document, and was not made under circumstances leading an objective person to reasonably believe the statement would be available for use at a later trial."

[f] Rule 803(2) -- Foundation

United States v. Arnold, 486 F.3d 177 (6th Cir. 2007) (en banc), rev'g 434 F.3d 396 (vacating 410 F.3d 895 (2005) (see Manual § 803.03[2][m])): In a trial for felon firearm possession, the government introduced evidence that Gordon called 911 and stated that the defendant had threatened her with a gun. After police arrived Gordon, crying and screaming, again named the defendant. Shortly thereafter the defendant showed up as well, and Gordon became upset and identified the defendant as the man who had threatened her. Affirming, the en banc Court held that the evidence showed that the statements were all made sufficiently proximate to the stressful events and while Gordon was still fearful for her own safety. Dissenting Judges contended that the prosecution had not satisfied its burden of proving the foundation, arguing that the only proof of the startling event came from the statements themselves.

United States v. Erickson, 610 F.3d 1049 (8th Cir. 2010) : In a prosecution for assault with a deadly weapon, the Court found that the admission as an excited utterance of a statement to a 911 dispatcher made by a person at the scene was problematic because there was "no way to identify the basis of the statement with any certainty," but any error was harmless.

[k] Rule 803(2) -- Scope of the Rule

United States v. Guthrie, 557 F.3d 243 (6th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for carjacking, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission, as an excited utterance, of a victim's statement to a 911 operator telling police to back off pursuit of the defendant's vehicle in which she was being held or she would be killed. Although the victim's original abduction at gunpoint did not result in her making excited utterances (because she was calm at that time), a second traumatic event occurred when the police came on the scene and a chase resulted; "the initiation of the police chase could have served as a new and independent startling event, sufficient to effectuate the excited utterance hearsay exception."

[m] Rule 803(2) -- Timing

United States v. Shoup, 476 F.3d 38 (1st Cir. 2007) : Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court held there was no plain error in the admission of a 911 call reporting that the defendant had a gun, which was made immediately after the caller observed the defendant with the gun. "[S]ince the time-lapse delimitation on an 'excited utterance' or a 'present sense impression' is by no means a bright-line test, ... Shoup cannot demonstrate that the district court would have committed 'obvious error' had it determined that the 911 call was admissible under these two hearsay exceptions." By failing to make a contemporaneous objection, the defendant "precluded (thus relieved) the government from presenting its best evidence as to the time-lapse issue, and the district court from making the attendant findings of fact. For these reasons, we perceive no plain error."

United States v. Penney, 576 F.3d 297 (6th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions for felon firearm possession and attempting to kill a federal agent, which arose from an incident in which the defendant shot an agent during execution of a search warrant. It found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of the defendant's statement after his arrest that "you guys don't understand. I thought I was being robbed." The statement was made 10-15 minutes after the incident was over and after EMT vehicles had arrived with sirens blaring, so the defendant "had to have known ... that ... he had shot somebody, and most likely that that was a police officer." The fact that the defendant had time and motive to "contrive or misrepresent" meant the statement was unreliable and inadmissible as an excited utterance.

United States v. McPike, 512 F.3d 1052 (8th Cir. 2008) : After the defendant was arrested, he had a telephone conversation from the jail with a woman in which she indicated that he had taken the firearm to his girlfriend's home. Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit the woman's statement as an excited utterance. Although she was "crying" and "hysterical" during the conversation, the Court noted that the government "failed to identify a startling event or condition that caused Schmidt's stress of excitement, and we reject any argument that she was still under the stress of excitement caused by McPike's arrest three months after the fact." In United States v. Kenyon, 481 F.3d 1054 (8th Cir. 2007) , the court, affirming a conviction for sexual abuse of a child, found it was error (but harmless) to admit hearsay statements made by the alleged victim to a physician's assistant as excited utterances. The statements were made three years after the first alleged instance of abuse and a week after the most recent alleged instance. "Given those lapses of time, we do not think it can reasonably be said that A.L. was still under the stress or excitement caused by a startling event when she made the disputed statements."

United States v. Smith, 606 F.3d 1270 (10th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a sexual assault conviction, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission, as an excited utterance, of the victim's statement, "Help me, help me. He raped me." Although the statement was made two hours after the assault, it was made regarding a stressful event to the first person encountered immediately after the victim had escaped from the defendant and she was still under obvious stress.

[o] Rule 803(2) -- Witnesses to Crimes

United States v. Davis, 577 F.3d 660 (6th Cir. 2009) : Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court held that the contents of a woman's 911 call, in which she recited the license number, make, and model of the car in which she saw a man she recognized as the defendant riding in a vehicle holding a gun, were admissible as excited utterances. The woman testified that she thought the defendant had been involved in a recent murder, so she had walked away quickly because she felt responsible for taking care of the small children in her custody. The Court observed that there was some question as to whether the statements were made prior to there being time to contrive or misrepresent, because the woman told the dispatcher it had been five minutes since she saw the defendant rather than 30 seconds to one minute as she testified a trial, and that the woman's statements contained some exaggerations (e.g., the defendant had two guns instead of one). It concluded that the exaggerations went to the weight to be given the statements, not their admissibility.

[3] Rule 803(3) -- Then Existing Mental, Emotional, or Physical Condition [Go To Main]

[c] Rule 803(3) -- Facts Reflected in State of Mind

United States v. Kaiser, 609 F.3d 556 (2d Cir. 2010) : The Court reversed a company executive's securities fraud conviction in part because a hearsay statement by another executive, named Abramson, that he had discovered the defendant's wrongdoing and wanted to go to the SEC to expose him, was improperly admitted as state of mind. "[T]he obvious premise of the statement is that Kaiser was violating the law. It is this assertion, and not Abramson's intent to report Kaiser to the SEC, that constitutes inadmissible hearsay." Even if the statement were offered to prove Abramson's intent, its probative value was substantially outweighed by the risk that the jury would misuse the statement for the truth of the accusation; so in any event it should have been excluded under Rule 403.

Apanovitch v. Houk, 466 F.3d 460 (6th Cir. 2006) : Although it denied habeas corpus relief, the Court held that admission of hearsay testimony from six witnesses describing the reasons that the victim feared the defendant violated his constitutional right to a fair trial. The Court noted that "a witness may testify that someone expressed to them fear of someone or something, but they may not testify as to that person's explanations of why they were afraid."

[d] Rule 803(3) -- Intent

[ii] Rule 803(3) -- Intent -- Inference from Present to Past State of Mind

United States v. Rivera-Hernandez, 497 F.3d 71 (1st Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a conviction for money laundering arising from a scheme in which a contractor building a juvenile facility under the defendant's authority paid money to the defendant for work never done. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony that the defendant told his father that he was providing consulting services to the contractor, but as a public servant he could not hold other employment and thus was having the payments made to his father's company. Because the statement was not made contemporaneously with the demand that the defendant made to the contractor for payment, it was not admissible as an expression of an innocent state of mind at the time of the allegedly illegal transaction. In our view, the statement was in fact a statement of the defendant's contemporaneous state of mind -- it reflected how he felt at the time the statement to his father was made and so it was "then existing" within the terms of Rule 803(3). However, the Trial Court would have been well within its discretion to exclude the statement under Rule 403, because the defendant's state of mind at the time of the statement to his father was only probative insofar as it raised an inference that he had the same state of mind at the time he made the demand for payment. A Judge could well conclude that the defendant's state of mind could have changed over that time, and therefore that the risk of jury confusion could substantially outweigh the probative value of the statement.

[iii] Rule 803(3) -- Intent -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Barraza, 576 F.3d 798 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for kidnapping resulting in death, finding no error in the admission of statements by the victim that she was taking her son and going with the defendant to Mexico, on a drug-buying trip. The statements referred to her then-existing intention and were properly admitted under Rule 803(3).

United States v. Duran, 596 F.3d 1283 (11th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for acting in the United States as a foreign government's agent without prior notification to the Attorney General and conspiracy, finding no abuse of discretion when statements by the defendant, which he argued showed that he did not intend to act as an agent of the Venezuelan government, were excluded. Two of the statements were properly excluded on relevance grounds and a third because it explained why the defendant had a certain state of mind and so was not a statement of intent. With respect to a statement, "I'm never bringing that money" to a business partner to pay bribes, the Court concluded that admissibility "was a close call under Rule 803 (3)" and that if exclusion was error it was harmless.

[e] Rule 803(3) -- Mixed Present and Past States of Mind

McInnis v. Fairfield Communities, Inc., 458 F.3d 1129 (10th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff in a Title VII gender discrimination action, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of emails written by a supervisor. The statements were not admissible under Rule 803(3) although some expressed then-existing states of mind, because others were assertions of why the declarant had those feelings. As statements of memory or belief, the latter are expressly outside the exception, and the defendant did not offer to redact the inadmissible portions.

[g] Rule 803(3) -- Present State of Mind

[ii] Rule 803(3) -- Present State of Mind -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Rivera-Hernandez, 497 F.3d 71 (1st Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a conviction for money laundering arising from a scheme in which a contractor building a juvenile facility under the defendant's authority paid money to the defendant for work never done. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony that the defendant told his father that he was providing consulting services to the contractor, but as a public servant he could not hold other employment and thus was having the payments made to his father's company. Because the statement was not made contemporaneously with the demand that the defendant made to the contractor for payment, it was not admissible as an expression of an innocent state of mind at the time of the allegedly illegal transaction. In our view, the statement was in fact a statement of the defendant's contemporaneous state of mind -- it reflected how he felt at the time the statement to his father was made and so it was "then existing" within the terms of Rule 803(3). However, the Trial Court would have been well within its discretion to exclude the statement under Rule 403, because the defendant's state of mind at the time of the statement to his father was only probative insofar as it raised an inference that he had the same state of mind at the time he made the demand for payment. A Judge could well conclude that the defendant's state of mind could have changed over that time, and therefore that the risk of jury confusion could substantially outweigh the probative value of the statement.

[k] Rule 803(3) -- Statements of Belief or Memory

United States v. Rodriguez-Berrios, 573 F.3d 55 (1st Cir. 2009) : The defendant was convicted for the fatal carjacking of his ex-wife, after a witness testified that the victim told her that bruises on her arm were caused by the defendant and that "she was afraid, afraid of him." On appeal, the government "correctly concede[d]" that the statement regarding the bruises was improperly admitted as a statement of a then existing mental, emotional, or physical condition. While the statement of fear referred to an existing emotional condition, the government correctly acknowledged that the victim's state of mind was not relevant to any issue in the case. Testimony by the victim's mother that the victim accused the defendant of stalking her were likewise improperly admitted under the state of mind exception. The Court nonetheless held that the admissible evidence against the defendant was sufficient, and affirmed.

United States v. DeMarce, 564 F.3d 989 (8th Cir. 2009) : The defendant was convicted for attempted aggravated sexual abuse of his 11-year-old niece after he attempted to rape her in his car. When he dropped her off at home following the incident, she first lied about the source of her injuries, but a few minutes later told the true story, which her mother related at trial. Affirming, the Court held that admission of most of the testimony was error, but harmless. It rejected the government's argument that the testimony was admissible to explain why the mother contacted the police, because the testimony was not restricted at trial to this purpose and was admitted for its truth. It held that the daughter's statement was admissible under Rule 803(3) to the extent that she described her physical state at the time of the statement, but not to the extent she described the events leading up to her physical state, as that was an inadmissible statement of memory.

[4] Rule 803(4) -- Statements for Purposes of Medical Diagnosis or Treatment [Go To Main]

[a] Rule 803(4) -- Abused Child

United States v. Peneaux, 432 F.3d 882 (8th Cir. 2005) : The Court upheld convictions for child sexual abuse, finding no error in the admission of hearsay statements that the victim, who testified at trial, had made to a physician. The statements were pertinent to treatment or diagnosis, because they identified the abuser as a family member, and the government presented sufficient evidence to indicate that the child was aware of the need to be truthful when talking to the doctor.

[b] Rule 803(4) -- Constitutional Concerns

United States v. Santos, 589 F.3d 759 (5th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for assault resulting in serious bodily injury, finding no violation of Rule 803(4) or Crawford v. Washington in the admission of a statement from the victim to a prison nurse that his pain was nine on a scale of ten. Rejecting the argument that a statement must be "necessary" for medical treatment in order to be admissible, the Court stated that the standard for admissibility is whether the statement was "reasonably pertinent to diagnosis or treatment." In this case, there was no question that the victim's statement regarding his pain was reasonably pertinent to treatment for that pain. For similar reasons, that the victim's statement was not testimonial, because the nurse was engaged in treatment and was not interrogating the victim to gather evidence for trial or prison disciplinary proceedings.

[f] Rule 803(4) -- Statements Explaining Cause or Attributing Fault

United States v. Bercier, 506 F.3d 625 (8th Cir. 2007) : The Court reversed sexual assault convictions, finding it was an abuse of discretion to permit a doctor at the hospital to testify to an extensive interview he conducted with the victim on the morning after the alleged assault. There was no foundation establishing that the doctor's lengthy interview of the victim, including questions as to the identity of the assailant, were essential to diagnosis and treatment or that the victim manifested an understanding that they were essential. The presence of law enforcement agents near the time of the doctor's interview reinforced the inference that the interview was not pertinent to treatment. In United States v. Miller, 477 F.3d 644 (8th Cir. 2007) , the court, affirming a jailer's conviction for Eighth Amendment violations in abusing prisoners, found no error in admitting medical records that, together with other evidence, could be used to identify the defendant as the assailant. Although statements concerning identity or fault are usually not considered reliable enough to come within Rule 803(4), these records did not by themselves identify the defendant or anyone else as the individual responsible, and the Court doubted "that a statement that is otherwise admissible as a statement made for the purposes of treatment or diagnosis is rendered inadmissible merely because it may also indirectly and incidentally suggest the person responsible for the declarant's injuries."

[g] Rule 803(4) -- Statements for Purposes of Treatment

United States v. Gonzalez, 533 F.3d 1057 (9th Cir. 2008) : At the trial of a sheriff's officer for acting under color of law to deprive three women of their right to bodily integrity by committing sexual assaults upon them, a registered nurse and sexual examiner testified that she had examined one of the women on the night of the assault and the woman had told her that "she had been forced to have oral copulation." The Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting this statement under Rule 803(4), as the witness testified that the victim's description of the assault affects the examination she conducts and that she examined the woman's mouth for injury. It was true that she was collecting evidence, but she was also a hospital nurse performing a medical examination of a victim of a sexual assault.

[5] Rule 803(5) -- Recorded Recollection [Go To Main]

[.1] Rule 803(5) -- Constitutional Concerns

United States v. Jones, 601 F.3d 1247 (11th Cir. 2010) : Affirming firearms convictions, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting as past recollection recorded a videotaped police interview of a 16-year-old witness who sold a gun to the defendant and rode with him to an area out of town where she witnessed the defendant shoot a man. Even though the videotaped statement was testimonial, the Court also rejected a Confrontation Clause challenge because the declarant testified at trial and was subject to unrestricted cross-examination.

[k] Rule 803(5) -- Police Reports

United States v. Rommy, 506 F.3d 108 (2d Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to import "Ecstasy" into the United States, finding no error in the admission, as past recollection recorded, of a transcript of a tape-recorded telephone conversation between the defendant and another drug dealer. The recording was made by Dutch law enforcement officials pursuant to a wiretap, but Dutch law prohibited production of the tape itself. The government produced a Dutch detective who was personally involved in the wiretap investigation and who prepared the transcript. Although the detective had no specific recollection of the call or of transcribing it, she testified that it had been her general practice upon listening to calls intercepted during the investigation to prepare a contemporaneous transcript. This testimony was sufficient to establish the foundation requirements for a past recollection recorded.

[m.1] Rule 803(5) -- Video Recordings

United States v. Jones, 601 F.3d 1247 (11th Cir. 2010) : Affirming firearms convictions, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting as past recollection recorded a videotaped police interview of a 16-year-old witness who sold a gun to the defendant and rode with him to an area out of town where she witnessed the defendant shoot a man. When the witness had memory problems at trial, the prosecution showed her the videotape outside the presence of the jury. The witness responded that she could remember only some of the events, and the Judge found that she lacked sufficient memory to testify to the subject matter of the video. The witness testified that it was easier to remember the events at the time of the videotape than at trial and that the things said on the tape were true and accurate to the best of her knowledge. Under these circumstances, "admission of the video as past recollection recorded was not a clear error of judgment on the part of the district judge."

[6] Rule 803(6) -- Records of Regularly Conducted Activity [Go To Main]

[e] Rule 803(6) -- Computerized Records

U-Haul Int'l, Inc. v. Lumbermens Mut. Cas. Co., 576 F.3d 1040 (9th Cir. 2009) : In an action over insurance coverage obligations the plaintiffs proved claims-defense and settlement costs by introducing computer-generated summaries detailing the indemnity and expenses paid on each claim. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiffs, the Court held that the summaries were properly admitted under Rule 803(6) because they were printouts from a database, where the underlying data was entered into the database at or near the time of each payment event, the persons who entered the data had knowledge of the payment event, and the data was kept in the course of the business' regularly conducted business activity. The Court rejected arguments that the exhibits were inadmissible because they had been prepared for the litigation -- why the printouts were produced was irrelevant when the underlying data met the requirements of the business record exception -- and that the foundation witness was unqualified because he had not input each piece of data -- all that is required is that the witness be knowledgeable about the business' practices and procedures concerning the records.

United States v. Sanchez, 586 F.3d 918 (11th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions for conspiracy to possess marijuana with the intent to distribute, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting call records for cell phones used by the conspirators, a summary of those records prepared by the prosecution, and a map showing the general location of the subject cell phones in relation to specific cell phone call towers at the times the phones were used. Although the defendants argued that the electronic records that contained the information about calls stored by VeriSign under contract with MetroPCS (who maintained the towers) were not business records of MetroPCS, the Court concluded that the argument was frivolous and that the information that was stored was recorded contemporaneously with the transactions it depicted and were business records. In our view, the records were not hearsay requiring an exception, since they were mechanical recordings not involving any human "statement" subject to infirmities of perception, memory, sincerity, or ambiguity. The Court held that given the fact that the records were admissible, it was not an abuse of discretion to permit the government to offer summaries and maps based upon the records.

[e.1] Rule 803(6) -- Constitutional Concerns

United States v. Feliz, 467 F.3d 227 (2d Cir. 2006) : In a prosecution for racketeering that included charges of murder, the government proved the manner of death through autopsy reports introduced by a medical examiner who had not conducted any of the autopsies. Affirming, the Court held that the reports were properly admitted as business records and that their admission did not violate confrontation rights. The Court noted that statements that are testimonial within the meaning of Crawford do not qualify as business records under Rule 803(6), and statements properly admitted as business records cannot be testimonial. "Because business records cannot be made in anticipation of litigation or include observations made by law enforcement personnel, they 'bear[] little resemblance to the civil-law abuses the Confrontation Clause targeted.' "

United States v. Vasilakos, 508 F.3d 401 (6th Cir. 2007) : The defendants were convicted of defrauding their employer, an insurance company, by setting up fictitious accounts into which they directed unearned commissions. The checks for the commissions were sent to post office boxes maintained by the defendants. The Court held that the government established a proper foundation for the post office box records through the testimony of a postal inspector, making them admissible as business records; rejecting an argument that admission of the records was a confrontation violation, the Court noted that "the Supreme Court specifically characterizes business records as non-testimonial."

[k] Rule 803(6) -- Foundation

[ii] Rule 803(6) -- Foundation -- Custodian or Qualified Witness

[A] Rule 803(6) -- Civil Cases

U.S. CFTC v. Dizona, 594 F.3d 408 (5th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed judgment as a matter of law given for the defendant in a civil enforcement action regarding alleged commodities market manipulation, holding that the CFTC had not established that documents admitted at trial were business records within the hearsay exception. The only foundation proffered came from a CFTC investigator who did not have any knowledge regarding the making or keeping of the records. A dissenting Judge would have found no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence, as it was produced by the defendant's employer in response to the government's subpoena to deliver the record of its trades, and the investigator gave undisputed testimony regarding the general practice by which trade data was recorded.

Thanongsinh v. Board of Educ., 462 F.3d 762 (7th Cir. 2006) : The Court reversed in part summary judgment for the defendant in a Title VII action by an employee who claimed he had been demoted because a qualification exam had been administered in a discriminatory manner. The Court held it was error to exclude interviewers' score sheets on the ground that they had not been authenticated by the interviewers themselves. As records made and kept in the ordinary course of the business, the sheets would come within the business records exception, and the foundation for that exception could be provided by the custodian or any other witness with knowledge of the business' practices. Although the plaintiff did not submit an affidavit by the custodian of these records, the Court held the foundation for consideration at the summary judgment stage was satisfied by the defendant's discovery responses and reliance on the sheets in its arguments on the motion.

[B] Rule 803(6) -- Foundation -- Custodian or Qualified Witness -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Brown, 553 F.3d 768 (5th Cir. 2008) : Two pharmacists were convicted of conspiring with physicians to distribute large quantities of pain medications under cover of false prescriptions written by the physicians. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of exhibits purporting to represent data from the defendants' pharmacy records, broken down in such a way as to demonstrate facts favorable to their claims of innocence, as the defendants were unable to provide a sufficient foundation. Their first witness, who was quite familiar with the computer program and had statistics training that enabled him to parse and present the data, had never worked at the pharmacy and first encountered the records long after they were compiled, so he could not testify to the business' record-keeping practices. The defendants could not provide a foundation because they were unwilling to testify because of Fifth Amendment concerns, and their suggestion that the foundation come from one defendant's mother was met with a prosecution warning that she too could have self-incrimination concerns. Finally, their attempt to use a business records affidavit pursuant to Rule 902(11) was rejected as untimely.

United States v. Baker, 458 F.3d 513 (6th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a mail fraud conviction, holding that an experienced postal inspector familiar with the Postal Service and postal records was qualified to establish that post office box records introduced in the case were business records.

United States v. Oros, 578 F.3d 703 (7th Cir. 2009) : Affirming a conviction for bribery of a public official, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit charts summarizing voluminous bank and telephone records, because the introducing witness did not provide evidence that the underlying records met the requirements of the business records exception and were thus admissible. The Trial Judge had erroneously accepted the government's argument that "because the government was only introducing the summary (and not the underlying records themselves), no certification or testimony from a custodian was required."

[iii] Rule 803(6) -- Foundation -- Examples

[A] Rule 803(6) -- Admissible Records

United States v. Ford, 435 F.3d 204 (2d Cir. 2006) : The Court held in a bribery prosecution that there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the key prosecution witness' calendar as a business record. Although the witness claimed not to remember when or why he made a critical entry, he had testified that it was his regular business practice to keep a calendar in which he documented events of which he had personal knowledge at or near the time they occurred.

[v] Rule 803(6) -- Foundation -- Procedure for Laying Foundation

United States v. Petroff-Kline, 557 F.3d 285 (6th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the government in an action to collect the amount owed on a student loan. It held that a declaration by the Chief of the Referral Control Section of the Debt Management Branch of the Department of Health and Human Services complied with Rule 902(11) and laid the foundation for the introduction of promissory notes as business records. The Court also noted that a qualifying witness "need only have knowledge of the procedures under which the records were created, not knowledge of the actual entries in the records."

[q] Rule 803(6) -- Opinions

Wood v. Valley Forge Life Ins. Co., 478 F.3d 941 (8th Cir. 2007) : In a beneficiary's action on a life insurance policy, the insurer contested on the ground that the insured committed suicide and offered the coroner's conclusion to that effect in the death certificate and the autopsy report. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to exclude evidence of the coroner's conclusion. The Court explained only that the certificate and the report were "both admissible into evidence without redactions as business records" under Rule 803(6). In our view, Rules 803(9) and 803(8), respectively, would provide stronger support for that conclusion.

Brawner v. Allstate Indem. Co., 591 F.3d 984 (8th Cir. 2010) : In an insurance dispute, the Court rejected the plaintiffs' argument that certain records offered by the insurer were not properly established as business records because the foundation witness was not a representative of the entity that created the document. It noted that "a record created by a third party and integrated into another entity's records is admissible as the record of the custodian entity, so long as the custodian entity relied upon the accuracy of the record and the other requirements of Rule 803(6) are met." The foundation witness testified that the insurer relied on the documents prepared by another entity.

[t] Rule 803(6) -- Records Created by Another Entity

United States v. Gwathney, 465 F.3d 1133 (10th Cir. 2006) : In a prosecution for possession of marijuana, the defendant truck driver argued that he obtained cash from money wired to him via Western Union by the truck's owner. To disprove that account, the prosecution introduced under Rule 803(6) an exhibit containing a subpoena issued by the DEA and Western Union's response to the subpoena indicating that it had no record of such a wire transfer. Affirming, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit the response as a business record of the DEA, since the agency did not prepare the document. And it was not an admissible business record of Western Union (even on the questionable assumption that it was a record made and kept in the ordinary course of business), since the DEA agent testifying about the exhibit lacked knowledge to lay the foundation.

[u] Rule 803(6) -- Regular Practice To Make and Keep Record

United States v. Kaiser, 609 F.3d 556 (2d Cir. 2010) : In a securities fraud prosecution, the Court found no error in the admission of a business planner maintained by an executive which included a "contact log" of his notes pertaining to his phone conversations. The Court rejected an argument that note-taking of phone conversations is not a regular practice because phone calls are sporadic and the executive only recorded selected phone calls, noting that the selectivity raised by the defendant "is the nature of all notetaking" and that a business record "need not be mechanically generated" to be part of a regular practice. The contact log was "different in kind from the kinds of 'miscellaneous jottings' that courts have found inadmissible under this exception, because it was maintained in a consistent way and was focused on a certain range of issues that were relevant to his business." Finally, the fact that pages had been removed from the business planners raised questions about their trustworthiness that would go to the weight of the evidence and not its admissibility.

United States v. LeShore, 543 F.3d 935 (7th Cir 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for armed bank robbery, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of a list of bait money as a business record. The defendant argued that it could not be a "regular practice" to compile such a list, since a new list is made only after the theft or loss of an existing bait money packet, which happens only on an irregular basis. However, the Court concluded that the argument overstated the spirit of the requirement, and it noted that the bank verified the list three times a year. Actual reliance on the list by the business, and compilation of the list by someone whose duty it is to do so provided additional indicia of reliability.

[w] Rule 803(6) -- Source of Information

[i] Rule 803(6) -- Business Duty

United States v. Bonds, 608 F.3d 495 (9th Cir. 2010) : In a perjury prosecution against a professional baseball player for falsely denying steroid use before a grand jury, the defendant moved in limine to preclude introduction of blood analysis reports for failure to establish that the blood had come from the defendant. A witness who could have made the connection refused to testify, so the government sought to introduce that witness' out of court statements. Affirming on interlocutory appeal the grant of the motion in limine, the Court held that log sheets of the testing company could not be used to establish that the blood came from the defendant, since the source of the information on the logs was the unavailable witness, who was under no business duty with respect to preparation of the log sheets. In United States v. Marguet-Pillado, 560 F.3d 1078 (9th Cir. 2009) , the court reversed a conviction for being a removed alien who was found in the United States, holding it was an abuse of discretion to admit evidence that an application for permanent resident status in the defendant's immigration file contained a statement by a person, who held himself out to be the defendant's father, that the defendant was born in and was a citizen of Mexico. The Court found that the statement did not fall within the business record or public records exception because the person who made the statement had no governmental duties whatsoever.

United States v. Ary, 518 F.3d 775 (10th Cir. 2008) : Affirming convictions for fraud and stolen property offenses arising from transactions involving space artifacts, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting computer and paper inventory records of the Cosmosphere and Space Center, a museum that the defendant managed from 1976 until 2002. The Court found that the records were prepared in the ordinary course of the museum's business and that, even though the museum's curators sometimes relied on outside sources to track down invoices and documentation that came with an artifact when it was purchased, the sources of the invoices and documentation were also a under a business duty to provide accurate information. "Therefore no link the trustworthiness chain was broken."

[z] Rule 803(6) -- Trustworthiness

[i] Rule 803(6) -- Trustworthiness -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Arledge, 553 F.3d 881 (5th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed mail and wire fraud convictions arising from submission of false claims to a mass tort settlement, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of a multi-page list of names, addresses, and phone numbers entitled "Arledge Accepted Cases." Although an employee of the defendant verified that the document was a record of regularly conducted activity, no witness testified to the purpose of the document or identified handwritten notations, so there was reason to be concerned about the trustworthiness of the document.

United States v. Hill, 552 F.3d 541 (7th Cir. 2008) : Affirming a conviction for bank robbery, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit the purchase record from a car dealer to prove that the defendant had used the proceeds from a robbery to purchase an expensive car. Evidence showed that the dealer sometimes, at the request of a buyer, listed a different individual's name as the buyer and sometimes misreported the sales price and down payment of the car being sold, so the purchase records lacked trustworthiness. In United States v. Price, 516 F.3d 597 (7th Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed a conviction for bank robbery, holding it was error (but harmless) to admit a purchase order as a business record, where there was evidence that the employees of the business "frequently and deliberately crammed [the orders] with inaccurate information at the request of the purchaser."

United States v. Rogers, 556 F.3d 1130 (10th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed drug and gun convictions arising from a police officer's confrontation with the defendant in the hallway and a suite of a local hotel. It found no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by the general manager of the hotel and a departure log, which were offered to prove that one "Ricky Smith" checked out of the hotel suite the day after the defendant was arrested. The Court noted that the departure log was different from the original log provided to investigating officers and offered by the defendant at a suppression hearing, which was enough to question the trustworthiness of the record.

[ii] Rule 803(6) -- Trustworthiness -- Records Made in Contemplation of Litigation

Millenkamp v. Davisco Foods Int'l, Inc., 562 F.3d 971 (9th Cir. 2009) : In a breach of warranty action by buyers of milk permeate for cattle food, who alleged that calves died as a result of ingesting the product, the Court held it was error to admit a letter placing the blame for the calves' illness on the seller, which had been written by a nutritionist at a company that settled with the buyers. Although the letter was admitted as a business record, the Court observed that it appeared to be in response to an inquiry from the buyers and was generated in anticipation of litigation rather than in the ordinary course of business.

United States v. Arias-Izquierdo, 449 F.3d 1168 (11th Cir. 2006) : Affirming convictions arising from the hijacking of an aircraft bound for Havana that was diverted to Key West, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit a report from Cubana Airlines showing that five of the defendants had been passengers on the same flight to Havana in the months before the hijacking. The report was a typewritten summary of handwritten business records, which was prepared solely for the trial of these defendants. Noting that reports prepared for litigation are not admissible under Rule 803(6), the Court distinguished cases admitting computer printouts prepared for use in litigation. In those cases, the information was simply a printout of electronically stored information that had been prepared without litigation in mind.

[7] Rule 803(7) -- Absence of Entry in Records [Go To Main]

United States v. Munoz, 487 F.3d 25 (1st Cir. 2007) : Affirming convictions of former bank executives for bank fraud, the Court found no abuse of discretion in permitting minutes of board meetings nearly 20 years earlier to be introduced for the purpose of proving, by the absence of any mention, that the board had not been informed of certain matters. There was sufficient foundation evidence that the minutes were prepared with the regularity required for business records and that they included sufficient detail that it could reasonably be inferred a matter was not discussed if there was no reference to it in the minutes.

[8] Rule 803(8) -- Public Records and Reports [Go To Main]

[a] Rule 803(8) -- Administrative Findings

[i] Rule 803(8) -- Administrative Findings -- Investigations

[A] Employment Cases

DeCorte v. Jordan, 497 F.3d 433 (5th Cir. 2007) : In a Title VII action, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of EEOC findings of discrimination, reaffirming its view that such determinations, while not binding on the trier of fact, are admissible as evidence in civil proceedings as probative of a claim of employment discrimination.

Alexander v. Caresource, 576 F.3d 551 (6th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant in an employment discrimination case, finding no error when no evidentiary weight was given to a probable cause letter from the state civil rights commission. It noted that the Trial Judge had misapplied earlier dicta authorizing blanket exclusion of such determinations at trial, where they "carrie[d] an evidentiary value of practically zero" "at the summary judgment stage, the report ought to be considered for the factual material it contains to determine if a fact question is raised." It also noted that the Judge had erred in discounting the letter because it was not made on personal knowledge; "the personal knowledge requirement does not extend to official reports admissible under Rule 803(8)." However, it found that the letter was properly accorded little weight because "the conclusions were not tied to specific facts, and it was unclear what evidence the investigator considered in reaching her conclusion," which indicated a lack of trustworthiness.

[d] Rule 803(8) -- Constitutional Concerns

Melendez-Diaz v. Massachusetts, 129 S. Ct. 2527, 174 L. Ed. 2d 314 (2009) : In a drug case, the Trial Court admitted three "certificates of analysis" showing the results of the forensic tests performed on the seized substances. The certificates stated that "the substance was found to contain: Cocaine," and were sworn to before a notary public by analysts at the State Laboratory Institute of the Massachusetts Department of Public Health. The Court, in a highly contested 5-4 decision, held that these certificates were "testimonial" under Crawford and therefore admitting them without a live witness violated the defendant's right to confrontation. The majority noted that affidavits prepared for litigation are within the core definition of "testimonial" statements, and the documents at issue, "while denominated by Massachusetts law 'certificates,' are quite plainly affidavits: declarations of facts written down and sworn to by the declarant before an officer authorized to administer oaths." The majority also noted that the only reason the certificates were prepared was for use in litigation. It stated that "[w]e can safely assume that the analysts were aware of the affidavits' evidentiary purpose, since that purpose -- as stated in the relevant state-law provision -- was reprinted on the affidavits themselves." In a footnote, the majority declared in dictum that "documents prepared in the regular course of equipment maintenance may well qualify as nontestimonial records." Notably, the Court approved the basic analysis of federal courts after Crawford with respect to business and public records, that is, if the record is admissible under FRE 803(6) or 803(8), it is for that reason, nontestimonial under Crawford. For business records, this is because, to be admissible under Rule 803(6), it cannot be prepared for litigation. For public records, this is because law enforcement reports prepared for a specific litigation are excluded under Rule 803(8)(B) and (C).

United States v. Garcia, 452 F.3d 36 (1st Cir. 2006) : In an illegal re-entry case, the Court found no violation of confrontation rights in the admission of a warrant of deportation. Finding that the warrant was not testimonial under Crawford v. Washington, the Court noted that every Circuit considering the matter has held "that defendants have no right to confront and cross-examine the agents who routinely record warrants of deportation" because such officers have no motivation to do anything other than "mechanically register an unambiguous factual matter."

United States v. Torres-Villalobos, 487 F.3d 607 (8th Cir. 2007) : Affirming a conviction for illegal re-entry after deportation, the Court held that a warrant of deportation recording the defendant's departure from the country was not testimonial hearsay, as such warrants "are produced under circumstances objectively indicating that their primary purpose is to maintain records concerning the movements of aliens and to ensure compliance with orders of deportation, not to prove facts for use in future criminal prosecutions."

United States v. Orozco-Acosta, 607 F.3d 1156 (9th Cir. 2010) : In an illegal reentry case, the government proved removal by introducing a warrant of deportation under Rule 803(8). The trial was conducted and the defendant convicted before the Supreme Court's decision in Melendez-Diaz. On appeal, the Court rejected an argument that the warrant of deportation was testimonial under Melendez-Diaz, reasoning that "neither a warrant of removal's sole purpose nor even its primary purpose is use at trial," since a warrant of removal must be prepared in every case resulting in a final order of removal, and only a "small fraction of these warrants are used in immigration prosecutions." The Court concluded that "Melendez-Diaz cannot be read to establish that the mere possibility that a warrant of removal -- or, for that matter, any business or public record -- could be used in a later criminal prosecution renders it testimonial under Crawford."

United States v. Caraballo, 595 F.3d 1214 (11th Cir. 2010) : In an alien smuggling case, the government introduced I-213 forms prepared by an officer who found aliens crammed into a small room in a boat near the shore of the United States. The forms contained basic biographical information on the people found, and were used at trial to prove that they were aliens and not admittable. Affirming, the Court found that the forms were properly admitted as public records, and that the exclusion of law enforcement records in Rule 803(8) did not apply because the forms were routine and nonadversarial documents requested from every alien entering the United States. Nor were the forms testimonial, even after the Supreme Court's decision in Melendez-Diaz v. Massachusetts, since the I 213 form is primarily used as a record by the INS for the purpose of tracking the entry of aliens into the United States, and it is "of little moment that an incidental or secondary use of the interviews underlying the I 213 forms actually furthered a prosecution."

[e] Rule 803(8) -- Court Records

United States v. Hatfield, 591 F.3d 945 (7th Cir. 2010) : In a prosecution for conspiracy to burglarize pharmacies and distribute controlled substances, the use of which resulted in death or serious bodily injury, one of the individuals whom the government alleged died as a result of the use of the defendants' drugs was an informant in another case. The Court held that an order from that other case dismissing it because of the informant's death was not excluded by Rule 803(8)(B), because it was not the product of law enforcement observations.

[f] Rule 803(8) -- Factual Findings

[vii] Rule 803(8) -- Factual Findings -- Miscellaneous Cases

Christopher Phelps & Assoc., LLC v. Galloway, 492 F.3d 532 (4th Cir. 2007) : In an architectural firm's action for copyright infringement against a homeowner who used its plans to construct his house, the Court found no error in admitting a county tax assessment as evidence of the value of the defendant's property. Although the assessment reflected an expert opinion, it was not subject to Rule 702 but was admissible under Rule 803(8) because it represented the outcome of a governmental process relied upon for non-judicial purposes.

Friends of Milwaukee's Rivers v. Milwaukee Metro. Sewerage Dist., 556 F.3d 603 (7th Cir. 2009) : In an environmental organization's citizens' suit under the Clean Water Act, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in disregarding a letter from the Environmental Protection Agency to the Wisconsin Department of Natural Resources following up on a meeting between the two agencies. The letter was not admissible under Rule 803(8) because it did not state any findings of the EPA but rather simply repeated the opinion of the WDNR.

Wood v. Valley Forge Life Ins. Co., 478 F.3d 941 (8th Cir. 2007) : In a beneficiary's action on a life insurance policy, the insurer contested on the ground that the insured committed suicide and offered the coroner's conclusion to that effect in the death certificate and the autopsy report. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to exclude evidence of the coroner's conclusion. The Court explained only that the certificate and the report were "both admissible into evidence without redactions as business records" under Rule 803(6). In our view, Rules 803(9) and 803(8), respectively, would provide stronger support for that conclusion.

United States v. Feliz, 467 F.3d 227 (2d Cir. 2006) : In a prosecution for racketeering that included charges of murder, the government proved the manner of death through autopsy reports introduced by a medical examiner who had not conducted any of the autopsies. Affirming, the Court held that the reports were properly admitted as public records and that their admission did not violate confrontation rights. The Court noted that statements properly admitted as public records cannot be testimonial: because the exception excludes documents prepared for the ultimate purpose of litigation or including observations made by law enforcement personnel, they " 'bear[] little resemblance to the civil-law abuses the Confrontation Clause targeted.' "

United States v. Valdez-Maltos, 443 F.3d 910 (5th Cir. 2006) (per curiam): The Court affirmed a conviction for unlawful re-entry into the United States, holding that warrants of deportation are not testimonial hearsay under Crawford. The Court relied on precedents stating that documents in a defendant's immigration file are analogous to nontestimonial business records and holding that a warrant of deportation was reliable and admissible because the official preparing it had no motivation other than to "mechanically register an unambiguous factual matter."

[g] Rule 803(8) -- Foreign Records

[i] Rule 803(8) -- Civil Cases

Chavez v. Carranza, 559 F.3d 486 (6th Cir. 2009) : The Court upheld an award of compensatory and punitive damages for victims of torture and their families in a suit against a former Salvadoran military officer. It found no abuse of discretion in the admission of a report prepared by the Commission on the Truth for El Salvador, an entity established under 1992 United Nations-sponsored peace agreements. Although the Commission did not hold a hearing, the report could be found sufficiently trustworthy because the Commission interviewed numerous witnesses, victims, and relatives; viewed thousands of complaints of violence; examined documents; interviewed members of the military; and visited locations of acts of violence.

[ii] Rule 803(8) -- Foreign Records -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Vidacak, 553 F.3d 344 (4th Cir. 2009) : The defendant was convicted of lying on his immigration application, by failing to report his service in the Serbian Army (VRS) during the Bosnian War. The Court found that foreign military documents indicating that the defendant had served in VRS were properly admitted under Rule 803(8)(A), and remarked that "Courts regularly admit foreign records pursuant to this exception." It further noted that "[n]o foundational testimony is required in order to admit evidence under Rule 803(8)."

[i] Rule 803(8) -- Included Hearsay

United States v. Taylor, 462 F.3d 1023 (8th Cir. 2006) : As evidence that he was not the source of a handgun found after police chasing him saw him discard a small object, the defendant offered a 2002 suburban police report documenting a citizen's report that a handgun with the same serial number had been lost or stolen. Affirming a conviction for drug trafficking and illegal firearm possession, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of the police report. The citizen's statements were hearsay coming within no exception and the report contained no factual findings from an investigation that would make it admissible under Rule 803(8)(C).

United States v. Marguet-Pillado, 560 F.3d 1078 (9th Cir. 2009) : Reversing a conviction for being a removed alien who was found in the United States, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to admit evidence that an application for permanent resident status in the defendant's immigration file contained a statement by a person, who held himself out to be the defendant's father, that the defendant was born in and was a citizen of Mexico. The Court found that the included statement was hearsay that did not fall within the public records exception because the person who made the statement had no governmental duties whatsoever.

United Techs. Corp. v. Mazer, 556 F.3d 1260 (11th Cir. 2009) : The Court held that statements in a police report "made by third persons under no business duty to report" are not admissible for their truth under Rule 803(8).

[j] Rule 803(8) -- Judicial Findings

United States v. Sine, 483 F.3d 990 (9th Cir. 2007) : In a mail fraud prosecution, the Court held it was error, but not reversible plain error, to permit the government to ask witnesses on cross-examination questions that incorporated adverse findings by a Judge in related civil litigation. Factual determinations by a Judge in a civil action are inadmissible hearsay not coming within any hearsay exception, and a Judge's findings can unduly affect a jury, which is likely to defer to credibility determinations made by an authoritative, professional factfinder rather than determine those issues for themselves. In United States v. Nguyen, 465 F.3d 1128 (9th Cir. 2006) , the defendant was convicted of violating an order of supervision requiring that he not "commit any crimes," based on pleas of nolo contendere to two State misdemeanors. Reversing, the Court held that Rule 410 prohibits the admission of nolo pleas and the convictions resulting from them as proof that the pleader actually committed the underlying crimes charged. The evidence was also not admissible under Rule 803(22), which "allows judgments of felony convictions resulting from guilty pleas to be admitted into evidence but not convictions resulting from nolo contendere pleas and not misdemeanor convictions." Finally, the Court held that although a judgment of conviction could be said to be a public record, Rule 803(8) could not be used to evade the more specific limitations of Rule 803(22). It explained that prior decisions admitting misdemeanor convictions under Rule 803(8) involved using the conviction to prove some other element of a subsequently charged crime but not to prove that the defendant actually committed the underlying crimes charged.

United States v. $125,938.62, 537 F.3d 1287 (11th Cir. 2008) : Reversing in part a judgment ordering forfeiture of funds allegedly embezzled from the Nicaraguan treasury by the president of the country, the Court held it was error to admit the judgment of a Nicaraguan court as a public record to prove facts found by that court. The Court noted that the judgment would be admissible under Rule 803(22) to prove the fact of the president's conviction and his sentence.

[k] Rule 803(8) -- Law Enforcement Reports and Matters Observed by Officials in Criminal Cases

[i] Rule 803(8) -- Admissible

United States v. Dowdell, 595 F.3d 50 (1st Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a cocaine distribution conviction, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission as a public record of the defendant's booking sheet, since was a routine, non-adversarial document.

United States v. Edelmann, 458 F.3d 791 (8th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a fraud conviction, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of a memorandum to file prepared by the Inmate Systems Manager at a federal prison where the defendant had previously been incarcerated. The memorandum included and discussed three forged court orders that had been presented to secure the defendant's release, as well as the Manager's disposition of the orders and her response when informed that the orders were fraudulent. The Court held that the memorandum was not barred by Rule 803(8)(B), because it was not prepared by a member of law enforcement, and even if the Manager were considered a law enforcement officer, the memorandum was not prepared in the course of investigating a crime.

[ii] Rule 803(8) -- Law Enforcement Reports and Matters Observed by Officials in Criminal Cases -- Inadmissible

United States v. Pintado-Isiordia, 448 F.3d 1155 (9th Cir. 2006) (per curiam): In a prosecution for unlawful re-entry into the United States, the Court held that the defendant's Mexican birth record was self-authenticating, but there was no showing that the record fell within the public records exception to the hearsay rule. It was not possible to tell if the document was a record of matters "observed pursuant to duty imposed by law," because the portion of the document purporting to set forth the legal authority for maintaining the record was shown as "illegible" in the translated copy submitted to the District Court. However, any error in admitting the record was harmless.

[n] Rule 803(8) -- Opinions

United States v. De La Cruz, 469 F.3d 1064 (7th Cir. 2006) : In the prosecution of two City workers for misappropriating public funds, the government introduced evidence that the State had done an audit of the City's finances, found violations, and requested that each member of the Board of Works reimburse the City for money spent in violation of the law. The defendants sought to introduce the City's own legal opinion in response, which was appended to the audit report. Affirming, the Court concluded that the City's legal opinion was not a public record, although it was included in one. The Court reasoned that the hearsay exception focuses on the activities of a public office and on the observations and investigations made under authority of law, so a legal opinion in response to an audit is not a public record.

[p.1] Rule 803(8) -- Private Contractors

United States v. Hoffman-Vaile, 568 F.3d 1335 (11th Cir. 2009) : Affirming a conviction of a dermatologist for health care fraud, the Court held that any error in the admission of records prepared by a private contractor that administers the Medicare program in Florida as business records was not "plain." Although the defendant argued that the records were inadmissible under the exclusionary language of Rule 803(8)(B), the Court noted that the administrator was a private firm and that the defendant offered no authority holding a private entity to be preparing law enforcement reports.

[z] Rule 803(8) -- Trustworthiness

[iv] Rule 803(8) -- Trustworthiness -- Report Admissible or Required To Be Admitted

Dortch v. Fowler, 588 F.3d 396 (6th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendants in a personal injury action arising from a car-truck collision, finding no abuse of discretion when a report by a police accident reconstruction expert was admitted. The report recorded matters observed pursuant to a duty to report, and it was made timely (the officer arrived about 35 minutes after the accident) by an officer with extensive experience and training in accident reconstruction and with no motivation problems, based primarily on his team's personal observations. Any inconsistencies between the report and the officer's testimony, and any questions about how the investigation was conducted, could be explored on cross-examination. In Chavez v. Carranza, 559 F.3d 486 (6th Cir. 2009) , the Court upheld an award of compensatory and punitive damages for victims of torture and their families in a suit against a former Salvadoran military officer. It found no abuse of discretion in the admission of a report prepared by the Commission on the Truth for El Salvador, an entity established under 1992 United Nations-sponsored peace agreements. Although the Commission did not hold a hearing, the report could be found sufficiently trustworthy because the Commission interviewed numerous witnesses, victims, and relatives; viewed thousands of complaints of violence; examined documents; interviewed members of the military; and visited locations of acts of violence.

[v] Rule 803(8) -- Trustworthiness -- Report Excludable or Required To Be Excluded

[A] Rule 803(8) -- Civil Cases

United States v. Missouri, 535 F.3d 844 (8th Cir. 2008) : Affirming in part a judgment for the defendant state in a suit by the United States alleging that the state was in violation of the National Voter Registration Act, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the Judge excluded the substance of responses by local election agencies to a survey by the Election Assistance Commission. The state had "merely passed the LEA's survey responses along to the federal government, with no indication that the state was adopting the truth of the responses," and it had indicated that additional time was needed. As business or public records, they could have been found not trustworthy because they were hastily gathered and inaccurate in part.

[9] Rule 803(9) -- Records of Vital Statistics [Go To Main]

[b] Rule 803(9) -- Death Certificates

Wood v. Valley Forge Life Ins. Co., 478 F.3d 941 (8th Cir. 2007) : In a beneficiary's action on a life insurance policy, the insurer contested on the ground that the insured committed suicide and offered the coroner's conclusion to that effect in the death certificate and the autopsy report. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to exclude evidence of the coroner's conclusion. The Court explained only that the certificate and the report were "both admissible into evidence without redactions as business records" under Rule 803(6). In our view, Rules 803(9) and 803(8), respectively, would provide stronger support for that conclusion.

[10] Rule 803(10) -- Absence of Public Record or Entry [Go To Main]

[a] Rule 803(10) -- Confrontation Issues

Melendez-Diaz v. Massachusetts, 129 S. Ct. 2527, 174 L. Ed. 2d 314 (2009) : In a drug case, the Trial Court admitted three "certificates of analysis" showing the results of the forensic tests performed on the seized substances. The certificates stated that "the substance was found to contain: Cocaine," and were sworn to before a notary public by analysts at the State Laboratory Institute of the Massachusetts Department of Public Health. The Court, in a highly contested 5-4 decision, held that these certificates were "testimonial" under Crawford and therefore admitting them without a live witness violated the defendant's right to confrontation. The majority noted that affidavits prepared for litigation are within the core definition of "testimonial" statements, and the documents at issue, "while denominated by Massachusetts law 'certificates,' are quite plainly affidavits: declarations of facts written down and sworn to by the declarant before an officer authorized to administer oaths." The majority also noted that the only reason the certificates were prepared was for use in litigation. It stated that "[w]e can safely assume that the analysts were aware of the affidavits' evidentiary purpose, since that purpose -- as stated in the relevant state-law provision -- was reprinted on the affidavits themselves." In one passage of the opinion, the Court in dictum stated that certificates offered to prove the lack of a public record are testimonial and therefore barred by the Confrontation Clause.

United States v. Orozco-Acosta, 607 F.3d 1156 (9th Cir. 2010) : In an illegal reentry case, the government proved unpermitted reentry by introducing a certificate of non-existence of permission to reenter (CNR) under Rule 803(10). The trial was conducted and the defendant convicted before the Supreme Court's decision in Melendez-Diaz. On appeal, the government conceded that introducing the CNR violated the defendant's right to confrontation because under Melendez-Diaz that record is testimonial. The Court in a footnote agreed with the government's concession, stating that its previous cases holding that CNRs were not testimonial were "clearly inconsistent with Melendez-Diaz" because like the certificates in that case, a CNR is prepared solely for purposes of litigation. The error was harmless, however.

United States v. Mendez, 514 F.3d 1035 (10th Cir. 2008) : To prove that the Mexican-born defendant had not entered the United States legally, an immigration agent testified that he searched a nationwide database of entry documents and found no match for the name and SSN the defendant had provided at his arrest. Affirming, the Court held that the testimony was not hearsay, and thus not a confrontation violation, because the person who conducted the data search testified at trial and no record was received into evidence. The Court further noted that the underlying database consisted of public records created by officials under a duty to accurately record matters in connection with ongoing regulatory functions independent of prosecution, and that Rule 803(10) provides a hearsay exception for evidence of the absence of a public record of a matter for which a record is regularly made. Finally, the Court held that the database "is not testimonial and not subject to the strictures of the Confrontation Clause."

[c] Rule 803(10) -- Examples of Admissible Statements

United States v. Giambro, 544 F.3d 26 (1st Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possession of an unregistered firearm, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting Certificates of Nonexistence of a Record in the National Firearms Registration and Transfer Record regarding the firearm. A witness from the ATF provided sufficient evidence regarding the reliability of the NFRTR and the searches conducted for this particular record.

United States v. Valdez-Maltos, 443 F.3d 910 (5th Cir. 2006) (per curiam): The Court affirmed a conviction for unlawful re-entry into the United States, finding no abuse of discretion when a Border Patrol agent was permitted to testify that there was no record of the defendant's application for permission to enter the United States. The evidence indicated that the agent had performed a diligent search of both of the names by which the defendant was known and their corresponding alien registration numbers.

United States v. Mendez, 514 F.3d 1035 (10th Cir. 2008) : To prove that the Mexican-born defendant had not entered the United States legally, an immigration agent testified that he searched a nationwide database of entry documents and found no match for the name and SSN the defendant had provided at his arrest. Affirming, the Court held that the testimony was not hearsay, and thus not a confrontation violation, because the person who conducted the data search testified at trial and no record was received into evidence. The Court further noted that the underlying database consisted of public records created by officials under a duty to accurately record matters in connection with ongoing regulatory functions independent of prosecution, and that Rule 803(10) provides a hearsay exception for evidence of the absence of a public record of a matter for which a record is regularly made.

[15] Rule 803(17) -- Market Reports, Commercial Publications [Go To Main]

United States v. Masferrer, 514 F.3d 1158 (11th Cir. 2008) : A bank CEO was convicted of fraudulently misrepresenting certain transactions related to bank assets that had dramatically lost value. To prove the bank's losses from the transactions, the government introduced testimony from accountants who had relied on securities quotes provided by Bloomberg Financial Service. The Court found no error, noting that the quotes were admissible under Rule 803(17), where the government had presented evidence establishing that Bloomberg financial information "is universally relied upon by individuals and institutions involved in financial markets."

[16] Rule 803(18) -- Learned Treatises [Go To Main]

[e] Rule 803(18) -- Videotape

United States v. Martinez, 588 F.3d 301 (6th Cir. 2009) : In a prosecution for health care fraud, the government offered, to prove that the defendant's manner of giving pain injections was improper, a video it had commissioned in which a physician demonstrated the proper manner for giving the injections. The Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit the video. All portions of the video were "statements": not only the oral and written verbal parts, but also the depictions of the physician's conduct, which was nonverbal conduct intended as an assertion of the proper way to do the procedure. The statements were offered for the truth of the assertion that that was the way to give the injection. And no hearsay exception applied. In particular, this video did not come within the learned treatise exception of Rule 803(18) because it was prepared for litigation purposes, not subject to peer review or public scrutiny, and not prepared primarily for professionals with the reputation of the author at stake.

[19] Rule 803(22) -- Judgment of Previous Conviction [Go To Main]

[a] Rule 803(22) -- Accomplices' Convictions

United States ex rel. Miller v. Bill Harbert Int'l Constr., Inc., 608 F.3d 871 (D.C. Cir. 2010) : In a False Claims Act case arising from a bid-rigging conspiracy, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting one defendant's guilty plea to violating the Sherman Act by engaging in the conspiracy, and the accompanying memorandum, which explained the roles of the other defendants. Because this was a civil case, the guilty plea could be admitted against persons other than the pleader (i.e., the other defendants) to prove any fact essential to sustain the judgment, including the facts stated in the memorandum. To avoid prejudice to the other defendants in the FCA case, the Judge redacted the names of the other conspirators from the criminal case caption and the memorandum and instructed the jury that the fact of the defendant's guilty plea did not permit any inference against the others.

[c] Rule 803(22) -- Foreign Judgments

United States v. $125,938.62, 537 F.3d 1287 (11th Cir. 2008) : Reversing in part a judgment ordering forfeiture of funds allegedly embezzled from the Nicaraguan treasury by the president of the country, the Court held it was error to admit the judgment of a Nicaraguan court as a public record to prove facts found by that court. The Court noted that the judgment would be admissible under Rule 803(22) to prove the fact of the president's conviction and his sentence.

[g] Rule 803(22) -- Misdemeanor Convictions

United States v. Nguyen, 465 F.3d 1128 (9th Cir. 2006) : The defendant was convicted of violating an order of supervision requiring that he not "commit any crimes," based on pleas of nolo contendere to two State misdemeanors. Reversing, the Court held that Rule 410 prohibits the admission of nolo pleas and the convictions resulting from them as proof that the pleader actually committed the underlying crimes charged. " Rule 410's exclusion of a nolo contendere plea would be meaningless if all it took to prove that the defendant committed the crime charged was a certified copy of the inevitable judgment of conviction resulting from the plea." The evidence was also not admissible under Rule 803(22), which "allows judgments of felony convictions resulting from guilty pleas to be admitted into evidence but not convictions resulting from nolo contendere pleas and not misdemeanor convictions."

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
CHAPTER 804 RULE 804

4-804 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 804.syn

§ 804.syn Synopsis to Chapter 804: RULE 804

804.01 Official Text

804.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Unavailability Required

[2] Rule 804(a) -- Procuring Unavailability and Party-Specific Availability

[3] Rule 804(a) -- Absence of the Declarant and the Deposition Preference

[4] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Former Testimony

[5] Former Testimony -- Predecessor in Interest

[6] Former Testimony -- Grand Jury Testimony

[7] Rule 804(b)(2) -- Dying Declarations

[8] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Statements Against Interest

[9] Statements Against Interest -- Corroboration Requirement for Against Penal Interest Statements

[10] Declarations Against Interest -- In Which Cases Does the Corroborating Circumstances Requirement Apply?

[11] Statements Against Interest -- Disserving of Declarant's Interest

[12] Statements Against Interest -- Accomplice Statements to Law Enforcement

[13] Statements Against Interest -- Are Statements Exculpating Another Disserving to the Declarant?

[14] Rule 804(b)(4) -- Statements of Personal or Family History

[15] Residual Exception

[16] Forfeiture by Wrongdoing

[17] The Rule 804 Exceptions and the Confrontation Clause

804.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Rule 804(a) -- Definition Of Unavailability

[a] Rule 804(a) -- Absent or Unavailable

[i] Rule 804(a) -- Absent or Unavailable -- Codefendant in Criminal Case

[ii] Rule 804(a) -- Absent or Unavailable -- Good Faith Effort To Produce

[iii] Rule 804(a) -- Absent or Unavailable -- Inadequate Efforts To Produce

[A] Rule 804(a) -- Civil Cases

[B] Rule 804(a) -- Absent or Unavailable -- Inadequate Efforts To Produce -- Criminal Cases

[iv] Rule 804(a) -- Absent or Unavailable -- Miscellaneous Cases

[v] Rule 804(a) -- Absent or Unavailable -- Request for Voluntary Appearance

[vi] Rule 804(a) -- Absent or Unavailable -- Witness in Custody

[vii] Rule 804(a) -- Absent or Unavailable -- Witness Out of United States

[b] Rule 804(a) -- Claim of Privilege

[c] Rule 804(a) -- Dead Man's Statute

[d] Rule 804(a) -- Depositions

[e] Rule 804(a) -- Memory Loss

[f] Rule 804(a) -- Mental or Physical Infirmity

[g] Rule 804(a) -- Mid-Trial Availability

[h] Rule 804(a) -- Other Unavailability

[i] Rule 804(a) -- Party's Unavailability

[j] Rule 804(a) -- Procuring Unavailability

[k] Rule 804(a) -- Requirement of Depositions

[l] Rule 804(a) -- Unprivileged Refusal To Testify

[m] Rule 804(a) -- Witness Available to One Party but Not to Another

[2] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Hearsay Exceptions -- Former Testimony

[a] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Adequacy of Prior Examination

[b] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Bail or Detention Hearing

[c] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Constitutional Concerns

[d] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Depositions

[e] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Foreign Examination

[f] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Grand Jury Testimony

[g] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Motive To Develop the Testimony

[i] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Civil Cases

[ii] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Motive To Develop the Testimony -- Criminal Cases

[h] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Opportunity To Develop the Testimony

[i] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Plea Hearing Testimony

[j] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Predecessor in Interest

[k] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Relationship to Other Rules

[l] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Suppression Hearing Testimony

[m] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Unavailability

[3] Rule 804(b)(2) -- Hearsay Exceptions -- Statement Under Belief Of Impending DEATH

[4] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Hearsay Exceptions -- Statement Against Interest

[a] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Against Pecuniary Interest

[b] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Against Penal Interest

[i] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Civil Cases

[ii] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Against Penal Interest -- Statement Offered Against Accused

[A] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Admissible

[B] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Against Penal Interest -- Statement Offered Against Accused--Constitutional Concerns

[C] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Against Penal Interest -- Statement Offered Against Accused -- Inadmissible

[iii] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Against Penal Interest -- Statement Offered for Accused

[A] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Admissible or Required To Be Admitted

[B] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Against Penal Interest -- Statement Offered for Accused -- Constitutional Concerns

[C] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Against Penal Interest -- Statement Offered for Accused -- No Abuse of Discretion to Exclude

[c] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Appellate Review

[d] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Corroborating Circumstances

[i] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Civil Cases

[ii] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Corroborating Circumstances -- Statements Offered by Accused

[A] Rule 804(b)(3) -- No Abuse of Discretion to Exclude

[B] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Corroborating Circumstances -- Statements Offered by Accused -- Admission Required

[iii] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Corroborating Circumstances -- Statements Offered by Government

[e] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Employee's Statements

[f] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Personal Knowledge Requirement

[g] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Statement Implicating Another

[5] Rule 804(b)(4) -- Hearsay Exceptions -- Statement Of Personal Or Family History

[a] Rule 804(b)(4) -- Constitutional Concerns

[b] Rule 804(b)(4) -- Statements of Motive or Purpose

[6] Rule 804(b)(5) -- Hearsay Exceptions -- Other Exceptions

[7] Rule 804(b)(6) -- Forfeiture By Wrongdoing

[a] Rule 804(b)(6) -- Constitutional Objection Forfeited

[b] RULE 804(b)(6) -- Determination of Wrongdoing

[c] Rule 804(b)(6) -- Discovery by the Defense

[d] Rule 804(b)(6) -- Evidence of Cover-up Insufficient

[e] Rule 804(b)(6) -- Forfeiture by Coconspirator's Actions

[f] Rule 804(b)(6) -- Statement Offered To Prove Murder of Declarant

[g] Rule 804(b)(6) -- Wrongdoing Intended To Procure Unavailability

804.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

[2] 1997 Amendment Committee Note

[3] Excerpt from "Advisory Committee Notes to the Federal Rules of Evidence That May Require Clarification," by Daniel Capra, 182 F.R.D. 268, 284 (1999)

[4] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

[5] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

[6] Report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary

[7] Report of the House and Senate Conferees

[8] Citations to Hearings and Debates

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
CHAPTER 804 RULE 804

4-804 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 804.01

804.01 Official Text

Rule 804. Hearsay Exceptions; Declarant Unavailable

(a) Definition of unavailability. -- "Unavailability as a witness" includes situations in which the declarant --

(1) is exempted by ruling of the court on the ground of privilege from testifying concerning the subject matter of the declarant's statement; or

(2) persists in refusing to testify concerning the subject matter of the declarant's statement despite an order of the court to do so; or

(3) testifies to a lack of memory of the subject matter of the declarant's statement; or

(4) is unable to be present or to testify at the hearing because of death or then existing physical or mental illness or infirmity; or

(5) is absent from the hearing and the proponent of the declarant's statement has been unable to procure the declarant's attendance (or in the case of a hearsay exception under subdivision (b)(2), (3), or (4), the declarant's attendance or testimony) by process or other reasonable means.A declarant is not unavailable as a witness if exemption, refusal, claim of lack of memory, inability, or absence is due to the procurement or wrongdoing of the proponent of a statement for the purpose of preventing the witness from attending or testifying.

(b) Hearsay exceptions. -- The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule if the declarant is unavailable as a witness:

(1) Former testimony. -- Testimony given as a witness at another hearing of the same or a different proceeding, or in a deposition taken in compliance with law in the course of the same or another proceeding, if the party against whom the testimony is now offered, or, in a civil action or proceeding, a predecessor in interest, had an opportunity and similar motive to develop the testimony by direct, cross, or redirect examination.

(2) Statement under belief of impending death. -- In a prosecution for homicide or in a civil action or proceeding, a statement made by a declarant while believing that the declarant's death was imminent, concerning the cause or circumstances of what the declarant believed to be impending death.

(3) Statement against interest. -- A statement which was at the time of its making so far contrary to the declarant's pecuniary or proprietary interest, or so far tended to subject the declarant to civil or criminal liability, or to render invalid a claim by the declarant against another, that a reasonable person in the declarant's position would not have made the statement unless believing it to be true. A statement tending to expose the declarant to criminal liability and offered to exculpate the accused is not admissible unless corroborating circumstances clearly indicate the trustworthiness of the statement.

(4) Statement of personal or family history. -- (A) A statement concerning the declarant's own birth, adoption, marriage, divorce, legitimacy, relationship by blood, adoption, or marriage, ancestry, or other similar fact of personal or family history, even though declarant had no means of acquiring personal knowledge of the matter stated; or (B) a statement concerning the foregoing matters, and death also, of another person, if the declarant was related to the other by blood, adoption, or marriage or was so intimately associated with the other's family as to be likely to have accurate information concerning the matter declared.

(5) [Transferred to Rule 807]

(6) Forfeiture by wrongdoing. -- A statement offered against a party that has engaged or acquiesced in wrongdoing that was intended to, and did, procure the unavailability of the declarant as a witness.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
CHAPTER 804 RULE 804

4-804 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 804.02

804.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[Go To Supp]

[1] Unavailability Required

This Rule concerns hearsay exceptions that are applicable only when the declarant is unavailable as a witness. The rationale for these exceptions is that statements falling within them are not as reliable as in-court testimony; however, the statements are better than no evidence at all coming from the declarant. Subdivision (a) defines unavailability to include the following situations:

(1) The declarant is exempted by the Judge on the ground of privilege from testifying.

(2) The witness persists in refusing to testify even though the Judge has ruled that there is no proper claim of privilege and orders the witness to speak.

(3) The witness testifies to having no memory of the event or events to which the hearsay statements relate. But what if the Court determines that the witness is feigning loss of memory? We believe that the Court must order the witness to answer questions. If the witness persists in refusing to answer, the witness should be deemed to be unavailable under (a)(2).

(4) Illness or death prevents the witness from appearing to testify. If the illness is temporary, the Trial Judge must balance the importance of the testimony with the expected length of delay in determining whether to dispense with production of the witness, or instead to grant a continuance until the declarant can testify. n1

(5) The declarant is absent from the jurisdiction. Again, if the absence is temporary, the Trial Judge must balance the importance of the testimony with the expected length of absence.

The doctrine of unavailability developed haphazardly at common law in connection with specific hearsay exceptions, rather than as a uniform body of law. Rule 804(a) generally takes a unitary approach, with the exception of the ground of absence, which is discussed below.

[2] Rule 804(a) -- Procuring Unavailability and Party-Specific Availability

The typical common-law provision -- that if the unavailability is wrongly procured by the person calling for the statements of the declarant, the various exceptions will not apply -- is continued in Rule 804(a). A problematic application of this proviso arose in United States v. Kimball, 15 F.3d 54 (5th Cir. 1994) . Kimball's first trial ended in a mistrial. At his second trial, he proffered a transcript of his own testimony given at his first trial. He argued that his testimony was admissible under Rule 804(b)(1), and that he was unavailable to testify at his second trial due to his invocation of his Fifth Amendment privilege. The Court held that the prior testimony was inadmissible because "the sponsor of a declarant's former testimony may not create the condition of unavailability and then benefit therefrom." It reasoned that Kimball had created his own unavailability by declaring the Fifth Amendment privilege. n2

We are troubled by the reasoning in Kimball. Kimball was essentially penalized for exercising a constitutional right. The Court stated that it was "sensitive to the importance of not discouraging or prejudicing a defendant who invokes the fifth amendment." However, it concluded that "a defendant seeking to testify and make exculpatory statements must face cross-examination." What the Court misses is that Kimball had already faced cross-examination at his prior trial. We see no reason why the prior testimony of criminal defendants should be treated any differently from prior testimony of other declarants who invoke the privilege.

[3] Rule 804(a) -- Absence of the Declarant and the Deposition Preference

A declarant is not absent under the terms of Rule 804(a)(5) simply because he is out of the jurisdiction or cannot be located. The party relying on absence to support an offer of hearsay evidence, in the case of any of the basic exceptions covered by subdivision (b) of Rule 804 aside from former testimony, must demonstrate that it has not been possible to take a deposition. The Senate objected to the requirement that an attempt to depose be required. However, the Rule follows the House provision in requiring a showing of inability to obtain testimony of a declarant before a dying declaration, statement against interest, or statement of pedigree can be admitted on the ground that the declarant is absent. As a practical matter, the issue does not arise for statements offered as dying declarations or statements of pedigree. The ground of unavailability for dying declarations is ordinarily death, not absence; and statements of pedigree are rarely offered. So the deposition requirement with respect to the absence ground of unavailability is really limited to situations in which the proponent has a statement that would otherwise be admissible as a declaration against interest, and the asserted ground of unavailability is absence. n3

Rule 804(a)(5) requires an attempt to depose. The rationale is that if a deposition can be taken, the deposition testimony will be admissible as prior testimony; and prior testimony is preferred to the declaration against interest, because prior testimony has been subject to cross-examination. Consequently, if the attempt to depose is successful, the hearsay declarant is no longer considered unavailable and statements falling within 804(b)(3), (or technically (2) or (4)) are no longer admissible for their truth. Note, however, that if the deposition is offered, the deponent may be impeached under Rule 806 with the statements that are inadmissible for their truth.

If the hearsay statement is offered under Rule 804(b)(1), the proponent need not prove an attempt to depose, for the obvious reason that a deposition or its equivalent has already been taken. When the statement is admissible under Rule 804(b)(1), the declarant has already testified under oath and subject to cross-examination; there is thus no need to obtain what would amount to duplicative evidence.

The problems created by the deposition preference in Rule 804(a)(5) are well illustrated by Campbell v. Coleman Co., 786 F.2d 892 (8th Cir. 1986) . The minor plaintiffs alleged that they were severely burned by a defective gasoline lantern that exploded. Coleman had a different theory: that Johnnie Hayes, who was babysitting the children, overfilled the lighted lantern with gasoline, then panicked and threw the burning lantern out of the house where it accidentally hit the children. Coleman had deposed Hayes, but at the deposition, Hayes flatly denied having anything to do with the accident. The deposition was not introduced at trial. However, Hayes had made several statements to various people implicating himself in the accident, and these were introduced at trial as declarations against interest. Coleman contended that Hayes was unavailable on the ground of absence because it had made good-faith attempts to locate him before trial, and he could not be found. The Trial Court admitted the statements, but the Court of Appeals found that this was reversible error, because Hayes was not absent within the meaning of Rule 804(a)(5). As the Court put it, the "subsection is concerned with the absence of testimony, rather than the physical absence of the declarant." Thus, while Hayes was absent from the trial, his testimony was available (i.e., the deposition), and his hearsay statements were therefore not admissible under Rule 804(b)(3).

The result in Coleman shows that the deposition preference can create anomalous results. Hayes's deposition was undoubtedly a less reliable indicator of what happened than were his informal statements against interest. The congressional assumption that a declaration against interest is not necessary where a deposition can be or has been taken assumes that the proponent will get the same information, only better, from the deposition as from the declaration against interest. However, Coleman shows that this is not always the case. The anomaly of the Rule is even more striking when it is considered that if Hayes were dead or declaring the privilege at the time of trial, the declarations against interest would have been admissible. The deposition preference is applied only when absence is the asserted ground of unavailability. Clearly, this makes no sense. If nothing else it is inconsistent with the general goal of Rule 804(a), which was to provide a unitary test of unavailability for all hearsay exceptions. Finally, the deposition preference is problematic because it ends up penalizing parties who depose witnesses in a timely fashion. If Coleman had not bothered to depose Hayes before he disappeared, the declarations against interest would have been admissible. It seems odd to penalize Coleman for engaging in diligent efforts to prepare for litigation.

Of course, as discussed above, the declarations against interest in Coleman would still have been admissible to impeach Hayes under Rule 806. But this assumes that the Hayes deposition would be proffered at the trial. The plaintiffs in Coleman were unlikely to do so, and in fact did not do so, because introducing the deposition would have accomplished little more than to open the door to the damaging "impeachment" evidence that the jury would misuse for its truth. The plaintiffs did not need the Hayes deposition as substantive evidence, given the availability of expert testimony and the sympathetic nature of their case. Moreover, even if the plaintiffs had introduced the deposition, the declarations against interest could not have been used as substantive evidence on Coleman's behalf. This point was made by the Court in Coleman when it rejected Coleman's argument that the introduction of the declarations against interest at trial was harmless error:

> At the close of plaintiffs' case-in-chief, no evidence had been introduced from which Coleman could have argued that plaintiffs' injuries were caused by the negligent actions of a nonparty. Introduction of the inadmissible hearsay created a substantive defense for Coleman... . Plaintiffs were thereby prejudiced.

Because there is a deposition preference in Rule 804(a)(5), however misguided it might be, it follows that a declarant will not be considered absent for purposes of Rules 804(b)(2)-(4) simply because he is outside the jurisdiction and beyond the subpoena power. The Federal Rules of Civil and Criminal Procedure make provision for deposing witnesses who are beyond the territorial jurisdiction of the Court. If the witness is deposable, he is not absent under Rule 804(a)(5). n4

[4] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Former Testimony

Subdivision (b)(1) of Rule 804 provides that former or prior recorded testimony is admissible as an exception to the hearsay rule. Such testimony is defined as that given by a witness at another hearing of the same or a different proceeding, or during the taking of a deposition, under circumstances such that the party against whom the testimony is now offered (or that party's predecessor in interest in a civil case) had an opportunity and similar motive to that which would exist at the time the testimony is offered, to develop testimony.

The touchstone of admissibility is a similar motive to develop the testimony on the part of the nonoffering party (or a predecessor in interest in a civil case).

The way to determine whether or not motives are similar is to look at the issues and the context in which the opportunity for examination previously arose, and compare that to the issues and context in which the testimony is currently proffered. The similar motive inquiry is essentially a hypothetical one: is the motive to develop the testimony at the prior time similar to the motive that would exist if the declarant were produced (which of course he is not) at the current trial or hearing? n5

Under Rule 804(b)(1), it does not matter whether the opportunity for examination came in the form of direct or cross-examination, as long as there was a similar motive and adequate opportunity to develop the testimony of the witness.

[5] Former Testimony -- Predecessor in Interest

In civil cases only, it will suffice that a predecessor in interest had an opportunity and a motive to examine the testimony similar to that of the party against whom the testimony is offered. The Advisory Committee attempted to expand this exception in civil cases to cover situations in which some unrelated party had a similar motive and opportunity for examination. But Congress rejected this innovation. There was a general feeling that it was unfair to bind one party to the examination of another, and so the term "predecessor in interest" was included, to provide for binding effect against nonparties only if they had some juridical relationship with a party to the prior litigation. Yet many of the Court decisions under the Rule are closer to the Advisory Committee's view than to that of Congress. Most Courts apply the term "predecessor in interest" broadly. n6 The difference in views is set forth by Judge Becker and Professor Orenstein in The Federal Rules of Evidence After Sixteen Years -- The Effect of "Plain Meaning" Jurisprudence, the Need for an Advisory Committee on the Rules of Evidence, and Suggestions for Selective Revision of the Rules, 60 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 857, 898 (1992):

> Another circuit split revolves around the definition of the "predecessor-in-interest" requirement of the former testimony exception to hearsay. Rule 804(b)(1) admits testimony of an unavailable witness in a civil case if the party against whom the testimony is offered, or his predecessor in interest, possessed a similar motive and opportunity to cross examine the witness. The definition is complicated by a tortured legislative history. The predecessor-in-interest requirement was added to the Rule to restrict its scope. ... In Lloyd v. American Export Lines, Inc., 580 F.2d 1179 (3d Cir. 1978) , the Third Circuit construed the predecessor-in-interest language as mandating only a "sufficient community of interest" between the prior litigant and party against whom the hearsay is offered. This construction arguably reads the predecessor-in-interest standard out of the Rule. ... Many courts have followed Lloyd's interpretation, n7 but others have adhered to a more narrow interpretation. n8

In our view, the "predecessor-in-interest" language of the Rule should be revised. Congress was concerned about one party being bound by the inadequate cross-examination of a previous litigant with whom the party had no legal relationship. But this assumes that the previous litigant in fact engaged in inadequate cross-examination. As most Courts recognize, if the prior cross-examination was as effective and thorough as the subsequent party could expect to have done, it is not unfair to admit the testimony against that later party. We note that those Courts that adhere to a strict construction of the "predecessor-in-interest" requirement of Rule 804(b)(1) have nonetheless admitted prior testimony under the residual exception as a "near miss" -- so long as the prior cross-examination was effective enough to bind the party against whom the testimony is offered. n9 These Courts are simply evading the "predecessor-in-interest" requirement by invoking the residual exception rather than reading it out of Rule 804(b)(1) -- but the end result is the same. Obviously the Courts are showing discontent with the "predecessor-in-interest" requirement; Congress may have intended to protect against unfairness, but in fact, unfairness is created if probative and reliable evidence is unnecessarily excluded.

[6] Former Testimony -- Grand Jury Testimony

Grand jury testimony is not admissible under Rule 804(b)(1) against a criminal defendant, because the defendant has no opportunity to cross-examine a witness at a grand jury proceeding. But, can grand jury testimony be admitted against the government under Rule 804(b)(1) when it exculpates the defendant? This question arose in United States v. Salerno, 505 U.S. 317 (1992) .

The prosecutor in Salerno granted use immunity to two witnesses who then testified before the grand jury. Contrary to the prosecutor's expectations, the testimony was exculpatory to the defendants. At trial the defendants called the two witnesses, hoping either to obtain favorable trial testimony, or to use the grand jury testimony as prior inconsistent statements admissible under Rule 801(d)(1)(A), should the witnesses change their testimony on the stand. But the witnesses invoked their Fifth Amendment privileges and refused to testify. So the defendants argued that the grand jury testimony was admissible against the government as prior testimony. The government contended that the grand jury testimony could not be admitted under that Rule because the "similar motive" requirement had not been met. The Trial Court agreed with the government, stating that the "motive of a prosecutor in questioning a witness before the grand jury in the investigatory stages of a case is far different from the motive of a prosecutor in conducting a trial."

The Second Circuit held that it was reversible error to exclude the exculpatory grand jury testimony. It found it unnecessary to decide whether a similar motive existed, because it held that "adversarial fairness" prohibited the Government from relying on the similar motive requirement to exclude the exculpatory testimony. The Court of Appeals found it unfair for the government to develop evidence in a one-sided manner, by immunizing some witnesses and not others, depending on whether their testimony was favorable to the Government.

However, the "adversarial fairness" rationale of the Court of Appeals was rejected by the Supreme Court in Salerno. The Court declared that the plain language of Rule 804(b)(1) requires proof of a similar motive in all cases in which hearsay is proffered as prior testimony. The Court contended that it had no authority to override the plain meaning of the Rule by applying notions of adversarial fairness, because Congress "presumably made a careful judgment as to what hearsay may come into evidence and what may not," and that to respect Congress's determination, "we must enforce the words that it enacted." In essence, the Court held that it didn't matter if the government had acted unfairly and had developed the evidence in a one-sided manner: the plain meaning rule prohibited the Court from considering this unfairness.

The question remained whether the prosecution indeed had a similar motive to develop the witnesses' testimony at the grand jury as it would have had at the trial. The Supreme Court remanded this question to the Second Circuit, which ultimately decided it in an en banc opinion. United States v. DiNapoli, 8 F.3d 909 (2d Cir. 1993) (Salerno having died in the interim). The DiNapoli Court rejected the extreme views of both the government and the defendant -- the government arguing that the prosecution never has a similar motive to develop testimony at the grand jury as it would have at trial, and the defendant arguing that the prosecution always has a similar motive to develop grand jury testimony as it would have at trial. The Court analyzed the question of similar motive as follows:

> The proper approach ... in assessing similarity of motive under rule 804(b)(1) must consider whether the party resisting the offered testimony at a pending proceeding has at a prior proceeding an interest of substantially similar intensity to prove (or disprove) the same side of a substantially similar issue. The nature of the two proceedings -- both what is at stake and the applicable burden of proof -- and, to a lesser extent, the cross-examination at the prior proceeding -- both what was undertaken and what was foregone -- will be relevant though not conclusive on the ultimate issue of similarity of motive. n10

Applying these principles to the facts, the DiNapoli Court found that the government did not, in the instant case, have a similar motive to develop the testimony of the witnesses at the grand jury as it would have had at the trial. The Court noted that at the time the witnesses gave exculpatory testimony at the grand jury, there was no question of probable cause as to any of the defendants in the case, because they had already been indicted, and the grand jury was simply investigating whether other defendants should be indicted. The witnesses had essentially denied that there was any conspiracy among the defendants, and at that point, the prosecution could not have been concerned that the grand jury proceeding would have been altered in any way as to the defendants by the testimony. As the Court put it, "The grand jury had already been persuaded, at least by the low standard of probable cause, to believe that the [conspiracy] existed and that the defendants had participated in it to commit crimes." In contrast, at trial, where the government has the burden to prove the defendants guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, the prosecutor would have had a substantial incentive to attack the testimony of exculpatory witnesses.

The DiNapoli Court also relied on the fact that the record showed that the grand jurors had indicated to the prosecutor that they did not believe the testimony of the exculpatory witnesses. The Court concluded that "a prosecutor has no interest in showing the falsity of testimony that a grand jury already disbelieves."

The defendants in DiNapoli argued that the prosecutor himself showed a similar motive to attack the testimony at the grand jury proceeding when he challenged the witnesses, accused them of lying, and confronted them with contradictory evidence. However, the Court did not find this enough for the grand jury proceeding to be considered a trial-like situation:

> A prosecutor may have varied motives for asking a few challenging questions of a grand jury witness who the prosecutor thinks is lying. The prosecutor might want to afford the witness a chance to embellish the lie, thereby strengthening the case for a subsequent perjury prosecution. Or the prosecutor might want to provoke the witness into volunteering some critical new fact in the heat of an emphatic protestation of innocence.

Thus, a prosecutor can challenge an exculpatory witness at a grand jury, to some extent, without crossing the line into a trial-like cross-examination that would result in a finding of a similar motive under Rule 804(b)(1). The DiNapoli Court particularly noted the prosecutor's "careful limitation of questioning to matters already publicly disclosed." That is, the prosecutor was not pulling out all the stops at the grand jury by attacking the witness with secret information, as he might well have done at trial.

While the DiNapoli Court refused to establish a bright-line rule, it is clear that, under the Court's decision, exculpatory grand jury testimony will only rarely be admissible against the government under Rule 804(b)(1). A similarity of motive is likely to be found only where each of three factors exists: (1) the issuance of an indictment is in doubt because the case as to probable cause is close; n11(2) it appears as if the grand jury could have believed the witness; n12 and (3) the witness is in fact attacked in much the same way as he would have been at trial. n13

The same case-by-case sensitivity shown to the government by the DiNapoli Court should also, we think, be applied to determine whether testimony at a preliminary hearing can be admitted against the defendant at the subsequent trial. Strong arguments can be made that the defendant does not have a similar motive to develop preliminary hearing testimony as he would have at trial: (1) the preliminary hearing is at such an early stage of the proceedings that the defendant may not have sufficient evidence with which to cross-examine the witness; (2) like the prosecutor at the grand jury, the defendant at the preliminary hearing has no wish to "tip his hand" by aggressive cross-examination, and would much prefer to attack the witness at trial; and (3) because of the minimal standard of proof, it is often a foregone conclusion that the defendant will lose at the preliminary hearing, so that any attempted cross-examination or impeachment of inculpatory witnesses will be so much wasted effort at that point.

Before Salerno and DiNapoli, the Courts had generally held that preliminary hearing testimony could virtually always be admitted against the defendant at trial under the prior testimony exception. That rule was applied with reluctance by the Third Circuit in Government of Virgin Islands v. Aquino, 378 F.2d 540 (3d Cir. 1967) :

> Were the question one of first impression it would seem that a clear distinction should be recognized between testimony given at a prior trial and testimony given at a preliminary hearing. ... At the preliminary hearing the cross-examiner is much more confined by the nature of the proceeding. ... The fear of adding to the government's case by extensive cross-examination weighs heavily on a defendant's counsel at a preliminary hearing, where much of the government's case remains still in doubt. ... All the arts of cross-examination which are exerted to impair the credibility of a witness are useless in a preliminary hearing. Nevertheless, we must accept for present purposes the rule which makes no distinction between testimony given at a prior trial and the testimony given at a preliminary hearing.

We believe that in light of Salerno and DiNapoli, the admissibility of preliminary hearing testimony under Rule 804(b)(1) should be reconsidered. If Courts are sympathetic to the prosecutor's plight at the grand jury, we believe that they should be equally sympathetic to the defendant's plight at the preliminary hearing.

It should also be noted that some Circuits appear to have a bright-line rule that exculpatory grand jury testimony is always admissible against the government at trial, i.e., that there is always a similar motive to attack the exculpatory testimony at these two proceedings. n14

[7] Rule 804(b)(2) -- Dying Declarations

Rule 804(b)(2) expands the common-law exception for dying declarations. Unlike the common law, the Federal Rule provides that dying declarations are admissible in civil cases as well as in homicide prosecutions. n15

The Rule contains a subject matter limitation, in that the statement must concern the immediate causes and circumstances of the death. n16 Statements of historical fact ("Joe shot me, just like he tried to do last year") are not admissible under this exception.

The proponent must prove that the declarant made the statement under belief of impending death and have given up all hope of recovery. So for example if the declarant's injuries do not appear serious, or are not treated as such by medical personnel, then the statement is unlikely to be admissible as a dying declaration. n17

[8] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Statements Against Interest

Rule 804(b)(3) expands the common-law exception for declarations against interest. Prior to the enactment of the Federal Rules, declarations against interest were usually limited to statements against pecuniary or proprietary interests. This Rule expands the exception to cover declarations against penal interests, i.e., statements that could tend to subject the declarant to criminal liability. n18 Both Houses of Congress rejected the Advisory Committee position that this exception should include statements against "social" interest. But the Rule makes clear that statements subjecting a person to civil liability and statements rendering claims invalid are included in the definition of statements against interest.

[9] Statements Against Interest -- Corroboration Requirement for Against Penal Interest Statements

If the defendant in a criminal case offers evidence of a declaration against penal interest to exculpate himself, he must make a showing that corroborating circumstances exist that "clearly indicate the trustworthiness of the statements." n19 The mere fact that the statement could tend to subject the declarant to criminal liability is not enough if the accused offers it in his favor; the accused must also show other factors supporting the truthfulness of the statement. n20 This is apparently an attempt to respond to the problem of one criminal of dubious credibility trying to exculpate another. n21

Rule 804(b)(3) does not purport to define "corroborating circumstances." The Advisory Committee on Evidence Rules is considering an amendment to Rule 804(b)(3), and the Advisory Committee Note to the proposed amendment provides a helpful discussion of the corroborating circumstances requirement. That discussion proceeds as follows:

> The Committee notes that there has been some confusion over the meaning of the "corroborating circumstances" requirement. See United States v. Garcia, 897 F.2d 1413, 1420 (7th Cir. 1990) ("the precise meaning of the corroboration requirement in rule 804(b)(3) is uncertain"). For example, some courts look to whether independent evidence supports or contradicts the declarant's statement. See, e.g., United States v. Mines, 894 F.2d 403 (4th Cir. 1990) (corroborating circumstances requirement not met because other evidence contradicts the declarant's account). Other courts hold that independent evidence is irrelevant and the court must focus only on the circumstances under which the statement was made. See, e.g., United States v. Barone, 114 F.3d 1284, 1300 (1st Cir. 1997) ("The corroboration that is required by Rule 804(b)(3) is not independent evidence supporting the truth of the matters asserted by the hearsay statements, but evidence that clearly indicates that the statements are worthy of belief, based upon the circumstances in which the statements were made.").
>
> The case law identifies some factors that may be useful to consider in determining whether corroborating circumstances clearly indicate the trustworthiness of the statement. Those factors include (see, e.g., United States v. Bumpass, 60 F.3d 1099, 1102 (4th Cir. 1995)) :
>
> (1) the timing and circumstances under which the statement was made;
>
> (2) the declarant's motive in making the statement and whether there was a reason for the declarant to lie;
>
> (3) whether the declarant repeated the statement and did so consistently, even under different circumstances;
>
> (4) the party or parties to whom the statement was made;
>
> (5) the relationship between the declarant and the opponent of the evidence; and
>
> (6) the nature and strength of independent evidence relevant to the conduct in question.
>
> Other factors may be pertinent under the circumstances. The credibility of the witness who relates the statement in court is not, however, a proper factor for the court to consider in assessing corroborating circumstances. To base admission or exclusion of a hearsay statement on the credibility of the witness would usurp the jury's role in assessing the credibility of testifying witnesses. United States v. Katsougrakis, 715 F.2d 769 (2d Cir. 1983) .
>
> The corroborating circumstances requirement assumes that the court has already found that the hearsay statement is genuinely disserving of the declarant's penal interest. See Williamson v. United States, 512 U.S. 594, 603 (1994) (statement must be "squarely self-inculpatory" to be admissible under Rule 804(b)(3)). "Corroborating circumstances" therefore must be independent from the fact that the statement tends to subject the declarant to criminal liability. The "against penal interest" factor should not be double-counted as a corroborating circumstance. n22

Neither the text of Rule 804(b)(3) nor the legislative history is precise on the degree of corroboration required. Some Courts have construed the "clearly indicating trustworthiness" requirement very strictly, demanding that "the inference of trustworthiness from the proffered corroborating circumstances must be strong, not merely allowable." n23 Other Courts, in consideration of the defendant's constitutional right to due process and an effective defense, have refused to apply the corroboration requirement in so strict a manner. n24 We believe that the burden placed on the accused has in many cases been too high -- so high that the exception itself often has little utility. It makes no sense to apply the corroboration standard so strictly that, if the defendant can meet it, he will probably never have been charged or tried in the first place.

On the other hand, the defendant's own protestations of innocence cannot be deemed sufficient corroboration; if that were enough, the corroboration requirement would be read out of the Rule as a practical matter. n25

[10] Declarations Against Interest -- In Which Cases Does the Corroborating Circumstances Requirement Apply?

Rule 804(b)(3) is striking in its asymmetry. Assume that three people are allegedly involved in a drug conspiracy -- Declarant, who is now dead, and Bill and Mike, who are being tried separately. Assume further that Declarant told a friend that he and Bill were selling the drugs as a two-person team. Under the plain meaning of the Rule, assuming this entire statement in context is disserving to Declarant's penal interest, it would be admissible against Bill without more. However, Mike would have to provide corroborating circumstances supporting the trustworthiness of the statement before it could be admitted in his favor. Thus, the Rule on its face imposes an evidentiary burden on the accused, to which the prosecution is not subject for the same statement.

Congress gave no explanation for its discriminatory application of the corroborating circumstances requirement of Rule 804(b)(3). n26 Commentators have argued that it violates due process and equal protection to impose an evidentiary burden on the defendant, but not on the state, for the same statement. n27

If anything, the admissibility requirements for a declaration against penal interest should be applied more strictly against the prosecution than against the defendant. The defendant has both a right to confront adverse witnesses, and a right to compulsory process for favorable witnesses. This should mean that as a general matter the defendant should receive at least some slight benefit of the doubt in excluding hearsay offered by the prosecution and in admitting hearsay offered by the defense.

These arguments have led some Courts to impose a corroborating circumstances requirement for all declarations against penal interest, whether they are offered by the prosecution or the defense. n28 The problem is that a symmetrical application of the Rule, though reasonable, is contrary to the plain meaning of the Rule; and as indicated in Salerno, the Court construes the Rules by their plain meaning without regard to whether they are fair in application -- at least so long as the unfairness does not approach absurdity or unconstitutionality. In light of the plain meaning mandate of the Supreme Court cases, some Courts have felt constrained to hold that declarations against penal interest need not be corroborated when offered by the prosecution. n29

The Advisory Committee considered an amendment to Rule 804(b)(3) that would have applied a corroborating circumstances requirement to government-offered statements. But this proposal was ultimately rejected due to strong opposition from the Justice Department. The Department argued that it already had an evidentiary burden beyond that set forth in the Rule -- specifically the requirement that the hearsay statement satisfy not only the text of the Rule but also the accused's right to confrontation. The argument was that it would be unduly burdensome to saddle the government with a third evidentiary requirement of corroborating circumstances.

Another question is whether corroborating circumstances should be required when a declaration against penal interest is offered in civil cases. The Rule does not by its terms require such a showing. Yet at least one Court has held that the requirement must be met. In American Automotive Accessories, Inc. v. Fishman, 175 F.3d 534 (7th Cir. 1999) , the Court found it important to have a "unitary standard" for declarations against penal interest, no matter in what case and no matter by whom they are offered.

[11] Statements Against Interest -- Disserving of Declarant's Interest

The Courts are in some disagreement about the degree to which a statement must be disserving to the declarant in order to qualify as a declaration against interest under Rule 804(b)(3). An example of the problem is United States v. Harwood, 998 F.2d 91 (2d Cir. 1993) . Harwood and McKee were both charged with drug offenses arising from a search of a van in which drugs were found. Both defendants employed blame-shifting defenses, each claiming that he was an unwitting rider and the other defendant was the drug dealer. Harwood offered a statement made by McKee to a newspaper reporter after they were arrested. McKee had stated that Harwood had simply been "at the wrong place at the wrong time," and that the same thing would have happened to anyone who was driving with McKee at that time. The Trial Court excluded the statement, and the Court of Appeals found no error. Judge McLaughlin concluded that McKee's statement was not sufficiently disserving to qualify under Rule 804(b)(3). He argued that the statement did not "expose McKee to criminal liability" and that it seemed "only to suggest that Harwood was arrested at an inopportune time."

According to the Harwood Court, a statement will not be sufficiently disserving to qualify under the Rule unless it squarely and unequivocally implicates the declarant in criminal activity or exposes the declarant to civil liability. n30 Yet this is not the only possible reading of the Rule; that strict reading conflicts with the Rule's permissive language that a statement need only "tend" to subject the declarant to criminal liability. As the Ninth Circuit has stated: "If Congress had wanted courts to take a restrictive approach to whether a statement is against penal interest, it would not have chosen the broadly worded phrase 'tended to subject' in Rule 804(b)(3)." n31 In fact situations similar to Harwood, other Courts have found statements exculpating a defendant to be sufficiently disserving to the declarant. n32 These Courts reason that when the declarant says that the defendant was not involved, he is implicitly stating that he, the declarant, was involved. This reasoning is, we think in harmony with the permissive language of the Rule.

It is true that McKee did not explicitly state that Harwood was never involved in the drug transaction. He said, more colloquially, that Harwood was in the wrong place at the wrong time. But certainly, a reasonable person in the declarant's position would know what could be taken from that statement. Given the oblique and coded manner in which most people talk in real life, it is unreasonable to limit Rule 804(b)(3) to explicit statements admitting guilt. We think that the Rule was designed for real life, and was not intended to be limited to the statements of masters of locution or students of English composition.

All this is not to say that the context in which a statement is made is irrelevant. A statement that appears to be highly incriminating on its face may in fact be either neutral or self-serving depending on the context in which it was made. n33 For example, in United States v. Silverstein, 732 F.2d 1338 (7th Cir. 1984) , the defendant was charged with murdering a prison guard. He proffered a statement from another prisoner who confessed to the murder. However, the Court found that the statement was not sufficiently disserving because the declarant was already serving three consecutive life sentences -- "and what would a fourth consecutive life sentence add to the three previous ones?" In addition, there was evidence that the declarant was a sympathizer with the prison gang to which the defendant belonged. Accordingly, the Court, correctly we think, held that the statement was only facially and not contextually disserving, and thus was inadmissible even under the liberal "tendency" test set forth in the Rule. n34

Is a hearsay statement sufficiently disserving to a declarant's penal interest if the declarant subsequently declares the Fifth Amendment privilege as to the same subject matter? This was one of the questions in United States v. Thomas, 62 F.3d 1332 (11th Cir. 1995) . The defendants were loan brokers who were convicted of fraud. The government offered proof at trial that the defendants took fees and yet made no effort to obtain loans for their customers. The defendants proffered hearsay statements from members of a Texas brokerage group with which the defendants did business. These statements indicated that the defendants had aggressively pursued their clients' interests, and had relied upon the representations of the Texas brokers group that the group would present the defendants' loan packages to lenders for funding. The Court held that the statements of the Texas brokers were not admissible under Rule 804(b)(3), because the statements did not inculpate the declarants in any way -- indeed the statements tended to exculpate both the declarants and the defendants from any allegation of participation in a fraud. The defendants argued that the statements had to be inculpatory, because the Texas brokers had invoked their Fifth Amendment privilege and refused to testify at the defendants' trial. But the Court rejected this argument:

> The "against penal interest" requirement of Rule 804(b)(3) is more narrow than the Fifth Amendment's declaration that no person "shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself." The [Texas brokers] might well have invoked their Fifth Amendment privilege because they feared that on crossexamination ... the prosecutor would wrench from them statements, within the scope of the direct examination, that incriminated them even though their earlier testimony had not. In contrast, Rule 804(b)(3) requires the proffered statements themselves to be so against ... penal interest that [the Texas brokers] would not have made those statements unless they believed them to be true.

Thomas is, we believe, another example of a Court that has construed the "against penal interest" requirement too strictly -- at least where the statement is offered to exculpate a criminal defendant. A person invokes the Fifth Amendment privilege where a compelled statement would "tend" to incriminate him. It is hard to see why the "tendency" test for the Fifth Amendment should be construed any differently from the "tendency" test for the "against penal interest" requirement.

[12] Statements Against Interest -- Accomplice Statements to Law Enforcement

In Williamson v. United States, 512 U.S. 594 (1994) , the Court considered the admissibility under Rule 804(b)(3) of a confession by a defendant's accomplice made to law enforcement. The declarant, Harris, was stopped and arrested for possessing a large quantity of cocaine in his rental car. Harris admitted trafficking in drugs and identified Williamson as the source of the drugs. The agent testified that he had promised to report any cooperation by Harris to the Assistant United States Attorney, but that Harris was not promised any reward or other benefit for cooperating. Harris refused to testify at Williamson's trial. The District Court then ruled that, under Rule 804(b)(3), the agent could relate all of what Harris had said to him. The Judge reasoned that while the part of the confession implicating Williamson was not particularly disserving to Harris, it was part of a broader account (Harris's confession of drug activity) that was disserving. The Court of Appeals affirmed.

The Supreme Court unanimously vacated and remanded the decision, on the ground that the Lower Courts had not properly applied Rule 804(b)(3). However, there was dispute among the Justices as to the scope of the Rule. Justice O'Connor, writing for six members of the Court on this point, held that the Rule covers statements only to the extent that they are disserving; neutral or self-serving aspects of a broader declaration are not admissible under the Rule. Justice O'Connor began her analysis by noting two possible readings of the term "statement" in the Rule:

> One possible meaning, "a report or narrative," Webster's Third New International Dictionary 2229, defn. 2(a) (1961), connotes an extended declaration. Under this reading, Harris' entire confession -- even if it contains both self-inculpatory and non-self-inculpatory parts -- would be admissible so long as in the aggregate the confession sufficiently inculpates him. Another meaning of "statement," "a single declaration or remark," ibid., defn. 2(b), would make Rule 804(b)(3) cover only those declarations or remarks within the confession that are individually self-inculpatory.

Justice O' Connor contended that the narrower meaning of "statement" was mandated by the "principle behind the Rule." She elaborated as follows:

> Rule 804(b)(3) is founded on the commonsense notion that reasonable people, even reasonable people who are not especially honest, tend not to make self-inculpatory statements unless they believe them to be true. This notion simply does not extend to the broader definition of "statement." The fact that a person is making a broadly self-inculpatory confession does not make more credible the confession's non-self-inculpatory parts. One of the most effective ways to lie is to mix falsehood with truth, especially truth that seems particularly persuasive because of its self-inculpatory nature. ... [W]hen part of the confession is actually self-exculpatory, the generalization on which Rule 804(b)(3) is founded becomes even less applicable. Self-exculpatory statements are exactly the ones which people are most likely to > make even when they are false; and mere proximity to other, self-inculpatory, statements does not increase the plausibility of the self-exculpatory statements.

In our view, the most faithful reading of Rule 804(b)(3) is that it does not allow admission of non-self-inculpatory statements, even if they are made within a broader narrative that is generally self-inculpatory. The District Court may not just assume for purposes of Rule 804(b)(3) that a statement is self-inculpatory because it is part of a fuller confession, and this is especially true when the statement implicates someone else.

While six members of the Court agreed that the narrow definition of "statement" was mandated by the Rule, these Justices split four to two in applying that narrow test to Harris' declarations. Justice O'Connor, writing only for herself and Justice Scalia on this point, declared that "[s]ome of Harris' confession would clearly have been admissible under Rule 804(b)(3); for instance, when he said he knew there was cocaine in the suitcase, he essentially forfeited his only possible defense to a charge of cocaine possession, lack of knowledge." n35 On the other hand, the parts of the confession that implicated Williamson by name "did little to subject Harris himself to criminal liability. A reasonable person in Harris' position might even think that implicating someone else would decrease his practical exposure to criminal liability, at least so far as sentencing goes." Because the District Court failed to make a searching, fact-intensive inquiry as to whether each of Harris' statements was self-inculpatory, Justice O'Connor concluded that a remand was required.

Justice Ginsburg, joined by Justices Blackmun, Stevens, and Souter, agreed that Rule 804(b)(3) "does not allow admission of non-self-inculpatory statements, even if they are made within a broader narrative that is generally self-inculpatory." Unlike Justice O'Connor, however, Justice Ginsburg concluded that none of the statements made by Harris were self-inculpatory in any sense, because "Harris' arguably inculpatory statements are too closely intertwined with his self-serving declarations to be ranked as trustworthy." She contended that Harris' statements projected "an image of a person acting not against his penal interest, but striving mightily to shift principal responsibility to someone else." Thus, Justice Ginsburg was much more skeptical about whether a post-custodial statement to a police officer could ever be self-inculpatory to the extent it implicated a nondeclarant. Justice Ginsburg concluded that the case should be remanded, but only to determine whether the admission of Harris' statements constituted harmless error.

Justice Kennedy, joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justice Thomas, argued for a broader meaning of the term "statement." He contended that Rule 804(b)(3) "contemplates exclusion of a collateral self-serving statement, but admission of a collateral neutral statement."

While there certainly was disagreement among the Justices in Williamson, it is clear that the majority of the Court has taken a cautious and narrow approach to statements offered under Rule 804(b)(3), especially when they are post-custodial statements to police officers and identify the defendant as a perpetrator. Even Justice Kennedy, who rejected the majority's narrow view of the term "statement," nonetheless emphasized that hearsay would not be admissible under the Rule unless, in context, it was truly self-inculpatory at least in part. All the Justices in Williamson were clearly aware of the possibility that a statement made by an arrestee to a police officer may in fact be self-serving to the extent it implicates others. It may well be an attempt to curry favor even though it appears on its face to inculpate the declarant. Because of Williamson -- and especially because of the later Confrontation Clause case of Crawford v. Washington -- Courts have now consistently held that accomplice confessions to law enforcement are not admissible against the accused in any part. n36

Lower Courts after Williamson and now Crawford have distinguished between statements made while in custody to police officers and statements made to others before the declarant has been arrested. Statements made to police officers have been found not disserving under Williamson, given their context and the likelihood that the declarant may be simply shifting blame or currying favor with law enforcement. Indeed, the very facts and result in Williamson indicate that it is not disserving to the declarant to implicate others in a post-arrest confession. n37 Even more importantly, such statements are "testimonial" under Crawford, in which the Court held that statements made during police interrogation are "testimonial" and that if hearsay is "testimonial" its admission violates the accused's right to confrontation. n38

On the other hand, if the statement is made outside the context of a post-custodial confession, Courts generally conclude that a statement identifying another as taking part in a crime tends to implicate the declarant as well. A good example is United States v. Moses, 148 F.3d 277 (3d Cir. 1998) . Moses was a County official who allegedly accepted kickbacks from Gaudelli, a commercial vendor who did business with the County. Moses challenged the admissibility of Gaudelli's statements implicating Moses in the kickback scheme. At the trial, Gaudelli's friend and colleague testified that Gaudelli said on several occasions that he was "taking care" of Moses "moneywise." The Court held that these statements directly implicating Moses were also self-inculpatory of Gaudelli, and therefore were properly admitted under Rule 804(b)(3). The Court analyzed the impact of Williamson as follows:

> Under Williamson, the proper approach in cases involving out-of-court statements implicating other people is to examine the circumstances in which the statements are made in order to determine whether they are self-inculpatory or self-serving. In Williamson, where the declarant implicated another person while in police custody and after already having confessed to the crime, the Court concluded that the naming of the defendant did little to further implicate the declarant and may have been an effort to secure a lesser punishment through cooperation. ... In the instant case, by contrast, Gaudelli made his statements to a friend during lunch conversations that took place long before Gaudelli was arrested. Under these circumstances, there is no reason to believe that Gaudelli was trying to avoid criminal consequences by passing blame to Moses. Moreover, by naming Moses, as well as the place where he was meeting Moses to make payments, Gaudelli provided self-inculpatory information that might have enabled the authorities to better investigate his wrongdoing. See Williamson (explaining that a declarant's statement as to where he hid a gun would be self-inculpatory "if it is likely to help the police find the murder weapon"). Given the context and content of Gaudelli's statements to Tutro, we agree with the district court that they were sufficiently self-inculpatory so as to satisfy the requirements of Rule 804(b)(3).

Thus, Gaudelli's statement "I am paying off Moses" tends to inculpate Gaudelli more than a statement like "I am paying kickbacks." The specific identification of Moses, as opposed to anyone else, would make it easier for the police to investigate the crime and prosecute Gaudelli if they ever received the information. Moreover, by identifying Moses, a government official, Gaudelli implicated himself in a more serious crime of bribery than if he simply admitted making kickbacks to an unidentified person. n39 In contrast, if the specific identification of Moses occurred in Gaudelli's post-arrest interview, the part identifying Moses could not be deemed inculpatory of Gaudelli. Once Gaudelli has been arrested, the incentive to curry favor with authorities would outweigh any self-inculpatory possibility in identifying a specific accomplice.

Thus, admissions of crime by accomplices made other than to law enforcement are sufficiently disserving to the declarant to be admissible under Williamson. And as a constitutional matter, such admissions are not "testimonial" for the same reason -- they are not made to law enforcement with an expectation that they will be used in a criminal prosecution. n40

[13] Statements Against Interest -- Are Statements Exculpating Another Disserving to the Declarant?

On its face the Williamson Court's narrow construction of the term "statement" is equally applicable to inculpatory and exculpatory statements offered under Rule 804(b)(3). So a statement that "I robbed the bank and Joe did not" runs into similar problems under Williamson when it is offered by Joe. The argument from the government is that the statement "I robbed the bank" is self-inculpatory, but the statement "Joe did not" is a collateral statement that adds nothing to inculpate the declarant. There is a good argument to be made, however, that the concerns expressed by the Court in Williamson are not necessarily applicable to statements exculpating a nondeclarant. Clearly the main concern of all of the Justices in Williamson was that a declarant could inculpate a person in a postcustodial confession in an attempt to curry favor with the authorities. This danger generally does not arise with respect to statements that exculpate another, so there is some argument for applying the Williamson standard more flexibly for exculpatory statements -- especially given the criminal defendant's constitutional right to an effective defense. n41

This more flexible approach is exemplified by the Ninth Circuit's decision in United States v. Paguio, 114 F.3d 928 (9th Cir. 1997) . The defendants, husband and wife, were charged with bank fraud arising out of forged documentation filed in a bank loan application. The application was prepared and the loan was arranged by Paguio's father, ostensibly on behalf of the defendants; the application was ultimately signed by the defendants. After the fraud was uncovered, the father made a statement to the son's lawyer, to the effect that he, the father, had engineered the whole transaction, and that the defendants "had nothing to do with it." The father was unavailable for trial. The Trial Court held that the part of the father's statement referring to his own conduct was admissible as a declaration against penal interest, but that the part exculpating the defendants was not. The Court found this ruling reversible error. The Court reasoned that the father admitted "not only participation but leadership, leading his son and daughter-in-law into the abyss. Because leading others into wrongdoing has always been seen as bad, there is a sentencing enhancement for it. Also, in context, the inculpating and exculpating statements were not practically separable." The Court held that Williamson did not require severance of the statements:

> Williamson does not mean that the trial judge must always parse the statement and let in only the inculpatory part. It means that the statement must be examined in context, to see whether as a matter of common sense the portion at issue was against interest and would not have been made by a reasonable person unless he believed it to be true. Sometimes that requires exclusion of part of the statement, sometimes not. A reasonable man caught with a trunk full of cocaine, like the unavailable declarant in Williamson, might well imagine that he could advance his own penal interest by fingering someone else. But Paguio Sr.'s statement that "my son had nothing to do with it" was not an attempt to shift blame or curry favor.

The Paguio Court noted that the Williamson analysis might play out differently when statements exculpating, rather than inculpating, another person are involved:

> When the prosecution attempts to take advantage of the rule, as in Williamson, the statement is typically in the form, "I did it, but X is guiltier than I am." As a matter of common sense, that is less likely to be true of X than "I did it alone, and not with X." That is because the part of the statement touching on X's participation is an attempt to avoid responsibility or curry favor in the former, but to accept undiluted responsibility in the latter.
>
> Prosecution use of an unavailable declarant's accusation of the defendant, as in Williamson, raises different concerns from a defendant's use of an unavailable declarant's confession which exonerates him. ... The Constitution gives the "accused," not the government, the right of confrontation. ... The accused's right to present witnesses in his own defense may be implicated where an absent declarant's testimony is improperly excluded from evidence. ... We raise the constitutional asymmetry because it helps explain why application of the rule of evidence is to some extent asymmetrical between defense and prosecution.

Accordingly, after Williamson, inculpatory declarations against interest should be strictly construed, especially when the statement is made while the declarant is in custody, and especially after Criwford. Exculpatory declarations against interest should receive a somewhat more permissive scrutiny. So long as an exculpatory statement would tend to disserve the declarant's interest, and is supported by some corroborative circumstances or independent evidence, the statement should be admitted.

[14] Rule 804(b)(4) -- Statements of Personal or Family History

Subdivision (b)(4) of Rule 804 is divided into two parts. Part (A) provides that declarants' statements concerning their own family history (including marriage, divorce, birth, and ancestry) are admissible as an exception to the hearsay rule even though the declarant had no means of acquiring personal knowledge of the matters stated. n42

Part (B) of the Rule provides that a statement concerning the same kind of personal or family history can be introduced even though the declarant is speaking about another person, if the declarant is closely related to the other person (as by blood, adoption, or marriage), or so intimately associated with the other's family, as to have accurate information concerning the matter declared. This expands the common-law exception somewhat. It drops the general common-law requirement that a declaration in this area must be made ante litem motam, on the ground that this bears more appropriately on weight than admissibility. It also expands the class of cases in which a declarant can speak about someone else, rejecting the common-law rule that a declarant could not speak on the basis of intimate association with someone's family.

[15] Residual Exception

Two residual hearsay exceptions were contained in the Federal Rules as initially adopted. These exceptions were designed to permit the admission of trustworthy hearsay that did not fit under any of the categorical exceptions. The residual exceptions were identically worded; one was placed in Rule 803 (subdivision (24)), and the other was placed in Rule 804 (subdivision (b)(5)). In 1997, the residual exceptions were transferred out of Rules 803 and 804, and combined in a single exception, Rule 807. This was done to facilitate additions to Rules 803 and 804. No change in meaning was intended. See the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 807, § 807.02, for a discussion of the residual exception. All of the annotations to the residual exception, including cases decided before the effective date of the amendment, are set forth under Rule 807, § 807.03.

[16] Forfeiture by Wrongdoing

In 1997, a new hearsay exception was added to Rule 804. Rule 804(b)(6) provides that a party forfeits the right to object to a hearsay statement when the declarant has become unavailable and the party has caused or acquiesced in wrongdoing that was intended to and did create that unavailability. The most obvious situation for employing this exception is where a criminal defendant kills a witness, or has him killed, to prevent him from testifying; by engaging in this conduct, the defendant has forfeited the right to object on hearsay grounds to any of the victim's statements. The Rule was derived from cases that have held that a criminal defendant forfeits his right to confrontation if he causes or acquiesces in the witness' unavailability. n43 If the defendant's conduct is such as to cause a forfeiture of the constitutional objection, it should a fortiori be enough to cause a forfeiture of the parallel hearsay objection.

The Rule is not limited to criminal defendants, however. Any party who causes or acquiesces in wrongdoing with the intent to render a declarant unavailable forfeits the right to object to the unavailable declarant's hearsay statement. So for example, if a prosecutor intentionally intimidates a defense witness so that the witness refuses to testify, the prosecution loses the right to interpose a hearsay objection with respect to any statement that the witness may have made. The same goes for parties in civil cases. The Rule mandates forfeiture for "wrongdoing" but the conduct need not rise to the level of criminal activity. n44

Under the Rule, it must be shown that the party against whom the evidence is offered acted with intent to procure the unavailability of the declarant as a witness. If the defendant kills a declarant simply because he did not like him, or because he was burned in a drug deal by him, then the defendant has not forfeited his right to object to the declarant's hearsay statement.

This does not mean, however, that a forfeiture can be found only if the party wakes up one day and says "I intend to act wrongfully and render the witness unavailable." The intent to render a witness unavailable can be inferred from wrongful activity. As the Court stated in United States v. Cherry, 217 F.3d 811 (10th Cir. 2000) , a defendant may be deemed to have forfeited a hearsay objection if "(1) he or she participated directly in planning or procuring the declarant's unavailability through wrongdoing, ... or (2) the wrongful procurement was in furtherance, within the scope, and reasonably foreseeable as a necessary consequence of an ongoing conspiracy." (emphasis added) In Cherry, a witness was murdered by conspirators of the defendants. The Trial Judge found that some of the defendants had no knowledge of or participation in the murder of the witness; it therefore found that their hearsay objections had not been forfeited. The Court of Appeals reversed and remanded. Under the test set out above, a forfeiture still can be found even if the defendants did not have specific input into the murder of the witness. The Court remanded to determine whether the murder could reasonably have been foreseen as a necessary consequence of the conspiracy. Thus, a forfeiture would be found if it was implicitly understood by the conspirators that all witnesses should be killed if any of their fellow conspirators were brought to trial. n45

Before the amendment, there was dispute among the Courts as to the standard of proof required to prove a forfeiture. In United States v. Thevis, 665 F.2d 616 (5th Cir. 1982) , the Court required clear and convincing evidence that the defendant had a declarant killed before finding a forfeiture. In contrast, the Court in United States v. Mastrangelo, 693 F.2d 269 (2d Cir. 1982) , found a forfeiture where the prosecution proved by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant procured the death of a declarant. According to the Advisory Committee, Rule 804(b)(6) adopts the "usual Rule 104(a) preponderance of the evidence standard ... in light of the behavior the new Rule 804(b)(6) seeks to discourage." n46 The Advisory Committee apparently reasoned that if a standard of proof higher than a preponderance were required, more parties would be disposing of witnesses. The preponderance standard discourages this misconduct, relatively speaking, because the hearsay testimony is more likely to be admitted than it would be under a clear and convincing standard -- making disposal of the witness more likely to be an inefficient act. One might question, however, whether a party thinking about disposing of a witness will factor in the Federal Rules of Evidence in deciding on a course of action -- especially a Rule based on the rather nuanced difference between two standards of proof.

[17] The Rule 804 Exceptions and the Confrontation Clause

The Editorial Explanatory Comments to Rules 801 and 803 considered whether statements admissible under those exceptions would satisfy the Confrontation Clause if admitted against an accused. A similar question arises with respect to hearsay statements admissible under Rule 804 -- does the fact that a hearsay statement satisfies the admissibility requirements of one of the Rule 804 exceptions also mean that it satisfies the requirements of the Confrontation Clause?

Before the Court's decision in Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004) , the answer to that question was "yes." This was because the Court in Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. 56 (1980) , held that the Confrontation Clause guarantees that only reliable hearsay can be admitted against an accused, and that hearsay fitting within a "firmly-rooted" hearsay exception automatically satisfied the constitutional reliability requirements. Moreover, if the hearsay does not fit a firmly-rooted exception, the statement can nonetheless be found reliable if it carries "particularized guarantees of trustworthiness." Cases after Roberts had essentially held that all of the Rule 804 exceptions were either "firmly-rooted" or required particularized guarantees of trustworthiness.

But the Court's analysis in Crawford complicates that answer somewhat. What follows is a short discussion of Crawford, and then a discussion of how statements admitted under Rule 804 square with Crawford.

Crawford:

The Court in Crawford held that the defendant's right to confrontation was violated because uncross-examined "testimonial" hearsay was admitted against him at trial under a state hearsay exception for declarations against interest. Crawford involved a statement made by the defendant's wife to police officers that implicated the defendant and herself. Under the jurisprudence established in Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. 56 (1980) , a hearsay statement satisfies the Confrontation Clause if (1) it fits a "firmly-rooted" hearsay exception, or (2) the statement carries "particularized guarantees of trustworthiness" that assure its reliability. The State Courts found that Mrs. Crawford's statement to police officers satisfied the "particularized guarantees of trustworthiness" prong of Roberts, reasoning that Mrs. Crawford was not trying to shift blame, and that she was relating relatively recent events to a "neutral" police officer.

The Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice Scalia, rejected the Roberts structure for determining whether a hearsay statement satisfies the Confrontation Clause, at least if the hearsay is "testimonial." Justice Scalia engaged in an extensive historical analysis and determined that the original intent of the Confrontation Clause was not to exclude unreliable evidence per se, but rather to exclude "testimonial" evidence that had not been cross-examined by the accused.

The bottom line from Crawford is that "testimonial" hearsay statements cannot be admitted against an accused unless the declarant is unavailable and the accused has or had the opportunity to cross-examine the declarant. Unless these two requirements are met, the "testimonial" hearsay statement must be excluded even if it is clearly reliable and even if it fits into a standard hearsay exception. An example of a statement that would qualify under Crawford is testimony from a prior trial in which the defendant was subject to the same charges, and the witness is unavailable for the subsequent trial.

On the other hand, if the hearsay statement is not "testimonial," the Courts after Crawford have uniformly held that the Roberts test continues to regulate the admissibility of the hearsay. While the Court in Crawford at least implied that there would be no constitutional regulation for non-testimonial hearsay, and was no fan of the Roberts reliability requirement, the Lower Courts after Crawford have reasoned that Roberts applies to non-testimonial hearsay until the Supreme Court specifically rules otherwise; and it did not so rule in Crawford, which involved only "testimonial" hearsay. n47

So a critical question after Crawford is whether a hearsay statement is "testimonial" or not. Surprisingly, the Supreme Court did not try to define the term "testimonial." The closest the Court came to a definition is set forth in the following passage:

> Various formulations of this core class of "testimonial" statements exist: "ex parte in-court testimony or its functional equivalent -- that is, material such as affidavits, custodial examinations, prior testimony that the defendant was unable to cross-examine, or similar pretrial statements that declarants would reasonably expect to be used prosecutorially," Brief for Petitioner 23; "extrajudicial statements ... contained in formalized testimonial materials, such as affidavits, depositions, prior testimony, or confessions," White v. Illinois, 502 U.S. 346, 365 (1992) (THOMAS, J., joined by SCALIA, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment); "statements that were made under circumstances which would lead an objective witness reasonably to believe that the statement would be available for use at a later trial," Brief for National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers et al. as Amici Curiae 3. These formulations all share a common nucleus and then define the Clause's coverage at various levels of abstraction around it.
>
> **...
>
> ... Whatever else the term ["testimonial"] covers, it applies at a minimum to prior testimony at a preliminary hearing, before a grand jury, or at a former trial; and to police interrogations. These are the modern practices with closest kinship to the abuses at which the Confrontation Clause was directed.

In another part of the opinion, the Court indicated that statements taken at guilty plea allocutions are testimonial:

> Courts have invoked Roberts to admit other sorts of plainly testimonial statements despite the absence of any opportunity to cross-examine. See United States v. Aguilar, 295 F.3d 1018, 1021-1023 (CA9 2002) (plea allocution showing existence of a conspiracy); United States v. Centracchio, 265 F.3d 518, 527-530 (CA7 2001) (same); United States v. Dolah, 245 F.3d 98, 104-105 (CA2 2001) (same); United States v. Petrillo, 237 F.3d 119, 122-123 (CA2 2000) (same).

While the precise definition of "testimonial" is not clear, n48 what is clear is that Crawford provides some limitation on the use of hearsay by the prosecution in federal criminal trials.

Statements Admitted Under Rule 804 and the Confrontation Clause:

While it is difficult to generalize in the absence of a clear definition of what "testimonial" means, a preliminary analysis of the major Rule 804 exceptions indicates the following:

(1) Prior testimony. Prior testimony is by definition "testimonial" but it also by definition comports with the Confrontation Clause under Crawford because it has been subject to cross-examination by the defendant.

(2) Dying declarations. Statements admitted as dying declarations may or may not be testimonial. If the declarant is being questioned by a police officer just before he dies, it is likely that the statement is testimonial under Crawford. If the declarant makes a deathbed statement to his mother, then it is probably not testimonial. Yet there remains a question, after Crawford, about the constitutional admissibility of even testimonial dying declarations. In a footnote in Crawford, the Court noted that it had held in the 19th century that a statement admitted as a dying declaration did not violate the accused's right to confrontation. That particular statement may have been testimonial. In the Crawford footnote, the Court bowed to precedent and entertained the possibility that a hearsay statement fitting the dying declarations exception might be admissible even though it is testimonial. The posited rationale was that the dying declarations exception was essentially as old as time itself. Ultimately, the Court found it unnecessary to decide whether a dying declaration would be an "exception" to the Court's new rule precluding testimonial hearsay. It did say that if it was an exception, it would be "sui generis." And as to nontestimonial dying declarations, they clearly comply with Roberts. In Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) , the Court held that a hearsay exception is firmly rooted if it has had a longstanding tradition of acceptance by the Courts. Clearly, Rule 804(b)(2) satisfies this standard.

(3) Declarations against interest. As discussed earlier, the standards of admissibility under Williamson (for the hearsay exception) and Crawford (for the Confrontation Clause) are essentially the same. If a confession is made to law enforcement, it is not admissible under the hearsay exception because it is not disserving, and it is not admissible under the Confrontation Clause because it is testimonial. And if a confession is made informally to friends, it is admissible under the hearsay exception because it is disserving, and it is admissible under the Confrontation Clause because it is not testimonial. n49

If the declaration against penal interest is not testimonial, then its constitutional admissibility is governed by the Roberts test. The application of Roberts to Rule 804(b)(3) is somewhat complicated. The Supreme Court in Lilly v. Virginia, 527 U.S. 116 (1999) , held that the hearsay exception for declarations against penal interest is not firmly-rooted. Therefore, to satisfy Roberts such statements must carry particularized guarantees of trustworthiness. It is highly likely, if not certain, that a statement admissible as a declaration against penal interest after Williamson will by that fact carry sufficient particularized guarantees of trustworthiness to satisfy Roberts. As the Court stated in Williamson, "The very fact that a statement is generally self-inculpatory -- which our reading of Rule 804(b)(3) requires -- is itself one of the particularized guarantees of trustworthiness that makes a statement admissible under the Confrontation Clause." The disserving nature of the statement, which is required for admissibility under Rule 804(b)(3), will generally qualify the statement under the Confrontation Clause requirements for non-firmly rooted hearsay. n50 Lower Courts have found it unnecessary to hold that Rule 804(b)(3) is firmly-rooted, because they have found that statements that fall within the exception after Williamson will, by that fact, carry the circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness required for non-firmly-rooted hearsay under the Confrontation Clause. n51 So the bottom line, even after Lilly, is that statements that are admissible under Federal Rule 804(b)(3) after Williamson will, by that fact, satisfy the Confrontation Clause.

(4) Statements of pedigree. To the extent this exception is applicable in criminal cases, it appears that statements of pedigree would not be made under testimonial circumstances; and as nontestimonial hearsay, the exception would satisfy the "traditionally accepted" definition of a firmly rooted exception set forth in Bourjaily.

(5) Residual exception. This has been transferred to Rule 807. See the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 807 at § 807.02[8] for a discussion of the relationship between the residual exception and the Confrontation Clause.

(6) Forfeiture by wrongdoing. In Crawford the Court held that if the defendant engaged in wrongdoing to keep a witness from testifying, this conduct would constitute a forfeiture of the right to confrontation. The standards for forfeiture under Rule 804(b)(6) and the Confrontation Clause are the same. n52

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. See, e.g., United States v. Faison, 679 F.2d 292 (3d Cir. 1982) (a key government witness was found unavailable because he was in the hospital with a heart problem, but the Court of Appeals found that this ruling was error; while much deference is accorded a Trial Judge when deciding whether or not to adjourn a trial, the Court found that in this case, there was an abuse of discretion in refusing to grant a continuance for a reasonable period).

(n2)Footnote 2. See also United States v. Bollin, 264 F.3d 391 (4th Cir. 2001) (defendant procured his own unavailability by refusing to testify; therefore his exculpatory grand jury testimony was not admissible as prior testimony); United States v. Peterson, 100 F.3d 7 (2d Cir. 1996) (exculpatory grand jury testimony given by the defendant at a parallel state proceeding was not admissible under the prior testimony exception, because the defendant was not unavailable to testify at trial; the defendant exercised his privilege not to testify at trial, and by doing so he procured his own unavailability: "When the defendant invokes his Fifth Amendment privilege, he has made himself unavailable to any other party, but he is not unavailable to himself.").

(n3)Footnote 3. The deposition preference issue will probably not arise under Rule 804(b)(6), the hearsay exception based on forfeiture by misconduct. That exception applies only if the party against whom the hearsay is offered intentionally created the witness's unavailability. If the party has engaged in such conduct, the declarant is quite unlikely to be available for a deposition. At any rate, the deposition preference by its terms applies only to statements offered under Rules 804(b)(2)-(4).

(n4)Footnote 4. See, e.g., United States v. Curbello, 940 F.2d 1503 (11th Cir. 1991) (a declaration against interest was not admissible where the declarant was incarcerated in the Bahamas and could have been deposed under Fed. R. Crim. P. 15).

(n5)Footnote 5. See, e.g., United States v. Tannehill, 49 F.3d 1049 (5th Cir. 1995) (testimony from a prior multi-defendant trial on the same charges was admissible under Rule 804(b)(1); the defendant argued that at the first trial, his strategy was to "disappear into the woodwork and hope for the best," but the defendant's motive for cross-examination at both trials was similar: "to discredit the witness and separate himself from the other members of the conspiracy"). See also Battle v. Memorial Hosp., 228 F.3d 544 (5th Cir. 2000) (deposition testimony should have been admitted against the defendants under Rule 804(b)(1); the defendants were on the same side of the same issues at the deposition and at trial and they had the same interest in asserting and prevailing on those issues; the defendants claimed that they did not aggressively test the witness' deposition answers with cross-examination-type questions because they were motivated only by the desire to understand the plaintiffs' case; but the defendants could not suggest a single question or line of questions that would have added reliability to the deposition); United States v. Poland, 659 F.2d 884 (9th Cir. 1981) (identification testimony given at a hearing on a defendant's motion to suppress could be admitted when the identification witness died; the basic questions at the hearing concerned suggestiveness and reliability, so the defense had the same motive to examine the witness at the hearing as it would have at the trial); New England Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Anderson, 888 F.2d 646 (10th Cir. 1989) (an insurance company brought an action to set aside a life insurance policy as fraudulently procured by a beneficiary, who allegedly conspired to murder the insured, her first husband; testimony given by an unavailable witness at the trial of another conspirator was properly excluded, as the defendant in that case was not disposed to protect the interests of the defendant in the instant case, but rather would be likely to shift the blame to her, so he had no "like motive" to develop the same facts).

(n6)Footnote 6. See, e.g., Supermarket of Marlinton, Inc. v. Meadow Gold Dairies, Inc., 71 F.3d 119 (4th Cir. 1995) (in an antitrust action, testimony by a dairy official testifying as a government witness in a prior criminal conspiracy trial was admissible as former testimony, even though the dairies were not the defendants in the criminal case; privity is not the gravamen of a Rule 804(b)(1) analysis; rather, the issue is whether the party who cross-examined the witness had a motive similar to that of the party against whom the testimony is offered).

(n7)Footnote 7. See, e.g., Horne v. Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corp., 4 F.3d 276 (4th Cir. 1993) (in a product liability case resulting from asbestos exposure, the Court held that a deposition from another asbestos case was properly admitted against the plaintiff as prior testimony, even though she had no relationship to the plaintiff in that prior litigation; the party against whom the deposition is offered "must point up distinctions in her case not evident in the earlier litigation that would preclude similar motives of witness examination"; the plaintiff in this case was in the same situation with respect to asbestos exposure as the plaintiff in the case in which the deposition was taken); Clay v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 722 F.2d 1289 (6th Cir. 1983) (deposition from a prior litigation is admissible against a nonparty to that litigation, where the party who cross-examined the deponent had the same goal in cross-examination as the party against whom the deposition is now offered).

(n8)Footnote 8. See, e.g., In re Screws Antitrust Litig., 526 F. Supp. 1316 (D. Mass. 1981) (testimony was not admissible against a nonparty to the prior litigation who had no legal relationship with the party against whom the testimony was originally offered).

(n9)Footnote 9. See, e.g., Dartez v. Fibreboard Corp., 765 F.2d 456 (5th Cir. 1985) (a deposition was offered against a defendant who was not a party to the litigation in which the deposition was taken; the party who cross-examined the deponent was not a predecessor in interest because there was no legal relationship between them; however, because the defendant could have added nothing to the cross-examination that did take place, the deposition was admissible against the defendant under the residual exception, as a "near miss" of the prior testimony exception).

(n10)Footnote 10. See also United States v. Lombard, 72 F.3d 170 (1st Cir. 1995) (the defendant was acquitted in State Court on two murder charges, then charged with firearms possession and other charges arising out of the murder; testimony from the State Court trial as to the events preceding and after the murders was properly admitted, because the defendant had a similar motive to cross-examine a witness in the prior murder charges about these matters).

(n11)Footnote 11. See, e.g., United States v. Peterson, 100 F.3d 7 (2d Cir. 1996) (exculpatory grand jury testimony in a prior state criminal proceeding was not admissible as prior testimony in a federal trial on firearm charges; even assuming that the state government could be considered a predecessor in interest of the federal government, the similar motive requirement of Rule 804(b)(1) was not met; the evidence before the state grand jury "provided ample probable cause to indict Peterson for possession" and therefore there was no reason for the government to attack Peterson's exculpatory testimony in the same manner as it would have done at trial).

(n12)Footnote 12. See, e.g., United States v. Foster, 128 F.3d 949 (6th Cir. 1997) (exculpatory grand jury testimony should have been admitted against the government under Rule 804(b)(1); at the time the witness testified, the outcome of the grand jury proceeding was in doubt, and there was no indication that the grand jury did not believe the witness).

(n13)Footnote 13. See also United States v. Jackson, 335 F.3d 170 (2d Cir. 2003) (statement made at guilty plea proceeding was not admissible against the government under Rule 804(b)(1), because the government's motive to develop the testimony at a plea hearing is not similar to the motive it would have at trial).

(n14)Footnote 14. See United States v. Miller, 904 F.2d 65 (D.C. Cir. 1990) (holding that the requirements of Rule 804(b)(1) were satisfied because the government had the same motive and opportunity to question the witness at the grand jury as it would have had if the witness had testified at trial); United States v. Lester, 749 F.2d 1288 (9th Cir. 1984) (error to exclude exculpatory grand jury testimony where the government had ample opportunity to cross-examine the witness during the grand jury proceeding); United States v. Young Brothers, Inc., 728 F. 2d 682 (5th Cir. 1984) (Rule 804(b)(1)'s concern for adversarial cross-examination is met by the government's previous opportunity to question a witness during a grand jury hearing).

(n15)Footnote 15. The effect of the Confrontation Clause on the admissibility of dying declarations offered against the accused is discussed at the end of this Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 804.02[17].

(n16)Footnote 16. See, e.g., United States v. Fernandez, 892 F.2d 976 (11th Cir. 1989) (holding it was improper to admit grand jury testimony as a dying declaration; the witness' belief of impending death would not bring his statements within the dying declaration exception because he was not testifying as to the cause or circumstances of his impending death).

(n17)Footnote 17. United States v. Lawrence, 349 F.3d 109 (3d Cir. 2003) (victim's statement not admissible as a dying declaration where medical treatment was undertaken with the expectation that he would survive, and the nursing staff "tried to keep his spirits up" by telling him he would recover).

(n18)Footnote 18. The impact of the Confrontation Clause on the declaration against penal interest exception in criminal cases is discussed at the end of this Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 804.02[17].

(n19)Footnote 19. By the terms of the Rule, there is no corroborating circumstances requirement for statements against the declarant's pecuniary interest. Such a statement is admissible upon a showing that it so tends to disserve the declarant's pecuniary interest that a reasonable person would not have made the statement unless it were true.

(n20)Footnote 20. See, e.g., United States v. DeVillio, 983 F.2d 1185 (2d Cir. 1993) (defendants sought to intro duce a statement from a surveillance tape made by a member of the conspiracy, to the effect that the declarant, and not the defendants, had participated in a burglary; the Court held that the Rule 804(b)(3) exception was inapplicable because there was no eyewitness corroboration for the statement).

(n21)Footnote 21. See, e.g., United States v. Mackey, 117 F.3d 24 (1st Cir. 1997) (justifying the corroborating circumstances requirement in light of the possibility that "one criminal can make out-of-court statements exculpating another and then rather easily claim the privilege when the government seeks to cross-examine him to discredit the statement.").

(n22)Footnote 22. See, e.g., United States v. Dean, 59 F.3d 1479 (5th Cir. 1995) (finding no error in the Trial Court's exclusion of a hearsay statement by the defendants' accomplice, made during the accomplice's plea negotiations, and which exculpated the defendants; the statement was not sufficiently corroborated; the fact that the accomplice admitted guilt did not preclude others' guilt; the statement contained many questionable claims; and the evidence of the defendants' involvement in the crime was strong).

(n23)Footnote 23. See, e.g., United States v. Salvador, 820 F.2d 558 (2d Cir. 1987) (independent evidence must corroborate both the declarant's trustworthiness and the truth of the statement). See also United States v. Silverstein, 732 F.2d 1338 (7th Cir. 1984) (the fact that the declarant had the opportunity to commit the crime with which the defendant was charged "was not clearly corroborative of his confession, but merely consistent with it"); United States v. MacDonald, 688 F.2d 224 (4th Cir. 1982) (statement by a declarant that she was involved in the murder of the defendant doctor's family was not sufficiently corroborated, in part because the declarant was a drug addict, even though the defendant's claim was that his family was killed by drug addicts looking for drugs in his home).

(n24)Footnote 24. See, e.g., United States v. Barrett, 539 F.2d 244 (1st Cir. 1976) (noting that because of constitutional concerns, the standard for corroboration cannot be so strict "as to be utterly unrealistic.").

(n25)Footnote 25. See, e.g., United States v. Rodriguez, 706 F.2d 31 (2d Cir. 1983) (a statement is not admissible where the only corroboration is the defendant's own statements).

(n26)Footnote 26. The legislative history of the second sentence of Rule 804(b)(3) indicates that the merits of a one-way corroboration requirement were never seriously considered or debated. Professor Tague has done an exhaustive search of the Advisory Committee proceedings, Standing Committee proceedings, and Congressional proceedings on Rule 804(b)(3). See Tague, Perils of the Rulemaking Process: The Development, Application, and Unconstitutionality of Rule 804(b)(3)'s Penal Interest Exception, 69 Georgetown L.J. 851 (1981). His research indicates the following:

(1) The initial Advisory Committee proposal had no corroboration requirement at all. To the contrary, the proposal contained a sentence, referred to as "the Bruton sentence." This sentence provided that "a statement or confession offered against the accused in a criminal case, made by a codefendant or other person implicating both himself and the accused," was not admissible under the exception. Thus, the initial proposal was basically a one-way rule of admissibility in favor of criminal defendants.

(2) Senator McClellan vigorously opposed the proposed Rule. This opposition threatened to scuttle all the proposed Evidence Rules, and the Advisory Committee thought that it might even lead to Congressional change of the Rules process itself. Senator McClellan was concernned that defendants would get unsavory characters to claim that they and not the defendant did the crime charged -- then these unsavory characters would simply declare the privilege and refuse to testify at the defendant's trial. He suggested a corroboration requirement. The Advisory Committee saw no problem with a corroboration requirement because Professor Cleary, the Reporter, believed that it was already inherent in the "against penal interest" requirement. Cleary also reasoned that any corroboration requirement would be automatically met by a simple declaration from the defendant that he was innocent. So essentially, the Advisory Committee saw no harm in throwing Senator McClellan a bone. As a result, the Advisory Committee added the following sentence to the proposed Rule:

> "Statements tending to expose the declarant to criminal liability and offered to exculpate the accused must, in addition, be corroborated."

(3) Apparently the Committee saw no need to consider the application of a corroboration requirement to statements offered by the prosecution, because under its proposal, declarations against penal interest could not be offered by the prosecution due to the Bruton sentence. But Senator McClellan was not satisfied. He demanded that the Committee delete the Bruton sentence. He convinced the Committee that the Bruton sentence was overbroad "because not every statement made by a declarant implicating the accused is an attempt to curry favor with the authorities." The Committee decided to delete the Bruton sentence from the rule and to change the note to state that a court should determine the penal interest effect of such a statement in each case. But the Committee never addressed or recognized the disparity it then created by imposing a corroboration requirement on the accused but not on the prosecution. This seems simply to have been an oversight due to the sequencing of the changes -- first the addition of a corroboration requirement at a time when inculpatory statements were inadmissible under the Rule; then a change to the rule to permit some admissibility of inculpatory statements, without thinking about how the two changes would fit together.

(4) The House Subcommittee decided to beef up the corroboration requirement -- apparently unconvinced that the Advisory Committee version would prevent the accused from corroborating by a simple protestation of his own innocence. The Subcommittee changed the second sentence of the rule to provide that "A statement tending to expose the declarant to criminal liability and offered to exculpate the accused is not admissible unless corroborating circumstances clearly indicate the trustworthiness of the statement." The House Subcommittee also decided to put the "Bruton sentence" back into the Rule, apparently because the Subcommittee thought it was constitutionally impermissible to admit accomplice hearsay against an accused.

(5) The Senate Judiciary Committee accepted the House's version of the rule and the corroboration requirement, but deleted the Bruton sentence. The Senate passed this version of the rule without discussion. The Senate's position on the Bruton sentence prevailed in Conference. The rationale for deleting the Bruton sentence was that the Evidence Rules should avoid trying to codify constitutional doctrine. No thought was given to the evidentiary question of whether the Rule would permit uncorroborated declarations against penal interest when offered by the prosecution.

(6) Only one person in the entire legislative process flagged the anomaly of the one-way corroboration requirement. During a markup session in the House Subcommittee, Representative Holtzman asked why the corroboration requirement should not be imposed on the government. Associate counsel to the subcommittee responded that a corroboration requirement imposed on the government would be superfluous "because Bruton created a confrontation clause bar to all government offered penal interest statements by an unavailable declarant." Thus, the Subcommittee was (mis)informed that inculpatory penal interest statements would never be admissible as a constitutional matter. Clearly, Bruton does not extend so far as to exclude all against-penal-interest statements offered against the accused.

(n27)Footnote 27. See, e.g., Tague, Perils of the Rulemaking Process: The Development, Application, and Unconstitutionality of Rule 804(b)(3)'s Penal Interest Exception, 69 GEO. L.J. 851, 990 (1981) (concluding that due process and equal protection are violated by an asymmetrical corroborating circumstances requirement).

(n28)Footnote 28. See, e.g., United States v. Barone, 114 F.3d 1284 (1st Cir. 1997) (applying a corroborating circumstances requirement for statements offered by the prosecution under Rule 804(b)(3), while noting that the Rule "does not explicitly require" corroboration for such statements); United States v. Garcia, 897 F.2d 1413 (7th Cir. 1990) (requiring corroborating circumstances for inculpatory declarations against penal interest); United States v. Rasmussen, 790 F.2d 55 (8th Cir. 1986) (applying corroborating circumstances requirement to government-offered statements; noting the defendant's right to confrontation); United States v. Alvarez, 584 F.2d 694 (5th Cir. 1978) (noting that "by transplanting the language governing exculpatory statements onto the analysis for admitting inculpatory hearsay, a unitary standard is derived which offers the most workable basis for applying Rule 804(b)(3)").

(n29)Footnote 29. See, e.g., United States v. Bakhtiar, 994 F.2d 970 (2d Cir. 1993) (an inculpatory declaration against interest was properly admitted even without a showing of corroboration).

(n30)Footnote 30. See also United States v. Butler, 71 F.3d 243 (7th Cir. 1995) (the Trial Court properly excluded a hearsay statement from a person on the premises during a police raid; the declarant accused the police of planting guns found in the house on the defendant because they knew that the defendant was a felon; the defendant argued that the hearsay statement was disserving to the declarant, because the declarant admitted that he was in the room where the weapons were found, and was thus opening himself up to possible weapons charges; but the Court held that the statement was not sufficiently disserving, because the declarant did not specifically admit that he had possession of or owned any gun; at most, the statement put the declarant at risk of being in some type of constructive possession of a gun, which "is not a risk sufficient to provide the guarantee of reliability or truthfulness the 804(b)(3) exception is based on"); United States v. Wilkinson, 754 F.2d 1427 (2d Cir. 1985) (a statement made by the declarant that the defendant did not know that the declarant was selling drugs was held insufficiently disserving to qualify under Rule 804(b)(3)).

(n31)Footnote 31. United States v. Satterfield, 572 F.2d 687 (9th Cir. 1978) . See also United States v. Thomas, 571 F.2d 285 (5th Cir. 1978) (rejecting a government argument that the statement did not qualify as a declaration against interest because the declarant did not expressly confess guilt: "[B]y referring to statements that 'tend' to subject the declarant to criminal liability, the Rule encompasses disserving statements by a declarant that would have probative value in a trial against the declarant.").

(n32)Footnote 32. See, e.g., United States v. Barrett, 539 F.2d 244 (1st Cir. 1976) (statement that Buzzy was not at the robbery inculpates the declarant due to the implication that the declarant was at the robbery).

(n33)Footnote 33. See, e.g., United States v. Jones, 124 F.3d 781 (6th Cir. 1997) (statement by the defendant's son, exculpating the defendant, was properly excluded; the defendant and his son had a close relationship, the statement was made on the eve of the defendant's trial, and was made in response to two letters from the defendant telling the son to say, and it was made after consultation with the defendant's attorney); United States v. Bobo, 994 F.2d 524 (8th Cir.

1993) (a statement by the defendant's brother to the effect that he, and not the defendant, had a gun, was insufficiently trustworthy to be admissible in the defendant's trial for felon-gun possession; the sibling relationship diminishes the trustworthiness of the statement, and the statement was suspiciously timed, having been made on the eve of trial); United States v. Riley, 657 F.2d 1377, 1384 (8th Cir. 1981) ("Depending on the circumstances in which it is made, a particular statement which is ostensibly disserving may in fact be either neutral or self-serving.").

(n34)Footnote 34. See also United States v. Innamorati, 996 F.2d 456 (1st Cir. 1993) (grand jury testimony of an accomplice was not sufficiently disserving to the declarant to be admissible as a declaration against interest; taken as a whole, the statement greatly minimized the declarant's role in the wrongdoing; the declarant admitted a few acts of logistical assistance, claiming they were innocently motivated); United States v. Albert, 773 F.2d 386 (1st Cir. 1985) (codefendant's statement accepting total responsibility for a crime was not admissible to exculpate the defendant; the statement was taken at the time of the codefendant's sentencing, at which point the codefendant had a self-interest in accepting responsibility).

(n35)Footnote 35. This interpretation of Rule 804(b)(3) -- that an accomplice's confession to law enforcement could be admitted in some part -- has now been rejected as a matter of constitutional law in Crawford v. Washington. Under Crawford, an accomplice's confession to law enforcement is "testimonial" and as such its admission violates the confrontation rights of the accused. Crawford is discusssed at the end of this Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 804.02[17].

(n36)Footnote 36. See, e.g., United States v. Rodriguez-Marrero, 390 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2004) (confession of an accomplice that incriminated the defendant could not be admitted against the defendant after Crawford; whatever the limits of the term "testimonial", it clearly covers sworn statements by accomplices to police officers, and Crawford holds that "testimonial" hearsay is barred by the Confrontation Clause in the absence of cross-examination); United States v. Jones, 371 F.3d 363 (7th Cir. 2004) (accomplice's statement to law enforcement was inadmissible against the defendant even though it was redacted to take out any direct reference to the defendant; even though redacted, the confession was testimonial, as it was made during interrogation by law enforcement; as the defendant never had a chance to cross-examine the accomplice, "under Crawford, no part of Rock's confession should have been allowed into evidence").

(n37)Footnote 37. See, e.g., United States v. McCleskey, 228 F.3d 640 (6th Cir. 2000) (statement by declarant implicating the defendant, made to police officers after arrest, was erroneously admitted; the statement was not admissible under Rule 804(b)(3) because of "the incentive brought to bear upon such an accomplice to shift and spread blame to other persons"); United States v. Mendoza, 85 F.3d 1347 (8th Cir. 1996) (statement made while accomplice in custody is not against the declarant's interest and therefore was improperly admitted under Rule 804(b)(3))

(n38)Footnote 38. United States v. Rashid, 383 F.3d 769 (8th Cir. 2004) (an accomplice's confession to law enforcement officers was testimonial and therefore inadmissible against the defendant, even though the confession did not specifically name the defendant and incriminated him only by inference).

(n39)Footnote 39. See also United States v. Tocco, 200 F.3d 401 (6th Cir. 2000) (in a RICO prosecution of a Mafia leader, it was not error to admit statements made by another Mafia leader to his son that described the roles of the declarant, the defendant and others in the organization; the statements were not inadmissible simply because they identified someone other than the declarant; the declarant's statements linked him to specific coconspirators and thus were against his own penal interest, especially since the statements were not made with the hope of implicating others to gain favor with the police); United States v. Wilson, 160 F.3d 732 (D.C. Cir. 1998) (in a trial for murdering a government witness, the prosecution introduced post-murder statements by a codefendant to two friends in which he said that he had gone to the other defendants' home on the evening of the murder and told them the victim was in the area; the Court found the statements were against the declarant's interest; they were made the day after the murder to a man who had witnessed the murder and to another who knew the victim, and they were potentially incriminating because they linked the declarant to a specific conspiracy).

(n40)Footnote 40. See, e.g., United States v. Franklin, 415 F.3d 537 (6th Cir. 2005) (accomplice told a friend that he was "stressed out," because he and the defendant had robbed a bank and he thought the authorities were on their trail; this statement was admissible as a declaration against penal interest, as it disserved the accomplice's interest and was not made to law enforcement officers in any attempt to curry favor with the authorities; moreover the statement was not testimonial under Crawford because it was made by happenstance to a friend, not to a "police officer or a government informant seeking to elicit statements to further a prosecution"); Ramirez v. Dretke, 398 F.3d 691 (5th Cir. 2005) (accomplice's confession to his roommate were not testimonial under Crawford: "There is nothing in Crawford to suggest that 'testimonial evidence' includes spontaneous out-of-court statements made outside any arguably judicial or investigatorial context.").

(n41)Footnote 41. See, e.g., United States v. Nagib, 56 F.3d 798 (7th Cir. 1995) (statements exculpating the defendant, made by the declarant at sentencing, were all sufficiently against the declarant's penal interest: "[T]here is no indication in the record that [the declarant] attempted to curry favor with the authorities when making his statement at sentencing. There is no record of any plea agreement or downward departure for cooperation.").

(n42)Footnote 42. See, e.g., United States v. Olafson, 203 F.3d 560 (9th Cir. 2000) (in a prosecution for transporting illegal aliens, statements given to the Border Patrol by men found in the defendant's van were properly admitted; the men stated that they were citizens of Mexico, so their declarations were admissible as statements of their own personal history).

(n43)Footnote 43. See, e.g., United States v. Aguiar, 975 F.2d 45 (2d Cir. 1992) ; United States v. Carlson, 547 F.2d 1346 (8th Cir. 1976) .

(n44)Footnote 44. See, e.g., United States v. Scott, 284 F.3d 758 (7th Cir. 2002) ("Scott argues that his actions were not sufficiently evil because they were not akin to murder, physical assault, or bribery. Although such malevolent acts are clearly sufficient to constitute 'wrongdoing,' they are not necessary.").

(n45)Footnote 45. See also United States v. Thompson, 286 F.3d 950 (7th Cir. 2002) (agreeing with Cherry "that if a murder is reasonably foreseeable to a conspirator and within the scope and in furtherance of the conspiracy, the conspirator waives his right to confront that witness just as if he killed the witness himself.").

(n46)Footnote 46. See United States v. Zlatogur, 271 F.3d 1025 (11th Cir. 2001) (holding that the clear and convincing evidence standard of Thevis has been rejected by Rule 804(b)(6)).

(n47)Footnote 47. See, e.g., Horton v. Allen, 370 F.3d 75 (1st Cir. 2004) (non-testimonial hearsay should be evaluated under the Ohio v. Roberts test to determine whether it violates the defendant's right to confrontation); United States v. Holmes, 406 F.3d 337 (5th Cir. 2005) (with respect to nontestimonial hearsay statements, "Crawford leaves in place the Roberts approach to determining admissibility."); United States v. Franklin, 415 F.3d 537 (6th Cir. 2005) ("the Supreme Court did not explicitly overrule its prior Confrontation Clause jurisprudence with its holding in Crawford" insofar as it applied to nontestimonial hearsay; "Consequently, with respect to non-testimonial hearsay statements, Roberts and its progeny remain the controlling precedents.").

(n48)Footnote 48. The Court may provide a further indication of what it means by "testimonial" in the 2005-6 Term, as it has granted certiorari in two state cases involving the admissibility of 911 calls and reports to police officers after Crawford.

(n49)Footnote 49. See, e.g., United States v. Manfre, 368 F.3d 832 (8th Cir. 2004) (an accomplice made a statement to his fiancee that he was going to burn down a nightclub for the defendant; this statement was properly admitted as a declaration against penal interest, as it was not a statement made to law enforcement to curry favor but rather was made informally to a loved one; for the same reason, the statement was not testimonial under Crawford; it was a statement made to a loved one and was "not the kind of memorialized, judicial-process-created evidence of which Crawford speaks.").

(n50)Footnote 50. See United States v. Sasso, 59 F.3d 341 (2d Cir. 1995) (statements implicating the defendant were admissible under Rule 804(b)(3) because they exposed the declarant to criminal liability and were not made to curry favor with anyone: "Given the totality of the circumstances as to the content and context [of the statements], we conclude that the statements bore sufficient indicia of reliability that their admission against Sasso did not violate Sasso's confrontation rights.").

(n51)Footnote 51. See, e.g., United States v. Tocco, 200 F.3d 401 (6th Cir. 2000) (the Court reads Lilly as requiring a showing of "particularized guarantees of trustworthiness" for accomplice's statements, but finds that standard met in this case, because the statements were truly self-inculpatory and made to the declarant's son in confidence rather than to the police).

(n52)Footnote 52. See United States v. Montague, 421 F.3d 1099 (10th Cir. 2005) ("Forfeiture by wrongdoing is an independent ground for the admissibility of hearsay testimony that survives Crawford.").

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
CHAPTER 804 RULE 804

4-804 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 804.03

804.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Rule 804(a) -- Definition Of Unavailability

[a] Rule 804(a) -- Absent or Unavailable

[i] Rule 804(a) -- Absent or Unavailable -- Codefendant in Criminal Case

United States v. Robbins, 197 F.3d 829 (7th Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed convictions arising out of a large-scale marijuana operation. It held that a codefendant was unavailable for purposes of Rule 804 because he was not subject to being called by the government in its case-in-chief; the codefendant's statement to his former fianc'e that he "sold pot" with Robbins was admissible against the codefendant as an admission and against Robbins as a declaration against interest.

[ii] Rule 804(a) -- Absent or Unavailable -- Good Faith Effort To Produce

Creamer v. General Teamsters Local Union 326, 560 F. Supp. 495 (D. Del. 1983) : The Court indicated that former testimony could be admitted where a witness was shown to be unavailable by an affidavit stating that counsel was unable to locate the witness even though he checked the telephone directory of the last known city of residence, reviewed transcripts and Court files in order to discover the address of the witness, contacted government agencies and attorneys, and contacted the witness' local attorney.

United States v. Mathis, 550 F.2d 180 (4th Cir. 1976) : The Court affirmed armed bank robbery convictions, rejecting the contention that a government witness' prior testimony should not have been admitted under Rule 804(b)(1) because the government had erroneously released the witness from a District of Columbia penal institution pursuant to a Court order requiring the release of another prisoner bearing the same name. The Court held that the government had made a good faith effort, and that the witness was not reasonably available.

United States v. Foster, 128 F.3d 949 (6th Cir. 1997) : The Court reversed a conviction for cocaine offenses because the defendant had not been permitted to introduce exculpatory testimony given by a witness before the grand jury. Although defense counsel was informed that the witness gave exculpatory testimony in July, he did not learn the substance of the testimony until it was ordered turned over to him on September 7; he issued a subpoena for the witness on the 8th, three days before the start of the trial, and that subpoena was returned unexecuted. The Court held that in these circumstances, the defense had made a good faith effort to procure the declarant's attendance, and the fact the effort was unsuccessful made the witness unavailable for purposes of Rule 804(a)(5).

United States v. Johnson, 108 F.3d 919 (8th Cir. 1997) : In the retrial of a drug-trafficking case, the government had not subpoenaed the K-9 officer who supervised the dog-sniff search of the defendant's car, but upon learning he was on vacation in Florida, moved unsuccessfully for a continuance when he could not be located. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the officer's former testimony, given its relative unimportance to the case, its reliability, and the defendant's failure to note any specific need for cross-examination beyond that at the first trial. In the fourth trial of the defendant's drug trafficking and firearms charges in United States v. Flenoid, 949 F.2d 970 (8th Cir. 1991) , defense counsel showed he was unable to locate one "not very rooted" witness. The Court held that in the circumstances it was prejudicial error not to declare the witness unavailable and admit her testimony given at previous trials of the case. In a dispute arising out of a barge breakaway, Azalea Fleet, Inc. v. Dreyfus Supply & Mach. Corp., n1 the Court upheld the admission of an unavailable witness' testimony from a prior trial, rejecting an argument that the party offering the testimony had not adequately demonstrated unavailability because it waited until three days before trial to attempt to serve a subpoena on the witness. The Court noted that there was no showing that an earlier attempt would have been successful.

[iii] Rule 804(a) -- Absent or Unavailable -- Inadequate Efforts To Produce

[A] Rule 804(a) -- Civil Cases

Kirk v. Raymark Indus., Inc., 61 F.3d 147 (3d Cir. 1995) : Reversing a verdict for the plaintiff in an asbestos case, the Court also held that it was error to admit the testimony given by an expert for the defendant in an unrelated asbestos trial. In proffering the testimony as prior testimony contradicting the defendant's defense in the instant case, the plaintiff argued that the expert was unavailable because he was beyond the subpoena power. The Court noted, however, that the plaintiff had made no attempt to contact the expert and offer him his usual expert witness fee, so she failed to prove that she used "reasonable means" to enlist his services.

Perricone v. Kansas City S. Ry., 630 F.2d 317 (5th Cir. 1980) : The Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff in a railroad crossing case on the ground that a witness' prior testimony was erroneously admitted when counsel claimed the witness could not be found, even though he had not looked in the phone book for the name of the witness (where it was listed). After the jury returned its verdict, the defendant's claims agent showed he was able to find the witness in two hours. But, in Bailey v. Southern Pac. Transp. Co., n2 the Court said that a Trial Judge could accept counsel's representations about the unavailability of a witness, and that an objecting party must demonstrate error in the Judge's acceptance of the representations.

Garcia-Martinez v. City & County of Denver, 392 F.3d 1187 (10th Cir. 2004) : The plaintiff, an illegal immigrant, brought a § 1983 action for use of excessive force in an arrest. Fearing arrest for immigration offenses, he returned to Honduras before the trial. Affirming a judgment for the defendants, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding a deposition of the plaintiff, which was offered in lieu of his live testimony. The plaintiff's absence at trial was calculated, so it was "due to the procurement or wrongdoing" of the proponent, and his failure to attempt to obtain a temporary visa or to use an alternative to live testimony, such as video-conferencing, meant that he had not demonstrated "a good faith effort ... to obtain the declarant's presence at trial using reasonable means." One Judge dissented, on the ground that the plaintiff's absence was not procured by him but by the government, which placed him under a standing deportation order, and any effort to obtain a temporary visa would have been futile. In Angelo v. Armstrong World Indus., 11 F.3d 957 (10th Cir. 1993) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendants in an asbestos personal injury action, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding a witness' deposition, where there was no showing the plaintiffs had made reasonable efforts by subpoena or otherwise to procure the witness' appearance to testify.

[B] Rule 804(a) -- Absent or Unavailable -- Inadequate Efforts To Produce -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Mann, 590 F.2d 361 (1st Cir. 1978) : The Court reversed a narcotics conviction because the government's efforts to produce a witness were inadequate. The Court said that "[i]mplicit ... in the duty to use reasonable means to procure the presence of an absent witness is the duty to use reasonable means to keep a present witness from becoming absent."

Government of Canal Zone v. P. (Pinto), 590 F.2d 1344 (5th Cir. 1979) : The Court held that the government had not shown the unavailability of two witnesses to an assault by offering evidence that the witnesses were tourists scheduled to depart the Canal Zone the day after the assault, rather than by offering proof of where the witnesses were at the time of the trial.

United States v. Quinn, 901 F.2d 522 (6th Cir. 1990) : The Court reversed a conviction for cocaine offenses on the ground that there was insufficient showing of a witness' unavailability to admit under Rule 804(b)(1) testimony she gave at a suppression hearing. The officer attempting to subpoena the witness was given less than the usual five working days to try to locate her and no one followed up with relatives, the manager of the apartment where she formerly lived, or possible employers.

United States v. Hite, 364 F.3d 874 (7th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed a conviction for unlawful possession of firearms, holding there was no abuse of discretion in precluding a hearsay statement offered by the defense in which the declarant asserted ownership of the weapons in question. The defense's efforts "fell far short of exhibiting a reasonable effort" to locate the declarant, as they did not begin the "search" until four months before the trial began, had previously made no effort to seek the assistance of law enforcement although the declarant had been in and out of the county court system numerous times during that period, and their investigator admitted that his only efforts to find the declarant consisted of talking to family members.

United States v. Harbin, 112 F.3d 974 (8th Cir. 1997) : Although it affirmed drug convictions of a husband and wife, the Court found that grand jury testimony of the wife's sister was improperly admitted because the prosecutor failed to demonstrate that serious attempts were made to locate the sister prior to trial. The prosecution learned that the sister was working in a motel at a specified city in Mississippi and made no effort to serve her there or to serve her when she visited her mother every three weeks. The Court found no evidence to corroborate the Trial Judge's conclusion that the sister had avoided efforts to serve her with process. The error was harmless, however.

United States v. Fuentes-Galindo, 929 F.2d 1507 (10th Cir. 1991) : The Court reversed convictions for illegally transporting aliens, where the government did not meet its burden of demonstrating a good faith effort to obtain the witnesses' presence before offering videotaped depositions by alien material witnesses. In United States v. Puckett, n3 the Court found no error in the exclusion of prior testimony where the defense counsel's unavailability claim was a result of his failure to attempt to subpoena a witness until the end of the second week of trial.

[iv] Rule 804(a) -- Absent or Unavailable -- Miscellaneous Cases

Bailey v. Southern Pac. Transp. Co., 613 F.2d 1385 (5th Cir. 1980) : The Court said that a Trial Judge could accept counsel's representations about the unavailability of a witness, and that an objecting party must demonstrate error in the Judge's acceptance of the representations.

United States v. Rothbart, 653 F.2d 462 (10th Cir. 1981) : This case illustrates how Confrontation Clause considerations may influence the interpretation of subdivision (a). The Trial Judge found a witness unavailable "solely because he was outside the jurisdiction of the court." The Court noted that the government must make a good faith effort to produce the witness and implied that the government must avoid acting in a way that might encourage a witness to be absent.

[v] Rule 804(a) -- Absent or Unavailable -- Request for Voluntary Appearance

Creamer v. General Teamsters Local Union 326, 560 F. Supp. 495 (D. Del. 1983) : The Court held that a witness, who was in the government's witness protection program, was not shown to be unavailable simply because he could not be subpoenaed. The Court reasoned that the language "or other reasonable means" required that the witness be requested to attend voluntarily.

United States v. Kehm, 799 F.2d 354 (7th Cir. 1986) : The Court held, in a drug prosecution, that a deposition was properly admitted where the government showed that the deponent was a Bahamian citizen who could not be extradited and he had indicated that he would not voluntarily testify.

[vi] Rule 804(a) -- Absent or Unavailable -- Witness in Custody

United States v. Casamento, 887 F.2d 1141 (2d Cir. 1989) : In affirming a defendant's conviction in a massive drug conspiracy, the Court held that a declarant imprisoned in Italy was sufficiently shown to be unavailable by an Assistant U.S. Attorney's affidavit that Italian authorities said they would not extradite him and that the government believed Italy's position was "sound." The government's efforts were made in good faith and reasonable in light of the complexity of the trial and the apparent futility of further efforts.

[vii] Rule 804(a) -- Absent or Unavailable -- Witness Out of United States

United States v. Casamento, 887 F.2d 1141 (2d Cir. 1989) : See annotation in § 804.03[1][a][vi]. In United States v. Losada, n4 the Court found that the government had made a good faith effort to produce a witness living in Colombia who had testified against the defendants at an earlier trial, so the witness' former testimony was properly admitted.

United States v. Jones, 404 F. Supp. 529 (E.D. Pa. 1975) , aff'd, 538 F.2d 321 (3d Cir. 1976) : In a prosecution for possessing heroin with intent to distribute, the Court held that a federal drug agent out of the country on special assignment was unavailable within the meaning of the Rule, and that his former testimony (at defendant's first trial) would be admitted to establish a chain of custody for the heroin involved in the case.

United States v. Allie, 978 F.2d 1401 (5th Cir. 1992) : In a prosecution for harboring illegal aliens, the Court held there was no confrontation violation in admitting deposition testimony of alien witnesses, as the government had made extensive good faith efforts to keep the witnesses (who had been released from custody after almost 60 days) in the United States and otherwise to secure their reappearance at trial.

United States v. Kehm, 799 F.2d 354 (7th Cir. 1986) : See annotation under § 804.03[1][a][v].

United States v. Pena-Gutierrez, 222 F.3d 1080 1080 (9th Cir. 2000) : In a prosecution for smuggling illegal aliens, the government introduced a report prepared by an INS inspector during her interview of one of the aliens, which contained his statements regarding his nationality. The Court held that the report was inadmissible, but even if the report itself were admissible, the alien's statements were not admissible because he was not shown to be unavailable. The alien had been deported to Mexico, and the government had his address there, so the requirement that a good faith effort be made to secure his presence before using his hearsay had not been satisfied when the prosecutor made no effort at all to contact him and had no reason to believe he would not return to the United States to testify. Admission of the statements was harmless error, however. In United States v. Johnson, n5 the Court affirmed fraud convictions, finding it was proper to admit the deposition of a witness who was serving as Ambassador to Italy at the time of trial. It rejected the defendant's argument that the Ambassador was available because he could have been subpoenaed pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1783(a) (authorizing subpoenas to United States nationals residing in foreign countries in the interests of justice) and held that the Ambassador was unavailable since the Trial Judge reasonably determined that it was not in the interests of justice to compel the Ambassador to appear at trial.

United States v. Samaniego, 345 F.3d 1280 (11th Cir. 2003) : In an interpleader action to determine ownership of championship belts allegedly stolen from a former professional boxer, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of statements by the alleged thief expressing remorse, apologizing for, and asking forgiveness for having stolen the belts. Although the statements were erroneously admitted under Rule 803(3), they were admissible under Rule 804(b)(3) because they would subject the declarant to civil or criminal liability and the declarant was sufficiently shown to be unavailable to testify. He was a Panamanian citizen apparently living in that country at the time of trial, and thus not amenable to process. Further, the claimant offering the statements, who was the declarant's brother-in-law, had enlisted his wife and the declarant's mother to try on five occasions to locate the declarant and persuade him to come back to testify, but the efforts were unsuccessful. In United States v. Siddiqui, 235 F.3d 1318 (11th Cir. 2000) , a college professor was charged with making false statements to the National Science Foundation after it was determined that he had himself submitted a nomination and recommendations in the names of others for an award. The Court held that the government had established the unavailability of two witnesses sufficiently to permit introduction of their depositions. Both witnesses were in Europe, had been offered reimbursement for expenses if they were to attend the trial, and had indicated (in the case of one witness, repeatedly) that they would not testify at trial.

[b] Rule 804(a) -- Claim of Privilege

United States v. Salerno, 505 U.S. 317 (1992) , rev'g 937 F.2d 797 , modified & reh'g en banc denied, 952 F.2d 624 (2d Cir. 1991) , on remand sub nom. United States v. DiNapoli, 8 F.3d 909 (2d Cir. 1993) (en banc): These opinions, in which the Courts found that witnesses who declared their self-incrimination privilege, after testifying before the grand jury, were unavailable for trial, are discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 804.02[6].

United States v. Gary, 74 F.3d 304 (1st Cir. 1996) : The Court affirmed a conviction for firearms possession by a felon, holding that the defendant was properly precluded from calling a witness who had testified at a first trial and who indicated that he would testify for the defense on direct examination but would invoke his privilege against self-incrimination on cross-examination. The witness was testifying about the merits of the case, not about a collateral matter, so he could not properly testify for one side and avoid examination by the other. Because the witness was unavailable, his former testimony was admissible.

United States v. Peterson, 100 F.3d 7 (2d Cir. 1996) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, rejecting the defendant's argument that his own state grand jury testimony should have been admitted as prior testimony. The Court concluded that "[w]hen the defendant invokes his Fifth Amendment privilege, he has made himself unavailable to any other party, but he is not unavailable to himself." In United States v. Rodriguez, n6 a conviction for aiding and abetting the making of a false statement on a passport application was affirmed. The Court found that the unavailability of a declarant of exculpatory statements against penal interest was sufficiently established when the declarant claimed the privilege against self-incrimination and refused to testify, even though she had entered an Alford plea of guilty.

United States v. MacCloskey, 682 F.2d 468 (4th Cir. 1982) : In a prosecution for conspiracy, a witness, who had been threatened with indictment if she testified for the defendant at his trial, testified at a hearing on the threats and was cross-examined by the prosecution about her knowledge of the case. The witness refused to testify at trial, the government argued that the self-incrimination privilege had been waived, and the Trial Judge refused to permit the witness' testimony at the hearing to be used on the defendant's behalf. The Court held exclusion of the former testimony was reversible error. If the Judge believed that the privilege had been waived he should have ordered the witness to testify. Had she refused, even if her refusal were improper, she would have been unavailable and former testimony could have been used.

United States v. Kimball, 15 F.3d 54 (5th Cir. 1994) : Where the defendant invoked his Fifth Amendment privilege not to testify at a retrial on charges of firearms possession, he could not introduce exculpatory testimony he gave at the first trial. The proponent of former testimony may not create the condition of unavailability and then benefit therefrom. In United States v. Fernandez-Roque, n7 the Court found that the defendant, charged with obstruction of criminal investigations and interstate travel in aid of racketeering, did not make a sufficient showing that a witness in a previous criminal conspiracy case was unavailable at trial. The defendant asserted that the witness would claim the Fifth Amendment privilege, but did not subpoena him or provide the Trial Judge with an opportunity to evaluate any refusal to testify and whether any type of immunity might be available, so the witness' former testimony was inadmissible.

United States v. Pelton, 578 F.2d 701 (8th Cir. 1978) : Affirming Mann Act convictions, the Court ruled that a defendant failed to establish that a witness was unavailable to testify at trial when his lawyer stated to the Trial Judge that the witness' attorney had indicated that, because of a self-incrimination fear, he would advise his client not to testify. The showing was inadequate to establish that the witness actually would not testify.

United States v. Montague, 421 F.3d 1099 (10th Cir. 2005) : The defendant's wife had identified firearms at their home as his to officers investigating a domestic violence complaint, but later told defense investigators she had framed her husband, and then before a grand jury changed her story yet again to confirm his ownership. When called by the government at his trial for felon firearm possession, she invoked her privilege against adverse spousal testimony; her grand jury testimony was then admitted under Rule 804(b)(6). Affirming, the Court held that the Judge properly recognized the wife's testimonial privilege and was not required to force her to testify regarding her reasons for invoking that privilege. Furthermore, the Court found there was sufficient evidence, from the defendant's communicating with his wife while in jail despite an order not to and his history of spousal abuse, to conclude that he had procured his wife's unavailability as a witness. Finally, the Court held that the defendant's wrongdoing was a forfeiture of his confrontation claim, and that that equitable principle survived Crawford.

[c] Rule 804(a) -- Dead Man's Statute

Rosenfeld v. Basquiat, 78 F.3d 84 (2d Cir. 1996) : In an art dealer's breach of contract action against an artist's estate, the Court indicated that the dealer, who was disqualified from testifying to transactions with the artist by New York's Dead Man's Statute, was not "unavailable" under the Rule because the Dead Man's Statute is a rule of competency, not of privilege. In our view, this result unfortunately follows from what appears to be a legislative oversight; "incompetent" witnesses are as unavailable as those claiming privilege, and many states treat statutory incompetency as a ground of unavailability.

[d] Rule 804(a) -- Depositions

Battle v. Memorial Hosp., 228 F.3d 544 (5th Cir. 2000) : After the infant plaintiff suffered extensive neurological injuries from viral encephalitis, he and his parents brought a medical malpractice action against the physicians and hospitals that had treated him. During discovery the defendants deposed a microbiomedical researcher who had conducted tests that supported the plaintiffs' position. When the plaintiffs offered the deposition, the Magistrate Judge conducting the trial excluded it because there was no showing that the researcher was unavailable. Reversing in part a judgment for the defendants, the Court held that because the deponent was more than 100 miles from the place of trial, the unavailability requirement of Fed. R. Civ. P. 32(a)(3)(B) was satisfied.

[e] Rule 804(a) -- Memory Loss

North Miss. Commun. Inc. v. Jones, 792 F.2d 1330 (5th Cir. 1986) : The Court held that a witness was not unavailable where he remembered the general subject matter of a conversation but did not remember certain details. In United States v. Amaya, n8 the Court upheld the admission of testimony in a heroin conspiracy case of prior testimony from a witness who was injured in an automobile accident and sustained a loss of memory (which was shown might never return) regarding his prior testimony. The Court noted that the duration of an illness is a proper element for consideration in making a determination of unavailability, but stated that, to constitute unavailability, the duration of the illness need only be in probability long enough so that, with proper regard to the importance of the testimony, the trial cannot be postponed.

[f] Rule 804(a) -- Mental or Physical Infirmity

United States v. Keithan, 751 F.2d 9 (1st Cir. 1984) : The Court sustained convictions for mail fraud arising out of a scheme to defraud elderly persons in the sale of insurance policies. It held that the Trial Judge properly found two witnesses to be unavailable and their depositions to be admissible. One witness was 87 years old and suffered from a back condition that kept him from walking. The other was 83 years old and suffered from a heart condition that kept her confined at home.

Complaint of Bankers Trust Co., 752 F.2d 874 (3d Cir. 1984) : Although the Court found that the District Judge had erred in failing to invoke a commission for the purpose of taking testimony in India relevant to a claim by the mother of a deceased seaman that her name had been forged upon a special power of attorney and release, it upheld the Judge's ruling that the mother's deposition, taken pursuant to another commission, could not be used as former testimony. The mother was not shown to be unavailable on the basis of her lawyer's assertion that she suffered a physical infirmity, where the lawyer had never met the mother and no affidavits were filed in support of the assertion. After a jury was unable to reach a verdict in United States v. Faison, n9 a prosecution for wire fraud and interstate transportation of securities, a second trial was scheduled. When it began, the key government witness, who had pleaded guilty and testified at the first trial, was in the hospital with a heart problem. The Court held it was an abuse of discretion to admit the witness' testimony from the first trial rather than to grant a continuance for a reasonable period; the case was remanded for consideration of whether it was likely that the witness would be available to testify at a new trial.

United States v. Tunnell, 667 F.2d 1182 (5th Cir. 1982) : In a RICO case, the Court upheld the introduction of a videotape deposition of a prosecution witness who was incapacitated by a stroke. The defendants were present at the deposition, and it was used only after the witness remained incapacitated following a continuance.

United States v. Donaldson, 978 F.2d 381 (7th Cir. 1992) : Affirming a conviction for bank robbery, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in finding that a bank teller was unavailable so that her videotaped deposition might be used in a four-day trial. The teller had recently delivered a child, had been hospitalized the day before she was to testify with chest pain, and experienced chest pain again when she attempted to rise from her bed the day of her scheduled testimony.

United States v. McGuire, 307 F.3d 1192 (9th Cir. 2002) : Before the retrial (after a hung jury) of a complex fraud case against the Montana Freemen, which also involved a charge of theft of sound recording equipment from an ABC news crew, a doctor for one of the news crew members wrote to the Trial Judge to say that the victim would be unable to travel to trial because of her pregnancy. The Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting her testimony at the first trial and in the findings that a 28-week pregnant mother was unable to undergo the stress of testimony and that adhering to the trial date was important to accommodate so many competing schedules. In a legal malpractice action, Mutuelles Unies v. Kroll & Linstrom, 957 F.2d 707 (9th Cir. 1992) , the Court held that a witness had been sufficiently shown to be unavailable where, although he could have testified on the afternoon of the first day of trial, he required surgery the next morning that would leave him indisposed for one to two weeks.

Parrott v. Wilson, 707 F.2d 1262 (11th Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed a judgment for officials in an action brought by a mother whose son was killed by a deputy marshal during the course of an eviction. The Trial Judge found the deputy who shot the deceased to be unavailable because of mental disability and permitted the deputy's deposition to be admitted. The Court ruled that the diagnosis by the deputy's psychiatrist indicated a probability that the deputy would be unable to testify for a lengthy period, which justified the finding of unavailability. The Court found in United States v. Acosta n10 that the uncorroborated statement of defense counsel that the defendant's wife was unavailable to testify because of her child's illness was insufficient to support introduction of her testimony at a suppression hearing.

[g] Rule 804(a) -- Mid-Trial Availability

Bickel v. Korean Air Lines Co., 96 F.3d 151 (6th Cir. 1996) : In the course of affirming in part judgments for the plaintiffs in Warsaw Convention wrongful death actions, the Court held that videotaped testimony from a prior trial was properly admitted. The experts were testifying elsewhere and were unavailable when the videotaped testimony began. Before the videotaped testimony was completed, however, the experts had finished their testimony in the other proceeding and had become available. The Court held that under these circumstances it was not error to finish the videotape testimony, rather than to call the experts at that point.

[h] Rule 804(a) -- Other Unavailability

Secretary of Labor v. DeSisto, 929 F.2d 789 (1st Cir. 1991) : In reversing a judgment for the Secretary in a Fair Labor Standards Act case, the Court noted that the hearsay exceptions requiring witness unavailability do not apply when the witness' unavailability is due solely to a limit imposed by the Trial Judge.

United States v. Munoz, 16 F.3d 1116 (11th Cir. 1994) : Affirming convictions for marijuana importation, the Court noted that the custodian of a Panamanian bank's records would be unavailable because of the Panamanian bank secrecy laws.

[i] Rule 804(a) -- Party's Unavailability

United States v. Peterson, 100 F.3d 7 (2d Cir. 1996) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, rejecting the defendant's argument that his own state grand jury testimony should have been admitted. It noted that "[w]hen the defendant invokes his Fifth Amendment privilege, he has made himself unavailable to any other party, but he is not unavailable to himself."

United States v. Bollin, 264 F.3d 391 (4th Cir. 2001) : Affirming convictions arising from involvement in an investment fraud scheme and the subsequent coverup, the Court found no error in refusing to admit exculpatory statements that the defendant made to a grand jury. This testimony could not be admitted as prior testimony because the defendant was not unavailable to testify at trial, since a criminal defendant who invokes his Fifth Amendment privilege makes himself unavailable to other parties, but not to himself.

United States v. Kimball, 15 F.3d 54 (5th Cir. 1994) : Where the defendant invoked his Fifth Amendment privilege not to testify at a retrial on charges of firearms possession, he could not introduce exculpatory testimony he gave at the first trial. The proponent of former testimony may not create the condition of unavailability and then benefit therefrom.

Garcia-Martinez v. City & County of Denver, 392 F.3d 1187 (10th Cir. 2004) : The plaintiff, an illegal immigrant, brought a § 1983 action for use of excessive force in an arrest. Fearing arrest for immigration offenses, he returned to Honduras before the trial. Affirming a judgment for the defendants, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding a deposition of the plaintiff, which was offered in lieu of his live testimony. The plaintiff's absence at trial was calculated, so it was "due to the procurement or wrongdoing" of the proponent, and his failure to attempt to obtain a temporary visa or to use an alternative to live testimony, such as video-conferencing, meant that he had not demonstrated "a good faith effort ... to obtain the declarant's presence at trial using reasonable means." One Judge dissented, on the ground that the plaintiff's absence was not procured by him but by the government, which placed him under a standing deportation order, and any effort to obtain a temporary visa would have been futile.

[j] Rule 804(a) -- Procuring Unavailability

United States v. Dolah, 245 F.3d 98 (2d Cir. 2001) : The Court held that government witnesses who declared their privilege against self-incrimination were unavailable under Rule 804(a), and that the government did not wrongfully procure their unavailability by the selective use of immunity (immunizing some witnesses for trial but not those whose hearsay statements the government proffered).

United States v. Reed, 227 F.3d 763 (7th Cir. 2000) : In Reed's first trial for bank robbery, his codefendant Simmons testified as a cooperating witness. The trial ended in a hung jury, and by the time of Reed's retrial, Simmons had already been sentenced. When Simmons refused to testify at the second trial, his prior testimony was admitted under Rule 804(b)(1). Affirming Reed's conviction, the Court rejected the argument that the government had procured

Simmons' unavailability by arranging to have him sentenced before Reed's second trial began. The Court found that the sentencing Judge, and not the government, retained control over the date and time of Simmons' sentencing.

Garcia-Martinez v. City & County of Denver, 392 F.3d 1187 (10th Cir. 2004) : The plaintiff, an illegal immigrant, brought a § 1983 action for use of excessive force in an arrest. Fearing arrest for immigration offenses, he returned to Honduras before the trial. Affirming a judgment for the defendants, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding a deposition of the plaintiff, which was offered in lieu of his live testimony. The plaintiff's absence at trial was calculated, so it was "due to the procurement or wrongdoing" of the proponent, and his failure to attempt to obtain a temporary visa or to use an alternative to live testimony, such as video-conferencing, meant that he had not demonstrated "a good faith effort ... to obtain the declarant's presence at trial using reasonable means." One Judge dissented, on the ground that the plaintiff's absence was not procured by him but by the government, which placed him under a standing deportation order, and any effort to obtain a temporary visa would have been futile.

[k] Rule 804(a) -- Requirement of Depositions

Zenith Radio Corp. v. Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co., 505 F. Supp. 1190 (E.D. Pa. 1980) , rev'd on other grounds, 723 F.2d 238 (3d Cir. 1983) , rev'd on other grounds, 475 U.S. 574 (1986) : The Court noted that inability to procure a witness' attendance by process or other reasonable means satisfies the Rule. It concluded that Rule 804(b)(1) does not require that an effort be made to take depositions outside the country before offering former testimony, but that more effort must be expended in connection with statements offered under Rule 804(b)(3).

Campbell v. Coleman Co., 786 F.2d 892 (8th Cir. 1986) : This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, at § 804.02[3].

[l] Rule 804(a) -- Unprivileged Refusal To Testify

Jennings v. Maynard, 946 F.2d 1502 (10th Cir. 1991) : In affirming denial of a habeas corpus petition, the Court noted that it was not necessary to order a witness to testify before a finding of unavailability was made, where the witness testified in an in camera hearing that he would not obey such an order and there was a determination that his reason for refusing to testify -- the threats that most likely came from the petitioner made against the witness and his family -- made an order to testify inappropriate. Most importantly, no order was made because the witness would have stated that he had been threatened, which would have prejudiced the defendant's right to an impartial jury.

[m] Rule 804(a) -- Witness Available to One Party but Not to Another

United States v. Dolah, 245 F.3d 98 (2d Cir. 2001) : The Court held that government witnesses who declared their privilege against self-incrimination were unavailable under Rule 804(a). The Court rejected the defendants' argument that the government's power to grant immunity meant that these witnesses were in fact available to the government.

United States v. Bollin, 264 F.3d 391 (4th Cir. 2001) : Affirming convictions arising from involvement in an investment fraud scheme and the subsequent coverup, the Court found no error in refusing to admit exculpatory statements that the defendant made to a grand jury. This testimony could not be admitted as prior testimony because the defendant was not unavailable to testify at trial, since a criminal defendant who invokes his Fifth Amendment privilege makes himself unavailable to other parties, but not to himself.

[2] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Hearsay Exceptions -- Former Testimony

[a] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Adequacy of Prior Examination

United States v. Ciak, 102 F.3d 38 (2d Cir. 1996) : At the retrial of a felon firearm possession case, the testimony given at the first trial by a prosecution witness who had become unavailable was read into the record. The defendant argued that the testimony was inadmissible under Rule 804(b)(1) and the Confrontation Clause because defense counsel at the first trial was conflicted (which was why the retrial was ordered). Affirming, the Court refused to find the cross-examination at the earlier trial inadequate per se, and looked to the transcript of the witness' actual testimony. It found that counsel had made a "serious effort" to undermine and discredit the witness, and that the conflict under which defense counsel labored had nothing to do with the witness.

[b] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Bail or Detention Hearing

United States v. Fischl, 16 F.3d 927 (8th Cir. 1994) : The Court held in a prosecution for distributing methamphetamine that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony given at a detention hearing by an accomplice who asserted his self-incrimination privilege at trial. The Trial Judge credited the government's contention that it did not have a similar motive to develop the testimony at the hearing; even if the evidence was admissible, any error was harmless.

[c] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Constitutional Concerns

United States v. McKeeve, 131 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1997) : Affirming a conviction for attempting to export computer equipment to Libya, the Court found no error in the admission of a transcript of a deposition taken in England. The deponent, a British national, was an important witness in the case and refused to attend the proceedings in the United States. The deposition was conducted under the auspices of a British judicial officer, and in accordance with the provisions of Fed. R. Crim. P. 15; defense counsel was present and cross-examined the witness, and the defendant, while remaining in prison in the United States, could hear the proceedings and confer by phone with defense counsel. The Court concluded that the deposition procedures were not "so incompatible with our fundamental principles of fairness or so prone to inaccuracy or bias as to render the testimony inherently unreliable." Accordingly, the deposition testimony was admissible under Rule 804(b)(1), and satisfied the then-applicable Ohio v. Roberts Confrontation Clause analysis. We note that under Crawford v. Washington the deposition was "testimonial" but the defendant was accorded an opportunity to cross-examine the witness through counsel.

United States v. Mann, 161 F.3d 840 (5th Cir. 1998) : The Court held in a prosecution for offenses arising out of dealings with financial institutions that a deposition taken in a civil suit of a codefendant was properly admitted against the codefendant, where the civil suit was brought by the FDIC on generally the same issues as were raised in the criminal prosecution, and the codefendant against whom the deposition was offered had been a party to the suit when it was taken. Although the deponent did not testify in the criminal trial, the Court found no Bruton violation in admitting the deposition, since Rule 804(b)(1) satisfies the Confrontation Clause. We note that the same result obtains for this hearsay exception under Crawford v. Washington as under the prior Ohio v. Roberts analysis.

[d] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Depositions

Battle v. Memorial Hosp., 228 F.3d 544 (5th Cir. 2000) : After the infant plaintiff suffered extensive neurological injuries from viral encephalitis, he and his parents brought a medical malpractice action against the physicians and hospitals that had treated him. During discovery the defendants deposed a microbiomedical researcher who had conducted tests that supported the plaintiffs' position. The Magistrate Judge conducting the trial ruled that there was no showing that the researcher was unavailable and the deposition was hearsay not satisfying Rule 804(b)(1) because the defendants did not have the requisite similar motive to develop the testimony as would be the case at trial, and thus inadmissible. Reversing in part a judgment for the defendants, the Court held that because the deponent was more than 100 miles from the place of trial, the unavailability requirement of Fed. R. Civ. P. 32(a)(3)(B) was satisfied. The Court also concluded that the defendants had sufficiently similar motive to develop the testimony in the deposition, so it was error to exclude the deposition testimony. In United States v. Mann, 161 F.3d 840 (5th Cir. 1998) , a prosecution for offenses arising out of dealings with financial institutions, the Court held that a deposition of a codefendant taken in a civil suit was properly admitted against the codefendant, where the civil suit was brought by the FDIC on generally the same issues as were raised in the criminal prosecution, and the defendant against whom the deposition was offered had been a party to the suit when it was taken.

McKnight v. Johnson Controls, Inc., 36 F.3d 1396 (8th Cir. 1994) : The Court held, in a personal injury action against the manufacturer by the user of a car battery that exploded, that there was no error in admitting the deposition testimony of a witness who had been injured in another explosion involving a battery manufactured by the defendant. The defendant had every incentive to cross-examine the testimony of the deponent, who was also suing for injuries in a substantially similar battery explosion.

[e] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Foreign Examination

United States v. McKeeve, 131 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1997) : Affirming a conviction for attempting to export computer equipment to Libya, the Court found no error in the admission of a transcript of a deposition taken in England. The deponent, a British national, was an important witness in the case and refused to attend the proceedings in the United States. The deposition was conducted under the auspices of a British judicial officer, and in accordance with the provisions of Fed. R. Crim. P. 15; defense counsel was present and cross-examined the witness, and the defendant, while remaining in prison in the United States, could hear the proceedings and confer by phone with defense counsel. The Court concluded that the deposition procedures were not "so incompatible with our fundamental principles of fairness or so prone to inaccuracy or bias as to render the testimony inherently unreliable." Accordingly, the deposition testimony was admissible under Rule 804(b)(1), and satisfied the then-applicable Ohio v. Roberts Confrontation Clause analysis. We note that under Crawford v. Washington the deposition was "testimonial" but the defendant was accorded an opportunity to cross-examine the witness through counsel.

United States v. Salim, 855 F.2d 944 (2d Cir. 1988) : Denying a motion for a new trial in a narcotics case, the Trial Judge held that deposition testimony taken in France was admissible under the residual exception in light of the deponent's unavailability and the circumstantial guarantees of reliability. The Court held that the deposition was admissible under Rule 804(b)(1), because it was taken "in compliance with law." The Court reasoned that comity required acquiescence in the insistence of the French Court that French law be applied to the taking of the deposition. It concluded that cross-examination was not rendered inadequate by the requirement that questions be submitted in writing.

United States v. Kelly, 892 F.2d 255 (3d Cir. 1989) : In affirming a conviction for drug offenses, the Court held that videotaped depositions of witnesses taken in Belgium were properly admitted. The witnesses were unwilling to attend trial in the United States, and the government could not compel their attendance; the depositions were taken in accordance with American procedures before an American Judge applying American evidentiary rules; and even though the defendant was not physically present, he could listen to the depositions live and consult with his attorneys through an open private telephone line.

United States v. King, 552 F.2d 833 (9th Cir. 1976) : Affirming convictions for narcotics offenses tried prior to the effective date of the Rules, the Court upheld admission of videotaped depositions (taken pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 3503) of unindicted coconspirators who were imprisoned in Japan. The defendants and their attorneys were present in Japan for the taking of the depositions.

Mainland Indus. v. Standal's Patents Ltd., 799 F.2d 746 (Fed. Cir. 1986) : The Court found that a videotaped deposition of a witness (since deceased) that had been taken in a prior patent action in Canada met the requirements of the Rule and was properly admitted.

[f] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Grand Jury Testimony

United States v. Salerno, 505 U.S. 317 (1992) , rev'g 937 F.2d 797 , modified & reh'g en banc denied, 952 F.2d 624 (2d Cir. 1991) , on remand sub nom. United States v. DiNapoli, 8 F.3d 909 (2d Cir. 1993) (en banc): These decisions, which require a finding of similar motive to cross-examine before exculpatory grand jury testimony can be admitted against the prosecution at trial, are discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 804.02[6].

United States v. Miller, 904 F.2d 65 (D.C. Cir. 1990) : The Court reversed wire fraud convictions, holding that if (under the Circuit's minority view) the witness waived his self-incrimination privilege by testifying before the grand jury, the defendants were entitled to compel him to testify at trial, and if he did not waive the privilege and was therefore unavailable at trial, they were entitled to introduce his grand jury testimony, in which the government had the same motive and opportunity to develop testimony on the defendant's guilt or innocence.

United States v. Omar, 104 F.3d 519 (1st Cir. 1997) : The Court held, in a case arising from an armored car robbery, that there was no error in excluding exculpatory grand jury testimony from a witness who had died before trial. It was arguable that the government had no meaningful opportunity to discredit the witness at the time, since there was no indication that there was any evidence then available to it with which to confront and contradict the witness. In any event, there was no evident motive to discredit the witness, since other evidence allayed any fear that the grand jury would refuse to indict based on the witness' testimony.

United States v. Peterson, 100 F.3d 7 (2d Cir. 1996) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, rejecting the defendant's argument that his own state grand jury testimony should have been admitted. The Court concluded that the prosecutorial interest in cross-examining him before the grand jury was not the same as at trial, and that the United States was not a party to that proceeding.

United States v. Klauber, 611 F.2d 512 (4th Cir. 1979) : The Court implied that it might admit exculpatory grand jury statements against the government.

United States v. Foster, 128 F.3d 949 (6th Cir. 1997) : The Court reversed a conviction for cocaine offenses because the defendant had not been permitted to introduce exculpatory testimony given by a witness before the grand jury. The Court held that the government had the same motive and opportunity in the grand jury as it would have had at trial to develop the witness' testimony. It distinguished United States v. DiNapoli, supra , on the grounds that the testimony here was given a month before any indictment was returned and there was no indication from the grand jurors that the group as a whole did not believe the witness.

[g] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Motive To Develop the Testimony

[i] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Civil Cases

Pacelli v. Nassau County Police Dep't, 639 F. Supp. 1382 (E.D.N.Y. 1986) : The Court granted summary judgment for the defendants in an action by a convicted murderer who claimed his civil rights were violated, ruling that a statement of an alleged murder accomplice in an unrelated prosecution that was inconsistent with his confession on a point was inadmissible. The prosecutor in the unrelated case had no motive to question the accomplice concerning the substantive accuracy of his statement. In In re Sterling Nav. Co., 444 F. Supp. 1043 (S.D.N.Y. 1977) , the Court found that an unofficial creditors committee did not have the same motivation as a bankruptcy trustee.

Complaint of Bankers Trust Co., 752 F.2d 874 (3d Cir. 1984) : In an action by the mother of a deceased seaman claiming that her name had been forged upon a special power of attorney and release, the Court upheld a ruling that the mother's deposition could not be used as former testimony. The shipowners who opposed the mother in the instant case had no opportunity to examine the mother in the deposition. Although the shipowners' law firm was a defendant in the other proceeding and did have a chance to examine the mother, the firm and the shipowners had dissimilar motives for examining the mother.

Supermarket of Marlinton, Inc. v. Meadow Gold Dairies, Inc., 71 F.3d 119 (4th Cir. 1995) : The Court reversed a summary judgment for dairies sued by retail food stores for alleged antitrust violations, holding that testimony by a dairy official testifying as a government witness in a prior criminal conspiracy trial was admissible as former testimony. The Court found that the defendants' motivation in the criminal trial (to show that no conspiracy occurred) was substantially similar to the dairies' motive in the civil trial (to show that it never occurred, or if it did, that no affirmative acts of concealment took place). It was sufficient that the motive in the former proceeding was similar, even if not identical, to the motive in the instant case.

Murphy v. Owens-Ill., Inc., 779 F.2d 340 (6th Cir. 1985) : Affirming a judgment for a defendant manufacturer in an asbestosis case, the Court upheld the exclusion of deposition testimony given by a medical expert in a prior case. It found that the party in the previous case had a dissimilar motivation to cross-examine the doctor and that the testimony was therefore inadmissible.

Oberlin v. Marlin Am. Corp., 596 F.2d 1322 (7th Cir. 1979) : A deposition taken during a separate lawsuit in another state was excluded on the ground that the defendant in the instant case did not have the same motivation for cross-examination in the first case.

McKnight v. Johnson Controls, Inc., 36 F.3d 1396 (8th Cir. 1994) : The Court held, in a personal injury action against the manufacturer by the user of a car battery that exploded, that there was no error in admitting the deposition testimony of a witness who had been injured in another explosion involving a battery manufactured by the defendant. The defendant had every incentive to cross-examine the testimony of the deponent, who was also suing for injuries in a substantially similar battery explosion. In Hannah v. City of Overland, n11 the Court affirmed judgments for police officers sued for false arrest. It held that deposition testimony of third parties that they felt pressured and threatened by the police into implicating the plaintiff in murder was inadmissible. The depositions were taken in connection with a criminal prosecution, and, even assuming that the prosecutor was a predecessor in interest of the defendant police officers, the prosecutor did not have a motive similar to the defendants' to develop the testimony of these witnesses. In DeLurya v. Winthrop Labs, n12 the plaintiff claimed that the defendant's drug Talwin caused her to become drug dependent and resulted in certain injuries. Reversing a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court found that deposition testimony given in a worker's compensation proceeding by a psychiatrist who had treated the plaintiff and who was dead at the time of trial should have been admitted as former testimony. Since one issue in that proceeding was whether the plaintiff abused drugs and had been warned not to use Talwin, the Court reasoned that the plaintiff's motive to cross-examine was similar to the motive that existed at trial.

New England Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Anderson, 888 F.2d 646 (10th Cir. 1989) : An insurance company brought an action to set aside a life insurance policy as fraudulently procured by a beneficiary, who allegedly conspired to murder the insured, her first husband. The Court held that testimony given by an unavailable witness at the trial of another conspirator was properly excluded, as the defendant in that case was not the beneficiary's predecessor in interest and was not disposed to protect her interests there, so he had no "like motive" to develop the same facts.

[ii] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Motive To Develop the Testimony -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Salerno, 505 U.S. 317 (1992) , rev'g 937 F.2d 797 , modified & reh'g en banc denied, 952 F.2d 624 (2d Cir. 1991) , on remand sub nom. United States v. DiNapoli, 8 F.3d 909 (2d Cir. 1993) (en banc): These decisions, requiring a similar motive to cross-examine before grand jury testimony can be admitted against the government, are discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 804.02[6].

United States v. Lombard, 72 F.3d 170 (1st Cir. 1995) : After the defendant was acquitted of murder charges in State Court, he was tried for federal firearms offenses in connection with the homicide. The Court held there was no error in admitting another participant's testimony from the state trial regarding the events preceding and following the murders, since the defendant's interest in discrediting the account in the state trial could hardly have been any stronger at the federal trial. However, the defendant had little real incentive at the state murder trial to attack the coparticipant's statements concerning ownership or possession of the rifle at issue in the federal firearms case; nonetheless, any error in admitting this part of the state testimony was harmless because the defendant had himself admitted the rifle belonged to him during direct examination at the state trial.

United States v. Tannehill, 49 F.3d 1049 (5th Cir. 1995) : The defendant was tried with six others for fraud, but a mistrial was declared when the jury was unable to reach a verdict. He was then tried separately on the same charges, and a witness' testimony from the prior trial was admitted against him under Rule 804(b)(1). The Court rejected the defendant's argument that at the first trial his strategy was to "disappear into the woodwork and hope for the best," and responded that his motive in cross-examining was the same at both trials: "to discredit the witness and separate himself from the other members of the conspiracy." In a mail fraud prosecution, United States v. McDonald, n13 the Court suggested that a civil litigant may be a predecessor in interest to the government so that deposition testimony in a civil case might be admissible on behalf of a criminal defendant. However, here the government and the civil litigant had sufficiently different strategies that the civil litigant's motives for cross-examining the deponent were different from the government's, so there was no error in excluding the deposition testimony. In United States v. Atkins, n14 the Court affirmed a narcotics conviction, finding that the government did not have the same motive in examining a witness at a hearing on the admissibility of coconspirators' statements as at trial, and that a transcript of the hearing was properly excluded.

United States v. Vartanian, 245 F.3d 609 (6th Cir. 2001) : Affirming convictions for interfering with the civil housing rights of real estate agents and a family, the Court held it was proper to admit the testimony of a deceased witness who had testified at an earlier civil trial against the defendant. The testimony in the civil case addressed allegations that the defendant communicated threats to the real estate agents intended to intimidate them and to interfere with a family's right to purchase a home. Since these were the same issues on which the former testimony was admitted in the criminal trial, "the motives of the civil action lawyer would necessarily be synonymous with those of the criminal defense attorney regarding the elicitation or possible challenge to such testimony." In United States v. Licavoli, n15 the Court affirmed RICO convictions, holding that the prior testimony of a witness in state prosecutions charging the defendants with murder was admissible, since the witness refused to testify, even though the government offered immunity, and the murder and conspiracy to commit murder charges brought in State Court were the predicate acts charged in the RICO prosecution. The witness had testified in several different state trials and the Trial Judge instructed the jury that it could use the witness' prior testimony in a particular state case only against the defendant charged in that case. Although the Court agreed with the defendants "that it may be humanly impossible for a juror to completely compartmentalize multiple versions of an event and apply each version only against a certain defendant," it concluded that the witness' testimony was substantially the same in all the state cases.

United States v. Reed, 227 F.3d 763 (7th Cir. 2000) : In Reed's first trial for bank robbery, his codefendant Simmons testified as a cooperating witness. The trial ended in a hung jury, and by the time of Reed's retrial, Simmons had already been sentenced. When he refused to testify at the second trial, his prior testimony was admitted under Rule 804(b)(1). Affirming Reed's conviction, the Court rejected Reed's argument that his motive to cross-examine Simmons at the second trial differed from that at the first trial, given that Simmons had pleaded guilty and been sentenced in the interim. The fact that Simmons "was actually sentenced and received a downward departure after the first trial, does not really change Reed's motives on cross. Simmons had entered into the plea agreement well before the first trial and Reed knew that he would be getting a substantial reduction in his sentence in exchange for cooperation. He used this information to impeach Simmons on cross-examination." In a drug conspiracy case, United States v. Powell, 894 F.2d 895 (7th Cir. 1990) , the defendant called as a witness a coconspirator who invoked his self-incrimination privilege. The Court held there was no error in excluding former testimony from the witness' guilty plea hearing because, regardless of its opportunity to cross-examine at such a hearing, the government's motive in examining, to assure that the plea is voluntary and that a factual basis exists for it, is not the same as at a trial. In United States v. Feldman, n16 the Court reversed wire fraud convictions because a deposition taken in an earlier civil proceeding was introduced against defendants who had no notice at the time of the deposition that the witness might incriminate them on criminal charges. The Court found that Rule 804(b)(1) was violated, since the defendants were not adverse to the witness at the time of the deposition and therefore did not have a similar motive or realistic opportunity to examine the witness. In United States v. Pizarro, n17 a prosecution for the sale of heroin, the Court reversed a conviction because the Trial Judge refused to admit testimony given by a codefendant at his separate trial that his supplier was someone other than the defendant. The government had sufficient motivation to demonstrate that the codefendant was untruthful in his separate trial sufficient to warrant admission of his prior testimony.

United States v. Fischl, 16 F.3d 927 (8th Cir. 1994) : In a prosecution for distributing methamphetamine, the Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony given at a detention hearing by an accomplice who asserted his self-incrimination privilege at trial. The Trial Judge credited the government's contention that it did not have a similar motive to develop the testimony at the hearing; even if the evidence was admissible, any error was harmless.

United States v. Poland, 659 F.2d 884 (9th Cir. 1981) : The Court held that identification testimony given at a hearing on a defendant's motion to suppress in-court identification testimony could be admitted when the identification witness died. The basic questions at the hearing concerned suggestiveness and reliability. Thus, the defense had the same motive to examine the witness at the hearing and at the trial.

[h] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Opportunity To Develop the Testimony

United States v. North, 910 F.2d 843 (D.C. Cir. 1990) , modified on other grounds, 920 F.2d 940 (D.C. Cir. 1990) : Vacating and reversing convictions for crimes relating to a congressional investigation, the Court held that the defendant's proffer of a videotape of an unavailable witness' testimony before Congress was properly rejected, as a congressional committee is not the same party as an executive branch prosecutor for purposes of the former testimony exception and the independent prosecutor in this case had no opportunity (and did not desire) to develop the witness' congressional testimony.

United States v. Shaw, 69 F.3d 1249 (4th Cir. 1995) : The Court held that testimony given by witnesses (since deceased) at the trial of a coconspirator was not admissible under Rule 804(b)(1) because the defendant had no opportunity to develop the testimony, even if the reason for the missed opportunity was that he was a fugitive from justice at the time.

Rodriguez v. Pacificare of Tex., Inc., 980 F.2d 1014 (5th Cir. 1993) : Affirming a summary judgment for the defendants in an action against a physician and an HMO for failing to provide adequate medical care and coverage, the Court held there was no error in rejecting deposition testimony of a physician involved in a state worker's compensation case that had been offered by the plaintiff to show breach of the standard of care, as neither defendant was a party to the compensation case and they never had an opportunity to cross-examine the deposed physician.

Carter v. Sowders, 5 F.3d 975 (6th Cir. 1993) : The Court granted habeas corpus relief to a petitioner whose conviction for drug offenses was based on the video deposition of a paid police informant that was taken in the absence of both the petitioner and his counsel. In In re Paducah Towing Co., n18 at a Coast Guard hearing held to determine whether to revoke the license of the captain of Paducah's tow boat following a barge accident, the captain of another boat testified to what he had observed. Although he had been called by the Coast Guard, the witness testified as an expert and answered hypothetical questions favorably towards Paducah. The examiner refused to permit the Coast Guard representative to impeach the witness. The Court held that this testimony was not admissible in a subsequent liability action under Rule 804(b)(1), even assuming that the Coast Guard was a predecessor in interest of Exxon. The Coast Guard did not have an adequate opportunity to examine the witness on the prior occasion, as it had no lawyer present at the hearing, while Paducah did, and the Coast Guard representative did not have the necessary skills to test the witness' qualifications.

United States v. Koon, 34 F.3d 1416 (9th Cir. 1994) , aff'd in part on other grounds, 518 U.S. 81 (1996) : The Court affirmed the convictions of two police officers for the deprivation of the rights of an arrestee, Rodney King, who was severely beaten after a high-speed chase. This federal conviction was obtained after a state trial on the same matter resulted in a mistrial on one count and an acquittal on the others. The Court held that testimony in the state trial, by an officer who was at the scene of the beating (and who was actually acquitted as a defendant in both trials), was properly admitted under Rule 804(b)(1) against the two defendants in the federal trial. The defendants argued that their opportunity to cross-examine the testifying officer at the state trial was not similar to that which would have existed at the federal trial, since most of the officer's testimony concerned events that had been recorded on videotape, which had been enhanced in the time between the state and federal trials to make it more definitive and thus a more effective tool in cross-examination. The Court held, however, that the "failure of a defendant to discover potentially useful evidence at the time of the former proceeding does not constitute a lack of opportunity to cross-examine."

United States v. Harenberg, 732 F.2d 1507 (10th Cir. 1984) : Affirming convictions for misapplying bank funds, participating in a kickback scheme, and violating tax laws, the Court upheld the exclusion of deposition testimony given by two codefendants in a civil case, since the government had had no opportunity to examine the codefendants.

United States v. Smith, 231 F.3d 800 (11th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed convictions for fraudulent absentee voting. It found no error when the defendants had been precluded from introducing testimony given at a selective-prosecution hearing by a witness who was unavailable at trial. The witness had pleaded her Fifth Amendment rights in the middle of testifying, so the government did not have a sufficient opportunity to develop the testimony. At a trial for cocaine importation and possession in United States v. Deeb, 13 F.3d 1532 (11th Cir. 1994) , testimony given by a coconspirator at a prior trial in absentia at which the defendant was neither present nor represented was admitted as a prior consistent statement, as former testimony, and under the residual exception. The Court held that it was not admissible under Rule 804(b)(1) because the defendant, being absent, had no opportunity to develop the testimony at the trial. However, the former testimony was properly admitted under the residual exception.

[i] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Plea Hearing Testimony

United States v. Jackson, 335 F.3d 170 (2d Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed a conviction for importing cocaine, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding statements from an accomplice's plea allocution that allegedly exculpated the defendant. Although the accomplice was unavailable because he invoked his Fifth Amendment right at the defendant's trial, the statements were not admissible as former testimony because the government does not have an opportunity and the same motive to develop the testimony at a plea proceeding.

United States v. Preciado, 336 F.3d 739 (8th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possession with intent to distribute methamphetamine, finding no error in the exclusion of statements made during a change-of-plea hearing for a codefendant who pleaded guilty. Some of those statements tended to exculpate the defendant, but the Court reasoned that the government's motive at the hearing was to assure that the codefendant's plea was knowing, voluntary, and intelligent, and that "it had no need or motive to develop testimony" about the one defendant who went to trial.

[j] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Predecessor in Interest

In re Screws Antitrust Litig., 526 F. Supp. 1316 (D. Mass. 1981) : The Court granted an in limine motion by antitrust plaintiffs to have testimony given at a criminal antitrust trial admitted in the instant case. The Court examined the legislative history of the term "predecessor in interest" and concluded that it could not be read so broadly as to include defendants in a criminal action and unrelated defendants in a subsequent civil action arising out of the same facts. However, the Court found that the prior testimony of the unavailable witness satisfied the residual exception.

United States v. Peterson, 100 F.3d 7 (2d Cir. 1996) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, rejecting the defendant's argument that exculpatory grand jury testimony he gave in a parallel state proceeding should have been admitted. It was not admissible as prior testimony, because the federal government was not a party to the state proceeding, the state government could not fairly be considered a predecessor in interest of the federal government, and there was no evidence that the federal government participated in or controlled the state proceedings. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, at § 804.02[2]. In In re Master Key Antitrust Litig., n19 the District Court ruled that the defendant could treat the government as a predecessor in interest of the plaintiff class for purposes of Rule 804(b)(1). The Court stressed the "unique relationship" between government enforcement efforts and private litigation.

Lloyd v. American Export Lines, Inc., 580 F.2d 1179 (3d Cir. 1978) : In a Jones Act case arising from a fight between the plaintiff and a fellow seaman, the Court reversed the judgment for the plaintiff, holding that Rule 804(b)(1) permitted admission of the other seaman's testimony at a Coast Guard hearing (at which both seamen were represented by counsel and testified under oath), as the Coast Guard was a predecessor in interest of the seaman who prevailed below. The Court noted that the Coast Guard preferred charges against the other seaman and attempted to prove what was alleged in the instant case. A concurring Judge argued that the residual exception, not Rule 804(b)(1), required admission of the prior testimony, and that the majority's approach equated "predecessor in interest" with similarity of motive, an approach to Rule 804(b)(1) that Congress rejected. In Creamer v. General Teamsters Local Union 326, n20 a suit by former employees of a labor-leasing company to enforce rights under a collective bargaining agreement, the District Court found that the testimony in a prior criminal trial of the owner of the company was admissible against the company, since the owner was a predecessor in interest who had an opportunity and similar motive to examine the witnesses. It also found that the testimony in the prior criminal trial of a labor union official was inadmissible, since this official was not a predecessor in interest of the company and did not have a motive similar to that of the company in examining the witnesses.

Supermarket of Marlinton, Inc. v. Meadow Gold Dairies, Inc., 71 F.3d 119 (4th Cir. 1995) : The Court reversed a summary judgment for dairies sued by retail food stores for alleged antitrust violations, holding that testimony by a dairy official testifying as a government witness in a prior criminal conspiracy trial was admissible as former testimony, even though the dairies were not the defendants in the criminal case. The Court reiterated that privity is not the gravamen of a Rule 804(b)(1) analysis; rather, the issue is whether the party who cross-examined the witness had a motive similar to that of the party against whom the testimony is offered. In any event, a privity requirement would be satisfied here because the individual defendants in the prior criminal case were officials of one of the defendant dairy companies in the present civil suit. In Horne v. Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corp., 4 F.3d 276 (4th Cir. 1993) , the Court affirmed a judgment for a manufacturer in an asbestos products liability action, holding that depositions taken in a prior suit against the defendant's predecessor company were properly admitted against the plaintiff, even though the plaintiff in the instant case was unrelated to the plaintiff in the prior litigation. It rejected the argument that privity is required and stated that "the party against whom the deposition is offered must point up distinctions in her case not evident in the earlier litigation that would preclude similar motives of witness examination."

United States v. McDonald, 837 F.2d 1287 (5th Cir. 1988) : The Court suggested in a mail fraud prosecution that a civil litigant may be a predecessor in interest to the government so that deposition testimony in a civil case might be admissible on behalf of a criminal defendant. However, here the government and the civil litigant had sufficiently different strategies that the civil litigant's motives for cross-examining the deponent were different from the government's, so it was not error to exclude the deposition testimony.

United States v. Jackson-Randolph, 282 F.3d 369 (6th Cir. 2002) : Affirming convictions for fraud arising from false claims made to government agencies for meals for economically disadvantaged children, the Court found no error in the exclusion of prior testimony given by a codefendant at a state administrative hearing, which was conducted before the codefendant pleaded guilty. The Court noted that the "predecessor in interest" clause of Rule 804(b)(1) did not appear to apply in criminal cases, but without deciding the point held that the prosecution in the federal case had a different motive than the state in the administrative proceeding. In an asbestosis action, Dykes v. Raymark Indus., n21 the Court held that one defendant was a successor in interest to another asbestos manufacturer, and found no error in admitting the former testimony of an expert. In Clay v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., n22 the Court, vacating a judgment for the defendant in a product liability action involving alleged injuries attributable to exposure to asbestos, adopted the approach to "predecessor in interest" advocated by the Third Circuit in Lloyd v. American Export Lines, supra , which focuses on similarity of motive in deciding whether a party in a prior case was a predecessor in interest.

In re Johns-Manville/Asbestosis Cases, 93 F.R.D. 853 (N.D. Ill. 1982) : In a suit against a building products manufacturer and certain subsidiaries by employees, the employees wished to use the depositions of a doctor who died after being deposed in two earlier asbestos-related cases against other subsidiaries. The Court found the testimony admissible as former testimony, since the corporate structure was "close-knit" and the doctor effectively worked for the whole structure, making the subsidiaries in the former case predecessors in interest of the parties in the instant case.

Azalea Fleet, Inc. v. Dreyfus Supply & Mach. Corp., 782 F.2d 1455 (8th Cir. 1986) : In a dispute arising out of a barge breakaway, the Court upheld the admission of an unavailable witness' testimony in a prior trial. It found that another company was a predecessor in interest to Dreyfus, presumably because Dreyfus was in a position of possibly having to indemnify the other company for any damages it paid. The Court rejected the argument that the other company did not have a sufficient motive to examine the witness because it knew that it could pass on liability.

O'Banion v. Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corp., 968 F.2d 1011 (10th Cir. 1992) : Affirming a judgment for the defendants in an action for asbestos-related disease, the Court held it was error, because there was no showing of the witness' unavailability, to admit a transcript of expert testimony given in another asbestos action. The error was harmless, however, because the plaintiffs did not show how their interests were compromised, or the cross-examination inadequate, by the counsel for the party (described as the plaintiffs' "predecessor in interest") in the prior case.

[k] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Relationship to Other Rules

Li v. Canarozzi, 142 F.3d 83 (2d Cir. 1998) : An inmate, suing for civil rights violations following an alleged assault by corrections officers, sought to introduce deposition testimony given by another inmate, after the deponent refused to testify at trial. Although the deposition qualified as former testimony under Rule 804(b)(1), the Court found no abuse of discretion in exclusion of the deposition under Rule 403. On the basis of the deponent's testimony (out of the jury's presence) that his answers had not been full, complete, and truthful, and in light of other evidence very much along the same lines, the Trial Judge had found that the potential prejudicial effect of the evidence substantially outweighed its probative value.

SEC v. American Realty Trust, 429 F. Supp. 1148 (E.D. Va. 1977) , rev'd on other grounds, 586 F.2d 1001 (4th Cir. 1978) : In an action by the SEC for relief against alleged securities violations, the District Judge discussed the relationship between Fed. R. Civ. P. 32 and the Federal Rules of Evidence. "Even if the deposition is admissible under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, statements contained therein must be admissible under the Federal Rules of Evidence." This represents sound thinking. Since Fed. R. Civ. P. 26 allows parties to use discovery devices to gather evidence that may be relevant to preparation, but inadmissible at trial, questions asked during a deposition may be permissible for purposes of discovery and yet may produce inadmissible evidence at trial. Of course, a party is not free to sit by and forgo all evidentiary objections at a deposition. It is clear that objections to the form of questions that could easily be corrected at the time of the deposition should be made then. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 32(d)(3).

United States v. King, 713 F.2d 627 (11th Cir. 1983) : The government successfully appealed from a pretrial ruling that testimony of a key witness in a trial ending in a mistrial would be excluded in the retrial. Although the Court rejected the government's argument that the Trial Judge lacked authority to exclude evidence under Rule 403 that was admissible under Rule 804(b)(1), it found in the instant case that the Trial Judge reached an incorrect balancing ruling. The Court pointed out that evidence should be excluded only sparingly under Rule 403 and that the greater the need for the evidence the less likely it is to be excluded. The Court recognized the legitimacy of the Trial Judge's concern that without seeing and hearing a key witness the jury might have trouble evaluating his credibility, but it concluded that the probative value of the testimony was extremely high and the risk of prejudice was low.

[l] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Suppression Hearing Testimony

United States v. Bartelho, 129 F.3d 663 (1st Cir. 1997) : The defendant, charged with armed bank robbery, sought to introduce statements made on cross-examination at his own suppression hearing by an accomplice who pleaded, in order to undermine the credibility of hearsay statements by the accomplice that had been admitted. Affirming, the Court found no error in exclusion of the prior testimony, as the government's motive at the hearing to attack the accomplice's claim that his own admissions were involuntary was different from its motive at the trial to support the accomplice's implicating of the defendant.

United States v. Wingate, 520 F.2d 309 (2d Cir. 1975) : Affirming a pre-Rules conviction for heroin distribution, the Court held there was no error in excluding the suppression hearing testimony of a nontestifying defendant, as the government had no opportunity for meaningful cross-examination.

United States v. Grandison, 783 F.2d 1152 (4th Cir. 1986) : The Court found that a transcript of a deceased witness' suppression hearing testimony was admissible where the witness was under oath and fully cross-examined at that hearing.

United States v. Taplin, 954 F.2d 1256 (6th Cir. 1992) : A conviction for cocaine offenses was reversed for erroneous admission of a coconspirator's testimony given at a hearing on the coconspirator's suppression motion. Although the defendant's counsel was present at the hearing, the Court held that the defendant did not have the requisite opportunity and motive to develop the testimony because the defendant's presence was not required for the motion.

United States v. Geiger, 263 F.3d 1034 (9th Cir. 2001) : After the defendant murdered a man by attaching a bomb to the victim's truck and detonating it, he was indicted first in State Court for murder. Following a hearing, the State Court suppressed his taped confession for failure to comply with state custodial interrogation requirements. In a subsequent federal prosecution, the defendant again moved to suppress his confession. An officer who had testified at the state hearing had died in the meantime, so the Magistrate Judge admitted the officer's former testimony. The Court found no abuse of discretion, since the issues in the two suppression hearings were virtually the same: whether the confession was coerced, whether the defendant had been Mirandized, whether the arrest was pretextual, and whether the defendant had been unlawfully detained. The officer's actual testimony demonstrated that the defendant had a similar motive to cross-examine in State Court, and the fact that the cross-examination focused on the state law issues resulted not from lack of opportunity to develop the testimony but from tactical choices about utilizing that opportunity.

[m] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Unavailability

United States v. Martinez-Perez, 916 F.2d 1020 (5th Cir. 1990) : The Court reversed a conviction for bringing in and harboring illegal aliens because deposition testimony of the government's primary witness, an undocumented alien who had been released after being deposed pursuant to a standing order of the District Court, was admitted without any showing on the record that she was unavailable.

United States v. Vargas, 933 F.2d 701 (9th Cir. 1991) : When the prosecutor indicated that a principal government witness (an informant) in a drug case would invoke the Fifth Amendment, the Trial Judge sua sponte established a procedure by which the witness was examined outside the jury's presence and an edited transcript was prepared. When the witness was then examined in front of the jury, counsel were permitted to ask only questions from the transcript, and if the Judge deemed an answer inconsistent with that in the transcript, he read the earlier answer to the jury. The Court reversed, holding that the procedure violated the Rules and the Confrontation Clause. Because the witness was available, the transcript read to the jury was not admissible as former testimony, and because the Judge would not permit cross-examination questions before the jury if they were not included in the transcript, the transcript was not admissible as prior inconsistent statements by a witness subject to cross-examination.

O'Banion v. Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corp., 968 F.2d 1011 (10th Cir. 1992) : Affirming a judgment for the defendants in an action for asbestos-related disease, the Court held it was error, because there was no showing of the witness' unavailability, to admit a transcript of expert testimony given in another asbestos action. The error was harmless, however, because the plaintiffs did not show how their interests were compromised, or the cross-examination inadequate, by the counsel for the party (described as the plaintiffs' "predecessor in interest") in the prior case.

[3] Rule 804(b)(2) -- Hearsay Exceptions -- Statement Under Belief Of Impending DEATH

United States v. Lawrence, 349 F.3d 109 (3d Cir. 2003) : A few days before he died from his wounds, the victim of a shooting was shown a photo array, and the defendant claimed that the victim used it to identify another man as his assailant. Affirming a murder conviction, the Court held that the purported identification was properly not admitted as a dying declaration because there was no showing that the victim's statement was made under belief of impending death. The Court noted that the victim's medical treatment "was rigorous and undertaken with the expectation that he would survive," and that doctors had been discussing with him their plans for post-discharge care.

Webb v. Lane, 922 F.2d 390 (7th Cir. 1991) : Affirming the denial of habeas corpus relief to a prisoner convicted of murder, the Court held there was no error in admitting the victim's identification of the defendant's photograph as a dying declaration, where the victim had communicated to relatives six hours earlier his belief that he was going to die.

[4] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Hearsay Exceptions -- Statement Against Interest

[a] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Against Pecuniary Interest

Silverstein v. Chase, 260 F.3d 142 (2d Cir. 2001) : The decedent, Marvin, held a one-third interest, in common with his brother Edward and sister Rita, in a brokerage account containing securities received from their father's estate. In order to reimburse Rita for money spent on their father, Edward executed a "Cancellation of Indebtedness," which recited that the brothers had agreed to reimburse Rita and which assigned their interests in the account to her. Marvin never signed the COI. In a subsequent action by Marvin's estate to recover his interest in the account, the Trial Judge ruled that the entire COI was admissible under Rule 804(b)(3) and that therefore the collateral statements affecting Marvin's interest were admissible as well. Vacating a decision for the defendants, the Court held that the statements against Marvin's interests were not admissible under Rule 804(b)(3) because they were not against the pecuniary interests of the declarant, Edward, and they did not gain reliability by being collateral to his statements. In the Court's view, the Williamson rationale was equally applicable to statements against pecuniary interest as to those against penal interest. The Court remanded for consideration whether the statements would be admissible under Rule 807 or Rule 803(15).

United States v. Ashfield, 735 F.2d 101 (3d Cir. 1984) : Convictions for tax evasion were sustained as the Court upheld the exclusion of testimony by an accountant that the owner of the accounting firm, who died before trial, told him to tell the IRS that any misreporting of the defendants' income was an "accounting error." The owner's statement was not "objectively contrary" to his interest, it was made after the IRS had begun to look at the defendants' tax returns, it failed to identify who made the error and what the error might have been, and the accountant-witness conceded that the statement might have been suggested by the defendants.

United States v. L'Hoste, 640 F.2d 693 (5th Cir. 1981) : The Court found that deposition testimony from a civil case was not admissible for a defendant where the deposition witness had a pecuniary interest in stating things a certain way, even if the testimony might also have been damaging, and the defendant offered nothing to support the declaration against interest claim.

Smith v. Updegraff, 744 F.2d 1354 (8th Cir. 1984) : In a civil rights action by a former police officer against a sheriff, deputy sheriffs, and others, the Court sustained a judgment for the plaintiff. It found that statements by the sheriff, which acknowledged a concert of action with other defendants, were admissible as declarations against pecuniary interest where they were made after the suit charging a conspiracy had been filed.

Donovan v. Crisostomo, 689 F.2d 869 (9th Cir. 1982) : In a suit for injunctive relief and back pay brought by the Secretary of Labor, the Court held that statements of foreign employees that they did not in fact work overtime were not admissible as declarations against interest, since they may have felt that it was in their interest to make the statements to avoid being sent back to their country of origin.

[b] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Against Penal Interest

[i] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Civil Cases

PECO Energy Co. v. Boden, 64 F.3d 852 (3d Cir. 1995) : In an insurance coverage dispute arising out of a scheme to steal fuel oil from the insured, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of a driver's statement that he had been told by his boss to steal from deliveries. A person's admission that he stole for someone else is as much against his interest as an admission that he stole for himself, since it subjects him to possible criminal responsibility and civil liability.

McClung v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 270 F.3d 1007 (6th Cir. 2001) : The plaintiff's decedent was abducted from the parking lot of a shopping mall and later murdered. The plaintiff sued Wal-Mart and other tenants of the mall for negligence in providing security in the lot. To prove the since-deceased kidnapper's location in the lot, the plaintiff offered the kidnapper's sworn affirmance at his guilty plea hearing to a statement by the prosecutor that he kidnapped the victim from the "Wal-Mart parking lot." Although the Court reversed summary judgment for Wal-Mart, it found no error in the Judge disregarding this statement. The guilty plea as a whole was against the declarant's interest, but whether the kidnapping was in the Wal-Mart lot as opposed to the Circuit City lot was not against his interest. It was inconceivable he would have corrected the prosecutor's recitation on this point, and his simple "Yes, sir" affirming the recitation did not provide sufficient reliability to each individual statement it contained. The Court held, however, that narratives the kidnapper provided to the police were sufficiently reliable, when taken with other evidence that the victim had been shopping at Wal-Mart, to justify their admission of the kidnapper's location within the parking area.

American Automotive Accessories, Inc. v. Fishman, 175 F.3d 534 (7th Cir. 1999) : In an action to recover embezzled funds, the embezzling employee had made a confession implicating Fishman, owner of the currency exchange where bogus checks were cashed, but the employee exercised his self-incrimination privilege at his deposition and all other alleged participants denied any knowledge of the check-cashing scheme. Affirming summary judgment for Fishman, the Court held that declarations setting forth the employee's confessions were hearsay not admissible under Rule 804(b)(3). There was no abuse of discretion in the finding below that the plaintiffs had not met their burden of showing corroborating circumstances indicating the trustworthiness of the employee's statements, since it was a reasonable inference, based on the timing and contents of settlement agreements made along with the confessions, that the statements were made to curry favor with the plaintiffs. The Court held that its requirement of corroborating circumstances for statements offered under the Rule, whether they inculpated or exculpated third parties, survived the Williamson decision and applied to both criminal and civil cases. In United States v. Hajda, 135 F.3d 439 (7th Cir. 1998) , the Court affirmed the denaturalization of an alleged Nazi concentration camp guard, holding there was no error in admitting an ancient document containing an unsigned statement given by his father at a trial of family members for collaboration in 1945-46. The Court noted that because of "the danger of guilt by association, ... a declarant's statement that his son collaborated with the Nazis is contrary to a father's interest when made at a Nazi collaboration trial." Furthermore, the statement was clearly corroborated by the other documentary evidence.

Stephens, Inc. v. Geldermann, Inc., 962 F.2d 808 (8th Cir. 1992) : In an action by an investor against a commodities futures market, the Court held that statements by a participant (since deceased) that he had help from another (clearly the defendant) in defrauding the plaintiff had been admitted improperly, but the error was harmless. Only those parts of a statement clearly against the declarant's interest are admissible under the Rule; here, the declarant may have been attempting to shift attention from himself to the defendant and thereby improve his position, so the part implicating the defendant lacked the necessary reliability. In an antitrust case, Pink Supply Corp. v. Hiebert, Inc., n23 the Court ruled that a statement by an employee implicating the employer in price fixing was not a declaration against interest absent evidence that the employee had some understanding of price-fixing when he made the statement.

United States v. Samaniego, 345 F.3d 1280 (11th Cir. 2003) : In an interpleader action to determine ownership of championship belts allegedly stolen from a former professional boxer, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of statements by the alleged thief expressing remorse, apologizing for, and asking forgiveness for having stolen the belts. Although the statements were erroneously admitted under Rule 803(3), they were admissible under Rule 804(b)(3) because they would subject the declarant to civil or criminal liability and the declarant was sufficiently shown to be unavailable to testify.

[ii] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Against Penal Interest -- Statement Offered Against Accused

[A] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Admissible

United States v. Wilson, 160 F.3d 732 (D.C. Cir. 1998) : In a trial for murdering a government witness, the prosecution introduced post-murder statements by a codefendant to two friends in which he said that he had gone to the other defendants' home on the evening of the murder and told them the victim was in the area. The Court found the statements were against interest, since they were made the day after the murder to a man who had witnessed the murder and to another who knew the victim, and they were potentially incriminating had there been evidence that the declarant was a part of the conspiracy.

United States v. Shea, 211 F.3d 658 (1st Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed racketeering, carjacking, and other convictions, finding no error in the admission of statements by some defendants as declarations against penal interest. The statements were made to friends or companions, not to police, and were not of the blame-shifting variety. In United States v. Barone, 114 F.3d 1284 (1st Cir. 1997) , the Court affirmed a racketeering conviction, upholding the admission of statements against penal interest implicating the defendant that were made by a declarant whom the defendant was alleged to have murdered. The declarant made the statements to a close friend and did not shift the blame for criminal acts away from himself.

United States v. Katsougrakis, 715 F.2d 769 (2d Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed mail fraud convictions growing out of arson of a diner. A government witness testified that he visited his friend, who had been burned in the arson, in the hospital and that the friend, heavily bandaged and unable to speak, nodded his head affirmatively when asked whether he had been paid to burn the diner. The friend died before trial. The Court found that the nodding was a statement against penal interest, admissible against all defendants. The circumstances made the statement especially reliable -- i.e., there was no indication that by nodding the friend thought that he would obtain any advantage.

United States v. Mussare, 405 F.3d 161 (3d Cir. 2005) : Affirming convictions for drug-related offenses and extortion, the Court found no error in the admission of a statement by an accomplice bragging to friends that he and the defendant had beaten up a person the previous day while collecting a debt. The accomplice was not attempting to deflect criminal liability, and the statement was made to friends in informal circumstances. In United States v. Moses, 148 F.3d 277 (3d Cir. 1998) , the defendant was charged with tax evasion for failure to report income he received from illegal kickbacks. The prosecution introduced statements, made in luncheon conversation by the person who paid the kickbacks to a friend, which indicated that the declarant was "taking care" of the defendant "moneywise." The Court found no error in admission of the statements, since they were not made while in custody, there was no reason to believe the declarant was trying to pass the blame to the defendant, and by naming Moses the declarant "provided self-inculpatory information that might have enabled the authorities to better investigate his wrongdoing."

United States v. Triplett, 922 F.2d 1174 (5th Cir. 1991) : Affirming an arson conviction, the Court held that a coconspirator's threats to a witness, made in jail after the declarant's arrest, were properly admitted under the Rule because the threat would have subjected the declarant to criminal liability and the statement that he could be convicted if the witness told the truth could be construed as an admission of incriminating facts.

United States v. Franklin, 415 F.3d 537 (6th Cir. 2005) : In a bank robbery prosecution, the government offered testimony from a witness recounting statements by the non-testifying codefendant, a long-time friend of the witness, that he and the defendant had committed the robbery. Affirming, the Court held there was no error in admitting the testimony. It satisfied the hearsay exception, since the declarant was unavailable, the declarant inculpated himself, and the trustworthiness requirement was satisfied by factors also meeting the Confrontation Clause requirements. The declarant's statements were not "testimonial" under Crawford because they were not made to the police or otherwise to further a prosecution, so the confrontation analysis was that of Ohio v. Roberts. Circuit precedent suggests that, except possibly for statements made by the defendant inculpating himself, statements against penal interest do not constitute a firmly-rooted exception under Roberts but rather are only admissible if they bear particularized guarantees of trustworthiness. Here, the declarant's statements about his own participation did not minimize his role, and to the extent they inculpated the defendant they were not puffing or bragging or made to curry favor with law enforcement; they were made to a friend who had expressed concern about the declarant's "paranoid" and "stressed-out" behavior. Thus, they were made in circumstances providing indicia of trustworthiness that satisfied the Sixth Amendment and the hearsay exception. In a RICO prosecution of a Mafia leader, United States v. Tocco, 200 F.3d 401 (6th Cir. 2000) , the Court found no error in the admission of statements made by another Mafia leader (since deceased) to his son that described the roles of the declarant, the defendant, and others in the organization. The declarant's statements about the conspiracy linked him to others in the conspiracy and were therefore against his own penal interest. The Court also noted that the statements were not made with the hope of implicating others to gain favor with the police. Finally, the Court rejected the argument that certain statements were not against penal interest because the declarant had already been convicted and sentenced for the conduct described; the statements were still against interest because the conduct was a predicate act of a RICO conspiracy for which the declarant was never tried and convicted.

United States v. Shukri, 207 F.3d 412 (7th Cir. 2000) : In a bench trial on charges of conspiracy to possess stolen property, the Judge admitted testimony from an accomplice's brother-in-law that the accomplice had made statements implicating the defendant. The accomplice was unavailable at the trial, and the defendant's counsel waived the argument that his statements were not against penal interest under Williamson v. United States, contesting only whether they were supported by corroborating circumstances. The Court held that the waiver and the failure to argue the statements were not against penal interest were not ineffective assistance of counsel, but a "reasonable tactic," since the statements were against penal interest. In United States v. Robbins, 197 F.3d 829 (7th Cir. 1999) , the Court affirmed convictions arising out of a large-scale marijuana operation, holding that an unavailable codefendant's statement to his former fiancee that he "sold pot" with Robbins was admissible against the codefendant and also against Robbins as a declaration against penal interest. The Court noted that the statement was not a confession to law enforcement officers, where the declarant may have been trying to shift blame to others, but was made voluntarily in a conversation between the declarant and a trusted confidante.

United States v. Manfre, 368 F.3d 832 (8th Cir. 2004) : Affirming a conviction for an arson conspiracy, the Court held that a statements by a conspirator to friends that he was going to burn down a nightclub for the defendant was properly admitted as a declaration against penal interest. The declarant was unavailable because he had died in the fire, the statements were against his interest, and they were trustworthy in naming the defendant because they were made casually to an intimate confidant rather than while in custody or under official suspicion.

[B] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Against Penal Interest -- Statement Offered Against Accused--Constitutional Concerns

Lee v. Illinois, 476 U.S. 530 (1986) : Lee and a codefendant were charged with committing a double murder and tried jointly in a bench trial in which neither testified. In rejecting Lee's claim that she had not participated in the murders and finding her guilty, the Trial Judge expressly relied upon portions of the codefendant's confession. Although Lee also made a statement that overlapped with the codefendant's "to a great extent," the two statements differed with respect to Lee's participation. The Supreme Court found a violation of the defendant's Confrontation Clause rights under the then-applicable Ohio v. Roberts analysis. Because the statement was made to police, it would be held "testimonial" and inadmissible under Crawford v. Washington.

Lilly v. Virginia, 527 U.S. 116 (1999) : The Court held that the admission of an accomplice's custodial confession as a declaration against penal interest violated a state defendant's right to confrontation. The concurring opinions of justices Scalia and Thomas applied the analysis later adopted by the Court in Crawford v. Washington; the other opinions used the then-applicable Ohio v. Roberts analysis. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 804.02[17].

United States v. Wilson, 160 F.3d 732 (D.C. Cir. 1998) : In a trial for murdering a government witness, the prosecution introduced post-murder statements by a codefendant to two friends in which he said that he had gone to the other defendants' home on the evening of the murder and told them the victim was in the area. The Court found the statements were against interest and were reliable: they were made to two different lay persons, not law enforcement officials, shortly after the murder, and the declarant had no motive to diminish his role by shifting blame. Thus, there was no Confrontation Clause problem under the then-applicable Ohio v. Roberts analysis. We note that under Crawford v. Washington the statements were probably not "testimonial," given the circumstances of their making, so there would be no confrontation issue. In United States v. Coachman, n24 the Court affirmed fraud, theft, and other convictions of a former clerk who serviced the Defense Intelligence Agency, although it found that the defendant's confrontation rights were violated when the government offered into evidence an inculpatory statement made by a codefendant after his arrest.

United States v. Barone, 114 F.3d 1284 (1st Cir. 1997) : The Court affirmed a racketeering conviction, upholding the admission of statements against penal interest implicating the defendant that were made by a declarant whom the defendant was alleged to have murdered. The Court found no confrontation violation under the then-applicable Ohio v. Roberts analysis. We note that under Crawford v. Washington the statements were probably not "testimonial," given the circumstances of their making, so there would be no confrontation issue. In United States v. Seeley, n25 the Court affirmed robbery convictions, holding that neither Rule 804(b)(3) nor the Constitution requires a special assessment of the credibility of a witness who relates an out-of-court declaration against penal interest, since the witness' credibility is a matter for the jury.

United States v. Matthews, 20 F.3d 538 (2d Cir. 1994) : Affirming bank robbery convictions, the Court rejected a Confrontation Clause attack on declarations against penal interest. It reasoned that ordinarily a confession that follows formal police interrogation cannot be admitted against a third person, but if the statement is made to a person whom the declarant believes is an ally rather than a law enforcement official, and if the circumstances surrounding the portion of the statement that inculpates the defendant provide no reason to suspect that the inculpatory portion is any less trustworthy than the part that directly incriminates the declarant, the trustworthiness of the portion that inculpates the defendant may well be sufficiently established that its admission does not violate the Confrontation Clause. We note that under Crawford v. Washington a declaration against penal interest made to an ally does not raise a confrontation issue.

United States v. Moses, 148 F.3d 277 (3d Cir. 1998) : Admitting inculpatory statements made by the declarant to a friend during lunch conversations, the Court held that a hearsay statement admissible as a declaration against penal interest satisfied the Confrontation Clause under the then-applicable Ohio v. Roberts analysis. We note that under Crawford v. Washington the statements were probably not "testimonial," given the circumstances of their making, so there would be no confrontation issue.

United States v. Franklin, 415 F.3d 537 (6th Cir. 2005) : In a bank robbery prosecution, the government offered testimony from a witness recounting statements by the non-testifying codefendant, a long-time friend of the witness, that he and the defendant had committed the robbery. Affirming, the Court held there was no error in admitting the testimony. It satisfied the hearsay exception, since the declarant was unavailable, the declarant inculpated himself, and the trustworthiness requirement was satisfied by factors also meeting the Confrontation Clause requirements. The confrontation analysis was that of Ohio v. Roberts; the declarant's statements were not "testimonial" under Crawford because they were not made to the police or otherwise to further a prosecution. Circuit precedent suggests that, except possibly for statements made by the defendant inculpating himself, statements against penal interest do not constitute a firmly-rooted exception under Roberts but rather are only admissible if they bear particularized guarantees of trustworthiness. Here, the declarant's statements about his own participation did not minimize his role, and to the extent they inculpated the defendant they were not puffing or bragging or made to curry favor with law enforcement; they were made to a friend who had expressed concern about the declarant's "paranoid" and "stressed-out" behavior. Thus, they were made in circumstances providing indicia of trustworthiness that satisfied the Sixth Amendment and the hearsay exception. In United States v. Tocco, 200 F.3d 401 (6th Cir. 2000) , the Court found no error in the admission of statements made by another Mafia leader (since deceased) to his son that described the roles of the declarant, the defendant, and others in the organization. Although the defendant did not raise a Confrontation Clause argument, the Court stated that it would have been unavailing under the then-applicable Ohio v. Roberts analysis. We note that under Crawford v. Washington the statements were probably not "testimonial," given the circumstances of their making, so there would be no confrontation issue.

United States v. Westmoreland, 240 F.3d 618 (7th Cir. 2001) : The Court held inculpatory declarations against penal interest made to police inadmissible, and those made to the declarant's son and to a cell mate admissible, under the then-applicable Ohio v. Roberts analysis. We note that the results would likely be the same under Crawford v. Washington.

[C] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Against Penal Interest -- Statement Offered Against Accused -- Inadmissible

Williamson v. United States, 512 U.S. 594 (1994) : The Court held (6-3) that the exception applies only to self-inculpatory statements; neutral or self-serving portions of a broader narrative that is generally self-inculpatory are not admissible under the Rule. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 804.02[12].

[iii] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Against Penal Interest -- Statement Offered for Accused

[A] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Admissible or Required To Be Admitted

United States v. Barrett, 539 F.2d 244 (1st Cir. 1976) : Reversing a theft conviction, the Court held that a defense witness' testimony to the effect that he was at a card game when one of the participants in the theft scheme made a statement admitting his participation and declaring that someone else, but not the defendant, was involved qualified as a declaration against interest and should have been admitted if there was sufficient corroboration. The exception is not limited to direct confessions; any statements qualify that a reasonable person would not have made under the circumstances unless he believed the statements to be true.

United States v. Ditizio, 530 F. Supp. 175 (E.D. Pa. 1982) : In a prosecution for conspiracy to commit arson, the District Judge granted a severance motion so that Ditizio could offer a statement, made by a codefendant during "an off-the-record interview" with the government, which tended to exculpate Ditizio. Even though the statement was made pursuant to a grant of use immunity, the Judge concluded that "sufficient risk of prosecution remained so that a reasonable declarant would not have made the statement without believing it to be true."

United States v. Brainard, 690 F.2d 1117 (4th Cir. 1982) : In the trial of two defendants on charges arising out of a fraudulent investment scheme, the Court held it was error to exclude testimony that a third person, who had pleaded guilty to involvement in the scheme, had told his secretary that the two defendants had no knowledge of the scheme. The Court concluded that where it was clear that the declarant would exercise his privilege against self-incrimination, the defense did not have to go through the motions of producing the declarant at trial; that the statement to the secretary was against penal interest by suggesting that the declarant had inside knowledge of the fraudulent scheme; and that the circumstances surrounding the statement provided corroboration.

United States v. Thomas, 571 F.2d 285 (5th Cir. 1978) : The Court reversed a conviction for bank robbery because the Trial Judge excluded evidence that a codefendant, who chose not to testify and thus was unavailable, had made statements exculpating the defendant at the close of the preliminary hearing. The statements were made spontaneously in the presence of a number of people, including a United States Magistrate. Rejecting an argument that the statement did not qualify as a declaration against interest because the declarant did not expressly confess guilt, the Court observed that "by referring to statements that 'tend' to subject the declarant to criminal liability, the Rule encompasses disserving statements by a declarant that would have probative value in a trial against the declarant."

United States v. Toney, 599 F.2d 787 (6th Cir. 1979) : The Court reversed a bank robbery conviction because the defendant was precluded from introducing a statement by another alleged robber (who asserted his self-incrimination privilege at trial) that the defendant had won a substantial sum of money from him. This evidence would have supported the defendant's claim that the "bait" money found on his person was obtained by gambling. The Court said that the statement, made when the declarant was arrested for the bank robbery, should have been admitted either as a declaration against interest or under the residual exception.

United States v. Nagib, 56 F.3d 798 (7th Cir. 1995) : During a drug conspiracy trial, one codefendant changed his plea. When the defendant sought to introduce portions of the transcript from the codefendant's change-of-plea hearing, the Trial Judge ruled it inadmissible under United States v. Powell, 894 F.2d 895 (7th Cir. 1990) , which held a coconspirator's plea hearing transcript inadmissible under Rule 804(b)(1) because the government does not have the opportunity to develop the testimony on cross-examination at the plea hearing. Reversing, the Court noted that Powell had reserved ruling on admissibility under Rule 804(b)(3). Applying Williamson v. United States, the Court held that all the codefendant's statements, including those tending to exculpate the defendant, were against his penal interest, for they implicated him in the conspiracy.

Chia v. Cambra, 360 F.3d 997 (9th Cir. 2004) : Chia was convicted in state court for being an accessory to the murder of two DEA agents killed in a shootout. The Court reversed denial of his habeas corpus petition because statements by one of the shooters were erroneously excluded at trial. In the statements, made to police and the FBI within two days of the shooting and after life-saving surgery, the declarant stated that not only was Chia not involved in the plot and would not have shared in the drugs or money to be stolen but also that Chia had tried to talk him out of the plot. The Court held that the statements were reliable, inculpating the declarant and corroborated in their details by independent evidence; they were also material and critical to Chia's defense, as the other conspirators were killed in the shootout. In United States v. Paguio, 114 F.3d 928 (9th Cir. 1997) , a husband and wife were charged with bank fraud arising out of forged documentation filed in a bank loan application. The application was prepared and the loan was arranged by the husband's father, ostensibly on behalf of the defendants; the application was ultimately signed by the defendants. The father made a statement to the son's lawyer to the effect that he had engineered the whole transaction and that the defendants "had nothing to do with it." The Trial Judge admitted the part of the father's statement referring to his own conduct as a declaration against penal interest, but excluded the part exculpating the defendants. Reversing, the Court noted that the father admitted "not only participation but leadership, leading his son and daughter-in-law into the abyss. Because leading others into wrongdoing has always been seen as bad, there is a sentencing enhancement for it. Also, in context, the inculpating and exculpating statements were not practically separable." This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, at § 804.02[13].

United States v. Lopez, 777 F.2d 543 (10th Cir. 1985) : The Court reversed a drug conviction because statements by the defendant's companion were erroneously excluded. It found that the statements tended to shift guilt from the defendant to the companion and that "a reasonable man in his position would not have made the statements unless he believed them to be true."

[B] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Against Penal Interest -- Statement Offered for Accused -- Constitutional Concerns

United States v. Benveniste, 564 F.2d 335 (9th Cir. 1977) : The Court reversed a drug conviction on the ground it was error to exclude testimony of a defense investigator regarding his interviews with a participant in the drug dealings while permitting the key government witness, a paid informant, to testify as to statements made by the same person. Noting that the government refused to grant immunity to the participant and emphasizing that there was significant external evidence to support the defendant's entrapment theory, the Court held that the statements to the defense investigator tended to place the declarant in a compromised position with respect to criminal liability and qualified as declarations against interest when the declarant invoked the Fifth Amendment at trial. The Court cited Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284 (1973) , to support its conclusion that the defendant was denied "crucial substantiation of his asserted defense of entrapment and thereby deprived him of a fair opportunity to defend against the Government's accusations."

United States v. Delgado, 903 F.2d 1495 (11th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed convictions for conspiring to import cocaine in furniture, holding there was no error in excluding evidence of a statement by one of the defendants when arrested that four persons (including defendants) showed up at his warehouse and he did not know why. The Court rejected the defendant's argument under Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284 (1973) , because the statement, rather than being trustworthy, was a self-serving attempt to exculpate the declarant from the conspiracy.

[C] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Against Penal Interest -- Statement Offered for Accused -- No Abuse of Discretion to Exclude

United States v. Tajeddini, 945 F.2d 458 (1st Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed a conviction for importing heroin, holding there was no error in excluding a statement made by the alleged source to Iranian police authorities in which the source indicated he had duped the defendant into carrying innocent vegetable seeds into the United States. The statement was not against any significant penal interest of the declarant and was not imbued with sufficient indicia of reliability to render it admissible.

United States v. Abreu, 342 F.3d 183 (2d Cir. 2003) : Affirming cocaine convictions, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony by the defendant that, when his son showed him a brick-shaped package containing drugs and the defendant instructed him to get rid of it, the son said that the drugs were "beat," and that he had been duped and would try to get his money back. The Court reasoned that the statements were offered for their truth, to prove that the seized cocaine belonged to the son. It declined to find that the statements were declarations against interest, because there were no corroborating circumstances to indicate their trustworthiness and the defendant had made no efforts to procure the testimony or attendance at trial of his son, who was in the Dominican Republic. In a prosecution for illegal exportation of fuel pumps to Libya, United States v. Doyle, 130 F.3d 523 (2d Cir. 1997) , defendants sought to introduce exculpatory statements made in the presence of counsel by a cooperating witness at an interview with the government pursuant to a proffer agreement. The declarant was unavailable at trial, and the Judge found the statements were against his penal interest but excluded them for lack of trustworthiness. The Court found no abuse of discretion, since the statements were unsworn and were contradicted by the declarant in subsequent statements, as well as by other witnesses. The Court also expressed doubt, although it was not necessary to decide, whether the statements were in fact sufficiently against the declarant's interest to satisfy Williamson. In United States v. DeVillio, n26 the Court rejected the defendants' claims that a tape-recorded statement of a witness made while cooperating with the government and wearing a wire recording device was admissible, since the statement was not against his penal interests under the circumstances. United States v. Harwood, 998 F.2d 91 (2d Cir. 1993) , is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 804.02[11].

United States v. Torcasio, 959 F.2d 503 (4th Cir. 1992) , amended, 993 F.2d 368 (4th Cir. 1993) (per curiam): In a prosecution arising out of payments to a West Virginia state senator for the purpose of influencing the passage of a statute, the defendant was precluded from offering a statement given by another person to New Jersey investigators that the declarant had made one of the payments to the senator to do public relations work. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion, as no adverse consequence could result to the declarant from the admission.

United States v. Williams, 809 F.2d 1072 (5th Cir. 1987) : The Court noted in a racketeering case that a codefendant's statements would have been excluded since they were made under the protection of an immunity grant "and therefore they were not statements against his interest."

United States v. Alvarez, 266 F.3d 587 (6th Cir. 2001) : The defendant was charged with killing a person who owed him a drug debt. To show that others had a motive to kill the victim, the defendant proffered a statement from another drug dealer to the effect that the victim owed that drug dealer money as well. Affirming, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the statement, as it was not sufficiently disserving to the declarant's interest.

The statement had been made in the defendant's counsel's office, after counsel said there was no way that the declarant could be convicted on the basis of the statements. In a prosecution for drug trafficking offenses, United States v. Jones, 124 F.3d 781 (6th Cir. 1997) , the Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding a letter from the defendant's son that claimed responsibility for some of the acts charged to the defendant. The letter was not trustworthy because: the two had a close relationship; it was written on the eve of trial and two years after the events in question; it was sent in response to two letters from the defendant telling the son what to say at trial; it was written after a visit from the defendant's attorney, who indicated he could get the son immunity; and the exculpatory statements were contradicted by statements the son gave under oath and with counsel present to an ATF agent a few days before the trial.

United States v. Bonty, 383 F.3d 575 (7th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed convictions of two men for interstate transportation of minors with intent to commit aggravated sexual abuse, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of the codefendant's statement during an FBI interview that the defendant "had nothing to do with" the crime. The exculpatory statement was not inculpatory of the declarant, and even evaluating the statement in the context of the declarant's entire interview would not change that conclusion, since the declarant at the time was continuing to deny that he sexually assaulted the victim. In United States v. Andreas, 216 F.3d 645 (7th Cir. 2000) , the government's case for price-fixing was based in large part on tape recordings made by an informant, who had concurrently committed other crimes not known to the FBI. When he learned he was about to be indicted, the informant met with an agent and told her that his FBI handler had instructed him to destroy tapes exculpatory of the defendants. He later recanted the allegations, but the defendants sought to introduce them as statements against penal interest. The Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding these hearsay statements. They were not corroborated, and lacked credibility, since the declarant both recanted them and had an undoubted propensity to lie. Furthermore, the request to destroy tapes was against the FBI's interest, not the declarant's, and might even have been helpful in the case on which he was about to be indicted. In United States v. Hall, n27 the Court, affirming a conviction for kidnapping and illegally transporting a teenage girl, upheld the exclusion of evidence that another man confessed after going to the funeral home and asking to see the girl's body. The other man "confessed to any crime he was questioned about by the police" and "lacked knowledge regarding the pertinent facts of the case," and there was no evidence corroborating any part of his story. Affirming firearms convictions in United States v. Butler, n28 the Court held that a hearsay statement from a person on the premises during a police raid was properly excluded. The hearsay declarant accused the police of planting guns found in the house on the defendant because they knew that the defendant was a felon. The Court held that the declarant had not admitted anything remotely criminal; he did not admit that he had possession of or owned any gun. At most, the statement put him at risk of being in some type of constructive possession of a gun, a risk not sufficient to provide a circumstantial guarantee of reliability. In United States v. Williams, n29 the Court upheld the exclusion of statements offered by the defense, suggesting that the statements not only lacked corroboration, but also that they might not have been against interest when made.

United States v. Bobo, 994 F.2d 524 (8th Cir. 1993) : The Court affirmed a firearms conviction, upholding the exclusion of the defendant's brother's statement that a gun was his rather than the defendant's. The sibling relationship, the brother's criminal record, the inconsistency of the brother's statements, and the timing of the statement on the eve of trial all supported exclusion. In United States v. Richards, 967 F.2d 1189 (8th Cir. 1992) , the defendant, charged with interstate transportation of firearms, sought to introduce a statement made three days before he was arrested in which the woman arrested with him had said that guns found in the car with them were hers. The Court held the evidence was properly excluded because the statement was not against the declarant's interest at the time it was made, although her subsequent behavior, concealing one of the guns in her purse and transporting marijuana, subjected her to criminal liability. In United States v. Thomas, n30 the Court affirmed a conviction for drug offenses, holding that a statement by a deceased codefendant to his attorney that indicated that the defendant and another had not been involved in the charged transaction was not admissible under the Rule. It was not inculpatory of the declarant and it was not trustworthy in light of the other codefendant's guilty plea and evidence of the defendant's guilt.

United States v. Shryock, 342 F.3d 948 (9th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed convictions for gang-related crimes, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony that an alleged accomplice, not present at trial, had said he shot a murder victim in self-defense. The Court concluded that the statement may have been made to absolve the declarant of criminal liability rather than to implicate him, so it was not a declaration against interest. In United States v. Fowlie, 24 F.3d 1059 (9th Cir. 1994) , the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding a videotaped interview between a defense investigator and a witness who had testified before the grand jury. The witness' statement, made in Holland, that he committed perjury lacked reliability, as he indicated he intended never again to be physically present in the United States, so he must have believed he was under little or no threat of criminal liability when he made the statement. In United States v. Ospina, n31 the Court held that one defendant was properly not permitted to introduce statements made by two other defendants that cocaine belonged only to them, where the statements were made after arrest and the codefendants had an opportunity to talk among themselves.

United States v. Chalan, 812 F.2d 1302 (10th Cir. 1987) : In a prosecution for murder and other crimes, the Court held there was no error in excluding statements by the defendant's brother and cousin that the defendant was drunk on the day of the murder and that they were in the vicinity. The Court found that the statements did not establish that the defendant was too intoxicated to commit the crime and did not clearly subject the two declarants to criminal liability.

United States v. Thomas, 62 F.3d 1332 (11th Cir. 1995) : At the fraud trial of loan brokers charged with taking fees but making no effort to obtain loans for their customers, the defendants proffered hearsay statements from members of a Texas brokerage group with which they had done business. These statements indicated that the defendants had aggressively pursued their clients' interests, and had relied upon the representations of the Texas brokers group that the group would present the defendants' loan packages to lenders for funding. The Court found no error in exclusion of the statements, since they did not inculpate the Texas brokers in any way -- indeed, the statements tended to exculpate both the declarants and the defendants from any allegation of participation in a fraud. The Court rejected the argument that the statements were necessarily inculpatory because the declarants had invoked their Fifth Amendment privilege against testifying at the defendants' trial.

[c] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Appellate Review

United States v. Bagley, 537 F.2d 162 (5th Cir. 1976) : Affirming a conviction for possession of heroin in a prison, the Court found no clear error in the determination below that the surrounding circumstances did not clearly indicate the trustworthiness of a proffered exculpatory statement. The Court noted that in reviewing the ruling on admissibility, consideration of the trustworthiness of the statement required a review of findings of fact, a situation analogous to the review of a preliminary determination of the voluntariness of a confession. Holding that the clearly erroneous standard of review governed, the Court stated that the absence of express findings of fact by the Trial Judge did not prevent the application of this test in the instant case. The reviewing Court's task is to determine whether any reasonable view of the evidence would support the lower Court's ruling.

[d] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Corroborating Circumstances

[i] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Civil Cases

American Automotive Accessories, Inc. v. Fishman, 175 F.3d 534 (7th Cir. 1999) : In an action to recover embezzled funds, the embezzling employee had made a confession implicating Fishman, owner of the currency exchange where bogus checks were cashed, but the employee exercised his self-incrimination privilege at his deposition and all other alleged participants denied any knowledge of the check-cashing scheme. Affirming summary judgment for Fishman, the Court held that declarations setting forth the employee's confessions were hearsay not admissible under Rule 804(b)(3). The plaintiffs had not met their burden of showing corroborating circumstances indicating the trustworthiness of the employee's statements, since it was a reasonable inference, based on the timing and contents of settlement agreements made along with the confessions, that the statements were made to curry favor with the plaintiffs. The Court held that its requirement of corroborating circumstances for statements offered under the Rule, whether they inculpated or exculpated third parties, survived the Williamson decision and applied to both criminal and civil cases.

[ii] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Corroborating Circumstances -- Statements Offered by Accused

[A] Rule 804(b)(3) -- No Abuse of Discretion to Exclude

United States v. Edelin, 996 F.2d 1238 (D.C. Cir. 1993) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possessing cocaine base with intent to distribute, holding there was no error in excluding a statement by the defendant's roommate purportedly exculpating the defendant, as there were no independent indicia of trustworthiness for the statement and the roommate may have had a motive to fabricate. In United States v. Mackin, n32 the Court affirmed the denial of new trial motions based on a prosecution witness' recantation of her trial testimony. If believed, the recantation would have placed most of the responsibility for the criminal activity on the declarant and her husband. But the Court held that it was properly rejected because of a lack of corroborating circumstances, citing Rule 804(b)(3).

United States v. Millan, 230 F.3d 431 (1st Cir. 2000) : Affirming carjacking and firearms convictions, the Court held there was no error in excluding the defendant's testimony about a conversation he had overheard between two participants in the events concerning trading illicit firearms, since there were insufficient corroborating circumstances to warrant admission of the testimony. In United States v. Mackey, 117 F.3d 24 (1st Cir. 1997) , a defendant charged with bank robbery sought to explain his sudden wealth with statements by his bookie that he had won $60,000 on baseball bets. The Court found no abuse of discretion in exclusion of the statements, since there were insufficient corroborating circumstances. There was no specific evidence of a long winning streak or large winnings, and two girlfriends familiar with the defendant's betting habits testified that he was not interested in baseball. Other cases in which the Court found insufficient corroborating circumstances include: United States v. Hemmer, 729 F.2d 10 (1st Cir. 1984) ; United States v. Zirpolo, 704 F.2d 23 (1st Cir. 1983) ; United States v. Annese, 631 F.2d 1041 (1st Cir. 1980) .

United States v. Abreu, 342 F.3d 183 (2d Cir. 2003) : Affirming cocaine convictions, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony by the defendant that, when his son showed him a brick-shaped package containing drugs and the defendant instructed him to get rid of it, the son said that the drugs were "beat," and that he had been duped and would try to get his money back. The Court reasoned that the statements were offered for their truth, to prove that the seized cocaine belonged to the son. It declined to find that the statements were declarations against interest, because there were no corroborating circumstances to indicate their trustworthiness and the defendant had made no efforts to procure the testimony or attendance at trial of his son, who was in the Dominican Republic. In a narcotics prosecution, United States v. Lumpkin, 192 F.3d 280 (2d Cir. 1999) , the defendant offered a statement made in the office of the defendant's attorney by the broker of the transaction, which indicated that the defendant was not involved in the drug transaction. The Court found no error in exclusion of the statement on the ground of insufficient corroborating circumstances. It noted that the declarant entered a plea agreement the day after making the challenged statement in which she made admissions that conflicted with her previous statement that the defendant was not involved. In United States v. Bahadar, n33 the Court affirmed a conviction for heroin offenses, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding allegedly exculpatory statements by a coconspirator who asserted his self-incrimination privilege. Even if the statements were against penal interest when made, there were insufficient corroborating circumstances to support the trustworthiness of the statements. Other cases in which the Court found insufficient corroborating circumstances include: United States v. Salvador, 820 F.2d 558 (2d Cir. 1987) ; United States v.

Rodriguez, 706 F.2d 31 (2d Cir. 1983) ; United States v. Ford, 771 F.2d 60 (2d Cir. 1985) (2-1 decision); United States v. Beltempo, 675 F.2d 472 (2d Cir. 1982) .

United States v. Green, 694 F. Supp. 107 (E.D. Pa. 1988) , aff'd, 875 F.2d 312 (3d Cir. 1989) : The Trial Judge held that an uncorroborated statement by a confessing codefendant that the defendant was not involved in the unlawful handling of a machine gun was inadmissible. The Judge concluded that the facts did not "distinguish this case from others in which a confessing co-conspirator or co-participant in criminal conduct seeks merely to make the best of a situation by insulating his partners through protestations of their innocence."

United States v. Bumpass, 60 F.3d 1099 (4th Cir. 1995) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possession of ammunition as a convicted felon, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding a written confession by the defendant's friend, because the defendant did not meet his burden of clearly establishing by corroborating circumstances the reliability of the confession: the friend had a motive to take responsibility because of the defendant's long criminal record; the statement was given several days after the events and was directly contradicted by three eyewitnesses; and the defendant never produced alleged witnesses who could corroborate the statement and testify to the circumstances. In United States v. MacDonald, n34 a former Army doctor charged with murdering his wife and children claimed that extrajudicial statements of a witness whose memory was faulty at trial should have been admitted as declarations against interest to support his theory that the murders were part of a bizarre cult attack. The Court found there was an inadequate showing of trustworthiness and corroborating circumstances, and that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the statements.

United States v. Dean, 59 F.3d 1479 (5th Cir. 1995) : The Court found no error in the exclusion of a hearsay statement exculpating the defendants that was made during plea negotiations by the defendants' accomplice. The statement was not sufficiently supported by corroborating circumstances; the fact that the accomplice admitted guilt did not preclude others' guilt; the statement contained many questionable claims; and the evidence of the defendants' involvement in the crime was strong.

United States v. Forest, 355 F.3d 942 (6th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed convictions for offenses related to cocaine distribution, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of a codefendant's statement against interest, because there was no corroboration of its allegedly exculpatory implications. In United States v. Noel, 938 F.2d 685 (6th Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed a conviction for possession of cocaine with intent to distribute, holding there was no error in excluding a statement made by an accomplice immediately after her arrest in which she claimed ownership of the cocaine. The statement was contrary to the declarant's penal interest, but it was not sufficiently supported by corroborating circumstances to render it clearly trustworthy, as it was not repeated subsequent to the arrest and she disclaimed ownership of the cocaine when she entered her guilty plea.

United States v. Amerson, 185 F.3d 676 (7th Cir. 1999) : The defendant offered Heard's affidavit to prove that drugs found by police were thrown out the window by Heard, not thrown by the defendant, who was approaching the house. Affirming exclusion of the affidavit, the Court found several points on which the affidavit was unreliable, such as: the drugs were found more than 30 feet from the window that Heard allegedly threw the drugs from; Amerson had a history of coercing associates into taking blame for him; and Heard's own name was misspelled on the affidavit, while Amerson's name was spelled correctly. In United States v. Hall, 165 F.3d 1095 (7th Cir. 1999) , the Court affirmed a conviction for kidnapping and illegally transporting a teenage girl, and upheld the exclusion of evidence that another man confessed after going to the funeral home and asking to see the girl's body. The other man "confessed to any crime he was questioned about by the police" and "lacked knowledge regarding the pertinent facts of the case," and there was no evidence corroborating any part of his story. In United States v. Groce, n35 the Court affirmed a firearms conviction, finding no clear error in the determination below that an unavailable witness' statements were not sufficiently trustworthy. The declarant made several conflicting statements, and there was evidence that he may have changed his story out of fear.

United States v. Eagle Hawk, 815 F.2d 1213 (8th Cir. 1987) : The Court upheld the exclusion, for insufficient corroborating circumstances, of exculpatory out-of-court declarations by a declarant who refused to testify. See also United States v. Savage n36(finding insufficient corroborating circumstances of a statement that a gun in the defendant's car was given to her and put in the car by another man); United States v. Hardrich n37(statements offered by a defendant were properly excluded where they were not supported by corroborating circumstances); United States v. Mansaw n38(a statement of a codefendant was properly excluded as not necessarily against interest and uncorroborated).

United States v. Rhodes, 713 F.2d 463 (9th Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy and possession of stolen mail, holding there was no error in excluding testimony that during the trial a codefendant -- who had pleaded guilty and who was hospitalized with a heart attack before being called as a witness -- had stated that the defendant was not the source of stolen checks. The statement was not against penal interest, since the codefendant had already pleaded guilty and was not subject to additional liability, and there were no corroborating circumstances to "clearly indicate" the trustworthiness of the witness' declaration. See also United States v. Poland n39(a statement was properly excluded due to insufficient corroborating circumstances); United States v. Hoyos n40(statements must be solidly against penal interest and solidly corroborated).

United States v. Spring, 80 F.3d 1450 (10th Cir. 1996) : In a bank robbery prosecution, the defendant offered statements, allegedly exculpating the defendant, that had been made to an FBI agent by another man being questioned about the robberies. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the statements, as the declarant provided no information about his own involvement in the robbery and there was no substantiation of his bald assertion that the defendant was not involved. In United States v. Porter, n41 the defendant, prosecuted for bank burglaries allegedly committed with his brother, was permitted to introduce statements by the brother (since deceased) that the brother and his wife had "hit" the banks, but was not permitted to elicit the brother's further statements that defendant should not plea bargain because "he has done nothing." The Court affirmed, holding that the statements were properly severed because the part exculpating the defendant was not sufficiently corroborated because there was a lack of evidence that only the brother and his wife were involved in the burglaries.

United States v. Jernigan, 341 F.3d 1273 (11th Cir. 2003) : The defendant was convicted of felon firearm possession and moved for a new trial on the basis of newly discovered evidence, a statement by one Nelson that he had placed the gun in the defendant's truck, where it was found by police officers. The Court affirmed the denial of a new trial on the ground that Nelson's statement was hearsay and would not have been admissible. The statement could not be admitted as a declaration against penal interest because there was no showing of corroborating circumstances clearly indicating that it was trustworthy. The Court noted that Nelson's statement "was contradicted by all of the government's evidence inculpating Jernigan," and also found it relevant that the person who allegedly heard Nelson make the statement was an unreliable person with a criminal record. We note that the Court's focus on the unreliability of the witness is misplaced. At any new trial, it would be the jury's job to assess the witness's credibility and determine whether Nelson in fact made the statement. In United States v. Hendrieth, 922 F.2d 748 (11th Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed a conviction for conspiring to pass counterfeit money, holding there was no error in excluding an alleged exculpatory statement by an unavailable declarant, as the witness to the alleged statement was completely unworthy of belief and there was no evidence to corroborate the making of the alleged statement. We note that the Rule requires corroboration for the statement's trustworthiness, but not for its making. In United States v. Carlin, n42 the Court affirmed a conviction for interstate transportation of stolen and forged securities, and upheld the exclusion of a statement by an unavailable witness whose explanation of the delivery of certain checks to the defendant supported the defense. The Court said that there were no corroborating circumstances remotely indicating the trustworthiness of the statement, which was obtained by the defendant's investigator.

[B] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Corroborating Circumstances -- Statements Offered by Accused -- Admission Required

United States v. Atkins, 558 F.2d 133 (3d Cir. 1977) : The Court ordered a new trial in a bank robbery case for erroneous exclusion as hearsay of a third-party confession to the robbery. The Court suggested that the error might have been in considering the credibility of the witness as a factor supporting exclusion of the evidence, when Rule 804(b)(3) directs the Judge's attention to the trustworthiness of the declarant, not of the witness. Here there were substantial corroborating circumstances indicating the trustworthiness of the declarant's statement.

United States v. Price, 134 F.3d 340 (6th Cir. 1998) : In an appeal from narcotics convictions, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to exclude post-custodial statements from a person involved in the drug transaction, which indicated that the money for the drugs belonged only to the declarant, and that while the defendant must have been aware of what was going on, he was not a substantial participant in the transaction. The Trial Judge excluded the statements on the ground that they were not sufficiently corroborated, but the Court noted that "Rule 804(b)(3) does not require that the information within the statement be clearly corroborated; it requires only that there be corroborating circumstances which clearly indicate the trustworthiness of the statement, itself." The Court found the exculpatory statement trustworthy because: the declarant and the defendant did not have a close relationship; the statement was made after the declarant was advised of his Miranda rights; there was no evidence that the declarant made the statement in an effort to curry favor with the authorities; and independent evidence was consistent with the declarant's assertion. In a prosecution for drug trafficking offenses, United States v. Hilliard, 11 F.3d 618 (6th Cir. 1993) , the Court held it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless) to exclude a post-arrest statement in which an accomplice claimed ownership of the cocaine and currency found with the men at their arrest. The Trial Judge had excluded the statement because the accomplice had refused to confirm it in a written confession; in the Court's view, it was error to rely on this single fact in determining trustworthiness and, not considering corroborating evidence presented by the defendant, improperly to assess the credibility of the accomplice rather than the reliability of the accomplice's statement. In United States v. Arthur, n43 after an accomplice gave testimony implicating himself and a codefendant in a bank robbery concededly committed by only two men, he was induced by the Trial Judge to assert his self-incrimination privilege. Reversing the defendant's conviction, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to then bar introduction of the accomplice's statement to the FBI confessing to this and other bank robberies and exculpating the defendant, as there was considerable corroboration of the confession.

United States v. Nagib, 56 F.3d 798 (7th Cir. 1995) : During a drug conspiracy trial, one codefendant changed his plea. The Court held it was error to preclude the defendant from introducing portions of the transcript from the codefendant's change-of-plea hearing. Corroborating circumstances, including the nature of the relationship between the defendant and the codefendant, the voluntariness of the statements, and the lack of indication they were made at sentencing to curry favor, provided sufficient indicia of reliability to require admission. Reversing the defendant's conviction for possession of 100 kilos of marijuana found in the cab of a truck in which he was codriver, the Court in United States v. Garcia, 986 F.2d 1135 (7th Cir. 1993) , held that the other driver's statements completely exculpating the defendant should have been admitted, as the two barely knew each other, the statements were made voluntarily shortly after a Miranda warning, there was nothing indicating they were made to curry favor, and the declarant inculpated only himself when entering his guilty plea. The Court noted that the corroborating circumstances requirement applies not to the substance of the statements but to their trustworthiness.

United States v. Slaughter, 891 F.2d 691 (9th Cir. 1989) : A conviction for cocaine distribution was reversed because a prior statement by an unavailable declarant that she, the defendant, and the government's key witness (a confidential informant) used cocaine at their first meeting had been erroneously excluded. The Court held that the statements were against the declarant's penal interest, were corroborated by the defendant's testimony that the key witness had used cocaine on that occasion, and were crucial to the defendant's defense that he had been entrapped by the informant.

[iii] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Corroborating Circumstances -- Statements Offered by Government

United States v. Barone, 114 F.3d 1284 (1st Cir. 1997) : The Court affirmed a racketeering conviction, upholding the admission of statements against penal interest implicating the defendant that were made by a declarant whom the defendant was alleged to have murdered. The Court stated that "the corroboration that is required by Rule 804(b)(3) is not independent evidence supporting the truth of the matters asserted by the hearsay statement, but evidence that clearly indicates that the statements are worthy of belief, based on the circumstances in which the statements were made."

United States v. Alvarez, 584 F.2d 694 (5th Cir. 1978) : In the course of reversing a conviction on heroin trafficking charges, the Court held that the corroborating circumstances requirement that is imposed on defendants who offer evidence under Rule 804(b)(3) must also be imposed on the government.

United States v. Shukri, 207 F.3d 412 (7th Cir. 2000) : At the defendant's bench trial on charges of conspiracy to possess stolen property, the Judge admitted testimony from an accomplice's brother-in-law that the accomplice had made statements implicating the defendant. The accomplice was unavailable at the trial, and the defendant's counsel waived the argument that his statements were not against penal interest under Williamson v. United States, contesting only whether they were supported by corroborating circumstances. The Court held that the waiver and the failure to argue the statements were not against penal interest was not ineffective assistance of counsel, but a "reasonable tactic," since the statements were against penal interest. The Court also held that the circumstances, including the fact that the declarant and his brother-in-law shared a confidential relationship within which candor is presumed, provided sufficient corroborating circumstances to support the trustworthiness of the statements. In United States v. Harty, 930 F.2d 1257 (7th Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed convictions for offenses in connection with an attempt to burglarize the vault at a race track, holding there was no error in admitting tape recordings of conversations among the defendants two years after the attempt. The statements were against the declarant's penal interest, and both his strong motivation to recount the events accurately and corroboration by other witnesses demonstrated that they were trustworthy.

United States v. Rasmussen, 790 F.2d 55 (8th Cir. 1986) : Ruling on an interlocutory appeal by the government in a tax evasion prosecution, the Court held that statements offered by the government as declarations against interest were properly excluded due to insufficient corroborating circumstances. It stated that the factors to be considered in examining corroborating circumstances include:

> (1) whether there is any apparent motive for the out-of-court declarant to misrepresent the matter, (2) the general character of the speaker, (3) whether other people heard the out-of-court statement, (4) whether the statement was made spontaneously, (5) the timing of the declaration and the relationship between the speaker and the witness.

United States v. Pappadopoulos, 64 F.3d 522 (9th Cir. 1995) : In a prosecution arising out of arson of a home, the Court declined to decide whether corroborating circumstances are required when a declaration against interest is offered to inculpate an accused. The Court found that, even if such circumstances are required, they existed in this case. In United States v. Williams, 989 F.2d 1061 (9th Cir. 1993) , the Court affirmed drug convictions and approved the admission of a coconspirator statement, in which a conspirator expressed frustration to a girlfriend. It was not in furtherance of the conspiracy, but was deemed admissible as a declaration against interest. The Court reserved decision on whether incriminating statements require corroborating circumstances, noting that any such requirement was met in this case.

[e] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Employee's Statements

Zenith Radio Corp. v. Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co., 505 F. Supp. 1190 (E.D. Pa. 1980) , rev'd on other grounds, 723 F.2d 238 (3d Cir. 1983) , rev'd on other grounds, 475 U.S. 574 (1986) : The Court said that

> [t]o qualify as an exception to the hearsay rule under Rule 804(b)(3), a declaration must be against the employee's interest, not just the employer's interest. Since the trustworthiness of the declaration is insured only by the accompanying threat of loss or liability, the statement must be to the declarant's "immediate prejudice."

Pink Supply Corp. v. Hiebert, Inc., 612 F. Supp. 1334 (D. Minn. 1985) , aff'd, 788 F.2d 1313 (8th Cir. 1986) : The Court ruled in this antitrust case that a statement by an employee implicating the employer in price fixing was not a declaration against interest absent evidence that the employee had some understanding of price fixing when he made the statement.

[f] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Personal Knowledge Requirement

United States v. Lang, 589 F.2d 92 (2d Cir. 1978) : The Court reversed a conviction for possession of counterfeit notes with intent to defraud, because a declaration against interest was admitted when there was no demonstration that the declarant had first-hand knowledge of the facts.

[g] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Statement Implicating Another

See also annotations under § 804.03[4][b][ii].

Williamson v. United States, 512 U.S. 594 (1994) : The Court held (6-3) that the exception applies only to self-inculpatory statements; neutral or self-serving portions of a broader narrative that is generally self-inculpatory are not admissible under the Rule. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 804.02[12].

United States v. Franklin, 415 F.3d 537 (6th Cir. 2005) : In a bank robbery prosecution, the government offered testimony from a witness recounting statements by the non-testifying codefendant, a long-time friend of the witness, that he and the defendant had committed the robbery. Affirming, the Court held there was no error in admitting the testimony. It satisfied the hearsay exception, since the declarant was unavailable, the declarant inculpated himself, and the trustworthiness requirement was satisfied by factors also meeting the Confrontation Clause requirements. The confrontation analysis was that of Ohio v. Roberts; the declarant's statements were not "testimonial" under Crawford because they were not made to the police or otherwise to further a prosecution. Circuit precedent suggests that, except possibly for statements made by the defendant inculpating himself, statements against penal interest do not constitute a firmly-rooted exception under Roberts but rather are only admissible if they bear particularized guarantees of trustworthiness. Here, the declarant's statements about his own participation did not minimize his role, and to the extent they inculpated the defendant they were not puffing or bragging or made to curry favor with law enforcement; they were made to a friend who had expressed concern about the declarant's "paranoid" and "stressed-out" behavior. Thus, they were made in circumstances providing indicia of trustworthiness that satisfied the Sixth Amendment and the hearsay exception.

[5] Rule 804(b)(4) -- Hearsay Exceptions -- Statement Of Personal Or Family History

[a] Rule 804(b)(4) -- Constitutional Concerns

United States v. Medina-Gasca, 739 F.2d 1451 (9th Cir. 1984) : Although the Court found that even though statements by one undocumented alien to immigration officers concerning his place of birth and ancestry might have satisfied Rule 804(b)(4), the Trial Judge would have been better advised to avoid confrontation problems and to refuse to admit the statements in a prosecution for illegal transportation of aliens. It found any error to be harmless, however.

[b] Rule 804(b)(4) -- Statements of Motive or Purpose

United States v. Carvalho, 742 F.2d 146 (4th Cir. 1984) : The Court reversed convictions of a husband and wife for knowing use of false alien registration cards. It found that the government improperly used affidavits of former spouses of the defendants in an effort to establish that the defendants were attempting to use various devices to obtain residency in the United States. The Court reasoned that while "for some purposes a statement regarding one's reasons for entering a marriage might well be a 'statement concerning' one's marriage, it is also clear that evidence as to motive or purpose, highly debatable or controversial matters, is simply not within the scope of Rule 804(b)(4)."

[6] Rule 804(b)(5) -- Hearsay Exceptions -- Other Exceptions

The residual exception formerly stated in this Rule was transferred to Rule 807 in 1997. Cases decided under the former Rule are collected in the Annotations to Rule 807, § 807.03.

[7] Rule 804(b)(6) -- Forfeiture By Wrongdoing

[a] Rule 804(b)(6) -- Constitutional Objection Forfeited

United States v. Aguiar, 975 F.2d 45 (2d Cir. 1992) : The Court held that the defendant, charged in connection with a heroin importing conspiracy, had forfeited any hearsay objections and confrontation rights with respect to statements given to an investigating agent and a prosecutor, where the defendant had procured the absence of the witness. In United States v. Mastrangelo, n44 where a grand jury witness was murdered hours before he was scheduled to testify at trial and the Trial Judge declared a mistrial as to Mastrangelo pursuant to a finding that he either ordered or acquiesced in the killing, the Judge held that the grand jury testimony was admissible in a second trial for drug-related offenses. The Court remanded, saying that an evidentiary hearing was required at which the government bore the burden of establishing by a preponderance of the evidence that Mastrangelo was in fact involved in the death of the witness through knowledge, complicity, planning, or in some other way. On remand, the Judge found by a preponderance of the evidence, but not by clear and convincing evidence, that the defendant had prior knowledge of a plan to murder a government witness and took no action to warn appropriate authorities. As a result, the defendant forfeited any constitutional objection to introduction of the murdered witness' grand jury testimony, which was admissible under the residual exception. We note that under the 1997 amendment, the proper standard of proof is by a preponderance. See the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 804, § 804.02[16].

United States v. Smith, 792 F.2d 441 (4th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed convictions for involvement in burning a barn, holding that the defendant forfeited all hearsay and confrontation objections to the introduction of a statement by a codefendant where the Trial Judge found clear and convincing evidence that the defendant had procured the absence of the codefendant from the trial. We note that under the 1997 amendment, the proper standard of proof is by a preponderance. See the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 804, § 804.02[16].

United States v. Thevis, 665 F.2d 616 (5th Cir. 1982) : The Court upheld a ruling that once the government showed by clear and convincing evidence that a defendant was involved in the murder of a witness, the defendant would be deemed to have waived any confrontation objection to the use of the witness' grand jury testimony. The waiver would also apply to a hearsay objection. We note that under the 1997 amendment, the proper standard of proof is by a preponderance. See the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 804.02[16].

United States v. Garcia-Meza, 403 F.3d 364 (6th Cir. 2005) : The Court held that evidence that the defendant had five months earlier assaulted his wife because of jealousy when she had talked to a former boyfriend was properly admitted as probative of motive in his trial for murdering his wife. The defense argued that it was a confrontation violation to admit statements made by the wife to police officers regarding the circumstances of the assault, but the Court held that the defendant had forfeited his confrontation right by killing his wife (a fact he admitted). The Court also held that, regardless of whether Rule 804(b)(6) requires that the defendant have acted with the intent to prevent the declarant from testifying, the "right secured by the Sixth Amendment does not depend on, in the recent words of the Supreme Court [in Crawford v. Washington], 'the vagaries of the Rules of Evidence,' " and the " 'essentially equitable grounds' for the rule of forfeiture strongly suggests that the rule's inapplicability does not hinge on the wrongdoer's motive."

United States v. Carlson, 547 F.2d 1346 (8th Cir. 1976) : In a cocaine distribution case, the Trial Judge found that one defendant had intimidated a witness into refusing to testify. The Court found that by the intimidation of the witness, the defendant forfeited his right to complain about the absence of cross-examination.

United States v. Balano, 618 F.2d 624 (10th Cir. 1979) : The Court affirmed a conviction, and held that the defendant forfeited any confrontation objection to the introduction of a witness' grand jury testimony because he had threatened the witness.

[b] RULE 804(b)(6) -- Determination of Wrongdoing

United States v. White, 116 F.3d 903 (D.C. Cir. 1997) : In a case decided before the effective date of Rule 804(b)(6), the Court held that two defendants, who murdered a witness, had thereby forfeited their confrontation and hearsay objections to the statements of that witness, as the government proved by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant has procured the unavailability of an adverse witness. The Court, citing Rule 104(a), found no error in the Trial Judge's partial reliance on hearsay in making the determination. The Court also held that it was proper for the Judge to make a preliminary ruling on forfeiture, and then to defer a final ruling until all the evidence of the murder had been introduced at trial.

United States v. Miller, 116 F.3d 641 (2d Cir. 1997) : The Court held in a massive drug conspiracy prosecution that statements made by homicide victims were admissible against their murderers, regardless of whether the defendant's purpose was to prevent the victim from testifying; merely participating in the deceased witness' murder operates as a forfeiture of the defendant's confrontation right and hearsay objection. An evidentiary hearing is required, at which the government must show by a preponderance of the evidence that the declarant's unavailability was caused by the defendant's misconduct. The failure to hold such a hearing in this case was harmless error.

United States v. Rivera, 412 F.3d 562 (4th Cir. 2005) : Affirming convictions for a murder conspiracy, the Court upheld a ruling that admitted under Rule 804(b)(6) a deceased declarant's statement relating the defendant's boast of committing the murder. The government had satisfied its preponderance of the evidence burden that Rivera was responsible for procuring the declarant's unavailability. The Court rejected Rivera's argument that he could not be responsible for the killing of a witness which occurred while he was incarcerated, since "a defendant need only tacitly assent to wrongdoing in order to trigger the Rule's applicability." In a drug dealing and murder case, United States v. Johnson, 219 F.3d 349 (4th Cir. 2000) , the Court found no error in the admission of hearsay statements by a former associate under Rule 804(b)(6). The Court held that there is no rigid hearing requirement. In this case, the Judge held a lengthy conference to discuss the admissibility of the hearsay, as briefed by the government before trial. Moreover, defense counsel did not request a separate hearing, nor did he contest the fact that the defendant murdered the associate to prevent him from testifying. See also United States v. Emery n45(holding that a Trial Judge need not hold a hearing under Rule 804(b)(6), but can admit the hearsay statement at trial "contingent upon proof of the underlying murder by a preponderance of the evidence").

United States v. Scott, 284 F.3d 758 (7th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed drug trafficking convictions, finding no error in the admission of grand jury testimony that had been given by a coconspirator who refused to testify at trial. The government offered evidence that the defendant had made threats through an intermediary while he and the witness were confined in the same jail and followed up with a direct 20-minute conversation in the jail's law library, after which he seemed "happy" and "relieved" that the witness would not testify. The Court held that applying pressure on a potential witness not to testify, including threats of harm and suggestions of future retribution, constitutes "wrongdoing" under Rule 804(b)(6), and that there was a sufficient showing in this case.

[c] Rule 804(b)(6) -- Discovery by the Defense

United States v. Rivera, 412 F.3d 562 (4th Cir. 2005) : Affirming convictions for a murder conspiracy, the Court upheld a ruling that admitted under Rule 804(b)(6) a deceased declarant's statement relating the defendant's boast of committing the murder. However, the Court rejected the government's argument that a defendant has no right to discover information regarding the alleged wrongdoing relied upon by the government when it seeks admission of a statement under Rule 804(b)(6). The Court reasoned that "[o]nce a defendant demonstrates that a witness can provide testimony material to his defense, then the government's interest in its evidentiary privilege must give way."

[d] Rule 804(b)(6) -- Evidence of Cover-up Insufficient

United States v. Thompson, 286 F.3d 950 (7th Cir. 2002) : Affirming convictions arising out of a drug conspiracy, the Court addressed whether the Trial Judge properly admitted evidence of a murdered informant's hearsay statements. The Court suggested that the fact that defendants participate in the cover-up of a murder does not necessarily prove that they intended to procure the witness' unavailability. It found any error in admission of a murdered informant's hearsay statements to be harmless.

[e] Rule 804(b)(6) -- Forfeiture by Coconspirator's Actions

United States v. Thompson, 286 F.3d 950 (7th Cir. 2002) : Affirming convictions arising out of a drug conspiracy, the Court addressed whether the Trial Judge properly admitted evidence of a murdered informant's hearsay statements. The Court agreed with the analysis in United States v. Cherry, 217 F.3d 811 (10th Cir. 2000) (infra). It concluded that the murder of the informant was not reasonably foreseeable by the conspiring defendants, but admission of the statements was harmless error.

United States v. Cherry, 217 F.3d 811 (10th Cir. 2000) : In a drug conspiracy prosecution, the Trial Judge ruled that statements by a murdered witness could be admitted against the defendant who committed the murder but not against other conspirator-defendants. On an interlocutory appeal, the Court reversed and remanded, holding (2-1) that a defendant may be deemed to forfeit Confrontation Clause and hearsay objections if "(1) he or she participated directly in planning or procuring the declarant's unavailability through wrongdoing, or (2) the wrongful procurement was in furtherance, within the scope, and reasonably foreseeable as a necessary consequence of an ongoing conspiracy." The Court found no clear error in the determination below that some of the defendants had no knowledge of or participation in the murder of the witness, but a remand was required to determine whether the murder could reasonably have been foreseen by these defendants as a necessary consequence of the conspiracy. One Judge, dissenting in part, argued that a finding of forfeiture simply on the basis of participation in a drug conspiracy "is too expansive and goes against the rule of fundamental fairness."

[f] Rule 804(b)(6) -- Statement Offered To Prove Murder of Declarant

United States v. Dhinsa, 243 F.3d 635 (2d Cir. 2001) : Affirming convictions for racketeering, murder, and related charges, the Court held it was proper to admit statements of two hearsay declarants to prove that the defendant murdered them. Rejecting the argument that Rule 804(b)(6) limits the admission of hearsay statements to past events or offenses committed by the defendant about which the declarant could have testified, the Court reasoned that the exception refers to the intent of a party to procure the unavailability of a witness and does not limit the subject matter of a declaration; a defendant forfeits his right to object to hearsay by participating in wrongful conduct designed to make a witness unavailable. However, a Trial Judge must perform a Rule 403 balancing test before admitting statements to assure that facially unreliable hearsay is not admitted.

United States v. Gray, 405 F.3d 227 (4th Cir. 2005) : The defendant was convicted of insurance fraud, resulting from collecting insurance proceeds after committing murders, including that of her husband. The husband had made many statements reflecting his fear of the defendant, and had brought charges against her for attempting to murder him, before he finally met his demise. The Court upheld admission of the husband's hearsay statements under Rule 804(b)(6), despite the defendant's argument that the Rule was inapplicable because she had no intent to procure her husband's unavailability as a witness in this trial. The Court noted that the policy of the Rule is to prevent a defendant from profiting by her own wrongdoing.

[g] Rule 804(b)(6) -- Wrongdoing Intended To Procure Unavailability

United States v. Scott, 284 F.3d 758 (7th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed drug trafficking convictions, finding no error in the admission of grand jury testimony that had been given by a coconspirator who refused to testify at trial. The government offered evidence that the defendant had made threats through an intermediary while he and the witness were confined in the same jail and followed up with a direct 20-minute conversation in the jail's law library, after which he seemed "happy" and "relieved" that the witness would not testify. The Court held that, although "murder, physical assault, or bribery" is sufficiently malevolent to constitute "wrongdoing," such offenses "are not necessary," and that applying pressure on a potential witness not to testify, including threats of harm and suggestions of future retribution, constitutes "wrongdoing" under Rule 804(b)(6). The Court held that circumstantial evidence could establish coercion, as well as the intent to cause unavailability and causing unavailability, and that the Trial Judge had sufficient evidence to find that the exception applied in this case. In United States v. Ochoa, 229 F.3d 631 (7th Cir. 2000) , a prosecution for conspiracy to commit mail fraud, arising from a scheme in which he arranged for his car to "disappear" in order to obtain insurance proceeds, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit a hearsay statement by the person who arranged the car's disposal for the defendant, which was made to an FBI agent while the declarant was a target of the investigation. There was insufficient evidence that the defendant assisted the declarant to flee the jurisdiction and become unavailable for trial.

United States v. Zlatogur, 271 F.3d 1025 (11th Cir. 2001) : Affirming convictions for conspiracy to violate immigration laws and transportation of illegal aliens, the Court held that the government provided sufficient evidence to prove more likely than not that the defendant wrongfully procured the unavailability of the hearsay declarant, thus justifying a finding that the defendant forfeited his hearsay objection.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. Azalea Fleet, Inc. v. Dreyfus Supply & Mach. Corp., 782 F.2d 1455 (8th Cir. 1986) .

(n2)Footnote 2. Bailey v. Southern Pac. Transp. Co., 613 F.2d 1385 (5th Cir. 1980) .

(n3)Footnote 3. United States v. Puckett, 692 F.2d 663 (10th Cir. 1982) .

(n4)Footnote 4. United States v. Losada, 674 F.2d 167 (2d Cir. 1982) .

(n5)Footnote 5. United States v. Johnson, 735 F.2d 1200 (9th Cir. 1984) .

(n6)Footnote 6. United States v. Rodriguez, 706 F.2d 31 (2d Cir. 1983) .

(n7)Footnote 7. United States v. Fernandez-Roque, 703 F.2d 808 (5th Cir. 1983) .

(n8)Footnote 8. United States v. Amaya, 533 F.2d 188 (5th Cir. 1976) .

(n9)Footnote 9. United States v. Faison, 679 F.2d 292 (3d Cir. 1982) .

(n10)Footnote 10. United States v. Acosta, 769 F.2d 721 (11th Cir. 1985) .

(n11)Footnote 11. Hannah v. City of Overland, 795 F.2d 1385 (8th Cir. 1986) .

(n12)Footnote 12. DeLurya v. Winthrop Labs, 697 F.2d 222 (8th Cir. 1983) .

(n13)Footnote 13. United States v. McDonald, 837 F.2d 1287 (5th Cir. 1988) .

(n14)Footnote 14. United States v. Atkins, 618 F.2d 366 (5th Cir. 1980) .

(n15)Footnote 15. United States v. Licavoli, 725 F.2d 1040 (6th Cir. 1984) .

(n16)Footnote 16. United States v. Feldman, 761 F.2d 380 (7th Cir. 1985) .

(n17)Footnote 17. United States v. Pizarro, 717 F.2d 336 (7th Cir. 1983) .

(n18)Footnote 18. In re Paducah Towing Co., 692 F.2d 412 (6th Cir. 1982) .

(n19)Footnote 19. In re Master Key Antitrust Litig., 72 F.R.D. 108 (D. Conn. 1976) , aff'd, 551 F.2d 300 (2d Cir. 1977) .

(n20)Footnote 20. Creamer v. General Teamsters Local Union 326, 560 F. Supp. 495 (D. Del. 1983) .

(n21)Footnote 21. Dykes v. Raymark Indus., 801 F.2d 810 (6th Cir. 1986) .

(n22)Footnote 22. Clay v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 722 F.2d 1289 (6th Cir. 1983) .

(n23)Footnote 23. Pink Supply Corp. v. Hiebert, Inc., 612 F. Supp. 1334 (D. Minn. 1985) , aff'd, 788 F.2d 1313 (8th Cir. 1986) .

(n24)Footnote 24. United States v. Coachman, 727 F.2d 1293 (D.C. Cir. 1984) .

(n25)Footnote 25. United States v. Seeley, 892 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1989) .

(n26)Footnote 26. United States v. DeVillio, 983 F.2d 1185 (2d Cir. 1993) .

(n27)Footnote 27. United States v. Hall, 165 F.3d 1095 (7th Cir. 1999) .

(n28)Footnote 28. United States v. Butler, 71 F.3d 243 (7th Cir. 1995) .

(n29)Footnote 29. United States v. Williams, 738 F.2d 172 (7th Cir. 1984) .

(n30)Footnote 30. United States v. Thomas, 919 F.2d 495 (8th Cir. 1990) .

(n31)Footnote 31. United States v. Ospina, 739 F.2d 448 (9th Cir. 1984) .

(n32)Footnote 32. United States v. Mackin, 561 F.2d 958 (D.C. Cir. 1977) .

(n33)Footnote 33. United States v. Bahadar, 954 F.2d 821 (2d Cir. 1992) .

(n34)Footnote 34. United States v. MacDonald, 688 F.2d 224 (4th Cir. 1982) .

(n35)Footnote 35. United States v. Groce, 999 F.2d 1189 (7th Cir. 1993) .

(n36)Footnote 36. United States v. Savage, 863 F.2d 595 (8th Cir. 1988) .

(n37)Footnote 37. United States v. Hardrich, 707 F.2d 992 (8th Cir. 1983) .

(n38)Footnote 38. United States v. Mansaw, 714 F.2d 785 (8th Cir. 1983) .

(n39)Footnote 39. United States v. Poland, 659 F.2d 884 (9th Cir. 1981) .

(n40)Footnote 40. United States v. Hoyos, 573 F.2d 1111 (9th Cir. 1978) .

(n41)Footnote 41. United States v. Porter, 881 F.2d 878 (10th Cir. 1989) .

(n42)Footnote 42. United States v. Carlin, 698 F.2d 1133 (11th Cir. 1983) .

(n43)Footnote 43. United States v. Arthur, 949 F.2d 211 (6th Cir. 1991) .

(n44)Footnote 44. United States v. Mastrangelo, 533 F. Supp. 389 (E.D.N.Y. 1982) , vacated & remanded, 693 F.2d 269 (2d Cir. 1982) , on remand, 561 F. Supp. 1114 (E.D.N.Y.) , aff'd, 722 F.2d 13 (2d Cir. 1983) .

(n45)Footnote 45. United States v. Emery, 186 F.3d 921 (8th Cir. 1999) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
CHAPTER 804 RULE 804

4-804 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 804.04

804.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Advisory Committee's Note

As to firsthand knowledge on the part of hearsay declarants, see the introductory portion of the Advisory Committee's Note to Rule 803.

Subdivision (a). The definition of unavailability implements the division of hearsay exceptions into two categories by Rules 803 and 804(b).

At common law the unavailability requirement was evolved in connection with particular hearsay exceptions rather than along general lines. For example, see the separate explications of unavailability in relation to former testimony, declarations against interest, and statements of pedigree, separately developed in McCormick §§ 234, 257, and 297. However, no reason is apparent for making distinctions as to what satisfies unavailability for the different exceptions. The treatment in the rule is therefore uniform although differences in the range of process for witnesses between civil and criminal cases will lead to a less exacting requirement under item (5). See Rule 45 (e) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and Rule 17(e) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

Five instances of unavailability are specified:

(1) Substantial authority supports the position that exercise of a claim of privilege by the declarant satisfies the requirement of unavailability (usually in connection with former testimony). Wyatt v. State, 35 Ala. App. 147, 46 So. 2d 837 (1950) ; State v. Stewart, 85 Kan. 404, 116 P. 489 (1911) ; Annot., 45 A.L.R.2d 1354 ; Uniform Rule 62(7)(a); California Evidence Code § 240(a)(1); Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60459(g)(1). A ruling by the judge is required, which clearly implies that an actual claim of privilege must be made.

(2) A witness is rendered unavailable if he simply refuses to testify concerning the subject matter of his statement despite judicial pressures to do so, a position supported by similar considerations of practicality. Johnson v. People, 152 Colo. 586, 384 P.2d 454 (1963) ; People v. Pickett, 339 Mich.

294, 63 N.W.2d 681, 45 A.L.R.2d 1341 (1954). Contra, Pleau v. State, 255 Wis. 362, 38 N.W.2d 496 (1949) .

(3) The position that a claimed lack of memory by the witness of the subject matter of his statement constitutes unavailability likewise finds support in the cases, though not without dissent. McCormick § 234, p. 494. If the claim is successful, the practical effect is to put the testimony beyond reach, as in the other instances. In this instance, however, it will be noted that the lack of memory must be established by the testimony of the witness himself, which clearly contemplates his production and subjection to crossexamination.

(4) Death and infirmity find general recognition as grounds. McCormick §§ 234, 257, 297; Uniform Rule 62(7)(c); California Evidence Code § 240(a)(3); Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60459(g)(3); New Jersey Evidence Rule 62(6)(c). See also the provisions on use of depositions in Rule 32(a)(3) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and Rule 15(e) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

(5) Absence from the hearing coupled with inability to compel attendance by process or other reasonable means also satisfies the requirement. McCormick § 234; Uniform Rule 62(7)(d) and (e); California Evidence Code § 240(a)(4) and (5); Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60459(g)(4) and (5); New Jersey Rule 62(6)(b) and (d). See the discussion of procuring attendance of witnesses who are nonresidents or in custody in Barber v. Page, 390 U.S. 719, 88 S. Ct. 1318, 20 L. Ed. 2d 255 (1968) .

If the conditions otherwise constituting unavailability result from the procurement or wrongdoing of the proponent of the statement, the requirement is not satisfied. The rule contains no requirement that an attempt be made to take the deposition of a declarant. [Editor's Note: A deposition preference was included when unavailability is asserted on grounds of absence. See the text of Rule 804(a)(5).]

Subdivision (b). Rule 803 supra is based upon the assumption that a hearsay statement falling within one of its exceptions possesses qualities which justify the conclusion that whether the declarant is available or unavailable is not a relevant factor in determining admissibility. The instant rule proceeds upon a different theory: hearsay which admittedly is not equal in quality to testimony of the declarant on the stand may nevertheless be admitted if the declarant is unavailable and if his statement meets a specified standard. The rule expresses preferences: testimony given on the stand in person is preferred over hearsay, and hearsay, if of the specified quality, is preferred over complete loss of the evidence of the declarant. The exceptions evolved at common law with respect to declarations of unavailable declarants furnish the basis for the exceptions enumerated in the proposal. The term "unavailable" is defined in subdivision (a).

Exception (1). Former testimony does not rely upon some set of circumstances to substitute for oath and crossexamination, since both oath and opportunity to crossexamine were present in fact. The only missing one of the ideal conditions for the giving of testimony is the presence of trier and opponent ("demeanor evidence"). This is lacking with all hearsay exceptions. Hence it may be argued that former testimony is the strongest hearsay and should be included under Rule 803 supra . However, opportunity to observe demeanor is what in a large measure confers depth and meaning upon oath and crossexamination. Thus in cases under Rule 803 demeanor lacks the significance which it possesses with respect to testimony. In any event, the tradition, founded in experience, uniformly favors production of the witness if he is available. The exception indicates continuation of the policy. This preference for the presence of the witness is apparent also in rules and statutes on the use of depositions, which deal with substantially the same problem.

Under the exception, the testimony may be offered (1) against the party against whom it was previously offered or (2) against the party by whom it was previously offered. In each instance the question resolves itself into whether fairness allows imposing, upon the party against whom now offered, the handling of the witness on the earlier occasion. (1) If the party against whom now offered is the one against whom the testimony was offered previously, no unfairness is apparent in requiring him to accept his own prior conduct of crossexamination or decision not to crossexamine. Only demeanor has been lost, and that is inherent in the situation. (2) If the party against whom now offered is the one by whom the testimony was offered previously, a satisfactory answer becomes somewhat more difficult. One possibility is to proceed somewhat along the line of an adoptive admission, i.e., by offering the testimony proponent in effect adopts it. However, this theory savors of discarded concepts of witnesses' belonging to a party, of litigants' ability to pick and choose witnesses, and of vouching for one's own witnesses. Cf. McCormick § 246, pp. 52627; 4 Wigmore § 1075. A more direct and acceptable approach is simply to recognize direct and redirect examination of one's own witness as the equivalent of crossexamining an opponent's witness. Falknor, Former Testimony and the Uniform Rules: A Comment, 38 N.Y.U.L. Rev. 651, n.1 (1963); McCormick § 231, p. 483. See also 5 Wigmore § 1389. Allowable techniques for dealing with hostile, doublecrossing, forgetful, and mentally deficient witnesses leave no substance to a claim that one could not adequately develop his own witness at the former hearing. An even less appealing argument is presented when failure to develop fully was the result of a deliberate choice.

The common law did not limit the admissibility of former testimony to that given in an earlier trial of the same case, although it did require identity of issues as a means of insuring that the former handling of the witness was the equivalent of what would now be done if the opportunity were presented. Modern decisions reduce the requirement to "substantial" identity. McCormick § 233. Since identity of issues is significant only in that it bears on motive and interest in developing fully the testimony of the witness, expressing the matter in the latter terms is preferable. Id. Testimony given at a preliminary hearing was held in California v. Green, 399 U.S. 149, 90 S. Ct. 1930, 26 L. Ed. 2d 489 (1970) , to satisfy confrontation requirements in this respect.

As a further assurance of fairness in thrusting upon a party the prior handling of the witness, the common law also insisted upon identity of parties, deviating only to the extent of allowing substitution of successors in a narrowly construed privity. Mutuality as an aspect of identity is now generally discredited, and the requirement of identity of the offering party disappears except as it might affect motive to develop the testimony. Falknor, supra, at 652; McCormick § 232, pp. 48788. The question remains whether strict identity, or privity, should continue as a requirement with respect to the party against whom offered. The rule departs to the extent of allowing substitution of one with the right and opportunity to develop the testimony with similar motive and interest. The position is supported by modern decisions. McCormick § 232, pp. 48990; 5 Wigmore § 1388. [This approach was rejected by the Congress, which provided that prior testimony cannot be used against a party unless that party or a predecessor in interest had a similar motive and opportunity to develop the testimony. --Ed.]

Provisions of the same tenor will be found in Uniform Rule 63(3)(b); California Evidence Code §§ 12901292; Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60460(c)(2); New Jersey Evidence Rule 63(3). Unlike the rule, the latter three provide either that former testimony is not admissible if the right of confrontation is denied or that it is not admissible if the accused was not a party to the prior hearing. The genesis of these limitations is a caveat in Uniform Rule 63(3) Comment that use of former testimony against an accused may violate his right of confrontation. Mattox v. United States, 156 U.S. 237, 15 S. Ct. 337, 39 L. Ed. 409 (1895) , held that the right was not violated by the government's use, on a retrial of the same case, of testimony given at the first trial by two witnesses since deceased. The decision leaves open the question (1) whether direct and redirect are equivalent to crossexamination for purposes of confrontation, (2) whether testimony given in a different proceeding is acceptable, and (3) whether the accused must himself have been a party to the earlier proceeding or whether a similarly situated person will serve the purpose. Professor Falknor concluded that, if a dying declaration untested by crossexamination is constitutionally admissible, former testimony tested by the crossexamination of one similarly situated does not offend against confrontation. Falknor, supra, at 659-60. The constitutional acceptability of dying declarations has often been conceded. Mattox v. United States, 156 U.S. 237, 243, 15 S. Ct. 337, 39 L. Ed. 409 (1895) ; Kirby v. United States, 174 U.S. 47, 61, 19 S. Ct. 574, 43 L. Ed. 890 (1899) ; Pointer v. Texas, 380 U.S. 400, 407, 85 S. Ct. 1065, 13 L. Ed. 2d 923 (1965) .

[The Advisory Committee's Note accompanying proposed, but not enacted, exception (b)(2) ("statement of recent perception") is found in Part Three of this Manual. We have renumbered the remainder of the headings to conform to the Rules as enacted. --Ed.]

Exception (2). The exception is the familiar dying declaration of the common law, expanded somewhat beyond its traditionally narrow limits. While the original religious justification for the exception may have lost its conviction for some persons over the years, it can scarcely be doubted that powerful psychological pressures are present. See 5 Wigmore § 1443 and the classic statement of Chief Baron Eyre in Rex v. Woodcock, 1 Leach 500, 502, 168 Eng. Rep. 352, 353 (K.B. 1789) .

The common law required that the statement be that of the victim, offered in a prosecution for criminal homicide. Thus declarations by victims in prosecutions for other crimes, e.g., a declaration by a rape victim who dies in childbirth, and all declarations in civil cases were outside the scope of the exception. An occasional statute has removed these restrictions, as in Colo. R.S. § 52120, or has expanded the area of offenses to include abortions, 5 Wigmore § 1432, p. 223, n. 4. Kansas by decision extended the exception to civil cases. Thurston v. Fritz, 91 Kan. 468, 138 P. 625 (1914) . While the common law exception no doubt originated as a result of the exceptional need for the evidence in homicide cases, the theory of admissibility applies equally in civil cases and in prosecutions for crimes other than homicide. The same considerations suggest abandonment of the limitation to circumstances attending the event in question, yet when the statement deals with matters other than the supposed death, its influence is believed to be sufficiently attenuated to justify the limitation. Unavailability is not limited to death. See subdivision (a) of this rule. Any problem as to declarations phrased in terms of opinion is laid at rest by Rule 701, and continuation of a requirement of firsthand knowledge is assured by Rule 602. [The Congress adopted a more limited exception. --Ed.]

Comparable provisions are found in Uniform Rule 63(5); California Evidence Code § 1242; Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60460(e); New Jersey Evidence Rule 63(5).

Exception (3). The circumstantial guaranty of reliability for declarations against interest is the assumption that persons do not make statements which are damaging to themselves unless satisfied for good reason that they are true. Hileman v. Northwest Engineering Co., 346 F.2d 668 (6th Cir. 1965) . If the statement is that of a party, offered by his opponent, it comes in as an admission, Rule 803(d)(2) [Editor's Note: now Rule 801(d)(2)], and there is no occasion to inquire whether it is against interest, this not being a condition precedent to admissibility of admissions by opponents.

The common law required that the interest declared against be pecuniary or proprietary but within this limitation demonstrated striking ingenuity in discovering an against interest aspect. Highman v. Ridgway, 10 East 109, 103 Eng. Rep. 717 (K.B. 1808) ; Reg. v. Overseers of Birmingham, 1 B. & S. 763, 121 Eng. Rep. 897 (Q.B. 1861) ; McCormick § 256, p. 551, nn.2 and 3.

The exception discards the common law limitation and expands to the full logical limit. One result is to remove doubt as to the admissibility of declarations tending to establish a tort liability against the declarant or to extinguish one which might be asserted by him, in accordance with the trend of the decisions in this country. McCormick § 254, pp. 54849. Another is to allow statements tending to expose declarant to hatred, ridicule, or disgrace, the motivation here being considered to be as strong as when financial interests are at stake. McCormick § 255, p. 551. And finally, exposure to criminal liability satisfies the against interest requirement. The refusal of the common law to concede the adequacy of a penal interest was no doubt indefensible in logic, see the dissent of Mr. Justice Holmes in Donnelly v. United States, 228 U.S. 243, 33 S. Ct. 449, 57 L. Ed. 820 (1913) , but one senses in the decisions a distrust of evidence of confessions by third persons offered to exculpate the accused arising from suspicions of fabrication either of the fact of the making of the confession or in its contents, enhanced in either instance by the required unavailability of the declarant. Nevertheless, an increasing amount of decisional law recognizes exposure to punishment for crime as a sufficient stake. People v. Spriggs, 60 Cal. 2d 868, 389 P.2d 377 (1964) ; Sutter v. Easterly, 354 Mo. 282, 189 S.W.2d 284 (1945) ; Band's Refuse Removal, Inc. v. Fairlawn Borough, 62 N.J. Super. 522, 163 A.2d 465 (1960) ; Newberry v. Commonwealth, 191 Va. 445, 61 S.E.2d 318 (1950) ; Annot., 162 A.L.R. 446 . The requirement of corroboration is included in the rule in order to effect an accommodation between these competing considerations. When the statement is offered by the accused by way of exculpation, the resulting situation is not adapted to control by rulings as to the weight of the evidence, and hence the provision is cast in terms of a requirement preliminary to admissibility. Cf. Rule 406(a). The requirement of corroboration should be construed in such a manner as to effectuate its purpose of circumventing fabrication. [The Congress adopted a more limited exception, rejecting the admissibility of statements against social interest. --Ed.]

Ordinarily the third party confession is thought of in terms of exculpating the accused, but this is by no means always or necessarily the case: it may include statements implicating him, and under the general theory of declarations against interest they would be admissible as related statements. Douglas v. Alabama, 380 U.S. 415, 85 S. Ct. 1074, 13 L. Ed. 2d 934 (1965) , and Bruton v. United States, 389 U.S. 818, 88 S. Ct. 126, 19 L. Ed. 2d 70 (1967) , both involved confessions by codefendants which implicated the accused. While the confession was not actually offered in evidence in Douglas, the procedure followed effectively put it before the jury, which the Court ruled to be error. Whether the confession might have been admissible as a declaration against penal interest was not considered or discussed. Bruton assumed the inadmissibility, as against the accused, of the implicating confession of his codefendant, and centered upon the question of the effectiveness of a limiting instruction. These decisions, however, by no means require that all statements implicating another person be excluded from the category of declarations against interest. Whether a statement is in fact against interest must be determined from the circumstances of each case. Thus a statement admitting guilt and implicating another person, made while in custody, may well be motivated by a desire to curry favor with the authorities and hence fail to qualify as against interest. See the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice White in Bruton. On the other hand, the same words spoken under different circumstances, e.g., to an acquaintance, would have no difficulty in qualifying. The rule does not purport to deal with questions of the right of confrontation.

The balancing of selfserving against disserving aspects of a declaration is discussed in McCormick § 256.

For comparable provisions, see Uniform Rule 63(10); California Evidence Code § 1230; Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60460(j); New Jersey Evidence Rule 63(10).

Exception (4). The general common law requirement that a declaration in this area must have been made ante litem motam has been dropped, as bearing more appropriately on weight than admissibility. See 5 Wigmore § 1483. Item (i) specifically disclaims any need of firsthand knowledge respecting declarant's own personal history. In some instances it is selfevident (marriage) and in others impossible and traditionally not required (date of birth). Item (ii) deals with declarations concerning the history of another person. As at common law, declarant is qualified if related by blood or marriage. 5 Wigmore § 1489. In addition, and contrary to the common law, declarant qualifies by virtue of intimate association with the family. Id. § 1487. The requirement sometimes encountered that when the subject of the statement is the relationship between two other persons the declarant must qualify as to both is omitted. Relationship is reciprocal. Id. § 1491.

For comparable provisions, see Uniform Rule 63(23), (24), (25); California Evidence Code §§ 1310, 1311; Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60460(u), (v), (w); New Jersey Evidence Rules 63(23), 63(24), 63(25).

Exception (5). [Editor's Note: Rule 804(b)(5) has been transferred to Rule 807. The Advisory Committee Note on Rule 804(b)(5) simply referred to the commentary under the identical Rule 803(24), which in 1997 was combined with Rule 804(b)(5) into a single Rule 807.]

[The entire Advisory Committee Note accompanying the gender-neutralizing changes effective October 1, 1987 is as follows: "The amendments are technical. No substantive change is intended."

Following the 1987 amendments to Rule 804, Congress adopted a technical amendment correcting syntax, effective November 18, 1988. AntiDrug Abuse Act of 1988, Pub. L. 100690, § 7075(b), 102 Stat. 4181 (1988).]

[2] 1997 Amendment Committee Note

1997 Amendment Committee Note

Subdivision (b)(5). The contents of Rule 803(24) and Rule 804(b)(5) have been combined and transferred to a new Rule 807. This was done to facilitate additions to Rules 803 and 804. No change in meaning is intended.

Subdivision (b)(6). Rule 804(b)(6) has been added to provide that a party forfeits the right to object on hearsay grounds to the admission of a declarant's prior statement when the party's deliberate wrongdoing or acquiescence therein procured the unavailability of the declarant as a witness. This recognizes the need for a prophylactic rule to deal with abhorrent behavior "which strikes at the heart of the system of justice itself." United States v. Mastrangelo, 693 F.2d 269, 273 (2d Cir. 1982) , cert. denied, 467 U.S. 1204 (1984) . The wrongdoing need not consist of a criminal act. The rule applies to all parties, including the government.

Every circuit that has resolved the question has recognized the principle of forfeiture by misconduct, although the tests for determining whether there is a forfeiture have varied. See, e.g., United States v. Aguiar, 975 F.2d 45, 47 (2d Cir. 1992) ; United States v. Potamitis, 739 F.2d 784, 789 (2d Cir.) , cert. denied, 469 U.S. 918 (1984) ; Steele v. Taylor, 684 F.2d 1193, 1199 (6th Cir. 1982) , cert. denied, 460 U.S. 1053 (1983) ; United States v. Balano, 618 F.2d 624, 629 (10th Cir. 1979) , cert. denied, 449 U.S. 840 (1980) ; United States v. Carlson, 547 F.2d 1346, 135959 (8th Cir.) , cert. denied, 431 U.S. 914 (1977) . The foregoing cases apply a preponderance of the evidence standard. Contra United States v. Thevis, 665 F.2d 616, 631 (5th Cir.) (clear and convincing evidence standard), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 825 (1982) . The usual Rule 104(a) preponderance of the evidence standard has been adopted in light of the behavior the new Rule 804(b)(6) seeks to discourage.

[3] Excerpt from "Advisory Committee Notes to the Federal Rules of Evidence That May Require Clarification," by Daniel Capra, 182 F.R.D. 268, 284 (1999)

Rule 804(a)(5)--Deposition Preference

Rule 804 sets forth exceptions to the hearsay rule that are premised on the unavailability of the hearsay declarant. The rationale of these exceptions is that while statements falling within them are not as reliable as the in-court testimony of the declarant, they are better than nothing at all. Therefore, if the declarant is unavailable, statements falling within these exceptions are admissible for their truth.

Rule 804(a) defines unavailability for purposes of the Rule 804 exceptions. Rule 804(a)(5) sets forth the ground of "absence," and defines when a declarant can be considered absent so that a qualifying hearsay statement can be admitted. The Advisory Committee's proposed definition of absence was that the proponent "has been unable to procure [the declarant's] attendance by process or other reasonable means." The Advisory Committee Note states categorically that "[t1he rule contains no requirement that an attempt be made to take the deposition of a declarant." The question of absence was to be determined, in the Advisory Committee's view, by "whether the declarant could be physically produced; if not, any statement qualifying under the Rule 804(b) exceptions would be admissible."

The House Committee on the Judiciary was in favor of requiring the proponent to attempt to depose a witness before a witness could be declared absent. The Senate Committee on the Judiciary disagreed with this position, calling a deposition requirement a "needless, impractical, and highly restrictive complication." Nonetheless, the House version was adopted in Conference and incorporated in Rule 804(a)(5). Now, before a declarant can be found absent for purposes of dying declarations, declarations against interest, and statements of pedigree (i.e., Rules 804(b)(2),(3), and (4)), the proponent must show that an attempt was made to depose the declarant. An attempt to depose must be made even if the declarant is abroad, since both the Civil and Criminal Rules of Procedure provide a means for deposing witnesses outside the country. It should be noted, however, that there is no deposition preference for an absent declarant who has given prior testimony that would otherwise be admissible under Rule 804(b)(1). This is because, as the House recognized, prior testimony has already been cross-examined either at trial or deposition, so it makes little sense to require the proponent to try to depose the declarant again to give exactly the same kind of testimony.

Because of Congress's inclusion of a deposition preference in Rule 804(a)(5), the Advisory Committee Note to that rule, which treats absence only in terms of inability to physically produce the declarant at trial, should not be relied upon as a proper statement of the rule.,

Rule 804(b)(1)--Prior Testimony

Congress and the Advisory Committee were in disagreement about the proper scope of the prior testimony exception to the hearsay rule. The justification for the exception is that the declarant has already been crossexamined under oath about the same subject matter previously, so the statement is reliable enough to be admitted despite the fact that it is hearsay. The dispute between Congress and the Advisory Committee was over whether a party could be bound by the testimony if someone other than that party conducted the prior cross-examination.

The Advisory Committee proposal provided for admissibility if the party against whom it was offered or a person with motive and interest similar to that of the party had an opportunity to examine the declarant when the testimony was given. An example may help to illustrate how this would work. Assume a series of cases arising from an airplane accident. In the first case, a witness gives favorable testimony for the airline, and is crossexamined thoroughly by the first plaintiff's counsel. Under the Advisory Committee's version of Rule 804(b)(1), the transcript of this testimony could be admitted against subsequent plaintiffs, since the first plaintiff had a "similar motive and opportunity" to cross-examine the witness as the subsequent plaintiffs would have were the witness now available.

The House Committee on the Judiciary objected to the Advisory Committee's proposal on the ground that it is "generally unfair to impose upon the party against whom the hearsay evidence is being offered responsibility for the manner in which the witness was previously handled by another party." The sole exception to this principle, according to the House Committee, is when a party's "predecessor in interest in a civil action or proceeding had an opportunity and similar motive to examine the witness." The House Committee's view prevailed in Congress even though, in the words of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, there is "considerable merit" to the Advisory Committee's version. The merit in the Advisory Committee position is that if the prior party conducted basically the same cross-examination that the current party would conduct if the witness were available, there is no unfairness in admitting the testimony against the current party; indeed, it is patently unfair to exclude such testimony when the alternative is no evidence at all, given the declarant's unavailability. The Senate Committee consoled itself, however, with the conclusion that the difference between the House and Advisory Committee versions was "not great."

As enacted, Rule 804(b)(1) provides that prior testimony is admissible "if the party against whom the testimony is now offered, or, in a civil action or proceeding, a predecessor in interest, had an opportunity and similar motive to develop the testimony." This would seem to mean that in the hypothetical airplane cases posed above, the testimony favorable to the airline would not be admissible against subsequent plaintiffs. The first plaintiff could not be deemed a "predecessor in interest" of subsequent unrelated parties, at least insofar as that term is ordinarily used in a legal context. The common understanding of "predecessor in interest" is, of course, that the first party is in some kind of privity relationship with the subsequent party. Accordingly, the Advisory Committee Note to Rule 804(b)(1) would appear to be misleading when it states that the rule allows "substitution of one with the right and opportunity to develop the testimony with similar motive and interest."

[4] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

The Subcommittee amendment to Subdivision (a)(5) is primarily designed to require that an attempt be made to depose a witness as a precondition to the witness being deemed unavailable; the Subcommittee, however, recognized the propriety of an exception to this requirement in the case where it is the witness' former testimony that is sought to be admitted under Subdivision (b)(1).

Subdivision (b)(1) of the Court Rule allowed prior testimony of a witness to be admissible if the party against whom it is offered or a person "with motive and interest similar" to his had an opportunity to examine the witness. The Subcommittee believed it is generally unfair to impose upon the party against whom the hearsay is being offered responsibility for the manner in which the witness was previously handled. The sole exception to this, in the Subcommittee's view, is where a party's predecessor in interest had the prior opportunity and similar motive to examine the witness. The subdivision was amended to reflect these policy determinations.

The Subcommittee voted to delete Subdivision (b)(2) as creating a new and unwarranted hearsay exception of great potential breadth. The Subcommittee did not believe that statements of the type referred to in the proposed Court Rule bore sufficient guarantees of trustworthiness to justify admissibility.

Subdivision (b)(3) [(b)(2) as enacted] of the Court Rule proposed to expand the traditional scope of the dying declaration exception (i.e. a statement of the victim in a homicide case as to the cause of circumstances of his believed imminent death) to allow such statements in all criminal and civil cases. The Subcommittee did not consider dying declarations as among the most reliable forms of hearsay. Consequently, it amended the provision to limit their admissibility in criminal cases to homicide prosecutions, where exceptional need for the evidence is present. At the same time, the Subcommittee approved the expansion to civil cases, although noting the possibility that this could lead to forum shopping in some cases.

Under Subdivision (b)(4) [(b)(3) as enacted] the Subcommittee determined to retain the traditional hearsay exception for statements against pecuniary or proprietary interest. However, it deemed the Court's additional references to statements tending to subject the declarant to civil liability or to render invalid a claim by him against another to be unnecessary as included within the scope of the reference to statements against pecuniary or proprietary interest. See Gichner v. Antonio Triano Tile & Marble Co., 410 F.2d 238 (D.C. Cir. 1968) . Those additional references were accordingly deleted. The Court's Rule also proposed to expand the hearsay exception from its present federal limitation to include statements subjecting the declarant to criminal liability and statements tending to make the declarant an object of hatred, ridicule, or disgrace. The Subcommittee eliminated the latter category from the subdivision as lacking sufficient guarantees of reliability. As for statements against penal interest, the Subcommittee shared the view of the Court that some such statements do possess adequate assurances of reliability and should be admissible. It believed, however, as did the Court, that statements of this type tending also to exculpate the accused are more suspect and so should have their admissibility conditioned upon some further provision insuring trustworthiness. The proposal in the Court Rule to add a requirement of corroboration was, however, deemed ineffective to accomplish this purpose since the accused's own testimony might suffice while not necessarily increasing the reliability of the hearsay statement. The Subcommittee settled on the language "unless corroborating circumstances clearly indicate the trustworthiness of the statement" as affording a proper standard and degree of discretion. It was contemplated that the result in cases like Donnelly v. United States, 228 U.S. 243 , where the circumstances clearly indicated reliability, would be changed. The Subcommittee also determined to add to the Rule the final sentence from the 1971 draft, designed to codify the doctrine of Bruton v. United States, 391 U.S. 123 . The Subcommittee did not intend to affect the existing exception to the Bruton principle where the codefendant takes the stand and is subject to crossexamination, but believed there was no need to make specific provision for this situation in the Rule since in that event the declarant would not be "unavailable."

[5] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

Rule 804(a)(3) was approved in the form submitted by the Court. However, the Committee intends no change in existing federal law under which the court may choose to disbelieve the declarant's testimony as to his lack of memory. See United States v. Insana, 423 F.2d 1165, 1169-70 (2d Cir.) , cert. denied, 400 U.S. 841 (1970) .

Rule 804(a)(5) as submitted to the Congress provided, as one type of situation in which a declarant would be deemed "unavailable," that he be "absent from the hearing and the proponent of his statement has been unable to procure his attendance by process or other reasonable means." The Committee amended the Rule to insert after the word "attendance" the parenthetical expression "(or, in the case of a hearsay exception under subdivision (b)(2), (3), or (4), his attendance or testimony)." The amendment is designed primarily to require that an attempt be made to depose a witness (as well as to seek his attendance) as a precondition to the witness being deemed unavailable. The Committee, however, recognized the propriety of an exception to this additional requirement when it is the declarant's former testimony that is sought to be admitted under subdivision (b)(1).

Rule 804(b)(1) as submitted by the Court allowed prior testimony of an unavailable witness to be admissible if the party against whom it is offered or a person "with motive and interest similar" to his had an opportunity to examine the witness. The Committee considered that it is generally unfair to impose upon the party against whom the hearsay evidence is being offered responsibility for the manner in which the witness was previously handled by another party. The sole exception to this, in the Committee's view, is when a party's predecessor in interest in a civil action or proceeding had an opportunity and similar motive to examine the witness. The Committee amended the Rule to reflect these policy determinations.

Rule 804(b)(3) as submitted by the Court (now Rule 804(b)(2) in the bill) proposed to expand the traditional scope of the dying declaration exception (i.e. a statement of the victim in a homicide case as to the cause or circumstances of his believed imminent death) to allow such statements in all criminal and civil cases. The Committee did not consider dying declarations as among the most reliable forms of hearsay. Consequently, it amended the provision to limit their admissibility in criminal cases to homicide prosecutions, where exceptional need for the evidence is present. This is existing law. At the same time, the Committee approved the expansion to civil actions and proceedings where the stakes do not involve possible imprisonment, although noting that this could lead to forum shopping in some instances.

Rule 804(b(4) as submitted by the Court (now Rule 804(b)(3) in the bill) provided as follows:

> "Statement against interest.--A statement which was at the time of its making so far contrary to the declarant's pecuniary or proprietary interest or so far tended to subject him to civil or criminal liability or to render invalid a claim by him against another or to make him an object of hatred, ridicule, or disgrace, that a reasonable man in his position would not have made the statement unless he believed it to be true. A statement tending to exculpate the accused is not admissible unless corroborated."

The Committee determined to retain the traditional hearsay exception for statements against pecuniary or proprietary interest. However, it deemed the Court's additional references to statements tending to subject a declarant to civil liability or to render invalid a claim by him against another to be redundant as included within the scope of the reference to statements against pecuniary or proprietary interest. See Gichner v. Antonio Triano Tile & Marble Co., 410 F.2d 238 (D.C. Cir. 1968) . Those additional references were accordingly deleted.

The Court's Rule also proposed to expand the hearsay limitation from its present federal limitation to include statements subjecting the declarant to criminal liability and statements tending to make him an object of hatred, ridicule, or disgrace. The Committee eliminated the latter category from the subdivision as lacking sufficient guarantees of reliability. See United States v. Dovico, 380 F.2d 325, 327 , nn.2, 4 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 944 (1967) . As for statements against penal interest, the Committee shared the view of the Court that some such statements do possess adequate assurances of reliability and should be admissible. It believed, however, as did the Court, that statements of this type tending to exculpate the accused are more suspect and so should have their admissibility conditioned upon some further provision insuring trustworthiness. The proposal in the Court Rule to add a requirement of simple corroboration was, however, deemed ineffective to accomplish this purpose since the accused's own testimony might suffice while not necessarily increasing the reliability of the hearsay statement. The Committee settled upon the language "unless corroborating circumstances clearly indicate the trustworthiness of the statement" as affording a proper standard and degree of discretion. It was contemplated that the result in such cases as Donnelly v. United States, 228 U.S. 243 (1912) , where the circumstances plainly indicated reliability, would be changed. The Committee also added to the Rule the final sentence from the 1971 Advisory Committee draft, designed to codify the doctrine of Bruton v. United States, 391 U.S. 123 (1968) . The Committee does not intend to affect the existing exception to the Bruton principle where the codefendant takes the stand and is subject to crossexamination, but believed there was no need to make specific provision for this situation in the Rule, since in that event [sic] the declarant would not be "unavailable."

[6] Report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary

Subdivision (a) of Rule 804 as submitted by the Supreme Court defined the conditions under which a witness was considered to be unavailable. It was amended in the House.

The purpose of the amendment, according to the report of the House Committee on the Judiciary, is "primarily to require that an attempt be made to depose a witness (as well as to seek his attendance) as a precondition to the witness being unavailable."

Under the House amendment, before a witness is declared unavailable, a party must try to depose a witness (declarant) with respect to dying declarations, declarations against interest, and declarations of pedigree. None of these situations would seem to warrant this needless, impractical and highly restrictive complication. A good case can be made for eliminating the unavailability requirement entirely for declarations against interest cases.

In dying declaration cases, the declarant will usually, though not necessarily, be deceased at the time of trial. Pedigree statements which are admittedly and necessarily based largely on word of mouth are not greatly fortified by a deposition requirement.

Depositions are expensive and timeconsuming. In any event, deposition procedures are available to those who wish to resort to them. Moreover, the deposition procedures of the Civil Rules and Criminal Rules are only imperfectly adapted to implementing the amendment. No purpose is served unless the deposition, if taken, may be used in evidence. Under Civil Rule (a)(3) and Criminal Rule 15(e), a deposition, though taken, may not be admissible, and under Criminal Rule 15(a) substantial obstacles exist in the way of even taking a deposition.

For these reasons, the committee deleted the House amendment.

The committee understands that the rule as to unavailability, as explained by the Advisory Committee "contains no requirement that an attempt be made to take the deposition of a declarant [sic]." In reflecting the committee's judgment, the statement is accurate insofar as it goes. Where, however, the proponent of the statement, with knowledge of the existence of the statement, fails to confront the declarant with the statement at the taking of the deposition, then the proponent should not, in fairness, be permitted to treat the declarant as "unavailable" simply because the declarant was not amenable to process compelling his attendance at trail [sic]. The committee does not consider it necessary to amend the rule to this effect because such a situation abuses, not conforms to, the rule. Fairness would preclude a person from introducing a hearsay statement on a particular issue if the person taking the deposition was aware of the issue at the time of the deposition but failed to depose the unavailable witness on that issue.

The rule defines those statements which are considered to be against interest and thus of sufficient trustworthiness to be admissible even though hearsay. With regard to the type of interest declared against, the version submitted by the Supreme Court included inter alia, statements tending to subject a declarant to civil liability or to invalidate a claim by him against another. The House struck these provisions as redundant. In view of the conflicting case law construing pecuniary or proprietary interests narrowly so as to exclude, e.g., tort cases, this deletion could be misconstrued.

Three states which have recently codified their rules of evidence have followed the Supreme Court's version of this rule, i.e., that a statement is against interest if it tends to subject a declarant to civil liability.

The committee believes that the reference to statements tending to subject a person to civil liability constitutes a desirable clarification of the scope of the rule. Therefore, we have reinstated the Supreme Court language on this matter.

The Court rule also proposed to expand the hearsay limitation from its present federal limitation to include statements subjecting the declarant to statements tending to make him an object of hatred, ridicule, or disgrace. The House eliminated the latter category from the subdivision as lacking sufficient guarantees of reliability. Although there is considerable support for the admissibility of such statements (all three of the State rules referred to supra, would admit such statements), we accept the deletion by the House.

The House amended this exception to add a sentence making inadmissible a statement or confession offered against the accused in a criminal case, made by a codefendant or other person implicating both himself and the accused. The sentence was added to codify the constitutional principle announced in Bruton v. United States, 391 U.S. 123 (1968). Bruton held that the admission of the extrajudicial hearsay statement of one codefendant inculpating a second codefendant violated the confrontation clause of the sixth amendment.

The committee decided to delete this provision because the basic approach of the rules is to avoid codifying, or attempting to codify, constitutional evidentiary principles, such as the fifth amendment's right against selfincrimination and, here, the sixth amendment's right of confrontation. Codification of a constitutional principle is unnecessary and, where the principle is under development, often unwise. Furthermore, the House provision does not appear to recognize the exceptions to the Bruton rule, e.g., where the codefendant takes the stand and is subject to crossexamination; where the accused confessed, see United States v. Mancusi, 404 F.2d 296 (2d Cir. 1968), cert. denied, 397 U.S. 942 (1967); where the accused was placed at the scene of the crime, see United States v. Zelker, 452 F.2d 1009 (2d Cir. 1971). For these reasons, the committee decided to delete this provision.

Former testimony.--Rule 804(b)(1) as submitted by the Court allowed prior testimony of an unavailable witness to be admissible if the party against whom it is offered or a person "with motive and interest similar" to his had an opportunity to examine the witness.

The House amended the rule to apply only to a party's predecessor in interest. Although the committee recognizes considerable merit to the rule submitted by the Supreme Court, a position which has been advocated by many scholars and judges, we have concluded that the difference between the two versions is not great and we accept the House amendment.

[Footnotes deleted. --Ed.]

[7] Report of the House and Senate Conferees

Rule 804 defines what hearsay statements are admissible in evidence if the declarant is unavailable as a witness. The Senate amendments make four changes in the rule.

Subsection (a) defines the term "unavailability as a witness." The House bill provides in subsection (a)(5) that the party who desires to use the statement must be unable to procure the declarant's attendance by process or other reasonable means. In the case of dying declarations, statements against interest and statements of personal or family history, the House bill requires that the proponent must also be unable to procure the declarant's testimony (such as by deposition or interrogatories) by process or other reasonable means. The Senate amendment eliminates this latter provision.

The Conference adopts the provision contained in the House bill.

The Senate amendment to subsection (b)(3) provides that a statement is against interest and not excluded by the hearsay rule when the declarant is unavailable as a witness, if the statement tends to subject a person to civil or criminal liability or renders invalid a claim by him against another. The House bill did not refer specifically to civil liability and to rendering invalid a claim against another. The Senate amendment also deletes from the House bill the provision that subsection (b)(3) does not apply to a statement or confession, made by a codefendant or another, which implicates the accused and the person who made the statement, when that statement or confession is offered against the accused in a criminal case.

The Conference adopts the Senate amendment. The Conferees intend to include within the purview of this rule, statements subjecting a person to civil liability and statements rendering claims invalid. The Conferees agree to delete the provision regarding statements by a codefendant, thereby reflecting the general approach in the Rules of Evidence to avoid attempting to codify constitutional evidentiary principles.

The Senate amendment adds a new hearsay exception, not contained in the House bill, which provides that certain law enforcement records are admissible if the officerdeclarant is unavailable to testify or be present because of (1) death or physical or mental illness or infirmity or (2) absence from the proceeding and the proponent of the statement has been unable to procure his attendance by process or other reasonable means.

The Conference does not adopt the Senate amendment, preferring instead to leave the bill in the House version, which contained no such provision.

[8] Citations to Hearings and Debates

Letter from George A. Spiegelberg to Herbert E. Hoffman, May 7, 1973, and accompanying material, in Supp. to Hearings on Proposed Rules of Evidence Before the Subcomm. on Criminal Justice of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 1st Sess., at 68, 7274 (1973).

Letter from Hon. Roszel C. Thomsen to Hon. James O. Eastland, May 22, 1974, and accompanying material, in Hearings on H.R. 5463 (Federal Rules of Evidence) Before the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 2d Sess., at 5354, 6870 (1974).

Prepared Statement of W. Vincent Rakestraw, June 5, 1974, in Hearings on H.R. 5463 (Federal Rules of Evidence) Before the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 2d Sess., at 109, 114 (1974).

Debate in the House of Representatives, 120 Cong. Rec. H12255H12257 (December 18, 1974).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
Supp. To CHAPTER 804 RULE 804

4-804 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 804, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 804. Hearsay Exceptions; Declarant Unavailable	Rule 804. Exceptions to the Rule Against Hearsay -- When the Declarant Is Un-

availablle as a Witness

(a) Definition of unavailability. "Unavailability as a witness" includes situations in which the declarant --

(a) Criteria for Being Unavailablle. A declarant is considered to be unavailable as a witness if the declarant:

(1) is exempted by ruling of the court on the ground of

(1) is exempted from testifying about the subject matter of privilege from testifying concerning the subject matter of the declarant's statement; or		the declarant's statement because the court rules that a privilege applies;

(2)	persists in refusing to testify concerning the subject matter of the declarant's statement despite an	(2)	refuses to testify about the subject matter despite a court order to do so;

	order of the court to do so; or
(3)	testifies to a lack of memory of the subject matter of the declarant's statement; or	(3)	testifies to not remembering the subject matter;
(4)	is unable to be present or to testify at the hearing because of death or then ex-	(4)	cannot be present or testify at the trial or hearing because of death or a

	ist-ing phys ical or men tal ill-ness or in-firm ity; or		then - ex-ist-ing in-firm ity, phys ical ill-ness, or men tal ill-ness ; or
(5)	is ab-sent from the heari ng and the pro-pon-ent of a state men t has been un-able to pro-cure the de-clar-ant's at-tend ance (or in the	(5)	is ab-sent from the trial or heari ng and the state men t's pro-pon-ent has not been able, by pro-cess or oth-er reas-on-able mea ns, case of a hearsay exception under subdivision (b)(2), (3), or (4), the declarant's attendance or testimony) by process or other reasonable means.

A declarant is not unavailable as a witness to procure:

(A) the declarant's attendance, in the case of a ness if ex-emp tion, re-fus-al, clai m of lack of me mor y, in-abil-ity, or ab-senc e is due to the pro-cure men t or wro ng-do-ing of the pro-pon-ent of a state men t for the pur-pose of pre-vent ing the hear say ex-cep-tion un-der Rule 804(b)(1) or (5); or witness from attending or testifying.

(B) the declarant's attendance or testimony, in the case of a hearsay exception under Rule 804(b)(2), (3), or (4).

But this subdivision (a) does not apply if the statement's proponent procured or wrongfully caused the declarant's unavailability as a witness in order to prevent the declarant from attending or testifying.

(b) Hearsay exceptions. The

(b) The Exceptions. The folfollowing are not excluded by the hearsay rule if the declarant is unavailable as a witness:

following are not excluded by the rule against hearsay if the declarant is unavailable as a witness:

(1) Former testimony. Testimony given as a witness at another hearing of the same or

(1) Former Testimony. Testimony that:

a different proceeding, or in a deposition taken in compliance with law in the course of the same or another proceeding, if the party against whom the testimony is now offered, or, in a civil action or proceeding, a predecessor in interest, had an opportunity and similar motive to develop the testimony by direct, cross, or redirect examination.

(A) was given as a witness at a trial, hearing, or lawful deposition, whether given during the current proceeding or a different one; and

(B) is now offered against a party who had -- or, in a civil case, whose predecessor in interest had -- an opportunity and similar motive to develop it by direct, cross-, or redirect examination.

(2)	Statement under belief of impending death. In a prosecution for homicide or in a civil ac-	(2)	Statement Under the Belief of Imminent Death. In a prosecution for homicide or in a civil tion or proceeding, a statement made by a declarant while believing that the declarant's death was imminent, concerning the cause or circumstances of what the declarant believed to be imminent, case, a statement that the declarant, while believing the declarant's death to be imminent, made about its cause or circumstances.

pending death.

(3) Statement against interest. A statement that:

(A) a reasonable person in the declarant's position would have made only if the person believed it to be true because, when

(3) Statement Against Interest. A statement that:

(A) a reasonable person in the declarant's position would have made only if the person believed it to be true because, when mad e, it was so contrary

to
the de-clar-ant's
proprietary
or pe-cuni ary
interes t or had so great a tend ency
to in-validate
the de-clar-ant's clai m agai nst som eone else or to expose
the de-clarant
to mad e, it was so contrary

to
the de-clar-ant's
proprietary
or pe-cuni ary
interes t or had so great a tend ency
to in-validate
the de-clar-ant's clai m agai nst
som eone else or to expose
the de-clarant
to

civil or criminal liability; and

(B) is supported by corroborating circumstances that clearly indicate its trustworthiness, if it is offered in a criminal case as one that tends to expose the declarant

civil or criminal liability; and

(B) is supported by corroborating circumstances that clearly indicate its trustworthiness, if it is offered in a criminal case as one that tends to expose the declarant

to crim inal liab- ility.

to crim inal liab- ility.

(4) Stat eme nt of per- son- al or fam- ily his- tory . (A) A state men t con- cerni ng the de- clar- ant's own birth , ad- op- tion, mar- riage , di- vorc e, le- git- imac y, rela- tion- ship by bloo d, ad- op- tion, or

(4) Stat eme nt of Per- son- al or Fam ily His- tory. A state men t abou t:

marriage
, ances-try,
or other similar fact
of personal or family history, even thou gh de-clarant had no mea ns of acquiring personal kno wled ge
of
the matter state d; or (B) a state men t
concerning the foregoing matters, and death also, of another person, if the declarant was related to the other by blood, adoption, or marriage or was so intimately associated with the other's family as to be likel y to have ac-curate

inform atio n con-cerni ng
the matter
declare
d.

(A) the de-clar-ant's own birth, ad-op-tion, le-git-imac y, an-ces-try, mar-riage, di-vorc e, rela-tion-ship by blood or marriage, or similar facts of personal or family history, even though the declarant had no way of acquiring personal knowledge about that fact; or

(B) another person concerning any of thes e facts , as well as deat h, if the de- clar- ant was re- lated to the per- son by bloo d, ad- op- tion, or mar- riage or was so in- tim- ately as- soci- ated with the per- son's fam- ily that the de- clar- ant's information is likely to be accurate.

(5)	[Other exceptions.] [Transferred to Rule 807]	(5)	[Other exceptions.] [Transferred to Rule 807.]
(6)	Forfeiture by wrongdoing. A statement offered against a party that has engaged or acquiesced in	(6)	Statement Offered Against a Party That Wrongfully Caused the Declarant's Unavailability. A statemen wro ng- do- ing that was in- ten- ded to, and did, pro- cure the un- avail abil- ity of the de- clar- ant as a wit- ness.

t offer ed agai nst a part y that wro ng- fully caus ed -- or ac- qui- esce d in wro ng- fully caus ing -- the de- clar- ant's un- avail abil- ity as a wit- ness, and did so in- tend ing that res- ult.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 804 has been amended as part of the general restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

No style changes were made to Rule 804(b)(3), because it was already restyled in conjunction with a substantive amendment, effective December 1, 2010.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
Supp. To CHAPTER 804 RULE 804

4-804 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 804.02

Supp. to § 804.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[Go To Main]

[17] The Rule 804 Exceptions and the Confrontation Clause [Go To Main]

In Davis v. Washington, 547 U.S. 813 (2006) (with the companion case of Hammon v. Indiana), the Court considered the admissibility under Crawford of hearsay statements made by two victims of domestic abuse. One was a report by the victim to a 911 operator, made essentially at the time of the assault. The other was a report made to responding police officers; the defendant was in the home and placed in another room, and the officer obtained, through questioning, the victim's account of the event. The Supreme Court held that the statement to the police officer was testimonial, but the statement to the 911 operator was not. Justice Scalia, writing for the majority, explained as follows:

> Without attempting to produce an exhaustive classification of all conceivable statements -- or even all conceivable statements in response to police interrogation -- as either testimonial or nontestimonial, it suffices to decide the present cases to hold as follows: Statements are nontestimonial when made in the course of police interrogation under circumstances objectively indicating that the primary purpose of the interrogation is to enable police assistance to meet an ongoing emergency. They are testimonial when the circumstances objectively indicate that there is no such ongoing emergency, and that the primary purpose of the interrogation is to establish or prove past events potentially relevant to later criminal prosecution

The Court emphasized the limited nature of its holding. It noted that it was not providing an "exhaustive classification of all conceivable statements -- or even all conceivable statements in response to police interrogation, but rather a resolution of the cases before us and those like them." Among other things, the Court stated that "our holding today makes it unnecessary to consider whether and when statements made to someone other than law enforcement personnel are testimonial." Nor did the Court hold that statements made to 911 operators could never be testimonial; statements made to 911 after an emergency has ended might be testimonial under some circumstances. Finally, the Court refused to hold that statements to responding police officers would always be testimonial:

> Although we necessarily reject the Indiana Supreme Court's implication that virtually any "initial

> inquiries" at the crime scene will not be testimonial, we do not hold the opposite -- that no questions at the scene will yield nontestimonial answers. We have already observed of domestic disputes that "[o]fficers called to investigate ... need to know whom they are dealing with in order to assess the situation, the threat to their own safety, and possible danger to the potential victim." Such exigencies may often mean that "initial inquiries" produce nontestimonial statements.

Of course, the Crawford rule applies only to "testimonial" hearsay. What if hearsay admissible under a hearsay exception is not testimonial? In Whorton v. Bockting, 127 S. Ct. 1173 (2007) , the habeas petitioner argued that testimonial hearsay was admitted against him in violation of Crawford. His trial was conducted ten years before Crawford, however, and so the question was whether Crawford applies retroactively to benefit habeas petitioners. Under Supreme Court jurisprudence, a new rule is applicable on habeas only if it is a "watershed" rule that is critical to the truthseeking function of a trial. The Court found that Crawford was a new rule because it overruled Roberts. It further held that Crawford was not essential to the truthseeking function; its analysis on this point is pertinent to whether Roberts retains any vitality with respect to non-testimonial hearsay. The Court declared as follows:

> Crawford overruled Roberts because Roberts was inconsistent with the original understanding of the meaning of the Confrontation Clause, not because the Court reached the conclusion that the overall effect of the Crawford rule would be to improve the accuracy of fact finding in criminal trials. Indeed, in Crawford we recognized that even under the Roberts rule, this Court had never specifically approved the introduction of testimonial hearsay statements. Accordingly, it is not surprising that the overall effect of Crawford with regard to the accuracy of fact-finding in criminal cases is not easy to assess
>
> With respect to testimonial out-of-court statements, Crawford is more restrictive than was Roberts, and this may improve the accuracy of fact-finding in some criminal cases. Specifically, under Roberts, there may have been cases in which courts erroneously determined that testimonial statements were reliable. But see 418 F.3d at 1058 (O'Scannlain, J., dissenting from denial of rehearing en banc) (observing that it is unlikely that this occurred "in anything but the exceptional case"). But whatever improvement in reliability Crawford produced in this respect must be considered together with Crawford's elimination of Confrontation Clause protection against the admission of unreliable out-of-court nontestimonial statements. Under Roberts, an out-of-court nontestimonial statement not subject to prior cross-examination could not be admitted without a judicial determination regarding reliability. Under Crawford, on the other hand, the Confrontation Clause has no application to such statements and therefore permits their admission even if they lack indicia of reliability. (Emphasis added)

This amounts to a holding that Roberts has been overruled even as to non-testimonial hearsay. One of the main reasons that Crawford is not retroactive (the holding) is that it is not essential to the accuracy of a verdict. And one of the reasons Crawford is not essential to accuracy is that, with respect to non-testimonial statements, Crawford conflicts with accurate factfinding because it lifts all constitutional reliability requirements imposed by Roberts. So after Whorton, if hearsay is not testimonial, the Confrontation Clause provides no limitation on its admission. Put another way, if the hearsay is not testimonial, then whatever reliability guarantees must be met are provided by the hearsay rule and its exceptions, not by the Constitution.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
Supp. To CHAPTER 804 RULE 804

4-804 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 804.03

Supp. to § 804.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[1] Rule 804(a) -- Definition of Unavailability [Go To Main]

[a] Rule 804(a) -- Absent or Unavailable

[i] Rule 804(a) -- Absent or Unavailable -- Codefendant in Criminal Case

United States v. US Infrastructure, Inc., 576 F.3d 1195 (11th Cir. 2009) : In the prosecution of a corporation and its officers for bribery arising from a scheme in which they made payments to a public official who had awarded them no-bid contracts, the Court found no abuse of discretion when a witness testified that the official had told him one of the corporate officers had been paying the official's mortgage. The official's statement was against his penal interest, and he "was 'unavailable' within the meaning of Rule 804(a) because he was a codefendant under the same indictment as appellants and, therefore, could not be called as a witness."

[ii] Rule 804(a) -- Absent or Unavailable -- Good Faith Effort To Produce

Thomas v. Cook County Sheriff's Dep't, 604 F.3d 293 (7th Cir. 2009, amended 2010): Affirming in substantial part a judgment for the plaintiff in a § 1983 deliberate indifference action, the Court found there was no abuse of discretion when deposition testimony by a former inmate, who had been detained at the same time as the plaintiff's decedent, was read at the trial. After "two subpoenas, a show cause order, numerous phone calls, and a search by a private investigator" were unsuccessful in getting the deponent to testify, the Court held that although "it would make sense to issue an arrest warrant," it was within the Judge's discretion to permit the deposition to be read without having issued a warrant.

[v] Rule 804(a) -- Absent or Unavailable -- Request for Voluntary Appearance

United States v. Yida, 498 F.3d 945 (9th Cir. 2007) : After a mistrial in a prosecution charging a conspiracy to import the drug "Ecstasy," the government's motion to admit the former testimony of a witness who had been deported was denied. On interlocutory appeal, the Court affirmed, holding that the government's decision to deport the witness without informing either the Trial Judge or the defense, and without having a means of compelling the witness' return, was not reasonable. Therefore the witness was therefore not unavailable within the meaning of Rule 804(a)(5). The Court noted that "allowing the prosecution to present a transcript, rather than live testimony, may lead to the presentation of that transcript when live testimony is vulnerable for the prosecution's case." The choices open to the government were not limited to either detaining the witness or deporting him: "Instead, the government could have released Reziniano from federal custody, but required him to remain in the United States until he had testified at the retrial." Alternatively, the government could have taken a video-recorded deposition of the witness before his release. Given these unexplored alternatives, the government's effort to seek a voluntary return did not satisfy the Rule's requirement of undertaking reasonable means to secure production.

[f] Rule 804(a) -- Mental or Physical Infirmity

United States v. McGowan, 590 F.3d 446 (7th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for fraud, finding no abuse of discretion or Confrontation Clause violation when the victim's testimony was offered through a videotaped deposition. The government satisfied its burden of showing that the witness was unavailable because her severe and chronic medical problems meant that traveling from her home in South Carolina to Chicago and enduring the rigors of testifying at trial would seriously damage her already precarious health.

[2] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Hearsay Exceptions -- Former Testimony [Go To Main]

[d] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Depositions

Nationwide Life Ins. Co. v. Richards, 541 F.3d 903 (9th Cir. 2008) : In an interpleader action to resolve conflicting claims to the proceeds of a life insurance policy, the Trial Court admitted deposition testimony of a witness under Fed. R. Civ. P. 32(a)(4)(B). Rejecting an argument that the deposition was not admissible under Rule 804(b)(1)'s more stringent admissibility requirements (particularly with respect to unavailability of the declarant), the Court held that the deposition was properly admitted under the Civil Rule. It noted that "Rule 32(a) is an independent exception to the hearsay rule" that is intended to eliminate "the possibility of certain technical hearsay objections which are based, not on the contents of deponent's testimony, but on his absence from court."

[e.1] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Government Investigations

United States v. Hunt, 521 F.3d 636 (6th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed convictions for health care fraud and making false statements, holding that an affidavit provided to the government by a potential defense witness during the government's investigation was not admissible against the government as former testimony. "The affidavit in question was not given at a hearing or in a deposition," as is required by Rule 804(b)(1). "A hearing connotes some kind of adversarial proceeding presided over by an impartial third party, while 'deposition' is a term of art referring to the out-of-court adversarial questioning of a witness under oath. Writing and signing a narrative affidavit during an interview with Government officers plainly is not the same as testimony given during a hearing or deposition."

[f] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Grand Jury Testimony

United States v. Carson, 455 F.3d 336 (D.C. Cir. 2006) , the Court upheld convictions of five defendants in a case it described as "a story of mayhem and disorder in and round the 200 block of K Street, Southwest, in the District of Columbia from the 1980s until 1998." The case involved a large narcotics distribution ring that "led to an astonishing amount of violence and a seemingly complete repudiation of civil society and respect for human life." Finding no error in the exclusion of exculpatory testimony by two witnesses before a Maryland state grand jury investigating triple murders, the Court held that the state prosecutor and the United States were not the same party for purposes of Rule 804(b)(1). As there was no evidence that "the state authorities who directed the testimony before the Maryland grand jury were in any way controlled or even used by federal authorities," the federal government never had an opportunity to develop the testimony before the Maryland grand jury. The Court also concluded that there was no showing that the motives for eliciting testimony at the state grand jury stage and at the federal trial stage were similar, since "the purpose of the Maryland grand jury proceeding was to investigate a crime and identify possible criminals. The state prosecutor was not attempting to prove that the appellants were involved in the triple murders."

United States v. McFall, 558 F.3d 951 (9th Cir. 2009) : In a prosecution for attempted extortion, the Court found an abuse of discretion in the exclusion of a witness's exculpatory grand jury testimony, where the witness invoked his privilege against self-incrimination and would not testify at trial. The Court concluded that the government's motivation to elicit testimony before the grand jury was the same motive it possessed at trial; even though the motive might not have been as intense before the grand jury, "Rule 804(b)(1) does not require an identical quantum of motivation." Because the witness's testimony bore directly on the charges in the indictment, prosecutors had "ample incentive to develop testimony that would incriminate McFall." The Court also held that exclusion of the grand jury testimony under Rule 403 was an abuse of discretion, particularly because the Judge appeared to have given no consideration to the probative value of the testimony.

[g] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Motive To Develop the Testimony

[ii] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Motive To Develop the Testimony -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Hunt, 521 F.3d 636 (6th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed convictions for health care fraud and making false statements, holding that an affidavit provided to the government by a potential defense witness during the government's investigation was not admissible against the government as former testimony. "The affidavit in question was not given at a hearing or in a deposition,"and "it is unlikely that he [the defendant] could demonstrate that the Government agents who were conducting the investigation had a similar motive to develop the statements as the prosecution had at trial." The Court explained that in an investigation "the Government agents desire to obtain information from the suspect without revealing the information that they already have," so it is not necessarily in their best interest to cross-examine the declarant. "At trial, however, it is in the Government's best interest to lay all of its cards on the table so that the unvarnished truth can be presented publicly to the jury."

[h] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Opportunity To Develop the Testimony

S.E.C. v. Ficken, 546 F.3d 45 (1st Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a summary judgment for the SEC in an enforcement action against a former stock broker. The defendant had testified in an SEC proceeding before the complaint was filed in this case, and after the complaint was filed he also testified in an investigation proceeding conducted by the National Association of Securities Dealers and claimed his privilege against self-incrimination as to certain questions. The defendant sought to rely upon his prior testimony to raise a genuine issue of material fact. The Court suggested, but did not hold, that the defendant's invocation of the privilege in this case did not render him unavailable for purposes of Rule 804(a), because by invoking the privilege he was creating his own unavailability. It did not decide the point, because it held that, even if the defendant were considered unavailable, his testimony in the NASD proceeding would be inadmissible because his invocation of the privilege there as to certain questions meant that the government and its predecessor (NASD) did not have an adequate opportunity to develop his testimony in the NASD proceeding.

[i] Rule 804(b)(1) -- Plea Hearing Testimony

United States v. Ricardo, 472 F.3d 277 (5th Cir. 2006) : Affirming marijuana-related convictions, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of statements made by a codefendant's attorney at a plea colloquy, which tended to exculpate one of the defendants tried in this case, as the government had no opportunity to question the pleading defendant about his attorney's statements.

[3] Rule 804(b)(2) -- Hearsay Exceptions -- Statement Under Belief of Impending Death [Go To Main]

United States v. Two Shields, 497 F.3d 789 (8th Cir. 2007) : In a murder prosecution, the defendant offered evidence that the victim, who suffered a badly broken jaw and facial injuries, shook his head negatively when asked if the defendant had caused his injuries. The Court found no error in exclusion of the evidence, holding that it was not admissible as a dying declaration because there was no evidence the victim believed his death was imminent. He had not indicated that he believed he would die, and "[h]is injuries, though severe, were limited to his face and were not life-threatening in nature; no doctor had diagnosed them as life-threatening, and everyone expected him to survive."

[4] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Hearsay Exceptions -- Statement Against Interest [Go To Main]

[.a] Rule 804(b)(3) -- "Admissions Against Interest"

Grace United Methodist Church v. City of Cheyenne, 451 F.3d 643 (10th Cir. 2006) : In an action challenging a city's refusal to grant a permit to a church to open a day care facility, the Trial Judge admitted a letter from a bishop of the church undercutting the church's position as an "admission against interest," without referring to a particular Federal Rule. Upholding admission of the letter, the Court noted that a declaration against interest is admissible under Rule 804(b)(3) only if the declarant is unavailable, and in this case the bishop was deposed, so it concluded that "we assume here that the district court actually relied on Rule 801(d)(2), which deems an admission by a party-opponent to be non-hearsay."

[a] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Against Pecuniary Interest

United States v. Two Shields, 497 F.3d 789 (8th Cir. 2007) : In a murder prosecution, the defendant offered evidence that the victim, who suffered a badly broken jaw and facial injuries, shook his head negatively when asked if the defendant had caused his injuries. The Court found no error in exclusion of the evidence, holding that it was not admissible as a statement against interest. The Court rejected the argument that the statement was contrary to the victim's pecuniary interest because by denying that the defendant was his attacker, the victim rendered invalid any civil claim he might have for assault and battery. The medical evidence indicated that the victim was highly intoxicated and unable to recall simple facts like his age, so he would not have been able to appreciate that the statement was against his interest.

[b] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Against Penal Interest

[i] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Civil Cases

United Techs. Corp. v. Mazer, 556 F.3d 1260 (11th Cir. 2009) : In an action by the manufacturer of an aircraft engine against two companies allegedly responsible for the theft and sale of blueprints relating to the engine, the Court held that statements made by an individual under investigation to the Inspector General of the Department of Defense were not admissible as declarations against interest. The Court declared that "it is reasonable to infer that spreading blame for the misconduct by implicating others, even falsely, could have been at least as big a priority ... at the time of his interview with government investigators as would have been protecting his financial stake in APM [the company]."

[ii] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Against Penal Interest -- Statement Offered Against Accused

[A] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Admissible

United States v. Wexler, 522 F.3d 194 (2d Cir. 2008) : Affirming a dermatologist's conviction for illegal distribution of controlled substances and health care fraud, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting statements by an addict who was a former patient of the defendant to three close friends in which the former patient described the controlled substances that the defendant prescribed, the false claims that the patient permitted the defendant to file, and kickbacks provided by the defendant to the former patient. The statements so far subjected the former patient to criminal liability that a reasonable person would not have made them unless they were true, and each statement inculpated the former patient as well as the defendant. In United States v. Williams, 506 F.3d 151 (2d Cir. 2007) , the Court affirmed convictions for narcotics trafficking, racketeering, and murder, finding that a confession made by one of the codefendants was properly admitted against the other, as a declaration against penal interest. The codefendant confessed to friends, not to a police officer. Thus, "the context of these statements shows that Bobby was not attempting to minimize his own culpability, shift blame onto Michael, or curry favor with authorities."

United States v. Udeozor, 515 F.3d 260 (4th Cir. 2008) : Affirming convictions for holding another in involuntary servitude and harboring a juvenile alien, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting two telephone conversations between the former husband of the defendant and the victim. Although the former husband's statements were not entirely inculpatory, in that he suggested that his sexual relationship with the victim was consensual, the Court found that his statements in context were sufficiently against his penal interest that a reasonable person would not have made them unless they were true. In the conversation he admitted smuggling the victim into the United States and hitting her, asked whether she told the police she had been beaten, demanded the victim tell him everything she told the police, and clearly admitted to sexual intercourse with a minor. In United States v. Jordan, 509 F.3d 191 (4th Cir. 2007) , accomplice of the defendant, who was convicted of murder while engaged in a drug-trafficking offense, confessed her part in the crime in a statement to her roommate. Affirming, the Court held that the accomplice's statement was properly admitted as a declaration against penal interest, since "although Brown's statements to Adams inculpated Jordan, they also subject her to criminal liability for a drug conspiracy and, by extension, for Tabon's murder," and she "made the statements to a friend in an effort to relieve herself of guilt, not to law enforcement in an effort to minimize culpability or criminal exposure."

United States v. Johnson, 581 F.3d 320 (6th Cir. 2009) : Affirming convictions for bank robbery, conspiracy, and murder, the Court held that the tape-recorded statement of a coconspirator describing the details of an armed robbery, including his and the defendant's roles, was properly admitted as a declaration against penal interest. The statements tended to disserve the declarant's interest because "they admitted his participation in an unsolved murder and bank robbery." And the statements were trustworthy because they were made to a person the declarant thought to be his friend, at a time when the declarant did not know he was being recorded "and therefore could not have made his statement in order to obtain a benefit from law enforcement."

United States v. Watson, 525 F.3d 583 (7th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed Hobbs Act convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting a codefendant's statement to an accomplice that one defendant could not possibly have been identified in a bank robbery because he had worn a mask. The Court found that the statement exposed the codefendant to criminal liability as a member of the conspiracy because it revealed his inside knowledge of the conspiracy and his role in helping one of the members avoid detection.

United States v. Honken, 541 F.3d 1146 (8th Cir. 2008) : While incarcerated, an accomplice of the defendant in a capital murder case became acquainted with a prisoner serving a life sentence for an unrelated offense. The prisoner told the accomplice that she (the accomplice) could escape responsibility of the murders if he (the prisoner) could arrange for another inmate already serving a life sentence claim responsibility for murdering the five victims. To make the other inmate's confession believable, the accomplice prepared maps and notes describing where the bodies were buried, but the prisoner turned them over to law enforcement rather than to the other inmate. Affirming, the Court held that the maps and notes were properly admitted as statements against penal interest offered to prove the government's theory that the accomplice and the defendant acted together to kill the victims. Although the accomplice made the statements in the evidence as part of a scheme to escape liability, they implicated her in the murders or at least the cover-up, and no reasonable person would make such a statement unless she believed it to be true. And admission of the statements did not violate the Confrontation Clause because they were not "testimonial": although the prisoner procuring the maps and notes may have known that they would be used at a later trial, they were not "solemn declarations" or "formal statements" and the declarant had no such expectations.

United States v. US Infrastructure, Inc., 576 F.3d 1195 (11th Cir. 2009) : In the prosecution of a corporation and its officers for bribery arising from a scheme in which they made payments to a public official who had awarded them no-bid contracts, the Court found no abuse of discretion when a witness testified that the official had told him one of the corporate officers had been paying the official's mortgage. The statement was against the official's penal interest because it tended to show that he had accepted bribes, and it did not seek to lessen blame as to his crime by spreading blame to others. Further, the statement was trustworthy, as it was given to a witness who had previously bribed the official and was a confidant of the official's regarding the bribery scheme, and the official had no reason to lie about the officer's payments (such as attempting to curry favor with government officials while under arrest). In United States v. Westry, 524 F.3d 1198 (11th Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed convictions arising from a drug conspiracy, finding no error in the admission of statements indicating that a conspirator was the source of drugs, made by a drug addict whose death was caused by using drugs allegedly supplied by members of the conspiracy. Although he was speaking to a confidante unlikely to cause his prosecution, the Court noted that "we do not think a reasonable man would falsely admit to waiting for cocaine ..., a serious crime, knowing there was a chance, albeit slight, that the admission could be used to subject him to severe penalties."

[B] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Against Penal Interest -- Statement Offered Against Accused -- Constitutional Concerns

United States v. Williams, 506 F.3d 151 (2d Cir. 2007) : Affirming convictions for narcotics trafficking, racketeering, and murder, the Court found that a confession made by one of the codefendants was properly admitted against the other, as a declaration against penal interest. The codefendant confessed to friends, not to a police officer. Thus, "the context of these statements shows that Bobby was not attempting to minimize his own culpability, shift blame onto Michael, or curry favor with authorities." For similar reasons, admitting the statement did not violate the defendant's right to confrontation. The confession was not testimonial, because it was made to friends, without the participation of law enforcement. The Court dismissed an argument that the confession lacked particularized guarantees of trustworthiness, because the Confrontation Clause "does not bar such nontestimonial statements, whatever their guarantees of trustworthiness." In United States v. Al-Sadawi, 432 F.3d 419 (2d Cir. 2005) , the Court held it was error to admit portions of a cohort's plea allocution against the defendant. Under Crawford v. Washington statements in a plea allocution are clearly "testimonial," so it was irrelevant that the Trial Court redacted all direct references to the defendant.

United States v. Jordan, 509 F.3d 191 (4th Cir. 2007) : An accomplice of the defendant, who was convicted of murder while engaged in a drug-trafficking offense, confessed her part in the crime in a statement to her roommate. Affirming, the Court held that the accomplice's statement was properly admitted as a declaration against penal interest, since she "made the statements to a friend in an effort to relieve herself of guilt, not to law enforcement in an effort to minimize culpability or criminal exposure," and its admission was not a Confrontation Clause violation for the same reason: "To our knowledge, no court has extended Crawford to statements made by a declarant to friends or associates."

United States v. Johnson, 581 F.3d 320 (6th Cir. 2009) : Affirming convictions for bank robbery, conspiracy, and murder, the Court held that the tape-recorded statement of a coconspirator describing the details of an armed robbery, including his and the defendant's roles, was properly admitted as a declaration against penal interest. The statements tended to disserve the declarant's interest because "they admitted his participation in an unsolved murder and bank robbery." And the statements were trustworthy because they were made to a person the declarant thought to be his friend, at a time when the declarant did not know he was being recorded "and therefore could not have made his statement in order to obtain a benefit from law enforcement." And because the declarant did not know he was being recorded or that the statement would be used in a criminal proceeding against the defendant, the hearsay was not testimonial under Crawford v. Washington. Even though the questioner was an informant encouraged by the government to obtain a statement from the declarant, "precedent makes clear that the intent of O'Reilly, the declarant, determines whether the statements on the tape-recording are testimonial."

United States v. Honken, 541 F.3d 1146 (8th Cir. 2008) : While incarcerated, an accomplice of the defendant in a capital murder case became acquainted with a prisoner serving a life sentence for an unrelated offense. The prisoner told the accomplice that she (the accomplice) could escape responsibility of the murders if he (the prisoner) could arrange for another inmate already serving a life sentence to claim responsibility for murdering the five victims. To make the other inmate's confession believable, the accomplice prepared maps and notes describing where the bodies were buried, but the prisoner turned them over to law enforcement rather than to the other inmate. Affirming, the Court held that the maps and notes were properly admitted as statements against penal interest offered to prove the government's theory that the accomplice and the defendant acted together to kill the victims. Although the accomplice made the statements in the evidence as part of a scheme to escape liability, they implicated her in the murders or at least the cover-up and no reasonable person would make such a statement unless she believed it to be true. And admission of the statements did not violate the Confrontation Clause because they were not "testimonial": although the prisoner procuring the maps and notes may have known that they would be used at a later trial, they were not "solemn declarations" or "formal statements" and the declarant had no such expectations.

United States v. Smalls, 605 F.3d 765 (10th Cir. 2010) : The Court found no error in admitting a jailhouse confession that implicated a defendant in the murder of a government informant. The statements were not testimonial, so their admission did not violate the Confrontation Clause, because they were not made with "the primary purpose ... of establishing or proving some fact potentially relevant to a criminal prosecution." That the statements were made in a conversation with a government informant did not make them testimonial, because the declarant did not know he was being interrogated and the statements was not made under the formalities required for a statement to be testimonial. Finally, the statements were properly admitted under Rule 804(b)(3), because they implicated the declarant in a serious crime committed with another person, there was no attempt to shift blame to the defendant, and the declarant did not know he was talking to a government informant and therefore was not currying favor with law enforcement.

[iii] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Against Penal Interest -- Statement Offered for Accused

[A] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Admissible or Required To Be Admitted

United States v. Guzman, 603 F.3d 99 (1st Cir. 2010) : Affirming an arson conviction, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to exclude a hearsay statement made by Cruz, whom the government alleged committed the arson with the defendant. A police officer was handing out flyers offering a reward for information, and Cruz said to his friend, "now that the people know it's me, they are going to rat me out." The Judge had concluded that the statement was not against penal interest because testimony at the in limine proceeding indicated that Cruz was engaged in a joking conversation at the time, but the Court concluded that the statement was "plainly" against Cruz's penal interest and that the government could have argued the context of the statement to the jury.

United States v. Hatfield, 591 F.3d 945 (7th Cir. 2010) : Reversing convictions for conspiracy to burglarize pharmacies and distribute controlled substances, the Court observed that a statement by a third person recorded in a police report that he and three others rather than the defendants had committed one of the pharmacy burglaries should have been admitted. Although the third person changed his story twice, before admitting his involvement in the burglary, there was no suggestion that he knew the defendants and he never implicated them. Moreover, his ultimate version was corroborated by the fact that he had dialed 911 while the burglary was in progress and made an accurate statement as to what was happening.

[C] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Against Penal Interest -- Statement Offered for Accused -- No Abuse of Discretion To Exclude

United States v. Guzman, 603 F.3d 99 (1st Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed an arson conviction., finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of statements made by an alleged accomplice, Cruz, to a confidential informant as he and Cruz were driving past the site of the arson. Cruz denied participation, said that others wanted him to do the arson but he did not, and added that the one who did it didn't even get paid. The Court agreed with the Judge that the statements were not inculpatory and were not against Cruz's penal interest.

United States v. Paulino, 445 F.3d 211 (2d Cir. 2006) : A search of the defendant's father's house uncovered drugs; the defendant was in the house at the time of the search, but claimed that he did not know that drugs were present. Affirming a conviction for possession of cocaine with intent to distribute, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony that the father made a statement to defense counsel "that the drugs for which his son had been arrested were his, and not his son's." Counsel asserted that the father would invoke his privilege against self-incrimination if called to testify. The Court found insufficient corroborating circumstances to warrant admission of the statement and observed that the father had a motive to exculpate his son and already faced charges for cocaine, so that taking additional responsibility might have added only incrementally to the evidence against him.

United States v. Blake, 571 F.3d 331 (4th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a carjacking conviction, finding no abuse of discretion in excluding an alleged exculpating statement by the defendant's accomplice. The statement was allegedly overheard in jail, and there was no evidence corroborating even the fact that the accomplice made the statement, much less that it was trustworthy.

United States v. Jones, 600 F.3d 847 (7th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to distribute narcotics, finding no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that a conspirator, in a change-of-plea hearing, stated that he had never given cocaine to two of the defendants on trial. The statement was hearsay, and it did not satisfy Rule 804(b)(3) because it was not against the declarant's interest to make it when he was pleading guilty. In United States v. Loggins, 486 F.3d 977 (7th Cir. 2007) , the court affirmed a conviction for robbing a federal credit union, finding no error in the exclusion of a statement made by the attorney for an alleged coconspirator. At that coconspirator's plea hearing, the attorney stated that the defendant was present at the robbery, "but didn't know what was about to happen." The Court held that the statement was not admissible as a declaration against penal interest, because it did not implicate either the attorney or the coconspirator and thus it was not sufficiently disserving to be admissible under Rule 804(b)(3).

[d] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Corroborating Circumstances

[ii] Rule 804(b)(3) -- Corroborating Circumstances -- Statements Offered by Accused

[A] Rule 804(b)(3) -- No Abuse of Discretion To Exclude

United States v. Jackson, 540 F.3d 578 (7th Cir. 2008) : In a prosecution for bank fraud arising from a scheme by bank employees to create false mortgage documents, one of the conspirators implicated another in her guilty plea proffer and her plea hearing, but then recanted the incriminating testimony just before the trial. The Judge granted a government motion to preclude the defense from presenting evidence of the recantation and ruled that it was not admissible under Rule 804(b)(3) because of insufficient corroborating circumstances. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the Judge's determinations that "a lot of corroboration would be needed to admit the recanting hearsay statements of an incredible and untrustworthy declarant," and that the defendants had not provided sufficient corroborating circumstances to admit the statements.

United States v. Ironi, 525 F.3d 683 (8th Cir. 2008) : Affirming a conviction for aiding and abetting the possession with intent to distribute cocaine, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding a codefendant's statement to a defense witness that the defendant did not know that the codefendant, who rented a room in the defendant's house, was selling drugs in the house. The Court found that the statement was not supported by corroborating circumstances clearly indicating the trustworthiness of the statement and was undermined by the codefendant's contrary testimony at his plea hearing and the fact that in a prior version of his proffered statement he said there were no drugs being sold in the house.

[7] Rule 804(b)(6) -- Forfeiture by Wrongdoing [Go To Main]

[a] Rule 804(b)(6) -- Constitutional Objection Forfeited

United States v. Johnson, 495 F.3d 951 (8th Cir. 2007) : The defendant was convicted of murder and sentenced to death for aiding and abetting her boyfriend in killing three adults and two children who witnessed the boyfriends's drug trafficking. Affirming, the Court held that admission of hearsay statements by the victims did not violate confrontation rights, because those rights are " 'forfeited with respect to any witness or potential witness whose absence a defendant wrongfully procures.' " The Court also rejected the defendant's argument that Rule 804(b)(6) could not be applied to her case because it had been enacted four years after the murders took place. The Rule reflects legal principles widely recognized at the time of the murders, and even if it enlarged the class of admissible hearsay, this expansion would not violate the Ex Post Facto Clause.

[a.1] Rule 804(b)(6) -- Constitutional Requirement of Confrontation

Giles v. California, 128 S. Ct. 2678 (2008) : The defendant was convicted of murdering his ex-girlfriend. The prosecution was permitted to introduce statements the victim made to police in connection with a domestic violence report, under a California law admitting out-of-court statements describing the infliction or threat of physical injury on a declarant when the declarant is unavailable to testify at trial and the prior statements are deemed trustworthy. The Supreme Court vacated the conviction, holding that the confrontation exception for "forfeiture by wrongdoing" applies only when the wrongdoing has the purpose, not simply the effect, of rendering the declarant unavailable to testify. The Court noted that this is the forfeiture doctrine codified in Rule 804(b)(6). Responding to the dissenters' argument that this reading of the exception would make it difficult to prosecute many domestic violence cases, the Court observed that "[a]cts of domestic violence often are intended to dissuade a victim from resorting to outside help, and include conduct designed to prevent testimony to police officers or cooperation in criminal prosecutions. Where such an abusive relationship culminates in murder, the evidence may support a finding that the crime expressed the intent to isolate the victim and to stop her from reporting abuse to the authorities," which would make the exception applicable.

[b] Rule 804(b)(6) -- Determination of Wrongdoing

United States v. Skilling, 554 F.3d 529 (5th Cir. 2009) : Affirming the convictions of the former Enron CEO for securities fraud offenses, the Court found no plain error when the Trial Judge rejected the defendant's claim that prosecutorial misconduct had led witnesses to refuse to cooperate with the defense. Although the defendant complained that the Judge failed to credit affidavits from his attorneys that relayed information from the witnesses' attorneys who purportedly conveyed the views of their clients, the Court found that the defendant failed to rely on Rule 804(b)(6) below, so it reviewed only for plain error. The Court noted that the Judge held a hearing in which two of the attorneys for witnesses appeared for questioning and it concluded that the Judge implicitly considered all the declarations that were submitted. The Court added: "[T]his court has not resolved whether, to invoke Rule 804(b)(6) properly, a party must make this evidentiary showing with material independent of the hearsay itself. This is a question of first impression, and there are persuasive arguments for either position or for a hybrid of the two. This question is especially difficult here given that it was the defense counsel who made the uncorroborated hearsay declarations."

[e] Rule 804(b)(6) -- Forfeiture by Coconspirator's Actions

United States v. Martinez, 476 F.3d 961 (D.C. Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to import cocaine, finding no error in the admission of testimony by a DEA agent regarding statements made by a cooperating member of the conspiracy. The informant had been killed shortly after one drug shipment had been intercepted and he told the agents about the conspirators' future plans. Evidence that the defendant, a leader in the conspiracy, had threatened another conspirator and his family showed that the coconspirators considered murder to be "a possible sanction to protect the privacy of the conspiracy." That the murder was committed by members of the conspiracy was shown circumstantially by the proximity of the murder to the interception of the shipment, and more directly by testimony that coconspirators had stated the fact. And the defendant's intent to procure the witness' unavailability was not belied by a suggestion that the murder was to retaliate for loss of the shipment; it is quite "reasonable to conclude that anyone who murders an informant does so intending both to exact revenge and to prevent the informant from disclosing further information and testifying." In United States v. Carson, 455 F.3d 336 (D.C. Cir. 2006), the Court upheld convictions of five defendants in a case it described as "a story of mayhem and disorder in and round the 200 block of K Street, Southwest, in the District of Columbia from the 1980s until 1998." The case involved a large narcotics distribution ring that "led to an astonishing amount of violence and a seemingly complete repudiation of civil society and respect for human life." The Court upheld a ruling that hearsay statements by a murdered witness could be admitted pursuant to Rule 804(b)(6), and that all of the defendants waived any Confrontation rights, in view of the Trial Judge's findings of fact that a coconspirator murdered the witness and the murder was within the scope of the conspiracy and reasonably foreseeable. The Court noted that "the reasons why a defendant forfeits his confrontation rights apply with equal force to a defendant whose coconspirators render the witness unavailable, so long as their misconduct was within the scope of the conspiracy and reasonably foreseeable to the defendant, as it was here... . That there is no direct evidence of an explicit agreement to kill adverse witnesses in this case is of no moment."

[e.1] Rule 804(b)(6) -- Intent to Procure Unavailability in Another Proceeding

United States v. Stewart, 485 F.3d 666 (2d Cir. 2007) : Affirming convictions for racketeering and drug offenses, the Court held that the Trial Judge did not err in finding by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant acted through a coconspirator to murder a potential witness with the intent to prevent the witness from testifying. It also held that Rule 804(b)(6) applied even though the defendant's effort had been focused on preventing the witness from testifying in a state trial for assault rather than in the instant case, which had not yet been initiated. The text of the Rule 804(b)(6) "requires only that the defendant intend to render the declarant unavailable 'as a witness' " therefore, a defendant "who wrongfully and intentionally renders a witness unavailable as a witness in any proceeding forfeits the right to exclude, on hearsay grounds, the declarant's statements at that proceeding and any subsequent proceeding."

[g] Rule 804(b)(6) -- Wrongdoing Intended To Procure Unavailability

United States v. Lentz, 524 F.3d 501 (4th Cir. 2008) : The defendant was convicted of murdering his ex-wife while they were engaged in an acrimonious dispute over custody and property issues. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of statements by the victim recounting that the defendant had told her that "[i]f O.J. [Simpson] can do it and get away with it, so can I," as well as similar comments. The Trial Judge's finding by "a preponderance of evidence that Lentz engaged in wrongdoing that was intended, at least in part, to procure [the victim's] unavailability as a witness and that did, in fact, procure her unavailability," was not clearly erroneous and was sufficient for admitting the statements under Rule 804(b)(6).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
CHAPTER 805 RULE 805

4-805 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 805.syn

§ 805.syn Synopsis to Chapter 805: RULE 805

805.01 Official Text

805.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Hearsay Within Hearsay

[2] Relationship to Rule 801(d)

[3] Relationship to Rule 403

[4] Relationship to Rule 1101

805.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Agents' Statements

[2] Business Records

[3] Coconspirator Statements

[4] Contemporaneous Notes

[5] Government Records

[6] Hospital and Medical Records

[7] Inadmissible Hearsay

[8] Party Admissions

[9] Recorded Recollection

805.04 Legislative History

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
CHAPTER 805 RULE 805

4-805 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 805.01

805.01 Official Text

Rule 805. Hearsay Within Hearsay

Hearsay included within hearsay is not excluded under the hearsay rule if each part of the combined statements conforms with an exception to the hearsay rule provided in these rules.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
CHAPTER 805 RULE 805

4-805 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 805.02

805.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Hearsay Within Hearsay

Sometimes a hearsay statement includes, or repeats, one or more other hearsay statements. When this occurs, in order for the statement to be admitted into evidence, there must be an applicable hearsay exception or exemption for each level of hearsay. n1

Consider, for example, the following illustration: an insurance investigator goes to the scene of an accident and takes the statement of one of several persons involved in the accident. The witness admits fault, taking the entire blame for the accident. Suppose that the police charge another person with reckless driving, and the witness is unavailable at trial. If the investigator is also unavailable, an offer of a report by the investigator concerning the witness' statement would have to overcome two hearsay hurdles: one for the out-of-court statement of the witness who admitted fault, and one for the investigator's statement (the report). Probably the witness' statement is a declaration against interest. However, the second hearsay hurdle is not overcome unless the investigator's report meets the requirements of the exception for regularly conducted business activities.

[2] Relationship to Rule 801(d)

Note that admissions under Rule 801(d)(2) and certain prior statements of available witnesses under Rule 801(d)(1) are defined as not hearsay. So Rule 805 could technically be read to be inapplicable to situations in which these statements are included within another statement that is hearsay. But, Courts have held that the technical difference between Rule 801(d) "not hearsay" and Rule 803, 804, and 807 "hearsay subject to exception" cannot control the application of Rule 805's limitation on multiple hearsay. As one Court put it: "For the purposes of the hearsay-within-hearsay principle expressed in Rule 805, nonhearsay statements under Rule 801(d) ... should be considered in analyzing a multiple hearsay statement as the equivalent of a level of the combined statements that conforms with an exception to the hearsay rule." n2 Thus, the mere fact that one level of a multiple level statement qualifies as exempt from the hearsay rule does not excuse the other levels from satisfying the Rule 805 requirement that each level satisfy the hearsay rule. n3 Conversely, a statement admissible under Rule 801(d) can be admitted when included in another hearsay statement if the other hearsay statement qualifies as an exception. n4

[3] Relationship to Rule 403

The fact that hearsay objections to statements consisting of multiple hearsay can be overcome by exceptions to the hearsay rule for each level of hearsay does not mean that the Court must admit the evidence. Under Rule 403, the Trial Judge certainly can determine that hearsay within hearsay is especially dangerous evidence and can exclude it in cases in which the probative value of the evidence is substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect. The possibility of exclusion should logically increase with each extra level of hearsay. n5

[4] Relationship to Rule 1101

Rule 1101 establishes the principle that the Rules of Evidence are not binding when a search warrant is sought. Thus, hearsay evidence can be used to support a warrant. Even hearsay within hearsay can be used. However, in determining whether probable cause exists, the magistrate must take into account the nature of the information provided, and so hearsay is more strictly scrutinized than information based on the officer's personal knowledge; and presumably there is more concern about reliability if the application is based on multiple hearsay. One way of demonstrating reliability is to show that the two hearsay levels satisfy exceptions established by the Federal Rules. See United States v. Harris, 403 U.S. 573 (1971) (a declaration against interest is reliable information upon which a warrant may be issued). It must be remembered, however, that the standards for scrutinizing hearsay in a warrant application are nowhere near as rigorous as those applied to hearsay at trial. A warrant application containing hearsay upon hearsay can readily suffice to show probable cause if the affidavit provides some independent information to corroborate the hearsay. See Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213 (1983) ("The task of the issuing magistrate is simply to make a practical, common sense decision whether, given all the circumstances set forth in the affidavit before him, including the veracity and basis of knowledge of persons supplying hearsay information, there is a fair probability that contraband or evidence of a crime will be found in a particular place."). n6

Rule 1101 also establishes that the Rules of Evidence are inapplicable to sentencing proceedings. So it can occur that sentencing determinations may be based in part on double hearsay. See generally United States v. Kikumura, 918 F.2d 1084 (3d Cir. 1990) (discussing the use of hearsay under Federal Guidelines sentencing).

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. See, e.g., Hart v. O'Brien, 127 F.3d 424 (5th Cir. 1997) (in a suit for wrongful incarceration, the plaintiff's testimony that a trustee at the jail told her that someone at the jail informed the bail bondsman that the plaintiff could not be released was inadmissible double hearsay).

(n2)Footnote 2. United States v. Dotson, 821 F.2d 1034, 1035 (5th Cir. 1987) (prior consistent statements within a report could not be admitted because the report itself was hearsay subject to no exception).

(n3)Footnote 3. See, e.g., Southern Stone Co. v. Singer, 665 F.2d 698 (5th Cir. 1982) (even if one level of a double hearsay statement is admissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(A), the second level of hearsay was not subject to an exception, so the document was inadmissible).

(n4)Footnote 4. See, e.g., Wright v. Farmers Co-op, 681 F.2d 549 (8th Cir. 1982) (a statement by the defendant's employee qualified as an agent's admission, and the transcribed version of the statement that was made by an insurance adjuster who obtained it qualified as a business record).

(n5)Footnote 5. See, e.g., United States v. Fernandez, 892 F.2d 976 (11th Cir. 1989) (grand jury testimony held not sufficiently trustworthy where it contained many levels of hearsay within hearsay: "Although the government argues that each individual piece of double or triple hearsay would come in under one of the standard exceptions, see Rule 805, experience suggests an inverse relationship between the reliability of a statement and the number of hearsay layers it contains").

(n6)Footnote 6. For a more complete discussion on the use of hearsay in the determination of probable cause, see SaltzburG & Capra, American Criminal Procedure ch. 2 (7th ed. 2004).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
CHAPTER 805 RULE 805

4-805 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 805.03

805.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Agents' Statements

Weston-Smith v. Cooley Dickinson Hospital, Inc., 282 F.3d 60 (1st Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the hospital in a suit by an employee who claimed she was laid off because she had taken maternity leave. According to the plaintiff, the person hired to replace her (who formerly reported to her) told the plaintiff that the plaintiff's supervisor had said that one reason for the layoff was the maternity leave. The Court assumed that the supervisor's statement might be an agent's admission, but found that there was double hearsay; there was no exception or exemption for the replacement's statement, and the replacement denied making it, so there was no error in excluding the testimony.

Pittman v. Grayson, 149 F.3d 111 (2d Cir. 1998) : The Court upheld a judgment for an airline sued by the father of a child whose mother flew her to Iceland in violation of a court order. It found no error in the exclusion of deposition testimony by a television news producer who described a conversation she had with a flight attendant for the airline who said that she had heard a story that the airline had assisted in sneaking the child from the country. What the attendant was reported to have said included hearsay based on what someone else allegedly said, and the Court found that there was nothing to tie what this someone else said to the airline. In Cook v. Arrowsmith Shelburne, Inc., 69 F.3d 1235 (2d Cir. 1995) , the Court reversed summary judgment against an employee alleging she had been discharged because of her gender. It found no error in admitting the plaintiff's testimony that her immediate supervisor and the supervisor who dismissed her had said her firing was because the General Manager wanted a man in the job, as all were making statements admissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(D) concerning a matter within the scope of their employment.

Armbruster v. Unisys Corp., 32 F.3d 768 (3d Cir. 1994) : The Court reversed a summary judgment for the defendant in an age discrimination case, but held that an alleged statement that the employer could not afford to keep employees over 50 years of age was properly disregarded because the declarant was not a decisionmaker and the original source of the comment could not be identified as a person with authority in the matter. In a prosecution for illegal ocean dumping and making false statements to a grand jury, United States v. Reilly, 33 F.3d 1396 (3d Cir. 1994), the Court held that radiotelegrams between the defendant and the ship in question satisfied multiple levels of hearsay as party or authorized admissions or as prior consistent statements and as business records. In an age discrimination case, Carden v. Westinghouse Elec. Corp., n1 the Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff, finding it was error to admit the plaintiff's testimony that his supervisor had said that he "thought they wanted a younger person" for a position that the plaintiff sought. The statement of the supervisor might have been an agent's admission, but the "they" referred to by the supervisor indicated that someone else must have said something to the supervisor.

Yohay v. City of Alexandria Employees Credit Union, Inc., 827 F.2d 967 (4th Cir. 1987) : The Court held that a credit union employee's statement to the assistant manager that she had obtained the credit information at issue at the request of the credit union's manager was admissible as an agent's statement in a suit against the union under the Fair Credit Reporting Act. Although the employee's statement included within it statements made by the manager, both were agents' statements and the combination was admissible under Rule 805.

Wilkerson v. Columbus Separate School Dist., 985 F.2d 815 (5th Cir. 1993) : In an employment discrimination action by a white football coach claiming his contract was not renewed after a black teacher had been fired, the coach offered deposition testimony that the school board president had said a black board member told him, "You got the black, now we are going to get the white." The Court held the statements were double hearsay admissible against the school district because both declarants were its agents, but were not admissible against individual defendants.

Haywood v. Lucent Techs., 323 F.3d 524 (7th Cir. 2003) : Affirming summary judgment for an employer sued by a former employee who alleged racial discrimination and defamation, the Court noted that the plaintiff's only evidence of a defamatory statement was her own testimony that another employee told her about information received from the employee's superiors in corporate security. Although statements by the superiors might have been Rule 801(d)(2)(D) admissions, there was no evidence that the employee who related those statements spoke within the scope of employment, so there was a level of hearsay that was not overcome.

EEOC v. HBE Corp., 135 F.3d 543 (8th Cir. 1998) : Affirming a judgment for the EEOC and two former employees who alleged racial discrimination by a hotel owned by the defendant, the Court upheld the admission of various statements by company employees concerning the racial views of the man who was the controlling figure in running the hotel. The testimony involved statements by agents of the hotel within the scope of their employment, so the double hearsay -- statements by these agents as to what the controlling figure had said -- was admissible because both levels qualified as agents' statements. In Cedeck v. Hamiltonian Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n, n2 the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in a Title VII action claiming sex discrimination in promotion and hiring. The Court held it was proper to exclude the plaintiff's testimony that her superior told her that someone else told him something suggesting that the plaintiff could not be promoted unless she were a man. Even though the superior's statement probably was an agent's admission under Rule 801(d)(2)(D), the included statement by the "someone else" could not be admitted as a party admission because the author of the statement was unknown.

City of Tuscaloosa v. Harcros Chems., Inc., 158 F.3d 548 (11th Cir. 1998) : In an antitrust action by five municipalities against five chemical companies for an alleged conspiracy to fix prices for repackaged chlorine, the Court found no error in the exclusion of testimony by the widow of the sales manager of one of the companies. She would have testified that her husband told her that a vice-president of the company had told him about a conspiracy to fix chlorine prices in which the vice-president was involved. This testimony was inadmissible double hearsay. The statement of the vice-president to the sales manager would be admissible as a statement about a matter within the vice-president's scope of authority, but the statement from the sales manager to his wife would not so qualify, since the sales manager did not set prices for chlorine, and thus was speaking about a matter outside the scope of his authority. Nor was the sales manager's statement to his wife admissible under the coconspirator exemption, because it merely informed an outsider of the existence of a conspiracy and so was not in furtherance of the conspiracy. In O'Donnell v. Georgia Osteopathic Hosp., n3 the Court affirmed a finding that the defendant hospital discriminated against the plaintiff because of her age. The Court upheld the admission of testimony by the person who replaced the plaintiff that related statements by the director of medical affairs concerning his reasons for hiring her and discussions he had with the executive director of the hospital concerning the treatment of the plaintiff. The statements by the director of medical affairs were agent's admissions, and his statements relating what the director of the hospital said represented two-step agents' admissions.

[2] Business Records

United States v. David, 96 F.3d 1477 (D.C. Cir. 1996) : The Court affirmed a cocaine conviction, finding no error in permitting the custodian of records for a paging service to testify that the defendant opened an account, listed a certain address, obtained a new pager and gave a new address, and that the service sent bills to the new address which were paid. Even if a proper hearsay objection had been made at trial, the records of the service could be used to prove that certain statements (e.g., address) had been made by the defendant. The statements were tied to the defendant by a picture he provided when seeking his pager.

United States v. Abell, 586 F. Supp. 1414 (D. Me. 1984) : Overruling motions to suppress evidence, the Court ruled that booking cards, which were prepared when the defendants were put in a county jail, were admissible at trial. The information on the cards was provided by the defendants and was admissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(A); the translation by a deputy at the time the information was given was a present sense impression under Rule 803(1); and the cards were business records admissible under Rule 803(6).

United States v. Reilly, 33 F.3d 1396 (3d Cir. 1994) : In a prosecution for illegal ocean dumping and making false statements to a grand jury, the Court held that radiotelegrams between the defendant and the ship in question satisfied multiple levels of hearsay as party or authorized admissions or as prior consistent statements and as business records.

United States v. Diez, 515 F.2d 892 (5th Cir. 1975) : The Court held in a tax evasion prosecution that an accountant's business records containing statements of a conspirator were admissible because the records and the statements both fell outside the hearsay exclusion.

United States v. Turner, 189 F.3d 712 (8th Cir. 1999) : Affirming convictions in a scheme by off-duty police officers to submit false time cards, thereby defrauding a low-income housing project where they were security guards, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting time cards and payroll records showing overlaps between the time the defendants claimed to have been working at the project and the times reflected on their police department duty rosters. The Court noted that business records containing information from multiple sources involve hearsay upon hearsay only when the source of information and the recorder of that information are not the same person, and that the hearsay upon hearsay problem may be excused if both the source and the recorder were acting in the regular course of the organization's business. Here, there was no evidence that any person not acting in the regular course of business provided any of the information in the records. In Wright v. Farmers Co-op, n4 a negligence action, the Court found that a statement by the co-op's employee qualified as an agent's admission and that the transcribed version of the statement that was made by the insurance adjuster who obtained it qualified as a business record.

United States v. Bland, 961 F.2d 123 (9th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, holding that a firearms transaction record completed at the time of purchase was properly admitted. Federal regulations requiring that employees verify gun purchasers' names with a picture identification, and imposing a legal duty on purchasers to provide truthful information, obviated any double hearsay problem regarding the statement on the form identifying the purchaser.

[3] Coconspirator Statements

United States v. Montanye, 962 F.2d 1332 (1992) , on reh'g in part en banc, 996 F.2d 190 (8th Cir. 1993) : Affirming convictions for conspiring to distribute drugs, the Court held that a coconspirator's statements based on statements by other conspirators, as well as those based on personal knowledge, were properly admitted.

[4] Contemporaneous Notes

Cargill, Inc. v. Boag Cold Storage Warehouse, Inc., 71 F.3d 545 (6th Cir. 1995) : Affirming a judgment for a turkey producer against a warehouse for negligent handling of frozen turkeys, the Court found that contemporaneous notes made by the plaintiff's employees during an investigation were properly admitted as present sense impressions. To the extent that one employee incorporated another's findings into his own notes, the Court found that the incorporated findings were made contemporaneously and qualified as present sense impressions, and the notes describing those findings also qualified as present sense impressions, thus satisfying Rule 805.

[5] Government Records

Parsons v. Honeywell, Inc., 929 F.2d 901 (2d Cir. 1991) : In a product liability action arising out of a gas explosion, the defendants offered a police report containing a statement from an eyewitness recounting the plaintiff's statement that he smelled gas and "shouldn't have lit it up." The police report would be admissible as a public record and the plaintiff's statement would be admissible as an excited utterance, but the Court held the witness' statement could not come within the residual exception because the witness apparently could testify in person.

United States v. Sallins, 993 F.2d 344 (3d Cir. 1993) : In a prosecution for felon firearm possession, the government introduced a 911 record in which the caller reported a black male wearing all black clothing who was carrying a gun. The Court held the 911 record came within Rule 803(8)(B), but it was reversible error to admit the contents of the call, which was hearsay not coming within any exception. In United States v. De Peri, n5 a prosecution of police officers for extortion, the Court refused to permit a defendant to offer into evidence FBI reports of interviews with two persons. Assuming that the report might be admissible under Rule 803(8) against the government, the Court found that the statements of the two people were hearsay and were therefore properly excluded. In a Fair Labor Standards Act suit, Williams v. Tri-County Growers, Inc., n6 the Court found that a statement by an agent of the defendant company that was recorded in a Department of Labor investigative report should have been admitted on behalf of the plaintiffs. The statement was an agent's admission and the report was a public record under Rule 803.

United States v. Dotson, 821 F.2d 1034 (5th Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed drug convictions, but it found that a police report was improperly admitted. The report stated that an officer said that a government witness told him that he carried marijuana for one defendant. The statement attributed to the witness would have been admissible as a prior consistent statement under Rule 801, but no exception covered the officer's account of having heard the witness. In United States v. Sanders, n7 the Court affirmed a pharmacist's convictions for Medicaid fraud, drug offenses, and tax violations, holding that computerized records of the Texas Department of Human Resources were properly admitted.

The records represented reimbursement claims filed by the defendant and showed payment of those claims. The Court treated the reimbursement requests as authorized admissions that were incorporated in business records.

Pridemore v. Legal Aid Soc'y, 625 F. Supp. 1171 (S.D. Ohio 1985) : Granting summary judgment for the defendant in an action alleging employment discrimination against a handicapped plaintiff, the Court found that statements that the plaintiff claimed were made to him by a state investigator were inadmissible hearsay. Although the investigator's statements repeated statements by others that might have qualified for admission under Rule 801(d)(2)(D), the investigator's own statements fit within no exception.

[6] Hospital and Medical Records

Onujiogu v. United States, 817 F.2d 3 (1st Cir. 1987) : Affirming a judgment for a stove manufacturer in a suit by a mother and child who alleged that a defective stove caused a pot of boiling water to spill on them, the Court held that hospital records containing the mother's statement that the child had pulled the water down were properly admitted. The plaintiffs did not dispute the general admissibility of the records (presumably business records), and the Court found that the statement was admissible against the mother as a personal admission and against her in her representative capacity as her child's "next friend." In Petrocelli v. Gallison, n8 the Court affirmed a defendant's judgment in a medical malpractice case, finding no error in the exclusion of hospital records that stated that a nerve had been severed during an earlier visit to another hospital. The Court observed that there was no indication as to where the information in the records came from and concluded that the Trial Judge was properly concerned that it may have come from the plaintiff or his wife. The Court noted that had the plaintiff provided the information it might have been admissible as falling within Rule 803(4); however, the plaintiff appeared to avoid relying on this Rule, perhaps because he did not want the jury to know that the information might have been no more than reiteration of his complaint.

Harrigan v. New England Mut. Life Ins. Co., 693 F. Supp. 1531 (S.D.N.Y. 1988) : In a suit by a former employee to recover disability benefits from the employer's insurance carrier, the Judge held that an optometrist's records noting the plaintiff's headaches were admissible. The records were business records, and the complaints of headaches were statements falling within Rule 803(4).

[7] Inadmissible Hearsay

United States v. Mackey, 117 F.3d 24 (1st Cir. 1997) : Affirming bank robbery convictions, the Court ruled that an out-of-court statement by the defendant's bookmaker that the defendant had won $60,000 on baseball bets was inadmissible. The Court recognized that the FBI report containing the statement might be a public record, but it held that the statement in the report was "hearsay within hearsay" and not admissible as a statement against penal interest.

United States Football League v. National Football League, 842 F.2d 1335 (2d Cir. 1988) : Affirming an antitrust judgment for $1, the Court held that handwritten notes of an NFL official that allegedly recorded statements by a players' union official at a meeting were properly excluded, since there was no foundation for the notes and they were double hearsay.

United States v. Melia, 691 F.2d 672 (4th Cir. 1982) : The Court reversed a conviction for receipt of stolen property, partly because an FBI agent testified as to what one person had told him that others said about selling jewelry to the defendant. This was double hearsay and required an exception at each level.

Hart v. O'Brien, 127 F.3d 424 (5th Cir. 1997) : Reviewing immunity issues in a civil rights suit brought by a plaintiff who was arrested, charged with possession of marijuana, and detained in jail for two weeks, the Court noted that testimony by the plaintiff in her deposition that a trustee at the jail told her that someone at the jail informed the bail bondsman that the plaintiff could not be released because of a federal hold was double hearsay that did not fall within any exception. In Winans v. Rockwell Int'l Corp., n9 the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendants in a wrongful death suit arising out of an airplane explosion, finding it was proper to exclude an undated document prepared by the employee of one of the defendant companies that purported to recount complaints by one of the plane's pilots. The writing may have been an agent's admission that complaints were made, but the complaints related in the writing constituted inadmissible hearsay when offered to prove the defects that were the subject of the complaint.

Burns v. Board of County Comm'rs, 330 F.3d 1275 (10th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed summary judgment against a terminated Native American employee in his § 1981 and § 1983 action against county officers. There was no error in excluding the plaintiff's deposition testimony that someone had told him that a county commissioner had said "[s]omething about the damn Indians or something." Even if the commissioner's statement was a party admission, there was no exception to the hearsay rule that would apply to the out-of-court statement the plaintiff had recounted. In a sex discrimination case, Gross v. Burggraf Constr. Co., 53 F.3d 1531 (10th Cir. 1995) , the Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant, holding that testimony concerning sexually derogatory comments made by the plaintiff's supervisor was inadmissible double hearsay. While the supervisor's statements were potentially admissible as admissions by an agent, the plaintiff "failed to present percipient witnesses to testify" to the statements she attributed to the supervisor. Thus, there was no admissible evidence that the statements were ever made.

United States v. Pendas-Martinez, 845 F.2d 938 (11th Cir. 1988) : The Court reversed a conviction for marijuana offenses, finding that a Coast Guard officer's handwritten report of events on the night of a chase of a small boat from which marijuana was thrown was improperly admitted. Even if the officer had been sufficiently attacked to justify rehabilitation, the report contained hearsay within hearsay and therefore was more than a prior statement of the officer.

[8] Party Admissions

United States v. Gibson, 409 F.3d 325 (6th Cir. 2005) : A coal mining company and two of its superintendents were convicted for violating mine safety regulations. Affirming, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion when a government witness was permitted to testify that one of the superintendents had told him that the other had said that the company was operating equipment in an illegal manner. Although the testimony was double hearsay to prove how the equipment was operated, both declarants' statements were those of party opponents, so the testimony was admissible.

[9] Recorded Recollection

United States v. Green, 258 F.3d 683 (7th Cir. 2001) : In a trial for a crack cocaine distribution conspiracy, an investigator was permitted to read his notes of interviews with the defendant and with a cooperating witness. The Court held that the notes were properly admitted as past recollection recorded, even though they were not made until 11 days after the interview with the defendant, since there was no showing of circumstances making it likely that the declarant's memory was inaccurate and the delay was not so long as to make accurate recall unlikely. The included statements of the defendant and the cooperating witness were admissible without the declarants' voucher, since they were independently admissible as a party-admission and a prior consistent statement, respectively.

FOOTNOTES:
(n1)Footnote 1. Carden v. Westinghouse Elec. Corp., 850 F.2d 996 (3d Cir. 1988) .

(n2)Footnote 2. Cedeck v. Hamiltonian Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n, 551 F.2d 1136 (8th Cir. 1977) .

(n3)Footnote 3. O'Donnell v. Georgia Osteopathic Hosp., 748 F.2d 1543 (11th Cir. 1984) .

(n4)Footnote 4. Wright v. Farmers Co-op, 681 F.2d 549 (8th Cir. 1982) .

(n5)Footnote 5. United States v. De Peri, 778 F.2d 963 (3d Cir. 1985) .

(n6)Footnote 6. Williams v. Tri-County Growers, Inc., 747 F.2d 121 (3d Cir. 1984) .

(n7)Footnote 7. United States v. Sanders, 749 F.2d 195 (5th Cir. 1984) .

(n8)Footnote 8. Petrocelli v. Gallison, 679 F.2d 286 (1st Cir. 1982) .

(n9)Footnote 9. Winans v. Rockwell Int'l Corp., 705 F.2d 1449 (5th Cir. 1983) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
CHAPTER 805 RULE 805

4-805 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 805.04

805.04 Legislative History

Advisory Committee's Note

On principle it scarcely seems open to doubt that the hearsay rule should not call for exclusion of a hearsay statement which includes a further hearsay statement when both conform to the requirements of a hearsay exception. Thus a hospital record might contain an entry of the patient's age based on information furnished by his wife. The hospital record would qualify as a regular entry except that the person who furnished the information was not acting in the routine of the business. However, her statement independently qualifies as a statement of pedigree (if she is unavailable) or as a statement made for purposes of diagnosis or treatment, and hence each link in the chain falls under sufficient assurances. Or, further to illustrate, a dying declaration may incorporate a declaration against interest by another declarant. See McCormick § 290, p. 611.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
Supp. To CHAPTER 805 RULE 805

4-805 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 805, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 805. Hearsay Within Hearsay	Rule 805. Hearsay Within Hearsay
Hearsay included within hearsay is not excluded	Hearsay within hearsay is not excluded by the rule under the hearsay rule if each part of the combined statements conforms with an exception to the hearsay rule provided in these rules.

against hearsay if each part of the combined statements conforms with an exception to the rule.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 805 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
Supp. To CHAPTER 805 RULE 805

4-805 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 805.03

Supp. to § 805.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[6] Hospital and Medical Records [Go To Main]

Zwygart v. Board of County Comm'rs, 483 F.3d 1086 (10th Cir. 2007) : A terminated employee bringing an ADA action sought to establish that his impairment substantially limited his major life activity of working by offering his physician's letter, which stated: "According to Mr. Zwygart, his cardiologist specifically told him that he could not work while on the intravenous antibiotics and in the most recent postoperative period." Affirming summary judgment for the defendants, the Court held that this statement was inadmissible double hearsay and insufficient to defeat a motion for summary judgment.

[7] Inadmissible Hearsay [Go To Main]

United States v. Vosburgh, 602 F.3d 512 (3d Cir. 2010) : Affirming a conviction for possession of child pornography, the Court held it was error (but harmless) when the prosecution attempted to prove the age of a girl depicted in an exhibit through testimony of a retired postal inspector that he had seen her birth records in the course of a prior investigation. Although the records might have been admissible under Rule 803(9) as records of vital statistics, they were never introduced. And the witness' testimony regarding the records was not admissible under Rule 807 because no pretrial notice was given by the prosecution. In Smith v. City of Allentown, 589 F.3d 684 (3d Cir. 2009) , the court affirmed summary judgment for the City and its mayor in a suit by a terminated City employee who alleged age and political affiliation discrimination. It held that the plaintiff's proffered testimony that a co-worker commented that the mayor purportedly considered the plaintiff to be a political enemy was properly excluded. The co-worker's statement was a level of hearsay that did not fall within any hearsay exception even though the mayor's statement, if made, was a statement by a party-opponent.

Nooner v. Norris, 594 F.3d 592 (8th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a summary judgment for state officials in a suit by prisoners awaiting execution who challenged the constitutionality of the state's protocol for execution by lethal injection. It held that a newspaper article reporting that a Corrections Department official said that the Department would use a certain medical procedure was inadmissible, since "[e]ven if Tyler's statement is viewed as a non-hearsay admission of a party opponent, the newspaper article reporting the statement is offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted and is not covered by any hearsay exception."

Johnson v. Weld Co., Colo., 594 F.3d 1202 (10th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant in an action for gender and disability discrimination. The plaintiff offered evidence that she had been told that the officer making the hiring decision had admitted that he did not hire the plaintiff because she was female and suffered from multiple sclerosis, but the Court found no error in the exclusion of that evidence because the declarants who reported the officer's statement to the plaintiff were persons whose statements did not qualify for any hearsay exception. In Regan-Touhy v. Walgreen Co., 526 F.3d 641 (10th Cir. 2008) , the plaintiff alleged that the defendant was responsible for intentional infliction of emotional distress because its pharmacist had disclosed her health information, and her ex-husband learned of it. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant, the Court held that the plaintiff's testimony -- that she heard about the pharmacist's conduct from her ex-husband, who heard about it from a girlfriend, who heard about it from the pharmacist -- was inadmissible multiple hearsay, even if the pharmacist's original statement was a nonhearsay party-opponent admission, and there was no other admissible evidence creating an issue of material fact.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
CHAPTER 806 RULE 806

4-806 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 806.syn

§ 806.syn Synopsis to Chapter 806: RULE 806

806.01 Official Text

806.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Basic Rule

[2] Legislative Confusion

[3] Inconsistent Statements

[4] Scope of Impeachment

[5] Introducing a Hearsay Statement Solely To Impeach It

806.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Admissions

[2] Bias or Motive To Lie

[3] Contradiction of Non-Declarant

[4] Impeachment of Coconspirator-Declarant

[5] Impeachment of Persons Whose Declarations Are Adopted

[6] Nontestifying Accused

[7] Prejudice to Codefendants

[8] Prior Convictions

[9] Prior Inconsistent Statements

[10] Prior Statements of Declarant

[11] Prosecutorial Abuse

[12] Rehabilitation Evidence

[13] Reputation and Opinion Evidence

[14] Scope of the Rule

[15] Self-Impeachment by a Party

[16] Specific Instances of Conduct

806.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

[2] Report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary

[3] Report of the House and Senate Conferees

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
CHAPTER 806 RULE 806

4-806 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 806.01

806.01 Official Text

Rule 806. Attacking and Supporting Credibility of Declarant

When a hearsay statement, or a statement defined in rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), or (E), has been admitted in evidence, the credibility of the declarant may be attacked, and if attacked may be supported, by any evidence which would be admissible for those purposes if declarant had testified as a witness. Evidence of a statement or conduct by the declarant at any time, inconsistent with the declarant's hearsay statement, is not subject to any requirement that the declarant may have been afforded an opportunity to deny or explain. If the party against whom a hearsay statement has been admitted calls the declarant as a witness, the party is entitled to examine the declarant on the statement as if under cross-examination.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
CHAPTER 806 RULE 806

4-806 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 806.02

806.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Basic Rule

If a hearsay statement is introduced into evidence because it qualifies as an exception to the hearsay rule, it is being introduced for its truth. This makes the credibility of the hearsay declarant important. The hearsay declarant's statements are the equivalent of trial testimony. Thus, Rule 806 provides that the credibility of the hearsay declarant can be attacked and supported just as if the declarant is on the stand testifying. As a general principle, the ways in which a witness can be impeached and rehabilitated are also the ways in which a hearsay declarant can be impeached and rehabilitated. n1

If a declarant's statement is not being offered for its truth, then it is not hearsay, and impeachment of the declarant is not permitted under Rule 806. This makes sense because if the statement is not offered for its truth, there is no concern about the credibility of the declarant, and so there is no need for evidence on that subject. n2

[2] Legislative Confusion

In an effort to clarify Rule 806, the Senate Committee on the Judiciary created some confusion. The first sentence of the Rule creates no difficulty, as it reasonably provides that certain statements, defined as nonhearsay admissions by Rule 801, can be attacked or supported in the same manner as if the declarant had made the nonhearsay admission on the witness stand. However, the second sentence begins the confusion. It omits references to nonhearsay admissions and provides only that a statement inconsistent with a hearsay statement can be used to impeach a hearsay declarant even though no foundation was laid for the statement. The sentence also does not answer whether an authorized speaker, an agent, or a coconspirator can also be impeached by an inconsistent statement without laying a foundation first. The last sentence continues the confusion by leaving open the question of whether an authorized speaker, an agent, or a conspirator can be cross-examined as to nonhearsay admissions. While arguments can be made for different treatment of nonhearsay admissions in the last two sentences from the treatment provided in the first sentence, we think that the Senate intended to group admissions with hearsay for all purposes in Rule 806. Thus, we recommended reading all three sentences as if they included a reference to Rules 801(d)(2)(C), (D), and (E). n3

[3] Inconsistent Statements

Evidence of an inconsistent statement or conduct inconsistent with the hearsay statement may be introduced to impeach the declarant. The test for inconsistency is the same as if the declarant were testifying; statements are inconsistent when they appear to proceed from beliefs that are necessarily contradictory. n4

In many cases, the inconsistent statement will be made after the hearsay declaration; and, of course, the declarant is being impeached with a hearsay declarant in absentia. Thus, the timing of the statement may differ from a prior inconsistent statement used to impeach a witness at trial, where the statement of course obviously precedes the testimony. For a hearsay declarant, the inconsistent statement will not necessarily be made "prior" to the statement offered as testimony.

Moreover, impeachment of a witness at trial is governed by Rule 613(b). Under that Rule, no foundation need be laid prior to the introduction of a witness' inconsistent statement, but at some point the witness must be given a chance to explain. n5 In contrast, a hearsay declarant by definition will have no opportunity to explain the inconsistency.

Nonetheless, Rule 806 provides that a hearsay declarant may still be impeached with an inconsistent statement; the Rule 613(b) procedure is inapplicable to hearsay declarants. If that were not the case, hearsay declarants could never be impeached with their inconsistent statements; and that would be contrary to the purpose of Rule 806, which is to provide the same modes of impeachment of a hearsay declarant as are available for trial witnesses.

[4] Scope of Impeachment

Rule 806 provides that a hearsay declarant may be impeached by any evidence that would be admissible if the declarant had testified as a witness. There are some cases in which the declarant's presence as a witness and the opportunity for the jury to observe the witness' demeanor would result in the Trial Judge's excluding evidence that might be deemed embarrassing to the witness (Rule 611) or unduly prejudicial to a party (Rule 403). When the declarant is not present as a witness and hearsay statements are offered, we would decide close cases in favor of allowing impeachment, because only by impeachment is the hearsay likely to be put into proper perspective, as cross-examination is not available to test the declarant. This should be particularly true when the hearsay statement is offered against a criminal defendant. n6

It would seem that almost all forms of impeachment available to attack a trial witness could be used to impeach a hearsay declarant. Inconsistent statements, we have seen, can be used. Bias evidence may be elicited. Character for truthfulness can be explored. n7 Even evidence concerning a declarant's eyesight or hearing might be available. Prior conviction impeachment is possible, too. n8

There is one form of impeachment, however, that presents a difficulty: impeachment of the witness' character for truthfulness by evidence of prior bad acts. Rule 608(b) restricts impeachment to questions addressed to a witness on the stand and limits the examiner to the witness' answers; Rule 608(b) precludes extrinsic evidence of bad acts offered to impeach the witness' character for truthfulness. It can therefore be argued that bad act impeachment of a hearsay declarant who is not present to testify is impermissible, because it would require admission of extrinsic evidence. However, we think that the need to determine the credibility of a hearsay declarant is even greater than the need with respect to an in-court witness. We also think that Rule 806 is clear in its intent that the adverse party is to have at least the same impeachment weapons as he would have had if the witness had testified. Therefore, we believe that bad act impeachment should be a permissible means of impeaching a hearsay declarant. n9 Counsel should be able to inform the jury about the declarant's bad act, presuming that it is not unduly prejudicial or confusing under Rule 403, in the same way that counsel would inform the jury were the witness to testify. Extrinsic evidence of the bad act should in most cases be prohibited, for the same reason that it would be prohibited if the witness were to testify -- unless resort to extrinsic evidence is the only meaningful way, in the absence of the witness, to disclose the bad act to the jury. n10

We note, however, that at least one Court has held that extrinsic evidence may never be admitted to prove a bad act offered to impeach a hearsay declarant's character for truthfulness. The Court in United States v. Saada, 212 F.3d 210 (3d Cir. 2000) , relied on the "plain language" of Rule 806, which it read as creating exactly the same impeachment rules for in-court witnesses and hearsay declarants, with one exception--impeachment with inconsistent statements (discussed above). Because extrinsic evidence could not be used if the witness were to testify at trial, it cannot be used if the statement is introduced as hearsay. The Court found that the Rule's express exception for different treatment of inconsistent statements cut against any judicially-created differential treatment for bad-acts impeachment; that is, if Congress had wanted to create differential treatment for bad acts, it knew how to do so because it had done so for prior inconsistent statements. The Court recognized that the ban on extrinsic proof, as applied to impeachment of hearsay declarants, "prevents using evidence of prior misconduct as a form of impeachment, unless the witness testifying to the hearsay has knowledge of the declarant's misconduct." Nevertheless, this drawback "may not override the language of Rules 806 and 608(b)."

The problem with the reasoning in Saada is that it is inconsistent with the intent of Rule 806, which is to give the opponent of the hearsay the same leeway for impeachment as it would have if the declarant testified at trial. Under Saada, the opponent of the hearsay is put in a worse position with respect to bad acts of the hearsay declarant. The bad acts could at least be referred to if the declarant were to testify, whereas if the statement is introduced as hearsay it is unlikely that the jury will hear about the hearsay declarant's bad acts.

[5] Introducing a Hearsay Statement Solely To Impeach It

In the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 607, § 607.02[2], we discuss the line of cases that have held that a party cannot call a witness for the sole purpose of impeaching that witness with otherwise inadmissible evidence. Courts have not looked kindly on deliberate attempts to evade the rules of evidence by introducing evidence as "impeachment," when in fact there is no good-faith strategic reason for calling a witness solely to impeach him or her. Similar considerations have been applied to Rule 806. Thus, Courts have held that a party cannot introduce an adverse hearsay statement, and then invoke Rule 806 to "impeach" the hearsay declarant with evidence that would not otherwise be admissible, e.g., a prior inconsistent statement. n11

FOOTNOTES:
(n1)Footnote 1. For a discussion of some of the problems involved in adapting impeachment rules to hearsay declarants, see Margaret Cordray, Evidence Rule 806 and the Problem of Impeaching the Nontestifying Declarant, 56 Ohio State L.J. 495 (1995).

(n2)Footnote 2. See, e.g., United States v. McClain, 934 F.2d 822 (7th Cir. 1991) (the Court held there was no error in prohibiting impeachment of an accomplice whose recorded statements were admitted only for their effect on others; the Rule permits impeachment only of hearsay declarants and declarants of statements admitted as authorized, vicarious, or coconspirator's admissions).

(n3)Footnote 3. See, e.g., United States v. Wali, 860 F.2d 588 (3d Cir. 1988) (a coconspirator's exculpatory statements regarding the defendant should have been admitted to impeach, as statements inconsistent with other statements by the conspirator that were admitted under Rule 801(d)(2)(E); no foundation was required).

(n4)Footnote 4. See, e.g., United States v. Trzaska, 111 F.3d 1019 (2d Cir. 1997) (in a firearm prosecution it was error to admit the defendant's statement to a probation officer under Rule 806; the statement to the probation officer indicated that the defendant was obsessed with guns, while the hearsay statement admitted was to the effect that the defendant wanted to give some specific guns to his son because he wanted nothing to do with them: "[T]here is no necessary inconsistency between Trzaska indicating his desire to give specific guns to his son, and later admitting that he (Trzaska) was obsessed with guns in general. Alcoholics may give away alcohol and cigarette smokers may give away cigarettes.").'

(n5)Footnote 5. Some Courts have returned to the common-law rule requiring a foundation to be made before the statement is introduced. See the discussion in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 613, § 613.02[6].

(n6)Footnote 6. See, e.g., United States v. Inadi, 475 U.S. 387 (1986) (noting the importance of impeachment of hearsay declarants whose statements are offered against a criminal defendant, citing Rule 806).

(n7)Footnote 7. See, e.g., United States v. Barrett, 8 F.3d 1296 (8th Cir. 1993) (a declarant's statement, made at a competency hearing, that she didn't know the difference between the truth and a lie, should have been admitted to impeach the declarant's character for truthfulness); United States v. Moody, 903 F.2d 321 (5th Cir. 1990) (a conviction was reversed because the defendant had not been permitted to offer evidence that coconspirators, whose hearsay statements had been admitted against him, had poor reputations for truthfulness).

(n8)Footnote 8. See, e.g., United States v. Burton, 937 F.2d 324 (7th Cir. 1991) (error to preclude cross-examination of an FBI agent regarding the criminal record of a nontestifying government informant whose voice was heard in several tape-recorded conversations).

(n9)Footnote 9. For commentary agreeing with and amplifying our view, see Cordray, Evidence Rule 806 and the Problem of the Nontestifying Declarant, 56 Ohio State L.J. 495, 526 (1995):

> If the attacking party cannot impeach the declarant with specific instances of conduct, she is clearly worse off than she would have been if her opponent had called the declarant to testify. ...
>
> In addition, if Rule 806 is applied to enforce the prohibition on extrinsic evidence, parties might be encouraged to offer hearsay evidence rather than live testimony. For example, if a party felt that a witness was vulnerable to attack under Rule 608(b), that party might attempt to insulate the witness from this form of impeachment by offering his out-of-court statements, rather than calling him to testify. If, however, the attacking party were allowed to impeach a nontestifying declarant with extrinsic evidence of untruthful conduct, the incentive to use hearsay evidence would be removed. ...
>
> These considerations militate strongly in favor of modifying Rule 608(b)'s ban on extrinsic evidence when the attacking party seeks to impeach a nontestifying declarant with specific instances of conduct showing untruthfulness.

(n10)Footnote 10. See, e.g., United States v. Friedman, 854 F.2d 535 (2d Cir. 1988) (the Court observed that when an unavailable declarant cannot be cross-examined, "resort to extrinsic evidence may be the only means of presenting such evidence to the jury"; in this case, however, the declarant's videotaped admission that he had lied on a single occasion was properly excluded under Rule 403).

(n11)Footnote 11. See, e.g., United States v. Finley, 708 F. Supp. 906 (N.D. Ill. 1989) (statements by a government informant were not authorized or agent's statements and could not be used by a defendant under Rule 801; moreover, such statements could not be presented by a defendant who intends to offer other statements to impeach them; just as a party may not call a witness for the sole purpose of eliciting prior inconsistent statements that do not qualify as substantive evidence, a party may not attempt to offer adverse hearsay under an exemption for the sole purpose of admitting otherwise unnecessary and inadmissible evidence in the guise of impeachment).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
CHAPTER 806 RULE 806

4-806 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 806.03

806.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Admissions

United States v. Shay, 57 F.3d 126 (1st Cir. 1995) : The Court held that a statement admitted under Rule 801(d)(2)(A) could be impeached even though Rule 806 does not so state.

United States v. Newman, 849 F.2d 156 (5th Cir. 1988) : The Court held that the government was properly permitted to impeach the defendant with prior convictions after he elicited testimony concerning his own hearsay statements to support an entrapment defense.

United States v. Lawson, 608 F.2d 1129 (6th Cir. 1979) : When defense counsel not only cross-examined a government agent to bring out the fact that the defendant denied his guilt but also introduced a written denial, the government was allowed to impeach the nontestifying defendant under Rule 806 by using a prior conviction.

United States v. McClain, 934 F.2d 822 (7th Cir. 1991) : In a public corruption case, the defendant (who did not testify) offered tapes of exculpatory statements he had made. The Court held there was no error in permitting introduction on rebuttal of other tapes containing the defendant's expansively exculpatory public statements, which seemed to have been thoroughly deflated by the evidence at trial. In United States v. Noble, n1 the Court held that the government was properly permitted to impeach the defendant with a dishonesty conviction after defense counsel introduced a taped conversation between the defendant and an agent in which the defendant denied on four or five occasions any knowledge of counterfeiting activities.

United States v. Price, 792 F.2d 994 (11th Cir. 1986) : The Court held, in affirming a drug conviction, that various tape recordings were admitted as personal admissions by the defendant and that statements by third parties were only admitted to put the defendant's statements in context. Thus, the third parties were not subject to impeachment under Rule 806. The Court observed, however, that there is persuasive authority that a person making a statement that is admitted as an adoptive admission should be subject to impeachment.

[2] Bias or Motive To Lie

United States v. Lechoco, 542 F.2d 84 (D.C. Cir. 1976) : In a prosecution for kidnapping the Philippine Ambassador to the United States, the government emphasized on cross-examination of doctors who presented the insanity defense that their testimony depended on the truth of statements made in psychiatric interviews with the defendant. Reversing on another ground, the Court said that upon remand inquiry into the statements made by the defendant to his psychiatrist should be treated as statements made to a physician and therefore admissible under Rule 803(4), and that the government was free to attack the credibility of the hearsay declarant under Rule 806.

United States v. Check, 582 F.2d 668 (2d Cir. 1978) : In the course of reversing drug convictions because inadmissible hearsay was utilized by the government, the Court pointed out that a party can attack a hearsay declarant by showing his possible bias and that the attack can be made by questioning the witness who reports the hearsay statement.

[3] Contradiction of Non-Declarant

United States v. Maliszewski, 161 F.3d 992 (6th Cir. 1998) : In a prosecution for marijuana trafficking, one defendant complained that he was not permitted to question a witness about a statement allegedly made to her by another defendant. Affirming, the Court found that the statement was actually being offered not to impeach the declarant who made it, but as substantive evidence to contradict another witness, and that Rule 806 did not warrant admission of a prior statement as substantive evidence.

[4] Impeachment of Coconspirator-Declarant

United States v. Vegas, 27 F.3d 773 (2d Cir. 1994) : In affirming a narcotics conviction, the Court upheld the government's introduction of testimony given by the defendant's coconspirator at the coconspirator's previous trial. The testimony contradicted post-arrest statements by the coconspirator that had been introduced by the defendant.

United States v. Wali, 860 F.2d 588 (3d Cir. 1988) : The Court reversed a conviction for conspiracy to import drugs, holding that a coconspirator's exculpatory statements regarding the defendant should have been admitted to impeach, as prior inconsistent statements, other statements by the conspirator that were admitted under Rule 801(d)(2)(E). The Court observed that impeachment of a conspirator-declarant is permitted without the need for cross-examination and regardless of whether the declarant could have been deposed.

[5] Impeachment of Persons Whose Declarations Are Adopted

United States v. Price, 792 F.2d 994 (11th Cir. 1986) : The Court held, in affirming a drug conviction, that various tape recordings were admitted as personal admissions by the defendant and that statements by third parties were only admitted to put the defendant's statements in context. Thus, the third parties were not subject to impeachment under Rule 806. The Court observed, however, that there is persuasive authority that a person making a statement that is admitted as an adoptive admission should be subject to impeachment.

[6] Nontestifying Accused

United States v. Newman, 849 F.2d 156 (5th Cir. 1988) : The Court held that the government was properly permitted to impeach the defendant with prior convictions after he elicited testimony concerning his own hearsay statements to support an entrapment defense.

[7] Prejudice to Codefendants

United States v. Robinson, 783 F.2d 64 (7th Cir. 1986) : Affirming cocaine convictions, the Court held that a defendant was properly barred from impeaching nontestifying codefendants whose statements were admitted under Rule 801(d)(2)(E). The Court found that exclusion was necessary to protect the codefendants from unnecessary prejudice and that the Trial Judge was not bound to grant a severance.

United States v. Lenfesty, 923 F.2d 1293 (8th Cir. 1991) : In affirming convictions for offenses arising out of a methamphetamine distribution conspiracy, the Court held there had been no abuse of discretion in permitting impeachment of a nontestifying codefendant's coconspirator statements with evidence of her reputation for truthfulness but prohibiting evidence of her numerous prior felony convictions. Enough impeachment of the declarant must be allowed to protect the other codefendants' confrontation rights, but the declarant's right to be fairly tried for this crime and not convicted for her prior bad acts must also be safeguarded.

[8] Prior Convictions

United States v. Lawson, 608 F.2d 1129 (6th Cir. 1979) : When defense counsel not only cross-examined a government agent to bring out the fact that the defendant denied his guilt but also introduced a written denial, the government was allowed to impeach the nontestifying defendant under Rule 806 by using a prior conviction.

United States v. Burton, 937 F.2d 324 (7th Cir. 1991) : Affirming convictions on charges arising out of an interstate scheme to steal tires and trucks, the Court held that it was error (but harmless) to preclude cross-examination of an FBI agent regarding the criminal record of a nontestifying government informant whose voice was heard in several tape-recorded conversations. In United States v. Noble, n2 the Court held that the government was properly permitted to impeach the defendant with a dishonesty conviction after defense counsel introduced a taped conversation between the defendant and an agent in which the defendant denied on four or five occasions any knowledge of counterfeiting activities.

United States v. Bovain, 708 F.2d 606 (11th Cir. 1983) : A government witness in a heroin prosecution testified to out-of-court statements by one defendant, Finch, that concerned the drug activities of another defendant, Rickett. Rickett was permitted to impeach Finch with certified records of Finch's prior convictions for stolen money orders and narcotics, even though Finch never testified. The Court upheld the impeachment under Rule 806 and observed that the Trial Judge carefully instructed the jury that evidence of Finch's convictions could be used to discredit his out-of-court statements, but could not be considered as evidence of Finch's guilt. In United States v. Kabbaby, n3 the Court found that the Trial Judge properly excluded evidence of a prior conviction of a government informant where the informant did not testify and there was no evidence of any statement or act of the informant that might have been considered as a statement.

[9] Prior Inconsistent Statements

United States v. Trzaska, 111 F.3d 1019 (2d Cir. 1997) : The defendant had twice previously been convicted of firearms offenses. At this trial for firearms offenses, the defendant's son testified for the defense that in 1992 the defendant had said the son should take the guns then being stored at a friend's apartment because he "didn't want nothing to do with them anymore." To impeach the 1992 statement, the prosecution then offered the defendant's statement during the course of an illegal search leading to the instant charges that "I'm a drug addict with this [i.e., guns]. It's a sickness." Reversing, the Court held that this impeachment was erroneous because the statements were not inconsistent. There is no necessary inconsistency between indicating a desire to dispose of specific guns and admitting an obsession with guns in general; further, the year's time lapse between the statements clouds whatever inconsistency might have existed. The government's argument that there was an inconsistency between the defendant's admission that he possessed the guns found at the time of his arrest and the implicit denial that he possessed the guns in the friend's apartment was likewise unavailing, since the two statements referred to different guns.

United States v. McClain, 934 F.2d 822 (7th Cir. 1991) : In a public corruption case, the defendant (who did not testify) offered tapes of exculpatory statements he had made. The Court held there was no error in permitting introduction on rebuttal of other tapes containing the defendant's expansively exculpatory public statements, which seemed to have been thoroughly deflated by the evidence at trial.

United States v. Grant, 256 F.3d 1146 (11th Cir. 2001) : The defendant in a drug conspiracy case attempted to impeach coconspirator statements by means of an affidavit given by the coconspirator (who had been deported before trial), which stated that the defendant had not been involved in the scheme. The affidavit was excluded because the coconspirator's statements, as reported by the agent, did not specifically identify the defendant as a participant in the conspiracy. Reversing, the Court held that that was too narrow a view of the permissible impeachment: the coconspirator's statements circumstantially linked the defendant to the conspiracy, and if he had been testifying at trial, there was no question that the statements in the affidavit would have been admissible to impeach him. In United States v. Wuagneux, n4 the Court affirmed convictions for racketeering and mail fraud, and upheld the government's introduction of an inconsistent statement offered to impeach a statement made by the defendant's accountant that the defendant had introduced as a declaration against interest. The government acted properly in impeaching the unavailable declarant, even though the unavailability resulted from the government's refusal to grant use immunity.

[10] Prior Statements of Declarant

United States v. Barrett, 8 F.3d 1296 (8th Cir. 1993) : At a hearing on whether the four-year-old victim of an assault was competent to testify, the child indicated that she did not know (or at least could not explain) what it meant to tell the truth or to lie. When her hearsay statements were admitted at trial, the defendant was not permitted to introduce the child's statements from the competency hearing. The Court vacated the conviction, holding it was a denial of confrontation rights to exclude relevant impeaching evidence.

[11] Prosecutorial Abuse

United States v. Sherlock, 962 F.2d 1349 (9th Cir. 1989) , amended (9th Cir. 1992): Reversing the defendant's conviction in a joint trial for assault with intent to commit rape because the prosecutor improperly used an inculpatory statement by the nontestifying codefendant, the Court noted that the defendant would have been permitted to impeach the statement with the codefendant's prior sex offense conviction, had there not been a joint trial in which the impeachment would have been unfair to the codefendant.

[12] Rehabilitation Evidence

United States v. Bernal, 719 F.2d 1475 (9th Cir. 1983) : In the course of affirming drug convictions, the Court sustained the introduction of a coconspirator's statement to rehabilitate a conspirator whose statement had been introduced under Rule 801(d)(2)(E) and who was impeached with a prior inconsistent statement.

[13] Reputation and Opinion Evidence

United States v. Katsougrakis, 715 F.2d 769 (2d Cir. 1983) : Affirming mail fraud and conspiracy convictions arising from the arson of a diner, the Court found it was error (but harmless) to preclude the defense from asking a government witness questions about the reputation of a hearsay declarant.

United States v. Moody, 903 F.2d 321 (5th Cir. 1990) : The Court reversed convictions for mail and wire fraud because the defendant had not been permitted to offer evidence that coconspirators, whose hearsay statements had been admitted against him, had abysmal reputations for truthfulness.

[14] Scope of the Rule

United States v. Shay, 57 F.3d 126 (1st Cir. 1995) : The Court held that a statement admitted under Rule 801(d)(2)(A) could be impeached even though Rule 806 does not so state.

United States v. Graham, 858 F.2d 986 (5th Cir. 1988) : The Court affirmed cocaine convictions, holding there was no error in barring the defendant from cross-examining a police officer about an accomplice's statements while pleading guilty that denied that he had implicated the defendant in previous statements to the officer. The cross-examination attempted to challenge the credibility of the officer, not the accomplice, and was therefore outside the scope of Rule 806.

United States v. McClain, 934 F.2d 822 (7th Cir. 1991) : The Court held there was no error in prohibiting impeachment of an accomplice whose recorded statements were admitted only for their effect on others, as the Rule permits impeachment of only hearsay declarants and declarants of statements admitted as authorized, vicarious, or coconspirator's admissions.

United States v. Martinez, 979 F.2d 1424 (10th Cir. 1992) : Affirming convictions for drug trafficking offenses, the Court held that the defendants had no need for disclosure of an informant's identity in order to impeach him, as the informant's statements were used only to explain the conduct of government agents and not for their truth, so the informant could not be impeached under the Rule.

United States v. Harris, 908 F.2d 728 (11th Cir. 1990) : In affirming cocaine importation conspiracy convictions, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in precluding a defendant from offering evidence impeaching a confidential informant whose voice was recorded on tapes of conversations with the defendant. Although the government listed the informant on their pretrial witness list, he never testified, and he did not provide evidence against the defendant.

[15] Self-Impeachment by a Party

United States v. Dent, 984 F.2d 1453 (7th Cir. 1993) : In a prosecution for felon firearm possession, the Trial

Judge admitted evidence that the defendant had pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor charge of unlawful use of a weapon growing out of the same facts. The defendant argued that a statement made to the State Court by his lawyer that he was pleading guilty against the lawyer's advice and that he had stated to counsel he did not know the gun was in the car should have been admitted under, inter alia, Rule 806. The Court found that the statements were really offered not for impeachment but for their truth, but it recognized that in some circumstances a party may impeach a statement admitted under Rule 801(d)(2)(A) and (B), as well as under (C), (D), and (E).

[16] Specific Instances of Conduct

United States v. White, 116 F.3d 903 (D.C. Cir. 1997) (per curiam): The Court affirmed convictions for a drug trafficking conspiracy, holding there was no abuse of discretion in precluding cross-examination of an undercover officer as to whether a deceased declarant whose hearsay statements he had testified to had ever made false statements on an employment application or had ever violated any Court orders. The Court noted Rule 608(b)'s bar on extrinsic evidence of misconduct to impeach; "[a]ccordingly, [defendant]'s counsel could have asked [the officer] only if [the declarant] had ever lied on an employment form or violated any court orders, and could not have made reference to any extrinsic proof of those acts." Because the officer had known the declarant for only two months, and because there was other evidence in the record concerning the declarant's credibility, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the conclusion "that the questions were of little utility."

United States v. Friedman, 854 F.2d 535 (2d Cir. 1988) : After the Trial Judge admitted numerous declarations of a deceased declarant as conspirator statements in a racketeering prosecution, the Judge excluded evidence that the declarant had lied to a hospital and pretended that he had been assaulted when he had actually attempted suicide. The Court observed that the government did not press on appeal its argument that Rule 608(b) barred the use of extrinsic evidence -- in this case, a videotape of the declarant's admission of his attempted suicide and fabrication of an assault -- and that when an unavailable declarant cannot be cross-examined, "resort to extrinsic evidence may be the only means of presenting such evidence to the jury." The Court found that the excluded evidence cast little doubt on the credibility of the conspirator statements and would have injected evidence of the declarant's subsequent suicide into the case, so there was no error in excluding the evidence under Rule 403.

United States v. Saada, 212 F.3d 210 (3d Cir. 2000) : The defendants attempted to defraud an insurance company by breaking a sprinkler head, causing water damage to insured merchandise in their warehouse, and claiming that it had happened accidentally. To prove the sprinkler head was broken by accident, the defendants proved that just after the incident a vice-president of their company (a former judge, since deceased) had run into the company kitchen and exclaimed that one of the defendants had just done something very stupid. The exclamation was admitted under Rule 803(2), but the Court noted the personal perception requirement was not satisfied because the declarant was not in the warehouse when the sprinkler head was broken. Nonetheless, the Court deferred to the ruling admitting the statement for its truth for purposes of reviewing the Trial Judge's taking judicial notice of two New Jersey Supreme Court decisions removing the declarant from the bench and disbarring him. The Court held that Rule 608(b)'s bar on extrinsic evidence of misconduct offered to impeach applies to hearsay declarants under Rule 806, even when the declarant is unavailable. The unavailable declarant may still be impeached either by the witness who testifies to the hearsay incorporating knowledge of the misconduct in cross-examination about the declarant's character for truthfulness or untruthfulness (Rule 608(a)) or by other impeachment under Rules 608(a), 609, or 613. The Court supported its conclusion by reference to the "plain -- albeit imperfectly meshed -- language" of Rules 806 and 608(b) and the explicit modification of Rule 613's foundation requirement in Rule 806. In this case, admitting the extrinsic evidence of the declarant's misconduct was harmless error.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. United States v. Noble, 754 F.2d 1324 (7th Cir. 1985) .

(n2)Footnote 2. United States v. Noble, 754 F.2d 1324 (7th Cir. 1985) .

(n3)Footnote 3. United States v. Kabbaby, 672 F.2d 857 (11th Cir. 1982) .

(n4)Footnote 4. United States v. Wuagneux, 683 F.2d 1343 (11th Cir. 1982) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
CHAPTER 806 RULE 806

4-806 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 806.04

806.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Advisory Committee's Note

The declarant of a hearsay statement which is admitted in evidence is in effect a witness. His credibility should in fairness be subject to impeachment and support as though he had in fact testified. See Rules 608 and 609. There are however, some special aspects of the impeaching of a hearsay declarant which require consideration. These special aspects center upon impeachment by inconsistent statement, arise from factual differences which exist between the use of hearsay and an actual witness and also between various kinds of hearsay, and involve the question of applying to declarants the general rule disallowing evidence of an inconsistent statement to impeach a witness unless he is afforded an opportunity to deny or explain. See Rule 613(b).

The principal difference between using hearsay and an actual witness is that the inconsistent statement will in the case of the witness almost inevitably of necessity in the nature of things be a prior statement, which it is entirely possible and feasible to call to his attention, while in the case of hearsay the inconsistent statement may well be a subsequent one, which practically precludes calling it to the attention of the declarant. The result of insisting upon observation of this impossible requirement in the hearsay situation is to deny the opponent, already barred from cross-examination, any benefit of this important technique of impeachment. The writers favor allowing the subsequent statement. McCormick § 37, p. 69; 3 Wigmore § 1033. The cases, however, are divided. Cases allowing the impeachment include People v. Collup, 27 Cal. 2d 829, 167 P.2d 714 (1946) ; People v. Rosoto, 58 Cal. 2d 304, 23 Cal. Rptr. 779, 373 P.2d 867 (1962) ; Carver v. United States, 164 U.S. 694, 17 S. Ct. 228, 41 L. Ed. 602 (1897). Contra, Mattox v. United States, 156 U.S. 237, 15 S. Ct. 337, 39 L. Ed. 409 (1895) ; People v. Hines, 284 N.Y. 93, 29 N.E.2d 483 (1940) . The force of Mattox, where the hearsay was the former testimony of a deceased witness and the denial of use of a subsequent inconsistent statement was upheld, is much diminished by Carver, where the hearsay was a dying declaration and denial of use of a subsequent inconsistent statement resulted in reversal. The difference in the particular brand of hearsay seems unimportant when the inconsistent statement is a subsequent one. True, the opponent is not totally deprived of crossexamination when the hearsay is former testimony or a deposition but he is deprived of crossexamining on the statement or along lines suggested by it. Mr. Justice Shiras, with two justices joining him, dissented vigorously in Mattox.

When the impeaching statement was made prior to the hearsay statement, differences in the kinds of hearsay appear which arguably may justify differences in treatment. If the hearsay consisted of a simple statement by the witness, e.g., a dying declaration or a declaration against interest, the feasibility of affording him an opportunity to deny or explain encounters the same practical impossibility as where the statement is a subsequent one, just discussed, although here the impossibility arises from the total absence of anything resembling a hearing at which the matter could be put to him. The courts by a large majority have ruled in favor of allowing the statement to be used under these circumstances. McCormick § 37, p. 69; 3 Wigmore § 1033. If, however, the hearsay consists of former testimony or a deposition, the possibility of calling the prior statement to the attention of the witness or deponent is not ruled out, since the opportunity to cross-examine was available. It might thus be concluded that with former testimony or depositions the conventional foundation should be insisted upon. Most of the cases involve depositions, and Wigmore describes them as divided. 3 Wigmore § 1031. Deposition procedures at best are cumbersome and expensive, and to require the laying of the foundation may impose an undue burden. Under the federal practice, there is no way of knowing with certainty at the time of taking a deposition whether it is merely for discovery or will ultimately end up in evidence. With respect to both former testimony and depositions the possibility exists that knowledge of the statement might not be acquired until after the time of the cross-examination. Moreover, the expanded admissibility of former testimony and depositions under Rule 804(b)(1) calls for a correspondingly expanded approach to impeachment. The rule dispenses with the requirement in all hearsay situations, which is readily administered and best calculated to lead to fair results.

Notice should be taken that Rule 26(f) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, as originally submitted by the Advisory Committee, ended with the following: "... and, without having first called them to the deponent's attention, may show statements contradictory thereto made at any time by the deponent." This language did not appear in the rule as promulgated in December, 1937. See 4 Moore's Federal Practice §§ 26.01[9], 26.35 (2d ed. 1967). In 1951, Nebraska adopted a provision strongly resembling the one stricken from the federal rule: "Any party may impeach any adverse deponent by self-contradiction without having laid foundation for such impeachment at the time such deposition was taken." R.S. Neb. § 251267.07.

For similar provisions, see Uniform Rule 65; California Evidence Code § 1202; Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60462; New Jersey Evidence Rule 65.

The provision for cross-examination of a declarant upon his hearsay statement is a corollary of general principles of cross-examination. A similar provision is found in California Evidence Code § 1203.

[The entire Advisory Committee Note accompanying the genderneutralizing changes effective October 1, 1987 is as follows: "The amendments are technical. No substantive change is intended."]

[The 1997 amendment to the Rule deleted a comma in the Text of the Rule. The Advisory Committee Note is as follows: "The amendment is technical. No substantive change is intended."]

[2] Report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary

Rule 906 [sic], as passed by the House and as proposed by the Supreme Court provides that whenever a hearsay statement is admitted, the credibility of the declarant of the statement may be attacked, and if attacked may be supported, by any evidence which would be admissible for those purposes if the declarant had testified as a witness. Rule 801 defines what is a hearsay statement. While statements by a person authorized by a party-opponent to make a statement concerning the subject, by the party-opponent's agent or by a coconspirator of a party -- see Rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), and (E) -- are traditionally defined as exceptions to the hearsay rule, Rule 801 defines such admission by a party-opponent as statements which are not hearsay. Consequently, Rule 806 by referring exclusively to the admission of hearsay statements, does not appear to allow the credibility of the declarant to be attacked when the declarant is a coconspirator, agent or authorized spokesman. The committee is of the view that such statements should open the declarant to attacks on his credibility. Indeed, the reason such statements are excluded from the operation of Rule 806 is likely attributable to the drafting technique used to codify the hearsay rule, viz some statements, instead of being referred to as exceptions to the hearsay rule, are defined as statements which are not hearsay. The phrase "or a statement defined in Rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), and (E)" is added to the rule in order to subject the declarant of such statements, like the declarant of hearsay statements, to attacks on his credibility. [The committee considered it unnecessary to include statements contained in Rule 801(d)(2)(A) and (B) -- the statement by the party-opponent himself or the statement of which he has manifested his adoption -- because the credibility of the party-opponent is always subject to attack. (Footnote 28)]

[3] Report of the House and Senate Conferees

The Senate amendment permits an attack upon the credibility of the declarant of a statement if the statement is one by a person authorized by a party-opponent to make a statement concerning the subject, one by an agent of a party-opponent, or one by a coconspirator of the party-opponent, as these statements are defined in Rules 801(d)(2)(C), (D), and (E). The House bill has no such provision.

The Conference adopts the Senate amendment. The Senate amendment conforms the rule to present practice.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
Supp. To CHAPTER 806 RULE 806

4-806 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 806, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 806. Attacking and Supporting Credibility of Declarant	Rule 806. Attacking and Supporting the Declarant's Credibility
When a hearsay state	When a hearsay state ment, or a statement defined in Rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), or (E), has been admitted in evidence, the credibility of the declarant may be attacked, and if attacked may be supported, by any ment -- or a statement described in Rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), or (E) -- has been admitted in evidence, the declarant's credibility may be attacked, and then supported, by any evidence that would be admiss evid ence whic h wou ld be ad- miss ible for thos e pur- pose s if de- clar- ant had test- ified as a wit- ness. Evid ence of a state men t or con- duct by the de- clar- ant at any time , in- con- sist- ent with the de- clar- ant's hear ible for thos e pur- pose s if the de- clar- ant had test- ified as a wit- ness. The cour t may ad- mit evid ence of the de- clar- ant's in- con- sist- ent state men t or con- duct, re- gard less of whe n it oc- curr ed or whet say state men t, is not sub- ject to any re- quir eme nt that the de- clar- ant may have been af- ford ed an op- por- tun- ity to deny or ex- plai n. If the part y agai nst who m a hear say state men t has been ad- mit- her the de- clar- ant had an op- por- tun- ity to ex- plai n or deny it. If the part y agai nst who m the state men t was ad- mit- ted calls the de- clar- ant as a wit- ness, the part y may ex- ami ne the de- clar-ted calls the declarant as a witness, the party is entitled to examine the declarant on the statement as if under cross-examination.

ant on the statement as if on cross-examination.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 806 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
Supp. To CHAPTER 806 RULE 806

4-806 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 806.03

Supp. to § 806.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[6] Nontestifying Accused [Go To Main]

United States v. Greenidge, 495 F.3d 85 (3d Cir. 2007) : In a bank fraud prosecution, the government introduced the nontestifying defendant's prior conviction for stealing money from his employer, to impeach a hearsay statement made by the defendant tending to indicate he had no intent to defraud. Affirming, the Court held that the conviction would have been admissible under Rule 609 if the defendant had testified, and so it was admissible to impeach his credibility as a hearsay declarant. The Court saw "no basis for altering the Rule 609 balancing in the circumstances of a non-testifying defendant-declarant."

[9] Prior Inconsistent Statements [Go To Main]

United States v. Ebbers, 458 F.3d 110 (2d Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed convictions for securities fraud, finding no abuse of discretion when the Judge did not compel the prosecution to choose between giving use immunity to defense witnesses or forgoing its own use of immunized testimony. The defendant argued that the unimmunized witnesses were necessary to impeach coconspirator hearsay offered by the government, but the Court held that their proffered testimony would not have contradicted the evidence that was admitted.

[14] Scope of the Rule [Go To Main]

United States v. Rodriguez-Berrios, 573 F.3d 55 (1st Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed the defendant's conviction for the fatal carjacking of his ex-wife, finding no error in the exclusion of tape records of the victim talking to passengers in her vehicle and on her cell phone while driving. The defense offered the tapes to impeach -- not so much by the words as by the tone and attitude -- hearsay accusations by the victim of abuse by the defendant. The Judge had excluded the evidence on the grounds, first, that the victim was not a declarant because she was not "a person who takes the witness stand," and, second, because the statements sought to be impeached were not hearsay but rather "exceptions to hearsay." The Court stated that both reasons were based on a misreading of the Rules: in fact, a declarant is "a person who makes a statement," and the statements were hearsay under Rule 801, and thus proper subjects for impeachment under Rule 806, even if they were admitted under a hearsay exception under Rule 803. Nevertheless, the evidence was properly excluded, because it strongly corroborated rather than contradicted the victim's hearsay statements.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
CHAPTER 807 RULE 807

4-807 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 807.syn

§ 807.syn Synopsis to Chapter 807: RULE 807

807.01 Official Text

807.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] A Single Residual Exception

[2] Breadth of the Residual Exception

[3] Relationship to Other Exceptions

[4] Trustworthiness Requirement

[5] "More Probative" Requirement

[6] Materiality Requirement

[7] Notice Requirement

[8] The Residual Exception and the Confrontation Clause

807.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Agency Proceedings

[2] Availability of Equally Probative Evidence

[a] Civil Cases

[b] Availability of Equally Probative Evidence -- Criminal Cases

[3] Cautionary Instructions

[4] Children's Statements

[a] Admissible

[b] Children's Statements -- Error To Admit

[5] Constitutional Concerns

[6] Consumer Complaints

[7] Error To Exclude

[8] Examples of Residual Hearsay

[a] Civil Cases

[b] Examples of Residual Hearsay -- Criminal Cases

[9] Foreign Documents

[10] Foundation

[11] Government Custom

[12] Grand Jury Testimony -- Offered by Prosecution

[13] Material Fact

[14] Notice

[15] Relationship to Other Hearsay Exceptions

[16] Sources of Information

[17] Surveys and Opinion Polls

[18] Testifying Witness

[19] Trustworthiness

[a] Civil Cases

[i] Statement Admissible or Admission Required

[ii] Trustworthiness -- Civil Cases -- Statement Excludable or Exclusion Required

[b] Trustworthiness -- Criminal Cases

[i] Statement Admissible or Admission Required

[ii] Trustworthiness -- Criminal Cases -- Statement Excludable or Exclusion Required

[A] Defense Evidence

[B] Trustworthiness -- Criminal Cases -- Statement Excludable or Exclusion Required -- Prosecution Evidence

807.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee Note to Rule 803(24)

[2] 1997 Amendment Committee Note

[3] Excerpt from "Advisory Committee Notes to the Federal Rules of Evidence That May Require Clarification," by Daniel Capra, 182 F.R.D. 268, 278 (1999)

[4] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

[5] Report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary

[6] Report of the House and Senate Conferees

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
CHAPTER 807 RULE 807

4-807 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 807.01

807.01 Official Text

Rule 807. Residual Exception

A statement not specifically covered by Rule 803 or 804 but having equivalent circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness, is not excluded by the hearsay rule, if the court determines that (A) the statement is offered as evidence of a material fact; (B) the statement is more probative on the point for which it is offered than any other evidence which the proponent can procure through reasonable efforts; and (C) the general purposes of these rules and the interests of justice will best be served by admission of the statement into evidence. However, a statement may not be admitted under this exception unless the proponent of it makes known to the adverse party sufficiently in advance of the trial or hearing to provide the adverse party with a fair opportunity to prepare to meet it, the proponent's intention to offer the statement and the particulars of it, including the name and address of the declarant.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
CHAPTER 807 RULE 807

4-807 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 807.02

807.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[Go To Supp]

[1] A Single Residual Exception

Two residual hearsay exceptions were contained in the Federal Rules as initially adopted. These exceptions were designed to permit the admission of trustworthy hearsay that did not fit under any of the categorical exceptions. The residual exceptions were identically worded; one was placed in Rule 803 (subdivision (24)), and the other was placed in Rule 804 (subdivision (b)(5)). In 1997, the residual exceptions were transferred out of Rules 803 and 804, and combined in a single exception, Rule 807. This was done to facilitate additions to Rules 803 and 804. No change in meaning was intended. This Editorial Explanatory Comment discusses the residual exception, making reference to many of the cases decided under Rules 803(24) and 804(b)(5). For ease of reference, the residual exception is referred to in the singular, even though the Rules as initially adopted contained two separate residual exceptions.

[2] Breadth of the Residual Exception

The residual exception was the subject of significant controversy when originally proposed by the Advisory Committee. A catchall provision was deleted by the House, but the Senate resurrected it in a more restricted form. Under the Senate version, the Court must determine that a statement is offered as evidence of a material fact, that it is more probative on the point for which it is offered than any other evidence that a proponent can procure by reasonable efforts, and that the general purposes of the Rules and the interests of justice will be served by admitting the evidence. In addition, the evidence must demonstrate circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness. The final bill adopted the Senate language. Added to the Senate version, however, was a provision that a party intending to proffer residual hearsay must notify any adverse party of that intention before trial. Included in the notice must be the particulars of the statement as well as the name and address of the declarant. The notice requirement is discussed in more detail below.

The residual exception is designed to leave room for limited growth and development in the law of hearsay exceptions. The Advisory Committee thought it "presumptuous to assume that all possible desirable exceptions to the hearsay rule have been catalogued," and therefore adopted a residual exception to allow Judges to admit hearsay in "new and presently unanticipated situations which demonstrate a trustworthiness within the spirit of the specifically stated exceptions." n1 It is clear, however, that the intent of the drafters was that the exception would be used sparingly; the concern was that overuse of the residual exception would undermine the categorical approach to the hearsay exceptions set forth in the Federal Rules. n2 An early draft of the Federal Rules contained only one hearsay exception, which mandated a case-by-case inquiry to determine the trustworthiness of each proffered hearsay statement. This approach was rejected because it was too unpredictable and time-consuming, and was replaced by a system of categorical admissibility requirements. The residual exception was the safety valve to the underinclusiveness of the categorical approach; but it was not intended to subsume the use of categorical exceptions and exclusions.

Unfortunately, the intent of the drafters to limit the residual exception has often been ignored, as the discussion below will indicate. Liberal use of the residual exception runs the risk of establishing, de facto, the dominance of the case-by-case approach that was rejected previously. A broad application of the residual exception could permit the case-by-case exception to swallow the categorical rules.

Certainly there is an argument against the inclusion of a residual exception in a code of evidence. The Washington Task Force on Evidence made the following comment in rejecting residual exceptions for the Washington Rules of Evidence:

> There is a serious risk that trial judges would differ greatly in applying the elastic standard of equivalent trustworthiness. The result would be a lack of uniformity which would make preparation for trial difficult. Nor would it be likely that an appellate court could effectively apply corrective measures. There would be doubt whether an affirmance of an admission of evidence under the catchall provision amounted to the creation of a new exception with the force of precedent or merely a refusal to rule that the trial court had abused its discretion.

While these concerns have merit, we think that the alternative of having no residual exception is worse. Without a residual exception, Trial Courts might well be pushed to expand the categorical exceptions beyond their ordinary application, in order to qualify a statement that the Court thinks is reliable but does not fit into any of the categorical exceptions. We note that Courts in states without a residual exception have been prone to distort certain hearsay exceptions by engaging in a generalized trustworthiness inquiry, instead of focusing on the grounds for admissibility applicable to a particular exception. This is particularly true with respect to Rules 803(2) and (4), where the prosecution offers statements of children concerning sexual abuse. Courts in states without a residual exception have often admitted statements of child-victims under these exceptions, even where the declarant was not excited or seeking treatment; these Courts undertake a residual-type analysis and admit the statement when it is trustworthy under the circumstances. n3 We think that ultimately it is more honest to apply a residual exception than it is to try to cram a statement into an exception where it clearly does not belong. However, we caution that flexibility should not be an excuse for unconstrained judicial activism. n4

[3] Relationship to Other Exceptions

The residual exception applies to statements "not specifically covered by Rule 803 or 804 but having equivalent circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness." Thus, Courts must face the issue whether hearsay that almost, but not quite, fits one of the standard exceptions may be admitted under the residual exception. A major concern of some members of Congress was that certain types of hearsay deliberately excluded from the categorical exceptions might nevertheless be admitted as residual hearsay. n5 Many decisions have demonstrated that there were good grounds for the congressional concerns, as Courts have often admitted hearsay under the residual exception where it is a "near miss" of an enumerated exception. n6

We believe that the residual exception was meant to cover special cases -- reliable statements that could not have been anticipated by a categorical approach and that are "not specifically covered" by those exceptions. But most Courts have construed "not specifically covered" to mean "not admissible under" a categorical exception. n7 It is obvious that this construction renders the language redundant, because the residual exception will only apply if the hearsay statement is "not admissible under" another exception.

[4] Trustworthiness Requirement

The most important requirement for residual hearsay is that it possess guarantees of trustworthiness equivalent to those supporting the Rule 803 and 804 exceptions. No inclusive list of factors determining admissibility can be devised because admissibility hinges upon the peculiar factual context within which the statement was made. But some nondispositive generalizations can be made

There are certain standard factors all Courts consider in evaluating the trustworthiness of a declarant's statement under the residual exception. n8 These include:

(1) The relationship between the declarant and the person to whom the statement was made. For example, a statement to a trusted confidante should be considered more reliable than a statement to a total stranger. n9

(2) The capacity of the declarant at the time of the statement. For instance, if the declarant was drunk or on drugs at the time, that would cut against a finding of trustworthiness, and vice versa. n10

(3) The personal truthfulness of the declarant. If the declarant is an untruthful person, this cuts against admissibility, while an unimpeachable character for veracity cuts in favor of admitting the statement. n11

(4) Whether the declarant appeared to carefully consider the statement. n12

(5) Whether the declarant recanted or repudiated the statement after it was made. n13

(6) Whether the declarant has made other statements that were either consistent or inconsistent with the proffered statement. n14

(7) Whether the behavior of the declarant was consistent with the content of the statement. n15

(8) Whether the declarant's memory might have been impaired due to the lapse of time between the event and the statement. n16

(9) Whether the statement, as well as the event described by the statement, is clear and factual, or instead is vague and ambiguous.

(10) Whether the statement was made under formal circumstances or pursuant to formal duties, such that the declarant would have been likely to consider the accuracy of the statement when making it. n17

(11) Whether the statement appears to have been made in anticipation of litigation and is favorable to the person who made or prepared the statement. n18

(12) Whether the declarant was a disinterested bystander or rather an interested party. n19

[5] "More Probative" Requirement

Statements offered under the residual exception must be more probative than any other evidence reasonably available to prove the point. The rationale for this requirement is that the residual exception should be reserved for cases of clear necessity.

Courts have held that live testimony by the declarant is as a general rule more probative than or at least equally probative as hearsay. n20 These Courts have generally excluded statements offered as residual hearsay when the declarant was not called to testify and was not shown to be unavailable. n21

However, the failure to call an available declarant will not always preclude the admission of residual hearsay. A declarant may be technically available and yet may be unable or unwilling to give testimony on the point for which the hearsay statement is offered, or at least unable or unwilling to give testimony that is as probative as the out-of-court statement. In such circumstances, the hearsay statement may be more probative evidence. For example, in child abuse cases the child's out-of-court statement concerning the abuse is often considered the more probative evidence because the child may not be able to communicate as well on the stand as he or she did out of court. n22

Moreover, the Rule states that the proffered hearsay must be the most probative evidence that can be produced through reasonable efforts. In some cases, a declarant might be technically available, but it would be unreasonably prohibitive and time-consuming to demand that the declarant testify in Court. For example, in an action where thousands of consumers have been defrauded, reliable affidavits prepared by each consumer have been admitted as residual hearsay in lieu of in-court testimony. n23 Because the probative value of the hearsay is compared with that of other evidence that could be procured through "reasonable" efforts, limitations upon the financial resources available to the parties and the Court are rightfully considered. As one Court has stated, the question of whether there is more probative evidence reasonably available depends upon "the importance of the evidence, the means at the command of the proponent, and the amount in controversy." n24

The term "more probative" must be distinguished from the term "more credible." For instance, if there are two eyewitnesses to an event, and one witness, now unavailable, makes a hearsay statement that is offered as residual hearsay, the statement is not more probative than the other eyewitness' in-court testimony would be. This is true even if the declarant's credibility is strong and the witness's credibility is weak. The term "probative" refers to the tendency of the statement to prove a proposition if the jury decides to believe it. As one Court has stated: "The credibility of a witness has nothing to do with whether or not his testimony is probative with respect to the fact it seeks to prove. ... [T]he law does not consider credibility as a component to relevance." n25

[6] Materiality Requirement

The Rule requires that residual hearsay be "offered as evidence of a material fact." It is ironic that the word "material," which found its way into the residual exception, was studiously avoided in the definition of relevance set forth in Rule 401. The Advisory Committee on the Federal Rules believed that the word should not be used because it has many different legal meanings. Nonetheless, Congress selected the word in defining the residual exception. It is probable that Congress intended to use one of the meanings other than relevance. Congress appears to have intended to limit the use of the residual exception to important evidence -- evidence likely to affect the outcome of a case.

We think that it makes sense to limit the use of the residual exception to crucial evidence. The exception is not to be abused and was intended for extraordinary situations of trustworthiness and necessity. Applying the residual exception to a statement that is only marginally relevant (but yet admissible under the liberal provisions of Rules 401 and 403) is inconsistent with this intent. Illustrative of our position is United States v. Gaitan-Acevedo, 148 F.3d 577 (6th Cir. 1998) . The defendants were charged with a drug conspiracy. The government presented evidence that an address book seized from one of the defendants contained the notation "Ranchito." The government contended that the defendants used drug proceeds to purchase a cattle ranch in Mexico, and that "Ranchito" was a reference to this ranch. In an attempt to rebut this contention, the defendant proffered a letter from a Mexican Consul Attache indicating that there is a small village in Mexico named "El Ranchito." The defendant argued that the letter was admissible as residual hearsay, but the Court found no error in its exclusion, reasoning that the letter was not "offered as evidence of a material fact" as required by the Rule. The Court stated that evidence concerning the town of Ranchito in Mexico "at most would have called into question the meaning of a single entry in the defendant's notebook -- a matter that clearly was not material to the jury's determination of his guilt on the drug charges." Thus, while the evidence was probative of a possibly innocent explanation for government-proffered evidence, it was not really important to the case.

[7] Notice Requirement

The purpose of the notice requirement is to protect against excessive liberalization and unfair surprise and to lend more predictability to preparation for trial when residual hearsay is to be proffered. Some Courts have interpreted the notice requirement literally, excluding the evidence unless the adversary has been notified before trial of the intent to invoke the residual exception to admit a specific statement. n26 Generally speaking, however, the notice requirement has been applied flexibly in accordance with its intent, which is to prevent surprise and to allow time to prepare to meet the evidence. n27 Under the majority, liberal approach, it is ordinarily possible to satisfy the notice requirement by notifying the adversary during the trial, so long as the adversary has sufficient time to challenge the evidence effectively. Postponing notification until trial may require the granting of a continuance, depending on the circumstances; the Court will also consider whether the delay in notice could have been avoided. n28

There is some dispute among the Courts as to the type of notice that the opponent of the evidence must receive. The Third Circuit holds that the opponent must be notified not only about the evidence itself but also of the proponent's intent to invoke the residual exception. All of the other Circuits that have decided the question appear to hold that the opponent need only be made aware in advance of the existence of the evidence and its potential proffer at trial. The usual fact situation in which this question arises is where the proponent has not even purported to give pretrial notice, and yet the opponent is well aware before trial of the existence of the evidence and its possible proffer at trial, albeit perhaps not under the residual exception.

The minority position is found in United States v. Pelullo, 964 F.2d 193 (3d Cir. 1992) . The Pelullo Court noted that while the Rule could be read to require notice only of the statement itself, the Third Circuit requires specific notice of the proponent's intent to use the residual exception. Here, even though the defendant was given the documents months before trial, there was no specific notice of the government's intent to invoke the residual exception, so the documents were held improperly admitted as residual hearsay. n29

The more common result is that the notice requirement is deemed satisfied when the opponent has received actual notice, before trial, of the existence of the evidence and its possible use at the trial. The reasoning is that under these circumstances, the opponent cannot complain about surprise or inability to prepare. Thus, in United States v. Bachsian, 4 F.3d 796 (9th Cir. 1993) , the Court declared that "failure to give [explicit] pretrial notice will be excused if the adverse party had an opportunity to attack the trustworthiness of the evidence." In Bachsian, the government did not give notice under the residual exception, but the defendant was more generally notified two months before trial that the government intended to use the evidence, and the defendant was given copies. Also, the defendant did not move for a continuance. Under these circumstances, the Court found that the spirit of the notice requirement was met. n30

Query whether the cases finding the notice requirement satisfied whenever the opponent somehow becomes aware of the evidence are consistent with the terms of the Rule. The Rule specifies that the proponent must herself provide notice to the adverse party; these terms would not be met if the opponent, as is often the case, becomes aware of the information other than through the proponent. On the other hand, where the proponent has in fact given some kind of advance notice about the hearsay evidence, but has failed to invoke the residual exception specifically, the Rule is, as the Third Circuit admits, vague as to whether the notice requirement is satisfied.

One consequence of the notice requirement is that an Appellate Court may be unable to admit a statement retroactively as residual hearsay. If the Trial Court admits a hearsay statement under the wrong exception the Appellate Court ordinarily can still affirm the judgment so long as the statement could have been admitted under a different exception. n31 For example, if a hearsay statement is erroneously admitted as an excited utterance, the Court will affirm if the statement could have been admitted as a party-admission. The reasoning is that the non-offering party is not prejudiced. However, there is an exception to this rule where the retroactive use of a theory would deprive the opponent of some argument or protection that could have been used if the theory had been presented below. Such is the case with the residual exception and its notice requirement. Advance notice that would meet the Rule is unlikely to have been given if the statement was not offered at trial as residual hearsay. And notice obviously cannot be given retroactively on appeal. n32

[8] The Residual Exception and the Confrontation Clause

The Supreme Court's cases on the Confrontation Clause were treated in detail in the Editorial Explanatory Comments to Rules 801, 803 and 804. Those same cases are pertinent to the constitutionality of hearsay statements that are found admissible under Rule 807.

As discussed more fully in § 803.02[26], the Court in Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. 56 (1980) , held that hearsay statements are admissible under the Confrontation Clause if they are sufficiently reliable. Reliability is found either by the statement fitting within a firmly rooted hearsay exception, or by a showing that the statement carries particularized guarantees of trustworthiness. The Supreme Court made clear in Idaho v. Wright, 497 U.S. 805 (1990) , that a residual exception is not "firmly rooted." So at least as far as Roberts goes, if residual hearsay is offered against a criminal defendant, and the declarant is not testifying at trial, the trustworthiness analysis for the residual exception is the same as the trustworthiness analysis for the Confrontation Clause -- that is, the inquiry is whether the hearsay statement carries particularized guarantees of trustworthiness sufficient to assure that it is reliable. The Court in Idaho v. Wright, 497 U.S. 805 (1990) , held that this inquiry into particularized guarantees of trustworthiness could not consider independent corroborating evidence supporting the truth of the hearsay statement. Rather, "the relevant circumstances include only those that surround the making of the statement and that render the declarant particularly worthy of belief"; that is, the hearsay "must possess indicia of reliability by virtue of its inherent trustworthiness, not by reference to other evidence at trial."

The Roberts reliability analysis was replaced in part by the Court in Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004) . The Court in Crawford held that the defendant's right to confrontation was violated because uncross-examined "testimonial" hearsay was admitted against him at trial under a state hearsay exception for declarations against interest. Crawford involved a statement made by the defendant's wife to police officers that implicated the defendant and herself. Under the jurisprudence established in Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. 56 (1980) , a hearsay statement satisfies the Confrontation Clause if (1) it fits a "firmly-rooted" hearsay exception, or (2) the statement carries "particularized guarantees of trustworthiness" that assure its reliability. The State Courts found that Mrs. Crawford's statement to police officers satisfied the "particularized guarantees of trustworthiness" prong of Roberts, reasoning that Mrs. Crawford was not trying to shift blame, and that she was relating relatively recent events to a "neutral" police officer.

The Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice Scalia, rejected the Roberts structure for determining whether a hearsay statement satisfies the Confrontation Clause, at least if the hearsay is "testimonial." Justice Scalia engaged in an extensive historical analysis and determined that the original intent of the Confrontation Clause was not to exclude unreliable evidence per se, but rather to exclude "testimonial" evidence that had not been cross-examined by the accused.

The bottom line from Crawford is that "testimonial" hearsay statements cannot be admitted against an accused unless the declarant is unavailable and the accused has or had the opportunity to cross-examine the declarant. Unless these two requirements are met, the "testimonial" hearsay statement must be excluded even if it is clearly reliable and even if it fits into a standard hearsay exception. An example of a statement that would qualify under Crawford is testimony from a prior trial in which the defendant was subject to the same charges, and the witness is unavailable for the subsequent trial.

On the other hand, if the hearsay statement is not "testimonial", the Courts after Crawford have uniformly held that the Roberts test continues to regulate the admissibility of the hearsay. While the Supreme Court in Crawford at least implied that there would be no constitutional regulation for non-testimonial hearsay, and was no fan of the Roberts reliability requirement, the Lower Courts after Crawford has reasoned that Roberts applies to non-testimonial hearsay until the Supreme Court specifically rules otherwise; and it did not so rule in Crawford, which involved only "testimonial" hearsay. n33

So a critical question after Crawford is whether a hearsay statement is "testimonial" or not. Surprisingly, the Supreme Court did not try to define the term "testimonial." The closest the Court came to a definition is set forth in the following passage:

> Various formulations of this core class of "testimonial" statements exist: "ex parte in-court testimony or its functional equivalent -- that is, material such as affidavits, custodial examinations, prior testimony that the defendant was unable to cross-examine, or similar pretrial statements that declarants would reasonably expect to be used prosecutorially," Brief for Petitioner 23; "extrajudicial statements ... contained in formalized testimonial materials, such as affidavits, depositions, prior testimony, or confessions," White v. Illinois, 502 U.S. 346, 365 (1992) (THOMAS, J., joined by SCALIA, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment); "statements that were made under circumstances which would lead an objective witness reasonably to believe that the statement would be available for use at a later trial," Brief for National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers et al. as Amici Curiae 3. These formulations all share a common nucleus and then define the Clause's coverage at various levels of abstraction around it.
>
> **...
>
> ... Whatever else the term ["testimonial"] covers, it applies at a minimum to prior testimony at a preliminary hearing, before a grand jury, or at a former trial; and to police interrogations. These are the modern practices with closest kinship to the abuses at which the Confrontation Clause was directed.

In another part of the opinion, the Court indicated that statements taken at guilty plea allocutions are testimonial:

> Courts have invoked Roberts to admit other sorts of plainly testimonial statements despite the absence of any opportunity to cross-examine. See United States v. Aguilar, 295 F.3d 1018, 1021-1023 (CA9 2002) (plea allocution showing existence of a conspiracy); United States v. Centracchio, 265 F.3d 518, 527-530 (CA7 2001) (same); United States v. Dolah, 245 F.3d 98, 104-105 (CA2 2001) (same); United States v. Petrillo, 237 F.3d 119, 122-123 (CA2 2000) (same).

While the precise definition of "testimonial" is not clear, n34 what is clear is that Crawford provides some limitation on the use of hearsay by the prosecution in federal criminal trials.

The change wrought by Crawford, as applied to statements offered under Rule 807, is likely to be dramatic for certain categories of statements that previously have been admitted routinely as residual hearsay. The most obvious example is grand jury testimony. Before Crawford, Courts had routinely admitted grand jury testimony against the accused on the ground that it was reliable under the circumstances and therefore satisfied the Roberts requirements. But the Court in Crawford makes clear that grand jury testimony is "testimonial." It is clearly "testimony" made in a formal proceeding. As such it cannot be admitted unless the declarant is produced and subject to cross-examination. It does not matter that the grand jury testimony is reliable under the circumstances, as that is no longer the constitutional inquiry under Crawford for testimonial hearsay. So Crawford has swept away a good deal of case law admitting grand jury testimony under the residual exception.

Other possible candidates for exclusion include statements made by children to law enforcement personnel; statements made to police officers by eyewitnesses; testimony that was cross-examined in a prior trial, but one in which the defendant was not a party; and statements made by laboratory personnel concerning forensic testing. If the statement is not testimonial, however, the residual hearsay is screened under the traditional Roberts requirements.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. Advisory Committee Note to Rule 803(24).

(n2)Footnote 2. See, e.g., S. Rep. No. 93-1277, 93d Cong., 2d Sess. 19-20 (1974) ("It is intended that the residual hearsay exceptions will be used very rarely, and only in exceptional circumstances."). See also Rock v. Huffco Gas & Oil Co., 922 F.2d 272 (5th Cir. 1991) (noting that the exception must be used "sparingly," and holding that statements of the deceased concerning the cause of his injury were not sufficiently trustworthy).

(n3)Footnote 3. For a discussion of these cases, see G. Joseph & S. Saltzburg, Evidence In America, ch. 58.

(n4)Footnote 4. The relationship between the residual exception and the right to confrontation of the accused is discussed at the end of this Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 807.02[8].

(n5)Footnote 5. See 120 Cong. Rec. H12255-57 (Dec. 18, 1974).

(n6)Footnote 6. See, e.g., United States v. Valdez-Soto, 31 F.3d 1467 (9th Cir. 1994) (the Trial Court properly admitted, as residual hearsay, the prior inconsistent statements of a prosecution witness; the statements were not admissible under Rule 801(d)(1)(A) because they were not made under oath; the Court rejected the defendants' argument "that Rule 801(d)(1)(A) provides the only test for admission of unsworn prior inconsistent statements as substantive evidence"; the reference in the residual exception to "guarantees of trustworthiness equivalent to those in the enumerated exceptions strongly suggests that almost fitting within one of these exceptions cuts in favor of admission, not against"); United States v. Furst, 886 F.2d 558 (3d Cir. 1989) (the residual exception "is not limited in availability as to types of evidence not addressed in the other exceptions; [it] is also available when the proponent fails to meet the standards set forth in the other exceptions"); Dartez v. Fibreboard Corp., 765 F.2d 456 (5th Cir. 1985) (a deposition was offered against a defendant who was not a party to the litigation in which the deposition was taken; the party who cross-examined the deponent was not a predecessor-in- interest as that term is used in Rule 804(b)(1); however, because the defendant could have added nothing to the cross-examination that did take place, the deposition was admissible under the residual exception, as a "near miss" of the prior testimony exception); United States v. Doe, 860 F.2d 488 (1st Cir. 1988) (telexes and a certificate issued by the Honduran Naval Force, verifying that permission had been granted to board a vessel, were not admissible under Rule 803(6) because no foundation witness had been provided; however, they were admissible as residual hearsay because they were normal and regular, similar to business records); Turbyfill v. International Harvester Co., 486 F. Supp. 232 (E.D. Mich. 1980) (a statement that failed to meet the requirements of Rule 803(5) because the preparer of the record was not available to testify was admitted as residual hearsay on "near miss" grounds).

(n7)Footnote 7. See, e.g., United States v. Laster, 258 F.3d 525 (6th Cir. 2001) (business records were not admissible under Rule 803(6) because the foundation witness was not sufficiently familiar with recordkeeping; but there was no error in admitting the records under the residual exception; "the phrase 'specifically covered' means only that if a statement is admissible under one of the exceptions, such subsection should be relied upon instead of the residual exception").

(n8)Footnote 8. The use of corroborative evidence to establish the trustworthiness of residual hearsay in criminal cases has been complicated by Confrontation Clause jurisprudence, and is discussed in a subsequent section. See the discussion in § 807.02[8].

(n9)Footnote 9. See, e.g., United States v. Morgan, 385 F.3d 196 (2d Cir. 2004) (letter written by a codefendant to her boyfriend was properly admitted against the defendant; it was sufficiently trustworthy because it was written to an intimate acquaintance in the privacy of the codefendant's hotel room, with no expectation that it would ever find its way to the police).

(n10)Footnote 10. See, e.g., United States v. Wilkus, 875 F.2d 649 (7th Cir. 1989) (an affidavit signed while the declarant was under heavy medication, and as to which the declarant had no memory at the time of trial, was insufficiently trustworthy to qualify as residual hearsay). See also United States v. Lawrence, 349 F.3d 109 (3d Cir. 2003) (victim's identification of someone other than the defendant as the perpetrator was properly excluded; the victim had been severely injured and was capable of only blinks and nods; thus the "statement" was potentially ambiguous and untrustworthy).

(n11)Footnote 11. See, e.g., United States v. Brothers Constr. Co., 219 F.3d 300 (4th Cir. 2000) (grand jury testimony could not be admitted under the residual exception; the government offered the testimony and yet had begun an independent criminal investigation to determine whether the declarant had committed perjury in his grand jury testimony; the fact that the suspected perjury was on a different point than the portion proffered by the government at trial did not render it reliable; the Court expressed "serious reservations about the reliability of testimony which, at least in part, the government finds so untrustworthy that it would consider bringing perjury charges"); United States v. Hall, 165 F.3d 1095 (7th Cir. 1999) (confession of another person could not be admitted on the defendant's behalf as residual hearsay; the declarant "confessed to any crime he was questioned about by the police" and thus was untrustworthy).

(n12)Footnote 12. See, e.g., United States v. York, 852 F.2d 221, 226 (7th Cir. 1988) (where the declarant answered affirmatively to every question asked by the United States Attorney, trustworthiness could not be found: "Apparently, not even a single placebo question was amongst the lot to ensure that Tommy was considering the substance of each question and answering responsively, rather than simply agreeing with every question that the government posed.").

(n13)Footnote 13. See, e.g., United States v. York, 852 F.2d 221, 226 (7th Cir. 1988) (a statement was not trustworthy where the declarant recanted).

(n14)Footnote 14. See, e.g., United States v. Dunford, 148 F.3d 385 (4th Cir. 1998) (statements by daughters accusing their father of abuse were properly admitted as residual hearsay; indicia of trustworthiness were present because the girls told different people the same story at different times: "The serious nature of the repeated statements made by the children to government officials as well as the consistency of their stories to those officials provide clear indicia of the trustworthiness of their statements."). Compare United States v. Sinclair, 74 F.3d 753 (7th Cir. 1996) (a statement offered by the defendant as residual hearsay was properly excluded, in part because of the great lapse of time between the declarant's statement and the events described and in part because the statement was inconsistent with prior statements made by the declarant to the FBI).

(n15)Footnote 15. See, e.g., United States v. Bradley, 145 F.3d 889 (7th Cir. 1998) (statement by the defendant's wife that the defendant brandished a gun at her was properly admitted as residual hearsay; among other things, the declarant was distraught when she made the statement, and this was "consistent with the trauma she described").

(n16)Footnote 16. See, e.g., Braun v. Lorillard Inc., 84 F.3d 230 (7th Cir. 1996) (the Trial Judge properly excluded testimony relating statements made by a deceased declarant who was hired by the defendant cigarette manufacturer in 1954 to examine Kent cigarettes under an electron microscope; there was no documentary evidence of her study, but a journalist who interviewed the declarant and the declarant's son would have testified that the declarant said that she reported to the manufacturer that the Kent filters leaked asbestos into the lungs; the statements were made years after the work had been done and therefore were not sufficiently reliable to qualify as residual hearsay); United States v. York, 852 F.2d 221, 226 (7th Cir. 1988) (a statement about events occurring five years earlier was insufficiently trustworthy). Compare United States v. Bradley, 145 F.3d 889 (7th Cir. 1998) (statement by the defendant's wife that the defendant brandished a gun at her was properly admitted as residual hearsay; the statement was made two hours after the event, so the "episode was therefore fresh in her mind").

(n17)Footnote 17. See, e.g., United States v. Sanchez-Lima, 161 F.3d 545 (9th Cir. 1998) (statements made by aliens to Border Patrol officers should have been admitted as residual hearsay; among other things, the statements were made under oath). See also Hal Roach Studios v. Richard Feiner & Co., 896 F.2d 1542 (9th Cir. 1990) (S-1 registration statement filed with Securities Exchange Commission held admissible as residual hearsay to prove the corporate history of the plaintiff; "The standard of due diligence applied by securities lawyers with regard to Registration Statements is sufficient to guarantee the requisite circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness.").

(n18)Footnote 18. See, e.g., United States v. Walker, 410 F.3d 754 (5th Cir. 2005) (no error in excluding a videotaped statement to police officers made by an associate of the defendant, in which she categorically denied that the defendant had brought any drugs into a room; the declarant "was in a room with a lot of cocaine," and was not under oath; she was facing the threat of criminal charges and "had every incentive to lie."); Kirk v. Raymark Indus., Inc., 61 F.3d 147 (3d Cir. 1995) (the Trial Court erred in admitting, as residual hearsay, interrogatory responses from a codefendant who had settled; the responses, which denied liability, were offered by the plaintiff to rebut the non-settling defendant's contention that the plaintiff's injury was solely caused by the settling defendant; the interrogatory responses were not sufficiently trustworthy, because they were made while the declarant was still a defendant in the litigation and "had every incentive to set forth the facts in a light most favorable to itself"); Wilander v. McDermott Int'l, Inc., 887 F.2d 88 (5th Cir. 1989) (a statement was not admissible as residual hearsay where it was later contradicted by the declarant and where it appeared to have been prepared in anticipation of litigation).

(n19)Footnote 19. See, e.g., United States v. Doerr, 886 F.2d 944 (7th Cir. 1989) ("Another indicium of reliability is the declarant's disinterest; the testimony of a mere bystander with no axe to grind tends to be more trustworthy."); Dogan v. Hardy, 587 F. Supp. 967 (N.D. Miss. 1984) (the Court held inadmissible in a personal injury action a self-serving statement by the driver of a car, made while he was hospitalized).

(n20)Footnote 20. See, e.g., United States v. Sinclair, 74 F.3d 753 (7th Cir. 1996) (a hearsay statement offered by the defendant as residual hearsay was properly excluded, in part because the defendant did not seek to fly the declarant to the trial to testify in person); Larez v. City of Los Angeles, 946 F.2d 630 (9th Cir. 1991) (newspaper reports of a disputed quotation were trustworthy because the reports were identical; however, the reports were not admissible as residual hearsay because the newspaper reporters were available to testify and would have provided better evidence of the statements); Polansky v. CNA Ins. Co., 852 F.2d 626 (1st Cir. 1988) (a letter prepared by the plaintiff as to his understanding of a certain transaction was not the most probative evidence reasonably available since the plaintiff could have testified about these matters on the stand).

(n21)Footnote 21. See, e.g., United States v. Azure, 801 F.2d 336 (8th Cir. 1986) (in a second trial on the same matter, where the witness testified in the first trial, an out-of-court statement by that witness could not be admitted as residual hearsay; if the witness were available for the second trial, her in-court testimony would be as probative as the residual hearsay; if the witness were not available at the second trial, her prior testimony at the first trial would be as probative as the residual hearsay; therefore, the "more probative" requirement of the Rule would not be met).

(n22)Footnote 22. See, e.g., United States v. Dorian, 803 F.2d 1439 (8th Cir. 1986) (where the child was frightened and uncommunicative on the stand, her residual hearsay statement was more probative); United States v. St. John, 851 F.2d 1096 (8th Cir. 1988) (child-witness was hampered by developmental problems, and his verbal abilities were overcome by the courtroom setting and the delicate nature of the material to which he was attesting; "Under these circumstances, we are unwilling to hold that a child victim's testimony is always more probative than the prior hearsay statements he or she may have made in the more relaxed environs of a doctor's or social worker's office.").

(n23)Footnote 23. See, e.g., FTC v. Figgie Int'l, Inc., 994 F.2d 595 (9th Cir. 1993) (letters of complaint sent to the FTC from customers of the seller of heat detectors were admissible as residual hearsay to establish the price of the detectors; the letters were sufficiently trustworthy because they were sent independently from many, unrelated members of the public, and all of the letters were basically identical in their assertions; the letters were the most probative evidence reasonably available, since it was obviously not reasonable to require the proponent to produce all the letter-writers for in-court testimony); FTC v. Amy Travel Serv., 875 F.2d 564, 576 (7th Cir. 1989) (thousands of consumer affidavits were properly admitted under the residual exception as the most probative evidence reasonably available: "The defendants ran a nation-wide telemarketing operation and it would be cumbersome and unnecessarily expensive to bring all the consumers in for live testimony.").

(n24)Footnote 24. Hal Roach Studios v. Richard Feiner & Co., 896 F.2d 1542, 1552 (9th Cir. 1990) .

(n25)Footnote 25. United States v. Welsh, 774 F.2d 670, 672 (4th Cir. 1985) (a hearsay statement was not more probative than the in-court testimony of another eyewitness, even though the hearsay declarant was a trustworthy person and the in-court witness's credibility was subject to attack).

(n26)Footnote 26. See, e.g., Kirk v. Raymark Indus., Inc., 61 F.3d 147 (3d Cir. 1995) (Trial Court erred in admitting, as residual hearsay, interrogatory responses from a codefendant who had settled; the plaintiff never gave the defendant notice that she intended to introduce this evidence under the residual exception); United States v. Furst, 886 F.2d 558 (3d Cir. 1989) (notice given one day prior to the introduction of residual hearsay is insufficient, and the statement was inadmissible as a result); United States v. Ruffin, 575 F.2d 346 (2d Cir. 1978) (rejecting a good cause defense for the failure to provide pretrial notice). See also United States v. Coney, 51 F.3d 164 (8th Cir. 1995) (residual hearsay inadmissible where the defendant failed to meet the notice requirement of the Rule; she offered the report during the trial, only 45 minutes before she wanted to introduce it).

(n27)Footnote 27. See, e.g., United States v. Doe, 860 F.2d 488 (1st Cir. 1988) (collecting cases adopting the majority view that the notice requirement will not preclude admission where the adversary has not been prejudiced).

(n28)Footnote 28. See, e.g., United States v. Baker, 985 F.2d 1248 (4th Cir. 1993) (where the need for rebuttal evidence did not become apparent until trial, and the rebuttal witness disappeared after the government announced it was offering rebuttal evidence, the witness' trustworthy statement was properly admitted as residual hearsay and pretrial notice was wholly impracticable and properly dispensed with); United States v. Doe, 860 F.2d 488 (1st Cir. 1988) (the notice requirement was satisfied where the government did not learn about the existence of evidence until the trial, and the defendant was offered a continuance to prepare for the statement).

(n29)Footnote 29. See also Kirk v. Raymark Indus., Inc., 61 F.3d 147 (3d Cir. 1995) ("[T]he proponent must give notice of the hearsay statement itself as well as the proponent's intention specifically to rely on the rule as a grounds for admissibility of the statement.").

(n30)Footnote 30. See also United States v. Munoz, 16 F.3d 1116 (11th Cir. 1994) (defendants knew about the statements, but did not know of the intent to offer them under the residual exception: "There is no particular form of notice required under the rule. As long as the party against whom the document is offered has notice of its existence and the proponent's intention to introduce it -- and thus has an opportunity to counter it and protect himself against surprise -- the rule's notice requirement is satisfied.").

(n31)Footnote 31. See Daniel Capra, Upholding Rulings on Grounds Not Used by the Trial Court, N.Y.L.J., Jan. 12, 1990, at 3, col. 1.

(n32)Footnote 32. See, e.g., United States v. Pelullo, 964 F.2d 193 (3d Cir. 1992) (records erroneously admitted as business records at trial cannot be retroactively held admissible on appeal as residual hearsay; because the records were not offered under the residual exception at trial, the defendant never received notice in accordance with the Rule, and the Trial Court never made the predicate findings required by that Rule). Compare United States v. Nivica, 887 F.2d 1110 (1st Cir. 1989) (government gave notice that the statement would be offered as residual hearsay, but the Trial Court admitted the hearsay under the business records exception; the Appellate Court held that the hearsay was not admissible as a business record, but could have been admitted under the residual exception; the judgment was affirmed, because the government had in fact complied with the notice requirement of the residual exception).

(n33)Footnote 33. See, e.g., Horton v. Allen, 370 F.3d 75 (1st Cir. 2004) (non-testimonial hearsay should be evaluated under the Ohio v. Roberts test to determine whether it violates the defendant's right to confrontation); United States v. Holmes, 406 F.3d 337 (5th Cir. 2005) (with respect to nontestimonial hearsay statements, "Crawford leaves in place the Roberts approach to determining admissibility."); United States v. Franklin, 415 F.3d 537 (6th Cir. 2005) ("the Supreme Court did not explicitly overrule its prior Confrontation Clause jurisprudence with its holding in Crawford" insofar as it applied to nontestimonial hearsay; "Consequently, with respect to non-testimonial hearsay statements, Roberts and its progeny remain the controlling precedents.").

(n34)Footnote 34. The Court may provide a further indication of what it means by "testimonial" in the 2005-6 Term, as it has granted certiorari in two state cases involving the admissibility of 911 calls and reports to police officers after Crawford.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
CHAPTER 807 RULE 807

4-807 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 807.03

807.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Agency Proceedings

NLRB v. United San. Serv., 737 F.2d 936 (11th Cir. 1984) : The Court held that an ALJ erred in admitting an affidavit by a former employee who had died before the hearing, which described events concerning the unfair labor practice charge at issue in great detail. Treating the hearsay rules as governing, the Court noted that "the burden is on the party seeking to invoke the residual exception to clearly demonstrate the existence of the requisite guarantees of trustworthiness," and it found that the Board had not met the burden. The fact that the affidavit was consistent with some other evidence was not enough, especially since the affidavit contained important statements not plainly supported by corroborative evidence.

[2] Availability of Equally Probative Evidence

[a] Civil Cases

De Mars v. Equitable Life Assurance Soc'y, 610 F.2d 55 (1st Cir. 1979) : Although it upheld a plaintiff's judgment in a suit to recover accidental death benefits, the Court noted that a letter of a deceased physician hired by the plaintiff should not have been admitted under the residual exception. The exception is to be read narrowly, and another expert could have been retained and would have produced at least equally probative evidence.

Parsons v. Honeywell, Inc., 929 F.2d 901 (2d Cir. 1991) : In a product liability action arising out of a gas explosion, the defendants offered a police report containing a statement from an eyewitness recounting the plaintiff's statement that he smelled gas and "shouldn't have lit it up." The police report would be admissible as a public record and the plaintiff's statement would be admissible as an excited utterance, but the Court held the witness' statement could not come within the residual exception because the witness apparently could testify in person.

Copperweld Steel Co. v. Demag-Mannesmann-Bohler, 578 F.2d 953 (3d Cir. 1978) : In a purchaser's action against a manufacturer, the Court found no error in the admission of a memorandum prepared by the plaintiff's attorney containing his recollection of an interview with the former executive vice president of the plaintiff's steel division. This memorandum was not admissible as an admission of the plaintiff, because the executive vice president was no longer an employee or agent of the plaintiff when he made the statements to the attorney, but the Trial Judge admitted it under the residual exception, finding that: there was no reason to doubt its truth, the former vice president reviewed the memorandum and adopted it as his statement, and it was more probative than any other evidence available.

Page v. Barko Hydraulics, 673 F.2d 134 (5th Cir. 1982) : In a negligence action arising from the plaintiff's son's death when he was engulfed in flames while operating equipment manufactured by the defendant, the defendant offered the plaintiff's deposition relating what her son said in the hospital about the accident. Because there were other, better witnesses available, the Court concluded that it would have been better to have excluded the son's statement, but it declined to find reversible error.

Eisenstadt v. Centel Corp., 113 F.3d 738 (7th Cir. 1997) : In a securities fraud action based in part on statements by the corporation reported in a newspaper article, the Court held that the article was not admissible under the residual exception, since the plaintiffs easily could have obtained the reporter's affidavit or deposed him and the article was not free from ambiguity. In a negligence action brought by a truck driver against a forklift operator, Abernathy v. Superior Hardwoods, Inc., n1 the Court found no error in the rejection of testimony by a private investigator, offered to rebut the plaintiff's claim that he had been rejected for employment by Ryder Truck Lines, that the investigator had gone to Ryder's headquarters and had looked through job applications and had not found the plaintiff's name. Even though Ryder's custodian of records was outside the 100-mile subpoena range, the custodian could have been deposed and the deposition could have laid the basis for the introduction of the records if the custodian was unwilling to appear at trial. Since better evidence was available, the defendant could not rely on the residual exception.

Stokes v. City of Omaha, 23 F.3d 1362 (8th Cir. 1994) : In an age discrimination case brought by a police officer, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to admit a two-paragraph affidavit from a former deputy chief who died before trial, which stated that he had heard the chief of police mention that he wanted to "weed out" older officers. The affidavit did not fall "within the rare and exceptional circumstances required by our cases applying [the residual exception]," since the affiant's death before the time of trial had not been unexpected, and therefore the plaintiff should have deposed him. Furthermore, the chief of police could have been called to testify. Affirming a judgment for the defendants in a suit alleging racial discrimination in promotion, Netterville v. State of Missouri, n2 the Court held that testimony by a witness that he had been told that another person had coached a successful candidate for promotion was properly excluded. Since the alleged coach was present to testify, the out-of-court statement was not admissible for its truth.

Larez v. City of Los Angeles, 946 F.2d 630 (9th Cir. 1991) : In a civil rights action brought against police officers, the chief of police, and the City arising out of the officers' use of excessive force during a search, newspaper reports quoted the chief as saying after he testified that one of the plaintiffs was lucky that a broken nose was all he had suffered. The Court held that where three independent newspapers attributed the same quotations to the chief, they had circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness, but because the newspaper reporters would have provided better evidence of the statements and would have been subject to cross-examination, it was reversible error to admit the statements.

Noble v. Alabama Dep't of Environmental Mgt., 872 F.2d 361 (11th Cir. 1989) : The Court found error (but harmless) in the admission on behalf of the defendant in an employment discrimination suit of a letter from the defendant's director to another state employee, which addressed the defendant's concern that certain engineering graduates were not qualified for certain jobs, and other letters supporting the defendant's evaluation of the capabilities of these graduates. No showing was made that the writers of the letters were unavailable to testify.

[b] Availability of Equally Probative Evidence -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Patrick, 248 F.3d 11 (1st Cir. 2001) : In a RICO prosecution, the defendant argued that portions of a search warrant affidavit concerning the timing of certain events, which would have contradicted testimony from some of the government witnesses, should have been admitted as residual hearsay. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding the affidavit, since the defendant could have called as a witness any officer whose conduct was described in the affidavit, and thus the hearsay was not more probative than any other evidence reasonably available.

United States v. Gotti, 641 F. Supp. 283 (E.D.N.Y. 1986) : In a racketeering case, the Trial Judge held that he would not admit evidence concerning a murder victim's statements to third parties concerning threats made by one defendant, since the government had at least equally probative evidence to show that the defendants had a motive to kill the victim.

United States v. Simmons, 773 F.2d 1455 (4th Cir. 1985) : The Court affirmed firearms convictions, finding that trade forms of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms used to prove the interstate commerce element of the offenses were properly admitted under the residual exception. An ATF agent testified that ATF contacts a manufacturer and requests its records custodian to fill out the form. Reasoning that it was not reasonable to require the government to bring records custodians to testify from all over the country, the Court found that "there is simply no reason for the manufacturers of these weapons to falsify the entries on the routine ATF forms." A dissenting Judge argued that the assumption that a manufacturer will obey the law is not the kind of reliability contemplated by the drafters of the exception and that the evidence was not more probative than other available evidence. He reasoned that the exception is to be used only in exceptional circumstances, not whenever the government finds it to be convenient. In United States v. Welsh, n3 the Court affirmed a ruling that three written statements given to the FBI by a suspect who entered into a plea agreement before committing suicide were inadmissible under the residual exception in a prosecution for interstate transportation of stolen property. The government had another witness available to testify, but claimed that this witness lacked credibility. A majority of the Court rejected the argument that doubts about the credibility of a witness available for cross-examination warranted admission of hearsay statements by an unavailable witness. In United States v. Heyward, n4 the Court sustained a conviction for income tax evasion, holding there was no error in excluding a memorandum found in the files of a deceased attorney who had handled the affairs of an estate of a third party. The defendant claimed that he received money from this third party, although the third party's wife, business partner, and accountant testified that the third party did not have access to the amount of money the defendant claimed to have received. The Court noted that the residual exception is to be used only in "exceptional circumstances" and found them lacking in the instant case. Other equally probative evidence existed.

United States v. Mathis, 559 F.2d 294 (5th Cir. 1977) : In the course of an investigation into firearms offenses, the government learned that the defendant's wife had evidence of his criminal activity. After the couple was divorced, agents interviewed the wife and obtained statements. Subsequently, the former wife was offered money and was threatened in an effort by the defendant to force a remarriage. Before the remarriage took place, she testified before the grand jury and repeated her incriminating statements. At the time of trial the couple was again married and the wife indicated that she did not wish to testify against her husband, although she said that if the government called her to the stand and asked her questions she would answer them truthfully. Concerned for the woman's health and safety, the Trial Judge excused her from testifying and permitted two agents who took her statement to testify about it. The Court reversed, finding that the woman was not unavailable. She had said that if ordered to testify she would do so, and with the implicit determination that the second marriage was a sham, the Trial Judge was not bound to respect any claim of privilege. Given her availability, it was improper to rely on the residual exception, since "[t]he live testimony of the available witness, whose demeanor the jury would have been able to observe and whose testimony would have been subject to cross-examination, would have been of more probative value in establishing the truth than the bare statements transcribed by the ... agents."

United States v. Sinclair, 74 F.3d 753 (7th Cir. 1996) : The Court affirmed the conviction of a bank officer for taking kickbacks, holding that a hearsay statement offered by the defendant as residual hearsay was properly excluded, in part because the defendant did not seek to fly the declarant to the trial to testify in person. The Court distinguished its prior decision in FTC v. Amy Travel Serv., Inc., n5 which upheld a decision to admit affidavits of witnesses spread all over the country, noting that Amy Travel "does not establish a general rule applicable to all situations involving distant witnesses."

United States v. Gabe, 237 F.3d 954 (8th Cir. 2001) : In a prosecution for sexual abuse of a minor, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit under Rule 803(4) and the residual exception a hearsay statement by the victim to a doctor that identified the defendant as the perpetrator. As to the residual exception, the Court noted that the victim's hearsay statement was "cumulative" of her own in-court testimony, and therefore it did not satisfy the requirement that the hearsay must be more probative than any other evidence on the point. In a prosecution for possession of stolen property, United States v. Calkins, 906 F.2d 1240 (8th Cir. 1990) , the Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in admitting under the residual exception testimony that the witness' grandmother had made statements asserting ownership over the property, even though there were insurance policies issued on the property that also would have indicated its ownership. In United States v. Fredericks, n6 a defendant charged with assault with a dangerous weapon offered hearsay statements of a witness who was unavailable at the time of trial. The Court upheld a ruling excluding the evidence, because the missing witness had a possible motive to make a statement favorable to the defendant, and because there was better evidence available -- i.e., other eyewitnesses' testimony.

[3] Cautionary Instructions

United States v. Medico, 557 F.2d 309 (2d Cir. 1977) : At the trial of a bank robbery, a bank employee testified that about five minutes after the robbers had fled with the bank funds, a bank customer knocked on the door and relayed information from another person whom the employee did not know, but who was sitting in a car outside the door, concerning the make and license plate number of the getaway car. Another witness testified that he had seen the defendant driving a car with the same license plate number. The Trial Judge admitted the evidence under the residual exception and advised the jury that it was hearsay that must be examined with the thought in mind that neither the bank customer nor the person who supplied the license plate number and description of the car was subject to cross-examination or under oath at the time he relayed information. The Court affirmed.

[4] Children's Statements

[a] Admissible

United States v. Ellis, 935 F.2d 385 (1st Cir. 1991) : Affirming a conviction for interstate transportation of a minor to engage in illegal sexual activity, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony by a social worker that, when playing with anatomically correct dolls, the victim's younger half-sister spontaneously took the hand of the adult male doll and put it into the vaginal opening of the female doll. That the child was never asked to reenact a situation but only given the dolls to play with, that the witness asked virtually no questions of the child, and that the child gave a negative answer to the later question of whether the defendant asked her to touch his penis all provided strong indicia of trustworthiness.

Doe v. United States, 976 F.2d 1071 (7th Cir. 1992) : In a Federal Tort Claims Act case brought after children were allegedly sexually molested at an Air Force base day care center, the Court held that statements by two three-year-olds to their parents were properly admitted under the Rule, where the core of their stories remained consistent over time, the children volunteered specific information when asked general, nonleading questions, and one child became agitated and uncomfortable when discussing the incident.

United States v. NB, 59 F.3d 771 (8th Cir. 1995) : The Court held there was no error in admitting, in the prosecution of a juvenile for sexual abuse of two nieces, statements that the seven-year-old victims made to social workers regarding the separate incidents. The social workers were well trained and were strangers to the girls; the girls were very young (lessening motivation concerns) and used age-appropriate language; the interviewers used open-ended techniques; one of the interviews took place shortly after the incident; and the girls' stories were essentially consistent. One Judge dissented, arguing, inter alia, that even though there was no Confrontation Clause issue because the girls testified, corroboration is irrelevant to a statement's reliability. In United States v. Grooms, n7 the Court affirmed a conviction for abusive sexual contact with three nine-year-old girls, holding that an FBI agent's testimony recounting statements made by the girls at their school was more probative than the girls' in-court testimony because it contained specific descriptions of the incidents, including the dates and place of abuse; furthermore, the girls testified they remembered the events more clearly when they spoke with the agent than at the time of trial. The statements had sufficient circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness, including that they were made to an agent with special training in interviewing child victims, they were responsive to open-ended rather than leading questions, there was nothing to suggest the girls were likely to have fabricated their stories, they identified and marked anatomically correct drawings during their interviews and discussed the incidents of sexual abuse in a childlike way, and the girls were subject to extensive cross-examination at trial. In United States v. Spotted War Bonnet, n8 the Court affirmed the defendant's conviction for sexual abuse of his daughters, holding that there had been no abuse of discretion in admitting statements by the four- and six-year-old victims to a psychologist and social worker about acts committed on them by the defendant, given the girls' unwillingness or inability to testify fully about the details. The dissenting Judge said that the statements' trustworthiness had been severely undermined by the declarants' youth, the fact one had been abused by an uncle, suggestive and manipulative use of anatomically correct dolls, and psychological coercion and suggestive methods in the interviews. See also United States v. Shaw n9(holding the victim's statements to an interviewer admissible under the residual exception; the statements were more probative than the victim's trial testimony, because they were made just days after the last incidents, included specific dates that the victim could not remember, and were the first known statements made by the young victim); United States v. Renville n10(a child victim's statements to a deputy sheriff were held admissible where she testified at trial, admitted making the statements, made similar statements to others, and later recanted).

United States v. Harrison, 296 F.3d 994 (10th Cir. 2002) : Affirming convictions for sexual abuse of a child, the Court upheld the admission, under Rule 807, of a hearsay statement by the victim to an FBI agent. Although the victim recanted the statement when testifying at trial, the Court emphasized the consistency of her three hearsay statements, one of which was admissible as made to a doctor under Rule 803(4), and one of which was adopted by the defendant. The Court opined that "[t]he specificity and peculiarity of C.V.'s account to [FBI Agent] Amman are also relevant because those features in themselves can suggest trustworthiness." Carefully applying the three conditions of Rule 807, the Court noted in connection with the "interests of justice" requirement, that the victim's recantation "increased the value to the prosecution of her statements at the same time that it afforded Defendant the equivalent of a devastating cross-examination regarding her statements (what more can the cross-examiner hope for than a recantation?)." In United States v. Farley, 992 F.2d 1122 (10th Cir. 1993) , the Court affirmed a conviction for aggravated assault on a child, holding that statements by the victim to her mother the night of the assault and the next morning were properly admitted under the residual exception and might have been admitted as excited utterances.

[b] Children's Statements -- Error To Admit

United States v. Azure, 845 F.2d 1503 (8th Cir. 1988) : The Court found that it was error (but harmless) to have admitted testimony of a social worker that the ten-year-old sexual abuse victim told her that the defendant was her assailant.

United States v. Tome, 61 F.3d 1446 (10th Cir. 1995) : On remand after the Supreme Court held that hearsay statements made when the declarant had a motive to falsify could not be admitted as prior consistent statements (see the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 801, § 801.02[4][c]), the Court held that statements by the child sexual abuse victim identifying the defendant, made to a Child Protective Services caseworker, were not admissible under Rule 803(4), because the caseworker did not diagnose or treat the child, and were not admissible under the residual exception, because they were not especially trustworthy. The statements were not spontaneous, since the child knew she had been brought to the caseworker to tell "what [defendant] had done to her"; they were made more than a year after the events described; and the child had a motive to fabricate, since she wanted to remain with her mother rather than being returned to her father's custody.

[5] Constitutional Concerns

Idaho v. Wright, 497 U.S. 805 (1990) : The Court held that statements admitted under the state residual hearsay exception, which had been made by the victim in a child sex abuse prosecution to a specialist examining her, did not satisfy the then-applicable Confrontation Clause requirement of particularized guarantees of trustworthiness. We note that under Crawford v. Washington the first question would be whether the statements were "testimonial." If they were, the statement would be inadmissible because the victim did not testify at trial. If not, the statement would still be inadmissible under the Ohio v. Roberts analysis, which the Court applied in Wright. See the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 807.02[8].

United States v. Valdez-Soto, 31 F.3d 1467 (9th Cir. 1994) : In a narcotics prosecution, prior inconsistent statements of a government witness, not made under oath, were admitted under the residual exception, in part because they were heavily corroborated. The Court found no confrontation violation under the then-applicable Ohio v. Roberts analysis. We note that the result would not change under Crawford v. Washington, as the witness was available for cross-examination.

[6] Consumer Complaints

FTC v. Kuykendall, 312 F.3d 1329 (10th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed findings in a civil contempt proceeding that the defendants had violated an injunction regulating their telemarketing businesses, and found no abuse of discretion in the admission under the residual hearsay exception of numerous consumer declarations and complaints filed with the FTC. Since all were made under oath subject to penalty of perjury, they had circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness, and " 'reasonable efforts' could not have produced more probative evidence under the circumstances of the hearing."

[7] Error To Exclude

Moffett v. McCauley, 724 F.2d 581 (7th Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed a judgment for prison officials in a civil rights suit by an inmate, but it found error in the exclusion of a prison report. One of the few cases in which a Court of Appeals has found error in the rejection of evidence offered under a residual exception, it illustrates the not uncommon situation in which reliance on a categorical exception (in this case, Rule 808(8)(C)) would require less foundation and lead to the same result.

[8] Examples of Residual Hearsay

[a] Civil Cases

Bohler-Uddeholm America, Inc. v. Ellwood Group, Inc., 247 F.3d 79 (3d Cir. 2001) : Affirming most of a judgment for a former joint venturer against others involved in the joint venture, the Court found no error in the admission of portions of an affidavit given by a since-deceased former president of the plaintiff company. The case involved claims of breach of contract and breach of fiduciary duties. Although the Court agreed with the defendants that "Rule 807 should only be used in rare situations," it relied upon the Trial Judge's "careful and extensive findings in support of its conclusion that this was such a situation."

[b] Examples of Residual Hearsay -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Iaconetti, 406 F. Supp. 554 (E.D.N.Y. 1976) , aff'd, 540 F.2d 574 (2d Cir. 1976) : In a bribery case, the chief prosecution witness, an officer of a corporation seeking a government contract, testified that the defendant had said no contract could be awarded unless a bribe was paid. The defendant denied the conversation, saying it was the officer who offered the bribe. In rebuttal, the government introduced two witnesses who testified that the officer reported to them on the same day as the alleged bribe request that the defendant had solicited a bribe. The Trial Judge found the evidence highly reliable because the declarant was available for cross-examination and the statement was made close on the heels of the criminal event to persons with whom it was appropriate and even necessary to communicate, and the risks of insincerity and faulty memory were not substantial. The Court affirmed admission of the testimony under the residual exception.

United States v. Vretta, 790 F.2d 651 (7th Cir. 1986) : Affirming a kidnapping conviction, the Court upheld the introduction of evidence of statements by the victim relating threats by the defendant. It held that these statements were admissible under the residual exception, where the victim had been killed, the threats were reported by the victim to disinterested third parties, circumstantial evidence corroborated the evidence (though this factor was subsequently held irrelevant as a constitutional matter in Wright), and the defendant had told the victim's wife that terrible things would happen if his money were not returned by the victim.

United States v. Bachsian, 4 F.3d 796 (9th Cir. 1993) : Affirming a defendant's convictions for possession of stolen goods, the Court held that shipping documents relating to a stolen container of goods were admissible under the residual exception as trustworthy and the most probative evidence available.

United States v. Treff, 924 F.2d 975 (10th Cir. 1991) : The defendant's conviction for an attempt to kill his former supervisor at the IRS was affirmed, the Court holding there was no error in admitting entries from a diary kept by the defendant's late wife. The diary, kept on advice of the wife's counsel when the parties were having marital difficulties, had circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness.

[9] Foreign Documents

United States v. Marsh, 747 F.2d 7 (1st Cir. 1984) : In a marijuana conspiracy prosecution involving a ship of Danish registry, the Court upheld the admission under the residual exception of documents evidencing Denmark's consent to the prosecution of the defendants by the United States.

United States v. Wilson, 249 F.3d 366 (5th Cir. 2001) : Affirming money laundering convictions, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting records of a foreign bank under the residual exception. Apparently, the residual exception was used because a satisfactory foundation could not be provided for admission under Rule 803(6). In United States v. Loalza-Vasquez, n11 the Court affirmed convictions on drug importation-related charges, and upheld the admission as residual hearsay of testimony by a Coast Guard Commander as to how he was advised by a series of teletype messages that the government of Panama had authorized the boarding of a ship of Panamanian registry. The Panamanian official who gave boarding permission was outside the subpoena power of the United States and there was no nonhearsay alternative way to prove permission. The teletype messages "reflected the attainment and transmittal through diplomatic channels of the foreign government's authorization," no issue was raised as to the verity of the substantive content of the teletypes, and pretrial notice had been given to the defendants of the government's intent to use the teletypes.

Branca v. Security Benefit Life Ins. Co., 773 F.2d 1158 (1985) , modified on other grounds, 789 F.2d 1151 (11th Cir. 1986) : In an action by beneficiaries to recover on a life insurance policy, the Court affirmed the admission of an Argentine judicial decree of "presumptive death" under the residual exception.

[10] Foundation

Karme v. Commissioner, 673 F.2d 1062 (9th Cir. 1982) : After ruling that certain records from a Netherlands Antilles bank were inadmissible as business records because of the absence of foundation testimony by a custodian, the Court sustained a ruling admitting them under the residual exception. In our view, before admitting such records the Trial Judge should have required more of a foundation than the testimony of an FBI agent who microfilmed the documents. At a minimum the government should have obtained the affidavit of a bank official to indicate how the particular records were made and kept. All that the FBI agent could say was that he was careful in copying the records. He could not explain the nature of the records or how the bank used them.

United States v. Sutton, 795 F.2d 1040 (Temp. Emer. Ct. App. 1986) : Affirming a judgment for the United States in a restitution action against crude oil resellers, the Court held that documents obtained from third parties who transacted business with the resellers were properly admitted under the residual exception to prove sales, where the resellers failed to maintain records required by law and the documents were supported by interrogatories sent by the government to several third parties.

[11] Government Custom

United States v. Cowley, 720 F.2d 1037 (9th Cir. 1983) : In a prosecution for making false statements to a grand jury, the Court found that testimony by the managing director of a bank in Anguilla that he had received two letters, one of which bore a Santa Barbara postmark, was properly admitted. The Court reasoned that the postmark was hearsay when used to prove that a letter passed through a certain post office on a certain day, but that "the postmark's circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness make it a perfect candidate for [the residual exception]." Although the Court recognized that the residual exception could not be utilized where no notice had been given, it found the admission of the testimony to be harmless error.

[12] Grand Jury Testimony -- Offered by Prosecution

United States v. Vigoa, 656 F. Supp. 1499 (D.N.J. 1987) , aff'd, 857 F.2d 1467 (3d Cir. 1988) : The Court denied the government's motion to admit grand jury testimony of a deceased witness in a narcotics prosecution. The Court concluded that the residual exception is unavailable when grand jury testimony is offered, since Rule 804(b)(1) specifically covers former testimony and does not include grand jury testimony. Assuming, however, that the residual exception could be used if its criteria were satisfied, the Court held that admission of the grand jury testimony would violate the Confrontation Clause under the then-applicable Ohio v. Roberts analysis. We note that the same result would obtain under Crawford v. Washington.

United States v. Brothers Constr. Co. of Ohio, Inc., 219 F.3d 300 (4th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed convictions for fraudulently receiving public funds in a scheme involving a public construction project, but found that it was improper to admit under the residual exception grand jury testimony by the general counsel of one of the defendants. Rejecting "the idea that grand jury testimony is sufficiently reliable per se," the Court noted that reliability in this case was belied by the fact that the government had begun an investigation to determine whether the counsel committed perjury during the very same grand jury testimony that was offered at trial. We note that the same result would obtain under Crawford v. Washington.

United States v. Gonzalez, 559 F.2d 1271 (5th Cir. 1977) : The Court overturned a conviction for possession of marijuana with intent to distribute on the ground that grand jury testimony by a witness who refused to testify at trial was improperly admitted. The evidence could not properly be accepted under the residual exception because of the pressure put on the witness by the prosecutor, the leading nature of the questions, the prosecutor's threat to call the witness repeatedly before grand juries and to seek contempt citations for failure to testify, the threats of physical harm to the witness that might have produced unreliable testimony, and the lack of cross-examination. We note that the same result would obtain under Crawford v. Washington.

United States v. Gomez-Lemos, 939 F.2d 326 (6th Cir. 1991) : In a drug prosecution two coconspirators testified before the grand jury; because they refused to testify at trial, their grand jury testimony was read into evidence. The Court reversed, finding a violation of the Confrontation Clause under the then-applicable Ohio v. Roberts analysis. We note that the same result would obtain under Crawford v. Washington.

United States v. Lang, 904 F.2d 618 (11th Cir. 1990) : The Court held it was error, but harmless, to admit in a mail fraud prosecution grand jury testimony by an unavailable witness, the defendant's father. There were suggestions that the witness had recanted, the witness may have been concerned with potential liability for himself, and the familial relation created, if anything, a strong possibility of coloring the testimony. In United States v. Fernandez, n12 the Court reversed convictions of conspiracy to illegally influence the operations of an employee benefit plan, because of improper admission of grand jury testimony by a witness who died before the trial. The testimony was open to troubling doubt: the witness testified under a grant of immunity, he responded to pregnant questions put by the government attorney, and he was an "almost comically unreliable character." We note that the same result would obtain under Crawford v. Washington.

[13] Material Fact

United States v. Gaitan-Acevedo, 148 F.3d 577 (6th Cir. 1998) : This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 807.02[6].

[14] Notice

United States v. Benavente Gomez, 921 F.2d 378 (1st Cir. 1990) : The Court held it was error, but harmless, in a cocaine conspiracy prosecution to admit a telephone toll record under the residual exception where the defendant had no notice before trial of its existence or the government's intention to introduce it. In a prisoners' civil rights suit, Furtado v. Bishop, n13 the Court found no error in the admission of an affidavit by an attorney (since deceased) stating that a prison official admitted withholding letters sent by one of the plaintiffs. The Court said that the absence of pretrial notice was not as serious in a civil as in a criminal case.

United States v. Oates, 560 F.2d 45 (2d Cir. 1977) : The Court, reviewing the legislative history of the residual exception, concluded that it left "no doubt that it was the intention of Congress that that requirement [notice] be read strictly." Accord United States v. Ruffin, 575 F.2d 346 (2d Cir. 1978) .

Kirk v. Raymark Indus., Inc., 61 F.3d 147 (3d Cir. 1995) : Reversing a verdict for the plaintiff in an asbestos case on non-evidentiary grounds, the Court also held that it was error to admit, as residual hearsay, interrogatory responses from a codefendant who had settled. The plaintiff never gave the defendant notice that she intended to introduce this evidence under the residual exception, which requires not just notice of the hearsay statement, "but also notice of the proponent's intention specifically to rely on the rule as a grounds for admissibility of the hearsay statement." In United States v. Pelullo, 964 F.2d 193 (3d Cir. 1992) , the Court reversed convictions for wire fraud because wire-transfer documents that had been subpoenaed from banks were erroneously admitted. No witness familiar with the record-keeping system laid an adequate foundation for their admission as business records and the government did not provide the requisite advance notice of its intent to offer them under the residual exception. Because the government first made its residual exception argument on appeal, the Trial Judge had not made any findings regarding the foundation required under the Rule.

United States v. Hogan, 763 F.2d 697 (5th Cir. 1985) : Reversing marijuana convictions because the government called a witness for the primary purpose of impeaching him with otherwise inadmissible hearsay evidence, the Court refused to consider whether the prior statements could have been admitted under the residual exception, since no notice was given and the Trial Judge never had an opportunity to make the findings required by the Rule.

United States v. Williams, 272 F.3d 845 (7th Cir. 2001) : Affirming cocaine-related convictions, the Court found no error in the exclusion of probation records from Texas that Williams claimed showed that he was in New Jersey cooperating with authorities when the prosecution claimed he was in Texas. Although Williams argued on appeal for admission under Rule 807, the Court noted that the argument was not made below and that the government had no notice at all of the attempt to rely on the residual hearsay exception.

United States v. Coney, 51 F.3d 164 (8th Cir. 1995) : Affirming a conviction for cashing a Social Security check with a forged endorsement, the Court found no abuse of discretion in refusing to admit a report offered by the defendant as residual hearsay, where the defendant offered the report during the trial, only 45 minutes before she wanted to introduce it. In a prosecution for possession of stolen property, United States v. Calkins, 906 F.2d 1240 (8th Cir. 1990) , the Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in admitting under the residual exception testimony that the witness' grandmother had made statements asserting ownership over the property, where the government received notice of the declarant's unavailability on the day before trial began, it promptly notified the Court, and a continuance was granted the defendant before the evidence was admitted. In United States v. Lyon, n14 the Court approved a ruling that allowed an FBI agent to read a portion of his transcribed interview of a witness after the witness testified she could not recall giving real evidence to the government, but the evidence bore both the agent's and the witness' signatures. Since the government was unaware before trial of the witness' poor memory, the Court said that "[u]nder the circumstances, strict compliance with the notice provision of the Rule is not required."

United States v. Tafollo-Cardenas, 897 F.2d 976 (9th Cir. 1990) : In reversing a conviction for drug offenses because a witness' prior statements were admitted without an instruction limiting their use to impeachment, the Court refused to consider the residual exception as a basis for admissibility when the government first raised it in its amended jury instructions but the Trial Judge made no finding whether it applied. In a Title VII case, Piva v. Xerox Corp., n15 the Court observed that the defendant's failure to give notice of the intended use of a summary of hiring results concerning men and women, admitted under the residual exception, did not prejudice the plaintiff. The Court focused on whether the plaintiff had "ample opportunity to address the trustworthiness of the evidence" and found that she had. In United States v. Brown, n16 the Court upheld the admission of passports despite a failure by the government to provide pretrial notice as required by the residual exception.

United States v. Parker, 749 F.2d 628 (11th Cir. 1984) : Affirming a conviction for stealing from an interstate shipment, the Court held that testimony of the vice president of the company that imported Scotch whiskey from a Scottish distiller concerning information that he had received over the telephone from an unidentified representative of the distiller concerning the manner in which whiskey bottles were marked was properly admitted under the residual exception. Although the government had not strictly complied with the notice requirement, the telephone conversation was the subject of a pretrial hearing and the defendant did not ask for a continuance. In a securities fraud case, Lloyd v. Professional Realty Servs., n17 the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding hearsay statements by an unavailable declarant, where the plaintiffs had given no notice of their intent to use the statements.

[15] Relationship to Other Hearsay Exceptions

Attorney-General v. Irish People, Inc., 595 F. Supp. 114 (D.D.C. 1984) , rev'd in part on other grounds, 796 F.2d 520 (D.C. Cir. 1986) : In an action by the government to compel a weekly newspaper to register as a foreign agent, the Court held that letters between managing persons or officers of the alleged foreign principal were admissible under the residual exception. The letters were similar to business records, although there was no duty to generate the letters. Since the letters were circulated internally, the Court believed that there was no motive for the writers to falsify the contents.

United States v. Nivica, 887 F.2d 1110 (1st Cir. 1989) : In upholding fraud convictions, the Court held that records of a corporation used by the defendants were inadmissible as business records because the federal agent who introduced them could not explain their making and keeping, but they were admissible under the residual exception, as there was nothing to suggest they were other than as they appeared and they were the only proof of the corporation's activities.

Zenith Radio Corp. v. Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co., 723 F.2d 238 (3d Cir. 1983) , rev'g 505 F. Supp. 1190 (E.D. Pa. 1980) , rev'd on other grounds, 475 U.S. 574 (1986) : In its second evidence opinion in this massive antitrust case, the District Judge examined the residual exceptions to the hearsay rule and their relationship to more specific exceptions, concluding that the residual exceptions "cannot be invoked when there is a specific exception which sets forth conditions governing the admissibility of a clearly defined category of hearsay evidence." As examples the Judge used Rules 804(b)(1), 803(18), and 803(22). The Judge said that Rules like 803(6) and 803(1) apply "to a relatively amorphous category of evidence," not to clearly defined categories, and that the residual exception could be applied in connection with these Rules. The Court found the analysis to be unpersuasive, finding the "near miss" approach too restrictive and as placing Federal Courts in a "straightjacket." It held that testimony before the Japanese Fair Trade Commission and one protocol were admissible under the residual exception.

Dartez v. Fibreboard Corp., 765 F.2d 456 (5th Cir. 1985) : In a suit by a worker against various manufacturers alleging injury as a result of exposure to asbestos, the Court held that a physician's testimony, given in a prior asbestos case, was admissible against all manufacturers, even though not all had an opportunity to cross-examine in the prior case. Unlike Clay v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., n18 which held that the testimony was admissible under Rule 804(b)(1) following the physician's death, the Court relied on the residual exception and the searching cross-examination in the former case by litigants who had the same motive to attack the testimony as the manufacturers in the instant case. In a wrongful death action arising out of an accident on a conveyor, Alexander v. Conveyors & Dumpers, Inc., n19 the Court affirmed a judgment for a manufacturer, holding it was not error to exclude as an exhibit the 1957 American Standard Safety Code for Conveyors. Although the Trial Judge permitted the plaintiffs' experts to read from the Code and to display photographic enlargements of it to the jury, he excluded the Code itself on the ground that Rule 803(18) permitted it to be read, but not shown to the jury. The Court noted that it had previously suggested that safety codes can be admitted under the residual exception.

United States v. Laster, 258 F.3d 525 (6th Cir. 2001) : The defendant was charged with drug offenses after ordering a component of methamphetamine from a chemical company using his employer's company name without its permission. The Court found that records of the chemical company were not admissible under Rule 803(6) because the foundation witness, a detective for a state drug task force, had no personal knowledge of or any familiarity with the company's record-keeping practices. However, there was no error in admitting the records under the residual exception, "as there was 'no indication' that the records were not reliable." The Court declined to adopt a narrow reading of Rule 807, under which proffered evidence failing to meet the requirements of a Rule 803 exception cannot qualify for admission under the residual exception. Rather, it read the "specifically covered" language of Rule 807 to mean only that evidence admissible under one of the categorical exceptions should be admitted under that exception rather than under the residual exception. One Judge dissented on the grounds that the majority's interpretation of "specifically covered" was far too broad and that in this case the absence of a qualified foundation witness put into question whether there were adequate "circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness" for the records. In a civil rights action on behalf of an arrestee rendered incompetent allegedly as a result of the arrest, Hancock v. Dodson, 958 F.2d 1367 (6th Cir. 1992) , the Court held that although the arrestee's guilty plea to misdemeanor assault and battery charges arising out of the incident did not come within Rule 803(22), it was admissible as a party admission or under the residual exception. In a criminal tax prosecution, United States v. Popenas, n20 the defendant unsuccessfully sought to offer an affidavit of the attorney who prepared his tax return as substantive evidence. Because the attorney testified, the Trial Judge admitted the affidavit as impeachment evidence, but ruled that under Rule 801 it could not be received as substantive evidence. The Court remanded for consideration whether the affidavit was admissible under the residual exception, reasoning that a statement that failed to qualify for admission under Rule 801 was not necessarily inadmissible under the residual exception.

United States v. Singleton, 125 F.3d 1097 (7th Cir. 1997) : The Court affirmed convictions for distribution of crack, finding no error in the admission of tape recordings of conversations between an unavailable informant and various defendants at various times. Although admitted under the residual exception, the statements in the tapes were all admissible as party admissions, adoptive admissions, or coconspirator statements. In Cook v. Hoppin, n21 the Court reversed a judgment for a landlord in a suit by a tenant's visitor who sustained injuries in a fall from an exterior stairway, finding that statements in medical records indicating that the plaintiff had fallen during a shoving or wrestling match were erroneously admitted. The statements did not come within the exceptions for business records or statements made for purposes of diagnosis or treatment, and the Court rejected an argument that the records were admissible under the residual exception. In a wrongful death action, Huff v. White Motor Co., n22 the Court concluded that a statement of the plaintiff's decedent, made while he was hospitalized for treatment of the injuries from which he later died, should have been admitted under the residual exception unless the decedent was not mentally competent when he spoke. The Court noted that privity-based admissions do not come under Rule 801, but analogized to Rule 804(b)(3).

United States v. Turner, 104 F.3d 217 (8th Cir. 1997) : Affirming drug convictions, the Court found no error in the exclusion of medical texts proffered by the defendant at trial. The medical texts could not be admitted as learned treatises, because there was no expert testimony that the treatises were authoritative. Neither were the texts admissible as residual hearsay, because to do so, "when Federal Rule of Evidence 803(18) specifically deals with the admissibility of this type of evidence, would circumvent the general purposes of the rules." In United States v. Balfany, 965 F.2d 575 (8th Cir. 1992) , the Court affirmed a conviction for sexual abuse, holding that statements made by the child victim to a psychologist and a social worker were admissible under Rule 803(4) and there had been no need to resort to the residual exception.

United States v. Valdez-Soto, 31 F.3d 1467 (9th Cir. 1994) : In a narcotics prosecution, a prosecution witness' prior inconsistent statements were admitted as residual hearsay; they were not admissible under Rule 801(d)(1)(A) because they were not made under oath. Affirming, the Court rejected the argument "that Rule 801(d)(1)(A) provides the only test for admission of unsworn prior inconsistent statements as substantive evidence." It reasoned that the reference in the residual exception to guarantees of trustworthiness equivalent to those in Rules 803 and 804 "strongly suggests that almost fitting within one of these exceptions cuts in favor of admission, not against." The prior inconsistent statements were found sufficiently trustworthy because: the declarant was cross-examined; the statements were consistent with the physical evidence in the case; they were contemporaneously recorded; and the declarant made the statements in an effort to cooperate with the government, and therefore would have realized that lying "would seriously jeopardize any chance he had to benefit from cooperating."

Ark-Mo Farms v. United States, 530 F.2d 1384 (Ct. Cl. 1976) : In an action against the government for allegedly taking a part of the value of the plaintiff's farm by causing flooding when it closed a dam, the government was permitted to rely on a hydrological study prepared by an expert. To the extent that the evidence was not a business record because it was gathered in part by persons technically not employed by the same governmental agency, the Court relied upon the residual exception to admit "the best evidence reasonably available and to have assurances of accuracy and reliability."

[16] Sources of Information

Litton Sys. v. American Tel. & Tel. Co., 700 F.2d 785 (2d Cir. 1983) : Affirming a large antitrust judgment for the plaintiff, the Court upheld the admission of testimony of a former executive of the plaintiff who testified in part from recollection of oral reports made by subordinates. Much of his testimony was based on personal knowledge, and the Trial Judge cited the residual exception in permitting him to rely on the subordinates' statements. The Court said that the trustworthiness of some of the recollections was subject to question, but found that the "potential hearsay taint" of the testimony was insufficient to require reversal.

[17] Surveys and Opinion Polls

Schering Corp. v. Pfizer Inc., 189 F.3d 218 (2d Cir. 1999) : The plaintiff and defendants, manufacturers of competing antihistamines, had entered a settlement agreement in which the defendants had agreed not to advertise their product as "nonsedating" or "low sedating." Seeking an injunction against violations of the agreement and the Lanham Act, the plaintiff offered five surveys in which physicians were asked to relate their memories of communications made by the defendants' sales representatives. The Judge excluded the surveys and denied the injunction. Reversing, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to rely on a per se rule against memory surveys offered to prove the facts remembered, and remanded for a determination of the surveys' trustworthiness based on their methodological strengths and their relative susceptibilities to the risks of faulty memory and perception. In Starter Corp. v. Converse, Inc., 170 F.3d 286 (2d Cir. 1999) , Starter's declaratory judgment action to establish its right to use a "star" trademark on athletic footwear, Starter offered a consumer survey to prove the unlikelihood of confusion between the parties' trademarks. Finding no abuse of discretion in exclusion of the survey, the Court noted that a survey possessing sufficient circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness may be admitted under Rule 807 on the confusion issue in a trademark case. However, it held that the survey in this case was irrelevant because the method used did not test or demonstrate likelihood of consumer confusion, and any probative value was outweighed by its potential to confuse the issues.

Pittsburgh Press Club v. United States, 579 F.2d 751 (3d Cir. 1978) : The Court rejected an expert's opinion and the survey on which it was largely based, noting that "[w]hile some polls are not hearsay in that they are admitted to show the beliefs or attitudes of the respondents ..., other polls are unquestionably hearsay," and that some polls may fall within a hearsay exception. The Court then commented that, in relying on the residual exception, the proponent of a poll must show that it followed generally accepted survey principles and that the results are used in a statistically correct way. Among other things, "the survey must be conducted independently of the attorneys involved in the litigation."

Opuku-Boateng v. California, 95 F.3d 1461 (9th Cir. 1996) : The Court reversed a judgment for the State and held that it failed to establish undue hardship from proposed accommodations of the plaintiff's religious beliefs. The Court found that the State had relied on the results of a flawed opinion poll. A program supervisor at the department that hired the plaintiff instructed another supervisor to conduct a poll of the staff to determine whether voluntary trading of shifts would be feasible to accommodate the plaintiff. The resulting survey was not sufficiently reliable to be admissible as residual hearsay, however, because the poll involved a faulty assumption about the nature of the accommodation sought by the plaintiff.

Harolds Stores, Inc. v. Dillard Dep't Stores, Inc., 82 F.3d 1533 (10th Cir. 1996) : The Court held in an action for infringement of a copyrighted fabric design that there was no abuse of discretion in admitting a survey conducted by the plaintiff's expert to support damages claims, as it covered an adequate universe of respondents and was conducted according to generally accepted survey principles. In Brunswick Corp. v. Spinit Reel Co., n23 a trademark infringement case, the Court held that evidence of a survey of persons over 14 years of age who had fished in fresh water in the previous 12 months to ascertain who they believed manufactured a reel was admissible to prove the likelihood of confusion. It noted that certain survey responses were not admitted for their truth, but to prove state of mind, and that other responses were properly analyzed under the residual exception.

[18] Testifying Witness

United States v. Marshall, 856 F.2d 896 (7th Cir. 1988) : The Court affirmed a conviction for illegal handling of savings bonds. It held that an FBI agent's testimony, at a hearing on a statute of limitations issue, that the defendant's sister stated that she had told the defendant of an outstanding warrant was admissible under the residual exception, where the sister testified at trial and the Trial Judge determined that her testimony to the opposite effect was not credible.

[19] Trustworthiness

[a] Civil Cases

[i] Statement Admissible or Admission Required

SEC v. First City Fin. Corp., 890 F.2d 1215 (D.C. Cir. 1989) : The defendant, charged with failure to make timely disclosure of significant stock purchases, argued that a phone call to the broker making the purchases was only a recommendation that the broker buy for its own account. The Court held that a chronology stating the broker had been asked to make the purchases, which had been submitted by the broker in response to the SEC's request, was properly admitted under the residual exception, since the participants in the conversation and the preparer of the chronology could be cross-examined, false statements would be subject to penalties of perjury, and it was the most contemporaneous account of the conversation.

Brookover v. Mary Hitchcock Mem. Hosp., 893 F.2d 411 (1st Cir. 1990) : In a medical malpractice action brought after a mentally retarded patient fell getting out of bed, the patient's mother testified that the patient told her 11 hours after the accident that he had gotten out of bed when no one responded to his call button and that a nurse several days later said she heard the calls, but the hospital was short-handed and she could not leave another patient. The Court held there was no error in admitting the patient's and nurse's statements under the residual exception, as they were corroborated by the nurse's admissible notes that the patient "had called for help but not quick enough response." We note that corroboration may be used to establish the trustworthiness of residual hearsay in civil cases, even after Idaho v. Wright. In Furtado v. Bishop, n24 the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiffs in a prisoners' civil rights suit, holding it was proper to admit an affidavit by an attorney (since deceased) that said that a prison official admitted withholding letters sent by one of the plaintiffs. The Court expressed reservations about the Trial Judge's reliance on his knowledge that the attorney had been an honorable man, but held that the lawyer's disinterested status and his knowledge of the meaning of an oath warranted a finding of reliability and a decision to admit.

Robinson v. Shapiro, 646 F.2d 734 (2d Cir. 1981) : In an action by the widow of an employee who was killed while attempting to clean up debris at an apartment building damaged by a windstorm, the Court said it was proper to admit testimony by a co-worker that the deceased told him what the building superintendent said about the conditions under which the repair crew was to work. Although it recognized that the residual exception should be invoked sparingly, the Court emphasized the following facts: the deceased and the superintendent were both unavailable, the conversation occurred immediately after the deceased returned from seeing the superintendent, there was an absence of a motive for the deceased to lie, and there was circumstantial evidence concerning the building's condition that suggested why the superintendent might have said what the deceased reported. We note that corroboration may be used to establish the trustworthiness of residual hearsay in civil cases, even after Idaho v. Wright.

King v. Armstrong World Indus., 906 F.2d 1022 (5th Cir. 1990) : Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff in an asbestos case, the Court upheld admission under the Rule of a deposition given in another case by a scientist working for another company. As sworn testimony in an adversary proceeding it possessed circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness and it was probative of the state of scientific knowledge at the time. A statute of limitations defense in Herdman v. Smith n25 turned on whether the defendant actively concealed his identity. The plaintiff produced an affidavit of a witness to an assault by the defendant upon the plaintiff which stated that the defendant asked her and her husband to conceal his identity. The affiant had taken the affidavit to the police voluntarily. When she was deposed, she refused to answer any questions concerning the assault, claiming her privilege against self-incrimination. The Court upheld the admission of the affidavit under the residual exception, noting that the affiant risked criminal sanctions if she gave a false statement to the police and also risked prosecution for falsely stating that she had no knowledge of the assault when the police first contacted her.

Doe v. United States, 976 F.2d 1071 (7th Cir. 1992) : In a Federal Tort Claims Act case brought after children were allegedly sexually molested at an Air Force base day care center, the Court held that statements by two three-year-olds to their parents were properly admitted under the Rule, where the core of their stories remained consistent over time, the children volunteered specific information when asked general, nonleading questions, and one child became agitated and uncomfortable when discussing the incident.

FTC v. Figgie Int'l, Inc., 994 F.2d 595 (9th Cir. 1993) : The FTC entered an order that the seller cease and desist from unfair or deceptive practices used to market heat detectors, and then sought consumer redress in District Court. Approving the assessment of the maximum amount of redress, the Court held that it was properly based on prices paid by consumers, as described in 127 letters of complaint to the FTC. The letters had the necessary indicia of trustworthiness, having been sent independently to the FTC and reporting roughly similar experiences, and the complaints corroborated each other. We note that corroboration may be considered as part of the reliability inquiry for residual hearsay in civil cases, even after Idaho v. Wright. In a legal malpractice action, Mutuelles Unies v. Kroll & Linstrom, 957 F.2d 707 (9th Cir. 1992) , the Court held that a declaration under oath subject to penalty of perjury that had been made in opposition to a summary judgment motion possessed sufficient indicia of trustworthiness, where the opponents could offer as cross-examination a deposition they had taken of the unavailable declarant. In a copyright licensing case, Hal Roach Studios, Inc. v. Richard Feiner & Co., n26 the Court affirmed in part a summary judgment granted the plaintiff, holding that an S-1 Securities Registration Statement was properly admitted under the residual exception, since the standard of due diligence applied by securities lawyers with regard to registration statements is sufficient to guarantee the requisite circumstantial trustworthiness of the facts contained in the statement and there was no reason to believe the registration statement at issue contained false statements regarding the relevant facts.

State Farm Mut. Auto Ins. Co. v. Gudmunson, 495 F. Supp. 794 (D. Mont. 1980) : In a declaratory judgment concerning insurance coverage, the Court admitted as substantive evidence prior statements by defense witnesses that contradicted their trial testimony, were given to an insurance adjuster, and were deemed especially reliable by the Trial Judge.

Osterneck v. E.T. Barwick Indus., 106 F.R.D. 327 (N.D. Ga. 1984) : The Court ruled in limine that portions of a report by a special review committee to the Board of a corporation, which was made pursuant to a consent agreement between the SEC and the corporation, were admissible under the residual exception. The information in the portions of the report was corroborated by other documents, and the representative of the national accounting firm that prepared the report had no interest in the report other than being accurate.

[ii] Trustworthiness -- Civil Cases -- Statement Excludable or Exclusion Required

SEC v. Scott, 565 F. Supp. 1513 (S.D.N.Y. 1983) , aff'd, 734 F.2d 118 (2d Cir. 1984) : In an action against a securities analyst, the Court refused to admit hearsay statements under the residual exception. It found that there were insufficient guarantees of reliability, especially since the declarant had been shown to be "an inherently untrustworthy character."

Kirk v. Raymark Indus., Inc., 61 F.3d 147 (3d Cir. 1995) : Reversing a verdict for the plaintiff in an asbestos case on non-evidentiary grounds, the Court also held that it was error to admit, as residual hearsay, interrogatory responses from a codefendant who had settled. The responses, which denied liability, were offered by the plaintiff to rebut the non-settling defendant's contention that the plaintiff's injury was solely caused by the settling defendant. The Court held that the interrogatory responses were not sufficiently trustworthy to qualify as residual hearsay, as they were made while the declarant was still a defendant in the litigation and "had every incentive to set forth the facts in a light most favorable to itself."

Stevens Shipping & Term. Co. v. Japan Rainbow II MV, 334 F.3d 439 (5th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed the dismissal of a stevedore's in rem claims against a vessel, seeking payment for agency and stevedoring services. To rebut a claim that the Trial Judge found that the plaintiff had actual knowledge that the charter of the vessel contained a prohibition of liens clause, the plaintiff offered affidavits and e-mail correspondence from the plaintiff's employees indicating that they were unaware of the no-liens clause. The Court found no "clear error" when this evidence was not admitted under the residual hearsay exception on the ground that it was untrustworthy. In an antitrust case, In re Corrugated Container Antitrust Litig., n27 the Court affirmed a judgment absolving manufacturers from liability for damages, holding it was proper to exclude, as substantive or impeachment evidence, an interview conducted by government attorneys with a witness pursuant to an immunity grant. The plaintiffs deposed the witness and used his deposition as evidence, but at a second deposition the witness invoked his privilege against self-incrimination. The Court reasoned that the interview statements could not be used under the residual exception because that exception is to be used sparingly. Because "a government interview under a grant of use immunity which includes testimony the witness is unable or unwilling to repeat at trial is neither rare nor exceptional," the Court declined to find such an interview to be inherently trustworthy.

Cody v. Harris, 409 F.3d 853 (7th Cir. 2005) : In a defamation action brought against his former employer, the plaintiff alleged that he was slandered by a statement that a supervisor made to a newspaper reporter. As proof that the statement was made, the plaintiff offered the published newspaper account. The statement was offered under the residual exception, but the Court found no error in the ruling that the statement was inadmissible under that exception, since "Cody has not offered any evidence related to [the reporter] or his method of reporting, or anything else that would give the district court guarantees that [the reporter's] statement was trustworthy." In a product liability action alleging that a smoker had died from cancer caused by asbestos contained in cigarette filters, Braun v. Lorillard Inc., 84 F.3d 230 (7th Cir. 1996) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence of statements by a chemist (since deceased) who had examined the cigarettes under an electron microscope in 1954. Her son, who had heard the statements in the 1960s and 1970s, and a journalist who interviewed the chemist in 1980, would have testified that she said she had told the manufacturer that the filters leaked asbestos into the smoke. Given the remoteness of the reported statements and their lack of precision, there were substantial questions about the reliability of the evidence.

EEOC v. Independent Stave Co., 754 F. Supp. 713 (E.D. Mo. 1991) : In the course of granting judgment for the plaintiff in a sex and age discrimination case, the Court held that the plaintiff's testimony that her supervisor's son told her that the supervisor had said she was not recalled from a layoff because she was too old and the men did not want women working in the mill could not be admitted under the Rule. The mere fact that the declarants were related did not provide the indicia of reliability necessary for admission.

Johnson v. Pacific Lighting Land Co., 817 F.2d 601 (9th Cir. 1987) : Reversing a judgment for citrus fruit growers who sued a packing house alleging breach of contract and antitrust violations, the Court held that statements by a prospective witness at a conference with the plaintiffs' counsel and several other witnesses should not have been admitted simply because the witness was ill and could not testify at trial, where there were no guarantees of trustworthiness in the statement.

Balogh's of Coral Gables Inc. v. Getz, 798 F.2d 1356 (11th Cir. 1986) (en banc), reinstating 778 F.2d 649 (11th Cir. 1985) : In an antitrust case, the Court held that a statement by a former employee of a defendant company, which was handwritten by the plaintiff's counsel and initialed by the former employee, was properly excluded. Although "prior notarized statements may be admitted under [the residual exception] at the trial judge's discretion," the Court found no error here, where the Trial Judge determined, after a hearing on admissibility, that the circumstances in which the statement was made were insufficiently trustworthy.

[b] Trustworthiness -- Criminal Cases

[i] Statement Admissible or Admission Required

United States v. Morgan, 385 F.3d 196 (2d Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to import controlled substances, holding there was no error in refusing to instruct the jury to disregard, as against the defendant, a letter written by her codefendant to her boyfriend. The letter was properly admitted against the defendant under the residual exception. It had circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness, since it was not responding or addressed to law enforcement authorities and it was not written in a coercive atmosphere, but rather it was written to an intimate acquaintance in the privacy of the codefendant's hotel room, with no expectation that it would ever find its way in the hands of the police and with no intention to curry official favor. In United States v. Bryce, 208 F.3d 346 (2d Cir. 1999) , the defendant was charged with drug trafficking after federal agents intercepted and recorded seven telephone conversations in which he negotiated (in coded phrases) to sell cocaine to his codefendant, Darren Johnson. Within the same time period the agents recorded another conversation in which Johnson told another individual, Gomez, in less cryptic language that Bryce was selling "straight powder" at a particular price and had sold seven kilos the prior day. The Court held there was no error, under Rule 807, when the last conversation was admitted, since it had a high degree of trustworthiness: "(i) the statements were obtained via a covert wiretap of which neither Johnson nor Gomez was aware; (ii) the statements were made during the same time period Johnson was conversing with Bryce; (iii) Johnson's statements implicated both himself and Bryce as participants in a narcotics conspiracy; and (iv) Gomez was Johnson's colleague in the narcotics trade."

United States v. Ismoila, 100 F.3d 380 (5th Cir. 1996) : The Court held, in a credit-card fraud prosecution, that notices to the issuing banks from credit card holders indicating that their cards had been stolen and charges were not authorized were admissible under the residual exception. An experienced investigator testified that he could remember only three or four instances in over 1000 fraud investigations in which a card holder had lied about unauthorized charges. The Court also noted that issuing banks have an incentive to ensure the veracity of such claims because they bear the fraud loss, and that the Trial Judge had delayed ruling on the admissibility of the records until the prosecution had presented live testimony of five of the cardholders, who were only minimally cross-examined. In a forgery case, United States v. White, n28 the Court observed that the residual exception should be used sparingly, but found sufficient guarantees of reliability in a Treasury Department claim form by a payee of a government check that he did not see or endorse it, when the payee read a warning in the presence of a witness regarding criminal penalties for a false claim and made the statement only three months after the check should have arrived.

United States v. Sanchez-Lima 161 F.3d 545 (9th Cir. 1998) : The defendant, an illegal alien, was charged with assaulting a Border Patrol officer after being apprehended with other aliens in an attempt to cross into the United States. Before the other aliens were deported, defense counsel obtained videotaped statements from them; these statements supported the defendant's claim of self-defense. The Court found reversible error in the exclusion of these videotaped statements at trial. The statements were sufficiently trustworthy because: (1) the declarants were under oath and subject to the penalty of perjury; (2) they made the statements voluntarily; (3) the statements were based on facts within the declarants' personal knowledge; (4) the statements did not contradict any previous statements given to government investigators; (5) the testimony was preserved on videotape, allowing the jurors an opportunity to view the demeanor of the declarants; and (6) the government had an opportunity to develop the testimony of these witnesses before they were deported, and the government also had notice and the option to participate when the statements were videotaped. In a sexual abuse case, United States v. George, 960 F.2d 97 (9th Cir. 1992) , the Court held that statements by the 12-year-old victim to an investigator regarding the dates of acts of abuse satisfied the trustworthiness requirements under the Rule. The victim (who testified at trial) had no motive to lie about the dates, she referred to the dates in a manner expected of a child her age, and there was no indication the investigator used leading questions.

[ii] Trustworthiness -- Criminal Cases -- Statement Excludable or Exclusion Required

[A] Defense Evidence

United States v. Jackson, 335 F.3d 170 (2d Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed a conviction for importing cocaine, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding statements from an accomplice's plea allocution that allegedly exculpated the defendant. The statements were not admissible as prior testimony or declarations against interest, essentially for lack of trustworthiness; the same lack of trustworthiness precluded their admission under the residual exception.

United States v. Wright, 363 F.3d 237 (3d Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to transport stolen property, holding there was no error in the exclusion of an allegedly exculpatory statement that a deceased coconspirator had made to his attorney. While the confidential relationship with the attorney is one indication the statements would be truthful, other circumstances -- including that the statements were not under oath and there was no penalty for lying to the attorney, and that they were self-serving statements made at a time when the declarant (a public official) knew he was under investigation -- indicated that the statement lacked the circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness required for admission under Rule 807. In United States v. Lawrence, 349 F.3d 109 (3d Cir. 2003) , the victim of a shooting was shown a photo array a few days before he died from his wounds, and the defendant claimed that the victim used it to identify another man as his assailant. Affirming a murder conviction, the Court held that the purported identification was properly not admitted under the residual exception. The victim was capable of only blinks and nods, and the Judge determined that these gestures were simply too ambiguous to constitute a meaningful statement. Therefore, the victim's response lacked the circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness required by Rule 807. In United States v. Ferri, n29 the Court affirmed convictions for conspiracy and attempting to damage a building, holding it was proper to exclude statements, offered under the residual exception, made by a codefendant to an informant. The statements were made after the codefendant had been subpoenaed by a grand jury and told that he was under investigation.

United States v. Hinkson, 632 F.2d 382 (4th Cir. 1980) : The Court held that a third party's confession of murder was not admissible when offered by the defendant, since the third party denied that he had made the statement and there was evidence that he "gloried" in parading a certain image before others. Thus, the confession was not shown to be trustworthy enough to be admitted under the residual exception.

United States v. Walker, 410 F.3d 754 (5th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed drug convictions, finding no error in the exclusion of a statement made by an associate of the defendant's who was present in a room in which drugs were found by police. The associate made a videotaped statement to police officers in which she categorically denied that the defendant had brought any drugs into the room. The Court held the statement was inadmissible under Rule 807 because it lacked trustworthiness. The declarant "was in a room with a lot of cocaine," and was not under oath. She was facing the threat of criminal charges and "had every incentive to lie." The Court also noted that the declarant had disappeared by the time of the defendant's trial, which "confirms her lack of trustworthiness." In United States v. Perez, 217 F.3d 323 (5th Cir. 2000) , the Court affirmed a conviction for aiding and abetting the harboring of an illegal alien. It upheld the exclusion of statements made by alien witnesses before they were deported from the United States, that Perez was not involved in the alien smuggling. A Special Agent of the INS testified that 90% of undocumented aliens who are apprehended do not give a truthful and accurate account of the events that led to their arrest. In the instant case, two material witnesses who were detained by the defense and designated as defense witnesses ultimately provided testimony implicating Perez in the smuggling operation. These facts, plus the fact that the statements were not under oath, led the Court to conclude that the hearsay statements lacked circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness.

United States v. Hall, 165 F.3d 1095 (7th Cir. 1999) : Affirming a conviction for kidnapping and illegally transporting a teenage girl, the Court upheld the exclusion of evidence that another man confessed after going to the funeral home and asking to see the girl's body. The other man "confessed to any crime he was questioned about by the police" and "lacked knowledge regarding the pertinent facts of the case," and there was no evidence corroborating any part of his story, so the Court concluded that the confession "lacked even the barest indicia of reliability." In the prosecution of a financial institution officer for taking kickbacks, United States v. Sinclair, 74 F.3d 753 (7th Cir. 1996) , the Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding a hearsay statement offered under the residual exception to contradict a principal government witness. Although the statement was against interest and made when the declarant was less likely to be biased, the great lapse of time between the statement and the event it described meant that it did not have the indicia of trustworthiness characterizing the categorical exceptions. Affirming a conviction for mail fraud in United States v. Wilkus, n30 the Court held that an affidavit made by a defense witness was properly excluded as hearsay not admissible under the residual exception because it was inherently untrustworthy. At the time it was purportedly executed -- the witness had no recollection of the affidavit or of his signature to it -- he was bedridden with a herniated disk, under medication, and suffering a diminished ability to read and comprehend documents. In United States v. Hooks, n31 a prosecution for conspiracy to defraud the United States, the Court found that a defendant had not overcome the presumption of unreliability of out-of-court statements made by two witnesses to the prosecutor at a time when they had a reason to deny conspiratorial activity.

United States v. Gaines, 969 F.2d 692 (8th Cir. 1992) : Affirming convictions for heroin distribution offenses, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in refusing to admit a private investigator's testimony that one defendant's ex-husband had said he never saw her deal or use heroin. The statement lacked circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness, especially in light of the codefendants' challenges to the declarant's competency because of his heroin addiction.

United States v. DeLuca, 692 F.2d 1277 (9th Cir. 1982) : In a racketeering prosecution, one defendant offered a tape recording made when a government witness, a former accomplice, called and attempted to get the defendant to make incriminating statements. In fact, the statements were exculpatory. Since the tape was made after the defendant learned that he was under investigation and after he employed counsel, the Court found that the tape was properly excluded as insufficiently reliable under the residual exception.

United States v. Trujillo, 136 F.3d 1388 (10th Cir. 1998) : The Court affirmed a bank robbery conviction, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of FBI reports of statements by witnesses who were unavailable at the time of trial. The defense made no showing why the statements were inherently trustworthy. Furthermore, the witnesses who made them had a limited opportunity to observe, and made significant errors in, the facts recounted, so the reports were not corroborated in any real sense.

United States v. Colson, 662 F.2d 1389 (11th Cir. 1981) : The Court affirmed drug convictions and rejected a claim that the Trial Judge should have admitted under the residual exception the transcript of a taped conversation between a witness and several police officers in which the witness admitted procuring false testimony against one defendant. The Court noted that the witness was a twice-convicted felon, the transcript was replete with opinions and conclusions not based upon personal knowledge, and it contained self-laudatory comments.

[B] Trustworthiness -- Criminal Cases -- Statement Excludable or Exclusion Required -- Prosecution Evidence

United States v. Trenkler, 61 F.3d 45 (1st Cir. 1995) : Although the Court affirmed a conviction on various charges resulting from a bomb explosion, it found error, albeit harmless, in the admission of evidence concerning information obtained from an ATF database of explosion and arson incidents. The prosecution sought to show that, out of more than 14,000 bombing and attempted bombing incidents, only the bombing charged and one prior incident alleged to have been committed by the defendant shared certain queried characteristics. The government's expert explained that the database was derived from reports by a variety of law enforcement agencies, that no agency was required by law to send reports to the database, and that no procedures or standards were required as the basis for reports. The Court noted that "it is far from clear the extent to which information memorialized in any of the reports derives from laboratory analyses, on-the-scene observations of police officers, second-hand descriptions of the device by layperson witnesses, or some other source," and it concluded that the reports lacked sufficient guarantees of trustworthiness to be admitted.

United States v. Ruppel, 666 F.2d 261 (5th Cir. 1982) : The Court found that taped post-arrest conversations of coconspirators should not have been admitted under the residual exception where there was nothing exceptional about the conversations that would have guaranteed trustworthiness.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. Abernathy v. Superior Hardwoods, Inc., 704 F.2d 963 (7th Cir. 1983) .

(n2)Footnote 2. Netterville v. State of Mo., 800 F.2d 798 (8th Cir. 1986) .

(n3)Footnote 3. United States v. Welsh, 774 F.2d 670 (4th Cir. 1985) .

(n4)Footnote 4. United States v. Heyward, 729 F.2d 297 (4th Cir. 1984) .

(n5)Footnote 5. FTC v. Amy Travel Serv., Inc., 875 F.2d 564 (7th Cir. 1989) .

(n6)Footnote 6. United States v. Fredericks, 599 F.2d 262 (8th Cir. 1979) .

(n7)Footnote 7. United States v. Grooms, 978 F.2d 425 (8th Cir. 1992) .

(n8)Footnote 8. United States v. Spotted War Bonnet, 882 F.2d 1360 (8th Cir. 1989) , vacated on other grounds, 497 U.S. 1021 (1990) .

(n9)Footnote 9. United States v. Shaw, 824 F.2d 601 (8th Cir. 1987) .

(n10)Footnote 10. United States v. Renville, 779 F.2d 430 (8th Cir. 1985) .

(n11)Footnote 11. United States v. Loalza-Vasquez, 735 F.2d 153 (5th Cir. 1984) .

(n12)Footnote 12. United States v. Fernandez, 892 F.2d 976 (11th Cir. 1989) , amended (11th Cir. 1990).

(n13)Footnote 13. Furtado v. Bishop, 604 F.2d 80 (1st Cir. 1979) .

(n14)Footnote 14. United States v. Lyon, 567 F.2d 777 (8th Cir. 1977) .

(n15)Footnote 15. Piva v. Xerox Corp., 654 F.2d 591 (9th Cir. 1981) .

(n16)Footnote 16. United States v. Brown, 770 F.2d 768 (9th Cir. 1985) .

(n17)Footnote 17. Lloyd v. Professional Realty Servs., 734 F.2d 1428 (11th Cir. 1984) .

(n18)Footnote 18. Clay v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 722 F.2d 1289 (6th Cir. 1983) .

(n19)Footnote 19. Alexander v. Conveyors & Dumpers, Inc., 731 F.2d 1221 (5th Cir. 1984) .

(n20)Footnote 20. United States v. Popenas, 780 F.2d 545 (6th Cir. 1985) .

(n21)Footnote 21. Cook v. Hoppin, 783 F.2d 684 (7th Cir. 1986) .

(n22)Footnote 22. Huff v. White Motor Co., 604 F.2d 80 (1st Cir. 1979) .

(n23)Footnote 23. Brunswick Corp. v. Spinit Reel Co., 832 F.2d 513 (10th Cir. 1987) .

(n24)Footnote 24. Furtado v. Bishop, 604 F.2d 80 (1st Cir. 1979) .

(n25)Footnote 25. Herdman v. Smith, 707 F.2d 839 (5th Cir. 1983) .

(n26)Footnote 26. Hal Roach Studios, Inc. v. Richard Feiner & Co., 896 F.2d 1542 (9th Cir. 1990) .

(n27)Footnote 27. In re Corrugated Container Antitrust Litig., 756 F.2d 411 (5th Cir. 1985) .

(n28)Footnote 28. United States v. White, 611 F.2d 531 (5th Cir. 1980) .

(n29)Footnote 29. United States v. Ferri, 778 F.2d 985 (3d Cir. 1985) .

(n30)Footnote 30. United States v. Wilkus, 875 F.2d 649 (7th Cir. 1989) .

(n31)Footnote 31. United States v. Hooks, 848 F.2d 785 (7th Cir. 1988) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
CHAPTER 807 RULE 807

4-807 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 807.04

807.04 Legislative History

[Editor's Note: Below is the Advisory Committee's original Note to what was then Rule 803(24). In 1997, Rule 803(24) was combined with Rule 804(b)(5) and transferred to a new Rule 807.]

[1] Advisory Committee Note to Rule 803(24)

Advisory Committee Note to Rule 803(24)

The preceding 23 exceptions of Rule 803 and the first five [four actually enacted -- Ed.] exceptions of Rule 804(b) infra, are designed to take full advantage of the accumulated wisdom and experience of the past in dealing with hearsay. It would, however, be presumptuous to assume that all possible desirable exceptions to the hearsay rule have been catalogued and to pass the hearsay rule to oncoming generations as a closed system. Exception (24) and its companion provision in Rule 804(b)(6) [enacted as 804(b)(5) -- Ed.] are accordingly included. They do not contemplate an unfettered exercise of judicial discretion, but they do provide for treating new and presently unanticipated situations which demonstrate a trustworthiness within the spirit of the specifically stated exceptions. Within this framework, room is left for growth and development of the law of evidence in the hearsay area, consistently with the broad purposes expressed in Rule 102. See Dallas County v. Commercial Union Assur. Co., Ltd., 286 F.2d 388 (5th Cir. 1961) .

[The original Advisory Committee Note to Rule 804(b)(5) stated as follows: "In language and in purpose, this exception is identical with Rule 803(24). See the Advisory Committee's Note to that provision."]

[2] 1997 Amendment Committee Note

1997 Amendment Committee Note

The contents of Rule 803(24) and Rule 804(b)(5) have been combined and transferred to a new Rule 807. This was done to facilitate additions to Rules 803 and 804. No change in meaning is intended.

[3] Excerpt from "Advisory Committee Notes to the Federal Rules of Evidence That May Require Clarification," by Daniel Capra, 182 F.R.D. 268, 278 (1999)

Residual Exception

A final aspect of dissonance between the Advisory Committee Notes on hearsay and the resulting Federal Rules involves the residual exceptions to the hearsay rule. The residual exceptions were proposed by the Advisory Committee, and adopted by Congress, to permit the admission of reliable hearsay that was "not specifically covered" by any of the foregoing categorical exceptions. The intent of the Advisory Committee and Congress was to provide some flexibility to admit clearly reliable statements that could not have been anticipated by the drafters.

The Advisory Committee proposed, and Congress adopted, two residual exceptions. One was placed in Rule 803 (subdivision 24), and one was placed in Rule 804 (subdivision (b)(5)). The former provision technically applied when the declarant was available to testify, while the latter provision technically applied when the declarant was unavailable. The exceptions were identically worded, and it soon became clear that it made little difference which of the two exceptions was invoked; regardless of enumeration, the question for residual hearsay was whether the statement was reliable, and whether it was, as both rules required, "more probative" than other evidence reasonably available to prove the point.

In 1994, the reconstituted Advisory Committee proposed a consolidation of the two residual exceptions into a single exception, Rule 807. The intent was to clarify any confusion resulting from two identically worded hearsay exceptions, and also to provide a means of adding new exceptions to Rules 803 and 804 without having to worry about the reference in Rules 803(24) and 804(b)(5) to "the foregoing exceptions." The proposal to consolidate the two residual exceptions into one became effective on December 1, 1997.

While the consolidation of two residual exceptions into one is not intended to have a substantive effect, it does render the original Advisory Committee Notes on the residual exceptions somewhat confusing. Obviously, the original Advisory Committee Notes refer to two residual exceptions, located in Rules 803 and 804, respectively. While the substance of the original Advisory Committee Note is still very useful in determining the scope of a residual hearsay exception, the note as a whole must be considered in light of the procedural shift to a new Rule 807.

[Editor's Note: The following legislative history is in reference to original Evidence Rules 803(24) and 804(b)(5), which were combined and transferred to Rule 807 in 1997.]

[4] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

[Rule 803] Subdivision (24) was deleted as injecting too much uncertainty into the law of evidence. It was noted that Rule 102 directs the courts to construe these Rules of Evidence so as to promote "growth and development." If additional hearsay exceptions are to be created, they should be by amendments to these Rules, not on a case by case basis.

[Rule 804] Subdivision (b)(6) [(b)(5) as enacted] was deleted for the same reasons underlying the deletion of Rule 803(24).

[5] Report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary

The proposed Rules of Evidence submitted to Congress contained identical provisions in rules 803 and 804 (which set forth the various hearsay exceptions), admitting any hearsay statement not specifically covered by any of the stated exceptions, if the hearsay statement was found to have "comparable circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness." The House deleted these provisions (proposed rules 803(24) and 804(b)(6) [enacted as 804(b)(5) -- Ed.]) as injecting "too much uncertainty" into the law of evidence and impairing the ability of practitioners to prepare for trial. The House felt that rule 102, which directs the courts to construe the Rules of Evidence so as to promote growth and development, would permit sufficient flexibility to admit hearsay evidence in appropriate cases under various factual situations that might arise.

We disagree with the total rejection of a residual hearsay exception. While we view rule 102 as being intended to provide for a broader construction and interpretation of these rules, we feel that, without a separate residual provision, the specifically enumerated exceptions could become tortured beyond any reasonable circumstances which they were intended to include (even if broadly construed). Moreover, these exceptions, while they reflect the most typical and well recognized exceptions to the hearsay rule, may not encompass every situation in which the reliability and appropriateness of a particular piece of hearsay evidence make clear that it should be heard and considered by the trier of fact.

The committee believes that there are certain exceptional circumstances where evidence which is found by a court to have guarantees of trustworthiness equivalent to or exceeding the guarantees reflected by the presently listed exceptions, and to have a high degree of probativeness and necessity could properly be admissible.

The case of Dallas County v. Commercial Union Assur. Co., Ltd., 286 F.2d 388 (5th Cir. 1961) illustrates the point. The issue in that case was whether the tower of the county courthouse collapsed because it was struck by lightning (covered by insurance) or because of structural weakness and deterioration of the structure (not covered). Investigation of the structure revealed the presence of charcoal and charred timbers. In order to show that lightning may not have been the cause of the charring, the insurer offered a copy of a local newspaper published over 50 years earlier containing an unsigned article describing a fire in the courthouse while it was under construction. The Court found that the newspaper did not qualify for admission as a business record or an ancient document and did not fit within any other recognized hearsay exception. The court concluded, however, that the article was trustworthy because it was inconceivable that a newspaper reporter in a small town would report a fire in the courthouse if none had occurred. See also United States v. Barbati, 284 F. Supp. 409 (E.D.N.Y. 1968) .

Because exceptional cases like the Dallas County case may arise in the future, the committee has decided to reinstate a residual exception for rules 803 and 804(b).

The committee, however, also agrees with those supporters of the House version who felt that an overly broad residual hearsay exception could emasculate the hearsay rule and the recognized exceptions or vitiate the rationale behind codification of the rules.

Therefore, the committee has adopted a residual exception for rules 803 and 804(b) of much narrower scope and applicability than the Supreme Court version. In order to qualify for admission, a hearsay statement not falling within one of the recognized exceptions would have to satisfy at least four conditions. First, it must have "equivalent circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness." Second, it must be offered as evidence of a material fact. Third, the court must determine that the statement "is more probative on the point for which it is offered than any other evidence which the proponent can procure through reasonable efforts." This requirement is intended to insure that only statements which have high probative value and necessity may qualify for admission under the residual exceptions. Fourth, the court must determine that "the general purposes of these rules and the interests of justice will best be served by admission of the statement into evidence."

It is intended that the residual hearsay exceptions will be used very rarely, and only in exceptional circumstances. The committee does not intend to establish a broad license for trial judges to admit hearsay statements that do not fall within one of the other exceptions contained in rules 803 and 804(b). The residual exceptions are not meant to authorize major judicial revisions of the hearsay rule, including its present exceptions. Such major revisions are best accomplished by legislative action. It is intended that in any case in which evidence is sought to be admitted under these subsections, the trial judge will exercise no less care, reflection and caution than the courts did under the common law in establishing the nowrecognized exceptions to the hearsay rule.

In order to establish a welldefined jurisprudence, the special facts and circumstances which, in the court's judgment, indicates [sic] that the statement has a sufficiently high degree of trustworthiness and necessity to justify its admission should be stated on the record. It is expected that the court will give the opposing party a full and adequate opportunity to contest the admission of any statement sought to be introduced under these subsections.

[6] Report of the House and Senate Conferees

The Senate amendment adds a new subsection, (24), which makes admissible a hearsay statement not specifically covered by any of the previous twentythree subsections, if the statement has equivalent circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness and if the court determines that (A) the statement is offered as evidence of a material fact; (B) the statement is more probative on the point for which it is offered than any other evidence the proponent can procure through reasonable efforts; and (C) the general purposes of these rules and the interests of justice will best be served by admission of the statement into evidence.

The House bill eliminated a similar, but broader, provision because of the conviction that such a provision injected too much uncertainty into the law of evidence regarding hearsay and impaired the ability of a litigant to prepare adequately for trial.

The Conference adopts the Senate amendment with an amendment that provides that a party intending to request the court to use a statement under this provision must notify any adverse party of this intention as well as of the particulars of the statement, including the name and address of the declarant. This notice must be given sufficiently in advance of the trial or hearing to provide any adverse party with a fair opportunity to prepare to contest the use of the statement.

The Senate amendment [to Rule 804] adds a new subsection, (b)(6) [enacted as (b)(5)], which makes admissible a hearsay statement not specifically covered by any of the five previous subsections, if the statement has equivalent circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness and if the court determines that (A) the statement is offered as evidence of a material fact; (B) the statement is more probative on the point for which it is offered than any other evidence the proponent can procure through reasonable efforts; and (C) the general purposes of these rules and the interests of justice will best be served by admission of the statement into evidence.

The House bill eliminated a similar, but broader, provision because of the conviction that such a provision injected too much uncertainty into the law of evidence regarding hearsay and impaired the ability of a litigant to prepare adequately for trial.

The Conference adopts the Senate amendment with an amendment that renumbers this subsection and provides that a party intending to request the court to use a statement under this provision must notify any adverse party of this intention as well as of the particulars of the statement, including the name and address of the declarant. This notice must be given sufficiently in advance of the trial or hearing to provide any adverse party with a fair opportunity to prepare to contest the use of the statement.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
Supp. To CHAPTER 807 RULE 807

4-807 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 807, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 807. Residual Exception	Rule 807. Residual Exception
A statement not specifically covered by Rule 803 or 804	(a)	In General. Under the following circumstances, a but having equivalent circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness, is not excluded by the hearsay rule, if the court determines that (A) the statement is offered as evidence of a material fact; hearsay statement is not excluded by the rule against hearsay even if the statement is not specifically covered by a hearsay exception in Rule 803 or 804:

(B) the statement is more probative on the point for which it is offered than any other evidence which the proponent can procure through reasonable efforts; and
(C) the general purposes of these rules and the interests of justice will best be served by admission of the statement into evidence. However, a statement may not be admitted under this exception unless the proponent of it makes known to the adverse party sufficiently in advance of the trial or hearing to provide the adverse party with a fair opportunity to prepare to meet it, the proponent's intention to offer the statement and the particulars of it, including the name and address of the declarant.

(1) the statement has equivalent circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness;

(2) it is offer

ed as evidence of a material fact;

(3) it is more probative on the point for which it is offered than any other evidence that the proponent can obtain through reasonable efforts; and

(4) admitting

it will best serve the purposes of these rules and the interests of justice.

(b) Notice. The statement is admissible only if, before the trial or hearing, the proponent gives an adverse party reasonable notice of the intent to offer the statement and its particulars, including the declarant's name and address, so that the party has a fair opportunity to meet it.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 807 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
Supp. To CHAPTER 807 RULE 807

4-807 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 807.02

Supp. to § 807.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[Go To Main]

[8] The Residual Exception and the Confrontation Clause [Go To Main]

In Davis v. Washington, 547 U.S. 813 (2006) (with the companion case of Hammon v. Indiana), the Court considered the admissibility under Crawford of hearsay statements made by two victims of domestic abuse. One was a report by the victim to a 911 operator, made essentially at the time of the assault. The other was a report made to responding police officers; the defendant was in the home and placed in another room, and the officer obtained, through questioning, the victim's account of the event. The Supreme Court held that the statement to the police officer was testimonial, but the statement to the 911 operator was not. Justice Scalia, writing for the majority, explained as follows:

> Without attempting to produce an exhaustive classification of all conceivable statements -- or even all conceivable statements in response to police interrogation -- as either testimonial or nontestimonial, it suffices to decide the present cases to hold as follows: Statements are nontestimonial when made in the course of police interrogation under circumstances objectively indicating that the primary purpose of the interrogation is to enable police assistance to meet an ongoing emergency. They are testimonial when the circumstances objectively indicate that there is no such ongoing emergency, and that the primary purpose of the interrogation is to establish or prove past events potentially relevant to later criminal prosecution

The Court emphasized the limited nature of its holding. It noted that it was not providing an "exhaustive classification of all conceivable statements -- or even all conceivable statements in response to police interrogation, but rather a resolution of the cases before us and those like them." Among other things, the Court stated that "our holding today makes it unnecessary to consider whether and when statements made to someone other than law enforcement personnel are testimonial." Nor did the Court hold that statements made to 911 operators could never be testimonial; statements made to 911 after an emergency has ended might be testimonial under some circumstances. Finally, the Court refused to hold that statements to responding police officers would always be testimonial:

> Although we necessarily reject the Indiana Supreme Court's implication that virtually any "initial

> inquiries" at the crime scene will not be testimonial, we do not hold the opposite -- that no questions at the scene will yield nontestimonial answers. We have already observed of domestic disputes that "[o]fficers called to investigate ... need to know whom they are dealing with in order to assess the situation, the threat to their own safety, and possible danger to the potential victim." Such exigencies may often mean that "initial inquiries" produce nontestimonial statements.

Of course, the Crawford rule applies only to "testimonial" hearsay. What if hearsay admissible under a hearsay exception is not testimonial? In Whorton v. Bockting, 127 S. Ct. 1173 (2007) , the habeas petitioner argued that testimonial hearsay was admitted against him in violation of Crawford. His trial was conducted ten years before Crawford, however, and so the question was whether Crawford applies retroactively to benefit habeas petitioners. Under Supreme Court jurisprudence, a new rule is applicable on habeas only if it is a "watershed" rule that is critical to the truthseeking function of a trial. The Court found that Crawford was a new rule because it overruled Roberts. It further held that Crawford was not essential to the truthseeking function; its analysis on this point is pertinent to whether Roberts retains any vitality with respect to non-testimonial hearsay. The Court declared as follows:

> Crawford overruled Roberts because Roberts was inconsistent with the original understanding of the meaning of the Confrontation Clause, not because the Court reached the conclusion that the overall effect of the Crawford rule would be to improve the accuracy of fact finding in criminal trials. Indeed, in Crawford we recognized that even under the Roberts rule, this Court had never specifically approved the introduction of testimonial hearsay statements. Accordingly, it is not surprising that the overall effect of Crawford with regard to the accuracy of fact-finding in criminal cases is not easy to assess.
>
> With respect to testimonial out-of-court statements, Crawford is more restrictive than was Roberts, and this may improve the accuracy of fact-finding in some criminal cases. Specifically, under Roberts, there may have been cases in which courts erroneously determined that testimonial statements were reliable. But see 418 F.3d at 1058 (O'Scannlain, J., dissenting from denial of rehearing en banc) (observing that it is unlikely that this occurred "in anything but the exceptional case"). But whatever improvement in reliability Crawford produced in this respect must be considered together with Crawford's elimination of Confrontation Clause protection against the admission of unreliable out-of-court nontestimonial statements. Under Roberts, an out-of-court nontestimonial statement not subject to prior cross-examination could not be admitted without a judicial determination regarding reliability. Under Crawford, on the other hand, the Confrontation Clause has no application to such statements and therefore permits their admission even if they lack indicia of reliability. (Emphasis added)

This amounts to a holding that Roberts has been overruled even as to non-testimonial hearsay. One of the main reasons that Crawford in not retroactive (the holding) is that it is not essential to the accuracy of a verdict. And one of the reasons Crawford is not essential to accuracy is that, with respect to non-testimonial statements, Crawford conflicts with accurate factfinding because it lifts all constitutional reliability requirements imposed by Roberts. So after Whorton, if hearsay is not testimonial, the Confrontation Clause provides no limitation on its admission. Put another way, if the hearsay is not testimonial, then whatever reliability guarantees must be met are provided by the hearsay rule and its exceptions, not by the Constitution.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article VIII. Hearsay
Supp. To CHAPTER 807 RULE 807

4-807 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 807.03

Supp. to § 807.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[2] Availability of Equally Probative Evidence [Go To Main]

[b] Availability of Equally Probative Evidence -- Criminal Cases

United States v. W.B., 452 F.3d 1002 (8th Cir. 2006) : Affirming an adjudication of juvenile delinquency on a charge of aggravated sexual abuse of a minor, the Court found no error in the admission of testimony from a forensic interviewer regarding statements made by the victim regarding the assault. Although the victim testified, the hearsay recounted by the interviewer was more probative than any available evidence, since the victim was unable or unwilling to recall specific details during her in-court testimony, including the time frame of the abuse and whether the defendant's pants were on or off.

[4] Children's Statements [Go To Main]

[a] Admissible

United States v. W.B., 452 F.3d 1002 (8th Cir. 2006) : Affirming an adjudication of juvenile delinquency on a charge of aggravated sexual abuse of a minor, the Court found no error in the admission of testimony from a forensic interviewer regarding statements made by the victim regarding the assault. Although the victim testified, the hearsay recounted by the interviewer was more probative than any available evidence, since the victim was unable or unwilling to recall specific details during her in-court testimony, including the time frame of the abuse and whether the defendant's pants were on or off. In United States v. Peneaux, 432 F.3d 882 (8th Cir. 2005) , the Court affirmed a conviction for child sexual abuse, finding no error in the admission of hearsay statements that the victim, who testified at trial, made to various individuals. The statements were trustworthy because: "T.P. consistently alleged both sexual and physical abuse prior to trial, she used language appropriate for a young child in talking about the abuse, she circled the parts of her body that Peneaux had touched on an anatomically correct diagram, and there was no allegations of coercion or coaching. Her out of court statements were either made in response to open ended questions ... or were simply volunteered."

[15] Relationship to Other Hearsay Exceptions [Go To Main]

United States v. Banks, 514 F.3d 769 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission under the residual hearsay exception of an ATF purchase form, which was offered to prove the name of the person to whom the gun in question was sold. The Court noted that the form would fall within the business records exception (Rule 803(6)), but the government had not called a foundation witness familiar with the seller's record-keeping practices. However, because the record-keeping practices of gun sellers are prescribed by law and ATF regulations, the purchase form possessed trustworthiness equivalent to a business record, and was thus properly admitted.

United States v. Bonds, 608 F.3d 495 (9th Cir. 2010) : In a perjury prosecution against a professional baseball player for falsely denying steroid use before a grand jury, the defendant moved in limine to preclude introduction of blood analysis reports for failure to establish that the blood had come from the defendant. A witness who could have made the connection refused to testify, so the government sought to introduce that witness' out of court statements. Affirming on interlocutory appeal the grant of the motion in limine, the Court held that the statements could not be admitted under Rule 807. Even if the statements "almost" met several other hearsay exceptions, they "miss[ed]" those exceptions, as well as the requirements of Rule 807, which is supposed to be used only in exceptional circumstances not shown here.

[18] Testifying Witness [Go To Main]

United States v. Peneaux, 432 F.3d 882 (8th Cir. 2005) : Affirming a conviction for child sexual abuse, the Court found no error in the admission of hearsay statements that the victim made to various individuals. The Court found the hearsay properly admitted even though the victim testified, noting that "[w]here testifying adults are able to provide information that the victim is unwilling or unable to give, this testimony may come in under Rule 807." Here, the victim's testimony was "inconsistent and unclear" and the testimony from the adult witnesses about the victim's hearsay statements "aided the jury in its fact finding task to determine whether T.P.'s allegations were true."

[19] Trustworthiness [Go To Main]

[a] Civil Cases

[ii] Trustworthiness -- Civil Cases -- Statement Excludable or Exclusion Required

Keri v. Board of Trustees of Purdue Univ., 458 F.3d 620 (7th Cir. 2006) : A black assistant professor who was not reappointed sued under Title VII. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant, the Court upheld exclusion of statements made by another professor concerning the decision not to reappoint the plaintiff. The statements lacked trustworthiness because the source of all the significant information was the plaintiff and the declarant had no personal knowledge.

United Techs. Corp. v. Mazer, 556 F.3d 1260 (11th Cir. 2009) : In an action by the manufacturer of an aircraft engine against two companies allegedly responsible for the theft and sale of blueprints relating to the engine, the Court held that statements made by an individual under investigation to the Inspector General of the Department of Defense were not admissible under the residual hearsay exception, because the individual's "position as a target in a criminal investigation provided him ample motivation to implicate others (even falsely) ... in his misconduct in order to diffuse and mitigate his own culpability."

[b] Trustworthiness -- Criminal Cases

[i] Statement Admissible or Admission Required

United States v. Banks, 514 F.3d 769 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission under the residual hearsay exception of an ATF purchase form, which was offered to prove the name of the person to whom the gun in question was sold. The Court noted that the form would fall within the business records exception (Rule 803(6)), but the government had not called a foundation witness familiar with the seller's record-keeping practices. However, because the record-keeping practices of gun sellers are prescribed by law and ATF regulations, the purchase form possessed trustworthiness equivalent to a business record, and was thus properly admitted.

[ii] Trustworthiness -- Criminal Cases -- Statement Excludable or Exclusion Required

[A] Defense Evidence

United States v. Hunt, 521 F.3d 636 (6th Cir. 2008) : Affirming convictions for health care fraud and making false statements, the Court held that an affidavit provided to the government by a potential defense witness during the government's investigation was not admissible against the government as residual hearsay, given the Trial Judge's finding that the statements lacked trustworthiness. The defendant argued that the statements were trustworthy because they tended to incriminate the affiant while exculpating the defendant. But the Court responded that "it is at least equally reasonable to conclude that the statements are not trustworthy" because "[i]t would not be bizarre for an individual to lie in order to protect another individual with whom he has a business relationship." The Court noted that "a statement is not rendered trustworthy simply by the fact that it tends to exculpate one other than the declarant. This principle is seen clearly in Rule 804(b)(3), which says that a statement that exposes the declarant to criminal liability while exculpating the accused is not admissible unless corroborating circumstances indicate its trustworthiness."

United States v. Hughes, 535 F.3d 880 (8th Cir. 2008) : The defendant, charged with purchasing furs without an out-of-state fur dealer's licence, offered a witness to testify that the defendant had called after returning home from his fur buying trip and told the witness that he did not know his license application was rejected until after the trip. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding the witness' testimony, as the statement was not admissible under Rule 804(b)(3) because the defendant had testified and was not unavailable, and it was not admissible under Rule 807 because it lacked any indicia of reliability and was cumulative of the defendant's own testimony. In United States v. Two Shields, 497 F.3d 789 (8th Cir. 2007) , a murder prosecution, the defendant offered evidence that the victim, who suffered a badly broken jaw and facial injuries, shook his head negatively when asked if the defendant had caused his injuries. The Court found no error in exclusion of the evidence, holding that it was not admissible under the residual exception because it lacked circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness. Even if the victim had a motive arising from revenge to accurately identify his attacker, the testimony of his relatives and medical personnel indicated that he had an extremely his high blood alcohol concentration, he had stated that he did not recall how he was injured, he was incoherent to the doctors, and his head shake was an ambiguous response to a leading question.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IX. Authentication And Identification
CHAPTER 901 RULE 901

5-901 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 901.syn

§ 901.syn Synopsis to Chapter 901: RULE 901

901.01 Official Text

901.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Authentication: The Basic Rule

[2] Trial Court Authority to Regulate Fabricated or Altered Evidence

[3] Case-by-Case Approach

[4] Tape Recordings

[5] The Requirement of Admissible Evidence

[6] In Camera Proceedings

[7] Conditional Rulings

[8] The Requirement of Proof

[9] Ten Basic Principles of Authentication

[10] Chain of Custody

[11] Illustrations

[12] Authentication of Internet Evidence, Email, Etc.

901.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Rule 901(a) -- General Provisions

[a] Rule 901(a) -- Altered Evidence

[b] Rule 901(a) -- Beeper Charts

[c] Rule 901(a) -- Chain of Custody

[i] Rule 901(a) -- Chain of Custody -- Blood and Tissue

[ii] Rule 901(a) -- Chain of Custody -- Drugs

[iii] Rule 901(a) -- Chain of Custody -- Other Evidence

[iv] Rule 901(a) -- Chain of Custody -- Tape Recordings

[v] Rule 901(a) -- Chain of Custody -- Weapons

[d] Rule 901(a) -- Depositions and Trial Transcripts

[e] Rule 901(a) -- Extent of Foundation Required

[f] Rule 901(a) -- Foreign Language Translation

[g] Rule 901(a) -- Illustrative Evidence

[h] Rule 901(a) -- Inadequate Authentication

[i] Rule 901(a) -- Internet and Computer Evidence

[i] Rule 901(a) -- Computer Records

[ii] Rule 901(a) -- Internet Communications

[j] Rule 901(a) -- Party Admission or Production in Discovery

[k] Rule 901(a) -- Photographs

[l] Rule 901(a) -- Scope of the Rule

[m] Rule 901(a) -- Tape Recordings

[i] Rule 901(a) -- Audibility

[ii] Rule 901(a) -- Tape Recordings -- Authenticity

[iii] Rule 901(a) -- Tape Recordings -- Chain of Custody

[iv] Rule 901(a) -- Tape Recordings -- Enhanced Tapes

[v] Rule 901(a) -- Tape Recordings -- Incomplete Record of Conversation

[vi] Rule 901(a) -- Tape Recordings -- Transcripts

[A] Rule 901(a) -- Tape Recordings -- Foreign Language Conversations

[B] Rule 901(a) -- Tape Recordings -- Transcripts -- Recorded Conversations

[n] Rule 901(a) -- Telephone Conversations and Similar Conversations

[o] Rule 901(a) -- Videotapes

[2] Rule 901(b)(1) -- Illustrations -- Testimony Of Witness With Knowledge

[3] Rule 901(b)(2) -- Illustrations -- Nonexpert Opinion On Handwriting

[4] Rule 901(b)(3) -- Illustrations -- Comparison By Trier Or Expert Witness

[5] Rule 901(b)(4) -- Illustrations -- Distinctive Characteristics And The Like

[a] Rule 901(b)(4) -- Contents

[b] Rule 901(b)(4) -- Fingerprints

[c] Rule 901(b)(4) -- Location or Possession

[d] Rule 901(b)(4) -- Nondocumentary Evidence

[e] Rule 901(b)(4) -- Other Examples

[f] Rule 901(b)(4) -- Photographs

[g] Rule 901(b)(4) -- Reply

[h] Rule 901(b)(4) -- Telephone Conversations

[6] Rule 901(b)(5) -- Illustrations -- Voice IdentificatioN

[7] Rule 901(b)(6) -- Illustrations -- Telephone Conversations

[a] Rule 901(b)(6) -- Calls to Businesses

[b] Rule 901(b)(6) -- Calls to Individuals

[8] Rule 901(b)(7) -- Illustrations -- Public Records Or Reports

[9] Rule 901(b)(8) -- Illustrations -- Ancient Documents Or Data Compilation

[10] Rule 901(b)(9) -- Illustrations -- Process Or System

901.04 Legislative History

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IX. Authentication And Identification
CHAPTER 901 RULE 901

5-901 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 901.01

901.01 Official Text

Rule 901. Requirement of Authentication or Identification

(a) General provision. -- The requirement of authentication or identification as a condition precedent to admissibility is satisfied by evidence sufficient to support a finding that the matter in question is what its proponent claims.

(b) Illustrations. -- By way of illustration only, and not by way of limitation, the following are examples of authentication or identification conforming with the requirements of this rule:

(1) Testimony of witness with knowledge. -- Testimony that a matter is what it is claimed to be.

(2) Nonexpert opinion on handwriting. -- Nonexpert opinion as to the genuineness of handwriting, based upon familiarity not acquired for purposes of the litigation.

(3) Comparison by trier or expert witness. -- Comparison by the trier of fact or by expert witnesses with specimens which have been authenticated.

(4) Distinctive characteristics and the like. -- Appearance, contents, substance, internal patterns, or other distinctive characteristics, taken in conjunction with circumstances.

(5) Voice identification. -- Identification of a voice, whether heard firsthand or through mechanical or electronic transmission or recording, by opinion based upon hearing the voice at any time under circumstances connecting it with the alleged speaker.

(6) Telephone conversations. -- Telephone conversations, by evidence that a call was made to the number assigned at the time by the telephone company to a particular person or business, if (A) in the case of a person, circumstances, including self-identification, show the person answering to be the one called, or (B) in the case of a business, the call was made to a place of business and the conversation related to business reasonably transacted over the telephone.

(7) Public records or reports. -- Evidence that a writing authorized by law to be recorded or filed and in fact recorded or filed in a public office, or a purported public record, report, statement, or data compilation, in any form, is from the public office where items of this nature are kept.

(8) Ancient documents or data compilation. -- Evidence that a document or data compilation, in any form, (A) is in such condition as to create no suspicion concerning its authenticity, (B) was in a place where it, if authentic, would likely be, and (C) has been in existence 20 years or more at the time it is offered.

(9) Process or system. -- Evidence describing a process or system used to produce a result and showing that the process or system produces an accurate result.

(10) Methods provided by statute or rule. -- Any method of authentication or identification provided by Act of Congress or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IX. Authentication And Identification
CHAPTER 901 RULE 901

5-901 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 901.02

901.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Authentication: The Basic Rule

One of the general requirements of introducing evidence at trial is that the evidence must be authenticated. This means that someone must lay a sufficient foundation so that the trier of fact is able to determine that the evidence is what it is supposed to be. For example, if the prosecution proffers a gun as the murder weapon, it must establish a foundation that the gun is in fact the murder weapon. Similarly, when a witness testifies to statements made by someone else, the witness must be able to identify the person from whom the statements emanated so that the trier of fact is able to properly attribute the statements. And when a proponent wishes to introduce a letter written by the adversary, the proponent must establish a foundation that the letter actually was written by the adversary.

Rule 901 provides that the proponent must provide evidence sufficient to support a finding that the proffered material is what the proponent says it is. Under the Rule, the question of authenticity is generally considered one of conditional relevance -- a document or other piece of evidence is not relevant unless it is what the proponent purports it to be. (For example, a diary in which the defendant purportedly admitted a crime is probative only if the entry was made by the defendant). As a question of conditional relevance, the admissibility standard is the same as that provided by Rule 104(b): Has the proponent offered a foundation from which the jury could reasonably find that the evidence is what the proponent says it is. This is a liberal standard favorable to admitting the evidence. The drafters of the Rule apparently believed that authenticity should generally be a jury question, subject to the limitation that there is no reason to bother the jury with evidence that clearly is not what the proponent claims it to be. n1 However, as discussed below, the Trial Judge retains the traditional power to exclude evidence that appears fabricated or altered.

[2] Trial Court Authority to Regulate Fabricated or Altered Evidence

The Advisory Committee Note to Rule 901 appears to state that all questions of authenticity are questions of conditional relevance rather than competency. If that were so, authenticity would in all cases be established by a showing sufficient to support a finding that the evidence is what the proponent claims it to be. We believe, however, that while the aforesaid standard is correct in most cases, the Federal Rule on authenticity is by no means unitary. Certainly, a unitary standard -- enough evidence to support a finding -- does not comply with all of the policies underlying all authentication requirements.

We begin with the premise that the confusion found in Rule 901 derives from the confusion that exists even in common-law jurisdictions over whether authentication is a problem involving a question of "competency" that must be resolved by preliminary factfinding and decisionmaking by the Trial Judge, or whether it involves a question of conditional relevancy that requires that the Judge only ensure that a prima facie case is made before leaving the matter to the jury to resolve. (The difference between these two concepts is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment accompanying Rule 104 in § 104.02[2].) Problems of how to qualify the results of a scientific test, how to justify introduction of an experiment, how to authenticate a tape recording, and how to establish a chain of custody do not lend themselves to one simple solution. In fact, common-law jurisdictions, without saying as much, have divided up authentication problems so that some are really problems of relevancy and some involve requirements of preliminary factfinding and judicial screening to ensure a minimal level of reliability. Requirements like the chain of custody requirement, for example, are designed to ensure that unnecessary doubts concerning the identity of an object are removed. To eliminate the requirement and to substitute a relevance approach in all cases is to change the amount of care required of a party, especially the government in a criminal case. Similarly, to say that a tape recording can be admitted without a preliminary showing that the machine was in good working order, and perhaps also that no one tampered with the tape, is to say that Rule 901 is not concerned with screening highly powerful evidence in a reasonably careful way.

We believe that the text of Rule 901 casts doubt on the proposition that it requires only a bare showing of relevance in all cases, and never more, when evidence is authenticated or identified. If this were the case, why would Rule 901(b)(2) intimate that a nonexpert should not be permitted to authenticate a challenged writing if he has become familiar with the handwriting only for purposes of pending litigation? We think the rationale for this Rule is that a nonexpert with an interest in litigation might be affected by bias. Since an expert could be retained, there is little reason to assume this risk. If relevance were the sole test, however, any witness with knowledge, no matter how or when it was obtained, ought to be able to identify handwriting.

Consider also Rule 901(b)(6). Assume that a person answers the phone and identifies himself as "John Steven" and that the government later charges someone named John Steven with conspiracy and the proof that he received the call would be helpful to the government's case. The Rule suggests that a jury cannot receive evidence of the conversation on the basis of this foundation. It seems to require more than simple self-identification. In fact, many, though not all, Courts have required something more, such as circumstantial evidence indicating that the person who took the call was the person identified. n2 But have they done it because they believe that the evidence is not relevant without that additional showing? We think not. Our view is that they recognize how easy it is for one person to say he is someone else and how attractive it might be for people to do just that if it became clear that any statement of identification could be used in litigation against the person identified. There is a concern about reliability in these circumstances that justifies a stronger showing than the minimal prima facie standard requires.

Finally, examine the ancient documents provision in Rule 901(b)(8). If a document is only ten years old, and otherwise meets the standard of the Rule, it cannot be authenticated as an ancient document. Certainly, a simple relevance analysis cannot explain this. In our view, the reason that Courts demand something more than minimal relevance in some contexts is that the absence of some reliability standard might readily lead to fabrication.

[3] Case-by-Case Approach

The lesson of Rule 901 is that there is more than one way to authenticate evidence. But when it comes to the question of whether the Judge must make a preliminary determination before admitting evidence, as opposed to simply deciding there is enough for the jury to decide whether to rely on the evidence, the best reading of Rule 901 would be to follow a case-by-case approach and to demand a more substantial foundation where the circumstances might create a suspicion that evidence is altered or fabricated. Given that there is no evidence that anyone who played a major part in the drafting of this Rule explicitly stated that the common law would be drastically modified and the supervisory role of the Trial

Judge drastically reduced, Judges should await more specific instructions from the Congress or the Supreme Court before abandoning the supervisory role that they played under the common-law rules. If there is a question as to the Trial Judge's authority for taking a more aggressive approach to authentication, we think that such a stance can be justified under Rule 403. n3

[4] Tape Recordings

The cases on tape recordings illustrate what we implied in the previous section: that there is not, and should not be, a unitary and almost completely permissive approach to authentication when there are legitimate concerns about the reliability and integrity of evidence. United States v. Branch, 970 F.2d 1368 (4th Cir. 1992) , is exemplary of the approach taken toward tape recordings in most Federal Courts. In that case, the defendant objected to the introduction of tape recordings on authenticity grounds. The Court looked to seven factors, but noted that not all had to be met in all cases, given the liberal admissibility standards of the Federal Rules. The Court held that the proponent was generally required to show that:

(1) the recording device was capable of recording the conversation;

(2) the operator was competent to operate the machine;

(3) the recording is a correct rendition of the occurrence;

(4) no changes, additions or deletions have been made;

(5) the recording has been preserved in a manner shown to the Court;

(6) the speakers are identified; and

(7) there was no impermissible inducement.

The Court in Branch found that there was sufficient evidence of authenticity where an agent described the implementation and operation of the wiretaps; described how the extracted tape recordings were prepared for trial; stated that he was familiar with the voices on the tapes and identified them; and stated that the recording machine was in good working order and that the tapes had not been altered.

We think the Court in Branch did an effective job of attending to the generally liberal standards of Rule 901 while remaining cognizant of the problems of fabrication and alteration that arise with respect to tape recordings. n4 Although this approach may seem at odds with the minimal conditional relevancy standard expressed in Rule 901, we think that Rule 901, together with Rule 403, can be read to allow the Judge to give more scrutiny to questions of authenticity and reliability on a case-by-case basis. Courts that do not require, for example, at least some showing that the tape is unaltered, and that the machinery was in working order, are leaving too much to the jury, often at the expense of a criminal defendant. n5 We note that some Courts are so concerned about the risks of alteration of tape recordings, and the impact of such recordings on the jury, that they have required clear and convincing evidence of authenticity of tape recordings before they can be considered by the jury. n6

[5] The Requirement of Admissible Evidence

In order for the trier of fact to make a rational decision as to authenticity, the foundation evidence must be admissible and it must actually be placed before the jury if the Judge admits the evidence. Otherwise the evidence will not be relevant. This means that the Judge's role when an authentication issue arises differs from the Judge's role when other issues arise involving the admissibility of evidence.

For example, a Judge may consider inadmissible evidence in deciding such matters as whether a coconspirator's statement is admissible -- as in Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) -- and, once the decision is made that the statement is admissible, the jury does not reconsider that decision and need not be informed of the evidentiary basis for it. This is but one illustration of the principle that a Trial Judge who is called upon to decide whether a variety of evidence standards have been satisfied often is a factfinder for evidence purposes. When the Judge assumes this role, the evidence relevant to the admissibility decision is that which is before the Judge, but may be different evidence from that which goes to the jury.

However, when authentication evidence is offered, a jury must be provided sufficient evidence for it to find that it is what the proponent claims or the requirement of authentication is not satisfied. A judgment as to whether a reasonable jury will find evidence to be authentic can only be made by examining the evidence that the jury will be permitted to hear.

This point is well illustrated by United States v. Branch, 970 F.2d 1368 (4th Cir. 1992) , discussed in the preceding section. Branch challenged the authenticity of wiretap recordings. The Trial Court conducted an in camera hearing to address the question of authenticity. The Judge heard witnesses, and ultimately determined that there was sufficient evidence of authenticity.

During the trial, the prosecution called Agent Thompson, the FBI supervisor of the wiretap operations as a witness to identify many of the voices in the recorded conversations and to explain how he prepared extracts from the original tape recordings. The prosecution also called a coconspirator, who had participated in many of the conversations, to testify to the accuracy of the recordings and to identify additional voices. The prosecution's third authentication witness was a detective who participated in the investigation and prepared transcripts of the tapes. He also identified voices on the tapes. The prosecution chose not to present before the jury testimony from the agents who had monitored the tapes and who testified at the in camera hearing. Branch argued that the District Judge had erred in hearing evidence at the in camera hearing and relying upon it when that evidence was never offered to the jury.

The Court of Appeals noted that because the jury must make the ultimate decision whether the evidence is what its proponent claims, "[a]n in camera hearing addressing authenticity does not replace the presentation of authenticating evidence before the jury; the district court must revisit this issue at trial." Thus, the Court observed that, even though the District Court might have been persuaded during the in camera proceeding that the prosecution had sufficient evidence to support a finding that a tape recording was authentic, the prosecution was obliged to present sufficient evidence again, to the jury, before the tape recording could properly be admitted.

Luckily for the government, on the facts of the Branch case, the Court of Appeals held that the prosecution had offered sufficient evidence at trial for a jury to find that the tapes were what the prosecution claimed: tapes of Branch and coconspirators involved in illegal activity. Accordingly, even though the prosecution might have chosen to offer more evidence in the hearing before the Judge alone, it was not required to offer the same evidence before the jury provided that the evidence it did offer was sufficient for authentication purposes.

[6] In Camera Proceedings

The Trial Judge in Branch made the choice to have an in camera hearing with respect to the sufficiency of the prosecution's foundation evidence. The Court of Appeals noted that such a hearing might be useful in dealing with tape recordings because the Judge often will be required to rule on hearsay objections to coconspirator statements in addition to determining the adequacy of authentication. The Court specifically stated, however, that it was not requiring pretrial hearings. It said that it did "not intend to suggest that in camera authentication is required in circumstances beyond those mandated by Rule 104(c)," and that it "merely recognize[d] that it is not improper to conduct a preliminary investigation into such matters outside of the presence of the jury."

In most cases, the relatively slight burden of establishing authenticity or identification will not justify the time required for an in camera hearing. Trial Judges have discretion, however, to hold such hearings regarding authentication when they believe that the hearings will enable the Judge to rule on matters so as to protect the jury from hearing prejudicial information that might not be admissible or to enable the Judge to rule on matters reserved for the Court rather than the jury.

The in camera proceeding is one in which the Trial Judge requires or permits a party to set forth the evidence it will rely upon for authentication purposes. When it is utilized, Branch serves as a reminder that the party offering evidence must repeat enough of the in camera evidence or offer other evidence in the presence of the jury to permit the jury to make a final decision as to whether evidence is what the proponent claims. The most elaborate presentation to a Trial Judge in an in camera hearing will not excuse the party who offers evidence from laying an appropriate foundation before the jury.

[7] Conditional Rulings

In most cases it is unlikely that Trial Judges will hold in camera hearings on all authentication issues. Indeed, it is common for a Trial Judge to permit a party to introduce evidence with a promise that the party subsequently will authenticate the evidence previously introduced. Some Courts refer to this as "conditional admission" (i.e., the evidence is admitted on the condition that the requisite foundation is subsequently laid). Other Courts refer to this as "admission subject to connection" (evidence is admitted subject to a connection later provided by foundation evidence). The terms differ, but the result is the same. At some point a party must authenticate the evidence it offers, provided that the other side insists upon it. In Huddleston v. United States, 485 U.S. 681, 690 n.7 (1988) , the Supreme Court recognized that "[i]t is, of course, not the responsibility of the judge sua sponte to insure that the foundation evidence is offered; the objector must move to strike evidence if at the close of the trial the offeror has failed to satisfy the condition."

[8] The Requirement of Proof

The requirement for authenticating evidence is not burdensome, but it usually means that foundational evidence must be presented. Courts will not assume that evidence is what the proponent claims simply because on the face of the evidence it is possible that it might be.

A case in point is United States v. Skipper, 74 F.3d 608 (5th Cir. 1996) . Skipper was charged with and convicted for possession of crack cocaine with intent to distribute. At trial, the prosecution introduced evidence under Rule 404(b) of two other State Court convictions for crimes allegedly committed by Skipper. Government Exhibit No. 3 was a certified copy of a judgment against "John Derrick Skipper" indicating that the defendant in that case had pleaded guilty to possession of a controlled substance. An expert testified that the fingerprints on this conviction matched Skipper's fingerprints. Government Exhibit No. 2 was a certified copy of a deferred adjudication order indicating that "John D. Skipper" was placed on ten-year probation for possession of a controlled substance. However, Exhibit No. 2 bore no fingerprints and the government did not otherwise identify Skipper as the person named in the order.

The Court of Appeals held that the Trial Judge erred in admitting Exhibit No. 2 because the prosecution failed to produce evidence proving that the defendant was the actual "John D. Skipper" named in the deferred adjudication order. The Court held "that the mere similarity in name between a criminal defendant and a person named in a prior conviction alone does not satisfy Rule 901's identification requirement."

A similar case is United States v. Dockins, 986 F.2d 888 (5th Cir. 1993) . Dockins was charged and convicted in Federal Court in Mississippi with being a felon in possession of a firearm. The prosecution needed to prove that Dockins had previously been convicted of a felony as an element of its case. It offered evidence of a fingerprint card and police record sheet reflecting the arrest and conviction in Denver, Colorado. The Court of Appeals held that the Denver police department documents did not qualify as self-authenticating under Rule 902 because they were not provided under seal and there was no certification under seal that the documents were genuine. The Court also held that the basic requirements of authentication were not satisfied because the Mississippi agents who testified merely said that the documents had been prepared by the Denver police and that the signature and fingerprints on the Denver documents matched those of Dockins. But no witness testified that the Denver police had actually provided the documents, which would have qualified the documents for admission as public records kept in a public office. Because there was no evidence that the documents came from the Denver police, the jury could not find that they originated there. Thus, admission of the documents was error, although harmless. n7

The lesson of Skipper and Dockins is that proof is required to authenticate evidence, unless it falls within one of the categories of self-authenticating materials covered by Rule 902. It is not enough for a party to show that evidence might be what it is purported to be. Rather, the party offering evidence must demonstrate an evidentiary basis for the jury to find that it is what the proponent claims.

[9] Ten Basic Principles of Authentication

The cases decided under Rule 901 suggest ten basic principles of authentication that trial lawyers and Trial Judges should keep in mind.

(1) In civil cases, authentication and identification issues often will be resolved by requests for admission or by the fact that the evidence is produced in discovery. n8 In criminal cases, there are no requests for admission and production in discovery is so limited that it is not nearly as likely to eliminate authentication issues at trial.

(2) There is a basic distinction between authentication and believability. Evidence need not be totally credible to be admissible in a jury trial. The fact that a jury might disbelieve it or probably will disbelieve it does not mean it cannot be authenticated.

(3) There is a basic distinction between sufficiency for purposes of authentication and sufficiency for purposes of withstanding a motion for judgment. Evidence is sufficient for authentication purposes if the foundation for particular evidence warrants the trier of fact in finding that it is what the proponent claims, though in some situations, as discussed above, the Court has the discretion to require a stronger showing. Evidence is sufficient for purposes of withstanding a motion for judgment if taken as a whole it is enough to meet the burden of persuasion imposed by the law (e.g., the beyond a reasonable doubt burden imposed upon the prosecution to prove the requisite elements of crimes charged).

(4) There may be a different standard of persuasion for authentication and for the merits. A prosecutor, for example, generally need only demonstrate that a jury could find by a preponderance of the evidence that an exhibit is authentic, even though the prosecutor must prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. A defendant in a criminal case may have no burden of persuasion at all, but still must demonstrate that a jury could find by a preponderance of the evidence that an exhibit is what the defense claims it to be.

(5) The Trial Judge does not decide whether he or she believes authentication evidence. Instead, the Judge decides whether a reasonable jury could believe it.

(6) There are many ways to authenticate evidence. The fact that a party cannot lay a foundation one way does not prohibit that party from finding another way to prove authenticity.

(7) To satisfy the authentication requirement, a party must have admissible evidence and that evidence must be placed before a jury, not just before the Judge. Thus, if a Judge holds an in camera hearing on disputed evidence and rules that it is admissible, a party offering evidence must be certain to put sufficient authentication evidence before the jury and not be content to rely upon the fact that the Judge heard it at a hearing.

(8) When a Judge admits evidence conditionally or subject to connection, the objecting party must move to strike the evidence if at the close of trial the offeror has failed to satisfy the requisite condition or make the required connection.

(9) Courts generally will not assume that evidence is what its proponent claims. They will require proof of authentication, unless the evidence falls in one of the categories of self-authenticating evidence under Rule 902.

(10) Evidence that is authenticated is potentially admissible but not immune from attack. The fact that a party has lost an objection to evidence on authenticity grounds does not mean that the party may not attack the evidence on grounds of relevance, prejudice, or hearsay. Moreover, the opponent can attack the weight of the evidence after it is admitted.

[10] Chain of Custody

In criminal cases a question of authenticity arises if something is seized from the defendant and then introduced at trial, and the defendant disputes that it is his or argues that the thing has been altered in some way. One way for the prosecution to authenticate the evidence in these circumstances is to establish a chain of custody. (Of course, a chain of custody can establish authenticity in civil cases as well, though it happens far less frequently.) Most Courts have been very permissive in determining whether the government has established a sufficient chain of custody. n9 The standard line is that gaps in the chain of custody go to weight and not admissibility. n10 Moreover, if evidence is in official custody at all times, there is a presumption that it has been handled properly and not altered or fabricated. n11

In our view, the strictness with which a chain of custody requirement is applied should depend on the importance of the evidence, the likelihood that it can be changed, and the extent to which its probative value depends on its unchanged condition. A unitary, conditional relevance approach is not appropriate because the Trial Court must also be concerned with prejudice and unreliability of evidence under Rule 403. So, for example, in the usual drug case, the most important chain of custody is the one from the original seizure of the evidence to the analysis of the substance. Given the fungibility of drugs, it is essential to make a connection between the substance seized from the defendant and the substance actually tested. We think that any substantial gap in this chain of custody or any indication of alteration should be treated as fatal, because otherwise there is an unacceptable risk that the test does not reflect the contents of the substance seized. n12 A gap in the chain occurring after testing can be treated much more permissively, given the admissibility of the test itself and the fact that the only purpose for introducing the substance in Court is to illustrate the testimony of government witnesses. n13 This function could be performed by any package wrapped identically to that originally found by the officer. n14 Thus, an intact chain of custody after testing is not essential.

Moreover, the degree of proof necessary to support a chain of custody will also properly depend on the nature of the evidence proffered. If the evidence is unique and resistant to change (e.g., an ancient pearl-handled scimitar), then the chain of custody is relatively unimportant. n15 On the other hand, "if the evidence is open to alteration or tampering, or is not readily identifiable, the trial court requires a more elaborate chain of custody to establish that the evidence has not been tampered with or altered." n16

[11] Illustrations

Subdivision (b) of Rule 901 contains ten illustrations of ways of authenticating evidence. It is plain that these are only illustrative; they are not limitations on the ways authentication can be accomplished. These examples are considered seriatim below.

(1) Testimony of a witness who has personal knowledge as to a piece of evidence is a classic way of authenticating the evidence. Someone who is an eyewitness to the signing of a document may authenticate the document, for example.

(2) A lay person can identify handwriting based upon familiarity with the handwriting, as long as the familiarity was not acquired solely for purposes of the litigation in which the testimony is offered. n17

(3) Handwriting, fingerprints, blood, hair, clothing fibers, and numerous other things can be authenticated by comparison with specimens that have been authenticated. Sometimes the comparison can be done by the trier of fact; at other times, an expert witness will be required, especially when scientific knowledge is needed to make a valid examination of the samples. Although the Rule does not retain the common-law requirement that the exemplar's genuineness be established to the Court's satisfaction, the Trial Judge still has discretion under Rule 403 to exclude specimens when questions as to their authenticity will be confusing and excessively time-consuming.

(4) Sometimes the characteristics of an item will themselves serve to authenticate the item. A letter may be authenticated, for example, by content and the circumstances indicating it was a reply to a duly authenticated letter. n18

An interesting example of circumstantial proof of authenticity is found in United States v. McGlory, 968 F.2d 309 (3d Cir. 1992) , a drug conspiracy case, where the government sought to admit notes indicative of drug activity against the defendant. The government relied on the following circumstances to establish that the notes were McGlory's: (1) the notes were seized from the trash outside McGlory's residence during the course of the conspiracy; (2) they were torn from a notebook found inside McGlory's house; (3) they were contained in the same trash bag as other papers clearly identified with McGlory; (4) the government's handwriting expert testified that the handwriting on the notes was similar to McGlory's, although he could not be conclusive; and (5) the notes were similar in form and contained similar information as that found in the books and ledgers in McGlory's home. The Court found that all this together was sufficient circumstantial evidence upon which a juror could find that the notes were McGlory's. n19

(5) One who is familiar with the voice of another may authenticate a conversation or identify the speaker on a tape or other recording. n20

However, if the tape or recording is offered for its truth, hearsay problems still will exist and must be solved following the satisfaction of the authentication requirement. n21

Best evidence problems may likewise exist, and they too must be addressed. Authentication is thus just one hurdle among several to admissibility. Note that the person making the identification may have become familiar with the voice for purposes of litigation, something not allowed in connection with handwriting.

(6) A speaker in a conversation may be identified other than by voice identification. For example, a telephone conversation might be authenticated in the case of a business by showing that a call was made to the number assigned to a business by the telephone company, that someone answered the phone purporting to represent the business, and that the conversation related to business reasonably transacted over the telephone. In the case of an individual, the fact that the number was assigned to the individual and that the person talking on the phone identified himself as being a certain person may be enough to authenticate the conversation, but, as discussed above, the Rule appears to require something more, and as discussed previously most Courts have required some circumstantial evidence in addition to self-identification.

(7) Public records are usually authenticated by proof of custody. n22 This illustration extends the traditional thinking to cover data stored by the government in computers.

(8) A document can be authenticated as an ancient document if evidence is presented that it is in such condition as to create no suspicion concerning its authenticity, is in a place where it would likely be if it were authentic, and has been in existence twenty years or more at the time it is offered. n23

(9) Authentication may be accomplished by showing that a process or system produces an accurate result when it is employed. In order to introduce an X-ray, for instance, it may be necessary to demonstrate that the X-ray machine is accurate. Judicial notice may sometimes solve the problem here. Judges must be careful to differentiate, however, between authentication of a process generally and a showing that a particular machine works as intended.

(10) Any method of authentication or identification provided by an Act of Congress or by Rules prescribed by the Supreme Court shall be valid to authenticate. This is included to ensure that no one interprets the Rules of Evidence as superseding statutes or the established Civil and Criminal Rules of Procedure or Bankruptcy Rules. Because subdivision (b) offers illustrations, it is arguable that some of its stated limitations -- e.g., that the person identifying handwriting have been familiar with the writing prior to the litigation -- are hortatory only and need not be honored. Whether they are binding or not, most Courts are following the limitations and seem to appreciate the guidance provided by the Rule.

[12] Authentication of Internet Evidence, Email, Etc.

The following is an excerpt from Gregory P. Joseph's article, Internet and email Evidence (2005). Mr. Joseph is the former Chair of the ABA Section of Litigation, and a former member of the Advisory Committee on Evidence Rules. His article provides important guidance on the authentication issues that arise with this electronic evidence. The entire article (covering hearsay questions as well) is set forth in Part Four of this Treatise.

> The explosive growth of the Internet and burgeoning use of electronic mail are raising a series of novel evidentiary issues. The applicable legal principles are familiar -- this evidence must be authenticated and, to the extent offered for its truth, it must satisfy hearsay concerns. The novelty of the evidentiary issues arises out of the novelty of the media -- thus, it is essentially factual. These issues can be resolved by relatively straightforward application of existing principles in a fashion very similar to the way they are applied to other computer-generated evidence and to more traditional exhibits.
>
> I. Internet Evidence
>
> There are primarily three forms of Internet data that are offered into evidence -- (1) data posted on the website by the owner of the site ("website data"); (2) data posted by others with the owner's consent (a chat room is a convenient example); and (3) data posted by others without the owner's consent ("hacker" material). The wrinkle for authenticity purposes is that, because Internet data is electronic, it can be manipulated and offered into evidence in a distorted form. Additionally, various hearsay concerns are implicated, depending on the purpose for which the proffer is made.
>
> A. Authentication
>
> Website Data. Corporations, government offices, individuals, educational institutions and innumerable other entities post information on their websites that may be relevant to matters in litigation. Alternatively, the fact that the information appears on the website may be the relevant point. Accordingly, courts routinely face proffers of data (text or images) allegedly drawn from websites. The proffered evidence must be authenticated in all cases, and, depending on the use for which the offer is made, hearsay concerns may be implicated.
>
> The authentication standard is no different for website data or chat room evidence than for any other. Under Rule 901(a), "The requirement of authentication ... is satisfied by evidence sufficient to support a finding that the matter in question is what its proponent claims." United States v. Simpson, 152 F.3d 1241, 1249 (10th Cir. 1998) ; *Johnson-Wooldridge v. Wooldridge, 2001 Ohio App. LEXIS 3319 at 11 (Ohio App. July 26, 2001) .
>
> In applying this rule to website evidence, there are three questions that must be answered, explicitly or implicitly:
>
> 1. What was actually on the website?

2. Does the exhibit or testimony accurately reflect it?

3. If so, is it attributable to the owner of the site?

In the first instance, authenticity can be established by the testimony of any witness that the witness typed in the URL associated with the website (usually prefaced with www); that he or she logged on to the site and reviewed what was there; and that a printout or other exhibit fairly and accurately reflects what the witness saw. n24 This last testimony is no different than that required to authenticate a photograph, other replica or demonstrative exhibit. n25 The witness may be lying or mistaken, but that is true of all testimony and a principal reason for cross-examination. Unless the opponent of the evidence raises a genuine issue as to trustworthiness, testimony of this sort is sufficient to satisfy Rule 901(a), presumptively authenticating the website data and shifting the burden of coming forward to the opponent of the evidence. It is reasonable to indulge a presumption that material on a web site (other than chat room conversations) was placed there by the owner of the site.

The opponent of the evidence must, in fairness, be free to challenge that presumption by adducing facts showing that proffered exhibit does not accurately reflect the contents of a website, or that those contents are not attributable to the owner of the site. First, even if the proffer fairly reflects what was on the site, the data proffered may have been the product of manipulation by hackers (uninvited third parties). n26 Second, the proffer may not fairly reflect what was on the site due to modification -- intentional or unintentional, material or immaterial -- in the proffered exhibit or testimony.

Detecting modifications of electronic evidence can be very difficult, if not impossible. That does not mean, however, that nothing is admissible because everything is subject to distortion. The same is true of many kinds of evidence, from testimony to photographs to digital images, but that does not render everything inadmissible. It merely accentuates the need for the judge to focus on all relevant circumstances in assessing admissibility under Fed.R.Evid. 104(a)

n27-- and to leave the rest to the jury, under Rule 104(b). n28

In considering whether the opponent has raised a genuine issue as to trustworthiness, and whether the proponent has satisfied it, the court will look at the totality of the circumstances, including, for example:

- The length of time the data was posted on the site.
- Whether others report having seen it.
- Whether it remains on the website for the court to verify.
- Whether the data is of a type ordinarily posted on that website or websites of similar entities (e.g., financial information from corporations).
- Whether the owner of the site has elsewhere published the same data, in whole or in part.
- Whether others have published the same data, in whole or in part.
- Whether the data has been republished by others who identify the source of the data as the website in question.

A genuine question as to trustworthiness may be established circumstantially. For example, more by way of authentication may be reasonably required of a proponent of Internet evidence who is known to be a skilled computer user and who is suspected of possibly having modified the proffered website data for purposes of creating false evidence. n29

In assessing the authenticity of website data, important evidence is normally available from the personnel managing the website ("webmaster" personnel). A webmaster can establish that a particular file, of identifiable content, was placed on the website at a specific time. This may be done through direct testimony or through documentation, which may be generated automatically by the software of the web server. It is possible that the content provider -- the author of the material appearing on the site that is in issue -- will be someone other than the person who installed the file on the web. In that event, this second witness (or set of documentation) may be necessary to reasonably ensure that the content which appeared on the site is the same as that proffered.

Self-Authentication. Government offices publish an abundance of reports, press releases and other information on their official web sites. Internet publication of a governmental document on an official website constitutes an "official publication" within Federal Rule of Evidence 902(5). n30 Under Rule 902(5), official publications of government offices are self-authenticating. n31

Chat Room Evidence. A proffer of chat room postings generally implicates the same authenticity issues discussed above in connection with web site data, but with a twist. While it is reasonable to indulge a presumption that the contents of a website are fairly attributable to the site's owner, that does not apply to chat room evidence. By definition, chat room postings are made by third parties, not the owner of the site. Further, chat room participants usually use screen names (pseudonyms) rather than their real names.

Since chat room evidence is often of interest only to the extent that the third party who left a salient posting can be identified, the unique evidentiary issue concerns the type and quantum of evidence necessary to make that identification -- or to permit the finder of fact to do so. Evidence sufficient to attribute a chat room posting to a particular individual may include, for example:

- Evidence that the individual used the screen name in question when participating in chat room conversations (either generally or at the site in question).

- Evidence that, when a meeting with the person using the screen name was arranged, the individual in question showed up.

- Evidence that the person using the screen name identified him- or herself as the individual (in chat room conversations or otherwise), especially if that identification is coupled with particularized information unique to the individual, such as a street address or email address.

- Evidence that the individual had in his or her possession information given to the person using the screen name (such as contact information provided by the police in a sting operation).

- Evidence from the hard drive of the individual's computer reflecting that a user of the computer used the screen name in question.

See generally United States v. Tank, 200 F.3d 627, 630-31 (9th Cir. 2000) ; United States v. Simpson, 152 F.3d 1241, 1249-50 (10th Cir. 1998) ; Perfect 10, Inc. v. Cybernet Ventures, Inc, 213 F.

Supp. 2d 1146, 1154 (C.D. Cal. 2002) .

* * *

II. Email Evidence

The authenticity of email evidence is governed by Federal Rule of Evidence 901(a), which requires only "evidence sufficient to support a finding that the matter in question is what its proponent claims." Under Fed.R.Evid. 901(b)(4), email may be authenticated by reference to its "appearance, contents, substance, internal patterns, or other distinctive characteristics, taken in conjunction with circumstances." See generally United States v. Siddiqui, 215 F.3d 1318, 1322 (11th Cir. 2000) ; Bloom v. Comw. of Virginia, 34 Va. App. 364, 370, 542 S.E.2d 18, 20-21 (2001) .

If email is produced by a party from the party's files and on its face purports to have been sent by that party, these circumstances alone may suffice to establish authenticity. n32 Authenticity may also be established by testimony of a witness who sent or received the emails -- in essence, that the emails are the personal correspondence of the witness. n33

It is important, for authentication purposes, that email generated by a business or other entity on its face generally reflects the identity of the organization. The name of the organization, usually in some abbreviated form, ordinarily appears in the email address of the sender (after the @ symbol). This mark of origin has been held to self-authenticate the email as having been sent by the organization, under Fed.R.Evid. 902(7), which provides for self-authentication of: "Trade inscriptions and the like.--Inscriptions, signs, tags, or labels purporting to have been affixed in the course of business and indicating ownership, control, or origin." *See Superhighway Consulting, Inc. v. Techwave, Inc., 1999 U.S.Dist.LEXIS 17910 at 6 (N.D.Ill. Nov. 15, 1999) . Where the email reflects the entire email name of a party (and not just the mark of origin), it has been held to comprise a party admission of origin. n34

Independently, circumstantial indicia that may suffice to establish that proffered email were sent, or were sent by a specific person, include evidence that:

- A witness or entity received the email.
- The email bore the email address of a particular individual.
- This email contained the typewritten name or nickname of this individual in the body of the email. n35
- The email recited matters that would normally be known only to the individual who is alleged to have sent it (or to a discrete number of persons including this individual).
- Following receipt of the email, the recipient witness had a discussion with the individual who purportedly sent it, and the conversation reflected this individual's knowledge of the contents of the email.

See generally United States v. Siddiqui, 215 F.3d 1318, 1322-23 (11th Cir. 2000) ; Bloom v. Comw. of Virginia, 34 Va. App. 364, 370, 542 S.E.2d 18, 20-21 (2001) ; Massimo v. State, 144 S.W.3d 210, 215-16 (Tex. App. 2004) (unpublished opinion).

As with all other forms of authentication, the testimony of a witness with knowledge is prerequisite to authenticate email. It is insufficient to proffer email through a witness with no knowledge of the transmissions at issue, unless the witness has sufficient technical knowledge of the process to be in a position to authenticate the email through expert testimony. See, e.g., *Richard Howard, Inc. v. Hogg, 1996 Ohio App. LEXIS 5533 at 8 (Ohio App. Nov. 19, 1996) (affirming exclusion of email where the authenticating witness "was neither the recipient nor the sender of the E-mail transmissions and he offered no other details establishing his personal knowledge that these messages were actually sent or received by the parties involved. Furthermore, the transmissions were not authenticated by any other means").

There are a variety of technical means by which email transmissions may be traced. See, e.g., *Clement v. California Dep't of Corrections, 2002 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 17426 at 32 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 9, 2002) ("major e-mail providers include a coded Internet Protocol address (IP address) in the header of every e-mail ... . The IP address allows the recipient of an e-mail to identify the sender by contacting the service provider"). Therefore, if serious authentication issues arise, a technical witness may be of assistance. n36 This may become important, for example, in circumstances where a person or entity denies receipt of an email and has not engaged in conduct that furnishes circumstantial evidence of receipt (such as a subsequent communication reflecting knowledge of the contents of the email). See, e.g. Ellison v. Robertson, 189 F.Supp.2d 1051, 1057 n.7 (C.D. Cal. 2002) ("Plaintiff has provided no evidence that AOL actually did receive the email. To the contrary, Plaintiff's former counsel states that while she received an acknowledgment of receipt for her April 17, 2000, email from [a local Internet provider], no such acknowledgment came from AOL"); Carafano v. Metrosplash.com, Inc., 207 F.Supp.2d 1055, 1072 (C.D. Cal. 2002) ("Plaintiff provides no evidence that [defendant Internet service] ever received the reply email in response to its welcome confirmation email").

* * *

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. See e.g., United States v. Harvey, 117 F.3d 1044 (7th Cir. 1997) ("Rule 901 requires only a prima facie showing of genuineness and leaves it to the jury to decide the true authenticity and probative value of the evidence.").

(n2)Footnote 2. See, e.g., United States v. Kingston, 971 F.2d 481 (10th Cir. 1992) (the Court noted that there is a split in the Circuits as to whether self-identification alone is sufficient to establish the identity of a party to a telephone conversation where that party is called at a place where he or she could reasonably be expected to be reached; citing cases, the Court states that the Seventh Circuit has required additional circumstantial evidence that shows the person answering to be the person called -- for example, that the person subsequently acted in accordance with directions given over the telephone; the Fifth Circuit follows the Seventh; the Second Circuit has held self-identification to be enough; the Court did not find it necessary to resolve the issue, because there was sufficient circumstantial evidence provided in this case).

(n3)Footnote 3. See, e.g., United States v. Citro, 938 F.2d 1431 (1st Cir. 1991) (there was no error in excluding an answering machine taped message offered by a defendant to impeach a conspirator on cross-examination; at a hearing in camera the witness specifically denied the communication, and at trial the defendant, who said she heard the message being recorded and recognized the witness' voice, only said the tape looked like a tape her sister had removed from the answering machine and she had given to defense counsel; that testimony might have sufficed to authenticate the tape, but there was no abuse of discretion in excluding it as suspect under Rule 403).

See also United States v. Jackson, 208 F.3d 633 (7th Cir. 2000) (the defendant proffered web postings as proof of some statements made by a white supremacist group; the Court found no error in excluding these postings for failure to establish a foundation of authenticity; the defendant failed to address the possibility that the postings may have been made by hackers, including the defendant, who was a skilled computer user). Jackson is an example of a Court requiring more that a prima facie showing of authenticity due to concerns about fabrication. Certainly, the fact that the posting was on the group's web page could lead a reasonable jury to believe that the posting was by the group that maintained the page. However, because of the possibility of hacking in the particular circumstances of the case, the Court required a stronger showing that the posting was what the defendant claimed it to be.

(n4)Footnote 4. See also United States v. Brown, 136 F.3d 1176 (7th Cir. 1998) (tape of surreptitiously recorded transactions was properly authenticated by the following: (1) the confidential informant testified that the transactions recorded on the tape actually occurred; (2) the CI testified that the speakers on the tape were himself and the defendants; (3) the CI testified that the tapes were in the same condition as when he last saw them; and (4) the agent who monitored the taped conversations testified that he listened to the conversations during each transaction and that he personally observed one transaction); United States v. Buchanan, 70 F.3d 818 (5th Cir. 1995) (in order to authenticate a tape recording, the government has the burden of establishing that the recording is "an accurate reproduction of relevant sounds previously audited by a witness"; generally, this requires the government to demonstrate (1) the operator's competency, (2) the fidelity of the recording equipment, (3) the absence of material alterations, and (4) the identification of relevant sounds or voices); United States v. Biggins, 551 F.2d 64 (5th Cir. 1977) (observing that the government in a criminal case has a heavier burden of justifying the introduction of a tape recording than a criminal defendant; "[t]his burden properly falls to the government because it has access to such information in a way the criminal defendant does not").

(n5)Footnote 5. See, e.g., United States v. Jewel, 947 F.2d 224 (7th Cir. 1991) (general testimony by a participant in a taped discussion, to the effect that the tape accurately reflected the discussion, was held sufficient to authenticate the tape).

(n6)Footnote 6. See, e.g., United States v. Ruggiero, 928 F.2d 1289 (2d Cir. 1991) (clear and convincing evidence of authenticity and accuracy is required); United States v. Faurote, 749 F.2d 40 (7th Cir. 1984) ("It is a well-settled principle of law that the party attempting to admit a tape recording into evidence must prove, by clear and convincing evidence, that the tape is a true, accurate, and authentic recording of the conversation, at a given time, between the parties involved."). We also note, however, that application of a clear and convincing standard to a question of admissibility is inconsistent with the Supreme Court's application of a preponderance standard as to competency questions in Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) .

(n7)Footnote 7. Compare United States v. Jimenez Lopez, 873 F.2d 769 (5th Cir. 1989) (a judgment of conviction was properly authenticated where a witness testified that he personally requested the document and received it from a Border Patrol agent who procured it from a Magistrate's Court).

(n8)Footnote 8. See, e.g., Chavez v. Thomas & Betts Corp., 396 F.3d 1088 (10th Cir. 2005) (documents were authenticated by the fact that they were produced by the defendant on its letterhead during discovery); Hangarter v. Provident Life & Acc. Ins. Co., 373 F.3d 998 (9th Cir. 2004) (documents were properly authenticated by a witness who testified that they were produced by the defendants in response to a discovery request).

(n9)Footnote 9. See, e.g., United States v. Dent, 149 F.3d 180 (3d Cir. 1998) (prosecution sufficiently established a chain of custody for seized drugs, despite the fact that there was a tear in the plastic bag holding the drugs that was not present when the drugs were tested and weighed); United States v. Miller, 994 F.2d 441 (8th Cir. 1993) (a one-year gap in the chain of custody for contraband goes to the weight and not the admissibility of the evidence; there was no showing of bad faith on the part of government officials, who are entitled to a presumption that they did not alter the proffered evidence).

(n10)Footnote 10. See, e.g., United States v. Scharon, 187 F.3d 17 (1st Cir. 1999) (break in the chain of custody respecting a suitcase containing drugs "factors into the weight given to the evidence rather than its admissibility"); United States v. Hon, 904 F.2d 803 (2d Cir. 1990) (the defendant pointed to defects in the chain of custody including an incorrectly labeled evidence bag, a bag carried by a witness who did not testify, bags that were left open for a couple of months, and a lack of written records; the Court concluded that these deficiencies went to weight and not admissibility);

United States v. Shaw, 920 F.2d 1225 (5th Cir. 1991) (no abuse of discretion to admit contraband evidence against the defendant, even though the custodian of the search team could not remember who delivered the contraband for analysis or whether it was delivered by hand or placed in the analyst's night deposit box; there was sufficient evidence to support a finding that the drugs introduced at trial were the drugs found in the defendant's motel room, and any gaps or deficiencies went to weight and not admissibility); United States v. Roberson, 897 F.2d 1092 (11th Cir. 1990) (gaps in the chain of custody go to weight and not admissibility).

(n11)Footnote 11. See, e.g., United States v. Thomas, 294 F.3d 899 (7th Cir. 2002) (tape recording properly authenticated as it was clear that the tape was in police custody at all times and this creates "a presumption that the tapes were handled properly").

(n12)Footnote 12. See, e.g., United States v. Casamento, 887 F.2d 1141 (2d Cir. 1989) (there was insufficient authentication that a bag tested by a chemist came from the defendant's garage; the officer who seized property in the garage could not remember whether he seized a bag, and the bag was not mentioned on the inventory list of property seized from the garage).

(n13)Footnote 13. See, e.g., United States v. Price, 265 F.3d 1097 (10th Cir. 2001) (chain of custody attack concerning drugs after they were tested was "off-target because the actual drugs were never admitted into evidence").

(n14)Footnote 14. See, e.g., United States v. Kelly, 14 F.3d 1169 (7th Cir. 1994) (chain of custody was sufficiently established where seals on the evidence bags remained intact until broken by the chemist for laboratory analysis; subsequent loss of the evidence was not fatal because "the government is not required to introduce narcotics in evidence in order to obtain a narcotics conviction").

(n15)Footnote 15. See, e.g., United States v. Thomas, 987 F.2d 1298 (7th Cir. 1993) : At trial, the officer testified that he found a shotgun at the defendant's premises. He identified a picture of the shotgun, and described the gun by brand, gauge, length of barrel, and cut-back stock. He identified the government's exhibit by the same brand, length of barrel, gauge, and cut-back stock. But he was never specifically asked, and did not state, whether the government exhibit was in fact the shotgun that he found at the defendant's premises. The Court held that this was not fatal to proper authentication of the shotgun under Rule 901. The Court reasoned that the similarities noted between the shotgun described by the officer and the gun introduced at trial were "striking" and that the jury was able to compare the gun to a picture of the shotgun identified by the officer.

See also United States v. Humphrey, 208 F.3d 1190 (10th Cir. 2000) (gap in chain of custody of several weeks did not render documents inadmissible, because the documents were not "fungible evidence, such as drugs or cash, where absent a reliable chain of custody there would be a relatively high risk that the original item had been contaminated or tampered with").

(n16)Footnote 16. United States v. Clonts, 966 F.2d 1366 (10th Cir. 1992) .

(n17)Footnote 17. See, e.g., United States v. Whittington, 783 F.2d 1210, 1215 (5th Cir. 1986) ("A signature may be identified by testimony of a person familiar with the signature. It is not essential that the witness have been present when the signature was executed.").

(n18)Footnote 18. See, e.g., United States v. Harvey, 117 F.3d 1044 (7th Cir. 1997) (notes concerning a marijuana operation were properly authenticated as belonging to the defendant: "The written materials were found in an isolated and remote area where law enforcement agents observed no one other than Harvey. The materials were within Harvey's campsite; indeed, they were next to Harvey's own bed. The writings also make numerous references to Harvey's beloved dog, Drigo. These distinctive characteristics and circumstances are sufficient to support a finding that the materials were written by Harvey."); United States v. Jones, 107 F.3d 1147 (6th Cir. 1997) (in a prosecution for credit card fraud, the government offered a card purportedly signed by the defendant and sent to the father of the defendant's son-in-law; the recipient testified that he did not know the defendant's handwriting, but that the card was signed in the defendant's name and the card contained references to the recipient's family "that no one else could have written"; this was sufficient authentication); United States v. Collado, 957 F.2d 38 (1st Cir. 1992) (circumstantial evidence indicated that the bag of powder dropped by the defendant while attempting to elude arrest was the bag that was introduced against him at trial).

(n19)Footnote 19. See also United States v. McMahon, 938 F.2d 1501 (1st Cir. 1991) : The government offered a note, purportedly written by McMahon, which indicated that he was participating in an act of extortion at a county planning board meeting. McMahon argued that the note was not admissible because there was no testimony from any witness that the handwriting was McMahon's. The Court concluded that testimony as to handwriting is only one means by which a document may be authenticated; under Federal Rule 901(b)(4), a document can be authenticated through circumstantial evidence alone. In this case, there was sufficient circumstantial evidence to support a finding that McMahon was the author of the note: McMahon was seen passing the note at the county planning board meeting; the note was written in the first person, "suggesting in the absence of a signature that the passer of the note was the author"; the note repeated nearly verbatim the conversation between McMahon and the person to whom the note was passed, which conversation was overheard only moments earlier by another board member; and the person to whom the note was passed was hard of hearing, "so there was some basis for thinking that the conversation needed repeating."

(n20)Footnote 20. See, e.g., United States v. Bush, 405 F.3d 909 (10th Cir. 2005) (no error to allow an undercover officer to testify as an authenticating witness that it was the defendant's voice in an incriminating conversation that was surreptitiously recorded and played at trial; the witness had sufficient familiarity with the defendant's voice as he had spoken to him in person and numerous times over the phone; voice identification "need only rise to the level of minimal familiarity" and once that standard has been satisfied, "it is for the jury to assess any issues regarding the extent of the witness's familiarity with the voice."); United States v. Saulter, 60 F.3d 270 (7th Cir. 1995) (no error in a government witness' identification of two coconspirators on a tape recording; the witness' familiarity with one of the coconspirators was limited to having purchased narcotics from him on two occasions, but "minimal familiarity is sufficient for admissibility purposes"); United States v. Torres, 908 F.2d 1417 (9th Cir. 1990) (a voice heard on tape recordings was sufficiently identified by testimony of a DEA agent that he had spoken with a defendant and recognized her voice on the tapes and by evidence that she was the only person at the location who responded to the name used on the tapes).

(n21)Footnote 21. See United States v. Harvey, 117 F.3d 1044 (7th Cir. 1997) (admitting a tape recording as a party-admission requires proof by a preponderance of evidence that the defendant was the speaker on the tape; while authenticity is governed by Rule 104(b), admissibility of hearsay is governed by Rule 104(a)).

(n22)Footnote 22. See, e.g., Baulch v. Johns, 70 F.3d 813 (5th Cir. 1995) (autopsy report was properly authenticated when it was turned over by the Chief of Police, one of the defendants, in response to the plaintiffs' subpoena duces tecum); United States v. Blackwood, 878 F.2d 1200 (9th Cir. 1989) (tax forms were properly authenticated because they were in the custody of the IRS).

(n23)Footnote 23. See, e.g., United States v. Kairys, 782 F.2d 1374 (7th Cir. 1986) (Nazi SS card was properly authenticated by testimony that: it matched other authenticated Nazi personnel cards in form; it was found in Soviet Union archives, which were a depository for such documents; and its paper fiber was consistent with documents more than 20 years old).

(n24)Footnote 24. *See Johnson-Wooldridge v. Wooldridge, 2001 Ohio App. LEXIS 3319 at 11 (Ohio App. July 26, 2001) . See also Perfect 10, Inc. v. Cybernet Ventures, Inc., 213 F. Supp. 2d 1146, 1154 (C.D. Cal. 2002) (admitting on a preliminary injunction motion copies of pages from defendant's and third party websites (as to the latter of which the furnished "webpages contain[ed] ... the internet domain address from which the image was printed and the date on which it was printed") because "the declarations, particularly in combination with circumstantial indicia of authenticity (such as the dates and web addresses), would support a reasonable juror in the belief that the documents are what [plaintiff] says they are;" noting the "reduced evidentiary standard in preliminary injunction motions").

(n25)Footnote 25. See, e.g., Actonet, Ltd. v. Allou Health & Beauty Care, 219 F.3d 836, 848 (8th Cir. 2000)

("HTML codes may present visual depictions of evidence. We conclude, therefore, that HTML codes are similar enough to photographs to apply the criteria for admission of photographs to the admission of HTML codes").

(n26)Footnote 26. See, e.g., Wady v. Provident Life & Accident Ins. Co. of Am., 216 F. Supp. 2d 1060, 1064-1065 (C.D. Cal. 2002) ("Defendants have objected on the grounds that [counsel] has no personal knowledge of who maintains the website, who authored the documents, or the accuracy of their contents" -- objections sustained).

(n27)Footnote 27. Fed.R.Evid. 104(a) provides that:

> Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

(n28)Footnote 28. Fed.R.Evid. 104(b) provides that:

> Relevancy conditioned on fact.-- When the relevancy of evidence depends upon the fulfillment of a condition of fact, the court shall admit it upon, or subject to, the introduction of evidence sufficient to support a finding of the fulfillment of the condition.

(n29)Footnote 29. See, e.g., United States v. Jackson, 208 F.3d 633, 637 (7th Cir. 2000) ("Jackson needed to show that the web postings in which the white supremacist groups took responsibility for the racist mailing actually were posted by the groups, as opposed to being slipped onto the groups' web sites by Jackson herself, who was a skilled computer user.").

(n30)Footnote 30. Fed.R.Evid. 902(5) provides that the following are self-authenticating: Official publications. -- Books, pamphlets, or other publications purporting to be issued by public authority.

(n31)Footnote 31. *See, e.g., Sannes v. Jeff Wyler Chevrolet, Inc., 1999 U.S.Dist.LEXIS 21748 at 10 n. 3 (S.D. Ohio March 31, 1999) ("The FTC press releases, printed from the FTC's government world wide web page, are self-authenticating official publications under Rule 902(5) of the Federal Rules of Evidence"). See also Elliott Assocs., L.P. v. Banco de la Nacion, 194 F.R.D. 116, 121 (S.D.N.Y. 2000) (discussed below; holding that prime rates published on the Federal Reserve Board website satisfy the hearsay exception of Federal Rule of Evidence 803(17). But see State v. Davis, 141 Wash.2d 798, 854, 10 P.3d 977, 1010 (2000) (no abuse of discretion in excluding, in death penalty case, defendant's proffer of state population statistics obtained from official state website; affirming exclusion on hearsay grounds but stating that "[a]n unauthenticated printout obtained from the Internet does not ... qualify as a self authenticating document under ER 902(e) [the Washington State equivalent of Federal Rule of Evidence 902(5)]"). There is reason to believe, however, that Davis may be limited to its facts. See State v. Rapose, 2004 WL 585856 [2004 Wash. App. LEXIS 560] at *5 (Wash. App. Mar. 25, 2004) (unpublished opinion).

(n32)Footnote 32. *See, e.g., Superhighway Consulting, Inc. v. Techwave, Inc., 1999 U.S.Dist.LEXIS 17910 at 6 (N.D.Ill. Nov. 15, 1999) .

(n33)Footnote 33. *Tibbetts v. RadioShack Corp., 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19835, at 44 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 30, 2004) .

(n34)Footnote 34. *Middlebrook v. Anderson, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1976, at 14 (N.D. Tex. Feb. 11, 2005) (jurisdictional motion).

(n35)Footnote 35. Thus, courts have looked at the "electronic 'signature' " at the end of the email message identifying the name and business affiliation of the sender. See, e.g., Sea-Land Serv., Inc. v. Lozen Int'l, LLC, 285 F.3d

808, 821 (9th Cir. 2002) (held, email by one employee forwarded to party opponent by a fellow employee -- containing the electronic signature of the latter -- constitutes an admission of a party opponent and thus is not hearsay).

(n36)Footnote 36. Since authentication issues are decided by the court under Federal Rule of Evidence 104(a), live testimony from such a witness is not essential; an affidavit or declaration may be equally effective.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IX. Authentication And Identification
CHAPTER 901 RULE 901

5-901 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 901.03

901.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Rule 901(a) -- General Provisions

[a] Rule 901(a) -- Altered Evidence

Siegal v. American Honda Motor Co., 921 F.2d 15 (1st Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed a summary judgment for the defendant in a product liability action arising out of a motorcycle accident, holding the Trial Judge properly excluded the motorcycle's handlebar assembly upon finding it had been intentionally altered following the parties' inspection of it and while in the plaintiff's exclusive control. Once the assembly had been altered beyond restoration to its condition at the time of the accident, it was no longer probative evidence of the only defect alleged by the plaintiff.

[b] Rule 901(a) -- Beeper Charts

United States v. Alicea-Cardoza, 132 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1997) : At a narcotics conspiracy trial, the government introduced "beeper charts" -- a record of all calls made to a beeper of one of the coconspirators. Many of the calls were from "Burbuja," and independent evidence indicated that the defendant went by that name. The Court rejected, as having nothing to do with authenticity, the argument that the records were not sufficiently authenticated because there was no evidence, other than self-identification, that the defendant actually made any of the calls to the beeper. The charts purported only to record the messages that were received, and that was sufficiently established by testimony of an investigating officer, who stated that beeper charts are produced by a pen register, and are checked against a cloned beeper, i.e., a beeper identical to that to which the message is sent. Whether the "Burbuja" who sent the messages was the defendant "is a separate question not within the purview of Rule 901."

[c] Rule 901(a) -- Chain of Custody

[i] Rule 901(a) -- Chain of Custody -- Blood and Tissue

United States v. Ladd, 885 F.2d 954 (1st Cir. 1989) : The Court affirmed a conviction for distribution of heroin, holding that authenticity of blood and urine samples processed by a state laboratory was sufficiently established and stating that "some links in the chain were rusty, but none were missing." Missing links in the chain of samples submitted to a private lab made admission error, but the error was held harmless.

United States v. Mendel, 746 F.2d 155 (2d Cir. 1984) : The Court sustained a company's convictions for making false representations to the United States Department of Agriculture, as it found that the government satisfactorily authenticated certain blood samples that it introduced by conclusively establishing a chain of custody.

Ballou v. Henri Studios, Inc., 656 F.2d 1147 (5th Cir. 1981) : The Court said that exclusion of blood tests indicating that the automobile driver was intoxicated at the time of a collision was reversible error:

> [T]he question whether the proponent of evidence has proved an adequate chain of custody goes to the weight rather than the admissibility of the evidence, and is thus reserved for the jury ... . Likewise, the issue of alteration, contamination or adulteration of the evidence is a question for the jury once the proponent of the evidence makes a threshold showing that reasonable precautions were taken against the risk of alteration, contamination or adulteration (emphasis added).

Cooper v. Eagle River Mem. Hosp., 270 F.3d 456 (7th Cir. 2001) : Affirming a judgment for the hospital in a malpractice action on behalf of an infant who died eight months after his mother's treatment at the hospital, the Court found no error in the admission of a pathology slide containing tissue samples from the plaintiff's placenta. Although the plaintiff complained that there was no chain of custody shown, Rule 901(a) was satisfied by evidence that the reference number on the slide matched the specimen number contained in the plaintiff's pathology report. There was no evidence of misconduct by the hospital nor was there any evidence to suggest that the sample came from a source other than the plaintiff.

United States v. Vallie, 284 F.3d 917 (8th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed convictions for sexual abuse and incest on an Indian reservation, finding no error in the admission of DNA evidence obtained from items collected by the victim's sister. It concluded that the defendant failed to make a showing of bad faith, ill will, or tampering. In Hoover v. Thompson, n1 the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in a suit by a widow whose husband was killed in an auto accident, finding no error in the admission of a blood alcohol test showing that the husband's blood alcohol level was.11. Although the blood sample lacked a seal when it reached the state lab, the Court found that the testimony showed that the probability of tampering was low.

In re Exxon Valdez, 270 F.3d 1215 (9th Cir. 2001) : Affirming a judgment against the captain of an oil tanker that ran aground and caused massive pollution damage, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of intoxication based on blood samples taken 11 hours after the incident. The captain argued that a discrepancy between the evidence log and the lab notes regarding the color of stoppers on the tubes containing blood samples was fatal to admission, but the Court held that evidence regarding sealed tubes with the captain's name and social security number on them was good enough that reasonable jurors could conclude that the tubes contained the captain's blood.

[ii] Rule 901(a) -- Chain of Custody -- Drugs

United States v. Scharon, 187 F.3d 17 (1st Cir. 1999) : Reviewing under a plain error standard the defendant's argument that there was a break in the chain of custody with respect to a suitcase seized from him that contained drugs, the Court in this drug and counterfeiting case stated that "[a] possible defect in the chain of custody for a certain piece of evidence factors into the weight given to the evidence rather than its admissibility." In United States v. Abreu, 952 F.2d 1458 (1st Cir. 1992) , the Court affirmed cocaine conspiracy and related firearms convictions, holding that distinguishing characteristics sufficiently identified a sawed-off shotgun and bags of cocaine, even though there were gaps in the chain of custody. In United States v. Collado, n2 the Court affirmed a conviction for possessing cocaine and heroin, holding that a plastic bag containing heroin and cocaine had been sufficiently connected with the defendant by a chain of custody and by testimony regarding its distinctively packaged and labeled contents.

United States v. Jackson, 345 F.3d 59 (2d Cir. 2003) : In a crack cocaine prosecution, the government presented a videotape showing one defendant giving drugs to an informant. To establish authenticity, a DEA agent testified to surveilling the informant before and after the videotaped transaction, an agent testified as to DEA field testing and storage of the drugs, and a chemist testified as to laboratory testing. The Court found no abuse of discretion in a ruling that a proper chain of custody had been established. The fact that the informant delivered four rocks to the DEA, whereas the video showed the informant receiving five rocks, went to the weight of the evidence and not its admissibility. In United States v. Grant, 967 F.2d 81 (2d Cir. 1992) (per curiam), the Court held that a 14-day gap in the chain of custody between the time packages allegedly containing drugs were seized and the time they were analyzed did not make the chemist's testimony insufficient to support the defendant's drug importation conviction. The Court stated that because the drugs were not introduced at trial, there was no need to authenticate them; the chemist's testimony needed only to meet the Rule 401 relevancy test of a "tendency" to make a material fact more or less probable.

United States v. Dent, 149 F.3d 180 (3d Cir. 1998) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to distribute crack cocaine, holding the prosecution sufficiently established a chain of custody for seized drugs, despite a tear (which was not present when the drugs were tested and weighed) in the plastic bag holding the vials and minor variations in the witnesses' descriptions of the drugs.

United States v. Howard-Arias, 679 F.2d 363 (4th Cir. 1982) : In a prosecution involving marijuana seized on the high seas, the Court commented that "the ultimate question is whether the authentication testimony was sufficiently complete so as to convince the court that it is improbable that the original item had been exchanged with another or otherwise tampered with." In United States v. Arias, n3 the Court held that a prosecution expert was properly permitted to rely on a sample pill sent to the expert by a DEA agent in Colombia "in a heat sealed container by diplomatic pouch with the agent's identification thereupon." The Court indicated that forensic scientists reasonably rely upon samples provided by field agents.

United States v. Dixon, 132 F.3d 192 (5th Cir. 1997) : Two government witnesses each testified that they delivered a particular bag of cocaine; one testified that the other's testimony was mistaken because the other had delivered the bag to him. The Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the bag, even if the apparent contradiction between the witnesses did support an inference of a break in the chain of custody, since that simply goes to the weight of the evidence. In United States v. Logan, 949 F.2d 1370 (5th Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed convictions for drug and firearms offenses, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting cocaine and a pistol that had been locked in the trunk of an officer's car for four days from the defendants' arrest until it was turned over for proper processing. The delay did not shatter irreparably the chain of custody, as only the officer had access to the trunk, and there was otherwise a prima facie showing of the authenticity of the evidence. In United States v. Shaw, n4 the Court affirmed a conviction for possession of methamphetamine with intent to distribute, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the contraband evidence, even though the custodian of the search team could not remember whether he or another officer delivered it for analysis or whether it was hand-delivered or placed in the analyst's night deposit box, and even though numerous chemists had access to the evidence in the course of analysis. There was sufficient evidence to conclude that the drug analyzed and introduced came from the defendant's motel room.

United States v. Kelly, 14 F.3d 1169 (7th Cir. 1994) : The Court held that the government's failure to explain the loss of seized narcotics did not require suppression of the seizing officer's testimony, as there is no need for a sample of the narcotics seized to be placed before the jury and there was no indication that the lost contraband was anything but what the chemical analysis indicated it to be. The Court noted, however, that explanations should be provided in case of loss, to protect the integrity of the criminal justice system. As to drugs that were introduced, the Court found a minimally sufficient chain of custody had been provided. In United States v. Boykins, 9 F.3d 1278 (7th Cir. 1993) , the Court affirmed drug and firearms convictions, holding there was no error in admitting two exhibits containing cocaine, where the officer who vouchered the evidence was unable to tell which exhibit had been recovered by one officer who retrieved it after it was discarded from a fleeing van and which had been found by another officer during a subsequent search of the van. Where both exhibits were safely in custody of the police department from the time of recovery to introduction at trial and they showed no evidence of any tampering, any gaps in the chain of custody went only to the weight of the evidence.

United States v. Pressley, 978 F.2d 1026 (8th Cir. 1992) : The defendant, convicted for possession of cocaine with intent to sell, asserted that there was no sufficient showing that the substances analyzed and admitted into evidence were the same as those seized, because the person who took the seized substances to a vault after a first prosecution ended in a mistrial was not produced by the government. Affirming, the Court held it was sufficient that the officer making the seizure had testified he marked the substances at that time and that the packages admitted still bore his marks, and that the chemist testified that the substances she tested had come from the same bags. Once the Trial Judge is satisfied that the relevant article has not, in all reasonable probability, been changed in any important respect, doubts about its identity go only to its weight. In United States v. Houston, n5 the Court held that a sufficient chain of custody for seized cocaine offered at trial had been established by evidence that a police officer delivered the exhibits and watched as they were transferred to new containers at the drug laboratory and that his handwriting appeared on the packaging of the exhibits, and by the testimony of a witness who accepted the exhibits at the laboratory, removed and transferred the cocaine from the original to the trial containers, and weighed and marked the exhibits.

United States v. Price, 265 F.3d 1097 (10th Cir. 2001) : Affirming narcotics-related convictions, the Court held there was no chain of custody problem because the actual drugs recovered were never admitted into evidence, and that, in any event, the government had established an adequate chain of custody of the drugs from the defendant's possession to the state bureau of investigation. In United States v. Washington, 11 F.3d 1510 (10th Cir. 1993) , the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting cocaine purchased by an informant in a series of controlled buys. Even though the informant had at least one opportunity during the course of each transaction to tamper with the contraband, there was a reasonable probability that the cocaine base recovered had not been altered in any material respect, so any flaws in the chain of custody went to the weight of the evidence, not to its admissibility. In United States v. Cardenas, n6 the Court found that an adequate chain of custody had been laid for cocaine to be admitted. It stated that the test for an item that is not readily identifiable and is subject to alteration by contamination or tampering is whether the chain is complete enough to render it improbable that the original item has been exchanged or tampered with.

United States v. Roberson, 897 F.2d 1092 (11th Cir. 1990) : Affirming a conviction for cocaine offenses, the Court rejected complaints that there were two gaps in the making of the chemical analysis, holding that gaps in the chain of custody affect only the weight of the evidence and not its admissibility.

[iii] Rule 901(a) -- Chain of Custody -- Other Evidence

United States v. Del Rosario, 388 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2004) : In a drug distribution conspiracy trial, a government witness described a cell phone as having been seized from a defendant upon his arrest in New York. The Court held the reference was error (but harmless), as the witness had only processed the phone at the DEA's San Juan office and had no personal knowledge that it was the defendant's, the agent who seized the phone did not testify, and the government never established a chain of custody tracing the phone from the defendant's bag to the witness' hands.

United States v. Lauersen, 343 F.3d 604 (2d Cir. 2003) : In a trial for health care fraud, an anesthesiologist testifying for the government explained how he prepared charts and reports in which he disguised the true nature of the procedures employed by the defendant and sent them to a record-keeping business operated by his father. The government obtained the records from the business, and an FBI agent used the code supplied by the anesthesiologist to create a summary chart of the disguised procedures contained in the records. The Court held that testimony by the FBI agent that the records were produced by the father in response to a subpoena and were faithfully maintained by the FBI while in government custody was sufficient to demonstrate that the contents had not changed. In United States v. Grant, 967 F.2d 81 (2d Cir. 1992) (per curiam), the Court held that a 14-day gap in the chain of custody between the time packages allegedly containing drugs were seized and the time they were analyzed did not make the chemist's testimony insufficient to support the defendant's drug importation conviction. The Court stated that because the drugs were not introduced at trial, there was no need to authenticate them; the chemist's testimony needed only to meet the Rule 401 relevancy test of a "tendency" to make a material fact more or less probable. In our view, this case illustrates an anomaly in the way a chain of custody question is usually approached. As a matter of relevance, a chain of custody between seizure and chemical analysis is more important than between analysis and introduction at trial. That is, it is critical that the white powder analyzed is the same as the powder seized from the defendant, but the powder introduced at trial is really only illustrative (because the jury cannot analyze it), so it is not important whether it is exactly the same as the powder seized. Thus, the Court's reliance only on Rule 401 -- although consistent with the language of the Rules (which have no explicit chain of custody requirement) -- seems to apply the less strict standard of relevance at just the place where a stricter chain of custody foundation should be required. In United States v. Hon, 904 F.2d 803 (2d Cir. 1990) , the Court affirmed a conviction for trafficking in counterfeit wristwatches, holding that although the government could have been more careful in handling exhibits, there was ample evidence supporting admission of the watches allegedly seized from the defendant.

United States v. Howard-Arias, 679 F.2d 363 (4th Cir. 1982) : In a prosecution involving marijuana seized on the high seas, the Court commented with respect to authentication that "the ultimate question is whether the authentication testimony was sufficiently complete so as to convince the court that it is improbable that the original item had been exchanged with another or otherwise tampered with."

United States v. Guidry, 406 F.3d 314 (5th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession arising from a robbery. It found no abuse of discretion in the admission of duct tape and twine found at the crime scene. Although the chain of custody for the exhibits was not completely documented, it was established by testimony from the relevant police officers, and the defense was able to explore any weakness in the chain on cross-examination. In United States v. Jardina, n7 the Court sustained a conviction for passing counterfeit notes, finding that a sufficient foundation was laid for admission of two counterfeit notes, even though the chain of custody was not complete. A reasonable jury could find from the evidence that there was a connection between the notes and the defendant, and any break in the chain of custody went to weight, not admissibility. In United States v. White, 569 F.2d 263 (5th Cir. 1978) , the Court said that "the mere possibility of a break in the chain does not render the physical evidence inadmissible." And in United States v. Henderson, 588 F.2d 157 (5th Cir. 1979) , the Court said that chain of custody problems went to weight, not admissibility.

United States v. Smith, 308 F.3d 726 (7th Cir. 2002) : Affirming convictions for marijuana and tax offenses, the Court found a sufficient chain of custody for documents seized at the defendant's residence during execution of a search warrant. The documents were in official custody at all times, which creates a presumption of regularity, and the defendant did not point to evidence specifically raising the issue of tampering, so his claims that the documents were not properly catalogued and could not be identified by the agents went only to the weight of the evidence. In United States v. Lampson, 627 F.2d 62 (7th Cir. 1980) , the Court said:

> [I]t has been held that whether the Government has proven an adequate chain of custody goes to the weight of the evidence, rather than admissibility ... . [T]his principle is usually applied in cases where there is a question about some change in the condition of the evidence between apprehension and testing ... . Courts need exercise greater care when the issue concerns the very identity of the evidence, rather than just possible changes in its condition. The Government's burden of proving each and every element of the crime cannot be diluted by unwarranted presumptions about the evidence it seeks to introduce. Although such heightened scrutiny is appropriate for chain of custody identification claims, automatic exclusion is not required. Whether or not the possible problem with the Government's proof is sufficiently serious to take it from the jury rests in the sound discretion of the trial judge.

United States v. Briley, 319 F.3d 360 (8th Cir. 2003) : The defendant, charged with possession of counterfeit currency, claimed that the bills allegedly seized from him should not have been admitted because they did not correspond to the receipt that the Secret Service had given to the seizing deputy. The Court held that the chain of custody was sufficient because the total number of bills was the same, all bore notations made by the Secret Service when the deputy turned them over, and the discrepancy was easily explainable as a clerical error. In United States v. Mays, n8 the Court held dye-stained money was properly admitted even though none of the witnesses could testify that the bills were the same ones they received. In United States v. McCowan, 706 F.2d 863 (8th Cir. 1983) (per curiam), the Court affirmed a conviction for fraud involving food stamps, and in response to a challenge to the chain of custody of tape recordings, observed that "[g]enerally, a district court may assume that public officials who had custody of the evidence properly discharged their duty and did not tamper with the evidence." The Court added that an article may be introduced "[i]f the trial court is satisfied that in reasonable probability the article has not been changed in any important respect."

United States v. Edwards, 235 F.3d 1173 (9th Cir. 2000) (per curiam): The defendant was charged with cocaine possession after a bag containing crack cocaine was found in a car driven by the defendant. The car was registered to another person, and one officer who was present when the car was searched testified that there was nothing in the bag that established the identity of the owner. The night the officer testified, the prosecutor, in violation of the local rule requiring that admitted evidence be kept by the clerk, examined the bag, which had been in the custody of the police for two years, and found a bail receipt bearing the defendant's name under a piece of cardboard at the bottom. The defendant's conviction was reversed, 154 F.3d 915 (9th Cir. 1998) (see annotation at § 601.03[1]) for violation of the attorney-voucher rule when the officers present at the examination testified to the prosecutor's discovery. On retrial, the Court reversed the defendant's conviction again, holding that the bail receipt should have been excluded. The search of the bag in violation of the local rule and the failure to take other necessary precautions, such as inventorying the numerous papers seized from the car in which the bag was found, led the Court to conclude the evidence was "inherently unreliable" and that the bail receipt should have been excluded. In United States v. Coades, 549 F.2d 1303 (9th Cir. 1977) , a bank robber claimed that it was error to admit into evidence a microscopic piece of glass found in a leather jacket belonging to him, because the chain of custody of the jacket was not sufficiently established to ensure that the glass was not inadvertently introduced by someone handling the jacket subsequent to the crime. Affirming, the Court said, "A mere showing that an opportunity existed for unlawful tampering with the evidence is insufficient to justify exclusion; affirmative evidence of bad faith or actual tampering is required."

United States v. Humphrey, 208 F.3d 1190 (10th Cir. 2000) : Remanding methamphetamine possession convictions on other grounds, the Court ruled that a purse containing documents need not have been excluded even though an officer kept it in his office for several weeks without examining the contents or transferring it to a secure evidence room. The contents of the purse were not "fungible evidence, such as drugs or cash, where absent a reliable chain of custody there would be a relatively high risk that the original item had been contaminated or tampered with." There was no abuse of discretion in concluding that the jury could find that the documents were what the government claimed them to be, and that any deficiency in the chain of custody went to weight. In United States v. Brewer, 630 F.2d 795 (10th Cir. 1980) , the Court framed the authentication issue as follows:

> This preliminary issue of admissibility is for the court to decide -- it must ascertain whether there is a reasonable probability that the evidence has not been altered in any material aspect since the time of the crime and that it reasonably has a tendency to establish facts of consequence in the action as more probable than they would be without the evidence ... . Absent a clear abuse of discretion, the court's decision on this issue will not be disturbed.

It said that the lack of positive identification and proof of connection of the specific drugs to the defendants went to the weight, not the admissibility, of the evidence.

[iv] Rule 901(a) -- Chain of Custody -- Tape Recordings

United States v. Thomas, 294 F.3d 899 (7th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed cocaine-related convictions, holding that a tape recording of a conversation among the defendant, another participant in a drug deal, and an undercover officer was properly authenticated when the other participant identified the voices on the tape and authenticated the conversation. In response to the argument that the government did not establish a chain of custody for the recording, the Court stated that "so long as other evidence is sufficient to establish the accuracy and authenticity of the tapes, lack of proof regarding a chain of custody does not render tapes inadmissible."

[v] Rule 901(a) -- Chain of Custody -- Weapons

United States v. Carlos Cruz, 352 F.3d 499 (1st Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed drug-trafficking convictions, finding that a sufficient chain of custody for two machine guns was laid where the agent who seized the guns testified that he took them to police headquarters and kept them until a BATF agent arrived to take them, and the BATF agent testified that he kept them in his custody until he prepared a property-inventory form on which the guns were listed. In United States v. Myers, 294 F.3d 203 (1st Cir. 2002) , the defendant was detained after a high-speed chase, during which he was seen throwing an object out the window. Ammunition was found in his car. A search of the area traversed during the chase yielded a handgun, and later a citizen turned in a gun found in the same vicinity. Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court found no error in admitting the guns. Witnesses testified how they came upon the guns, and given the circumstantial evidence (that ammunition was found in the car, that the defendant threw something from the car, and that the guns were found along the route), the Court concluded that the government had made an "ample" showing to connect the defendant with the guns. In United States v. Abreu, n9 the Court affirmed cocaine conspiracy and related firearms convictions, and held that distinguishing characteristics sufficiently identified a sawed-off shotgun and bags of cocaine, even though there were gaps in the chain of custody.

United States v. Logan, 949 F.2d 1370 (5th Cir. 1991) : Affirming convictions for drug and firearms offenses, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting cocaine and a pistol that had been locked in the trunk of an officer's car for four days from the defendants' arrest until it was turned over for proper processing. The delay did not shatter irreparably the chain of custody, as only the officer had access to the trunk, and there was otherwise a prima facie showing of the authenticity of the evidence.

United States v. Douglas, 964 F.2d 738 (8th Cir. 1992) : The Court held that the chain of custody for a handgun in a felon firearm possession case was adequately shown, even though reports identified the weapon originally seized as.38-caliber, rather than the.32-20-caliber revolver introduced into evidence.

[d] Rule 901(a) -- Depositions and Trial Transcripts

Orr v. Bank of Am., NT & SA, 285 F.3d 764 (9th Cir. 2002) : In an action by a bank organizer against her former employer for allegedly disclosing disparaging information to the FDIC, the Court affirmed summary judgment granted for the defendant after many of the exhibits for her opposition were ruled inadmissible. The Court held that exhibits purporting to be deposition extracts lacked the reporter's certification and the names of the deponent and the action, and that the defense attorney's affidavit that the exhibit was a "true and correct copy" was insufficient because the attorney lacked personal knowledge of the deposition. Likewise, exhibits purporting to be transcripts of testimony from a trial were not sufficiently authenticated when they did not identify the names of the witness, the trial, and the Judge and were not certified copies of the reporter's transcript.

[e] Rule 901(a) -- Extent of Foundation Required

United States v. Blackwell, 694 F.2d 1325 (D.C. Cir. 1982) : A defendant convicted of firearms offenses claimed that the government could not lay a foundation for the inference that the gun he was shown carrying in photos was the one seized during a search. The Court found sufficient circumstantial evidence to support a finding that the photos were taken close in time to the search and that the gun pictured was the gun found in the search. Furthermore, any gap in the government's foundation was cured by the defendant's testimony.

United States v. McMahon, 938 F.2d 1501 (1st Cir. 1991) : In a prosecution for extortion, the Court held that even though a witness was unable to testify that he recognized handwriting on a note as the defendant's, the note was sufficiently authenticated by evidence that the defendant was observed passing the note to a colleague, it repeated nearly verbatim the contents of a conversation between the defendant and the colleague (who was hard of hearing) that a different witness had overheard only moments before, and it raised matters unique to the defendant.

United States v. Tin Yat Chin, 371 F.3d 31 (2d Cir. 2004) : The Court vacated a conviction arising from an immigration fraud scheme because credit card receipts offered by the defendant to prove an alibi were improperly excluded as lacking authentication. The defendant's proffered testimony from (1) his wife, a co-holder of the credit card, that she had not made the purchases, (2) from a store manager regarding their transaction practices, and (3) from a handwriting expert identifying the defendant's signature was sufficient to surmount the relatively low authentication hurdle. Prosecution evidence placing the defendant in China at the time the receipts were generated, and possibilities that the originals had been signed by the wife or left unsigned, went to the weight of the evidence, not its admissibility. In SCS Communications, Inc. v. Herrick Co., 360 F.3d 329 (2d Cir. 2004) , a breach of contract action arising from a failed attempt by a joint venture to acquire a company, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in the admission of a notebook belonging to one of the venturers, which contained a note that "[t]he more you [underlined four times] say, the more you will get hurt on cross unless it is our party line." Although the note was written in a different hand from notes admittedly written by the venturer, a reasonable juror could find that the venturer or someone known to him wrote the statement to remind him not to stray from the defendants' scenario, from evidence that the venturer admitted he owned the notebook, that he brought it to his deposition, that it was full of his handwriting from the year he was deposed, and that he wrote the five lines immediately preceding the "party line" notation. In Ricketts v. City of Hartford, n10 the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendants in a civil rights action by a plaintiff who alleged the use of excessive force. After one police officer testified, the plaintiff proffered a tape recording which he claimed contained a statement by this particular officer. The Trial Court excluded the tape because it was not satisfied that the voice belonged to the police officer who testified. The Court concluded that this approach was improper (but harmless error), since "[s]o long as a jury is entitled to reach a contrary conclusion, it must be given the opportunity to do so." In United States v. Ruggiero, n11 the Court affirmed convictions for racketeering, holding that the government had satisfied its burden of producing clear and convincing evidence of authenticity and accuracy as a foundation for admission of tape recordings. The Court noted that this foundation standard was more demanding than that required by the Rule, because recorded evidence is likely to have a strong impression upon a jury and is susceptible to alteration. In our view, the stricter standard may be inconsistent with the admissibility standards set forth in Huddleston v. United States, n12 although a Court may wish to provide greater assurances of reliability through application of Rule 403. In a civil rights action alleging that three police officers beat a suspect after taking him into custody, O'Neal v. Esty, n13 the alleged victim died of other causes before trial and the plaintiff attempted to offer testimony of a police officer for whom the victim had done undercover work that he had called the arresting officer to find out what had happened and that a person, after saying he was a partner of the arresting officer, admitted the beating. The Court reversed exclusion of the evidence, holding that the calling of a listed number, together with self-identification, were enough to authenticate a phone call. As for the fact that the witness could not say which of the defendants he had spoken with, the Court said:

> We conclude that when a plaintiff presents to the trial judge sufficient evidence from which a jury can reasonably find that an admission was made by one of a limited group of two or more of the defendants, the admission should be received in evidence and the jury should be instructed that it may consider the admission against each member of that group of defendants who fails to persuade the jury that he did not make the statement.

United States v. McGlory, 968 F.2d 309 (3d Cir. 1992) : This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 901.02[11]. In United States v. Tyler, 878 F.2d 753 (3d Cir. 1989) , the Court held that a baseball cap introduced in a robbery prosecution was sufficiently authenticated by the testimony of a postal inspector who found it in a search of the defendant's home, and that the differences in color and markings between the cap and the one described by a witness went to the weight rather than the admissibility of the evidence.

United States v. Mojica, 746 F.2d 242 (5th Cir. 1984) : The Court found that a photograph was properly authenticated in a marijuana conspiracy case by testimony that the photo depicted the scene of the arrest. The testimony warranted an inference that the photograph reflected the scene soon after a raid began and established to a reasonable degree the time and place of the photo.

United States v. Lawrence, 934 F.2d 868 (7th Cir. 1991) : Affirming tax evasion convictions arising out of a "skimming" scheme, the Court held that daily sales sheets were sufficiently authenticated and shown to be business records by proof, inter alia, that the defendants' attorney produced the documents in response to a subpoena calling for their business' records. In a prosecution for conspiracy to embezzle government funds, United States v. Brown, n14 the Court upheld the admission of business records that the defendant had turned over through an agent in response to a subpoena. The defendant had produced the records pursuant to an agreement with the government that spared him the need to go before a grand jury. The Court reasoned that, having made the agreement and having had his agent turn over the records, the defendant could not complain that the records were not properly authenticated.

United States v. Coohey, 11 F.3d 97 (8th Cir. 1993) : The Court affirmed a drug trafficking conviction, holding that telephone records had been properly identified by the telephone company's custodian for records from the area code involved. Although the particular records had been sent directly from the depository to the government, the custodian's conclusion on subsequent review that they did not appear to have been altered was sufficient for admissibility. In United States v. Englebrecht, 917 F.2d 376 (8th Cir. 1990) , the Court affirmed a conviction for drug offenses, holding that photographs of the defendant posing next to marijuana plants were sufficiently authenticated, even though there was no direct proof of when or where the pictures were taken. In United States v. Drews, n15 the Court affirmed drug convictions, holding that drugs admitted into evidence were sufficiently shown to be those possessed and distributed by the defendant, even though the evidence on that point was not entirely consistent.

United States v. Pang, 362 F.3d 1187 (9th Cir. 2004) : At a trial for structuring currency transactions and income tax evasion, the prosecution introduced invoices from the defendant and checks from a customer paying those invoices. The Court held that the checks were self-authenticating as negotiable instruments, but the invoices, not being commercial paper, required authentication. A reasonable juror could find the invoices were authentic from the facts that the invoices were identical to other invoices admitted into evidence, they matched carbonless copies of the same invoices in evidence, the numbers were in sequence with numbers of other invoices in evidence, and they correlated dollar-for-dollar with the cancelled checks. In a prosecution for making false statements in a permanent resident application, United States v. Chu Kong Yin, 935 F.2d 990 (9th Cir. 1991) , the Court held that certain Hong Kong criminal records were sufficiently authenticated by testimony together with various certifications and declarations. In E.W. French & Sons, Inc. v. General Portland, Inc., n16 the Court, reversing a directed verdict granted for the defendant in an antitrust case, held that the Trial Judge should not have admitted certain mailing lists located in the defendant's files only "for the limited purpose [of] indicating they were found within [defendant's] files," but should have treated them as prima facie authentic and left authenticity and probative value to the jury. In United States v. Soulard, n17 the Court affirmed convictions for subscribing false corporate income tax returns, holding that the use of bank deposits as circumstantial evidence of unreported income was proper even though the government witnesses apparently did not make an effort to assure that the bank records were complete. The Court reasoned that once authenticity and relevance were demonstrated, the issue of completeness was a question for the jury. See also People of Terr. of Guam v. Ojeda n18(holding that pictures of stolen jewelry were properly admitted in a burglary prosecution when identified by the victim; no chain of custody was required for the jewelry); United States v. One 56-Foot Motor Yacht n19(a diary was properly authenticated by circumstantial evidence); United States v. Johnson n20(the victim of an assault with an ax was permitted to testify that he was "pretty sure" that the exhibit was the ax used against him).

Nolin v. Douglas Cty., 903 F.2d 1546 (11th Cir. 1990) : Affirming dismissal of a civil rights action brought by a former deputy sheriff, the Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding copies of personnel guidelines proffered by the plaintiff, where the only foundation evidence elicited was a defendant's response on cross-examination that he was "somewhat familiar" with the document and a somewhat different document that was offered as self-authenticating but properly excluded as not under seal. In United States v. Garcia, n21 the Court found that testimony that government agents discovered the defendants in possession of counterfeit notes, that these notes were turned over to other agents, and that the notes offered in evidence were counterfeit was sufficient to demonstrate that the notes put in evidence were the same notes taken from the defendants. In Itel Capital Corp. v. Cups Coal Co., n22 the Court affirmed a plaintiff's judgment in an action related to equipment leases, finding that leases and other documents were authenticated by testimony concerning the preparation and maintenance of the documents, even though there was no testimony regarding the signatures. Since the plaintiff relied on theories of ratification and estoppel, proving the signatures was not essential.

[f] Rule 901(a) -- Foreign Language Translation

Kassim v. City of Schenectady, 415 F.3d 246 (2d Cir. 2005) : The operator of a variety store sued for violation of § 1983 after the City closed his business without notice when it foreclosed on his lessor for delinquent property taxes. To prove his losses, the plaintiff offered an English translation of his business records (kept in Arabic), which indicated higher profits than his recent tax returns, but the Judge excluded the records, apparently either because the tax returns were more reliable or because of a notion that a taxpayer is estopped from inconsistently claiming higher earnings in a civil suit against a private party. The Court held that neither explanation would justify the ruling, but that exclusion was proper because the translation was not sufficiently authenticated. The woman who prepared it neither spoke nor read Arabic, so the exhibit consisted of what the plaintiff told her to write, and neither of them testified that she had accurately translated the notes.

[g] Rule 901(a) -- Illustrative Evidence

Carson v. Polley, 689 F.2d 562 (5th Cir. 1982) : In a civil rights case in which the plaintiff claimed that deputy sheriffs used excessive force upon him, the Trial Judge had permitted the defendants to offer a knife to illustrate the type of knife found on the plaintiff when he was arrested. The Court found that it was not made clear to the jury that the knife that was offered was not the knife taken from the plaintiff, but another used for purposes of illustration. This was one of the prejudicial errors requiring a new trial. The Court also suggested that the knife should not have been sent to the jury room.

[h] Rule 901(a) -- Inadequate Authentication

Kassim v. City of Schenectady, 415 F.3d 246 (2d Cir. 2005) : The operator of a variety store sued for violation of § 1983 after the City closed his business without notice when it foreclosed on his lessor for delinquent property taxes. To prove his losses the plaintiff offered an English translation of his business records (kept in Arabic), which indicated higher profits than his recent tax returns, but the Judge excluded the records, apparently either because the tax returns were more reliable or because of a notion that a taxpayer is estopped from inconsistently claiming higher earnings in a civil suit against a private party. The Court held that neither explanation would justify the ruling, but that exclusion was proper because the translation was not sufficiently authenticated. The woman who prepared it neither spoke nor read Arabic, so the exhibit consisted of what the plaintiff told her to write, and neither of them testified that she had accurately translated the notes. In United States v. Almonte, 956 F.2d 27 (2d Cir. 1992) , the Court affirmed a conviction for distributing heroin, holding that an Assistant U.S. Attorney's shorthand summary made after debriefing a witness was not shown to reflect what the witness said sufficiently to be used as a prior inconsistent statement impeaching the witness.

Railroad Mgmt. Co. v. CFS La. Midstream Co., 428 F.3d 214 (5th Cir. 2005) : The plaintiff sued to recover license payments under an agreement of which it claimed to be the assignee. When asked in discovery to produce the assignment agreement, the plaintiff refused on the ground it contained proprietary information. Instead, it submitted, inter alia, a four-page excerpt of the agreement. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant because there was insufficient evidence of a contractual relationship between the parties, the Court held that the contents of the agreement, particularly the relevant time period, were at issue, so the best evidence rule applied. The Court found no abuse of discretion in rejecting the excerpt for insufficient authentication, as it was produced during discovery by the party seeking to benefit from it, rather than the adversary, and there was nothing in the record tending to authenticate it. In Positive Black Talk Inc. v. Cash Money Records Inc., 394 F.3d 357 (5th Cir. 2004) , to rebut the claim by a defendant in a copyright suit that he had recorded an album containing the song at issue before hearing the plaintiffs' song, the plaintiffs offered a promotional mailer for the album that did not list the song. Affirming a judgment for the defendants, the Court held that the mailer was properly excluded because it was not authenticated. One of the foundation witnesses had worked for the alleged source of the mailer, but he had never worked in any capacity related to the creation of mailers and he had no personal knowledge whatsoever regarding the offered mailer. The other foundation witness could only testify that he had received the mailer in the mail. None of this testimony established that the mailer was created by the alleged source or that it had any connection with the defendants. In Stahl v. Novartis Pharms. Corp., n23 the Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant in an action alleging inadequate warnings on a prescription drug, and held there was no error in refusing to consider, as evidence of the contemporary knowledge of the risks, "a collection of lists of medical journal articles [and] paragraph-long summaries of medical journal articles (apparently obtained from an unidentified computerized database)," since there were insufficient indicia as to the authenticity of those resources to satisfy the requirements of Rule 901. In United States v. Skipper, n24 the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit a deferred adjudication order as evidence of other crimes under Rule 404(b). Although the name on the order was the same as the defendant's, there was no proof that the defendant was in fact the same person named in the order. See also United States v. Dockins, 986 F.2d 888 (5th Cir. 1993) , discussed with Skipper in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 901.02[8].

United States v. Stierwalt, 16 F.3d 282 (8th Cir. 1994) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding a photograph taken a few days before trial where no witness testified that it was an accurate representation of the view between vehicles when the charged drug deal took place.

Orr v. Bank of Am., NT & SA, 285 F.3d 764 (9th Cir. 2002) : In an action by a bank organizer against her former employer for allegedly disclosing disparaging information to the FDIC, the Court affirmed summary judgment granted for the defendant after many of the exhibits for her opposition were ruled inadmissible. The Court held that exhibits purporting to be deposition extracts lacked the reporter's certification and the names of the deponent and the action, and that the defense attorney's affidavit that the exhibit was a "true and correct copy" was insufficient because the attorney lacked personal knowledge of the deposition. Likewise, exhibits purporting to be transcripts of testimony from a trial were not sufficiently authenticated when they did not identify the names of the witness, the trial, and the Judge and were not certified copies of the reporter's transcript. A memo on state agency letterhead, which identified both the author and recipient and contained a signature next to their names, lacked foundation because there was no affidavit from the author stating that he wrote the letter or from someone who witnessed the writing or was familiar with the author's signature.

Linear Technology Corp. v. Micrel, Inc., 275 F.3d 1040 (Fed. Cir. 2001) : To prove sales of an allegedly patented product before a certain date, a party in an infringement action offered certain letters ostensibly mentioning the product to customers. The Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding the letters as insufficiently authenticated, since they were not signed, were not on company letterhead, bore no outward indicia of ever having been mailed to a customer, and were not shown by the testimony of any witness to have been mailed.

[i] Rule 901(a) -- Internet and Computer Evidence

[i] Rule 901(a) -- Computer Records

United States v. Whitaker, 127 F.3d 595 (7th Cir. 1997) : The Court held that computer records were sufficiently authenticated in a drug prosecution when an FBI agent testified that the records were retrieved from a computer seized from a conspirator pursuant to a search warrant and that he had observed installation of software on the machine and retrieval of the records using that software.

United States v. Tank, 200 F.3d 627 (9th Cir. 2000) : The defendant participated in an Internet chat room, whose 16 members discussed, traded, and produced child pornography. One of the members of the chat room had recorded all the discussions as text files on his computer whenever he was online; to save space, he had deleted nonsexual conversations and extraneous material, such as date and time stamps. Affirming convictions for sexual exploitation of children, the Court held that these files and printouts from them were sufficiently authenticated by the maker's testimony as to how they were created and that they were an accurate representation of the chat room conversations, and by testimony from several members of the chat room that when they arranged a meeting with the person who used the screen name allegedly used by the defendant in the chat room, it was the defendant who showed up. Any deletions from the computer files went only to the weight of the evidence.

[ii] Rule 901(a) -- Internet Communications

United States v. Jackson, 208 F.3d 633 (7th Cir. 2000) : The defendant, charged with fraud against the Postal Service in a scheme that included falsely attributing hate mail to white supremacist groups, attempted to introduce website postings from those groups that allegedly indicated responsibility for the hate mail. Affirming, the Court held that the web postings lacked authentication, since the defendant failed to show that they were actually posted by the groups, as opposed to being slipped onto the groups' websites by the defendant herself, who was a skilled computer user.

United States v. Simpson, 152 F.3d 1241 (10th Cir. 1998) : In a trial for receiving child pornography over the Internet, the government introduced the printout of a chat room discussion between the defendant and a detective. The Court found no abuse of discretion, since the evidence was sufficiently authenticated by the use of the defendant's first initial, last name, and street address, and by an e-mail address belonging to the defendant, as well as by notations of the detective's name, street address, e-mail address, and telephone number in papers found near the computer in the defendant's home.

United States v. Siddiqui, 235 F.3d 1318 (11th Cir. 2000) : A college professor was charged with making false statements to the National Science Foundation after it was determined that he had himself submitted a nomination and recommendations in the names of others for an award. During the investigation the purported nominator and a purported recommender received e-mails asking the recipient, if contacted by the NSF, to "tell good words" or confirm that the defendant's actions had been authorized. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the e-mails, as they bore the defendant's e-mail address (which was the same as was on an e-mail from the "nominator" that the defense introduced), they contained information likely known only to the defendant, they referred to the author by the nickname the defendant used with the recipients, and the same messages had been communicated by phone calls from the defendant shortly afterwards.

[j] Rule 901(a) -- Party Admission or Production in Discovery

Lexington Ins. Co. v. Western Pa. Hospital, 423 F.3d 318 (3d Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the insurer in a coverage dispute, holding that an internal business form containing handwritten notations without indication of authorship was authenticated by its having been produced by the insurer in response to discovery requests, which was sufficient at least in the absence of any dispute that it was filled out by an employee of the insurer for the purpose for which the form was typically used. In Zenith Radio Corp. v. Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co., n25 a massive antitrust case in which the plaintiffs alleged that the defendants conspired to drive them out of the market for television receivers, the Court reversed most of the summary judgment entered for the defendants and held that the Trial Judge erred in holding that documents that were authenticated against some defendants -- generally by their admissions -- were not authenticated against them all. The Court reasoned that, first, the Trial Judge should see whether there is "evidence admissible against the party having such a relationship to the proffered materials that it is likely to know the facts as to genuineness," and, second, that "[o]nce a prima facie case of genuineness against that party is established, the court should regard the materials as sufficiently authenticated against all parties, subject, of course, to the right of any party to offer evidence to the ultimate factfinder disputing authenticity." In McQueeney v. Wilmington Trust Co., n26

the Court reversed a judgment for a seaman in a Jones Act case, finding that the defendants should have been permitted to offer the seaman's "Sea Records" to limit his damage claim, since the records were amply supported by circumstantial evidence. The seaman produced the records in response to a discovery request, they contained information not widely held, and they appeared to be genuine copies of standard Coast Guard documents.

Snyder v. Whittaker Corp., 839 F.2d 1085 (5th Cir. 1988) : Notes that were produced by a corporation during discovery and that the corporation did not deny were written by one of its senior employees were sufficiently authenticated.

United States v. Lawrence, 934 F.2d 868 (7th Cir. 1991) : Affirming tax evasion convictions arising out of a "skimming" scheme, the Court held that daily sales sheets were sufficiently authenticated and shown to be business records by proof, inter alia, that the defendants' attorney produced the documents in response to a subpoena calling for their business' records. In a prosecution for conspiracy to embezzle government funds, United States v. Brown, n27 the Court upheld the admission of business records that the defendant had turned over through an agent in response to a subpoena. The defendant had produced the records pursuant to an agreement with the government that spared him the need to go before a grand jury. Having made the agreement and having had his agent turn over the records, the Court reasoned that the defendant could not complain that the records were not properly authenticated.

Hangarter v. Provident Life & Acc. Ins. Co., 373 F.3d 998 (9th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed a damage award for a chiropractor who sued his disability insurer for breach of contract and misrepresentation. It held that all of the documents were properly authenticated by a witness who testified that the documents were produced by the defendants in response to a document discovery request. In Orr v. Bank of Am., NT & SA, 285 F.3d 764 (9th Cir. 2002) , an action by a bank organizer against her former employer for allegedly disclosing disparaging information to the FDIC, the Court affirmed summary judgment granted for the defendant after many of the exhibits for her opposition were ruled inadmissible. The Court held that exhibits purporting to be deposition extracts lacked the reporter's certification and the names of the deponent and the action, and that the defense attorney's affidavit that the exhibit was a "true and correct copy" was insufficient because the attorney lacked personal knowledge of the deposition. However, it was error (but harmless) to exclude one such exhibit, because it had been authenticated when offered by the defendant.

Chavez v. Thomas & Betts Corp., 396 F.3d 1088 (10th Cir. 2005) : The Court held that documents produced by the defendant on its letterhead during discovery were properly authenticated.

[k] Rule 901(a) -- Photographs

United States v. Soto-Beniquez, 356 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2003) : Affirming convictions in a complex drug conspiracy prosecution, the Court held that a photograph of a gun seized from one defendant was properly admitted when specific markings on the gun matched a description in the police report and the arresting officer identified the photo.

[l] Rule 901(a) -- Scope of the Rule

Cook v. Hoppin, 783 F.2d 684 (7th Cir. 1986) : Although the Court reversed a judgment for a landlord in a suit by a tenant's visitor who sustained injuries in a fall from an exterior stairway, it found that the Trial Judge properly permitted a witness to testify that during one evening in the winter of 1979 she had heard two men arguing and had later seen one man lying on the ground near the spot where the plaintiff had fallen. The Court rejected the plaintiff's argument that Rule 901(a) was not satisfied, noting that Rule 901 "is applicable to offers of real proof as opposed to testimonial proof."

[m] Rule 901(a) -- Tape Recordings

[i] Rule 901(a) -- Audibility

United States v. Arango-Correa, 851 F.2d 54 (2d Cir. 1988) : Affirming cocaine convictions, the Court held there was no error in admitting tape recordings, even though some portions were inaudible. It noted that "[o]ur decisions in this area reveal a clear preference for the admission of recordings notwithstanding some ambiguity or inaudibility, as long as the recordings are probative."

United States v. Booker, 334 F.3d 406 (5th Cir. 2003) : Affirming convictions for conspiracy to distribute crack cocaine, the Court held that evidence of an audiotape and transcript of a conversation was admissible even if parts were difficult to understand. It noted that the recorded conversation in this case was in English, much of its content was undisputed, two of the three speaking parties confirmed its accuracy, and the Trial Judge instructed the jury to disregard the transcript if it did not accurately reflect the audio recording.

United States v. Moncivais, 401 F.3d 751 (6th Cir. 2005) : Affirming a conviction for conspiring to distribute cocaine, the Court rejected the defendant's argument that a tape recording of a telephone call should have been disregarded because the sound quality was too poor to be reliable. It noted that the defendant had hired his own translator of the Spanish-language conversation of the tape, who had been able to produce a transcript of substantially all of the conversation and also an English translation with which the government agreed. In United States v. Segines, 17 F.3d 847 (6th Cir. 1994) , the Court vacated cocaine convictions, holding that a composite tape recording was admissible under Rule 1006, but that it was error to admit a transcript, where the tape was unintelligible in part. It noted that "[w]hen tapes are unintelligible, ... a transcript intended as an aid to the jury inevitably becomes, in the minds of the jurors, the evidence itself." In United States v. West, n28 the Court affirmed convictions for cocaine offenses and false grand jury testimony, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting recordings where the incomprehensible portions were not so substantial as to render them untrustworthy as a whole.

United States v. Powers, 75 F.3d 335 (7th Cir. 1996) : Affirming a cocaine conspiracy conviction, the Court held that a recording that contains inaudible or unintelligible parts may be admitted unless the inaudible or unintelligible portions are so substantial that they render the recording as a whole untrustworthy.

United States v. Rrapi, 175 F.3d 742 (9th Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed a conviction for bank robbery, holding that the Trial Judge had a sufficient basis for determining the audibility of a surveillance tape recording. Although the Judge did not speak Albanian, the language of the recorded conversation, he could determine by listening to the tape with headsets in a quiet room whether the tape was of sufficient quality and clarity in terms of sounds to allow the jury to assess whether the FBI agent who prepared the translation could have translated the tape. The Judge was not required to rely solely on the conflicting opinions of the government's and the defendant's translators to determine whether the tape was of sufficient clarity to allow a jury to hear it.

United States v. Mittleider, 835 F.2d 769 (10th Cir. 1987) : In a firearms prosecution, the Court found no error in the admission of tape recordings of the defendant's conversations during the sale of a machine gun, even though portions of the tapes were inaudible. Three witnesses who had heard the conversations testified and were subject to cross-examination, and the jury was instructed that written transcripts of the conversations were not evidence and were used only to help them.

United States v. Phelps, 733 F.2d 1464 (11th Cir. 1984) : Affirming Mann Act convictions of a husband and wife, the Court held that the Trial Judge acted properly in reading a summary of a tape recording to the jury as requested by a third defendant. The Judge was concerned about the poor quality of the recording and about possible prejudice to a fourth defendant. He summarized the conversations relied on by the third defendant and told the jury that, although the parties had not agreed that the summary was accurate, he believed that it fairly summarized a tape that could not be played because of its poor quality.

[ii] Rule 901(a) -- Tape Recordings -- Authenticity

United States v. White, 116 F.3d 903 (D.C. Cir. 1997) : Affirming convictions arising from a drug conspiracy, the Court rejected a challenge to the authenticity of tape recordings, declaring that "where one witness testified at length about the process of creating the tapes and identified the originals, and where another witness confirmed the accuracy of the portions of the tapes with which he was familiar, the Government met its burden."

United States v. Citro, 938 F.2d 1431 (1st Cir. 1991) : Affirming convictions for drug offenses, the Court held there was no error in excluding an answering machine taped message offered by a defendant to impeach a conspirator on cross-examination. At a hearing in camera, the witness specifically denied the communication, and at trial the defendant, who said she heard the message being recorded and recognized the witness' voice, only said the tape looked like a tape her sister had removed from the answering machine and she had given to defense counsel. That testimony might have sufficed to authenticate the tape, but there was no abuse of discretion in excluding it under Rule 403. See also United States v. Rengifo n29(holding that a wiretap tape could be authenticated by the testimony of an agent who supervised the taping; once a sufficient foundation is laid, the litigant who opposes admission bears the burden of showing the tape is inaccurate).

United States v. Hamilton, 334 F.3d 170 (2d Cir. 2003) : Affirming the convictions of two former police officers for narcotics-related offenses, the Court upheld the admission of two tape-recorded conversations and rejected the argument that the tapes were not reliable because an informant had supplied some of the participants with drugs. The recordings were adequately authenticated by a witness who heard the conversations and made the recordings, and by various parties to the conversations. In United States v. Tropeano, 252 F.3d 653 (2d Cir. 2001) , the Court affirmed a conviction for securities and wire fraud, finding that tape recordings of telephone conversations were sufficiently authenticated by the testimony of participants, without also requiring proof of a chain of custody for the tapes. Affirming convictions for racketeering in United States v. Ruggiero, n30 the Court held that the government had satisfied its burden of producing clear and convincing evidence of authenticity and accuracy as a foundation for admission of tape recordings. It noted that this foundation standard was more demanding than that required by the Rule, because recorded evidence is likely to have a strong impression upon a jury and is susceptible to alteration. In our view, the stricter standard may be inconsistent with the admissibility standards set forth in Huddleston v. United States, although a Court may wish to provide greater assurances of reliability through application of Rule 403. In a prosecution for a scheme to defraud a bank by cashing fraudulent checks, United States v. Sliker, n31 the government introduced a tape recording in connection with a witness' testimony even though the witness refused to identify his voice or the voice of a defendant on the tape. The Court held that this was proper, since the Trial Judge determined that the tape was clear enough to support an identification and thus it satisfied authentication principles.

United States v. Wilson, 115 F.3d 1185 (4th Cir. 1997) : Affirming drug convictions, the Court found no error in the introduction of both original and composite tape recordings of drug transactions between the defendants and an undercover police officer. The original tape recordings were properly authenticated by witnesses who monitored the audio recording equipment and by the undercover officer who reviewed the tapes and testified that they accurately recorded the conversations. The composite tape was properly authenticated by the same witnesses, who listened to the original recordings and compared them to the composite tape, and testified that the composite tape accurately represented the relevant portions of the original tapes. In United States v. Branch, 970 F.2d 1368 (4th Cir. 1992) , a drug distribution prosecution, an extensive hearing was held in camera before the trial on the authenticity of numerous tape recordings of wiretaps. The Judge ruled that there was sufficient authenticating evidence and that, although the government would not have to present the testimony of all the monitors, it would have to lay a proper foundation for admission of the tapes before the jury. The Court held there was no error in the procedure followed or admission of the tapes; the ruling following the in camera hearing did not replace the required presentation of authenticating evidence before the jury and the assessment of the adequacy of that presentation, and there was evidence presented in this case sufficient to support a finding that the recordings were authentic.

United States v. Buchanan, 70 F.3d 818 (5th Cir. 1995) : In a drug conspiracy case, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting a tape recording of a conversation between a defendant and an undercover officer, where all voices were identified, there was no intimation that the tape had been altered, and the testifying officer explained how the recording was made and testified to its accuracy. In United States v. Stone, 960 F.2d 426 (5th Cir. 1992) , the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting tape recordings of meetings between an undercover agent and participants in a conspiracy to manufacture methamphetamine. Although not all the foundation elements were thoroughly covered before the tapes were admitted, a sufficient showing was made. The Trial Judge took adequate precautions in dealing with the poor quality and partial unintelligibility of the tapes and with the transcripts offered by the government to assist the jury listening to the tapes. In United States v. Lance, n32 the Court rejected a stringent foundation requirement for tape recordings in affirming drug convictions. It was sufficient that law enforcement agents who participated in the conversations testified that the recordings were accurate and that the person who made the tapes could identify the voices. See also United States v. Stephenson n33(duplicate tape recordings were properly authenticated by testimony that they were accurate representations of the recorded conversations).

United States v. DeJohn, 368 F.3d 533 (6th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed drug trafficking convictions, holding there was no abuse of discretion in the admission of audio tape recordings of conversations made on a conspirator's cell phone. The defendant made no argument that the tapes were in fact inaccurate, and a sufficient foundation of authenticity was provided by an agent's testimony as to the court authorization to get the wiretaps, the simultaneous taping by two recording devices, the monitoring of conversations, and the log made of them, as well as testimony that each tape played at trial was made by isolating a conversation on the original tapes and dubbing it onto a blank tape. In addition, a foundation was laid for each individual recording before it was played for the jury.

United States v. Dawson, 425 F.3d 389 (7th Cir. 2005) : Affirming convictions for a narcotics trafficking conspiracy, the Court found no error in the admission of recorded conversations, although no chain of custody was established and there were gaps in the tapes. The defendants did not deny that it was their voices on the tapes, there was no showing of splicing or other alterations that might have changed the meaning of what was actually said, and there was no indication that the gaps or erasures contained exculpatory evidence. In United States v. Westmoreland, 312 F.3d 302 (7th Cir. 2002) , the Court affirmed a conviction of murder-for-hire in connection with drug trafficking, holding that four tapes of incriminating conversations between the defendant and a coconspirator involving a plot to murder the coconspirator's wife were properly admitted. Although the tape recorder's operator died before trial, the Court concluded that the tapes were sufficiently authenticated by the testimony of an agent that he had been present when the calls were made and had listened in on headphones, and that the tapes were "first generation copies" of the tapes made that night. The Court applied a standard of clear and convincing evidence for the foundation. In our view, that standard may be inconsistent with the admissibility standards set forth in Huddleston v. United States, although a Court may wish to provide greater assurances of reliability through application of Rule 403. In United States v. Brown, n34 the Court affirmed convictions for food stamp fraud, finding no error in the admission of audiotapes of transactions in which the defendants exchanged food stamps for cash, even though the government had not established a chain of custody for the tapes. A confidential informant testified that the transactions recorded on the tapes actually occurred, that he listened to the tapes, that the speakers on the tape were himself and the defendants, and that the tapes were in the same condition as when he last saw them. Moreover, the agent who monitored the taped conversations testified that he listened to the conversations during each transaction, and that he personally observed one transaction. See also United States v. Boyd n35(upholding admission of duplicate tape recordings of conversations ten years earlier on testimony of participant and of agent who had spot-checked duplicates against sealed originals).

McAlinney v. Marion Merrell Dow, Inc., 992 F.2d 839 (8th Cir. 1993) : Affirming a judgment for an employer in an action for national origin employment discrimination, the Court applied a seven-part test for admission of tape recordings (discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 901.02[4]). It found no error in the exclusion of surreptitiously recorded conversations between the plaintiff and others that were largely inaudible and difficult to track, and contained numerous blank spots. There were serious questions whether the tapes had been altered, especially in light of the plaintiff's concession that he edited the tapes. In United States v. Pecina, 956 F.2d 186 (8th Cir. 1992) , the Court affirmed convictions for narcotics offenses, holding that a proper foundation was laid for tape recordings of telephone conversations, where a detective testified he accurately recorded each of the tapes and personally made the copies that were played for the jury and that he recognized the voices recorded. In a civil rights action in which a Court clerk established that her firing violated the First Amendment, Williams v. Butler, n36 the Court upheld the admission of tape recordings and accompanying transcripts. Although suggesting that it might be preferable to have the person who prepared the transcript testify to its accuracy, the Court sustained authentication by a witness who had monitored the recording and who testified that he listened to the recording and read the transcript and that both accurately reflected the taped conversation. It also applied a rebuttable presumption that police officers having custody of tape recordings do not tamper with them.

United States v. Matta-Ballesteros, 71 F.3d 754 (9th Cir. 1995) , amended, 98 F.3d 1100 (9th Cir. 1996) : In a prosecution for the kidnapping of a federal agent, the Court upheld the admission of audiotape recordings of the agent's torture that had been made by the conspirators. It said that the seven-factor test (discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 901.02[4]) applies when a government agent or informant initiates a conversation knowing it is to be recorded, but in other cases Rule 901(a) requires only sufficient proof that a reasonable juror could find in favor of authenticity. Here, the tapes were obtained from a codefendant, and the government had presented evidence that it had not tampered with the tapes and that the speakers were parties involved in this case.

United States v. Harrell, 788 F.2d 1524 (11th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed marijuana convictions, finding that taped statements of one defendant were properly admitted. It reiterated its general rule in criminal cases that "requires the prosecution to go forward with respect to the competency of the operator, the fidelity of the recording equipment, the absence of material deletions, additions or alterations in the relevant portions of the recording, and the identification of the relevant speakers." See also United States v. Richardson, n37 where the Court found that the government had laid a sufficient foundation even though it had not offered evidence as to the fidelity of the machine used, since there were independent indicia of accuracy.

[iii] Rule 901(a) -- Tape Recordings -- Chain of Custody

United States v. Thomas, 294 F.3d 899 (7th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed cocaine-related convictions, holding that a tape recording of a conversation among the defendant, another participant in a drug deal, and an undercover officer was properly authenticated when the other participant identified the voices on the tape and authenticated the conversation. In response to the argument that the government did not establish a chain of custody for the recording, the Court stated that "so long as other evidence is sufficient to establish the accuracy and authenticity of the tapes, lack of proof regarding a chain of custody does not render tapes inadmissible."

[iv] Rule 901(a) -- Tape Recordings -- Enhanced Tapes

Iacobucci v. Boulter, 193 F.3d 14 (1st Cir. 1999) : A journalist was arrested after videotaping a local board meeting; when he retrieved his videotape, the video portion was erased, but the audio portion picked up conversations after he was taken into custody. In a subsequent § 1983 action, the journalist enhanced the audibility of the audio by playing it on a high-quality play-back system. The Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the tape, as the plaintiff testified he did not alter the tape in any way, and the defendant offered no evidence in contradiction.

United States v. Thompson, 130 F.3d 676 (5th Cir. 1997) : The Court held there was no error in admitting a tape recording of the defendant soliciting another inmate to murder a Federal Judge, where an FBI signal processing analyst testified that the recording was made by electronically filtering out noises, such as from a public address system, on the original recording. The analyst explained that he did not add or delete any words in making the enhanced recording, and the inmate testified that the enhanced tapes accurately reflected the conversation. The Court also found no error in providing a transcript for the jury's use in listening to the tapes, where the defendant did not offer his own transcription or point to any inaccuracies in the government's.

United States v. Calderin-Rodriguez, 244 F.3d 977 (8th Cir. 2001) : In a drug prosecution, the Court found no error in the admission of digitally enhanced recordings of intercepted conversations, where the government established that the recording device and the enhancement device were both operative at the appropriate times; that the operator of devices was competent to operate them; that the recording was authentic; and that no changes were made (other than a change in volume as a result of the digital enhancement).

[v] Rule 901(a) -- Tape Recordings -- Incomplete Record of Conversation

United States v. Doyon, 194 F.3d 207 (1st Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed a cocaine conviction, finding that two tape recordings of the defendant's conversations with a drug dealer were properly admitted, even though the tape recorder was old and manually operated in a way that omitted the first few seconds of both conversations. The Court reasoned that "[a]n accurate tape recording of part of a conversation is not inherently less admissible than the testimony of a witness who heard only part of a conversation and recounts the part that he heard." It also held that the probative value of the tapes was not outweighed by the prejudice associated with the omissions since this was a case in which "the recorded portion of the conversation ... contain[ed] straightforward admissions" and there was "no reason to suspect that they were qualified by anything said in the omitted portions."

United States v. Ray, 250 F.3d 596 (8th Cir. 2001) : Affirming drug convictions, the Court found no error in the admission of a tape and transcript of the defendant's conversation with a drug buyer. Although there were a number of places on the tape in which the conversation was unintelligible, the "gaps to which Ray points are by no means so substantial as to render the entire recording untrustworthy."

[vi] Rule 901(a) -- Tape Recordings -- Transcripts

[A] Rule 901(a) -- Tape Recordings -- Foreign Language Conversations

United States v. Rengifo, 789 F.2d 975 (1st Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed drug convictions, upholding the admission of English language transcripts of tape recordings that contained conversations in Spanish. It suggested that the Trial Judge should endeavor to obtain a stipulated transcript when the decision has been made that the jury should receive the transcript as evidence. If there is a difference of opinion as to the accuracy of the transcripts, each side should be able to introduce its own properly authenticated transcript and the jury should be instructed that it must decide which version, if any, is accurate.

United States v. Ben-Shimon, 249 F.3d 98 (2d Cir. 2001) : The Court affirmed an inmate's conviction for possession of contraband, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting a transcript of a tape-recorded conversation in English and Hebrew. Although the translation of the Hebrew portions was prepared by a cooperating witness who was not a certified translator, the defendant specified no inaccuracy in the transcript, the defendant refused several invitations to prepare a competing transcript with the assistance of a court-appointed translator, and the jury was properly instructed on the limited purpose of the transcript. In United States v. Chalarca, 95 F.3d 239 (2d Cir. 1996) , the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting an English-language transcript of a Spanish-language audiotape of a drug transaction, where the defendant was offered an opportunity to present an alternative transcript and the jury was instructed that it need not accept the transcript.

United States v. Garcia, 20 F.3d 670 (6th Cir. 1994) : The Court affirmed convictions for conspiracy to possess marijuana with intent to distribute, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting an English translation of an audiotape in Spanish, where a professional translator testified to its accuracy and the defendant did not point to any inaccuracies or offer an alternative translation.

United States v. Estrada, 256 F.3d 466 (7th Cir. 2001) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion when the prosecution in a drug case was permitted to introduce transcripts in English of taped Spanish-language conversations without playing any of the tapes. The jury was not proficient in Spanish, and it was doubtful they would have been able to interpret inflections and tone of conversations in that language. In United States v. Briscoe, 896 F.2d 1476 (7th Cir. 1990) , the Court affirmed convictions of a heroin importing and distribution conspiracy, holding that government-prepared transcripts containing English translations of tape-recorded telephone conversations conducted in Yoruba were sufficiently authenticated with respect to both the identity of the speakers and the accuracy of the translations.

United States v. Grajales-Montoya, 117 F.3d 356 (8th Cir. 1997) : The Court held in a narcotics conspiracy case that there was no abuse of discretion in admitting transcripts of translations of tape-recorded conversations that had been conducted in Spanish, without introducing the tapes. It was unlikely that jurors who were not proficient in Spanish would be able to discern relevant inflections without knowing the language being spoken.

United States v. Abonce-Barrera, 257 F.3d 959 (9th Cir. 2001) : Tape-recorded Spanish-language conversations were key evidence in a drug prosecution. Before trial, the government provided the defense with successive drafts of its verbatim transcriptions (in Spanish) and English translations of the conversations. At trial, every member of the jury was given a copy of both the final transcription and the translation to take into deliberations, the tapes were played for the jury, and the English translations were read to the jury. Although the defendant argued on appeal that the tapes were of poor quality and the transcription process problematic, the Court found no abuse of discretion, since there was no specific allegation of inaccuracies and the procedures used gave the defense a fair opportunity to highlight alleged inaccuracies and to introduce alternative versions. In a bank robbery case, United States v. Rrapi, 175 F.3d 742 (9th Cir. 1999) , a surveillance tape recording of a conversation in Albanian was introduced, along with an English translation transcript. The Court found no error in the failure to instruct that the tape is the evidence and the transcript only a guide, since such an instruction is not only nonsensical in situations like this, but it also has the potential for harm. In United States v. Pena-Espinoza, n38 the prosecution of a cocaine distribution conspiracy, the government introduced over 4,800 recorded phone conversations (mostly in Spanish) and transcripts for 50 of the conversations. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the English-language transcripts, where the defense made no meaningful attempt to check the transcripts for accuracy or at least to obtain a continuance to examine the crucial evidence.

[B] Rule 901(a) -- Tape Recordings -- Transcripts -- Recorded Conversations

United States v. Holton, 116 F.3d 1536 (D.C. Cir. 1997) : At a drug trial, the government introduced body-wire recordings of conversations with an undercover agent and offered transcripts of the recordings. After the defendants objected and offered an alternative transcript, the Trial Judge ruled that the government transcripts would aid the jury in listening to the tapes during the trial but that the transcripts would not be given to the jury during its deliberations. However, when the jury asked to hear the tapes again during deliberations, the Judge consulted with counsel and arranged a procedure whereby his law clerk would play the tapes for the jury in the courtroom and distribute the transcripts as listening aids during the playback. The Court held that the procedure was error (but harmless). The Trial Judge has discretion whether to admit a transcript into evidence as an aid to the jury and whether to permit transcripts to be used during deliberations. That decision should be reached sufficiently early in the trial for the defense to challenge a government-prepared transcript and support the accuracy of any alternative, to make objections, and to request appropriate jury instructions. If the parties do not agree on a transcript, each party should be permitted an opportunity to introduce its own transcript, and the jury should be instructed that it is up to them which, if any, version to accept. In United States v. Strothers, 77 F.3d 1389 (D.C. Cir. 1996) , the Court held it was error (but harmless) in a drug case to actually admit a government-prepared transcript of tape recordings into evidence, because it created a risk that the jury might have relied on that version of the conversations without simultaneously listening to the authenticated tapes to verify the transcript's accuracy.

United States v. Gonzalez-Maldonado, 115 F.3d 9 (1st Cir. 1997) : In a money laundering and cocaine prosecution, the government provided transcripts of taped conversations which included quotation marks around certain words that the government claimed were code words used to conceal the illegal nature of the conversations. The Court held it was error to allow use of the transcripts, where there was no audible emphasis or vocal inflection placed on the marked words that was discernible when listening to the tapes, even though the government subsequently presented evidence that the words were code words and the jury was instructed that only the tapes and not the transcripts were evidence. In United States v. Rengifo, n39 the Court affirmed drug convictions, holding that a wiretap tape could be authenticated by the testimony of the agent who supervised the taping. It suggested that the Trial Judge should endeavor to obtain a stipulated transcript when the decision has been made that the jury should receive the transcript as evidence. If there is a difference of opinion as to the accuracy of the transcripts, each side should be able to introduce its own properly authenticated transcript and the jury should be instructed that it must decide which version, if any, is accurate. In United States v. Mazza, n40 the Court affirmed cocaine convictions, finding that government-prepared transcripts were properly admitted to assist the jury in understanding tape recordings. It rejected the argument that the Judge should have made an independent inquiry into the accuracy of the transcripts before admitting them. In United States v. Lopez-Pena, n41 the Court held that voice identifications in transcripts used in a heroin conspiracy trial as an aid to the jury in listening to tape recordings, but not admitted into evidence, were sufficiently authenticated by testimony of an undercover agent who participated in the conversations transcribed. The Court also held that earlier drafts of the transcripts containing different voice identifications were properly excluded because no person authenticated those voice identifications and the agent specifically testified they were incorrect.

United States v. Rosa, 17 F.3d 1531 (2d Cir. 1994) : The Court, affirming convictions for conspiring to receive stolen goods, held there was no abuse of discretion in allowing the jury to have tape recording transcripts during its deliberations, where the jury was instructed that the transcripts themselves were not evidence and could be used only as aids in listening to the audiotapes and as nonbinding guides subject to the jurors' own assessment of the transcripts' accuracy.

United States v. Collazo, 732 F.2d 1200 (4th Cir. 1984) : The Court found no abuse of discretion in permitting the government to use transcripts of tape recordings admitted into evidence even though the defendants did not stipulate to the accuracy of the transcripts and the Judge did not attempt to verify their accuracy. The defendants made only a few objections to alleged inaccuracies in the transcripts, they did not challenge the methods used to prepare the transcripts, and the Judge carefully cautioned the jury on the proper use of transcripts.

United States v. Polk, 56 F.3d 613 (5th Cir. 1995) : The Court affirmed convictions for cocaine distribution offenses, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting tape recordings of undercover operations or in permitting the jury to use transcripts of the recordings during the playing of the tapes. Although some portions of the recordings were inaudible or unintelligible, the quality was not so poor that the transcripts could not be challenged effectively; further, the jury was not permitted to have the transcripts during deliberations and it was instructed that the tapes should control any difference with the transcripts.

United States v. Scarborough, 43 F.3d 1021 (6th Cir. 1994) : Affirming convictions for obstruction of justice, the Court found that a transcript of surreptitiously recorded conversations was properly admitted and that there was no error in allowing the jury to use the transcript in deliberation. While the parties did not stipulate to the accuracy of the government-prepared transcript, the Trial Judge determined that it was accurate by reviewing both the tapes and transcript. The Court noted that the jury was instructed that the transcript was not evidence and that it represented the government's version of the tape; it also noted that the defendant had not shown that the transcript was inaccurate in any respect. In United States v. Segines, 17 F.3d 847 (6th Cir. 1994) , the Court vacated cocaine convictions, holding that a composite tape recording was admissible under Rule 1006, but that it was error to admit a transcript, where the tape was unintelligible in part. It noted that "[w]hen tapes are unintelligible, ... a transcript intended as an aid to the jury inevitably becomes, in the minds of the jurors, the evidence itself." In United States v. West, n42 the Court affirmed convictions for cocaine offenses and false grand jury testimony, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting recordings where the incomprehensible portions were not so substantial as to render the recordings untrustworthy as a whole. Further, there was no abuse of discretion in allowing the jury to use government-prepared transcripts, as there was evidence of their accuracy and the Judge made an independent determination of their accuracy after listening to the tapes.

United States v. Singleton, 125 F.3d 1097 (7th Cir. 1997) : The Court affirmed convictions for distribution of crack, finding no abuse of discretion in allowing the use of written transcripts to aid the jury in listening to partially inaudible recorded conversations, where the tapes were reasonably intelligible and the jury was repeatedly instructed to consider only those parts of the tapes they could understand and to be guided solely by what they heard and not by the transcripts. In United States v. Howard, 80 F.3d 1194 (7th Cir. 1996) , the Court affirmed convictions for crack cocaine distribution, holding there was no abuse of discretion in permitting use of a government-prepared transcript in connection with tape-recorded conversations. Although the tape was quite difficult to follow, it was not so unintelligible that the properly instructed jury could not reasonably be expected to rely on it rather than on the transcript. As for the transcript's accuracy, the defendants neither singled out portions they considered inaccurate nor provided an alternative version. The Court did express concern that the transcript provided the only basis for identifying several voices on the tape, but that issue had not been raised below and the error, if any, was harmless.

United States v. Frazier, 280 F.3d 835 (8th Cir. 2002) : Affirming convictions arising from a heroin distribution operation, the Court ruled that the jury was properly permitted to view transcripts of recorded conversations while they were being played at trial. The agent responsible for the wiretap investigation provided sufficient foundation for the transcripts when he testified that he was familiar with the voices on the tapes through his work with the wiretaps and he described how he prepared the transcripts and that he proofread them by comparing them to the actual tape-recorded conversations.

United States v. Delgado, 357 F.3d 1061 (9th Cir. 2004) : Affirming drug convictions, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the Trial Judge allowed the jury to use transcripts of recorded conversations for the limited purpose of a listening aid. Although there was no indication that the Judge reviewed the transcripts for accuracy, the defendant was allowed to highlight alleged inaccuracies through testimony; the jury was instructed that the tape, rather than the transcript, was evidence; and the jury was allowed to compare the transcript to the tape and to hear counsel's arguments as to the meaning of the conversations.

United States v. Wright, 932 F.2d 868 (10th Cir. 1991) : In affirming convictions for drug trafficking, the Court held that transcripts of taped conversations of the defendants had been properly authenticated by the unrebutted testimony of one of the participants in the conversations, a government informant. Although the preferable means of authentication is a stipulation between the parties or a pretrial determination, here the defense counsel were given access to the tapes before trial, made their own transcripts, and neither attempted to enter into a stipulation nor offered to submit their own version of the transcripts at trial. In a firearms prosecution, United States v. Mittleider, n43 the Court found no error in the admission of tape recordings of the defendant's conversations during the sale of a machine gun, even though portions of the tapes were inaudible. Three witnesses who had heard the conversations testified and were subject to cross-examination, and the jury was instructed that written transcripts of the conversations were not evidence and were used only to help them. In United States v. Devous, n44 the Court affirmed the convictions of a doctor for illegally dispensing drugs, and upheld the introduction of a transcript of a tape recording that had been played to the jury. Although a judicial determination of the accuracy of transcripts should be made when the parties dispute the accuracy of the transcripts, defense counsel did not request cautionary procedures in this case, and the Trial Judge was not required to implement them sua sponte.

United States v. Green, 40 F.3d 1167 (11th Cir. 1994) : Affirming drug convictions, the Court held that transcripts of wiretapped conversations among the defendants were properly admitted. It stated that "[i]t is not a necessary predicate for admission of transcripts of tape recordings that each officer who prepared the transcript testify to its accuracy." In a racketeering case involving cocaine, United States v. Rosenthal, n45 the Court held that a defendant was not entitled to exclusion of a government-prepared transcript of a videotape based on alleged inaudibility of portions of the tape, where the defendant failed to tender a transcript offering a different version of the conversation.

[n] Rule 901(a) -- Telephone Conversations and Similar Conversations

United States v. Dhinsa, 243 F.3d 635 (2d Cir. 2001) : Affirming a conviction for racketeering and murder, the Court held that it was proper to admit testimony by the girlfriend of a murdered witness regarding threatening phone calls from a person whose voice she could not identify. The Court reasoned that the caller identified himself as the defendant, and it was important for the defendant to identify himself in order to receive the "benefit" of the threat.

United States v. Espinoza, 641 F.2d 153 (4th Cir. 1981) : The Court found circumstantial authentication of a telephone call.

United States v. Pool, 660 F.2d 547 (5th Cir. 1981) : A conviction for illegal importation of marijuana was overturned because a DEA agent could not identify the voice on a telephone call during which the caller used a particular nickname. Absent other evidence, self-authentication by the caller was insufficient identification. In a prosecution for conspiracy to import marijuana, United States v. Scott, n46 the Court suggested that the government laid an inadequate foundation for testimony concerning radio communications where it neither identified the parties to the communications nor showed that certain ships had radios capable of communicating with one another. Any error was harmless, however.

United States v. Garrison, 168 F.3d 1089 (8th Cir. 1999) : In a narcotics prosecution, one of the witnesses was permitted to testify that a person who called himself "Ike" threatened to injure her and her daughter if she testified. The Court rejected the defense argument that no sufficient foundation was laid that "Ike" was a member of the conspiracy. Besides testifying to the fact of the telephone conversation, the witness also testified that she had been informed that other conspirators were working for a person named "Ike," and that the voice that threatened her did not belong to any of the other people she knew to be involved in the conspiracy. Finally, the government provided proof that one of the coconspirators went by the name "Ike." In United States v. Hassell, n47 the Court affirmed convictions for drug-related offenses, holding that a proper foundation was laid for a tape recording of a telephone conversation. According to the Court, "[T]he circumstances of this case are such that it could reasonably be inferred that [the defendant] was indeed the person whose conversation with the informant had been recorded."

United States v. Cook, 794 F.2d 561 (10th Cir. 1986) : The Court upheld convictions for cocaine offenses, finding that taped conversations were properly admitted where voices were identified by witnesses and circumstantial evidence, such as name references and pen register records, connected the tapes to the defendants.

United States v. Dynalectric Co., 859 F.2d 1559 (11th Cir. 1988) : The Court found sufficient circumstantial evidence to support admission of a telephone call from an unidentified caller to a witness telling him what price to use on a bid.

[o] Rule 901(a) -- Videotapes

Louis Vuitton S.A. v. Spencer Handbags Corp., 765 F.2d 966 (2d Cir. 1985) : The Court upheld a judgment for trademark owners against sellers of counterfeit handbags, concluding that no chain of custody was required for admission of a videotape showing the defendants telling an undercover agent of their counterfeiting activities. No challenge was made to the accuracy of the tape.

United States v. Goldin, 311 F.3d 191 (3d Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed convictions of protesters at a National Historic Park, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of a 15-minute videotape, which had been edited from a two-hour tape. The tape was authenticated by the camera operator, a person with knowledge, and it was not necessary that the editor authenticate it.

United States v. Sivils, 960 F.2d 587 (6th Cir. 1992) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting video and audiotape recordings in a conspiracy prosecution where agents testified to regular checks on the recording equipment and to a chain of custody of the tapes.

United States v. Mills, 194 F.3d 1108 (10th Cir. 1999) : In order to curtail a problem with prison guards beating inmates, escort teams at a federal penitentiary were required to videotape inmate movements. The defendant corrections officer was charged with beating a prisoner, but the videotape did not show the incident. The officer in charge of the video camera testified that it had been working properly and that he had recorded the entire incident, but that the defendant had ordered him to hand over the camera after the beating and had then returned it to him with instructions to begin filming the escort moving down the hall. The defendant argued that the tape was inadmissible because no chain of custody was established and because a five-minute gap in the digital time designation clearly indicated that it had been tampered with. Affirming a conviction for depriving a prisoner of his Eighth Amendment rights, the Court held there was no error in admission of the videotape. Chain of custody is not required for evidence with distinctive characteristics making it unique, readily identifiable, and relatively resistant to change; the officer confirmed that the tape, except for the deleted portion, accurately depicted the entire episode; and the deletion did not affect the accuracy of the remaining images, including the clear indication that some of the event was missing.

[2] Rule 901(b)(1) -- Illustrations -- Testimony Of Witness With Knowledge

United States v. Masse, 816 F.2d 805 (1st Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed a cocaine distribution conviction, holding that testimony by government agents that they had seized items from the defendant, that the items were in substantially the same condition at trial as when they were seized, and that the agents followed standard procedure in handling the evidence was sufficient authentication. It rejected the defendant's contention that the agents' inability to recall which of them had seized the items or exactly where they were on the defendant's person undermined the evidentiary foundation.

United States v. Barone, 913 F.2d 46 (2d Cir. 1990) : Affirming a conviction for tax evasion and perjury, the Court held there was no error in admitting a tape recording authenticated through the testimony of the technician who made it; the government is not required to call as an authenticating witness a participant in the conversation.

United States v. Reilly, 33 F.3d 1396 (3d Cir. 1994) : In a prosecution for illegal ocean dumping and making false statements to a grand jury, the Court held that radiotelegrams were sufficiently authenticated by, inter alia, testimony of telegraph operators, contents known only by the purported source, and the reply letter doctrine.

NLRB v. General Wood Preserving Co., 905 F.2d 803 (4th Cir. 1990) : The Court granted enforcement of a collective bargaining order, holding that signatures on a petition to designate the bargaining representative were sufficiently authenticated by witnesses who testified they observed the named employees affix their signatures.

In re Bobby Boggs, Inc., 819 F.2d 574 (5th Cir. 1987) : In a bankruptcy dispute over entitlement to a subcontractor's funds, the Court held that there was ample evidence to authenticate certain bonds issued by a surety that was defunct at the time of trial. It reasoned that state law permitted files from a defunct insurer's files to be admitted, and it concluded that the testimony of the surety's receiver concerning the documents was tantamount to testimony by a person with knowledge. Reviewing a bankruptcy proceeding in In re Clifford, n48 the Court held that an improperly recorded security deed was admissible under Rule 901 in the light of a notary public's testimony as to execution of the deed.

United States v. Long, 857 F.2d 436 (8th Cir. 1988) : In a prosecution arising out of the deposit of a forged treasury check, the Court held that a witness sufficiently authenticated a document when she testified that she recognized it as the contract that she had seen the defendant sign.

United States v. Vasquez, 858 F.2d 1387 (9th Cir. 1988) : The Court affirmed convictions for drug offenses, finding that an officer gave sufficient testimony to lay the foundation for fingerprint evidence. Although it noted that the government could have offered better evidence and that the officer did not testify that he personally lifted the print, the Court found that the testimony established that two officers lifted all of the prints taken and that the print had to come from a cocaine package seized in a search.

United States v. Davis, 780 F.2d 838 (10th Cir. 1985) : Affirming drug convictions, the Court held that a notepad was properly authenticated by the testimony of the person who made most of the notes, even though the author of one of the words on the pad was unknown.

[3] Rule 901(b)(2) -- Illustrations -- Nonexpert Opinion On Handwriting

United States v. Scott, 270 F.3d 30 (1st Cir. 2001) : The Court affirmed false claims and bank fraud convictions, finding no error in the admission of testimony from a law enforcement agent, who was not an expert on handwriting identification, that certain documents in evidence were in Scott's handwriting. The agent had not acquired his knowledge of Scott's handwriting "for purposes of the litigation," but during the course of many years investigating Scott's criminal conduct.

United States v. Whittington, 783 F.2d 1210 (5th Cir. 1986) : In a false claims prosecution, the Court held that a multipage lease was properly authenticated by an identification of the signatures on one page: "To identify a document sufficiently to warrant its admissibility, a witness need not be able to attest familiarity with every page." In United States v. Barron, n49 the Court affirmed perjury convictions, upholding the admission of testimony by a witness that a signature on a note was A's rather than B's where the witness knew the handwriting of both persons and had once seen A sign B's name. In United States v. Pitts, n50 the Court upheld the rejection of a nonexpert's opinion on handwriting, where the witness "acquired any expertise he arguably had for purposes of a pending criminal investigation."

United States v. Tipton, 964 F.2d 650 (7th Cir. 1992) : Affirming an embezzlement and tax evasion conviction, the Court held that a co-worker familiar with the defendant's handwriting and signature as a result of observing many of the documents on which the defendant worked was qualified to identify the defendant's handwriting or signature on phony documents. In United States v. Binzel, 907 F.2d 746 (7th Cir. 1990) , an action to recover on a Small Business Administration loan guaranty, the defendant made an affidavit that, based on his familiarity with another's signature gained from observing him sign documents and seeing documents executed by him, a particular signature was a forgery. The Court affirmed summary judgment for the SBA, holding that because the affidavit did not identify the documents, establish the genuineness of the documents, or identify a relationship with the purported signer permitting reasonable familiarity with the signature, the opinion was based on nothing more than conclusory, self-serving allegations not raising a genuine issue of material fact. Affirming convictions for smuggling weapons into a prison in United States v. Mauchlin, n51 the Court found that prison file documents purporting to have been written by Mauchlin, which were used by a handwriting expert to support his conclusion that Mauchlin was the author of a trial exhibit, were properly authenticated by a prison official who for 16 months had daily contact with Mauchlin and had seen him write on approximately six occasions.

United States v. Humphrey, 208 F.3d 1190 (10th Cir. 2000) : Remanding convictions for possession of methamphetamine, the Court ruled that if a new trial was required, a witness' testimony that she was familiar with one defendant's handwriting was sufficient to authenticate documents found in a purse, "[a]lthough it is true that there was almost no elaboration on the opportunities that [the witness] had to observe the defendant's handwriting."

Hall v. United Ins. Co. of Am., 367 F.3d 1255 (11th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the insurer in an action to obtain benefits under a policy that the insurer had terminated. The plaintiff in the action had filed an affidavit stating that, based on her familiarity with the insured's handwriting, the insured had not signed the letter of termination. The Court held that such an opinion requires detailed information regarding documents relied upon to establish familiarity -- including identification of the documents with particularity -- and detailed information regarding the witness' relationship with the signatory, whether it be familial, professional, or otherwise personal. In United States v. Williams, n52 the Court held that "yellow sheets" were properly admitted against a defendant charged with filing a false tax return, where the defendant's initials were identified at the bottom of several sheets. In United States v. Barker, n53 a bank employee convicted of misapplying and converting traveler's checks unsuccessfully appealed, as the Court held that testimony of two fellow employees, who identified the defendant's handwriting on checks, was properly admitted.

[4] Rule 901(b)(3) -- Illustrations -- Comparison By Trier Or Expert Witness

United States v. Mangan, 575 F.2d 32 (2d Cir. 1978) : Affirming conspiracy and tax fraud convictions, the Court upheld the use of the defendant's signatures on his returns as exemplars offered to support an expert opinion that he signed certain documents in the course of the fraudulent scheme.

United States v. Clifford, 704 F.2d 86 (3d Cir. 1983) : The Trial Judge ruled that the government could not introduce correspondence in the defendant's handwriting to show stylistic similarities between it and threatening letters that he allegedly wrote. The Court recognized the broad discretion given by Rule 403, but found that the Judge had misconstrued the government's offer of proof and confused the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to convict with the question of the admissibility of the correspondence. The Court saw no reason "why jurors cannot examine the documents for themselves and consider the similarities between the documents along with the rest of the evidence presented by the government."

NLRB v. General Wood Preserving Co., 905 F.2d 803 (4th Cir. 1990) : The Court granted enforcement of a collective bargaining order, holding that signatures on a petition to designate the bargaining representative were sufficiently authenticated by comparison with undisputed authentic specimens.

United States v. Saadey, 393 F.3d 669 (6th Cir. 2005) : Affirming convictions for attempted extortion and filing false tax returns and credit applications, the Court found no error in the admission of false credit applications unaccompanied by expert testimony that the handwriting on the applications matched that of the defendant. The government had previously entered into evidence tax returns that the defendant admitted were his. Thus, the jury could compare the signatures on the returns with those on the applications. In a prosecution for threatening the President, United States v. Glover, n54 the Court upheld the admission of expert testimony that handwriting in one letter could have been the defendant's, although the evidence was far from conclusive.

Greater Kansas City Laborers Pension Fund v. Thummel, 738 F.2d 926 (8th Cir. 1984) : Affirming a judgment holding a company and its owner liable for unpaid contributions to employee benefit funds, the Court upheld the admission of a carbon copy of a contract, which contained a dim signature of the owner. This signature was sufficiently authenticated by the Trial Judge comparing it with other handwriting samples of the owner. "[T]he trier of fact may compare a contested sample of handwriting with an authenticated sample and decide that the contested sample is authentic even in the absence of expert testimony."

United States v. Alvarez-Farfan, 338 F.3d 1043 (9th Cir. 2003) : The defendant argued that the confidential informant, not the defendant, rented the motel room in which the charged drug transaction occurred. Reversing, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to exclude the informant's debriefing statement and the motel receipt in support of the defendant's argument. The jury could properly compare the handwriting on the proved statement with that on the receipt and make its own determination whether the same person's handwriting was on the two documents; no expert testimony from a questioned document examiner was required. In United States v. Woodson, n55 the Court affirmed convictions for theft and sale of government property, and upheld the sending of invoices signed by the perpetrator and exemplars of the defendant to the jury for its comparison, even though the government's expert could not say whether the signatures were of similar or dissimilar authorship.

United States v. Hernandez-Herrera, 952 F.2d 342 (10th Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed convictions for immigration offenses, holding that a photocopy of a fingerprint card was sufficiently authenticated by comparison with other exhibits already admitted into evidence.

[5] Rule 901(b)(4) -- Illustrations -- Distinctive Characteristics And The Like

[a] Rule 901(b)(4) -- Contents

United States v. McMahon, 938 F.2d 1501 (1st Cir. 1991) : In a prosecution for extortion, the Court held that even though a witness was unable to testify that he recognized handwriting on a note as the defendant's, the note was sufficiently authenticated by evidence that the defendant was observed passing the note to a colleague, it repeated nearly verbatim the contents of a conversation between the defendant and the colleague (who was hard of hearing) overheard by a different witness only moments before, and it raised matters unique to the defendant. To prove that the proceeds of a marijuana importation conspiracy were deposited in Swiss bank accounts in United States v. Newton, n56 the government offered an unsigned and undated typed document seized from one of the alleged participants that included lists of names (including aliases proved to have been used by the conspirator), account numbers, and Swiss banking officers. The Court held that the document was sufficiently authenticated by circumstantial evidence, including references to the conspirator's wife, lawyer, and girlfriend, bank account numbers next to proven aliases, and external evidence corroborating the connections made in the document. See also United States v. Drougas n57(admitting in a marijuana conspiracy case placemats found in a conspirator's apartment that contained the first names of many conspirators along with four- and five-digit figures).

United States v. Maldonado-Rivera, 922 F.2d 934 (2d Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed convictions for bank robbery offenses committed by members of a Puerto Rican independence group, holding that a communiqu'e bearing the group's logo was sufficiently authenticated as having been authored by one or more of the conspirators because it contained information unlikely to have been known by others.

United States v. Reilly, 33 F.3d 1396 (3d Cir. 1994) : In a prosecution for illegal ocean dumping and making false statements to a grand jury, the Court held that radiotelegrams were sufficiently authenticated by, inter alia, testimony of telegraph operators, contents known only by the purported source, and the reply letter doctrine.

United States v. Jones, 107 F.3d 1147 (6th Cir. 1997) : In a prosecution for credit card fraud, the government offered a card purportedly signed by the defendant and sent to the father of the defendant's son-in-law. The recipient testified that he did not know the defendant's handwriting, but that the card was signed in the defendant's name and the card contained references to the recipient's family "that no one else could have written." Affirming the convictions, the Court found that the card was properly authenticated.

United States v. Mokol, 957 F.2d 1410 (7th Cir. 1992) : Affirming a racketeering conviction, the Court held that handwritten bribe sheets seized from a codefendant's home were sufficiently authenticated by evidence that they included initials corresponding to the defendant's and amounts the codefendant paid him; furthermore, the information conformed to information in recorded conversations among coconspirators and to testimony at trial. In United States v. De Gudino, n58 the Court affirmed convictions for conspiracy to transport illegal aliens, finding that the contents of "pollo lists" (names, amounts of money paid, etc.), considered in connection with the testimony concerning the smuggling conspiracy, established that they were written by someone involved in the conspiracy.

United States v. Sanders, 421 F.3d 1044 (9th Cir. 2005) : When the defendant was in jail awaiting trial he attempted to dissuade an accomplice, also held there, from testifying by conversations through vents and by notes; he also sent a false declaration exonerating him to the accomplice to be signed. Affirming a bank robbery conviction, the Court held that the defendant's various statements were sufficiently identified by testimony from the accomplice that: he recognized the defendant's voice; the defendant knew his booking number that was on the declaration; a note from the defendant was in response to one he sent; and no other inmate had any significant interest in getting him to sign the exonerating declaration.

[b] Rule 901(b)(4) -- Fingerprints

United States v. Patterson, 277 F.3d 709 (4th Cir. 2002) : In a narcotics prosecution, the Court held that a fingerprint image taken by a Digital Biometrics Tenprinter was sufficiently authenticated by a matching print recovered from a bag containing narcotics that the police discovered during their investigation of the defendant. The expert testimony that one of the fingerprints recorded by the Tenprinter matched a print on the bag provided "compelling evidence that the Tenprinter reliably imaged Patterson's fingers." The alternative -- that the machine generated an inaccurate image that happened to be identical to a fingerprint recovered by a different person using a different process on a different object in a different location -- was "simply implausible."

[c] Rule 901(b)(4) -- Location or Possession

United States v. Paulino, 13 F.3d 20 (1st Cir. 1994) : To prove the defendant's connection with the drug business in an apartment in which he was arrested, the government offered a postal money order receipt found in the apartment that bore his name, the address of the apartment, and a notation that it was used for a rent payment. The Court held that the authenticity of the receipt was sufficiently shown by the circumstances, including the fact that it was of a type likely to be saved only by the rent-payer and that the defendant had been seen in and around the apparently uninhabited apartment during the rental period covered by the receipt. In a prosecution for extortion, United States v. McMahon, 938 F.2d 1501 (1st Cir. 1991) , the Court held that even though a witness was unable to testify that he recognized handwriting on a note as the defendant's, the note was sufficiently authenticated by evidence that the defendant was observed passing the note to a colleague, it repeated nearly verbatim the contents of a conversation between the defendant and the colleague (who was hard of hearing) overheard by a different witness only moments before, and it raised matters unique to the defendant.

United States v. Smith, 63 F.3d 766 (8th Cir. 1995) : The Court affirmed cocaine convictions, holding that receipts and similar documents seized at the defendant's house were sufficiently connected to the defendant, since it is reasonable to assume that the true owner or purchaser of goods would have receipts for those goods. In United States v. Eisenberg, n59 the Court affirmed a defendant's cocaine convictions, finding that a letter found in his roommate's suitcase was circumstantially authenticated, in part by its location.

Burgess v. Premier Corp., 727 F.2d 826 (9th Cir. 1984) : The Court held in a tax shelter case that certain records offered by the plaintiffs could be authenticated by the fact that they were found in the company's warehouse. See also United States v. Black n60(in a mail fraud and tax evasion case, allegedly forged documents were authenticated by their being in the defendant's possession).

[d] Rule 901(b)(4) -- Nondocumentary Evidence

United States v. Schrock, 855 F.2d 327 (6th Cir. 1988) : Affirming drug convictions, the Court held that the nature of substances in which the defendant dealt could be proved by circumstantial evidence and that scientific evaluation of a substance is not required.

United States v. Lepanto, 817 F.2d 1463 (10th Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed a conviction for being an accessory to the manufacture of a destructive device, holding that a carpet was sufficiently authenticated by: testimony of a postal inspector that he saw the defendant throw it into a dumpster (although it was not recovered until the next day); testimony of an expert that the carpet came from the defendant's apartment; and testimony of the defendant's brother identifying the carpet.

[e] Rule 901(b)(4) -- Other Examples

United States v. Bruner, 657 F.2d 1278 (D.C. Cir. 1981) : In a drug conspiracy, the government properly authenticated prescriptions by circumstantial evidence of authenticity.

United States v. Bello-Perez, 977 F.2d 664 (1st Cir. 1992) : The Court held there was ample circumstantial evidence that a letter from prison urging the recipient not to implicate the author in drug dealing had originated with the defendant. In a mail fraud case, United States v. Gordon, n61 the Court found that "the appearance, contents, substance, internal patterns, and like characteristics of the documents purporting to have been authorized by the defendant" supported a finding that the documents were so authorized.

United States v. Bagaric, 706 F.2d 42 (2d Cir. 1983) : In a RICO prosecution, the Court found that a letter was circumstantially authenticated by its postmark, its salutation, its contents, and its use of nicknames, as well as by the location in which it was found.

Link v. Mercedes-Benz, 788 F.2d 918 (3d Cir. 1986) : In a class action antitrust case involving an unsuccessful claim that a manufacturer conspired with its dealers to fix prices of nonwarranty repairs, the Court held that industry publications involving other automobile manufacturers, offered to support the defense that certain practices were independent responses to market pressures, were properly authenticated by the testimony of a defense witness or by the distinctive characteristics of the publications. The characteristics included logos, trademarks, and professional appearance and internal consistency. In McQueeney v. Wilmington Trust Co., n62 the Court reversed a judgment for a seaman in a Jones Act case, finding that the defendants should have been permitted to offer the seaman's "Sea Records" to limit his damage claim, since the records were amply supported by circumstantial evidence. The seaman produced the records in response to a discovery request, they contained information not widely held, and they appeared to be genuine copies of standard Coast Guard documents.

United States v. Martin, 756 F.2d 323 (4th Cir. 1985) (en banc): In a drug conspiracy case, the Court upheld admission of an owner's registration card for a boat, since it "speaks for itself" and was obviously the card relating to the boat named.

United States v. Dumeisi, 424 F.3d 566 (7th Cir. 2005) : Affirming convictions of a defendant who was acting as an agent of Saddam Hussein's Iraqi regime, the Court held that a file obtained in Baghdad as an Iraq Intelligence Service file had been sufficiently authenticated. A witness who had worked for the Service from 1979 to 2003 and advanced to a high position identified distinctive characteristics such as the style and form of the documents, but did not identify the blue and clear plastic folder in which the file was found. The Court also noted that classified information surrounding the initial discovery of the file bolstered the contention that the file was what the government claimed it to be. In the prosecution of a massive street gang drug conspiracy, United States v. Smith, 223 F.3d 554 (7th Cir. 2000) , the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting "The List," a document describing the territorial and hierarchical organization of the entire operation, which had been found in the files of an organization owned by the gang leader's female partner. There was ample proof of its authenticity, including recordings of the gang leaders discussing its creation, its place of discovery, the gang leader's name on the file where it was found, and contents indicating its connection to the gang. In United States v. Thornton, n63 the Court affirmed convictions for a drug conspiracy, finding that 50 documents seized by law enforcement personnel from the person, residence, or vehicle of a coconspirator were sufficiently authenticated without testimony from the authors of the documents. Some, such as utility bills, merchandise receipts, and business cards, were distinctive enough to authenticate themselves; for others, evidence of their location and substance provided an adequate foundation. In United States v. Harvey, n64 the Court held that the government provided sufficient circumstantial evidence that handwritten notes concerning the charged marijuana operation were prepared by the defendant. The notes were found in a remote area where law enforcement agents observed no one other than the defendant; the notes were found next to the defendant's bed; and the notes made reference to the defendant's dog. In United States v. Hoag, n65 a prosecution for making false statements on mortgage applications, the Court held that letters written on a company letterhead were properly authenticated by the circumstances and distinctive characteristics, as well as by company employees.

United States v. Baker, 855 F.2d 1353 (8th Cir. 1988) : The Court found sufficient authentication of items seized from the trash in a drug investigation in the distinctive characteristics linking the items to the defendants. In a prosecution for drug trafficking and other offenses, United States v. Lewis, n66 the Court found that a ledger reference that listed cash disbursements was circumstantially authenticated. In United States v. Helmel, n67 the Court upheld convictions for conducting an illegal gambling enterprise, finding that a lease agreement for the rental of an office was properly admitted despite the fact that no witness identified the handwriting on the agreement as that of one of the defendants. Since the office was used by the gambling business, and a ledger admitted as a conspirator's statement showed payments on the lease, the lease agreement was authenticated as relating to the charges against the defendants.

United States v. Whitworth, 856 F.2d 1268 (9th Cir. 1988) : The Court affirmed an espionage conviction and held that certain anonymous letters were properly admitted as having been written by the defendant. The authentication was circumstantial and included evidence of the places of mailing, connections with other evidence found in the defendant's home, and the use of a name in the letters that the defendant used for a friend.

United States v. Henry, 164 F.3d 1304 (10th Cir. 1999) : The defendant was charged with filing false statements in obtaining worker's compensation benefits. The Court held that the forms that included the false statements were sufficiently authenticated as having come from the defendant by: their having been received in reply to instructions and blank forms that the government mailed to the defendant; defense counsel's testimony that he assisted the defendant in completing such forms; personal information (including the defendant's Veterans Administration number); internally consistent biographical information; and corroboration of certain information by other witnesses. In United States v.

Markopoulos, n68 the Court found insufficient evidence of distinctive characteristics to admit as party admissions signatures on various rental documents in a marijuana conspiracy case. Admission of the documents was harmless error, however. See also United States v. Reyes n69(the source of handwritten notes seized from the defendant's residence and the correspondence of information contained therein to members of a drug conspiracy authenticated the notes).

United States v. Munoz, 16 F.3d 1116 (11th Cir. 1994) : Affirming convictions for marijuana importation, the Court held that Panamanian bank documents were sufficiently authenticated as belonging to the defendant by the location where they were seized, their bearing markings typical of bank documents, and signatures similar to those on other documents of the defendant's. In United States v. Smith, 918 F.2d 1501 (11th Cir. 1990) , the Court affirmed convictions for offenses in a cocaine distribution conspiracy, holding that ledgers containing references to the defendants and composed of special color and notation codes were sufficiently authenticated by the similarity to color codes on containers of narcotics and on business cards seized from the defendants. In United States v. Caldwell, n70 the Court affirmed fraud convictions, but rejected the Trial Judge's implication "that the testimony of someone present at the time of creation of the document was necessary for authentication." Although this is one form of authentication, a document also may be authenticated by circumstantial evidence.

[f] Rule 901(b)(4) -- Photographs

United States v. Englebrecht, 917 F.2d 376 (8th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed a conviction for drug offenses, holding that photographs of the defendant posing next to marijuana plants were sufficiently authenticated, even though there was no direct proof of when or where the pictures were taken.

United States v. Stearns, 550 F.2d 1167 (9th Cir. 1977) : Affirming theft convictions, the Court held that photographs of two boats, one of which was allegedly stolen, were properly admitted into evidence, even though no witness testified explicitly as to where or when the pictures were taken or what they represented. It noted: "Even if direct testimony as to foundation matters is absent, however, the contents of a photograph itself, together with such other circumstantial or indirect evidence as bears upon the issue, may serve to explain and authenticate a photograph sufficiently to justify its admission into evidence."

[g] Rule 901(b)(4) -- Reply

United States v. Reilly, 33 F.3d 1396 (3d Cir. 1994) : In a prosecution for illegal ocean dumping and making false statements to a grand jury, the Court held that radiotelegrams were sufficiently authenticated by, inter alia, testimony of telegraph operators, contents known only by the purported source, and the reply letter doctrine.

United States v. Sanders, 421 F.3d 1044 (9th Cir. 2005) : When the defendant was in jail awaiting trial he attempted to dissuade an accomplice, also held there, from testifying by conversations through vents and by notes; he also sent a false declaration exonerating him to the accomplice to be signed. Affirming a bank robbery conviction, the Court held that the defendant's various statements were sufficiently identified by testimony from the accomplice that: he recognized the defendant's voice; the defendant knew his booking number that was on the declaration; a note from the defendant was in response to one he sent; and no other inmate had any significant interest in getting him to sign the exonerating declaration.

United States v. Weinstein, 762 F.2d 1522 (11th Cir. 1985) : In a racketeering conspiracy and mail fraud case, the Court approved the admission of a telex that was circumstantially authenticated by its responsiveness to a letter that was in evidence.

[h] Rule 901(b)(4) -- Telephone Conversations

United States v. Console, 13 F.3d 641 (3d Cir. 1993) : The Court affirmed RICO and fraud convictions, holding that a telephone conversation was sufficiently authenticated by the caller's self-identification plus his disclosing knowledge of facts known peculiarly to him.

United States v. Parker, 133 F.3d 322 (5th Cir. 1998) : In the prosecution of a husband and wife for public bribery, the Court found that the husband was sufficiently identified as having made a threat in a phone conversation, where the wife placed the call to the witness and thereafter a man interrupted the conversation and referred to the wife as his "old lady."

United States v. Sawyer, 607 F.2d 1190 (7th Cir. 1979) : In a prosecution for failure to file tax returns, the Court held that a telephone conversation was properly authenticated by evidence that the number listed in an IRS agent's report was the defendant's, and the personal nature of the facts made it unlikely that anyone else would have answered for the defendant.

United States v. Miller, 771 F.2d 1219 (9th Cir. 1985) : Affirming criminal antitrust convictions, the Court held that a telephone call could be authenticated by the caller's reference to another call made ten minutes earlier.

[6] Rule 901(b)(5) -- Illustrations -- Voice IdentificatioN

United States v. Cambindo Valencia, 609 F.2d 603 (2d Cir. 1979) : The Court indicated that it was not necessary for a witness to be an expert in order to identify a voice speaking in Spanish on a tape. In United States v. James, n71 the Court found that a telephone call was admissible as a statement of a coconspirator without a showing of the identity of the caller, but suggested that the jury should have been told that there was insufficient evidence to connect a particular defendant with the call.

United States v. Oriakhi, 57 F.3d 1290 (4th Cir. 1995) : The Court held there was no error in admitting incriminating audio tapes in a drug prosecution. Although one witness who identified the defendant's voice had listened to the tapes with the aid of a government-prepared transcript containing portions of dialogue labeled with the defendant's name, the witness testified that he knew the defendant's voice and that he had not seen the transcripts until after he had recognized the voice on the tapes. The defendant objected that another witness had gained his knowledge of the defendant's voice during plea negotiations, but the Court held that the Rules only limit admissibility of statements, not sounds, in plea bargaining. In a drug prosecution, United States v. Robinson, n72 the Court found that a government witness was properly permitted to testify that a person who identified himself as Ralph, the defendant's first name, spoke to her during several telephone calls and once in person. She could identify the voice as the same in all the conversations.

United States v. Norman, 415 F.3d 466 (5th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed drug convictions, finding no error in permitting DEA agents to identify a defendant's voice on an audiotape, since the agents had an hour-long discussion with the defendant from which they could make the identification. The fact that the recording of defendant's voice was short in duration and accompanied by background noise went to weight rather than admissibility, especially given extrinsic evidence supporting the reliability of the identification.

United States v. Mansoori, 304 F.3d 635 (7th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed drug trafficking convictions, finding no error in the admission of tape recordings and translations of intercepted telephone conversations that had been conducted in Farsi. An FBI language specialist identified two of the defendants as participants in the conversations, based on having heard them speak at a Court proceeding that took place in advance of trial. While agreeing with the defendants that the basis for the witness' identification "was relatively weak," the Court found that it could not say the brief opportunity was insufficient as a matter of law to permit the voice identification. In United States v. Magana, 118 F.3d 1173 (7th Cir. 1997) , the Court affirmed drug convictions, holding there was no error in refusing to give the defendant's proposed instruction that the value of voice identification evidence depends on the witness' opportunity to hear the offender at the time of the offense and later to make a reliable identification. The instruction did not accurately reflect the law, that voice identifications can be based on the witness' opportunity to hear the speaker's voice at any time in circumstances connecting the speaker with the voice. In United States v. Saulter, n73 the Court affirmed crack cocaine convictions, finding no error in a government witness' identification of two coconspirators on a tape recording. The witness' familiarity with one of the coconspirators was limited to having purchased narcotics from him on two occasions. Nonetheless, "minimal familiarity is sufficient for admissibility purposes," and two meetings formed a sufficient basis for a voice identification. In United States v. Gironda, n74 the Court held that a person who spoke with a defendant on three occasions could identify his voice over the telephone.

United States v. Vitale, 549 F.2d 71 (8th Cir. 1977) : Affirming convictions for distributing controlled substances, the Court approved a ruling that a police officer could testify as to his identification of the defendant's voice in telephone conversations since he had spoken with her personally on two occasions and said that he could identify her voice. The Court also noted that the identity of a speaker in a telephone conversation might be proved by circumstantial evidence. In United States v. Kirk, n75 the Court affirmed convictions for heroin distribution offenses, noting that voice identification is not necessarily a subject of expert testimony. Under Rule 901 the standard for the admissibility of an opinion as to the identity of a speaker is merely that the identifier has heard the voice of the alleged speaker at any time.

United States v. Sanders, 421 F.3d 1044 (9th Cir. 2005) : When the defendant was in jail awaiting trial he attempted to dissuade an accomplice, also held there, from testifying by conversations through vents and by notes; he also sent a false declaration exonerating him to the accomplice to be signed. Affirming a bank robbery conviction, the Court held that the defendant's various statements were sufficiently identified by testimony from the accomplice that: he recognized the defendant's voice; the defendant knew his booking number that was on the declaration; a note from the defendant was in response to one he sent; and no other inmate had any significant interest in getting him to sign the exonerating declaration. In United States v. Duran, 4 F.3d 800 (9th Cir. 1993) , the Court affirmed a bank robbery conviction, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting bank tellers' in-court voice identification of the defendant, where he had their undivided attention during the robbery, they gave an accurate description of the defendant and his voice, and the identification occurred just three months after the robbery. In United States v. Torres, n76 the Court affirmed drug conspiracy convictions, holding that a voice heard on tape recordings was sufficiently identified by testimony of a DEA agent that he had spoken with a defendant and recognized her voice on the tapes and by evidence that she was the only person at the location who responded to the name used on the tapes.

United States v. Bush, 405 F.3d 909 (10th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a conviction for cocaine distribution, finding no error in allowing an undercover officer to testify as a lay witness that it was the defendant's voice in an incriminating conversation that was surreptitiously recorded and played at trial. The witness had sufficient familiarity with the defendant's voice from speaking to him in person and numerous times over the phone. A voice identification "need only rise to the level of minimal familiarity" and once that standard has been satisfied, "it is for the jury to assess any issues regarding the extent of the witness' familiarity with the voice." In a drug trafficking prosecution, United States v. Hardwell, 80 F.3d 1471 (10th Cir. 1996) , the Court held there was no plain error in admitting a detective's opinion identifying a defendant's voice on a tape recording even though the detective had not heard the taped conversations in person, since the detective later heard the defendant's voice both in person and on a tape of his Court appearance. In United States v. Watson, n77 the Court held that, for purposes of voice identification, familiarity with another's voice may be acquired either before or after the conversation that is the subject of the identification.

United States v. Puentes, 50 F.3d 1567 (11th Cir. 1995) : Affirming a narcotics conviction, the Court held that transcripts of wiretapped conversations were properly admitted. An inspector with the Spanish National Police, who conducted the wiretap, had read the transcript to the jury. Although the inspector was not familiar with the defendant's voice prior to the wiretaps, the Court held that it was sufficient under the Rule that the inspector became familiar with the defendant's voice during the two-month wiretap surveillance.

[7] Rule 901(b)(6) -- Illustrations -- Telephone Conversations

[a] Rule 901(b)(6) -- Calls to Businesses

United States v. Portsmouth Paving Corp., 694 F.2d 312 (4th Cir. 1982) : The Court held that a telephone conversation was properly authenticated under the Rule by evidence that it had been placed to a defendant's office.

United States v. Kingston, 971 F.2d 481 (10th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed fraud convictions, holding that a telephone conversation was sufficiently identified with the defendant by evidence that the witness had called the number listed for the defendant's business and left a message on the answering machine, which prompted a return call from a person informing the witness that the defendant could be reached at a given number, and that when the witness called that number, the person answering identified himself as the defendant and stated his familiarity with the matter at issue.

[b] Rule 901(b)(6) -- Calls to Individuals

United States v. Khan, 53 F.3d 507 (2d Cir. 1995) : In a prosecution for Medicaid fraud, the Court held that telephone calls allegedly made by a defendant were sufficiently authenticated by evidence that they were made to a number provided by the defendant on an application form and in regard to a matter as to which the defendant had indicated a strong interest in returning the call.

First State Bank v. Maryland Cas. Co., 918 F.2d 38 (5th Cir. 1990) : To show that the insured was not at home when a fire destroyed a house he owned, which with other proof tended to show he set the fire, the defendant in an action on a fire insurance policy offered testimony by a police dispatcher that she called the listed number for the insured to notify him of the fire, that an unidentified person answered the phone and identified it as the insured's residence, and the person answering said the insured was not home. Affirming a judgment for the insurer, the Court held that the telephone conversation was sufficiently authenticated.

United States v. Roberts, 22 F.3d 744 (7th Cir. 1994) : In a prosecution for fraud in the sale of distributorships, an undercover informant testified for the government that he called an advertised 800 number, expressed interest in buying a distributorship, and was told to call "Doug Jones" at a certain number. When he dialed that number, a person who identified himself as "Doug Jones" answered and made fraudulent representations. The Court held there was no error in admitting the representations against the defendant Doug Jones at trial. Although "self-identification by the speaker alone is insufficient to authenticate the source of a telephone call," here there was more than simple self-identification: the agent was directed to Jones' telephone number and dialed that number, and the person who identified himself as Doug Jones made several representations consistent with those that Doug Jones had made in similar circumstances.

United States v. Pruitt, 702 F.2d 152 (8th Cir. 1983) : Affirming a conviction for making a fraudulent claim to the government, the Court found that testimony about several conversations involving the defendant were admissible even though neither of the witnesses who testified was familiar with his voice: "Identification of a party to a telephone conversation may be established by circumstantial evidence, including self-identification, tending to relate a phone number to a particular person."

United States v. Kingston, 971 F.2d 481 (10th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed fraud convictions, holding that a telephone conversation was sufficiently identified with the defendant by evidence that the witness had called the number listed for the defendant's business and left a message on the answering machine, which prompted a return call from a person informing the witness that the defendant could be reached at a given number, and that when the witness called that number, the person answering identified himself as the defendant and stated his familiarity with the matter at issue.

[8] Rule 901(b)(7) -- Illustrations -- Public Records Or Reports

United States v. Childs, 5 F.3d 1328 (9th Cir. 1993) : The Court affirmed convictions for interstate transportation of stolen motor vehicles, holding there was no error in admitting documents filed with the Alberta, Canada, Division of Motor Vehicles upon the testimony of a custodian of those records, even though they did not meet the requirements for self-authentication under Rule 902(3). In United States v. Wilson, n78 the Court affirmed convictions for fraud and possession of false identity cards, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of a map referred to in the testimony of a Navy realty specialist and draftsman that established federal jurisdiction over the area in which two of the alleged crimes were committed. The map was identified as one prepared and maintained under the supervision of the Naval Department charged with responsibility for real estate acquisition and management in the area, and the witness was sufficiently qualified as an expert draftsman and cartographer.

United States v. Meienberg, 263 F.3d 1177 (10th Cir. 2001) : The Court affirmed a conviction for selling a firearm in violation of state law, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of printouts of computerized records reflecting the approval numbers issued by the state Bureau of Investigation to the defendant's firearms business. The printouts were sufficiently authenticated by testimony from a government witness to that fact; any question as to their accuracy went only to weight, not admissibility. In United States v. Hernandez-Herrera, 952 F.2d 342 (10th Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed convictions for immigration offenses, holding that an INS agent with knowledge of the agency's procedures could sufficiently authenticate INS records, even though no chain of custody was established.

[9] Rule 901(b)(8) -- Illustrations -- Ancient Documents Or Data Compilation

George v. Celotex Corp., 914 F.2d 26 (2d Cir. 1990) : Affirming a verdict for the plaintiff in an action for injuries from asbestos exposure, the Court said that an unpublished 1947 report regarding the dangers of asbestos was properly admitted as an ancient document under Rule 803(16) after authentication pursuant to Rule 901(b)(8).

United States v. Stelmokas, 100 F.3d 302 (3d Cir. 1996) : The Court held, in denaturalization proceedings against an alleged Nazi collaborator, that records of the defendant's employment and activities during World War II, which were found in Lithuanian archives and other locations containing German records, were properly admitted. The records' authenticity and reliability was certified by experts possessing considerable experience with Eastern European Holocaust records. In Threadgill v. Armstrong World Indus., 928 F.2d 1366 (3d Cir. 1991) , the Court held that the plaintiff in an asbestos wrongful death action should have been given the opportunity to authenticate the "Sumner Simpson papers" under the Rule. The Trial Judge's reliance on other decisions excluding the documents was misplaced, as they focused on the completeness and trustworthiness of the information in the documents rather than on whether the documents offered were what they purported to be.

United States v. Demjanjuk, 367 F.3d 623 (6th Cir. 2004) : Affirming the revocation of the defendant's citizenship on the ground it was illegally procured, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of a German identification card identifying the defendant as a prison guard at a Polish concentration camp. Under Rule 901(b)(8), "*[t]*he question of whether evidence is suspicious, and therefore inadmissible, is within the trial court's discretion." "Although Rule 901(b)(8) requires that the document be free of suspicion, that suspicion goes not to the content of the document, but to whether the document is what it purports to be." The Court also found authenticity on the alternative ground of circumstantial evidence. In an action to recover contribution for an environmental clean-up, Kalamazoo River Study Group v. Menasha Corp., 228 F.3d 648 (6th Cir. 2000) , the plaintiffs offered a document from the files of the state Department of Natural Resources to prove that a defendant purchased a substance containing PCBs in 1970 and 1971. A DNR employee testified that the document had been in the files for over 20 years and that he believed that it was prepared by the federal Environmental Protection Agency. The Court held there was no error in excluding the document, since its reliability was seriously in question, given that the witness was unable to state with certainty that it was prepared by the EPA and did not establish why it was in the DNR files.

Chemetall GMBH v. Zr Energy, Inc., 320 F.3d 714 (7th Cir. 2003) : In an action to enforce an employee's confidentiality agreement, the defendants attempted to prove that the alleged trade secrets were public knowledge by introducing a 1974 memorandum that had been obtained through discovery from the files of an expert for the plaintiff. The memorandum was excluded as not authenticated, and the Court found no abuse of discretion, "even though a contrary conclusion on this evidence might also have been reasonable." Since the expert was not identified as a recipient on the document's distribution list and he was unable to say who sent him the document or how he obtained it, it was reasonable to conclude that the expert's files were not where one would expect to find an authentic copy of the document. In United States v. Kairys, n79 the Court affirmed an order revoking the defendant's citizenship, rejecting the defendant's claim that a Nazi identification card should not have been admitted as an ancient document because allegedly "the Soviet Union routinely disseminates forged documents as part of propaganda campaigns."

Fulmer v. Connors, 665 F. Supp. 1472 (N.D. Ala. 1987) : Entering judgment for the widow of a deceased coal miner who sued a union pension fund, the Judge ruled that the coal company's cash book and time and payroll book, which contained entries for the early 1940s, were authenticated as ancient documents.

[10] Rule 901(b)(9) -- Illustrations -- Process Or System

United States v. Rembert, 863 F.2d 1023 (D.C. Cir. 1988) : The Court affirmed convictions for kidnapping, armed robbery, and other offenses, as it found that photographs taken by an automatic teller machine were properly admitted even though no foundation testimony was offered as to the process by which the pictures were taken. It found that circumstantial evidence concerning the events, the contents of the photos, and testimony concerning the loading and security of the film constituted sufficient identification.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. Hoover v. Thompson, 787 F.2d 449 (8th Cir. 1986) .

(n2)Footnote 2. United States v. Collado, 957 F.2d 38 (1st Cir. 1992) .

(n3)Footnote 3. United States v. Arias, 678 F.2d 1202 (4th Cir. 1982) .

(n4)Footnote 4. United States v. Shaw, 920 F.2d 1225 (5th Cir. 1991) .

(n5)Footnote 5. United States v. Houston, 892 F.2d 696 (8th Cir. 1989) .

(n6)Footnote 6. United States v. Cardenas, 864 F.2d 1528 (10th Cir. 1989) .

(n7)Footnote 7. United States v. Jardina, 747 F.2d 945 (5th Cir. 1984) .

(n8)Footnote 8. United States v. Mays, 822 F.2d 793 (8th Cir. 1987) .

(n9)Footnote 9. United States v. Abreu, 952 F.2d 1458 (1st Cir. 1992) .

(n10)Footnote 10. Ricketts v. City of Hartford, 74 F.3d 1397 (2d Cir. 1996) .

(n11)Footnote 11. United States v. Ruggiero, 928 F.2d 1289 (2d Cir. 1991) .

(n12)Footnote 12. See the Editorial Explanatory Comments, §§ 104.02[9], 404.02[18].

(n13)Footnote 13. O'Neal v. Esty, 637 F.2d 846 (2d Cir. 1980) .

(n14)Footnote 14. United States v. Brown, 688 F.2d 1112 (7th Cir. 1982) .

(n15)Footnote 15. United States v. Drews, 877 F.2d 10 (8th Cir. 1989) .

(n16)Footnote 16. E.W. French & Sons, Inc. v. General Portland, Inc., 885 F.2d 1392 (9th Cir. 1989) .

(n17)Footnote 17. United States v. Soulard, 730 F.2d 1292 (9th Cir. 1984) .

(n18)Footnote 18. People of Terr. of Guam v. Ojeda, 758 F.2d 403 (9th Cir. 1985) .

(n19)Footnote 19. United States v. One 56-Foot Motor Yacht, 702 F.2d 1276 (9th Cir. 1983) .

(n20)Footnote 20. United States v. Johnson, 637 F.2d 1224 (9th Cir. 1980) .

(n21)Footnote 21. United States v. Garcia, 718 F.2d 1528 (11th Cir. 1983) , aff'd, 469 U.S. 70 (1984) .

(n22)Footnote 22. Itel Capital Corp. v. Cups Coal Co., 707 F.2d 1253 (11th Cir. 1983) .

(n23)Footnote 23. Stahl v. Novartis Pharms. Corp., 283 F.3d 254 (5th Cir. 2002)

(n24)Footnote 24. United States v. Skipper, 74 F.3d 608 (5th Cir. 1996) .

(n25)Footnote 25. Zenith Radio Corp. v. Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co., 723 F.2d 238 (3d Cir. 1983) , rev'd on other grounds, 475 U.S. 574 (1986) .

(n26)Footnote 26. McQueeney v. Wilmington Trust Co., 779 F.2d 916 (3d Cir. 1985) .

(n27)Footnote 27. United States v. Brown, 688 F.2d 1112 (7th Cir. 1982) .

(n28)Footnote 28. United States v. West, 948 F.2d 1042 (6th Cir. 1991) .

(n29)Footnote 29. United States v. Rengifo, 789 F.2d 975 (1st Cir. 1986) .

(n30)Footnote 30. United States v. Ruggiero, 928 F.2d 1289 (2d Cir. 1991) .

(n31)Footnote 31. United States v. Sliker, 751 F.2d 477 (2d Cir. 1984) .

(n32)Footnote 32. United States v. Lance, 853 F.2d 1177 (5th Cir. 1988) .

(n33)Footnote 33. United States v. Stephenson, 887 F.2d 57 (5th Cir. 1989) .

(n34)Footnote 34. United States v. Brown, 136 F.3d 1176 (7th Cir. 1998) .

(n35)Footnote 35. United States v. Boyd, 208 F.3d 638 (7th Cir. 2000) .

(n36)Footnote 36. Williams v. Butler, 746 F.2d 431 (8th Cir. 1984) , adhered to, 802 F.2d 296 (8th Cir. 1986) .

(n37)Footnote 37. United States v. Richardson, 764 F.2d 1514 (11th Cir. 1985) .

(n38)Footnote 38. United States v. Pena-Espinoza, 47 F.3d 356 (9th Cir. 1995) .

(n39)Footnote 39. United States v. Rengifo, 789 F.2d 975 (1st Cir. 1986) .

(n40)Footnote 40. United States v. Mazza, 792 F.2d 1210 (1st Cir. 1986) .

(n41)Footnote 41. United States v. Lopez-Pena, 912 F.2d 1536 (1989) , rev'd in part on other grounds en banc, 912 F.2d 1552 (1990) , panel opinion reinstated, 944 F.2d 51 (1st Cir. 1991) .

(N42)Footnote 42. United States v. West, 948 F.2d 1042 (6th Cir. 1991) .

(n43)Footnote 43. United States v. Mittleider, 835 F.2d 769 (10th Cir. 1987) .

(n44)Footnote 44. United States v. Devous, 764 F.2d 1349 (10th Cir. 1985) .

(n45)Footnote 45. United States v. Rosenthal, 793 F.2d 1214 (11th Cir. 1986) .

(n46)Footnote 46. United States v. Scott, 678 F.2d 606 (5th Cir. 1982) .

(n47)Footnote 47. United States v. Hassell, 547 F.2d 1048 (8th Cir. 1977) .

(n48)Footnote 48. In re Clifford, 566 F.2d 1023 (5th Cir. 1978) .

(n49)Footnote 49. United States v. Barron, 707 F.2d 125 (5th Cir. 1983) .

(n50)Footnote 50. United States v. Pitts, 569 F.2d 343 (5th Cir. 1978) .

(n51)Footnote 51. United States v. Mauchlin, 670 F.2d 746 (7th Cir. 1982) .

(n52)Footnote 52. United States v. Williams, 837 F.2d 1009 (11th Cir. 1988) .

(n53)Footnote 53. United States v. Barker, 735 F.2d 1280 (11th Cir. 1984) .

(n54)Footnote 54. United States v. Glover, 846 F.2d 339 (6th Cir. 1988) .

(n55)Footnote 55. United States v. Woodson, 526 F.2d 550 (9th Cir. 1975) .

(n56)Footnote 56. United States v. Newton, 891 F.2d 944 (1st Cir. 1989) .

(n57)Footnote 57. United States v. Drougas, 748 F.2d 8 (1st Cir. 1984) .

(n58)Footnote 58. United States v. De Gudino, 722 F.2d 1351 (7th Cir. 1983) , amended (7th Cir. 1984).

(n59)Footnote 59. United States v. Eisenberg, 807 F.2d 1446 (8th Cir. 1986) .

(n60)Footnote 60. United States v. Black, 767 F.2d 1334 (9th Cir. 1985) .

(n61)Footnote 61. United States v. Gordon, 634 F.2d 639 (1st Cir. 1980) .

(n62)Footnote 62. McQueeney v. Wilmington Trust Co., 779 F.2d 916 (3d Cir. 1985) .

(n63)Footnote 63. United States v. Thornton, 197 F.3d 241 (7th Cir. 1999) .

(n64)Footnote 64. United States v. Harvey, 117 F.3d 1044 (7th Cir. 1997) .

(n65)Footnote 65. United States v. Hoag, 823 F.2d 1123 (7th Cir. 1987) .

(n66)Footnote 66. United States v. Lewis, 759 F.2d 1316 (8th Cir. 1985) .

(n67)Footnote 67. United States v. Helmel, 769 F.2d 1306 (8th Cir. 1985) .

(n68)Footnote 68. United States v. Markopoulos, 848 F.2d 1036 (10th Cir. 1988) .

(n69)Footnote 69. United States v. Reyes, 798 F.2d 380 (10th Cir. 1986) .

(n70)Footnote 70. United States v. Caldwell, 776 F.2d 989 (11th Cir. 1985) .

(n71)Footnote 71. United States v. James, 609 F.2d 36 (2d Cir. 1979) .

(n72)Footnote 72. United States v. Robinson, 707 F.2d 811 (4th Cir. 1983) .

(n73)Footnote 73. United States v. Saulter, 60 F.3d 270 (7th Cir. 1995) .

(n74)Footnote 74. United States v. Gironda, 758 F.2d 1201 (7th Cir. 1985) .

(n75)Footnote 75. United States v. Kirk, 534 F.2d 1262 (8th Cir. 1976) .

(n76)Footnote 76. United States v. Torres, 908 F.2d 1417 (9th Cir. 1990) .

(n77)Footnote 77. United States v. Watson, 594 F.2d 1330 (10th Cir. 1979) .

(n78)Footnote 78. United States v. Wilson, 535 F.2d 521 (9th Cir. 1976) .

(n79)Footnote 79. United States v. Kairys, 782 F.2d 1374 (7th Cir. 1986) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IX. Authentication And Identification
CHAPTER 901 RULE 901

5-901 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 901.04

901.04 Legislative History

Advisory Committee's Note

Subdivision (a). Authentication and identification represent a special aspect of relevancy. Michael and Adler, Real Proof, 5 Vand. L. Rev. 344, 362 (1952); McCormick §§ 179, 185; Morgan, Basic Problems of Evidence 378 (1962). Thus a telephone conversation may be irrelevant because on an unrelated topic or because the speaker is not identified. The latter aspect is the one here involved. Wigmore describes the need for authentication as "an inherent logical necessity." 7 Wigmore § 2129, p. 564.

This requirement of showing authenticity or identity falls in the category of relevancy dependent upon fulfillment of a condition of fact and is governed by the procedure set forth in Rule 104(b).

The common law approach to authentication of documents has been criticized as an "attitude of agnosticism," McCormick, Cases on Evidence 388, n. 4 (3d ed. 1956), as one which "departs sharply from men's customs in ordinary affairs," and as presenting only a slight obstacle to the introduction of forgeries in comparison to the time and expense devoted to proving genuine writings which correctly show their origin on their face, McCormick § 185, pp.395, 396. Today, such available procedures as requests to admit and pretrial conference afford the means of eliminating much of the need for authentication or identification. Also, significant inroads upon the traditional insistence on authentication and identification have been made by accepting as at least prima facie genuine items of the kind treated in Rule 902 infra . However, the need for suitable methods of proof still remains, since criminal cases pose their own obstacles to the use of preliminary procedures, unforeseen contingencies may arise, and cases of genuine controversy will still occur.

Subdivision (b). The treatment of authentication and identification draws largely upon the experience embodied in the common law and in statutes to furnish illustrative applications of the general principle set forth in subdivision (a). The examples are not intended as an exclusive enumeration of allowable methods but are meant to guide and suggest, leaving room for growth and development in this area of the law.

The examples relate for the most part to documents, with some attention given to voice communications and computer printouts. As Wigmore noted, no special rules have been developed for authenticating chattels. Wigmore, Code of Evidence § 2086 (3d ed. 1942).

It should be observed that compliance with requirements of authentication or identification by no means assures admission of an item into evidence, as other bars, hearsay for example, may remain.

Example (1) contemplates a broad spectrum ranging from testimony of a witness who was present at the signing of a document to testimony establishing narcotics as taken from an accused and accounting for custody through the period until trial, including laboratory analysis. See California Evidence Code § 1413, eyewitness to signing.

Example (2) states conventional doctrine as to lay identification of handwriting, which recognizes that a sufficient familiarity with the handwriting of another person may be acquired by seeing him write, by exchanging correspondence, or by other means, to afford a basis for identifying it on subsequent occasions. McCormick § 189. See also California Evidence Code § 1416. Testimony based upon familiarity acquired for purposes of the litigation is reserved to the expert under the example which follows.

Example (3).

The history of common law restrictions upon the technique of proving or disproving the genuineness of a disputed specimen of handwriting through comparison with a genuine specimen, by either the testimony of expert witnesses or direct viewing by the triers themselves, is detailed in 7 Wigmore §§ 1991-1994. In breaking away, the English Common Law Procedure Act of 1854, 17 and 18 Vict., c. 125, § 27, cautiously allowed expert or trier to use exemplars "proved to the satisfaction of the judge to be genuine" for purposes of comparison. The language found its way into numerous statutes in this country, e.g., California Evidence Code §§ 1417, 1418. While explainable as a measure of prudence in the process of breaking with precedent in the handwriting situation, the reservation to the judge of the question of the genuineness of exemplars and the imposition of an unusually high standard of persuasion are at variance with the general treatment of relevancy which depends upon fulfillment of a condition of fact. Rule 104(b). No similar attitude is found in other comparison situations, e.g., ballistics comparison by jury, as in Evans v. Commonwealth, 230 Ky. 411, 19 S.W.2d 1091 (1929) , or by experts, Annot., 26 A.L.R.2d 892 , and no reason appears for its continued existence in handwriting cases. Consequently Example (3) sets no higher standard for handwriting specimens and treats all comparison situations alike, to be governed by Rule 104(b). This approach is consistent with 28 U.S.C. § 1731: "The admitted or proved handwriting of any person shall be admissible, for purposes of comparison, to determine genuineness of other handwriting attributed to such person."

Precedent supports the acceptance of visual comparison as sufficiently satisfying preliminary authentication requirements for admission in evidence. Brandon v. Collins, 267 F.2d 731 (2d Cir. 1959) ; Wausau Sulphate Fibre Co. v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 61 F.2d 879 (7th Cir. 1932) ; Desimone v. United States, 227 F.2d 864 (9th Cir. 1955) .

Example (4).

The characteristics of the offered item itself, considered in the light of circumstances, afford authentication techniques in great variety. Thus a document or telephone conversation may be shown to have emanated from a particular person by virtue of its disclosing knowledge of facts known peculiarly to him; Globe Automatic Sprinkler Co. v. Braniff, 89 Okl. 105, 214 P. 127 (1923) ; California Evidence Code § 1421; similarly, a letter may be authenticated by content and circumstances indicating it was in reply to a duly authenticated one. McCormick § 192; California Evidence Code § 1420. Language patterns may indicate authenticity or its opposite. Magnuson v. State, 187 Wis. 122, 203 N.W. 749 (1925) ; Arens and Meadow, Psycholinguistics and the Confession Dilemma, 56 Colum. L. Rev. 19 (1956).

Example (5).

Since aural voice identification is not a subject of expert testimony, the requisite familiarity may be acquired either before or after the particular speaking which is the subject of the identification, in this respect resembling visual identification of a person rather than identification of handwriting. Cf. Example (2) supra. People v. Nichols, 378 Ill. 487, 38 N.E.2d 766 (1942) ; McGuire v. State, 200 Md. 601, 92 A.2d 582 (1952) ; State v. McGee, 336 Mo. 1082, 83 S.W.2d 98 (1935) .

Example (6).

The cases are in agreement that a mere assertion of his identity by a person talking on the telephone is not sufficient evidence of the authenticity of the conversation and that additional evidence of his identity is required. The additional evidence need not fall in any set pattern. Thus the content of his statements or the reply technique, under Example (4) supra, or voice identification, under Example (5), may furnish the necessary foundation. Outgoing calls made by the witness involve additional factors bearing upon authenticity. The calling of a number assigned by the telephone company reasonably supports the assumption that the listing is correct and that the number is the one reached. If the number is that of a place of business, the mass of authority allows an ensuing conversation if it relates to business reasonably transacted over the telephone, on the theory that the maintenance of the telephone connection is an invitation to do business without further identification. Matton v. Hoover Co., 350 Mo. 506, 166 S.W.2d 557 (1942) ; City of Pawhuska v. Crutchfield, 147 Okl. 4, 293 P. 1095 (1930) ; Zurich General Acc. & Liability Ins. Co. v. Baum, 159 Va. 404, 165 S.E. 518 (1932) . Otherwise, some additional circumstance of identification of the speaker is required. The authorities divide on the question whether the self-identifying statement of the person answering suffices. Example (6) answers in the affirmative on the assumption that usual conduct respecting telephone calls furnishes adequate assurances of regularity, bearing in mind that the entire matter is open to exploration before the trier of fact. In general, see McCormick § 193; 7 Wigmore § 2155; Annot., 71 A.L.R. 5 ; Annot., 105 A.L.R. 326 .

Example (7).

Public records are regularly authenticated by proof of custody, without more. McCormick § 191; 7 Wigmore §§ 2158, 2159. The example extends the principle to include data stored in computers and similar methods, of which increasing use in the public records area may be expected. See California Evidence Code §§ 1532, 1600.

Example (8).

The familiar ancient document rule of the common law is extended to include data stored electronically or by other similar means. Since the importance of appearance diminishes in this situation, the importance of custody or place where found increases correspondingly. This expansion is necessary in view of the widespread use of methods of storing data in forms other than conventional written records.

Any time period selected is bound to be arbitrary. The common law period of 30 years is here reduced to 20 years, with some shift of emphasis from the probable unavailability of witnesses to the unlikeliness of a still viable fraud after the lapse of time. The shorter period is specified in the English Evidence Act of 1938, 1 & 2 Geo. 6, c. 28, and in Oregon R.S. 1963, ? 41.360(34). See also the numerous statutes prescribing periods of less than 30 years in the case of recorded documents. 7 Wigmore § 2143.

The application of Example (8) is not subject to any limitation to title documents or to any requirement that possession, in the case of a title document, has been consistent with the document. See McCormick § 190.

Example (9) is designated for situations in which the accuracy of a result is dependent upon a process or system which produces it. X rays afford a familiar instance. Among more recent developments is the computer, as to which see Transport Indemnity Co. v. Seib, 178 Neb. 253, 132 N.W.2d 871 (1965) ; State v. Veres, 7 Ariz. App. 117, 436 P.2d 629 (1968) ; Merrick v. United States Rubber Co., 7 Ariz. App. 433, 440 P.2d 314 (1968) ; Freed, Computer Print-Outs as Evidence, 16 Am. Jur. Proof of Facts 273; Symposium, Law and Computers in the Mid-Sixties, ALI-ABA (1966); 37 Albany L. Rev. 61 (1967). Example (9) does not, of course, foreclose taking judicial notice of the accuracy of the process or system.

Example (10).

The example makes clear that methods of authentication provided by act of Congress and by the Rules of Civil and Criminal Procedure or by Bankruptcy Rules are not intended to be superseded. Illustrative are the provisions for authentication of official records in Civil Procedure Rule 44 and Criminal Procedure Rule 27, for authentication of records of proceedings by court reporters in 28 U.S.C. § 753(b) and Civil Procedure Rule 80(c), and for authentication of depositions in Civil Procedure Rule 30(f).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IX. Authentication And Identification
Supp. To CHAPTER 901 RULE 901

5-901 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 901, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

ARTICLE IX. AUTHENTICATION AND IDENTIFICATION	ARTICLE IX. AUTHENTICATION AND IDENTIFICATION
Rule 901. Requir	Rule 901. Authen

ement of Authentication or Identification

Authenticating or Identifying Evidence

(a) General provision. The requirement of authentication or identification as a condition precedent to admissibility is satisfied by evidence sufficie

(a) In General. To satisfy the requirement of authenticating or identifying an item of evidence, the proponent must produce evidence sufficient to sup-nt to support a finding that the matter in question is what its proponent claims.		port a finding that the item is what the proponent claims it is.

(b)	Illustrations. By way of illustration only, and not by way of limitation, the following are examples of	(b)	Examples. The following are examples only -- not a complete list -- of evidence that satisfies the requirement:

authentication or identification conforming with the requirements of this rule:

(1)	Testimony of witness with knowledge. Testimony that a matter is what it is claimed to be.	(1)	Testimony of a Witness with Knowledge. Testimony that an item is what it is claimed to be.
(2)	No nexpert opinion	(2)	No nexpert Opinion on handwriting. Non-expert opinion as to the genuineness of handwriting, based upon familiarity not acquired for purposes of the litigation.		About Handwriting. A non-expert's opinion that handwriting is genuine, based on a familiarity with it that was not acquired for the current litigation.

(3)	Comparison by trier or expert witness	(3)	Comparison by an Expert Witness or

	. Comparison by the trier of fact or by expert witnesses with specimens which have been authenticated.		the Trier of Fact*. A comparison with an authenticated specimen by an expert witness or the trier of fact.
(4)	Distinctive characteristics and the like. Appearance, contents, substance,	(4)	Distinctive Characteristics and the Like*. The appearance, contents, sub-internal patterns, or other distinctive characteristics, taken in conjunction with circumstances.	stance, internal patterns, or other distinctive characteristics of the item, taken together with all the circumstances.

(5)	Voice identification. Identification of a voice, whether heard	(5)	Opinion About a Voice. An opinion identifying a person's voice -- whet first hand or through mechan-ical or elec-tron-ic trans mis-sion or re-cord ing, by opin ion base d upo n heari ng the voic e at any time un-der cir-cum stan ces con-nect-ing it with the al-lege d spea ker.

her hear d first hand or thro ugh mec han-ical or elec-tron-ic trans mis-sion or re-cord ing - - base d on heari ng the voic e at any time un-der cir-cum stan ces that con-nect it with the al-lege d spea ker.

(6)	Telephone conversations. Telephone conversations, by evidence that a call was made to the number assigned at the time by the telephone company to a particular person or business, if (A) in	(6)	Evidence About a Telephone Conversation. For a telephone conversation, evidence that a call was made to the number assigned at the time to:

the case of a person, circumstances, including self-identification, show the person answering to be the one called, or (B) in the case of a business, the call was made to a place of business and the conversation related to business reasonably transacted over the telephone.

(A) a particular person, if circumstances, including self-identification, show that the person answering was the one called; or

(B) a particular business, if the call was made to a business and the call related to business reasonably transacted over the telephone.

(7) Public records or reports. Evidence that a writing authorized by law

(7) Evidence About Public Records. Evidence that:

to be re-cor-ded or filed and in fact re-cor-ded or filed in a pub-lic of-fice, or a pur-por-ted pub-lic re-cord , re-port, state men t, or data com pila-tion, in any form , is from the pub-lic of-fice wher e item s of this nature are kept.

(A) a document was recorded or filed in a public office as authorized by law; or

(B) a purported public record or statement is from the office where items of this kind are kept.

(8) Ancient documents or data compilation. Evidence that a document or data compilation, in any form, (A) is in such condition as to create no suspicion concerning its authenticity, (B) was in a place where it, if authentic, would likely be, and (C) has been in existence 20 years or more at the time it is offered.

(8) Evidence About Ancient Documents or Data Compilations. For a document or data compilation, evidence that it:

(A) is in a condition that creates no suspicion about its authenticity;

(B) was in a place where, if authentic, it would likely be; and

(C) is at least 20 years old when offered.

(9) Process or system. Evidence describing a process or system used to produce a result and showing that

(9) Evidence About a Process or System. Evidence describing a process or system and showing that

	g that the process or system produces an accurate result.		it produces an accurate result.
(10)	Methods provided by statute or rule. Any method of authentication or identification provided by Act of Congress or by other	(10)	Methods Provided by a Statute or Rule. Any method of authentication or identification allowed by a federal statute or a rule prescrib rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority.

ed by the Supreme Court.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 901 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IX. Authentication And Identification
Supp. To CHAPTER 901 RULE 901

5-901 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 901.03

Supp. to § 901.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[1] Rule 901(a) -- General Provisions [Go To Main]

[c] Rule 901(a) -- Chain of Custody

[ii] Rule 901(a) -- Chain of Custody -- Drugs

United States v. Rawlins, 606 F.3d 73 (3d Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for cocaine distribution, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of test results on drugs allegedly seized from the conspiracy. It agreed with the defendant that there were substantial gaps in the chain of custody for the drugs, but deferred to the finding below in the absence of a "clear abuse of discretion" and because of the presumption of regularity in the handling of evidence by law enforcement, which was unchallenged in this case.

United States v. Moreland, 437 F.3d 424 (4th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for possession of cocaine base with intent to distribute, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting two exhibits, one containing the cocaine base purchased from the defendant, and the other containing cocaine base seized after the defendant's arrest. Trooper Perdue identified Government Exhibit 1 as the cocaine purchased from the defendant by Trooper Berry, and identified Government Exhibit 2 as the cocaine seized after the defendant's arrest. But subsequently, Trooper Berry identified Exhibit 2 as the cocaine he purchased, noting that his initials were on a piece of tape on the packaging. The government then recalled Trooper Perdue, who reiterated that the purchased cocaine base was Exhibit 1. He surmised that the packaging had been confused, and switched, at the lab. The Court found that the testimony regarding the chain of custody of the exhibits was sufficient to allow the jury to conclude that the substances in both exhibits were obtained from the defendant, and that the conflict in the officers' testimony went to weight, not admissibility.

United States v. Prieto, 549 F.3d 513 (7th Cir. 2008) : Affirming a conviction for possession with intent to distribute methamphetamine, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting several methamphetamine exhibits that were seized by the police after the defendants' arrest and that remained in police custody up until trial. Although the Court noted that the chain of custody was "somewhat sloppy" and that "the government did not offer any testimony about what happened to the drug packages removed from the rear bumper from the time they were removed to the time they appeared on the floor of the police garage," it held that "gaps in the chain go to the weight of the methamphetamine exhibits rather than their admissibility." Because the defendants had not shown that the exhibits ever left police custody, the Court found that a "presumption of regularity" applied. In United States v. Tatum, 548 F.3d 584 (7th Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed a conviction for possession of drugs with intent to distribute, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of drugs allegedly seized from the defendant. There was sufficient evidence connecting the drugs with the defendant at the time of arrest to satisfy the preponderance standard of proof for preliminary questions. Any gaps in the chain of custody went to the weight of the evidence and not to its admissibility.

[iii] Rule 901(a) -- Chain of Custody -- Other Evidence

United States v. Mejia, 597 F.3d 1329 (D.C. Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiring to import cocaine, which arose from a DEA-initiated Central American sting operation. It found no abuse of discretion in the admission of a handwritten note with "DEA" and a list of names on it that a DEA agent testified was in the defendant's wallet which the agent received in a bag of evidence from a Salvadoran officer. The agent did not witness the defendant's arrest or the seizure of evidence from him. Responding to a prosecution argument that a Judge is entitled to presume the integrity of evidence routinely handled by government officials, the Court said that "[w]hile we agree with the proposition as a general matter, we do not believe it extends automatically to all government officials, including those of a foreign government." Here, the record did not reveal what procedure the Salvadoran police used, the identity of the person making the seizure, or what was done with the evidence before the agent received it. Nonetheless, the brief, 10-minute delay between seizure and delivery to the DEA agent made it "implausible that it was planted, tampered with, or misidentified."

United States v. Lee, 502 F.3d 691 (7th Cir. 2007) : Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the government's gunshot-residue expert was permitted to testify to gunshot residue found on the cuff of the defendant's jacket, despite the facts that the jacket had been placed in a reusable property bag that was not sterilized or laundered between each use and the government could not establish who removed the jacket from the cloth bag and put it into a plastic bag that was transferred to the state police for testing. "Lee's arguments regarding the chain of custody and potential contamination of his jacket go to the weight of the evidence, not its admissibility."

United States v. Wilson, 565 F.3d 1059 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for transporting a minor to engage in criminal sexual activity and related offenses, rejecting the defendant's challenge, based on chain of custody, to the admissibility of a cell phone containing child pornography found in a search of his car. It reasoned that "[t]he location and custody of the cellular phone were adequately identified and Wilson has failed to aver any facts showing change or alteration of the images on the cellular phone," and "[a]ccordingly, he has failed to rebut the presumption of integrity."

[e] Rule 901(a) -- Extent of Foundation Required

United States v. Hampton, 464 F.3d 687 (7th Cir. 2006) : In a bank robbery trial, the prosecution proved the banks' federally insured status by introducing photocopies purporting to be insurance certificates, with an employee of each bank, typically a teller, testifying that an identical photocopy hanging on the wall of the witness' bank was a true copy of the bank's certificate. The Court held that the photocopies were not properly admitted under Rule 902(1), because the copies were copies of sealed documents rather than sealed documents themselves. They were also not admissible under Rule 1005, because there was no indication that the certificates on the walls of the banks to which the copies were compared were themselves originals. Nonetheless, the Court held the copies admissible, and affirmed the convictions, on the grounds that the copies were duplicates admissible under Rule 1003 unless there was a genuine question raised about the authenticity of the original and that the testimony of the tellers satisfied the authentication requirement of Rule 901(a): the testimony was "pretty compelling evidence that the copies were not forgeries prepared by or for, or somehow obtained by, the government," so that "[a]s between the parties' rival hypotheses ... the defendant's hypothesis is so improbable that without some evidence to support the hypothesis no reasonable person would accept it."

[f.1] Rule 901(a) -- Foreign Official Records

Vatyan v. Mukasey, 508 F.3d 1179 (9th Cir. 2007) : Vatyan sought asylum in the United States after alleged persecution in Armenia. As proof of his persecution, he offered letters purportedly sent to him by the Armenian Ministry of Internal Affairs and National Security. The Immigration Judge refused to recognize the letters on the ground that they were not properly certified by the Armenian government. Remanding, the Court found an error as a matter of law because the Immigration Judge had wrongly assumed that certification -- required for authentication under Fed. R. Civ. P. 44 and Fed. R. Evid. 902 -- was the only way in which the documents could be authenticated. The Court held that "an immigration petitioner may resort to any recognized procedure for authentication of documents in general, including the procedures permitted under Federal Rule of Evidence 901, and thus a petitioner's failure to obtain government certification of a foreign public document's authenticity is not necessarily a bar to admission of the document." The Court reasoned that to require an asylum petitioner "to obtain a certification from the very government he claims has persecuted him or has failed to protect him from persecution would in some cases create an insuperable barrier to admission of authentic documents." Here, the petitioner himself "arguably could have supported authentication" as he was a longtime resident of Armenia, he recognized the official stamps on the letter, and he might have been able to establish a chain of custody by explaining how the letter came into his possession.

[h] Rule 901(a) -- Inadequate Authentication

United States v. Baker, 538 F.3d 324 (5th Cir. 2008) : Yahoo! found 46 images on a Web site it hosted and reported the incident (as required by statute) to the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children. An investigation determined that the defendant was the source of the images, and he was charged with possessing, receiving, and distributing child pornography. At trial the government introduced a report from NCMEC with 46 images and their filenames, to prove that the defendant distributed child pornography. Reversing the defendant's conviction on the distribution count, the Court held it was plain error to admit the NCMEC report, as the prosecution had introduced no affidavit or testimonial evidence connecting the 46 images in the report with the 46 images Yahoo! had reported finding to NCMEC; the only witness testifying that the images in the report were the ones on the Web site was an agent with no personal knowledge.

United States v. Wilder, 597 F.3d 936 (8th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed convictions for cocaine-related offenses, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of a document that one defendant claimed was a police department record, where the witness asked to authenticate the document was a detective who said only that it "appears to be a copy of a possibly genuine document."

[i] Rule 901(a) -- Internet and Computer Evidence

[i] Rule 901(a) -- Computer Records

U-Haul Int'l, Inc. v. Lumbermens Mut. Cas. Co., 576 F.3d 1040 (9th Cir. 2009) : In an action over insurance coverage obligations the plaintiffs proved claims defense and settlement costs by introducing computer-generated summaries detailing the indemnity and expenses paid on each claim. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiffs, the Court held that the summaries were sufficiently authenticated by a witness who testified to the practices of the business, the process of inputting data into the computer, and the process of querying the computer to compile the information to create the summaries. The Court noted that it is not necessary to have the computer programmer testify, nor to have an expert provide testimony regarding the computer's mechanical accuracy where there is evidence that the computer was sufficiently accurate that the business relied upon it.

[ii] Rule 901(a) -- Internet Communications

United States v. Gagliardi, 506 F.3d 140 (2d Cir. 2007) : Affirming a conviction for attempting to entice a minor to engage in prohibited sexual activity, the Court found no error in the admission of e-mails and transcripts of instant messages. The Court rejected the defendant's argument that because the documents were largely cut from his electronic communications to others and then pasted by the recipients into word processing files, they could have been subject to fabrication and misrepresentative editing. It noted that the standard for authentication is "minimal," and in this case the recipients testified that the exhibits were accurate records of the defendant's conversations. "Based on their testimony, a reasonable juror could have found that the exhibits did represent those conversations, notwithstanding that the e-mails and online chats were editable."

[iii] Rule 901(a) -- Website Information

Victaulic Co. v. Tieman, 499 F.3d 227 (3d Cir. 2007) : Reversing a judgment for a former employee and his new employer that held a non-compete covenant invalid, the Court held that the Trial Judge should not have considered information about the former employer's business based on information contained on its website, because the information was not properly authenticated: "Anyone may purchase an internet address, and so, without proceeding to discovery or some other means of authentication, it is premature to assume that a webpage is owned by a company merely because its trade name appears in the uniform resource locator."

United States v. Baker, 538 F.3d 324 (5th Cir. 2008) : Yahoo! found 46 images on a Web site it hosted and reported the incident (as required by statute) to the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children. An investigation determined that the defendant was the source of the images, and he was charged with possessing, receiving, and distributing child pornography. At trial the government introduced a report from NCMEC with 46 images and their filenames, to prove that the defendant distributed child pornography. Reversing the defendant's conviction on the distribution count, the Court held it was plain error to admit the NCMEC report, as the prosecution had introduced no affidavit or testimonial evidence connecting the 46 images in the report with the 46 images Yahoo! had reported finding to NCMEC; the only witness testifying that the images in the report were the ones on the Web site was an agent with no personal knowledge.

[j] Rule 901(a) -- Party Admission or Production in Discovery

United States v. Fraser, 448 F.3d 833 (6th Cir. 2006) : As evidence of the defendant's intent in a check fraud scheme, the prosecution introduced a book he had written that detailed a virtually identical scheme. Affirming, the Court held that the book was sufficiently authenticated as the defendant's by his reference to it on his Website, his picture on the cover, and his name as author.

Law Co., Inc. v. Mohawk Constr. & Supply Co., 577 F.3d 1164 (10th Cir. 2009) : Reversing summary judgment for a general contractor in a breach of contract suit against a subcontractor, the Court held that it was an abuse of discretion to categorically reject documentary evidence relied upon by the subcontractor: "We do not require an affidavit to authenticate every document submitted for consideration at summary judgment ... . Rather, documents produced during discovery that are on the letterhead of the opposing, producing party are authentic per se for purposes of Federal Rule of Evidence 901."

[k] Rule 901(a) -- Photographs

United States v. Lawson, 494 F.3d 1046 (D.C. Cir. 2007) : The defendant was convicted of selling narcotics after a police officer testified that he was sitting at an observation post when he saw the defendant dealing drugs from his car to a person on a bicycle. The defendant contended that it was physically impossible for the officer to see any transaction given the location of the defendant's car, the bicycle, and the observation post. The defendant attempted to introduce two photographs of the scene that he took in preparation for trial. The photographs, taken from the location of the observation post, showed a car placed in the same spot that the defendant had occupied, and a man on a bicycle in two different positions relative to the car. The Court found no abuse of discretion when the photos were excluded because the officer -- "the only witness at trial with knowledge of the scene" -- stated that they did not accurately represent what he had seen: the bicycle did not appear in the exact position he had recalled seeing it.

Schmidt v. Magyari, 557 F.3d 564 (8th Cir. 2009) : Affirming summary judgment for the City in an action by an arrestee who claimed that photographing her tattoo violated her rights, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of a photograph purporting to show the location of her tattoo and the position of her clothing when the photos were taken by the police chief. The legal secretary to the plaintiff's lawyer, who provided the affidavit accompanying the photograph, had no personal knowledge of the circumstances in which the police chief took his photos, and the depiction of the clothing in the excluded photo varied from the factual allegations in the complaint.

[m] Rule 901(a) -- Tape Recordings -- Authenticity

[i] Rule 901(a) -- Audibility

United States v. Trogdon, 575 F.3d 762 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a drug conspiracy conviction, finding no plain error in the admission of two partially inaudible recordings. Although the recordings were of poor quality, the conversations were audible enough to provide the jury with the gist of them.

[ii] Rule 901(a) -- Tape Recordings -- Authenticity

United States v. Emerson, 501 F.3d 804 (7th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed convictions for offenses arising from a conspiracy to commit "licks" (robbing drug dealers of their drugs), finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of a tape recording of a meeting among the conspirators. The foundation was supplied by a detective, who testified that he turned on the recording device before he gave it to an informant attending the meeting (who did not know how to turn it on or off) and that after the meeting he listened to the tape and was familiar with the voices record thereon. However, he conceded that he did not personally monitor the conversations as they were being recorded and he could not verify whether the tape had been altered or the recorder had been turned off for periods of time while it was in the informant's possession. The Court noted that it was questionable whether the detective's testimony alone was sufficient to establish the authenticity of the recording by clear and convincing evidence, but it held that there was no abuse of discretion in the authenticity determination, given the testimony establishing the location of the recording device, the informant's lack of knowledge about turning it on and off, and the identification of the voices, together with the failure of the defendants to assert or provide evidence that the tape was altered or was anything other than what it purported to be. In United States v. Eberhart, 467 F.3d 659 (7th Cir. 2006) , the court, affirming a conviction for conspiracy to distribute cocaine, held that tape recordings of conversations between an informant and the defendant were sufficiently authenticated by an agent who heard only the informant's half of the conversations as they occurred. The agent recognized the defendant's voice on the tape, and the fact he did not hear half of the conversation goes only to the weight of the recording, not its admissibility. However, a tape recording of a conversation that the agents heard only a very short part of because of an equipment malfunction may not have been authenticated by clear and convincing evidence, but the defendant did not show that its admission was plain error.

United States v. Oslund, 453 F.3d 1048 (8th Cir. 2006) : Affirming convictions for robbery and murder, the Court found no error in the admission of a taped conversation between the defendant and his friend Russell, who was cooperating with the government at the time of the conversations. Rejecting an argument that the tape was not properly authenticated because Russell was not present at trial to establish a foundation, the Court held that authenticity was sufficiently established by the testimony of the officer who arranged the conversations. The agent testified that Russell would contact him prior to meeting with the defendant, that he would then provide Russell with a digital recorder, that he would turn the recorder on and then turn it off after receiving it back, and that it was not possible for Russell to turn the recorder off. The agent was also able to identify each speaker in the recordings. The Court also held that any gaps in the recording affected the weight of the evidence, not its admissibility.

[vi] Rule 901(a) -- Tape Recordings -- Transcripts

[A] Rule 901(a) -- Tape Recordings -- Transcripts -- Foreign Language Conversations

United States v. Nunez, 532 F.3d 645 (7th Cir. 2008) : In a drug prosecution government introduced transcripts of wiretap calls that included quotation marks around certain words that it claimed were code words for drugs and footnotes giving definitions for the words provided by the language specialists translating. Affirming, the Court held it was error for the Judge to tell the jury it "could afford as much weight as it felt proper" to the transcripts, since transcripts should not ordinarily be given independent weight. However, the error was harmless, since the language specialists testified at trial as to their definitions of the code words marked in the transcripts, and that testimony was entitled to as much or as little weight as the jury wanted to give it.

United States v. Chavez-Alvarez, 594 F.3d 1062 (8th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for distributing methamphetamine, finding no abuse of discretion when jurors were furnished English-language transcripts of recorded telephone conversations during deliberations. The transcripts were not cumulative, since without translation, an English-speaking jury would not have been able to understand the content of recorded conversations that took place in Spanish. Also, the transcripts were not prejudicial, because there was no contention that the translations were inaccurate or the speakers misidentified.

[B] Rule 901(a) -- Tape Recordings -- Transcripts -- Recorded Conversations

United States v. Anderson, 452 F.3d 66 (1st Cir. 2006) : In a drug prosecution, the government introduced a taped conversation between the defendant and an undercover informant. Because the tape was unclear in parts, the government also submitted a transcript of the conversation. Although the person who prepared the transcript (i.e., the prosecutor) did not take the stand to authenticate it, the Court held it was sufficiently authenticated by a police officer who was monitoring the conversation when it occurred. That officer reviewed the transcript and testified that it fairly and accurately represented the conversation on the tape. The Court also rejected an argument that the tape recording was itself so garbled that the transcript became the actual evidence that the jury relied upon, noting that the Judge gave a limiting instruction that the tape not the transcript was the evidence, and that the government never attempted to interpret portions of the tape that were completely unintelligible.

United States v. Rommy, 506 F.3d 108 (2d Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to import "Ecstasy" into the United States, finding no error in the admission of a transcript of a tape-recorded telephone conversation between the defendant and another drug dealer. The recording was made by Dutch law enforcement officials pursuant to a wiretap, but Dutch law prohibited production of the tape itself. The government produced a Dutch detective who was personally involved in the wiretap investigation and who prepared the transcript. Although the detective had no specific recollection of the call or of transcribing it, she testified that it had been her general practice upon listening to calls intercepted during the investigation to prepare a contemporaneous transcript. This testimony, together with the production of the transcript by the Dutch government in response to the request of the United States, "demonstrated a sufficiently reliable process to authenticate the transcript as a product of the Dutch wiretap investigation." Moreover, the Dutch detective sufficiently authenticated the defendant's voice on the conversation, by testifying that she personally recognized his voice as the one she had heard on the recorded calls and identified as his on the transcripts.

United States v. Thompson, 482 F.3d 781 (5th Cir. 2007) : The prosecution had a video and audio recording of a drug transaction with which the defendant was charged, but at trial they showed only the video portion with a scrolling transcript superimposed. Affirming, the Court held that it was error to show the transcript without allowing the jury to hear the underlying audio; however, it was not plain error, as the audio would not help the jury identify the defendant, who did not testify, and the defendant did not challenge the accuracy of the transcript.

United States v. Neighbors, 590 F.3d 485 (7th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed cocaine convictions, finding no abuse of discretion when jurors were permitted to follow along with government-created transcripts containing marginal notations of who was speaking while listening to recorded phone conversations during the trial and during deliberations. The Judge carefully instructed that the transcripts were not evidence but only aids, and had not permitted the transcripts into the jury room until it became necessary to expedite the deliberation process. In United States v. Wilson, 481 F.3d 475 (7th Cir. 2007) , the Court affirming convictions for conspiring to distribute crack cocaine in a public housing complex, found no abuse of discretion when the jury was provided with a transcript of a recorded conversation. Although the recording was difficult to hear, the jury was repeatedly admonished that only the tape was evidence and that if they could not make out parts of the recording, they should disregard the corresponding portions of the transcript.

[o] Rule 901(a) -- Videotapes

United States v. Thompson, 482 F.3d 781 (5th Cir. 2007) : The prosecution had a video and audio recording of a drug transaction with which the defendant was charged, but at trial they showed only the video portion with a scrolling transcript superimposed. Affirming, the Court held that it was error to show the transcript without allowing the jury to hear the underlying audio; however, it was not plain error, as the audio would not help the jury identify the defendant, who did not testify, and the defendant did not challenge the accuracy of the transcript.

United States v. Smith, 591 F.3d 974 (8th Cir. 2010) : In a child sex abuse prosecution, the Court held that a DVD of the forensic interview with the victim was sufficiently authenticated when Seviour, the person who conducted the interview, "identified the DVD as a recording of her forensic interview with B.R. and indicated that the DVD was an accurate recording of the interview. This was sufficient to authenticate the DVD under Rule 901(b). There is no requirement that Seviour mark the DVD to identify it." In United States v. Seifert, 445 F.3d 1043 (8th Cir. 2006) , the Court affirmed a conviction for arson, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of a surveillance videotape that had been enhanced -- but not manipulated -- by being "real-timed," keeping only images from the relevant camera of the four used, and brightening the suspect and the surrounding area more than the rest of the image.

United States v. Zepeda-Lopez, 478 F.3d 1213 (10th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a drug distribution conspiracy conviction, finding no error when a surveillance videotape was admitted based on an agent's opinion that it was the defendant's image on the tape. The agent's identification was corroborated by the fact that he observed the defendant in court before his testimony.

[2] Rule 901(b)(1) -- Illustrations -- Testimony of Witness With Knowledge [Go To Main]

United States v. Barlow, 568 F.3d 215 (5th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a defendant's convictions for attempting to persuade a person he believed to be minor to engage in sexual activity and for sending obscene material to a person he believed to be younger than 16 years. It held that the testimony by the witness who pretended to be a 14-year-old girl that the transcripts fairly and fully reproduced the "chats" between her and the defendant was adequate authentication by a participant in the chats.

United States v. Estrada-Eliverio, 583 F.3d 669 (9th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for illegal re-entry, holding that the government properly authenticated the defendant's immigration (A-file) documents with testimony by a Border Patrol agent that the documents were accurate copies of documents in the defendant's file. In United States v. Iribe, 564 F.3d 1155 (9th Cir. 2009) , the defendant, convicted for conspiracy to kidnap, had been extradited from Mexico. Affirming, the Court held that the authenticity of a Diplomatic Note initialed but not signed by a Mexican government official was sufficiently established by a declaration from an Assistant Legal Advisor for the U.S. State Department that the Diplomatic Note was an official communication of the Government of Mexico.

[3] Rule 901(b)(2) -- Illustrations -- Nonexpert Opinion on Handwriting [Go To Main]

United States v. Samet, 466 F.3d 251 (2d Cir. 2006) : In a racketeering trial, a postal inspector, who had been working on the investigation for three years and spent 80% of her time on the investigation, was permitted to identify the handwriting of one of the defendants. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the handwriting opinion. Lay opinion testimony offered to authenticate handwriting must comport with both Rules 701 and 901(b)(2). Here, the witness did not acquire her handwriting knowledge for purposes of litigation, and her opinion was admissible under both Rules. The Court reasoned that during the investigation -- before there was litigation -- the inspector's opportunity to observe the defendant's handwriting "was no less (and little different) than if she had been his accountant, employee or family member."

[5] Rule 901(b)(4) -- Illustrations -- Distinctive Characteristics and the Like [Go To Main]

[a] Rule 901(b)(4) -- Contents

United States v. Thompson, 449 F.3d 267 (1st Cir. 2006) : Affirming drug convictions, the Court found no error in the admission of an anonymous letter sent to the defendant's coconspirator in jail. The letter was admitted as the defendant's own incriminating statements, and the defendant argued that the government had failed to adduce evidence that the letter was in fact sent by him. Declaring that a document "need not be signed or proven to be in the defendant's handwriting to be authenticated," the Court found that the content of the letter "precisely fits Thompson's circumstances and predicament" as of the time it was written. Moreover, the coconspirator testified that he recognized the return address, provided in the letter, as the defendant's address. In United States v. Garcia, 452 F.3d 36 (1st Cir. 2006) , an illegal reentry case, the Court held that an affidavit allegedly signed by the defendant, in which he admitted that he entered the country illegally, had been sufficiently authenticated. "The content of the affidavit, the circumstances surrounding its creation, and its location in an Alien Registration File containing not only Garcia's photograph but also several examples of his signature (a signature that appeared to be the same as the signature placed on the waiver-of-presence form signed by Garcia in the presence of the district court) all support the district court's decision to admit the affidavit as an authentic document."

United States v. Watkins, 591 F.3d 780 (5th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed drug convictions, holding that a rental application in which the defendant listed a present member of the conspiracy as his landlord was properly admitted to impeach the defendant's trial testimony denying that an alleged member of the conspiracy was his landlord. The exhibit was sufficiently authenticated by the fact that it had the defendant's name, date of birth, address, and signature on it.

[c] Rule 901(b)(4) -- Location or Possession

Jones v. National Am. Univ., 608 F.3d 1039 (8th Cir. 2010) : To prove in an age discrimination action the stated qualifications for the position at issue, the plaintiff offered a job posting that witnesses testified they had seen on bulletin boards in the administration building and outside the president's office. Although the posting differed in format from the defendant's other job postings and no employee could identify the author, the foundation was sufficient to admit the posting, and those facts went only to weight.

[e] Rule 901(b)(4) -- Other Examples

United States v. Seale, 600 F.3d 473 (5th Cir. 2010) : In the prosecution of a fatal kidnapping committed in 1964, the prosecution introduced contemporaneous statements regarding the defendant's racial animus and membership in the KKK, including a journal kept by the pastor of a church that the conspirators had searched. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the whole journal, including portions unrelated to the defendant, since that permitted the jury to "evaluate the journal's authenticity and credibility by comparing the handwriting, writing style, and content of those other entries to the ones being offered in connection with this case." In In re McLain, 516 F.3d 301 (5th Cir. 2008) , a bankruptcy trustee sought to reopen a discharge for failure to disclose pre-petition assets, but the Trial Judge granted summary judgment to the debtor on the ground that a ledger sheet offered by the trustee was insufficient to create any genuine issue of material fact because it was insufficiently authenticated as a record of all the debtor's transactions during a particular period. Reversing, the Court held that the ledger sheet, which had been attached by the debtor to his summary judgment motion, was a party admission authenticated by the consistency of its entries with both bank records and a spreadsheet drafted by the debtor and admitted into evidence.

United States v. Fraser, 448 F.3d 833 (6th Cir. 2006) : As evidence of the defendant's intent in a check fraud scheme, the prosecution introduced a book he had written that detailed a virtually identical scheme. Affirming, the Court held that the book was sufficiently authenticated as the defendant's by his reference to it on his Website, his picture on the cover, and his name as author.

Law Co., Inc. v. Mohawk Constr. & Supply Co., 577 F.3d 1164 (10th Cir. 2009) : Reversing summary judgment for a general contractor in a breach of contract suit against a subcontractor, the Court held that it was an abuse of discretion to categorically reject documentary evidence relied upon by the subcontractor because no authenticating affidavit was provided. "We do not require an affidavit to authenticate every document submitted for consideration at summary judgment." The Court noted that the documents might have been sufficiently authenticated by distinctive characteristics or other circumstantial evidence under Rule 901(b)(4).

[6] Rule 901(b)(5) -- Illustrations -- Voice Identification [Go To Main]

United States v. Brown, 510 F.3d 57 (1st Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no abuse of discretion in denying the defendant's motion in limine to preclude police officers from testifying that they identified the defendant's voice in a cell phone conversation. The officers, although not trained in voice identification, had listened in on "hundreds of hours" of the defendant's telephone conversations and had debriefed him in person during an investigation in the early 1990s. The defendant had subsequently undergone cancer surgeries on his tongue, but one of the officers had later spoken with him on a couple of occasions; and, even if his voice had changed, he also had a distinctive manner of speech. The Court also held that references to the prior investigation had been handled in a way that avoided undue prejudice. In United States v. Panico, 435 F.3d 47 (1st Cir. 2006) , the Court affirmed a conviction for extortionate debt collection, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of lay witness testimony identifying the defendant's voice on tape recordings. Although questions during the investigation were suggestive, the lay witnesses had heard the defendant's voice before (and one of them had known him since childhood), so there was no showing that under the totality of the circumstances the identification was unreliable.

United States v. Jones, 600 F.3d 847 (7th Cir. 2010) : The Court vacated the conviction of one defendant charged with conspiracy to distribute narcotics, because a detective identifying the voice on a tape recording indicated that he recognized the defendant's voice based on overhearing a courtroom conversation between the defendant and his attorney. The Court noted that the detective's identification met its "minimal familiarity" standard for admissibility under Rule 901(b)(5). However, the defendant challenged whether the conversation even occurred, but under the advocate-witness rule could not use his counsel to dispute the detective's story. The Court vacated the conviction because the Judge had not addressed the conflict of interest in ruling on a mistrial motion. In United States v. Neighbors, 590 F.3d 485 (7th Cir. 2009) , the Court affirmed cocaine convictions, holding that officers' short conversations with the defendants at the time of arrest were sufficient to satisfy "the minimal familiarity standard" for making identifications of voices on wiretap recordings.

United States v. Parker, 551 F.3d 1167 (10th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conveying false information about an attempt to blow up buildings, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by an investigating agent opining that the voice heard on 911 calls was that of the defendant. The agent had acquired knowledge of the defendant's voice during a four-hour interview. The claim that he had concluded the defendant was the culprit before hearing the 911 calls went to the weight, not the admissibility, of the evidence. In United States v. Zepeda-Lopez, 478 F.3d 1213 (10th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a drug distribution conspiracy conviction, finding no error when audiotapes of six recorded telephone calls were admitted based on an agent's opinion that it was the defendant's voice on the tapes. The bases for the agent's opinion were a comparison between the defendant's voice on one call in which he self-identified with the voices on the other calls and the agent's having heard the defendant speak in court a few days before the trial began. Although the conversations were in Spanish and the agent spoke no Spanish, that went only to the weight of the identification evidence.

[8] Rule 901(b)(7) -- Illustrations -- Public Records or Reports [Go To Main]

United States v. Vidacak, 553 F.3d 344 (4th Cir. 2009) : The defendant was convicted of lying on his immigration application, by failing to report his service in the Serbian Army (VRS) during the Bosnian War. The defendant challenged the authenticity of foreign military documents indicating that he had served in VRS, arguing that the government could not account for the history of the documents prior to their seizure by authorities. Affirming, the Court noted that the documents "were discovered in a place where they would be expected to be found"; they "bore unique indexing numbers that rendered them readily identifiable as VRS records that dated to the period of the Bosnian War"; the government witness "explained that the VRS, like most military entities, had a vested interest in keeping records on its soldiers for accountability purposes and to determine eligibility for benefits"; and the defendant "offered no basis for inferring that the exhibits were forged or altered that would arouse this Court's suspicion as to their authenticity."

Article II Gun Shop, Inc. v. Gonzales, 441 F.3d 492 (7th Cir. 2006) : The Court, affirming summary judgment for the government in a proceeding to revoke a gun shop's license for willful violation of recordkeeping requirments, held that 1981 and 1998 ATF inspection reports were properly authenticated as public records by an ATF agent's affidavit that they were public reports kept in a public office where reports of that type were kept.

[9] Rule 901(b)(8) -- Illustrations -- Ancient Documents or Data Compilation [Go To Main]

United States v. Mandycz, 447 F.3d 951 (6th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a denaturalization order issued because the defendant illegally procured his naturalization by failing to disclose his service as a guard in a concentration camp. The defendant claimed that Soviet interrogation records, although more than 20 years old, were not "authentic" because the Soviet Union did not value truth, and so documents of that regime lack trustworthiness. The Court concluded that "[a]lthough Rule 901(b)(8) requires the document to be free from suspicion, that suspicion goes not to the content of the document, but rather to whether the document is what it purports to be... . Because Mandycz does not argue, much less prove, that the Soviet interrogation records are not what they purport to be -- Soviet interrogation records -- his contention fails."

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IX. Authentication And Identification
CHAPTER 902 RULE 902

5-902 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 902.syn

§ 902.syn Synopsis to Chapter 902: RULE 902

902.01 Official Text

902.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Self-Authentication

[2] Factfinding Required

[3] Originals and Copies

[4] Types of Self-Authentication

902.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Rule 902(1) -- Domestic Public Documents Under Seal

[a] Rule 902(1) -- Banking Certificates

[b] Rule 902(1) -- Judgments

[c] Rule 902(1) -- Postal Service

[d] Rule 902(1) -- Relationship to Other Rules

[e] Rule 902(1) -- Tax Records

[2] Rule 902(2) -- Domestic Public Documents Not Under Seal

[3] Rule 902(3) -- Foreign Public Documents

[a] Rule 902(3) -- Certification by Consular Officials

[b] Rule 902(3) -- Certification by Foreign Officials

[c] Rule 902(3) -- Failure To Challenge Documents

[d] Rule 902(3) -- Failure To Prove Authority of Foreign Officials

[e] Rule 902(3) -- Good Cause

[4] Rule 902(4) -- Certified Copies Of Public Records

[a] Rule 902(4) -- Appropriate Official

[b] Rule 902(4) -- Notarized Documents

[5] Rule 902(6) -- Newspapers And Periodicals

[6] Rule 902(7) -- Trade Inscriptions And The Like

[7] Rule 902(8) -- Acknowledged Documents

[8] Rule 902(9) -- Commercial Paper And Related Documents

[9] Rule 902(11) -- Certified Domestic Records Of Regularly Conducted Activity

902.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

[2] 2000 Amendment Committee Note

[3] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

[4] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IX. Authentication And Identification
CHAPTER 902 RULE 902

5-902 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 902.01

902.01 Official Text

Rule 902. Self-authentication

Extrinsic evidence of authenticity as a condition precedent to admissibility is not required with respect to the following:

(1) Domestic public documents under seal. -- A document bearing a seal purporting to be that of the United States, or of any State, district, Commonwealth, territory, or insular possession thereof, or the Panama Canal Zone, or the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, or of a political subdivision, department, officer, or agency thereof, and a signature purporting to be an attestation or execution.

(2) Domestic public documents not under seal. -- A document purporting to bear the signature in the official capacity of an officer or employee of any entity included in paragraph (1) hereof, having no seal, if a public officer having a seal and having official duties in the district or political subdivision of the officer or employee certifies under seal that the signer has the official capacity and that the signature is genuine.

(3) Foreign public documents. -- A document purporting to be executed or attested in an official capacity by a person authorized by the laws of a foreign country to make the execution or attestation, and accompanied by a final certification as to the genuineness of the signature and official position (A) of the executing or attesting person, or (B) of any foreign official whose certificate of genuineness of signature and official position relates to the execution or attestation or is in a chain of certificates of genuineness of signature and official position relating to the execution or attestation. A final certification may be made by a secretary of an embassy or legation, consul general, consul, vice consul, or consular agent of the United States, or a diplomatic or consular official of the foreign country assigned or accredited to the United States. If reasonable opportunity has been given to all parties to investigate the authenticity and accuracy of official documents, the court may, for good cause shown, order that they be treated as presumptively authentic without final certification or permit them to be evidenced by an attested summary with or without final certification.

(4) Certified copies of public records. -- A copy of an official record or report or entry therein, or of a document authorized by law to be recorded or filed and actually recorded or filed in a public office, including data compilations in any form, certified as correct by the custodian or other person authorized to make the certification, by certificate complying with paragraph (1), (2), or (3) of this rule or complying with any Act of Congress or rule prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority.

(5) Official publications. -- Books, pamphlets, or other publications purporting to be issued by public authority.

(6) Newspapers and periodicals. -- Printed materials purporting to be newspapers or periodicals.

(7) Trade inscriptions and the like. -- Inscriptions, signs, tags, or labels purporting to have been affixed in the course of business and indicating ownership, control, or origin.

(8) Acknowledged documents. -- Documents accompanied by a certificate of acknowledgment executed in the manner provided by law by a notary public or other officer authorized by law to take acknowledgments.

(9) Commercial paper and related documents. -- Commercial paper, signatures thereon, and documents relating thereto to the extent provided by general commercial law.

(10) Presumptions under Acts of Congress. -- Any signature, document, or other matter declared by Act of Congress to be presumptively or prima facie genuine or authentic.

(11) Certified domestic records of regularly conducted activity. -- The original or a duplicate of a domestic record of regularly conducted activity that would be admissible under Rule 803(6) if accompanied by a written declaration of its custodian or other qualified person, in a manner complying with any Act of Congress or rule prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority, certifying that the record --

(A) was made at or near the time of the occurrence of the matters set forth by, or from information transmitted by, a person with knowledge of those matters;

(B) was kept in the course of the regularly conducted activity; and

(C) was made by the regularly conducted activity as a regular practice.A party intending to offer a record into evidence under this paragraph must provide written notice of that intention to all adverse parties, and must make the record and declaration available for inspection sufficiently in advance of their offer into evidence to provide an adverse party with a fair opportunity to challenge them.

(12) Certified foreign records of regularly conducted activity. -- In a civil case, the original or a duplicate of a foreign record of regularly conducted activity that would be admissible under Rule 803(6) if accompanied by a written declaration by its custodian or other qualified person certifying that the record --

(A) was made at or near the time of the occurrence of the matters set forth by, or from information transmitted by, a person with knowledge of those matters;

(B) was kept in the course of the regularly conducted activity; and

(C) was made by the regularly conducted activity as a regular practice.The declaration must be signed in a manner that, if falsely made, would subject the maker to criminal penalty under the laws of the country where the declaration is signed. A party intending to offer a record into evidence under this paragraph must provide written notice of that intention to all adverse parties, and must make the record and declaration available for inspection sufficiently in advance of their offer into evidence to provide an adverse party with a fair opportunity to challenge them.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IX. Authentication And Identification
CHAPTER 902 RULE 902

5-902 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 902.02

902.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Self-Authentication

The difficulty of authenticating certain items of evidence has been eased over the years by judicial decisions and by legislative enactments that have provided that some matters can be self-authenticating. In other words, no evidence other than the document or item itself is needed to authenticate it. Rule 902 gathers together some of the more common examples of self-authentication and expands several categories.

In the original draft of the Rules published in March 1969, Rule 902 was entitled "Presumption of Authenticity." In line with the title, the Rule presumed the listed items to be authentic, but the presumption would give way to conflicting evidence. In the official text as promulgated, the presumption language is virtually eliminated, except for some mention in paragraphs (3) and (10) of Rule 902. Since there is little danger of fraud with respect to the first nine classes of documents and tangible things, the change should not threaten the truth-finding function of the Courts. That evidence is authenticated does not mean that it must be accepted as valid by a factfinder. Authentication signifies only that the proponent of the evidence has done enough to identify or to explain the evidence for the trier to be justified in finding that the evidence is what the proponent claims. After the item is admitted an opposing party can offer evidence attacking its authenticity and the factfinder may accept that as true. Thus, self-authentication lifts some of the usual burden in introducing evidence from its proponent without inhibiting an opponent from offering conflicting evidence. n1

[2] Factfinding Required

There are times when factfinding will be needed in connection with Rule 902 despite the elimination of the reference to a presumption. Thus, it may be necessary under paragraph (3) of Rule 902 for the Court to rule on whether a foreign official is authorized to make an attestation under the laws of the foreign country. And under paragraph (4) of the Rule, it may be necessary to find whether a document is an official record, whether it is a type that may be recorded, or whether the person certifying it was a proper person for the task. n2 These are all questions on which the Judge must be satisfied; if the factual premise is established before the Judge, the document may be considered by the jury as authentic, without any foundation being presented.

[3] Originals and Copies

There are some writers who assert that self-authentication is only permissible where an original document is offered to a Court. We believe that this is not necessarily so. It certainly makes sense to conclude that self-authentication ought not to be permitted when the circumstances thought to guarantee genuineness are no longer present. Thus, if someone offered a piece of a magazine or periodical and asked the Court to accept it as a genuine part of that magazine or periodical, the Court might well want to see the original; the piece might be misleading, drawn from a different issue of the magazine or periodical, or drawn from a different source entirely. Similarly, if the character of a seal cannot be judged from a copy, an original might be required under paragraphs of the Rule requiring documents to be under seal.

We see no reason, however, why a trade inscription that is reflected in a picture or a videotape of an object should not be self-authenticating. Nor do we see any reason why signatures on commercial paper that are reflected in copies or photos should not be self-authenticating. Even with respect to seals, to the extent that an officer with a seal is attaching it to a copy of a document bearing the signature of another officer, as provided in paragraph (2), we believe that the copy should be self-authenticating. The test should be whether the circumstances giving rise to the assumption of genuineness are sufficiently present to justify doing without authentication evidence. If so, self-authentication should be permitted. If not, additional evidence should be required.

[4] Types of Self-Authentication

Because many of the categories are not only self-authenticating, but self-explanatory as well, only brief comments on the twelve paragraphs of this Rule are offered below.

(1) A document bearing a seal purporting to be that of a governmental subdivision in the United States or of an officer or agency thereof together with a signature purporting to be an attestation or execution is enough to make the document self-authenticating. n3 There is no requirement that the certifying party must use the magic word "attest"; nor does the attesting person need to be formally authorized to make a certification. n4 More formal authorization requirements are set forth in Rules 902(2) and (4).

(2) Authentication is also accomplished if a document is offered purporting to bear the signature of an officer or an employee of a governmental entity in an official capacity if an officer who has a seal and has official duties in the district or political subdivision of the officer or employee signing the document certifies under seal that the signer has the official capacity and that the signature is genuine. The Advisory Committee states that in the absence of an official seal, the greater ease of effecting a forgery is apparent and the requirement of authentication by an officer who has a seal is designed to legitimate the document. n5

On the face of the Rule, it seems that it is not applicable to a situation where an officer has a seal and fails to employ it. Yet, there appears to be no reason why that situation should be differentiated from one in which a low echelon employee of a governmental subdivision has no seal and authentication is provided through certification of another officer of the subdivision with the seal.

Courts have applied the sealing requirement of Rule 902 without questioning the underlying policy of the Rule (i.e., that self-authentication on anything less than a seal would create too great a risk of admitting forged documents). If a public document lacks a seal or certification under seal, the courts have consistently held that the document is not self-authenticating. n6 The argument for providing an alternative to sealing is that developments in technology have made it much easier to detect a forgery, rendering the sealing procedure time-consuming and unnecessary. But the obvious contrary argument is that developments in technology have made it much easier to forge a document in the first place, making a sealing requirement more important than ever, at least if the proponent wants to establish authenticity through the document itself.

(3) Derived from Fed. R. Civ. P. 44(a)(2), paragraph (3) of Rule 902 provides a method for self-authentication of foreign public documents. Paragraph (3) provides that a document can be authenticated if it purports to be executed or attested by someone authorized by the laws of a foreign country to make the execution or attestation who appears to be acting in his official capacity, if the document is accompanied by a final certification as to the genuineness of the signature and the official position of the person executing the documents. The final certification can be made by the executing or attesting person, or by any foreign official who certifies the genuineness of the signature and the official position. Moreover, a final certification can be made by a secretary of an embassy, a consul general, a consul, or a diplomatic or consular official of a foreign country assigned or accredited to the United States. Finally, this paragraph provides that as long as reasonable opportunity is given the parties to investigate authenticity, the Court may order that foreign public documents be presumed to be authenticated without final certification. n7

The parameters of Rule 902(3) are well-illustrated by Raphaely v. Waterman Steamship Corp., 972 F.2d 498 (2d Cir. 1992) . An importer received a shipment of contaminated peanuts and sued the shipper, claiming that the peanuts were not contaminated when they left Sudan. To prove that point, the importer offered a record by the Sudanese National Laboratory, which had commissioned a nationalized company called Gezira to inspect outgoing goods. The report indicated that the peanuts were not contaminated. The defendant challenged the report on authenticity grounds. One question was whether this was a foreign public document for purposes of Rule 902(3), because Gezira was not itself a foreign agency. The Court found that Gezira, as a nationalized company, was a governmental entity. The Court noted, however, that if Gezira were merely working pursuant to a contract with the Sudanese government, the report would not be a public document and could not be authenticated under Rule 902(3).

Under Rule 902(3), the public record is self-authenticating if it is accompanied by a final certificate of genuineness from a duly authorized government official. There was no such attestation in Raphaely. However, the Court properly noted that Rule 902(3) provides that even in the absence of attestation, the document is presumptively authentic if two conditions are satisfied. First, the opponent must have been given a reasonable opportunity to investigate the accuracy and authenticity of the document. Second, there must be a showing of good cause to treat the document as presumptively authentic. The Raphaely Court found that these two conditions were met, because the steamship company had nine years preceding the trial to challenge the authenticity of the record, and yet failed to produce any evidence that the report was not genuine. n8

(4) Confined to official records and reports, and documents authorized to be recorded or filed in a public office or actually recorded in public files (including data compilations), n9 paragraph (4) of Rule 902 provides that a copy of a public record can be certified as correct by the custodian or any other person authorized to make the certification by a certificate that complies with any of the three previous sections discussed. This paragraph, together with Rules 803(8) and 1005, provides the customary way by which the contents of most public records are offered into evidence.

(5) Books, pamphlets, or other publications purporting to be issued by public authority are considered to be self-authenticating. This goes beyond common-law rules. As the Advisory Committee notes, this paragraph does not mean that all official publications are admissible; it merely provides a means whereby their authenticity may be taken as established for purposes of admissibility. Authenticity is simply one aspect of admissibility. n10

Assume, for example, that a congressional committee issues a report including hearing testimony from a person who claims to have been injured by a toxic substance. The person states that the substance causes a certain set of injuries. If a member of the public then brings a suit against the company claiming that injuries resulted from exposure to the substance, it is doubtful that the plaintiff will be able to introduce the report even though it is self-authenticating. The testimony before the committee is hearsay, and subject to suspect motivation, and probably will not qualify for admission into evidence under any exception. See the discussion in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 803(8), § 803.02[9][f].

On the other hand, assume that the manufacturer of the substance brings a suit against the government to restrain publication of the report on the grounds that it is malicious and inaccurate. Surely the report will be admissible in such a case; it is authenticated and it is not hearsay because it is not being offered for its truth. See the discussion in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 801, § 801.02[1][e].

In both situations, if a copy of the pamphlet purporting to be an official copy is offered into evidence, Rule 902(5) would hold that the pamphlet is self-authenticating. Yet, we have seen that admissibility would differ in the two cases.

(6) Printed materials purporting to be newspapers or periodicals are self-authenticating. Again it should be emphasized that they are not necessarily admissible. Thus, if a newspaper prints a story that says that Mr. Doe lied in his testimony before a Senate Committee, the newspaper account is not admissible in a perjury prosecution of Mr. Doe. n11 If, however, Mr. Doe sues the newspaper for libel, the report would be admissible and necessary to prove his case. In both cases, production of materials purporting to be the newspaper would amount to self-authentication. Admissibility, though, depends on other Rules of Evidence as well.

It is doubtful that this paragraph of the Rule could be used to authenticate the authorship of a letter to the editor, something that might easily be forged. Authorship is different from authenticating the newspaper itself. Advertisements are more likely to be self-authenticating, though arguably they do not fall within the paragraph. But, they might fall within Rule 901(b)(4).

The reference in the Rule to "printed" materials would seem to make it difficult to use paragraph (6) to authenticate electronic or hardcopy of material made available only over the Internet, such as Slate magazine, to wire service reports like Reuters. This does not mean that online materials cannot be authenticated. It simply means that the Rule does not appear to provide for self-authentication. For a discussion of authentication of online materials, see Gregory P. Joseph's article on Internet and email evidence, excerpted in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 901, § 901.02[12].

(7) Concluding that the risk of forgery of trademarks is minimal in light of the serious penalties accompanying such offenses, the Advisory Committee drafted this Rule providing that inscriptions on labels purporting to have been affixed in the course of business and indicating ownership, control, or origin are self-authenticating.

(8) If a document is accompanied by a certificate of acknowledgment executed by a notary public in the manner provided by law, or by any other officer in the manner provided by law, this is enough for authentication of the document.

(9) This paragraph provides that commercial paper, signatures thereon, and documents relating thereto are authenticated to the extent provided by general commercial law. n12 General commercial law is intended to be the Uniform Commercial Code, except that when federal commercial paper is involved, federal commercial law will apply.

(10) This paragraph simply recognizes that whenever Congress decides to make any signature, document, or other matter presumptively genuine, or whenever Congress already has done so, self-authentication can be accomplished in the manner provided by the statute.

(11) and (12). In 2000, Rule 902 was amended to provide for a means of self-authentication of business records that are otherwise admissible under Rule 803(6). Rule 902(11) covers domestic records and Rule 902(12) covers foreign records in civil cases. The reason for breaking out domestic and foreign business records and for limiting Rule 902(12) to civil cases is that a federal statute (18 U.S.C. § 3505) already provides for self-authentication of foreign business records in criminal cases. Under these amendments, the foundation requirements for the business records exception can be established by the certification of a proper foundation witness. The witness no longer has to testify. Pretrial notice of intent to use the certification procedures must be provided. The intent of the notice requirement is to provide the opponent of the evidence a full opportunity to test the adequacy of the foundation set forth in the certification.

In a criminal case authentication under Rule 902(11) and (12) may raise constitutional issues because there will be no person available for cross-examination with respect to the business records. See the discussion in § 803.02[26].

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. See, e.g., United States v. McIntosh, 200 F.3d 1168 (8th Cir. 2000) (per curiam) (no error in admitting certified court documents under Rule 902(4); the Court notes that the opponent could attack the authenticity of the records at trial).

(n2)Footnote 2. See, e.g., United States v. Doyle, 130 F.3d 523 (2d Cir. 1997) (Trial Court did not err in finding that the Senior Inspector of the Customs Department was a proper person to certify an official record).

(n3)Footnote 3. See, e.g., United States v. Rigsby, 943 F.2d 631 (6th Cir. 1991) (the defendant objected to the admission of two certified documents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, arguing that the copies of the documents provided to him did not bear seals; the Court responded that the original documents, which were admitted into evidence, did bear the appropriate seal and therefore were admissible as self-authenticating government documents under Rule 902(1); there was no authority for the proposition that the document copies provided to the defendant must also have been sealed); Amfac Distrib. Corp. v. Harrelson, 842 F.2d 304 (11th Cir. 1988) (a State Court judgment, which had the attestation stamped on back of the last page of the judgment, and which was signed by the deputy clerk bearing the Court's official seal, was self-authenticating under Rule 902(1)).

(n4)Footnote 4. See, e.g., United States v. Mateo-Mendez, 215 F.3d 1039 (9th Cir. 2000) . (a certificate prepared by an immigration official and attesting that she had failed to find that a certain application had been filed was properly admitted under Rule 902(1); the document was under seal and bore the signature of the immigration official, and stated that she intended to "certify to the following:").

(n5)Footnote 5. See, e.g., United States v. Dockins, 986 F.2d 888 (5th Cir. 1993) (police records are not self-authenticating where they were not sealed, and there was no certification under seal that the documents were genuine; the certification was by way of rubber stamp, and this is not sufficient).

(n6)Footnote 6. See, e.g., United States v. Jimenez-Lopez, 873 F.2d 769 (5th Cir. 1989) (copy of judgment of conviction was not self-authenticating where it had no seal nor any certification under seal that the document was genuine); Acosta-Mestre v. Hilton Int'l of P.R., Inc., 156 F.3d 49 (1st Cir. 1998) (document that was not sealed was not self-authenticating under Rule 902); Nolin v. Douglas County, 903 F.2d 1546 (11th Cir. 1990) (document certified by the county personnel director as a true copy of the county merit system was properly excluded because the certificate was not under seal).

(n7)Footnote 7. In 1979 the United States ratified an international Convention making it easier for parties than it is under Rule 902(3) to authenticate foreign public documents. Under the Convention, each country designates public officials by title who may stamp what is called an "apostille," a form of certification, on the document itself or affix it to an accompanying paper. The apostille states that the document was signed by an individual acting in an official capacity and that the official's stamp or seal is genuine. Authorities employing apostilles must keep a record of how they are used. American Courts will recognize documents to which the apostille is affixed as long as they are from countries that have ratified the Convention. The Convention covers all official documents as well as private papers that have been notarized.

(n8)Footnote 8. Compare United States v. De Jongh, 937 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1991) (a purported foreign certificate of good conduct was properly excluded because: it lacked a final certification by foreign officials; a consular official called as a witness could not verify the document; there was no reasonable opportunity for investigation when the evidence was offered the same day its existence was revealed to the prosecution; and there was no showing of circumstances constituting good cause for relaxing the certification requirements).

(n9)Footnote 9. See, e.g., Acosta-Mestre v. Hilton Int'l of P.R., Inc., 156 F3d 49 (1st Cir. 1998) (a document does not qualify for self-authentication under Rule 902(4) simply because it has been notarized).

(n10)Footnote 10. See, e.g., United States v. Southard, 700 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1983) (the defendant offered a Nevada driver's license and work permit in the name of a person that he spoke with on the phone to support his claim that he had no knowledge that telephone conversations with this person were interstate; the documents were self-authenticating, but they had not been connected up with the party who made the telephone calls and the defendant had made no showing as to the other party's residency at the time of the phone calls: "Self-authentication merely eliminates the requirement of testimony by a public official that a document is authentic. It does not eliminate the requirement of relevancy.").

(n11)Footnote 11. See, e.g., Abruzzi Foods, Inc. v. Pasta & Cheese, Inc., 986 F.2d 605 (1st Cir. 1993) (a newspaper article is clearly inadmissible to prove the facts asserted therein); Horta v. Sullivan, 4 F.3d 2 (1st Cir. 1993) (newspaper account of an accident is inadmissible hearsay).

(n12)Footnote 12. See, e.g., United States v. Pang, 362 F.3d 1187 (9th Cir. 2004) (cancelled checks "did not require extrinsic evidence of authenticity. As a negotiable instrument, a check is a species of commercial paper, and therefore self-authenticating"; in contrast, an invoice was not self-authenticating because it is not commercial paper; the UCC "makes no provision for invoices").

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IX. Authentication And Identification
CHAPTER 902 RULE 902

5-902 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 902.03

902.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Rule 902(1) -- Domestic Public Documents Under Seal

[a] Rule 902(1) -- Banking Certificates

United States v. Wingard, 522 F.2d 796 (4th Cir. 1975) : Affirming a pre-Rules bank robbery conviction, the Court cited Rule 902 and held that an FDIC certificate was properly introduced into evidence to prove the bank's insured status.

[b] Rule 902(1) -- Judgments

Crossley v. Lieberman, 868 F.2d 566 (3d Cir. 1989) : Affirming a judgment finding violation of a federal debt-collection statute, the Court held that a State Court record, which contained a raised seal and signature of a prothonotary, was self-authenticating.

Amfac Distrib. Corp. v. Harrelson, 842 F.2d 304 (11th Cir. 1988) : Affirming a creditor's summary judgment in an action to enforce a State Court judgment, the Court held that the judgment was self-authenticating where it bore a seal purporting to be that of a State Court and a signature purporting to be an attestation of the custodian of the original judgment.

[c] Rule 902(1) -- Postal Service

United States v. Moore, 555 F.2d 658 (8th Cir. 1977) : The Court held that for purposes of Rule 902(1), the Postal Service is an agency of the United States.

[d] Rule 902(1) -- Relationship to Other Rules

United States v. Southard, 700 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1983) : To support his claim in a gambling prosecution that he had no knowledge that telephone conversations were interstate, the defendant offered a Nevada driver's license and work permit issued in 1974 in the name of a person with whom he spoke. The Court noted that the documents were self-authenticating, but that they had not been connected up with the party who made the telephone calls and the defendant had made no showing as to the other party's residency at the time of the phone calls. The Court said that "[s]elf-authentication merely eliminates the requirement of testimony by a public official that a document is authentic. It does not eliminate the requirement of relevancy."

[e] Rule 902(1) -- Tax Records

United States v. Ryan, 969 F.2d 238 (7th Cir. 1992) (per curiam): The Court affirmed a conviction for tax evasion, holding that computer-generated IRS printouts offered to prove the defendant's failure to file tax returns were properly admitted as self-authenticating.

Hughes v. United States, 953 F.2d 531 (9th Cir. 1992) : Affirming judgments against taxpayers, the Court held that computer-generated IRS Certificates of Assessments and Payments are admissible records of matters observed pursuant to duty imposed by law as to which there is a duty to report, and self-authenticating when certified under seal.

[2] Rule 902(2) -- Domestic Public Documents Not Under Seal

Hunt v. Liberty Lobby, 720 F.2d 631 (11th Cir. 1983) : In a libel action against the publisher of a weekly newspaper for allegedly false statements suggesting that the plaintiff was involved in the assassination of President Kennedy, the Court held that affidavits of certain CIA officials stating that, after diligent searches, they were unable to find any evidence that the plaintiff was in Dallas on the date of the assassination or any memoranda discussing the need to explain his whereabouts on that date were properly admitted under Rules 902(2) and 803(10).

[3] Rule 902(3) -- Foreign Public Documents

[a] Rule 902(3) -- Certification by Consular Officials

United States v. Montemayor, 712 F.2d 104 (5th Cir. 1983) : Upholding the defendant's conviction for making false statements in an effort to establish that her two children were born in the United States and not subject to deportation, the Court found that Mexican birth certificates were properly authenticated under Rule 902(3) by certification of American consular officials.

[b] Rule 902(3) -- Certification by Foreign Officials

United States v. Doyle, 130 F.3d 523 (2d Cir. 1997) : The Court held in a prosecution for illegal exportation of fuel pumps to Libya that certifications from the Senior Inspector of the Customs Department and the Deputy Attorney General of Malta were sufficient to authenticate copies of privately-generated, as well as public, documents recorded in the Maltese Customs Department.

United States v. Squillacote, 221 F.3d 542 (4th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed convictions for espionage, holding that records of the former East German spy agency were sufficiently authenticated by certifications of the director of the unified Germany's counter-intelligence service and a German consul to the United States. In United States v. Pena-Jessie, n1 a prosecution under the Marijuana on the High Seas Act, the Court held that Panama's grant of permission to board a ship was properly admitted as self-authenticating under Rule 902(3).

United States v. Koziy, 728 F.2d 1314 (11th Cir. 1984) : The Court upheld a revocation of citizenship on the ground that the defendant procured citizenship by concealing or misrepresenting information concerning his membership in the Organization of Ukranian Nationalists and the Ukranian Police. To prove membership in the police force, the government offered two exhibits bearing the defendant's signature. Rule 902(3) was satisfied by the certificate of a Russian official authorized to authenticate documents, and expert testimony concerning the nature of the exhibits was sufficient to warrant admission of the exhibits.

[c] Rule 902(3) -- Failure To Challenge Documents

Raphaely Int'l, Inc. v. Waterman S.S. Corp., 972 F.2d 498 (2d Cir. 1992) : This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 902.02[4]. See also In re Sterling Nav. Co. n2(upholding admission of copies of purported Articles of Association and bylaws of a bankrupt corporation, accompanied by an affidavit of an attorney appointed by the Court as special counsel averring that the copies were true copies of original documents on file in the Bahamas).

[d] Rule 902(3) -- Failure To Prove Authority of Foreign Officials

United States v. Chu Kong Yin, 935 F.2d 990 (9th Cir. 1991) : In a prosecution for making false statements in a permanent resident application, the Court held that certain Hong Kong criminal records were not self-authenticating, even though the government complied with the execution and attestation requirements, because there was no final certification. The Court did not determine whether the government demonstrated good cause for its failure, because the requirements of Rule 901 were satisfied. In United States v. Perlmuter, n3 the Court overturned a conviction for illegally procuring naturalization by failing to reveal prior convictions in Israel. Two documents, one listing four convictions, and the other stating that it contained the fingerprints of the person who was convicted, were not properly admitted because there was no evidence as to the authority or position of the person who signed the documents.

United States v. Garate-Vergara, 942 F.2d 1543 (1991), amended 991 F.2d 662 (11th Cir. 1993) : In a prosecution for drug trafficking, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding a foreign official document where the consular certification did not establish that the foreign officials were authorized to make the original document or the attestation.

[e] Rule 902(3) -- Good Cause

United States v. De Jongh, 937 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1991) : Affirming a conviction for possession of cocaine, the Court held that a purported foreign certificate of good conduct was properly excluded because it lacked a final certification by foreign officials, a consular official called as a witness could not verify the purported certificate, there was no reasonable opportunity for investigation when the evidence was offered the same day its existence was revealed to the prosecution, and there was no showing of circumstances constituting good cause for relaxing the certification requirements.

[4] Rule 902(4) -- Certified Copies Of Public Records

[a] Rule 902(4) -- Appropriate Official

United States v. Pent-R-Books, Inc., 538 F.2d 519 (2d Cir. 1976) : In a proceeding to enforce postal prohibitory orders under the Pandering Law, 39 U.S.C. § 3008, the Court noted that a postal official in Washington was authorized to authenticate certain administrative records.

[b] Rule 902(4) -- Notarized Documents

Acosta-Mestre v. Hilton Int'l of P.R., Inc., 156 F.3d 49 (1st Cir. 1998) : The plaintiff was resting on a chaise lounge on the beach at the defendant's hotel; he reached back to adjust the chaise lounge, and his finger got caught and it was severed. At trial he offered 18 photographs of chaise lounges, taken by the plaintiff after the accident; attached to the photos was a notarized document. When the plaintiff failed to authenticate the photographs during his testimony, he argued that they were self-authenticating under Rule 902(4). Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court found no error in the exclusion of the photographs. A notarized document does not constitute an official record within the meaning of Rule 902(4), and even if the notarized photos were self-authenticating, it would not necessarily make them admissible; none of the photos depicted the chair involved in the accident, so they were properly excluded under Rule 403 in any event.

[5] Rule 902(6) -- Newspapers And Periodicals

Price v. Rochford, 947 F.2d 829 (7th Cir. 1991) : The Court noted, in an action for willful violations of an automatic stay, that newspaper articles reporting that the plaintiff was in bankruptcy were self-authenticating.

[6] Rule 902(7) -- Trade Inscriptions And The Like

Los Angeles News Service v. CBS Broadcasting, Inc., 305 F.3d 924 (9th Cir. 2002) : The plaintiff news organization videotaped the notorious beating of Reginald Denny and obtained copyrights for four segments of its tape. Reversing in part summary judgment for the defendants in a copyright infringement action, the Court held that the identifying slate that appeared on the opening frames of the tape "appears to fall directly within the text of the relevant Federal Rule, which provides that no extrinsic evidence is required to support the authentication of 'labels purporting to be affixed in the course of business and indicating ownership, control, or origin.' Rule 902(7) (emphasis added)." In United States v. Alvarez, 972 F.2d 1000 (9th Cir. 1992) (per curiam), a prosecution of a felon for criminal possession of a firearm that had moved in interstate commerce, the Court held that the inscription "Garnika, Spain" on the gun was a "mechanical trace" not excludable under the hearsay rule and not requiring extrinsic evidence of authenticity.

[7] Rule 902(8) -- Acknowledged Documents

In re Bobby Boggs, Inc., 819 F.2d 574 (5th Cir. 1987) : In a bankruptcy dispute over entitlement to a subcontractor's funds, the Court observed that notarized bonds may well have been self-authenticating.

[8] Rule 902(9) -- Commercial Paper And Related Documents

United States v. Carriger, 592 F.2d 312 (6th Cir. 1979) : Reversing an income tax evasion conviction, the Court held that promissory notes should have been admitted on behalf of the defendant. It cited Rule 902(9) and noted that "[u]nder Uniform Commercial Code § 3-307 mere production of a note is prima facie evidence of its validity and of the holder's right to recover on it."

United States v. Little, 567 F.2d 346, 349 n.1 (8th Cir. 1977) : Affirming convictions for mail fraud, the Court noted that corporate checks "were relevant, admissible under Federal Rule of Evidence 902(9) as commercial paper or as an exception to the hearsay rule under Rule 803" (emphasis added). The italicized "or" is misleading. Real evidence always must be authenticated; only after authentication, if it is hearsay, must an exception be found. Authentication and hearsay problems should not be confused.

United States v. Pang, 362 F.3d 1187 (9th Cir. 2004) : At a trial for structuring currency transactions and income tax evasion, the prosecution introduced invoices from the defendant and checks from a customer paying those invoices. The Court held that the checks were self-authenticating as negotiable instruments, but the invoices, not being commercial paper, required authentication, which was sufficiently provided.

United States v. Varner, 13 F.3d 1503 (11th Cir. 1994) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the government in an action to recover on notes assumed by the defendant, holding that the promissory notes were properly found self-authenticating under the Rule. In United States v. Hawkins, 905 F.2d 1489 (11th Cir. 1990) , the Court affirmed mail fraud convictions, holding that checks were properly admitted in evidence as self-authenticating commercial paper.

[9] Rule 902(11) -- Certified Domestic Records Of Regularly Conducted Activity

United States v. Lauersen, 343 F.3d 604 (2d Cir. 2003) : In a prosecution for health care fraud, an anesthesiologist (Ratner) who testified for the government explained how he prepared charts and reports in which he disguised the true nature of the procedures employed by the defendant and sent them to a record-keeping business operated by his father. The government obtained the records from the business, and an FBI agent used the code supplied by Ratner to create a summary chart of the disguised procedures contained in the records. The basis of the defendant's objection at trial was unclear. To the extent that the defendant was objecting to the foundation for the records as business records, the Court held that Ratner was qualified to lay a foundation and the father's testimony was not required. Therefore, "[b]ecause Rule 803(6) was satisfied by Ratner's testimony, Rule 902(11) certification and notice were unnecessary." Rule 902(11) provides for a means of authenticating a domestic business record in lieu of live testimony.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. United States v. Pena-Jessie, 763 F.2d 618 (4th Cir. 1985) .

(n2)Footnote 2. In re Sterling Nav. Co., 444 F. Supp. 1043 (S.D.N.Y. 1977) .

(n3)Footnote 3. United States v. Perlmuter, 693 F.2d 1290 (9th Cir. 1982) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IX. Authentication And Identification
CHAPTER 902 RULE 902

5-902 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 902.04

902.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Advisory Committee's Note

Case law and statutes have, over the years, developed a substantial body of instances in which authenticity is taken as sufficiently established for purposes of admissibility without extrinsic evidence to that effect, sometimes for reasons of policy but perhaps more often because practical considerations reduce the possibility of unauthenticity to a very small dimension. The present rule collects and incorporates these situations, in some instances expanding them to occupy a larger area which their underlying considerations justify. In no instance is the opposite party foreclosed from disputing authenticity.

Paragraph (1). The acceptance of documents bearing a public seal and signature, most often encountered in practice in the form of acknowledgments or certificates authenticating copies of public records, is actually of broad application. Whether theoretically based in whole or in part upon judicial notice, the practical underlying considerations are that forgery is a crime and detection is fairly easy and certain. 7 Wigmore § 2161, p. 638; California Evidence Code § 1452. More than 50 provisions for judicial notice of official seals are contained in the United States Code.

Paragraph (2). While statutes are found which raise a presumption of genuineness of purported official signatures in the absence of an official seal, 7 Wigmore § 2167; California Evidence Code § 1453, the greater ease of effecting a forgery under these circumstances is apparent. Hence this paragraph of the rule calls for authentication by an officer who has a seal. Notarial acts by members of the armed forces and other special situations are covered in paragraph (10).

Paragraph (3) provides a method for extending the presumption of authenticity to foreign official documents by a procedure of certification. It is derived from Rule 44(a)(2) of the Rules of Civil Procedure but is broader in applying to public documents rather than being limited to public records.

Paragraph (4). The common law and innumerable statutes have recognized the procedure of authenticating copies of public records by certificate. The certificate qualifies as a public document, receivable as authentic when in conformity with paragraphs (1), (2), or (3). Rule 44(a) of the Rules of Civil Procedure and Rule 27 of the Rules of Criminal Procedure have provided authentication procedures of this nature for both domestic and foreign public records.

It will be observed that the certification procedure here provided extends only to public records, reports, and recorded documents, all including data compilations, and does not apply to public documents generally. Hence documents provable when presented in original form under paragraphs (1), (2), or (3) may not be provable by certified copy under paragraph (4).

Paragraph (5). Dispensing with preliminary proof of the genuineness of purportedly official publications, most commonly encountered in connection with statutes, court reports, rules, and regulations, has been greatly enlarged by statutes and decisions. 5 Wigmore § 1684. Paragraph (5), it will be noted, does not confer admissibility upon all official publications; it merely provides a means whereby their authenticity may be taken as established for purposes of admissibility. Rule 44(a) of the Rules of Civil Procedure has been to the same effect.

Paragraph (6). The likelihood of forgery of newspapers or periodicals is slight indeed. Hence no danger is apparent in receiving them. Establishing the authenticity of the publication may, of course, leave still open questions of authority and responsibility for items therein contained. See 7 Wigmore § 2150. Cf. 39 U.S.C. § 4005(b), public advertisement prima facie evidence of agency of person named, in postal fraud order proceeding; Canadian Uniform Evidence Act, Draft of 1936, printed copy of newspaper prima facie evidence that notices or advertisements were authorized.

Paragraph (7). Several factors justify dispensing with preliminary proof of genuineness of commercial and mercantile labels and the like. The risk of forgery is minimal. Trademark infringement involves serious penalties. Great efforts are devoted to inducing the public to buy in reliance on brand names, and substantial protection is given them. Hence the fairness of this treatment finds recognition in the cases. Curtiss Candy Co. v. Johnson, 163 Miss. 426, 141 So. 762 (1932) , Baby Ruth candy bar; Doyle v. Continental Baking Co., 262 Mass. 516, 160 N.E. 325 (1928) , loaf of bread; Weiner v. Mager & Throne, Inc., 167 Misc. 338, 3 N.Y.S.2d 918 (1938) , same. And see W. Va. Code 1966, § 47-3-5, trademark on bottle prima facie evidence of ownership. Contra, Keegan v. Green Giant Co., 150 Me. 283, 110 A.2d 599 (1954) ; Murphy v. Campbell Soup Co., 62 F.2d 564 (1st Cir. 1933) . Cattle brands have received similar acceptance in the western states. Rev. Code Mont. 1947, § 46-606; State v. Wolfley, 75 Kan. 406, 89 P. 1046 (1907) ; Annot., 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 87 . Inscriptions on trains and vehicles are held to be prima facie evidence of ownership or control. Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. Ry. v. Callaghan, 157 Ill. 406, 41 N.E. 909 (1895) ; 9 Wigmore § 2510a. See also the provision of 19 U.S.C. § 1615(2) that marks, labels, brands, or stamps indicating foreign origin are prima facie evidence of foreign origin of merchandise.

Paragraph (8). In virtually every state, acknowledged title documents are receivable in evidence without further proof. Statutes are collected in 5 Wigmore § 1676. If this authentication suffices for documents of the importance of those affecting titles, logic scarcely permits denying this method when other kinds of documents are involved. Instances of broadly inclusive statutes are California Evidence Code § 1451 and NYCPLR 4538 , McKinney's Consol. Laws 1963.

Paragraph (9). Issues of the authenticity of commercial paper in federal courts will usually arise in diversity cases, will involve an element of a cause of action or defense, and with respect to presumptions and burden of proof will be controlled by Erie Railroad Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64, 58 S. Ct. 817, 82 L. Ed. 1188 (1938) . Rule 302, supra . There may, however, be questions of authenticity involving lesser segments of a case or the case may be one governed by federal common law. Clearfield Trust Co. v. United States, 318 U.S. 363, 63 S. Ct. 573, 87 L. Ed. 838 (1943) . Cf. United States v. Yazell, 382 U.S. 341, 86 S. Ct. 500, 15 L. Ed. 2d 404 (1966) . In these situations, resort to the useful authentication provisions of the Uniform Commercial Code is provided for. While the phrasing is in terms of "general commercial law," in order to avoid the potential complications inherent in borrowing local statutes, today one would have difficulty in determining the general commercial law without referring to the Code. See Williams v. Walker-Thomas Furniture Co., 350 F.2d 445, 121 U.S. App. D.C. 315 (1965) . Pertinent Code provisions are sections 1-202, 3-307, and 3-510, dealing with third-party documents, signatures on negotiable instruments, protests, and statements of dishonor.

Paragraph (10). The paragraph continues in effect dispensations with preliminary proof of genuineness provided in various acts of Congress. See, for example, 10 U.S.C. § 936, signature without seal, together with title, prima facie evidence of authenticity of acts of certain military personnel who are given notarial powers; 15 U.S.C. § 77f(a), signature on SEC registration presumed genuine; 26 U.S.C. § 6064, signature to tax return prima facie genuine.

[The entire Advisory Committee Note accompanying the gender-neutralizing changes effective October 1, 1987 is as follows: "The amendments are technical. No substantive change is intended."

Following the 1987 amendment to Rule 902(3), the Supreme Court sent to Congress a technical amendment restoring two sentences inadvertently omitted, effective November 1, 1988.]

[2] 2000 Amendment Committee Note

2000 Amendment Committee Note

The amendment adds two new paragraphs to the rule on self-authentication. It sets forth a procedure by which parties can authenticate certain records of regularly conducted activity, other than through the testimony of a foundation witness. See the amendment to Fed. R Evid. 803(6). 18 U.S.C. § 3505 currently provides a means for certifying foreign records of regularly conducted activity in criminal cases, and this amendment is intended to establish a similar procedure for domestic records, and for foreign records offered in civil cases.

A declaration that satisfies 28 U.S.C. § 1746 would satisfy the declaration requirement of Rule 902(11), as would any comparable certification under oath.

The notice requirement in Rules 902(11) and (12) is intended to give the opponent of the evidence a full opportunity to test the adequacy of the foundation set forth in the declaration.

[3] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

Subdivision (8) was redrafted to eliminate the requirement, believed to be inconsistent with the law in some States, that a notary public must affix a seal to a document acknowledged before him. As amended, the Rule merely requires that the document be executed in the manner required by the law of the State which authorized the notary to take the acknowledgment.

Subdivision (9) was approved as submitted by the Court. However, there was considerable discussion concerning the meaning of the term "general commercial law." The Subcommittee intends that the Uniform Commercial Code, which has been adopted in virtually every State, will be followed generally, but that Federal commercial law will apply where Federal commercial paper is involved. Further, in those instances in which the issues are governed by Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64 (1938) , State law will apply irrespective of whether it is the Uniform Commercial Code.

[4] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

Rule 902(8) as submitted by the Court referred to certificates of acknowledgment "under the hand and seal of" a notary public or other officer authorized by law to take acknowledgments. The Committee amended the Rule to eliminate the requirement, believed to be inconsistent with the law in some States, that a notary public must affix a seal to a document acknowledged before him. As amended the Rule merely requires that the document be executed in the manner prescribed by State law.

The Committee approved Rule 902(9) as submitted by the Court. With respect to the meaning of the phrase "general commercial law," the Committee intends that the Uniform Commercial Code, which has been adopted in virtually every State, will be followed generally, but that federal commercial law will apply where federal commercial paper is involved. See Clearfield Trust Co. v. United States, 318 U.S. 363 (1943) . Further, in those instances in which the issues are governed by Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64 (1938) , State law will apply irrespective of whether it is the Uniform Commercial Code.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IX. Authentication And Identification
Supp. To CHAPTER 902 RULE 902

5-902 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 902, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 902. Self-authentication	Rule 902. Evidence That Is Self-Authenticating
Extrinsic evidence of authenticit	The following items of evidence are

y as a condition precedent to admissibility is not required with respect to the following: self-authenticating; they require no extrinsic evidence of authenticity in order to be admitted:

(1) Domestic public documents under seal. A document bearing a seal purporting to be that of

(1) Domestic Public Documents That Are Sealed and Signed. A document that bears:

the United States, or of any State, district, Commonwealth, territory, or insular possession thereof, or the Panama Canal Zone, or the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, or of a political subdivision, department, officer, or agency thereof, and a signature purporting to be an attestation or execution.

(A) a seal purporting to be that of the United States; any state, district, commonwealth, territory, or insular possession of the United States; the former Panama Canal Zone; the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands; a political subdivision of any of these entities; or a department, agency, or officer of any entity named above; and

		(B) a signature purporting to be an execution or attestation.
(2) Domestic public documents not under seal. A document	(2)	Domestic Public Documents That Are Not Sealed but Are Sign purporting to bear the signature in the official capacity of an officer or employee of any entity included in paragraph (1) hereof, having no seal, if a public officer having a seal and having official ed and Certified. A document that bears no seal if:

cial duties in the district or political subdivision of the officer or employee certifies under seal that the signer has the official capacity and that the signature is genuine.

(A) it bears the signatu re of an officer or employee of an entity named in Rule 902(1)(A); and

(B) another public officer who has a seal and official duties within that same entity certifies under seal -- or its equivalent -- that the signer has the official capacity and that the signature is genuine.

(3)	Foreign public documents. A document purporting to be executed or attested in an official capacity by a person	(3)	Foreign Public Documents. A document that purports to be signed or attested by a person who is authorized by a

authorized by the laws of a foreign coun try to mak e the execu-tion
or attestatio
n,
and ac-
com panied by a final cer-tific-
atio n as to
the genu ine-ness
of
the signatu re
and official position
(A)
of foreign coun try's law
to do so.
The docume nt must be ac-
com panied by a final cer-tific-atio n that cer-tifie s the genu ine-ness
of
the signatu re
and official position
of
the sign er or attester -- or of any

the ex- ecut- ing or at- test- ing per- son, or (B) of any for- eign offi- cial who se cer- tific- ate of genu ine- ness of sig- natu re and offi- cial pos- ition relat es to the exe- cu- tion or at- test- atio n or is in a chai for- eign offi- cial who se cer- tific- ate of genu ine- ness relat es to the sig- natu re or at- test- atio n or is in a chai n of cer- tific- ates of genu ine- ness re- lat- ing to the sig- natu re or at- test- atio n. The cer- tific- atio n of cer- tific- ates of genu ine- ness of sig- natu re and offi- cial pos- ition re- lat- ing to the exe- cu- tion or at- test- atio n. A final cer- tific- atio n may be mad e by a sec- ret- ary of an em- bass y or lega- tion, n may be mad e by a sec- ret- ary of a Unit ed Stat es em- bass y or lega- tion; by a con- sul gen- eral, vice con- sul, or con- sular agen t of the Unit ed Stat es; or by a dip- lo- mat- ic or con- sular offi- cial of the for-consul general, consul, vice consul, or consular agent of the United States, or a diplomatic or consular official of the foreign country assigned or accredited to the United States. If reasonable eign country assigned or accredited to the United States. If all parties have been given a reasonable opportunity to investigate the document's authenticity and accuracy, the court may,

opportunity has been given to all parti es to investi gate
the au-then ticit
y and ac-cur-acy
of official docume nts,
the cour t
may,
for goo d caus e sho wn,
order that they be treat ed
as presum for goo d caus e, eithe r:

ptivel
y au-then tic with out final cer-tific-atio n or permit
the m to be evid enced
by an atteste d sum mar y with or with out final cer-tific-atio
n.

(A) order that it be treat ed
as presum ptivel
y

			authentic without final certification; or
		(B)	allow it to be evidenced by an attested summary with or without final certification.
(4)	Certified copies of public records. A copy of an official	(4)	Certified Copies of Public Records. A copy of an official

cial re- cord or re- port or entr y there in, or of a doc- ume nt au- thor- ized by law to be re- cor- ded or filed and actu- ally re- cor- ded or filed in a pub- lic of- fice, in- clud ing data com pila- tions in any form re- cord -- or a copy of a doc- ume nt that was re- cor- ded or filed in a pub- lic of- fice as au- thor- ized by law -- if the copy is cer- tifie d as cor- rect by:

,
certified as correct by the custodian or other person authorized to make the certification, by certificate complying with paragraph (1), (2), or (3) of this rule or complying with any

Act of Congress or rule prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority.

(A) the custodian or another person authorized to make the certification; or

(B) a certificate that complies with Rule 902(1), (2), or (3), a federal statute, or a rule prescribed by the Supreme Court.

(5) Official publications. Books, pamphlets, or other publications purporting to be

(5) Official Publications. A book, pamphlet, or other publication purporting to be is-sued by pub-lic au-thor-ity.		is-sued by a pub-lic au-thor-ity.

(6)	Ne wsp aper s and peri odic als. Print ed ma-teri-als pur-port-ing to be new spa-pers or peri-odic als.	(6)	Ne wsp aper s and Peri odic als. Print ed ma-teri-al pur-port-ing to be a new spa-per or peri-odic al.
(7)	Tra de in-scri ptio ns and the like. In-scrip tions , sign s, tags,	(7)	Tra de In-scri ptio ns and the Like . An in-scrip tion, sign, tag, or or labels purporting to have been affixed in the course of business and indicating ownership, control, or origin.		label purporting to have been affixed in the course of business and indicating origin, ownership, or control.

(8)	Acknowledged documents. Documents accompanied by a certificate of	(8)	Acknowledged Documents. A document accompanied by a certificate of acknowledgment executed in the manner provided by law by a notary public or other officer authorized by law to take acknowledgments.		acknowledgment that is lawfully executed by a notary public or another officer who is authorized to take acknowledgments.

(9)	Commercial paper and related documents.	(9)	Commercial Paper and Related Documents.

Commercial paper, signatures thereon, and documents relating thereto to the extent provided by general commercial law.		Commercial paper, a signature on it, and related documents, to the extent allowed by general commercial law.
(10) Presumptions under Acts of Congress. Any signature, document, or	(10)	Presumptions Under a Federal Statute. A signature, document, or other matter declared by Act of Congress to be presumptively or prima facie genuine or authentic.		anything else that a federal statute declares to be presumptively or prima facie genuine or authentic.

(11) Certified domestic records of regularly conducted activity. The original or a	(11)	Certified Domestic Records of a Regularly Conducted Activity. The original or duplicate of a domestic record of regularly conducted activity that would be admissible under Rule 803(6) if accompanied by a written declaration of its custodian or other qualified person a copy of a domestic record that meets the requirements of Rule 803(6)(A)-(C), as shown by a certification of the custodian or another qualified person that complies with a federal statute or a son, in a manner complying with any Act of Congress or rule prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority, certifying that the record -- rule prescribed by the Supreme Court. Before the trial or hearing, the proponent must give an adverse party reasonable written notice of the intent to offer the record -- and must mak e the record and certification available for inspection -- so that the party has a fair opportunity to challenge them.

(A) was made at or near the time of the occurrence of the matters set forth by, or from information transmitted by, a person with knowledge of those matters;

(B) was kept in the course of the regularly conducted activity; and

(C) was made by the regularly conducted activ ity as a regular practice.

A party intending to offer a record into evidence under this paragraph must provide written notice of that intention to all adverse parties, and must make the record and declaration available for inspection sufficiently in advance of their offer into evidence to provide an adverse party with a fair opportunity to challenge them.

(12)	Certified foreign re-	(12)	Certified Foreign Re- cords of regularly conducted activity. In a civil case, the original or a duplicate of a foreign record of regularly conducted activity that would be admissible under Rule 803(6) if accompanied	cords of a Regularly Conducted Activity. In a civil case, the original or a copy of a foreign record that meets the requirements of Rule 902(11), modified as follows: the certification, rather than com by a written declaration by its custodian or other qualified person certifying that the record -- plying with a federal statute or Supreme Court rule, must be signed in a manner that, if falsely made, would subject the maker to a criminal penalty in the country where the certification is signed. The proponent must also meet the notice requirements of Rule 902(11).

(A) was made at or near the time of the occurrence of the matters set forth by, or from information transmitted by, a person with knowledge of those matters;

(B) was kept in the course of the regularly conducted activity; and

(C) was made by the regularly conducted activity as a regular practice.

The declaration must be signed in a manner that, if falsely made, would subject the maker to criminal penalty under the laws of the country where the declaration is signed. A party intending to offer a record into evid ence under this paragraph must provide written notice of that intention to all adverse parties, and must make the record and declaration available for inspection sufficiently in advance of their offer into evidence to provide an adverse party with a fair opportunity to challenge them.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 902 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IX. Authentication And Identification
Supp. To CHAPTER 902 RULE 902

5-902 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 902.03

Supp. to § 902.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[1] Rule 902(1) -- Domestic Public Documents Under Seal [Go To Main]

United States v. Hampton, 464 F.3d 687 (7th Cir. 2006) : In a bank robbery trial, the prosecution proved the banks' federally insured status by introducing photocopies purporting to be insurance certificates, with an employee of each bank, typically a teller, testifying that an identical photocopy hanging on the wall of the witness' bank was a true copy of the bank's certificate. The Court held that the photocopies were not properly admitted under Rule 902(1), because the copies were copies of sealed documents rather than sealed documents themselves. They were also not admissible under Rule 1005, because there was no indication that the certificates on the walls of the banks to which the copies were compared were themselves originals. Nonetheless, the Court held the copies admissible, and affirmed the convictions, on the grounds that the copies were duplicates admissible under Rule 1003 unless there was a genuine question raised about the authenticity of the original and that the testimony of the tellers satisfied the authentication requirement of Rule 901(a): the testimony was "pretty compelling evidence that the copies were not forgeries prepared by or for, or somehow obtained by, the government," so that "[a]s between the parties' rival hypotheses ... the defendant's hypothesis is so improbable that without some evidence to support the hypothesis no reasonable person would accept it."

[3] Rule 902(3) -- Foreign Public Documents [Go To Main]

[a] Rule 902(3) -- Certification by Consular Officials

United States v. Pintado-Isiordia, 448 F.3d 1155 (9th Cir. 2006) (per curiam): In a prosecution for unlawful re-entry into the United States, the Court held that the defendant's Mexican birth record was self-authenticating under Fed. R. Civ. P. 44(a)(2). The government was not required to submit a "final certification" because the record and its attestation were certified by an Apostille in accordance with the Hague Convention Abolishing the Requirement of Legalization for Foreign Public Documents, to which Mexico and the Untied States are parties.

United States v. Deverso, 518 F.3d 1250 (11th Cir. 2008) : Affirming a conviction for possession of child pornography, the Court held that the copy of a Philippine birth certificate was sufficiently authenticated under Rule 902(3). The copy was accompanied by a certificate of a Philippine official attesting that it was a true copy of an official record, and by a final certification by the U.S. Vice Consul in the Philippines. The copy was also stamped as a certified copy and affixed with a seal of an officer whom the Vice Consul certified was a clerk in the Philippines National Statistics Office. The Court noted that challenges to the reliability of information contained in the birth certificate, such as the date of birth and the lack of signature of the attendant at birth, went to the weight rather than the admissibility of the evidence.

[b] Rule 902(3) -- Certification by Foreign Officials

Vatyan v. Mukasey, 508 F.3d 1179 (9th Cir. 2007) : Vatyan sought asylum in the United States after alleged persecution in Armenia. As proof of his persecution, he offered letters purportedly sent to him by the Armenian Ministry of Internal Affairs and National Security. The Immigration Judge refused to recognize the letters on the ground that they were not properly certified by the Armenian government. Remanding, the Court found an error as a matter of law because the Immigration Judge had wrongly assumed that certification -- required for authentication under Fed. R. Civ. P. 44 and Fed. R. Evid. 902 -- was the only way in which the documents could be authenticated. The Court held that "an immigration petitioner may resort to any recognized procedure for authentication of documents in general, including the procedures permitted under Federal Rule of Evidence 901, and thus a petitioner's failure to obtain government certification of a foreign public document's authenticity is not necessarily a bar to admission of the document." The Court reasoned that to require an asylum petitioner "to obtain a certification from the very government he claims has persecuted him or has failed to protect him from persecution would in some cases create an insuperable barrier to admission of authentic documents." Here, the petitioner himself "arguably could have supported authentication" as he was a longtime resident of Armenia, he recognized the official stamps on the letter, and he might have been able to establish a chain of custody by explaining how the letter came into his possession.

[4] Rule 902(4) -- Certified Copies of Public Records [Go To Main]

[a.1] Rule 902(4) -- Constitutional Concerns

United States v. Jimenez, 513 F.3d 62 (3d Cir. 2008) : Affirming conviction for bank fraud and mortgage fraud, the Court held that it need not decide whether IRS Form 2866 certifications used under Rule 902(4) to authenticate tax records offered under Rule 803(8) were "testimonial" and subject to the Confrontation Clause under Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004) , as any error in their admission would be harmless.

[9] Rule 902(11) -- Certified Domestic Records of Regularly Conducted Activity [Go To Main]

United States v. Adefehinti, 510 F.3d 319 (D.C. Cir. 2007) : Affirming fraud convictions, the Court held that Rule 902(11) does not require the custodian who provides the certificate to have personal knowledge of the actual creation of the business record; it is sufficient that the affiant have knowledge of a business's processes for creating and retaining records. It also rejected an argument that use of Rule 902(11) to lay the foundation for business records violates the Confrontation Clause.

United States v. Jimenez, 513 F.3d 62 (3d Cir. 2008) : Affirming conviction for bank fraud and mortgage fraud, the Court held that it need not decide whether Rule 902(11) declarations used to authenticate bank records offered under Rule 803(6) were "testimonial" and subject to the Confrontation Clause under Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004) , as any error in their admission would be harmless.

United States v. Petroff-Kline, 557 F.3d 285 (6th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a summary judgment for the government in an action to collect the amount owed on a student loan. It held that a declaration by the Chief of the Referral Control Section of the Debt Management Branch of the Department of Health and Human Services complied with Rule 902(11) and laid the foundation for the introduction of promissory notes as business records. In United States v. Jordan, 544 F.3d 656 (6th Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed convictions for mail fraud and aggravated identity theft, finding no abuse of discretion when the government was permitted to provide a corrected notice of the intention to rely on T-Mobile phone records, where the government's pretrial notice contained a typographical error as to the phone number.

United States v. Ellis, 460 F.3d 920 (7th Cir. 2006) : To prove that the defendant, a felon arrested for possession of a firearm, was a user of a controlled substance in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(3), the prosecution introduced records of blood and urine tests conducted by the local hospital and by other laboratories. Affirming, the Court held there was no Confrontation Clause violation when a certification pursuant to Rule 902(11) was used to authenticate the records. The certification was nontestimonial evidence, as it did not purport to convey information about the defendant, but simply established the existence of the procedures necessary to create a business record.

United States v. Lewis, 594 F.3d 1270 (10th Cir. 2010) : In a massive fraud case the prosecution notified the defense 12 days before trial that it would authenticate 16 boxes of bank records using the certification process under Rule 902(11). Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in denying a defense request for a continuance and in admitting the records, since the originals of the records had been available to the defense for more than two years and a defense investigator had in fact reviewed the records more than 18 months before the trial. Furthermore, the defense had 39 days from the time of the Rule 902(11) notice until they were introduced but devoted only two hours to inspecting them.

[10] Rule 902(12) -- Certified Foreign Records of Regularly Conducted Activity [Go To Main]

United States v. Jawara, 474 F.3d 565 (9th Cir. 2006) : In an immigration fraud case, the Court upheld the admission of Gambian school examination records under 18 U.S.C. § 3505, the criminal counterpart to Rule 902(12).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IX. Authentication And Identification
Supp. To CHAPTER 902 RULE 902

5-902 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to

Supp. to §

[Go To Main]

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IX. Authentication And Identification
CHAPTER 903 RULE 903

5-903 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 903.syn

§ 903.syn Synopsis to Chapter 903: RULE 903

903.01 Official Text

903.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Common-Law Rule

[2] Proving Execution of a Document

903.03 Annotated Cases

903.04 Legislative History

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IX. Authentication And Identification
CHAPTER 903 RULE 903

5-903 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 903.01

903.01 Official Text

Rule 903. Subscribing Witness' Testimony Unnecessary

The testimony of a subscribing witness is not necessary to authenticate a writing unless required by the laws of the jurisdiction whose laws govern the validity of the writing.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IX. Authentication And Identification
CHAPTER 903 RULE 903

5-903 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 903.02

903.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Common-Law Rule

At common law an attesting witness was a preferred witness for proving execution of an attested document. Unless the attesting witness was called or his absence was satisfactorily explained, no other evidence of execution could be received. If the attesting witness was unavailable, the next best evidence was that of the witness' handwriting, which was proof of the attestation. Yet the common-law provision was an odd one, for it did not confine the evidence to testimony of the attesters. Rather, it merely required that the attesters be called before other evidence could be introduced. If all the attesters when called denied having witnessed the execution and denied having attested, the proponent of a document could introduce other evidence in order to prove that the maker of the document had executed the writing in the presence of the attesters and that they had signed as attesters. Thus, the proponent might still convince the tribunal that the writing was executed with attestation as required by statute.

It is important to note that the older common-law rule required the production of attesting witnesses or, in lieu thereof, a satisfactory explanation for failure to produce them before other evidence could be produced of the execution of any attested writing, whether or not attestation was necessary to a legally effective execution of the writing. This rule once prevailed with varying degrees of strictness in the United States. It has now been generally abolished as to writings that are not required to be attested. Unless the laws of the jurisdiction whose laws govern the validity of the writing require the testimony of a subscribing or attesting witness, the attesting witness' testimony is not necessary for authentication.

The Rule does not say what is required to authenticate an attested document; it only says what is not required. The authentication requirements for an attested document, like any other, are found in Rules 901 and 902.

[2] Proving Execution of a Document

Wigmore makes a point that should be kept in mind in conjunction with Rule 903. Even where the state law of authentication is applicable and requires the subscribing witness to testify first or to be otherwise accounted for, the rule "applies only in proving execution, not in using the document for other purposes." 4 J. Wigmore, Evidence § 1293 (Chadbourn rev. 1972). If, for example, a statement in a will is offered in a suit where the validity of the will is not being contested, the Rule does not apply. If, however, a state has a more restrictive rule and requires attesters to authenticate a will in every case, the language of Rule 903 makes it difficult to escape the application of the state rule.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IX. Authentication And Identification
CHAPTER 903 RULE 903

5-903 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 903.03

903.03 Annotated Cases

No significant decisions.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IX. Authentication And Identification
CHAPTER 903 RULE 903

5-903 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 903.04

903.04 Legislative History

Advisory Committee's Note

The common law required that attesting witnesses be produced or accounted for. Today the requirement has generally been abolished except with respect to documents which must be attested to be valid, e.g., wills in some states. McCormick § 188; Uniform Rule 71; California Evidence Code § 1411; Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60-468; New Jersey Evidence Rule 71; NYCPLR, Rule 4537.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IX. Authentication And Identification
Supp. To CHAPTER 903 RULE 903

5-903 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 903, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 903. Subscribing Witness' Testimony Unnecessary	Rule 903. Subscribing Witness's Testimony
The testimony of a subscrib	A subscribing witness's

ing wit- ness is not ne- ces- sary to au- then tic- ate a writ- ing un- less re- quir ed by the laws of the jur- is- dic- tion who se laws gov- ern the vali dity of the writ- ing.

testi mon y is ne- ces- sary to au- then tic- ate a writ- ing only if re- quir ed by the law of the jur- is- dic- tion that gov- erns its vali dity.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 903 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1001 RULE 1001

5-1001 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1001.syn

§ 1001.syn Synopsis to Chapter 1001: RULE 1001

1001.01 Official Text

1001.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Definitions

[2] Business Records

1001.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Rule 1001(3) -- Original

[2] Rule 1001(4) -- Duplicate

1001.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

[2] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

[3] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1001 RULE 1001

5-1001 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1001.01

1001.01 Official Text

Rule 1001. Definitions

For purposes of this article the following definitions are applicable:

(1) Writings and recordings. -- "Writings" and "recordings" consist of letters, words, or numbers, or their equivalent, set down by handwriting, typewriting, printing, photostating, photographing, magnetic impulse, mechanical or electronic recording, or other form of data compilation.

(2) Photographs. -- "Photographs" include still photographs, X-ray films, video tapes, and motion pictures.

(3) Original. -- An "original" of a writing or recording is the writing or recording itself or any counterpart intended to have the same effect by a person executing or issuing it. An "original" of a photograph includes the negative or any print therefrom. If data are stored in a computer or similar device, any printout or other output readable by sight, shown to reflect the data accurately, is an "original."

(4) Duplicate. -- A "duplicate" is a counterpart produced by the same impression as the original, or from the same matrix, or by means of photography, including enlargements and miniatures, or by mechanical or electronic re-recording, or by chemical reproduction, or by other equivalent techniques which accurately reproduces the original.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1001 RULE 1001

5-1001 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1001.02

1001.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Definitions

Rules 1001, 1002, 1003, and 1004 constitute the basic federal version of the Best Evidence Rule. Rule 1001 provides the definitions that are carried forth in the three succeeding Rules.

Section (1) defines "writings" and "recordings" to include letters, words, or numbers set down by handwriting, typewriting, printing, photostating, photographing, magnetic impulse, mechanical or electronic recording, or any other form of data compilation. Prior to the adoption of the Rules, several jurisdictions had extended the definition of "writing" to cover photostating and electronic recording. This section makes it clear that computers and other modern reproduction systems are also included in the Federal Rule.

Rule 1001 is somewhat narrower than corresponding portions of the Model Code of Evidence and the Uniform Rules of Evidence, restricting itself to letters, words, or numbers, or their equivalent, rather than extending to any form of communication or representation. Still, the Rule is comprehensive, covering as it does all forms of photographs, including X-rays, computer printouts, and every sort of writing or recording of words or word-substitutes.

Section (2) simply states that "photographs" include still photos, X-ray films, videotapes, and motion pictures. This definition recognizes that non-writing and non-documentary materials can still be subject to the Best Evidence Rule, if the proponent is attempting to prove the contents of such materials. n1

If evidence is not a writing, recording, or photograph, then it is not subject to the Best Evidence Rule. For example, in a criminal trial, a defendant charged with drug possession cannot make a best evidence objection when the prosecution proves the possession through the testimony of a police officer. The government is under no obligation to produce the drugs in lieu of testimony, because possession of drugs is not a writing, recording or photograph. See the discussion under the section "Chain of Custody" in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 901, § 901.02[10].

Section (3) defines an original of a writing or recording as the writing or recording itself and any counterpart intended to have the same effect by the person executing or issuing it. An original of a photograph includes the negative or any print therefrom, even though logically this may not be the case. Any printout of computer data, such as a digital photo, is an original. The key point is that the particular counterpart was intended to function as an original. For example, parties to a contract may create one document they intend to serve as the ultimate manifestation of their agreement, as well as copies to be held by each party. Or they may have multiple documents, each of which is to be considered an original, a definitive recording of their agreement.

Section (4) defines a duplicate as a counterpart produced by the same impression as the original, from the same matrix, by means of photography, by rerecording, or by other equivalent techniques that accurately reproduce the original. It is evident that the word "duplicate" is reserved for copies that are produced by methods possessing a high degree of accuracy. n2

[2] Business Records

Montana has added the following subdivision to its state version of Federal Rule 1001, so that the covered material would be admissible under its version of Rule 1003:

> (5) Copies of entries in the regular course of business. A copy of an entry in the regular course of business consists of an entry in a writing kept in the regular course of business copied from another such writing by manual or mechanical means at or near the time of the transaction.

The Commission Comment accompanying the Rule explained that it was based on a Montana statute (derived from the widely-adopted Uniform Photographic Copies of Business and Public Records as Evidence Act; see also 28 U.S.C. § 1732), that provides in relevant part that "[w]hen an entry is repeated in the regular course of business, one being copied from another or [sic] at or near the time of the transaction, all the entries are equally regarded as originals." The Commission felt that the evidence was not admissible under the federal version of Rule 1003. The Commission Comment states:

> The entry cannot be considered an original because the person making the entry has no such intent, but is carrying on a normal business function of collecting information to be stored in a single record. The entry cannot be considered a duplicate because, as previously indicated, duplicates are defined to include only mechanical means of duplication and not manual means.

Query whether the addition by Montana is necessary. Every record compiled by a business in the ordinary course of business that is kept as part of the business routine can qualify as a business record, even though portions of the record originally appeared in other writings. As long as several different kinds of writings are made in the ordinary course of business, it would seem that all of the writings could be introduced as originals, if the business retained them as such in the ordinary course of conducting its affairs. Of course, if the business records were being introduced to prove the content of the writings from which they were originally derived, they could only come in without explaining absence of the originals if they were "duplicates," and the Montana provision makes it possible to treat manual as well as photographic reproductions within that category. The comment to Minnesota's Rule 1003 is in accord with our view. Minnesota did not find it necessary to make the addition.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. See, e.g., United States v. Stockton, 968 F.2d 715 (8th Cir. 1992) (the government introduced a photograph taken of miscellaneous papers found in the residence of a drug laboratory, and the photos were introduced to prove the contents of the writings; held, subject to Best Evidence Rule).

(n2)Footnote 2. See, e.g., United States v. Mulinelli-Navas, 111 F.3d 983 (1st Cir. 1997) (microform copy of a check was a duplicate under Rule 1001(4); the copy was properly admitted under the terms of Rule 1003); United States v. Carroll, 860 F.2d 500 (1st Cir. 1988) (microfilm copy of a check is a duplicate within the meaning of the Rule: "Additionally, the fact that what was actually admitted into evidence was technically a duplicate of a duplicate, i.e., a print made from the microfilm does not affect our analysis.").

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1001 RULE 1001

5-1001 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1001.03

1001.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Rule 1001(3) -- Original

Greater Kansas City Laborers Pension Fund v. Thummel, 738 F.2d 926 (8th Cir. 1984) : Affirming a judgment against a company and its owner for unpaid contributions to employee benefit funds, the Court upheld the admission of a carbon copy of a contract, noting that the contract was executed in quadruplicate. Thus, the carbon copies were originals under Rule 1001(3), even though the signature at the bottom of the contract was dim and someone had written the owner's name over the signature.

[2] Rule 1001(4) -- Duplicate

United States v. Savarese, 404 F.3d 651 (2d Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed convictions for conspiring to rob a credit union, holding that copies of digital recordings of conversations between the conspirators were properly admitted, since "electronic re-recordings" are "duplicates," which are admissible to the same extent as originals unless there is a genuine issue of authenticity or admission would be unfair. In this case the government's testimonial evidence was sufficient to establish authenticity.

Railroad Mgmt. Co. v. CFS La. Midstream Co., 428 F.3d 214 (5th Cir. 2005) : The plaintiff sued to recover license payments under an agreement of which it claimed to be the assignee. When asked in discovery to produce the assignment agreement, the plaintiff refused on the ground it contained proprietary information. Instead, it submitted, inter alia, a retyped redacted version of the agreement. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant because there was insufficient evidence of a contractual relationship between the parties, the Court held that the contents of the agreement, particularly the relevant time period, were at issue, so the Best Evidence Rule applied. There was no abuse of discretion in rejecting the retyped version, offered as a "duplicate," since there were physical inconsistencies with an excerpt of the agreement and no sufficient showing that it was an accurate reproduction.

United States v. Perry, 925 F.2d 1077 (8th Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed a conviction for bank robbery, holding that a still photograph made from the bank videotape was a duplicate, as it was a counterpart produced by the same impression as the original.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1001 RULE 1001

5-1001 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1001.04

1001.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Advisory Committee's Note

In an earlier day, when discovery and other related procedures were strictly limited, the misleadingly named "best evidence rule" afforded substantial guarantees against inaccuracies and fraud by its insistence upon production of original documents. The great enlargement of the scope of discovery and related procedures in recent times has measurably reduced the need for the rule. Nevertheless important areas of usefulness persist: discovery of documents outside the jurisdiction may require substantial outlay of time and money; the unanticipated document may not practically be discoverable; criminal cases have built-in limitations on discovery. Cleary & Strong, The Best Evidence Rule: An Evaluation in Context, 51 Iowa L. Rev. 825 (1966).

Paragraph (1). Traditionally the rule requiring the original centered upon accumulations of data and expressions affecting legal relations set forth in words and figures. This meant that the rule was one essentially related to writings. Present day techniques have expanded methods of storing data, yet the essential form which the information ultimately assumes for usable purposes is words and figures. Hence the considerations underlying the rule dictate its expansion to include computers, photographic systems, and other modern developments.

Paragraph (3). In most instances, what is an original will be self-evident and further refinement will be unnecessary. However, in some instances particularized definition is required. A carbon copy of a contract executed in duplicate becomes an original, as does a sales ticket carbon copy given to a customer. While strictly speaking the original of a photograph might be thought to be only the negative, practicality and common usage require that any print from the negative be regarded as an original. Similarly, practicality and usage confer the status of original upon any computer printout. Transport Indemnity Co. v. Seib, 178 Neb. 253, 132 N.W.2d 871 (1965) .

Paragraph (4). The definition describes "copies" produced by methods possessing an accuracy which virtually eliminates the possibility of error. Copies thus produced are given the status of originals in large measure by Rule 1003 infra . Copies subsequently produced manually, whether handwritten or typed, are not within the definition. It should be noted that what is an original for some purposes may be a duplicate for others. Thus a bank's microfilm record of checks cleared is the original as a record. However, a print offered as a copy of a check whose contents are in controversy is a duplicate. This result is substantially consistent with 28 U.S.C. § 1732(b). Compare 26 U.S.C. § 7513(c), giving full status as originals to photographic reproductions of tax returns and other documents, made by authority of the secretary of the treasury, and 44 U.S.C. § 399(a), giving original status to photographic copies in the National Archives.

[2] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

The Subcommittee amended subdivision (2) specifically to include video tapes in the definition of "photographs."

[3] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

The Committee amended this Rule expressly to include "video tapes" in the definition of "photographs."

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
Supp. To CHAPTER 1001 RULE 1001

5-1001 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 1001, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

ARTICLE X. CONTENTS OF WRITINGS, RECORDINGS, AND PHOTOGRAPHS	ARTICLE X. CONTENTS OF WRITINGS, RECORDINGS, AND PHOTOGRAPHS

RAPHS Rule 1001. Definitions	RAPHS Rule 1001. Definitions That Apply to This Article
For purposes of this article the following definitions are applicable:	In this article:
	(1) Writings and recordings. "Writings" and "re-	(a)	A "writing" consists of letters, words, numbers, or their equivalent set down in any form.

cord
ings
"
consist
of letters, wor ds,
or num bers,
or their equi vale
nt, set dow n by hand writing, type writing, print ing, pho-tosta ting, photo-grap hing
,
mag netic impuls e, mec hanical
or electronic
record ing, or oth- er form of data com pila- tion.

(b) A "re- cord ing" con- sists of let- ters, wor ds, num bers, or their equi vale nt re- cor- ded in any man ner.

(c) A "pho- to- grap h" mea ns a pho- to- grap hic im- age or its equivalent stored in any form.

(2) Photographs. "Photographs" include still photographs, X-ray films, video tapes, and motion pictures.

(3) Original. An "original" of a writing or recording means the writing or recording itself or any counterpart intended to have the same effect by the person who executed or issued it. For electronically stored information, "original" means any printout -- or other output readable by sight -- if it accurately reflects the information. An "original" of a photograph includes the negative or a print from it.

(d) An "original" of a writing or re- cord ing is the writ- ing or re- cord ing it- self or any coun terpa rt in- ten- ded to have the sam e ef- fect by a per- son ex- ecut- ing or issu- ing it. An "ori- gin- al" of a pho- to- grap h in- clud es the negative or any print therefrom. If data are stored in a computer or similar device, any printout or other output readable by sight, shown to reflect the data accurately, is an "original".

(4) Duplic (e) A "duplicate" means a counterpart produced by ate. A "duplicate" is a counterpart produced by the same impression as the original, or from the same matrix, or by means of photography, including enlargements and miniatures, or by a mechanical, photographic, chemical, electronic, or other equivalent process or technique that accurately reproduces the original.

mec
hanical
or electronic
re-
record
ing,
or by che mical
reproduction,
or by other equi vale
nt techniqu es whic h ac-curately
reproduce
s the origin-
al.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 1001 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
Supp. To CHAPTER 1001 RULE 1001

5-1001 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to

Supp. to §

[Go To Main]

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1002 RULE 1002

5-1002 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1002.syn

§ 1002.syn Synopsis to Chapter 1002: RULE 1002

1002.01 Official Text

1002.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] The Best Evidence Rule: Proving the Contents

[2] Statutes

[3] Proving the Absence of an Item

1002.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Admissible Testimony

[2] Inadmissible or Properly Excluded Evidence

[a] Documents

[b] Inadmissible or Properly Excluded Evidence -- Testimony

[3] Proving the Contents

[4] Real and Demonstrative Evidence

[5] Tape Recordings

1002.04 Legislative History

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1002 RULE 1002

5-1002 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1002.01

1002.01 Official Text

Rule 1002. Requirement of Original

To prove the content of a writing, recording, or photograph, the original writing, recording, or photograph is required, except as otherwise provided in these rules or by Act of Congress.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1002 RULE 1002

5-1002 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1002.02

1002.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] The Best Evidence Rule: Proving the Contents

This is the familiar part of the Best Evidence Rule that requires the production of an original in order to prove the contents of a writing, recording, or photograph, unless an exception is provided in another Rule. n1 The traditional rationale of the Best Evidence Rule -- that accuracy is promoted by production of the original, because the process of copying creates a risk of error -- has clearly been undermined by technological advances with respect to copying of writings and recordings. The Federal Rules take account of these developments by establishing broad exceptions to Rule 1002. Rule 1002 must be read together with the exceptions provided in Rules 1003 and 1004. The only legitimate concern remaining is where the proponent seeks to prove the content of a writing or recording by way of oral testimony or handwritten replication, i.e., where there is no duplicate of the final document.

The one difficult concept that arises in connection with Rule 1002 is the notion of proving the contents of a writing, recording, or photograph. If the contents are not sought to be proved, the Best Evidence Rule is inapplicable, and the proponent can prove the fact in any otherwise permissible way. n2 The fact that a writing is made to describe or record an event or a condition does not prevent testimony by knowledgeable witnesses as to the same event or condition, if it is the event or condition to be proved and not the contents of the document itself. n3

One familiar example relates to the question whether A paid B a certain sum of money at a specified time. B may have given A a written receipt, but that does not prevent oral testimony concerning an alleged payment. The proponent is trying to prove whether or not a payment is made, not the content of any agreement. n4 However, should A choose to prove the fact of payment by using the receipt, the Rule requires that the original or a duplicate of the receipt be introduced, or its absence explained, because in that case the content of the receipt (i.e., the amount, date, signature, etc.) is the point to be proven. The same can be said of the use of most photographs, a point made by the Advisory Committee. Ordinarily, a witness takes the stand and states that a photograph represents the scene as he saw it. The contents of the picture are not then in issue; the scene is in dispute. So the Rule seldom applies to ordinary photographs. n5 However, in an obscenity prosecution or copyright case, the contents might be in dispute. n6 The contents of a photograph would also be in dispute if the proponent merely took a picture of documents and offered the photograph to prove the contents of the documents. n7

The most common example of non-applicability of the Best Evidence Rule in criminal cases is police testimony as to the contents of a confession. Officers who heard a defendant confess may testify to what they heard even if there is a recording of the confession and a transcript of that recording. Only when the recording or transcript is actually offered, as proof of the content therein, is the Best Evidence Rule triggered. n8

An interesting example of Best Evidence Rule application arose in United States v. Bennett, 363 F.3d 947 (9th Cir. 2004) . The Coast Guard found large quantities of marijuana on the defendant's boat, and the major contested issue was whether the defendant was importing the marijuana from Mexico. The government did not have eyewitness testimony that the boat crossed into the United States from Mexican waters. The government relied at trial chiefly on the testimony of a customs officer that he found a global positioning system (GPS) on the defendant's boat and that the GPS revealed that the boat had traveled from Mexican waters to San Diego Bay. A GPS device uses global positioning satellites to track and record the location of the device, and thus the location of any object to which it is attached. The GPS device in question came with a "backtrack," that graphed the boat's journey the day of the search. The officer testified at trial that the backtrack feature mapped the defendant's journey from Mexican territorial waters and then north to San Diego Bay. The officer admitted on cross-examination that he had not taken possession of the GPS device itself nor had he obtained any printout record of the data contained in it. Rather, he simply pressed the "backtrack" button and viewed the graphic display, which indicated where the boat had been. The Court found the testimony about the GPS information to be a best evidence violation for three reasons. First, the GPS display the officer saw was a writing or recording. Second, the officer never actually observed the defendant's boat travel the path depicted by the GPS. Third, he did not observe anyone entering way points into the machine. Thus, his testimony concerned the "content" of the GPS to prove the defendant's travels. The government did not produce the GPS itself, in which case the backtrack feature could be employed in court; nor did it produce a printout of the GPS data. Either of these sources would have been the best evidence of the boat's travels; as a result, testimony did not satisfy the Best Evidence Rule. Finally, the government provided no excuse for relying on the witness' testimony instead of the GPS or a printout.

[2] Statutes

Congress has specifically made it possible for certain photographic reproductions to be treated as originals. For example, in 26 U.S.C. § 7513, Congress provided that photographic reproductions of tax returns and documents made by authority of the Secretary of the Treasury are treated as originals. To accommodate these statutes and any others that may be enacted, Rule 1002 provides an exception from the requirement that an original be produced for whenever Congress may provide or has provided for such an exception. Familiar examples are 28 U.S.C. §§ 1732 (permitting destruction of business records and allowing proof through "reproduction") and 1733 (providing that properly authenticated government documents may be admitted in lieu of originals).

[3] Proving the Absence of an Item

The Advisory Committee's Note to Rule 1002 states that the Best Evidence Rule does not apply "to testimony that books or records have been examined and found not to contain any reference to a designated matter." In our view, this is not so clear. What is plain is that the drafters of the Rule did not intend that following a search of numerous documents the searcher must produce all of them in Court in order to testify that none contained a certain matter. See also Rule 1006, infra. It may be a different situation altogether, however, when a witness says that a specific document had a blank space at an important point. For example, if an insurance company witness said that there was no information provided on an application for insurance concerning prior hospitalization even though the form asked for a listing of such hospitalization, we believe that the theory of the Best Evidence Rule requires that the application (or a duplicate, see Rule 1003) be produced. While there is really no difference anymore between an original and a duplicate, there is a significant difference between oral testimony and either an original or a duplicate, where that testimony concerns the details of a document.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. See, e.g., United States v. Humphrey, 104 F.3d 65 (5th Cir. 1997) (the defendants were charged with operating a loan brokerage service that was "essentially a scam"; at trial, the defendants sought to call their former lawyer to testify that the defendants obtained a judgment awarding them brokerage fees in a certain transaction -- this tended to show that they were operating a legitimate business; there was no error in the exclusion of the lawyer's testimony because the proponents were trying to prove the content of the judgment and the testimony of the lawyer was not the best evidence of the judgment).

(n2)Footnote 2. See, e.g., United States v. Jones, 958 F.2d 520 (2d Cir. 1992) (the defendant asserted that she did not file tax returns because she believed that a taxpayer could not file without paying the taxes due; the government offered a summary of her transactions from an earlier year, indicating she had filed in that year without paying; the original of her previous return was not required, because the summary was introduced to demonstrate conduct inconsistent with her stated belief, not to prove the content of the return); R & R Assoc. v. Visual Scene, Inc., 726 F.2d 36, 38 (1st Cir. 1984) ("Rule 1002 applies not when a piece of evidence sought to be introduced has been somewhere recorded in writing but when it is that written record itself that the party seeks to prove.").

(n3)Footnote 3. See, e.g., United States v. Hernandez-Fundora, 58 F.3d 802 (2d Cir. 1995) (jurisdictional component of assault crime -- that Raybrook penitentiary was within the special territorial jurisdiction of the United States -- was properly proved through the testimony of a witness who saw the deed establishing federal status; Rule 1002 did not require that the deed be placed in evidence, because it was the fact of federal status that was relevant, not the terms of the deed establishing that status); United States v. Sliker, 751 F.2d 477 (2d Cir. 1984) (the government could prove that a bank was federally insured through testimony, without producing a writing documenting the insurance; the fact to be proved was the existence of insurance, not the contents of the writing).

(n4)Footnote 4. See e.g., Jackson v. Crews, 873 F.2d 1105 (8th Cir. 1989) (Best Evidence Rule did not prevent a plaintiff from questioning a witness concerning a flyer that solicited potential witnesses to come forward; the purpose of the questions was to prove how the witness learned of the case rather than the contents of the flyer).

(n5)Footnote 5. See, e.g., People of Territory of Guam v. Ojeda, 758 F.2d 403 (9th Cir. 1985) (photographs of stolen jewelry were properly admitted in a burglary case); United States v. Alexander, 415 F.2d 1352 (7th Cir. 1969) (Best Evidence Rule does not prevent the introduction of a photograph of stolen mail, because the photograph was offered to show the quantity of mail and not to prove the contents of a writing).

(n6)Footnote 6. See, e.g., United States v. Levine, 546 F.2d 658 (5th Cir. 1977) (in an obscenity prosecution, "[t]he contents of the film are what is sought to be proved. Thus, the best evidence standard embodied in Rule 1002 applies to the introduction of the film.").

(n7)Footnote 7. See, e.g., United States v. Stockton, 968 F.2d 715 (8th Cir. 1992) (photographs of miscellaneous papers found in a laboratory in which illegal drugs were made; the Best Evidence Rule applied where the photos were introduced to prove the contents of the writings that were photographed).

(n8)Footnote 8. See, e.g., United States v. Ortiz, 966 F.2d 707 (1st Cir. 1992) (no error in relying on testimony as to what one defendant said in a recorded conversation even though the statements did not appear on the tape recording; there is no requirement that the government rely on a tape recording to prove a conversation); United States v. Howard, 953 F.2d 610 (11th Cir. 1992) (no error in permitting a DEA agent to testify to recorded statements he overheard even though the recording was only partially audible; the testimony was offered not to prove the content of the tapes, but rather the content of the conversations, therefore the Best Evidence Rule did not apply).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1002 RULE 1002

5-1002 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1002.03

1002.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Admissible Testimony

R & R Assocs. v. Visual Scene, Inc., 726 F.2d 36 (1st Cir. 1984) : The Court sustained a breach of contract judgment for a distributor of sunglasses, holding that its president was properly permitted to testify regarding the cost of procuring from the defendant the defective sunglasses. The president did not seek to prove the contents of a document, so the Rule did not require the production of any document, even though one might have supported the testimony.

United States v. Hernandez-Fundora, 58 F.3d 802 (2d Cir. 1995) : The defendant, who beat up a fellow inmate at Raybrook penitentiary, was convicted of assault committed within the special territorial jurisdiction of the United States. The Court held that the jurisdictional component was properly proved through the testimony of a witness who saw the deed establishing Raybrook's federal status. Rule 1002 did not require that the deed be placed in evidence, since it was the fact of federal status that was relevant, not the terms of the deed establishing that status. Affirming convictions arising out of a scheme to defraud a bank by cashing fraudulent checks in United States v. Sliker, n1 the Court held that the government could prove that the bank was federally insured through testimony, without producing a writing documenting the insurance. The fact to be proved was the existence of insurance, not the contents of the writing.

Jackson v. Crews, 873 F.2d 1105 (8th Cir. 1989) : The Court held that the Best Evidence Rule did not prevent a plaintiff from questioning a witness concerning a flyer that solicited potential witnesses to come forward, since the purpose of the questions was to prove how the witness learned of the case rather than the contents of the flyer.

[2] Inadmissible or Properly Excluded Evidence

[a] Documents

Dugan v. R.J. Corman R.R. Co., 344 F.3d 662 (7th Cir. 2003) : In an action for contributions by a pension plan against an employer, the Judge, who conducted the trial by agreement of the parties on a stipulated paper record, struck an affidavit in which the plaintiff quoted from a "Trust Agreement," because the agreement itself was never made a part of the record. Affirming in part a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court found no error in striking the affidavit, since the quotation in it was not the best evidence of the agreement, and thus it was unreliable.

[b] Inadmissible or Properly Excluded Evidence -- Testimony

Conway v. Consolidated Rail Corp., 720 F.2d 221 (1st Cir. 1983) : In a FELA case, the Court held that a conductor's testimony that he did not have any authority to stop a passenger with a footlocker from boarding a train was properly excluded, since it was not the best evidence of the railroad's written rules and regulations.

Time Share Vacation Club v. Atlantic Resorts, 735 F.2d 61 (3d Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed a dismissal of a breach of contract action for lack of in personam jurisdiction. It observed that the plaintiff bears the burden of demonstrating sufficient contacts once the defendant raises a jurisdictional defense and concluded that the plaintiff must produce a copy of the entire contract or proffer an explanation for its absence where it relies wholly upon the contract to establish the contacts.

United States v. Humphrey, 104 F.3d 65 (5th Cir. 1997) : The defendants, charged with operating a loan brokerage service that was "essentially a scam," sought to call their former lawyer to testify that the defendants obtained a judgment awarding them brokerage fees in a certain transaction, as that tended to show they were operating a legitimate business. Affirming fraud convictions, the Court found no error in the exclusion of the lawyer's testimony, since the testimony was not the best evidence of the judgment.

Ridgway v. Ford Dealer Computer Servs., Inc., 114 F.3d 94 (6th Cir. 1997) : Affirming a discharged employee's judgment for severance benefits, the Court noted that had the defendant objected to the plaintiff's oral proof regarding the employment contract and the relevant contract provision, the proof could have been excluded on best evidence grounds.

United States v. Bennett, 363 F.3d 947 (9th Cir. 2004) : In a trial for illegal importation, the government relied chiefly on the testimony of a Customs officer that he found a global positioning system on defendant's boat, which graphed the boat's journey the day of the search from Mexican territorial waters and then north to San Diego Bay. The officer admitted on cross-examination that he had not taken possession of the GPS device itself or obtained any printout record of the data contained in it. The Court found that the officer's testimony concerned the "content" of the GPS to prove the defendant's travels, so the government was required to produce the GPS itself, or a printout of the GPS data, or an excuse for relying on the witness' testimony instead of the GPS or a printout. In Los Angeles News Service v. CBS Broadcasting, Inc., 305 F.3d 924 (9th Cir. 2002) , the plaintiff news organization videotaped the notorious beating of Reginald Denny and obtained copyrights for four segments of its tape. In a copyright infringement action, the plaintiff submitted a declaration by a producer for MTV who stated that he had used a clip from the video in an MTV program, he had obtained the clip from a beta tape in the MTV library, and the tape box identified Group W News Service as the source. Affirming in part summary judgment for the defendants, the Court found that the declaration violated the Best Evidence Rule: "Even assuming that the label's contents were not inadmissible hearsay, LANS was required to produce the original label (or a duplicate, see Fed. R. Evid. 1003) or at least explain why it could not do so. See Fed. R. Evid. 1002, 1004."

[3] Proving the Contents

United States v. Jones, 958 F.2d 520 (2d Cir. 1992) : In a prosecution for failing to file 1984-87 tax returns, the defendant asserted that she did not file because she believed that a taxpayer could not file without paying the taxes due; the government offered a summary of her 1982 transactions indicating she had filed that year without paying. The Court held that the original of her 1982 return was not required, as the summary was being introduced to demonstrate conduct inconsistent with her stated belief, not to prove the contents of her 1982 return.

Railroad Mgmt. Co. v. CFS La. Midstream Co., 428 F.3d 214 (5th Cir. 2005) : The plaintiff sued to recover license payments under an agreement of which it claimed to be the assignee. When asked in discovery to produce the assignment agreement, the plaintiff refused on the ground it contained proprietary information. Instead, it submitted affidavits attesting to the assignment, a four-page excerpt of the agreement, and a retyped redacted version of the agreement. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant because there was insufficient evidence of a contractual relationship between the parties, the Court held that the contents of the agreement, particularly the relevant time period, were at issue, so the Best Evidence Rule applied. There was no abuse of discretion in rejecting the evidence offered by the plaintiff, when it had the original agreement at its disposal. In United States v. Levine, n2 the Court reversed convictions for interstate shipment of obscene films, noting that in an obscenity prosecution "[t]he contents of the film are what is sought to be proved. Thus, the 'best evidence' standard embodied in Rule 1002 applies to the introduction of the film."

United States v. Ziesman, 409 F.3d 941 (8th Cir. 2005) : Affirming convictions for manufacturing methamphetamine and making a false statement to a federal agent, the Court held that three crime lab exhibits were properly admitted. The exhibits were as they had been generated by the lab, except that the name of a second suspect was omitted. The lab analyst testified that the crime lab generated two names rather than just the defendant's by mistake. Although the defendant argued that the alterations disqualified the reports and that originals were required, the Court found that the testimony was sufficient to authenticate the reports and that the reports "had no independent evidentiary significance." On the best evidence point, we suggest that the Court reached the right result for the wrong reason. Clearly, the reports were offered to prove the results of the lab tests and thus to prove their contents. But there was no question as to the genuineness of the duplicate. The originals had the wrong name, as did the duplicate. Thus, the two were identical, and the mistake as to the second name was explained to the jury, so there was no possibility that use of the duplicate was prejudicial.

United States v. Workinger, 90 F.3d 1409 (9th Cir. 1996) : Before he was indicted for tax fraud, the defendant had been interviewed by an attorney representing his former wife. He had affirmed that he would tell the truth and the interview was tape-recorded; subsequently, the attorney's secretary typed a transcription and the tape was erased. Holding there was no error in admitting the transcript, the Court noted that the Best Evidence Rule does not require a recording to prove a recorded conversation, but here the government sought to prove the content of the tape, so the recording itself or a proper excuse would be required. In this case, the original tape had been destroyed in good faith, so the transcript was admissible under Rule 1004(1). One Judge, concurring in the result on this point, applied what is in our view the better analysis: The government was seeking to prove what the defendant said at his deposition, not the content of the tape; therefore, the Best Evidence Rule had no application. Rather, the problem was one of hearsay, and here the attorney testified that the transcript accurately reflected what the defendant said at the deposition. Reversing convictions for cocaine offenses on other grounds in United States v. Mayans, 17 F.3d 1174 (9th Cir. 1994) , the Court noted that it was error to sustain best evidence objections when the defendant attempted to cross-examine codefendant witnesses about their understanding of their plea agreements. Both the terms of the agreements and the witnesses' understanding of those terms were relevant.

[4] Real and Demonstrative Evidence

United States v. Rodriguez, 968 F.2d 130 (2d Cir. 1992) : Affirming convictions for drug offenses, the Court held there was no unfair prejudice to a defendant when witnesses testified that a purse and an identification card in it, which were observed in a search but not seized or introduced into evidence, belonged to her. The fact that a physical object is not available does not require exclusion of relevant oral testimony describing the object if the witness has the requisite personal knowledge.

United States v. Stockton, 968 F.2d 715 (8th Cir. 1992) : In a prosecution for conspiring to manufacture methamphetamine, the government offered photographs of miscellaneous papers seized at a coconspirator's house. Rejecting the government's argument that the Best Evidence Rule does not apply to photographs of demonstrative evidence, the Court held that the contents of the photographs were at issue in this case because a DEA agent testified to the contents of the photographs and specifically read from them. There was no error in admitting the photographs in lieu of the originals, however, because they were "duplicates" admissible under Rule 1003.

People of Terr. of Guam v. Ojeda, 758 F.2d 403 (9th Cir. 1985) : The Court held that pictures of stolen jewelry were properly admitted in a burglary case, since the Best Evidence Rule applies only to writings and recordings, not to other physical evidence.

[5] Tape Recordings

United States v. Holton, 116 F.3d 1536 (D.C. Cir. 1997) : In the course of upholding drug-related convictions, the Court rejected a best-evidence attack on the use of transcripts of tape-recorded conversations, since the original recording was before the jury and the transcript was only used to assist the jury in understanding the original.

United States v. Ortiz, 966 F.2d 707 (1st Cir. 1992) : Affirming convictions for aiding and abetting drug trafficking, the Court held there was no error in relying on testimony as to what one defendant said in a recorded conversation even though the statements did not appear on the tape recording. It noted that there is no requirement that the government rely on a tape recording to prove a conversation.

United States v. Fagan, 821 F.2d 1002 (5th Cir. 1987) : The Court held that the Best Evidence Rule was not violated when testimony was admitted concerning a conversation even though a tape was available, since the testimony was offered to prove the content of the conversation, not the content of the tape.

United States v. Martin, 920 F.2d 393 (6th Cir. 1990) : Affirming a conviction for distributing cocaine, the Court held that the Rule did not apply to a tape recording used not to prove its content but to corroborate a conversation the government claimed to have occurred. Thus, there was no error in permitting an informant to be asked about some of his statements heard on the tape.

United States v. Rose, 590 F.2d 232 (7th Cir. 1978) : Affirming convictions for transportation of stolen goods, the Court rejected arguments that testimony about a tape-recorded telephone conversation violated the Best Evidence Rule. It observed that "the government sought to prove the contents of a conversation, not the contents of a tape recording."

United States v. Workinger, 90 F.3d 1409 (9th Cir. 1996) : Before he was indicted for tax fraud, the defendant had been interviewed by an attorney representing his former wife. He had affirmed that he would tell the truth and the interview was tape-recorded; subsequently, the attorney's secretary typed a transcription and the tape was erased.

Holding there was no error in admitting the transcript, the Court noted that the Best Evidence Rule does not require a recording to prove a recorded conversation, but here the government sought to prove the content of the tape, so the recording itself or a proper excuse would be required. In this case, the original tape had been destroyed in good faith, so the transcript was admissible under Rule 1004(1). One Judge, concurring in the result on this point, applied what is in our view the better analysis: The government was seeking to prove what the defendant said at his deposition, not the content of the tape; therefore, the Best Evidence Rule had no application. Rather, the problem was one of hearsay, and here the attorney testified that the transcript accurately reflected what the defendant said at the deposition. In United States v. Gonzales-Benitez, n3 the parties appeared to misunderstand the meaning of offering a recording to prove its contents, but the Court properly noted that under the Rule the government was not bound to introduce tape recordings of conversations between the defendants and informers. The government had an option of introducing the tapes or offering the testimony of witnesses who heard the conversations.

United States v. Howard, 953 F.2d 610 (11th Cir. 1992) (per curiam): Affirming a conviction for possession of marijuana, the Court held there was no error in permitting a DEA agent to testify to recorded statements he overheard even though the recording was only partially audible. Since the proffered testimony was offered not to prove the content of the tapes, but rather the content of the conversations, the Rule did not apply.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. United States v. Sliker, 751 F.2d 477 (2d Cir. 1984) .

(n2)Footnote 2. United States v. Levine, 546 F.2d 658 (5th Cir. 1977) .

(n3)Footnote 3. United States v. Gonzales-Benitez, 537 F.2d 1051 (9th Cir. 1976) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1002 RULE 1002

5-1002 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1002.04

1002.04 Legislative History

Advisory Committee's Note

The rule is the familiar one requiring production of the original of a document to prove its contents, expanded to include writings, recordings, and photographs, as defined in Rule 1001(1) and (2) supra.

Application of the rule requires a resolution of the question whether contents are sought to be proved. Thus an event may be proved by nondocumentary evidence, even though a written record of it was made. If, however, the event is sought to be proved by the written record, the rule applies. For example, payment may be proved without producing the written receipt which was given. Earnings may be proved without producing books of account in which they are entered. McCormick § 198; 4 Wigmore § 1245. Nor does the rule apply to testimony that books or records have been examined and found not to contain any reference to a designated matter.

The assumption should not be made that the rule will come into operation on every occasion when use is made of a photograph in evidence. On the contrary, the rule will seldom apply to ordinary photographs. In most instances a party wishes to introduce the item and the question raised is the propriety of receiving it in evidence. Cases in which an offer is made of the testimony of a witness as to what he saw in a photograph or motion picture, without producing the same, are most unusual. The usual course is for a witness on the stand to identify the photograph or motion picture as a correct representation of events which he saw or of a scene with which he is familiar. In fact he adopts the picture as his testimony, or, in common parlance, uses the picture to illustrate his testimony. Under these circumstances, no effort is made to prove the contents of the picture, and the rule is inapplicable. Paradis, the Celluloid Witness, 37 U. Colo. L. Rev. 235, 249-51 (1965).

On occasion, however, situations arise in which contents are sought to be proved. Copyright, defamation, and invasion of privacy by photograph or motion picture fall in this category. Similarly as to situations in which the picture is offered as having independent probative value, e.g., automatic photograph of bank robber. See People v. Doggett, 83 Cal. App. 2d 405, 188 P.2d 792 (1948) , photograph of defendants engaged in indecent act; Mouser and Philbin, Photographic Evidence: Is There a Recognized Basis for Admissibility? 8 Hastings L.J. 310 (1957). The most commonly encountered of this latter group is of course, the X-ray, with substantial authority calling for production of the original. Daniels v. Iowa City, 191 Iowa 811, 183 N.W. 415 (1921) ; Cellamare v. Third Ave. Transit Corp., 273

App. Div. 260, 77 N.Y.S.2d 91 (1948) ; Patrick & Tilman v. Matkin, 154 Okla. 232, 7 P.2d 414 (1932) ; Mendoza v. Rivera, 78 P.R.R. 569 (1955) .

It should be noted, however, that Rule 703, supra , allows an expert to give an opinion based on matters not in evidence, and the present rule must be read as being limited accordingly in its application. Hospital records which may be admitted as business records under Rule 803(6) commonly contain reports interpreting X-rays by the staff radiologist, who qualifies as an expert, and these reports need not be excluded from the records by the instant rule.

The reference to acts of Congress is made in view of such statutory provisions as 26 U.S.C. § 7513, photographic reproductions of tax returns and documents, made by authority of the secretary of the treasury, treated as originals, and 44 U.S.C. § 399(a), photographic copies in National Archives treated as originals.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
Supp. To CHAPTER 1002 RULE 1002

5-1002 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 1002, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 1002. Requirement of Original	Rule 1002. Requirement of the Original
To prove the content of a writing, recording,	An original writing, recording, or pho-or photograph, the original writing, recording, or photograph is required, except as otherwise provided in these rules or by Act of Congress.

to-graph is required in order to prove its content unless these rules or a federal statute provides otherwise.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 1002 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
Supp. To CHAPTER 1002 RULE 1002

5-1002 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 1002.03

Supp. to § 1002.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[1] Admissible Testimony [Go To Main]

Waterloo Furniture Components, Ltd. v. Haworth, Inc., 467 F.3d 641 (7th Cir. 2006) : The plaintiff and the defendant had a patent licensing agreement under which the plaintiff was entitled to receive the benefit of the most favorable royalty terms the defendant gave any licensee. The plaintiff sued for breach of contract after the defendant resolved a patent dispute with another company, SoftView. In support of its motion for summary judgment, the defendant presented an affidavit from its employee responsible for negotiating the agreement with SoftView. The plaintiff argued that the statement in the affidavit that the defendant "has never licensed the '798 patent to SoftView" violated the Best Evidence Rule and that the defendant should have to produce the original or a copy of the Haworth-SoftView agreement as the best evidence of the affiant's assertions. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant, the Court found no abuse of discretion in considering the affidavit, as the Best Evidence Rule does not apply unless a witness is testifying about the contents of a document. Here, the affiant was testifying as to his personal knowledge of the negotiations and not as to the contents of the settlement agreement.

[3] Proving the Contents [Go To Main]

United States v. Smith, 566 F.3d 410 (4th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions for firearms offenses and drug trafficking, finding no error when an ATF agent was permitted to testify as an expert to the place of manufacture of four firearms seized from the defendant's apartment. The agent consulted various references including one reference book and an ATF database in arriving at his opinion. The defendant objected that the testimony violated the best evidence rule, but the Court held that the agent was not attempting to prove the contents of any book or record. Instead, the agent was relying on materials reasonably relied upon by experts to form an opinion.

[4] Real and Demonstrative Evidence [Go To Main]

United States v. Buchanan, 604 F.3d 517 (8th Cir. 2010) : In a drug distribution prosecution, the government introduced evidence that a key bearing the number "2010" was found on the defendant's person during execution of a search warrant and that the key matched a large safe bearing the same number at an alleged "stash house." Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence over hearsay and best evidence objections. The numbers on the key and the safe were not hearsay because the were simply identifying marks and were neither assertions that the items matched nor offered to such an assertion. As for the best evidence objection, it was within the Judge's discretion to treat the written numbers as simple marks on a chattel identifying it; there was "little danger that the witness would inaccurately remember the terms of the 'writing'," and the numeric inscription was not critical to the case, since the safe was merely collateral evidence of the crime. In United States v. Blaylock, 535 F.3d 922 (8th Cir. 2008) , the defendant, charged with felon firearm possession and other offenses, moved in limine to exclude photographs of items that had been seized during a search of his residence and destroyed after his indictment but before trial. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in denial of the motion, as nothing in the Best Evidence doctrine requires that seized items be introduced; the government may rely on testimony from the officers making the seizure or upon properly authenticated photographs.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1003 RULE 1003

5-1003 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1003.syn

§ 1003.syn Synopsis to Chapter 1003: RULE 1003

1003.01 Official Text

1003.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Presumption of Admissibility for Duplicates

[2] Questions of Genuineness

1003.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Demonstrative Evidence

[2] Foundation for Duplicate

[3] Presumption of Genuineness

[a] Documents

[b] Presumption of Genuineness -- Tape Recordings

[4] Questions of Fairness

[5] Questions of Genuineness

1003.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

[2] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

[3] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1003 RULE 1003

5-1003 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1003.01

1003.01 Official Text

Rule 1003. Admissibility of Duplicates

A duplicate is admissible to the same extent as an original unless (1) a genuine question is raised as to the authenticity of the original or (2) in the circumstances it would be unfair to admit the duplicate in lieu of the original.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1003 RULE 1003

5-1003 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1003.02

1003.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Presumption of Admissibility for Duplicates

Rule 1003 departs from the common law by providing that a duplicate (as defined in Rule 1001(4)) is admissible to the same extent as an original unless a genuine question is raised as to the authenticity of the original or it would be unfair to admit the duplicate under the circumstances of a particular case. In essence, someone opposing the introduction of a duplicate must show some reason why the original should be produced. n1 Duplicates and originals are ordinarily interchangeable. In contrast, the assumption in common-law jurisdictions is that the Best Evidence Rule, adopted for purposes of avoiding fraud and ensuring accuracy, must rest on the opposite premise, i.e., the original must be favored without any special showing.

One of the explanations for Rule 1003 is that Article X as a whole deals with items that differ greatly from the traditional writings covered by the Best Evidence Rule. In addition, copying machines and other familiar devices for reproducing writings and recordings have provided us with new ways of enhancing the accuracy of copies. Article X expands coverage of the Best Evidence Rule to reach all of these devices, but pays tribute to their accuracy by making duplicates presumptively acceptable.

[2] Questions of Genuineness

While the House indicated that it wished the Courts to be "liberal" in permitting questions of genuineness to be raised and thereby to require an original, the Senate expressed no such view. Nor did the Advisory Committee. "Liberal" is a word that signifies different things to different people. We suggest that Judges examine the quality of the duplicate, the possibility that the duplicate does not fully reproduce all aspects of the original, n2 the specificity and sincerity of the challenge, the importance of the evidence to the case, and the burdens of producing the original before determining whether a genuine question is raised as to authenticity. n3 In our view, the Trial Judge should err on the side of admitting the duplicate, leaving it to the jury to consider the possibility that the original might not be genuine or that the duplicate might be inaccurate or incomplete. n4

Of course, if the original itself would be inadmissible under other rules of evidence (e.g., hearsay), then the duplicate must be inadmissible as well.

An additional factor that Trial Judges may wish to consider in deciding whether a genuine question as to authenticity is raised or whether admission of a duplicate would be unfair is the opportunity for discovery before trial. Civil and criminal cases may receive different treatment because of the broader opportunities for pretrial examination of evidence in civil cases and the concomitant expectation that a stronger showing can be made in a civil case as to why a duplicate should not be admitted.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. See, e.g., Pahl v. Commissioner, 150 F.3d 1124 (9th Cir. 1998) (no error in admitting the duplicate of an amendment to the articles of incorporation of a law firm; the taxpayer's law partner testified that he saw the taxpayer sign the original document, so there was no genuine question as to the authenticity of the original); United States v. Mulinelli-Navas, 111 F.3d 983 (1st Cir. 1997) (a duplicate of a check was admissible where the defendant "failed to elicit any testimony or make any proffer suggesting that the original had been tampered with or altered in any way and that the copy was not what it purported to be"); United States v. Garmany, 762 F.2d 929 (11th Cir. 1985) (the Court rejected a Best Evidence Rule attack on a photocopy of a check; the defendant failed to explain his objection to the copy, and the Court stated that "[t]he burden of challenging admissibility ... rests with the party against whom it is offered").

(n2)Footnote 2. See, e.g., SEC v. Hughes Capital Corp., 124 F.3d 449 (3d Cir. 1997) (the Trial Judge properly refused to admit photocopies of check stubs offered to prove their contents; the stubs were "altered" before they were copied, there was no showing of what was changed as a result of the alteration, and the canceled checks could not be located); Amoco Prod. Co. v. United States, 619 F.2d 1383 (10th Cir. 1980) (a duplicate file copy of a deed was properly excluded under Rule 1003, because the most critical part of the original conformed copy was not completely reproduced in the copy).

(n3)Footnote 3. See, e.g., Tyson v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 958 F.2d 756 (7th Cir. 1992) (the plaintiff did not make the requisite showing that there was a genuine issue of authenticity by merely objecting to the admission of duplicates).

(n4)Footnote 4. See, e.g., United States v. Westmoreland, 312 F.3d 302 (7th Cir. 2002) (copies of tapes were properly admitted as duplicates under Rule 1003; the defendant had the opportunity to have the tapes tested and provided no reason to believe the tapes were not authentic); United States v. Stockton, 968 F.2d 715 (8th Cir. 1992) (a photograph offered to prove the contents of writings did not violate Best Evidence Rule; the photograph was a duplicate, and there was no genuine challenge to the authenticity of the documents); United States v. Smith, 893 F.2d 1573 (9th Cir. 1990) (a photocopy of a calendar/drug ledger was properly admitted, even though the handwriting on the ledger was not positively identified by an expert; the handwriting was identified by three witnesses who knew the purported author's handwriting and other witnesses provided circumstantial evidence supporting the authenticity of the document).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1003 RULE 1003

5-1003 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1003.03

1003.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Demonstrative Evidence

United States v. Stockton, 968 F.2d 715 (8th Cir. 1992) : In a prosecution for conspiring to manufacture methamphetamine, the government offered photographs of miscellaneous papers seized at a coconspirator's house. Rejecting the government's argument that the Best Evidence Rule does not apply to photographs of demonstrative evidence, the Court held that the contents of the photographs were at issue in this case because a DEA agent testified to the contents of the photographs and specifically read from them. There was no error in admitting the photographs in lieu of the originals, however, because they were "duplicates" admissible under the Rule.

[2] Foundation for Duplicate

United States v. Carroll, 860 F.2d 500 (1st Cir. 1988) : Affirming a defendant's Hobbs Act convictions, the Court held that a print made from a microfilm copy of a check was a duplicate and was not barred by either exception in Rule 1003.

United States v. Savarese, 404 F.3d 651 (2d Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed convictions for conspiring to rob a credit union, holding that copies of digital recordings of conversations between the conspirators were properly admitted, since "electronic re-recordings" are "duplicates," which are admissible to the same extent as originals unless there is a genuine issue of authenticity or admission would be unfair. In this case the government's testimonial evidence was sufficient to establish authenticity. In United States v. Chang An-Lo, n1 the Court upheld racketeering convictions, finding that duplicate telephone logs were properly admitted where a hotel manager identified the logs as records kept in the ordinary business of the hotel. Although he had not compared the duplicate with the original, he did recognize the names and signatures of the hotel operators and the handwriting and format of the logs. Moreover, the American Consulate in Brazil affixed a certification under seal stating that the duplicate was a true and faithful copy of the original.

Pahl v. Commissioner, 150 F.3d 1124 (9th Cir. 1998) : Affirming a determination of the Tax Court, the Court upheld the admission of a duplicate of an amendment to the articles of incorporation for a law firm, which bore the taxpayer's signature. The Tax Court did not err in crediting the testimony of the taxpayer's law partner that he saw the taxpayer sign the original document. Thus, there was no genuine question as to the authenticity of the original. In United States v. Childs, 5 F.3d 1328 (9th Cir. 1993) , the Court affirmed convictions for interstate transportation of stolen motor vehicles, holding there was no error in admitting copies of several types of documentation kept by auto dealers (e.g., certificates of title, purchase orders, and odometer statements) even though copies were also recorded and filed as public records. When the proponent is trying to establish the content of the original document, it is not necessary to follow Rule 1005; rather, it is more appropriate to admit a copy of the document under Rule 1003, the general provision addressing the admission of duplicates. In this case, there was no genuine question as to the authenticity of the original, nor was it unfair to admit the duplicate in lieu of the original. In United States v. Skillman, n2 the Court affirmed a conviction for burning a cross outside the house of an African-American family, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting a photocopy of a target as probative of the defendant's racial animus. There was no genuine issue of authenticity raised; because extraneous handwriting was entirely incomprehensible, there was no persuasive argument of unfairness; and there was no evidence that the original had been lost in bad faith.

[3] Presumption of Genuineness

[a] Documents

United States v. Mulinelli-Navas, 111 F.3d 983 (1st Cir. 1997) : The Court held in a bank fraud prosecution that there was no abuse of discretion in admitting a microform copy of a check, since the defendant, despite objecting to the document's "authenticity," made no proffer suggesting that the original had been tampered with or altered or that the copy was not what it purported to be, and the prosecution had sufficiently authenticated the evidence.

United States v. Angle, 230 F.3d 113 (4th Cir. 2000) , aff"d in pertinent part, vacated and remanded on other grounds, 254 F.3d 514 (en banc): In preparing marked money for use in a sting operation during the investigation of a drug conspiracy, a detective made a photocopy of the marked money before she turned the money over to an undercover officer; she wrote the date on the photocopy. A fax and an extra photocopy of the dated photocopy provided by the detective were used to compare the serial numbers of the money recovered in the sting operation, and a photocopy was made of the seized money. The seized money was not offered at trial because it had been returned in the normal course for use in other operations. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the photocopies, since no question was raised concerning their authenticity or accuracy. In United States v. Moore, n3 a prosecution for armed robbery of a savings and loan, the Court held that the Trial Judge properly admitted photocopies of both sides of a piece of paper found in the wallet of one of the alleged participants in the robbery. The original had been returned to the participant; he testified and identified the photocopies. See also FDIC v. Rodenberg n4(copies of the defendant's guarantee and promissory note were properly considered as evidence on a motion for summary judgment, even though portions had been deleted when they were duplicated, as no genuine issue appeared to be raised concerning the deleted portions).

In re Bobby Boggs, Inc., 819 F.2d 574 (5th Cir. 1987) : The Court observed in a bankruptcy dispute over entitlement to a subcontractor's funds that no genuine question was raised as to the accuracy of duplicate copies of bonds. In United States v. Hausmann, n5 a prosecution for making false statements to a federal agency, the Court held that duplicates of receipts submitted by the defendant to the Small Business Administration were properly admitted where no issue as to their authenticity was raised.

Tyson v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 958 F.2d 756 (7th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the employer in an employment discrimination action, holding that the plaintiff had not made the requisite showing that there was a genuine issue of authenticity by merely objecting to admission of duplicates. In United States v. Leight, n6 the Court affirmed a mother's conviction for murdering her infant son, finding no error in admission of diagnostic copies of an X-ray. The government had destroyed the original film in an effort to erase some grease-pencil marks. Without deciding whether the copies were originals or duplicates, the Court held that the defendant did not raise a genuine question concerning the copies by speculating that there might be some difference between them and the original. In CTS Corp. v. Pikher Int'l Corp., n7 a patent infringement case, the Court emphasized that carbon copies and other reproductions can be admitted under the "misnamed" Best Evidence Rule as long as there is no reason to suspect the authenticity of the copy.

United States v. Smith, 893 F.2d 1573 (9th Cir. 1990) : The Court held that a photocopy of a calendar/drug ledger was properly admitted in the trial of a drug conspiracy, where there was no genuine issue as to the authenticity of the original. In United States v. Morgan, n8 the Court held that unless something is offered for the record to suggest that a genuine question is raised as to the authenticity of an original or as to the fairness of admitting a duplicate, Rule 1003 makes the duplicate, here a photocopy, presumptively admissible.

United States v. Garmany, 762 F.2d 929 (11th Cir. 1985) : Affirming drug convictions, the Court rejected an attack on a photocopy of a check. The defendant failed to explain his objection to the copy, and the Court observed that "[t]he burden of challenging admissibility ... rests with the party against whom it is offered."

[b] Presumption of Genuineness -- Tape Recordings

United States v. Balzano, 687 F.2d 6 (1st Cir. 1982) : Affirming convictions for sale of "slugs," the Court found there was no error in permitting the government to play for the jury a copy of a tape, where the original was erased in the process of making the copy, the Judge heard extensive evidence concerning the mechanics of making both the tape and the copy, and there was no challenge to the authenticity of the original.

United States v. Stephenson, 887 F.2d 57 (5th Cir. 1989) : Affirming drug convictions, the Court held that duplicate tape recordings were properly admitted after being authenticated by testimony that they were accurate representations of the recorded conversations.

United States v. Westmoreland, 312 F.3d 302 (7th Cir. 2002) : Affirming convictions related to a murder for hire, the Court held that four tapes of incriminating conversations between the defendant and a coconspirator involving a plot to murder the coconspirator's wife were properly admitted. It concluded that the "first generation copies" were admissible as duplicates under Rule 1003. The defendant had the opportunity to have the tapes tested and pointed to no reason to believe that they were not authentic. In United States v. Carrasco, n9 the Court held that the government adequately established that duplicate tapes were true and accurate with the testimony of a knowledgeable witness.

United States v. DiMatteo, 716 F.2d 1361 (11th Cir. 1983) , vacated on other grounds, 469 U.S. 1101 (1985) : In a prosecution for conspiracy to import marijuana, the Court held that the government was properly permitted to introduce copies of recorded telephone calls. Since the witness who tape-recorded the calls testified that the duplicates were exact recordings of what was on the original tapes, the government established that they were duplicates that were admissible unless a defendant raised a genuine question about their authenticity, and none was raised in this case.

[4] Questions of Fairness

United States v. Sinclair, 74 F.3d 753 (7th Cir. 1996) : The Court held, in the prosecution of a financial institution officer for taking kickbacks, that there was no abuse of discretion in admitting copies of expense account reports that did not reproduce the reverse side of the originals. Only three of the eight originals had any entries on the reverse side, and the entries lacked detail and were insignificant compared to the expenses claimed in the reports as a whole, so reproductions of the reverse would not have been useful to the defense.

[5] Questions of Genuineness

Ruberto v. Commissioner, 774 F.2d 61 (2d Cir. 1985) : Although the Court reversed a Tax Court judgment that taxpayers were liable for deficiencies, it upheld the Trial Judge's ruling that photocopies of canceled checks that the taxpayers claimed had been written to a church were inadmissible in light of problems in matching copies of the back of the checks with copies of the fronts. The taxpayers should have been given an opportunity to obtain and submit the originals.

SEC v. Hughes Capital Corp., 124 F.3d 449 (3d Cir. 1997) : Affirming summary judgment for the SEC in an action against alleged participants in a stock fraud scheme, the Court found no error in the refusal to admit photocopies of check stubs that purported to establish the distribution of the proceeds of the securities fraud. The stubs were "altered" before they were copied, there was no showing of what was changed as a result of the alteration, and the canceled checks could not be located. Under these circumstances, the copies were properly excluded as untrustworthy.

United States v. Bolton, 977 F.2d 1196 (7th Cir. 1992) : To prove that a health inspector charged with extortion and RICO offenses had visited certain establishments on given days, the government offered copies of inspection reports signed by the defendant. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the copies, even though the middle third of each report was missing. The government satisfactorily explained that the forms were too long to fit in the agency's copier, so it was standard practice to fold the reports so that the middle, which contained checkoffs repeated in the inspector's written description at the bottom, was not reproduced; the defendant did not even suggest he filled out the middle and bottom sections of his reports differently.

United States v. Ziesman, 409 F.3d 941 (8th Cir. 2005) : Affirming convictions for manufacturing methamphetamine and making a false statement to a federal agent, the Court held that three crime lab exhibits were properly admitted. The exhibits were as they had been generated by the lab, except that the name of a second suspect was omitted. The lab analyst testified that the crime lab generated two names rather than just the defendant's by mistake. Although the defendant argued that the alterations disqualified the reports and that originals were required, the Court found that the testimony was sufficient to authenticate the reports and that the reports "had no independent evidentiary significance." On the best evidence point, we suggest that the Court reached the right result for the wrong reason. Clearly, the reports were offered to prove the results of the lab tests and thus to prove their contents. But there was no question as to the genuineness of the duplicate. The originals had the wrong name, as did the duplicate. Thus, the two were identical, and the mistake as to the second name was explained to the jury, so there was no possibility that use of the duplicate was prejudicial.

United States v. Haddock, 956 F.2d 1534 (10th Cir. 1992) : In a bank fraud prosecution, the Court held there was no error in excluding photocopies of six documents offered by the defendant, as only the defendant could recall ever seeing either the original or a copy of these documents, persons who allegedly typed or received the documents were not familiar with their contents, and witnesses testified the documents bore markings and included statements that did not comport with similar documents prepared by the purported sources in the ordinary course of business. In Amoco Prod. Co. v. United States, n10 the Court approved exclusion of a duplicate file copy of a deed under Rule 1003, because the most critical part of the original conformed copy was not completely reproduced in the duplicate.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. United States v. Chang An-Lo, 851 F.2d 547 (2d Cir. 1988) .

(n2)Footnote 2. United States v. Skillman, 922 F.2d 1370 (9th Cir. 1990) .

(n3)Footnote 3. United States v. Moore, 710 F.2d 157 (4th Cir. 1983) .

(n4)Footnote 4. FDIC v. Rodenberg, 571 F. Supp. 455 (D. Md. 1983) .

(n5)Footnote 5. United States v. Hausmann, 711 F.2d 615 (5th Cir. 1983) .

(n6)Footnote 6. United States v. Leight, 818 F.2d 1297 (7th Cir. 1987) .

(n7)Footnote 7. CTS Corp. v. Pikher Int'l Corp., 527 F.2d 95 (7th Cir. 1975) .

(n8)Footnote 8. United States v. Morgan, 555 F.2d 238 (9th Cir. 1977) .

(n9)Footnote 9. United States v. Carrasco, 887 F.2d 794 (7th Cir. 1989) .

(n10)Footnote 10. Amoco Prod. Co. v. United States, 619 F.2d 1383 (10th Cir. 1980) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1003 RULE 1003

5-1003 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1003.04

1003.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Advisory Committee's Note

When the only concern is with getting the words or other contents before the court with accuracy and precision, then a counterpart serves equally as well as the original, if the counterpart is the product of a method which insures accuracy and genuineness. By definition in Rule 1001(4), supra, a "duplicate" possesses this character.

Therefore, if no genuine issue exists as to authenticity and no other reason exists for requiring the original, a duplicate is admissible under the rule. This position finds support in the decisions, Myrick v. United States, 332 F.2d 279 (5th Cir. 1964) , no error in admitting photostatic copies of checks instead of original microfilm in absence of suggestion to trial judge that photostats were incorrect; Johns v. United States, 323 F.2d 421 (5th Cir. 1963) , not error to admit concededly accurate tape recording made from original wire recording; Sauget v. Johnston, 315 F.2d 816 (9th Cir. 1963) , not error to admit copy of agreement when opponent had original and did not on appeal claim any discrepancy. Other reasons for requiring the original may be present when only a part of the original is reproduced and the remainder is needed for cross-examination or may disclose matters qualifying the part offered or otherwise useful to the opposing party. United States v. Alexander, 326 F.2d 736 (4th Cir. 1964) . And see Toho Bussan Kaisha, Ltd. v. American President Lines, Ltd., 265 F.2d 418, 76 A.L.R.2d 1344 (2d Cir. 1959) .

[2] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

With respect to clause (1), the Subcommittee intends that the courts should be liberal in deciding "a genuine question is raised as to the authenticity of the original."

[3] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

The Committee approved this Rule in the form submitted by the Court, with the expectation that the courts would be liberal in deciding that a "genuine question is raised as to the authenticity of the original."

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
Supp. To CHAPTER 1003 RULE 1003

5-1003 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 1003, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 1003. Admissibility of Duplicates	Rule 1003. Admissibility of Duplicates
A duplicate is admissible to the same ex-	A duplicate is admissible to the same extent as an original unless (1) a genuine question is raised as to the authenticity of the original or (2) in the circumstances it would be unfair to admit the duplicate in lieu of the original tent as the original unless a genuine question is raised about the original's authenticity or the circumstances make it unfair to admit the duplicate.

al.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 1003 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
Supp. To CHAPTER 1003 RULE 1003

5-1003 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 1003.03

Supp. to § 1003.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[2] Foundation for Duplicate [Go To Main]

United States v. Rosado-Perez, 605 F.3d 48 (1st Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed convictions for conspiring to distribute drugs, and held that the government did not violate the best evidence rule by playing for the jury digital copies of video recordings made on tape, where a government witness testified that he had seen the original recordings and the digital copies were identical.

[3] Presumption of Genuineness [Go To Main]

[a] Documents

United States v. Hampton, 464 F.3d 687 (7th Cir. 2006) : In a bank robbery trial, the prosecution proved the banks' federally insured status by introducing photocopies purporting to be insurance certificates, with an employee of each bank, typically a teller, testifying that an identical photocopy hanging on the wall of the witness' bank was a true copy of the bank's certificate. The Court held that the photocopies were not properly admitted under Rule 902(1), because the copies were copies of sealed documents rather than sealed documents themselves. They were also not admissible under Rule 1005, because there was no indication that the certificates on the walls of the banks to which the copies were compared were themselves originals. Nonetheless, the Court held the copies admissible, and affirmed the convictions, on the grounds that the copies were duplicates admissible under Rule 1003 unless there was a genuine question raised about the authenticity of the original and that the testimony of the tellers satisfied the authentication requirement of Rule 901(a): the testimony was "pretty compelling evidence that the copies were not forgeries prepared by or for, or somehow obtained by, the government," so that "[a]s between the parties' rival hypotheses ... the defendant's hypothesis is so improbable that without some evidence to support the hypothesis no reasonable person would accept it."

95 of 176 DOCUMENTS

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1004 RULE 1004

5-1004 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1004.syn

§ 1004.syn Synopsis to Chapter 1004: RULE 1004

1004.01 Official Text

1004.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Original Lost or Destroyed

[2] Original Not Obtainable

[3] Original in Possession of Adversary

[4] Collateral Matters

[5] Degrees of Secondary Evidence

[6] Relationship to Rule 1003

1004.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Secondary Evidence

[2] Rule 1004(1) -- Originals Lost Or Destroyed

[a] Rule 1004(1) -- Failure To Show Good Faith

[b] Rule 1004(1) -- Loss by Destruction

[c] Rule 1004(1) -- Loss by Negligence

[d] Rule 1004(1) -- Loss by Theft

[3] Rule 1004(2) -- Original Not Obtainable

[a] Rule 1004(2) -- Diligent Efforts To Obtain Original

[b] Rule 1004(2) -- Failure To Find

[c] Rule 1004(2) -- Unsuccessful Subpoena

1004.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

[2] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

[3] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1004 RULE 1004

5-1004 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1004.01

1004.01 Official Text

Rule 1004. Admissibility of Other Evidence of Contents

The original is not required, and other evidence of the contents of a writing, recording, or photograph is admissible if --

(1) Originals lost or destroyed. -- All originals are lost or have been destroyed, unless the proponent lost or destroyed them in bad faith; or

(2) Original not obtainable. -- No original can be obtained by any available judicial process or procedure; or

(3) Original in possession of opponent. -- At a time when an original was under the control of the party against whom offered, that party was put on notice, by the pleadings or otherwise, that the contents would be a subject of proof at the hearing, and that party does not produce the original at the hearing; or

(4) Collateral matters. -- The writing, recording, or photograph is not closely related to a controlling issue.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1004 RULE 1004

5-1004 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1004.02

1004.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Original Lost or Destroyed

Rule 1004 recognizes that the Best Evidence Rule is a rule of preference, not necessarily a rule of exclusion. Rule 1004(1) states that one excuse for the failure to produce the original of a writing or recording is its destruction or loss through no wrongdoing on the part of the proponent of the evidence. Under these circumstances, secondary evidence can be used to prove the contents of the document.

A party who loses or destroys a document or writing is not necessarily prohibited from proving the contents of the destroyed document through secondary evidence. n1 Rule 1004(1) provides that secondary evidence is admissible so long as the proponent shows that the loss or destruction was not in bad faith. n2 Good faith (or absence of bad faith) destruction has been broadly construed to include the destruction or reformulation of records in the ordinary course of proper recordkeeping, for example, pursuant to an established document retention policy. n3

Note that the Rule disqualifies secondary evidence only upon a finding of bad faith loss or destruction by the proponent. Secondary evidence is thus permitted if the original was lost or destroyed (even if in bad faith) by a person or entity unaffiliated with the proponent. n4

When an original is lost or destroyed, it still must be authenticated under Article IX. Thus, the Trial Judge must ensure that a reasonable jury could find the existence and execution of the original in the same way it would make such a finding if the original were available. See also Rule 1008. And, of course, while secondary evidence may be permitted in lieu of an original insofar as the Best Evidence Rule is concerned, other rules of evidence (e.g., Rule 403 and the hearsay rule) are still applicable, and may operate to exclude the evidence.

The Rule does not mention where the burden of proof lies on a claim of loss or destruction, but Courts have placed the burden on the proponent and have required a diligent search for the original unless it has clearly been destroyed. n5

There is some dispute among the commentators as to the exact order of proof that should be followed when the original is not available. Some would prefer that proof of the document's existence and execution should precede proof of its loss, while others would prefer that proof of loss should come first. A Federal Trial Judge has wide discretion under Rule 611 to select the appropriate order of proof for any given case.

[2] Original Not Obtainable

If the writing or recording is in the possession of someone who is not a party to the case, and if no original can be obtained by any available judicial process or procedure such as a subpoena duces tecum, secondary evidence can be introduced under paragraph (2) of Rule 1004. Absent some specific statute to the contrary, it appears that a claim of great expense or difficulty is not enough to establish that the original is not obtainable.

Courts have tended to enforce strictly the due diligence requirement inherent in the Rule when it appears that the secondary evidence is suspect. For example, in Cartier v. Jackson, 59 F.3d 1046 (10th Cir. 1995) , Cartier sued the performer Michael Jackson for copyright infringement. She claimed that she had circulated a demo tape of a song, "Dangerous," throughout the music community, and that Michael Jackson had written a virtually identical song of the same name after hearing the tape. However, she could not produce either the demo tape or a copy at trial. She claimed that all her friends had lost their copies, and that the music industry executives to whom she had sent copies of the tape would not speak to her. As secondary evidence, she tried to introduce a recording of her version of "Dangerous" made two years after Jackson had released his song. She termed this recording a "recreation" of the original demo tape, based on her memory of the version she originally distributed.

The Court upheld the Trial Court's ruling that the conditions of Rule 1004 had not been satisfied. Cartier had not made a diligent effort to find the original. She made no attempt to subpoena the record company executives to whom she had sent the demo tape. Her bare contention that the executives would not speak to her was insufficient, as was her contention that record companies regularly destroy the tapes that are sent to them.

If there is any case in which the Best Evidence Rule retains vitality, it is a case like Cartier. The secondary evidence was obviously a suspect recreation of the original demo tape, in light of the fact that Jackson's song had already been released; it is too likely under the circumstances that Cartier's new recording would copy Jackson's song, rather than the other way around. Cartier did not try very hard to find the original. A reasonable inference from this lack of effort is that the original was not similar to Jackson's song, and therefore producing the original for trial would have resulted in the dismissal of her copyright infringement claim. It is this kind of suspicious litigation conduct that the Best Evidence Rule can and should still regulate.

[3] Original in Possession of Adversary

If a writing or recording is in the control of an adverse party, secondary evidence of its contents becomes admissible if that party does not produce the original after reasonable notice to do so. The purpose of notice is to advise the adverse party that the document or recording or writing will be necessary for trial. Notice can come in the pleadings or otherwise. While notice may be either express or implied, counsel should be careful to provide the best possible notice in order to preserve the right to introduce secondary evidence.

[4] Collateral Matters

Paragraph (4) of Rule 1004 provides that secondary evidence can be introduced if a writing, recording, or photograph is not closely related to a controlling issue. Often this is referred to as collateral evidence. Obviously, some leeway is left to the Judge to determine when evidence is so closely related to a controlling issue as to require production of the original.

[5] Degrees of Secondary Evidence

One of the most significant things about this Rule is that it recognizes no degrees of secondary evidence. n6 At one time in most American jurisdictions, if non-production of an original was excused, a certified copy or a satisfactory explanation of non-production of the copy was required before other secondary evidence would be received. According to the Advisory Committee, strict logic might call for extending the principle of preference beyond the original, but development of a proper hierarchy of preferences is too complex. Thus, if secondary evidence is admissible in lieu of the original, the proponent can offer any kind of proof on the point.

Although there are no degrees of secondary evidence when production of the original is excused under Rule 1004, a hierarchy of secondary evidence is established by Rule 1005, which excuses production of the originals of public records. See the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 1005, § 1005.02[1].

[6] Relationship to Rule 1003

Rules 1003 and 1004 provide separate means of overcoming a Best Evidence objection made under Rule 1002. The difference between the Rules is that with Rule 1003, the proponent does not have to show that the original is unavailable; a duplicate is admissible unless there is some reason to suspect the authenticity of the original. In contrast, Rule 1004 requires that the proponent must show that the original is unavailable through no bad faith or lack of diligence of the proponent; but if that showing is made, the substitute evidence need not be a duplicate. Thus, if a document has been destroyed in good faith, a witness could testify to prove the contents of the document under Rule 1004. n7

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. See, e.g., United States v. Balzano, 687 F.2d 6 (1st Cir. 1982) (secondary evidence was held admissible where a tape recording was knowingly erased by the government in order to transfer the tape to a cassette capable of audio replay; there was no bad faith destruction).

(n2)Footnote 2. See, e.g., Malkin v. United States, 243 F.3d 120 (2d Cir. 2001) (no abuse of discretion in admitting IRS computer reports, where there was no evidence that the unavailability of the original documents was anything other than inadvertent and the secondary evidence was shown to be reliable); Estate of Gryder v. Commissioner, 705 F.2d 336 (8th Cir. 1983) (business records were destroyed negligently, but not in bad faith, therefore secondary evidence was permissible under Rule 1004).

(n3)Footnote 3. See, e.g., United States v. Dudley, 941 F.2d 260 (4th Cir. 1991) (the government offered a "GX4" form prepared by a Federal Reserve official that traced the serial numbers of currency found on the defendant, which indicated a circulation date of the currency after the date on which her boyfriend, whom the defendant sought to blame for obtaining the currency, had died; the circulation records on which the GX4 form was based had been destroyed pursuant to the routine policy of the Federal Reserve to destroy old records of currency issuance; the Court found that the routine practice belied any bad faith destruction, and therefore that the form was admissible under Rule 1004).

(n4)Footnote 4. See, e.g., United States v. Carroll, 860 F.2d 500 (1st Cir. 1988) (Rule 1004 allows the government to prove the contents of a writing through secondary evidence because the original was destroyed by an individual who acted against the wishes of the government).

(n5)Footnote 5. See, e.g., United States v. McGaughey, 977 F.2d 1067 (7th Cir. 1992) (affidavits describing IRS procedures requiring destruction of forms after a specified period of time and indicating a futile search for the original sufficiently proved that the taxpayer's original waiver of limitations form had been destroyed in good faith); Seiler v. Lucasfilm, Ltd., 808 F.2d 1316 (9th Cir. 1986) (copyright infringement action by an artist who claimed that the defendant copied his drawings in making a film; the plaintiff had no originals of his drawings, and the Trial Judge found that the plaintiff failed to establish that it was more probable than not that originals of materials assertedly copied by the defendants were destroyed or lost without bad faith; the Judge therefore properly excluded drawings by the plaintiff that purported to reproduce the originals).

(n6)Footnote 6. See, e.g., United States v. Standing Soldier, 538 F.2d 196 (8th Cir. 1996) (oral testimony describing the contents of a destroyed note was permissible; Rule 1004 does not recognize degrees of secondary evidence).

(n7)Footnote 7. See, e.g., Neville v. Cook Paint, 671 F.2d 1107 (8th Cir. 1982) (a buyer was permitted to testify to the contents of a manufacturers' brochure that was destroyed in a fire).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1004 RULE 1004

5-1004 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1004.03

1004.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Secondary Evidence

United States v. McGaughey, 977 F.2d 1067 (7th Cir. 1992) : In a suit on a tax-related debt, the Court held that a detailed description of the procedures involved in processing, which indicated that the taxpayer's settlement offer could not have reached the processing steps it did without a validly executed waiver of limitations, was sufficient secondary evidence of the waiver; it was not necessary that anyone specifically recalled the presence of the waiver on the taxpayer's offer. In United States v. Bolton, 977 F.2d 1196 (7th Cir. 1992) , the government offered copies of inspection reports signed by the defendant to prove that a health inspector charged with extortion and RICO offenses had visited certain establishments on given days. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the copies, even though the middle third of each report was missing. The government satisfactorily explained that the forms were too long to fit in the agency's copier, so it was standard practice to fold the reports so that the middle, which contained checkoffs repeated in the inspector's written description at the bottom, was not reproduced; the defendant did not even suggest he filled out the middle and bottom sections of his reports differently.

United States v. Gerhart, 538 F.2d 807 (8th Cir. 1976) : In a prosecution for knowingly making a material false statement on a loan application, the Court held that it was not necessary to show by clear and convincing evidence the trustworthiness of a photocopy of a check the defendant had altered in support of his loan application. It noted that once a proper excuse under Rule 1004 is given, the proponent may provide evidence of the contents by any properly authenticated secondary evidence.

[2] Rule 1004(1) -- Originals Lost Or Destroyed

[a] Rule 1004(1) -- Failure To Show Good Faith

Wright v. Farmers Co-op, 681 F.2d 549 (8th Cir. 1982) : In an action by owners of a motor home against a co-op for overfilling the motor home's propane tank, the Court observed that it was a close question whether a transcription of a statement by the co-op's employee was properly admitted, where the statement was originally recorded on tape and the only foundation for the written version was testimony by the person who took the statement that often the tapes were discarded after they were transcribed. The Court suggested that "more specific testimony should be adduced concerning the ground upon which a finding that an 'original' was lost or destroyed is to be based," although it declined to find error in the ruling admitting the statement.

Seiler v. Lucasfilm, Ltd., 808 F.2d 1316 (9th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant in a copyright infringement action by an artist who claimed that the defendant copied his drawings in making a film. The plaintiff had no originals of his drawings, and the Trial Judge found that the plaintiff failed to establish that it was more probable than not that originals of materials assertedly copied by defendants were destroyed or lost without bad faith. Thus, the Judge properly excluded drawings by the plaintiff that purported to reproduce the originals.

[b] Rule 1004(1) -- Loss by Destruction

Malkin v. United States, 243 F.3d 120 (2d Cir. 2001) : A taxpayer sued for a refund on the ground that the statute of limitations had run prior to the assessment of a deficiency. The IRS claimed that he had timely consented to extension of the limitations period, but the taxpayer's entire file, which contained the original extension form, had been lost or destroyed before the time of trial. Affirming a judgment for the government, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting IRS computer reports that indicated when items in the file had been entered, since there was no evidence that the unavailability of the original documents was anything other than inadvertent and the secondary evidence was shown to be reliable.

United States v. Dudley, 941 F.2d 260 (4th Cir. 1991) : In a perjury prosecution, the government offered a report, prepared by a Federal Reserve Bank staff assistant based on an exhaustive review of currency records maintained by the Bank, which concluded that certain bills were not in circulation at the relevant time. Although the report was prepared at the direction of a law enforcement officer, the Court held that when a government agency performs mechanical record-keeping and provides a law enforcement officer with a computerized printout of that information, the printout is admissible. The report was based on records destroyed pursuant to a routine policy of destroying outdated records, and there was no ground raised for contesting the accuracy or trustworthiness of the information, so the fact that the report was a summary and derivative in nature did not impose any impediment to its admissibility.

Beggerly v. United States, 114 F.3d 484 (5th Cir. 1997) : Reversing the dismissal of an action to set aside a consent judgment entered in a quiet title suit by the government, the Court found it proper to admit an English translation of a 1781 Spanish land grant in which the Governor-General of Spanish Louisiana conveyed Horn Island to Catarina Boudreau. It was the only copy available after a fire destroyed the archives in which the original would have been stored.

United States v. McGaughey, 977 F.2d 1067 (7th Cir. 1992) : In a suit on a tax-related debt, the Court held that affidavits describing IRS procedures requiring destruction of forms after a specified period of time and indicating a futile search for the original sufficiently proved that the taxpayer's original waiver of limitations form had been destroyed.

Neville Constr. Co. v. Cook Paint & Varnish Co., 671 F.2d 1107 (8th Cir. 1982) : In an action brought by a buyer of insulation against the manufacturer to recover property loss suffered in a fire, the Court found that the buyer was properly permitted to testify concerning the manufacturer's brochure, which was destroyed in the fire.

United States v. Ross, 33 F.3d 1507 (11th Cir. 1994) : The Court affirmed drug importation conspiracy convictions, holding it was not an abuse of discretion to admit transcripts of recordings made in Spain of telephone conversations. The recordings, which the prosecution never possessed, had been destroyed in a routine procedure by the Spanish police, and the transcripts were admissible secondary evidence of the contents.

[c] Rule 1004(1) -- Loss by Negligence

Estate of Gryder v. Commissioner, 705 F.2d 336 (8th Cir. 1983) : The Court held that the Tax Court properly permitted the Commissioner to rely on a transcript of a prior criminal trial to prove the contents of business records that had negligently, but not in bad faith, been destroyed by the IRS following the criminal trial.

Medical Lab. Mgmt. Consultants v. American Broadcasting Cos., 306 F.3d 806 (9th Cir. 2002) : In an action for torts in connection with a broadcast about errors in the reading of Pap smear slides, the plaintiff sought an adverse inference against the defendants because some of the allegedly misread slides were lost while in the defendants' control. The Trial Judge found that the loss was at most a result of negligence and that the plaintiff had the means to challenge the validity of the defendants' conclusion that the slides were abnormal. Affirming a judgment for the defendants, the Court noted that "[w]hen a proponent cannot produce original evidence of a fact because of the inadvertent loss of the evidence, proof by secondary evidence is permissible."

[d] Rule 1004(1) -- Loss by Theft

United States v. Bueno-Risquet, 799 F.2d 804 (2d Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed narcotics convictions, holding that various forms were properly admitted to prove the contents of bags that had been stolen during the trial. It cited Rule 1004(1) as authority for use of the forms to prove the markings on the bags, and noted that the bags were not lost in bad faith.

United States v. Shoels, 685 F.2d 379 (10th Cir. 1982) : In a prosecution for stealing money from a savings and loan association, the Court held there was no error in permitting the government to offer photographs of checks that were stolen from an FBI agent's car. The Court cited Rule 1004, although it might have relied also on Rule 1003 unless there was some real claim made that the photographs were not accurate representations of the checks.

[3] Rule 1004(2) -- Original Not Obtainable

[a] Rule 1004(2) -- Diligent Efforts To Obtain Original

Burt Rigid Box, Inc. v. Travelers Property Cas. Corp., 302 F.3d 83 (2d Cir. 2002) : In an insurance coverage action, the Court concluded that the "diligence" requirement of Rule 1004 was a question for the Judge, to be resolved under Rule 104(a), and not a matter to be determined by the fact finder.

Cartier v. Jackson, 59 F.3d 1046 (10th Cir. 1995) : The plaintiff, suing for infringement of a copyrighted song, alleged that the defendant had had access to a "demo tape" version of her song, but because she no longer had any of the demo tapes, she sought to introduce secondary evidence to prove the contents of the missing cassettes. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the secondary evidence, since even though the plaintiff carefully searched among her possessions and called friends and former colleagues, she had not subpoenaed record companies to which she had sent demo tapes.

[b] Rule 1004(2) -- Failure To Find

United States v. Marcantoni, 590 F.2d 1324 (5th Cir. 1979) : The Court held that a police officer who had seen several $10 bills in the defendant's home, but who could not find them when he returned with a search warrant, could testify as to the serial numbers of the bills, because it was obvious they were not available to the government.

[c] Rule 1004(2) -- Unsuccessful Subpoena

United States v. Taylor, 648 F.2d 565 (9th Cir. 1981) : A key jurisdictional issue in the defendant's wire fraud trial was whether he had signed a letter before or after he telecopied it from San Diego to Houston, where a photocopy of the telecopy was made and delivered to a bank that relied on it in making a loan. Neither the original nor the telecopy was produced at trial, only the photocopy or a more remote reproduction. The Court upheld the admission of the photocopy on the basis of the prosecutor's representation that the original had been subpoenaed unsuccessfully.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1004 RULE 1004

5-1004 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1004.04

1004.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Advisory Committee's Note

Basically the rule requiring the production of the original as proof of contents has developed as a rule of preference: if failure to produce the original is satisfactorily explained, secondary evidence is admissible. The instant rule specifies the circumstances under which production of the original is excused.

The rule recognizes no "degrees" of secondary evidence. While strict logic might call for extending the principle of preference beyond simply preferring the original, the formulation of a hierarchy of preferences and a procedure for making it effective is believed to involve unwarranted complexities. Most, if not all, that would be accomplished by an extended scheme of preferences will, in any event, be achieved through the normal motivation of a party to present the most convincing evidence possible and the arguments and procedures available to his opponent if he does not. Compare McCormick § 207.

Paragraph (1). Loss or destruction of the original, unless due to bad faith of the proponent, is a satisfactory explanation of nonproduction. McCormick § 201.

Paragraph (2). When the original is in the possession of a third person, inability to procure it from him by resort to process or other judicial procedure is a sufficient explanation of nonproduction. Judicial procedure includes subpoena duces tecum as an incident to the taking of a deposition in another jurisdiction. No further showing is required. See McCormick § 202.

Paragraph (3). A party who has an original in his control has no need for the protection of the rule if put on notice that proof of contents will be made. He can ward off secondary evidence by offering the original. The notice procedure here provided is not to be confused with orders to produce or other discovery procedures, as the purpose of the procedure under this rule is to afford the opposite party an opportunity to produce the original, not to compel him to do so. McCormick § 203.

Paragraph (4). While difficult to define with precision, situations arise in which no good purpose is served by production of the original. Examples are the newspaper in an action for the price of publishing defendant's advertisement, Foster-Holcomb Investment Co. v. Little Rock Publishing Co., 151 Ark. 449, 236 S.W. 597 (1922), and the streetcar transfer of plaintiff claiming status as a passenger, Chicago City Ry. v. Carroll, 206 Ill. 318, 68 N.E. 1087 (1903). Numerous cases are collected in McCormick § 200, p. 412, n.1.

[The entire Advisory Committee Note accompanying the gender-neutralizing changes effective October 1, 1987 is as follows: "The amendments are technical. No substantive change is intended."]

[2] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

With respect to subdivision (1), the Subcommittee assumes that loss or destruction of an original by another at the instigation of the proponent would be tantamount to loss or destruction by the proponent himself.

[3] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

The Committee approved Rule 1004(1) in the form submitted to Congress. However, the Committee intends that loss or destruction of an original by another person at the instigation of the proponent should be considered as tantamount to loss or destruction in bad faith by the proponent himself.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
Supp. To CHAPTER 1004 RULE 1004

5-1004 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 1004, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 1004. Admissibility of Other Evidence of Contents	Rule 1004. Admissibility of Other Evidence of Contents
The original is not re-	An original is not required, and other evidence of the contents of a writing, recording, or photograph is admissible if -- quired and other evidence of the content of a writing, recording, or photograph is admissible if:

(1) Originals lost or destroyed. All originals are lost or have been destroyed, unless the pro-

(a) all the originals are lost or destroyed, and not by the proponent acting in bad faith;

			ponent lost or destroyed them in bad faith; or
(2)	Original not obtainable. No original can be obtained by any available judicial process or procedure; or	(b)	an original cannot be obtained by any available judicial process;
(3)	Original in possession of opponent	(c)	the party against whom the orient. At a time when an original was under the control of the party against whom offered, that party was put on notice, by the pleadings or otherwise, that the contents would be a subject of proof at the trial or hearing; and fails to produce the original, the proponent may prove its contents by a copy or by testimony or deposition that correctly reflects the contents.

(2) Original Not Obtainable. No original can be obtained by any available judicial process or procedure.

(3) Original in Possession of Opponent. At a time when an original was under the control of the party against whom offered, that party was put on notice, by the pleadings or otherwise, that the contents would be a subject of proof at the trial or hearing, and that party does not produce the original at the hearing.

(4) Collateral Matters. The writing, recording, or photograph is not closely related to a controlling issue.

(c) Admissibility of Duplicates. A duplicate is admissible to the same extent as the original unless a genuine question is raised about the original's authenticity or the circumstances make it unfair to admit the duplicate.

(d) Admissibility of Other Evidence of Content. An original is not required and other evidence of the content of a writing, recording, or photograph is admissible if:

(1) Originals Lost or Destroyed. All the originals are lost or destroyed, and not by the proponent acting in bad faith;

(2) Original Not Obtainable. No original can be obtained by any available judicial process or procedure;

(3) Original in Possession of Opponent. At a time when an original was under the control of the party against whom offered, that party was put on notice, by the pleadings or otherwise, that the contents would be a subject of proof at the trial or hearing, and that party does not produce the original at the hearing; or

(4) Collateral Matters. The writing, recording, or photograph is not closely related to a controlling issue.

(e) Admissibility of Certified Copies. A certified copy is admissible to the same extent as the original.

(f) Summaries. A party may use a summary, chart, or calculation to prove the content of voluminous writings, recordings, or photographs that cannot be conveniently examined in court. The proponent must make the originals or duplicates available for examination or copying, or both, by other parties at a reasonable time and place. The court may order that they be produced in court.

(g) Testimony or Statement of a Party. In a criminal case, the proponent must prove the content of a statement made by the opposing party. Testimony or a written admission of the party is admissible without accounting for the original.

(h) Functions of the Court and Jury. Ordinarily, the court determines whether the proponent has fulfilled the factual conditions for admitting other evidence of content under (d) or (e). But in a jury trial, the jury determines—in accordance with Rule 104(b)—any issue about whether:

(1) an asserted writing, recording, or photograph ever existed;

(2) another one produced at the trial or hearing is the original; or

(3) other evidence of content accurately reflects the content.

Rule 1005. Copies of Public Records to Prove Content

The proponent may use a copy to prove the content of an official record—or of a document that was recorded or filed in a public office as authorized by law—if these conditions are met: the record or document is otherwise admissible; and the copy is certified as correct in accordance with Rule 902(4) or is testified to be correct by a witness who has compared it with the original. If no such copy can be obtained by reasonable diligence, then the proponent may use other evidence to prove the content.

Rule 1006. Summaries to Prove Content

The proponent may use a summary, chart, or calculation to prove the content of voluminous writings, recordings, or photographs that cannot be conveniently examined in court. The proponent must make the originals or duplicates available for examination or copying, or both, by other parties at a reasonable time and place. The court may order that they be produced in court.

Rule 1007. Testimony or Statement of a Party to Prove Content

In a criminal case, the proponent must prove the content of a statement made by the opposing party. Testimony or a written admission of the party is admissible without accounting for the original.

Rule 1008. Functions of the Court and Jury

Ordinarily, the court determines whether the proponent has fulfilled the factual conditions for admitting other evidence of content under Rule 1004 or 1005. But in a jury trial, the jury determines—in accordance with Rule 104(b)—any issue about whether:

(a) an asserted writing, recording, or photograph ever existed;

(b) another one produced at the trial or hearing is the original; or

(c) other evidence of content accurately reflects the content.

	of proof at the hearing, and that party does not produce the original at the hearing; or		to produce it at the trial or hearing; or
(4)	Collateral matters. The writing, recording, or photograph is not closely related to a controlling issue.	(d)	the writing, recording, or photograph is not closely related to a controlling issue.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 1004 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

101 of 176 DOCUMENTS

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
Supp. To CHAPTER 1004 RULE 1004

5-1004 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to

Supp. to §

[Go To Main]

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1005 RULE 1005

5-1005 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1005.syn

§ 1005.syn Synopsis to Chapter 1005: RULE 1005

1005.01 Official Text

1005.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Purpose and Effect of the Rule

[2] Relationship to Rule 1003

1005.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Comparisons

[2] Unrecorded Documents

1005.04 Legislative History

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1005 RULE 1005

5-1005 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1005.01

1005.01 Official Text

Rule 1005. Public Records

The contents of an official record, or of a document authorized to be recorded or filed and actually recorded or filed, including data compilations in any form, if otherwise admissible, may be proved by copy, certified as correct in accordance with Rule 902 or testified to be correct by a witness who has compared it with the original. If a copy which complies with the foregoing cannot be obtained by the exercise of reasonable diligence, then other evidence of the contents may be given.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1005 RULE 1005

5-1005 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1005.02

1005.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Purpose and Effect of the Rule

The Rule provides different treatment for public records than for most documents. The reason for the difference lies in a concern that removing public documents from their usual place of keeping might be disruptive to both the public and the custodian. The Rule provides that evidence concerning a public record may be proved either by a self-authenticating copy or by testimony of a witness who has compared the copy to the original. If neither method is reasonably possible then other evidence of the contents is permissible. Thus, unlike Rule 1004, this Rule provides for a ranking of secondary evidence.

There is no requirement that the original of a public record be introduced, thereby taking public records out of the otherwise applicable Best Evidence Rule; however, there is a preference for the two specific kinds of proof mentioned above. Of course, the original itself must meet the admissibility requirements of the Rules other than Rule 1002 (see, e.g., Rule 803(8)), or else the copy is excluded as well.

The rationale for the preference for two kinds of alternative evidence is that without it, all kinds of secondary evidence of public records would be offered, some of which would be of questionable accuracy. According to the Advisory Committee, establishment of a preferential ranking of secondary evidence is an appropriate quid pro quo for not requiring the original.

If a certified or compared copy of a record or document covered by Rule 1005 "cannot be obtained by the exercise of reasonable diligence" (which should be an extremely rare occurrence), the Rule provides that "other evidence of the contents may be given." Reasonable diligence will vary much like the search requirement for a lost original under Rule 1004. "Other evidence" signifies that no hierarchy of preferences is created after certified or compared copies.

[2] Relationship to Rule 1003

Rule 1005 is not applicable unless the proponent is offering to prove the contents of the document as a public document. United States v. Childs, 5 F.3d 1328 (9th Cir. 1993) , illustrates this point. Childs was an auto dealer who was tried for possessing stolen vehicles. The government proffered photocopies of documentation kept by various auto dealers in connection with the stolen cars, such as certificates of title, purchase orders and odometer statements. Childs objected that these were "uncertified copies of documents authorized to be recorded and supposedly recorded or filed" with the States of Arizona and Minnesota, and therefore that they did not comply with Rule 1005. But the Court held that Rule 1003 controlled this situation:

> If the proponent is not attempting to establish the content of the public record as such, but rather is trying to prove the content of the original document regardless of whether or not it is a public record, the rationale behind Rule 1005 does not apply. In that situation it is more appropriate to admit a copy of that document under Rule 1003, the general provision addressing the admission of duplicates, rather than under Rule 1005. This reasoning is particularly applicable if the copy was made from an outsider's files, and not from the public record.

The prosecutor in Childs had copied the documents from the files of the auto dealers and was not offering the documents to prove the content of the public record itself, but rather as a means of identifying the stolen cars. Therefore the Court held that the copies were admissible as duplicates under Rule 1003. n1

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. See also Amoco Prod. Co. v. United States, 619 F.2d 1383 (10th Cir. 1980) (Rule 1005 authorizes the admission of recorded deeds, but does not cover an original deed that is not filed and stored in a public office; the Rule does not exclude all evidence other than the public record of the contents of the deed when the very question in controversy is whether the original deed was correctly transcribed onto the recorded version).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1005 RULE 1005

5-1005 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1005.03

1005.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Comparisons

United States v. Rodriguez, 524 F.2d 485 (5th Cir. 1975) : Affirming convictions for marijuana distribution offenses, the Court upheld admission of a photocopy of an automobile certificate of title that tended to tie the defendant to the auto in which the marijuana was found. Citing Rule 1005 as persuasive authority although the Rules were not in effect at the time of trial, the Court indicated that an agent's certificate that he made the photocopy from the original was sufficient for admitting the evidence.

[2] Unrecorded Documents

United States v. Childs, 5 F.3d 1328 (9th Cir. 1993) : This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 1005.02[2].

Amoco Prod. Co. v. United States, 619 F.2d 1383 (10th Cir. 1980) : In a quiet-title action, the Court held that Rule 1005 authorizes the admission of recorded deeds, but does not cover an original deed that is not filed and stored in a public office. The Court also said that it could not interpret the Rule to exclude all evidence other than the public record of the contents of the deed when the very question in controversy is whether the original deed was correctly transcribed onto the recorded version.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1005 RULE 1005

5-1005 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1005.04

1005.04 Legislative History

Advisory Committee's Note

Public records call for somewhat different treatment. Removing them from their usual place of keeping would be attended by serious inconvenience to the public and to the custodian. As a consequence judicial decisions and statutes commonly hold that no explanation need be given for failure to produce the original of a public record. McCormick § 204; 4 Wigmore §§ 1215-1228. This blanket dispensation from producing or accounting for the original would open the door to the introduction of every kind of secondary evidence of contents of public records were it not for the preference given certified or compared copies. Recognition of degrees of secondary evidence in this situation is an appropriate quid pro quo for not applying the requirement of producing the original.

The provisions of 28 U.S.C. § 1733(b) apply only to departments or agencies of the United States. The rule, however, applies to public records generally and is comparable in scope in this respect to Rule 44(a) of the Rules of Civil Procedure.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
Supp. To CHAPTER 1005 RULE 1005

5-1005 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 1005, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 1005. Public Records	Rule 1005. Copies of Public Records to Prove Content
The contents of an official	The proponent may use a record, or of a document authorized to be recorded or filed and actually recorded or filed, including data compilations in any form, if otherwise admissible, may be proved by copy, certified copy to prove the content of an official record -- or of a document that was recorded or filed in a public office as authorized by law -- if these conditions are met: the record or document is d as cor- rect in ac- cord ance with rule 902 or test- ified to be cor- rect by a wit- ness who has com pare d it with the ori- gin- al. If a copy whic h com plies with the fore- go- ing can- not be ob- taine d by the ex- er- cise oth- er- wise ad- miss ible; and the copy is cer- tifie d as cor- rect in ac- cord ance with Rule 902(4) or is test- ified to be cor- rect by a wit- ness who has com pare d it with the ori- gin- al. If no such copy can be ob- taine d by of reasonable diligence, then other evidence of the contents may be given.

reasonable diligence, then the proponent may use other evidence to prove the content.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 1005 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
Supp. To CHAPTER 1005 RULE 1005

5-1005 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 1005.03

Supp. to § 1005.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[.1] Certified or Compared Copy Unavailable [Go To Main]

United States v. Phillips, 543 F.3d 1197 (10th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed convictions for immigration fraud, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of copies of public records without certification or testimony that they had been compared. The Court concluded that the government had sufficiently shown that it had exercised reasonable diligence in its attempts to obtain an original.

[1] Comparisons [Go To Main]

United States v. Hampton, 464 F.3d 687 (7th Cir. 2006) : In a bank robbery trial, the prosecution proved the banks' federally insured status by introducing photocopies purporting to be insurance certificates, with an employee of each bank, typically a teller, testifying that an identical photocopy hanging on the wall of the witness' bank was a true copy of the bank's certificate. The Court held that the photocopies were not properly admitted under Rule 902(1), because the copies were copies of sealed documents rather than sealed documents themselves. They were also not admissible under Rule 1005, because there was no indication that the certificates on the walls of the banks to which the copies were compared were themselves originals. Nonetheless, the Court held the copies admissible, and affirmed the convictions, on the grounds that the copies were duplicates admissible under Rule 1003 unless there was a genuine question raised about the authenticity of the original and that the testimony of the tellers satisfied the authentication requirement of Rule 901(a): the testimony was "pretty compelling evidence that the copies were not forgeries prepared by or for, or somehow obtained by, the government," so that "[a]s between the parties' rival hypotheses ... the defendant's hypothesis is so improbable that without some evidence to support the hypothesis no reasonable person would accept it."

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1006 RULE 1006

5-1006 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1006.syn

§ 1006.syn Synopsis to Chapter 1006: RULE 1006

1006.01 Official Text

1006.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Summary Devices

[2] Foundation for Underlying Information

[3] Relationship to Rule 803(6)

[4] Voluminous and Inconvenient

[5] Summaries of Trial Evidence

1006.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Access to Underlying Data

[2] Computer Records

[3] Examples of Properly Admitted Summaries

[4] Expert Testimony

[5] Foundation Requirement

[6] Inadmissible Underlying Materials

[7] Jury Instructions

[8] Notice

[9] Providing Underlying Materials to Jury

[10] Reasonable Time

[11] Relationship to Rule 611(a)

[12] Summaries of Trial Evidence

[a] Civil Cases

[b] Summaries of Trial Evidence -- Criminal Cases

[i] Drug Cases

[ii] Summaries of Trial Evidence -- Criminal Cases -- Fraud Cases

[iii] Summaries of Trial Evidence -- Criminal Cases -- Miscellaneous Cases

[iv] Summaries of Trial Evidence -- Criminal Cases -- Tax Cases

[13] Summary Judgment

[14] Tape Recordings

[15] Testimony from Prior Proceeding

[16] Transcripts

1006.04 Legislative History

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1006 RULE 1006

5-1006 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1006.01

1006.01 Official Text

Rule 1006. Summaries

The contents of voluminous writings, recordings, or photographs which cannot conveniently be examined in court may be presented in the form of a chart, summary, or calculation. The originals, or duplicates, shall be made available for examination or copying, or both, by other parties at reasonable time and place. The court may order that they be produced in court.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1006 RULE 1006

5-1006 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1006.02

1006.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Summary Devices

Rule 1006 continues the tradition that voluminous writings, recordings, or photographs may be presented in the form of a chart, summary, or calculation when they cannot be examined conveniently in court. It is necessary, however, that the proponent of the summary make available for examination or copying, or both, the original evidence. n1 The purpose of the availability requirement "is to provide the opposing party who desires to attack the authenticity or accuracy of a chart, summary, or calculation, with an opportunity to prepare for cross-examination, or to offer exhibits of its own as rebuttal evidence, which would serve to counteract the impression made on the jury by the proponent's witness." n2 The Judge can order the original information produced in court, and probably will if there is a dispute as to the accuracy of the summary. If the underlying information is not available for inspection, the summary is inadmissible. n3

It should be noted that the provisions of Rule 1006 (most importantly the requirement that the underlying information be made available) are inapplicable when the underlying information has been destroyed other than through the misconduct of the proponent, and the summary is admitted as secondary evidence under the terms of Rule 1004. n4 The summary might well be a helpful elucidation of voluminous evidence, but that is incidental to its admission under Rule 1004.

[2] Foundation for Underlying Information

Before offering a summary under Rule 1006, the proponent will have to lay a proper foundation for the admission of the originals. n5 Once the originals are authenticated, the summary must be authenticated.

If the data or material that is used as the basis for a summary or chart would not be accepted at trial (even to illustrate the basis for the testimony of an expert under Rule 703), the summary or chart itself is not admissible in evidence. n6 For example, in United States v. Pelullo, 964 F.2d 193 (3d Cir. 1992) , a government agent in a RICO prosecution summarized his analysis of the defendant's financial activity. The summary was based in part on interviews with people who engaged in suspect financial transactions with the defendant, and also upon information obtained from bank documents describing wire transfers. The Court held that the summary was inadmissible under Rule 1006, because the underlying materials upon which the summary was based were out-of-court statements that the witness used for their truth in making the conclusions set forth in the summary. The Court stated that "the schedules are inadmissible not because [the witness] merely interviewed people during the course of his investigation, but because the schedules were predicated upon inadmissible evidence. Rule 1006 does not permit such a result." n7 The Pelullo Court noted that "the schedules were not pedagogical devices used to summarize or organize testimony or documents that have been admitted into evidence," in which case Rule 1006 would have been inapplicable and there would have been no need for the underlying information to satisfy independent admissibility requirements.

Ford Motor Co. v. Auto Supply Co., 661 F.2d 1171 (8th Cir. 1981) , is another example of the kind of analysis that a Court should employ under Rule 1006. In a trademark and copyright infringement action, the defendants claimed that the Trial Judge erred in admitting an exhibit containing sales and costs figures relating to the auto parts that were the subject of the suit. The plaintiffs offered the manager of their financial analysis department, who testified that the figures were taken from annual reports on pricing and purchasing. After noting that only summaries of admissible evidence may be used under Rule 1006, the Court of Appeals held that the Trial Judge ruled properly in admitting the summaries, because the year-end reports were admissible as business records. n8

It should be noted that Rule 1006 requires only that the underlying evidence be admissible and made available to the adversary; the underlying evidence need not actually have been admitted at trial. n9 In fact, if the summary is nothing more than an overview of previously admitted evidence, it is not covered by Rule 1006 at all. See the discussion of "Summaries of Trial Evidence" in § 1006.02[5].

[3] Relationship to Rule 803(6)

Under Rule 1006, summaries of business records are admissible, so long as the underlying business records are admissible under Rule 803(6). The criteria of Rule 1006 must also be satisfied: the records must have been made available to opposing counsel in advance of the offer of the summary, and the records must be "voluminous" and not conveniently examinable in Court. n10 It is not a problem if a summary of business records is prepared in anticipation of litigation, so long as the underlying records themselves were prepared in the regular course of business. n11

Rule 803(6) does not require that the summary of the data be kept in the regular course of business. Rather, it is the underlying data that must be so kept. If the underlying data are admissible under the business records exception, a summary of that data can be admitted under Rule 1006 where the contents of the records cannot conveniently be examined in court.

It could well occur that a summary (e.g., a computerized summary or spreadsheet of transactions) is itself a business record. If so, Rule 1006 is inapplicable; there is no need for foundation other than that required by Rule 803(6). n12 For the summary itself to be admissible as a business record, it need not be prepared at or near the time of the events recorded, so long as the underlying information was recorded at or near the time of the events and the summary is prepared in the regular course of business activity as defined by Rule 803(6). n13 Nor is it problematic that the underlying records are not available, so long as the summary itself fits the admissibility requirements of Rule 803(6). This is because the Rule 1006 requirements of availability and voluminousness need not be met if the summary is itself a business record.

[4] Voluminous and Inconvenient

A summary is not admissible under Rule 1006 if the underlying information can be examined conveniently in Court. The Trial Judge has substantial discretion to decide whether the underlying evidence can be presented conveniently in lieu of a summary. The proponent of a summary should not have to show that presentation of the underlying evidence would be impossible or even extremely difficult before a summary can be presented. n14 The convenience standard is based on trial convenience. n15

[5] Summaries of Trial Evidence

Rule 1006 allows admission of summaries in lieu of having the voluminous originals presented at trial. This use of summaries must be distinguished from charts and summaries used only for demonstrative purposes to clarify or amplify argument based on evidence that has already been admitted. n16 For example, a government agent in a tax evasion trial may use a chart to help the jury see how hundreds of business records already admitted as exhibits show that the defendant's tax returns understated his income. Although some Courts have considered such charts and summaries under Rule 1006, the Rule is really not applicable, because pedagogical summaries are not evidence. Rather, they are demonstrative aids governed by Rules 403 and 611. n17 A pedagogical or demonstrative summary may be considered by the factfinder so long as it is consistent with the evidence and not misleading. n18 Where a chart or summary is introduced solely as a pedagogical device, the jury should be instructed that it is not to be considered as evidence but only as an aid in evaluating the evidence. n19 In contrast, no limiting instruction is required or even appropriate if the summary is properly admitted as evidence under Rule 1006. n20

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. See, e.g., Air Safety, Inc. v. Roman Catholic Archbishop of Boston, 94 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1996) (to satisfy the "made available" requirement of Rule 1006, a party seeking to use a summary "must identify its exhibit as such, provide a list or description of the documents supporting the exhibit, and state when and where they may be reviewed").

(n2)Footnote 2. United States v. Bray, 139 F.3d 1104 (6th Cir. 1998) . See also United States v. Jamieson, 427 F.3d 394 (6th Cir. 2005) (under Rule 1006, the proponent has a duty to "state when and where the documents underlying its summaries could be viewed," and "merely making the records available upon request is insufficient"; however, Rule 1006 does not require that the government provide the defendant with a copy of the actual summary or send copies of the relevant documents to the defendant; notice was sufficient because the government served the defendant with its notice of the intent to use summary evidence, and the notice was "reasonably specific in identifying the underlying documents.").

(n3)Footnote 3. See, e.g., Intel Corp. v. Terabyte Int'l, Inc., 6 F.3d 614 (9th Cir. 1993) (in a dispute on attorney's fees, summaries of hours worked were inadequate without providing the adversary an opportunity to see just what was charged and why); Hackett v. Housing Auth., 750 F.2d 1308 (5th Cir. 1985) (a summary should have been excluded where underlying information was not provided to the adversary).

(n4)Footnote 4. See, e.g., United States v. Dudley, 941 F.2d 260 (4th Cir. 1991) (a summary of records that were destroyed in good faith was held admissible under Rule 1004; Rule 1006 was found inapplicable).

(n5)Footnote 5. See, e.g., United States v. Samaniego, 187 F.3d 1222 (10th Cir. 1999) (reversing drug convictions because the government had introduced summaries of telephone records without making any effort to establish a foundation for the admissibility of the underlying records); SEC v. Hughes Capital Corp., 124 F.3d 449 (3d Cir. 1997) (summary of the information contained on check stubs was properly excluded where the proponent failed to establish that the check stubs were admissible).

(n6)Footnote 6. See, e.g., Needham v. White Labs., 639 F.2d 394 (7th Cir. 1981) (Rule 1006 could not be used to introduce a summary of articles that an expert claimed had proven a causal relationship between estrogen and cancer; the articles were not independently admissible under any hearsay exception, and they were not admissible as the basis of the expert's opinion under Rule 703 because the expert admitted that he had not read all of the articles).

(n7)Footnote 7. See also PEAT, Inc., v. Vanguard Research, Inc., 378 F.3d 1154 (11th Cir. 2004) (error to admit the summary as evidence, where it was not compiled in the ordinary course of business, nor was it based on otherwise admissible evidence; the summary was "based on inadmissible hearsay and contained conclusory allegations concerning Vanguard's alleged misappropriation and intent."); Fagiola v. National Gypsum Co., 906 F.2d 53 (2d Cir. 1990) (error to base a summary on records that had not been established as records of regularly conducted activity); Johnson v. Ford Motor Co., 988 F.2d 573 (5th Cir. 1993) (summary of pending claims, lawsuits, and complaints against Ford is "nothing more than a summary of allegations by others which constitute hearsay"); United States v. Goss, 650 F.2d 1336 (5th Cir. 1981) ("There is no provision for the admission of summaries of the testimony of out-of-court witnesses.").

(n8)Footnote 8. See also Keith v. Volpe, 618 F. Supp. 1132 (C.D. Cal. 1985) (in an action related to low-income housing in the path of a proposed freeway, the Court admitted a summary of a survey of residents after finding that the survey was admissible under the residual hearsay exception, and admitted a summary of files generated by state and federal officials after finding that the files fell within Rule 803(8)), aff'd, 858 F.2d 467 (9th Cir. 1988) .

(n9)Footnote 9. See, e.g., United States v. Bakker, 925 F.2d 728 (4th Cir. 1991) (composite tapes prepared from over 200 hours of broadcasts were properly admitted even though the broadcasts themselves were not in evidence; the broadcasts were made available to the defendant and were admissible; objections to the misrepresentative nature of the summary went to weight and not admissibility); United States v. Strissel, 920 F.2d 1162 (4th Cir. 1990) (it is not necessary that all the information upon which a summary is based must be in evidence; Rule 1006 requires only that the underlying evidence be admissible and available to the opponent for purposes of cross-examination).

(n10)Footnote 10. See, e.g., Martin v. Funtime, Inc., 963 F.2d 110 (6th Cir. 1992) (summaries of an employer's personnel records were properly admitted, as the original records were voluminous and admissible under Rule 803(6)).

(n11)Footnote 11. See, e.g., United States v. Loney, 959 F.2d 1332 (5th Cir. 1992) .

(n12)Footnote 12. See, e.g., United States v. Catabran, 836 F.2d 453 (9th Cir. 1988) (general ledgers summarizing regularly conducted activity are treated as business records, not summaries, so the admissibility requirements of Rule 1006 are inapplicable).

(n13)Footnote 13. See the discussion of this point in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 803(6), § 803.02[7].

(n14)Footnote 14. See, e.g., United States v. Scales, 594 F.2d 558, 562 (6th Cir. 1979) (it is not necessary that the documents be so voluminous as to be "literally impossible to examine.").

(n15)Footnote 15. See, e.g., United States v. Briscoe, 896 F.2d 1476 (7th Cir. 1990) (summaries of tape-recorded conversations were properly admitted; the Rule does not require that it be impossible to examine all the underlying records; all that is required is that an in-court examination would be inconvenient; that standard was met in this case).

(n16)Footnote 16. See, e.g., United States v. Posada-Rios, 158 F.3d 832 (5th Cir. 1998) ("Since the government did not offer the charts into evidence and the trial court did not admit them, we need not decide whether ... they were not admissible under Fed.R.Evid. 1006 ... . Where, as here, the party using the charts does not offer them into evidence, their use at trial is not governed by Fed.R.Evid. 1006."); Air Disaster at Lockerbie Scot. on Dec. 21, 1988, 37 F.3d 804 (2d Cir. 1994) (finding no error where experts gave their opinions on the adequacy of PanAm security measures, relying from time to time on trial transcripts displayed on a projection screen; Rule 1006 objection was misplaced because the trial transcripts were records of testimony at the trial itself); Pierce v. Ramsey Winch Co., 753 F.2d 416 (5th Cir. 1985) (distinguishing between summaries that are admitted under Rule 1006 and "other visual aids that summarize or organize testimony or documents that have already been admitted in evidence"; concluding that summaries admitted under Rule 1006 should go to the jury room with other exhibits but the other visual aids should not be sent to the jury room without the consent of the parties); White Indus. v. Cessna Aircraft Co., 611 F. Supp. 1049 (W.D. Mo. 1985) ("[T]here is a distinction between a Rule 1006 summary and a so-called 'pedagogical' summary. The former is admitted as substantive evidence, without requiring that the underlying documents themselves be in evidence; the latter is simply a demonstrative aid which undertakes to summarize or organize other evidence already admitted.").

(n17)Footnote 17. See, e.g., United States v. Baker, 10 F.3d 1374 (9th Cir. 1993) (while summary testimony was not covered by Rule 1006 because it simply summarized previously admitted oral testimony, it was admissible as a valid exercise of the Court's discretion under Rule 611(a)).

(n18)Footnote 18. See, e.g., United States v. Wood, 943 F.2d 1048 (9th Cir. 1991) (in a complex tax fraud case, the Trial Court allowed a government witness to testify to his opinion of Wood's tax liability, as summarized by two charts, but prohibited the defendant's witness from using his own charts; Rule 1006 was not applicable, because the charts were pedagogical devices and not evidence; the Court found no error in allowing the use of the prosecution's chart but prohibiting the use of the defense's chart, because the prosecution's chart was supported by the proof, while the chart prepared by the defense witness was based on an incomplete analysis). See also United States v. Bakker, 925 F.2d 728 (4th Cir. 1991) (the defendant's summaries were properly excluded because they did not fairly represent the evidence).

(n19)Footnote 19. See, e.g., United States v. DeBoer, 966 F.2d 1066, 1069 (6th Cir. 1992) ("Notwithstanding Rule 1006, this Circuit has traditionally endorsed summary evidence so long as an appropriate limiting instruction informs the jury that the chart is not itself evidence but is only an aid in evaluating the evidence.").

(n20)Footnote 20. See, e.g., United States v. Bray, 139 F.3d 1104 (6th Cir. 1998) ("Since Rule 1006 authorizes the admission in evidence of the summary itself, it is generally inappropriate to give a limiting instruction for a Rule 1006 summary.").

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1006 RULE 1006

5-1006 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1006.03

1006.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Access to Underlying Data

Air Safety, Inc. v. Roman Catholic Archbishop, 94 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1996) : In its Boston trial to recover payments for asbestos removal, the plaintiff sought to introduce exhibits summarizing records kept in Chicago relating to its overhead expenses. The Court held there was no error in excluding the exhibits, since the plaintiff had not made the documents underlying the summary exhibits available to the defendants. The exhibits had not been identified in the pretrial period as summaries, no description of the underlying documents had been provided, and no reasonably convenient opportunity for review of the documents had been specified. Without such explicit information, the underlying documents had not been "made available" to the defendants.

Hackett v. Housing Auth., 750 F.2d 1308 (5th Cir. 1985) : Although the Court affirmed a judgment for the housing authority in a civil rights suit by a landlord who claimed that the authority discriminated against him on racial grounds in setting the rents he could charge under a federal program, it found that the Trial Judge erred in admitting an exhibit that purported to summarize the rents authorized in other units in the same area. The underlying documents were not in existence at the time of the bench trial, so the impossibility of testing the summary against the originals meant that Rule 1006 could not be used. Moreover, the summary appeared to rest on conversations with owners of other subsidized housing, which would have been inadmissible hearsay, so the summary would also have been inadmissible.

United States v. Modena, 302 F.3d 626 (6th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed a fraud conviction, holding it was error (but not plain error) to admit voluminous summaries when the government had not "state[d] when and where" the underlying records could be viewed, without regard to whether the defendant made a request for the records, and when the government's Statement of Discovery provided that the defendant could inspect the records only if he allowed the government to examine the materials that he planned to introduce at trial. Nothing in Rule 1006 indicates that the right of inspection may be conditioned in such a manner.

Coates v. Johnson & Johnson, 756 F.2d 524 (7th Cir. 1985) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in an employment discrimination action, finding that summaries of the employer's disciplinary records were properly admitted. The records were business records, and the underlying records (although not the summaries) were made available prior to trial.

Amarel v. Connell, 102 F.3d 1494 (9th Cir. 1996) , amended (9th Cir. 1997): Reversing in part an antitrust judgment, the Court found error under Rule 1006 in the admission of two summary exhibits. One was a summary of California and Thai rice prices that had been adjusted by the defendants' expert, and the other was a graph prepared by the expert. The defendants had not made available to the plaintiffs all the materials that went into the summary exhibit, including certain raw data. The error was not prejudicial, however, because under Rule 703 the experts could have discussed the information contained in the exhibits even though the exhibits themselves were not admissible. In a trademark infringement suit, Intel Corp. v. Terabyte Int'l, Inc., 6 F.3d 614 (9th Cir. 1993) , the Court affirmed on the merits but remanded as to the determination of attorney's fees, holding that summaries of hours worked were inadequate without providing the adversary an opportunity to see just what was charged and why. In Davis & Cox v. Summa Corp., n1 an action by an attorney to recover fees and expenses, the Court held there was no error in excluding a series of summaries where the party offering them did not make the summaries or the underlying documents available until just before trial and one of the summaries did not "fairly represent" the underlying documents. In United States v. Miller, n2 the Court relied upon its prior opinion in Paddack v. Dave Christensen, Inc. n3 to state that summaries may not be admitted unless the underlying documents are provided to the opposing party prior to their being offered. In Frank Music Corp. v. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, n4 the Court recognized that the Trial Judge may have to make a finding as to whether the underlying records were provided. See also Rager v. Commissioner n5(letters from the parent church acknowledging receipt of contributions were inadmissible to prove claims of charitable deductions to the local church, where the letters were written in 1983 and the contributions were allegedly made in 1980 and 1981; since the church records were unavailable, the letters could not be used as summaries).

[2] Computer Records

United States v. Loney, 959 F.2d 1332 (5th Cir. 1992) : In a prosecution of a scheme to defraud a frequent flyer program, the Court held that a report based on a search of the airline's frequent flyer records was properly admitted. Although the report was prepared in anticipation of the litigation, the underlying data it summarized was kept in the regular course of business. In United States v. Sanders, n6 the Court affirmed a pharmacist's convictions for Medicaid fraud, drug offenses, and tax violations. It found that computerized records from the Texas Department of Human Resources, representing reimbursement claims filed by the defendant and payments on those claims, were properly admitted as business records. The Court rejected the assertion that the computerized evidence was a summary under Rule 1006; the evidence was simply a retrieval of data stored in a computer, not a selective compilation of random pieces of data.

United States v. Catabran, 836 F.2d 453 (9th Cir. 1988) : The Court held that a printout of a business ledger kept via computer was admissible. The computerized summary was itself a business record of the company. Thus, admissibility depended on a foundation under Rule 803(6), not on Rule 1006.

[3] Examples of Properly Admitted Summaries

R & R Assocs. v. Visual Scene, Inc., 726 F.2d 36 (1st Cir. 1984) : The Court sustained a judgment for the plaintiff in a breach of contract action, holding that a summary of allegedly defective merchandise supplied by the defendant was properly admitted. It noted that the defendant had ample opportunity to examine the underlying documents and that it failed to ask the Judge to order that the documents be produced for inspection.

United States ex rel. Evergreen Pipeline Constr. Co. v. Merritt Meridian Constr. Corp., 95 F.3d 153 (2d Cir. 1996) : In a construction contract dispute, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the plaintiff's expert's testimony supported by summaries of some 5000 documents, where the Trial Judge had determined that the underlying documents were admissible and had been made available to the defendant.

United States v. Strissel, 920 F.2d 1162 (4th Cir. 1990) : The defendant, a public official convicted for taking kickbacks from contractors, argued that chart summaries were erroneously admitted because not all of the supporting documents were in evidence. The Court, considering the issue for the first time, held that the Rule requires only that the underlying evidence be admissible and available to the opponent so that a proper cross-examination may be had, not that it actually be introduced into evidence. In Barnes Group, Inc. v. C & C Prods., Inc., n7 the Court rejected a claim that the admission of summaries of damages in an action for tortious interference with contract was an abuse of discretion.

Martin v. Funtime, Inc., 963 F.2d 110 (6th Cir. 1992) : In affirming injunctive relief against an employer for wage and hour violations, the Court held that summaries of the employer's personnel records introduced by the Department of Labor were properly admitted, as the original records were voluminous and admissible under Rule 803(6). In United States v. Campbell, n8 a prosecution for Medicare fraud, the Court held that a summary chart based on the defendant's medical files was admissible, since without the chart the jury would have had to read hundreds of pages of technical information.

United States v. Turner, 400 F.3d 491 (7th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a money laundering conviction, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of summary charts analyzing the bank records of the defendant and his wife for the years 1995-2000. The underlying evidence was relevant to show unexplained cash deposits in excess of his reported income and was not overly prejudicial because it allowed an inference that the laundering represented the proceeds of some illicit activity, and the summaries were not claimed to be inaccurate. In an installation subcontractor's fraud action against the manufacturer of screws used to anchor windows, AMPAT/Midwest, Inc. v. Illinois Tool Works, Inc., 896 F.2d 1035 (7th Cir. 1990) , the Court held that the plaintiff properly proved the amount of damages by means of summaries derived from its regular business records. In United States v. Meyers, n9 the Court held that a chart summarizing long distance phone calls and surveillance logs of FBI teams was properly admitted.

EEOC v. HBE Corp., 135 F.3d 543 (8th Cir. 1998) : In an employment discrimination action arising from the firing of a black personnel manager in a hotel, the Court held there was no error in admitting a chart that summarized almost 200 employment applications. The summarized information was straightforward and accurate, the underlying employment records were admissible business records, and the defendant had ample time to examine the summary and compare it with the records, which belonged to the defendant. In United States v. Robinson, n10 the Court affirmed mail fraud convictions arising out of a bogus loan scheme, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting a summary and chart listing 105 loan applications. A sufficient foundation was laid for the underlying documents, they were made available to the defendants, and they were sufficiently voluminous to warrant summarization.

City of Phoenix v. Com/Sys., 706 F.2d 1033 (9th Cir. 1983) : The Court held in a breach of contract case that a City officer was properly permitted to give testimony, based on a computer printout summarizing numerous individual documents, as to the total amount of money the City had expended in completing a communications system. Since each individual document was prepared by a City employee who did the work reported, each was a business record, and their numerosity justified admission of the summary. See also Keith v. Volpe n11(in an action related to low-income housing in the path of a proposed freeway, the Court admitted a summary of a survey of residents in the path of the freeway after finding that the survey was admissible under the residual exception, and admitted a summary of files generated by state and federal officials after finding that the files fell within Rule 803(8)).

FTC v. Kuykendall, 312 F.3d 1329 (10th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed findings in a civil contempt proceeding that the defendants had violated an injunction regulating their telemarketing businesses, and found no abuse of discretion in the admission under Rule 1006 of declarations by FTC employees summarizing the defendants' business records.

[4] Expert Testimony

United States v. Consolidated Edison Co., 580 F.2d 1122 (2d Cir. 1978) : In modifying a judgment awarding damages to the United States for the defendant's breach of contract, the Court indicated that under Rule 1006 an expert might summarize the business records of several different businesses.

United States v. Hart, 295 F.3d 451 (5th Cir. 2002) : In a prosecution for making false statements in applications for farm loans by omitting debts from Farm and Home Plans (computer-generated projections of the borrower's plan of operation), an employee of the loan servicing agency was permitted to introduce, as summaries under Rule 1006, revised FHPs that she prepared, which the government said illustrated what the results would have been if all the debts testified to by the prosecution witnesses had been included on the actual FHPs. Reversing, the Court held that the government had failed to adduce any evidence in support of the assumptions and conclusions that the witness drew when preparing her versions of the "proper" FHPs. While the government had shown undisclosed debts, it had not shown that the full amount of those debts belonged on a properly prepared FHP, so the "summary" impermissibly assumed what the government "was required to prove beyond a reasonable doubt as operative facts of the alleged offense.' "

Needham v. White Labs, 639 F.2d 394 (7th Cir. 1981) : In product liability suit against a drug manufacturer, the Court held it was error to allow the plaintiff's expert witness to read into evidence a list of medical article titles published before the defendant manufactured its drug in order to show that the defendant should have known about the problem with the drug. Since the expert had not read all of the articles, the foundation for the summary was inadequate.

Goldberg v. United States, 789 F.2d 1341 (9th Cir. 1986) : The Court approved permitting an IRS agent to summarize voluminous tax records.

State Office Sys. v. Olivetti Corp., 762 F.2d 843 (10th Cir. 1985) : The Court affirmed a judgment for an agent-dealer against a manufacturer, finding that a "damage summary" was properly admitted under Rule 1006. The summary was based on actual business records which themselves were admissible. The Court noted, however, that projections of lost future profits were not summaries of otherwise admissible data, but it found that they were properly admitted as part of an expert opinion by a qualified witness.

[5] Foundation Requirement

United States v. North Am. Reporting, Inc., 740 F.2d 50 (D.C. Cir. 1984) : The Court remanded a criminal case for determination of whether certain prosecutor's notes were producible as Jencks Act material, but it affirmed the exclusion of a summary chart offered by the defendant as a calendar of *under*billings to counter the government's evidence of *over*billings. The Court found that the prosecution's summary chart was properly authenticated and relied upon employee time sheets, while the defendant's chart was based upon a "hodge-podge collection of personal memory, unauthorized evidence, surmise and post hoc contract interpretation."

United States v. Sorrentino, 726 F.2d 876 (1st Cir. 1984), vacated in part on other grounds, 726 F.2d 888 (1st Cir. 1984): In a prosecution for attempted income tax evasion, the Court upheld the prosecution's use of a summary exhibit to prove the defendant's net worth, since the net worth schedule "was based exclusively on primary evidence which was available to test the accuracy of the summary; the agent who prepared the chart was available for cross-examination concerning disputed items; and the purpose and effect of the chart were made clear to the jury." It also upheld the exclusion of a summary exhibit prepared by the defendant's accountant that used figures for which "there was virtually no documentation." See also United States v. Massachusetts Maritime Academy n12(summaries of the academy's application files were admissible to prove sex discrimination where the academy had an opportunity to contest accuracy and failed to do so).

Fagiola v. National Gypsum Co., 906 F.2d 53 (2d Cir. 1990) : In an action for injuries from asbestos allegedly sold by defendants to the shipyard employing the plaintiff's decedent, the Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in admitting summaries of purchase and sales records. Even though the assumptions used in preparing the summaries may not have been completely correct, the total amount of all sales (whether the products contained asbestos or not) was so small that any error was harmless; the fact that some of the underlying documents were not directly authenticated was not significant because similar documents were authenticated; and no hearsay objection was made (perhaps for tactical reasons) to possibly objectionable underlying documents.

United States v. Pelullo, 964 F.2d 193 (3d Cir. 1992) : This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 1006.02[2].

United States v. Janati, 374 F.3d 263 (4th Cir. 2004) : The Judge presiding over a prosecution for a complex healthcare fraud conspiracy limited the government's case-in-chief to presentation of the 61 overt acts alleged in the indictment and ruled that charts and summary testimony regarding 1300 transactions within the scope of the conspiracy could only be presented in rebuttal if necessary. On interlocutory appeal, the Court held that the limitation on the case-in-chief was an abuse of discretion. Although the Judge had not ruled on any specific summary chart, the Court noted that Rule 1006 could be used to provide independent evidence of voluminous records if the chart is an accurate compilation of records otherwise admissible in evidence that have been made available to the opposing party. To the extent that the charts would summarize witness' conclusions or opinions, they would be pedagogical charts subject to regulation under Rule 611(a). In reviewing a TV evangelist's fraud conviction in United States v. Bakker, 925 F.2d 728 (4th Cir. 1991) , the Court rejected the defendant's argument that eleven composite tapes edited from 200 hours of broadcasts were erroneously admitted because the original tapes had not been introduced into evidence. The language of the Rule simply requires that the underlying material be made available to the other party, as was done here. Objections to the representativeness of the composite tapes properly go to their weight, not their admissibility.

United States v. Jennings, 724 F.2d 436 (5th Cir. 1984) : Affirming a conviction for making false statements to a government agency, the Court upheld the government's use of summary charts to compare the number of meals the defendant claimed had been served at day-care centers with the number the government alleged had actually been served. The fact that the government made certain assumptions in preparing the charts did not disqualify them, and the Court reasoned that "when a chart does not contain complicated calculations requiring the need of an expert for accuracy, no special expertise is required in preparing the chart."

United States v. Seelig, 622 F.2d 207 (6th Cir. 1980) : Reversing convictions for improperly dispensing drugs, the Court found that a summary of 1409 of the defendants' sales was properly admitted, but it was error to admit a sales chart comparing the defendants' pharmacy's sale of certain items with those of eight other pharmacies. The Court found that the underlying records were not made available to the defendants and that there was no attempt to compare the stores in total sales, marketing area, hours of operation, etc. In United States v. Denton, n13 the Court upheld the admission of a composite tape recording rather than the original recordings, where the defense lawyers had reasonable access to the originals, the government laid a proper foundation as to the accuracy and authenticity of the composite tape, use of the one tape saved time at trial, and the defense was free at trial to cross-examine the agents who prepared the composite tape. To have a proper foundation for transcripts of tapes, testimony must be offered that the transcripts accurately summarize the tapes.

Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. Intercounty Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 412 F.3d 745 (7th Cir. 2005) : In a suit alleging fraud and unjust enrichment arising out of the disappearance of funds from insured escrow accounts, the Judge refused to admit summaries that the plaintiff had furnished to the defendant 30 days before the start of trial. The Judge excluded the summaries on two grounds: (1) a Court should be wary of permitting a party to use a summary that might misstate evidence, and (2) 30 days' notice was too little. Finding an abuse of discretion, the Court concluded that "[t]he first ground was unreasoned, and the second incorrect." Rule 1006 does not express any "wariness" concerning summaries and "the fact that they might be inaccurate is not a ground for excluding them without any determination of whether they are inaccurate." As for timeliness of the notice, the Court found that the defendant's counsel was "a huge law firm that could easily have spot checked the summaries for accuracy immediately upon receiving them 30 days before the trial began, and if the check had revealed inaccuracies [the defendant] would then have had solid grounds for moving to exclude them from the trial unless the inaccuracies were promptly corrected." By failing to employ this simple expedient the defendant forfeited any claim of untimeliness. In Zayre Corp. v. S.M. & R. Co., n14 the Court sustained a summary judgment for a corporate store owner who sued a company for reimbursement of vacation pay that accrued during a time that the company operated jewelry departments. Even if it would have been unduly burdensome for the defendant company to visit hundreds of stores to examine the records underlying summaries offered by the store owner, the company failed to submit an affidavit requesting a continuance or seeking other relief below. The Court expressed concern, however, that the store owner's affidavit in support of the summaries did not fully address authentication and foundation concerns.

United States v. Samaniego, 187 F.3d 1222 (10th Cir. 1999) : The Court reversed drug convictions because the government had introduced summaries of telephone records with no effort whatsoever to establish the foundational requirements of Rule 803(6) for admissibility of the underlying records. The burden of establishing the underlying foundation falls on the proponent of the summary, and even when faced with a hearsay objection the prosecution did not call a single witness or ask a single question related to business records. In United States v. Behrens, n15 the Court affirmed convictions for conspiracy to unlawfully distribute narcotics, and upheld the use of a summary of prescriptions written by a doctor and filled by a pharmacist. The foundation was laid by a DEA agent who testified that he served the pharmacist with an administrative search warrant, the pharmacist identified his files, the agent removed all prescriptions for a certain drug, all the prescriptions were written by the doctor, and a witness admitted that he received all of the prescriptions that were made out to him.

[6] Inadmissible Underlying Materials

United States v. Davis, 261 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2001) : Affirming most of the judgment in a suit by a hazardous waste generator for contribution under CERCLA from potentially responsible parties, the Court found no error in the exclusion of a chart prepared by the generator that summarized information about the claims and theories of the various parties. The chart was simply a summary of hearsay, and the hearsay statements were not admissible under any hearsay exception.

SEC v. Hughes Capital Corp., 124 F.3d 449 (3d Cir. 1997) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the SEC in an action arising from a stock fraud scheme, holding that the Trial Judge properly refused to admit photocopies of check stubs that purported to establish the distribution of the proceeds of the securities fraud. The Court observed that the stubs were "altered" before they were copied, there was no showing of what was changed as a result of the alteration, and the canceled checks could not be located. Under these circumstances, the Judge properly excluded a summary of the information contained on the stubs after finding that the stubs themselves were untrustworthy. United States v. Pelullo, 964 F.2d 193 (3d Cir. 1992) , which held that a summary must be based on admissible evidence, is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 1006.02[2].

United States v. Goss, 650 F.2d 1336 (5th Cir. 1981) : The Court held in a mail fraud case that it was improper to permit an FBI agent to give a summary of his interviews with various people. The Court said that "[t]here is no provision for the admission of summaries of the testimony of out-of-court witnesses."

Paddack v. Dave Christensen, Inc., 745 F.2d 1254 (9th Cir. 1984) : In a suit by trustees of employee trust funds for breach of a collective bargaining agreement, the Trial Judge excluded compliance audit reports that were made by an independent accounting firm and offered by the plaintiffs to show contribution deficiencies on the part of the defendants. The Court agreed that the reports were not admissible under Rule 1006 because the reports relied not only upon the employer's business records, but also upon inadmissible information provided by union sources as to employees whose work for the employer was not recorded in the records.

PEAT, Inc. v. Vanguard Research, Inc., 378 F.3d 1154 (11th Cir. 2004) : The plaintiff alleged that the defendant misappropriated trade secrets. In preparation for litigation, the plaintiff prepared a summary of all of the information that its officials "thought might be a trade secret" and that was allegedly misappropriated by the defendant. Reversing a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court held it was error to admit the summary as evidence, which was based on inadmissible hearsay, since it was not compiled in the ordinary course of business, nor was it based on otherwise admissible evidence, as is required by Rule 1006.

Conoco, Inc. v. Department of Energy, 99 F.3d 387 (Fed. Cir. 1996) : The Court vacated a summary judgment for DOE in an action for restitution of crude oil pricing overcharges. It held that summaries of purchases of oil from various fields that were prepared long after the purchases were made in response to an oil company's request for information in connection with a DOE audit were improperly admitted. Although DOE argued that the purchasers had no motive to falsify the information they provided, the Court reasoned that the records had none of the indicia of reliability associated with business records. In a case like this, where no foundation for the documents underlying the summaries was laid and the underlying documents were not made available because the proponent did not have them, summaries could not be used under Rule 1006.

[7] Jury Instructions

United States v. Williams, 264 F.3d 561 (5th Cir. 2001) : Affirming a conviction for an extortion and bribery conspiracy, the Court upheld the admission of summary charts detailing telephone calls between the defendant and other alleged conspirators. The defendant argued that the charts should not have been admitted without an instruction that they were not evidence. The Court noted that the charts were properly admitted under Rule 1006 and that a summary chart "that meets the requirements of Rule 1006 is itself evidence and no instruction is needed ... . Such charts are distinguishable from pedagogical aids, which are merely to assist the jury in understanding the evidence and should be accompanied by an appropriate limiting instruction."

United States v. Bray, 139 F.3d 1104 (6th Cir. 1998) : A postal clerk was convicted for embezzling money received from stamp purchases. The government introduced charts summarizing the forms that kept daily track of the clerk's transactions. Affirming, the Court held there was no error in refusing to give a limiting instruction that the charts were not evidence or proof of facts. Such an instruction may be appropriate when a summary is a pedagogical device, governed by Rule 611(a), but the charts in this case were properly introduced under Rule 1006 as primary evidence of records so voluminous that they could not be conveniently examined in court, and so constituted the evidence to be considered by the factfinder. The Court noted that its prior opinions on the distinction between the two types of summaries had been "less than clear."

[8] Notice

United States v. Jamieson, 427 F.3d 394 (6th Cir. 2005) : Affirming convictions for fraudulent sale of insurance policies, the Court found no error in allowing the government to use summary evidence. The Court noted that under Rule 1006, the proponent has a duty to "state when and where the documents underlying its summaries could be viewed," and that "merely making the records available upon request is insufficient," but the Rule does not require that the government provide the defendant with a copy of the actual summary or send copies of the relevant documents to the defendant. In this case, notice was sufficient because the government served the defendant with its notice of the intent to use summary evidence, and the notice was "reasonably specific in identifying the underlying documents."

[9] Providing Underlying Materials to Jury

Bristol Steel & Iron Works, Inc. v. Bethlehem Steel Corp., 41 F.3d 182 (4th Cir. 1994) : In a price discrimination action by a steel fabricator against a raw steel supplier, the plaintiff introduced summaries in chart form to prove its purchases. During deliberations the jury asked whether it needed invoices to prove sales, and the defendant suggested submitting the invoices. The Trial Judge declined on the ground that the invoices had not been admitted, and explained to the jury that summaries had been introduced instead of the actual invoices. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion, as the jury never requested any invoices, the plaintiff never moved to have the invoices admitted, it would have been erroneous to submit to the jury documents that were not admitted into evidence, and Rule 1006 does not require that both the summaries and the underlying documents be admitted.

[10] Reasonable Time

Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. Intercounty Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 412 F.3d 745 (7th Cir. 2005) : In a suit alleging fraud and unjust enrichment arising out of the disappearance of funds from insured escrow accounts, the Judge refused to admit summaries that the plaintiff had furnished to the defendant 30 days before the start of trial. The Judge excluded the summaries on two grounds: (1) a court should be wary of permitting a party to use a summary that might misstate evidence, and (2) 30 days' notice was too little. Finding an abuse of discretion, the Court concluded that "[t]he first ground was unreasoned, and the second incorrect." Rule 1006 does not express any "wariness" concerning summaries and "the fact that they might be inaccurate is not a ground for excluding them without any determination of whether they are inaccurate." Regarding timeliness, the Court found that the defendant's counsel was "a huge law firm that could easily have spot checked the summaries for accuracy immediately upon receiving them 30 days before the trial began, and if the check had revealed inaccuracies [the defendant] would then have had solid grounds for moving to exclude them from the trial unless the inaccuracies were promptly corrected." By failing to employ this simple expedient the defendant forfeited any claim of untimeliness.

[11] Relationship to Rule 611(a)

United States v. Yousef, 327 F.3d 56 (2d Cir. 2003) : In the prosecution of a conspiracy to bomb United States commercial airliners in southeast Asia and of crimes relating to the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center, the Court held that it was not an abuse of discretion to admit the government's summary charts of telephone records, but this brief portion of the lengthy opinion is muddled. The Court affirmed the admission of the charts under Rule 1006, while commenting that "any possible prejudice was cured by the District Court's limiting instruction stating that the charts were not evidence; they were only graphic demonstrations of the underlying evidence, and the jury had to determine for itself whether they fairly and accurately summarized the underlying evidence." The confusion arises because summaries under Rule 1006 are evidence; they summarize voluminous material that cannot practically be brought to court. Summaries of trial evidence are Rule 611(a) summaries and may or may not be admitted as illustrative exhibits.

United States v. Buck, 324 F.3d 786 (5th Cir. 2003) : In a prosecution for misapplying federal grant payments, the Court held that it was error to admit into evidence and allow into the jury room a diagram showing connections between the defendant and the misapplied payments, but the error was harmless because the diagram accurately summarized testimony and other evidence that had been properly admitted and was thus already before the jury. Although the defendant argued the issue in terms of Rule 1006, the Court, quoting this Manual, noted that pedagogical aids such as the diagrams in this case are properly analyzed under Rule 611.

[12] Summaries of Trial Evidence

[a] Civil Cases

Management Sys. Assocs. v. McDonnell Douglas Corp., 762 F.2d 1161 (4th Cir. 1985) : In a contract dispute over royalty payments allegedly due pursuant to a software licensing agreement, the Court found reversible error in the admission of a summary exhibit. Summaries must fairly represent competent evidence before the jury, and the summary in this case unfairly and improperly purported to calculate the royalty on the basis of two "vitally important faulty assumptions."

Moore v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 781 F.2d 1061 (5th Cir. 1986) : In an asbestosis case, the Court, citing Rule 1006, sustained the admission of lists setting out various job sites where each plaintiff worked during his insulating career as summaries of other exhibits and oral testimony. In Pierce v. Ramsey Winch Co., n16 the Court, affirming an antitrust judgment for a terminated distributor of winches and accessories, distinguished between summaries that are admitted under Rule 1006 and "other visual aids that summarize or organize testimony or documents that have already been admitted in evidence." It concluded that summaries admitted under Rule 1006 should go to the jury room with other exhibits but the other visual aids should not be sent to the jury room without the consent of the parties. See also Big John, B.V. v. Indian Head Grain Co. n17(finding no error where the jury was permitted to use a chart not admitted into evidence, under an instruction that the chart was only argument and not evidence).

Gomez v. Great Lakes Steel Div., 803 F.2d 250 (6th Cir. 1986) : Vacating a judgment for the plaintiff in an employment discrimination action, the Court determined that a summary that the defendant was confronted with for the first time at trial should not have been admitted as evidence. This summary was more akin to "argument than evidence," and when it was used a limiting instruction should have been given informing the jury that the summary was a pedagogical device rather than evidence.

White Indus. v. Cessna Aircraft Co., 611 F. Supp. 1049 (W.D. Mo. 1985) : The Court noted in a Robinson-Patman Act case that "there is a distinction between a Rule 1006 summary and a so-called 'pedagogical' summary. The former is admitted as substantive evidence, without requiring that the underlying documents themselves be in evidence; the latter is simply a demonstrative aid which undertakes to summarize or organize other evidence already admitted." It added, however, "that a pedagogical summary can itself be admitted in evidence where the trier of fact will find it helpful and will not be unduly influenced thereby."

Daniel v. Ben E. Keith Co., 97 F.3d 1329 (10th Cir. 1996) : The Court stated that "[s]ummaries not offered as evidence should be used only with a limiting instruction stating that the summary itself is not evidence."

[b] Summaries of Trial Evidence -- Criminal Cases

[i] Drug Cases

United States v. Rivera-Maldonado, 194 F.3d 224 (1st Cir. 1999) : In a drug conspiracy case, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of composite videotapes of drug transactions involving the defendants' organization. The tapes summarized daily videos previously admitted in evidence, which an agent who had observed the events had testified accurately reflected what he observed. In United States v. Drougas, n18 the Court, affirming convictions for importation and possession of marijuana, indicated that seven telephone charts depicting telephone traffic between the conspirators' homes, businesses, and meeting places were properly admitted. Following an extensive voir dire, the Trial Judge first excluded the charts, and subsequently admitted modified versions that were less argumentative.

United States v. Pinto, 850 F.2d 927 (2d Cir. 1988) : The Court upheld the use of charts that summarized aspects of 66 wiretaps of calls placed to 35 telephone numbers and the submission of the charts for jury use during deliberations. It observed that the Trial Judge repeatedly reminded the jury that it was to decide whether the charts accurately reflected the evidence presented.

United States v. Johnson, 54 F.3d 1150 (4th Cir. 1995) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion when a detective, at the end of the government's case-in-chief, offered an organizational chart based on prior witnesses' testimony that diagrammed drug transactions among members of the charged conspiracy. After an extended discussion of summary testimony from expert witnesses, the Court concluded that the summary chart would be helpful because of the complexity of the case. Furthermore, appropriate safeguards were utilized to minimize any potential prejudice to the defendants: the parties stipulated that the chart accurately reflected the testimony of prior witnesses; the detective was voir dired before giving testimony as to the chart, and extensively cross-examined regarding the chart's creation; the defendants were given a recess to prepare the cross-examination regarding the chart; and numerous limiting instructions were given. The Court likewise held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting summary testimony from the detective, but it cautioned that the dangers inherent in the dual roles of expert and summary witness make the practice inappropriate in the ordinary drug prosecution lacking the complexity of this case.

United States v. Solis, 299 F.3d 420 (5th Cir. 2002) : Affirming convictions in a complex drug trafficking case, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of a series of charts summarizing evidence of communications among the defendants. The Court noted that the charts "were drawn from competent evidence before the jury, which was available to the defendants at trial and was subject to cross-examination," and that "the jury was properly instructed concerning use of the charts and the limitations thereof." In United States v. Taylor, 210 F.3d 311 (5th Cir. 2000) , the Court reversed convictions for drug trafficking offenses because a government chart purporting to list the players in the conspiracy and their positions within the hierarchy was improperly admitted into evidence. The chart did not accurately reflect the underlying testimony, showing connections to the defendant that did not exist and giving her a more central role in the conspiracy than the evidence supported. In United States v. Castillo, n19 a marijuana distribution prosecution, the Court held that a DEA agent, who properly presented summary charts relating to numerous wiretaps, had improperly been permitted to testify to matters that had nothing to do with summarizing any documents or records, were not anything observed or personally known by him, and were not the basis of any expert opinion expressed by him. The error was harmless, however.

United States v. Paulino, 935 F.2d 739 (6th Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed convictions for conspiring to possess and distribute cocaine, holding there was no error in permitting a witness to give testimony explaining an organizational chart that showed the various players and their roles in the conspiracy and a chart that indicated the cash generated from cocaine sales for a specified period. A proper cautionary instruction was given at the close of evidence, the defendants had a full opportunity to cross-examine the witness, and the charts were not substantially inconsistent with the evidence adduced at trial.

United States v. Briscoe, 896 F.2d 1476 (7th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed convictions for a heroin importing and distribution conspiracy, holding that cover sheets summarizing transcripts of tape-recorded telephone conversations admitted into evidence were properly admitted under Rule 1006, as the Rule does not require that it be literally impossible to examine all the underlying records, but only that an in-court examination would be an inconvenience.

United States v. Grajales-Montoya, 117 F.3d 356 (8th Cir. 1997) : The Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit in a narcotics conspiracy case a chronology prepared by the government of what it believed to be relevant events. The chronology listed occurrences such as wire transfers, bank deposits, airplane travel, and coconspirators' meetings, and was derived from documents such as bank and Western Union records, receipts, and surveillance records that were all admitted into evidence. The Court believed that Rule 1006 contemplates a summary admitted instead of, rather than in addition to, the documents it summarizes, and that the summary will have been prepared by a witness available for cross-examination rather than the lawyers trying the case. In United States v. Possick, n20 the Court held that a chart summarizing 250 telephone calls and 20 drug transactions was properly admitted as a summary of the evidence and was not unduly argumentative in prominently mentioning the defendant's name. It also held that Rule 1006 charts may be sent to the jury room in the Judge's discretion, although it suggested that a limiting instruction is generally required when demonstrative charts are submitted to the jury.

United States v. Pena-Espinoza, 47 F.3d 356 (9th Cir. 1995) : At the trial of a cocaine distribution conspiracy, the government introduced over 4,800 recorded phone conversations (mostly in Spanish) and transcripts for 50 of the conversations. The investigating agents testified, serving as "readers" of relevant portions of the transcripts and sometimes summarizing the contents of the conversations. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the agents to summarize transcript contents in their own words, where the transcripts themselves were in evidence, the defense was permitted to require a reading of the full transcript on cross-examination, and the Trial Judge sustained objections when made to impermissible commentary by the agents that went beyond summarization. In a complex narcotics manufacturing prosecution, United States v. Baker, 10 F.3d 1374 (9th Cir. 1993) , the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting an FBI agent to present a summary including a total value of the narcotics transactions and expenditures testified to during the government's case. The agent was presenting neither summary evidence under Rule 1006 nor expert evidence under Rule 702; rather, the testimony was permissible under Rule 611(a) as clarifying the government's presentation for the jury. Because of the dangers of undue prejudice, such summaries should be admitted only in exceptional cases, but in this case careful precautions had been taken (e.g., a week's continuance for the defense to examine the materials, a full opportunity to cross-examine the agent, thorough limiting instructions three times during the testimony).

[ii] Summaries of Trial Evidence -- Criminal Cases -- Fraud Cases

United States v. Lemire, 720 F.2d 1327 (D.C. Cir. 1983) : Affirming convictions for wire fraud and other offenses, the Court held that an FBI agent properly used four charts, which summarized the testimony of government witnesses, to explain to the jury how cash flowed through certain companies. Although the Court relied on Rule 1006, a summary of evidence already before the jury is not evidence, and is more properly considered under Rule 611. The Court did express concern about the possible misuse of summaries -- e.g., a jury might erroneously view a summary as additional or corroborative evidence, a summary might incorporate inadmissible evidence, and it might be used as an extra summation -- but it found that the charts were not misused in the instant case.

United States v. Walker, 191 F.3d 326 (2d Cir. 1999) : Affirming the convictions of an attorney and an interpreter in a scheme to submit fraudulent asylum applications, the Court held that the Trial Judge properly admitted the testimony of a research specialist for the INS indicating that many of the asylum applications found in one defendant's law office were very similar or identical in wording. The applications were before the jury, and the testimony amounted to summary evidence.

United States v. Bakker, 925 F.2d 728 (4th Cir. 1991) : Reviewing a TV evangelist's fraud conviction, the Court held there had been no error in excluding charts offered by the defense. The charts allegedly summarized information already introduced into evidence, but they did not fairly represent that evidence.

United States v. Hart, 295 F.3d 451 (5th Cir. 2002) : In a prosecution for making false statements in applications for farm loans by omitting debts from Farm and Home Plans (computer-generated projections of the borrower's plan of operation), an employee of the loan servicing agency was permitted to introduce, as summaries under Rule 1006, revised FHPs that she prepared, which the government said illustrated what the results would have been if all the debts testified to by the prosecution witnesses had been included on the actual FHPs. Reversing, the Court held that the government had failed to adduce any evidence in support of the assumptions and conclusions that the witness drew when preparing her versions of the "proper" FHPs. While the government had shown undisclosed debts, it had not shown that the full amount of those debts belonged on a properly prepared FHP, so the "summary" impermissibly assumed what the government "was required to prove beyond a reasonable doubt as operative facts of the alleged offense." In United States v. Bishop, 264 F.3d 535 (5th Cir. 2001) , the Court affirmed a conviction for income tax offenses, holding there was no error in the admission of summary charts that were intended to clarify trial evidence. "Summary charts in particular are admissible when (1) they are based on competent evidence already before the jury, (2) the primary evidence used to construct the charts is available to the other side for comparison so that the correctness of the summary may be tested, (3) the chart preparer is available for cross-examination, and (4) the jury is properly instructed concerning use of the charts." The Court approved a cautionary instruction that "summaries do not, of themselves, constitute evidence in the case but only purport to summarize the documented and detailed evidence already submitted."

United States v. Stoecker, 215 F.3d 788 (7th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed convictions for making false statements to financial institutions and giving or receiving bribes, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of stock pledge charts that detailed which stocks the defendant's corporation pledged as security for its bank loans and revealed that, in a number of instances, the same stock was pledged to more than one bank. The charts were properly considered as a summary of the witness testimony regarding dates and pledges that the jury might forget during the course of a long trial, and the jury was properly instructed to analyze the underlying evidence on which the charts were based. In United States v. Swanquist, 161 F.3d 1064 (7th Cir. 1998) , a prosecution for making false statements in loan applications, the government introduced charts contrasting the loans the defendant actually had outstanding with those disclosed in the applications, but the defendant contested the characterizations of some of the outstanding loans. The Court found no abuse of discretion, since a party is not required to include within its charts or summaries an opponent's version of the facts, and the jurors were properly instructed that the charts were not evidence, but were only admitted to aid them in evaluating other evidence, and that it was for them to decide whether the evidence supported the summaries. In United States v. Bentley, n21 the Court affirmed fraud convictions, stating that charts may be admitted that summarize other trial evidence, even though not all evidence was summarized: "charts need not be encyclopedic to be admissible."

United States v. Richardson, 233 F.3d 1285 (11th Cir. 2000) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in a complex six-week money laundering, fraud, and embezzlement trial when a government witness was permitted to present charts summarizing the transaction histories of the accounts of the 14 alleged embezzlement victims. The Trial Judge issued numerous limiting instructions to the jury, the expert specifically testified that the label "unauthorized transaction" on one of the columns represented his opinion, the expert was available for cross-examination, and the label was ultimately changed to "questioned transaction" before the charts went to the jury. In United States v. Atchley, n22 the Court affirmed insurance fraud convictions, holding that telephone company toll records were properly introduced and that a chart summarizing relevant portions of the records also was properly admitted under Rule 1006.

[iii] Summaries of Trial Evidence -- Criminal Cases -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Sawyer, 85 F.3d 713 (1st Cir. 1996) : Although it reversed convictions for bribery-related offenses for error in jury instructions, the Court approved the admission of summaries based upon evidence that was already admitted. The Trial Judge determined that there was a factual basis for the summaries and ensured that the defendant had an opportunity to explore them on cross-examination.

United States v. Porter, 821 F.2d 968 (4th Cir. 1987) : The Court held there was no error in admitting charts summarizing telephone toll records previously introduced. Any prejudice attributable to the highlighting of names was cured by a cautionary instruction. See also United States v. Dorta n23(affirming admission of summaries of lengthy telephone records that had been admitted as evidence).

United States v. Winn, 948 F.2d 145 (5th Cir. 1991) : At the trial of a kidnapping-for-ransom scheme, an FBI agent testified as a fact and summary witness, using chronological charts tracking the various events by dates. Affirming, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the charts, as they were based on competent evidence, the primary evidence was available for testing the summary, the person who prepared them was available for cross-examination, the jury was properly instructed concerning their use, and they made evidence already before the jury conveniently examinable. In United States v. Stephens, n24 the Court held that Rule 1006 not only permits a summary to be substituted for admissible evidence but also authorizes admission of a chart summarizing voluminous and complex evidence that has been admitted at trial. Actually, such a summary is governed by Rules 403 and 611 rather than Rule 1006. See also United States v. Means n25(permitting use of a chart to illustrate how the proceeds of a check were divided).

United States v. Scales, 594 F.2d 558 (6th Cir. 1979) : The Court found no error in allowing the government to use large charts in connection with the testimony of a witness who served only to lay the foundation for the charts, which did little more than summarize the government's case.

United States v. Petty, 132 F.3d 373 (7th Cir. 1997) : In a prosecution for aiding and abetting tampering with motor vehicle identification numbers, the government introduced computer-generated telephone records. The records were cumbersome and difficult to read, and contained much irrelevant information, so an FBI technical analyst prepared charts summarizing the relevant phone calls. For "reasons unapparent to [the Court]," the Trial Judge declined to admit the charts as summary evidence under Rule 1006, but did permit the analyst to use them as demonstrative aids under Rule 611(a). The Court found no abuse of discretion, nor would it have had the charts been admitted into evidence, since they summarized complex evidence that was admissible. In United States v. Howard, n26 the Court, affirming convictions for vote fraud, recognized that summaries of trial evidence may not fall within Rule 1006, but that they might be admissible as "a pedagogical device." It suggested, however, that the preferred practice would be to give a limiting instruction explaining the permissible use of such summaries.

United States v. Wainright, 351 F.3d 816 (8th Cir. 2003) : Affirming a conviction for interstate transportation of stolen property in a scheme to divert timber that the defendant was paid to cut and haul, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of summaries of voluminous logging records and of bank records, which had been introduced into evidence. Although the Court relied upon Rule 1006, these summaries almost certainly fell within Rule 611(a). They summarized evidence already admitted, so they were not summaries of evidence too voluminous to be brought to court. Summaries of admitted evidence are demonstrative or illustrative exhibits, which may be admitted into evidence in the Judge's discretion. In United States v. Orlowski, n27 the Court held that exhibits summarizing trial testimony and documents could be sent to the jury room.

United States v. Meyers, 847 F.2d 1408 (9th Cir. 1988) : The Court held that a chart summarizing long distance phone calls and surveillance logs of FBI teams was properly admitted.

United States v. Gold, 743 F.2d 800 (11th Cir. 1984) : The Court held that a summary of evidence derived from exhibits that had been admitted into evidence was properly admitted to demonstrate the amount of claims payable under Medicare.

[iv] Summaries of Trial Evidence -- Criminal Cases -- Tax Cases

United States v. Oshatz, 912 F.2d 534 (2d Cir. 1990) : Affirming tax fraud convictions, the Court held that although it was greatly desirable to make computer programs used in the preparation of a chart summarizing trial evidence available to the defense a reasonable time before trial, there was no error in failing to do so when the defendant had ample time to check the validity of the program and cross-examine the government witness as to errors during the trial, and errors were corrected before the chart was ultimately admitted into evidence.

United States v. Pree, 384 F.3d 378 (7th Cir. 2004) : Affirming a conviction for filing false tax returns, the Court found no plain error in the admission of two summary charts prepared by a testifying IRS agent. The Judge gave a pattern instruction stating that the charts accurately summarized voluminous books, records, or documents. That instruction was problematic because the charts summarized evidence already admitted, and thus were akin to "a teaching device rather than ... substantive evidence." Although the Court recognized that the preferred practice when such charts are offered is to instruct the jury that the charts are not evidence and purport to summarize already admitted evidence, it declined to find plain error in view of the absence of any challenge to the accuracy of the charts. In United States v. Radseck, 718 F.2d 233 (7th Cir. 1983) , the Court affirmed mail fraud and income tax convictions as it found the government was properly permitted to utilize several exhibits that summarized trial testimony in connection with the testimony of an IRS agent. The Court indicated that cross-examination of a summary witness like the agent is an adequate protection against error in the exhibits.

United States v. Nelson, 735 F.2d 1070 (8th Cir. 1984) : In a prosecution for failing to file tax returns, the Court upheld the admission of three charts that summarized an IRS agent's testimony and indicated a defendant's gross income for two years based on bank deposits and his filing history.

United States v. Wood, 943 F.2d 1048 (9th Cir. 1991) : In a prosecution for tax fraud, the government was permitted to introduce a summary chart by its expert, but a summary chart by the defendant's expert was not admitted. The Court affirmed the conviction, holding that although the better practice is to allow charts to be used as testimonial aids only, it was no abuse of discretion to admit the government's chart; the disparate treatment between the charts was justified because the defendant's chart was not supported by the record. In United States v. Soulard, n28 the Court, affirming convictions for subscribing false corporate income tax returns, observed that the Trial Judge should examine summary charts outside the presence of the jury to see that they are supported by the proof in the case, should allow the charts to be used as testimonial aids, and should not admit them as evidence.

United States v. Kapnison, 743 F.2d 1450 (10th Cir. 1984) : The Court found that an expert witness in a criminal tax trial was properly permitted to summarize government exhibits and testimony. In United States v. Kaatz, n29 the Court held that a government summary of 2,300 exhibits that were business records was properly admitted in an income tax evasion case. See also United States v. Harenberg n30(approving use of a summary exhibit by an IRS agent to demonstrate that income reported by the defendant was incorrect; the chart was "very helpful in sorting out the numerous exhibits presented by the government," and provided a basis for the agent's conclusions).

United States v. Evans, 910 F.2d 790 (11th Cir. 1990) , aff'd, 504 U.S. 255 (1992) : In affirming a public official's Hobbs Act and tax fraud convictions, the Court held that a government chart summarizing payments to the defendant and showing their effects was properly admitted. However, the Trial Judge properly excluded charts and testimony by a proposed defense expert in linguistics because the expert would not be helpful to the jury in understanding taped conversations and the charts impermissibly reflected the expert's opinion of the content of recorded testimony previously presented to the jury. In United States v. Scrima, n31 an income tax evasion case, the defendant offered a summary exhibit that assumed that he had a large amount of money prior to the relevant tax years. The Court held that the Trial Judge properly cautioned the jury that the chart assumed a fact that was not in evidence. Since a summary must be based upon admissible evidence or evidence actually before the jury, the chart could have been excluded altogether, and the Judge actually gave the defendant more favorable treatment than the Rule required.

[13] Summary Judgment

Tamarin v. Adam Caterers, Inc., 13 F.3d 51 (2d Cir. 1993) : In a union's action to recover unpaid ERISA benefit contributions from an employer, the Court held there was no error in relying on the plaintiff's summary of payroll records in granting summary judgment, as the underlying documents would have been admissible as business records and they would have been available to the defendant during discovery.

In re Citric Acid Litig., 191 F.3d 1090 (9th Cir. 1999) : Affirming summary judgment for a manufacturer charged with conspiring with competitors to fix prices and market shares, the Court held that facts stated in an expert report are not admissible simply because the expert relied upon them, nor was the expert's report admissible as a summary of data, since there was no showing that the report purported to summarize voluminous data that could not be conveniently examined.

[14] Tape Recordings

United States v. Wilson, 115 F.3d 1185 (4th Cir. 1997) : Affirming drug convictions, the Court found no error in the introduction of both original and composite tape recordings of drug transactions between the defendants and an undercover police officer. The original tape recordings were properly authenticated by witnesses who monitored the audio recording equipment and by the undercover officer who reviewed the tapes and testified that they accurately recorded the conversations. The composite tape was properly authenticated by the same witnesses, who listened to the original recordings and compared them to the composite tape, and testified that the composite tape accurately represented the relevant portions of the original tapes. In United States v. Bakker, 925 F.2d 728 (4th Cir. 1991) , the Court, reviewing a TV evangelist's fraud conviction, rejected the defendant's argument that eleven composite tapes edited from 200 hours of broadcasts were erroneously admitted because the original tapes had not been introduced into evidence. The language of the Rule simply requires that the underlying material be made available to the other party, as was done here. Objections to the representativeness of the composite tapes properly go to their weight, not their admissibility.

United States v. Segines, 17 F.3d 847 (6th Cir. 1994) : Vacating cocaine convictions, the Court held that a composite tape recording was admissible under the Rule, but that it was error to admit a transcript, where the tape was unintelligible in part, and to send to the jury original tapes expressly excluded from admission into evidence. In United States v. Denton, n32 the Court upheld the admission of a composite tape recording rather than the original recordings, where the defense lawyers had reasonable access to the originals, the government laid a proper foundation as to the accuracy and authenticity of the composite tape, use of the one tape saved time at trial, and the defense was free at trial to cross-examine the agents who prepared the composite tape. To have a proper foundation for transcripts of tapes, testimony must be offered that the transcripts accurately summarize the tapes.

United States v. Nunez, 658 F. Supp. 828 (D. Colo. 1987) : The Court held, in ruling on various pretrial motions in a narcotics prosecution, that composite tapes could be used to summarize 112 tape recordings if the composites were representative and in proper context.

United States v. Phelps, 733 F.2d 1464 (11th Cir. 1984) : Affirming Mann Act convictions of a husband and wife, the Court held that the Trial Judge acted properly in reading a summary of a tape recording to the jury as requested by a third defendant. The Judge was concerned about the poor quality of the recording and about possible prejudice to a fourth defendant. He summarized the conversations relied on by the third defendant and told the jury that, although the parties had not agreed that the summary was accurate, he believed that it fairly summarized a tape that could not be played because of its poor quality.

[15] Testimony from Prior Proceeding

United States v. Leon-Reyes, 177 F.3d 816 (9th Cir. 1999) : The defendant was charged with committing perjury in a previous trial in which he testified on behalf of defendants charged with drug crimes. To prove the materiality of his testimony, the government offered summaries of the testimony of a number of witnesses at the previous trial. The Court found no error, stating that "we believe admission of summaries like the ones from this case offer numerous advantages to district courts. Rather than admitting the potentially voluminous transcript or subpoenaing witnesses from the prior trial to repeat their testimony, the prior testimony can be reduced to short summaries tending to prove materiality. Additionally, the district court is better able to monitor and exclude unduly prejudicial material from short summaries than the entire transcript."

[16] Transcripts

United States v. Alwan, 279 F.3d 431 (7th Cir. 2002) : Affirming a contempt of court conviction for failure to testify before a grand jury, the Court held that a government agent was properly permitted to testify that he reviewed transcripts to determine whether the defendant ever stated he feared for his safety. Although the defendant raised no objection at trial, he alleged hearsay on appeal. The Court found that "Rule 1006 specifically permits voluminous writings as a practical matter to be summarized."

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. Davis & Cox v. Summa Corp., 751 F.2d 1507 (9th Cir. 1985) .

(n2)Footnote 2. United States v. Miller, 771 F.2d 1219 (9th Cir. 1985) .

(n3)Footnote 3. Paddack v. Dave Christensen, Inc., 745 F.2d 1254 (9th Cir. 1984) .

(n4)Footnote 4. Frank Music Corp. v. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, 772 F.2d 505 (9th Cir. 1985) .

(n5)Footnote 5. Rager v. Commissioner, 775 F.2d 1081 (9th Cir. 1985) .

(n6)Footnote 6. United States v. Sanders, 749 F.2d 195 (5th Cir. 1984) .

(n7)Footnote 7. Barnes Group, Inc. v. C & C Prods., Inc., 716 F.2d 1023 (4th Cir. 1983) .

(n8)Footnote 8. United States v. Campbell, 845 F.2d 1374 (6th Cir. 1988) .

(n9)Footnote 9. United States v. Meyers, 847 F.2d 1408 (9th Cir. 1988) .

(n10)Footnote 10. United States v. Robinson, 774 F.2d 261 (8th Cir. 1985) .

(n11)Footnote 11. Keith v. Volpe, 618 F. Supp. 1132 (C.D. Cal. 1985) , aff'd, 858 F.2d 467 (9th Cir. 1988) .

(n12)Footnote 12. United States v. Massachusetts Maritime Academy, 762 F.2d 142 (1st Cir. 1985) .

(n13)Footnote 13. United States v. Denton, 556 F.2d 811 (6th Cir. 1977) .

(n14)Footnote 14. Zayre Corp. v. S.M. & R. Co., 882 F.2d 1145 (7th Cir. 1989) .

(n15)Footnote 15. United States v. Behrens, 689 F.2d 154 (10th Cir. 1982) .

(n16)Footnote 16. Pierce v. Ramsey Winch Co., 753 F.2d 416 (5th Cir. 1985) .

(n17)Footnote 17. Big John, B.V. v. Indian Head Grain Co., 718 F.2d 143 (5th Cir. 1983) .

(n18)Footnote 18. United States v. Drougas, 748 F.2d 8 (1st Cir. 1984) .

(n19)Footnote 19. United States v. Castillo, 77 F.3d 1480 (5th Cir. 1996) .

(n20)Footnote 20. United States v. Possick, 849 F.2d 332 (8th Cir. 1988) .

(n21)Footnote 21. United States v. Bentley, 825 F.2d 1104 (7th Cir. 1987) .

(n22)Footnote 22. United States v. Atchley, 699 F.2d 1055 (11th Cir. 1983) .

(n23)Footnote 23. United States v. Dorta, 783 F.2d 1179 (4th Cir. 1986) .

(n24)Footnote 24. United States v. Stephens, 779 F.2d 232 (5th Cir. 1985) .

(n25)Footnote 25. United States v. Means, 695 F.2d 811 (5th Cir. 1983) .

(n26)Footnote 26. United States v. Howard, 774 F.2d 838 (7th Cir. 1985) .

(n27)Footnote 27. United States v. Orlowski, 808 F.2d 1283 (8th Cir. 1986) .

(n28)Footnote 28. United States v. Soulard, 730 F.2d 1292 (9th Cir. 1984) .

(n29)Footnote 29. United States v. Kaatz, 705 F.2d 1237 (10th Cir. 1983) .

(n30)Footnote 30. United States v. Harenberg, 732 F.2d 1507 (10th Cir. 1984) .

(n31)Footnote 31. United States v. Scrima, 819 F.2d 996 (11th Cir. 1987) .

(n32)Footnote 32. United States v. Denton, 556 F.2d 811 (6th Cir. 1977) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1006 RULE 1006

5-1006 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1006.04

1006.04 Legislative History

Advisory Committee's Note

The admission of summaries of voluminous books, records, or documents offers the only practicable means of making their contents available to judge and jury. The rule recognizes this practice, with appropriate safeguards. 4 Wigmore 1230.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
Supp. To CHAPTER 1006 RULE 1006

5-1006 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 1006, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 1006. Summaries	Rule 1006. Summaries to Prove Content
The contents of voluminous writings, re-	The proponent may use a summary, chart cord ings, or pho- to- grap hs whic h can- not con- veni entl y be ex- ami ned in cour t may be pres en- ted in the form of a chart , sum mar y, or cal- cula- tion. The ori- gin- als, or du- plica tes, shall be mad e , or cal- cula- tion to prov e the con- tent of vo- lu- min- ous writ- ings, re- cord ings, or pho- to- grap hs that can- not be con- veni entl y ex- ami ned in cour t. The pro- pon- ent must mak e the ori- gin- als or du-available for examination or copying, or both, by other parties at reasonable time and place. The court may order that they be produced in court.	plicates available for examination or copying, or both, by other parties at a reasonable time or place. And the court may order the proponent to produce them in court.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 1006 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
Supp. To CHAPTER 1006 RULE 1006

5-1006 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 1006.03

Supp. to § 1006.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[2] Computer Records [Go To Main]

U-Haul Int'l, Inc. v. Lumbermens Mut. Cas. Co., 576 F.3d 1040 (9th Cir. 2009) : In an action over insurance coverage obligations the plaintiffs proved claims defense and settlement costs by introducing computer-generated summaries detailing the indemnity and expenses paid on each claim. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiffs, the Court held that the summaries were not subject to Rule 1006, because "the summaries themselves constituted the business records. They were the writings at issue, not summaries of other evidence." (Emphasis in original.)

[3] Examples of Properly Admitted Summaries [Go To Main]

United States v. Hemphill, 514 F.3d 1350 (D.C. Cir. 2008) : In a prosecution for various crimes arising from the theft of millions of dollars from the Washington Teachers Union, the government charged six specific acts of embezzlement as well as a conspiracy to embezzle to commit fraud, and offered evidence of thousands of transactions in which one defendant took money from the union. Affirming, the Court rejected one defendant's argument that it was error to admit summary charts because the underlying documents were not admitted. It noted that "the point of Rule 1006 is to avoid introducing all the documents." The Court also rejected the argument that the charts were "argumentative, prejudicial and selective." It reasoned that "the fact that a non-expert witness ... prepared a chart or testified about it does not make the chart inadmissible," "[n]or is it problematic for a witness to perform some calculations in preparing a chart," and "[e]ven if the calculations are mistaken, the chart is itself admissible, since admissible evidence may be unpersuasive and a defendant has the opportunity to rebut it."

United States v. Valencia, 600 F.3d 389 (5th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed fraud convictions arising from a scheme to give false information regarding natural gas trades to industry publications in order to manipulate natural gas markets. It found no abuse of discretion when a former risk manager at one of the involved companies testified to the effects of the false reporting, based on analyses he conducted on all relevant trades in the company's vast databases. These records had been made available to the defense in a timely manner, and the witness' testimony would assist the jury in understanding how voluminous records boiled down to the potential for profit or loss. The Court distinguished this evidence from a summary of trial evidence, and held that limitations on the latter were inapplicable, given the plain language and purposes of Rule 1006.

[4] Expert Testimony [Go To Main]

Eichorn v. AT&T Corp., 484 F.3d 644 (3d Cir. 2007) : Affirming summary judgment for the plaintiffs in an action alleging improper termination of pension benefits under ERISA, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of spreadsheets prepared by the son of plaintiffs. The son, who was not an expert, made various assumptions about future events, such as when the plaintiffs would have retired, how their salaries would have increased, what choices the plaintiffs would have made with respect to pension benefits, and life expectancy of the plaintiffs. Although the plaintiffs claimed that the spreadsheets were admissible under Rule 1006, the Court concluded that "[t]he calculations went beyond the data they summarized and included several assumptions, inferences, and projections about future events, which represent Mr. Crowley's opinion, rather than the underlying information." The evidence was thus subject to the rules governing opinion testimony, and was properly held inadmissible, given there was no abuse of discretion in finding that the son was not qualified to render an opinion as a lay witness.

[5] Foundation Requirement [Go To Main]

United States v. Oros, 578 F.3d 703 (7th Cir. 2009) : Affirming a conviction for bribery of a public official, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit charts summarizing voluminous bank and telephone records, because the introducing witness did not provide evidence that the underlying records met the requirements of the business records exception and were thus admissible. The Trial Judge had erroneously accepted the government's argument that "because the government was only introducing the summary (and not the underlying records themselves), no certification or testimony from a custodian was required."

[8] Notice [Go To Main]

United States v. Isaacs, 593 F.3d 517 (7th Cir. 2010) : In a case involving computer fraud, the government provided relevant data to the defendant 15 months before trial. It then provided the defendant a summary of the data three days before trial. The Court held that the summary and underlying data were made available at a "reasonable time" within the meaning of Rule 1006. The defendant "had at least fifteen months to review the data and compare it to the summary exhibits to determine if there were any inaccuracies."

[12] Summaries of Trial Evidence [Go To Main]

[b] Summaries of Trial Evidence -- Criminal Cases

[ii] Summaries of Trial Evidence -- Criminal Cases -- Fraud Cases

United States v. Nguyen, 504 F.3d 561 (5th Cir. 2007) : Affirming convictions arising from a fraudulent home buying scheme, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit summary testimony from an FBI financial analyst. The testimony "was inappropriate" because, for example, the analyst referred to one defendant as a coconspirator and thereby offered an opinion on mental state that is prohibited by Rule 704(b). Moreover, the analyst provided a summary of her investigation and authenticated a summary chart that relied in part on out-of-court statements that unspecified witnesses made to FBI agents during their investigation; the Court held that this testimony "was in error because the supporting evidence must have been presented previously to the jury to establish any assumptions reflected in the summary." The Court observed that it has allowed the use of summary witnesses in limited situations, but that it "has repeatedly warned of its dangers" and that "[s]ummary witnesses may not be used as a substitute for, or a supplement to, closing argument."

United States v. Green, 428 F.3d 1131 (8th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a conviction for fraud in an identity-theft scheme, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of charts outlining individual transactions and summarizing the evidence in spreadsheet form. The charts summarized evidence already introduced at trial and assisted the jury in understanding how the scheme was perpetrated, and the witness who prepared the charts was available for cross-examination. Instructions to consider the charts as evidence while also taking into account "all the testimony" heard and the "way in which [the charts] were prepared" were sufficient.

United States v. Lewis, 594 F.3d 1270 (10th Cir. 2010) : In a massive fraud case the prosecution created a database from which it prepared summary exhibits for presentation at trial. Affirming, the Court held that the defense was not entitled under Rule 1006 to disclosure of the database, since the underlying documents were not the database but the bank records that were admitted into evidence, which the defense had been given ample time to inspect and review. In United States v. Schuler, 458 F.3d 1148 (10th Cir. 2006) , the Court affirmed a conviction for fraud. It cited Rule 1006 in upholding the use of exhibits summarizing voluminous financial records, where the underlying financial records "were admissible and were in fact admitted into evidence" and had been made available to the defendant in advance of trial.

[iii] Summaries of Trial Evidence -- Criminal Cases -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Milkiewicz, 470 F.3d 390 (1st Cir. 2006) : Toward the end of a fraud and tax fraud case in which several thousand pages of financial records were offered by the government to prove transactions in the scheme, the prosecutor called an IRS agent to testify about a series of charts that summarized the information contained in those financial records. The defense initially objected only to admission of the charts as independent evidence, but later argued that they should not have been given to the jury because one set contained errors and significant omissions rendering it unreliable and the other was improperly admitted through the agent, who was not qualified as a witness. Affirming, the Court took the occasion to clarify its approach to the treatment of summaries under the Rules, noting that "[i]n a case where voluminous underlying records are involved, the key difference between [the] various approaches appears to be the purpose for which the summaries are offered":

> Charts admitted under Rule 1006 are explicitly intended to reflect the contents of the documents they summarize and typically are substitutes in evidence for the voluminous originals. Consequently they must fairly represent the underlying documents and be " 'accurate and non-prejudicial.' " [citations omitted]
>
> By contrast, a pedagogical aid that is allowed under Rule 611(a) to illustrate or clarify a party's position, or allowed under Rule 703 to assist expert testimony, may be less neutral in its presentation. Record support is necessary because such devices tend to be "more akin to argument than to evidence," and "may reflect to some extent, through captions or other organizational devices or descriptions, the inferences and conclusions drawn from the underlying evidence by the summary's proponent." In some cases, however, such pedagogical devices may be sufficiently accurate and reliable that they, too, are admissible in evidence, even though they do not meet the specific requirements of Rule 1006.

The Court held that although most, if not all, of the charts would have been admissible into evidence under Rule 1006, there certainly was no abuse of discretion in allowing the jury to consider them under Rules 611(a) and 703. Deficiencies in the underlying records were explored on examination of the witnesses, "and gaps or other imperfections in the underlying data do not necessarily undermine the value of the summary charts as pedagogical aids under Rule 611(a)." As for the tax charts, the summarization of documents "took patience but not expertise," and an IRS agent was well qualified to make the computations, "particularly where, as here, the computation required no subjective judgment."

United States v. Whitfield, 590 F.3d 325 (5th Cir. 2009) : An attorney and two state judges were convicted for a bribery scheme in which the attorney arranged, guaranteed, and paid off loans for the judges, in order to corruptly influence the outcome of cases he had filed in their courts. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion when a government witness was permitted to explain charts summarizing the financial transactions at issue in the case. Although the Court had "properly expressed some reluctance to generally endorse the use of summary evidence," the testimony and charts were neither cumulative nor prejudicial; the information presented to the jury synthesized voluminous records that were properly admitted; the witness was cross-examined fully; and the defendant did not contend that the charts were incorrect or misleading.

[13] Summary Judgment [Go To Main]

Judson Atkinson Candies, Inc. v. Latini-Hohberger Dhimantec, 529 F.3d 371 (7th Cir. 2008) : Affirming summary judgment for the defendants in an action by a judgment creditor seeking to set aside allegedly fraudulent transfers, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in striking two charts that the plaintiff had prepared, which summarized the allegedly fraudulent transfers. The charts were not admissible under Rule 1006 because the plaintiff had neither established the admissibility of the records on which the summaries were purportedly based nor authenticated the summaries in any way.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1007 RULE 1007

5-1007 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1007.syn

§ 1007.syn Synopsis to Chapter 1007: RULE 1007

1007.01 Official Text

1007.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Admissions Proving Genuineness

[2] Relationship to Rule 1004

[3] Relationship to Rule 801(d)(2)

[4] Testimony

1007.03 Annotated Cases

1007.04 Legislative History

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1007 RULE 1007

5-1007 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1007.01

1007.01 Official Text

Rule 1007. Testimony or Written Admission of Party

Contents of writings, recordings, or photographs may be proved by the testimony or deposition of the party against whom offered or by that party's written admission, without accounting for the nonproduction of the original.

118 of 176 DOCUMENTS

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1007 RULE 1007

5-1007 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1007.02

1007.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Admissions Proving Genuineness

Although some cases have taken a different view, most American Courts have held that if the secondary evidence offered consists of an admission of the contents by the opponent of the evidence, no showing is required of why the original is not produced. Prior to the enactment of the Federal Rules, it was not altogether clear whether all admissions would serve to prove the contents of an item otherwise covered by the Best Evidence Rule. Rule 1007 provides that the contents of writings and recordings may be proved only by admissions made in the course of giving testimony under oath or by written admissions. The policy underlying the Best Evidence Rule is to obtain an accurate version of the contents of writings and the other items covered by the Rule. If all oral admissions sufficed to prove the contents of writings, accuracy might be jeopardized. The Advisory Committee accepted the argument that the possibility of error was reduced if admissibility under this Rule was confined to written admissions or admissions under oath.

[2] Relationship to Rule 1004

Admissions not covered by Rule 1007 might still be used under Rule 1004 to prove the contents of a writing. If A sues B for breach of contract, for example, and A satisfies Rule 1004 by showing that the original of the contract was destroyed and that there was no bad faith in A's doing so, A can then offer, as secondary evidence, admissions made by B concerning the contents of the contract. The difference between Rule 1004 and the instant Rule is that the former requires an accounting for the original, while the instant Rule does not.

[3] Relationship to Rule 801(d)(2)

The exact relationship between Rule 1007 and Rule 801(d)(2) is unclear. If an authorized speaker, an agent or employee, or a coconspirator admits the content of a writing or recording, should a party against whom ordinary admissions could be introduced under Rule 801(d)(2) be deemed to have admitted the authenticity of the writing or recording? Arguably, the answer is yes; whatever reasons justify the use of ordinary 801(d)(2) admissions as substantive evidence on the merits would seem to carry over to the often less significant question of proving the contents of a writing or recording.

[4] Testimony

There is a question under the Rule as to what "testimony" of a party qualifies as establishing the contents of a document. The fact that a deposition explicitly qualifies suggests that grand jury testimony and testimony in other proceedings should also qualify. In fact, any testimonial statement made by the person against whom a writing is offered should be sufficient to establish the contents of the writing, as long as the statement is reliably recorded. The Advisory Committee's concern about mistransmission is adequately answered by a reliable recording (e.g., at a legislative hearing).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1007 RULE 1007

5-1007 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1007.03

1007.03 Annotated Cases

No significant decisions.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1007 RULE 1007

5-1007 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1007.04

1007.04 Legislative History

Advisory Committee's Note

While the parent case, Slatterie v. Pooley, 6 M. & W. 664, 151 Eng. Rep. 579 (Exch. 1840), allows proof of contents by evidence of an oral admission by the party against whom offered, without accounting for nonproduction of the original, the risk of inaccuracy is substantial and the decision is at odds with the purpose of the rule giving preference to the original. See 4 Wigmore § 1255. The instant rule follows Professor McCormick's suggestion of limiting this use of admissions to those made in the course of giving testimony or in writing. McCormick § 208, p. 424. The limitation, of course, does not call for excluding evidence of an oral admission when nonproduction of the original has been accounted for and secondary evidence generally has become admissible. Rule 1004 supra .

A similar provision is contained in New Jersey Evidence Rule 70(1)(h).

[The entire Advisory Committee Note accompanying the gender-neutralizing changes effective October 1, 1987 is as follows: "The amendment is technical. No substantive change is intended."]

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
Supp. To CHAPTER 1007 RULE 1007

5-1007 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 1007, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 1007. Testimony or Written Admission of Party	Rule 1007. Testimony or Statement of a Party to Prove Content
Contents of writings,	The proponent may

record
ings,
or photo-grap hs may be prov ed
by
the testi mon y or deposition
of
the part y agai nst who m offer ed
or by that part y's written ad-mission,
with out ac-coun ting for
the non-producprov e the content of a writing,
record
ing,
or photo-grap h by the testi mon
y, deposition
, or written state men t of
the part y agai nst who m
the evid ence is offer ed.
The proponent need not ac-coun t for

tion of the original.	the original.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 1007 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
Supp. To CHAPTER 1007 RULE 1007

5-1007 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to

Supp. to §

[Go To Main]

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1008 RULE 1008

5-1008 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1008.syn

§ 1008.syn Synopsis to Chapter 1008: RULE 1008

1008.01 Official Text

1008.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Preliminary Questions for the Court

[2] Jury Issues

1008.03 Annotated Cases

1008.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

[2] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1008 RULE 1008

5-1008 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1008.01

1008.01 Official Text

Rule 1008. Functions of Court and Jury

When the admissibility of other evidence of contents of writings, recordings, or photographs under these rules depends upon the fulfillment of a condition of fact, the question whether the condition has been fulfilled is ordinarily for the court to determine in accordance with the provisions of rule 104. However, when an issue is raised (a) whether the asserted writing ever existed, or (b) whether another writing, recording, or photograph produced at the trial is the original, or (c) whether other evidence of contents correctly reflects the contents, the issue is for the trier of fact to determine as in the case of other issues of fact.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1008 RULE 1008

5-1008 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1008.02

1008.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Preliminary Questions for the Court

The Editorial Explanatory Comment accompanying Rule 104 discusses the role of the Judge in deciding preliminary questions of fact relating to "rules of competency" and the Judge's role in handling problems of conditional relevancy. See § 104.02[2]. Some further discussion concerning the difference between the two roles is offered in the Editorial Explanatory Comment accompanying Rule 901, § 901.02[1]. Rule 1008, which is basically a specialized application of the principles set forth in Rule 104, makes it necessary to deal with the problem once more.

Prior to permitting evidence of the contents of a writing, recording, or photograph to go to the jury, the Judge must ensure that the technical requirements of the Best Evidence Rule have been satisfied. Hence, the Judge must determine, at least, the following questions:

(1) whether a given item of evidence is an "original";

(2) whether a given item of evidence qualifies as a duplicate and is thus presumptively admissible;

(3) whether a genuine question is raised as to the authenticity of the original for purposes of Rule 1003;

(4) whether it would be unfair to admit a duplicate in lieu of an original as provided for in Rule 1003;

(5) whether an original is lost or destroyed, and whether a diligent search has been conducted for the original; n1

(6) whether the proponent lost or destroyed evidence in bad faith;

(7) whether an original can be obtained by any available judicial process;

(8) whether an adverse party has possession or control over the original and, if so, whether proper notice was given to that party;

(9) whether evidence goes to a collateral matter or to a controlling issue.

All of the above questions are concerned with the policies behind the Best Evidence Rule. None would be of much interest to the jury, and would only serve to distract and confuse. Hence, they are properly left to the Trial Judge.

[2] Jury Issues

If an issue is raised as to: (a) whether the asserted writing ever existed, (b) whether another writing, recording, or photograph produced at the trial is the original, or (c) whether other evidence of contents correctly reflects the contents, the issue is for the jury to determine. An example is provided in the Advisory Committee's Note. If the plaintiff offers secondary evidence of the contents of an alleged contract, having produced evidence to show the loss of the original, the Trial Judge cannot take from the jury the question of whether a contract was ever executed. If the Judge could decide the point, the Advisory Committee states that the case is at an end without ever going to the jury on a central issue. The same reasoning applies where the question of admissibility is the accuracy of the secondary evidence. The parties should not be deprived of a jury trial where what might be thought of as a preliminary issue is also the ultimate issue to be decided by the jury.

Assume A and B are involved in a contract dispute, and each offers a photocopy of what each claims the contract to be. What are the respective functions of Judge and jury? It seems that the Judge should determine the following question: Assuming that A (or B) is correct in asserting that his copy is a copy of the actual contract, has A (or B) shown a valid excuse for not producing the original? If the answer is yes, the Judge should let the evidence in for A, and do the same for B if B makes a similar showing, and let the jury decide which of the two copies actually represents the contract between the parties.

As with Rule 104(b), where the factual determination is for the jury, the Trial Judge must decide whether the evidence is sufficient to support a finding; the Court does not make a credibility determination. Where the factual determination is for the Judge, it is the Judge who must be persuaded, and it is the Judge who makes the determinations of credibility and probative force on the evidence offered to prove the preliminary question of fact.

One of the advantages of Rule 1008 is that it deals explicitly with some of the trickiest problems of distinguishing between conditional relevance questions and competency questions. If, as we suspect, Trial Judges have an easier time dealing with Rule 1008 than with Rule 104, it suggests that Rule 104 could be amended to address more explicitly some of the difficult Judge-jury questions that frequently arise, especially in complex litigation.

FOOTNOTES:
(n1)Footnote 1. See Burt Rigid Box, Inc. v. Travelers Property Cas. Corp., 302 F.3d 83 (2d Cir. 2002) (whether a party exercised due diligence under Rule 1004 is a question for the Court and not the jury).

126 of 176 DOCUMENTS

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1008 RULE 1008

5-1008 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1008.03

1008.03 Annotated Cases

Seiler v. Lucasfilm, Ltd., 808 F.2d 1316 (9th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed a summary judgment for the defendant in a copyright infringement action by an artist who claimed that the defendant copied his drawings in making a film. The plaintiff had no originals of his drawings, and the Trial Judge found that the plaintiff failed to establish that it was more probable than not that originals of materials assertedly copied by the defendant were destroyed or lost without bad faith. Thus, the Judge properly excluded drawings by the plaintiff which purported to reproduce the originals. The plaintiff argued that Rule 1008 required a trial on whether the reconstructions correctly reflected the originals, but the Court said fulfillment of the conditions of admissibility, including those in Rule 1004, is a preliminary question for the Judge. Only if the reconstructions were found admissible would their accuracy have become a jury question.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1008 RULE 1008

5-1008 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1008.04

1008.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Advisory Committee's Note

Most preliminary questions of fact in connection with applying the rule preferring the original as evidence of contents are for the judge, under the general principles announced in Rule 104 supra . Thus, the question whether the loss of the originals has been established, or of the fulfillment of other conditions specified in Rule 1004 supra , is for the judge. However, questions may arise which go beyond the mere administration of the rule preferring the original and into the merits of the controversy. For example, plaintiff offers secondary evidence of the contents of an alleged contract, after first introducing evidence of loss of the original, and defendant counters with evidence that no such contract was ever executed. If the judge decides that the contract was never executed and excludes the secondary evidence, the case is at an end without ever going to the jury on a central issue. Levin, Authentication and Content of Writings, 10 Rutgers L. Rev. 632, 644 (1956). The latter portion of the instant rule is designed to insure treatment of these situations as raising jury questions. The decision is not one for uncontrolled discretion of the jury but is subject to the control exercised generally by the judge over jury determinations. See Rule 104(b) supra.

For similar provisions, see Uniform Rule 70(2); Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60-467(b); New Jersey Evidence Rule 70(2), (3).

[2] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

The phrase "in accordance with the provisions of Rule 104" was added to make clear that the procedures set forth in Rule 104 apply to the situation described in the first sentence of this Rule.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
Supp. To CHAPTER 1008 RULE 1008

5-1008 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 1008, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 1008. Functions of Court and Jury	Rule 1008. Functions of the Court and Jury
When the admissibility of other	Ordinarily, the court determines evidence of contents of writings, recordings, or photographs under these rules depends upon the fulfillment of a condition of fact, the question whether the condition has been fulfilled is whether the proponent has fulfilled the factual conditions for admitting other evidence of the content of a writing, recording, or photograph under Rule 1004 or 1005. But in a jury trial, the ordinarily for the court to determine in accordance with the provisions of rule 104. However, when an issue is raised (a) whether the asserted writing ever existed, or (b) whether another writ- jury determines -- in accordance with Rule 104(b) -- any issue about whether:

ing, re- cord ing, or pho- to- grap h pro- duce d at the trial is the ori- gin- al, or (c) whet her oth- er evid ence of con- tents cor- rectl y re- flect s the con- tents , the is- sue is for the trier of fact to de- ter- min e as in the case of other issues of fact.

(a) an asserted writing, recording, or photograph ever existed;

(b) another one produced at the trial or hearing is the original; or

(c) other evidence

of content
ac-curately
reflect s the content.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 1008 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
Supp. To CHAPTER 1008 RULE 1008

5-1008 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to

Supp. to §

[Go To Main]

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1101 RULE 1101

5-1101 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1101.syn

§ 1101.syn Synopsis to Chapter 1101: RULE 1101

1101.01 Official Text

1101.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Rationale for Inapplicability of Evidence Rules to Certain Proceedings

[2] Situations in Which Some Evidence Rules Might Be Applicable

[3] Supervised Release Revocation Proceedings

[4] Suppression Hearings

[5] Psychiatric Release and Commitment Proceedings

[6] Arbitrations and Administrative Hearings

[7] Juvenile Transfer Proceedings

[8] Preliminary Injunction Proceedings

[9] Proceedings Listed in Rule 1101(e)

[10] Non-Jury Trials: An Anomaly?

[11] Military Courts

1101.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Rule 1101(a) -- Courts and Magistrates

[2] Rule 1101(b) -- Proceedings Generally

[a] Rule 1101(b) -- Administrative Proceedings

[b] Rule 1101(b) -- Arbitration Proceedings

[c] Rule 1101(b) -- Bankruptcy Cases

[d] Rule 1101(b) -- Class Action Settlement Fairness Hearing

[e] Rule 1101(b) -- Forfeiture Proceedings

[f] Rule 1101(b) -- Nonjury Trials

[g] Rule 1101(b) -- Preliminary Injunction Proceedings

[3] Rule 1101(c) -- Rule of Privilege

[4] Rule 1101(d)(1) -- Rules Inapplicable -- Preliminary Questions of Fact -- Suppression Hearing

[5] Rule 1101(d)(2) -- Rules Inapplicable -- Grand Jury

[6] Rule 1101(d)(3) -- Rules Inapplicable -- Miscellaneous Proceedings

[a] Rule 1101(d)(3) -- Extradition and Rendition Proceedings

[b] Rule 1101(d)(3) -- Immigration Proceedings

[c] Rule 1101(d)(3) -- Parole, Probation, and Supervised Release Revocation Proceedings

[d] Rule 1101(d)(3) -- Penalty Phase of Capital Trial

[e] Rule 1101(d)(3) -- Release From Psychiatric Commitment Proceedings

[f] Rule 1101(d)(3) -- Sentencing

1101.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

[2] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

[3] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

[4] 1993 Amendment Committee Note

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1101 RULE 1101

5-1101 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1101.01

1101.01 Official Text

Rule 1101. Applicability of Rules

(a) Courts and judges. -- These rules apply to the United States district courts, the District Court of Guam, the District Court of the Virgin Islands, the District Court for the Northern Mariana Islands, the United States courts of appeals, the United States Claims Court, and to United States bankruptcy judges and United States magistrate judges, in the actions, cases, and proceedings and to the extent hereinafter set forth. The terms "judge" and "court" in these rules include United States bankruptcy judges and United States magistrate judges.

(b) Proceedings generally. -- These rules apply generally to civil actions and proceedings, including admiralty and maritime cases, to criminal cases and proceedings, to contempt proceedings except those in which the court may act summarily, and to proceedings and cases under title 11, United States Code.

(c) Rule of privilege. -- The rule with respect to privileges applies at all stages of all actions, cases, and proceedings.

(d) Rules inapplicable. -- The rules (other than with respect to privileges) do not apply in the following situations:

(1) Preliminary questions of fact. -- The determination of questions of fact preliminary to admissibility of evidence when the issue is to be determined by the court under rule 104.

(2) Grand jury. -- Proceedings before grand juries.

(3) Miscellaneous proceedings. -- Proceedings for extradition or rendition; preliminary examinations in criminal cases; sentencing, or granting or revoking probation; issuance of warrants for arrest, criminal summonses, and search warrants; and proceedings with respect to release on bail or otherwise.

(e) Rules applicable in part. -- In the following proceedings these rules apply to the extent that matters of evidence are not provided for in the statutes which govern procedure therein or in other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority: the trial of misdemeanors and other petty offenses before United States magistrate judges; review of agency actions when the facts are subject to trial de novo under section 706(2)(F) of title 5, United States Code; review of orders of the Secretary of Agriculture under section 2 of the Act entitled "An Act to authorize association of producers of agricultural products" approved February 18, 1922 (7 U.S.C. 292), and under sections 6 and 7(c) of the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act, 1930 (7 U.S.C. 499f, 499g(c)); naturalization and revocation of naturalization under sections 310-318 of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1421-1429); prize proceedings in admiralty under sections 7651-7681 of title 10, United States Code; review of orders of the Secretary of the Interior under section 2 of the Act entitled "An Act authorizing associations of producers of aquatic products" approved June 25, 1934 (15 U.S.C. 522); review of orders of petroleum control boards under section 5 of the Act entitled "An Act to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in petroleum and its products by prohibiting the shipment in such commerce of petroleum and its products produced in violation of State law, and for other purposes," approved February 22, 1935 (15 U.S.C. 715d); actions for fines, penalties, or forfeitures under part V of title IV of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1581-1624), or under the Anti-Smuggling Act (19 U.S.C. 1701-1711); criminal libel for condemnation, exclusion of imports, or other proceedings under the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act (21 U.S.C. 301-392); disputes between seamen under sections 4079, 4080, and 4081 of the Revised Statutes (22 U.S.C. 256-258); habeas corpus under sections 2241-2254 of title 28, United States Code; motions to vacate, set aside or correct sentence under section 2255 of title 28, United States Code; actions for penalties for refusal to transport destitute seamen under section 4578 of the Revised Statutes (46 U.S.C. 679); actions against the United States under the Act entitled "An Act authorizing suits against the United States in admiralty for damage caused by and salvage service rendered to public vessels belonging to the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1925 (46 U.S.C. 781-790), as implemented by section 7730 of title 10, United States Code.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1101 RULE 1101

5-1101 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1101.02

1101.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Rationale for Inapplicability of Evidence Rules to Certain Proceedings

With the exception of rules of privilege, which apply at all stages of all actions, cases, and proceedings, n1 the Federal Rules of Evidence do not ordinarily govern preliminary stages of litigation, criminal or civil, n2 or preliminary factfinding relating to the application of an evidentiary Rule, as opposed to factfinding relating to the merits of the case. Nor do the Rules generally apply to post-adjudicative hearings such as sentencing proceedings. n3

It should be remembered, however, that even where the Rules do not apply, they may be helpful in assessing the reliability of statements made in such proceedings. n4

[2] Situations in Which Some Evidence Rules Might Be Applicable

Even though Congress has chosen to provide that the Federal Rules of Evidence should not apply during most preliminary and post-trial parts of litigation, the fact remains that many of the Rules will be borrowed and continued in effect during these proceedings. Most of the Congressional concern was with the extension of the hearsay rule outside the trial context. It is difficult to imagine that Congress intended that witnesses should testify without taking an oath, that interpreters should not be provided for non-English speaking persons, and that proper objections should not be made to offers of evidence in proceedings other than trials on the merits. The decisions to date indicate that Rule 1101 is primarily a restriction on the application of the hearsay rule. n5

[3] Supervised Release Revocation Proceedings

The Federal Sentencing Reform Act of 1984 abolished parole and replaced it with a system of supervised release. Rule 1101(d)(3) provides that the Rules of Evidence are not applicable to "sentencing, or granting or revoking probation"; but it makes no reference to supervised release revocation proceedings. Of course, supervised release proceedings did not exist when Rule 1101 became law. But the absence of a specific reference to these proceedings has created an issue for the Courts to resolve.

In the leading case of United States v. Frazier, 26 F.3d 110 (11th Cir. 1994) , Frazier made several interesting arguments in support of the proposition that the Evidence Rules are applicable to supervised release revocation proceedings. These arguments were: (1) supervised release proceedings are not specifically listed in Rule 1101(d); (2) Rule 1101 was amended after supervised release proceedings were instituted in 1984 (for example, to refer to "magistrate judges" rather than "magistrates"), and yet no attempt was made to amend subdivision (d) to include a reference to supervised release proceedings; (3) the Criminal Rules have been amended to refer to supervised release proceedings, while the Evidence Rules have not; and (4) supervised release proceedings are different from parole and probation proceedings, because supervised release is statutorily required in specified circumstances, whereas parole and probation are discretionary acts of grace.

The Court in Frazier rejected all these arguments. It reasoned that the failure to amend Evidence Rule 1101 to refer to supervised release revocation proceedings was not dispositive, "because we believe that Congress considered probation revocation and supervised release revocation so analogous as to be interchangeable." It also concluded that supervised release is "conceptually the same" as parole. A proceeding to revoke either parole or supervised release is by definition more flexible than a trial, and therefore neither proceeding should be constrained by the Rules of Evidence. Finally, the Court observed that as with parole revocation proceedings, the subject of a supervised release proceeding remains protected by minimal evidentiary standards of reliability. The Courts that have dealt with the question have all held, consistently with Frazier, that the Federal Rules of Evidence (with the exception of privilege rules) are inapplicable to supervised release revocation proceedings. n6

[4] Suppression Hearings

Unlike proceedings to obtain a warrant, suppression hearings are not specifically covered by the Rule 1101(d) exclusion. This has not deterred most Courts, however, from holding that the Federal Rules are not applicable to suppression hearings. The Supreme Court dealt with the question in United States v. Matlock, 415 U.S. 164 (1974) , a pre-Rules case which discussed the then-proposed Rule 1101. The Court reasoned that suppression hearings are essentially preliminary hearings on the admissibility of evidence, and are thus controlled by the general provision of Rule 1101(d) exempting the determination of preliminary questions of fact from the Evidence Rules. The Court also relied on the rationale that "in proceedings where the judge himself is considering the admissibility of evidence, the exclusionary rules, aside from rules of privilege, should not be applicable; and the judge should receive the evidence and give it such weight as his judgment and experience counsel." In other words, the Evidence Rules are by and large designed to protect against misuse of information by the jury; where the proceedings are before the Judge, the need for the Evidence Rules diminishes. The Matlock Court concluded that at a suppression hearing "the judge should be empowered to hear any relevant evidence, such as affidavits or other reliable hearsay." n7

There is one important case, however, that holds that at least certain Evidence Rules are applicable in suppression hearings. In United States v. Brewer, 947 F.2d 404 (9th Cir. 1991) , the defendant moved to sequester a police officer who was scheduled to testify after another police officer at a suppression hearing. The Trial Judge denied the motion on the ground that Rule 615 (requiring sequestration upon motion) was not applicable to suppression hearings. The two police officers testified virtually identically. The Ninth Circuit reversed Brewer's conviction due to error at the suppression hearing. The panel addressed the government's argument that Rule 1101(d)(1) (exempting preliminary determinations from the Evidence Rules) covered suppression hearings. The Court noted that Rule 1101(d)(1) essentially restates Rule 104, and elaborated as follows:

> The commentary that follows Rule 104 makes it clear that this section is limited to the preliminary requirements or conditions that must be proved before a particular rule of evidence may be applied. Notes of the Advisory Committee on 1972 Proposed Rules. The examples of foundational facts that may be proved without complying with the exclusionary Rules of Evidence include the qualifications of an expert, the unavailability of a witness whose former testimony is being offered, the presence of a third person during a conversation between an attorney and client, proof of the interest of the declarant in determining whether the out-of-court statement threatens that interest, the competency of a child to testify as a witness.

The Brewer Court distinguished "between the type of proof that may be presented as a foundation for the admission of evidence, such as a declaration against interest, or a dying declaration, and procedural rules that have been developed to enhance the search for the truth." It construed Rule 1101(d) to mean "that the traditional exclusionary rules do not apply, but that procedural regulation of the process of admission and exclusion remains applicable." The Brewer Court found that Rule 615 was a procedural rule designed to guarantee a fair proceeding, as opposed to a rule dealing with the admissibility of evidence. Therefore Rule 615 was fully applicable in suppression hearings. The Court distinguished the Supreme Court's decision in Matlock, which held specifically that the hearsay rule is inapplicable in suppression hearings. The Brewer Court stated that Matlock "does not support the notion that procedural rules designed to protect the integrity of the fact finding process are inapplicable in a suppression hearing."

We believe that the distinction put forth in Brewer, between exclusionary rules (that are not applicable to preliminary, Judge-conducted proceedings) and rules guaranteeing procedural fairness (that are applicable to such proceedings) has much to commend it. The distinction is consistent with the policy of Rule 104; and Rule 1101 is simply a particularized application of the principles of Rule 104.

[5] Psychiatric Release and Commitment Proceedings

Rule 1101 is silent on whether it exempts proceedings for psychiatric commitment and release from the application of the Evidence Rules. In United States v. Palesky, 855 F.2d 34 (1st Cir. 1988) , the Court held that the Rules of Evidence are not applicable in hearings held to determine whether a person will be committed to or released from a psychiatric facility. The Court analogized such hearings to bail release hearings, which are specifically exempted from the Evidence Rules, and further reasoned that a Court determining the question of psychiatric commitment or release "should not be too confined in the kinds of evidence it considers." Thus, the more flexible and informal the proceedings, the more the need for exemption from the Evidence Rules. The reasoning of Palesky and is consistent with the rationale for exempting other types of proceedings from the Evidence Rules, such as bail hearings and sentencing hearings.

[6] Arbitrations and Administrative Hearings

Rule 1101 does not specifically exempt arbitrations and administrative proceedings from the Rules of Evidence. However, those proceedings are inferentially so exempted, because Rule 1101(a) provides that the Rules are applicable to "courts," and arbitration and administrative proceedings are not considered "court" proceedings. Nor are they considered "civil actions and proceedings" within the meaning of Rule 1101(b). Despite the lack of specificity in the Rule, the Courts have had no problem in exempting arbitrations and administrative hearings from the Evidence Rules. n8 Besides the implicit text of Rule 1101(a), the Courts rely on the rationale that administrative and arbitration hearings are designed to be informal and flexible--the nature of the proceedings would be undermined by formal, trial-geared rules. For good measure, there are a plethora of statutes and regulations providing that particular administrative and arbitration proceedings are outside the scope of the Federal Rules of Evidence. n9

As with other proceedings to which the Federal Rules are inapplicable, administrative proceedings are not devoid of evidentiary protection. The Federal Rules are often used as "a helpful guide to proper hearing practices." n10 And there are many cases, rules, and statutes imposing requirements on the presentation of evidence that are analogous to those found in the Federal Rules. n11

[7] Juvenile Transfer Proceedings

The Evidence Rules have been held inapplicable to proceedings brought under 8 U.S.C. § 5032 to determine whether a juvenile should be tried as an adult. Rule 1101 is silent as to such proceedings, but the Courts have reasoned that a transfer proceeding "is of a preliminary nature and is consequently not comparable to a civil or criminal trial."

Government of Virgin Islands ex rel. A.M., 34 F.3d 153 (3rd Cir. 1994) . The court in A.M. stated that juvenile transfer proceedings were most analogous to preliminary examinations in criminal cases, which are specifically exempted by Rule 1101(d)(3). n12

[8] Preliminary Injunction Proceedings

Rule 1101 is silent on whether the Federal Rules are applicable to preliminary injunction proceedings. The rather sparse case law on the matter provides that the Evidence Rules are not applicable to such proceedings when they are held independently from the trial. There are at least three reasons for this exemption. First is the familiar principle that the Federal Rules are really designed to protect against misuse of information by juries, and therefore they should not be used to hinder Judges in making preliminary determinations, because Judges can properly weigh information that would be inadmissible at a trial. Second, when preliminary injunction hearings are held independently from a trial on the merits, there is a need for speed and flexibility that is inconsistent with the formal Rules of Evidence. Third, Fed. R. Civ. P. 65(a) appears to contemplate that a Judge can and will consider inadmissible evidence in determining whether a preliminary injunction will be issued. Rule 65(a)(2) provides that where consolidation of the preliminary injunction proceeding and the trial is not ordered, "any evidence received upon an application for a preliminary injunction which would be admissible upon the trial on the merits becomes part of the record on the trial and need not be repeated upon the trial." This provision presumes that some of the evidence considered at the preliminary injunction hearing would not be admissible if offered at trial. It also presumes, reasonably enough, that if the preliminary injunction proceeding is consolidated with a trial, then the Rules of Evidence will apply.

The court in SEC v. General Refractories Co., 400 F. Supp. 1248 (D.D.C. 1975) , summed it up as follows:

> Rule 65(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure contemplates the introduction at a hearing on a preliminary injunction of evidence which would not be admissible in a final trial on the merits. This relaxation of the rule of evidence at the preliminary injunction stage is consonant with one of the key purposes of a preliminary injunction: the need for speedy relief. Sworn affidavits and investigatory transcripts of testimony taken under oath are properly admitted as probative evidence at a preliminary injunctive hearing, where, as here, testimony of numerous live witnesses is simply not practical and the magnitude of inquiry would preclude any meaningful "trial type" hearing at a preliminary stage.

[9] Proceedings Listed in Rule 1101(e)

Rule 1101(e) sets forth a laundry list of proceedings in which the Evidence Rules are applicable to the extent that matters of evidence are not governed by other rules or statutes. It appears that this provision is devoid of substantive effect. All of the proceedings specified are civil actions or proceedings tried in the Federal Courts (e.g., habeas corpus proceedings). The Evidence Rules are already applicable to these proceedings under the provisions of Rule 1101(a) and (c). So the only apparent purpose for subdivision (e) is to highlight the fact that other rules and statutes might trump the Evidence Rules in particular circumstances. Yet this merely states the obvious. There are in fact over 100 statutes that trump the Evidence Rules in specific circumstances. Rule 1101(e) provides some (incomplete) guidance, but it appears to have no independent content.

An argument can be made that Rule 1101(e) should be abrogated, given the fact that it makes no attempt to be comprehensive and has no substantive effect. On the other hand, it appears to be doing no harm, and can be said to usefully highlight the relationship between the Evidence Rules and some of the evidentiary law outside those Rules.

It could also be argued that Rule 1101(e) should be retained because it is necessary to prevent the enumerated statutes from being superseded by the later-enacted Evidence Rules. But these independent statutes will not be superseded if Rule 1101(e) is abrogated. This is because the Evidence Rules are written so as not to supersede any statutory rule of evidence. The statutory rules of evidence generally govern one of five topics: (1) presumptions; (2) relevance and prejudice; (3) privilege; (4) hearsay; and (5) authentication. On none of these topics do the Evidence Rules preclude statutory authority from determining whether evidence is admissible. For example, Rule 301 provides a rule on presumptions to the extent "not otherwise provided for by Act of Congress." Rule 402 says that relevant evidence is admissible, unless otherwise provided by Act of Congress, etc. Rule 501 provides for a federal common law of privilege except as otherwise provided by Act of Congress, etc. Rule 802 provides that hearsay is not admissible except as otherwise provided by Act of Congress, etc. And Rule 901 governs authenticity, but does not purport to supersede statutes that provide for authentication; the examples in 901 are illustrative only.

[10] Non-Jury Trials: An Anomaly?

Many of the proceedings conducted outside the purview of the Evidence Rules are preliminary proceedings in which the Trial Judge operates as a factfinder. As stated above, a major justification for exemption of such proceedings from the Federal Rules is that the Judge is the factfinder, and the Judge will not be misled by evidence that would be inadmissible if offered at a trial. For example, a Judge, unlike a jury, will be able to weigh inadmissible hearsay "for what it's worth." But if that premise is accepted, one might wonder why the Evidence Rules (or at least why certain Evidence Rules) should be applicable in bench trials.

It should be noted that at least two Evidence Rules by their terms operate more permissively in bench trials, on the rationale that the Trial Judge can properly assess the evidence that might improperly affect a jury. Under Rule 403, evidence proffered in a bench trial cannot be excluded on grounds of prejudice or confusion. See Gulf States Utils. Co. v. Ecodyne Corp., 635 F.2d 517 (5th Cir. 1981) ("Rule 403 assumes that a trial judge is able to discern and weigh the improper inferences that a jury might draw from certain evidence"). And the limitations added to Rule 703 in 2000 apply only in jury trials.

On the other hand, the hearsay rule has been held fully applicable in bench trials. As the Court stated in In re Oil Spill by Amoco Cadiz, 954 F.2d 1279 (7th Cir. 1992) :

> During the damages trial the district court admitted a great deal of evidence it characterized as hearsay. It did so because it thought that if the rule were to be applied the trial would be too cumbersome. Yet the hearsay rule applies in all trials -- jury and bench, big and small. Rule 101, 1101; Walton v. United Consumers Club, Inc., 786 F.2d 303, 313 (7th Cir. 1986) . A defendant faced with a single $200 million claim is no less entitled to the protection of the rule than is a person defending against 200 claims for $1 million each, or 2,000 claims for $100,000. See, e.g., UNR Industries, Inc. v. Continental Casualty Co., 942 F.2d 1101, 1107 (7th Cir. 1991) (enforcing the rules of evidence in a multi-million dollar case with approximately 100,000 claimants).

The Amoco Cadiz Court has certainly read Rule 1101 correctly. But the question is, why is the Rule as it is? If a Trial Judge can reliably consider hearsay in determining whether coconspirator testimony is admissible, or whether the defendant being sentenced sold a certain amount of cocaine, why can't the Trial Judge reliably consider the same evidence in a trial on the merits? Certainly there is a tension under current law between the rationale for exempting preliminary determinations from the Evidence Rules and the application of some of those Rules in bench trials.

Of course, no reasonable person could advocate that all of the Evidence Rules should be abrogated in bench trials. For example, rules on sequestration of witnesses and the oath requirement, and the rules on judicial notice and presumptions, are necessary to promote accurate factfinding even in a bench trial.

[11] Military Courts

Since September 1, 1980, military courts-martial have been using the Military Rules of Evidence. These rules were implemented by Executive Order, pursuant to the President's authority in Article 36, Uniform Code of Military Justice, 10 U.S.C.A. §§ 801-940, to prescribe procedures and modes of proof in cases tried by courts-martial. Implementation of the Rules is generally designed to adopt the Federal Rules of Evidence. Sections I, II, IV and VI-XI of the Military Rules of Evidence follow Articles I, II, IV and VI-XI of the Federal Rules and adopt those rules, unless such adoption is impracticable, contrary to or inconsistent with the Uniform Code of Military Justice. The Rules apply only to criminal proceedings and throughout substitute the words "military judge" for the term "court," as used in the Federal Rules. Section III of the Military Rules addresses the exclusionary rules concerning self-incrimination, search and seizure, and eyewitness identification. Of particular note are rules governing procedures for litigating constitutional issues, an innovative rule governing bodily views and intrusions, and a rule that governs examination of the accused. Section V of the Military Rules departs from the Federal Rules and continues the present military practice of detailing specific rules of privilege, rather than adopting the Federal Rules approach of looking to development of privileges under common law. The Military Rules are analyzed in S. Saltzburg, L. Schinasi & D. Schlueter, Military Rules Of Evidence Manual.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. See, e.g., United States v. Eirven, 987 F.2d 634 (9th Cir. 1993) (it was improper to impose an enhanced sentence where the defendant would probably have to use privileged information in order to challenge the enhancement).

(n2)Footnote 2. See, e.g., In re Subpoena to Testify Before Grand Jury, 39 F.3d 973 (9th Cir. 1994) (under Rule 1101, neither the hearsay rule nor the personal knowledge requirement is applicable to grand jury proceedings). See also Thompson v. Board of Education, 71 F.R.D. 398 (W.D. Mich. 1976) (rules of evidence inapplicable in a preliminary hearing to determine whether a class should be certified).

(n3)Footnote 3. See, e.g., United States v. Crosby, 397 F.3d 103 (2d Cir. 2005) (judicial factfinding in sentencing is not limited by the Federal Rules of Evidence); United States v. Davis, 170 F.3d 617 (6th Cir. 1999) (hearsay evidence is admissible in sentencing proceedings under the Federal Sentencing Guidelines); United States v. McGill, 32 F.3d 1138 (7th Cir. 1994) (hearsay rule is inapplicable in sentencing proceedings).

(n4)Footnote 4. See, e.g., United States v. Kikumura, 918 F.2d 1084 (3d Cir. 1990) (while evidence rules do not apply at sentencing, evidence must still meet minimum standards of reliability); United States v. Atkin, 29 F.3d 267 (7th Cir. 1994) ("hearsay is a staple" in sentencing proceedings, so long as it carries minimum indicia of reliability).

(n5)Footnote 5. See, e.g., McMorrow v. Schweiker, 561 F. Supp. 584 (D.N.J. 1982) (the principal significance of Rule 1101's inapplicability to administrative agency hearings is "that ordinarily hearsay evidence is routinely received," but "[e]vidence lawfully received need not be accepted as true merely because it is admissible").

(n6)Footnote 6. See, e.g., United States v. Redd, 318 F.3d 778 (8th Cir. 2003) (Federal Rules of Evidence are not applicable to supervised release revocation proceedings; however, minimal standards of reliability must be met); United States v. Portalla, 985 F.2d 621 (1st Cir. 1993) ; United States v. Stephenson, 928 F.2d 728 (6th Cir. 1991) (at a supervised release revocation proceeding, a "judge may consider hearsay if it is proven to be reliable"); United States v. Walker, 117 F.3d 417 (9th Cir. 1997) .

(n7)Footnote 7. See also United States v. Jackson, 213 F.3d 1269 (10th Cir. 2000) (hearsay statement properly credited at a suppression hearing; the Federal Rules of Evidence do not apply to suppression hearings); United States v. Schaefer, 87 F.3d 562 (1st Cir. 1996) ("[A] judge presiding at a suppression hearing may receive and consider any relevant evidence, including affidavits and unsworn documents that bear indicia of reliability.").

(n8)Footnote 8. See, e.g., Renteria-Gonzalez v. INS, 322 F.3d 804 (5th Cir. 2003) (Federal Rules of Evidence are not applicable in immigration proceedings); Drayer v. Krasner, 572 F.2d 348 (2d Cir. 1978) (arbitrators are not bound by rules of evidence); Woolsey v. National Transp. Safety Bd., 993 F.2d 516 (5th Cir. 1993) (Evidence Rules inapplicable in NTSB proceedings); American Coal Company v. Benefits Review Board, 738 F.2d 387 (10th Cir. 1984) (Evidence Rule 301 not applicable in an administrative hearing held under the Black Lung Benefits Act, because such a proceeding is not in the Federal Court); Yanopoulos v. Dept. of the Navy, 796 F.2d 468 (Fed. Cir. 1986) (leading questions rule does not apply to Merit Systems Protection Board hearings); Dallo v. INS, 765 F.2d 581 (6th Cir. 1985) (deportation proceedings are administrative in nature and therefore the Federal Rules of Evidence do not apply).

(n9)Footnote 9. See, e.g., 8 C.F.R. 242.14(c) (in immigration proceedings, "the special inquiry officer may receive in evidence any oral or written statement which is material and relevant to any issue in the case"); 5 C.F.R. 1201.62(a) (in MSPB hearings, the hearing examiner has broad discretion to admit most forms of evidence, including that which is irrelevant, immaterial, or repetitious). 9 U.S.C. §§ 1-9 (governing admission of evidence in arbitration proceedings).

(n10)Footnote 10. Yanopoulos v. Dept. of the Navy, 796 F.2d 468 (Fed. Cir. 1986) .

(n11)Footnote 11. See, e.g., Baliza v. INS, 709 F.2d 1231 (9th Cir. 1983) (in immigration deportation proceedings, the Federal Rules are not applicable, but hearsay affidavits must at least be shown to be authentic, and the government must make a reasonable attempt to produce the affiant for cross-examination).

(n12)Footnote 12. See also United States v. Anthony Y, 990 F. Supp. 1310 (D.N.M. 1998) (juvenile court records admissible even though hearsay, because the Evidence Rules do not apply to juvenile transfer hearings).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1101 RULE 1101

5-1101 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1101.03

1101.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Rule 1101(a) -- Courts and Magistrates

Air-Sea Brokers, Inc. v. United States, 454 F. Supp. 451 (Cust. Ct. 1978) : "Evidence admissible under the rules of evidence applicable in the courts of the United States are [sic] admissible in the Customs Court. Rule 10.4(a) of this Court so provides."

[2] Rule 1101(b) -- Proceedings Generally

[a] Rule 1101(b) -- Administrative Proceedings

Connecticut Light & Power Co. v. Federal Power Comm'n, 557 F.2d 349 (2d Cir. 1977) : The Court implied that the Administrative Law Judge hearing evidence on the navigability of a river should follow the Federal Rules of Evidence. In NLRB v. Stark, n1 the Court observed that the governing statute provides that unfair labor practice proceedings by the NLRB "shall, so far as practicable, be conducted in accordance with the rules of evidence applicable in the district courts."

Ortiz v. Eichler, 794 F.2d 889 (3d Cir. 1986) : Affirming an order requiring state officials to permit cross-examination of adverse witnesses before denying or terminating various federally-funded public assistance benefits, the Court approved the admission of hearsay falling within recognized exceptions. In Heinze v. Heckler, n2 the District Court remanded a disability claim to the Secretary of HHS, finding that an Administrative Law Judge erred in rejecting the diagnosis of the plaintiff's treating physician, a cardiologist, on the ground that a diagnosis of cardiac neurosis must be made by a psychiatrist. In McMorrow v. Schweiker, n3 the District Court affirmed a decision denying a claim for widow's insurance benefits, finding insufficient proof of a marriage between the claimant and the deceased. The Court observed that the principal significance of Rule 1101's inapplicability to administrative agencies is "that ordinarily hearsay evidence is routinely received," but also commented that "[e]vidence lawfully received need not be accepted as true merely because it is admissible."

Walter N. Yoder & Sons v. NLRB, 754 F.2d 531 (4th Cir. 1985) : The Court enforced an order requiring an employer to cease and desist withholding information from a union. It noted that generally the Board must not rely upon hearsay evidence, but found that certain hearsay was not relied upon for its truth, but to show the basis for the union's request for information. In McCrea v. Heckler, n4 an opinion remanding a disability claim to the Secretary of HHS, the Distict Court observed that relevant evidence may be excluded if it would be wasteful to admit it, but suggested that it should not be excluded simply because of the hearing demands on the agency.

Central Freight Lines v. NLRB, 653 F.2d 1023 (5th Cir. 1981) : The Court modified a Board order on the ground that the Administrative Law Judge improperly relied on the residual exception to admit an affidavit of a deceased employee without any adequate showing of trustworthiness under circumstances in which it was the only support for a portion of the order. In NLRB v. Jacob E. Decker & Sons, n5 after noting that the NLRB "is required to conduct its proceedings, 'so far as practicable,' in accord with the Federal Rules of Evidence," the Court held that the Board erred in deciding that it could exclude all convictions for any crimes other than those involving dishonesty or false statement without engaging in balancing under Rule 609(a)(1). Departures from the Federal Rules of Evidence must be justified on the basis of peculiar characteristics of administrative hearings. See also NLRB v. Houston Distribution Servs. n6(the agency should follow "accepted rules of competency").

Banks v. Schweiker, 654 F.2d 637 (9th Cir. 1981) : The Court held that the Social Security Administration may adopt a rule of convenience that would result in the notice of adjudicative facts whenever the Administrative Law Judge knows of information that would be useful in making a decision. However, a claimant must be afforded an opportunity to present information that might bear upon the propriety of taking such notice or on the truth of the matter to be noticed. Such an opportunity was lacking in this case, so it was remanded.

NLRB v. United San. Serv., 737 F.2d 936 (11th Cir. 1984) : The Court held that an Administrative Law Judge erred in an unfair labor practice case by admitting an affidavit of a former employee who had died before the hearing. The Court found "no reason why the hearsay rules should not govern here," since the NLRB is directed to conduct proceedings insofar as practicable pursuant to the Rules of Evidence.

[b] Rule 1101(b) -- Arbitration Proceedings

National Post Office Mailhandlers v. United States Postal Serv., 751 F.2d 834 (6th Cir. 1985) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the Postal Service following arbitration decisions in its favor concerning disciplinary actions against an employee. It noted that the formal rules of evidence do not apply to arbitration proceedings and that the arbitrator properly excluded cumulative testimony.

[c] Rule 1101(b) -- Bankruptcy Cases

In re Clifford, 566 F.2d 1023 (5th Cir. 1978) : The Court utilized Rule 901 in reviewing a bankruptcy proceeding.

[d] Rule 1101(b) -- Class Action Settlement Fairness Hearing

Mars Steel Corp. v. Continental Bank N.A., 880 F.2d 928 (7th Cir. 1989) (en banc): In reviewing an order imposing Rule 11 sanctions, the Court noted that sanctioned counsel could have, but did not, make an argument that affidavits should not have been admitted at a class action settlement fairness hearing because no case expressly holds that Rule 1101(d) suspends the usual rules of evidence for fairness hearings.

[e] Rule 1101(b) -- Forfeiture Proceedings

United States v. Monsanto, 924 F.2d 1186 (2d Cir. 1991) (en banc): In holding that continuation of an ex parte restraint of assets subject to forfeiture in the event of conviction requires a postrestraint, pretrial adversary hearing as to probable cause that the defendant committed the crimes providing a basis for forfeiture, the Court held that the Rules of Evidence do not apply in the hearing.

United States v. Carrell, 252 F.3d 1193 (11th Cir. 2001) : The Court held that hearsay testimony may be used to establish probable cause in a civil in rem forfeiture proceeding.

[f] Rule 1101(b) -- Nonjury Trials

In re Oil Spill by Amoco Cadiz, 954 F.2d 1279 (7th Cir. 1992) : In a nonjury damages trial arising from an oil spill in the English Channel, the Trial Judge admitted considerable evidence it characterized as hearsay, thinking it would be too cumbersome to apply the rule. The Court noted that the hearsay rule applies in all trials -- jury and bench, big and small -- but after considering available exceptions found no reason to upset the damages award on evidentiary grounds.

[g] Rule 1101(b) -- Preliminary Injunction Proceedings

SEC v. General Refractories Co., 400 F. Supp. 1248 (D.D.C. 1975) : In an action by the SEC to enjoin use of manipulative and deceptive devices in security transactions, the District Judge admitted affidavits by an SEC staff attorney into evidence at the hearing on a preliminary injunction, noting that Fed. R. Civ. P. 65(a) contemplates the introduction of evidence that is not admissible in a final trial on the merits.

[3] Rule 1101(c) -- Rule of Privilege

United States v. Eirven, 987 F.2d 634 (9th Cir. 1993) : An attorney for a defendant convicted of armed robbery filed an objection to the presentence report, suggesting that the defendant's criminal history was overstated and that his prior convictions were for acts committed by someone else. The Trial Judge found that the defendant had attempted to mislead and enhanced the sentence for willful obstruction of justice. The Court vacated the enhanced sentence on the ground that it was unclear whether the objection had been based on information that the defendant wanted the Judge to have or on the beliefs of counsel. Since anything that the lawyer wrote was likely based upon privileged communications that could not be revealed, the Court found that there was no need for further factfinding and that obstruction of justice was not an available enhancement.

[4] Rule 1101(d)(1) -- Rules Inapplicable -- Preliminary Questions of Fact -- Suppression Hearing

United States v. Green, 670 F.2d 1148 (D.C. Cir. 1981) : The Court recognized that "a defendant has some right to cross-examine Government witnesses at a suppression hearing," and that the right is important enough that "any limitations on this right (beyond the typical evidentiary rules limiting its scope to the subject matter of direct examination and to matters affecting witness credibility, Rule 611(b)) must be justified by weighty considerations."

United States v. Tussell, 441 F. Supp. 1092 (M.D. Pa. 1977) : Denying a motion to suppress evidence seized through electronic surveillance, the Judge noted that hearsay evidence is admissible at a hearing on the motion, "although the court remains obligated to weigh the evidence and discount that which is less reliable."

United States v. Lee, 541 F.2d 1145 (5th Cir. 1976) : The Court reversed a decision suppressing evidence seized without a search warrant, holding that the hearsay rule and other exclusionary rules did not apply to hearings in limine before a Judge.

United States v. Ienco, 92 F.3d 564 (7th Cir. 1996) : The Court vacated a conviction for offenses arising out of an unsuccessful extortion scheme, finding that the Trial Judge "made a serious error at the suppression hearing." At the hearing, defense counsel called a witness who had first told him that she had seen facts consistent with the defendant's version of events, but the day before the hearing she changed her story. When she testified at the hearing as she said she would a day earlier, defense counsel asked leading questions to which the Judge sustained objections. The Court observed that Rule 607 permits any party to impeach any witness and "the asking of leading questions" is a standard technique of impeachment. The Judge compounded his error in sustaining objections by striking the testimony of the witness as a sanction. The Court concluded that "when, as in a suppression hearing, a jury is not involved, there is no reason for the judge to become preoccupied with the niceties of the rules of evidence."

United States v. Elliott, 893 F.2d 220 (9th Cir. 1990) , amended, 904 F.2d 25 (9th Cir. 1990) : Reversing an order suppressing evidence seized in a narcotics case, the Court held that testimony at a probable cause hearing from a woman who had lived with the defendant regarding his marijuana-growing operation is not barred, and should not be discounted, merely because it was delivered in response to leading questions. In United States v. Brewer, 947 F.2d 404 (9th Cir. 1991) , the Court reversed a conviction for possession of cocaine, holding that a witness should have been excluded from a suppression hearing on the defendant's motion. Under Rule 1101(d)(1), the traditional exclusionary rules do not apply, but the procedural rules regulating the process of admission and exclusion remain applicable. Because Rule 615 is a procedural rule directed at the fairness of the proceedings, and not a rule governing the admissibility of evidence, it applies in suppression hearings.

United States v. Jackson, 213 F.3d 1269 (10th Cir. 2000) : At a hearing to suppress evidence allegedly obtained in violation of the Fourth Amendment, the government introduced a hearsay statement to prove that a third party consented to the challenged search. The Court found no error, because the Rules of Evidence do not apply to suppression hearings. In United States v. Merritt, n7 two police officers' testimony at a suppression hearing as to what another officer told them before a vehicle stop and search was excluded as hearsay. Reversing a ruling suppressing the evidence, the Court noted that hearsay need not be excluded at a suppression hearing.

United States v. Sorrells, 714 F.2d 1522 (11th Cir. 1983) : Although the Rules do not apply in a suppression hearing, the Court properly noted that the Trial Judge made an inappropriate comment at a hearing on a motion to suppress when he indicated that he had personal knowledge of the reliability of an informant. In United States v. Bent-Santana, n8 the Court declined to rule on whether certain Panamanian documents qualified for admission under Rule 803(8), since they were used in a suppression hearing in which hearsay is admissible.

[5] Rule 1101(d)(2) -- Rules Inapplicable -- Grand Jury

United States v. Mackey, 405 F. Supp. 854 (E.D.N.Y. 1975) : This case is a good reminder that common-law privileges remain in force before grand juries.

In re Grand Jury Investigation, 412 F. Supp. 943 (E.D. Pa. 1976) : Citing Rules 501 and 1101, the Court held that the work product doctrine was among the privileges that could be invoked in a grand jury investigation.

In re Special Nov. 1975 Grand Jury, 433 F. Supp. 1094 (N.D. Ill. 1977) : Two persons, who were suspected of improprieties in transactions that they handled as trust officers for a bank, submitted personal papers and records for inspection by an accounting firm with the understanding that they would be treated in the same fashion as the bank's corporate records. A grand jury, already possessing 38 auditors' reports, subpoenaed the papers and records submitted to the accounting firm. Rejecting under Rule 1101(d)(2) a claim that Rule 408 barred disclosure of the papers and records, the District Judge denied a motion to quash the grand jury subpoena issued to the accounting firm.

United States v. Callahan, 442 F. Supp. 1213 (D. Minn. 1978) , rev'd on other grounds, 596 F.2d 759 (8th Cir. 1979) : Relying on Rule 1101(d), the Court held that polygraph evidence inadmissible at trial could be presented to a grand jury.

In re Subpoena to Testify Before Grand Jury, 39 F.3d 973 (9th Cir. 1994) : An attorney sought to quash a grand jury subpoena that demanded disclosure of the identity of a client who paid the attorney with counterfeit money. The attorney argued that he lacked the personal knowledge to testify on the matter, because someone else in his office physically received money from the clients and prepared the bank deposits. The Court refused to quash the subpoena, noting that under Rule 1101, neither the hearsay rule nor the personal knowledge requirement is applicable to grand jury proceedings. The attorney could "tell his receptionist or office manager to give him the cash receipts and other records" and ask them how the office came into possession of the counterfeit money.

[6] Rule 1101(d)(3) -- Rules Inapplicable -- Miscellaneous Proceedings

[a] Rule 1101(d)(3) -- Extradition and Rendition Proceedings

United States v. Kin-Hong, 110 F.3d 103 (1st Cir. 1997) : Reversing an order preventing extradition, the Court held that the Rules of Evidence are not applicable to extradition proceedings, so hearsay statements accusing the petitioner of bribery were admissible.

Messina v. United States, 728 F.2d 77 (2d Cir. 1984) : Affirming the denial of habeas corpus relief to two men extradited to Italy, the Court noted that the Rules of Evidence do not apply in extradition proceedings.

Bovio v. United States, 989 F.2d 255 (7th Cir. 1993) : The Court held that hearsay was admissible in a hearing to extradite the petitioner to Sweden, as the Rules are inapplicable to extradition proceedings.

[b] Rule 1101(d)(3) -- Immigration Proceedings

Renteria-Gonzalez v. INS, 322 F.3d 804 (5th Cir. 2003) : In the course of denying a petition for review of the Board of Immigration Appeals' decision approving removal based upon a conviction for transporting illegal aliens, the Court noted that I-213 forms, which corroborated the testimony of an INS agent, were admissible because the hearsay rule is inapplicable in immigration proceedings.

[c] Rule 1101(d)(3) -- Parole, Probation, and Supervised Release Revocation Proceedings

United States v. Taveras, 380 F.3d 532 (1st Cir. 2004) : The defendant's supervised release had been revoked on the ground that he had threatened a woman with a gun and assaulted her. As proof of the threat and the assault, the government introduced the woman's hearsay statement made to a law enforcement officer. The Court held that the introduction of the hearsay was error, and vacated the judgment, noting that the hearsay statement was not an excited utterance, because there was a substantial delay between the threat/assault and the woman's statement. Moreover, the hearsay statement lacked any other indicia of reliability necessary to satisfy the requirements of due process that are applicable to supervised release revocation proceedings. The statement was not corroborated in any way, and the government provided no background details about the declarant or her relationship with the defendant.

United States v. McCallum, 677 F.2d 1024 (4th Cir. 1982) : At a revocation hearing, the District Judge admitted a letter from the probationer's program coordinator and counselor at an Atlanta Salvation Army center explaining why the probationer lost his job and was expelled from the center. Neither the authors of the letter nor the Atlanta probation officer testified. Only a Virginia probation officer testified and he had no personal knowledge of what happened in Atlanta, although he had talked on the phone to the Atlanta probation officer about the probationer's difficulties. The Court found no confrontation problem in the Judge's reliance on the letter in finding a violation of probation conditions.

United States v. Verbeke, 853 F.2d 537 (7th Cir. 1988) : The Court affirmed a probation revocation, finding that an investigative report of a treatment center, which related the defendant's effort to fabricate a report of an attack upon him, was properly admitted. Hearsay evidence is admissible in a revocation proceeding, and there was no challenge to the reliability of the report in this case. In United States v. Smith, n9 the Court affirmed an order revoking the defendant's probation, but found that it was error (harmless in this case) for the Judge to permit one witness at the revocation hearing to repeat the entire story of another witness. Recognizing that Rule 1101(d) provides that, except for privileges, the Rules of Evidence do not apply in revocation hearings, the Court grounded its opinion in the confrontation and cross-examination portions of the Supreme Court's decision in Gagnon v. Scarpelli. n10

United States v. Redd, 318 F.3d 778 (8th Cir. 2003) : The Court held that although the Rules of Evidence are not applicable to supervised release revocation proceedings, the Trial Judge must balance the defendant's right to confront a witness against the grounds asserted by the government for not requiring confrontation. The Court found no error in the Judge's use of records of test results: the evidence admitted was reliable and "the de minimis value of testimony from the proposed technician-witnesses did not outweigh the government's inconvenience and expense in making those witnesses available." See also United States v. Reynolds, 49 F.3d 423 (8th Cir. 1995) (vacating an order revoking supervised release for failure to balance the defendant's confrontation right against the government's asserted reasons).

United States v. Frazier, 26 F.3d 110 (11th Cir. 1994) : The Court held that proceedings for revocation of supervised release are to be treated like probation revocation proceedings for purposes of the Rule, so hearsay evidence is admissible, subject to due process limitations. In United States v. Penn, n11 the Court affirmed a probation revocation, observing that Rule 1101(d)'s provision that the Rules do not apply in probation proceedings "has limits in the Sixth Amendment confrontation clause." It suggested "that the hearing officer in a probation revocation proceeding must balance the probationer's right to confront and cross-examine witnesses against any good cause asserted by the government for not allowing confrontation."

[d] Rule 1101(d)(3) -- Penalty Phase of Capital Trial

United States v. Fell, 360 F.3d 135 (2d Cir. 2004) : Equating the Rules of Evidence with a defendant's constitutional rights, the District Court held the Federal Death Penalty Act unconstitutional because it provides that the Rules are not applicable to the penalty phase. Vacating the ruling, the Court found this reasoning flawed, as the Rules

"do not set forth the constitutional parameters of admissible evidence"; it noted that the Rules in many cases provide broader protection than the Constitution requires by excluding constitutionally permissible evidence. The Court also noted that the presumption of admissibility of relevant evidence under the Federal Death Penalty Act is "actually narrower" than under Rule 403, while the Act does not purport to hold admissible any evidence that could not constitutionally be admitted.

[e] Rule 1101(d)(3) -- Release From Psychiatric Commitment Proceedings

United States v. Palesky, 855 F.2d 34 (1st Cir. 1988) : The Court held that in psychiatric commitment proceedings, involving a defendant who was committed for psychiatric evaluation following a trial in which she was found not guilty by reason of insanity, the Rules of Evidence do not apply. The Court analogized the release proceeding to a bail release hearing.

[f] Rule 1101(d)(3) -- Sentencing

United States v. Simmons, 164 F.3d 76 (2d Cir. 1998) : The Court found no error in enhancing the defendant's sentence for possession of a firearm on the basis of the defendant's statements made during his guilty plea hearing. The guilty plea was later withdrawn, and although Rule 410 would preclude the admission of such statements at trial, Rule 410 is not applicable in sentencing proceedings. Besides citing Rule 1101(d)(3), the Court relied on 18 U.S.C. § 3661, which provides that "[n]o limitation shall be placed on the information concerning the background, character, and conduct of a person convicted of an offense which a court of the United States may receive and consider for the purpose of imposing an appropriate sentence."

United States v. Kikumura, 918 F.2d 1084 (3d Cir. 1990) : Reviewing a 12-fold, 330-month upward departure from the median of the applicable guideline range in sentencing an alleged terrorist for interstate transportation of explosive devices, the Court held that a Confrontation Clause analysis is not appropriate for hearsay admitted at sentencing but that hearsay statements cannot be considered unless other evidence indicates they are reasonably trustworthy. In this case, an informant's statements regarding the defendant's presence in a terrorist training camp in Lebanon were verified by numerous other details in the record. In United States v. Sciarrino, n12 the Court, without citing Rule 1101(d)(3), held that hearsay was admissible in proceedings under the Sentencing Guidelines, as it had been previously in sentencing proceedings.

United States v. Roberts, 881 F.2d 95 (4th Cir. 1989) : In affirming convictions and sentences for narcotics offenses, the Court held there was no error when the Trial Judge considered hearsay in determining the sentences.

United States v. McDonald, 964 F.2d 390 (5th Cir. 1992) : The Court held there was no error in relying on hearsay documents prepared by Florida correctional officers in assessing the defendant's career offender status at sentencing, as the documents had sufficient indicia of reliability. In United States v. Goldfaden, 959 F.2d 1324 (5th Cir. 1992) , the Court held there was no Sixth Amendment violation when reliable hearsay was used in sentencing the defendant for Clean Water Act violations.

United States v. Davis, 170 F.3d 617 (6th Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed convictions for telemarketing fraud, holding there was no error when the sentencing Judge considered testimony from an IRS Criminal Investigation Division agent, which was based on her prior conversation with an FBI special agent, regarding a defendant's criminal activities. Under Rule 1101(d)(3), hearsay evidence is admissible in guideline sentencing hearings.

United States v. Atkin, 29 F.3d 267 (7th Cir. 1994) : The Court held there was no error in relying on hearsay in sentencing, where the defendant was provided an opportunity for live questioning had he so chosen.

United States v. Wise, 976 F.2d 393 (8th Cir. 1992) (en banc): The Court held that the Confrontation Clause does not apply at sentencing and that corroboration may be sufficient to satisfy due process in establishing the reliability of hearsay at sentencing. Three Judges dissented.

United States v. Ramos-Oseguera, 120 F.3d 1028 (9th Cir. 1997) : A husband and wife involved in a drug conspiracy were tried separately for their crimes. After the wife was convicted, her lawyer delivered to the Judge letters from four jurors explaining their beliefs that the wife had been severely abused by her husband. The Court found that the Judge's decision not to consider the letters in sentencing was not an abuse of discretion, since a practice of doing so could lead to harassment of jurors.

United States v. Beaulieu, 893 F.2d 1177 (10th Cir. 1990) : In affirming a sentence for drug offenses, the Court held there was no error in the Judge considering testimony from another trial involving the same conspiracy and noted that the Rules of Evidence that might bar hearsay do not apply to sentencing proceedings. In United States v. Ruminer, n13 the Court upheld convictions in a drug case and ruled that the Trial Judge properly considered in sentencing the fact that the defendants supplied false leads to the government during plea discussions. It cited Rule 1101(d)(3) and observed that Rule 410 did not override the general principle that a defendant's conduct could be considered in sentencing.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. NLRB v. Stark, 525 F.2d 422 (2d Cir. 1975) .

(n2)Footnote 2. Heinze v. Heckler, 581 F. Supp. 13 (E.D. Pa. 1983) .

(n3)Footnote 3. McMorrow v. Schweiker, 561 F. Supp. 584 (D.N.J. 1982) .

(n4)Footnote 4. McCrea v. Heckler, 580 F. Supp. 1106 (W.D.N.C. 1984) .

(n5)Footnote 5. NLRB v. Jacob E. Decker & Sons, 569 F.2d 357 (5th Cir. 1978) .

(n6)Footnote 6. NLRB v. Houston Distribution Servs., 573 F.2d 260 (5th Cir. 1978) .

(n7)Footnote 7. United States v. Merritt, 695 F.2d 1263 (10th Cir. 1982) .

(n8)Footnote 8. United States v. Bent-Santana, 774 F.2d 1545 (11th Cir. 1985) .

(n9)Footnote 9. United States v. Smith, 571 F.2d 370 (7th Cir. 1978) .

(n10)Footnote 10. Gagnon v. Scarpelli, 411 U.S. 778, 786 (1973) .

(n11)Footnote 11. United States v. Penn, 721 F.2d 762 (11th Cir. 1983) .

(n12)Footnote 12. United States v. Sciarrino, 884 F.2d 95 (3d Cir. 1989) .

(n13)Footnote 13. United States v. Ruminer, 786 F.2d 381 (10th Cir. 1986) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1101 RULE 1101

5-1101 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1101.04

1101.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Advisory Committee's Note

Subdivision (a). The various enabling acts contain differences in phraseology in their descriptions of the courts over which the Supreme Court's power to make rules of practice and procedure extends. The act concerning civil actions, as amended in 1966, refers to "the district courts ... of the United States in civil actions, including admiralty and maritime cases ... ." 28 U.S.C. sec. 2072, Pub. L. 89-773, sec. 1, 80 Stat. 1323. The bankruptcy authorization is for rules of practice and procedure "under the Bankruptcy Act." 28 U.S.C. sec. 2075, Pub. L. 88-623, sec. 1, 78 Stat. 1001. The Bankruptcy Act in turn creates bankruptcy courts of "the United States district courts and the district courts of the Territories and possessions to which this title is or may hereafter be applicable." 11 U.S.C. secs. 1(10), 11(a). The provision as to criminal rules up to and including verdicts applies to "criminal cases and proceedings to punish for criminal contempt of court in the United States district courts, in the district courts for the districts of the Canal Zone and Virgin Islands, in the Supreme Court of Puerto Rico, and in proceedings before United States magistrates." 18 U.S.C. sec. 3771.

These various provisions do not in terms describe the same courts. In congressional usage the phrase "district courts of the United States," without further qualification, traditionally has included the district courts established by Congress in the states under Article III of the Constitution, which are "constitutional" courts, and has not included the territorial courts created under Article IV, Section 3, Clause 2, which are "legislative" courts. Hornbuckle v. Toombs, 85 U.S. 648, 21 L. Ed. 966 (1873) . However, any doubt as to the inclusion of the District Court for the District of Columbia in the phrase is laid at rest by the provisions of the Judicial Code constituting the judicial districts, 28 U.S.C. sec. 81 et seq. creating district courts therein, id. sec. 132, and specifically providing that the term "district court of the United States" means the courts so constituted. Id. sec. 451. The District of Columbia is included. Id. sec. 88. Moreover, when these provisions were enacted, reference to the District of Columbia was deleted from the original civil rules enabling act. 28 U.S.C. sec. 2072. Likewise Puerto Rico is made a district, with a district court, and included in the term. Id. sec. 119. The question is simply one of the extent of the authority conferred by Congress. With respect to civil rules it seems clearly to include the district courts in the states, the District Court for the District of Columbia, and the District Court for the District of Puerto Rico.

The bankruptcy coverage is broader. The bankruptcy courts include "the United States district courts," which includes those enumerated above. Bankruptcy courts also include "the district courts of the Territories and possessions to which this title is or may hereafter be applicable." 11 U.S.C. secs. 1(10), 11(a). These courts include the district courts of Guam and the Virgin Islands. 48 U.S.C. secs. 1424(b), 1615. Professor Moore points out that whether the District Court for the District of the Canal Zone is a court of bankruptcy "is not free from doubt in view of the fact that no other statute expressly or inferentially provides for the applicability of the Bankruptcy Act in the Zone." He further observes that while there seems to be little doubt that the Zone is a territory or possession within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 11 U.S.C. sec. 1 (10), it must be noted that the appendix to the Canal Zone Code of 1934 did not list the Act among the laws of the United States applicable to the Zone. 1 Moore's Collier on Bankruptcy sec. 1.10, pp. 67, 72, n. 25 (14th ed. 1967). The Code of 1962 confers on the district court jurisdiction of: "(4) actions and proceedings involving laws of the United States applicable to the Canal Zone; and (5) other matters and proceedings wherein jurisdiction is conferred by this Code or any other law." Canal Zone Code, 1962, Tit. 3, sec. 141.

Admiralty jurisdiction is expressly conferred. Id. sec. 142. General powers are conferred on the district court, "if the course of proceeding is not specifically prescribed by this Code, by the statute, or by applicable rule of the Supreme Court of the United States ..." Id. sec. 279. Neither these provisions nor sec. 1(10) of the Bankruptcy Act ("district courts of the Territories and possessions to which this title is or may hereafter be applicable") furnishes a satisfactory answer as to the status of the District Court for the District of the Canal Zone as a court of bankruptcy. However, the fact is that this court exercises no bankruptcy jurisdiction in practice.

The criminal rules enabling act specifies United States district courts, district courts for the districts of the Canal Zone and the Virgin Islands, the Supreme Court of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and proceedings before United States commissioners. Aside from the addition of commissioners, now magistrates, this scheme differs from the bankruptcy pattern in that it makes no mention of the District Court of Guam but by specific mention removes the Canal Zone from the doubtful list.

The further difference in including the Supreme Court of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico seems not to be significant for present purposes, since the Supreme Court of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico is an appellate court. The Rules of Criminal Procedure have not been made applicable to it, as being unneeded and inappropriate, Rule 54(a) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, and the same approach is indicated with respect to rules of evidence.

If one were to stop at this point and frame a rule governing the applicability of the proposed rules of evidence in terms of the authority conferred by the three enabling acts, an irregular pattern would emerge as follows:

> Civil actions, including admiralty and maritime cases -- district courts in the states, District of Columbia, and Puerto Rico.
>
> Bankruptcy -- same as civil actions, plus Guam and Virgin Islands.
>
> Criminal cases -- same as civil actions, plus Canal Zone and Virgin Islands (but not Guam).

This irregular pattern need not, however, be accepted. Originally the Advisory Committee on the Rules of Civil Procedure took the position that, although the phrase "district courts of the United States" did not include territorial courts, provisions in the organic laws of Puerto Rico and Hawaii would make the rules applicable to the district courts thereof, though this would not be so as to Alaska, the Virgin Islands or the Canal Zone, whose organic acts contained no corresponding provisions. At the suggestion of the Court, however, the Advisory Committee struck from its notes a statement to the above effect. 2 Moore's Federal Practice sec. 1.07 (2d ed. 1967); 1 Barron and Holtzoff, Federal Practice and Procedure sec. 121 (Wright ed. 1960). Congress thereafter by various enactments provided that the rules and future amendments thereto should apply to the district courts of Hawaii, 53 Stat. 841 (1939), Puerto Rico, 54 Stat. 22 (1940), Alaska, 63 Stat. 445 (1949), Guam, 64 Stat. 384-390 (1950), and the Virgin Islands, 68 Stat. 497, 507 (1954). The original enabling act for rules of criminal procedure specifically mentioned the district courts of the Canal Zone and the Virgin Islands. The Commonwealth of Puerto Rico was blanketed in by creating its court a "district court of the United States" as previously described. Although Guam is not mentioned in either the enabling act or in the expanded definition of "district court of the United States," the Supreme Court in 1956 amended Rule 54(a) to state that the Rules of Criminal Procedure are applicable in Guam. The Court took this step following the enactment of legislation by Congress in 1950 that rules theretofore or thereafter promulgated by the Court in civil cases, admiralty, criminal cases and bankruptcy should apply to the District Court of Guam, 48 U.S.C. sec. 1424(b), and two Ninth Circuit decisions upholding the applicability of the Rules of Criminal Procedure to Guam. Pugh v. United States, 212 F.2d 761 (9th Cir. 1954) ; Hatchett v. Guam, 212 F.2d 767 (9th Cir. 1954) ; Orfield, The Scope of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, 38 U. of Det. L.J. 173, 187 (1960).

From this history, the reasonable conclusion is that Congressional enactment of a provision that rules and future amendments shall apply in the courts of a territory or profession [possession] is the equivalent of mention in an enabling act and that a rule on scope and applicability may properly be drafted accordingly. Therefore the pattern set by Rule 54 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure is here followed.

The substitution of magistrates in lieu of commissioners is made in pursuance of the Federal Magistrates Act, P.L. 90-578, approved October 17, 1968, 82 Stat. 1107.

Subdivision (b) is a combination of the language of the enabling acts, supra, with respect to the kinds of proceedings in which the making of rules is authorized. It is subject to the qualifications expressed in the subdivisions which follow.

Subdivision (c), singling out the rules of privilege for special treatment, is made necessary by the limited applicability of the remaining rules.

Subdivision (d). The rule is not intended as an expression as to when due process or other constitutional provisions may require an evidentiary hearing. Paragraph (1) restates, for convenience, the provisions of the second sentence of Rule 104(a) supra. See Advisory Committee's Note to that rule.

(2) While some states have statutory requirements that indictments be based on "legal evidence," and there is some case law to the effect that the rules of evidence apply to grand jury proceedings, 1 Wigmore sec. 4(5), the Supreme Court has not accepted this view. In Costello v. United States, 350 U.S. 359, 76 S. Ct. 406, 100 L. Ed. 397 (1965) , the Court refused to allow an indictment to be attacked, for either constitutional or policy reasons, on the ground that only hearsay evidence was presented. "It would run counter to the whole history of the grand jury institution, in which laymen conduct their inquiries unfettered by technical rules. Neither justice nor the concept of a fair trial requires such a change." Id. at 364 . The rule as drafted does not deal with the evidence required to support an indictment.

(3) The rule exempts preliminary examinations in criminal cases. Authority as to the applicability of the rules of evidence to preliminary examinations has been meager and conflicting. Goldstein, The State and the Accused: Balance of Advantage in Criminal Procedure, 69 Yale L.J. 1149, 1168, n. 53 (1960); Comment, Preliminary Hearings on Indictable Offenses in Philadelphia, 106 U. of Pa. L. Rev. 589, 592-93 (1958). Hearsay testimony is, however, customarily received in such examinations. Thus in a Dyer Act case, for example, an affidavit may properly be used in a preliminary examination to prove ownership of the stolen vehicle, thus saving the victim of the crime the hardship of having to travel twice to a distant district for the sole purpose of testifying as to ownership. It is believed that the extent of the applicability of the Rules of Evidence to preliminary examinations should be appropriately dealt with by the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure which regulate those proceedings.

Extradition and rendition proceedings are governed in detail by statute. 18 U.S.C. §§ 3181-3195. They are essentially administrative in character. Traditionally the rules of evidence have not applied. 1 Wigmore sec. 4(6). Extradition proceedings are accepted [sic] from the operation of the Rules of Criminal Procedure. Rule 54 (b)(5) of Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

The rules of evidence have not been regarded as applicable to sentencing or probation proceedings, where great reliance is placed upon the presentence investigation and report. Rule 32(c) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure requires a presentence investigation and report in every case unless the court otherwise directs. In Williams v. New York, 337 U.S. 241, 69 S. Ct. 1079, 93 L. Ed. 1337 (1949) , in which the judge overruled a jury recommendation of life imprisonment and imposed a death sentence, the Court said that due process does not require confrontation or cross-examination in sentencing or passing on probation, and that the judge has broad discretion as to the sources and types of information relied upon. Compare the recommendation that the substance of all derogatory information be disclosed to the defendant, in A.B.A. Project on Minimum Standards for Criminal Justice, Sentencing Alternatives and Procedures sec. 4.4, Tentative Draft (1967, Sobeloff, Chm.). Williams was adhered to in Specht v. Patterson, 386 U.S. 605, 87 S. Ct. 1209, 18 L. Ed. 2d 326 (1967) , but not extended to a proceeding under the Colorado Sex Offenders Act, which was said to be a new charge leading in effect to punishment, more like the recidivist statutes where opportunity must be given to be heard on the habitual criminal issue.

Warrants for arrest, criminal summonses and search warrants are issued upon complaint or affidavit showing probable cause. Rules 4(a) and 41(c) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. The nature of the proceedings makes application of the formal rules of evidence inappropriate and impracticable.

Criminal contempts are punishable summarily if the judge certifies that he saw or heard the contempt and that it was committed in the presence of the court. Rule 42(a) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. The circumstances which preclude application of the rules of evidence in this situation are not present, however, in other cases of criminal contempt.

Proceedings with respect to release on bail or otherwise do not call for application of the rules of evidence. The governing statute specifically provides: "Information stated in, or offered in connection with, any order entered pursuant to this section need not conform to the rules pertaining to the admissibility of evidence in a court of law." 18 U.S.C.A. sec. 3146(f).

This provision is consistent with the type of inquiry contemplated in A.B.A. Project on Minimum Standards for Criminal Justice, Standards Relating to Pretrial Release, sec. 4.5(b), (c), p. 16 (1968). The references to the weight of the evidence against the accused, in Rule 46(a)(1), (c) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure and in 18 U.S.C.A. sec. 3146(b), as a factor to be considered, clearly do not have in view evidence introduced at a hearing under the rules of evidence.

The rule does not exempt habeas corpus proceedings. The Supreme Court held in Walker v. Johnston, 312 U.S. 275, 61 S. Ct. 574, 85 L. Ed. 830 (1941) , that the practice of disposing of matters of fact on affidavit, which prevailed in some circuits, did not "satisfy the command of the statute that the judge shall proceed 'to determine the facts of the case, by hearing the testimony and arguments.' " This view accords with the emphasis in Townsend v. Sain, 372 U.S. 293, 83 S. Ct. 745, 9 L. Ed. 2d 770 (1963) , upon trial-type proceedings, id. 311, 83 S. Ct. 745 , with demeanor evidence as a significant factor, id. 322, 83 S. Ct. 745 , in applications by state prisoners aggrieved by unconstitutional detentions. Hence subdivision (e) applies the rules to habeas corpus proceedings to the extent not inconsistent with the statute.

Subdivision (e). In a substantial number of special proceedings, ad hoc evaluation has resulted in the promulgation of particularized evidentiary provisions, by Act of Congress or by rule adopted by the Supreme Court. Well adapted to the particular proceedings, though not apt candidates for inclusion in a set of general rules, they are left undisturbed. Otherwise, however, the rules of evidence are applicable to the proceedings enumerated in the subdivision.

[The entire Advisory Committee Note accompanying the amendments effective October 1, 1987 is as follows: "Subdivision (a) is amended to delete the reference to the District Court for the District of the Canal Zone, which no longer exists, and to add the District Court for the Northern Mariana Islands. The United States bankruptcy judges are added to conform the subdivision with Rule 1101(b) and Bankruptcy Rule 9017."]

[Following the 1987 amendments to Rule 1101, Congress adopted a technical amendment correcting capitalization, effective November 18, 1988. Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988, Pub. L. 100-690, sec. 7075(c), 102 Stat. 4181 (1988).]

[2] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

The Subcommittee amendment in subdivision (a) extends the application of the Federal Rules of Evidence to the Court of Claims and its commissioners.

Subdivision (e) was amended to substitute positive law citations for those which were not.

[3] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

Subdivision (a) as submitted to the Congress, in stating the courts and judges to which the Rules of Evidence apply, omitted the Court of Claims and commissioners of that Court. At the request of the Court of Claims, the Committee amended the Rule to include the Court and its commissioners within the purview of the Rules.

Subdivision (b) was amended merely to substitute positive law citations for those which were not.

[4] 1993 Amendment Committee Note

1993 Amendment Committee Note

The following is the entire Committee Note for the 1993 amendment to Rule 1101:

> This revision is made to conform the rule to changes in terminology made by Rule 58 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure and to the changes in the title of United States magistrates made by the Judicial Improvements Act of 1990.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
Supp. To CHAPTER 1101 RULE 1101

5-1101 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 1101, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

ARTICLE XI. MISCELLANEOUS RULES	ARTICLE XI. MISCELLANEOUS RULES
Rule 1101. Applicability of Rul	Rule 1101. Applicability of the

es	Rules
(a)	Courts and judges. These rules apply to the United States district courts, the District Court of Guam, the District Court of the Virgin Islands, the District Court for the Northern Mari	(a) To Courts and Judges. These rules apply to proceedings before:

ana Islands, the United States courts of appeals, the United States Claims Court, and to United States bankruptcy judges and United States magistrate judges, in the actions, case s, and pro-ceed ings and to the ex-tent herei nafte r set forth . The term s "jud ge" and "cou rt" in thes e rules in-clud e Unit ed Stat es bank rupt cy judg es and Unit ed Stat es ma-gis-trate judg es.

- Unit

ed States district courts;

- United States bankruptcy and magistrate judges;
- United States courts of appeals;
- the United States Court of Federal Claims; and
- the district courts of Guam, the Virgin Islands, and the Northern Mariana Islands.

(b) Proceedings generally. These rules apply generally to civil actions and proceedings, including admiralty and maritime cases, to criminal cases

(b) To Cases and Proceedings. These rules apply in:

and proceedings, to contempt proceedings except those in which the court may act summarily, and to proceedings and cases under title 11, United States Code.

- civil cases and proceedings, includ ing bankruptcy, admiralty, and maritime cases;

- criminal cases and proceedings; and
- contempt proceedings, except those in which the court may act summarily.

(c) Rule of privilege. The rule with re-

(c) Rules on Privilege. The rules on spect to privilege s applies at all stages of all actions, cases, and proceedings.		privilege apply to all stages of a case or proceeding.

(d)	Rules inapplicable. The rules (other than with respect to privileges) do not apply in the following situations:	(d)	Exceptions. These rules -- except for those on privilege -- do not apply to the following:

(1)	Preliminary questions of fact. The determination of questions of fact preliminary to admissibility of evidence when the issue is to be determined by the court under rule 104.	(1)	the court's determination, under Rule 104(a), on a preliminary question of fact governing admissibility;
(2)	Grand jury	(2)	grand-jury

. Proceedings before grand juries

pro-ceedings; and

(3) Miscellaneous proceedings. Proceedings for extradition or rendition; preliminary examinations in criminal cases; sentencing, or granting or re-

(3) miscellaneous proceedings such as:

voking probation; issuance of warrants for arrest, criminal summonses, and search warrants; and proceedings with respect to release on bail or otherwise.

- extradition or rendition;
- issuing an arrest warrant, criminal summons, or search warrant;

- a preliminary examination in a criminal case;
- sentencing;
- granting or revoking probation or supervised release; and
- con-

sid-erin g whet her to release on bail
or other-wise
.

(e) Rules applicable in part. In the following proceedings these rules apply to the extent that matters of evidence are not provided for

(e) Other Statutes and Rules. A federal statute or a rule prescribed by the Supreme Court may provide for admitting or excluding in the statutes which govern procedure therein or in other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority: the trial of misdemeanors and other petty offens evidence independently from these rules.

es before United States magistrate judges; review of agency actions when the facts are subject to trial de novo under section 706(2)(F) of title 5, United States Code; review of orders of the Secretary of Agriculture under section 2 of the Act entitled "An Act to authorize association of producers of agricultural products" approved February 18, 1922 (7 U.S.C. 292)

, and under sections 6 and 7(c) of the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act, 1930 (7 U.S.C. 499f, 499g(c)); naturalization and revocation of naturalization under sections 310-318 of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1421-1429); prize proceedings in admiralty under sections 7651-7681 of title 10, United States Code; review of orders of the Secretary of the Interior under section 2 of the Act entitled "An Act authorizing associations of producers of aquatic products" approved June 25, 1934 (15 U.S.C. 522); review of orders of petroleu

m control boar ds under section
5 of the Act entitle d
"An Act
to regulate
inter-
state and foreign
com merc e in petroleu
m and its prod ucts by pro-hibiting
the ship men t in such com
merc

e of pet-ro-leu m and its prod ucts pro-duce d in viol-atio n of Stat e law, and for oth-er pur-pose s", ap-prov ed Feb-ru-ary 22, 193 5 (15 U.S. C. 715 d); ac-tions for fines , pen-al-ties, or for-feit-ures under part V of title IV of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1581-1624), or under the Anti-Smuggling Act (19 U.S.C. 1701-1711); criminal libel for condemnation, exclusion of imports, or other proceedings under the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act (21 U.S.C. 301-392); disputes between seamen under sections 4079, 4080, and 4081 of the Revised Statutes (22 U.S.C. 256-258); habeas corpus under sections 2241-2254 of title 28, United States Code; motions to vacate, set aside or correct sentence under section 2255 of title 28, United States Code; actions for penalties for refusal to transport destitute seamen under section 4578 of the Revised Statutes (46 U.S.C. 679); actions against the United States under the Act entitled "An Act authorizing suits against the United States in admiralty for damage caused by and salvage service rendered to public vessels belonging to the United States, and for other pur-pose s", ap-prov ed Mar ch 3, 192 5 (46 U.S. C. 781-790) , as im-ple-men ted by sec-tion 773 0 of title 10, Unit ed Stat es Cod e.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 1101 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
Supp. To CHAPTER 1101 RULE 1101

5-1101 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 1101.03

Supp. to § 1101.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[2] Rule 1101(b) -- Proceedings Generally [Go To Main]

[d.1] Enemy Combatant Proceedings

Barhoumi v. Obama, 609 F.3d 416 (D.C.Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed denial of habeas corpus in a proceeding challenging detention at Guantanamo as an enemy combatant. It found no error in the Judge's reliance on hearsay diary evidence, noting that under the legislation governing trials of enemy combatants, the Federal Rules of Evidence are not applicable. Thus, "hearsay evidence is admissible in this type of habeas proceeding if it is reliable"; and here the diary was sufficiently reliable.

[4] Rule 1101(d)(1) -- Rules Inapplicable -- Preliminary Questions of Fact -- Suppression Hearing [Go To Main]

United States v. Ozuna, 561 F.3d 728 (7th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possession of cocaine with intent to distribute, finding no abuse of discretion when the Judge accepted expert testimony comparing handwriting in a suppression hearing without conducting a Daubert hearing. Noting that the Rules do not apply at suppression hearings, the Court stated that "[w]e see no persuasive reason to disregard the Rules of Evidence and impose a new requirement on district judges to conduct a Daubert analysis during suppression hearings."

[6] Rule 1101(d)(3) -- Rules Inapplicable -- Miscellaneous Proceedings [Go To Main]

[c] Parole, Probation, and Supervised Release Revocation Proceedings

United States v. Bari, 599 F.3d 176 (2d Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed revocation of the defendant's supervised release, noted that the Federal Rules of Evidence do not apply in a supervised release revocation proceeding, and held there was no reversible error when the Judge conducted an independent Internet search to confirm an intuition that there were many types of yellow rain hats for sale. A bank surveillance film showed the robber wearing a yellow rain hat and such a hat was found in the garage of the defendant's landlord.

[d] Rule 1101(d)(3) -- Penalty Phase of Capital Trial

United States v. Pepin, 514 F.3d 193 (2d Cir. 2008) : In a prosecution for murders committed while engaged in drug trafficking, for which the government sought the death penalty, the Trial Judge granted pretrial motions to exclude evidence at the penalty phase of the defendant's " 'continuing pattern of violence,' including 'child abuse' " and his prior conviction for child endangerment and related behavior, as well as photographs of the victims' dismembered bodies at either the guilt phase or the penalty phase. On interlocutory appeal, the Court held that, although the Rules of Evidence do not apply to sentencing proceedings, the federal death penalty act, 18 U.S.C. § 3593(c), gives the Trial Judge discretion to exclude information "if its probative value is outweighed by the danger of creating unfair prejudice, confusing the issues, or misleading the jury." The Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence of child abuse by the defendant and of his child endangerment conviction, as the Trial Judge had "conscientiously balanced" the probative value -- "[This evidence does] not relate to the homicidal characteristics which form the basis of the prosecution," and the probability that the defendant, if convicted and spared, would spend the rest of his life in prison, so his potential dangerousness to minor children and women is of little relevance -- with the risks of the jury overvaluing the evidence in light of recent publicity, the necessity of a diversionary trial within the trial regarding the abuse evidence, and the jury's passions becoming inflamed. The Court, however, reversed the ruling excluding evidence of post-mortem dismemberment at the guilt phase. It first held that "a district court ordinarily has somewhat less latitude to exclude probative evidence based on unfair prejudice at the guilt phase, under Rule 403, than it does where the evidence is offered only at the penalty phase," because Rule 403 permits exclusion only when the probative value is "substantially outweighed" by the countervailing dangers. Thus, to the extent the Judge had excluded the photographs at the guilt phase because they would be inadmissible at the penalty phase, it was an error of law. The Court also held it was an abuse of discretion to exclude the photographs at the guilt phase, because, as the Judge had concluded, they were highly probative of the defendant's mental state when committing the murders.

United States v. Fields, 483 F.3d 313 (5th Cir. 2007) : The Court held that in a capital sentencing proceeding, an expert's opinion on future dangerousness was not to be assessed under Daubert, because of the Federal Death Penalty Act, 18 U.S.C. § 3593(c), which states that evidence may be admitted at a capital sentencing proceeding "regardless of its admissibility under the rules governing admission of evidence at criminal trials." The section provides only that evidence may be excluded if its "probative value is outweighed by the danger of creating unfair prejudice, confusing the issues, or misleading the jury." Under that standard, the expert's opinion was properly admitted because "Fields's jury was required to make an assessment of future dangerousness and because the jury could benefit from the opinion of a psychological expert on that matter."

United States v. Mitchell, 502 F.3d 931 (9th Cir. 2007) : Affirming a death sentence, the Court observed that the Rules of Evidence do not apply during sentencing and held that "[t]o the extent Mitchell suggests that they, or similar constraints, constitutionally must apply, we disagree." It concluded that, while capital punishment demands increased reliability, more evidence rather than less on the presence of aggravating and mitigating factors would promote reliability. The Court noted, however, that the federal death penalty statute allows the Trial Judge to exclude unduly prejudicial evidence under Rule 403.

United States v. Brown, 441 F.3d 1330 (11th Cir. 2006) : The Court held that the Federal Rules of Evidence (other than Rule 403) are inapplicable to the penalty phase of a capital trial, as 18 U.S.C. § 3593(c) provides that information is admissible during the capital phase "regardless of its admissibility under the rules governing admission of evidence at criminal trials except that information may be excluded it its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of creating unfair prejudice, confusion of issues, or misleading the jury."

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
Supp. To CHAPTER 1101 RULE 1101

5-1101 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to

Supp. to §

[Go To Main]

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1102 RULE 1102

5-1102 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1102.syn

§ 1102.syn Synopsis to Chapter 1102: RULE 1102

1102.01 Official Text

1102.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Review of Amendments by Congress

1102.03 Annotated Cases

1102.04 Legislative History

[1] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

[2] Report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary

[3] Report of the House and Senate Conferees

[4] Citations to Hearings and Debates

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1102 RULE 1102

5-1102 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1102.01

1102.01 Official Text

Rule 1102. Amendments

Amendments to the Federal Rules of Evidence may be made as provided in section 2072 of title 28 of the United States Code.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1102 RULE 1102

5-1102 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1102.02

1102.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Review of Amendments by Congress

Sharp controversy was provoked in Congress by various proposals for amendments of the Rules of Evidence. The Evidence Rules, and especially rules on privileges, are thought to have more "substantive" content than the Rules of Criminal or Civil Procedure, so Congress has sought more control over the amendment process. As originally reported by the Supreme Court, future amendments by the Supreme Court would have gone into effect as they do when the Federal Rules of Civil and Criminal Procedure are amended -- that is, unless Congress enacted a bill to stop them within ninety days. The House approved 28 U.S.C. § 2076 providing that either House of Congress could stop an amendment of any new Evidence Rule approved by the Supreme Court and transmitted to Congress by the Chief Justice, within 180 days after it was so reported. The Senate favored allowing 365 days for either House to reject an amendment before it became effective. The Senate then added a provision that explicitly stated that the Congress could defer implementation of the Rules and amend any Rule after it is enacted. A controversial proposal approved by the House and disapproved by the Senate required explicit Congressional approval of Rules relating to privileges.

By way of compromise, § 2076 was eventually adopted providing for a 180-day waiting period and one-House disapproval. It further provided that either House could defer the effective date of an amendment, that any Rule could be amended by Act of Congress, and that any amendment creating, abolishing, or modifying a privilege required an Act of Congress to become effective.

The compromise was redone in 1988, when Congress adopted the Judicial Improvements and Access to Justice Act, Pub. L. 100-702, tit. IV, sec. 401, 102 Stat. 4648 (1988). Former § 2076 was repealed, and evidence rulemaking was once again treated with other rules of practice and procedure under 28 U.S.C. § 2072. New § 2073 opens up the rulemaking process for more public participation and scrutiny. New § 2074(a) provided that all proposed Rules shall be transmitted to Congress not later than May 1 to become effective not earlier than December 1, thus giving a seven-month period for review. The former statute permitting one-House disapproval was replaced by a provision that the proposed "rule shall take effect ... unless otherwise provided by law." Subdivision (b) of § 2074 restated the limitation in former § 2076 that any Rule "creating, abolishing, or modifying an evidentiary privilege shall have no force or effect unless approved by Act of Congress." Thus privilege rules must be affirmatively enacted.

Several Rules have already been amended through the rulemaking process, including Rules 103, 404(a) and (b), 407, 608(b), 609(a), 701-703, 801, 803(6), 804 and 902. A new Rule 807 was created by the transfer of the residual exceptions into a single exception. Rule 410 was superseded by a Rule of Criminal Procedure and subsequently amended, as our discussion of that Rule explains. Minor amendments have been made to Rules such as 101, 705, 806 and 1101. Congress added Rule 412 (and thereafter amended it) and Rules 413-415 and 704(b) on its own. A new batch of amendments -- to Rules 404(a), 408, 606(b), and 609(a) -- is scheduled to take effect on December 1, 2006. Finally, technical amendments have also been adopted to make the Rules gender-neutral.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1102 RULE 1102

5-1102 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1102.03

1102.03 Annotated Cases

No significant decisions.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1102 RULE 1102

5-1102 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1102.04

1102.04 Legislative History

[1] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

[We have included legislative excerpts relating to the amendment process here, even though in the Report itself this excerpt does not purport to relate to Rule 1102. The Reader will have no trouble in seeing the relevance of the excerpt to the Rule. -- Ed.]

Section 2 of H.R. 5463

Subsection (a) sets forth the method by which future amendments may be made to the Rules of Evidence. The present Rules Enabling Acts (18 U.S.C. 3771, 3772, 3402; 28 U.S.C. 2072, 2075), which the Supreme Court invoked as the authority pursuant to which it promulgated the Rules of Evidence, provide that the Court may prescribe rules of "practice and procedure" and submit them to Congress. The rules then take effect automatically either at such time as the Court directs, or after ninety days following their submission. An Act of Congress is necessary to prevent any rule so submitted from taking effect.

The Committee believed that many of the Rules of Evidence, particularly in the privilege and hearsay fields, involve substantive policy judgments as to which it is appropriate that the Congress play a greater role than that provided for in the present Enabling Acts. Accordingly, the Committee concluded that it should provide for a new statutory procedure by which amendments to the Rules of Evidence may be made, designed to insure adequate congressional participation in the evidence rule-making process. Section 2(a) as adopted by the Committee adds a new section, 2076, to title 28, United States Code, permitting the Court to prescribe amendments to the Rules of Evidence, which amendments must be reported to the Congress. However, unlike the situation under the present Rules Enabling Acts, either House of Congress may, by resolution, prevent a rule from becoming operative. Moreover, rather than the 90-day period allowed in the existing Rules Enabling Acts, a 180-day period is prescribed for Congressional action.

The Committee considered the possibility of requiring congressional approval of any rule of evidence submitted to it by the Court, and recognized that a similar judgment inhered in Public Law 93-12, pursuant to which the Court's proposed Rules of Evidence were barred from taking effect, until approved by Congress. However, the Committee determined that requiring affirmative congressional action was appropriate to this first effort at codifying the Rules of Evidence, but was not needed with respect to subsequent amendments which would likely be of more modest dimension. Indeed, it believed that to require affirmative congressional action with respect to amendments might well result in some worthwhile amendments not being approved because of other pressing demands on the Congress. The Committee thus concluded that the system of allowing Court-proposed amendments to the Rules of Evidence to take effect automatically unless disapproved by either House strikes a sound balance between the proper role of Congress in the amendatory process and the dictates of convenience and legislative priorities.

[2] Report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary

The House, in order to clarify the power of the Supreme Court to issue Rules of Evidence or amendments to them, added a new section 2076 to title 28, United States Code, specifying the Supreme Court's authority. The present Rules Enabling Acts (18 U.S.C. §§ 3771, 3772, 3402; 28 U.S.C. 2072, 2075), which the Supreme Court invoked as the authority pursuant to which it promulgated the Rules of Evidence, provide that the Court may prescribe rules of "practice and procedure" and submit them to Congress. The rules then take effect automatically either at such time as the Court directs, or after ninety days following their submission. An act of Congress is necessary to prevent any rule so submitted from taking effect.

The House believed that the Rules of Evidence involve policy judgments as to which it is appropriate for the Congress to play a greater role than that provided in the present Enabling Acts. Accordingly, the bill provides for a new statutory procedure by which amendments to the Rules of Evidence may be made, designed to insure adequate congressional participation in the evidence rule-making process. Section 2(a) adds a new section, 2076, to title 28, United States Code, permitting the Court to prescribe amendments to the Rules of Evidence, which amendments must be reported to the Congress. However, three changes were made with respect to the role of Congress. First, any rule, rather than the entire package of rules may be disapproved. Second, either House of Congress, rather than both Houses acting together, can prevent a rule from becoming operative. Third, rather than the 90-day period allowed in the existing Rules Enabling Acts, a 180-day period is prescribed for congressional action.

In order to augment the power of Congress to review rules of evidence, the committee made two additional amendments. It decided to extend the review period to 365 days -- one full year -- and adopted a provision under which either House of Congress can defer the effective date of a rule to permit further study, either until a later date or until approved by Act of Congress. Thus, either House of Congress can disapprove or defer consideration of any proposed rule or combination of rules. The committee also added one clarifying amendment which provides that either a proposed rule or a rule already in effect may be amended by act of Congress. While this has been generally understood, the committee feels it should be made clear.

The committee considered the possibility of requiring congressional approval of any rule of evidence submitted to it by the Court. We determined, however, that while requiring affirmative congressional action was appropriate to this first effort at codifying the Rules of Evidence, it was not needed with respect to subsequent amendments which would likely be of more modest dimension. Indeed, the committee believed that to require affirmative congressional action with respect to amendments might well result in some worthwhile amendments not being approved because of other pressing demands on the Congress. The committee thus concluded that the system of allowing Court-proposed amendments to the Rules of Evidence to take effect automatically unless disapproved by either House strikes a sound balance between the proper role of Congress in the amendatory process and the dictates of convenience and legislative priorities.

For the same reasons, the committee has deleted an amendment made on the floor of the House providing that no amendment creating, abolishing or modifying a privilege could take effect until approved by act of Congress. The basis for the House action was the belief that rules of privilege constitute matters of substance that require affirmative congressional approval. While matters of privilege are, in a sense, substantive, and also involve particularly sensitive issues, the committee does not believe that privileges necessarily require different treatment from other rules, provided there are adequate safeguards so that the Congress retains sufficient review power to review effectively proposed changes in this area, as well as in others. By extending the period of review from 90 to 365 days, and by providing that any proposed rule may be disapproved or its effective date deferred by either House of Congress, the committee believes that the Congress does, in fact, retain sufficient review power to reflect its views on such matters.

[3] Report of the House and Senate Conferees

Section 2 of the bill adds a new section to title 28 of the United States Code that establishes a procedure for amending the rules of evidence in the future. The House bill provides that the Supreme Court may promulgate amendments, and these amendments become effective 180 days after being reported to Congress. However, any amendment that creates, abolishes or modifies a rule of privilege does not become effective until approved by Act of Congress. The Senate amendments changed the length of time that must elapse before an amendment becomes effective to 365 days. The Senate amendments also added language, not contained in the House provision, that (1) either House can defer the effective date of a proposed amendment to a later date or until approved by Act of Congress and (2) an Act of Congress can amend any rule of evidence, whether proposed or in effect. Finally, the Senate amendments struck the provision requiring that amendments creating, abolishing or modifying a privilege be approved by Act of Congress.

The Conference adopts the House provision on the time period (180 days) and the House provision requiring that an amendment creating, abolishing or modifying a rule of privilege cannot become effective until approved by Act of Congress. The Conference adopts the Senate amendment providing that either House can defer the effective date of an amendment to the rules of evidence and that any rule, either proposed or in effect, can be amended by Act of Congress. In making these changes in the enabling Act, [the] Conference recognizes the continuing role of the Supreme Court in promulgating rules of evidence.

[4] Citations to Hearings and Debates

Debate in the House of Representatives, 120 Cong. Rec. H567-H568 (daily ed. February 6, 1974).

Testimony of Hon. Albert B. Maris, Hearings on H.R. 5463 (Federal Rules of Evidence) Before the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 2d Sess., at 43-44 (1974).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
Supp. To CHAPTER 1102 RULE 1102

5-1102 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 1002, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 1002. Amendments	Rule 1002. Amendments
Amendments to the Federal Rules of Evidence may be made as	These rules may be amended as provided in 28 U.S.C. § 207 provided in section 2072 of title 28 of the United States Code.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 1102 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
Supp. To CHAPTER 1102 RULE 1102

5-1102 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to

Supp. to §

[Go To Main]

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1103 RULE 1103

5-1103 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1103.syn

§ 1103.syn Synopsis to Chapter 1103: RULE 1103

1103.01 Official Text

1103.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

1103.03 Annotated Cases

1103.04 Legislative History

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1103 RULE 1103

5-1103 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1103.01

1103.01 Official Text

Rule 103. Title

These rules may be known and cited as the Federal Rules of Evidence.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1103 RULE 1103

5-1103 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1103.02

1103.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

The title "Federal Rules of Evidence" signifies the Rules discussed in this Manual, enacted on January 2, 1975, and effective on July 1, 1975, and all amendments subsequently adopted.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1103 RULE 1103

5-1103 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1103.03

1103.03 Annotated Cases

No significant decisions.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
CHAPTER 1103 RULE 1103

5-1103 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 1103.04

1103.04 Legislative History

None.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article X. Contents Of Writings, Recordings, And Photographs
Supp. To CHAPTER 1103 RULE 1103

5-1103 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 1103, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 1103. Title	Rule 1103. Title
These rules may be known and cited as the Federal Rules of Evidence.	These rules may be cited as the Federal Rules of Evidence.

ce.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 1103 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART THREE: RULES APPROVED BY SUPREME COURT BUT REJECTED BY CONGRESS
Part Three: Rules Approved by Supreme Court But Rejected by Congress

5-Three Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Three.syn

§ Three.syn Synopsis to Chapter Three: Rules Approved by Supreme Court But Rejected by Congress

I Introduction

Rule 105 SUMMING UP AND COMMENT BY JUDGE

Rule 303 PRESUMPTIONS IN CRIMINAL CASES

Rule 501 PRIVILEGES RECOGNIZED ONLY AS PROVIDED

Rule 502 REQUIRED REPORTS PRIVILEGED BY STATUTE

Rule 503 LAWYER-CLIENT PRIVILEGE

Rule 504 PSYCHOTHERAPIST-PATIENT PRIVILEGE

Rule 505 HUSBAND-WIFE PRIVILEGE

Rule 506 COMMUNICATIONS TO CLERGYMEN

Rule 507 POLITICAL VOTE

Rule 508 TRADE SECRETS

Rule 509 SECRETS OF STATE AND OTHER OFFICIAL INFORMATION

Rule 510 IDENTITY OF INFORMER

Rule 511 WAIVER OF PRIVILEGE BY VOLUNTARY DISCLOSURE

Rule 512 PRIVILEGED MATTER DISCLOSED UNDER COMPULSION OR WITHOUT OPPORTUNITY TO CLAIM PRIVILEGE

Rule 513 COMMENT UPON OR INFERENCE FROM CLAIM OF PRIVILEGE; INSTRUCTION

Rule 804 HEARSAY EXCEPTIONS: DECLARANT UNAVAILABLE

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART THREE: RULES APPROVED BY SUPREME COURT BUT REJECTED BY CONGRESS
Part Three: Rules Approved by Supreme Court But Rejected by Congress

5-Three Federal Rules of Evidence Manual I

I Introduction

The following Rules were approved by the Supreme Court, but were not thereafter enacted by the Congress. Advisory Committee's Notes are also set forth. Many of these proposed Rules have been mentioned earlier in our Comments.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART THREE: RULES APPROVED BY SUPREME COURT BUT REJECTED BY CONGRESS
Part Three: Rules Approved by Supreme Court But Rejected by Congress

5-Three Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Rule 105

Rule 105 SUMMING UP AND COMMENT BY JUDGE

[Not enacted.]

After the close of the evidence and arguments of counsel, the judge may fairly and impartially sum up the evidence and comment to the jury upon the weight of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses, if he also instructs the jury that they are to determine for themselves the weight of the evidence and the credit to be given to the witnesses and that they are not bound by the judge's summation or comment.

note

ADVISORY COMMITTEE'S NOTE

The rule states the present rule in the federal courts. Capital Traction Co. v. Hof, 174 U.S. 1, 13-14, 19 S. Ct. 580, 43 L. Ed. 873 (1899) . The judge must, of course, confine his remarks to what is disclosed by the evidence. He cannot convey to the jury his purely personal reaction to credibility or to the merits of the case; he can be neither argumentative nor an advocate. Quercia v. United States, 289 U.S. 466, 469, 53 S. Ct. 698, 77 L. Ed. 1321 (1933) ; Billeci v. United States, 184 F.2d 394, 402, 87 U.S. App. D.C. 274, 24 A.L.R.2d 881 (1950) . For further discussion see the series of articles by Wright, The Invasion of Jury: Temperature of the War, 27 Temp. L.Q. 137 (1953), Instructions to the Jury: Summary Without Comment, 1954 Wash. U.L.Q. 177, Adequacy of Instructions to the Jury, 53 Mich. L. Rev. 505, 813 (1955); A.L.I. Model Code of Evidence, Comment to Rule 8; Maguire, Weinstein, et al., Cases and Materials on Evidence 737-40 (5th ed. 1965); Vanderbilt, Minimum Standards of Judicial Administration 224-29 (1949).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART THREE: RULES APPROVED BY SUPREME COURT BUT REJECTED BY CONGRESS
Part Three: Rules Approved by Supreme Court But Rejected by Congress

5-Three Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Rule 303

Rule 303 PRESUMPTIONS IN CRIMINAL CASES

[Not enacted.]

(a) Scope. Except as otherwise provided by Act of Congress, in criminal cases, presumptions against an accused, recognized at common law or created by statute, including statutory provisions that certain facts are prima facie evidence of other facts or of guilt, are governed by this rule.

(b) Submission to jury. The judge is not authorized to direct the jury to find a presumed fact against the accused. When the presumed fact establishes guilt or is an element of the offense or negatives a defense, the judge may submit the question of guilt or of the existence of the presumed fact to the jury, if, but only if, a reasonable juror on the evidence as a whole, including the evidence of the basic facts, could find guilt or the presumed fact beyond a reasonable doubt. When the presumed fact has a lesser effect, its existence may be submitted to the jury if the basic facts are supported by substantial evidence, or are otherwise established, unless the evidence as a whole negatives the existence of the presumed fact.

(c) Instructing the jury. Whenever the existence of a presumed fact against the accused is submitted to the jury, the judge shall give an instruction that the law declares that the jury may regard the basic facts as sufficient evidence of the presumed fact but does not require it to do so. In addition, if the presumed fact establishes guilt or is an element of the offense or negatives a defense, the judge shall instruct the jury that its existence must, on all the evidence, be proved beyond a reasonable doubt.

note

ADVISORY COMMITTEE'S NOTE

Subdivision (a). This rule is based largely upon A.L.I. Model Penal Code § 1.12(5) P.O.D. (1962) and United States v. Gainey, 380 U.S. 63, 85 S. Ct. 754, 13 L. Ed. 2d 658 (1965) . While the rule, unlike the Model Penal Code provision, spells out the effect of common law presumptions as well as those created by statute, cases involving the latter are no doubt of more frequent occurrence. Congress has enacted numerous provisions to lessen the burden of the prosecution, principally though not exclusively in the fields of narcotics control and taxation of liquor. Occasionally, in the pattern of the usual common law treatment of such matters as insanity, they take the form of assigning to the defense

the responsibility of raising specified matters as affirmative defenses, which are not within the scope of these rules. See comment, A.L.I. Model Penal Code § 1.13, T.D. No. 4 (1955). In other instances they assume a variety of forms which are the concern of this rule. The provision may be that proof of a specified fact (possession or presence) is sufficient to authorize conviction. 26 U.S.C. § 4704(a), unlawful to buy or sell opium except from original stamped package -- absence of stamps from package prima facie evidence of violation by person in possession; 26 U.S.C. § 4724(c), unlawful for person who has not registered and paid special tax to possess narcotics -- possession presumptive evidence of violation. Sometimes the qualification is added, "unless the defendant explains the possession [presence] to the satisfaction of the jury." 18 U.S.C. § 545, possession of unlawfully imported goods sufficient for conviction of smuggling, unless explained; 21 U.S.C. § 174, possession sufficient for conviction of buying or selling narcotics known to have been imported unlawfully, unless explained. See also 26 U.S.C. § 5601(a)(1), (a)(4), (a)(8), (b)(1), (b)(2), (b)(4), relating to distilling operations. Another somewhat different pattern makes possession evidence of a particular element of the crime. 21 U.S.C. § 176b, crime to furnish unlawfully imported heroin to juveniles -- possession sufficient proof of unlawful importation, unless explained; 50 U.S.C.A. App. § 462(b), unlawful to possess draft card not lawfully issued to holder, with intent to use for purposes of false identification -- possession sufficient evidence of intent, unless explained. See also 15 U.S.C. § 902(f), (i).

Differences between the permissible operation of presumptions against the accused in criminal cases and in other situations prevent the formulation of a comprehensive definition of the term "presumption," and none is attempted. Nor do these rules purport to deal with problems of the validity of presumptions except insofar as they may be found reflected in the formulation of permissible procedures.

The presumption of innocence is outside the scope of the rule and unaffected by it.

Subdivisions (b) and (c). It is axiomatic that a verdict cannot be directed against the accused in a criminal case, 9 Wigmore § 2495, p. 312, with the corollary that the judge is without authority to direct the jury to find against the accused as to any element of the crime, A.L.I. Model Penal Code § 1.12(1) P.O.D. (1962). Although arguably the judge could direct the jury to find against the accused as to a lesser fact, the tradition is against it, and this rule makes no use of presumptions to remove any matters from final determination by the jury.

The only distinction made among presumptions under this rule is with respect to the measure of proof required in order to justify submission to the jury. If the effect of the presumption is to establish guilt or an element of the crime or to negative a defense, the measure of proof is the one widely accepted by the Courts of Appeals as the standard for measuring the sufficiency of the evidence in passing on motions for directed verdict (now judgment of acquittal): an acquittal should be directed when reasonable jurymen must have a reasonable doubt. Curley v. United States, 160 F.2d 229, 81 U.S. App. D.C. 389 (1947), cert. denied, 331 U.S. 837, 67 S. Ct. 1511, 91 L. Ed. 1850; United States v. Honeycutt, 311 F.2d 660 (4th Cir. 1962); Stephens v. United States, 354 F.2d 999 (5th Cir. 1965); Lambert v. United States, 261 F.2d 799 (5th Cir. 1958); United States v. Leggett, 292 F.2d 423 (6th Cir. 1961); Cape v. United States, 283 F.2d 430 (9th Cir. 1960); Cartwright v. United States, 335 F.2d 919 (10th Cir. 1964). Cf. United States v. Gonzales Castro, 228 F.2d 807 (2d Cir. 1956); United States v. Masiello, 235 F.2d 279 (2d Cir. 1956), cert. denied, Stickel v. United States, 352 U.S. 882, 77 S. Ct. 100, 1 L. Ed. 2d 79; United States v. Feinberg, 140 F.2d 592 (2d Cir. 1944). But cf. United States v. Arcuri, 282 F. Supp. 347 (E.D.N.Y.1968), aff'd, 405 F.2d 691, cert. denied, 395 U.S. 913; United States v. Melillo, 275 F. Supp. 314 (E.D.N.Y.1968). If the presumption operates upon a lesser aspect of the case than the issue of guilt itself or an element of the crime or negativing a defense, the required measure of proof is the less stringent one of substantial evidence, consistently with the attitude usually taken with respect to particular items of evidence. 9 Wigmore § 2497, p. 324.

The treatment of presumptions in the rule is consistent with United States v. Gainey, 380 U.S. 63, 85 S. Ct. 754, 13 L. Ed. 2d 658 (1965), where the matter was considered in depth. After sustaining the validity of the provision of 26 U.S.C. § 5601(b)(2) that presence at the site is sufficient to convict of the offense of carrying on the business of distiller without giving bond, unless the presence is explained to the satisfaction of the jury, the Court turned to procedural considerations and reached several conclusions. The power of the judge to withdraw a case from the jury for insufficiency of evidence is left unimpaired; he may submit the case on the basis of presence alone, but he is not required to do so. Nor is he precluded from rendering judgment notwithstanding the verdict. It is proper to tell the jury about the "statutory inference," if they are told it is not conclusive. The jury may still acquit, even if it finds defendant present and his presence is unexplained. [Compare the mandatory character of the instruction condemned in Bollenbach v. United States, 326 U.S. 607, 66 S. Ct. 402, 90 L. Ed. 350 (1945) .] To avoid any implication that the statutory language relative to explanation be taken as directing attention to failure of the accused to testify, the better practice, said the Court, would be to instruct the jury that they may draw the inference unless the evidence provides a satisfactory explanation of defendant's presence, omitting any explicit reference to the statute.

The Final Report of the National Commission on Reform of Federal Criminal Laws § 103(4) and (5) (1971) contains a careful formulation of the consequences of a statutory presumption with an alternative formulation set forth in the Comment thereto, and also of the effect of a prima facie case. In the criminal code there proposed, the terms "presumption" and "prima facie case" are used with precision and with reference to these meanings. In the federal criminal law as it stands today, these terms are not used with precision. Moreover, common law presumptions continue. Hence it is believed that the rule here proposed is better adapted to the present situation until such time as the Congress enacts legislation covering the subject, which the rule takes into account. If the subject of common law presumptions is not covered by legislation, the need for the rule in that regard will continue.

Article V. Privileges

[The 13 rules numbered 501-513 prescribed by the Supreme Court as Article V were replaced by a single rule 501 in the rules enacted by the Congress. -- Ed.]

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART THREE: RULES APPROVED BY SUPREME COURT BUT REJECTED BY CONGRESS
Part Three: Rules Approved by Supreme Court But Rejected by Congress

5-Three Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Rule 501

Rule 501 PRIVILEGES RECOGNIZED ONLY AS PROVIDED

[Not enacted.]

Except as otherwise required by the Constitution of the United States or provided by Act of Congress, and except as provided in these rules or in other rules adopted by the Supreme Court, no person has a privilege to:

(1) Refuse to be a witness; or

(2) Refuse to disclose any matter; or

(3) Refuse to produce any object or writing; or

(4) Prevent another from being a witness or disclosing any matter or producing any object or writing.

note

ADVISORY COMMITTEE'S NOTE

No attempt is made in these rules to incorporate the constitutional provisions which relate to the admission and exclusion of evidence, whether denominated as privileges or not. The grand design of these provisions does not readily lend itself to codification. The final reference must be the provisions themselves and the decisions construing them. Nor is formulating a rule an appropriate means of settling unresolved constitutional questions.

Similarly, privileges created by act of Congress are not within the scope of these rules. These privileges do not assume the form of broad principles; they are the product of resolving particular problems in particular terms. Among them are included such provisions as 13 U.S.C. § 9, generally prohibiting official disclosure of census information and conferring a privileged status on retained copies of census reports; 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5(a), making inadmissible in evidence anything said or done during Equal Employment Opportunity conciliation proceeding; 42 U.S.C. § 2240, making required reports of incidents by nuclear facility licensees inadmissible in actions for damages; 45 U.S.C. §§ 33, 41, similarly as to reports of accidents by railroads; 49 U.S.C. § 1441(e), declaring C.A.B. accident investigation reports inadmissible in actions for damages. The rule leaves them undisturbed.

The reference to other rules adopted by the Supreme Court makes clear that provisions relating to privilege in those rules will continue in operation. See, for example, the "work product" immunity against discovery spelled out under the Rules of Civil Procedure in Hickman v. Taylor, 329 U.S. 495, 67 S. Ct. 385, 91 L. Ed. 451 (1947), now formalized in revised Rule 26(b)(3) of the Rules of Civil Procedure, and the secrecy of grand jury proceedings provided by Criminal Rule 6.

With respect to privileges created by state law, these rules in some instances grant them greater status than has heretofore been the case by according them recognition in federal criminal proceedings, bankruptcy, and federal question litigation. See Rules 502 and 510. There is, however, no provision generally adopting state-created privileges.

In federal criminal prosecutions the primacy of federal law as to both substance and procedure has been undoubted. See, for example, United States v. Krol, 374 F.2d 776 (7th Cir. 1967), sustaining the admission in a federal prosecution of evidence obtained by electronic eavesdropping, despite a state statute declaring the use of these devices unlawful and evidence obtained therefrom inadmissible. This primacy includes matters of privilege. As stated in 4 Barron, Federal Practice and Procedure § 2151, p. 175 (1951):

"The determination of the question whether a matter is privileged is governed by federal decisions and the state statutes or rules of evidence have no application." In Funk v. United States, 290 U.S. 371, 54 S. Ct. 212, 78 L. Ed. 369 (1933), the Court had considered the competency of a wife to testify for her husband and concluded that, absent congressional action or direction, the federal courts were to follow the common law as they saw it "in accordance with present day standards of wisdom and justice." And in Wolfle v. United States, 291 U.S. 7, 54 S. Ct. 279, 78 L. Ed. 617 (1934), the Court said with respect to the standard appropriate in determining a claim of privilege for an alleged confidential communication between spouses in a federal criminal prosecution:

"So our decision here, in the absence of Congressional legislation on the subject, is to be controlled by common law principles, not by local statute." Id., 13, 54 S. Ct. at 280. On the basis of Funk and Wolfle, the Advisory Committee on Rules of Criminal Procedure formulated Rule 26, which was adopted by the Court. The pertinent part of the rule provided:

"The ... privileges of witnesses shall be governed, except when an act of Congress or these rules otherwise provide, by the principles of the common law as they may be interpreted ... in the light of reason and experience."

As regards bankruptcy, section 21(a) of the Bankruptcy Act provides for examination of the bankrupt and his spouse concerning the acts, conduct, or property of the bankrupt. The Act limits examination of the spouse to business transacted by her or to which she is a party but provides "That the spouse may be so examined, any law of the United States or of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." 11 U.S.C. § 44(a). The effect of the quoted language is clearly to override any conflicting state rule of incompetency or privilege against spousal testimony. A fair reading would also indicate an overriding of any contrary state rule of privileged confidential spousal communications. Its validity has never been questioned and seems most unlikely to be. As to other privileges, the suggestion has been made that state law applies, though with little citation of authority. 2 Moore's Collier on Bankruptcy 21.13, p. 297 (14th ed. 1961). This position seems to be contrary to the expression of the Court in McCarthy v. Arndstein, 266 U.S. 34, 39, 45 S. Ct. 16, 69 L. Ed. 158 (1924), which speaks in the pattern of Rule 26 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure:

"There is no provision [in the Bankruptcy Act] prescribing the rules by which the examination is to be governed. These are, impliedly, the general rules governing the admissibility of evidence and the competency and compellability of witnesses."

With respect to federal question litigation, the supremacy of federal law may be less clear, yet indications that state privileges are inapplicable preponderate in the circuits. In re Albert Lindley Lee Memorial Hospital, 209 F.2d 122 (2d Cir. 1953), cert. denied, Cincotta v. United States, 347 U.S. 960, 74 S. Ct. 709, 98 L. Ed. 1104; Colton v. United States, 306 F.2d 633 (2d Cir. 1962); Falsone v. United States, 205 F.2d 734 (5th Cir. 1953); Fraser v. United States, 145 F.2d 139 (6th Cir. 1944) , cert. denied, 324 U.S. 849, 65 S. Ct. 684, 89 L. Ed. 1409 ; United States v. Brunner, 200 F.2d 276 (6th Cir. 1952). Contra, Baird v. Koerner, 279 F.2d 623 (9th Cir. 1960) . Additional decisions of district courts are collected in Annot., 95 A.L.R.2d 320, 336 . While a number of the cases arise from administrative income tax investigations, they nevertheless support the broad proposition of the inapplicability of state privileges in federal proceedings.

In view of these considerations, it is apparent that, to the extent that they accord state privileges standing in federal criminal cases, bankruptcy, and federal question cases, the rules go beyond what previously has been thought necessary or proper.

On the other hand, in diversity cases, or perhaps more accurately cases in which state law furnishes the rule of decision, the rules avoid giving state privileges the effect which substantial authority has thought necessary and proper. Regardless of what might once have been thought to be the command of Erie R. R. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64, 58 S. Ct. 817, 82 L. Ed. 1188 (1938) , as to observance of state created privileges in diversity cases, Hanna v. Plumer, 380 U.S. 460, 85 S. Ct. 1136, 14 L. Ed. 2d 8 (1965) , is believed to locate the problem in the area of choice rather than necessity. Wright, Procedural Reform: Its Limitations and Its Future, 1 Ga. L. Rev. 563, 572-73 (1967). Contra, Republic Gear Co. v. Borg-Warner Corp., 381 F.2d 551, 555, n. 2 (2d Cir. 1967) , and see authorities there cited. Hence all significant policy factors need to be considered in order that the choice may be a wise one.

The arguments advanced in favor of recognizing state privileges are: a state privilege is an essential characteristic of a relationship or status created by state law and thus is substantive in the Erie sense; state policy ought not to be frustrated by the accident of diversity; the allowance or denial of a privilege is so likely to affect the outcome of litigation as to encourage forum selection on that basis, not a proper function of diversity jurisdiction. There are persuasive answers to these arguments.

(1) As to the question of "substance," it is true that a privilege commonly represents an aspect of a relationship created and defined by a State. For example, a confidential communications privilege is often an incident of marriage. However, in litigation involving the relationship itself, the privilege is not ordinarily one of the issues. In fact, statutes frequently make the communication privilege inapplicable in cases of divorce. McCormick § 88, p. 177. The same is true with respect to the attorney-client privilege when the parties to the relationship have a falling out. The reality of the matter is that privilege is called into operation, not when the relation giving rise to the privilege is being litigated, but when the litigation involves something substantively devoid of relation to the privilege. The appearance of privilege in the case is quite by accident, and its effect is to block off the tribunal from a source of information. Thus its real impact is on the method of proof in the case, and in comparison any substantive aspect appears tenuous.

(2) By most standards, criminal prosecutions are attended by more serious consequences than civil litigation, and it must be evident that the criminal area has the greatest sensitivity where privilege is concerned. Nevertheless, as previously noted, state privileges traditionally have given way in federal criminal prosecutions. If a privilege is denied in the area of greatest sensitivity, it tends to become illusory as a significant aspect of the relationship out of which it arises. For example, in a state having by statute an accountant's privilege, only the most imperceptible added force would be given the privilege by putting the accountant in a position to assure his client that, while he could not block disclosure in a federal criminal prosecution, he could do so in diversity cases as well as in state court proceedings. Thus viewed, state interest in privilege appears less substantial than at first glance might seem to be the case.

Moreover, federal interest is not lacking. It can scarcely be contended that once diversity is invoked the federal government no longer has a legitimate concern in the quality of judicial administration conducted under its aegis. The demise of conformity and the adoption of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure stand as witness to the contrary.

(3) A large measure of forum shopping is recognized as legitimate in the American judicial system. Subject to the limitations of jurisdiction and the relatively modest controls imposed by venue provisions and the doctrine of forum non conveniens, plaintiffs are allowed in general a free choice of forum. Diversity jurisdiction has as its basic purpose the giving of a choice, not only to plaintiffs but, in removal situations, also to defendants. In principle, the basis of the choice is the supposed need to escape from local prejudice. If the choice were tightly confined to that basis, then complete conformity to local procedure as well as substantive law would be required. This, of course, is not the case, and the choice may in fact be influenced by a wide range of factors. As Dean Ladd has pointed out, a litigant may select the federal court "because of the federal procedural rules, the liberal discovery provisions, the quality of jurors expected in the federal court, the respect held for federal judges, the control of federal judges over a trial, the summation and comment upon the weight of evidence by the judge, or the authority to grant a new trial if the judge regards the verdict against the weight of the evidence." Ladd, Privileges, 1969 Ariz. St. L.J. 555, 564. Present Rule 43(a) of the Civil Rules specifies a broader range of admissibility in federal than in state courts and makes no exception for diversity cases. Note should also be taken that Rule 26(b)(2) of the Rules of Civil Procedure, as revised, allows discovery to be had of liability insurance, without regard to local state law upon the subject.

When attention is directed to the practical dimensions of the problem, they are found not to be great. The privileges affected are few in number. Most states provide a physician-patient privilege; the proposed rules limit the privilege to a psychotherapist-patient relationship. See Advisory Committee's Note to Rule 504. The area of marital privilege under the proposed rules is narrower than in most states. See Rule 505. Some states recognize privileges for journalists and accountants; the proposed rules do not.

Physician-patient is the most widely recognized privilege not found in the proposed rules. As a practical matter it was largely eliminated in diversity cases when Rule 35 of the Rules of Civil Procedure became effective in 1938. Under that rule, a party physically examined pursuant to court order, by requesting and obtaining a copy of the report or by taking the deposition of the examiner, waives any privilege regarding the testimony of every other person who has examined him in respect of the same condition. While waiver may be avoided by neither requesting the report nor taking the examiner's deposition, the price is one which most litigant-patients are probably not prepared to pay.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART THREE: RULES APPROVED BY SUPREME COURT BUT REJECTED BY CONGRESS
Part Three: Rules Approved by Supreme Court But Rejected by Congress

5-Three Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Rule 502

Rule 502 REQUIRED REPORTS PRIVILEGED BY STATUTE

[Not enacted.]

A person, corporation, association, or other organization or entity, either public or private, making a return or report required by law to be made has a privilege to refuse to disclose and to prevent any other person from disclosing the return or report, if the law requiring it to be made so provides. A public officer or agency to whom a return or report is required by law to be made has a privilege to refuse to disclose the return or report if the law requiring it to be made so provides. No privilege exists under this rule in actions involving perjury, false statements, fraud in the return or report, or other failure to comply with the law in question.

note

ADVISORY COMMITTEE'S NOTE

Statutes which require the making of returns or reports sometimes confer on the reporting party a privilege against disclosure, commonly coupled with a prohibition against disclosure by the officer to whom the report is made. Some of the federal statutes of this kind are mentioned in the Advisory Committee's Note to Rule 501, supra . See also the Note to Rule 402, supra . A provision against disclosure may be include in a statute for a variety of reasons, the chief of which are probably assuring the validity of the statute against claims of self-incrimination, honoring the privilege against self-incrimination, and encouraging the furnishing of the required information by assuring privacy.

These statutes, both state and federal, may generally be assumed to embody policies of significant dimension. Rule 501 insulates the federal provisions against disturbance by these rules; the present rule reiterates a result commonly specified in federal statutes and extends its application to state statutes of similar character. Illustrations of the kinds of returns and reports contemplated by the rule appear in the cases, in which a reluctance to compel disclosure is manifested. In re Reid, 155 F. 933 (E.D. Mich. 1906) , assessor not compelled to produce bankrupt's property tax return in view of statute forbidding disclosure; In re Valecia Condensed Milk Co., 240 F. 310 (7th Cir. 1917) , secretary of state tax commission not compelled to produce bankrupt's income tax returns in violation of statute; Herman Bros. Pet Supply, Inc. v. N. L. R. B., 360 F.2d 176 (6th Cir. 1966) , subpoena denied for production of reports to state employment security commission prohibited by statute, in proceeding for back wages. And see the discussion of motor vehicle accident reports in Krizak v. W. C. Brooks & Sons, Inc., 320 F.2d 37, 42-43 (4th Cir. 1963) . Cf. In re

Hines, 69 F.2d 52 (2d Cir. 1934) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART THREE: RULES APPROVED BY SUPREME COURT BUT REJECTED BY CONGRESS
Part Three: Rules Approved by Supreme Court But Rejected by Congress

5-Three Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Rule 503

Rule 503 LAWYER-CLIENT PRIVILEGE

[Not enacted.]

(a) Definitions. As used in this rule:

(1) A "client" is a person, public officer, or corporation, association, or other organization or entity, either public or private, who is rendered professional legal services by a lawyer, or who consults a lawyer with a view to obtaining professional legal services from him.

(2) A "lawyer" is a person authorized, or reasonably believed by the client to be authorized, to practice law in any state or nation.

(3) A "representative of the lawyer" is one employed to assist the lawyer in the rendition of professional legal services.

(4) A communication is "confidential" if not intended to be disclosed to third persons other than those to whom disclosure is in furtherance of the rendition of professional legal services to the client or those reasonably necessary for the transmission of the communication.

(b) General rule of privilege. A client has a privilege to refuse to disclose and to prevent any other person from disclosing confidential communications made for the purpose of facilitating the rendition of professional legal services to the client, (1) between himself or his representative and his lawyer or his lawyer's representative, or (2) between his lawyer and the lawyer's representative, or (3) by him or his lawyer to a lawyer representing another in a matter of common interest, or (4) between representatives of the client or between the client and a representative of the client, or (5) between lawyers representing the client.

(c) Who may claim the privilege. The privilege may be claimed by the client, his guardian or conservator, the personal representative of a deceased client, or the successor, trustee, or similar representative of a corporation, association, or other organization, whether or not in existence. The person who was the lawyer at the time of the communication may claim the privilege but only on behalf of the client. His authority to do so is presumed in the absence of evidence to the contrary.

(d) Exceptions. There is no privilege under this rule:

(1) Furtherance of crime or fraud. If the services of the lawyer were sought or obtained to enable or aid anyone to commit or plan to commit what the client knew or reasonably should have known to be a crime or fraud; or

(2) Claimants through same deceased client. As to a communication relevant to an issue between parties who claim through the same deceased client, regardless of whether the claims are by testate or intestate succession or by inter vivos transaction; or

(3) Breach of duty by lawyer or client. As to a communication relevant to an issue of breach of duty by the lawyer to his client or by the client to his lawyer; or

(4) Document attested by lawyer. As to a communication relevant to an issue concerning an attested document to which the lawyer is an attesting witness; or

(5) Joint clients. As to a communication relevant to a matter of common interest between two or more clients if the communication was made by any of them to a lawyer retained or consulted in common, when offered in an action between any of the clients.

note

ADVISORY COMMITTEE'S NOTE

Subdivision (a). (1) The definition of "client" includes governmental bodies, Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Shields, 18 F.R.D. 448 (S.D.N.Y.1955) ; People ex rel. Department of Public Works v. Glen Arms Estate, Inc., 230 Cal. App. 2d 841, 41 Cal. Rptr. 303 (1965) ; Rowley v. Ferguson, 48 N.E.2d 243 (Ohio App. 1942) ; and corporations, Radiant Burners, Inc. v. American Gas Ass'n, 320 F.2d 314 (7th Cir. 1963). Contra, Gardner, A Personal Privilege for Communications of Corporate Clients -- Paradox or Public Policy, 40 U. Det. L.J. 299, 323, 376 (1963). The definition also extends the status of client to one consulting a lawyer preliminarily with a view to retaining him, even though actual employment does not result. McCormick, § 92, p. 184. The client need not be involved in litigation; the rendition of legal service or advice under any circumstances suffices. 8 Wigmore § 2294 (McNaughton Rev.1961). The services must be professional legal services; purely business or personal matters do not qualify. McCormick § 92, p. 184.

The rule contains no definition of "representative of the client." In the opinion of the Advisory Committee, the matter is better left to resolution by decision on a case-by-case basis. The most restricted position is the "control group" test, limiting the category to persons with authority to seek and act upon legal advice for the client. See, e.g., City of Philadelphia v. Westinghouse Elec. Corp., 210 F. Supp. 483 (E.D.Pa.1962) , mandamus and prohibition denied sub nom. General Elec. Co. v. Kirkpatrick, 312 F.2d 742 (3d Cir.) , cert. denied, 372 U.S. 943 ; Garrison v. General Motors Corp., 213 F. Supp. 515 (S.D. Cal. 1963) ; Hogan v. Zletz, 43 F.R.D. 308 (N.D. Okla. 1967) , aff'd sub nom. Natta v. Hogan, 392 F.2d 686 (10th Cir. 1968) ; Day v. Illinois Power Co., 50 Ill. App. 2d 52, 199 N.E.2d 802 (1964) . Broader formulations are found in other decisions. See, e.g., United States v. United Shoe Mach. Corp., 89 F. Supp. 357 (D. Mass. 1950) ; Zenith Radio Corp. v. Radio Corp. of America, 121 F. Supp. 792 (D. Del.1954) ; Harper & Row Publishers, Inc. v. Decker, 423 F.2d 487 (7th Cir. 1970) , aff'd without opinion by equally divided court, 400 U.S. 955 (1971) , reh. denied, 401 U.S. 950 ; D. I. Chadbourne, Inc. v. Superior Court, 60 Cal. 2d 723, 36 Cal. Rptr. 468, 388 P.2d 700 (1964) . Cf. Rucker v. Wabash R.R., 418 F.2d 146 (7th Cir. 1969) . See generally Simon, The Attorney-Client Privilege as Applied to Corporations, 65 Yale L.J. 953, 956-66 (1956); Note, Attorney-Client Privilege for Corporate Clients: The Control Group Test, 84 Harv. L. Rev. 424 (1970).

The status of employees who are used in the process of communicating, as distinguished from those who are parties to the communication, is treated in paragraph (4) of subdivision (a) of the rule.

(2) A "lawyer" is a person licensed to practice law in any state or nation. There is no requirement that the licensing state or nation recognize the attorney-client privilege, thus avoiding excursions into conflict of laws questions. "Lawyer" also includes a person reasonably believed to be a lawyer. For similar provisions, see California Evidence Code § 950.

