1 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual AN INTRODUCTION TO ORGANIZATION: HOW TO USE THE BOOK

AN INTRODUCTION TO ORGANIZATION: HOW TO USE THE BOOK

AN INTRODUCTION TO ORGANIZATION:
HOW TO USE THE BOOK

In an effort to provide all the information concerning the Federal Rules of Evidence in the simplest and clearest way, we have divided this edition into four parts. It is our hope that each Part will add a dimension to the understanding of the reader.

Part One traces the history of the movement to codify rules of evidence generally before focusing on the particular events that gave rise to the specific Federal Rules of Evidence that are the subject of this enquiry. Although this history may not aid in the understanding of each individual Rule, those who have not followed the debate over the utility of codification and over what to codify may find this brief background to be of general interest. Some insight into the creation of Rules may also help in interpreting several of them.

Part Two is the heart of the book. Each Rule is individually analyzed. The analysis takes the following illustrative form.

RULE X. A RULE OF EVIDENCE

§ X.01 Official Text of the Rule

The exact text of the particular Rule signed into law by President Ford on January 2, 1975, as part of Public Law 93-595, 88 Stat. 1926 et seq., and subsequent additions, all as amended to date, begin the analysis.

§ X.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

Following the official text of each Rule is a concise explanation of the Rule, the way it operates, and a discussion of important questions that have arisen under the Rule. When problems with a Rule are apparent, we attempt to highlight some of the difficulties that Bench and Bar have experienced and to anticipate some developing problems. No contention is made here that all potential problems are exhaustively covered. Such a task would be impossible. Where, however, a problem is both obvious and significant, we believe it is important to attempt to solve it. Our answers are concededly debatable. At times we have no ready answer. Still, we attempt to pose the important questions and to suggest possible solutions that Judges and lawyers may want to consider.

This section gives special treatment to recent and planned amendments to the Evidence Rules, including their rationale and potential impact. One of the authors of this Manual served as a member of the Advisory Committee on Evidence Rules, and another is currently the Reporter to that Committee. We try to give a special perspective on the drafting process that gave rise to a new amendment.

§ X.03 Annotated Cases

Important Federal cases construing the Rule are grouped by subject matter headings, cited and discussed. At times we repeat our discussion of a case under several Rules and headings for the convenience of the reader.

Despite the fact that we have included numerous cases, we have not offered a mechanical compendium of all decided cases. Rather, we have screened every decided case, assessed its importance, and summarized the important ones in this Manual. The cases are arranged first by topic. The topics represent various sections of the Rule or classes of cases decided under it. Within these topics the cases are arranged by circuit. See, e.g., Rule 103. We hope this organization will maximize the usefulness of the Manual.

§ X.04 Legislative History

Relevant portions of legislative history are provided. These include:

Advisory Committee's Note.

Set forth in this section is the Advisory Committee's Note accompanying each Rule approved by the Supreme Court on November 20, 1972 (with the exception in most instances of Rules deleted by Congress). Even though many of these Rules were modified by the Congress and differ in form in the official text contained in Section X.01, the Note is still important. It contains a wealth of authority to which Judges and lawyers may wish to refer to understand the Rule or to do further research about the Rule or general area of the law with which they are concerned. Moreover, it is the beginning of a "legislative" history that is important in understanding how the final draft came into being. If a Rule has been amended, subsequent Advisory Committee's Notes have been included also. In the end, however, it must be remembered that where the words of the Rule are clear, the "plain meaning" of the Rule will control over any contrary indication in the Advisory Committee note.

House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes.

The first Congressional body to examine the draft of the Rules approved by the Supreme Court was the House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice, a subcommittee of the House Committee on the Judiciary. This Subcommittee made important changes in the Rules, and we include, where pertinent, the Subcommittee Notes explaining why the changes were made. It should be noted that the Subcommittee developed one draft of the Rules and tentatively approved it on June 28, 1973. After receiving comments and criticisms, the Subcommittee amended its draft on October 10, 1973, and sent its proposed final draft to the full House Judiciary Committee. This section of the book contains the Subcommittee Notes in the later draft, i.e., the October 10, 1973, draft. However, whenever the Subcommittee made a major change between the first and second drafts, the Notes explaining both drafts are included. Whenever only one Note appears, the reader can safely assume that it is from the October 10, 1973, draft, and that this Note is not appreciably different from the one found in the earlier draft. We have used the word "Notes" in our heading as a reminder that there are two separate sets of Notes, even though most often it is only necessary to present the later Note.

Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary.

Some of the changes recommended by the House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice were accepted by the full Committee on the Judiciary, while others were rejected. H.R. 5463, a bill sent to the floor of the House by the full Committee, was subjected to only a few amendments on the House floor. The bill is an important step in the legislative history of the Federal Rules of Evidence. Report No. 93-650 accompanied the bill. Whenever the Report makes reference to any significant change in the Rules drafted by the Advisory Committee, that portion of the report is included in this section. Although we have not included every single reference in the Report, it is our hope that we erred on the side of including anything that anyone might find to be relevant in understanding a particular Rule. The separate views of the members of Congress found in the Report are also included in this section. The House bill was approved with several amendments by the House of Representatives on February 6, 1974. House Reports relating to later amendments are specially noted.

Report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary.

The Senate Committee recommended several major changes in H.R. 5463. These changes are discussed in Report No. 93-1277. Following the same procedure outlined in the previous section, whenever the Senate Report makes reference to a change in the House draft, or to its interpretation of a Rule, we have attempted to include it in this section. Once again we have left out references that do not provide any insight into why a change was made or into the intent of the Congress in choosing certain language, but we have attempted to include all relevant material The Senate passed its version of the bill on November 22, 1974. Senate Reports relating to later amendments are specially noted.

Report of the House and Senate Conferees.

This Report (House No. 93-1597) accompanied the bill actually approved by both Houses of Congress.

Citations to Hearings and Debates.

Several days of hearings on the proposed Rules of Evidence were held before the Subcommittee on the Criminal Justice. In addition to the testimony of numerous witnesses, the Subcommittee had before it many documents and letters submitted in opposition to or in support of the proposed Rules. Hearings were also held before the Senate Committee on the Judiciary.

Whenever material found in the Hearings is helpful in understanding the way in which a Rule developed, we have endeavored to include a citation to it. Similarly, whenever the debate on the floor of either the House or Senate on the Rules casts light on particular provisions, we have included a reference to the debate. It is our hope that this information may provide some guidance, especially to Judges, when a difficult problem of interpreting a particular Rule is encountered.

Excerpts From "Advisory Committee Notes to the Federal Rules of Evidence That May Require Clarification."

At the request of the Advisory Committee on Evidence Rules, one of the authors of this Manual prepared a monograph highlighting all of the Advisory Committee Notes that are inconsistent with the text of the accompanying Rule. These inconsistencies were generally caused by Congress having made a material change from the Advisory Committee's draft of a particular Rule. The Advisory Committee Notes provide comment on the Advisory Committee proposals that were sent to Congress, not on the rules that Congress subsequently enacted. The current Advisory Committee believed that it would be useful to instruct practitioners and judges that certain Rules were changed by Congress and that the Advisory Committee Note should not be unduly relied upon for interpretation of such Evidence Rules. We include excerpts from the monograph for those Rules in which the Advisory Committee Note comments on a proposed Rule that is substantially different from the Rule actually adopted.

In Part Three of this Book, we include those Rules originally proposed by the Advisory Committee which were rejected by Congress. The Advisory Committee's Notes to these Rules have also been included.

Part Four includes an article from one of the authors of this Manual, highlighting those Federal Rules as to which case law diverges from the text of the Rule. It also includes an article on the authentication of Internet and Email evidence.

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE

THE RULES THAT TRIAL LAWYERS (AND JUDGES) NEED TO KNOW

The Nature of Evidence Rules

Evidence rules are special. They require more of trial lawyers than most rules of civil or criminal procedure. Although there are rules of civil and criminal procedure that trial lawyers need to keep in mind during a trial - for example, the requirement that a motion for judgment as a matter of law or a motion for judgment of acquittal be made in order to preserve a sufficiency of the evidence issue - most issues that involve interpretation of procedural rules are resolved before the trial actually begins or after some or all evidence is presented. Therefore, most procedural issues provide an opportunity for research, for thoughtful consideration, and for consultation with others.

Evidence issues also may be considered pretrial. The increasing demands of rules like Fed. R. Civ. P. 16, the prevalence of motions in limine, and the final pretrial orders entered by many judges require that trial lawyers think about some evidence issues before the trial starts. But, it is inevitably the case that questions will be asked and answers will be given at trial that will require immediate objections or motions to strike if a party intends to protect itself against inadmissible evidence. It is also inevitable that a proponent of evidence will have to respond to objections and motions to strike in order to demonstrate why proffered evidence is admissible and should be admitted, and to make a proper offer of proof if an objection is improperly sustained.

Speed is essential at trial. It is often said that there are only two kinds of trial lawyers, the quick and the dead. When it comes to objections to evidence and responses to objections, this division of trial lawyers is especially accurate. Delay may mean loss; indeed, it may mean disaster. Raising the wrong objection or making the wrong response is no better than failing to object or to respond. Being "close" generally is no more helpful than being "just plain wrong." The pressure on trial lawyers to be right is great.

The Federal Rules of Evidence might appear intimidating at first glance. They are comprehensive, copious, and trans-substantive. Certainly they must be mastered for trial counsel to be effective. We believe, however, that the task of mastering the Federal Rules is not as daunting as it may seem. This is due to the simple fact that many of the Rules never become a subject of contention in a trial.

Are Rule Numbers Important?

Before turning to specific rules, it makes some sense to address the question whether lawyers operating under the Federal Rules should feel some obligation to cite rule numbers to a Trial Court. Although reasonable minds might differ about this, our experience is that it is generally more important to educate the Trial Judge about the substance of an objection or of a response than it is to demonstrate one's erudition by citing the correct rule number and even the correct subdivision in a rule.

For example, assume a witness is asked during a homicide trial, "As you stood there over the person who was bleeding, did that person say anything?" It is more important for defense counsel to say "hearsay" than it is to invoke Rule 802. In fact, Rule 802 is cited so infrequently that a Trial Judge might well respond to the words "I object, your Honor, under Rule 802" by asking what rule that is. Similarly, in the same example, it is more important for the proponent to respond to the hearsay objection by saying "Your honor, it is an excited utterance," or "it is a dying declaration," than it is to cite Rule 803(2) or Rule 804(b)(2).

There are two dangers when lawyers reach for rule numbers. The first danger is that they will state the wrong number. All honest trial lawyers and evidence teachers will admit that they sometimes have to look at the rules to remember the number of the particular rule they are invoking. Uttering the wrong number is worse than uttering no number at all. The second danger is that the Trial Judge will confuse in his or her mind the rule numbers and reject an argument on the assumption that it rests on a rule other than the one actually relied upon. Unless the Judge offers reasons for a ruling, it is possible that the losing advocate would never know that the Judge was confused.

One objection, however, ought to be made by rule number in almost every case. Any time a trial lawyer invokes Rule 403 and objects that evidence is too prejudicial, the objection is best made by number and the objector ought to seek to articulate the reasons for the objection outside the hearing of the jury. The reason should be obvious. If the objecting counsel declares in the presence of the jury, "Your Honor, this evidence is so prejudicial that if the jury hears it, it will overwhelm all other evidence," and the objection is overruled, some if not all of the jurors are likely to understand that the objecting counsel has stamped this evidence as overwhelming. The objection in the hearing of the jury may well assure that it is certain rather than probable that the evidence will have the extreme impact that gave rise to the objection. Indeed, even a successful objection may lead to jury speculation about what kind of "prejudicial" evidence they were not allowed to hear.

There are other situations in which rule numbers can be important. The most common arise when counsel wishes to call the Trial Judge's attention to particular language in an evidence rule. The Trial Judge is likely to have a copy of the rules at the bench. By referring to a rule by number and reading relevant language, counsel is most likely to induce the Trial Judge to turn to the rule and read the language. This may be necessary if the Judge is to understand a complex argument based upon particular language in a rule that has not been the subject of previous argument.

The Most Important Rules

Turning now to specific rules of evidence, we offer a list of the rules that trial lawyers ought to master and be prepared to invoke or respond to at all times. Whenever part of a rule is more important than the rest, the list identifies the most important part or parts. Altogether the list contains 24 rules. This may seem like too many to master, but we believe that the list is manageable, especially if emphasis is placed upon the key rules, which are identified with an asterisk. These are the "top ten" on our list of evidence rules. Actually, there are eleven rules in the "top ten," but the two with double asterisks are included in a tie for the last spot, because each in our view could qualify as the most underutilized of the rules. Both are included to call attention to them.

The List

Rule 103. Rulings on evidence

(a) Effect of erroneous ruling

(c) Hearing of jury

Rule 104. Preliminary questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally

(b) Relevancy conditioned on fact

Rule 105. Limited admissibility

*Rule 401. Definition of "relevant evidence"

*Rule 402. Relevant evidence generally admissible; irrelevant evidence inadmissible

*Rule 403. Exclusion of relevant evidence on grounds of prejudice, confusion,or waste of time

*Rule 404. Character evidence not admissible to prove conduct; exceptions; other crimes

(b) Other crimes, wrongs, or acts

Rule 602. Lack of personal knowledge

*Rule 607. Who may impeach

Rule 608. Evidence of character and conduct of witness

(b) Specific instances of conduct

Rule 609. Impeachment by evidence of conviction of crime

(a) General Rule

*Rule 611. Mode and order of interrogation and presentation

(a) Control by Court

Rule 612. Writing used to refresh memory

Rule 613. Prior statements of witnesses

Rule 701. Opinion testimony by lay witnesses

*Rule 702. Testimony by experts

Rule 703. Bases of opinion testimony by experts

*Rule 801. Definitions

(a) Statement

(c) Hearsay

(d) Statements which are not hearsay

Rule 803. Hearsay exceptions; availability of declarant immaterial

(1) Present sense impression

(2) Excited utterance

(3) Then existing mental, emotional or physical condition

(4) Statements for purposes of medical diagnosis or treatment

(5) Recorded recollection

(6) Records of regularly conducted activity

(8) Public records and reports

(18) Learned treatises

Rule 804. Hearsay exceptions; declarant unavailable

(b) (1) Former testimony

Rule 806. Attacking and supporting credibility of declarant

Rule 807. Residual Exception

*Rule 901. Requirement of authentication or identification

(a) General provision

Rule 1006. Summaries

We shall consider these rules in groups and explain how we arrived at the list. We shall also explain why the "top ten" rules are so important to trial lawyers.

Offering & Objecting; Rulings; Instructions - Rules 103, 104 & 105

Trial lawyers need to know the basic requirements of a timely objection and a proper offer of proof when an objection is sustained. Rule 103 sets forth the same basic rules as at common law. One important thing to notice about Rule 103(a) is that a "timely" objection is required, but the word "timely" is not defined in the Rule. Rule 103 is not one that lawyers need to know by number; it sets forth the basic proposition that, generally speaking, Trial Judges will not intervene when evidence is offered unless an objection is made, and Appellate Courts will not consider a claim that an objection should not have been sustained unless they can review the substance of the excluded evidence.

Rule 104 is another rule that generally need not be cited by number. It is important because it sets forth the basic tasks of judge and jury. The Trial Judge has the duty of deciding whether or not evidence qualifies for admission under the various rules set forth in Articles IV-X of the Federal Rules and to deal with presumptions and judicial notice under Articles II and III of the Rules. Rule 104(a) sets forth the Judge's responsibility to interpret and to apply the rules of evidence.

Rule 104(b) indicates that, when a relevance issue arises, the Trial Judge decides whether, when evidence is relevant only if some fact or other is true, there is sufficient evidence for a reasonable juror to find the necessary fact. Under Rule 104(a), the Trial Judge often is factfinder; what the Judge finds to be true is critical. Under Rule 104(b), the Judge sifts the evidence to decide whether it is sufficient to support a jury's finding that something is true.

Trial lawyers need to know how to raise an objection and to make an offer of proof; they also need to know what the Judge's role in ruling on evidence is. The Supreme Court held in Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) , that the Trial Judge is to use a preponderance of the evidence standard in ruling on coconspirator statements offered under Rule 801(d)(2)(E). After Bourjaily, the preponderance standard is the standard that Trial Judges use for Rule 104(a) rulings. See the Advisory Committee Note to the 2000 amendment to Rule 702. With Bourjaily and Rule 104(a) in mind, trial lawyers can employ a very useful rule of thumb: The lawyer who relies upon a rule of evidence has the burden of showing, by a preponderance of the evidence if facts are disputed, entitlement under the rule. Thus, a lawyer who objects to admission of a statement on the ground that it falls within the attorney-client privilege must show that the elements of a privilege claim exist, just as the proponent of a statement as an excited utterance must show by a preponderance that it satisfies the requirements of Rule 803(2).

Rule 103(c) is a much neglected rule. It provides that in jury cases, "proceedings shall be conducted, to the extent practicable, so as to prevent inadmissible evidence from being suggested to the jury by any means." This rule may be useful to a lawyer trying to stop an opponent from making "speaking objections" in front of the jury or to counsel who wants to make an evidence argument outside the hearing of the jury.

Rule 105 should be considered along with these rules. It provides that, upon request, a party can obtain a limiting instruction when evidence is admitted for a limited purpose. Because Rule 105 requires a request for an instruction, just as Rule 103 requires an objection and an offer of proof, trial lawyers are on notice that they cannot expect the Trial Judge sua sponte to explain to the jury how evidence may or may not be used. (See the further discussion of this point in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 105, §§ 105.02[2], [3]). A trial lawyer who asks for an instruction has a right to one under the Rule, and experienced trial lawyers will decide what language to suggest to the Judge. The most experienced lawyers may in some cases ask the Judge not to give a specific instruction to the jury, out of fear that the instruction might do more harm than good, and instead to instruct opposing counsel not to use the evidence except in a limited way.

In short, Rules 103 and 104 set forth basic requirements for raising and responding to evidence claims, and Rule 105 sets forth a rule that governs limiting instructions with respect to admitted evidence.

Relevancy (Rules 401, 402 & 403) and Rules 901(a), 611(a) & 1006

One federal District Judge gave a speech a few years ago and claimed that he only needed two evidence rules, 401 and 403, to do his job. He said Rule 401 permitted him to admit anything while Rule 403 permitted him to exclude anything. This is slightly exaggerated, but only slightly, and we think that the Judge should have mentioned Rule 402 as well as the other two Rules. All three make the "top ten" and for good reason. Rule 401 provides a generous standard of relevant evidence, combining in one definition the common-law distinction between materiality and relevance. Rule 402 provides that "[a]ll relevant evidence is admissible" except as otherwise provided by law, and that "[e]vidence which is not relevant is not admissible." Thus, evidence is not admitted under Rule 401--that Rule is definitional only, and technically the power to admit relevant evidence is grounded in Rule 402. Rule 403 provides that relevant evidence can be excluded if the prejudicial effect or other problems substantially outweigh the probative value of the evidence.

These rules are tremendously important. Rule 402, as interpreted by the Supreme Court in United States v. Abel, 469 U.S. 45 (1984) , stands for the proposition that all relevant evidence is admissible, whether or not any other rule says so, unless there is some provision in law that excludes the evidence. This is important because there are many types of relevant evidence that are not specifically mentioned in the Federal Rules, and all are presumptively admissible under Rule 402. In Abel, for example, the Court noted that no rule must say that bias evidence is admissible to impeach a witness; bias evidence is relevant and therefore is admissible under Rule 402. Rule 402 also states clearly that irrelevant evidence can never be properly admitted.

Under Rule 401, evidence is relevant if it adds in the slightest to a case - this is a very permissive standard for relevance. Rule 403 provides Trial Judges with a variety of reasons to exclude evidence that is relevant and not excluded by other rules. Rule 403 permits a Judge to conclude that evidence is prejudicial, confusing, misleading, cumulative, time-consuming, or unnecessary. It is a rule that can be cited by trial lawyers any time they have no other objection to make. However, the success rate on Rule 403 exclusions is relatively low - in order to be subject to exclusion, the risk of prejudice, confusion and delay must substantially outweigh the probative value of the evidence. Appellate opinions generally pay great deference to Trial Judges who make Rule 403 rulings in view of the fact that Trial Judges see and hear the litigants and observe the jury, while Appellate Courts have only a cold record on which to base a decision.

Closely related to Rule 401 is Rule 901(a), the basic rule of authentication. Rule 901(a) states that "evidence sufficient to support a finding that the matter in question is what its proponent claims" is all that is needed to authenticate challenged evidence. Essentially, any relevant evidence that a factfinder could believe is enough for authentication. The standard of Rule 901(a), like the definition of relevance in Rule 401, requires only a minimal showing. (Though perhaps the requirement is a bit more stringent than might appear at first glance - see the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 901, §§ 901.02[3], [4]). Moreover, the Trial Judge who rules on whether evidence is relevant or whether it is properly authenticated decides not whether he or she believes the evidence, but whether a reasonable juror could believe it. Essentially, authentication is treated in the same way as evidence whose relevance is conditioned on fact under Rule 104(b). A trial lawyer who knows these rules understands that there are virtually unlimited ways to authenticate evidence.

A rule that should be considered along with the relevance rules, especially Rule 403, is Rule 611(a), which specifically grants the Trial Judge authority to control the scope and the order of proof. These rules provide support for Judges imposing time limits on parties, for Judges permitting witnesses to testify out of turn, for ruling on whether instructional charts, videos, etc. can be presented to the jury, and for virtually any trial management that the Judge concludes will avoid prejudice, waste of time, presentation of cumulative evidence, etc., and will enhance a jury's understanding. If counsel wants a Trial Judge to do something unusual by way of trial management, counsel often will find that Rules 611(a) and 403 provide the best authority for experimentation.

The last rule in this grouping is Rule 1006, which permits summaries of voluminous material to be introduced. This is the only really important "best evidence" rule in modern litigation, now that Rule 1003 provides that duplicates (most mechanically reproduced copies of documents and recordings) are presumptively admissible. Rule 1006 permits trial lawyers to present voluminous materials in an understandable way. The most important thing for trial counsel to remember under this rule is that summaries are only admissible if the underlying documents would be; summaries of inadmissible evidence are themselves inadmissible.

Rule 611(a) gives the Trial Judge authority to permit summaries of evidence that do not qualify under Rule 1006. For example, a chart used by a law enforcement officer to trace a series of telephone calls and to summarize how they connect to one another is properly characterized as a summary of trial evidence, not as a Rule 1006 summary. Rule 611(a) is the rule that provides the authority for a Trial Judge to permit and to control the use of summaries and instructional aids falling outside of Rule 1006.

Rules 401, 402, 403, 901(a), and 611(a) all make our "top ten" because they set forth the most basic requirements for admission of evidence and provide the Trial Judge with expansive authority to manage a trial. Rule 1006, while outside the "top ten," is grouped with these rules because it provides an opportunity for trial lawyers to present voluminous evidence in a way that judges and juries can understand it. It is a management device that trial lawyers can utilize much like the Trial Judge utilizes Rule 611(a).

Character Evidence - Rules 404(b), 608, 609

The common-law approach to character evidence is codified in Rule 404(a): "Evidence of a person's character or a trait of character is not admissible for the purpose of proving action in conformity therewith on a particular occasion ... ." The basic exclusion of character evidence rests on a judgment that general proof of a predisposition to act a certain way is not very probative of how a person acted on any given occasion and more importantly that triers of fact may give character evidence undue weight or punish a person because of general character without paying sufficient attention to the facts alleged in a particular case.

Character evidence is only excluded, however, when offered to prove a character trait and action in conformity therewith. It is not excluded when offered as evidence of other crimes, wrongs or acts under Rule 404(b) to prove things like intent, knowledge, or identity. Thus, it is common in criminal cases for the government to offer Rule 404(b) evidence, ostensibly for a permissible, particularized purpose rather than to prove character. According to the Supreme Court's decision in Huddleston v. United States, 485 U.S. 681 (1988) , the Trial Judge is to consider an offer of character evidence under Rule 104(b) and decide whether the evidence offered is relevant and whether it is tied to other facts sufficiently to warrant admission, and whether to exclude such evidence as unduly prejudicial under Rule 403. Once evidence of other crimes, wrongs or acts is introduced, it is difficult for any instruction to assure that a jury will not use this evidence to reach forbidden inferences.

Rule 404(b) evidence is not limited to criminal cases. It is frequently offered, for example, in employment discrimination cases to prove intent. The possibility that other crimes, wrongs, or acts will be misused as character evidence is ever present, and it is why this evidence is so difficult to control. Plaintiffs and prosecutors are particularly prone to offer such evidence, and defense counsel in both civil and criminal cases must be aware that the standard for admission is relevance, and must be prepared to raise objections under Rule 403. Because the introduction or exclusion of Rule 404(b) evidence arises in most every case and has a genuine potential to affect the outcome of a case, it makes the "top ten" list.

It is vitally important that counsel know the difference between Rule 404(b) on the one hand and Rule 608(b) and 609(a) on the other hand. Rule 404(b) evidence can be offered in a proponent's case-in-chief; this evidence is not dependent on whether any particular witness testifies. In contrast, questions about prior bad acts under Rule 608(b) and about prior convictions under Rule 609(a) cannot be asked except when impeaching a witness. Nonetheless, these two impeachment rules raise some issues similar to those raised under Rule 404(b), e.g., whether introduction of impeachment evidence, especially when it is a party who is impeached, will result in the misuse of such evidence as showing action in conformity therewith in violation of Rule 404(a).

Counsel also should be aware of limitations found in Rules 608 and 609 that are not found in Rule 404(b). For example, Rule 608(b) permits a witness to be questioned about prior bad acts when probative of the witness' character for veracity, but the questioner is bound by the witness's answer. Extrinsic evidence is prohibited. And Rule 609(a) contains a specialized balancing test favoring the criminal accused. Because all of this evidence, like Rule 404(b) evidence, can have a genuine effect on the verdict in a case, these rules are important.

Character evidence of any sort always poses a danger for the reasons stated. Rule 404(b) sets forth a variety of reasons why evidence of specific acts not charged or pleaded may be offered, and is a rule of tremendous importance, justifying its place among the "top ten." Rules 608(b) and 609(a) are also very important, although resort can be made to them only after a witness takes the stand to testify.

Flexible Impeachment Rules: 607, 612, and 613

A trial lawyer operating under the Federal Rules has more options available for impeachment or for anticipating impeachment than were available at common law. Rule 607 marks an important departure from the common-law principle that a party generally could not impeach its own witness. On its face the Rule permits any party to impeach any witness.

Rule 607 clearly permits a party to anticipate an adversary's impeachment and to "remove the sting" by eliciting negative material on direct examination rather than leaving it for the cross-examiner to bring out. Rule 607, read together with Rule 402, permits any relevant impeachment evidence to be offered unless some other rule, like Rule 403, 608 or 609, places limits on such evidence.

There is one caveat about Rule 607. It must be considered in conjunction with Rule 801(d)(1)(A), the rule that permits certain prior inconsistent statements to be admitted as substantive evidence. If a lawyer knows that a witness has recanted a prior statement, it is impermissible for the lawyer to call the witness in order to place the inconsistent statement before the jury under the guise of impeachment; the lawyer may only call the witness for the purpose of eliciting or introducing the inconsistent statement if it is admissible as substantive evidence under Rule 801(d)(1) or under some other exception to the hearsay rule. See the discussion in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 607.02[2].

Rule 612 might seem out of place in a discussion of impeachment, since it is a rule governing refreshing recollection. But, it does fit.

Rule 612 expands the common-law right of a party to inspect anything used to refresh a witness's recollection at trial to provide that "if a witness uses a writing to refresh memory for the purpose of testifying ... before testifying," "if the court in its discretion determines it is necessary in the interests of justice," then "an adverse party is entitled to have the writing produced at the hearing, to inspect it, to cross-examine the witness thereon, and to introduce in evidence those portions which relate to the testimony of the witness." This Rule is especially important when experts are retained in a case. It is highly likely in both civil and criminal cases that the Court will require an expert to disclose all of the documents or information provided to the expert and reviewed by the expert. Parties who wish to protect work product and privileged communications must take care not to provide these documents to witnesses, particularly experts, or the documents will lose their protection. The adversary may then impeach the witness with the documents.

Rule 613(a) provides that counsel may question a witness about a prior inconsistent statement in a document without first showing the document to the witness. This is a relaxation of the common-law rule. Rule 613(b) on its face appears to relax the foundation requirement by not requiring that the foundation for a prior inconsistent statement be laid before extrinsic evidence is offered. Experienced counsel generally will continue to lay the foundation first, however, for two reasons. The first is that an inconsistent statement is most effective in many cases when it is used as close in time to direct examination as is possible. The second is that some Judges will hesitate to force witnesses to await recall so that a foundation can be laid and may find that the failure to lay a foundation while the witness was first on the stand is a waiver of the right to offer an inconsistent statement, despite the language of Rule 613.

If there is a good reason for counsel to want to offer the inconsistent statement before providing a witness an opportunity to explain or deny - for example, where the same statement might impeach several witnesses and counsel does not want to reveal the statement too early -- counsel should alert the Trial Judge that a witness may have to be recalled and seek permission to depart from the traditional foundation. The language of Rule 613(b) and the Trial Judge's authority under Rule 611(a) should provide all the authority that the Court needs to fashion an appropriate procedure for any given case.

Rule 607 makes the "top ten" because it affords maximum flexibility in dealing with witnesses. Rule 612 and 613 are also important. Counsel must think about Rule 612 in dealing with witnesses before a trial starts, and should be aware that Rule 613 does relax strict common-law requirements.

Counsel should also note that, under Rule 806, a party may impeach a hearsay declarant. The rules governing impeachment of witnesses generally govern impeachment of hearsay declarants, except that foundation requirements are relaxed. Rule 806 is rarely cited and rarely used. It can, however, be a very important rule to combat hearsay testimony. As we stated in introducing our "top ten," Rule 806 is one of two rules placed on the list to call attention to its potential importance rather than to acknowledge its past significance.

Opinions and Expert Witnesses: Rules 702 and 703

Not only are the Federal Rules more flexible than the common law with respect to impeachment, but they are also more flexible with respect to both lay and expert opinion.

Rule 701 abolishes the common-law distinction between facts and opinion and provides that a lay witness can testify in the form of an opinion if the opinion is rationally based on the witness's perceptions and helpful to the trier of fact. Rule 701 does not permit a witness to assume the role of a factfinder and to suggest how disputed issues ought to be decided; nor does it permit what is tantamount to expert testimony in the guise of "lay opinion." But, the Rule does permit witnesses to testify as fully as possible as to what they perceived so that triers of fact can have as much useful information as possible.

It is the unusual case these days in which no expert witness is called. Expert testimony is not limited to matters beyond the ken of a judge or jury; any helpful testimony may be admitted under Rule 702. Under Rule 703, an expert may rely upon facts or data reasonably relied upon others in the field even if those facts or data are not independently admissible as evidence.

Rule 702 makes our "top ten" largely because of the Supreme Court's decision in Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 509 U.S. 579 (1993) . The Court held that the Trial Judge sits as a "gatekeeper" and must exclude expert testimony when it is unreliable. A recent amendment to Rule 702 codifies Daubert and its progeny. Daubert signifies that, while the expert rules are more flexible than the common-law approach to expert testimony, the Trial Judge still has an important screening role to play.

Rules 701, 702, and 703 liberalize the admissibility of lay and expert opinion. All are important, and Rule 702 ranks among the "top ten" as a result of Daubert.

Hearsay: Rule 801, 803 and 804, and Personal Knowledge, Rule 602

Hearsay is one of the most difficult of all evidence subjects. The Federal Rules make some important departures from the common law, especially in Rule 801.

Rule 801(a) defines "statement" so as to exclude conduct that is not intended as a communication. Thus, conduct, not intended to be an assertion but offered to prove what the actor believed to be true, which was hearsay at common law, is not hearsay under the Federal Rules.

Rule 801(c) defines hearsay as "a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted." This basic definition focuses on whether a statement was made outside of court rather than on whether the declarant who made the statement is present in court.

However, Rule 801(d) contains eight categories of statements that are defined as "not hearsay." Unlike the common law, Rule 801(d)(1) makes certain prior inconsistent statements and certain prior consistent statements of a testifying witness nonhearsay. It also makes prior identifications by a testifying witness nonhearsay.

Rule 801(d)(2) sets forth five categories of admissions. Each is deemed to be "not hearsay." There are personal admissions, adoptive admissions, authorized admissions, agent's admissions, and coconspirator's admissions. Under the Supreme Court's decision in Bourjaily, discussed above, a Trial Judge may consider a challenged hearsay statement in the course of determining whether it qualifies as a coconspirator's statement. This is a departure from many common-law decisions which required that a Court find that a conspiracy existed and that the declarant and any party against whom a statement is offered were members of that conspiracy on the basis of evidence aliunde (or independent evidence). The Bourjaily principle has been extended to proof of agency under the other agency exceptions found in Rule 801(d)(2).

The Supreme Court left undecided in Bourjaily whether a challenged statement, standing alone, would be sufficient to permit a statement to qualify as a coconspirator's statement. An amendment to Rule 801(d)(2) states that with respect to authorized, agent's, and coconspirator's statements, the hearsay statement standing alone is insufficient to prove the foundational fact.

Rule 801 now provides the vehicle for admitting most hearsay in Federal Courts. Every admission, the most common hearsay exception, falls under Rule 801. So do prior statements of testifying witnesses. Moreover, the vicarious admissions that fall under Rule 801(d)(2)(D) are increasingly important in civil cases, while coconspirator statements under Rule 801(d)(2)(E) remain important in criminal cases. Rule 801(d) plainly warrants inclusion among the "top ten."

Rule 803 and 804(b) respectively provide 23 and 5 particular hearsay exceptions, and Rule 807 adds a residual exception. The hearsay exceptions that are most commonly used are the ones found on our list. A few comments on each are offered here.

Rule 803(1) provides an exception for a present sense impression, an exception that not all common-law courts recognized. It is confined in time and scope. It is a useful Rule for admitting evidence of telephone conversations reported by another and for admitting notes taken during conversations.

Rule 803(2) is the classic excited utterance. It should be noted that a statement need only relate to a startling event or condition to qualify. That standard is broad enough to include a variety of statements.

Rule 803(3) codifies the distinction between forward and backward looking statements. This is the classic distinction between Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Hillmon, 145 U.S. 285 (1892) , and Shepard v. United States, 290 U.S. 96 (1933) .

Rule 803(4) admits a wide variety of statements made to both treating and diagnosing physicians. It is more inclusive than many common-law rules.

Rule 803(5) offers an exception for prior recorded recollection. There is no requirement that a witness have total memory loss, only that there be "insufficient recollection." It is important to note that the memorandum or record must be read to the trier of fact; it is not admissible as evidence.

Rules 803(6) and 803(8) cover business and public records. "Business" is broadly defined as a regularly conducted activity. Public records include factual findings in public investigations with some limitation on that principle when law enforcement reports are offered against a criminal accused. Rule 803(8)(C) was given a broad reading in Beech Aircraft Corp. v. Rainey, 488 U.S. 153 (1988) .

Rule 803(18) expands the use of learned treatises. Experts are permitted to read on direct examination from treatises they relied upon. An authoritative work may be read to the jury whether or not the witness relied upon it. More flexibility is provided both on direct and cross-examination than at common law.

None of the 803 particular exceptions requires a showing of unavailability of the declarant, the showing that is required under Rule 804. The most frequently used 804 exception is for former testimony. The key under the Rule is that the party against whom the former testimony is offered, or a predecessor in interest of that party, must have had an opportunity and similar motive as at trial to question the witness.

Finally, Rule 807 can be relied upon when no particular exception is satisfied but the proponent of a hearsay statement proves that the statement is especially reliable. The trial lawyer must remember to give notice to the other side before offering statements under this residual exception.

All of these exceptions are familiar, and all are important. None is so much more important than the others to warrant a place among the "top ten."

It might seem strange, but the final place on the "top ten" is reserved for a rule that is too often ignored, Rule 602, which provides that a witness may only testify if there is evidence to support a finding that the witness is testifying from personal knowledge. The personal knowledge requirement is not likely to be ignored when a witness testifies at trial. But it is too often ignored when hearsay statements are offered. Except for admissions, defined as nonhearsay under Rule 801, the general rule is that hearsay statements falling within the definition provided in Rule 801(c) require evidence sufficient to support a finding that the declarant had personal knowledge.

For example, a proponent of an excited utterance might call a witness to say that a hearsay declarant, who had blood on her clothes, said that the defendant stabbed the deceased. Proving that this is an excited utterance might be easy. Proving that the declarant had personal knowledge might be more difficult. The blood might have come as the declarant examined the deceased without the declarant's having seen what occurred. The blood might even belong to someone other than the deceased. The Trial Judge must decide whether a reasonable juror could believe that the witness had personal knowledge of the event related.

We put Rule 602 on our list of the ten most important rules in order to call attention to the importance of personal knowledge as applied to hearsay declarants. Like Rule 806, Rule 602 is too little appreciated.

These twenty-four rules, especially the "top ten," should be familiar to all trial lawyers. We recognize that everyone reading this will want to add some rules or eliminate some that we have identified as important. Lawyers who specialize in particular kinds of litigation might find some omissions particularly galling. Those who handle negligence cases or product liability cases might complain that Rule 407 should be on the list. Those who handle insurance coverage cases might want to see Rule 408 or 411 here. We acknowledge that there is no list that will meet the needs of every lawyer, but we believe that this one will provide some useful guidance for most lawyers in most cases.

1 The Push to Codify

The background of the codification movement in the United States is a curious one; there has been and still is a fairly constant demand among some lawyers for evidentiary codes. But it has been exceedingly difficult to build sufficient momentum to enact codes into law. "Ambivalent" is probably the best word to describe the long-time attitude of many lawyers towards legislation in the evidentiary domain.

There is apparently some appreciation of the benefits of uniformity and ease of ascertainment of the rules when a statute is enacted. At the same time there is some fear that legislation produces wooden rules, concern that some established principles will be inadvertently omitted, and some feeling that case by case adjudication is a superior means of doing justice. Lurking in the background also is a sense, for most lawyers, that some evidentiary rules are of questionable value and that some may even approach the realm of the absurd. But the problem has been to find the appropriate means to change the rules without impairing the functioning of those that are justifiable and that are presently working well.

Legislation, at first glance, offers a nice clean solution. One swing of the legislative (or rulemaking) axe and the umbilical cord tying present to past is cut, and legislation emerges that solves the problems of the past and serves the needs of the future. But when it is remembered that not all lawyers agree on which are silly rules and which are wise, that too radical a departure from tradition makes it difficult to enact legislation, that the problem of too much rigidity is a real one, and that there are many possible solutions, not simply one, the difficulties of enacting legislation become readily apparent.

Common-law courts, on the other hand, can examine the facts of particular cases and fashion rules to fit those facts. They are also somewhat free to modify past rules to meet present needs. However, the mere mention of the term stare decisis should serve to explain one of the "problems" of common-law Courts, i.e., precedent is important and resistant to change. Moreover, while molding rules to fit particular facts may do justice in individual cases, it becomes difficult to predict what a Court will say about the rules of evidence in any given case; and evidence rules especially need to be predictable as they are used in the heat of a trial. Finally, there is the feeling on the part of many Judges that once a rule has stood over time, even if it is of questionable value, legislative intervention is a more appropriate response than judicial overruling.

More could be said on the relative advantages and disadvantages of legislation and adjudication. It is sufficient for the purposes of this brief background, however, to note that the demand for codification has never come unanimously from the members of the bar. Codification has had its opponents as well as its adherents. It is difficult to review the history of the last sixty years and to reach any firm conclusion as to whether feelings about codification of evidentiary rules differ greatly from the feelings of most lawyers about the relative merits of legislation versus adjudication generally.

2 The Path to the Supreme Court

Much of the impetus toward legislation arose from enactment of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure in the late 1930's. When the original Advisory Committee on Civil Rules issued its report in 1937, it suggested that evidentiary rules be largely excluded, because at that time there was no ready reference for codification and there was apparently insufficient time for the task. It is also likely that inclusion of evidentiary rules with the Rules of Civil Procedure would have provoked much of the same controversy that surrounded the 1970's attempt at codification and thus would have diverted attention from the much needed Rules of Civil Procedure. The Chairman of the Advisory Committee, Attorney-General William D. Mitchell, said:

> There was tremendous pressure brought on the advisory committee by those familiar with the subject of evidence insisting that there was a need for reform which we did not meet, and some advisory committee should tackle the task of revising the rules of evidence and composing them into a new set of rules to be promulgated by the Supreme Court.

Following the suggestion of Attorney-General Mitchell that some Advisory Committee should tackle the task of revising the rules of evidence and compose them into a new set of rules to be promulgated by the Supreme Court, other prominent members of the legal profession made similar proposals.

These clarion calls did not go unheeded. In 1939, the American Law Institute turned to the subject of evidence, and with Professor Edmund Morgan of Harvard as its Reporter, promulgated the Model Code of Evidence in 1942. Despite the "tremendous pressure" of which the Advisory Committee Chairman had spoken, no jurisdiction ever adopted the Model Code of Evidence.

While unadopted, the Model Code was not entirely disregarded. In 1943 the American Bar Association took action. Its House of Delegates directed a study of uniform evidentiary rules, and the following year specifically provided that the Model Code should serve as the basis of the study.

In the interim, the Advisory Committee had an opportunity once again to consider whether or not it should undertake to compile rules of evidence. It concluded: "While consideration of a comprehensive and detailed set of rules of evidence seems very desirable, it has not been feasible for the Committee so far to undertake this important task."

The American Bar Association recognized that the Model Code as drafted would not receive support from the various states, so it enlisted the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws in a program of revision in the hope that acceptable rules could be promulgated.

The actual drafting by the Commissioners began in 1950 and culminated in the Uniform Rules of Evidence, in 1953. But only a handful of jurisdictions (e.g., California, Kansas, New Jersey, Oklahoma, Utah) have adopted comprehensive evidence codes based upon the Uniform Rules. Like the Model Code, the Uniform Rules were not the stimulus to reform that some had hoped they would be. In 1958 the House of Delegates of the American Bar Association urged the Judicial Conference of the United States to appoint a special committee to adapt the Uniform Rules for use in Federal Courts in order to clarify and to improve the evidentiary rules and to provide a means of uniformity and conformity.

In March 1961, in special session, the Judicial Conference of the United States approved a proposal of the Standing Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure that called for a project devoted to Federal Rules of Evidence. The Chief Justice implemented the proposal by naming a Special Committee under the chairmanship of the distinguished Yale Professor James William Moore. The Committee's mandate was to inquire into the feasibility and advisability of Federal Rules of Evidence. During 1961, its report (A Preliminary Report on the Advisability and Feasibility of Developing Uniform Rules of Evidence for the United States District Courts) was written. This report concluded that uniform Rules of Evidence were both advisable and feasible. On February 12, 1962, the report was circulated to members of the bar and to Judges. After considering their comments, the Standing Committee and the Judicial Conference confirmed the recommendation of the Special Committee. On March 8, 1965, Chief Justice Warren appointed an Advisory Committee on Rules of Evidence.

The Advisory Committee transmitted to the Standing Committee a "Preliminary Draft of Proposed Rules of Evidence for the United States District Courts and Magistrates" on January 30, 1969. On March 31, 1969, the Standing Committee circulated the preliminary draft to the Bar and Bench for consideration. It was not until October 1970 that the Standing Committee presented to the Judicial Conference its revised draft of evidentiary rules which substantially modified the preliminary draft. The revised draft was approved by the Judicial Conference and referred to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court concluded that the revised draft should be submitted for comments to lawyers and Judges in the same manner as the preliminary draft. This was done in March 1971.

Many comments and criticisms were made with respect to both drafts, and revisions were made in the revised draft, just as they had been made in the previous draft. After the Advisory Committee had reworked its product, it submitted the revised draft to the Standing Committee, which made some further revisions before approving the draft and submitting it to the Judicial Conference. The Judicial Conference also approved the draft and then forwarded it to the Supreme Court in October 1971. Although the Court did not promulgate this revision of the revised draft, it did receive further comments and suggestions, including some from the Department of Justice. Upon receipt of these comments, the Court requested the Advisory Committee and the Standing Committee to evaluate them. Early in 1972 the Advisory Committee and the Standing Committee met again and made further modifications. This procedure, which did not allow for public comment on the final draft, was severely criticized. See, e.g., Testimony of George Halpern and George Frampton, Hearings on Proposed Rules of Evidence Before the Subcommittee on Criminal Justice of the House Committee on the Judiciary, 93rd Congress, First Session, at 158-92 (1973). In any event, on November 20, 1972, the Supreme Court approved a final draft.

3 The Legislative Response

Had the same procedure that was used in adopting the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure been used with respect to the evidentiary Rules (a procedure that would also have applied absent any contrary Congressional action), the Supreme Court draft would have become effective automatically after the passage of ninety days. But because Congress recognized the importance of the evidentiary Rules and because the label "substantive" was persistently applied to several of the Rules, Congress enacted Public Law 93-12, which provided that the Rules should not be effective until expressly approved by the Congress.

Two days after receiving the proposed Rules from Chief Justice Burger on February 5, 1973, the Subcommittee on Criminal Justice of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives (formerly designated as Special Subcommittee on Reform of Federal Criminal Laws) opened hearings on the desirability of the uniform code of evidence and the merits of the Rules approved by the Supreme Court. After six days of hearings, and receipt of numerous written communications, the Subcommittee circulated a draft on June 28, 1973. Following extensive comments from the public, the Subcommittee revised its draft and on October 10, 1973, reported its revised draft to the full Judiciary Committee. On October 16 and 18, and on November 6, 1973, the full Committee debated the bill and amended it in several respects before reporting it to the full House. Several additional amendments were made by the full House before the Rules were passed on February 6, 1974. A Senate version of the Rules was passed on November 22, 1974, following hearings on July 4 and 5, 1974, before the full Senate Committee on the Judiciary. As a result of compromises by House and Senate conferees, the final bill was approved by the House on December 16, and by the Senate on December 18. It was sent to President Ford, who approved it on January 2, 1975, whereupon it became Public Law 93-595, 88 Stat. 1926 et seq.

1-One Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 4

4 The Future of the Rules

After more than thirty years under the Rules, it is fair to state that the goals of codification -- increased certainty as to what the rules are, predictability, efficiency, and uniformity of result -- have been met in large part, but not completely. There is still some disuniformity and unpredictability. Part of the reason for disparate results is that several of the most important Rules (such as Rule 403 and the residual exception to the hearsay rule) call for an ad hoc judgment on the part of the Trial Judge that will necessarily vary from case to case. As to other Rules, the disuniformity is largely due to vague or misguided statutory language. See Becker and Orenstein, The Federal Rules of Evidence After Sixteen Years -- The Effect of "Plain Meaning" Jurisprudence, the Need for an Advisory Committee on the Rules of Evidence, and Suggestions for Selective Revision of the Rules, 60 G.W. L. Rev. 857 (1992) (presenting a catalog and summary of some problems that have arisen under the Rules, including "circuit splits, gaps and inconsistencies in the Rules, debates over fundamental policy, and innovative suggestions").

Also, there is no question that some of the Rules are poorly drafted, and this has often led the Courts to reach results that they believe to be correct and just, even though such results are not mandated (and are even arguably prohibited) by the Rule. In a world of perfect codification, the rule itself would always lead to fair and just results. See Jonakait, The Supreme Court, Plain Meaning, and the Changed Rules of Evidence, 66 Tex. L. Rev. 745 (1990) (noting the reluctance on the part of many Courts to apply certain Federal Rules as they are written when to do so would lead to an unfair result). Case law has often diverged from the text of the Federal Rules. n1

Finally, some commentators have complained that under the Rules, Judges have lost the common-law power to promulgate new exclusionary rules of evidence, and that Judges are forced to admit evidence in certain circumstances even where they have legitimate doubts about its reliability or where exclusion would serve public policy. See Imwinkelreid, The Meaning of Probative Value and Prejudice in Federal Rule of Evidence 403: Can Rule 403 Be Used to Resurrect the Common Law of Evidence?, 41 Vand. L. Rev. 879 (1988).

Still, on balance, the Federal Rules of Evidence have been a success. See Becker and Orenstein, supra at 858 ("By most accounts, the Rules have been a great success."). Litigators and Judges undoubtedly have found it easier to master the Rules rather than a morass of common-law precedent; and many of the Rules have been uncontroversial and have led to uniform and just results in the Federal Courts.

One important question that has arisen is whether the codification of rules of evidence has totally supplanted the common law previously developed in the Federal Courts. The Supreme Court has visited this question on several occasions, and a unifying principle can be derived from these cases. In United States v. Abel, 469 U.S. 45 (1984) , the Court quoted with approval the statement that as a matter of principle, "under the Federal Rules no common law of evidence remains." Yet the Court in Abel analyzed and applied the common-law rule permitting impeachment for bias, even though there is nothing specifically concerning impeachment for bias in the Federal Rules. Given the widespread use of impeachment for bias at the time the Federal Rules were being drafted and adopted, the Abel Court found it unlikely that the drafters "intended to scuttle entirely the evidentiary availability of cross-examination for bias."

This would suggest that widespread common-law practice would still be relevant in the absence of a Federal Rule on the point or put another way, that common-law concepts have been subsumed within the perameters of Rule 402 (providing that relevant evidence is admissible) and Rule 403 (giving the judge discretion to exclude relevant evidence under certain circumstances).

Any common-law rule will be supplanted, however, if there is an Evidence Rule that is in conflict with the common law. Thus, in Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) , the Court rejected the applicability of a widespread practice under the common law, finding that it had been supplanted by an explicit Federal Rule. Under common law, the prosecution was required to establish independent evidence of conspiracy by a preponderance of the evidence before a coconspirator's hearsay statement could be admitted. The Bourjaily Court found no support for this practice in the language of the Federal Rules, and stated that under the explicit terms of Rule 104, the coconspirator's hearsay statement itself could be used by the Judge in determining whether a conspiracy existed.

More recently, in Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, 509 U.S. 579 (1993) , the Court rejected the well-known common-law Frye test for assessing scientific expert testimony, and held that it was superseded by Federal Rule 702. n2 The Daubert Court explained that common-law principles could serve as an "aid" to the application of the Federal Rules, but that they are superseded insofar as they are inconsistent with "a specific Rule that speaks to the contested issue."

The distinction, therefore, is between common law that is supplemental to and consistent with the Federal Rules, and common law that is inconsistent with a specific Rule. Thus, the common law as to bias was not in conflict with any Federal Rule in Abel -- in fact it was consistent with the general principles of relevance and prejudice set forth in Rule 403 -- whereas the common law was found to be in conflict with a specific Rule in both Bourjaily and Daubert.

Finally, it must be remembered that, in one area at least, a common-law approach is mandated by the Federal Rule itself. Federal Rule 501 provides that the law of privileges in the Federal Courts shall be determined by principles of Federal common law, as developed in light of "reason and experience."

5 Amendments to the Rules

From time to time certain Rules have been amended and others have been added, some of the amendments originating in Congress and some generated by the Judicial Conference (and specifically by the Advisory Committee on Evidence Rules). The amendments have generally fallen into four categories: (1) technical amendments such as those designed to make the Rules gender-neutral; (2) amendments responding to particular developments, such as the amendment to Rule 704(b), which resulted from Congress's dissatisfaction with proof of the insanity defense in the trial of John Hinckley; (3) amendments that have sought to clarify problematic language, such as the amendment to Rule 609, concerning impeachment of witnesses with prior convictions -- which as originally written created anomalous results when used in a civil trial; and (4) amendments seeking to resolve a split in the circuits, such as the amendment to Rule 407 which specifically states that subsequent remedial measures are not admissible to prove product defect, defective design, and the like.

The original Advisory Committee on the Federal Rules of Evidence was dissolved shortly after the Rules were enacted. For many years thereafter, there was no advisory committee specifically and exclusively assigned to the Federal Rules of Evidence; amendments were few and far between, especially compared with the amendments promulgated to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure over the corresponding time period. See Becker and Orenstein, The Federal Rules of Evidence After Sixteen Years -- The Effect of "Plain Meaning" Jurisprudence, the Need for an Advisory Committee on the Rules of Evidence, and Suggestions for Selective Revision of the Rules, 60 G.W. L. Rev. 857 (1992) (noting six substantive amendments to the Federal Rules of Evidence during the first seventeen years -- three initiated by Congress -- compared with over one hundred substantive amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure during that time period).

In 1993, the Judicial Conference, responding to calls from Judges, scholars and practitioners, appointed a new Advisory Committee on the Federal Rules of Evidence. This committee meets regularly to consider proposed changes in the Rules. Its package of amendments to Rules 103, 404, 701, 702, 703, 803(6) and 902 became effective on December 1, 2000, and an amendment to Rule 608(b) became effective on December 1, 2003. As this edition goes to press, proposed amendments to Rules 404(a), 408, 606(b) and 609(a) have been approved by the Judicial Conference and the Supreme Court. If all goes well, these amendments will become effective on December 1, 2006. One of the authors of this Treatise currently serves as the Reporter to the Advisory Committee on Evidence Rules.

AN ACT

To Establish Rules of Evidence for Certain Courts and Proceedings.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following rules shall take effect on the one hundred and eightieth day beginning after the date of the enactment of this Act. These rules apply to actions, cases, and proceedings brought after the rules take effect. These rules also apply to further procedure in actions, cases, and proceedings then pending, except to the extent that application of the rules would not be feasible, or would work injustice, in which event former evidentiary principles apply.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES

1- Federal Rules of Evidence Manual B

B EDITORIAL EXPLANATORY COMMENT

The preamble to the Act is straightforward. It provides that the Rules take effect on the one hundred and eightieth day after their enactment (i.e., on July 1, 1975). Thus, any action brought after the date the Rules became effective is governed by them. With respect to actions tried between the date of enactment and the one hundred and eightieth day thereafter, the Rules did not apply, irrespective of when the action was filed. As for actions brought before or during the one hundred eighty day period and pending when the Rules actually took effect, the Rules applied unless the Court found that it would be unfair for them to be so applied.

The preamble was important in the early years after the Rules took effect. Its importance declined, however, as cases filed before the Rules took effect were decided.

CHAPTER 101 RULE 101

§ 101.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

This Rule simply states that the Rules of Evidence are generally applicable in the Federal Courts whether a case is before a Judge, a Bankruptcy Judge, or a Magistrate Judge. Express reference is made, however, to Rule 1101, which more specifically identifies the proceedings in which the Rules are applicable and those in which they are not. Thus, the Rules are applicable in all civil and criminal cases and generally in cases in which Courts review agency actions de novo. They are also applicable in bankruptcy cases. They are inapplicable in a number of types of proceedings, including: (1) when a Judge is deciding a preliminary question of fact -- preliminary, that is, to a decision on whether or not to admit evidence; (2) in grand jury proceedings and in preliminary examinations (such as suppression hearings) in criminal cases; (3) in probation, supervised release and sentencing proceedings; (4) when a warrant is sought; (5) in bail proceedings; (6) in hearings on motions independent of the merits; (7) in arbitrations and administrative proceedings; and (8) in any other proceedings in which Congress has explicitly stated that the Federal Rules are inapplicable -- for example, Congress has provided that in pretrial hearings concerning criminal forfeiture of assets, the District Court "may receive and consider ... evidence and information that would be inadmissible under the Federal Rules of Evidence." 21 U.S.C. § 853(e)(3) (1988). See United States v. Monsanto, 924 F.2d 1186 (2d Cir. 1991) , discussed in the annotations to this Rule.

Rule 101 is essentially a reference point to the more precise delineation of applicability of the Rules set forth in Rule 1101. For a more detailed exploration on the Rules' applicability, see the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 1101, § 1101.02. As will be discussed in that Comment, the Rules have been found inapplicable to certain proceedings even though Rule 1101 does not specifically provide for an exclusion.

§ 101.03 Annotated Cases

Daigle v. Maine Med. Center, Inc., 14 F.3d 684 (1st Cir. 1994) : The Trial Court in a diversity medical malpractice action ordered that the plaintiff present her case to a prelitigation screening panel as required by state law, and when the panel unanimously found no acts of negligence, followed the state law by admitting the findings into evidence without providing an opportunity for impeachment. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court held that the federal evidence rules governing hearsay and impeachment do not seek to displace the state's substantive policy implemented by the screening panel procedure.

United States v. Monsanto, 924 F.2d 1186 (2d Cir. 1991) (en banc): In holding that continuation of an ex parte restraint of assets subject to forfeiture in the event of conviction requires a post-restraint, pretrial adversary hearing as to probable cause that the defendant committed the crimes providing a basis for forfeiture, the Court held that the Federal Rules of Evidence do not apply in the hearing.

United States v. Chase, 18 F.3d 1166 (4th Cir. 1994) : The Court reversed a murder conviction, concluding that the rule that a defendant cannot be convicted of murder if the victim's death occurred more than a year and a day after the defendant's attack was a substantive rule unchanged by adoption of the Evidence Rules.

In re Oil Spill by Amoco Cadiz, 954 F.2d 1279 (7th Cir. 1992) : In a nonjury damages trial arising from an oil spill in the English Channel, the Trial Court admitted considerable evidence it characterized as hearsay, thinking that it would be too cumbersome to apply the rule. The Court noted that the hearsay rule applies in all trials -- jury and bench, big and small -- but after considering available exceptions, found no reason to upset the damages award on evidentiary grounds.

The reference to electronically stored information is intended to track the language of Fed. R. Civ. P. 34.

The Style Project

The Evidence Rules are the fourth set of national procedural rules to be restyled. The restyled Rules of Appellate Procedure took effect in 1998. The restyled Rules of Criminal Procedure took effect in 2002. The restyled Rules of Civil Procedure took effect in 2007. The restyled Rules of Evidence apply the same general drafting guidelines and principles used in restyling the Appellate, Criminal, and Civil Rules.

1. General Guidelines

Guidance in drafting, usage, and style was provided by Bryan Garner, Guidelines for Drafting and Editing Court Rules, Administrative Office of the United States Courts (1969) and Bryan Garner, Dictionary of Modern Legal Usage (2d ed. 1995). See also Joseph Kimble, Guiding Principles for Restyling the Civil Rules, in Preliminary Draft of Proposed Style Revision of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, at page x (Feb. 2005) (available at http://www.uscourts.gov/rules/Prelim_draft_proposed_pt1.pdf); Joseph Kimble, Lessons in Drafting from the New Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 12 Scribes J. Legal Writing 25 (2008-2009). For specific commentary on the Evidence restyling project, see Joseph Kimble, Drafting Examples from the Proposed New Federal Rules of Evidence, 88 Mich. B.J. 52 (Aug. 2009); 88 Mich. B.J. 46 (Sept. 2009); 88 Mich. B.J. 54 (Oct. 2009); 88 Mich. B.J. 50 (Nov. 2009).

2. Formatting Changes

Many of the changes in the restyled Evidence Rules result from using format to achieve clearer presentations. The rules are broken down into constituent parts, using progressively indented subparagraphs with headings and substituting vertical for horizontal lists. "Hanging indents" are used throughout. These formatting changes make the structure of the rules graphic and make the restyled rules easier to read and understand even when the words are not changed. Rules 103, 404(b), 606(b), and 612 illustrate the benefits of formatting changes.

3. Changes to Reduce Inconsistent, Ambiguous, Redundant, Repetitive, or Archaic Words

The restyled rules reduce the use of inconsistent terms that say the same thing in different ways. Because different words are presumed to have different meanings, such inconsistencies can result in confusion. The restyled rules reduce inconsistencies by using the same words to express the same meaning. For example, consistent expression is achieved by not switching between "accused" and "defendant" or between "party opponent" and "opposing party" or between the various formulations of civil and criminal action/case/proceeding.

The restyled rules minimize the use of inherently ambiguous words. For example, the word "shall" can mean "must," "may," or something else, depending on context. The potential for confusion is exacerbated by the fact the word "shall" is no longer generally used in spoken or clearly written English. The restyled rules replace "shall" with "must," "may," or "should," depending on which one the context and established interpretation make correct in each rule.

The restyled rules minimize the use of redundant "intensifiers." These are expressions that attempt to add emphasis, but instead state the obvious and create negative implications for other rules. The absence of intensifiers in the restyled rules does not change their substantive meaning. See, e.g., Rule 104(c) (omitting "in all cases"); Rule 602 (omitting "but need not"); Rule 611(b) (omitting "in the exercise of discretion").

The restyled rules also remove words and concepts that are outdated or redundant.

4. Rule Numbers

The restyled rules keep the same numbers to minimize the effect on research. Subdivisions have been rearranged within some rules to achieve greater clarity and simplicity.

5. No Substantive Change

The Committee made special efforts to reject any purported style improvement that might result in a substantive change in the application of a rule. The Committee considered a change to be "substantive" if any of the following conditions were met:

a. Under the existing practice in any circuit, the change could lead to a different result on a question of admissibility (e.g., a change that requires a court to provide either a less or more stringent standard in evaluating the admissibility of particular evidence);

b. Under the existing practice in any circuit, it could lead to a change in the procedure by which an admissibility decision is made (e.g., a change in the time in which an objection must be made, or a change in whether a court must hold a hearing on an admissibility question);

c. The change would restructure a rule in a way that would alter the approach that courts and litigants have used to think about, and argue about, questions of admissibility (e.g., merging Rules 104(a) and 104(b) into a single subdivision); or

d. The amendment would change a "sacred phrase" -- one that has become so familiar in practice that to alter it would be unduly disruptive to practice and expectations. Examples in the Evidence Rules include "unfair prejudice" and "truth of the matter asserted."

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article I. General Provisions
CHAPTER 102 RULE 102

1-102 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual § 102.02

§ 102.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Goals of the Rules; When Admissibility Is In Doubt

Rule 102 sets forth the goals of the Rules, which are to provide speedy, inexpensive, and fair trials designed to reach the truth.

When Rule 102 states that the Federal Rules shall be construed so that the truth may be ascertained and proceedings justly determined, does this signify that the Judge who is doubtful of whether to admit or exclude evidence should always err on the side of admission in order to aid the search for truth?

The answer must be NO for several reasons. First, Article Four of the Federal Rules makes it clear that certain evidence must be excluded even though it is relevant, because it is too prejudicial or possibly too confusing. In such instances, the search for truth would not be aided by admitting the evidence. When Trial Judges have doubts about the admissibility of evidence, they must always remember to balance the possible prejudicial effect of the evidence against its probative value. Only then can they be sure to assist the search for truth. Second, the Rules also recognize that there are other policies served by rules of evidence aside from reaching accurate decisions as to what happened in a particular case. In dealing with offers to compromise, evidence of insurance, subsequent remedial measures, and privileges, for example, the Trial Judge must consider factors other than accurate reconstruction of historical facts. Finally, Rule 102 itself notes that the Rules must be construed to eliminate unjustifiable expense and delay. In short, there are other factors to be weighed against the probative value of evidence.

Professor (now Judge) Posner has suggested that the basic goals of a judicial system are ascertaining the truth (i.e., determining historical facts accurately) while keeping the costs of litigation as low as is reasonably feasible. See generally An Economic Approach to Legal Procedure and Judicial Administration, 2 J. Legal Stud. 399 (1973). Other goals may also be operative, including: protecting the sanctity of the individual (e.g., the Fifth Amendment); providing disincentives for governmental abuses (e.g., Fourth Amendment exclusionary rule); promoting safety (Federal Rule of Evidence 407); and encouraging other socially useful activity, such as payment of medical expenses (Federal Rule 409) or settlement of claims (Federal Rule 408). It should also be noted that the principle of ascertaining truth necessarily mandates certain rules of exclusion as well as rules of inclusion. Thus, a system concerned with the search for truth must protect against the possibility of biased and unbalanced decisionmaking (Federal Rule 403); and it must ensure that the evidence considered by the factfinder meets at least some minimal standard of reliability (Federal Rules 702-703 and 801-805). Judges are often called upon to balance the impact of a decision on "the search for truth," the burdens on the competing litigants, and the promotion of highly regarded social values. Ensuring that "proceedings [are] justly determined" as this Rule states is by no means a simple task.

Rule 102 is sometimes cited by a court when a literal interpretation of an Evidence Rule would lead to a nonsensical or unjust result. For example, in Costantino v. Herzog, 203 F.3d 164 (2d Cir. 2000), a party sought to admit a video of an operation as a learned treatise. The opponent objected, arguing that under the literal terms of Rule 803(18) (the learned treatise exception), only published, hardcopy materials would qualify. The Court found that this argument ignored the fact that "we are exhorted under Rule 102 to interpret the Rules of Evidence to promote the 'growth and development of the law ... to the end that the truth may be ascertained.' " The Court saw "no reason to deprive a jury of authoritative learning simply because it is presented in a visual, rather than printed format." It concluded that "[i]n this age of visual communication, a videotape may often be the most helpful way to illuminate the truth in the spirit of Rule 102."

[2] Relationship to Specific Rules

Rule 102 gives the Trial Judge authority to fashion evidentiary procedures to deal with situations not specifically covered by the Rules. n1 In a few instances, however, Federal Courts, both Trial and Appellate, have used Rule 102 to disregard more specific Rules. n2 Rule 102 is not, however, an invitation to Judges to treat other specific Rules as if they were nonexistent. As Rule 102 is used, it is important for Courts to differentiate when Congress has spoken and finally determined an issue and when Congress has left room for judicial interpretation. n3 Drawing lines between permissible and impermissible constructions of Rules requires an understanding of congressional intent and a fair reading of statutory language. Our general view is that Rule 102 is not a basis in any case for disregarding a more specific Rule that makes basic sense as applied. Otherwise, the entire notion of a uniform set of federal evidence rules is threatened. n4

[3] Plain Meaning

Rule 102 establishes a principle of flexibility in the application of the Federal Rules of Evidence. But the Supreme Court has in some cases stated that judicial flexibility has no place when the "plain meaning" of a Federal Rule of Evidence mandates a certain result. United States v. Salerno, 505 U.S. 317 (1992), presents the clearest example of the Court's plain meaning approach. However, other cases, such as Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals Inc., 509 U.S. 579 (1993), and United States v. Mezzanatto, 513 U.S. 196 (1995), indicate that the Court is sometimes willing to employ a more flexible approach than a rigid adherence to plain meaning would seem to allow.

In Salerno, the prosecution immunized grand jury witnesses, who then unexpectedly gave testimony to the effect that the defendants were not guilty. The Court held that this grand jury testimony could not be admitted against the government at trial under Rule 804(b)(1), the prior testimony exception to the hearsay rule, unless it could be shown that the government had a "similar motive" to develop the testimony at the grand jury as it would have had at trial. The Court of Appeals had found it unnecessary for the defendants to establish a similar motive; it had reasoned that it would be unfair to allow the government to immunize witnesses in the hope of obtaining damaging testimony, and then to hide behind the hearsay rule if the testimony actually exculpated the defendant. But the Lower Court's concern, that the government could develop evidence in a one-sided manner, was found irrelevant by the Supreme Court in the face of a clear requirement in the Rule that a similar motive must be established. The Court contended that it had no authority to override the plain meaning of the rule by applying notions of adversarial fairness. Justice Thomas, writing for the Court, noted that the hearsay exceptions contained in the Federal Rules are both numerous and detailed. From this, he concluded that Congress "presumably made a careful judgment as to what hearsay may come into evidence and what may not," and that to respect Congress' determination, "we must enforce the words that it enacted." In essence, the Court held that it did not matter if the government had acted unfairly and had developed the evidence in a one-sided manner: The plain meaning of the Rule prohibited the Court from considering this unfairness.

Salerno can be read as embracing the unremarkable concept that when the words of a statute impose a clear requirement, the words control. However, the Federal Rules of Evidence are in many instances intentionally ambiguous. Generally speaking, the Rules are intended to provide a guide for a Trial Court in exercising its discretion -- thus, the Rules often read more like a draft of general principles than a specific code. n5

Therefore, a rigid adherence to plain meaning -- even assuming, arguendo, that this is a good idea -- can take the Court only so far. Moreover, Salerno was an easy case because it dealt with a specific statutory requirement that was affirmatively placed in the Rule; such an explicit requirement (proving a similar motive) can hardly be ignored. The plain meaning approach does not reach such easy results in the converse situation -- where a party is arguing for an evidentiary principle that is not specifically in the Rule.

This converse situation arose in Daubert. The Daubert Court held that the common-law test for assessing the admissibility of scientific expert testimony -- the "general acceptance" or Frye test -- was inapplicable in federal trials. The Court did pay lip service to the plain meaning rule of construction, by stating that there was nothing in the language of Rule 702 that would support a standard as rigorous as that of "general acceptance." Yet it also relied more broadly on the tenor of the Federal Rules, which are designed to promote admissibility and which generally defer to the discretion of Trial Judges. That type of analysis is broader than a single-minded focus on the language of a particular rule; thus, the Court did not simply say, "it's not specifically in the Rule, so that is that." As Professor Taslitz has stated about Daubert:

> Daubert reveals a sensitivity to the need for judicial value choices and an awareness of the role of judicial discretion within the broad limits set by text and by whatever other indicators of congressional intent are available. This sensitivity is consistent with the Court's continued adherence to a more flexible, pragmatic approach to reading the Rules than is embodied in portions of other decisions. n6

The approach indicated in Daubert -- a more flexible construction is justified, and indeed encouraged, when the Rule does not affirmatively impose an absolute requirement or an absolute exclusion -- was followed in Mezzanatto. The question in that case was whether a defendant could permissibly waive the protections of Federal Rule 410, which forbids the introduction of statements made by the defendant in unsuccessful plea bargaining. The defendant, invoking a plain meaning approach, argued waiver was not permitted because the Rule did not specifically provide that its protections could be waived. But the Court rejected this analysis, reasoning that the Rule had to be read against the background presumption that all rights are waivable. If the Rule had specifically stated that the rights provided could not be waived, it would have been a different matter; but the Rule's absence of language did not preclude a construction consistent with the broader context of the Rules. Professor Jonakait provides helpful commentary on the result in Mezzanatto:

> Mezzanatto teaches an important lesson for interpretations of the Federal Rules of Evidence. While the text gave a clear rule, none of the Justices looked to that plain meaning. Whatever the merits of the plain-meaning doctrine, Mezzanatto was correct to conclude that, even if the language does not authorize them, waivers can still be valid. Waivers and stipulations are routine and valuable in litigation. Their blanket prohibition would change trials tremendously, and it is almost inconceivable that the drafters of the evidence code would have meant to ban waivers completely without at least some discussion of such a major change. Only a reflexive acolyte of plain meaning could conclude that because the text does not mention them, waivers cannot be enforced under the Federal Rules of Evidence.
> ... Mezzanatto convincingly demonstrates, if it had not been clear before, that the Federal Rules of Evidence cannot simply be treated as a self-contained code in which the text alone embraces the answer to all evidence questions. Sometimes we must look beyond the words of the Rules to understand evidentiary doctrine. We must do so when the Rules are not definitive or are ambiguous ... but > sometimes even when the text is clear. ... n7

The Court continued its flexible application of the plain-meaning approach in Ohler v. United States, 529 U.S. 753 (2000) . The Judge decided in a pretrial hearing that Ohler's prior conviction would be admissible to impeach her if she testified. When Ohler took the stand, defense counsel decided to bring up the conviction on direct examination. The Supreme Court found that Ohler had waived her right to appeal the pretrial ruling by bringing out the conviction herself. The Court relied on the general principle that "a party introducing evidence cannot complain on appeal that the evidence was erroneously admitted." Ohler argued that this general principle had been altered by Rules 103 and 609(a)(1). But the Court rejected this argument. It stated that > neither of these Rules addresses the question at issue here. Rule 103 sets forth the unremarkable propositions that a party must make a timely objection to a ruling admitting evidence and that a party cannot challenge an evidentiary ruling unless it affects a substantial right. The Rule does not purport to determine when a party waives a prior objection, and it is silent with respect to the effect of introducing evidence on direct examination, and later assigning its admission as error on appeal. Rule 609(a) is equally unavailing for Ohler; it merely identifies the situations in which a witness' prior conviction may be admitted for impeachment purposes. The Rule originally provided that admissible prior conviction evidence could be elicited from the defendant or established by public record during cross-examination, but it was amended in 1990 to clarify that the evidence could also be introduced on direct examination. According to Ohler, it follows from this amendment that a party does not waive her objection to the in limine ruling by introducing the evidence herself. However, like Rule 103, Rule 609(a) simply does not address this issue. There is no question that the Rule authorizes the eliciting of a prior conviction on direct examination, but it does no more than that.

Thus, as in Mezzanatto, the Court in Ohler held that the absence of statutory language did not preclude a construction consistent with the broader context of the rules and with trial practice generally.

One of the most helpful critiques on the plain-meaning approach, as applied to the Federal Rules of Evidence, is provided by Judge Becker and Professor Orenstein, in The Federal Rules of Evidence After Sixteen Years -- The Effect of "Plain Meaning" Jurisprudence, the Need for an Advisory Committee on the Rules of Evidence, and Suggestions for Selective Revision of the Rules, 60 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 857, 867-68 (1992):

> Significant scholarly attention has been devoted to theories of statutory interpretation, particularly in light of the Court's recent trend toward plain meaning. In particular, there is a growing recognition that generalized, global theories of statutory interpretation are less helpful than approaches tailored to individual statutes. The Federal Rules present a fascinating, if peculiar, case study for plain meaning.
> The Rules govern an area of judicial activity where judges have firm opinions, strong interest, and perhaps some unique wisdom. The Rules are generally clear and well-written. Thus, a plain meaning approach does not trigger noticeable angst about our ability to understand and agree upon meaning. Many of the Rules, however, although "clear" and "plain," are purposely flexible. For example, whether information will "assist" [see Rule 702] or "confuse" [see Rule 403] the trier of fact is a quintessential judicial judgment call. Where Congress purposely left a point open or vague, attempts to justify various interpretations by resort to plain meaning are disingenuous.
>
> Many of the so-called plain meaning debates pose questions of how to resolve discrepancies between the plain text of the Federal Rules and the generally shared interpretation of the Rules deriving from preexisting common law traditions. Under the new theory of plain meaning, the language of the Federal Rules controls, even in light of a strong and persuasive common law tradition to the contrary.

> Obviously, where the Rules consciously and clearly depart from preexisting common law, that departure supplants the pre-Rules approach. Plain meaning is troubling, however, when there is no indication that Congress intended to deviate from the prior common law consensus. ...

Becker and Orenstein focus on an important problem, that the plain meaning approach -- even as limited to enforcing only specific, affirmative statutory requirements -- threatens to repudiate the shared understanding of the Courts, derived from the common law, as to how a traditional rule of evidence should be applied. Another problem with the plain meaning approach is discussed by Professor Jonakait in The Supreme Court, Plain Meaning, and the Changed Rules of Evidence, 68 Tex. L. Rev. 745 (1990). Professor Jonakait addresses several situations in which a plain meaning approach will reach a result that is simply wrong on the merits, either because it is unfair or not fully thought out by Congress. He notes that the Lower Courts have often rebelled against the plain meaning approach in these instances. See the article by Professor Capra, Case Law Divergence from the Federal Rules of Evidence, set forth in Part Four of this Manual, for a complete discussion of Lower Court departures from the text of the Federal Rules.

It should be noted that the plain meaning approach has its limits even as applied by the Supreme Court. The Court has recognized that if a Rule on its face would lead to an "absurd" result, then it cannot be read literally. In Green v. Bock Laundry Mach. Co., 490 U.S. 504 (1989) , the Court encountered an anomaly in former Federal Rule 609, and concluded that Congress could not possibly have meant what it said. Former Rule 609 provided that a prior felony conviction, not based on dishonesty or false statement, was admissible to impeach a witness so long as the probative value outweighed its prejudicial effect "to the defendant." How should this Rule apply in civil cases? Read literally, it would mean that prior felony convictions would be automatically admissible against the civil plaintiff and his witnesses, yet they would not be admissible against the civil defendant and his witnesses unless the probative value outweighed the prejudice to the defendant. Thus, the plain meaning of the Rule granted a benefit -- possible exclusion of convictions offered for impeachment -- to the civil defendant that it did not grant to the civil plaintiff.

The Court in Green refused to be constrained by the plain meaning of Rule 609, concluding that "no matter how plain the text of the Rule may be, we cannot accept an interpretation that would deny a civil plaintiff the same right to impeach an adversary's testimony that it grants to a civil defendant." Yet the Green exception to the plain meaning doctrine is not itself so "plain." Reasonable minds can certainly differ as to whether a result is sufficiently "absurd" to trigger the exception to the plain meaning rule. And if the objection to former Rule 609 is that it merely led to an "unfair" result in civil cases, then it is difficult to justify the Court's adherence to plain meaning in Salerno, where the Court found itself unable to override an unfair result in criminal cases.

In light of the foregoing cases, two principles can be derived with which to construe the Federal Rules of Evidence:

1. If a Rule contains specific language imposing an admissibility requirement or excluding certain evidence, that requirement must be satisfied for evidence to be admissible under that Rule -- unless the requirement is so irrational as to be an obvious mistake.

2. If a Rule says nothing about a particular requirement, its absence from the Rule is not dispositive. One must resort to the policy behind the Rules (embodied in Rule 102), the entire body of text of the Rules, the common understandings of trial practice, and relevant legislative history to determine whether the requirement should be imposed. n8 In other words, the plain-meaning doctrine does not foreclose an argument that a Rule should be read to mean more than it actually says, so long as that reading is not directly in conflict with the specific provisions of the Rule.

[4] Judge or Jury Cases, Civil or Criminal Cases

The Federal Rules provide Trial Judges with a good deal of flexibility in handling most admissibility issues. This is because the Rules mandate an ad hoc balancing approach for many evidentiary questions -- most importantly under Rule 403 of the Federal Rules. For these more flexible applications, Rule 102 can be cited as authority for a differentiated approach to admissibility questions, depending on whether the case is tried to a jury or to a Judge, and depending on whether the case is civil or criminal. It is true that the Rules are equally applicable to civil and criminal cases, and equally applicable to jury and bench trials. Yet a civil case tried to a Judge should not necessarily require the same evidentiary formalities as a criminal case tried to a jury.

For example, under Rule 403, a Trial Judge is authorized to exclude evidence where it is unduly prejudicial or confusing. But surely these considerations are mainly applicable to jury trials. We must presume -- and the Trial Judge will certainly presume -- that she will not be unduly confused or prejudiced by the proffered evidence. In this situation, Rule 102 can be used as authority for a flexible approach depending on the case, since the language of Rule 403 is not so plain as to mandate a single result.

It must be remembered that, without regard to Rule 102, certain Rules explicitly require different treatment for civil and criminal trials. For example, Rule 609 applies a heightened exclusionary test for convictions of testifying defendants in criminal prosecutions -- a test not applicable to other witnesses; and Rule 803(8)(C) prohibits the use of certain public reports against a criminal defendant, but there is no similar prohibition as to other litigants. Finally, the criminal defendant has constitutional rights to confrontation and compulsory process; these rights obviously supersede any interest in flexibility set forth in Rule 102.

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 102, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article I. General Provisions
CHAPTER 103 RULE 103

1-103 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual § 103.02

§ 103.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Objections and Offers of Proof; General Requirement

This Rule is a codification of the basic rules of offering evidence and objecting to admission of evidence. In order to preserve an objection for appeal, ordinarily a party must make a specific, as opposed to a general, objection. n1 If, however, a specific ground is apparent, no absolute requirement of specification will be imposed. n2 Once an objection is made, if the Trial Judge excludes evidence, the party offering the evidence must make an offer of proof. n3 However, Courts have excused a failure to make an offer of proof where the offer would have been extremely difficult or futile under the circumstances. n4 The Rule sensibly states that Trial Judges should attempt to conduct proceedings for the determination of the admissibility of evidence outside of the presence of the jury. n5

The requirement of a timely and specific objection is not a mere formality. A timely and specific objection is required so that the Court is notified of a possible error, and so has an opportunity to correct the error and obviate the need for appeal. Specific and timely objections are also required, in fairness, to allow the opponent an opportunity for argument on the question and to correct any possible deficiencies in the evidence. Finally, Courts are concerned that, without a requirement of timely and specific objection, a party could remain silent at trial in the hope of a favorable trial outcome, with the insurance policy of an appeal should that hope not become reality. n6

[2] Harmless Error, Prejudicial Error, Plain Error

The text of the Rule specifically mentions only plain error. In application, however, the Rule concerns three types of Trial Court error, each of which has been well-recognized by the Courts both before and after the passage of the Federal Rules. The three types of error are: (1) harmless error, which is error objected to at trial, but found on appeal not to affect substantial rights; n7(2) prejudicial error, also called reversible error, which is that raised at trial and found on appeal to affect substantial rights; and (3) plain error, which is error not raised at trial, but nevertheless so egregious that it is considered and rectified on appeal. n8 Thus, the distinction between harmless and prejudicial error is dependent on whether substantial rights have been adversely affected by a mistake. The distinction between prejudicial error and plain error is dependent on whether the error is so grave as to excuse the party's failure to preserve it at trial.

The Circuit Courts have adopted conflicting standards of harmless error. Some Circuits have differentiated between civil and criminal cases, and have held that the standard for harmless error in a civil case is whether substantial rights were "more probably than not" untainted by the error. n9 Some Circuits have applied this same more-probable-than-not standard to criminal cases as well. n10 Other Circuits have held that errors are not harmless unless it is "highly probable" that they did not affect a party's substantial rights. This standard results in more reversals, but is hardly a wholesale ticket to reversal. Some Circuits hold that this "highly probable" standard is limited to criminal cases (applying the more-probable-than-not standard to civil cases), while some hold that it is equally applicable to civil and criminal cases. n11 Other Circuits have held that in criminal cases, the standard for harmlessness is whether the evidentiary error was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. n12

If the error is one of constitutional dimension, rather than merely evidentiary, the test of harmlessness on direct review is whether the prosecution can prove that the error was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. n13 On habeas corpus review, constitutional error is considered by the stricter standard of whether the error had a "substantial and injurious effect or influence in determining the jury's verdict." n14

All these various standards are probably not as important as the judgment that is applied in determining the effect of an error on the verdict. n15 If the Appellate Court is left with a definite and firm conviction that the error was substantial enough to affect the fairness of the proceedings, then it will probably reverse regardless of the standard employed.

Some of the factors that are relevant to the harmless error inquiry include: (1) whether erroneously admitted or excluded evidence was "cumulative" on a point or, conversely, whether it was the most powerful or only evidence in support of the point; n16(2) whether the Trial Court gave timely and effective curative instructions; (3) whether erroneously admitted evidence was relied upon by counsel in argument; (4) whether the error was discrete or pervasive; n17(5) whether evidence, though improperly admitted for one purpose, was properly admitted for another; n18 and (6) whether the error was made in a lengthy or short trial. Of course, if more than one error was made, the Appellate Court must assess the cumulative effect of the errors on the verdict. However, Appellate Courts have understandably taken the view that no trial can be error-free, and the longer the trial, the less likely it is that a few discrete errors will have had an impact on the verdict. For further application of these principles, see the annotated cases under this Rule.

[3] Difference Between Harmless Error and Plain Error

The failure to preserve an objection does not mean that an Appellate Court is absolutely precluded from considering the evidentiary issue. It does mean, however, that the question is reviewed under the more stringent plain error standard of review. n19 The plain error test is more rigorous for the party seeking reversal than is the abuse of discretion standard, which is applied to most evidentiary rulings; and the abuse of discretion standard is itself so Trial Court-friendly as to make most evidentiary rulings reversal-proof.

In United States v. Olano, 507 U.S. 725 (1993) , the Supreme Court interpreted the plain error provision of Fed. R. Crim. P. 52(b), which is substantively identical to the plain error provision of Federal Rule of Evidence 103(d); both Rules permit an Appellate Court to take notice of plain errors "affecting substantial rights although they were not brought to the attention of the court." Indeed, Rule 103(d) was patterned after Fed. R. Crim. P. 52(b). n20 Consequently, the Court's interpretation of "plain error" in Olano is instructive on the application of the plain error standard of Rule 103. n21

The Olano Court identified three limitations on a Court's power to reverse because of errors that were not properly preserved for review in the Trial Court. First, there must be an error. Second, the error must be plain, which means it must be clear or obvious. Thus, even more deference is given to the Trial Court than under the deferential abuse of discretion standard of review. Moreover, if the Courts are split on an evidentiary point, any asserted error on that point is by definition not "plain" enough to permit reversal. n22 Finally, the plain error must affect substantial rights, which means in most cases that it must have been prejudicial in the sense of affecting the outcome of the case.

Most importantly, the Olano Court stated that the language of the plain error rule (unlike that of the harmless error rule) is permissive, not mandatory. The Court recognized that "the Court of Appeals should correct a plain forfeited error affecting substantial rights if the error seriously affects the fairness, integrity or public reputation of judicial proceedings." However, a "plain error affecting substantial rights does not, without more" mandate reversal; otherwise the discretion not to reverse that is afforded by Criminal Rule 52 (and by Rule 103) "would be rendered illusory." The Court also made it clear that the burden of showing plain error and its effect on the verdict is on the appellant. n23 It follows that reversal for plain error is extremely rare and within the broad discretion of the Appellate Court. For example, the Court in Olano found no plain error even though alternate jurors were permitted to sit in on jury deliberations, in clear violation of Fed. R. Crim. P. 24(c). For applications of the plain error standard, see the annotated cases under this Rule.

[4] Waiver Distinguished From Forfeiture

If a party fails to object in a timely and specific manner to evidence offered at trial, review for plain error is the party's best hope. But sometimes the failure to object is not the result of inadvertence or neglect. Sometimes counsel decides not to object for strategic reasons -- either because the matter is better left alone, or because the evidence introduced is thought at the time to be beneficial to the party's position. When that strategy does not work out, may the party seek plain error review on appeal?

The answer is no. There is a difference between a forfeiture of an objection (permitting plain error review) and a strategic waiver of an objection. "Forfeiture" denotes conduct (or lack of it) by which the party failed to preserve a claim of error. In contrast, a waiver denotes an intentional relinquishment of the right to appeal. A strategic waiver disentitles the party from seeking any kind of review of a claim of evidentiary error. Judge Calabrese's opinion in United States v. Yu-Leung, 51 F.3d 1116 (2d Cir. 1995) , is instructive on this point. The defendant was indicted with others in a drug conspiracy. His coconspirators suspected that he was stealing money from them, and kicked him out of the conspiracy. After he was ejected, the coconspirators continued to engage in drug activities, murder, etc. The defendant was the only member of the conspiracy to be tried -- the others all became cooperating witnesses for the government. At trial, these former coconspirators testified, among other things, to their own participation in acts of drug activity and murder, which acts occurred well after the defendant had been ejected from the conspiracy. Defense counsel did not object to any of this testimony. On appeal, the defendant argued that this evidence was erroneously admitted, and should be reviewed for plain error.

Judge Calabrese noted that the Olano Court had "carefully distinguished the concept of waiver from that of forfeiture" and noted that "forfeiture does not preclude appellate consideration of a claim in the presence of plain error, whereas waiver necessarily extinguishes the claim altogether." In this case, it was clear that the defendant had made a strategic decision to waive any objection to the evidence of drug and related activity in which the former coconspirators took part. This brought any plain error analysis "to a grinding halt." The defendant's defense was that he was an innocent victim of false accusations made by "unsavory drug runners who desperately wanted to curry favor with the government." Thus, it was reasonable to conclude that counsel did not object to evidence of the witnesses' criminal activity because he thought that the evidence would help the defense. Moreover, there was so much of this evidence introduced that one could not reasonably believe that the failure to object was the result of inadvertence or neglect. As Judge Calabrese remarked: "[G]iven the sheer quantity of unchallenged yet allegedly prejudicial testimony ... that is in the trial record, [the defendant's] lawyer would have had to have suffered from aggravated narcolepsy for us to believe that his failure to object did not reflect a clear and conscious tactical decision."

[5] Deferential Standards of Review

Whatever the standard of error applied on review, it is clear from the cases that even the most lenient standard of review is difficult to meet. Most appellants do not even get the opportunity to test the harmfulness of error because the deferential standard of review employed by the reviewing Court makes it extremely difficult to prove error on an evidentiary question in the first place. While pure issues of Rule construction are reviewed de novo, there are very few such issues that arise in practice. n24 Mixed questions of law and fact are also reviewed de novo, and they arise with somewhat more frequency than pure questions of law; for example, the question whether a communication is protected by a privilege is usually a mixed question of law and fact. n25 Still, the vast majority of evidentiary rulings are reviewed under the Trial-Court-friendly abuse of discretion standard, even where the claim of error has been properly preserved. n26 This has prompted one Court to state that appellants who challenge evidentiary rulings of the Trial Court "are like rich men who wish to enter the Kingdom; their prospects compare with those of camels who wish to pass through the eye of a needle." n27 Then, once passing through the eye of the needle, the appellant may still be without a remedy; the Appellate Court is more than likely to find that the error was harmless. All in all, the chances of reversal on the ground of an evidentiary error are slim indeed. n28

[6] Affirmance on a Different Theory

Suppose that the prosecution in a murder trial offers a hearsay statement from the victim that implicates the defendant. The statement is offered and admitted as a dying declaration. On appeal, the Court holds that the Trial Court erred in finding that the victim, at the time of the statement, had given up all hope of recovery. The government argues, however, that the conviction should be affirmed anyway, because the victim made the statement while under the influence of a startling event and thus the statement could have been admitted as an excited utterance. The defendant responds that the excited utterance argument should be rejected since it is being made for the first time on appeal. How should the Appellate Court rule?

The general rule is that an Appellate Court may uphold the admission of evidence on any theory that finds support in the record. n29 This is a corollary of the principle of harmless error: If the Trial Court admits evidence on an incorrect ground, this will not generally harm the appellant if the Trial Court could properly have admitted the evidence on an alternative theory.

An exception to the general rule of harmlessness will apply, however, if the objectionable evidence would have been used or treated differently at trial had it been admitted under an alternate theory. The leading case refusing affirmance on a different ground is Shepard v. United States, 290 U.S. 96 (1933) . Shepard was on trial for murdering his wife. He called witnesses who testified that Mrs. Shepard had been planning to commit suicide. He was convicted largely upon his wife's statement to her maid that "Dr. Shepard has poisoned me." The statement was offered over objection and admitted at trial as a dying declaration. The prosecutor used the statement as proof of the truth of the wife's claims, and argued the statement to the jury on that basis.

On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the statement was not admissible as a dying declaration, because it was not made under a belief of impending death. The government then argued that the statement could nonetheless have been admitted as circumstantial proof of Mrs. Shepard's state of mind, as being inconsistent with suicide. But Justice Cardozo, writing for the Court, refused to consider this theory of admissibility since it had not been used at trial:

> Here the course of the trial put the defendant off his guard. The testimony was received by the trial judge and offered by the government with the plain understanding that it was to be used for an illegitimate purpose, gravely prejudicial [i.e. to prove that Dr. Shepard had in fact poisoned his wife]. A trial becomes unfair if testimony thus accepted may be used in an appellate court although admitted for a different purpose, unavowed and unsuspected. n30

How can Shepard be squared with the general principle that the Trial Court's ruling, though incorrect, should be affirmed where an alternative theory could have been used to admit the evidence? The answer is that if the evidence had been admitted under the alternate theory, it would have been treated and used differently at trial. Specifically, Shepard would have been entitled to a limiting instruction if the evidence had been used to prove Mrs. Shepard's state of mind. The Court would have had to instruct the jury that Mrs. Shepard's statement could not be used to prove that Dr. Shepard actually poisoned her, but only to prove that Mrs. Shepard believed it to be so, and thus may have had a state of mind inconsistent with suicide. But as the evidence was actually used at trial, there was no limiting instruction, since the statement was treated as a dying declaration, admitted for the truth of the facts asserted.

It follows that the Shepard exception will not apply when the evidentiary ground asserted on appeal serves the same purpose and would lead to the same use and consequences as the theory actually used at trial. The unfairness and prejudice in Shepard, where the government advanced on appeal a theory different in evidentiary effect from the one presented to the Trial Court, is not present where different theories serve the same evidentiary purpose. For example, there would be no unfairness where records incorrectly offered as business records could have been admitted as admissions. Both theories of admissibility serve the same purpose and would lead to the same consequences -- proof of the truth of the matters asserted in the records. n31

Nor can the appellant complain if the theory used at trial is less prejudicial than the theory that could have been used. For instance, if the government in a criminal trial offers bad acts as "other crimes" evidence, when in fact the crimes are encompassed by the indictment, the error, if any, is harmless, because "the limiting instruction was more favorable than the defendant deserved." n32

Even where the new theory of admissibility serves the same purpose as the one used at trial -- such as substituting one hearsay exception for another -- the fact remains that each theory of admissibility has its own unique proof requirements. The party who proffers the evidence must show by a preponderance that the applicable admissibility requirements are met. n33 It follows that a new theory of admissibility cannot be upheld on appeal unless the admissibility requirements supporting that theory were proved during the proceedings below. And given the fact that a new theory of admissibility was by definition not pursued at trial, it will only be by happenstance that the necessary proof requirements would have been met. It is uncertain, for example, whether the record will indicate that a hearsay statement could have been admitted as a dying declaration, when in fact it was admitted at trial as an excited utterance.

Even if there is proof in the record that the Trial Judge could have admitted the evidence under a different theory than the one actually used, an Appellate Court should be cautious before concluding that the appellee has proved that the admissibility requirements were met. This is because whatever proof was elicited below was asserted in another context, and the nonoffering party never had a chance to meet the proof head on, in the context in which it is argued on appeal. For reasons similar to those given in Shepard, the nonoffering party can be prejudiced by being denied an opportunity to meet the evidence directly on a theory that was not argued at trial. n34

On the other hand, the appellee can make a strong argument for affirmance where the new theory of admissibility argued on appeal has requirements that will almost inevitably (though inadvertently) have been proved below. Thus, if the new theory of admissibility is that a statement could have been admitted as a party admission, the only proof requirements are that the statement was made by the party against whom the statement is offered; this would probably have been shown below as a matter of course. n35 In contrast, an argument that a hearsay statement could have been admitted under the residual exception is usually precluded on appeal because, among other things, admissibility under the residual exception requires advance notice to be given to the nonoffering party; and advance notice is unlikely to have been given if the statement was not offered at trial as residual hearsay. n36

[7] Offers of Proof

The Rule provides that an objection to exclusion of evidence will ordinarily not be preserved unless the party makes an offer of proof. The offer of proof has an important function at both the trial and appellate level. At trial, the offer of proof informs the Judge what the proponent expected to prove by the evidence, thereby enabling the Judge to determine whether the evidence would be admissible for any purpose. On appeal, the offer of proof ensures that the record will provide enough detail with which to determine whether the Trial Court committed reversible error by excluding the evidence. n37

The Rule does not specify what form the offer of proof should take. The fairest reading of the Rule is that counsel has the obligation only of representing to the Judge what the evidence would be if allowed to present it. n38 While the requirement is flexible, it cannot be ignored. n39 Of course, the more specific the description or presentation of the proof, the more helpful it will be to both the Trial and Appellate Court. If the Trial Judge has doubts about counsel's ability to produce, or wishes to know more about the evidence, counsel may be required to offer a witness to give testimony so the record will be complete. Obviously, the more complete the record, the less likely it is that a new trial will be required. A Judge will have to weigh the costs of a full trial record -- i.e., delay, expense, and even possible confusion -- against the potential benefits of alleviating the necessity for retrial.

The Court in United States v. Adams, 271 F.3d 1236 (10th Cir. 2001), provides this incisive analysis of the offer of proof requirement:

> On numerous occasions we have held that merely telling the court the content of proposed testimony is not an offer of proof. In order to qualify as an adequate offer of proof, the proponent must, first, describe the evidence and what it tends to show and, second, identify the grounds for admitting the evidence ... .
>
> There are at least four ways to make an offer of proof of testimony and achieve the purposes underlying the rule. First, and most desirable from all standpoints except cost, the proponent may examine the witness before the court and have the answers reported on the record ... .
>
> The second, and least favorable, method for making an offer of proof of testimony is a statement of counsel as to what the testimony would be ... .
> Documentary offers of proof comprise the third and fourth proper forms of proffering anticipated testimony. The first of these, and the least common, is a statement written by examining counsel describing the answers the proposed witness would give if permitted to testify. More common ... the proponent of the evidence may introduce a written statement of the witness's testimony signed by the witness and made part of the record.

In Adams, the Court held that the defendant's offer of proof of excluded expert testimony was inadequate. Counsel sent the expert's report directly to the Trial Judge, but it was never made part of the record. And counsel's colloquy with the Judge at the time of the Court's ruling was insufficient because counsel stated "kind of" what the expert's conclusion would be.

The Rule states that an offer of proof is unnecessary where the substance of the evidence "was apparent from the context within which questions were asked." One example of this exception is where testimony is received and subsequently stricken. It is clear in these circumstances that an offer of proof is unnecessary, since the substance of the evidence is apparent. Another possible application of this exception arises with witness testimony, where it is clear from the question what the answer would be. Obviously, though, no such assurance is justified if the witness is hostile to the party who asked the question.

Appellate Courts have been forgiving about the offer of proof requirement where it appears that the Trial Court was itself responsible for the incompleteness of the offer. For example, in Reed v. Baxter, 134 F.3d 351 (6th Cir. 1998) , the plaintiffs sought inquiry into certain statements made at a meeting. The Trial Court granted a protective order on grounds of attorney-client privilege. The defendants argued that any claim of error was forfeited by the plaintiffs' failure to make an offer of proof as to the substance of the testimony they sought to introduce. The Court noted that the plaintiffs had failed to make a specific showing of the asserted contents of the conversations. But it also noted that the plaintiffs' failure was "attributable primarily to the confusion caused by the District Court's broad rulings excluding in advance any inquiry into evidence that may be covered under the privilege." Thus, the Trial Court had through a broad protective order deprived the plaintiffs of the ability to put any evidence into the record. Under these circumstances, the Court held that the plaintiffs had done all they could to preserve their claim of error.

[8] Timeliness of Objections

Rule 103 does not provide a standard for when an objection is timely, nor for when a motion to strike is sufficient. Generally, the rule has been that an objection to an improper question is waived if not made before the answer, since counsel is not allowed to gamble that there will be some benefit if it is answered. n40 Federal Courts have shown much flexibility, however, in permitting objections or motions to strike following an improper question that is answered where counsel reacts swiftly, but not quite quickly enough. Of course, where the answer is objectionable but the question is not, a motion to strike is appropriate following the answer. Where demonstrative or documentary evidence is offered, the grounds for objection are ordinarily apparent at that time. Therefore, an objection should be made when the evidence is offered.

It should be noted that sometimes a ground for objection or for a motion to strike is not immediately apparent. In these circumstances, the objection is timely if made as soon as the ground for objection appears.

Rules 30(c) and 32(d) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure provide that objection must be made during a deposition to errors or irregularities in the form of the questions or answers, to the administering or taking of the oath, or to anything that might be corrected. Objections to the competency of a witness or to the materiality or relevance of evidence may be made at trial. Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(a)(3) provides that parties have fourteen days from the date of production to disclose any objections they have to deposition testimony or documentary evidence. All objections other than those under Rules 402 and 403 are waived if not made within the time period, unless good cause is shown. Rule 15(f) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure is not as specific, but is interpreted to impose requirements similar to the Civil Rules.

[9] Importance of Specificity

A quick reading of Rule 103 might lead one to conclude that its principal purpose is to announce standards to be used for appellate review of Trial Court actions. It should be apparent, however, that the real thrust of the Rule is directed to action in the Trial Court. Whether or not an appeal is ever taken in a case, trial lawyers should utilize, and Trial Judges should require, specific objections and particularized offers of proof if evidentiary claims are to be adequately resolved during the course of litigation. n41 It is our view that Trial Judges, who bear the burden of justifying their rulings on the basis of reasons articulated for the record, owe it to themselves to compel counsel to state precise grounds for opposing or supporting a point at trial. If the Trial Judge is alerted to the specific intentions of the parties, a ruling is likely to be better than if only general arguments are made.

It is axiomatic that a specific objection made on one ground will not preserve an objection to the same evidence on different grounds. n42 This rule is more than a formality. Courts recognize that a litigant will often choose a specific ground of objection, and reject another ground, for tactical reasons. There is no reason in these circumstances to allow reconsideration of this strategic choice on appeal. Moreover, if an objection is made on one ground, neither the Trial Court nor the opposing party has been properly notified that the evidence may be objectionable on different grounds.

Counsel must take care that an objection to proffered evidence is not so detailed and specific as to miss the forest for the trees. For example, an objection to specific language in a document is not an objection to the document itself. Likewise, an objection to the details of a prior conviction is not an objection to the conviction itself. n43 Generally, an objection as to details should be used only as a fallback argument once the more all-encompassing objection has failed.

[10] Continuing Objections

Often, a particular line of testimony or other evidence will present the same evidentiary objection with respect to each question or each witness. In these circumstances, neither the Court nor counsel may find it productive to reiterate continuous objections at each point down the line, as if the issue had not been raised before. On the other hand, counsel must be concerned that a failure to renew an objection down the line could be deemed a failure to preserve a claim of error.

Nothing in Rule 103 prevents continuing objections. n44 However, reviewing Courts have sometimes frowned on the practice due to the concern that such a "cookie cutter" way of making objections may not take unto account the nuances of presenting certain types of evidence. For example, in United States v. McVeigh, 153 F.3d 1166 (10th Cir. 1988) , the defendant in one of the Oklahoma City bombing trials objected under Rule 403 to the testimony of a number of witnesses who identified deceased victims of the blast and described the impact of the explosion. The Trial Court granted McVeigh a continuing objection to testimony dealing with the "long-range effects" of the bombing that went beyond the "immediate effects" of the blast. The Court of Appeals analyzed this continuing objection as follows:

> We have serious doubts as to whether McVeigh's continuing objection was a proper form of objection for the victim testimony that followed. In certain circumstances, a continuing objection has been allowed as a specific, timely objection under Federal Rule of Evidence 103. See United States v. Fortenberry, 919 F.2d 923 (5th Cir. 1990) ; United States v. Blackman, 904 F.2d 1250 (8th Cir. 1990) ; United States v. Vinson, 606 F.2d 149 (6th Cir. 1979) . ...
> However, continuing objections generally are considered inappropriate for preserving error on appeal under Rule 403. In United States v. Mangiameli, 668 F.2d 1172, 1177 (10th Cir. 1982) , this court cautioned that "in our view, the considerations bearing upon a decision whether to admit or exclude evidence under Rules 404(b) and 403 are sufficiently complex that ordinarily neither counsel nor the trial court should rely on a standing objection with respect to evidence coming within the purview of these rules. ...

The McVeigh Court stated that a continuing objection would be sufficient to preserve a claim of error only if each piece of evidence presented the same exact circumstances, undifferentiated by trial context or witness. It concluded that "[g]iven the sheer number of witnesses involved and the variety of factual contexts presented, the admissibility of victim testimony would not ordinarily be an issue that could be decided ... by means of a continuing objection." Nonetheless, the Court decided that in this case it would be unfair to hold that McVeigh forfeited his claim of error, because that the Trial Court had granted the continuing objection and McVeigh therefore had a right to rely on it.

The McVeigh Court noted, however, that "a standing objection should not be given broader scope than is found in its establishing statement." A party cannot rely on a standing objection lodged on one evidentiary ground to argue a different ground for error on appeal. n45 Thus, the Court limited its abuse-of-discretion review to testimony regarding the "long-range effects" of the bombing. On appeal, McVeigh also complained about testimony concerning witness histories, pre-explosion witness activities, and descriptions of the bombing and its immediate aftermath. None of these complaints were within the scope of the continuing objection -- the claims of error on these grounds were therefore reviewed for plain error only.

As McVeigh indicates, it will often be prudent to make specific objections as evidence is offered, rather than to rely on a continuing objection. This is particularly true if the admissibility of the evidence is dependent on balancing within the Trial Judge's discretion, as is the case with Rule 403. Of course the downside of serial objections is that the practice risks the annoyance of both the Judge and the jury.

[11] Objections in Multiparty Cases

Suppose that two codefendants share a common defense but they are represented by separate counsel. If only one codefendant objects to proffered evidence, does this preserve the right to appeal for both parties or only one? Looking to the purposes of Rule 103, a strong argument can be made that the objection of one party should apply to both, assuming that the ground for objection was specific, and was equally applicable to both parties. Despite the inaction of one of the parties, the purpose of the Rule has been served: both the Trial Court and the offering party have been properly informed of the nature of the objection, and a clear record has been made for appeal. Nor can it usually be said that the inactive party has been negligent or has slept on his or her rights; a party in these circumstances can assume that it would be unnecessary to join in a proper and specific objection that is clearly applicable to both the objecting and the inactive party. There is little to be gained by "piling on" and risking the annoyance of the jury and the Trial Judge.

Consequently, Courts have held that a nonobjecting party may appeal an evidentiary ruling on grounds specified at trial by an objecting party, when the parties are in the same situation with respect to the evidence. n46 The Courts reasonably conclude that a rule requiring all parties to object would significantly complicate and prolong multiple party cases. n47

The prudent course, however, is to join in an objection made by another party. Otherwise, it may later be found that the interests of the parties are not sufficiently aligned for the objection of one to be deemed the objection of the other. n48

[12] In Limine Rulings

A party who foresees the use of prejudicial and arguably inadmissible evidence by the adversary may find it useful to make a motion in limine to exclude the evidence in advance of trial. Also, a party who is concerned about the admissibility of evidence it intends to proffer may find it advisable to seek an advance ruling. The most frequent use of a motion in limine occurs when a criminal defendant with prior convictions might wish to testify at trial. The motion in limine is particularly useful in this situation because the defendant otherwise would have to take the stand and gamble that his or her convictions would be excluded.

It is important to note, however, that an in limine ruling is not written in stone. The Judge is free to revisit the evidentiary question presented in limine when it arises in the context of the trial. n49 A new look at the issue may be necessary especially where the admissibility decision is dependent upon balancing factors within the Judge's discretion, as is the case under Rule 403. Ordinarily, such a balancing process is context-dependent and cannot be conducted with certainty until the evidence is proffered at trial. As one Court put it, it is usually "too great a handicap to bind a trial judge to a ruling on a subtle evidentiary question, requiring the most delicate balancing, outside a precise factual context." n50

A Trial Judge has discretion either to rule in limine or to await developments at trial before ruling. The decision whether to rule in advance often will turn on the Judge's confidence or uncertainty concerning the relationship of particular evidence to the case as a whole. Rarely will Trial Judges be reversed for declining to rule in limine. n51 The one situation in which an in limine ruling may be mandated is prior to a second trial when the Trial Judge knows the evidence and the issues raised by the parties as a result of the first trial. n52

[13] Taking the Stand to Preserve an In Limine Objection

In Luce v. United States, 469 U.S. 38 (1984) , a unanimous Court concluded that "to raise and preserve for review the claim of improper impeachment with a prior conviction, a defendant must testify." n53 The Court was concerned that defendants could get a windfall if they could claim error from an in limine ruling and yet not have to testify. Defendants could argue on appeal that the Trial Court's erroneous pretrial ruling kept them off the stand when in fact they might never have had an intention of taking the stand. The defendant might be trying to cook up an appealable issue in case the trial goes bad. The Luce Court was also concerned that the harmless error determination, and indeed the determination of whether the Court was even in error, would be speculative if the defendant never testified at trial.

While the Court in Luce had justifiable concerns and reached a reasonable conclusion, it must be recognized that Luce leaves defendants with prior convictions in a difficult situation -- in order to preserve an objection as to the convictions, they must take the stand and face a much higher probability of a guilty verdict once the jury hears about their past.

The lower Courts have extended the Luce principle to other forms of impeachment, such as impeachment with bad acts under Rule 608 n54 and impeachment of witnesses other than the defendant. n55 Such extensions are clearly within the logic of Luce. Other Courts have read Luce even more broadly for the proposition that any in limine ruling dependent on an event occurring at trial is not appealable unless that event actually occurs. Thus, in United States v. Ortiz, 857 F.2d 900 (2d Cir. 1988) , the defendant in a drug case moved in limine to exclude prior drug transactions. The Trial Court held that the uncharged misconduct would be admissible if the defendant chose to pursue a "personal use" defense. The defendant decided to pursue a different defense, and argued on appeal that the Trial Court's in limine ruling was erroneous. But the Court held that to preserve her claim of error, the defendant was required to pursue the personal use defense at trial. n56 The Court declared that "[t]he proper method to preserve a claim of error in similar circumstances is to take the position that leads to the admission of the adverse evidence, in order to bring a fully developed record into this Court." Thus, if an in limine ruling is conditioned on an event occurring at trial, there will be no appealable issue unless that event actually happens.

[14] Forfeiting a Claim of Error By Proffering the Evidence at Trial

If the Trial Court makes a definitive ruling that objectionable evidence is going to be admitted at trial, it would appear that the prudent course is for the objecting party to bring out the evidence first. For example, if the Trial Court rules that a party's witness can be impeached with a prior conviction, it would seem to make sense for the party calling that witness to bring out the conviction on direct examination. This tactic seeks to "remove the sting" of the anticipated impeachment. More importantly, it prevents the jury from drawing the negative inference that the party was trying to hide the unfavorable evidence. But if the party does follow the prudent course by bringing out the objectionable evidence, does this constitute a forfeiture of the right to appeal the Trial Court's ruling? If so, the objecting party is put between a rock and a hard place -- in order to preserve a claim of error for appeal, the party must suffer at trial the unjustified inference that the party was trying to hide negative evidence.

The Supreme Court in Ohler v. United States, 529 U.S. 753 (2000) , held that a party who introduced evidence of a prior conviction on direct examination forfeited her right to appeal an in limine ruling holding that the evidence would be admissible at trial. The Court, in an opinion by Chief Justice Rehnquist, refused to depart from the general rule that "a party introducing evidence cannot complain on appeal that the evidence was erroneously admitted." The Court recognized that a defendant who did not bring out an objectionable conviction on direct examination might suffer an adverse inference that he was trying to hide that conviction from the jury. But the Chief Justice thought this risk to be simply part of the reality that the defendant "must make choices as the trial progresses." The Court reasoned that when a defendant brings out an objectionable conviction on direct, this denies the Government "its usual right to decide, after she testifies, whether or not to use her prior conviction against her." In the Court's view, the defendant in Ohler sought to "short-circuit that process by offering the conviction herself (and thereby removing the sting) and still preserve its admission as a claim of error on appeal." The Court saw nothing unfair "about putting petitioner to her choice in accordance with the normal rules of trial."

The Court in Ohler has a point, that by bringing out the evidence herself, Ohler deprived the government of the power not to introduce the conviction. If the prosecution would not have used the conviction on cross-examination, then Ohler herself created the error. It might be wondered why the prosecution might choose not to introduce Ohler's prior conviction on cross-examination. Wouldn't the government always introduce it? The answer is no. The prosecution might be worried that the Trial Judge's ruling admitting the conviction was in error. And it might not need the conviction, or at least the prosecution might think it not worth the risk of creating reversible error. So the Ohler Court is right in thinking that defendants should not be able to short circuit prosecutorial decisionmaking.

This does not mean, however, that the Court's result in Ohler is correct. The fact is that in many cases the prosecution will want to introduce the objectionable evidence on cross-examination, and in some cases it will not. If defendants bring out the evidence on direct examination when the prosecutor would have done so anyway on cross-examination, then it is exceedingly harsh to hold that the defendants have forfeited their right to appeal. The question then is whether a procedure can be fashioned to accommodate the defendant's interest in preserving a claim of error and in avoiding unjustified negative inferences, and the prosecution's interest in being able to decide whether or not to proffer the objectionable evidence on cross-examination. And indeed a compromise procedure is possible.

We propose this solution in cases like Ohler: At the conclusion of the direct examination of the defendant, the Trial Judge should ask the government, Do you still want to offer the prior convictions? If the answer is yes, the defense should be permitted to offer them before passing the witness. Why? Because otherwise the failure of the defense to offer the convictions may be viewed by the jury as concealment of relevant facts, and this inference would be completely unjustified under the circumstances. Such an unjustified inference should be forbidden by basic notions of fairness and by Rule 403. If the prosecution answers that it has decided not to use the convictions on cross-examination, then they need not be mentioned at trial, and no appealable issue is created.

It is possible in some cases that the government will express doubt as to whether it wishes to use the convictions and will claim that a decision cannot be made until the cross-examination has begun and the defendant's answers to a variety of questions are known. When the government expresses doubt, the Trial Judge has two options available to protect both the defendant and the government.

The first option is for the Trial Judge to ask the government to make a proffer as to the nature of its expected cross-examination. The Judge then can decide whether the government does have a good-faith doubt about its need to use the convictions. If the Court finds that the doubt is not sincere, it can require the government to choose whether it wishes to rely on the convictions. If not, they disappear from the case. If so, and if the Judge concludes that they will be admitted, the defense can offer them as the final part of direct examination.

Alternatively, the Trial Judge can reserve a final decision on whether to admit the convictions until the conclusion of cross-examination. If the convictions are deemed admissible, the Judge can give the defense an opportunity to offer them as part of a redirect examination. This is fair to both sides. After all, if the government has represented before beginning cross-examination that prior convictions may not be necessary or important evidence, it cannot complain about admission being delayed until redirect examination if it subsequently decides that it wants the evidence to be admitted. By permitting the defendant to offer the convictions, the Judge permits the defense to avoid the unfair aspect of impeachment described above.

Should the Trial Judge choose the second option, the Judge might also choose to instruct the jury that, for procedural reasons with which the jury need not be concerned, the defendant had no opportunity earlier to present the prior convictions. Although this is not correct as a matter of law, because the defendant theoretically could have offered the convictions on direct examination, it is correct as a matter of trial reality, because no reasonable defense counsel would offer the convictions if the Trial Judge might ultimately declare them inadmissible.

We believe that the above approach strikes a fair compromise between the interests of the defendant in preserving a right to appeal and the interests of the prosecution in avoiding appealable issues. More importantly, it avoids the unjustified cost of appeal imposed by the Ohler Court; under Ohler, a party who wants to preserve the right to appeal must suffer the unjustified inference that it was trying to hide negative evidence. We realize that the compromise we set out above is not mandated, or even supported, by the language in Ohler. Yet we do not believe that the use of this fair and balanced procedure is completely foreclosed by the Ohler decision, either.

It should also be noted that the Court in Ohler did not discuss whether the Trial Court must instruct the jury not to draw a negative inference against a defendant who wants to preserve his right to appeal by waiting for the prosecution to introduce the objectionable evidence. We believe that such an instruction must be given upon request. This is the bare minimum of protection to which the defendant is entitled. n57

[15] Renewing an In Limine Objection or Proffer at Trial

If the Trial Judge specifically makes an in limine ruling provisional, or defers a ruling, the litigant must renew an objection at trial, when the evidence is offered or excluded, in order to preserve it for appeal. This makes sense, because the Judge is essentially telling the parties that she would like to revisit the question in the trial context. If the objecting party refuses this invitation, the party is hardly in a position to complain. n58

One of the most difficult questions arising from in limine motions is whether a losing party has to renew an objection or offer of proof in order to preserve an issue for appeal, where the ruling is not obviously provisional. This question was taken up by the Advisory Committee on Evidence Rules, and the result is an amendment to Rule 103 that became effective on December 1, 2000. Before the amendment, Courts took differing approaches to whether an objection to a definitive pretrial ruling had to be renewed at trial. Some Courts held that a renewal at the time of trial was always required, no matter how definitive the in limine ruling. Some Courts took the contrary approach. Other Courts distinguished between objections to evidence, which had to be renewed when evidence was offered at trial, and offers of proof, which did not need to be renewed.

The Advisory Committee believed that when an advance ruling is definitive, a renewal requirement imposes a needless formality. Rule 46 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and Rule 51 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure both state that formal exceptions are unnecessary. Requiring a party to make what is, in reality, a formal exception in order to preserve error will only lead to interruption of the trial and needless provocation of the Trial Judge. For example, in United States v. Lui, 941 F.2d 844 (9th Cir. 1991) , the defendant moved in limine to exclude drug courier profile testimony. The Trial Judge found the motion frivolous and threatened to impose sanctions. Obviously, defense counsel in Lui should not have been required to risk sanctions by renewing the objection at trial; the Trial Judge made painfully clear how he would rule on such an objection. The costliness of a renewal requirement is even more pronounced if a party has moved in limine for a ruling and the Court has found definitively that the evidence will not be admitted at trial. Under these circumstances, it would be extremely wasteful for the proponent to have to make a futile offer of evidence at trial solely to preserve the right to appeal. The proponent might have to produce witnesses for trial who would never actually testify.

The amendment to Rule 103 provides that if the advance ruling is definitive, a party need not renew an objection or offer of proof in order to preserve the right to appeal that ruling. The public comment on the proposed rule change was generally positive. A comment from the American College of Trial Lawyers was typical, stating that the amendment has "the virtue of establishing certainty by placing lawyers on notice of the circumstances under which it is necessary to renew pretrial objections. At present, counsel may place unwarranted reliance on a pretrial ruling, only to learn after the fact that the failure to renew an objection at trial has foreclosed appellate review." The Association of the Bar of the City of New York commented that "the Rule would eliminate the wasteful and unnecessary practice of renewing objections and offers of proof as to issues that can be and have been definitively resolved. On the other hand, the requirement that the ruling be 'definitive' will give the district court flexibility to provide guidance to the litigants as to its initial view with respect to the admissibility of evidence in those cases where a definitive ruling cannot be made without depriving itself of the ability to reconsider the decision in the developed context of the trial."

One constructive comment, from Magistrate Judge Tommy Miller, pointed out that appeals from a Magistrate Judge's determination must, by statutory requirement, be renewed in the District Court in order to preserve a claim of error on appeal. See 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1). A paragraph was added to the Committee Note to alert practitioners to this statutory requirement and to indicate that the amendment does not purport to change that requirement.

The key concept in the amended Rule 103(a) is the term "definitive ruling." If the advance ruling is "definitive," the objection or offer of proof need not be renewed at trial. The Advisory Committee deliberately decided not to define the term "definitive ruling," believing that the concept was very case-dependent. There is a good deal of case law pre-dating the amendment in the circuits that already followed the practice now codified. It would behoove counsel to consult that case law. For example, in United States v. Mejia-Alarcon, 995 F.2d 982, 986 (10th Cir. 1993) , the Court noted that the Trial Court in that case stated unequivocally that the challenged evidence would be admissible at trial, and contrasted that situation from one where the Trial Court stated that it was inclined to admit the evidence but expressly reserved a final ruling. Under the amendment, the Trial Court's ruling in Mejia-Alarcon would be definitive, and renewal of the pretrial objection would not be required when the evidence is introduced. The opinion in Scott v. Ross, 140 F.3d 1275 (9th Cir. 1998) , provides a useful counterpoint. When Scott sought to qualify his witness as an expert, Ross objected on the ground the expert was unqualified. The Trial Judge stated that although Scott would not be precluded from calling the witness as an expert, the Judge would consider objections to specific testimony elicited at trial. Ross never objected to specific testimony. The Court held that the issue of the admissibility of the witness' testimony was not properly preserved for review "because the district court's ruling lacked the necessary definitiveness." The Trial Judge had essentially reserved a ruling on specific questions which the witness might be unqualified to answer. Under the amendment to Rule 103, Ross would have to object to the specific questions at trial, just as under previous practice.

The Advisory Committee recognized that the term "definitive ruling" might be considered fuzzy around the edges. The Committee therefore included language in the Committee Note indicating that the "amendment imposes the obligation on counsel to clarify whether an in limine or other evidentiary ruling is definitive when there is doubt on that point." Should counsel believe that the Court has foreclosed an issue, obtaining a statement from the Court to that effect is prudent practice.

Of course, if the Trial Court changes at trial what had been a favorable in limine ruling, or if the opposing party violates the in limine ruling at trial, objection must be made when the evidence is offered. The error, if any, in each of these situations occurs only when the evidence is offered and admitted. n59 Similarly, an objection must be made at trial if the claim of error is that the Judge's trial ruling is based on considerations or circumstances that have developed since the in limine determination. For example, assume that the Trial Judge rules in limine on the admissibility of a prior conviction. When the evidence is offered at trial, the Judge reasons that the conviction is admissible because the objecting party opened the door on direct examination. If the objecting party believes that this assumption is in error (e.g., the door was not really opened), then objection on these grounds must be made at trial to preserve a claim of error. In the words of the Advisory Committee, an advance ruling "is reviewed in light of the facts and circumstances before the trial court at the time of the ruling. If the relevant facts and circumstances change materially after the advance ruling has been made, those facts and circumstances cannot be relied upon on appeal unless they have been brought to the attention of the trial court by way of a renewed, and timely, objection, offer of proof, or motion to strike."

Griffin, 818 F.2d 97 (1st Cir. 1987)* (the prosecutor proposed to explain a government witness' delay in coming forward by offering evidence of a third-party threat against him; the Trial Court sustained the in limine objection to this evidence, but warned that, if defense counsel cross-examined the witness as to the delay, the threat evidence could come in as rebuttal; the failure to cross-examine the witness as to delay operated to forfeit any objection to the Court's ruling; since because the threat evidence was never introduced, the defendant's challenge "never ripened into an appealable issue").

Holmquist, 36 F.3d 154 (1st Cir. 1994)* (where order excluding evidence is provisional, "the exclusion of evidence pursuant to that order may be challenged on appeal only if the party unsuccessfully attempts to offer such evidence in accordance with the terms specified in the order"); Doty v. Sewall, 908 F.2d 1053, 1056 (1st Cir. 1990) ("a pre-trial motion in limine is not sufficient to preserve an issue for appeal where the district court declines to rule on the admissibility of the evidence until the evidence is actually offered").

Becker, 237 F.3d 1223 (10th Cir. 2001)* (in limine ruling barred the evidence to which the defendant had objected in advance of trial; when the Trial Judge decided to admit the evidence at trial, objection was required to preserve the right to claim of error for appeal).

1-103 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual § 103.03

§ 103.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Rule 103(a) -- Effect of Erroneous Ruling

[a] Rule 103(a) -- Affirmance on a Different Theory

United States v. Samaniego, 345 F.3d 1280 (11th Cir. 2003) : The Court held that a statement erroneously admitted under Rule 803(3) could nevertheless have properly been admitted under Rule 804(b)(3). Although the Judge had not reached that alternative ground for admissibility, the Court said that it would not find an abuse of discretion where the correct result had been reached even if for the wrong reason, so the judgment was affirmed. In United States v. Williams, 837 F.2d 1009 (11th Cir. 1988) , the Court held that "yellow sheets" were properly admitted against a defendant charged with filing a false tax return, where the defendant's initials were identified at the bottom of several sheets. The government had not relied on the admissions exemption at trial, but the Court found no unfairness in permitting the exemption to be relied upon on appeal.

[b] Rule 103(a) -- Automatic Reversal

United States v. Noushfar, 78 F.3d 1442 (9th Cir. 1996) : Reversing convictions for illegal importation of goods and money laundering, the Court held it was error to send to the jury room, over the defendants' objection, 14 tapes that had not been played in the courtroom, together with a tape recorder. The Trial Judge had "completely abdicated control of the presentation of the evidence," and "made no analysis of whether undue emphasis might be placed on some of the recorded conversations." The Court stated that "we find the error to be a structural error requiring automatic reversal."

[c] Rule 103(a) -- Explanation for Proffer of Excluded Evidence

Ramey v. District 141 Int'l Ass'n of Machinists, 378 F.3d 269 (2d Cir. 2004) : The plaintiffs sued their union for breach of its duty of fair representation, arising from the treatment of their seniority status after a previous employer went bankrupt and a new employer took over. The plaintiffs introduced a memorandum filed in the bankruptcy proceeding that demonstrated that the union had then taken a position inconsistent with the one it was espousing at trial. When the union sought to show that the Bankruptcy Court had rejected its position then, the Judge cut off the questioning with an instruction that the only relevance of the memorandum was its inconsistency with the union's current position. On appeal, the union argued that it wanted to present the outcome in the bankruptcy proceedings in order to show that it had been forced to reevaluate its position in light of the Bankruptcy Judge's ruling, and thus that it had changed its position reasonably and not out of malice or animus toward the plaintiffs. The Court held that, although it did not require detailed explanations of objections to evidentiary rulings in the heat of trial, here union counsel never made any explanation or counter-argument. Thus, the Judge, whose ruling was correct on one plausible reading of the purpose of the evidence, was not alerted to the union's other purpose. Because no notice was given below, the Court refused to entertain the union's challenge to the ruling.

[d] Rule 103(a) -- Harmless and Harmful Error

[i] Rule 103(a) -- Civil Cases

Lataille v. Ponte, 754 F.2d 33 (1st Cir. 1985) : The Court determined that the erroneous admission of an inmate's disciplinary record required reversal of a judgment for prison guards in an action alleging that the guards beat the inmate. In deciding that the error was prejudicial, the Court focused on "[t]he centrality of the evidence, its prejudicial effect, whether it is cumulative, the use of the evidence by counsel, and the closeness of the case."

Habecker v. Copperloy Corp., 893 F.2d 49 (3d Cir. 1990) : The Court reversed a judgment for the defendants in a product liability action arising out of a forklift accident, holding that error in excluding testimony by the plaintiff's proposed expert required reversal because it could not be said to be "highly probable" that the error did not affect a party's rights. In McQueeney v. Wilmington Trust Co., n1 the Court reversed a judgment for a seaman in a Jones Act case, finding that the Trial Judge erred in excluding evidence from which it could have been inferred that the seaman had suborned perjury of a proffered witness. It determined that the error was prejudicial, and it held that the same standard should be used for assessing the harmless or prejudicial nature of errors in civil and criminal cases. Thus, it relied upon its prior decision in Government of Virgin Islands v. Toto. n2 In a medical malpractice case brought on behalf of a child who suffered severe brain damage, Salas v. Wang, n3 the Court applied its McQueeney harmless error rule and held that inappropriate remarks made by the plaintiff's counsel during closing argument did not require reversal of a judgment for the plaintiff.

Beck v. Haik, 377 F.3d 624 (6th Cir. 2004) : The Court held that the standard for harmless error in civil cases was the same as that for criminal cases: reversal is required when the appellate court lacks a "fair assurance" that the outcome of the trial was not affected by evidentiary error. The Court rejected a definition that would require the appellant to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the error was outcome-determinative. The Court further held that errors are to be assessed cumulatively in civil cases as well as in criminal cases. It reasoned that "[s]ince a jury reaches its verdict in light of the evidence as a whole, it makes no sense to try to analyze errors in artificial isolation, when deciding whether they are harmless."

Obrey v. Johnson, 400 F.3d 691 (9th Cir. 2005) : In an employee's race discrimination action, the Court found abuses of discretion in the exclusion of a statistical report showing a correlation between race and promotion, a co-worker's testimony that the defendant's officials had made disparaging remarks about the ethnic group to which the plaintiff belonged, and co-workers' testimony that they had been denied promotion on discriminatory grounds. Resolving a conflict in its precedents, the Court held that "when reviewing the effect of erroneous evidentiary rulings we will begin with a presumption of prejudice. That presumption can be rebutted by a showing that it is more probable than not that the jury would have reached the same verdict even if the evidence had been admitted." Applying that standard, the Court found that the evidentiary errors in this case were not harmless. In Haddad v. Lockheed Cal. Corp., 720 F.2d 1454 (9th Cir. 1983) , an employment discrimination suit, although the Court found it was error to admit testimony of the plaintiff's ex-wife that revealed marital communications, the error was harmless. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court held that "when an appellate court ponders the probable effect of an error on a civil trial, it need only find that the jury's verdict is more probably than not untainted by the error."

[ii] Rule 103(a) -- Harmless and Harmful Error -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Logan, 998 F.2d 1025 (D.C. Cir. 1993) : A defense witness in a drug prosecution was impeached with convictions for misdemeanor offenses of taking property without a right and distributing marijuana and PCP. The Court held the error in admitting the evidence was harmless because it was a witness rather than a defendant who was impeached, the prosecution did not emphasize the convictions, a proper limiting instruction was promptly given, the witness' story was confirmed in part by another witness, and the other evidence against the defendant was strong. The dissenting Judge argued that when a defendant does not testify and presents his case through others, improper impeachment (particularly of the defendant's chief witness) is likely to be prejudicial and not harmless.

United States v. Lamberty, 778 F.2d 59 (1st Cir. 1985) : The Court reversed a postmaster's conviction for opening another's package, because the government wrongly elicited testimony that investigators suspected the postmaster of thefts. It stated that "[w]hen faced in a criminal case with a clearly prejudicial error, unless it is certain that the error is harmless beyond a reasonable doubt, a court should not be forced to gamble with a defendant's liberty." See also United States v. Ferreira n4(reversing bank robbery conviction for admission of evidence concerning weapons seized from the defendant upon his arrest; not a harmless error, using "beyond a reasonable doubt" standard).

United States v. Musacchia, 900 F.2d 493 (2d Cir. 1990) , vacated on other grounds, 955 F.2d 3 (2d Cir. 1991) : The Court, reviewing a tax evasion case, held that error in permitting three prosecution witnesses to testify on direct about "truth-telling" provisions in their cooperation agreements was harmless, as elicitation of the testimony was not an intentional violation, the defense conceded the truthfulness of testimony by two of the witnesses, the third's witness' testimony was peripheral, and the Judge gave a clear curative instruction not to consider the bolstering evidence.

United States v. Dowling, 855 F.2d 114 (3d Cir. 1988) , aff'd, 493 U.S. 342 (1990) : The Court applied its harmless error test for nonconstitutional errors in this case and found that error in the introduction of prior act evidence was harmless. In Government of Virgin Islands v. Joseph, n5 the Court, using the "beyond a reasonable doubt" test of harmless error (which it usually reserves for constitutional errors), reversed convictions for assault, robbery, and rape because two documents not admitted into evidence were submitted to the jury. In United States v. Zarintash, n6 the Court again seemed to equate its test for judging the effect of nonconstitutional error with the test used for constitutional errors. In Government of Virgin Islands v. Toto, n7 the Court had indicated that it would reverse criminal convictions because of error unless it could say that it is highly probable that the error did not contribute to the judgment of conviction.

United States v. Urbanik, 801 F.2d 692 (4th Cir. 1986) : The Court reversed a defendant's marijuana convictions because coconspirator statements were improperly admitted. It stated that a nonconstitutional error could be harmless only where it is highly probable that the error did not affect the judgment.

United States v. Valdez, 722 F.2d 1196 (5th Cir. 1984) : The Court reversed a conviction for extortion, finding that the use of hypnosis on an identifying witness presented dangers of undue suggestiveness and that the resulting evidence was more prejudicial than probative. It found that the admission of the evidence was prejudicial, not harmless, error. The opinion recognized that in some prior cases, the Court had appeared to test nonconstitutional errors by the demanding test of harmlessness required for constitutional errors. The Court stated that those prior expressions were inadvertent and that nonconstitutional errors are not as likely to require reversal as constitutional ones.

United States v. McFadyen-Snider, 552 F.2d 1178 (6th Cir. 1977) : Using the "beyond a reasonable doubt" test, the Court reversed convictions in a bank fraud case, holding that the prosecutor improperly attempted to impeach the defendant with proof of her sexual conduct and that evidence of bad checks she wrote was improperly admitted because "it directly imputed to her other bad acts that were not necessary to prove the prosecution's case." Furthermore, the Trial Judge failed to give complete limiting instructions.

United States v. Dominguez, 992 F.2d 678 (7th Cir. 1993) : In a cocaine distribution prosecution, an agent testified that she had learned from Guatemalan police that tests of the delivered packages had revealed cocaine. The Court held it was harmless error to admit the testimony, as there was strong evidence of the defendant's participation in a conspiracy, and no proof of the identity of a controlled substance is required. A dissenting Judge argued that all the evidence was consistent with an intent to engage in a sham transaction rather than a drug deal, so it was impossible to conclude that the hearsay evidence did not have a substantial influence on the jury's verdict.

United States v. Hitt, 981 F.2d 422 (9th Cir. 1992) : Reviewing a conviction for possessing a machine gun, the Court held it was reversible error to admit a photograph that showed a dozen weapons in addition to the one charged. The Court observed a conflict in the Circuit as to whether the harmless error test permits affirmance only if the Court can say with "fair assurance" that an error was harmless or whether affirmance is required if it is more probable than not that an error was harmless. The Court found that the error was prejudicial under either test and thus did not resolve the conflict. In United States v. Dixon, n8 the Court said that plain error requires reversal only when it is "highly probable that the error materially affected the jury's verdict," whereas nonconstitutional error properly raised in the Trial Court requires reversal unless "it is more probable than not that the error did not materially affect the verdict" (emphasis in original). See also United States v. Soulard n9(reiterating that nonconstitutional errors would not require reversal unless it is more probable than not that they affected verdict). In United States v. Eaglin, n10 the Court indicated that, before deciding on the appropriate test for harmless error, it was appropriate to decide whether it was dealing with a violation of the hearsay rules only or with a confrontation problem. See also United States v. Ragghianti n11(error for failing to give limiting instruction must be harmless beyond a reasonable doubt); United States v. Tebha n12(constitutional standard used when exhibit not in evidence reaches jury).

United States v. Polsinelli, 649 F.2d 793 (10th Cir. 1981) : The Court used the "beyond a reasonable doubt" standard in finding a mistake in the prosecutor's cross-examination of character witnesses to have been prejudicial error.

United States v. Lehder-Rivas, 955 F.2d 1510 (11th Cir. 1992) : The Court held that it was harmless error when the government suggested that the defendant in a cocaine importation conspiracy engaged in frequent "partying" and fathered an illegitimate child. A concurring Judge believed that the majority opinion improperly blended the "harmless beyond a reasonable doubt" standard applicable to errors of constitutional magnitude and the "harmless error" standard of Fed. R. Crim. P. 52(a). In the majority's view, to the extent there is any difference in the standards, the Circuit has employed the constitutional standard for nonconstitutional evidentiary errors; in any event, the error in this case was harmless by either standard.

[e] Rule 103(a) -- In Limine Rulings

[i] Rule 103(a) -- Appealability -- Requirement that Witness Testify and Other Conditions Precedent

Luce v. United States, 469 U.S. 38 (1984) : The Court held that an accused wishing to preserve for review a claim of improper impeachment with a prior conviction may not rely on an adverse in limine ruling but must testify. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 103.02[13], [14].

United States v. Coumaris, 399 F.3d 343 (D.C. Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a defendant's conviction for conspiring to help another person evade arrest. It held that the defendant waived his objection to an in limine ruling granting the government's motion to cross-examine proposed character witnesses. "Coumaris clearly waived his objection to the district court's in limine ruling by failing to call the character witnesses to testify."

United States v. Holmquist, 36 F.3d 154 (1st Cir. 1994) : In a trial for illegally exporting firearms, the defendant sought to subpoena three witnesses who purportedly would testify that the defendant's activity had been authorized by certain government officials. The Trial Judge entered an in limine order that before such evidence could be proffered at trial, the defendant would first have to present it in chambers or at sidebar. At trial, the defendant never called the witnesses to testify, and on appeal he argued that the Trial Court had imposed unreasonable conditions on the presentation of his evidence of authorization. The Court, citing Luce v. United States (see the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 103.02[13], [14]), declared that "when a judge issues a provisional in limine pretrial order and clearly invites the adversely affected party to offer evidence at sidebar for the purpose of reassessing the scope or effect of the order in the setting of the actual trial, the exclusion of evidence pursuant to that order may be challenged on appeal only if the party unsuccessfully attempts to offer such evidence in accordance with the terms specified in the order." In United States v. Nivica, n13 the defendant sought an in limine ruling limiting the scope of cross-examination if he took the stand, but the Judge said he would be subject to cross-examination on all matters relevant to the issue at hand. The Court held that the defendant had not preserved the issue for appeal, as he did not testify. One Judge concurred because Circuit precedent did not limit Luce to Rule 609(a) issues. In United States v. Griffin, n14 the Court affirmed marijuana convictions, holding that the defendant failed to preserve for appeal an objection to an in limine ruling that the government could elicit from a witness the fact that he had been threatened by a third party, if the defense impeached the witness with evidence that he withheld information from investigators for more than a year. Since the defense never attacked the witness, the threat evidence was not offered.

United States v. Velez, 354 F.3d 190 (2d Cir. 2004) : The defendant in a felon firearm possession case agreed at a proffer session that the government could use any statements made to rebut arguments or evidence offered by the defendant at trial. After the defendant elected to go to trial, he requested an in limine ruling on the scope of defense arguments and defenses that would open the door to use of statements from the proffer. In response, the Judge implicitly ruled that the proffer agreement was enforceable. At trial, the defendant failed to trigger the waiver provision through evidence or argument, and the government argued on appeal that this meant his constitutional challenge to the provision could not be considered. However, the Court held that "[t]he record and its fact-specific contents [were] irrelevant" to the defendant's contention that the waiver provision was unenforceable and unconstitutional as a general matter. In the Court's view, the Luce requirement is limited to situations in which the ruling to be reviewed, such as the balancing of probative value and prejudicial effect, is contextually bound. In United States v. Ortiz, n15 a drug prosecution in which the defendant disputed identity, the Court found that defense counsel appeared inclined to argue both mistaken identity and intent. Defense counsel did not challenge the ruling that a prior conviction could be used to rebut the intent argument if it were raised, and thus waived any complaint about the ruling. In United States v. Weichert, n16 the Court relied upon Luce v. United States (see the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 103.02[13], [14]) to hold that defendants in a fraud case could not challenge an in limine ruling permitting the government to ask an attorney-witness about his disbarment if he testified, since the defendants never called him as a witness. In United States v. DiPaolo, n17 the Court affirmed convictions for intimidating witnesses, holding that a defendant could not appeal an in limine ruling that denied his motion to preclude impeachment of a witness with a prior criminal conviction, since the witness never testified.

United States v. Bond, 87 F.3d 695 (5th Cir. 1996) : Affirming the Trial Judge's refusal to permit a defendant to withdraw his guilty plea, the Court relied upon the Supreme Court's decision in Luce v. United States in holding that the defendant could not appeal the Magistrate Judge's ruling that if the defendant testified at a hearing, he would waive his privilege against self-incrimination about all issues regarding his motion to withdraw. The defendant's objection was not properly preserved because he did not take the stand and testify.

United States v. Sanderson, 966 F.2d 184 (6th Cir. 1992) : In a prosecution for theft of government property, the Trial Judge ruled that evidence of prior thefts by the defendant was not admissible on the government's direct case but would be admissible under Rule 608(b) to impeach the defendant if he took the stand. The Court held that the defendant was precluded from appealing that ruling because he did not testify at trial.

United States v. Wilson, 307 F.3d 596 (7th Cir. 2002) : Affirming a conviction for wire fraud, the Court held that it would not review the defendant's claim that the Trial Judge violated his right to remain silent by deciding conditionally to allow the government to introduce evidence of the defendant's "selective silence" as to the identity of a purported associate if the defendant were to bring up the issue of the associate at trial. Because the defendant never brought up the issue of the associate at trial, the trial court's conditional ruling never ripened into an error. The Court, citing Luce v. United States, 469 U.S. 38 (1984) , declared that the defendant could not "attack a potential introduction of evidence by the government in response to his potential testimony."

United States v. Hall, 312 F.3d 1250 (11th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed a conviction for distribution and receipt of child pornography through a computer. It held that an in limine ruling that other crimes evidence (a videotaped interview of a four-year-old girl who was the victim in a pending state case against Hall for molestation) was admissible to prove intent, knowledge, and lack of mistake or accident was not reviewable. The in limine ruling was conditioned on the defendant arguing at trial that he lacked intent. The defendant made no such defense at trial, so the evidence was never admitted, but the defendant argued that the Trial Judge's error in finding the evidence admissible was the reason he had offered no such defense. The Court noted that other Circuits had applied Luce v. United States, 469 U.S. 38 (1984) , to Rule 404(b) evidence. It reasoned that because the defendant did not take the position leading to admission of adverse evidence, the record was too minimally developed to support any meaningful review of the Judge's pre-trial Rule 404(b) decision, and any possible harm from the ruling would be wholly speculative. In United States v. DiMatteo, n18 the Court held, in affirming a conviction for a marijuana importation conspiracy, that the failure to present a defense witness barred appellate review of an in limine ruling regarding permissible cross-examination and rebuttal of the witness.

[ii] Rule 103(a) -- In Limine Rulings -- Procedures

United States v. Buckner, 91 F.3d 34 (7th Cir. 1996) : In a prosecution for conspiracy to illegally transfer a machine gun, the defendant moved ten days before trial to prohibit the government from playing tapes of conversations between the defendant and an alleged conspirator that occurred after the conspiracy ended. The Trial Judge heard argument on the motion on the morning of trial and granted the motion without hearing the tapes, and the government appealed. The Court noted that, given the pressures on a Trial Judge on the morning of trial, "the best way to deal with many [motions in limine] is usually to reserve ruling and get the trial on the road, for many times, what appears to be vitally important before the start of trial, becomes less so once the case starts moving." The Court found error in the exclusion of the tape, and observed that "[t]he wholesale exclusion of all this taped evidence, before hearing it and considering it in context, was an abuse of discretion."

[iii] Rule 103(a) -- In Limine Rulings -- Requirement of Record

United States v. Mitchell, 954 F.2d 663 (11th Cir. 1992) : In a Hobbs Act prosecution of police officers for fixing drunk driving tickets, the Trial Judge granted the defendants' in limine motion under Rules 702 and 403 to exclude the testimony of a government expert on alcoholism and highway safety. There was no record of the arguments by counsel, the proffer of the expert's testimony made in camera, or the Judge's oral ruling; it was, therefore, impossible to conclude that the precluded testimony could under no circumstances have been admissible, so the Court vacated the order and remanded with instructions to conduct an adequate hearing. The Court also noted its doubts about the appropriateness of a pretrial ruling on the question, as relevancy issues depend on the exact state of the record at the time the evidence is offered.

[iv] Rule 103(a) -- In Limine Rulings -- Summary Judgment

In re Japanese Elec. Prods. Antitrust Litig., 723 F.2d 238 (3d Cir. 1983) , rev'd on other grounds, 475 U.S. 574 (1986) : In a massive antitrust case against Japanese television manufacturers, the Court reversed most of the summary judgment for the defendants but expressed its approval of the District Court's substantial use of in limine hearings on evidence questions "not only because the court's in limine consideration was far more efficient than if the rulings were deferred until the trial, with consequent interruptions, but also because the in limine procedure permitted more thorough briefing and argument than would have been likely had the rulings been deferred." Although the Court noted that there are "countervailing considerations, especially with respect to relevancy rulings under Rule 403 which may be made pretrial without the benefit of the flavor of the record developed at trial," it found that the Trial Judge has discretion to make those rulings prior to trial and that the discretion was properly exercised in this case.

[f] Rule 103(a) -- In Limine Rulings Admitting Evidence -- Appealability

[i] Rule 103(a) -- Evidence Introduced by Opponent

Ohler v. United States, 529 U.S. 753 (2000) . See the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 103.02[14].

Rojas v. Richardson, 713 F.2d 116 (5th Cir. 1983) : The Court held in an employee's personal injury action that a motion in limine to preclude testimony about the plaintiff's status as an illegal alien did not preserve his claim of error, where his counsel mentioned the status during jury selection and made no objection to references by the defense.

United States v. Gaitan-Acevedo, 148 F.3d 577 (6th Cir. 1998) : The Court held that a defendant convicted for drug offenses had waived his right to appeal from an adverse in limine ruling when he voluntarily introduced the conviction on direct examination.

United States v. Saunders, 359 F.3d 874 (7th Cir. 2004) : In a felon firearm prosecution, the parties stipulated that the defendant was a felon. The Judge, relying on Rule 403, held nonetheless that if the defendant took the stand, he could be impeached with his prior murder conviction. The defendant took the stand and his counsel brought up the murder conviction on direct examination. On appeal, the defendant argued that the Judge erred in relying on Rule 403, as the admissibility of a prior conviction for impeachment is governed by Rule 609(a). But the Court, relying on Ohler v. United States, 529 U.S. 753 (2000) , held that the defendant had not preserved the right to appeal from the in limine ruling, because his counsel brought out the conviction. The defendant argued that Ohler was distinguishable because the Judge in this case relied on the wrong rule of evidence in the in limine ruling, but the Court found this to be a distinction without a difference.

Jones v. Collier, 762 F.2d 71 (8th Cir. 1985) : The Court ruled that a plaintiff in a civil rights action waived any objection to impeachment with a prior conviction by presenting evidence of the conviction on direct examination following an unsuccessful motion in limine.

United States v. Williams, 939 F.2d 721 (9th Cir. 1991) : The Court held that a defendant convicted for possession of cocaine had waived the right to appeal from an adverse in limine ruling by bringing out the fact of his prior conviction during direct examination. By the defendant's strategic choice at trial, the Trial Judge and the government were deprived of a last chance to reverse their prestated positions.

[ii] Rule 103(a) -- In Limine Rulings Admitting Evidence -- Appealability -- Generally

Wilson v. Williams, 182 F.3d 562 (7th Cir. 1999) (en banc): In a § 1983 action by a detainee against corrections officers, the plaintiff made an in limine motion to exclude any reference to the fact that he had been convicted of murdering a police officer. The Judge ruled that the jury could hear the date, time, conviction, and employment of the victim as impeachment if the plaintiff testified. Throughout the trial, beginning with his opening statement, defense counsel referred to the plaintiff as a "cop killer" and never missed an opportunity to remind the jury that the plaintiff was a despicable person who had committed a despicable crime. The plaintiff did not object to this line of argument, but contended on appeal of a defense judgment that the motion in limine should have been granted. The Court en banc overruled United States v. York, 933 F.2d 1343 (7th Cir. 1991) , and held that a party does not waive a claim of error in a definitive in limine ruling by failing to renew the objection at trial. Treating definitive rulings as sufficient to preserve an appeal serves the purpose of the objection requirement -- ensuring focused consideration of the problem at the time when the decision is best made -- while avoiding a trap for unwary counsel and permitting adjustment of trial strategy in light of the Judge's decisions. However, the plaintiff in this case had received a ruling only on the question of whether the victim's occupation could be mentioned; he did not receive any ruling on how that fact could be used. Therefore, the Court held that because he made no objections, he was entitled only to plain error review of the defendant's inflammatory references. The Court found there was no plain error, and that the ruling denying the in limine motion was erroneous, but harmless. Two Judges dissented in part on the ground that the defendant's use of the victim identity evidence was plain error and that the error in the in limine ruling was not harmless.

Coursen v. A.H. Robins Co., 764 F.2d 1329 (9th Cir. 1985) : In a suit for Dalkon Shield injuries, two of the plaintiffs took involuntary dismissals with prejudice following an in limine ruling that evidence of their sexual history would be admitted. The Court held that a litigant cannot make a nonfinal order appealable by taking a voluntary nonsuit. It vacated the judgment of dismissal, however, and remanded the case because it was possible that the Judge as well as the litigants assumed that the dismissals were proper vehicles for obtaining review of the in limine ruling.

United States v. Harrison, 296 F.3d 994 (10th Cir. 2002) : Affirming convictions for sexual abuse of a child, the Court upheld the admission, under Rule 807, of a statement by the victim to an FBI agent. The Trial Judge had made an in limine ruling that the statement would be admitted provided that the prosecution proved the credentials and methods of the agent, and had made clear to defense counsel that he did not wish to hear repetitive argument on the matter. Accordingly, the Court held that the Judge made a definitive ruling, so under the 2000 amendment to Rule 103, the defendant was not required to renew his objection when the evidence was admitted at trial. On the question of the scope of the record to be reviewed in assessing the ruling, the Court determined that, where an objecting party does not renew an objection at trial, the objecting party is limited to relying on the evidence and argument made in limine. It reasoned, however, that a ruling admitting evidence could be affirmed based on consideration of all trial evidence, because "[t]he cause of justice is unlikely to be furthered by reversing a judgment because a ruling was not supported by sufficient evidence when made but was so supported by the time of the verdict."

[iii] Rule 103(a) -- In Limine Rulings Admitting Evidence -- Appealability -- Renewing Objections

[A] Rule 103(a) -- Civil Cases

Freeman v. Package Machinery Co., 865 F.2d 1331 (1st Cir. 1988) : The Court held that an employer waived any objection to a plaintiff's statistical proof in an age discrimination case by failing to object to an expert's testimony during trial. The Trial Judge had ruled in limine that the expert could testify if the employee laid a proper foundation, and the defendant failed to object after the foundation evidence was offered. Although the Court recognized that a ruling on an in limine motion may be definitive enough to excuse omission of an objection at trial, it stated that it was unclear in this case whether the defendant continued to object to statistical evidence and on what grounds. The Court added that "the importance of a contemporaneous objection is at its zenith in a situation such as this, where defendant's in limine motion invoked Rule 403."

Rosenfeld v. Basquiat, 78 F.3d 84 (2d Cir. 1996) : In a breach of contract action by an art dealer against an artist's estate, the Court held that the estate had not waived the Dead Man's Statute by failing to object when testimony given by the dealer at a former trial was introduced. The Judge's in limine ruling that the former testimony would be admissible was explicit and definitive, and the issue was essentially a legal one, not dependent on the character of other evidence admitted at trial.

American Home Assur. Co. v. Sunshine Supermarket, 753 F.2d 321 (3d Cir. 1985) : In an action on a fire insurance policy, the insurance company had moved in limine to exclude evidence that the insured was not prosecuted for arson, but the Trial Judge had ruled that the evidence could be admitted if the company relied on opinions by local officials that the insured was responsible for the fire. Holding that the company preserved for appeal its claim that admission of the evidence was error, the Court reasoned that if an evidence issue is fully briefed and the Judge is able and willing to make a definitive pretrial ruling, there is no necessity for a litigant to repeat during the trial an objection to evidence that the Judge has indicated will be admitted.

Elsayed Mukhtar v. California State Univ., Hayward, 299 F.3d 1053 (9th Cir. 2002) : The Court vacated a judgment in favor of a professor who alleged racial discrimination in the decision to deny him tenure, holding that the defendant had properly preserved an objection to the admissibility of the testimony of the plaintiff's expert by moving in limine to exclude it. It was not necessary under the circumstances to renew the objection at trial, since under the 2000 amendment to Rule 103, contemporaneous objection is not required where the Judge definitively rules on a motion in limine. The Court emphasized that "[h]ere, the district court made clear at the outset of the trial that it was admitting Dr. Wellman's testimony subject to the limitation that he not offer a legal conclusion," and "Dr. Wellman's testimony stayed within these parameters." Thus, "because he did not violate the district court's in limine ruling, no additional objection was necessary." In Palmerin v. City of Riverside, 794 F.2d 1409 (9th Cir. 1986) , an arrestee's §1983 action against officers for using excessive force, the Court held that where the Judge makes an explicit and definitive ruling on an in limine motion, an objection need not be renewed.

The Guides, Ltd. v. Yarmouth Group Property Mgmt., Inc., 295 F.3d 1065 (10th Cir. 2002) : A retail mall tenant brought an action for violation of § 1981 and for interference with prospective advantage, after its lease was not renewed. The defendants' motions in limine to exclude testimony by the plaintiffs' expert witness and some comparative evidence were denied, with the issues reserved for trial. Affirming much of a judgment for the plaintiffs, the Court held that the defendants waived any error by failing to object when the evidence identified in the motions was introduced at trial. In National Environmental Serv. v. Ronan Eng'g, 256 F.3d 995 (10th Cir. 2001) , a breach of contract action, the Court held that the plaintiff adequately preserved a claim of error after the Trial Judge ruled in limine that a defense witness would be allowed to testify. This ruling was definitive, and was not dependent on balancing of interests or on subsequent developments at trial. Moreover, the plaintiff's counsel raised the issue again shortly before the testimony was to be offered. Under these circumstances, there was no need for the plaintiff to renew its objection to the testimony at the time it was offered. In Pandit v. American Honda Motor Co., 82 F.3d 376 (10th Cir. 1996) , the Court held that the defendants in a product liability action had not waived their objection to similar accident evidence by failing to object at trial. The parties had argued the question in their trial briefs, before the defendants' opening, and again before their cross-examination; as presented by the plaintiff, the question involved a general legal issue capable of decision before trial; and the Judge addressed the issue definitively and in detail.

[B] Rule 103(a) -- In Limine Rulings Admitting Evidence -- Appealability -- Renewing Objections -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Aleskerova, 300 F.3d 286 (2d Cir. 2002) : The defendant, convicted for possession in 1997 of stolen artworks from an Azerbaijan museum, challenged the admission of evidence that in 1996 she was stopped by customs officials at an airport in Azerbaijan and was found with other artwork that was in a museum's inventory but missing. The Trial Judge ruled that the evidence would be admitted as probative of the defendant's intent and plan. On appeal, the defendant complained that there was insufficient evidence that the items found in the 1996 stop were stolen. The Court held that the defendant could obtain only plain error review, because she had not renewed an in limine motion at trial. It reasoned that the Judge will not normally be aware of any deficiencies in foundation evidence in ruling on an in limine motion but only after the evidence is presented at trial. Thus, the in limine ruling was conditioned on the government's presenting evidence at trial that the artwork was stolen, and if it did not do so, the defendant was obliged to object then. Affirming, the Court found no plain error.

Government of Virgin Islands v. Joseph, 964 F.2d 1380 (3d Cir. 1992) : The Court held that the defendant's failure to object at trial to hearsay evidence did not constitute waiver where the issue had been raised by a pretrial motion with supporting memorandum, had been considered at a hearing during the trial at which both counsel were given a chance to advocate their positions, and had been the subject of a definitive ruling made with no suggestion that it would be reconsidered at trial.

United States v. Wilson, 118 F.3d 228 (4th Cir. 1997) : Affirming a lawyer's conviction for obstructing administration of the revenue laws, the Court held that a pretrial motion to strike evidence as irrelevant was sufficient for review although no objection was made when the evidence was offered at trial. The pretrial motion clearly identified the ruling sought and the Trial Judge made the requested ruling. By contrast, in United States v. Ellis, 121 F.3d 908 (4th Cir. 1997) , the Trial Judge had deferred a decision on the defendant's motion in limine regarding certain statements, and the defendant had not objected when one of the statements was offered as a prior consistent statement to rehabilitate an impeached prosecution witness. The Court held that under those circumstances admission of the statement was reviewable only for plain error.

United States v. Brawner, 173 F.3d 966 (6th Cir. 1999) : The defendant, charged with fraud in a telemarketing scheme, moved in limine to exclude expert testimony on common practices in fraudulent telemarketing. After the motion was denied, he did not object at trial when the expert testified. The Court held that the defendant had not waived his objection, since the issue had been thoroughly explored during the hearing on the in limine motion and the Trial Judge's ruling was explicit and definitive. In such circumstances, treating the claim of error as preserved is consistent with the rules and decisions encouraging or requiring pretrial procedures in order to narrow the issues remaining for trial and to minimize disruptions at trial.

United States v. Haddad, 10 F.3d 1252 (7th Cir. 1993) : The Court held that an objection to a conditional in limine ruling admitting the defendant's State Court guilty plea was not preserved when no objection was made at trial.

United States v. Archdale, 229 F.3d 861 (9th Cir. 2000) : A defendant charged with child sexual abuse moved in limine to exclude a hearsay statement from the alleged victim. The motion was overruled, and no objection was made when the statement was introduced at trial. The Court held that the in limine motion was insufficient to preserve the objection, because there was no "explicit and definitive ruling by the district court that the evidence was admissible." The Court reviewed for plain error, and found none. In United States v. Palmer, 3 F.3d 300 (9th Cir. 1993) , the Court affirmed a conviction for manufacturing marijuana plants, holding it was error (but harmless) to admit the defendant's postarraignment statement to law enforcement officials. Although the defendant had objected prior to trial to admission of the statement, he did not renew the objection at trial. The Court held that "requiring a contemporaneous objection immediately after the district court has denied a pretrial objection and motion on the same grounds would have the perverse result of making form the master of substance." In United States v. Lui, n19 a defendant charged with importation and possession of heroin filed a motion in limine to exclude drug courier profile testimony; the motion was denied, and he did not object when the testimony was offered at trial. The Court reviewed admission of the testimony for abuse of discretion rather than plain error, because when the motion was denied as frivolous and sanctions were threatened, the defendant should not be penalized for failing to raise the objection again.

United States v. Nichols, 169 F.3d 1255 (10th Cir. 1999) : In one of the prosecutions for bombing the Federal Building in Oklahoma City, the defendant moved in limine to exclude the testimony of a forensic explosives expert. The Trial Judge stated that defense objections regarding the expert's testimony would be considered "during the course of trial." The expert testified at trial without objection. Under these circumstances, the Court held that the in limine motion did not preserve the defendant's right to appeal. Because the Judge reserved decision on the motion, the defendant was obligated to renew his objection at trial. The Court reviewed for plain error and found none. Although the Court affirmed drug and firearms convictions in United States v. Mejia-Alarcon, 995 F.2d 982 (10th Cir. 1993) , it held that the defendant was not required to renew his objection to an in limine ruling that a prior conviction for a food stamp offense could be admitted as a "dishonesty" crime for impeachment if he testified. Defense counsel made no objection to the introduction of the conviction during trial. While ruling that an in limine ruling could be appealed if (1) the issue had been adequately presented to the Trial Judge, (2) the issue had been of a type that can be finally decided in a pretrial hearing, and (3) the ruling was definitive, the Court stressed that "[p]rudent counsel will renew objections at trial" rather than take the risk that an Appellate Court would find one of the requirements unsatisfied.

[iv] Rule 103(a) -- In Limine Rulings Admitting Evidence -- Appealability -- Tentative or Reserved Rulings

United States v. Polishan, 336 F.3d 234 (3d Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed the conspiracy, securities fraud, and related convictions of a corporate officer, finding no plain error in the admission of testimony by the defendant's co-workers that described the defendant's role in the company. The Court noted that the defendant's pretrial motion in limine adequately explained his objection that lay opinion testimony about the defendant's knowledge should be excluded, but found that the Trial Judge never made a definitive ruling on the motion. The pretrial order explicitly reserved ruling on the issue until "the evidence has been presented within its context at trial." Thus, Polishan's failure to make contemporaneous trial objections left him with only plain error review.

Hidalgo v. Fagen, Inc., 206 F.3d 1013 (10th Cir. 2000) : Affirming a judgment for a contractor in a suit by a meat packing plant employee who was injured while cleaning a machine built by the contractor, the Court held that the plaintiff waived any objection to expert testimony for the defendant about compliance with OSHA standards. The plaintiff had filed a motion in limine, the Trial Judge declined to rule on the motion in advance of the issue arising at trial, and the plaintiff failed to renew his objections at trial. In one of the prosecutions for bombing the Federal Building in Oklahoma City, United States v. Nichols, 169 F.3d 1255 (10th Cir. 1999) , the defendant moved in limine to exclude the testimony of a forensic explosives expert. The Trial Judge stated that defense objections regarding the expert's testimony would be considered "during the course of trial." The expert testified at trial without objection. Under these circumstances, the Court held that the in limine motion did not preserve the defendant's right to appeal. Because the Judge reserved decision on the motion, the defendant was obligated to renew his objection at trial. The Court found reviewed for plain error and found none.

[g] Rule 103(a) -- In Limine Rulings Excluding Evidence -- Appealability

[i] Rule 103(a) -- Civil Cases

Walden v. Georgia-Pacific Corp., 126 F.3d 506 (3d Cir. 1997) : In an employment discrimination case, the plaintiffs made an in limine motion to admit certain statements by the defendant's supervisors. The Trial Court stated that it was making a "tentative" ruling excluding the evidence, "and then we will see where we are as we begin with the different aspects of the case." Seeing no reason to distinguish between objections and offers of proof with respect to renewal of admissibility questions that were the subject of in limine hearings, the Court held that under these circumstances the plaintiff was obligated to renew the issue by making an offer of proof at trial. The Court rejected the plaintiffs' argument that the in limine ruling was in fact definitive and thus a sufficient ground for appeal, noting that although "the district court told plaintiffs' counsel not to reargue every ruling, it did not countermand its clear opening statement that all of its rulings were tentative, and counsel never requested clarification, as he might have done." The Court did observe that it was "hard pressed" to see the advantages of an in limine hearing that produces only tentative rulings, because "the game would hardly be worth the candle." The Court reviewed for plain error and found none.

McQuaig v. McCoy, 806 F.2d 1298 (5th Cir. 1987) : In a false arrest and imprisonment action, the plaintiffs moved at a pretrial conference for admission of the entire internal affairs investigation report. The Trial Judge ruled that the report could be used for a limited purpose only, and the plaintiffs twice objected to the ruling during trial. Although the plaintiffs made no formal offer of proof, the Court held they had preserved the issue for appeal by "go[ing] into such detail (six pages in the record) as to the substance of the evidence and why it should be admitted" and later filing the actual investigation report as part of the record. In Garner v. Santoro, n20 the Court held that a manufacturer was not required to make an offer of proof at trial on a government contractor defense, since the Trial Judge had precluded the defense well in advance of trial.

Tennison v. Circus Circus Enters., Inc., 244 F.3d 684 (9th Cir. 2001) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant employer in a sexual harassment action brought by casino employees, finding that the plaintiffs had not preserved error after the defendant's motion in limine to exclude evidence of pre-1994 complaints was granted because the earlier events fell outside the statute of limitations. The Trial Judge had made it clear that the ruling was tentative, so the plaintiffs' failure to offer the evidence at trial waived any error.

Unit Drilling Co. v. Enron Oil & Gas Co., 108 F.3d 1186 (10th Cir. 1997) : The Court held in a contract case that the plaintiff could appeal, without having made an offer of proof at trial, the grant of an in limine motion based on Rules 402 and 403 to exclude evidence. The plaintiff had made clear the evidence it wished to admit and the grounds of admissibility, the issue was a discrete one that could be presented adequately and ruled upon before trial, and the issue was definitively decided by the order granting the motion.

[ii] Rule 103(a) -- In Limine Rulings Excluding Evidence -- Appealability -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Rivera-Figueroa, 149 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1998) : Defendants in a fatal carjacking case moved in limine to suppress the victim's dying declaration, and the Judge granted the motion on implicit Rule 403 grounds. At trial, one of the defendants who was not named in the statement sought to introduce it as exculpatory evidence; he had been represented at the suppression hearing and had raised no objection to the motion. The Court held that exclusion of the statement could be reviewed only under the plain error standard, since the defendant had waived his objection by not making it at the suppression hearing. Had the objection been timely made, the Judge would have faced a different set of arguments for admissibility, a conflict in position among the codefendants, and the possibility of a severance if the evidence were admissible as to one codefendant but inadmissible as to the others. The Court noted that a motion to suppress evidence effectively advances the time at which a party who wants the evidence admitted has to make that argument, since rulings in limine are relied upon by the Judge and the parties in preparing for trial.

United States v. Jimenez, 256 F.3d 330 (5th Cir. 2001) : The Trial Judge in an arson prosecution granted a motion in limine precluding the defense from discussing the mental health of a witness unless it could show that the condition existed at the time of the events relevant to the case. During the trial the Judge reviewed the witness' mental health records in camera, determined that they did not encompass the relevant time period, sealed the records, and stated that they would be subject to appellate review. Although the defendants did not make an offer of proof regarding their proposed impeachment based on the mental health records, the Court held that a formal offer of proof was not required. The Judge was adequately informed of the reasons for which counsel wished to impeach the witness, and the issue was sufficiently preserved for appeal.

United States v. Vest, 116 F.3d 1179 (7th Cir. 1997) : A doctor was charged with fraudulently subjecting his patients to unnecessary medical tests. The Court held that the defendant failed to preserve his claim that testimony from patients who were happy with his medical care was erroneously excluded. The Trial Judge had ruled in limine that the testimony could not be admitted, but the ruling allowed Vest to seek leave at trial to call the witnesses should their testimony turn out to be relevant. Since Vest never sought such leave at trial, it was "too late to reopen the issue now on appeal."

United States v. Echols, 346 F.3d 818 (8th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed robbery and firearm convictions, holding that the defendant failed to preserve a claim of error with respect to a pretrial ruling that the defendant could not cross-examine the robbery victim regarding his illegal alien status. The Court noted that the Judge expressly invited the defendant to raise his objection during trial. Therefore the in limine objection was not sufficient to preserve the claim of error. In United States v. Kirkie, 261 F.3d 761 (8th Cir. 2001) , a sexual abuse prosecution, the defendant claimed that during a telephone conversation between the victim and her cousin, the cousin had told her about the cousin's experience of making false accusations of sexual abuse against her father, resulting in his incarceration, and had explained certain aspects of sexual intercourse to the eleven-year-old victim. At a pretrial conference the Judge ruled that the victim could be questioned as to the source of her knowledge of sexual intercourse and the nature and implications of allegations of sexual abuse, but that no hearing was necessary at that time regarding what the cousin had allegedly said. At trial the defendant was not permitted, on the ground that it was collateral impeachment, to elicit what the cousin had allegedly said about her own similar situation. Because the defendant did not make, or ask to make, an offer of proof when the cousin's statements were excluded at trial, the Court held that the issue was not properly preserved for appeal.

[h] Rule 103(a) -- Objections

[i] Rule 103(a) -- Acquiescence in Ruling

United States v. Rogers, 918 F.2d 207 (D.C. Cir. 1990) : The defendant in a crack possession case objected on grounds of Rules 404(b) and 403 to other crimes evidence, but the Trial Judge admitted the evidence. During a conference on limiting instructions after the defendant rested, the prosecutor represented that the defendant was no longer objecting on Rule 404(b) grounds and defense counsel did not protest, nor did he request any limiting instruction. Affirming the conviction, the Court held that the Rule 404(b) objection had been waived by acquiescence, but the Rule 403 objection to the evidence was preserved, as the prosecutor had not mentioned it, and the defense lawyer, by making the strategic choice not to ask for a limiting instruction, did not thereby waive his remaining objection to admission of the evidence in the first instance.

United States v. Ramirez-Velasquez, 322 F.3d 868 (5th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed two defendants' marijuana-related convictions. It held that one defendant waived any objection to the admission of the other defendant's confession when defense counsel agreed to its admission: "Having waived his objection to admission of the statement, Villarreal cannot now argue that its admission was error."

United States v. Pittman, 319 F.3d 1010 (7th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed a conviction for making a false statement to a federally insured bank, holding that the defendant waived any objection to Rule 404(b) evidence when defense counsel affirmatively represented that he had no objection to the evidence.

[ii] Rule 103(a) -- Objections -- Adequate in Context

United States v. Whitaker, 127 F.3d 595 (7th Cir. 1997) : The Court affirmed a defendant's conviction for marijuana conspiracy, finding no error in admitting printouts from a coconspirator's computer. Although defense counsel did not use the specific word "authentication," the Court considered the challenge because it concluded that the defendant's lawyer adequately preserved an authentication objection to the printouts. The Court reasoned that "[c]ounsel's questions about the accuracy of the retrieval of the records were sufficient to preserve his objection as to authenticity, and counsel clearly stated his objection as to foundation."

[iii] Rule 103(a) -- Objections -- Continuing Objections

United States v. Fortenberry, 919 F.2d 923 (5th Cir. 1990) , denying reh'g en banc to 914 F.2d 671 (5th Cir. 1990) : The defendant, charged with conspiracy to commit arson and other offenses, moved in limine to exclude evidence of uncharged crimes; at a hearing on the motion, the Trial Judge permitted defense counsel to enter a continuing objection to the testimony and instructed that objecting further at trial was unnecessary. The Court held that the continuing objection preserved error for appeal under the Rule, but noted its displeasure at the procedure, which precludes a reevaluation of admissibility in context.

United States v. McVeigh, 153 F.3d 1166 (10th Cir. 1998) : Reviewing one of the prosecutions for bombing the Oklahoma City Federal Building, the Court expressed "serious doubts" whether a continuing objection was proper, noting that continuing objections are generally inappropriate for preserving error on appeal under Rule 403, because the balancing required under that Rule is complex, contextual, and fact-intensive. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 103.02[10], supra .

[iv] Rule 103(a) -- Objections -- Evidentiary Objections Insufficient To Preserve Constitutional Claims

United States v. Logan, 419 F.3d 172 (2d Cir. 2005) : Affirming a conviction for conspiracy to commit arson, the Court noted that the defendant's hearsay objection to evidence at trial did not preserve any Confrontation Clause objection for appellate review. The Court found no plain error in the admission of statements made by coconspirators to investigating officers. In United States v. Dukagjini, 326 F.3d 45 (2d Cir. 2003) , the prosecution of a drug conspiracy, the government offered the testimony of a DEA agent about the meaning of various "code words." The Court concluded that "in this case the expert was repeating hearsay evidence without applying any expertise whatsoever, thereby enabling the government to circumvent the rules prohibiting hearsay." The Court held, however, that when the defendants objected on hearsay grounds to the agent's testimony, they did not preserve a Confrontation Clause objection. Thus, the constitutional objection was reviewed only for plain error, and none was found.

United States v. Baker, 432 F.3d 1189 (11th Cir. 2005) : Appealing convictions of a drug trafficking conspiracy, the defendants argued that admission of certain evidence violated the Confrontation Clause, but the Court applied only plain error review because the defendants had asserted only hearsay objections to the evidence at trial.

[v] Rule 103(a) -- Objections -- Failure to Object

Hoult v. Hoult, 57 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1995) : In an action for damages resulting from alleged sexual assaults during her childhood, the plaintiff called an expert in repressed memories. The defendant did not object. On appeal from denial of relief under Fed. R. Civ. P. 60(b), the defendant argued that his failure to object was not dispositive. He read Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc. (discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 702) to require the Trial Judge to make a sua sponte ruling on the admissibility of all expert testimony. The Court stated that while Daubert does instruct Judges to conduct a preliminary assessment of the reliability of expert testimony, even in the absence of an objection, it does not require a Judge to sua sponte hold a hearing and make explicit on-the-record findings. In the absence of an explicit objection, "we assume that the district court performs such an analysis sub silentio throughout the trial with respect to all expert testimony." The Court found that the admission of the expert testimony was not a "mistake" within the meaning of Rule 60(b). In United States v. Lopez, n21 the Court said that because no objection was made to conspirators' statements, the Trial Judge was not required to make a finding that a conspiracy existed and that the declarants and the defendant were part of it before admitting the statements.

United States v. Sandini, 803 F.2d 123 (3d Cir. 1986) : In a marijuana conspiracy case, the Court held that a defendant could not argue on appeal that evidence should have been excluded under Rules 403 and 404(b), since neither of these Rules was relied upon in the Trial Court.

United States v. Mejia, 844 F.2d 209 (5th Cir. 1988) : The Court declined to consider on appeal an objection to a document describing a company's business, since no hearsay objection was raised below. In United States v. Vesich, 724 F.2d 451 (5th Cir. 1984) , the Court held that the failure to object to other act evidence barred review on appeal.

Helmniski v. Ayerst Labs., 766 F.2d 208 (6th Cir. 1985) : Affirming a judgment for a manufacturer in a product liability action, the Court rejected an argument that a failure to object to comments by the Trial Judge and opposing counsel should be excused because the plaintiff's counsel did not want to call attention to the comments by objecting. The Court reasoned that "[w]hile under limited circumstances an objection might only exacerbate an error in admission of testimony, ... counsel is generally not excused from bringing an objection to the court's attention," since "[a]ny other general rule would eviscerate Rule 103(a)(1)." See also United States v. Brady, 595 F.2d 359 (6th Cir. 1979) (failure to object to scientific evidence).

United States v. Pallais, 921 F.2d 684 (7th Cir. 1990) : In a drug conspiracy prosecution, a witness was asked whether he had been told who would be flying a plane, the Trial Judge overruled a hearsay objection, and the witness then volunteered the names without objection. The government argued that the prosecutor should not be blamed because a witness blurts out an answer to a question that has not been asked, but the Court rejected the argument as shallow casuistry. Since it was clear to the witness and the defense counsel that the identity of the pilots was sought, the hearsay objection was timely and preserved the point for appeal. Error in admitting the evidence was harmless, however.

Owen v. Patton, 925 F.2d 1111 (8th Cir. 1991) : During the trial of a personal injury action against a tavern owner whose employee allegedly committed a battery, defense counsel repeatedly brought out that the plaintiff's companions were now incarcerated, despite instructions to end the line of inquiry. Because the plaintiff's counsel did not object, move to strike, request special instructions, or move for a mistrial, however, the Trial Judge was not called upon to make a ruling that could result in error for failure to accommodate the request. Although the Court did not grant a new trial, it did exercise its discretionary authority to deny costs to the prevailing party. In Terrell v. Poland, n22 the Court affirmed a judgment for an insurance company that proved arson in a suit on a fire insurance policy. The Court found that, by failing to object when it was offered, the plaintiffs waived their hearsay objection to a written statement of a person who stated that she saw the plaintiffs move furniture from their nightclub two weeks before the fire. A motion to strike at the close of the evidence came too late.

ESCO Corp. v. United States, 750 F.2d 1466 (9th Cir. 1985) : The Court held that a taxpayer who failed to object to the admission of letters as settlement negotiations could not raise the objection for the first time on appeal.

Wilson v. Attaway, 757 F.2d 1227 (11th Cir. 1985) : In a civil rights action in which the plaintiffs claimed that the defendants had unlawfully arrested them, the Court found that Rule 403 cannot be relied upon on appeal if objections under the Rule are not made at trial. Parties failing to object may only rely on the doctrine of plain error, which the Court did not find in the instant case. See also Collins v. Seaboard Coast Line R.R., 675 F.2d 1185 (11th Cir. 1982) (railroad's failure to object to testimony that one of its employees made a racially derogatory remark about the victim and to evidence of accidents occurring after the one giving rise to the instant case preserved no issue for appeal).

[vi] Rule 103(a) -- Objections -- General Relevancy Objections

United States v. Garcia-Torres, 280 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2002) : Reversing a drug trafficking conviction on other grounds, the Court noted that the defendant had objected to a coconspirator's statement only on relevancy grounds, so only plain error review was available regarding a hearsay objection. There was no plain error. In Bonilla v. Yamaha Motors Corp., 955 F.2d 150 (1st Cir. 1992) , the Court reversed a judgment for the defendant in a product liability action arising out of a motorcycle accident, holding that an objection stated to be on grounds of Rules 402, irrelevancy, and 403, prejudice, was sufficient to preserve error in admission of evidence that the plaintiff had been convicted of speeding. The plaintiff specifically raised Rule 404(b) in a later request for an instruction to the jury; given the close relation between Rules 404(b) and 403, under the circumstances the objections were sufficiently timely and specific. In a FELA action, Bryant v. Consolidated Rail Corp., n23 the Court held that a relevance objection to a medical report admitted during cross-examination of the plaintiff was insufficient to preserve an objection that the report was improperly used as character evidence in violation of Rule 404.

Failla v. City of Passaic, 146 F.3d 149 (3d Cir. 1998) : In a suit brought by a police officer who claimed that his employer did not properly accommodate his disability (a back problem), the plaintiff proffered evidence of a worker's compensation award compensating him for his back injury. The defendants objected on the ground that the award was irrelevant, but the Trial Judge held that it was relevant because it tended to prove that the plaintiff did have a back problem. On appeal, the defendants argued that the worker's compensation award should have been excluded under Rule 403. Since that specific objection was not raised at trial, the Court reviewed for plain error, and found none. And because the test for relevance under Rule 401 is so permissive, the Court found no error in the Trial Judge's determination that the award was relevant.

United States v. Williams, 132 F.3d 1055 (5th Cir. 1998) : Appealing a conviction for transporting illegal aliens, the defendant argued that evidence of his prior acts of transporting illegal aliens was improperly admitted. On appeal the defendant relied on Rule 404(b), but at trial the defendant had argued only that the uncharged misconduct evidence was irrelevant. Because the defendant failed to assert his Rule 404(b) objection at trial, the Court reviewed only for plain error, and found none.

United States v. Price, 418 F.3d 771 (7th Cir. 2005) : The Court held that a general objection to relevance was not sufficiently specific to preserve a claim of error under Rules 403 or 404(b). In United States v. Spiller, 261 F.3d 683 (7th Cir. 2001) , the Court affirmed a conviction for distributing crack cocaine, noting (although it was unnecessary to decide) that an objection of "irrelevant, immaterial and uncorroborated" was probably sufficient to preserve a hearsay issue for appeal. Although much hearsay is relevant and material, "[l]ack of reliability and corroboration go to the heart of the hearsay objection." In United States v. Rhodes, n24 a narcotics prosecution, the defendant objected to evidence that he had carried a pellet gun. On appeal, he argued that this evidence was inadmissible propensity evidence under Rule 404(b) and that it should have been excluded as unduly prejudicial under Rule 403. The Court found, however, that the objection at trial was solely on the ground that the pellet gun evidence was "irrelevant" to drug activity, so it limited its abuse of discretion review to whether the Trial Judge erred in finding the pellet gun evidence relevant, and it reviewed the claims under Rules 404(b) and 403 only for plain error. In United States v. Wilson, n25 the defendant objected on grounds of relevance to introduction of a gun at a trial for a cocaine distribution conspiracy. Affirming, the Court held that the defendant's argument on appeal that the prejudicial effect of the gun substantially outweighed its probative value had not been preserved by the objection, which alerted the Trial Judge only to problems under Rules 401 and 402, not Rule 403. See also United States v. Field n26(objection on grounds of relevancy and remoteness does not preserve Rule 404(b) objection).

United States v. Johnson, 722 F.2d 407 (8th Cir. 1983) : A defendant convicted as a felon possessing a firearm had objected on relevance grounds to admission of a BATF form that indicated that the gun had been shipped interstate. The Court ruled that a hearsay objection had been waived and rejected a claim that receipt of the form was plain error.

Goulah v. Ford Motor Co., 118 F.3d 1478 (11th Cir. 1997) : Appealing a judgment for the defendant in a product liability action arising from the crash of a sport utility vehicle, the plaintiffs argued that the Trial Court erroneously admitted a report from the National Highway Safety Traffic Administration. The plaintiffs argued that the report was not sufficiently trustworthy to qualify under Rule 803(8)(C), and that the report should also have been excluded under Rule 403. The Court refused to entertain these arguments on appeal, however, because the plaintiffs objected at trial only on relevance grounds. Such a general objection was "totally inadequate to preserve counsel's Rule 803(8)(C) and Rule 403 objections." In Judd v. Rodman, 105 F.3d 1339 (11th Cir. 1997) , an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendant for infecting her with genital herpes, the Trial Judge denied her objections under Rule 402 to evidence of her breast augmentation surgery. The Court held that the failure to object under Rule 412 precluded her from raising that ground of inadmissibility on appeal.

[vii] Rule 103(a) -- Objections -- Incorrect Specific Objections

United States v. Nnanyererugo, 39 F.3d 1205 (D.C. Cir. 1994) : The Court held in a bank fraud prosecution that a hearsay objection failed to preserve for appeal a claim that a witness testifying to the bank's insured status was not competent because he lacked personal knowledge.

Brookover v. Mary Hitchcock Mem. Hosp., 893 F.2d 411 (1st Cir. 1990) : In a medical malpractice action, the plaintiff introduced evidence that after the patient's fall the nurses in the defendant hospital said that he should have been restrained. The Court held that the evidence should not have been admitted as an agent's admission because there was no proof the nurses were employees of the hospital, but that the defendant had waived the objection by asserting only the declarants' lack of personal knowledge of the circumstances. See also United States v. Barrett, 766 F.2d 609 (1st Cir. 1985) (changing grounds for objection from Rule 403 to Rule 608(b) not permitted on appeal).

United States v. Mennuti, 679 F.2d 1032 (2d Cir. 1982) : In a prosecution for conspiracy to destroy residences in order to obtain insurance money, the Court found that a defendant could not complain that the Trial Judge's ruling -- that if the defendant testified, he could be asked on cross-examination about another act -- should have been barred by Rule 608, where his only objection at trial was based on Rule 403.

United States v. Guerrero, 169 F.3d 933 (5th Cir. 1999) : At the defendant's trial on bank robbery charges, he objected to evidence of other bank robberies, citing Rules 402 and 403. On appeal, he relied on Rule 404(b) to argue that the Trial Judge erred in admitting the uncharged misconduct. The Court reviewed the Rule 404(b) question for plain error only, and found none.

United States v. Demjanjuk, 367 F.3d 623 (6th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed the revocation of the defendant's citizenship on the ground that he illegally procured his citizenship after World War II. One of the important pieces of evidence at trial was a German identification card identifying the defendant as a prison guard at a Polish concentration camp. At trial the defendant objected to the document as improperly authenticated, and on appeal he urged that it was double hearsay. Because the defendant did not raise his hearsay objection at trial, the Court held that the double hearsay objection would be reviewed only for plain error, and it found none.

United States v. Campos, 217 F.3d 707 (9th Cir. 2000) : The defendant, arrested after she crossed over from Tijuana in a van that had a false compartment full of marijuana, claimed that the van was a friend's and she did not know it contained marijuana. Affirming her conviction, the Court held (2-1) that there was no plain error in permitting a customs agent to testify that in his opinion an organization trafficking in marijuana would not entrust 151 pounds of the drug to a courier unless she knew what she was transporting. The defendant claimed on appeal that this was improper expert testimony on the defendant's mental state, but the majority observed that the defendant did not object under Rule 704(b) and declined to find plain error. The defendant's trial objection to the testimony on the ground that it was impermissible "drug courier profile" evidence was seen as implicating Rule 403 rather than Rule 704(b). The dissenting Judge thought it was plain error to admit the testimony because it clearly amounted to an opinion on the mental state of the defendant. In Gilbrook v. City of Westminster, 177 F.3d 839 (9th Cir. 1999) , the defendants argued on appeal that a certain statement was improperly admitted because it was made in the course of settlement negotiations and was therefore protected under Rule 408. At trial, however, the defendants argued that the statement was inadmissible because it was irrelevant and hearsay. The Court held that by failing to make a timely and specific objection on the basis of Rule 408, the defendants waived their right to contest the admissibility of the statement on that ground. Reviewing the admission of drug courier profile testimony in United States v. Gomez-Norena, n27 the Court noted that the defendant had not preserved the Rule 403 objection being asserted on appeal by his trial objections on Rule 404(b) and hearsay grounds.

United States v. Ramirez, 348 F.3d 1175 (10th Cir. 2003) : Affirming methamphetamine and cocaine convictions, the Court rejected the defendant's argument that an undercover police officer was erroneously permitted to testify as an expert regarding the contents of wiretapped phone calls. Because the objection was made at trial was for "speculation," the Court reviewed the admission of the testimony only for plain error. In K-B Trucking Co. v. Riss Int'l Co., 763 F.2d 1148 (10th Cir. 1985) , an action for fraudulent misrepresentation, the Court held that the defendant's objection to an exhibit on the ground of foundation was insufficient to preserve a Rule 403 claim.

[viii] Rule 103(a) -- Objections -- Insufficiently Specific Objections

Bandera v. City of Quincy, 344 F.3d 47 (1st Cir. 2003) : In a sexual harassment lawsuit, the Court ruled that there was no plain error in the admission of testimony by a female police officer, who also experienced harassment, as to her opinion about the plaintiff's claims. Although the defendant objected to the witness's testimony regarding her own harassment, the Court found that the objection was "only a generic objection" that was unsound and properly rejected, and that no objection on the ground of improper opinion testimony by a lay witness had been properly preserved. In United States v. Diaz, 300 F.3d 66 (1st Cir. 2002) , the Court affirmed an arson conviction, holding that the defendant's objections at trial to expert testimony failed to advise the Trial Judge that he was objecting to the reliability of the methods employed by those experts. The defendant's pretrial objections related solely to the experts' qualifications; at trial, the defendant made generic references to "the Daubert analysis" but the Judge could have reasonably understood this to refer back to the objections as to qualifications. The Court reviewed for plain error and found none.

United States v. Williams, 264 F.3d 561 (5th Cir. 2001) : The Court affirmed the conviction of a former city councilman for conspiracy to commit extortion and solicitation of bribes. Although the government conceded that the Trial Judge erroneously admitted the prior testimony of a witness as prior consistent statements, the Court noted that the defendant's objection at trial was simply that "Rule 801(d)(1)(B) does not apply." It concluded that this objection was not sufficiently specific to raise the question whether the motive to falsify arose after the prior testimony. In United States v. Burton, 126 F.3d 666 (5th Cir. 1997) , the Court affirmed convictions for bank robbery, holding that defense counsel had failed to preserve an objection that a hearsay statement of a coconspirator was not in furtherance of the conspiracy. Defense counsel objected "under 801d2e," and argued that there was insufficient evidence to connect the defendant to the conspiracy. The Court noted that "Rule 801(d)(2)(E) contains at least four possible bases for an objection to proffered co-conspirators' testimony" and that "the thrust of the objections here was whether sufficient evidence linked [the defendant] to the conspiracy and not whether the statements were in furtherance of the conspiracy." The Court reviewed the "in furtherance" question for plain error and found none.

United States v. Michaels, 726 F.2d 1307 (8th Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to bomb an automobile, declining to consider "foundation" objections to a magazine that was found to contain the appellant's fingerprint and a map resembling the neighborhood surrounding the bomb scene. The defendant failed to raise the objections at trial, and the Court indicated that admission of an exhibit on the basis of a general, not a specific, foundation is sufficient when no request is made for greater specificity.

United States v. Holland, 880 F.2d 1091 (9th Cir. 1989) : In a prosecution arising from a payroll-padding scheme, the Court held that the defendant did not preserve an objection to failure to redact a 90-minute tape recording by making a blanket objection to admission of the tape.

United States v. Gatling, 96 F.3d 1511 (D.C. Cir. 1996) : On an appeal from conspiracy convictions in a multiple defendant case, the government argued that the evidentiary complaints of one of the defendants should be reviewed only for plain error, because that defendant did not make an objection to the evidence at trial, although other defendants did. The Court, however, rejected any hard-and-fast rule requiring a personal objection from each defendant. It noted that such a rule would significantly complicate multi-defendant trials, and concluded as follows:

> Trial judges have discretion to determine whether each defendant must individually object or whether objections raised by one defendant will count as having been raised for all similarly situated defendants. Where a judge does not indicate what her policy will be in express terms during a trial, we will consider objections raised by one defendant to be preserved for other defendants if an examination of the record suggests that this was the approach taken by the judge in practice.

United States v. Rivera-Figueroa, 149 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1998) : Defendants in a fatal carjacking case moved in limine to suppress the victim's dying declaration, and the Judge granted the motion on implicit Rule 403 grounds. At trial, one of the defendants who was not named in the statement sought to introduce it as exculpatory evidence. The Court held that exclusion of the statement could be reviewed only under the plain error standard, since the defendant had waived his objection by not making it at the suppression hearing. Had the objection been timely made, the Judge would have faced a different set of arguments for admissibility, a conflict in position among the codefendants, and the possibility of a severance if the evidence were admissible as to one codefendant but inadmissible as to the others.

[x] Rule 103(a) -- Objections -- Sufficiently Specific Objections

Bonilla v. Yamaha Motors Corp., 955 F.2d 150 (1st Cir. 1992) : Reversing a judgment for the defendant in a product liability action arising out of a motorcycle accident, the Court held that an objection stated to be on grounds of Rules 402, irrelevancy, and 403, prejudice, was sufficient to preserve error in admission of evidence that the plaintiff had been convicted of speeding. The plaintiff specifically raised Rule 404(b) in a later request for an instruction to the jury; given the close relation between Rules 404(b) and 403, under the circumstances the objections were sufficiently timely and specific.

United States v. Musacchia, 900 F.2d 493 (2d Cir. 1990) , vacated on other grounds, 955 F.2d 3 (2d Cir. 1991) : The Court held, in reviewing a tax evasion case, that the defendants' objection, without stating grounds, to prosecution witnesses' testimony on direct about "truth-telling" provisions in their cooperation agreements was sufficiently preserved because the ground of objection was apparent from the context.

United States v. Long, 574 F.2d 761 (3d Cir. 1978) : Other crimes evidence was admitted against the appellant without a proper specific objection being raised. On appeal, the Court concluded that when no objection under Rule 403 is raised, the Court does not have to deal with the Rule. It added that "[w]here an objection does invoke Rule 403, the trial judge should record his balancing analysis to the extent that his exercise of discretion may be fairly reviewed on appeal. However, where Rule 403 is not invoked, the trial judge's balancing will be subsumed in his ruling."

United States v. Polasek, 162 F.3d 878 (5th Cir. 1998) : The defendant, who operated a service that transferred motor vehicle documents from dealers to purchasers, was charged with fraudulently altering the mileage on titles and related documents. After the defendant's testimony denying any fraudulent alteration, the government called a special agent of the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration, who testified that the defendant had done title work for persons who were subsequently convicted of odometer fraud. Reversing the defendant's conviction, the Court held that the rebuttal testimony was improper evidence of guilt by association. The Court found that the defendant's objection, "It doesn't prove that she had anything to do with altering anything or had knowledge of it," was sufficient to put the Trial Judge on notice that the defendant was contending that her relationship with other individuals did not show bad acts or guilty knowledge on her part, and this was sufficient to demonstrate that the only purpose for which the evidence could be offered was to show guilt by association. In Dixon v. International Harvester Co., 754 F.2d 573 (5th Cir. 1985) , the Court overturned a judgment n.o.v. for the defendant in a personal injury action against the manufacturer of a crawler tractor. The Court found that, in the light of a motion in limine, the defendant's objections at trial were specific enough to preserve an issue for appeal.

United States v. Kone, 307 F.3d 430 (6th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed convictions involving the immigration laws, finding that a ruling that one defendant's objection would be treated as an objection for all defendants did not imply that an objection as to one witness would be treated as having been made concerning another witness. The Court found, however, that the defense did raise specific objections to three prosecution witnesses. In United States v. Sheffey, 57 F.3d 1419 (6th Cir. 1995) , the defendant was charged with murder and assault after an automobile collision that occurred while he was driving impaired with prescription drugs and alcohol. At trial eyewitnesses were asked whether the defendant had driven "recklessly, in extreme disregard of human life." The Court held that the defendant's ultimate issue objection under Rule 704 sufficiently preserved for appeal the issue under Rule 701 whether the question called for a legal conclusion or unhelpful opinion testimony, since the former Rule clearly incorporates the analysis of the latter by the words "otherwise admissible." In Torres v. County of Oakland, 758 F.2d 147 (6th Cir. 1985) , the Court held that an objection to opinion testimony in an employment discrimination action was properly preserved for appeal where the ground of the objection was clear from the context.

United States v. Long, 86 F.3d 81 (7th Cir. 1996) : Appealing a drug conviction, the defendant argued that prior uncharged drug transactions were erroneously admitted against him in violation of Rule 404(b) because the prior drug transactions were not similar enough to the charged transaction to be probative of intent and because the government had not presented sufficient evidence of the uncharged misconduct. The government contended that these arguments were waived because the defendant's Rule 404(b) objection at trial went to the issues of timeliness and the reason for introducing the evidence. The Court rejected the government's position (but affirmed the conviction), finding that the defendant clearly relied on Rule 404(b) as the basis of his objection at trial, and thus sufficiently alerted the Trial Judge to all Rule 404(b) issues. The Court noted that "waiver is a doctrine designed to protect the district court from being reversed on grounds it did not have a chance to consider."

K-B Trucking Co. v. Riss Int'l Co., 763 F.2d 1148 (10th Cir. 1985) : The Court held in an action for fraudulent misrepresentation that the defendant's objection to an exhibit on the ground it was cumulative was sufficient to preserve error under Rule 403.

[xi] Rule 103(a) -- Objections -- Timing of Objection

United States v. Spriggs, 102 F.3d 1245 (D.C. Cir. 1996) : Affirming convictions in a money-laundering prosecution, the Court held that the defendants had failed to make a timely objection to the testimony of a law enforcement officer called as an expert on money-laundering practices. The defendants made no objection when the testimony was given, and although they raised concerns about the testimony in a bench conference called at the behest of the government partway through the officer's testimony, it was not until the following day that they moved to strike the testimony. The Court therefore reviewed for plain error and found none.

Government of Virgin Islands v. Archibald, 987 F.2d 180 (3d Cir. 1993) : Reversing a conviction for aggravated rape of a ten-year-old, the Court held that, when the victim's mother was asked how she happened to know the defendant and answered that the defendant had fathered the child of her fifteen-year-old other daughter, the defendant could not reasonably have been expected to object to the question, and therefore an objection and motion to strike the answer were timely.

Spivey v. United States, 912 F.2d 80 (4th Cir. 1990) : In a Federal Tort Claims Act case, the Court held that a proper hearsay objection and motion to strike made nine days after the plaintiff offered a posttrial affidavit were timely.

Jones v. Lincoln Elec. Co., 188 F.3d 709 (7th Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed a judgment for manufacturers and distributors of welding rods in a suit by a welder who claimed neurological injuries from being exposed to manganese present in fumes emitted from the rods. The plaintiff complained that it was error to permit a professor of materials engineering to testify about an epidemiological study of welders at Caterpillar, where the expert failed to disclose, under Fed. R. Civ. P. 26, that he would be relying on that study at trial. The plaintiff had not raised any objection until the close of the expert's testimony. Although the Trial Judge found that the objection was waived, the Court disagreed and concluded that the objection was sufficiently timely. Noting that the objection was made when the Trial Judge could take corrective action and that the case was protracted with many experts, the Court stated that "Rule 103 should not be construed in such a narrow manner that courts cannot, or should not, recognize the exigencies of attempting to recall on a moment's notice whether a particular document or opinion has been disclosed in an expert's Rule 26 disclosure, especially when such evidence does not concern the expert's core testimony, as is the case here." The Court found any error in permitting the expert to rely on the study to be harmless.

United States v. Potter, 616 F.2d 384 (9th Cir. 1979) : The Court sustained a Rule 403 balancing ruling, which was not accompanied by reasons, in part because the objection to a line of evidence was late. See also United States v. Lara-Hernandez n28(posttrial evidence claims come too late).

Vallejos v. C.E. Glass Co., 583 F.2d 507 (10th Cir. 1978) : The Court held that the proper time to object to evidence such as a stipulation is when it is offered, not in a subsequent motion.

[i] Rule 103(a) -- Offers of Proof

[i] Rule 103(a) -- Basic Requirement

[A] Rule 103(a) -- Civil Cases

Beech Aircraft Corp. v. Rainey, 488 U.S. 153 (1988) : Agreeing with the Court of Appeals that the Trial Judge had erred in refusing to permit a plaintiff, who had been called as an adverse witness and asked about a letter he had written to a Navy officer concerning his wife's death, to testify on cross-examination as to other aspects of the letter, the Court held that the plaintiff had preserved for appeal a rule of completeness argument. Justice Brennan reasoned that "the nature of the proposed testimony was abundantly apparent from the very question put by Rainey's counsel," the Trial Court appeared to indicate that it understood counsel to be making a completeness argument, counsel was interrupted by opposing counsel and by the Judge, and "the degree of precision with which counsel is required to argue must be judged, among other things, in accordance with the leeway the court affords him in advancing his arguments."

BWX Electronics, Inc. v. Control Data Corp., 929 F.2d 707 (D.C. Cir. 1991) : In a suit alleging breach of contract and fraud after termination of negotiations to purchase a business and a building, the Trial Judge granted the defendant's motion in limine to exclude evidence allegedly showing improper motive. The Court affirmed judgments for the defendant, holding that the plaintiff's failure to suggest a single piece of tangible evidence supporting its unsubstantiated allegations doomed its challenge to the ruling.

Faigin v. Kelly, 184 F.3d 67 (1st Cir. 1999) : During his case in chief the plaintiff in a defamation action plaintiff sought to testify about inconsistent statements made by the deposition witness, but was not permitted to because the deposition had not yet been introduced; the Judge told the plaintiff he would be permitted to delve into the inconsistent statements on rebuttal. After the videotape was introduced and the defense rested, the plaintiff requested "ten minutes" in rebuttal, but the Judge denied the request on the ground that the plaintiff had testified eight days and the rebuttal testimony would likely be repetitive. The Court held that the plaintiff had not preserved any error, since he neither made an offer of proof when denied the opportunity to rebut nor identified the particular statements that he wished to impeach. In Curreri v. International Bhd. of Teamsters, n29 the Court reversed a judgment against a union in an action for injuries that the plaintiff received when he crossed a picket line, holding it was error to exclude certain testimony by the union's business agent concerning directions he gave to workers on the first day of the strike, as the instructions were not hearsay but were conduct probative of whether the union instigated violence or attempted to prevent it. Discussing the union's offer of proof, the Court observed that "[m]ere compliance with Rule 103 may, in some situations be insufficient to preserve for appeal the issue whether evidence was properly excluded." The Court cited pre-Rules cases requiring a party to make clear, after a ruling, that the party is still pressing a point so that the Judge might reconsider an exclusionary ruling as the issues in a case become clearer. In an employment discrimination case, Andrews v. Bechtel Power Corp., n30 the Court refused to excuse a pro se litigant from the offer of proof requirement, since there is nothing for an Appellate Court to review when a litigant fails to indicate the evidence he wishes to offer.

Seatrax, Inc. v. Sonbeck Int'l, Inc., 200 F.3d 358 (5th Cir. 2000) : In an action for trademark infringement and misappropriation of trade secrets regarding offshore marine cranes, the Court found no error in the Judge's order forbidding the plaintiff from showing how defendant came into possession of drawings of the cranes, since the plaintiff failed to make an offer of proof indicating the evidence that would support its allegation of theft. In a class action alleging discriminatory lending practices, Fischer v. Dallas Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n, n31 the Court affirmed a judgment for a bank, holding that the plaintiffs failed to make an offer of proof with respect to several documents relating to a federal investigation of the bank. Thus, there was nothing for the Court to review on appeal. See also Petty v. Ideco n32("[w]here no offer of proof appears of record, there is no way that a party can demonstrate that his substantial rights have been affected"); Gray v. Lucas n33(error for Judge to deny opportunity for offer of proof, but substance of claims raised was sufficient for Appellate Court to rule).

Paschal v. Flagstar Bank, FSB, 295 F.3d 565 (6th Cir. 2002) : Affirming in part a Fair Housing Act case that held the defendant engaged in racially discriminatory mortgage lending, the Court found that the defendant had not made an offer of proof when loan files alleged to be comparable had been excluded; therefore, any error was waived.

Okai v. Verfuth, 275 F.3d 606 (7th Cir. 2001) : Affirming a judgment for corrections officers sued by an inmate who claimed that he was beaten while being moved during a transfer that followed a prison riot, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence that the officers had been suspended following the riot, when the plaintiff provided no indication of the basis for and nature of the officers' discipline. The Court noted that the plaintiff made no offer of proof as to what the excluded evidence would have shown or how it would have helped the plaintiff's case. In Brandt v. Vulcan, Inc., 30 F.3d 752 (7th Cir. 1994) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant manufacturer in a worker's action for injuries suffered in a fall off a scaffold, holding there was no error in excluding evidence of subsequent design changes made by third parties. The Court emphasized that the plaintiff failed to respond to the exclusion with an offer of proof regarding such matters as how the design was changed, what motivated the alteration, or when it occurred. In Evanston Bank v. Brink's, Inc., n34 the Court affirmed a judgment for a bank that sued an armored car company for breach of contract. Declining to consider arguments for admissibility of evidence not raised below, the Court opined that "it is incumbent upon the party presenting the evidence to make an appropriate offer of proof describing both the relevance of the evidence and the basis upon which it is being offered in order to properly preserve an issue regarding such evidence for appeal."

United Fire & Cas. Co. v. Historic Preservation Trust, 265 F.3d 722 (8th Cir. 2001) : After a fire damage claim was submitted, the insurer conducted a five-day examination of the Trust's sole trustee; the entire examination was transcribed and the final three days were videotaped. At trial of its action seeking a declaration of nonliability, the insurer sought to introduce both the 600-page transcript and the videotape in their entirety as admissions by a party-opponent and as evidence of the trustee's "demeanor and attitude" during the investigation. The Judge ruled that only portions offered for impeachment or as substantive evidence would be admitted. The Court held that because no offer of proof was made, it would find no abuse of discretion in refusing to admit the complete transcript and videotapes. In Dupre v. Fru-Con Eng'g, 112 F.3d 329 (8th Cir. 1997) , an age discrimination case, the Court held that the plaintiff had not preserved error with respect to exclusion of certain deposition testimony, where the record contained neither an offer of proof at trial nor a demonstration of the context within which the questions regarding the testimony were asked. Although the plaintiff claimed that the offer of proof was made at an in limine hearing but, unbeknownst to him, it was not recorded, the Court held that an offer of proof must be made a part of the record. In Porter-Cooper v. Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, n35 a personal injury action arising out of the plaintiff's use of the Dalkon Shield, the Court held that the plaintiff had not made a sufficient offer of proof to justify a claim of error regarding exclusion of expert testimony. The plaintiff's pretrial designation of expert witnesses stated only that the expert "may testify concerning the cause and effect" of the plaintiff's injuries. A sufficient offer of proof "must express precisely the substance of the excluded evidence, which counsel accomplishes by stating with specificity what he or she anticipates will be the witness' testimony or by putting the witness on the stand." In Lee v. Rapid City Area School Dist. No. 51-4, n36 an ADEA action by a teacher whose contract was not renewed, the Trial Judge admitted evidence that school administrators had received complaints about the plaintiff from students and parents but refused, on grounds that the evidence was hearsay and the witnesses repeatedly volunteered nonresponsive statements, to allow testimony about the substance of the complaints unless they had been documented. The Court held, inter alia, that the defendants had not preserved any error, as their offer of proof referred only generally to the complaints without naming the individuals making them or their specific substance. Four Judges believed the offer of proof was sufficient. In Fox v. Dannenberg, n37 the Court, holding that evidence from the plaintiff's expert engineers had been improperly excluded in a wrongful death case arising out of an automobile accident, noted that the error had been sufficiently preserved by counsel's specific statement describing the witnesses' anticipated testimony. Putting a proffered witness on the stand is not the only way to make an adequate offer of proof. In Estes v. Dick Smith Ford, Inc., n38 the Court reversed a judgment in an employment discrimination case and found that prior acts of discrimination against black customers by the service department for which the plaintiff formerly worked should have been admitted. Although the defendant complained that the plaintiff had not established the number of times discrimination occurred or proved that nondiscriminatory reasons might have explained the actions of its employees, the Court concluded that the substance of the evidence was made known and that an offering party did not have to answer all questions that went more to the weight than to the admissibility of evidence.

Price v. Seydel, 961 F.2d 1470 (9th Cir. 1992) : In a fraud action by the purchaser of a hotel, the plaintiff attempted to show that the defendant kept two sets of books, one accurate and the other showing greater income in order to induce purchase of the property. The Magistrate Judge excluded evidence of the first set, presuming that they were kept for the purpose of defrauding the IRS. The Court noted that exclusion may well have been an abuse of discretion under Rule 404(b), but the plaintiff's attorney never made a clear statement of the theory on which admission was sought. An offer of proof would have avoided the problem.

Inselman v. S & J Operating Co., 44 F.3d 894 (10th Cir. 1995) : Land owners suing an oil well operating company for pollution damage were not permitted to elicit from the defendant's witness that leases covering adjacent property had been purchased by the defendant because it had also polluted that property, as there was no evidence the adjacent property was polluted. The plaintiffs' counsel then made an offer of proof that the witness would have stated that pollution complaints were the reason the purchase was made, but defense counsel stated that the witness would not testify to that effect. The Court held there was no error in precluding the testimony, since the plaintiffs' failure to examine the witness made it impossible to tell whether the excluded evidence would have been relevant or helpful to the plaintiffs' case. In Polys v. Trans-Colorado Airlines, 941 F.2d 1404 (10th Cir. 1991) , the Court held that plaintiffs who had brought a personal injury action against an airline had not preserved error for appeal when they made no formal offer of proof following exclusion of their expert's deposition testimony. Elicitation through later testimony of the substance of the previously excluded evidence did not require reconsideration of the ruling without more in the way of explanation or proffer.

Murphy v. City of Flagler Beach, 761 F.2d 622 (11th Cir. 1985) : The Court held that a plaintiff in a civil rights case made a proper offer of proof at a conference on evidence questions that was held some time after the plaintiff had been barred from eliciting certain testimony from a witness. Since the plaintiff intended to elicit similar testimony from subsequent witnesses, the Court found that the Trial Judge had a chance to correct the error in his ruling.

[B] Rule 103(a) -- Offers of Proof -- Basic Requirement -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Thompson, 279 F.3d 1043 (D.C. Cir. 2002) : The defendant was charged with crack distribution after he gave an undercover officer a covered large drink cup in exchange for $1,500. The defendant denied knowing cocaine was in the cup and testified that earlier a codefendant had asked him to deliver the cup, saying it contained $2,600, which the defendant assumed was to pay a gambling debt. The defendant tried to recount what the codefendant said after he returned with the $1,500, but a hearsay objection was sustained as to any post-transaction statements. The Court held that, although it was possible that post-transaction statements might be nonhearsay relevant to the defendant's state of mind, any error had not been preserved, since the defendant did not indicate what the statements were or otherwise inform the Judge of the nature of the evidence sought to be adduced, or even at a minimum indicate the purpose for which the evidence was being offered. In United States v. Wright, 783 F.2d 1091 (D.C. Cir. 1986) , the Court held that evidence of a telephone call that one defendant claimed to have received was not hearsay when it was offered in support of a duress defense to prove that the call contained a threat, but found that no offer of proof was made at trial and that the exclusion of the evidence was not plain error. Thus, the Court affirmed a conviction for kidnapping.

United States v. Hudson, 970 F.2d 948 (1st Cir. 1992) : After witnesses, including the defendant's brother, testified under a grant of immunity about drug transactions, the defense offered evidence that the witnesses had participated in jailhouse conversations indicating that the defendant was not involved in drugs and that the brother was upset at the defendant for beating him out of gambling money and not taking care of his family. The Court held that the error in excluding the evidence was sufficiently preserved where the "substance of the evidence was made known to the court" and the defendants asserted that the evidence was admissible as impeachment by inconsistent statement and to show bias, even though much of the colloquy centered on whether the evidence came within a hearsay exception.

United States v. Dennis, 843 F.2d 652 (2d Cir. 1988) : The Court held that a defendant in a cocaine conspiracy case could not obtain appellate review with respect to allegedly inconsistent statements by a government witness, since no offer of proof was made as to the substance of the statements.

United States v. Ballis, 28 F.3d 1399 (5th Cir. 1994) : In a prosecution for bank fraud, the Court held that the defendant had sufficiently preserved error when testimony by defense witnesses regarding a meeting with government agents was excluded as hearsay. The government argued that the defendant had proffered the entire record of the hearing on the motion to dismiss, rather than specifically listing the parts of that testimony that he wished to present. The Court concluded that the general proffer was sufficient, given that the Trial Court had chided defense counsel for "spoon feeding" it, and had expressed an "intimate familiarity" with the challenged statements on the basis of having tried related cases and ruled on the motion to dismiss. In United States v. Mejia, n39 the Court declined to consider whether testimony from the defendant's attorney should have been admitted to demonstrate the defendant's innocent state of mind, since no claim was made at trial that the testimony came within a hearsay exception.

United States v. King, 75 F.3d 1217 (7th Cir. 1996) : A defendant, charged with attempting to hire someone to kill his wife, sought to have a witness testify that he was invited by the defendant to attend a meeting, which the defendant would argue was with the hit-man for the purpose of terminating the scheme. The Court held that the government's hearsay objection was prematurely sustained, but that any error was harmless because, inter alia, the defendant's offer of proof did not indicate that the witness would support the theory that the scheme was to be terminated.

United States v. Kirkie, 261 F.3d 761 (8th Cir. 2001) : The defendant in a sexual abuse prosecution claimed that during a telephone conversation between the victim and her cousin, the cousin had told her about the cousin's experience of making false accusations of sexual abuse against her father, resulting in his incarceration, and had explained certain aspects of sexual intercourse to the eleven-year-old victim. At a pretrial conference the Judge ruled that the victim could be questioned as to the source of her knowledge of sexual intercourse and the nature and implications of allegations of sexual abuse, but that no hearing was necessary at that time regarding what the cousin had allegedly said. At trial the defendant was not permitted, on the ground that it was collateral impeachment, to elicit what the cousin had allegedly said about her own similar situation. Because the defendant did not make, or ask to make, an offer of proof when the cousin's statements were excluded at trial, the Court held that the issue was not properly preserved for appeal.

United States v. Clark, 918 F.2d 843 (9th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed convictions of perjury offenses, holding that an offer of proof asserted to have been made off the record did not preserve for appeal a defendant's argument that evidence was erroneously excluded. In United States v. Cutler, n40 a defendant charged with mail fraud and arson tried to show that an employee of his was the guilty party, but the Court upheld a ruling excluding modus operandi evidence concerning the employee because the defendant failed to demonstrate by a proper offer of proof that the evidence would amount to a "signature" that could be associated with the employee.

United States v. Adams, 271 F.3d 1236 (10th Cir. 2001) : A defendant charged with felon firearm possession claimed error in the exclusion of a psychologist's report regarding his mental condition. The Court noted that counsel's general statements about the psychologist's planned testimony did not constitute an offer of proof that was sufficiently explicit to enable the Trial Judge to make an informed decision on the substance of the evidence. A facsimile of the psychologist's report sent to the Judge's chambers the morning before the hearing, but not made an exhibit or marked for identification, did not create the required clear record that the Appellate Court could review to determine whether there was reversible error in excluding the evidence. The Court did, however, permit defense counsel to supplement the record on appeal, because the Judge had made reference to the facsimile at the hearing. In United States v. Willie, 941 F.2d 1384 (10th Cir. 1991) , at a tax protestor's trial for tax evasion, the defendant offered a series of documents, including the Constitution and a Navajo Treaty, to show the basis for his belief that he was not required to file tax returns; all were excluded as irrelevant. Affirming, the Court held that the defendant failed to preserve the issue for appeal because the purpose for which the evidence was offered was not clear, even though the substance of the evidence was presented, and that there was no plain error.

United States v. West, 898 F.2d 1493 (11th Cir. 1990) : In a trial for solicitation of murder, the Trial Judge excluded testimony as to unrecorded statements by an informant to the defendant, which the defendant argued on appeal would have shed light on his defense that he lacked criminal intent. The Court said that the defendant was improperly prevented from testifying to the effect of the informant's statements on his state of mind, but as he made no attempt to inform the Judge of the nature of the informant's statements, the Court was unable to determine whether their exclusion substantially prejudiced his rights, so the conviction was affirmed.

[ii] Rule 103(a) -- Offers of Proof -- Cross-Examination

Wright v. Hartford Acc. & Indem. Co., 580 F.2d 809 (5th Cir. 1978) : The defendant cross-examined the plaintiff's expert at a deposition in a worker's compensation case. The plaintiff's motion in limine to exclude this cross-examination was granted and the plaintiff objected both times the defendant offered the testimony at trial. The evidence was excluded after the defendant provided no authority supporting its admission in response to the Trial Judge's request. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court observed: "The arguments for a more relaxed requirement of an offer of proof on cross-examination ... are inapplicable, when, as in this case, the evidence is deposition testimony, counsel is forewarned of the objection, and the trial judge specifically requests that counsel provide support for admitting the evidence."

[iii] Rule 103(a) -- Offers of Proof -- Expert Testimony

United States v. Rettenberger, 344 F.3d 702 (7th Cir. 2003) : A defendant, charged with fraudulently obtaining disability insurance payments, was not permitted to introduce testimony from an expert challenging testimony from experts for the government that the defendant was faking his symptoms, because the defense had not disclosed before trial that it would ask the witness about his analysis of the other physicians' assessments, although it did disclose that the witness would explain and support his own assessments. The defendant argued that pretrial disclosure would have been pointless; the Court agreed that it would have been if the witness planned only to reiterate his own diagnosis, but not if he had scientific reasons for thinking that the other experts used unreliable techniques or implemented good techniques in slipshod ways. However, the defense made no offer of proof regarding the reasons the witness would have given, so no error was preserved and the ruling below would not be disturbed.

United States v. Rouse, 111 F.3d 561 (8th Cir. 1997) : Affirming convictions for sexual abuse of children, the Court held that any error in the Trial Judge's exclusion of expert testimony concerning how adult questioning may taint the testimony of children was harmless. The Court noted that an expert may explain the dangers of implanted memory but may not give an opinion as to whether a particular child witness is truthful, and observed that a narrative offer of proof may pose problems for a Trial Judge that would be avoided if counsel made an offer of proof through specific questions and answers.

[iv] Rule 103(a) -- Offers of Proof -- Requirement Excused

United States v. Jimenez, 256 F.3d 330 (5th Cir. 2001) : The Trial Judge in an arson prosecution granted a motion in limine precluding the defense from discussing the mental health of a witness unless it could show that the condition existed at the time of the events relevant to the case. During the trial the Judge reviewed the witness' mental health records in camera, determined that they did not encompass the relevant time period, sealed the records, and stated that they would be subject to appellate review. Although the defendants did not make an offer of proof regarding their proposed impeachment based on the mental health records, the Court held that a formal offer of proof is not required. The Judge was adequately informed of the reasons for which counsel wished to impeach the witness, and the issue was sufficiently preserved for appeal. In United States v. Bell Petroleum Servs., Inc., 64 F.3d 202 (5th Cir. 1995) , an environmental suit by the United States under CERCLA, the Court held that the Trial Judge erred in reading a prior opinion by the Court as precluding the reopening of the record on remand, and reasoned that "because the district court refused to allow any additional evidence, the EPA was not required to make an offer of proof."

Reed v. Baxter, 134 F.3d 351 (6th Cir. 1998) : In a reverse discrimination case, the plaintiffs sought inquiry into statements made at a meeting between the city attorney and some city councilmen. The Trial Judge granted a protective order on grounds of privilege. The defendants asserted that the plaintiffs' claim of error was waived because they had never made a complete offer of proof regarding the substance of the testimony they sought to introduce. Although the plaintiffs "failed to take steps that would have more clearly preserved the attorney-client issue for appeal," the Court found that the lack of evidence concerning the content of the meeting was "attributable primarily to the confusion caused by the District Court's broad rulings excluding in advance any inquiry into evidence that may be covered under the privilege." Therefore, the Court concluded that the plaintiffs had taken sufficient steps to preserve the privilege question on appeal.

[v] Rule 103(a) -- Offers of Proof -- Response by Objecting Party

Gilchrist v. Bolger, 733 F.2d 1551 (11th Cir. 1984) : The Court upheld a ruling denying class certification in an employment discrimination action, finding that an offer of proof as to class size failed to demonstrate that the members of the class were so numerous that joinder was impractical. In a footnote, the Court observed that the Trial Judge wisely permitted defense counsel to comment on the offer of proof in an effort to ascertain whether there were matters in the offer that were uncontroverted.

[vi] Rule 103(a) -- Offers of Proof -- Specific Hearsay Exception

United States v. Gaines, 170 F.3d 72 (1st Cir. 1999) : Appealing drug convictions, the defendant argued that an exculpatory statement from a coconspirator should have been admitted either as not hearsay or as an excited utterance. When the defendant made the offer of proof at trial, however, he argued that the statement was admissible under the state of mind exception. The Court declared that "[g]rounds not identified at trial on which rejected evidence is admissible will ordinarily not provide a basis for reversal on appeal." The Court reviewed for plain error, and found none.

United States v. Pugliese, 712 F.2d 1574 (2d Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed heroin-related convictions, finding that a defendant could not argue that a statement originally offered under the residual exception to the hearsay rule should have been admitted as a declaration against interest. The Court noted that where evidence was improperly admitted under one theory, it might affirm if the evidence should have been admitted anyway under another theory, but in the instant case the defendant never offered a solid ground for admitting the evidence.

[j] Rule 103(a) -- Summary Judgment

Movie 1 & 2 v. United Artists Commun., Inc., 909 F.2d 1245 (9th Cir. 1990) : The Trial Judge granted summary judgment for the defendants in an antitrust action involving film distribution rights after excluding from evidence statements by an employee of a defendant. The appellees argued that a plain error standard under Rule 103(d) applied because the appellants did not address appellees' specific objections in their responsive papers or in oral argument on the summary judgment motion. But the Court held Rule 103(d) does not apply where the evidence was made known to the Trial Court, so the de novo standard of review was applicable.

[2] Rule 103(c) -- Hearing of Jury

United States v. Adames, 56 F.3d 737 (7th Cir. 1995) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in removing the jury from the courtroom, as opposed to holding sidebar conferences, when determining evidentiary and procedural matters in this complex drug conspiracy case.

United States v. Nace, 561 F.2d 763 (9th Cir. 1977) : Although it affirmed loansharking convictions, the Court indicated that the government should use Rule 103(c) and should broach highly inflammatory material outside of the jury's presence in order to avoid possible mistrials.

[3] Rule 103(d) -- Plain Error

[a] Rule 103(d) -- Definition of Plain Error

United States v. Thompson, 82 F.3d 849 (9th Cir. 1996) : The defendant appealed his conviction for a firearms violation, arguing that the Trial Court had erred in permitting his pre-arrest silence to be used as substantive evidence of guilt. Because the defendant did not properly object to this evidence at trial, the Court reviewed for plain error. Quoting United States v. Alli-Balogun, 72 F.3d 9 (2d Cir. 1995) , the Court stated that " '[w]e do not see how an error can be plain when the Supreme Court and this court have not spoken on the subject, and the authority in other circuits is split.' " Thus, to be plain error, the Trial Court must have ignored clearly established law. Since the Circuit Courts were found to be split on the admissibility of pre-arrest silence as evidence of guilt, the Court held that there was no plain error and affirmed the defendant's conviction.

[b] Rule 103(d) -- Effect of Failure To Object When Rule Requires Application of a Balancing Test

United States v. Meserve, 271 F.3d 314 (1st Cir. 2001) : The Court affirmed convictions for robbery of a convenience store and firearms offenses. The Trial Judge admitted a conviction that was more than twenty years old to impeach a bartender who was a defense alibi witness. Because the defendant failed to object at trial, the Court reviewed the ruling for plain error. The Court concluded that there could be no plain error when a party failed to make a timely objection and thus deprived the Trial Judge of the opportunity to engage in a balancing as Rule 609(b) contemplates.

[c] Rule 103(d) -- Examples of Plain Error

United States v. Jean-Baptiste, 166 F.3d 102 (2d Cir. 1999) : In the defendant's trial for falsely stating her place of birth in a passport application, the government introduced evidence that the defendant gave a social security number belonging to another person when she obtained an earlier passport. However, in offering the evidence and in closing argument, the prosecutor transposed digits in the social security number, so the references were not to the false number actually used by the defendant. Vacating the conviction, the Court held that the error was plain and it was not made harmless either by the fact that the nature of the proper evidence was exactly the same or by the other evidence offered against the defendant.

Government of Virgin Islands v. Joseph, 685 F.2d 857 (3d Cir. 1982) : The Court found plain error in the submission to a jury of two critical documents not admitted in evidence and reversed the appellant's convictions for assault, robbery, and rape. In Teen-Ed, Inc. v. Kimball Int'l, Inc., n41 the Court vacated a judgment awarding the plaintiff one dollar for breach of contract, even though the evidence point that was determinative on appeal was not raised below. The Court said that the appellant's counsel was not solely to blame, since "appellee's counsel also failed to assist the court in the proper resolution of a very difficult evidentiary problem" and went on to find that "fundamental dictates of fairness and justice" required a new trial on the issue of damages.

United States v. Escobar, 674 F.2d 469 (5th Cir. 1982) : The Court reversed a conviction for marijuana offenses because, in explaining how his attention focused on the defendant, a police officer related computer information stating the defendant was a suspected marijuana smuggler. The evidence was hearsay and clearly prejudicial, and was not offered for any proper limited purpose. Even though the defendant raised only a hearsay objection at trial, the Court also found plain error under Rule 404(b).

Williams v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 922 F.2d 1357 (8th Cir. 1990) : The Court reversed a judgment for the defendant in a personal injury action brought by a store customer who allegedly suffered back injuries when a shelf display collapsed on him. It was plain error to preclude the plaintiff from asking his medical experts whether he experienced a trauma to his back.

United States v. Baez, 703 F.2d 453 (10th Cir. 1983) : In a drug conspiracy case, the Court found plain error in a statement by the Trial Judge to the jury that two codefendants had pleaded guilty.

[d] Rule 103(d) -- Relationship to Harmless Error

United States v. Armijo, 5 F.3d 1229 (9th Cir. 1993) : The Court held it was plain error in a drug prosecution to admit a prior inconsistent statement not given under oath without a limiting instruction, but the error did not affect substantial rights, so there was no authority to correct it.

Rule 103(d)-- Stipulation

United States v. McGill, 952 F.2d 16 (1st Cir. 1991) : The Court held there was no plain error where the jury was permitted to view a three-hour film in its entirety pursuant to a stipulation of the parties. The film depicted an incident allegedly imitated by the defendant guard when he shot an inmate, and the defendant had apparently not wished the jury to see the relevant scene in isolation.

[f] Rule 103(d) -- Waiver

United States v. Sanchez-Berrios, 424 F.3d 65 (1st Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed convictions for cocaine-related crimes and firearms offenses, finding no plain error in the admission of coconspirator statements. The Court addressed the "threshold issue" of "the distinction between waiver and forfeiture" as follows:

> A party waives a right when he intentionally relinquishes or abandons it. This is to be distinguished from a situation in which a party fails to make a timely assertion of a right -- what courts typically call a "forfeiture." The difference is critical: a waived issue cannot be resurrected on appeal, whereas a forfeited issue may be reviewed for plain error.

Rejecting the argument that the hearsay issue was so obvious that the defendants' failure to object constituted a waiver, the Court stated that in the absence of "extraordinary circumstances -- and none are present here -- a party who does not object to an evidentiary ruling has forfeited his claim of error, not waived it." In a securities and common-law fraud action, Willco Kuwait (Trading) S.A.K. v. deSavary, n42 the Court held that the Kuwait oil company had waived any objection to redirect testimony by the financier who it had sued, by failing to object when it elicited similar testimony on cross-examination.

United States v. Yu-Leung, 51 F.3d 1116 (2d Cir. 1995) : The defendant's codefendants in a narcotics conspiracy pleaded guilty and testified against him at trial, without objection, to acts of drug-dealing and murder that the witnesses had committed after the defendant was thrown out of the conspiracy. On appeal, the defendant argued that the introduction of these bad acts was plain error. The Court, however, distinguished the forfeiture of an objection, which permits plain error review, from the waiver of an objection, which extinguishes the claim of error altogether. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 103.02[4].

United States v. Hall, 845 F.2d 1281 (5th Cir. 1988) : In a prosecution for forging an endorsement on a stolen treasury check, the Court held that the defendant not only failed to object to the victim's testimony concerning what a "surprise witness" might say, but also opened the door to the victim's testimony when it cross-examined the victim about this witness.

United States v. Cowart, 90 F.3d 154 (6th Cir. 1996) : In a drug prosecution, the government gave notice of its intent to introduce evidence of the defendant's drug activity occurring after the events that were the subject of the instant trial. The defendant did not object to this evidence, and even took the stand and admitted that he was involved in the other drug incident. The Court saw this as a stratagem, i.e., "to enable the defense to argue that since Cowart testified and readily admitted, on direct examination, his guilt of the Florida incident, he must have also testified truthfully when he denied his guilt with respect to the Tennessee incident for which he was on trial." Under these circumstances, the defendant would not be allowed to use "his appeal rights to evade that strategy's ultimate failure." Thus, even though the admission of the evidence under Rule 404(b) might have been erroneous, the Court found the point to be waived.

United States v. Dysart, 705 F.2d 1247 (10th Cir. 1983) : In a prosecution for threatening the life of the President, the Trial Judge permitted the government's expert to rely on statements made in a pretrial competency examination. Admission of the evidence violated the governing statute and possibly the Fifth Amendment, but defense counsel was aware of the statute and chose to cross-examine extensively on the background material related by the doctor. In light of the defense strategy and the absence of a specific objection, the Court refused to consider on appeal the claim that the expert impermissibly relied on statements made in the competency examination.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article I. General Provisions
CHAPTER 103 RULE 103

1-103 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual § 103.04

§ 103.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Advisory Committee's Note

Subdivision (a) states the law as generally accepted today. Rulings on evidence cannot be assigned as error unless (1) a substantial right is affected, and (2) the nature of the error was called to the attention of the judge, so as to alert him to the proper course of action and enable opposing counsel to take proper corrective measures. The objection and the offer of proof are the techniques for accomplishing these objectives. For similar provisions see Uniform Rules 4 and 5; California Evidence Code §§ 353 and 354; Kansas Code of Civil Procedure §§ 60-404 and 60-405. The rule does not purport to change the law with respect to harmless error. See 28 U.S.C. § 2111, F.R. Civ. P. 61, F.R. Crim. P. 52, and decisions construing them. The status of constitutional error as harmless or not is treated in Chapman v. California, 386 U.S. 18, 87 S. Ct. 824, 17 L. Ed. 2d 705 (1967) , reh. denied, id. 987, 87 S. Ct. 1283 (1967).

Subdivision (b). The first sentence is the third sentence of Rule 43(c) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure virtually verbatim. Its purpose is to reproduce for an appellate court, insofar as possible, a true reflection of what occurred in the trial court. The second sentence is in part derived from the final sentence of Rule 43(c). It is designed to resolve doubts as to what testimony the witness would have in fact given, and, in nonjury cases, to provide the appellate court with material for a possible final disposition of the case in the event of reversal of a ruling which excluded evidence. See 5 Moore's Federal Practice § 43.11 (2d ed. 1968). Application is made discretionary in view of the practical impossibility of formulating a satisfactory rule in mandatory terms.

Subdivision (c). This subdivision proceeds on the supposition that a ruling which excludes evidence in a jury case is likely to be a pointless procedure if the excluded evidence nevertheless comes to the attention of the jury. Bruton v. United States, 389 U.S. 818, 88 S. Ct. 126, 19 L. Ed. 2d 70 (1968) . Rule 43(c) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure provides: "The court may require the offer to be made out of the hearing of the jury." In re McConnell, 370 U.S. 230, 82 S. Ct. 1288, 8 L. Ed. 2d 434 (1962) , left some doubt whether questions on which an offer is based must first be asked in the presence of the jury. The subdivision answers in the negative. The judge can foreclose a particular line of testimony and counsel can protect his record without a series of questions before the jury, designed at best to waste time and at worst "to waft into the jury box" the very matter sought to be excluded.

Subdivision (d). This wording of the plain error principle is from Rule 52(b) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. While judicial unwillingness to be constricted by mechanical breakdowns of the adversary system has been more pronounced in criminal cases, there is no scarcity of decisions to the same effect in civil cases. In general, see Campbell, Extent to Which Courts of Review Will Consider Questions Not Properly Raised and Preserved, 7 Wis. L. Rev. 91, 160 (1932); Vestal, Sua Sponte Consideration in Appellate Review, 27 Fordham L. Rev. 477 (1958-59); 64 Harv. L. Rev. 652 (1951). In the nature of things the application of the plain error rule will be more likely with respect to the admission of evidence than to exclusion, since failure to comply with normal requirements of offers of proof is likely to produce a record which simply does not disclose the error.

[2] 2000 Amendment Committee Note

2000 Amendment Committee Note

The amendment applies to all rulings on evidence whether they occur at or before trial, including so-called "in limine" rulings. One of the most difficult questions arising from in limine and other evidentiary rulings is whether a losing party must renew an objection or offer of proof when the evidence is or would be offered at trial, in order to preserve a claim of error on appeal. Courts have taken differing approaches to this question. Some courts have held that a renewal at the time the evidence is to be offered at trial is always required. See, e.g., Collins v. Wayne Corp., 621 F.2d 777 (5th Cir. 1980) . Some courts have taken a more flexible approach, holding that renewal is not required if the issue decided is one that (1) was fairly presented to the trial court for an initial ruling, (2) may be decided as a final matter before the evidence is actually offered, and (3) was ruled on definitively by the trial judge. See, e.g., Rosenfeld v. Basquiat, 78 F.3d 84 (2d Cir. 1996) (admissibility of former testimony under the Dead Man's Statute; renewal not required). Other courts have distinguished between objections to evidence, which must be renewed when evidence is offered, and offers of proof, which need not be renewed after a definitive determination is made that the evidence is inadmissible. See, e.g., Fusco v. General Motors Corp., 11 F.3d 259 (1st Cir. 1993) . Another court, aware of this Committee's proposed amendment, has adopted its approach. Wilson v. Williams, 182 F.3d 562 (7th Cir. 1999) (en banc). Differing views on this question create uncertainty for litigants and unnecessary work for the appellate courts.

The amendment provides that a claim of error with respect to a definitive ruling is preserved for review when the party has otherwise satisfied the objection or offer of proof requirements of Rule 103(a). When the ruling is definitive, a renewed objection or offer of proof at the time the evidence is to be offered is more a formalism than a necessity. See Fed.R.Civ.P. 46 (formal exceptions unnecessary); Fed.R.Cr.P. 51 (same); United States v. Mejia-Alarcon, 995 F.2d 982, 986 (10th Cir. 1993) ("Requiring a party to renew an objection when the district court has issued a definitive ruling on a matter that can be fairly decided before trial would be in the nature of a formal exception and therefore unnecessary."). On the other hand, when the trial court appears to have reserved its ruling or to have indicated that the ruling is provisional, it makes sense to require the party to bring the issue to the court's attention subsequently. See, e.g., United States v. Vest, 116 F.3d 1179, 1188 (7th Cir. 1997) (where the trial court ruled in limine that testimony from defense witnesses could not be admitted, but allowed the defendant to seek leave at trial to call the witnesses should their testimony turn out to be relevant, the defendant's failure to seek such leave at trial meant that it was "too late to reopen the issue now on appeal"); United States v. Valenti, 60 F.3d 941 (2d Cir. 1995) (failure to proffer evidence at trial waives any claim of error where the trial judge had stated that he would reserve judgment on the in limine motion until he had heard the trial evidence).

The amendment imposes the obligation on counsel to clarify whether an in limine or other evidentiary ruling is definitive when there is doubt on that point. See, e.g., Walden v. Georgia-Pacific Corp., 126 F.3d 506, 520 (3d Cir. 1997) (although "the district court told plaintiffs' counsel not to reargue every ruling, it did not countermand its clear opening statement that all of its rulings were tentative, and counsel never requested clarification, as he might have done.").

Even where the court's ruling is definitive, nothing in the amendment prohibits the court from revisiting its decision when the evidence is to be offered. If the court changes its initial ruling, or if the opposing party violates the terms of the initial ruling, objection must be made when the evidence is offered to preserve the claim of error for appeal. The error if any in such a situation occurs only when the evidence is offered and admitted. United States Aviation Underwriters, Inc. v. Olympia Wings, Inc., 896 F.2d 949, 956 (5th Cir. 1990) ("objection is required to preserve error when an opponent, or the court itself, violates a motion in limine that was granted"); United States v. Roenigk, 810 F.2d 809 (8th Cir. 1987) (claim of error was not preserved where the defendant failed to object at trial to secure the benefit of a favorable advance ruling).

A definitive advance ruling is reviewed in light of the facts and circumstances before the trial court at the time of the ruling. If the relevant facts and circumstances change materially after the advance ruling has been made, those facts and circumstances cannot be relied upon on appeal unless they have been brought to the attention of the trial court by way of a renewed, and timely, objection, offer of proof, or motion to strike. See Old Chief v. United States, 519 U.S. 172, 182, n.6 (1997) ("It is important that a reviewing court evaluate the trial court's decision from its perspective when it had to rule and not indulge in review by hindsight."). Similarly, if the court decides in an advance ruling that proffered evidence is admissible subject to the eventual introduction by the proponent of a foundation for the evidence, and that foundation is never provided, the opponent cannot claim error based on the failure to establish the foundation unless the opponent calls that failure tothe court's attention by a timely motion to strike or other suitable motion. See Huddleston v. United States, 485 U.S. 681, 690, n.7 (1988) ("It is, of course, not the responsibility of the judge sua sponte to ensure that the foundation evidence is offered; the objector must move to strike the evidence if at the close of the trial the offeror has failed to satisfy the condition.").

Nothing in the amendment is intended to affect the provisions of Fed.R.Civ.P. 72(a) or 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1), pertaining to nondispositive pretrial rulings by magistrate judges in proceedings that are not before a magistrate judge by consent of the parties. Fed.R.Civ.P. 72(a) provides that a party who fails to file a written objection to a magistrate judge's nondispositive order within ten days of receiving a copy "may not thereafter assign as error a defect" in the order. 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1) provides that any party "may serve and file written objections to such proposed findings and recommendations as provided by rules of court" within ten days of receiving a copy of the order. Several courts have held that a party must comply with this statutory provision in order to preserve a claim of error. See, e.g., Wells v. Shriners Hospital, 109 F.3d 198, 200 (4th Cir. 1997) ("[i]n this circuit, as in others, a party 'may' file objections within ten days or he may not, as he chooses, but he 'shall' do so if he wishes further consideration."). When Fed.R.Civ.P. 72(a) or 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1) is operative, its requirement must be satisfied in order for a party to preserve a claim of error on appeal, even where Evidence Rule 103(a) would not require a subsequent objection or offer of proof.

Nothing in the amendment is intended to affect the rule set forth in Luce v. United States, 469 U.S. 38 (1984) , and its progeny. The amendment provides that an objection or offer of proof need not be renewed to preserve a claim of error with respect to a definitive pretrial ruling. Luce answers affirmatively a separate question: whether a criminal defendant must testify at trial in order to preserve a claim of error predicated upon a trial court's decision to admit the defendant's prior convictions for impeachment. The Luce principle has been extended by many lower courts to other situations. See United States v. DiMatteo, 759 F.2d 831 (11th Cir. 1985) (applying Luce where the defendant's witness would be impeached with evidence offered under Rule 608). See also United States v. Goldman, 41 F.3d 785, 788 (1st Cir. 1994) ("Although Luce involved impeachment by conviction under Rule 609, the reasons given by the Supreme Court for requiring the defendant to testify apply with full force to the kind of Rule 403 and 404 objections that are advanced by Goldman in this case."); Palmieri v. DeFaria, 88 F.3d 136 (2d Cir. 1996) (where the plaintiff decided to take an adverse judgment rather than challenge an advance ruling by putting on evidence at trial, the in limine ruling would not be reviewed on appeal); United States v. Ortiz, 857 F.2d 900 (2d Cir. 1988) (where uncharged misconduct is ruled admissible if the defendant pursues a certain defense, the defendant must actually pursue that defense at trial in order to preserve a claim of error on appeal); United States v. Bond, 87 F.3d 695 (5th Cir. 1996) (where the trial court rules in limine that the defendant would waive his fifth amendment privilege were he to testify, the defendant must take the stand and testify in order to challenge that ruling on appeal).

The amendment does not purport to answer whether a party who objects to evidence that the court finds admissible in a definitive ruling, and who then offers the evidence to "remove the sting" of its anticipated prejudicial effect, thereby waives the right to appeal the trial court's ruling. See, e.g., United States v. Fisher, 106 F.3d 622 (5th Cir. 1997) (where the trial judge ruled in limine that the government could use a prior conviction to impeach the defendant if he testified, the defendant did not waive his right to appeal by introducing the conviction on direct examination); Judd v. Rodman, 105 F.3d 1339 (11th Cir. 1997) (an objection made in limine is sufficient to preserve a claim of error when the movant, as a matter of trial strategy, presents the objectionable evidence herself on direct examination to minimize its prejudicial effect); Gill v. Thomas, 83 F.3d 537, 540 (1st Cir. 1996) ("by offering the misdemeanor evidence himself, Gill waived his opportunity to object and thus did not preserve the issue for appeal"); United States v. Williams, 939 F.2d 721 (9th Cir. 1991) (objection to impeachment evidence was waived where the defendant was impeached on direct examination).

[3] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

The Rules submitted by the Court used the terms "judge" and "court" interchangeably. The Subcommittee determined that the term "court" should be preferred unless plainly inappropriate in the context of a rule since "court" has the advantage of including cases tried by multi-judge courts. Amendments of "judge" to "court" with concomitant changes in pronoun references appear throughout the Rules.

[4] Report of the House and Senate Conferences

The House bill contains the word "judge." The Senate amendment substitutes the word "court" in order to conform with usage elsewhere in the House bill.

The Conference adopts the Senate amendment.

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 103, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

(e) Taking Notice of Plain Error. A court may take notice of a plain error affecting a substantial right, even if the claim of error was not properly preserved.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 103 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Article I. General Provisions
Supp. To CHAPTER 103 RULE 103

1-103 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 103.03

Supp. to § 103.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[1] Rule 103(a) -- Effect of Erroneous Ruling [Go To Main]

[c] Rule 103(a) -- Explanation for Proffer of Excluded Evidence

United States v. DeSimone, 488 F.3d 561 (1st Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a tax fraud conviction, finding no plain error in the exclusion of a witness' testimony. The Judge had sustained a hearsay objection, and the defense provided no specific basis for overruling the objection until after the trial.

[e] Rule 103(a) -- In Limine Rulings

[i] Rule 103(a) -- Appealability -- Requirement that Witness Testify and Other Conditions Precedent

United States v. Gunter, 551 F.3d 472 (6th Cir. 2009) : Affirming narcotics convictions, the Court held that the defendant failed to preserve a claim of error on the Judge's ruling that if he testified, the government could introduce his prior conviction for impeachment. The defendant did not testify at trial and, on appeal, argued that he was deprived of his constitutional right to testify. The Court noted that the "admissibility of a prior conviction is not appealable where a defendant does not testify." Additionally, there is no constitutional deprivation where a rule merely "deters" a defendant from taking the stand and does not actually "prevent" him from doing so.

United States v. LeCroy, 441 F.3d 914 (11th Cir. 2006) : In the sentencing phase of a prosecution for aggravated carjacking, an in limine ruling provided that if defense experts gave opinions about the defendant's mental condition, the government might be permitted to present rebuttal evidence that included portions of a sealed report of a psychiatric evaluation by experts for the government. The Court held that because the defense decided not to elicit the opinions, the in limine ruling was not appealable.

[i.1] Rule 103(a) -- In Limine Rulings -- Definitive Ruling

United States v. Parish, 606 F.3d 480 (8th Cir. 2010) : In a prosecution for drug offenses, the defense indicated before trial that it would ask police about an alleged beating when the defendant was arrested, and the government moved in limine to preclude such questions before the defendant had testified to his having been beaten and raised those allegations as part of his defense. To forestall an argument to the jury based on the content of cross-examination questions, the Judge ruled that there should be some foundation established before the officers were cross-examined on the alleged beating. The Judge further stated that "as things go along, and if foundation can be established for the admission of this stuff, that's a whole other issue. For right now, I'm not going to get into it, especially during voir dire or opening statements." The alleged beating was never raised during the government's case-in-chief, although officers testified about the circumstances of the arrest. On appeal, the defendant claimed that he had been erroneously limited in questioning the police during the government's case-in-chief. Affirming, the Court held that the in limine ruling had been "'definitive' only in the sense that it applied to voir dire and opening statements and not to the offer of testimony or evidence during the trial." Because the question of later admission of the evidence as the trial record developed was left open, there was no abuse of discretion in the ruling, and the defendant had been provided the opportunity to present to the jury all the evidence supporting his story.

[f] Rule 103(a) -- In Limine Rulings Admitting Evidence -- Appealability

[i] Rule 103(a) -- Evidence Introduced by Opponent

United States v. El-Alamin, 574 F.3d 915 (8th Cir. 2009) : Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court held that because the defendant had introduced his prior convictions, he waived his right to appeal the Judge's denial of his motion in limine to exclude evidence of the convictions.

[iii] Rule 103(a) -- In Limine Rulings Admitting Evidence -- Appealability -- Renewing Objections

[B] Rule 103(a) -- In Limine Rulings Admitting Evidence -- Appealability -- Renewing Objections -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Whitney, 524 F.3d 134 (1st Cir. 2008) : Affirming a conviction for making a false statement to a firearms dealer while attempting to purchase a firearm, the Court found no plain error in the admission of evidence that the defendant was arrested for violating the protective order that resulted in the charge (since defendant signed a form stating that he was not under any protective order). The Court used the plain error standard of review because it determined that the Trial Judge made no definitive pretrial ruling on the defendant's motion to exclude the evidence, and the defendant did not renew his objection when the evidence was introduced at trial. The Judge stated at the pretrial hearing a willingness to entertain any stipulation that the parties would agree to and encouraged the parties to discuss the matter. Therefore the ruling "was preliminary and subject to change in light of further negotiations by the parties or the trial evidence."

United States v. Atchley, 474 F.3d 840 (6th Cir. 2007) : When the defendant objected to the admission of flight evidence at a pretrial conference, the Judge responded: "I think that if there is evidence of flight ... I will allow the evidence in" but "I'm not going to give a flight charge until I hear what the evidence in the case is." When the flight evidence was admitted at trial, the defendant did not object. The Court held that the objection at the pretrial conference was not sufficient to preserve the right to appeal the admission of the flight evidence, since the Judge had merely stated that a ruling would await the trial.

United States v. Jumper, 497 F.3d 699 (7th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed marijuana convictions, holding that the defendant preserved for appeal the issue whether it was an abuse of discretion to admit portions of a videotape of the defendant's postarrest interrogation. The defendant had moved in limine to exclude the evidence and the Trial Judge had made a definitive ruling rejecting the motion. Moreover, before the agent testified, defense counsel requested and obtained a ruling that he preserved his objection. In United States v. McMahan, 495 F.3d 410 (7th Cir. 2007) , vacated for reconsideration of sentencing, 128 S. Ct. 917 (2008) , the Court affirmed drug-related convictions, finding no plain error when a government witness was permitted to testify to the wiretap procedures that were employed in investigating the defendants. The defendants had not objected to the testimony at trial, but they argued that they preserved the error by objecting to an in limine ruling by the Trial Judge. The Court held that the in limine objection did not preserve the claim of error: "[T]he government's motion in limine, which sought to preclude testimony regarding the legality of the wiretap, does not preserve for the defense an objection to testimony regarding the process for obtaining a wiretap order."

United States v. Commanche, 577 F.3d 1261 (10th Cir. 2009) : The Court reversed a conviction for assault with intent to do bodily harm arising from a fight in which the defendant, who claimed self-defense, used a box cutter. The defendant, who had twice been convicted of aggravated battery after altercations in which he brandished sharp cutting instruments, moved in limine to exclude the details of his convictions if they were admitted pursuant to Rule 609, but did not renew his objection when a conviction was admitted at trial. The Court reasoned that in most cases a Judge cannot do the balancing under Rule 609(a)(1) until trial and thus the defendant's failure to renew an objection at trial meant that he could only have plain error review. Here, there was plain error in the ruling admitting the details of the convictions: "That Commanche was twice convicted of aggravated battery was properly admissible. That the crimes involved cutting instruments consistent with the box cutter used in the present case was not." In United States v. Franklin-El, 555 F.3d 1115 (10th Cir. 2009) , the Court, affirming convictions for health care fraud, reviewed the admission of evidence of wrongful receipt of welfare benefits only for plain error because the Judge had reserved ruling on the defendant's motion in limine and had instructed counsel to object to the issue at the appropriate time, but no objection was made. The Court found no plain error.

[g] Rule 103(a) -- In Limine Rulings Excluding Evidence -- Appealability

United States v. Jackson, 540 F.3d 578 (7th Cir. 2008) : In a prosecution for bank fraud arising from a scheme by bank employees to create false mortgage documents, one of the conspirators implicated another in her guilty plea proffer and her plea hearing, but then recanted the incriminating testimony just before the trial. The Judge granted a government motion to preclude the defense from presenting evidence of the recantation and ruled that it was not admissible under Rule 804(b)(3) because of insufficient corroborating circumstances. Affirming, the Court noted that only one of three defendants sought admission of the recanting statements; as to that defendant the Court would review the ruling below for abuse of discretion. A second defendant had actually objected to their admission, so she had waived her right to challenge their exclusion, which precluded any appellate review as to her. The third had not addressed the evidence; that was a forfeiture of his right to challenge exclusion, so he was entitled to only plain error review. The Court found neither plain error nor abuse of discretion in the Judge's ruling. In United States v. Clark, 538 F.3d 803 (7th Cir. 2008) , a drug conspiracy case, the defendant wanted to admit a photo that he claimed showed a prosecution witness making a hand gesture that was a gang signal. The prosecution and the witness disputed the defendant's characterization. The Judge ruled that the photo could not be admitted on cross-examination of the witness, but that the defendant could revisit it if he testified -- as defense counsel insisted that the defendant would testify and that he could lay a proper foundation by stating that the witness's hand gesture in the photo was a gang signal. But the defendant never testified. On appeal, the Court held that the claim of error in exclusion of the photo was not preserved. "When a district court indicates that a final evidentiary ruling must await developments at trial, the party must reoffer the evidence at trial to preserve the issue for appeal." The Court reviewed for plain error and found none.

[h] Rule 103(a) -- Objections

[i] Rule 103(a) -- Acquiescence in Ruling

United States v. Clark, 538 F.3d 803 (7th Cir. 2008) : In a drug conspiracy case, the government offered evidence of the defendant's prior drug dealings. To the surprise of the Trial Judge, defense counsel agreed to the admission of the evidence and expressed his intent to expand on it in order to establish what he referred to as "the patsy defense." On appeal, the defendant argued that it was error to admit the prior drug dealings. The Court found that the right to appeal the Court's ruling had been waived, and therefore the defendant's arguments would not be considered at all. The Court noted that "[w]aiver occurs when a criminal defendant intentionally relinquishes a known right. Forfeiture, on the other hand, occurs when a defendant negligently fails to assert a right in a timely fashion. Waiver extinguishes any error and precludes appellate review, while forfeiture warrants review for plain error only. When a defendant elects to pursue one argument over another as a matter of strategy, he waives those arguments he decided not to present."

[ii] Rule 103(a) -- Objections -- Adequate in Context

United States v. Carpenter, 494 F.3d 13 (1st Cir. 2007) : The Court held that objections to arguments made by the prosecutor in closing were properly preserved even though the defendant failed to lodge a specific objection until after the jury had delivered its verdict. The defendant had continually and specifically objected, both in limine and at trial, to the admission of the evidence upon which the prosecutor was commenting in closing argument. The Court relied on the 2000 amendment to Rule 103, which provides that an objection need not be renewed if the Trial Court's initial ruling is definitive; in this case, the Judge had definitively ruled admissible the evidence on which the prosecutor was commenting in closing argument. The Judge had considered the defendant's objection to be properly preserved, and the Court concluded that it should defer to the preservation ruling, since "it is certainly the trial judge who is in the best position to decide if she sufficiently understood that an objection had been made and the grounds for it."

[iv] Rule 103(a) -- Objections -- Evidentiary Objections Insufficient To Preserve Constitutional Claims

United States v. Baker, 432 F.3d 1189 (11th Cir. 2005) : The Court held that a hearsay objection did not preserve a claim that admission of hearsay violated the defendant's right to confrontation.

[v] Rule 103(a) -- Objections -- Failure To Object

King v. Harrington, 447 F.3d 531 (7th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a judgment for the defendant in a negligence action arising from an intersection collision, the Court found no abuse of discretion in refusing to permit a traffic officer to offer an opinion as to the cause of the accident, where he was not present at the time of the accident and testified that he had no independent recollection beyond what was in his accident report. The accident report was admitted into evidence, but an opinion as to the cause of the accident was redacted. The plaintiffs had agreed to the redaction, so they could not claim on appeal that the redaction was erroneous. In Naeem v. Mckesson Drug Co., 444 F.3d 593 (7th Cir. 2006) , the Court, affirming a judgment for a discharged female employee who claimed intentional infliction of emotional distress, held that the defendants had waived their objection that an expert for the plaintiff improperly provided "a legal interpretation and application of a federal regulation." The defendants had not objected to the expert's testimony at trial and had asserted the ground only in their post-verdict motions. Although they had moved in limine before trial to exclude the expert's testimony, they had not asserted improper opinions on law as a basis for that motion.

In re Hanford Nuclear Reservation Litig., 534 F.3d 986, 1013 (9th Cir. 2008) : In the trial of claims by bellwether plaintiffs alleging that radioiodine emissions by plutonium producers at a nuclear facility caused cancers and other life-threatening diseases, the expert for one of the plaintiffs gave testimony that his thyroid contained Hurthle cells, which are indicative of some kind of injury to the thyroid, although the expert's pretrial report contained no evidence regarding Hurthle cells. Defense counsel did not object to the testimony, but when the jury asked during deliberations whether it could consider the Hurthle cell evidence even though it was not in the expert's report, the Judge instructed the jury to disregard the evidence. The Court held the ruling was reversible error, since rarely may evidence be excluded after the close of the parties' cases: they no longer have a chance to provide a curative response to the excluded evidence or to present the testimony in another fashion, and "it is impossible to erase from the jury's minds any arguments that were made during closing summation about the belatedly-excluded evidence."

[vii] Rule 103(a) -- Objections -- Incorrect Specific Objections

United States v. Diaz, 597 F.3d 56 (1st Cir. 2010) : Affirming a conviction for conspiring to engage in the sexual trafficking of children, the Court held that the defendant failed to preserve a hearsay objection to a minor's statement, as he objected at trial only to its relevance. In United States v. Colon-Diaz, 521 F.3d 29 (1st Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed drug convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting a hearsay statement by the defendant's coconspirator. The defendant argued on appeal that the government had not established a sufficient foundation that there was a conspiracy between the defendant and the declarant. But at trial, the defendant only objected to the statement on the ground that it was not in furtherance of the conspiracy. Thus, this was the only error preserved for appeal. The Court found no plain error in the ruling that the foundation requirement for the existence of a conspiracy was satisfied.

United States v. Seale, 600 F.3d 473 (5th Cir. 2010) : In the prosecution of a fatal kidnapping committed in 1964, the defendant objected to the admission of his confession made that year on the ground that it did not comply with the standards applicable before the Miranda decision in 1966, and repeated that argument in his appellate brief. Only in his reply brief did he argue the Miranda standards, which the Supreme Court has held applicable to trials after that decision. Affirming, the Court of Appeals treated the objection to admissibility as insufficiently specific and a failure to preserve the objection based on Miranda, thus entitling the defendant only to plain error review.

United States v. Schalk, 515 F.3d 768 (7th Cir. 2008) , The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to distribute marijuana and cocaine. The defendant's challenge to the admission of notebooks was reviewed for plain error only, because at trial the defendant argued that the ledgers were inadmissible under Rule 403, while on appeal he argued they were hearsay. In United States v. Eberhart, 467 F.3d 659 (7th Cir. 2006) , the court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to distribute cocaine, holding that an objection to introduction of tape recordings on the ground that "there was no adequate foundation in terms of showing that the equipment had been tested and functioning properly" was inadequate to preserve the defendant's appellate objection that the tapes were not true and accurate recordings of the conversations. The Court noted that a "foundation" objection is usually not specific enough to preserve an alleged error on appeal, and an objection concerning the equipment would not have alerted the Judge to the objection being asserted on appeal. Therefore, admission of the tapes was reviewed only for plain error.

[viii] Rule 103(a) -- Objections -- Insufficiently Specific Objections

United States v. Vargas, 471 F.3d 255 (1st Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for making a false passport application, the Court held that the defense had not preserved error regarding the sufficiency of facts or the reliability of an expert witness' fingerprint identification. Although three objections were made to the expert's testimony, the first went to only to his qualifications; the second was only a general objection following a lengthy cross-examination covering many subjects, including the witness' qualifications, the methods he employed and records he kept, the accuracy of fingerprint analysis generally, and his knowledge of statistical studies on the reliability of fingerprint identification; and the third again addressed his qualifications and the scientific foundation of fingerprint analysis. None of the objections called the Judge's attention to the witness' data (one of the comparisons was to a faxed copy) or to his application of analysis methods, so admission of his testimony was reviewed only for plain error.

United States v. Phillips, 596 F.3d 414 (7th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for Medicaid fraud, finding that the defendant had forfeited a claim that the Trial Judge erred in denying her motion to exclude a redacted audio recording without having reviewed the complete version first. The defendant had moved to exclude the evidence only on the ground that it was redacted, and there is no rule requiring the Judge to review a complete recording before admitting a redacted version into evidence. The Court found no plain error in admitting the redacted version, noting that even if it told an incomplete story, the proper remedy would be to supplement it under Rule 106, not exclude it. In Griffin v. Foley, 542 F.3d 209 (7th Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in a medical malpractice case, holding that an in limine motion to bar the defendant from introducing in his case in chief any medical article or treatise that was not disclosed before trial did not preserve the plaintiff's claim that a defense expert's testimony regarding his general recollection regarding the support in the medical literature (without reference to specific articles) of a particular procedure was improper because the literature had not been disclosed before trial. In United States v. Eberhart, 467 F.3d 659 (7th Cir. 2006) , the Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to distribute cocaine, holding that an objection to introduction of tape recordings on the ground that "there was no adequate foundation in terms of showing that the equipment had been tested and functioning properly" was inadequate to preserve the defendant's appellate objection that the tapes were not true and accurate recordings of the conversations. The Court noted that a "foundation" objection is usually not specific enough to preserve an alleged error on appeal, and an objection concerning the equipment would not have alerted the Judge to the objection being asserted on appeal. Therefore, admission of the tapes was reviewed only for plain error.

United States v. Phillips, 543 F.3d 1197 (10th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed convictions for immigration fraud, finding no abuse of discretion when a copy of a document was admitted as a duplicate under Rule 1003. A defendant argued on appeal that there was a question as to the copy's authenticity; however, at trial he objected to the document's admission only because it was a copy, without making any objection to its authenticity.

[x] Rule 103(a) -- Objections -- Sufficiently Specific Objections

Hudson v. Dist. of Columbia, 558 F.3d 526 (D.C. Cir. 2009) : Reversing a judgment for an arrestee who sued for excessive force, the Court found it was error to admit evidence that the arresting officer had previously been disciplined for misconduct involving other arrestees, and then to allow the plaintiff's counsel to argue to the jury that the misconduct showed that the officer was a "bad cop" and would always be a bad cop. The plaintiff argued that the defendant had not preserved an objection under Rule 404(b), but the Court disagreed. During the bench conference regarding the prior discipline, defense counsel asked the Judge: "Is this evidence of prior misconduct to show on this particular date that he is inconsistent [sic]? That's not allowed by the rules." The Court noted that "[w]hile the phrasing may have been somewhat inartful (and perhaps mistranscribed), it was stated with enough specificity to alert the district court and opposing counsel to the basis for the objection, namely that the examination violated Rule 404(b)."

[xi] Rule 103(a) -- Objections -- Timing of Objection

Hill v. Principi, 439 F.3d 18 (1st Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the Department of Veterans Affairs in an action by a psychiatrist who resigned her employment after being assigned additional duties, which she claimed violated the Rehabilitation Act. It held that the plaintiff failed to object in a timely fashion to the defense expert testimony, where she waited to object until moments before the witness was to testify despite having received the witness' report five months earlier. The Court noted that "because Daubert generally contemplates a 'gatekeeping' function, not a 'gotcha' function, untimely Daubert motions should be considered only in rare circumstances."

Jerden v. Amstutz, 430 F.3d 1231 (9th Cir. 2005) : The Court reversed a judgment for the defendant in a medical malpractice action, finding it was an abuse of discretion to strike testimony by an expert witness for the plaintiff. The defendant's objection that the expert lacked the required knowledge of professional standards in the locality or a similar community was not made until two days after the expert finished testifying. The objection was untimely, and the foundational flaw likely could have been repaired if the defendant had disclosed the basis for his objection while the expert was still on the stand and available to amplify his testimony.

[i] Rule 103(a) -- Offers of Proof

[i] Rule 103(a) -- Basic Requirement

[A] Rule 103(a) -- Civil Cases

Harris v. Chand, 506 F.3d 1135 (8th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the employer in a Title VII race discrimination action, finding no abuse of discretion in the Trial Judge's placing time limits on the presentation of the plaintiff's case and no plain error when plaintiff was not able to call witnesses due to the time limit. The plaintiff made no objection when the Judge said her time was up nor offer of proof as to the testimony that she was unable to present. The Court observed that time limits imposed before trial must be sufficiently flexible to accommodate adjustments if it appears during trial that the limits were too restrictive, and that when there is an objection to the exclusion of evidence as a result of time limits the Judge must explain the exclusion. A dissenting Judge argued that the Trial Judge "placed an impermissibly rigid time constraint on the plaintiff's case" and that the plaintiff had attempted to make offers of proof but was not permitted to do so.

[ii] Rule 103(a) -- Offers of Proof -- Cross-Examination

United States v. Crockett, 435 F.3d 1305 (10th Cir. 2006) : In a prosecution for tax fraud, the Judge refused to allow cross-examination of a witness about the tax advice she received from a third party. The government objected that the cross-examination was beyond the scope of the direct, and defense counsel did not explain the relevance of the cross-examination. Because defense counsel failed to reveal the content of the evidence he expected to adduce, the Court reviewed the ruling for plain error and found none.

[iii] Rule 103(a) -- Offers of Proof -- Expert Testimony

United States v. Ganier, 468 F.3d 920 (6th Cir. 2006) : In a prosecution for obstruction of justice arising from deletion of computer files subpoenaed by a grand jury, testimony from Drueck, a forensic computer specialist who would have testified regarding manipulation of the defendant's computer files, was excluded as a discovery sanction on the ground that the defense had not been provided with a written summary of the testimony (see Fed. R. Crim. P. 16(a)(1)(G)). On interlocutory appeal the defendant argued that the ruling should be reviewed for plain error because the government had not made an offer of proof of Drueck's testimony in accordance with Rule 103(a). The government had, however, explained in general terms what Drueck would testify to, the analysis he had performed, and how it was relevant to the proceedings. The Court held that although the government did not make a formal offer of proof, the government's presentation was sufficient to preserve its claim of error. Much of the proposed testimony was brought out in arguments on the motion from both sides; and the Judge had copies of the reports generated by the forensic software. The Court noted, however, that the government "would have been well advised to make a formal offer of proof, as the district court was left to discern the substance of Drueck's testimony from Ganier's written motion and the parties' arguments the next morning." On the merits, the Court found a discovery violation but held that exclusion of the witness was an excessive sanction.

[iii.1] Rule 103(a) -- Offers of Proof -- Informal Offer

United States v. Kay, 513 F.3d 432 (5th Cir. 2007) : In a fraud case, the government objected to the admission of certain tax receipts on the ground of inadequate authentication. The Trial Judge excluded the records and the government argued on appeal that the defendants had not made an offer of proof sufficient to preserve a claim of error. The Court, however, found that "a formal offer of proof was not necessary here." It explained that "[b]y explaining to the court the substance of the proffered evidence (receipts indicating tax payments that Defendants made after shipments were complete) and why the court should admit these documents (describing how the documents had been 'subscribed and sworn -- and certified by the United States vice counsel'), Defendants made a sufficient 'informal' offer of proof." The Court concluded that the records were properly excluded and affirmed the conviction.

[iii.2] Rule 103(a) -- Offers of Proof -- Offer Insufficient

United States v. Gregg, 451 F.3d 930 (8th Cir. 2006) : Affirming convictions arising from a murder on an Indian reservation, the Court found no error when evidence of specific acts of violence committed by the victim on other occasions was excluded. Although specific act evidence is inadmissible if offered to prove that the victim was violent and therefore acted aggressively on the occasion in question, the defendant argued that it should have been admitted for a non-character purpose, i.e., to establish the defendant's fear of the victim. The defendant's offer of proof stated that the defendant "would have testified that he believed [the victim] was tougher than he was, that he's not a person that he would want to have a fight with, that in his experience [the victim] could have beaten him up, and that he would not have wanted to have an ongoing feud with [the victim]." The Court held that this offer of proof was insufficient to establish admissibility of the victim's violent conduct to prove the defendant's state of mind, since it identified no specific instances of the victim's violent conduct, "let alone any instances known by Gregg at the time of the shooting."

[3] Rule 103(d) -- Plain Error [Go To Main]

[a] Rule 103(d) -- Definition of Plain Error

United States v. James, 464 F.3d 699 (7th Cir. 2006) : In a prosecution for drug and firearm offenses, evidence of other acts was admitted on the government's mistaken representation that they occurred only a few days after the charged crimes and were "intricately related" thereto. In fact, the other acts took place a month later, but the defendant did not object to the admission of the evidence on Rule 404(b) grounds until the appeal. Affirming, the Court held that it was error to admit the evidence, since the story of the crime was complete on the date of its occurrence, the subsequent acts did nothing to explain the circumstances of the charged offenses nor to prove any element of the charged conduct, and the only link between the later acts and the charged offenses was propensity. However, the error was not "plain error," as required when no timely objection was made, because the defendant could not demonstrate that the outcome probably would have been different without the error.

[b.1] Rule 103(d) -- Effect of Failure To Object When Rule Requires Findings of Fact

United States v. Shoup, 476 F.3d 38 (1st Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no plain error in the admission of a 911 call reporting that the defendant had a gun. The call had been admitted under the hearsay exceptions for present sense impressions and excited utterances. Both exceptions require some showing of a short amount of time between the event and the statement. The Court noted that by failing to make a contemporaneous objection, the defendant "precluded (thus relieved) the government from presenting its best evidence as to the time-lapse issue, and the district court from making the attendant findings of fact. For these reasons, we perceive no plain error."

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. -- Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

(b) Relevancy conditioned on fact. -- When the relevancy of evidence depends upon the fulfillment of a condition of fact, the court shall admit it upon, or subject to, the introduction of evidence sufficient to support a finding of the fulfillment of the condition.

(c) Hearing of jury. -- Hearings on the admissibility of confessions shall in all cases be conducted out of the hearing of the jury. Hearings on other preliminary matters shall be so conducted when the interests of justice require, or when an accused is a witness and so requests.

(d) Testimony by accused. -- The accused does not, by testifying upon a preliminary matter, become subject to cross-examination as to other issues in the case.

(e) Weight and credibility. -- This rule does not limit the right of a party to introduce before the jury evidence relevant to weight or credibility.

1-104 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 104.02

104.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Questions of Admissibility

Rule 104 allocates responsibility between the Judge and jury for deciding preliminary questions of fact upon which the admissibility of evidence depends. The Rule preserves the force of exclusionary rules of evidence by assuring that inadmissible evidence will not generally be brought before the jury. At the same time, the Rule assures that the jury will be the factfinder as to all substantive issues in the case.

The determination of whether certain evidence should be admitted at trial cannot be made until preliminary questions of fact are resolved. For example, if one party wants to introduce hearsay statements of a declarant, and the other party objects, some exception to the hearsay rule will have to be found. If the offering party claims that the statement is an excited utterance under Rule 803(2), the Court will have to determine whether the declarant spoke while under the influence of a startling event. Factfinding is necessary. Another example is an attempt by the prosecution in a criminal case to introduce evidence of a confession by the defendant. If the defendant claims that the confession was coerced, a finding of voluntariness will have to be made before the confession can be introduced. Once again, factfinding is required.

Rule 104 provides the general rule that it is the Trial Judge and not the jury who decides the preliminary questions of fact that condition the admissibility of evidence. There are a number of practical reasons for this allocation. First, one cannot expect jurors to exclude inadmissible evidence from their minds if they find that preliminary facts have not been established. For example, if the jury were to decide that a hearsay declarant was not under the influence of a startling event, it might still wish to consider the hearsay statement for its truth. Having been exposed to the hearsay statement, it would be difficult for jurors to exclude that statement from their minds on the technical ground that a preliminary fact had not been established. Second, allocating such preliminary questions to the jury would bog down the trial; Judges clearly can act more expeditiously with preliminary questions than can juries.

[2] "Competency" Distinguished From Conditional Relevance

Under Rule 104, the Trial Judge decides preliminary questions of fact relating to competency. Competency is a word of art that really stands for all of the technical rules of evidence. Competency is used in contradistinction to relevancy.

Suppose, for instance, a defendant is charged with receiving stolen property. The prosecution contends that the defendant was in Philadelphia on a given day. This fact may be relevant only if the stolen goods were also in Philadelphia on the same day; thus, the relevance of one piece of evidence depends on the existence of another piece. Since it is generally believed that the jury is capable of deciding the truth of both propositions equally well, it is thought that there is no reason to take either of these questions from the jury. The whole idea of a jury system is that the jury will apply logic and experience in reaching its conclusions, and will reject a conclusion unsupported by the evidence. The decision that must be made is one of connection, and the jurors can easily ignore the evidence if no connection is established. In our example, evidence that the defendant was in Philadelphia on a given day will be discarded by the jury if they do not find that the stolen goods were there as well. The role of the Trial Judge in these circumstances is merely to determine whether there is enough evidence for a reasonable juror to find each of the facts. n1

This is often referred to as connecting one piece of evidence up with another piece of evidence. If the connection cannot be made, then both pieces of evidence should be rejected, since the relevance of each part of the evidence depends upon the existence of some other part. n2 For example, in a case where notice is an issue, the relevancy of a shouted-out warning is dependent upon whether the shout was heard. Rule 104(b) allocates to the jury -- subject to minimal scrutiny by the Judge -- the responsibility to determine whether a condition of fact has been met whenever the relevancy of proffered evidence depends on a factual condition. n3

When a competency issue is raised, the problem is not whether evidence is relevant. A competency objection maintains that evidence, even if relevant, still should be excluded. Competency rules, which include most of the evidence rules that exist, serve as screening devices to protect against certain special problems -- such as unreliability, confusion of the jury, and governmental error -- or as special guarantees of privacy or some other social policy.

Examples of competency rules include: (1) the hearsay rule, and the admissibility requirements of the hearsay exceptions (such as whether the declarant, whose statement is proffered as an excited utterance, was in fact speaking while under the influence of a startling event); (2) the rules on privilege (such as whether a client was seeking legal advice from an attorney for purposes of the attorney-client privilege); (3) rules mandating qualifications for testifying witnesses (such as whether a person is qualified to testify as an expert); n4 and (4) rules mandating exclusion of illegally obtained evidence. n5

Examples of conditional relevancy include: (1) whether a witness has a basis of personal knowledge from which to testify; n6 and (2) whether a document has been properly authenticated. n7

While Rule 104 distinguishes "competency" from "relevancy," it would be a mistake to conclude that the Judge has no role in determining questions of relevancy. The question of whether evidence is relevant within the meaning of Rule 401 is one for the Trial Judge. Likewise, it is for the Judge to determine, under Rule 403, whether the probative value of proffered evidence is substantially outweighed by the risk of prejudice, confusion, and delay. n8 Even questions of conditional relevancy, specifically allocated to the jury under Rule 104(b), are subject to the Trial Court's determination that a reasonable juror could find the existence of the predicate facts.

[3] Preliminary Questions That Mirror the Ultimate Question

In some cases, the preliminary question to be decided by the Trial Judge is the same question as that to be decided ultimately by the jury. For example, suppose a plaintiff is injured in a car accident, and sues the employer of the other driver. At the scene, the other driver made a statement admitting fault. That statement is not admissible against the employer unless the other driver was an agent speaking about a matter within the scope of employment. Yet the questions of agency and scope of employment may be the very questions the jury will have to decide to determine the employer's liability. A similar example of a confluence of preliminary questions and ultimate issues occurs in conspiracy cases. A hearsay statement is not admissible as coconspirator hearsay unless the declarant and the defendant are coconspirators; the jury may well have to decide the same question in determining guilt.

Where the preliminary question mirrors the ultimate question, the Trial Judge who excludes the evidence for insufficient proof of the preliminary fact will often preempt the jury. But this is not particularly troublesome. n9 The law of evidence is based on the assumption that litigants will not get to the jury unless they have enough evidence that the Trial Judge finds to be admissible. There is no good reason for the Trial Judge to treat "mirror" admissibility questions differently from any other question of admissibility.

Where preliminary and ultimate determinations involve the same question, Trial Judges who admit the evidence should not inform the jury that they have found the admissibility requirement in the proponent's favor. To do so would improperly influence the jury's decision on its ultimate determination. This would be especially problematic in criminal cases where evidence is offered against the defendant; in that situation, the jury must decide the ultimate question by proof beyond a reasonable doubt, whereas the Trial Judge decides the preliminary question by a preponderance of the evidence. n10

[4] Inapplicability of Evidence Rules

The Rules of Evidence, with the exception of the rules on privileges, do not apply to preliminary fact determinations. So for example, a Court may consider affidavits and other hearsay statements in ruling on whether proffered hearsay is admissible or whether an expert is qualified. The reasoning behind this principle is sound. Most of the Rules that control admissibility of evidence at trial are justified by the presumed inability of the jury to handle certain kinds of evidence; it makes no sense to apply those rules when the Trial Judge alone decides preliminary questions. For example, a Trial Judge can consider hearsay for what it's worth, while a jury might think a hearsay statement to be more reliable than it actually is. See generally Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) (noting that a judge making an admissibility determination can receive otherwise inadmissible evidence and "give it such weight as his judgment and experience counsel"). With respect to privileges, however, disclosure at any stage would destroy the purpose of the privilege.

[5] Exclusion of Jurors From Preliminary Determinations

Subdivision (c) of the Rule provides that hearings concerning the admissibility of confessions must be conducted outside the hearing n11 of the jury, and that other hearings shall be so conducted when the interests of justice require it. The mandatory aspect of the Rule tracks constitutional law. In Jackson v. Denno, 378 U.S. 368 (1964) , the Court held that a Judge must, upon objection, hold a hearing and make a ruling on whether the defendant's confession is voluntary. A fair reading of Jackson is that the hearing must be held outside the jury's presence. Also in Jackson, the Court held that Trial Judges may not inform the jury that they have found the defendant's confession to be voluntary, even if the Judge instructs the jurors that they can reject the finding if they wish. Giving the jury this information might interject an improper judicial influence on the jury's obligation to weigh the confession.

Courts have held, in search and seizure cases, that a suppression hearing should be held outside the presence of the jury. n12 As a practical matter this will almost always be the case, because Rule 104(c) requires exclusion of the jury if the accused is a witness and so requests; ordinarily the defendant is a witness at the suppression hearing, and there is no upside to the defendant in having the jury listen to suppression hearing testimony. At any rate, pursuant to Fed. R. Crim. P. 41, suppression hearings are likely to be held long before trial and well before the jury is empanelled.

In contrast, in Watkins v. Sowders, 449 U.S. 341 (1981) , the Court found no constitutional error when the Trial Court conducted a hearing on the admissibility of identification testimony in the presence of the jury. The Watkins Court distinguished Jackson, where the admissibility question related to the voluntariness of the defendant's confession. The Court explained that Jackson was based on the concern that the jury may give credit to the defendant's confession even if it was found by the Judge to be involuntary; this was because involuntary confessions could still be probative and reliable. Thus, the only way to keep involuntary confessions from the jury was to exclude them before the jury could hear them. The Court found no such danger with respect to pretrial identification evidence. Its rather dubious reasoning was that if the identification was so suggestive as to be unreliable under due process standards, the jury would be unlikely to give it any consideration at trial, and so it wouldn't matter that the jury heard the inadmissible identification. The Court did state, however, that a "judicial determination outside the presence of the jury of the admissibility of identification evidence may often be advisable." But it was not constitutionally required.

Sometimes the Trial Judge will find it more efficient to make a determination of admissibility after much of the evidence is already before the jury. For example, in a conspiracy case, the Trial Judge may admit statements by alleged coconspirators on the condition that, before resting, the prosecution show by a preponderance of the evidence that there was a conspiracy. n13 Failure to connect up the evidence will result in the Judge either declaring a mistrial, or, at the very least, instructing the jury to disregard all of the statements of the alleged coconspirator with respect to anyone other than the declarant. n14 Reviewing Courts have sometimes stated a preference for a separate hearing on the admissibility of coconspirator hearsay, but they also recognize that the Trial Judge should have discretion to leave the admissibility question for trial. n15 The predicate question of conspiracy is often the question to be decided on the merits at trial. Thus, an ironclad rule requiring an admissibility hearing for all coconspirator hearsay might result in much duplication of time and effort -- a trial before the trial.

In practice, it may be possible for the Trial Judge, at an early stage, to rule at least conditionally on the admissibility of the coconspirator hearsay. n16 Such an early ruling might be possible on the basis of documents marked for trial, suppression hearing testimony, argument of the parties, and perhaps a few witnesses. The early conditional ruling would have the effect of providing some predictability for the parties.

Of course, as discussed above, if Trial Judges do find sufficient evidence of conspiracy to admit the hearsay statement, they should not inform the jury about this finding, because this could improperly influence the jury's deliberations on the conspiracy question. n17

[6] Excluding the Jury in the Interests of Justice

Rule 104(c) instructs the Court to exclude the jury from preliminary determinations if the "interests of justice" so require. This provision is deliberately vague, and much discretion is left to the Trial Judge. Generally speaking, four factors are pertinent to whether discretion should be exercised to exclude the jury:

(1) If disclosure to the jury would result in substantial prejudice to one of the parties, this clearly cuts in favor excluding the jury. n18 For example, if there is a viable claim of privilege, this claim should be resolved outside the hearing of the jury; otherwise, the very reason for the privilege is undermined. Likewise, jurors should be excluded from a hearing concerning the admissibility of a statement of a victim that implicates the accused, or evidence of uncharged crimes -- if this type of evidence is found inadmissible, the purpose of the exclusionary rule will be undermined by the jury's presence at the hearing. On the other hand, there is often no reason to exclude the jury from the presentation of foundational evidence as to the qualification of an expert witness. If the Trial Judge finds that the expert is unqualified, there is little risk that the jury will be prejudiced against the party, and moreover the jury will not have heard the opinion.

(2) If the Trial Judge can see in advance that admissibility is doubtful, this cuts in favor of excluding the jury. Conversely, there is little risk in a hearing before the jury if admissibility is essentially a foregone conclusion.

(3) If the evidence offered to prove the preliminary fact is relevant both to weight and admissibility, this should cut in favor of allowing the jury to hear the foundation proof; this will avoid some duplication of effort.

(4) If the jury would draw an adverse inference from its exclusion, this cuts in favor of allowing the jury to be present. For example, the jury may be understandably disenchanted if it is repeatedly and pointedly excluded from what are obviously important decisions. It may also be that the speculations of an excluded juror would be more prejudicial to one of the parties than the proffered evidence itself. Moreover, a negative inference would not be drawn from the absence of evidence if the jury knew that the party tried to admit the evidence but it was excluded by the Court.

[7] Conspirator Statements

One of the most complex problems associated with Rule 104(a), and to some extent with subdivision (b) of the Rule as well, relates to a preliminary ruling that is mentioned above: What evidence may a Trial Judge consider in ruling on the admissibility of conspirators' statements under Rule 801(d)(2)(E)? We are reserving our lengthy discussion on this question for Rule 801. For now, it is important to note that the preliminary questions as to the admissibility of a coconspirator statement -- whether the statement was made during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy and whether the declarant and defendant were in fact coconspirators -- are left to the Trial Judge under Rule 104(a). n19 A contrary rule, leaving the question to the jury as one of conditional relevancy, would undermine the protection otherwise afforded by the hearsay rule, because the jury might consider the coconspirator's statement for its truth even if it finds that the predicate facts are not established.

[8] Testimony By Accused

Rule 104(d) allows criminal defendants to testify upon preliminary matters (such as their standing to contest a search, or the involuntariness of their confessions) without the risk of opening themselves to cross-examination as to other issues in the case, i.e., issues other than those that relate to the preliminary question. But this does not mean that the accused pays no price for testifying on preliminary issues. It is true that the Supreme Court has held in Simmons v. United States, 390 U.S. 377 (1968) , that defendants' suppression hearing testimony cannot be used against them as an admission at trial. The Court reasoned that defendants would be deterred from making constitutional claims if they knew that their statement at a suppression hearing could be used as evidence of guilt at trial. But a more difficult question is whether defendants' statements can be used against them for impeachment purposes. The Supreme Court has left this question open. See United States v. Salvucci, 448 U.S. 83 (1980) . Most Lower Courts have held that the testimony of the accused on a preliminary matter can be used to impeach a defendant who chooses to testify at trial. n20 It is one thing to use the defendant's statements at a suppression hearing as evidence of guilt. It is another to allow the defendant to perjure himself at trial without fear of impeachment with his prior statements.

Defense counsel must therefore be aware that an accused who has testified on a preliminary matter may have little choice but to exercise the right not to testify at trial. For example, defendants who seek to establish standing at a suppression hearing by testifying that they possessed and controlled the drugs in issue would generally be foolhardy to testify at trial that they did not possess the drugs. Conversely, defendants who wish to testify at trial may well have to forego a suppression motion.

It is important to note that an accused who testifies on a preliminary matter is entitled to testify outside the jury's hearing. However, the Rule appears to suggest that, confession cases aside, an accused "waives" this right by not specifically requesting it.

[9] Burdens of Proof as to Preliminary Facts

Who bears the burden of proof on preliminary fact questions? And what standard of proof is to be employed? Nothing in Rule 104 specifically answers either of these questions. But the Supreme Court has, in several cases, held that the moving party has the burden of proving admissibility requirements under Rule 104(a) by a preponderance of the evidence. Where the objection goes to conditional relevance, the proponent must show that a reasonable juror could believe the preliminary fact by a preponderance of the evidence.

In Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) , the Supreme Court held that the preponderance of the evidence standard governs preliminary factfinding under Rule 801(d)(2)(E). Although the Court addressed only coconspirator statements in Bourjaily, it reasoned that the preponderance standard had been used successfully to determine the admissibility of confessions and evidence seized pursuant to searches conducted under Fourth Amendment standards. It also implied that the preponderance standard should be the governing standard for all preliminary questions decided under Rule 104(a). n21

In the later case of Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, 509 U.S. 579 (1993) , the Court held that the proponent of expert testimony has the burden of establishing its reliability under Rule 702 by a preponderance of the evidence. The Daubert Court relied on Rule 104 and Bourjaily. Given these cases, it is fair to conclude that the offering party must ordinarily establish admissibility requirements under Rule 104(a) by a preponderance of the evidence. Lower Courts have applied the preponderance standard to an array of competency questions. n22

It is also notable that the Advisory Committee in some of the recent amendments to the Evidence Rules has taken the position that the preponderance standard applies to the Court's rulings under Rule 104(a). Thus, Rule 804(b)(6) provides a hearsay exception when the opponent engages in wrongdoing that was intended to, and did, procure the unavailability of the declarant as a witness. The Committee Note states that the test for determining forfeiture is "[t]he usual Rule 104(a) preponderance standard." And the Committee Note to the 2000 amendment to Rule 702 provides that "the admissibility of all expert testimony is governed by the principles of Rule 104(a). Under that Rule, the proponent has the burden of establishing that the pertinent admissibility requirements are met by a preponderance of the evidence."

While the general rule is that the proponent must show that admissibility requirements are met by a preponderance of the evidence, there is an exception for questions of privilege. Because privilege rules operate to exclude relevant and reliable evidence, they are not favored. Therefore, it is the party seeking to exclude the evidence that has the burden of establishing, by a preponderance of the evidence, that a privilege exists. Once this burden has been met, the proponent of the evidence has the burden of establishing, by prima facie evidence, that an exception to the privilege (such as the crime-fraud exception to the attorney-client privilege) exists. See United States v. Zolin, 491 U.S. 554 (1989) .

In Huddleston v. United States, 485 U.S. 681 (1988) , the defendant challenged the admissibility of other act evidence that was admitted to prove knowledge that he was dealing with stolen property. Chief Justice Rehnquist wrote for a unanimous Court as it concluded that when other act evidence is offered under Rule 404(b) for a proper purpose, the relevance of the evidence is conditioned on whether the event actually occurred as alleged by the proponent. The Chief Justice described the proper judicial approach to conditional relevance in the following language: "The court simply examines all the evidence in the case and decides whether the jury could reasonably find the conditional fact -- here, that the television sets were stolen -- by a preponderance of the evidence." The test for conditional relevance is thus not whether the Judge is convinced by a preponderance, but rather whether a reasonable juror could be convinced by a preponderance.

[10] In Camera Review

In United States v. Zolin, 491 U.S. 554 (1989) , the Supreme Court held that Rule 104(a) does not prohibit use of in camera review procedures when a District Court rules on privilege claims. The Court set forth the showing required to warrant in camera review in the context of a claim that the crime or fraud exception to the attorney-client privilege warrants disclosure. The Court's analysis is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 501. n23

[11] Evidence Relating to Weight

Rule 104(e) provides that, after the Trial Judge makes a determination on a preliminary question of fact, the party opposing the ruling is still entitled to introduce before the jury evidence that relates to the weight or credibility of evidence. For instance, even if the Judge determines that a confession was not coerced, the defendant is entitled to introduce evidence of coercion at trial, because this goes to the weight of the evidence. n24 And where a judge finds an expert's testimony to be sufficiently reliable to be admissible under Rule 702, the opponent is still allowed to attack any defects in the expert's qualifications, basis, methodology, or application when the expert testifies at trial.

Balthazard, 360 F.3d 309 (1st Cir. 2004)* (defendant's claim that evidence of growing operations should have been excluded "because the government failed to connect the operations to the conspiracy described in the indictment" "is primarily an argument about conditional relevancy that we evaluate under Rule 104(b)"; the Court notes that "[w]hen the relevancy of evidence is conditioned on the establishment of a fact -- in this case, that the other marijuana growing operations were undertaken in furtherance of the charged conspiracy -- the offering party need only introduce sufficient evidence to permit a reasonable jury to find the conditional fact by a preponderance of the evidence to establish that the evidence is relevant."). City of Hartford, 74 F.3d 1397 (2d Cir. 1996)* (Trial Judge erroneously excluded a tape recording, purportedly of a party in the case, when he determined that he was not satisfied that the voice belonged to that party; this approach was improper since "[s]o long as a jury is entitled to reach a contrary conclusion, it must be given the opportunity to do so"); United States v. Koontz, 143 F.3d 408 (8th Cir. 1998) (Trial Judge's responsibility was only to determine whether there is evidence sufficient to support a finding that a proffered piece of evidence was connected to the defendant).

Lang, 8 F.3d 268 (5th Cir. 1993)* , in which the defendant moved to suppress evidence as illegally obtained, while the prosecution argued that the evidence was found in plain view; the question of whether the evidence was found in plain view was within the sole province of the Trial Court, and it was reversible error to leave this question to the jury:

> The cocaine's relevancy did not depend upon the fulfillment of a condition of fact, as the cocaine would have been relevant to show Lang's guilt of the charged offense notwithstanding whether officer Young saw the cocaine in plain view. Although relevant, the cocaine would have been excluded for policy reasons underlying the Fourth Amendment.

(n11)Footnote 11. The Rule uses the word "hearing" rather than "presence" in order to specify that the jury need not always be physically excused; a brief sidebar conference may suffice to protect the parties.

In these circumstances, some defendants have sought a provisional instruction to the jury to disregard the coconspirator statement "for the time being." Most Courts have found such an instruction to be unwise, because if the Judge ultimately finds that the coconspirator exception applies, the provisional instruction must be undone. This may tend to highlight the coconspirator's statement, and may even signal to the jury that the Trial Judge has found the existence of a conspiracy. See United States v. Drougas, 748 F.2d 8 (1st Cir. 1984) (Trial Judge properly rejected provisional instruction as to coconspirator hearsay: "the retraction of the limiting instruction can appear to be a judicial endorsement of the conspiracy").

Vinson, 606 F.2d 149 (6th Cir. 1979)* (if coconspirator hearsay is conditionally admitted and the government subsequently fails to establish the conspiracy, the Trial Court "should, on defendant's motion, declare a mistrial unless convinced that a cautionary jury instruction would shield the defendant from prejudice").

(n22)Footnote 22. See, e.g., Miller v. Keating, 754 F.2d 507 (3d Cir. 1985) (proponent must establish admissibility of an excited utterance by a preponderance of the evidence).

(n23)Footnote 23. See also United States v. Branch, 970 F.2d 1368 (4th Cir. 1992) (because authenticity of a document must be established to the jury, an in camera hearing cannot replace the presentation of evidence of authenticity at trial; holding a preliminary hearing, as the Court did in this case, cannot be used to streamline the trial by excusing proof of authenticity; still, an in camera hearing is not itself error and indeed may be a good idea; it ensures that the jury will not be tainted by hearing prejudicial evidence where the proponent cannot show in advance that he will be able to provide an adequate foundation for admission).

(n24)Footnote 24. See 18 U.S.C. § 3501(a):

> If the trial judge determines that the confession was voluntarily made it shall be admitted in evidence and the trial judge shall permit the jury to hear relevant evidence on the issue of voluntariness and shall instruct the jury to give such weight to the confession as the jury feels it deserves under all the circumstances.

104.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Rule 104(a) -- Questions of Admissibility Generally

[a] Rule 104(a) -- Informing the Jury About Preliminary Determinations

United States v. Tracy, 12 F.3d 1186 (2d Cir. 1993) : In the prosecution of two leaders of a large drug trafficking conspiracy, the Trial Judge told the jury that statements proffered as coconspirator statements were admitted on a conditional basis and later told them that the government had proved the existence of a conspiracy to his satisfaction, so that the statements were admissible against both defendants. The Court held that the Judge's comments were inappropriate because, while it might be proper to alert the jury that there may be a later ruling to disregard conditionally admitted evidence, the jury should not be told what facts the Judge believes have been established when making a determination of admissibility. The error was harmless, however.

[b] Rule 104(a) -- Inapplicability of Rules

Precision Piping & Instruments, Inc. v. E.I. Du Pont de Nemours & Co., 951 F.2d 613 (4th Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed a judgment on a directed verdict for the defendants in an antitrust action, holding there was no error in excluding statements offered under Rule 801(d)(2)(E) because the preliminary showing of a conspiracy was insufficient. In making that determination, the Trial Judge acted properly in weighing the credibility and reliability of evidence, including hearsay statements.

United States v. York, 933 F.2d 1343 (7th Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed convictions for mail fraud and arson, holding there was no error in permitting the government to conduct a voir dire in the jury's presence focusing on prior unprofessional conduct by a pathologist called as an expert. The defendant had qualified the witness before the jury, the questions were relevant to the weight to be accorded the expert's testimony, the prosecutor had a good-faith basis for the questions, and qualification is a preliminary question to which Rule 608(b) does not apply.

[c] Rule 104(a) -- In Limine Rulings

United States v. Russell, 919 F.2d 795 (1st Cir. 1990) : In a prosecution for illegal possession of firearms, the Trial Judge granted a motion to suppress a gun found in the arresting trooper's car on the ground that there was no evidence connecting it with the defendants. Reversing, the Court noted that as a general rule, when a pretrial motion raises a question of fact -- especially one involving credibility -- that is intertwined with issues on the merits, resolution of the question of fact thus raised must be deferred until trial.

[d] Rule 104(a) -- Procedure

Gentile v. County of Suffolk, 926 F.2d 142 (2d Cir. 1991) : When the plaintiffs in a civil rights action offered a state investigation commission report as evidence of the defendant County's failure to investigate and discipline cases of employee misconduct, the Trial Judge made a preliminary finding of the report's trustworthiness under Rule 803(8)(C), but deferred a final ruling on admissibility until after a posttrial hearing. The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiffs, holding the defendants were not entitled as a matter of law to a trustworthiness hearing and there was no abuse of discretion in following the procedure in this case, where the defendants had pretrial notice that the report would be offered but did not request an evidentiary hearing until the third day of trial and did not controvert the presumption favoring admission of the report. A dissenting Judge argued that the defendants had not been given an adequate opportunity to challenge the trustworthiness of the report.

United States v. Cox, 923 F.2d 519 (7th Cir. 1991) : In ruling on the admissibility of a coconspirator's statements, the Trial Court followed the permissible procedure of having a pretrial proffer, making a conditional ruling, and making an ultimate ruling at the end of the government's case, but required as a matter of policy that the preliminary proffer be ex parte. The procedure withheld the evidence from the defendant's counsel up through oral argument on appeal. Although it expressed its concern and bewilderment over this policy when there was no reasonable justification for sealing, the Court nevertheless held there was no reversible error.

[e] Rule 104(a) -- Relationship to Other Rules

Burt Rigid Box, Inc. v. Travelers Property Cas. Corp., 302 F.3d 83 (2d Cir. 2002) : In an action by a container manufacturer seeking a declaration that the insurer was obligated to provide coverage under certain lost insurance policies issued to the manufacturer's former parent company, the Court affirmed a partial summary judgment for the manufacturer and reversed a partial summary judgment for the insurer. The Court concluded that the question whether the manufacturer could rely on secondary evidence was a question for the Court, to be resolved under Rule 104(a). It declared that the "diligence" requirement of Rule 1004 is not a matter to be determined by the fact finder.

[f] Rule 104(a) -- Resubmission to Jury

United States v. Lang, 8 F.3d 268 (5th Cir. 1993) : The Court vacated a cocaine possession conviction because the question of whether cocaine seized from the defendant was admissible under the plain view exception to the warrant requirement was submitted to the jury. The dissenting Judge believed that the jury was only given the opportunity to reject the Trial Judge's admissibility decision and argued that while the procedure was improper, it caused no harm to the defendant. In United States v. Gomez, 947 F.2d 737 (5th Cir. 1991) (per curiam), the Court affirmed convictions for drug offenses, holding that the issue of whether a telephone conversation with the defendant had been recorded with the consent required for admissibility is decided only by the Trial Judge and need not be resubmitted to the jury.

[g] Rule104(a) -- Standard of Proof

Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987) : This case, discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 104.02[9], establishes the preponderance of the evidence standard for preliminary factfinding associated with coconspirator statements.

United States v. Lang, 364 F.3d 1210 (10th Cir. 2004) : An employee of the District Court clerk's office copied and took home a sealed affidavit, which authorized a tracking device in a narcotics investigation, and discussed it with her husband. The next day an individual visited a man listed in the affidavit, gave it to him, and stated he got it "from somebody that thought he might know the people involved." Although the recipient's heroin use impaired his memory, his description of the individual closely matched the husband. Affirming the couple's convictions for obstruction of justice, the Court held that the recipient's testimony about the individual's statements was properly admitted as a party-admission of the husband, since a preponderance of the evidence indicated that the husband had spoken to the recipient. In United States v. Harrison, 296 F.3d 994 (10th Cir. 2002) , the Court affirmed convictions for sexual abuse of a child, and upheld the admission of a statement by the victim to a tribal police officer. Although the Trial Judge had admitted the statement under Rule 807, the Court concluded that it was admissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(B). The Court reasoned that "[u]nder Rule 801(d)(2)(B), C.V.'s statement is not hearsay if the Defendant 'manifested an adoption or belief in its truth.' Whether Defendant did so is a preliminary question of fact to be decided by the court, which is not bound by the rules of evidence in its fact finding." Under Rule 104(a) the Trial Judge "determines the question under a preponderance-of-the-evidence standard." The Court found the standard to have been met in this case, because when the child made the statement accusing the defendant, he looked at her and said words to the effect, "I told you I was sorry and it wouldn't happen again."

[2] Rule 104(b) -- Relevancy Conditioned on Fact

[a] Rule 104(b) -- Act of Remaining Silent

United States v. Cummiskey, 728 F.2d 200 (3d Cir. 1984) : The Court read the Supreme Court's decision in Doyle v. Ohio, 426 U.S. 610 (1976) , as holding that "when the action of remaining silent occurs after the witness has received Miranda warnings, that action is not relevant as a prior inconsistent assertion." Since the relevance of the silence depends on the absence of warnings, the Court held that "when a testifying defendant makes an objection to the prosecutor's cross-examination with respect to postarrest silence, it is the prosecutor's burden, under Rule 104(b), to establish that Miranda warnings were not given prior to the silence relied upon for impeachment purposes."

[b] Rule104(b) -- Affidavit of Counsel

United States v. Flores Perez, 849 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1988) : Affirming a firearms conviction, the Court held that it was permissible to consider facts stated in an affidavit of the defendant's lawyer in determining the admissibility of other acts evidence.

[c] Rule 104(b) -- Experiments, Demonstrations, and Tests

Bogosian v. Mercedes-Benz of N. Am., Inc., 104 F.3d 472 (1st Cir. 1997) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in a product liability action brought by a motorist who had parked an automobile and then suffered injuries when it rolled back, allegedly because of a defect in the gear selection lever. There was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by the plaintiff's proffered expert that the shift lever's defective design led to the accident, since there was no prima facie showing that the condition of the transmission when the expert tested it was substantially similar to that on the accident date.

United States v. Hart, 729 F.2d 662 (10th Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed firearms convictions, finding that the Trial Judge properly refused to permit defense counsel to ask a witness, who testified that the defendant opened a gun case with a hairpin, to demonstrate in Court with a pin how the defendant bent and used the pin. The defense made no claim or showing that the pin produced in Court was similar to the one used by the defendant.

[d] Rule104(b) -- Failure To Connect Up

Tate v. Robbins & Myers, Inc., 790 F.2d 10 (1st Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in a product liability suit claiming that the manufacturer breached its continuous duty to warn. It found that evidence of a manual published in 1980 was properly excluded, where the plaintiff offered no evidence that the manufacturer knew that the operator possessed a hoist manufactured earlier, in 1943.

United States v. Cote, 744 F.2d 913 (2d Cir. 1984) : In a prosecution for transportation of stolen firearms, the government offered evidence concerning two burglaries and several weapons sales that were never connected to the defendant in any way. The Court reversed the convictions, indicating that it had been offered no explanation for the government's introducing irrelevant evidence that it knew or should have known could not be connected to the defendant. The Court noted that it appreciated "the need for leeway so counsel may select the most persuasive order of proof," but added that "representations, express or implied, that otherwise irrelevant evidence will be tied to a defendant should not be made without a good faith and objectively reasonable belief that the missing links will in fact be supplied."

United States v. Anderson, 933 F.2d 1261 (5th Cir. 1991) : A defendant's conviction for arson of a furniture warehouse was reversed because the Trial Judge had not determined that jurors could find by a preponderance that each of four previous fires involving the defendant's furniture factory had involved arson and that the defendant was involved. The evidence had been admitted over objection, and there was no later proof on the issue, so the objection was sufficient to preserve any error and no motion to strike was necessary.

[e] Rule 104(b) -- Foundation for Knowledge, Notice, Motive, etc.

United States v. Wilson, 160 F.3d 732 (D.C. Cir. 1998) : James Wilson was charged with a postal robbery on the basis of information from a witness who had worn a wire while imprisoned with James. The government turned the tape and a transcript over to James' attorney, who improperly disclosed at least parts to James' wife and his brother Ralph. The tape revealed that the key witness was Leroy Copeland; Ralph and another brother began looking for Copeland, and when they found him, murdered him. On trial for murdering a government witness, the brothers objected that it was improper to admit the whole tape because there was insufficient foundation that Ralph had heard the whole tape. The Court held the foundation sufficient because there was evidence that James had heard the whole tape and had communicated with Ralph before the murder, and there was proof that Ralph heard parts identifying Copeland.

United States v. Ansaldi, 372 F.3d 118 (2d Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed convictions for conspiracy to distribute a controlled substance and to launder money. It held that certain documents were admissible to prove the defendant's state of mind. It recognized that the relevance of the documents depended on the jury's drawing certain other inferences from the evidence, but concluded that there was sufficient evidence for the jury to conclude that the defendant was aware of the contents of the documents.

[f] Rule 104(b) -- Judge's Role

Ricketts v. City of Hartford, 74 F.3d 1397 (2d Cir. 1996) : The Court affirmed a judgment for police officers and the City in a civil rights action brought by a plaintiff who alleged the use of excessive force. After one police officer testified, the plaintiff proffered a tape recording that he claimed contained a statement by this particular officer. The Trial Court excluded the tape because it was not satisfied that the voice belonged to the police officer who testified. The Court concluded that this approach was improper because "[s]o long as a jury is entitled to reach a contrary conclusion, it must be given the opportunity to do so." The Court found the error harmless, however, since the tape could have been excluded on other grounds.

United States v. Koontz, 143 F.3d 408 (8th Cir. 1998) : In a prosecution for drug and weapons offenses, the defense was that a gun found in the defendant's car belonged to a friend of his son. The government sought to rebut this contention by introducing a computerized booking record that indicated that a person by the friend's name was jailed during the relevant time. The Trial Judge rejected an argument that some person other than the friend might have that name, and concluded that the son's friend and the subject of the booking report were "the same person." The Court held that finding was error, since the Judge's responsibility was only to determine whether there was evidence in the record sufficient to support a finding that the report concerned the son's friend. The error was harmless, however, since there was evidence in the record to support admission of the booking report.

United States v. Platero, 72 F.3d 806 (10th Cir. 1995) : In order to show that the victim had a motive to fabricate rape allegations, the defendant sought to introduce evidence of her romantic relationship with a third party at the time. The Trial Judge determined that witnesses to the alleged relationship were not credible and precluded the defendant from cross-examining on the relationship. Reversing, the Court held that under Rule 412(b)(1)(C) the question of whether a relationship existed between the victim and a third person was an issue of conditional relevancy to be finally determined by the jury rather than the Judge.

[g] Rule 104(b) -- Nature of Evidentiary Hearing

United States v. Leight, 818 F.2d 1297 (7th Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed a mother's conviction for murdering her infant son. Since there was clear and convincing evidence that the defendant had inflicted injuries upon two of her other children, the Court held that the admission of this evidence was proper at trial. It declined "to hold that every Rule 104 hearing must be a full-blown trial in which both sides may present every available piece of evidence." Instead, the Court concluded that Trial Judges must decide in light of the circumstances of particular cases "what and how much evidence" is necessary to make a finding of clear and convincing evidence.

[h] Rule104(b) -- Personal Knowledge

United States v. Owens-El, 889 F.2d 913 (9th Cir. 1989) : Affirming a conviction for assaulting a prison guard, the Court held that when a question is raised as to whether a witness has sufficient personal knowledge to satisfy Rule 602, the testimony will be excluded only when no reasonable jury could conclude that the witness has personal knowledge. In the instant case, the jury could determine that there was evidence -- e.g., placement of wounds -- to support the conclusion that an assault victim had sufficient personal knowledge to make an out-of-court identification, even though the victim was later unable to testify as to the basis upon which he made his identification.

[i] Rule 104(b) -- Standard of Proof

Huddleston v. United States, 485 U.S. 681 (1988) : This case, discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, §

104.02[9], establishes the standard for conditional relevancy: sufficient evidence for a jury to find the fact by a preponderance of the evidence.

United States v. Balthazard, 360 F.3d 309 (1st Cir. 2004) : The defendants were charged with a conspiracy to grow marijuana plants after officers raided a warehouse containing a massive marijuana growing operation. On appeal of their convictions they argued that evidence of other growing operations should have been excluded because there was insufficient evidence connecting those operations to the conspiracy described in the indictment. Affirming, the Court observed that the party offering evidence conditioned on establishment of a fact need only introduce sufficient evidence to permit a reasonable jury to find the conditional fact (here, that the other operations were undertaken in furtherance of the charged conspiracy) by a preponderance of the evidence.

MDU Resources Group v. W.R. Grace & Co., 14 F.3d 1274 (8th Cir. 1994) : Reversing a judgment for the defendant in an action by a building owner for expenses in removing asbestos fireproofing, the Court held it was error to exclude documents offered to show the defendant's awareness of asbestos dangers in 1968 when the building was constructed. The documents came from the defendant's sole custody and control and the defendant did not provide the plaintiff with evidence necessary for it to establish the date they were received, so the jury could have inferred they were received when the plaintiff said. Furthermore, the documents contained other evidence supporting the inference, so there was a sufficient basis to make a preliminary determination that relevancy had been established and to admit the documents, leaving the question of when the defendant received them, and their relevance to the liability issue, to the jury.

[3] Rule 104(c) -- Hearing of Jury

United States v. Odom, 736 F.2d 104 (4th Cir. 1984) : In a mail fraud prosecution arising out of a fraudulent absentee voting scheme, the Court rejected an argument that the Trial Judge erred in not holding an in camera hearing on the competency of residents of a nursing home to testify. The Court cited Rule 104(c) and noted that it requires an in camera hearing in only one instance. It concluded that a Trial Judge has "great latitude in the procedure he may follow in determining the competency of a witness to testify."

United States v. Bartley, 855 F.2d 547 (8th Cir. 1988) : The Court upheld a cocaine distribution conviction. It found that an expert was qualified to identify cocaine and that "there is no requirement that the court specifically make that finding in open court upon proffer of the offering party," since "[s]uch an offer and finding by the Court might influence the jury in its evaluation of the expert and the better procedure is to avoid an acknowledgment of the witnesses' expertise by the Court."

[4] Rule 104(d) -- Testimony by Accused

United States v. Smith, 940 F.2d 710 (1st Cir. 1991) : The defendant, charged with felon firearm possession, asserted that he had been acting as an undercover agent for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, but he did not give testimony at a preliminary hearing after it was suggested that by doing so he would waive his self-incrimination privilege. The Court noted that, although preliminary hearing testimony might have been used for impeachment at trial, the accused would not waive the privilege by testifying at a preliminary hearing.

United States v. Jaswal, 47 F.3d 539 (2d Cir. 1995) : In a drug prosecution, the defendant moved to suppress his confession as involuntary. The Court held that it was permissible to allow the prosecution to cross-examine the defendant at the suppression hearing about the facts of the offense, and then to confront him with that testimony while cross-examining him at trial. On direct examination at the suppression hearing, the defendant denied having said or read what was in the statement he signed. It was therefore proper to cross-examine the defendant as to the accuracy of the contents of the confession, so as to rebut his claim that the confession came from the police officer, not from the defendant.

United States v. Gomez-Diaz, 712 F.2d 949 (5th Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed drug convictions, finding that the defendant consented to X-rays of his body. It rejected his contention that the Magistrate should have permitted him to take the stand during a suppression hearing to answer a single question: whether he verbally agreed to the X-ray. The Court reasoned that if appellant chose to testify, he could have been cross-examined "on any matter that occurred during his detention by customs officials which related to the issue of consent," since this was not examination on a new issue.

United States v. Williams, 754 F.2d 672 (6th Cir. 1985) : Affirming a conviction for possessing cocaine, the Court held that the Trial Judge properly compelled the defendant to state during a suppression hearing whether he knew that he was carrying drugs, after he testified that he was not exhibiting signs of nervousness before being stopped by an officer in an airport.

United States v. Roberts, 14 F.3d 502 (10th Cir. 1993) : Affirming the defendant's conviction for drug trafficking offenses, the Court held there was no error in permitting him to be asked at a suppression hearing about the indictment itself. Once the defendant took the stand to challenge the voluntariness of his confession on the ground he was substantially under the influence of drugs, it was appropriate to question him about his awareness and mental capacity to run a business at that time.

United States v. Quesada-Rosadal, 685 F.2d 1281 (11th Cir. 1982) : The Court held that prior inconsistent statements given at a suppression hearing can be used to impeach a defendant's trial testimony, whether those statements were made during direct or cross-examination.

Article I. General Provisions
CHAPTER 104 RULE 104

1-104 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 104.04

104.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Advisory Committee's Note

Subdivision (a). The applicability of a particular rule of evidence often depends upon the existence of a condition. Is the alleged expert a qualified physician? Is a witness whose former testimony is offered unavailable? Was a stranger present during a conversation between attorney and client? In each instance the admissibility of evidence will turn upon the answer to the question of the existence of the condition. Accepted practice, incorporated in the rule, places on the judge the responsibility for these determinations. McCormick § 53; Morgan, Basic Problems of Evidence 45-50 (1962).

To the extent that these inquiries are factual, the judge acts as a trier of fact. Often, however, rulings on evidence call for an evaluation in terms of a legally set standard. Thus when a hearsay statement is offered as a declaration against interest, a decision must be made whether it possesses the required against-interest characteristics. These decisions, too, are made by the judge.

In view of these considerations, this subdivision refers to preliminary requirements generally by the broad term "questions," without attempt at specification.

This subdivision is of general application. It must, however, be read as subject to the special provisions for "conditional relevancy" in subdivision (b) and those for confessions in subdivision (d).

If the question is factual in nature, the judge will of necessity receive evidence pro and con on the issue. The rule provides that the rules of evidence in general do not apply to this process. McCormick § 53, p. 123, n. 8, points out that the authorities are "scattered and inconclusive," and observes: "Should the exclusionary law of evidence, 'the child of the jury system' in Thayer's phrase, be applied to this hearing before the judge? Sound sense backs the view that it should not, and that the judge should be empowered to hear any relevant evidence, such as affidavits or other reliable hearsay." This view is reinforced by practical necessity in certain situations. An item, offered and objected to, may itself be considered in ruling on admissibility, though not yet admitted in evidence. Thus the content of an asserted declaration against interest must be considered in ruling whether it is against interest. Again, common practice calls for considering the testimony of a witness, particularly a child, in determining competency. Another example is the requirement of Rule 602 dealing with personal knowledge. In the case of hearsay, it is enough, if the declarant "so far as appears [has] had an opportunity to observe the fact declared." McCormick § 10, p. 19.

If concern is felt over the use of affidavits by the judge in preliminary hearings on admissibility, attention is directed to the many important judicial determinations made on the basis of affidavits. Rule 47 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure provides: "An application to the court for an order shall be by motion ... . It may be supported by affidavit." The Rules of Civil Procedure are more detailed. Rule 43(e), dealing with motions generally, provides: "When a motion is based on facts not appearing of record the court may hear the matter on affidavits presented by the respective parties, but the court may direct that the matter be heard wholly or partly on oral testimony or depositions." Rule 4(g) provides for proof of service by affidavit. Rule 56 provides in detail for the entry of summary judgment based on affidavits. Affidavits may supply the foundation for temporary restraining orders under Rule 65(b).

The study made for the California Law Revision Commission recommended an amendment to Uniform Rule 2 as follows: "In the determination of the issue aforesaid [preliminary determination], exclusionary rules shall not apply, subject, however, to Rule 45 and any valid claim of privilege." Tentative Recommendation and a Study Relating to the Uniform Rules of Evidence (Article VIII, Hearsay), Cal. Law Revision Comm'n, Rep., Rec. & Studies, 470 (1962). The proposal was not adopted in the California Evidence Code. The Uniform Rules are likewise silent on the subject. However, New Jersey Evidence Rule 8(1), dealing with preliminary inquiry by the judge, provides: "In his determination the rules of evidence shall not apply except for Rule 4 [exclusion on grounds of confusion, etc.] or a valid claim of privilege."

Subdivision (b). In some situations, the relevancy of an item of evidence, in the large sense, depends upon the existence of a particular preliminary fact. Thus when a spoken statement is relied upon to prove notice to X, it is without probative value unless X heard it. Or if a letter purporting to be from Y is relied upon to establish an admission by him, it has no probative value unless Y wrote or authorized it. Relevance in this sense has been labeled "conditional relevancy." Morgan, Basic Problems of Evidence 45-46 (1962). Problems arising in connection with it are to be distinguished from problems of logical relevancy, e.g., evidence in a murder case that accused on the day before purchased a weapon of the kind used in the killing, treated in Rule 401.

If preliminary questions of conditional relevancy were determined solely by the judge, as provided in subdivision (a), the functioning of the jury as a trier of fact would be greatly restricted and in some cases virtually destroyed. These are appropriate questions for juries. Accepted treatment, as provided in the rule, is consistent with that given fact questions generally. The judge makes a preliminary determination whether the foundation evidence is sufficient to support a finding of fulfillment of the condition. If so, the item is admitted. If after all the evidence on the issue is in, pro and con, the jury could reasonably conclude that fulfillment of the condition is not [sic] established, the issue is for them. If the evidence is not such as to allow a finding, the judge withdraws the matter from their consideration. Morgan, supra; California Evidence Code § 403; New Jersey Rule 8(2). See also Uniform Rules 19 and 67.

The order of proof here, as generally, is subject to the control of the judge.

Subdivision (c). Preliminary hearings on the admissibility of confessions must be conducted outside the hearing of the jury. See Jackson v. Denno, 378 U.S. 368, 84 S. Ct. 1774, 12 L. Ed. 2d 908 (1964) . Otherwise, detailed treatment of when preliminary matters should be heard outside the hearing of the jury is not feasible. The procedure is time consuming. Not infrequently the same evidence which is relevant to the issue of establishment of fulfillment of a condition precedent to admissibility is also relevant to weight or credibility, and time is saved by taking foundation proof in the presence of the jury. Much evidence on preliminary questions, though not relevant to jury issues, may be heard by the jury with no adverse effect. A great deal must be left to the discretion of the judge who will act as the interests of justice require.

Subdivision (d). The limitation upon cross-examination is designed to encourage participation by the accused in the determination of preliminary matters. He may testify concerning them without exposing himself to cross-examination generally. The provision is necessary because of the breadth of cross-examination under Rule 611(b).

The rule does not address itself to questions of the subsequent use of testimony given by an accused at a hearing on a preliminary matter. See Walder v. United States, 347 U.S. 62 (1954) ; Simmons v. United States, 390 U.S. 377 (1968) ; Harris v. New York, 401 U.S. 222 (1971) .

Subdivision (e). For similar provisions see Uniform Rule 8; California Evidence Code § 406; Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60-408; New Jersey Evidence Rule 8(1).

[The entire Advisory Committee Note accompanying the gender-neutralizing changes effective October 1, 1987 is as follows: "The amendments are technical. No substantive change is intended."]

[2] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

The Subcommittee adopted the March 1971 draft version of subdivision (c). Although recognizing that in some instances duplication of evidence would occur and that the procedure could be subject to abuse, the Subcommittee felt that a proper regard for the right of an accused not to testify generally in the case requires that he be given an option to testify out of the presence of the jury on preliminary matters.

[3] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

Rule 104(c) as submitted to the Congress provided that hearings on the admissibility of confessions shall be conducted outside the presence of the jury and hearings on all other preliminary matters should be so conducted when the interests of justice require. The Committee amended the Rule to provide that where an accused is a witness as to a preliminary matter, he has the right, upon his request, to be heard outside the jury's presence. Although recognizing that in some cases duplication of evidence would occur and that the procedure could be subject to abuse, the Committee believed that a proper regard for the right of an accused not to testify generally in the case dictates that he be given an option to testify out of the presence of the jury on preliminary matters.

The Committee construes the second sentence of subdivision (c) as applying to civil actions and proceedings as well as to criminal cases, and on this assumption has left the sentence unamended.

[4] Report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary

Under Rule 104(c) the hearing on a preliminary matter may at times be conducted in front of the jury. Should an accused testify in such a hearing, waiving his privilege against self-incrimination as to the preliminary issue, Rule 104(d) provides that he will not generally be subject to cross-examination as to any other issue. This rule is not, however, intended to immunize the accused from cross-examination where, in testifying about a preliminary issue, he injects other issues into the hearing. If he could not be cross-examined about any issues gratuitously raised by him beyond the scope of the preliminary matters, injustice might result. Accordingly, in order to prevent any such unjust result, the committee intends the rule to be construed to provide that the accused may subject himself to cross-examination as to issues raised by his own testimony upon a preliminary matter before a jury.

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 104, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

[b] Rule 104(a) -- Inapplicability of Rules

United States v. Mangual-Garcia, 505 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2007) : Affirming cocaine convictions, the Court held that there was no plain error in the admission of coconspirator statements despite the Trial Judge's failure to make a final determination at the close of the evidence that the declarant was a member of the conspiracy when the statements were made. The Court noted that an FBI agent provided a "certification letter" that the declarant was a cooperating witness for the FBI before and after the statements were made, but not at the time the statements were made. Although the agent did not testify, a Trial Judge may consider any evidence other than privileged information in making a Rule 104(a) determination as to a preliminary question of fact.

United States v. Morgan, 505 F.3d 332 (5th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a conviction for Medicare fraud, finding no violation of the defendant's Confrontation Clause rights when grand jury testimony was used to provide foundation evidence for admission of business records. Based on pre-Crawford precedent, the Court's decision that Crawford does not apply to sentencing, and "persuasive authority from the Seventh and Ninth Circuits" (United States v. Ellis, 460 F.3d 920, 927 (7th Cir. 2006) ; United States v. Weiland, 420 F.3d 1062, 1077 (9th Cir. 2005)) , the Court held that "Crawford does not apply to the foundational evidence authenticating business records in preliminary determinations of the admissibility of evidence."

[g] Rule 104(a) -- Standard of Proof

United States v. Tatum, 548 F.3d 584 (7th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possession of drugs with intent to distribute, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of drugs allegedly seized from the defendant. There was sufficient evidence connecting the drugs with the defendant at the time of arrest to satisfy the preponderance standard of proof for preliminary questions. Any gaps in the chain of custody went to the weight of the evidence and not to its admissibility.

[4] Rule 104(d) -- Testimony by Accused [Go To Main]

United States v. Hollingsworth, 495 F.3d 795 (7th Cir. 2007) : Affirming a conviction for drug offenses, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit testimony given by the defendant at a suppression hearing, after he exercised his Fifth Amendment right not to testify at trial.

Article I. General Provisions
CHAPTER 105 RULE 105

1-105 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 105.02

105.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Purpose of the Rule

Many of the rules of exclusion found in the Federal Rules are purpose-specific -- exclusion depends upon the purpose for which the evidence is offered. For example, the hearsay rule excludes out-of-court statements only if they are offered for the purpose of proving the truth of the statement; and Rule 404(b) excludes prior bad acts only if they are offered to prove the propensity of a person to act in accordance with those bad acts. The corollary to these purpose-specific exclusionary rules is that the same evidence may be admissible if offered for one purpose but inadmissible if offered for another. Rule 105 provides the mechanism with which the Trial Judge must deal with evidence offered for a "good" purpose, where that same evidence could be used by the factfinder for a "bad" purpose. The Rule allows the evidence to be admitted for the limited "good" purpose, but protects the nonoffering party, who will be prejudiced by use of the evidence for the "bad" purpose, by requiring a limiting instruction to the jury.

[2] Burden on Parties to Object

When evidence is admitted for a limited purpose, or against only one party, the Judge must instruct the jury as to the proper scope of the evidence if requested to do so. n1 The plain language of the Rule imposes a mandatory duty to instruct "upon request." Rule 105 makes clear that the burden is on the party who wants the instruction to ask for it. n2 Thus, the Trial Judge apparently has no discretion to refuse to give an instruction upon request, but also no duty to give a limiting instruction sua sponte. n3

There is usually a good reason for the Trial Judge to avoid a limiting instruction if the opponent of the evidence has not asked for one. The opponent may have made a strategic decision not to ask for an instruction. It may well be that an instruction will only serve to highlight the evidence to the jury -- it might do more harm than good. n4 This is especially true if the instruction would be difficult for a layperson to follow, e.g., an instruction to use a bad act for impeachment purposes but not as evidence of the defendant's guilt.

There is another reason for requiring instructions only upon request. The requirement of a request serves much the same function as the requirement of a timely and specific objection -- it enables the Trial Court to avoid error, it provides the proponent with an opportunity to correct any error, and it sharpens the record on appeal.

[3] Sua Sponte Instructions

On the other hand, there is nothing in the Rule that prohibits the Trial Judge from providing a limiting instruction sua sponte. n5 Indeed there could be a case where it would be in the interests of justice for the Judge to give an instruction even if no request is made. n6 The best approach for a Trial Judge who is concerned about impairing the strategy of counsel is to make a record outside the presence of the jury as to the reasons for counsel's failure to seek a limiting instruction, and to give an instruction where justice requires it, unless counsel explicitly waives it as a matter of trial strategy.

Some Judges have suggested that the quality of trial advocacy is quite low, and that many trial lawyers inadequately protect the interests of their clients. We believe that it is consistent with the philosophy of the adversary system and with the impartial posture required of a Trial Judge for the Judge to inquire of counsel whether a limiting instruction has been inadvertently overlooked during the course of the trial. In other words, it should be permissible for a Trial Judge to assure clients that careless lawyers will not deny clients the protection afforded by limiting instructions. A Trial Judge who is too quick to give an instruction sua sponte runs the risk that an Appellate Court will find that the Trial Judge invaded the province of counsel by denying the opportunity to forgo an instruction. But the Trial Judge who makes a careful record of the reasons why an instruction was (or was not) given is very likely to be sustained on appeal. See generally Saltzburg, The Unnecessarily Expanding Role of the American Trial Judge, 64 Va. L. Rev. 1 (1978).

[4] Relationship to Rule 403

Counsel should pay particular attention to the relationship between Rules 105 and 403. The mere fact that evidence is admissible for a limited purpose does not require that the evidence be admitted. Rule 105 does not purport to state that a limiting instruction is a panacea in all situations. If the prejudicial effect of evidence substantially outweighs its probative value, even after a limiting instruction, then the nonoffering party can argue that the evidence should be excluded because any limiting instruction would be inadequate.

Rules 403 and 105 are interrelated, because a Judge in determining the prejudice to be suffered from proffered evidence must necessarily take into account whether a limiting instruction can ameliorate this prejudice sufficiently so that the prejudice does not substantially outweigh the probative value of the proffered evidence. n7 The more effective the instruction would be in controlling prejudice, the less the risk of prejudice needs to be taken into account in the Rule 403 balancing process. This means that the offering party should be prepared to argue that a limiting instruction will cure the negative effect of the evidence, while the nonoffering party must articulate why the instruction will not suffice. It is well recognized that in some cases a limiting instruction will be insufficient, and proffered evidence must be altogether excluded under Rule 403. n8

[5] Form of Requests

The Rule directs the Trial Judge to restrict evidence to its proper scope and to instruct the jury accordingly if a request is made, but it does not articulate the requirements of a proper request. We suggest that an analogy be drawn to Rule 103, sections (a)(1) and (2), which require a specific objection or a reasonably definite offer of proof. n9

Counsel should not be permitted to request that "the Court do whatever is legal and correct." Rather, counsel should seek to illuminate all concerns for the Court and to suggest appropriate actions. Moreover, the request should be pinpointed to meet the problematic evidence. For example, if the objection is only to a single statement that is part of more complete testimony, the requested instruction should focus the jury on the problematic statement, rather than to the witness' testimony as a whole. n10

It is our view that lawyers who want a good limiting instruction must suggest specific language to the Court and not just say, "May I have a limiting instruction?"

[6] Timing and Content of Instructions

It is ordinarily preferable to give a limiting instruction immediately when the challenged evidence is introduced. n11 Otherwise, the passage of time and accumulation of other evidence may impair the usefulness of the instruction. However, reviewing Courts have generally held that the timing of an instruction is a matter of Trial Court discretion. n12 Thus, the Trial Judge may decide to delay a limiting instruction and include it with the general charge to the jury at the end of the case. n13 In some cases, though, an immediate instruction may be required, because a delayed instruction would be tantamount to giving none at all. For example, where the failure to give any instruction would be so serious as to amount to plain error, there is a strong argument that a Trial Court must give it immediately upon the introduction of the evidence. n14

Usually, the most effective limiting instruction is one that specifies and prohibits the impermissible use of the evidence; indeed, some Courts have required a "prohibited use" instruction. n15 Despite these rulings, there is no requirement in the language of Rule 105 that a limiting instruction actually articulate and prohibit the impermissible use of the evidence. Indeed, it may be appropriate in some cases to craft an instruction that specifies only a permissible use, and says nothing about forbidden uses, so as not to give the jury any ideas. n16 Most Courts have held that while a prohibited use instruction is ordinarily preferable, the Trial Judge has discretion in crafting an appropriate limiting instruction. n17

The objecting party has a strategic decision to make in asking for a "prohibited use" or a "permissible use" instruction. Asking for a permissible use instruction will not work unless the party can articulate all the possible permissible uses of the evidence--this may serve to give the adversary an idea on how to use the evidence that the adversary never thought about. On the other hand, asking for a prohibited use instruction risks giving the jury an idea about how to (impermissibly) use the evidence. This is another reason why counsel often choose not to request a limiting instruction even when they are entitled to one.

The Trial Judge is not bound by the exact language of an instruction proffered by counsel, even if it correctly states the law. Rule 105 imposes a mandatory duty to give a limiting instruction upon request, but it does not require the Court to give the exact instruction requested. n18 It follows, of course, that the Trial Court may refuse a proffered instruction that erroneously or incompletely states the law.

[7] Constitutional Limitations

The doctrine of limited admissibility rests on the assumption that the jury, when instructed to ignore evidence insofar as it proves a certain, impermissible point, will in fact follow the instruction. n19 Professor Damaska, in Evidence Law Adrift, has an interesting take on limiting instructions. He agrees with Judge Learned Hand and others that individual jurors are unlikely to follow limiting instructions. However, he argues that an instruction does have some utility during juror deliberations, because a juror would never try to convince other jurors on the basis of evidence or inference that the judge has told the jurors not to use. In other words, a juror may not follow an instruction in his own mind, but he would never explicitly encourage other jurors to disregard the instruction as well. Thus, juror arguments in deliberation will tend to be based solely on permissible uses of the evidence.

The Supreme Court has held that in some egregious circumstances a limiting instruction is constitutionally insufficient to protect the rights of a criminal defendant. The leading case is Bruton v. United States, 391 U.S. 123 (1968) , n20 where Bruton's codefendant, Evans, confessed; the confession was admissible against Evans but not against Bruton. The Court held that a limiting instruction -- to use the confession only against Evans, and not against Bruton -- was insufficient to protect Bruton's right to confrontation, because the hearsay statement was "powerfully incriminating" as to Bruton, and the jury would be very unlikely to follow the instruction. The Court reasoned that the instruction was an especially difficult one for laypersons to follow, because it required the jury to affirmatively use the evidence against Evans, but not at all against Bruton. Such mental gymnastics were considered beyond the power of any juror; the jury was asked to do more than simply ignore evidence that had come before it or to use the evidence for one purpose but not for another. Therefore, Evans' confession could not be admitted, even against Evans, in a joint trial with Bruton, because admission against Evans was tantamount to admission against Bruton. Bruton was grounded in the Confrontation Clause. The Court specifically held that Bruton's right to confront his accuser, Evans, was violated.

Bruton was extended to "interlocking" confessions (i.e., where both codefendants confess, but neither defendant's confession is admissible against the other) in Cruz v. New York, 481 U.S. 186 (1987) ; in these circumstances the confession of the nontestifying codefendant remains powerfully incriminating, and an instruction not to use it against the defendant is constitutionally insufficient to protect the defendant's constitutional rights. However, in Richardson v. Marsh, 481 U.S. 200 (1987) , the Court held that the Confrontation Clause is not violated where a codefendant's confession is redacted to eliminate any reference to the defendant's existence, and proper limiting instructions are provided. n21 Thereafter, in Gray v. Maryland, 523 U.S. 185 (1998) , the Court held that Bruton was violated when the codefendant's confession accused the defendant of taking part in the crime, and the confession was "redacted" so that the defendant's name was replaced by a "[deleted]." This was unlike Marsh, where the confession was redacted in such a way as to not implicate Marsh either directly or by the use of a "fill in the blanks" procedure. Thus, redaction of the confession is insufficient to satisfy Bruton when the jury can see through the redaction and easily conclude that the codefendant has accused the defendant of taking part in the crime. In such circumstances, the confession remains "powerfully incriminating" to the defendant even after redaction.

It is well established that there is no Bruton problem if the confessing codefendant takes the stand and is available for cross-examination; in that case, the defendant's right to confrontation is assured. n22 Finally, Bruton is not applicable where the confessing defendant's statement is admissible against the codefendant under a hearsay exception that satisfies the Confrontation Clause. n23 This is because the statement is properly admitted for its truth against the non-confessing codefendant.

(n19)Footnote 19. This assumption has its critics. Judge Learned Hand, in Nash v. United States, 54 F.2d 1006 (2d Cir. 1932) , complains that limiting instructions are nothing but "the recommendation to the jury of a mental gymnastic which is beyond not only their powers, but anybody's else." And yet a purpose-driven system evidence must depend on the assumption that jurors generally can generally follow instructions, because the alternative -- exclusion of evidence whenever it could be used for an impermissible purpose -- is unworkable.

(n20)Footnote 20. See also Jackson v. Denno, 378 U.S. 368 (1964) (instruction to jury, to consider defendant's confession only if it finds that it was voluntarily made, held constitutionally insufficient to protect the defendant against the use of an involuntary confession). But see Spencer v. Texas, 385 U.S. 554 (1967) (instruction as to appropriate use of prior crimes evidence was constitutionally sufficient).

(n21)Footnote 21. For more discussion of the Bruton problem and the role of limiting instructions, see *United States v. Washington, 952 F.2d 1402 (D.C. [1] Codefendant's Confession -- Limiting Instruction Required

United States v. Sauza-Martinez, 217 F.3d 754 (9th Cir. 2000) : The Court reversed a defendant's cocaine convictions arising from a trial in which he was tried with three other defendants. One of the codefendants had made statements to the authorities after her arrest, implicating both herself and the defendant. The parties agreed that these statements would be admissible against the codefendant as party-admissions, but not admissible against the defendant. They also agreed that the defendant's confrontation rights under Bruton v. United States n1 were not at stake, because the codefendant was going to testify at the trial. The defendant argued nonetheless that severance was required because he would suffer undue prejudice when the codefendant's statements were admitted. The government opposed the severance motion and promised to offer a limiting instruction when the statements were introduced, instructing the jury that the statements could not be used against the defendant. The Trial Judge denied the severance motion, the codefendant testified, and her post-arrest statements were introduced. But the government never offered a limiting instruction, the defendant never asked for one, and the Judge never gave one. Since the defendant failed to object to the statements when they were offered and did not request a limiting instruction, he could claim plain error only with respect to the Judge's failure to give a limiting instruction. The Court found plain error in this case. The error was plain because "both the Supreme Court and this court have made very clear that limiting instructions are necessary to reduce the prejudicial effect of joinder." And the error affected the defendant's substantial rights because (1) the codefendant's statement directly implicated the defendant, (2) the prejudice was accentuated by the government's references to the statement in closing argument, and (3) the other evidence against the defendant "was by no means overwhelming."

[2] Impeachment Evidence

United States v. Rhodes, 62 F.3d 1449 (D.C. Cir. 1995) , vacated on other grounds, 517 U.S. 1164 (1996) : Affirming a narcotics conviction, the Court overruled United States v. Copelin, 996 F.2d 379 (D.C. Cir. 1993) , and held there was no obligation on Trial Courts to give a limiting instruction sua sponte, since Rule 105 commands that the instruction shall be available "upon request" and the Supreme Court has taught that the Federal Rules displace common-law precedents to the extent they are inconsistent.

Gray v. Busch Entertainment Corp., 886 F.2d 14 (2d Cir. 1989) : The Court held that after a witness denied making a statement to a nurse employed by the defendant, it was permissible to offer the defendant's business record which recorded the statement to impeach the witness. Although the record was admissible only for impeachment purposes, the plaintiff failed to request an instruction, and the Court held that the general hearsay objection made by the plaintiff was insufficient to preserve for appeal a complaint that the evidence should have been admitted only for a limited purpose.

United States v. Barnes, 586 F.2d 1052 (5th Cir. 1978) : Affirming convictions for drug offenses, the Court held that the Trial Judge did not err in failing to give the jury a limiting instruction on the use of prior inconsistent statements of a codefendant. Except in limited circumstances identified in United States v. Sisto, 534 F.2d 616 (5th Cir. 1976) , the Court indicated that in most cases a limiting instruction will be given only upon request. Rule 105 requires a request for such an instruction and, unless such a request were made, only plain error would require a reversal. Plain error would seem to require a showing of great prejudice in a context in which the need for a limiting instruction is obvious.

Sherman v. Burke Contracting, Inc., 891 F.2d 1527 (11th Cir. 1990) : When a witness denied that the defendant had urged him to fire the plaintiff for making an EEOC complaint against the defendant, the plaintiff introduced a surreptitious tape recording in which the witness had previously recounted the conversation with the defendant. The Court held that although an instruction limiting use of the recording to impeachment purposes would have been correct, the Trial Judge had no duty to give the instruction sua sponte, and counsel's failure to request one did not result in a manifest miscarriage of justice.

[3] Motive

Staniewicz v. Beecham, Inc., 687 F.2d 526 (1st Cir. 1982) : Affirming a judgment for an employer in an age discrimination suit, the Court found that the results of a telephone audit conducted by the plaintiff's superior were not hearsay, since they were offered only to show why a meeting was called with appellant that ultimately led to his resignation. The Court rejected a complaint that no limiting instruction had been given, as none had been requested.

[4] Other Accidents

Hale v. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., 820 F.2d 928 (8th Cir. 1987) : Although the Court affirmed the liability portion of a judgment for a husband and wife who sued following a wheel rim explosion that injured the husband, it indicated that the Trial Judge's limiting instruction -- that evidence of other accidents was admitted to prove notice of the alleged defect -- would have been better if the Court had included a specific direction that the evidence could not be used to prove a defect.

[5] Other Crimes and Acts

United States v. Echeverri-Jaramillo, 777 F.2d 933 (4th Cir. 1985) : Although the Court stated that ordinarily a limiting instruction should be given when other crimes evidence is admitted, it found that no request for an instruction was made in this case and affirmed a defendant's drug convictions.

United States v. Stevens, 303 F.3d 711 (6th Cir. 2002) : Affirming convictions for arson and related offenses, the Court held that there was no plain error in the admission of evidence of the defendant's involvement in two prior arsons or in an instruction to the jury that the evidence was admitted to assist the jury "in deciding the defendant's intent, motive, knowledge, and whether the fire was an accident." The defendant claimed on appeal that the evidence was relevant to prove only intent, but the Court rejected the argument, reasoning that "[w]here a single, legitimate purpose supports the admission of the evidence under Rule 404(b), a trial court's admission of that evidence for additional reasons allowed under the rule does not constitute plain error." The Court also held that the Judge did not commit plain error by failing to repeat a limiting instruction each time other acts evidence was introduced.

United States v. Liefer, 778 F.2d 1236 (7th Cir. 1985) : Affirming convictions for conspiracy to distribute marijuana, the Court held that a Trial Judge's failure to give a limiting instruction concerning prior criminal acts will be reversible error only if it qualifies as plain error.

United States v. Unruh, 855 F.2d 1363 (9th Cir. 1987) : In a prosecution for misapplication of bank funds, the Court suggested that defense counsel should have requested a more specific instruction with respect to the use of evidence if counsel believed that the Trial Judge's proposed instruction was inadequate. In Borunda v. Richmond, 885 F.2d 1384 (9th Cir. 1988) , the Court held there was no error in admitting evidence of the plaintiffs' prior acquittals in a state criminal proceeding, which was offered as part of proof that they expended funds following the arrest which they claimed was unlawful. The Court observed that the Trial Judge gave a limiting instruction and that the defendants, who did not request a more elaborate instruction, could not complain on appeal that a more precise instruction was required. In United States v. Potter, n2 the Court said that limiting instructions should ordinarily be given when Rule 404(b) evidence is admitted against a criminal defendant, but found no error in the failure of the Trial Judge to instruct sua sponte.

United States v. Bridwell, 583 F.2d 1135 (10th Cir. 1978) : In this drug case, the Court noted that a jury instruction on the proper use of other crimes evidence generally must be given only upon the request of a defendant, not sua sponte by the Trial Judge.

Griffin v. City of Opa-Locka, 261 F.3d 1295 (11th Cir. 2001) : A former City employee brought a civil rights action against the City and its City Manager (Neal) after Neal sexually harassed and raped her. Neal did not object or request a limiting instruction when the plaintiff introduced evidence that Neal harassed other women and had a reputation as a harasser, to prove that the City had a custom or policy of being indifferent to women. The Court held that there was no plain error in failing to provide a limiting instruction sua sponte. In United States v. Rodriguez, 765 F.2d 1546 (11th Cir. 1985) , the Court indicated that it would have been better practice in a drug prosecution to give a limiting instruction when evidence of guns found on the dashboard of a car was admitted, but it held that it was not error to fail to give an instruction when no request for one was made.

[6] Other Defendants' Convictions

United States v. Prawl, 168 F.3d 622 (2d Cir. 1999) : The Court found reversible error in the Trial Judge's refusal to instruct the jury that a coconspirator's guilty plea was not to be used as evidence of the defendant's guilt. In United States v. Ramirez, 973 F.2d 102 (2d Cir. 1992) , the Court reversed the defendant's conviction for narcotics and firearms offenses, holding it was error to refuse to instruct the jury that they should not consider a testifying codefendant's guilty plea as evidence of the defendant's guilt.

United States v. Werme, 939 F.2d 108 (3d Cir. 1991) : Affirming a conviction for conspiracy to violate the Travel

Act, the Court noted that evidence of another party's guilty plea is not admissible to prove the defendant's guilt but may be admitted to show the witness' bias. The Court held it was error, but harmless, to fail to give a requested limiting instruction when a coconspirator's guilty plea was introduced. See also Government of Virgin Islands v. Mujahid, 990 F.2d 111 (3d Cir. 1993) (error, but harmless, merely to instruct jury to be cautious in evaluating cooperating witness without telling them witness' guilty plea could not be considered evidence of defendant's guilt).

United States v. Christian, 786 F.2d 203 (6th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed drug convictions, holding there was no plain error in the failure to give a limiting instruction sua sponte concerning a codefendant's guilty plea.

United States v. Lawrence, 934 F.2d 868 (7th Cir. 1991) : Affirming tax evasion convictions arising out of a "skimming" scheme, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in giving, at the government's instance, an instruction to carefully consider testimony from a prosecution witness who had been given immunity. Although the instruction is ordinarily given on behalf of the defense, the witness was basically a hostile witness, and Rule 607 permits any party to attack a witness' credibility.

United States v. Roth, 736 F.2d 1222 (8th Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed loansharking convictions, observing that admission of "evidence that a codefendant has pled guilty to the same offense is not error unless elicited as substantive proof of the defendant's guilt. Such evidence is clearly admissible to show the witness' acknowledgment of participation in the offense, or to reflect on his credibility." An instruction to the jury on the proper use of the conviction should be given when it is requested.

United States v. Harris, 738 F.2d 1068 (9th Cir. 1984) : The Court said that it was unfortunate that the jury was instructed not to speculate on the reasons why two coconspirators pleaded guilty and testified for the government. The defendants attempted to use the pleas to prove that the coconspirators had a motive to testify as the government wanted, and the instruction tended to undercut the attempt at impeachment. However, the Court found that another instruction fairly informed the jury that it should carefully examine the testimony of confessing codefendants.

United States v. Austin, 786 F.2d 986 (10th Cir. 1986) : The Court reversed two defendants' marijuana convictions because the government informed the jury that ten coconspirators had been previously tried and convicted for their parts in the alleged conspiracy. It concluded that the government engaged in "blatantly impermissible use of these convictions" and that it was plain error for the Trial Judge to have admitted evidence that two of the conspirators who testified had been convicted without giving the jury a limiting instruction.

[7] Right to an Instruction

United States v. Washington, 592 F.2d 680 (2d Cir. 1979) : The Court held that it was error in a case charging assault on a federal officer for the Trial Judge to refuse to instruct the jury that the fact that the defendant was previously convicted of a felony, the nature of which was not disclosed, could be considered only for a limited purpose.

United States v. Werme, 939 F.2d 108 (3d Cir. 1991) : Affirming a conviction for conspiracy to violate the Travel Act, the Court noted that evidence of another party's guilty plea is not admissible to prove the defendant's guilt but may be admitted to show the witness' bias. The Court held it was error (but harmless) to fail to give a requested limiting instruction when a coconspirator's guilty plea was introduced.

Hale v. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., 756 F.2d 1322 (8th Cir. 1985) : In a product liability action brought against manufacturers of a tire rim which separated and struck one of the plaintiffs as he attempted to inflate a truck tire, the Court found that the Trial Judge erred in refusing to give a limiting instruction when evidence was admissible for a limited purpose with respect to only one of the defendants. Subsequently, in Sprynczynatyk v. General Motors Corp., 771 F.2d 1112 (8th Cir. 1985) , the Court reversed a judgment for a plaintiff who brought an action alleging product liability and negligence in the design of automobile brakes, because the Trial Judge erred in admitting videotapes of a hypnotic session and in rejecting the defendant's request for a limiting instruction explaining that the videotapes were admitted only to evaluate the opinions of an expert witness. Since the tapes were important evidence and the jury was permitted to consider the truth of the contents, the Court held that the error was prejudicial to the defendant.

[8] Settlements

Brocklesby v. United States, 767 F.2d 1288 (9th Cir. 1985) : The Court affirmed a judgment against the manufacturer of an approach chart in a case arising out of an airline crash. It held that the Trial Judge properly admitted evidence of a compromise settlement between the manufacturer and the United States to attack the credibility of witnesses for the manufacturer and the government, and that the Trial Judge was not obliged to give a limiting instruction concerning the proper use of the evidence where no request for such an instruction was made.

[9] State of Mind

United States v. Dozier, 672 F.2d 531 (5th Cir. 1982) : In the course of affirming Hobbs Act and RICO convictions, the Court stated that if the defendant wanted a more particularized limiting instruction regarding testimony by government witnesses as to why they gave money to him, he "could, and should, have requested one."

[10] Tactical Choice

United States v. Brandon, 17 F.3d 409 (1st Cir. 1994) : After a witness in a bank fraud prosecution mentioned that two of the defendants were Jewish, defense counsel moved to dismiss and for a mistrial on the grounds that the testimony invited an impermissible inference that members of the same religion would be more likely to join a conspiracy and may have provoked anti-Semitic feelings. When the Trial Judge offered to try to ferret out any anti-Semitism on the jury, the counsel requested only dismissal, not further questioning of the jury, and expressed displeasure with the possibility of providing curative instructions that "would only magnify the problem." Affirming, despite the possible inappropriateness of the testimony, the Court found that the level of prejudice, if any, was not sufficiently significant to overturn the decision to accept "the defendants' tactical choice to forgo more appropriate methods of addressing the potential prejudice in favor of the unrealistic and unnecessary solution of a dismissal or a new trial."

[11] Timing of Instruction

United States v. Garcia, 848 F.2d 1324 (2d Cir. 1988) , rev'd on other grounds, 490 U.S. 858 (1989) : Affirming narcotics-related convictions, the Court held that it was not an abuse of discretion to decline to give a limiting instruction at the time physical evidence was admitted against some, but not all defendants, where the Judge instead instructed the jury on the admissibility of evidence in the general charge at the close of trial. In our judgment, the better practice is to give an instruction at the time evidence is offered, provided that a specific request is made for an instruction. In the instant case, the jury might well have assumed that all physical evidence was admissible against all defendants, especially in view of the fact that when conspirator statements were not admissible against all the Judge had so indicated. A timely limiting instruction works to guarantee that a jury does not incorrectly assume for much of a trial that evidence is admissible against all defendants and that it is not necessary for the jury to disabuse itself of the assumption at the last moment.

United States v. Chance, 306 F.3d 356 (6th Cir. 2002) : In a prosecution of a sheriff for racketeering offenses, the Court held that the defense had opened the door to cross-examination about the indictment or conviction of employees hired or promoted by the defendant. However, the Court was given "some pause" by the Trial Judge's refusal to give a contemporaneous limiting instruction on the proper uses of the cross-examination evidence. Nevertheless, it reasoned that Rule 105's requirement of an instruction "[w]hen ... [the evidence] is admitted" is ambiguous, so the matter is within the Judge's discretion. In this case, any prejudice the defendant suffered as a result of the timing of the instruction was minimal, so if there was any error in the Judge's refusal, it was harmless.

United States v. Butler, 102 F.3d 1191 (11th Cir. 1997) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in refusing to repeat at the end of the trial a limiting instruction given when Rule 404(b) evidence was excluded. Repeating the instruction might have unduly emphasized the evidence.

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Advisory Committee's Note

A close relationship exists between this rule and Rule 403 which requires exclusion when "probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury." The present rule recognizes the practice of admitting evidence for a limited purpose and instructing the jury accordingly. The availability and effectiveness of this practice must be taken into consideration in reaching a decision whether to exclude for unfair prejudice under Rule 403. In Bruton v. United States, 389 U.S. 818, 88 S. Ct. 126, 19 L. Ed. 2d 70 (1968) , the Court ruled that a limiting instruction did not effectively protect the accused against the prejudicial effect of admitting in evidence the confession of a codefendant which implicated him. The decision does not, however, bar the use of limited admissibility with an instruction where the risk of prejudice is less serious.

Similar provisions are found in Uniform Rule 6; California Evidence Code § 355; Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60-406; New Jersey Evidence Rule 6. The wording of the present rule differs, however, in repelling any implication that limiting or curative instructions are sufficient in all situations.

[2] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

Rule 106 as submitted by the Supreme Court (now Rule 105 in the bill) dealt with the subject of evidence which is admissible as to one party or for one purpose but is not admissible against another party or for another purpose. The Committee adopted this Rule without change on the understanding that it does not affect the authority of a court to order a severance in a multi-defendant case.

[3.1] Multiple Defendants [Go To Main]

United States v. Baker, 432 F.3d 1189 (11th Cir. 2005) : Reviewing the convictions of 11 defendants for participating in a cocaine distribution conspiracy, the Court held that it was an abuse of discretion, when admitting evidence that four of the defendants threatened a witness, to refuse to give a limiting instruction that such evidence was not relevant to the other seven defendants.

[3.2] Nonhearsay Purpose [Go To Main]

United States v. Colon-Diaz, 521 F.3d 29 (1st Cir. 2008) : Affirming a conviction for drug distribution, the Court found no plain error in admitting the testimony of an informant that federal agents asked her to go purchase drugs from the defendant's "yellow point" location. The evidence was admitted for the purpose of demonstrating why the informant went to that location, and not to prove that the defendant owned the location. The Court noted that the defense had approved a limiting instruction that the jury "may not take that answer for its veracity, that it was the defendant's yellow point." The Court also pointed out that other testimony by task force members offered to show why they went to the defendant's location or focused on the defendant was admitted to explain their actions, not for its truth, and was accompanied by appropriate limiting instructions.

[5] Other Crimes and Acts [Go To Main]

United States v. Fraser, 448 F.3d 833 (6th Cir. 2006) : In the prosecution of a check fraud scheme, the government introduced excerpts from a book the defendant had written that detailed a virtually identical scheme. Affirming, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence as proof of the defendant's intent. However, it was plain error to give a limiting instruction that the evidence could be used to prove "motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity or absence of mistake or accident," because there was no issue concerning motive, opportunity, or identity. The error was harmless, however, because the other listed purposes overlapped with intent, there was no showing that consideration of the book permitted any unfair inferences concerning identity, motive, or opportunity, and the instruction carefully addressed avoiding the propensity inference.

[7] Right to an Instruction [Go To Main]

United States v. Smith, 459 F.3d 1276 (11th Cir. 2006) : Appealing convictions for producing and possessing child pornography, the defendant argued that the Judge did not provide an adequate limiting instruction with regard to an out of court identification. Reviewing only for plain error because this argument was not raised at trial, the Court held that "because Federal Rule of Evidence 105, which provides for limiting instructions in appropriate circumstances, only operates upon request, the failure to give a limiting instruction is error only when such an instruction is requested."

[11] Timing of Instruction [Go To Main]

United States v. Beasley, 495 F.3d 142 (4th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed convictions for conspiring to distribute and possessing crack cocaine, finding no abuse of discretion in the denial of a request for a contemporaneous limiting instruction when evidence was admitted against one defendant but not another. The Court concluded that "[i]n this case, the district court met its obligation under Rule 105 when it instructed the jury at the conclusion of the trial that it 'is your duty to give separate personal consideration to the case of each individual defendant. When you do so, you should analyze what the evidence in the case shows with respect to that individual, leaving out of consideration entirely any evidence admitted solely against some other defendant or defendants.' Rule 106. Remainder of or Related Writings or Recorded Statements

When a writing or recorded statement or part thereof is introduced by a party, an adverse party may require the introduction at that time of any other part or any other writing or recorded statement which ought in fairness to be considered contemporaneously with it.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article I. General Provisions
CHAPTER 106 RULE 106

1-106 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 106.02

106.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Purpose of the Rule

Rule 106 provides that when a writing or recorded statement or a part thereof is introduced by any party, an adverse party can obtain admission of the entire statement or any other writing or recording so closely related that in fairness it too should be admitted. n1 When the Trial Court finds that fairness requires the admission of additional evidence, the proponent must decide between allowing all of the evidence to be admitted and withdrawing the originally proffered portions. n2

The Rule by its terms applies to separate writings and recordings as well as to excised portions of a single writing or recording. n3 Thus, if the offering party proffers a reply letter, a Court might find it necessary to place the letter in context by admitting the letter to which reply was made. n4

The party who wants to complete the record is entitled under the Rule to compel the offer of the additional information at the time the proponent offers the partial evidence, rather than waiting until a later stage of the trial. Thus, Rule 106 is a procedural device governing the timing of completion evidence. It has been stated that the Rule is "primarily designed to affect the order of proof." n5 As such, the Rule reduces the risk that a writing or recording will be taken out of context and that an initial misleading impression will take hold in the mind of the jury. n6 The opponent has discretion, of course, to wait to offer the completing evidence until a later point. But the Rule recognizes that sometimes waiting until later to put an unfair presentation of harmful evidence in context is just not good enough.

The Rule does not mean that an entire writing or recording is automatically admissible whenever part of it is introduced. As one Court put it, the remainder of a writing or recording is admissible only when necessary "to (1) explain the admitted portion, (2) place the admitted portion in context, (3) avoid misleading the trier of fact, or (4) insure a fair and impartial understanding." n7 As another Court stated, "the trial judge need only admit the remaining portions of the statement which are needed to clarify or explain the portion already received." n8

Rule 106 does not by any means prohibit a party from introducing only part rather than all of a statement. There may be many good reasons for admitting an excerpt, including the possibility that some parts of the entire statement may be irrelevant, inadmissible hearsay, or may even be unduly prejudicial to the opponent. Rule 106 simply provides that excerpts will be evaluated to determine whether the proponent has made an unfairly selective presentation.

[2] Oral Statements

While Rule 106 by its terms applies only to writings and recordings, the principle of completeness embodied in the Rule has been applied to the introduction of oral out-of-court statements as well. Whether this is mandated by Rule 106 or by Rule 611 is unimportant. n9 The important point is that where a party introduces a portion of an oral statement, the adversary is entitled to have omitted portions introduced at the same time, insofar as that is necessary to correct any misimpression that the initially proffered portion would create.

[3] Admitting Hearsay

Suppose a portion of an oral or written statement is introduced and the opponent wants to introduce another portion under the completeness principle -- and it is a portion that would be hearsay if offered independently. This situation arises most often when the prosecution in a criminal case introduces a portion of the defendant's confession. That portion is admissible as an admission. Often, however, the defendant's confession is not self-inculpatory in all respects. Defendants when confessing routinely attempt to exculpate or explain their conduct in whole or in part, while admitting to taking some part in a crime. When these exculpatory portions are offered under the completeness principle, they are often met with a hearsay objection. Can Rule 106 essentially be used as a hearsay exception, assuming that the hearsay statement is necessary to complete an admitted portion of a statement?

The Rule does not on its face state that hearsay is admissible. This has led some Courts to hold that Rule 106 operates solely as a timing device, affecting the order of proof -- it does not make admissible what would otherwise be excluded. n10

We believe that these rulings are misguided and contrary to the completeness principle embodied in Rule 106. A party should not be able to admit an incomplete statement that gives an unfair impression, and then object on hearsay grounds to completing statements that would rectify the unfairness.

The appropriate way to resolve the hearsay issue is to hold that the party who offers an incomplete statement or document forfeits any hearsay objection to completing evidence that is necessary to correct a misleading impression. Rule 106 is thus consistent with the "open door" principle. n11 It is up to the proponent of the initial portion to decide whether to forgo that portion, or to forgo the hearsay objection to the remainder.

[4] "Fairness" Under the Rule

The Rule requires admission of completing evidence only when it ought "in fairness" to be considered with the admitted statement. Sometimes it is difficult to determine whether "fairness" mandates the admission of allegedly completing evidence. n12 United States v. Branch, 91 F.3d 699 (5th Cir. 1996) , offers a case in point. Branch arose out of the notorious gun battle between ATF agents and members of the Branch Davidian sect in Waco, which gave rise to the standoff between FBI agents and the Davidians. After the standoff came to its tragic conclusion, several surviving members of the sect were tried for firearms offenses as well as for conspiracy to murder the four ATF agents who were killed in the initial raid.

One of the defendants who was convicted in Branch, Jaime Castillo, had made a confession to a Texas Ranger that contained both inculpatory and exculpatory statements. At trial, the inculpatory statements were testified to by the Ranger, but when Castillo sought to bring out the exculpatory statements, he was prohibited from doing so on grounds of hearsay. A short discussion of the nature of the defense set forth in Branch, and the nature of the exculpatory statements, is necessary to understand Castillo's argument on appeal that the Trial Court violated the rule of completeness. Castillo was charged with and convicted of two offenses: using or carrying a firearm during a crime of violence, and aiding and abetting the voluntary manslaughter of federal agents. Castillo argued, among other things, that he did not know that the men approaching the compound were federal agents; that he acted in self-defense; that the federal agents used excessive force; and that he never fired a shot at any federal agent and did not take part in any violence or aid or abet any manslaughter. The inculpatory statements made by Castillo and testified to by the Texas Ranger included the following: (1) Castillo donned battle dress upon learning of an impending raid by federal agents; (2) Castillo went to retrieve his AK 47 rifle in preparation for a gun battle; (3) When the gun battle started, Castillo's rifle failed, and so he went into a bedroom to obtain a handgun; (4) After a cease fire was declared, Castillo went into the kitchen and picked up an AK 47 rifle; he looked out the window and saw a dead ATF agent; (5) Castillo was given his AK 47 rifle and ammunition a few weeks before the ATF raid.

The exculpatory statements, which Castillo sought to introduce, included the following: (1) When he went to find the handgun in the bedroom, he saw a fellow Davidian lying there dead, with a bullet wound in his head; (2) After retrieving the handgun, he went and hid in another bedroom for the entire time of the gun battle, and he never fired a shot; (3) His duties at the compound were to help construct the tornado shelter, play the drums, and study the Bible.

The Branch Court assumed that if the rule of completeness were applicable to Castillo's exculpatory statements, those statements would have been admissible despite the fact that they were hearsay. The question was whether "fairness" required admission of the exculpatory portions. The test employed by the Branch Court was whether the omitted portions were "necessary to qualify, explain, or place into context the portion already introduced."

After considering the excluded exculpatory statements, the Branch Court found that while each of them was relevant to Castillo's defense, none of them was necessary to qualify, explain, or place into context the incriminating statements. For example, Castillo argued that his statement about hiding in the bedroom during the gun battle and never firing a shot was necessary to correct the misimpression left from his inculpatory statements. He argued that the jury may have been misled into believing that because Castillo picked up several guns, he might have actually fired a gun on the day of the battle. The Court, however, held that the "cold fact" that Castillo had retrieved several guns during the day was neither qualified nor explained by the fact that he never fired them. Castillo was charged with using or carrying a gun during a crime of violence, and this charge did not require a finding that he shot a gun. The Court concluded: "We do not doubt the exculpatory nature of the excluded statement, but that does not require its admission under Rule 106."

Finally, the Court rejected Castillo's contention that the statement about his Biblical and percussionist duties at the compound was improperly excluded. In light of his unvarnished statements about carrying guns, there was no misimpression that these exculpatory statements could qualify or place into context. On the rule of completeness, the Branch Court concluded as follows:

> We acknowledge the danger inherent in the selective admission of post-arrest statements. Neither the Constitution nor Rule 106, however, requires the admission of the entire statement once any portion is admitted in a criminal prosecution. We do no violence to criminal defendants' constitutional rights by applying Rule 106 as written and requiring that a defendant demonstrate with particularity the unfairness in the selective admission of his post-arrest statement.

The Branch opinion can usefully be contrasted with the Seventh Circuit's opinion in United States v. Haddad, 10 F.3d 1252, 1258 (7th Cir. 1993) . Haddad was a prosecution for a firearms offense. In a post-arrest confession, the defendant stated that he knew that marijuana was under his bed, but that he did not know that a gun was also under the bed. At trial, the inculpatory statement (knowledge about marijuana) was admitted as an admission, but the exculpatory statement (lack of knowledge about the gun) was excluded as hearsay. The Court of Appeals found that the confession had been improperly (though harmlessly) redacted to exclude the exculpatory statement about the gun. The Haddad Court concluded, properly we believe, that "the admission of the inculpatory portion only (i.e., that [Haddad] knew of the location of the marijuana) might suggest, absent more, that the defendant also knew of the gun." That would clearly give an inaccurate account of the defendant's culpability, because he specifically denied knowing about the gun. The Court concluded therefore that the "whole statement should be admitted in the interest of completeness and context, to avoid misleading inferences, and to help insure a fair and impartial understanding of the evidence."

The more expansive approach of Haddad is clearly preferable to that of Branch, especially in criminal cases where confessions are obviously so powerfully incriminating. It is critical that defendants be allowed some leeway to place these confessions in context, and Rules 106 and 611(a), when properly read, provide the necessary flexibility. It should also be noted that the more expansive Haddad view of Rule 106 helps to prevent the prosecution from admitting portions of a confession as a way to put pressure on the defendant to take the stand. If the completing portions of the statement are not admitted, defendants may have no choice but to take the stand and explain that the prosecution took their prior statements out of context.

Although post-arrest statements may pose special problems for defendants, prosecutors also have an interest in ensuring that testimony about oral statements is complete. In United States v. Tarantino, 846 F.2d 1384 (D.C. Cir. 1988) , it was the prosecutor who offered prior statements on redirect examination to complete what had been adduced on cross-examination. The case of United States v. Maccini, 721 F.2d 840 (1st Cir. 1983) , is similar, permitting a prosecutor to have additional portions of a witness' grand jury testimony read after defense counsel introduced some of the testimony.

[5] Timing Aspect of the Rule

Rule 106 is one of the rare examples of an evidence rule that permits one party to require another party to introduce more evidence than the latter desires to offer, or at least to have the latter party's case-in-chief interrupted while additional evidence is offered. Contrast Rule 106 with the typical approach to oral trial testimony. Questions asked on direct examination may produce a story that is shaded to the advantage of the party calling the witness. However, clarification does not occur until cross-examination. Thus, the Rule provides protection against initial offers of incomplete writings and recordings that is not provided against initial offers of incomplete testimony. The reason for limiting the Rule to writings and recordings, at least as to timing, was that a process of immediate interruption was thought to be unwieldy for witness testimony. The broader principle of completeness applies to writings, recordings, and oral testimony, as discussed above; but the more limited principle of contemporaneous presentation embodied in the Rule can be applied only to writings and recordings.

Under Rule 106, a Trial Judge applying concepts of "fairness" must take into account the possible disruption of a party's order of proof, and balance that against the risk to the adversary that a misimpression could not be undone at a later point.

Rule 106 authorizes the introduction of completing evidence during the initial presentation of the writing or recording, but it does not require the adversary to introduce the material at that point. The adversary may in some cases find it more effective to present the completing evidence on cross-examination or rebuttal. n13

[6] Relationship to Best Evidence Rule

Rule 106 serves as a reminder that if a writing is offered, special rules may govern its introduction. Rule 106 is one of the best examples. See also Rules 803(5) and 803(18). One theme concerning writings seems to run through the Rules: writings, it is feared, may have undue impact on a trier of fact, especially a jury. Thus, special controls have been developed to govern the admissibility of writings.

One of these controls is the Best Evidence Rule, found in Article X (Rules 1001-1008). There is a relationship between the Best Evidence Rule and Rule 106, and it has not received much attention. If a witness is permitted to testify about the contents of a missing writing -- when a writing has been lost, for example -- what impact should Rule 106 have? Plainly, the Rule should be read to permit the questioning of the witness on cross-examination about related writings or parts of the missing writing that are necessary for a full understanding of the meaning of the terms of the writing already in evidence. But when the production of a writing is excused and oral testimony is accepted, the writing itself is not present and there is no danger that it will have an undue impact on the jury that could not be corrected at a later point. Thus, there is not an immediate need to interrupt direct examination with questions by an opposing party. That is, the timing provisions of Rule 106 should not be applicable in these circumstances. However, the spirit of both this Rule n14 and Rule 611 suggests that a broad view of the "scope of direct examination" should be taken to assure that full and fair cross-examination occurs and that testimony about documents is placed in proper context. n15

[7] Tape Recordings

How does the rule of completeness apply to tape recordings where part of the recording is inaudible? The question is whether the inaudible portions would provide important context or alleviate misimpressions. If so, Rule 106 could be invoked to require the audible portions to be summarized or recharacterized, n16 or to require exclusion of the entire recording. But of course the Trial Court must engage in some supposition in determining whether the inaudible portions are necessary to give a complete account. n17 The admissibility of portions of a tape where other portions are inaudible is necessarily committed to the discretion of the Trial Court. n18 Generally speaking, the chance of exclusion of the entirety should increase with the percentage of inaudible material on the tape. n19 However, the presumption should be that the audible portions are admissible if relevant, and that the risk presented by inaudible portions can be rectified by an appropriate limiting instruction. n20

[8] Prior Consistent Statements

Rule 106 has sometimes been invoked to allow the admission of a prior consistent statement of a testifying witness. This can occur when the witness is impeached with a prior inconsistent statement, and counsel argues that another statement consistent with the in-court testimony will serve to explain away the alleged inconsistency. Thus, the argument is that an inconsistent statement was taken out of context and that a consistent statement must be introduced in order to alleviate the misimpression.

Where both statements -- consistent and inconsistent -- are contained in a writing or recording, then Rule 106 applies by its terms. For example, in United States v. Pierre, 781 F.2d 329 (2d Cir. 1986) , a DEA agent testified to an inculpatory statement made by Pierre in an interview. On cross-examination, he was confronted with the handwritten notes he took during the interview. These notes contained a series of "fragmentary phrases," and did not mention Pierre's inculpatory statement. On redirect, the Trial Court permitted the witness to testify that he had prepared typewritten notes three days after the interview, and he was allowed to read these notes. The typewritten notes included Pierre's inculpatory statement. The Court of Appeals relied on Rule 106 and held that admission of a prior consistent statement is warranted "when the consistent statement will amplify or clarify the allegedly inconsistent statement." In Pierre, the consistent statement could corroborate the agent's explanation of the apparent inconsistency. The agent explained that the inculpatory statement was not included in the original notes because he was just jotting down certain phrases in the heat of the moment; after the interview, and while preparing the formal report, the agent had the opportunity to write down the inculpatory statement for the first time. He did not need to write the statement down initially, since it was something that he was unlikely to forget.

While Rule 106 does not explicitly apply if either the prior inconsistent statement or the consistent statement is oral rather than written, it is clear that the reasoning of the Rule should still apply. n21 As the Court in Pierre put it: "It matters not whether such use is deemed a permissible type of rehabilitation or only an invocation of the principle of completeness, though not a precise use of Rule 106."

Note that where the prior consistent statement will explain an alleged inconsistency and thus rehabilitate the witness, it is admissible under the principle of completeness even if it is not admissible for its truth under the terms of Rule 801(d)(1)(B). n22 For example, in Pierre, there was no charge that the witness had recently fabricated his testimony, or that he had an improper motive. These are requirements for admissibility under Rule 801(d)(1)(B); but that Rule deals with the substantive use of prior consistent statements. n23 Where a consistent statement is admitted to explain an inconsistency and is not admissible as substantive evidence under Rule 801(d)(1)(B), the adversary is of course entitled to a limiting instruction as to the appropriate use of the evidence.

(n14)Footnote 14. The spirit of this Rule has resulted in the admission of documents to which one party has made reference at trial in order to clarify for the trier of fact the contents of the documents. See, e.g., United States v. Baron, 602 F.2d 1248 (9th Cir. 1979) , a case in which defense counsel attempted to impeach the key government witness in a bribery case by referring to the witness' prior memoranda in order to suggest that they really were consistent with trial testimony. See also United States v. Juarez, 549 F.2d 1113 (7th Cir. 1977) (reports of government agent used by defense counsel in cross-examination properly admitted under Rules 106 and 801(d)(1)(B) even though neither Rule "literally applicable" since witness' testimony not as good as reports in determining whether reports constituted accurate summaries).

(n15)Footnote 15. See, e.g., United States v. Alvarado, 882 F.2d 645 (2d Cir. 1989) (Rule 611(a) basically applies Rule 106 to oral statements); United States v. Castro, 813 F.2d 571 (2d Cir. 1987) (while Rule 106 concerns only written or recorded statements, Rule 611 permits a Court to require a party to provide a fair context for an oral statement).

(n16)Footnote 16. See United States v. Phelps, 733 F.2d 1464 (11th Cir. 1984) (Trial Judge read a summary of a tape to a jury, because he was concerned about inaudible portions; no abuse of discretion).

(n17)Footnote 17. Sometimes the problem with a tape recording is not whether inaudible portions render it incomplete, but rather whether the tape "says" what the proponent says it does. The adversary may dispute the proponent's interpretation of what the declarants stated on the tape. This dispute is a question of authentication: is the document or recording what the proponent says it is? For a further discussion of the question of accuracy of a tape recording, see the commentary and annotations to Rule 901.

Devous, 764 F.2d 1349 (10th Cir. 1985)* ("admissibility of tape recordings that are partially inaudible lies within the sound discretion of the trial court"); United States v. Enright, 579 F.2d 980 (6th Cir. 1978) (no abuse of discretion where Trial Court carefully considered, and rejected, defense argument that audible portions of a tape could be taken out of context due to the fact that much of the tape, alleged to be clarification, was inaudible).

(n19)Footnote 19. See United States v. Brinklow, 560 F.2d 1008 (10th Cir. 1977) (tape recording is admissible unless the inaudible portions are so substantial as to render the tape untrustworthy; this question is left to the sound discretion of the Trial Judge).

(n20)Footnote 20. See United States v. Arango-Correa, 851 F.2d 54 (2d Cir. 1988) (there is a "clear preference for the admission of recordings notwithstanding some ambiguity or inaudibility, as long as the recordings are probative").

CHAPTER 106 RULE 106

1-106 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 106.03

106.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Associated Documents

Phoenix Assocs. III v. Stone, 60 F.3d 95 (2d Cir. 1995) : Reversing a judgment for the defendant in an oral contract dispute between a partnership and a business associate, the Court held that an accountant's work papers should have been admitted to explain how various figures on certain financial statements were derived. It concluded that the jury could not have reached an impartial understanding of the financial statements without the work papers.

[2] Books Relied Upon

United States v. Latham, 754 F.2d 747 (7th Cir. 1985) : The Court found that the Trial Judge properly excluded books that the defendant claimed to have relied on in deciding not to file tax returns and admitted only portions that the defendant quoted during his testimony. The books contained only general criticism of the Tax Code and did not relate to the charges made against the defendant.

[3] Burden of Invoking the Rule

United States v. Sweiss, 814 F.2d 1208 (7th Cir. 1987) : In an arson prosecution, the Court held that Rule 106 gave a defendant a right to offer a tape recording of a conversation between himself and the main prosecution witness if the recording were relevant to explain later recorded statements that were admitted. In this case, however, the defendant failed to specify the portions of the recording that would qualify or explain the other recordings, so it was no abuse of discretion to refuse to admit the tape recording.

United States v. King, 351 F.3d 859 (8th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed a conviction for violating the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of certain tape-recorded conversations between the defendant and coconspirators and no abuse of discretion in denying the defendant's request to publish all the tapes in their entirety. The defendant was permitted to present additional tape recordings or transcripts to the jury to provide context to his statements, but he did not specify the remaining portions of the tapes that were relevant to the issue at trial and qualified or explained the portions admitted, nor did he show that the portions admitted misled the jury or provided an incomplete or distorted view.

United States v. Larranaga, 787 F.2d 489 (10th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed a perjury conviction, finding no error in the exclusion of the defendant's entire grand jury testimony after the government introduced portions relevant to the perjury charge. The Court found that the defendant had not invoked Rule 106 and had failed to claim that other portions should have been admitted "in fairness."

[4] Experts' Reports

Engebretsen v. Fairchild Aircraft Corp., 21 F.3d 721 (6th Cir. 1994) : Affirming a defendant's judgment in a product liability case, the Court held that reports containing opinions of defense expert witnesses as well as prejudicial hearsay should not have been admitted under Rules 702 and 703 simply because the experts testified. Rule 702 permits admission of expert opinion testimony, and Rule 703 permits an expert to base an opinion on inadmissible evidence but not to introduce that evidence for its truth. However, where the plaintiff extensively cross-examined the witnesses regarding the reports, the door was opened to their admission under the rule of completeness.

[5] Films, Movies, etc.

Brewer v. Jeep Corp., 724 F.2d 653 (8th Cir. 1983) : A judgment for the defendant in an action by an injured driver was upheld on appeal, as the Court ruled that the Trial Judge properly refused to admit into evidence a film commissioned by the company, which dealt with Jeep rollovers, unless a companion report written by the film-makers was also admitted.

[6] Hearsay in Documents

Engebretsen v. Fairchild Aircraft Corp., 21 F.3d 721 (6th Cir. 1994) : Affirming a defendant's judgment in a product liability case, the Court held that reports containing opinions of defense expert witnesses as well as prejudicial hearsay should not have been admitted under Rules 702 and 703 simply because the experts testified. Rule 702 permits admission of expert opinion testimony, and Rule 703 permits an expert to base an opinion on inadmissible evidence but not to introduce that evidence for its truth. However, where the plaintiff extensively cross-examined the witnesses regarding the reports, the door was opened to their admission under the rule of completeness.

Haygood v. Auto-Owners Ins. Co., 995 F.2d 1512 (11th Cir. 1993) : As evidence that the plaintiff had made material misstatements in a claim for fire damage to his house, the defendant insurer offered part of the plaintiff's statement under oath indicating he was current on all of his obligations at the time, which was inconsistent with other evidence indicating that he was delinquent. The Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit under Rule 106 another part of his statement showing he had a "1A" credit rating, as that hearsay within hearsay was not needed to qualify or place in context the statement about being current on all obligations.

[7] Impeachment Versus Substantive Evidence

United States v. Pierre, 781 F.2d 329 (2d Cir. 1986) : After the defense in a heroin prosecution elicited testimony from an agent that his notes of his interview with the defendant contained no reference to the defendant's refusal to make a controlled delivery, the Trial Judge admitted evidence that the agent's formal report mentioned the refusal. Holding that the evidence was properly admitted, the Court observed in a footnote that Rule 106 is silent as to the permissible uses of a document offered for completeness. It reasoned that "[w]here the first document is introduced not as substantive evidence but only to impeach credibility, the document offered for completeness would seem to be appropriately introduced also not as substantive evidence but only to rehabilitate credibility."

United States v. Myers, 972 F.2d 1566 (11th Cir. 1992) : In a civil rights prosecution of an officer for using a stun gun on arrestees, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in limiting admission of a statement made by the defendant during an internal affairs investigation to the parts concerning the number of times he had used the stun gun, as the prosecutor had introduced the statement only to impeach the defendant on that issue. The parts consistent with the defendant's trial testimony were admitted for rehabilitation, but the parts of the statement dealing with the circumstances and the defendant's motivation were not admissible under the Rule.

[8] Offered To Provide Context for Evidence Introduced by Proponent

Echo Acceptance Corp. v. Household Retail Servs., 267 F.3d 1068 (10th Cir. 2001) : In an action for breach of contract between financing companies, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding three letters the defendant had sent to the plaintiff. The Court rejected an argument that the letters were nonhearsay because they were offered to provide context for other exhibits. The other exhibits had been admitted either on stipulation or by the defendant, so the defendant could not argue that the letters were necessary to cure a misleading impression.

[9] Opinion in Document

Polk v. Yellow Freight Sys., 876 F.2d 527 (6th Cir. 1989) : The Court held in a wrongful discharge case that the defendant's attempt to rebut a witness' testimony by quoting from an investigator's report was properly conditioned on also admitting the investigator's conclusion in the report about the incident because the conclusion was relevant to whether the defendant's action was pretextual.

[10] Oral Statements

[a] Completing Evidence for Accused

United States v. Castro, 813 F.2d 571 (2d Cir. 1987) : In a cocaine prosecution, the government offered evidence of a statement by the defendant, without references that would implicate a nontestifying codefendant. Rejecting the defendant's argument that Rule 106 required admission of the omitted references, the Court noted that the Rule governs only writings, but observed that even the substance of oral statements must be presented fairly and that the Trial Judge can utilize Rule 611(a) to ensure fairness. In this case the defendant was able to convey to the jury by other means the essential point he wanted to make with the omitted references. Thus, the Judge reasonably balanced interests of judicial economy in trying defendants jointly against the unfairness of using a redacted statement, and any error was harmless. In a narcotics case, United States v. Terry, n1 the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit testimony that defendants refused to supply palm prints pursuant to Court order while excluding statements made by the defendants that they wanted their lawyers present when the prints were taken. Although the statements were not required to be admitted under Rule 106 since they were oral statements, not writings, they qualified for admission under Rule 803(3).

United States v. Wilkerson, 84 F.3d 692 (4th Cir. 1996) : The arresting officer in a bank robbery case testified that he found a suitcase containing some of the bait money in the defendant's car; in response, the defendant sought to admit statements he made to the officer explaining the presence of the bait money. The Court found Rule 106 inapplicable.

First, the Rule "applies only to writings or recorded statements, not to conversations." Second, the officer's testimony was limited to what he found in the car; therefore, "the rule of completeness, if it applied to oral conversations, would not have applied here where there was no partially introduced conversation that needed clarification or explanation." Third, even if Rule 106 were to apply, "it would not render admissible the evidence which is otherwise inadmissible under the hearsay rule." In United States v. Smith, n2 the Court affirmed a conviction for involvement in burning a barn, holding there was no error in rejecting the defendant's request that a codefendant's prior testimony at his own trial, in which he recanted a confession, be admitted during the government's case at the same time when the codefendant's confession was admitted as evidence.

United States v. Burns, 162 F.3d 840 (5th Cir. 1998) : In order to protect the Bruton rights of a nontestifying codefendant, the Trial Judge ordered that investigating agents recount statements made by two defendants in non-custodial interviews without including references in the interviews to the codefendant. The Court found no reversible error in redacting the statements or denying a severance, since most of the omitted references implicated the codefendant without thereby exculpating the declarant, and any error in omission of the few exculpatory statements was harmless. In a prosecution of members of the Branch Davidian sect arising out of the ill-fated raid at Waco by ATF agents, United States v. Branch, 91 F.3d 699 (5th Cir. 1996) , the Court found no error in the Trial Judge's exclusion of the exculpatory parts of the post-arrest statement of a defendant -- even though the Judge had admitted the inculpatory parts. See the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 106.02[4].

United States v. Li, 55 F.3d 325 (7th Cir. 1995) : In the trial of a kickback scheme between a union and a health care provider, the government called the union president to testify to a conversation in which the defendant admitted making payments to his codefendant. The president was not permitted to testify, however, that when asked why he did not report the codefendant's apparent extortion earlier, the defendant replied that "Danny would put an axe in my head." Reiterating its analysis in United States v. Haddad (infra), that Rule 611(a) gives Trial Judges the same authority regarding oral statements as Rule 106 grants regarding written and recorded statements, the Court found there was no abuse of discretion. The alleged threat was not necessary to explain or understand the defendant's admission, and it was not needed to avoid misleading the jury, since the defendant had explicitly declined to pursue a coercion defense. In United States v. Haddad, 10 F.3d 1252 (7th Cir. 1993) (see the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 106.02[4]), a prosecution for felon firearm possession, an officer testified that the defendant admitted when arrested knowing marijuana was under his bed, but the defense was not permitted to elicit from the officer that the defendant had denied knowledge of a gun found under the bed at the same time. The Court held it was error (but harmless) to preclude the testimony, which was part and parcel of the inculpatory statement.

United States v. Ortega, 203 F.3d 675 (9th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed convictions for drug and firearm offenses, finding no error when the defendant was not permitted to introduce exculpatory portions of his oral confession to an INS agent after the prosecution had introduced inculpatory portions. The Court said that "the rule of completeness, see Rule 106 ..., applies only to written and recorded statements," and that even if it did apply, exclusion was proper "because these statements would still have constituted inadmissible hearsay." The Court later noted that the agent's testimony did not distort the meaning of the defendant's statements because the defendant testified to the facts not mentioned by the agent.

United States v. Ramirez-Perez, 166 F.3d 1106 (11th Cir. 1999) : The Court held that Rule 106 did not apply to testimony from an officer concerning parts of an oral statement that the defendant made after an arrest. The Court stated that Rule 106 applies only when a written document is admitted into evidence directly or indirectly. The Court noted that the officer's testimony did not refer, directly or indirectly, to a written statement to the same effect signed by the defendant after he made his oral statement.

[b] Oral Statements -- Completing Evidence for Prosecution

United States v. Tarantino, 846 F.2d 1384 (D.C. Cir. 1988) : Affirming drug conspiracy convictions, the Court held that prior statements by a government witness were properly offered on redirect examination, since the defense had used portions of the statements on cross-examination and the government merely wished to rebut the use of the statements by showing the portions in context.

United States v. Maccini, 721 F.2d 840 (1st Cir. 1983) : Affirming convictions for conspiracy and submitting a false statement, the Court cited Rule 106 as support for upholding a ruling that permitted the prosecutor, during defense cross-examination of a government witness, to have portions of the witness' grand jury testimony read to the jury in addition to those that defense counsel read. While technically Rule 106 does not seem to cover oral statements, we believe that the philosophy of the Rule properly extends to this situation and that the Trial Judge has authority under Rule 611(a), as well as Rule 106, to control the scope and order of proof so that a jury is not confused or misled.

Government of Virgin Islands v. Archibald, 987 F.2d 180 (3d Cir. 1993) : The mother of a ten-year-old victim of aggravated rape was asked on cross-examination whether she had ever heard the victim discussing the defendant with her fifteen-year-old sister, who was the defendant's girlfriend. Reversing the conviction, the Court held that the question did not open the door to redirect examination of the mother as to whether the fifteen-year-old might have told the mother she observed the defendant and the victim together. The Court stated that "[t]he principle of completeness does not apply ... to separate utterances or occurrences pertaining to a different subject."

United States v. Draiman, 784 F.2d 248 (7th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed a defendant's mail fraud conviction arising from his filing fraudulent insurance claims following a burglary. After the defendant elicited on cross-examination of a detective a statement by one of the burglars tending to show that the burglars were capable of hauling away a lot of material, the government was properly permitted to elicit on redirect the burglar's statement that $25,000 of merchandise had been taken. The Court stated that the defendant "could not open it [the statement] up to seek only as much as would leave a favorable, but erroneous, impression with the jury."

United States v. Woolbright, 831 F.2d 1390 (8th Cir. 1987) : In a drug prosecution, the defendant successfully offered a statement by a female companion that a suitcase containing the drugs belonged to her. The government responded by offering her statement that she and the defendant were on a "honeymoon trip." Although the defendant and the woman were not married, the statement was offered to establish that the pair had more than a casual relationship. The Court held that the statement was not admissible under Rule 106, since the Rule is limited to writings, and neither it nor Rule 611 empowers a Court to admit unrelated hearsay even in a writing. The statement was held properly admitted under a residual hearsay exception, however.

[11] Oral Testimony About Writings

Beech Aircraft Corp. v. Rainey, 488 U.S. 153 (1988) : The Supreme Court agreed with the Court of Appeals, 784 F.2d 1523 (11th Cir. 1986), reinstated, 827 F.2d 1498 (11th Cir. 1987) (en banc), that a Trial Judge had erred in refusing to permit a plaintiff, who had been called as an adverse witness and asked about a letter he had written to a Navy officer concerning his wife's death, to testify on cross-examination as to other aspects of the letter. The Court reasoned that, whether or not Rule 106 actually applied to the facts, "[c]learly the concerns underlying Rule 106 are relevant here, but, as the general rules of relevancy permit a ready resolution to this case, we need go no further in exploring the scope and meaning of Rule 106." The Court held that "when one party has made use of a portion of a document, such that misunderstanding or distortion can be averted only through presentation of another portion, the material required for completeness is ipso facto relevant and therefore admissible under Rules 401 and 402."

[12] Otherwise Inadmissible Evidence Offered To Complete

United States v. Sutton, 801 F.2d 1346 (D.C. Cir. 1986) : In a prosecution arising out of a conspiracy to bribe federal officials, the Court reasoned that "Rule 106 can adequately fulfill its function only by permitting the admission of some otherwise inadmissible evidence when the court finds in fairness that the proffered evidence should be considered contemporaneously." It added, however, that "the provision of Rule 106 grounding admission on 'fairness' reasonably should be interpreted to incorporate the common-law requirements that the evidence be relevant, and be necessary to qualify or explain the already introduced evidence allegedly taken out of context" and that "[i]n almost all cases we think Rule 106 will be invoked rarely and for a limited purpose." The Court found error in the exclusion of portions of recorded conversations that the defense offered after the government introduced portions of the recordings, but it found the error to be harmless.

United States v. Nixon, 779 F.2d 126 (2d Cir. 1985) : Although the error was harmless, the Court found in a narcotics case that the government erred in introducing a telex containing a witness' description of a defendant. Since the agent who sent the telex never testified, the telex was hearsay and could not be admitted under any exception. Although the government sought to rely upon Rule 106, the Court concluded that the Rule could not be used where the evidence was not admissible under the hearsay rule. In United States Football League v. National Football League, n3 the Court affirmed a judgment awarding the plaintiff one dollar on antitrust claims and held that the Trial Judge ruled properly in excluding a letter, even though a reply letter was admitted. It said that "[t]he doctrine of completeness, Rule 106, does not compel admission of otherwise inadmissible hearsay evidence."

United States v. Costner, 684 F.2d 370 (6th Cir. 1982) : The Court reversed a conviction for making a false statement to a bank in order to obtain a loan, because the Trial Judge improperly admitted portions of a document that were hearsay and were not related to a portion that appellant had previously offered. The Court observed that "Rule 106 is intended to eliminate the misleading impression created by taking a statement out of context. The rule covers an order of proof problem; it is not designed to make something admissible that should be excluded."

[13] Post-Arrest Statements

United States v. Millan, 230 F.3d 431 (1st Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed a defendant's carjacking and firearms convictions. When the government sought to offer evidence of a plea agreement by an accomplice along with a three-page statement of facts, the defendant successfully objected to the statement of facts. Later, defense counsel sought to offer a portion of the statement of facts, but the Trial Judge ruled that if the defendant offered that portion, then the whole version had to be admitted. The Court affirmed, finding that the document was a whole version of facts and that "[s]horn from the context of the entire narrative, the excerpt may have distorted the jury's perception of the government's written version of the events."

United States v. Branch, 91 F.3d 699 (5th Cir. 1996) : In a prosecution of members of the Branch Davidian sect arising out of the ill-fated raid at Waco by ATF agents, the Court found no error in the Trial Judge's exclusion of the exculpatory parts of the post-arrest statement of a defendant -- even though the Judge had admitted the inculpatory parts. See the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 106.02[4].

United States v. Ortega, 203 F.3d 675 (9th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed convictions for drug and firearm offenses, finding no error when the defendant was not permitted to introduce exculpatory portions of his oral confession to an INS agent after the prosecution had introduced inculpatory portions. The Court said that "the rule of completeness, see Rule 106 ..., applies only to written and recorded statements," and that even if it did apply to oral statements, exclusion was proper "because these statements would still have constituted inadmissible hearsay." The Court later noted that the agent's testimony did not distort the meaning of the defendant's statements because the defendant testified to the facts not mentioned by the agent.

[14] Prejudicial Material in Documents

United States v. Rivera, 61 F.3d 131 (2d Cir. 1995) : After the defendant in a heroin conspiracy case had cross-examined the key government witness about his plea agreement and cooperation, the prosecution introduced a two-page stipulation of facts that had been part of the plea agreement. The stipulation included substantial incriminating hearsay information about the defendant, which corroborated the government witness' factual testimony. The Court reversed, reasoning that "[t]he mere fact that the Stipulation was incorporated into [the witness'] plea agreement is insufficient to justify its admission on completeness grounds," and that "[w]e can see no way in which the Stipulation was essential for the jury's understanding of [the] plea agreement, or to place it in context, or correct misleading impressions from it."

United States v. Brown, 720 F.2d 1059 (9th Cir. 1983) : The Court reversed convictions of numerous defendants convicted of a conspiracy to distribute heroin. It found that the government had sufficient evidence of conspiracy and the defendants' connection therewith, but it held that the prosecutor acted improperly in bringing to the jury's attention the fact that as part of plea bargain agreements several government witnesses agreed to submit to polygraph tests. The Court recognized that the government is entitled to bring out the fact that it has made a bargain with a witness, but it refused to permit the government to elicit every fact that might be mentioned in the agreement. And it rejected the government's argument that since the defense insinuated that the witnesses had been made promises not revealed in their written agreements with the government, the polygraph was properly mentioned. The Court found that the defense never implied that the polygraph provision was not in the writing, so there was no reason to offer it as evidence except for the improper purpose of rehabilitating witnesses through reliance on the polygraph.

[15] Previously Excluded Evidence

In re Paoli R.R. Yard PCB Litig., 113 F.3d 444 (3d Cir. 1997) : In its third review of this toxic exposure case (see annotations to Rule 702), the Court held that after evidence of "heat-degraded PCBs" was excluded under Rule 403 as lacking sufficient connection with the plaintiffs, Rule 106 did not require that the jury be told that these items were mentioned in an expert's report that was used to cross-examine one of the plaintiffs' experts. Once the Trial Judge ruled that the plaintiffs could fairly proceed without any mention of these items, "Rule 106 did not independently require the admission of additional portions of the text."

[16] Prior Testimony and Depositions

United States v. Soures, 736 F.2d 87 (3d Cir. 1984) : Affirming a defendant's conviction for receiving kickbacks, the Court found that the Trial Judge properly admitted some portions of the defendant's grand jury testimony and excluded others. The Court cited Rule 106 and commented that "[t]he Rule does not require introduction of portions of a statement that are neither explanatory of nor relevant to the passages that have been admitted."

United States v. Bollin, 264 F.3d 391 (4th Cir. 2001) : The Court affirmed two defendants' convictions arising from their involvement in an investment fraud scheme and the subsequent coverup. It rejected one defendant's contention that the Trial Judge erred in permitting the government to use a redacted version of his grand jury testimony while refusing to permit him to present the omitted portions under the rule of completeness. The Court held that the excerpts admitted by the government were not misleading, so the omitted portions of the defendant's grand jury excerpts were not necessary to clarify any misimpression. "The fact that some of the omitted testimony arguably was exculpatory does not, without more, make it admissible under the rule of completeness."

Trepel v. Roadway Express, Inc., 194 F.3d 708 (6th Cir. 1999) : In an action against an express company to recover for damages to a rare wood carving, the defendant introduced part of the plaintiff's deposition testimony, in which the plaintiff recounted the negotiations leading to his purchase of the carving. The defendant was permitted to introduce the part indicating the purchase price was $15,000 (the plaintiff was claiming damages substantially in excess of $80,000) and the plaintiff's statement that he didn't want, like, or have any use for the carving, but the plaintiff was not permitted to introduce other parts of the negotiation that he contended indicated he had no knowledge what the carving was worth. The Court held that on remand if the defendant introduced parts of the deposition, it would be required to introduce enough of the surrounding questions and answers to put the statements into context.

United States v. Glover, 101 F.3d 1183 (7th Cir. 1996) : Affirming a union officer's conviction for misusing benefit funds, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion when the Judge, in a retrial following a mistrial, refused to admit the entire 198-page transcript (less thirty pages of background) of the defendant's testimony in the first trial, after the government offered eleven pages from the defendant's cross-examination. The defendant had made no showing that the entire transcript was relevant to the part admitted or that fairness required its admission, and on appeal was unable to show that the transcript was excluded merely because of its length. In United States v. Walker, 652 F.2d 708 (7th Cir. 1981) , a conviction for extortion was reversed because the Trial Judge admitted selected portions of the appellant's testimony in a first trial that ended in a mistrial but excluded other relevant portions that explained the excerpts that were admitted.

[17] Redacted Statements

United States v. Yousef, 327 F.3d 56 (2d Cir. 2003) : Defendants Yousef and Murad were convicted for a conspiracy to bomb United States commercial airliners in southeast Asia, and defendants Yousef and Ismoil were convicted for crimes relating to the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center. When Ismoil's statement was introduced, it was redacted for Bruton purposes so that "neighbor" was substituted for Yousef's alias and other references to Yousef were omitted. Ismoil argued that the statement as redacted violated Rule 106's rule of completeness because it conveyed the impression he had omitted Yousef's name to protect him. Affirming the convictions, the Court found no abuse of discretion, since it saw no distortion of meaning and the redaction was a reasonable accommodation of competing interests. In United States v. Marin, 669 F.2d 73 (2d Cir. 1982) , the Court approved a ruling in a drug case that admitted one defendant's statement without the part attributing possession and control of narcotics to a codefendant. The Court said that "[t]he completeness doctrine does not require introduction of portions of a statement that are neither explanatory of nor relevant to the admitted passages" and found that the deleted portion was inadmissible, self-serving hearsay.

United States v. Moussaoui, 382 F.2d 453 (4th Cir. 2004) : In a prosecution of the so-called "20th hijacker" for conspiracy relating to the September 11, 2001, attacks, the Court held that the defendant's Sixth Amendment right to compulsory process required the government to provide some kind of access to witnesses held in government custody outside the United States. It also held, however, that substitutions for the testimony of the witnesses, whom the government refused to make available on national security grounds, were available and that they would provide the defendant with the evidence that otherwise might have been provided by the witnesses. It held that with respect to these written summaries of witness statements, Rule 106 had to be used carefully in view of the fact that the witnesses were not available:

> In short, we wish to make clear that the rule of completeness is not to be used by the Government as a means of seeking the admission of inculpatory statements that neither explain nor clarify the statements designated by Moussaoui. On the other hand, the defense's ability to propose substitutions based on the language of the [redacted] summaries is not a license to mislead the jury.

One Judge, dissenting in part, argued that the summaries should be offered in more complete form.

Frymire-Brinati v. KPMG Peat Marwick, 2 F.3d 183 (7th Cir. 1993) : The Court reversed a judgment for investors who sued an accounting firm, holding, inter alia, that the Trial Judge erred in permitting the plaintiffs to compress the defendant's discovery responses into a three-page narrative and in denying the defendant's request to have its statements restored to their original context. The Court stated that "[a]n admission depicts the party in its own words; Peat Marwick was entitled to have the jury see those words rather than a precis that the adverse party thought would depict the speaker in the worst light." In United States v. Velasco, 953 F.2d 1467 (7th Cir. 1992) , a cocaine conspiracy prosecution, the government introduced a portion of one defendant's postarrest statement to prove his knowledge, but the defendant was not permitted to introduce the remainder. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion, as the rest of the statement referred only to a nontestifying codefendant (and therefore would be inadmissible under Bruton) and others whose activities were irrelevant in the case.

United States v. Dorrell, 758 F.2d 427 (9th Cir. 1985) : In a prosecution for injuring government property and illegally entering a military reservation, the Court held that the Trial Judge properly redacted a defendant's statement to eliminate references to political and religious motivations that were not relevant.

United States v. Range, 94 F.3d 614 (11th Cir. 1996) : After an arresting officer testified that a defendant in a drug trafficking case had admitted that he knew a gun and money were in the car he had been driving, the defendant sought on cross-examination to elicit the defendant's statements that a codefendant had placed the gun and money there and had instructed him to drive to a meeting. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in limiting the cross-examination, since the statement as redacted was not distorted, the excluded statements were irrelevant to the issue of the defendant's knowledge, and, more importantly, their introduction would violate his non-testifying codefendant's confrontation rights. In United States v. Lopez, 898 F.2d 1505 (11th Cir. 1990) , one defendant argued that the rule of completeness was violated by the introduction of his redacted postarrest statement at his joint trial for drug offenses. The Court affirmed the convictions, holding there was no error in admitting the statement, when the redaction was made to protect the Bruton rights of a codefendant and it did not distort the meaning of the statement or exclude information substantially exculpatory of the nontestifying defendant.

[18] Relationship to Prior Consistent Statements

United States v. Wilkerson, 411 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2005) : In a felon firearm and drug prosecution, the Government contended that the defendant discarded drugs and a gun while fleeing the police after a traffic stop; the defendant argued that the drugs and gun were found in a place that was not on his path of flight. One pursuing officer's testimony was impeached by his previous statements, in which he had given conflicting or uncertain accounts about the flight path.

The government offered the officer's grand jury testimony and other prior statements to rebut the impression that he had been inconsistent, contending that this was permissible under Rule 106. The Court held that it was error (but harmless) to admit the prior consistent statements, since "the testimony only bolstered Officer Fleming's credibility generally by restating what had already been said." In order for a consistent statement to be admitted under Rule 106, the statement must "tend to show that a statement used to impeach a witness is not really inconsistent when understood in its proper context," and that standard was not met in this case. In United States v. Simonelli, 237 F.3d 19 (1st Cir. 2001) , a tax fraud case, a principal prosecution witness was the defendant's accountant, who testified under immunity. On cross-examination, the accountant admitted making inconsistent statements, and committing perjury, in his initial grand jury appearance, when making a subsequent proffer, and at a second grand jury appearance. On redirect the witness was permitted to read testimony he had given to the grand jury that was consistent with his trial testimony; this prior testimony covered both specific points raised in the cross-examination and other points within the scope of the overall cross-exam. The Court held that some of the prior consistent statements were properly admitted because they provided a larger context in which trial testimony could be understood as not really inconsistent with prior statements. However, it was error (but harmless) to admit grand jury statements that simply bolstered trial testimony by presenting again the evidence offered on direct.

United States v. Castillo, 14 F.3d 802 (2d Cir. 1994) : Seeking to discredit an undercover officer's testimony by arguing that he lied about the presence of a gun to justify his snorting cocaine during a drug purchase, defense counsel contrasted the officer's testimony that he told his superior immediately after the buy that he had been forced to ingest cocaine "at gunpoint," with his testimony that the gun was displayed but never removed from an accomplice's waistband. The Court held it was not an abuse of discretion to admit testimony from the superior repeating what the officer had said to him, as the evidence was offered only to rehabilitate credibility rather than for its truth, and thus it did not matter if the officer had a motive to fabricate when he was debriefed by his superior. According to the Court, the superior's testimony helped the jury decide whether "at gunpoint" was shorthand for the presence of the gun in the waistband, but according to the dissenting Judge, the hearsay had no rebutting force beyond the mere fact that the witness had repeated on a prior occasion a statement consistent with his trial testimony. In United States v. Pierre, n4 the Court affirmed a heroin conviction, finding that the Trial Judge properly admitted evidence that an agent's formal report stated that the defendant refused to make a controlled delivery, after the defense elicited testimony from the agent that his notes of his interview with the defendant contained no reference to the refusal. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 106.02[8].

United States v. Harris, 761 F.2d 394 (7th Cir. 1985) : Affirming convictions for defrauding the government, the Court held that the requirement that prior consistent statements predate any motive to fabricate need not be met when the statements are offered solely to rehabilitate a witness rather than for their truth. The Court added that rehabilitation use of prior consistent statements "is particularly appropriate where, as here, those statements are part of a report or interview containing inconsistent statements which have been used to impeach the credibility of the witness," since they can be of assistance in deciding "whether the impeaching statements really were inconsistent within the context of the interview, and if so, to what extent ... . This rehabilitative use of prior consistent statements is also in accord with the principle of completeness promoted by Rule 106."

United States v. Keltner, 147 F.3d 662 (8th Cir. 1998) : The Court affirmed racketeering convictions, finding no error when the government was permitted to question a witness on redirect examination about prior consistent statements even though they were made after the witness' motive to lie or fabricate had arisen. The Court reasoned that the defendants had cross-examined the witness about prior statements but had omitted portions, which the government was entitled to elicit under the role of completeness rather than under Rule 801(d)(1)(B). In United States v. Blankinship, n5 the Court affirmed the admission of an entire extrajudicial written statement of a postal employee who the defendant was charged with assaulting. Since the defendant's counsel used portions of the statement to suggest recent fabrication, the Court reasoned that it was important for the factfinder to see the entire statement in order to assess the seriousness of any inconsistencies. In United States v. Andrade, n6 the Court affirmed convictions arising out of a scheme to use fraudulent credit cards to buy and later cash-in airline tickets. There was no error in admitting evidence of one agent's notes concerning an interview with a defendant, where the defense had questioned two other witnesses concerning the notes and left impressions that there might have been inaccuracies in the notes and collaboration between government witnesses. The Court held that the rehabilitation was proper and it fell within Rule 106.

United States v. Collicott, 92 F.3d 973 (9th Cir. 1996) : In cross-examining a prosecution witness in a drug case, the defense asked her what time of day she had told an arresting officer that a drug dealer had come to the hotel room she was sharing with the defendant, but she said she did not remember. Defense counsel then called the officer to recount what the witness said about the time the dealer arrived. On cross-examination of the officer, the government elicited other statements the witness had made to the officer during that conversation about the defendant's connection with the dealer. Reversing the conviction, the Court held that the remainder of the conversation was not admissible as a prior consistent statement. Neither was it admissible under Rule 106, since the Rule does not compel admission of otherwise inadmissible hearsay, and the complete statement did not serve to correct a misleading impression created by taking the witness' comments out of context.

United States v. Myers, 972 F.2d 1566 (11th Cir. 1992) : In a civil rights prosecution of an officer for using a stun gun on arrestees, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in limiting admission of a statement made by the defendant during an internal affairs investigation to the parts concerning the number of times he had used the stun gun, as the prosecutor had introduced the statement only to impeach the defendant on that issue. The parts consistent with the defendant's trial testimony were admitted for rehabilitation, but the parts of the statement dealing with the circumstances and the defendant's motivation were not admissible under the Rule.

[19] Relevance Requirement

United States v. Crosby, 713 F.2d 1066 (5th Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed convictions for kidnapping offenses, rejecting the defendant's argument that he should have been permitted to play for the jury portions of a tape recording of the negotiations between himself and the police while he was holding a hostage. The Court interpreted the Trial Judge's ruling to require that the defense show that the portion of the tape it wished to play was relevant, and it observed that promises of immunity in a hostage situation are irrelevant to guilt or innocence.

United States v. Harvey, 959 F.2d 1371 (7th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed mail fraud convictions, holding there was no abuse of discretion in precluding cross-examination of a postal inspector about statements from the defendant that his funding sources were "hustlers," as the statements were made when he had time to reflect and perhaps misrepresent his thoughts and were, in any event, not probative of whether he had an intent to defraud. Moreover, there was no showing the statements qualified or explained the witness' direct testimony. In United States v. Lewis, n7 the defendant, when questioned about a postarrest statement, was asked whether he had told agents that he had not obtained any drugs from an accomplice but that if he had he would not tell the FBI; on redirect, he was not permitted to add that he had said he would not tell the FBI without talking to an attorney first. Affirming the defendant's conviction for a cocaine conspiracy, the Court said it might have admitted the completing statement but held there was no abuse of discretion, as the statement had only minimal significance. In United States v. Velasco, n8 a cocaine conspiracy prosecution, the government introduced a portion of one defendant's postarrest statement to prove his knowledge, but the defendant was not permitted to introduce the remainder. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion, as the rest of the statement referred only to a nontestifying codefendant (and therefore would be inadmissible under Bruton) and others whose activities were irrelevant in the case.

United States v. Bolden, 92 F.3d 686 (8th Cir. 1996) : A defendant, who was charged with two others in a cocaine distribution conspiracy, had told officers after his arrest that he had transported drugs "for chump change" for men he would not identify because they would kill him if he snitched; when told others had already been arrested, he said he wanted to "tell you guys everything but they'll kill me." After the government introduced the portion in which the defendant admitted transporting drugs, he sought to introduce the balance of the statements to support a defense of coercion. Affirming, the Court found nothing in the statements suggesting that the defendant transported cocaine as a result of coercion -- in fact, they showed his motivation was monetary and his fear related only to cooperation with the authorities -- so admission of the redacted statement did not exclude information that was necessary to clarify the statement.

United States v. Wright, 826 F.2d 938 (10th Cir. 1987) : Affirming fraud convictions, the Court held that portions of a diary were properly excluded while others were admitted. The portions excluded were not relevant to trial issues nor were they explanatory of other portions that were admitted.

[20] Remainder Not Necessary To Complete

United States v. Ramos-Caraballo, 375 F.3d 797 (8th Cir. 2004) : Although the Court affirmed a conviction for possession of cocaine with intent to distribute, it found an abuse of discretion in the admission of the entirety of a police officer's grand jury testimony, suppression hearing testimony, and police report after defense counsel attempted to impeach the officer with portions of those documents. The Court found that this was not a case in which the defense created a misunderstanding or distortion, observed that the government made no attempt to specify which portions of the documents were relevant to the issues raised on cross-examination, and concluded that "this looks more like a government attempt to improperly bolster its witness by admitting the officer's entire testimony again and again through these exhibits."

[21] Scientific Articles

Marsee v. United States Tobacco Co., 866 F.2d 319 (10th Cir. 1989) : Affirming a judgment against a plaintiff who claimed that her son developed oral cancer from using snuff, the Court held that the defendant was properly permitted to introduce scientific articles in addition to those introduced by the plaintiff in order to rebut a claim that the then-existing scientific and medical evidence "as a whole" tended to show that the product was dangerous.

[22] Tape Recordings

In re Air Crash Disaster, 635 F.2d 67 (2d Cir. 1980) : The Court affirmed the Trial Judge's decision refusing to allow the playing of one channel of the cockpit recorder by itself and requiring the entire tape to be played with volume adjustments to make the tape clearer.

United States v. Garrett, 716 F.2d 257 (5th Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed Travel Act convictions, finding no error in the admission of part of a tape recording for the government and rejection of another part offered by a defendant. The Court said that Rule 106's completeness doctrine "does not require introduction of portions of a statement that are neither relevant to nor explanatory of the admitted passages." In United States v. Crosby, n9 the Court affirmed convictions for kidnapping offenses, rejecting the defendant's argument that he should have been permitted to play for the jury portions of a tape recording of the negotiations between himself and the police while he was holding a hostage. The Court interpreted the Trial Judge's ruling to require that the defense show that the portion of the tape it wished to play was relevant, and it observed that promises of immunity in a hostage situation are irrelevant to guilt or innocence.

United States v. Branham, 97 F.3d 835 (6th Cir. 1996) : Defendants in a marijuana conspiracy case alleged that they had been entrapped and, therefore, moved to have all tape recorded conversations played in a sequential and chronological order so as to present a fair understanding of their respective roles in the attempted drug transaction. The Court found no abuse of discretion in denial of the motion, since the defendants were given an opportunity during presentation of their evidence to play any remaining tapes and develop the record to indicate the magnitude of their roles or any entrapment.

United States v. LeFevour, 798 F.2d 977 (7th Cir. 1986) : Affirming the convictions of a former State Court Judge, the Court found no error in the admission of part of a tape recording and the exclusion of a part offered by the defendant. It found that no misleading impression was created by the playing of only part of the tape, and the part that the defendant desired to play was irrelevant.

United States v. Webber, 255 F.3d 523 (8th Cir. 2001) : Affirming firearms convictions, the Court found no error in permitting the government to play only a portion of the ten hours of recorded conversations between the defendant and an undercover informant. The defendant argued that under Rule 106 the government was required to play all ten hours of tapes in the order in which they were recorded. The Court noted that the party urging admission of an excluded portion of a conversation "must specify the portion of the testimony that is relevant to the issue at trial and that qualifies or explains portions already admitted." Moreover, the Trial Judge "has broad discretion to conduct the trial in an orderly and efficient manner, and to choose among reasonable evidentiary alternatives to satisfy the rule of completeness reflected in Rule 106." In this case, the Judge made the tapes available for playing in their entirety by the jury during its deliberations, and also permitted the defense to play all the tapes during its case, which defense counsel chose not to do.

[23] Television Interviews

Lambert v. Fulton County, Ga., 253 F.3d 588 (11th Cir. 2001) : Affirming a judgment for county employees in a reverse discrimination case, the Court held that the introduction of a television interview of some individuals did not warrant the introduction of evidence of an interview with a different person.

[24] Timing

Phoenix Assocs. III v. Stone, 60 F.3d 95 (2d Cir. 1995) : On the question of the proper timing of a proffer of material offered for completeness, the Court stated that "[w]hile the wording of Rule 106 appears to require the adverse party to proffer the associated document or portion contemporaneously with the introduction of the primary document, we have not applied this requirement rigidly." In United States v. Southland Corp., 760 F.2d 1366 (2d Cir. 1985) , the Court affirmed convictions of a corporation and a lawyer for conspiring to defraud the United States, although it found that the lawyer should have been permitted to introduce certain portions of grand jury testimony immediately after the prosecutor introduced an excerpt from the testimony. The Court cited Rule 106 and referred to it as "a principle of simple fairness, long antedating the Federal Rules of Evidence."

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Advisory Committee's Note

The rule is an expression of the rule of completeness. McCormick § 56. It is manifested as to depositions in Rule 32(a)(4) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, of which the proposed rule is substantially a restatement.

The rule is based on two considerations. The first is the misleading impression created by taking matters out of context. The second is the inadequacy of repair work when delayed to a point later in the trial. See McCormick § 56; California Evidence Code § 356. The rule does not in any way circumscribe the right of the adversary to develop the matter on cross-examination or as part of his own case.

For practical reasons, the rule is limited to writings and recorded statements and does not apply to conversations.

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 106, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Article I. General Provisions
Supp. To CHAPTER 106 RULE 106

1-106 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 106.03

Supp. to § 106.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[3] Burden of Invoking the Rule [Go To Main]

United States v. Phillips, 543 F.3d 1197 (10th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed convictions for immigration fraud, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of documents that the defendants claimed were incomplete. It noted that "Rule 106 does not prohibit admission of an incomplete document. Instead, it allows the party against whom the document is introduced to place the remainder in evidence without additional evidentiary foundation... . If the defendants wanted the remainder of the document to be admitted, they should have offered it."

[10] Oral Statements [Go To Main]

[a] Completing Evidence for Accused

United States v. Garcia, 530 F.3d 348 (5th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for drug importation, finding no abuse of discretion when the defense was not permitted to introduce the complete transcript of a conversation after an agent had testified to his memory of the conversation. The government had not introduced the transcript or the tape recording of the conversation, and the agent's testimony was not a quotation or reading from the transcript tantamount to introducing it. The Court explained why a witness' testimony regarding his memory of an oral statement is not subject to Rule 106: "A recording played or a document read in isolation is not subject to cross-examination. But an adversary can attack a live witness's credibility, confront the witness with previous inconsistent statements, or demonstrate bias or poor memory." One Judge, concurring, noted that "since the agent did use the transcript to refresh his memory, the portions of the transcript were admissible under Fed. R. Evid. 612," and that the Judge "did allow defense counsel to make full use of the transcript in cross-examination of the agent, and I will not fault the ruling or judgment."

[12] Otherwise Inadmissible Evidence Offered To Complete [Go To Main]

United States v. Bucci, 525 F.3d 116 (1st Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed convictions for firearms and other offenses. Although it found no abuse of discretion in permitting the government to offer redacted portions of a recording and transcript, it rejected the government's argument that "the purview of Rule 106 is limited to the order of proof." The Court observed that although "[o]ther circuits have held differently," its "case law unambiguously establishes that the rule of completeness may be invoked to facilitate the introduction of otherwise inadmissible evidence," and "we adhere to our own precedent."

United States v. Hoffecker, 530 F.3d 137 (3d Cir. 2008) : Affirming convictions for mail and wire fraud arising from a commodities-sales scheme, the Court found no error when the defense was not permitted to play the entirety of a tape recording, portions of which the government had offered as admissions by a party-opponent. The recording was of a presentation made by the defendant to a government undercover operation he was seeking to recruit as a boiler-room. The defendant argued that it was evidence of his state of mind -- that the program was always to be operated in a legitimate manner -- but the Court found that the statements were simply exculpatory, made to people he had every reason to sign on to sell aggressively for his own gain. Furthermore, they were not necessary to explain or place in context the portions admitted or any other evidence or testimony.

United States v. Lentz, 524 F.3d 501 (4th Cir. 2008) : The defendant, arrested for murder, had consulted with another inmate about hiring a hit man to murder some witnesses. In a recorded conversation with his attorney, the defendant asked questions to check on the other inmate's reliability in the scheme. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the recorded conversation with certain self-serving statements by the defendant and various hearsay statements by the attorney redacted. The omitted portions were not necessary either to avoid misleading the jury or to place the portions admitted into proper context. The Court noted that "Rule 106 does not ... 'render admissible the evidence which is otherwise inadmissible under the hearsay rules.' "

United States v. Sine, 493 F.3d 1021 (9th Cir. 2007) : The Court held that the rule of completeness in Rule 106 "does not allow the admission of otherwise inadmissible statements." It relied on its prior decision in United States v. Collicott, 92 F.3d 973 (9th Cir. 1996) (see Manual § 106.03[18]) ("Because [the witness'] out-of-court statements ... do not fall within an exception to the hearsay rule, they are inadmissible, regardless of Rule 106.").

United States v. Lopez-Medina, 596 F.3d 716 (10th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possession of methamphetamine with intent to distribute, holding that the door had been opened to the admission of otherwise inadmissible statements implicating the defendant, which had been made by a codefendant at a change-of-plea hearing, when the officer was questioned about the codefendant's conviction in a way that suggested the codefendant had claimed full and sole responsibility for the crime.

[17] Redacted Statements [Go To Main]

United States v. Phillips, 596 F.3d 414 (7th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for Medicaid fraud, finding that the defendant had forfeited a claim that the Trial Judge erred in denying her motion to exclude a redacted audio recording without having reviewed the complete version first. The defendant had moved to exclude the evidence only on the ground that it was redacted, and there is no rule requiring the Judge to review a complete recording before admitting a redacted version into evidence. The Court found no plain error in admitting the redacted version, noting that even if it told an incomplete story, the proper remedy would be to supplement it under Rule 106, not exclude it.

[19] Relevance Requirement [Go To Main]

United States v. Kopp, 562 F.3d 141 (2d Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions for killing a reproductive health service provider, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of redacted statements that the defendant made to a newspaper and to a state trial court during a sentencing based on the same killing charged in the instant case. Although the defendant claimed that the statements should have been admitted in their entirety, the Court held that to the extent that the statements suggested that the defendant did not intend to kill him, they were not relevant, because the statute required only that the defendant intend to injure the victim.

[20] Remainder Not Necessary To Complete [Go To Main]

United States v. Johnson, 507 F.3d 793 (2d Cir. 2007) : Affirming drug and firearm convictions, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of the defendant's redacted confession concerning the robbery of a drug-dealer by the defendant and a coconspirator. The defendant argued that the redacted portion contained exculpatory information that was necessary to provide a complete understanding of the confession under Rule 106, but the Court reasoned that the admitted portion of the confession "related to Freeman and Newman's plans to execute the robbery, while the redacted portion related to the execution of the robbery." (Emphasis in original.) Thus, the redacted portion of the confession did not explain the admitted portion or place it in context.

United States v. Price, 516 F.3d 597 (7th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for a 2002 bank robbery, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of the defendant's statement to the FBI following his arrest for another bank robbery in 2003 that it was the only robbery he ever committed. The defendant argued that the statement was admissible under Rule 106 as clarifying a statement he made in 2005 that he would "cooperate" with the FBI by providing details about the 2002 robbery (including the names of those involved). The proffered statement was not necessary to explain the admission he made nearly two years later, and the two statements were not connected contextually in such a way that the proffered statement was needed to avoid an incomplete, misleading, or distorted picture of the evidence.

United States v. Gordon, 510 F.3d 811 (8th Cir. 2007) : At trial for a marijuana conspiracy, the defense was not permitted to cross-examine a deputy who had taken the defendant into custody for driving with an expired license regarding an affidavit the deputy had filed with respect to cash found in the defendant's truck. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion, as the deputy testified on direct only about the defendant's arrest and made no mention of the affidavit. Rule 106 did not entitle the defendant to offer portions of the affidavit, because there was nothing to complete.

[24] Timing [Go To Main]

United States v. Holden, 557 F.3d 698 (6th Cir. 2009) : In a prosecution for false reporting to the Environmental Protection Agency, certain admissions made by a defendant to an investigating agent were admitted, but the government's objection to other statements from the same conversation was sustained when the defense sought to bring them out during cross-examination, on the ground that the defendant waived his rights under the rule of completeness when the purportedly misleading evidence was introduced. Resolving what had been an open question in the Circuit, the Court held it was error to treat the right to complete as having been waived, since neither the text nor the rationale of Rule 106 requires that offering completing evidence be contemporaneous with the admission of the evidence it completes. The error was harmless, however, because the defendant's proffered evidence was inadmissible hearsay and, in any event, unnecessary to correct a misleading impression.

Rule 201. Judicial Notice of Adjudicative Facts

(a) Scope of rule. -- This rule governs only judicial notice of adjudicative facts.

(b) Kinds of facts. -- A judicially noticed fact must be one not subject to reasonable dispute in that it is either (1) generally known within the territorial jurisdiction of the trial court or (2) capable of accurate and ready determination by resort to sources whose accuracy cannot reasonably be questioned.

(c) When discretionary. -- A court may take judicial notice, whether requested or not.

(d) When mandatory. -- A court shall take judicial notice if requested by a party and supplied with the necessary information.

(e) Opportunity to be heard. -- A party is entitled upon timely request to an opportunity to be heard as to the propriety of taking judicial notice and the tenor of the matter noticed. In the absence of prior notification, the request may be made after judicial notice has been taken.

(f) Time of taking notice. -- Judicial notice may be taken at any stage of the proceeding.

(g) Instructing jury. -- In a civil action or proceeding, the court shall instruct the jury to accept as conclusive any fact judicially noticed. In a criminal case, the court shall instruct the jury that it may, but is not required to, accept as conclusive any fact judicially noticed.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article II. Judicial Notice
CHAPTER 201 RULE 201

1-201 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 201.02

201.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Legislative and Adjudicative Facts

Both at common law and under the Federal Rules, most proof is presented by means of testimonial evidence or by the offering of real evidence. But there is an exception to the requirement that a party who relies on a certain proposition must prove it; the exception is judicial notice. Professor Kenneth Culp Davis has suggested a distinction between two kinds of judicial notice: (1) judicial notice of legislative facts, and (2) judicial notice of adjudicative facts. This distinction is followed in Rule 201, which covers the latter but not the former. Rule 201 does not define the term "adjudicative facts." But courts have often relied on the distinction between "adjudicative" and "legislative" facts espoused by Professor Davis. Professor Davis discussed this distinction in a letter to the House Subcommittee [cited in § 201.04]:

> A rule on judicial notice cannot lump together the facts about the parties and the facts that are used for lawmaking. The two kinds of facts are quite different. Judicial practices about the two kinds of facts are and always have been quite different. Facts pertaining to the parties should not be judicially noticed but should be developed through the evidence unless the facts are unlikely to be questioned. But facts that help a judge determine what the law ought to be often cannot be proved with evidence; they are a part of a judge's thinking and they often have to be the subject of judicial notice. (Emphasis in original.) n1

This is the only Rule dealing with judicial notice. It covers only what Davis refers to as adjudicative facts -- facts which concern the "who, what, when, where, and why" of the case before the Court. Judicial notice of legislative facts -- facts and policy assumptions used by the Court in the process of construing a statute or developing the law -- is intentionally left unrestricted. A Court can rely on legislative facts and assumptions even if they are subject to dispute and are not verifiable. Indeed, it could not be otherwise. If a court could only rely on indisputable facts before it could interpret a statute or the Constitution or develop common law, its lawmaking and interpreting powers would grind to a halt. n2

[2] Indisputable Adjudicative Facts

To be judicially noticed an adjudicative fact must either be (1) generally known within the territorial jurisdiction of the Trial Court or (2) capable of accurate and ready determination by resort to sources whose accuracy cannot reasonably be questioned. Thus, there are two different types of indisputable adjudicative facts subject to judicial notice under Rule 201. The first is a fact so well known that it would be a waste of judicial resources to require proof; reasonably well-informed people simply could not differ as to the fact n3 This indisputability requirement is not satisfied merely because the Trial Judge learns of a fact through personal experience or independent research. The matter must be generally known by reasonably well-informed people. n4 However, it is not required that the fact be universally known. The Rule requires general knowledge "within the territorial jurisdiction" of the Trial Court. Thus, it may not be universally known that Nebraska has a unicameral legislature; but that fact is generally known in Nebraska. n5

The second type of adjudicative fact that can be judicially noticed under the Rule is one that is capable of ready verification through sources whose reliability cannot reasonably be questioned. This prong of noticeable adjudicative fact is the one more often relied upon, because a fair argument can be made that most facts are not generally known, but yet that some of these facts can be verified through unquestioned sources. For example, there may be some argument as to whether the names of the current Justices of the United States Supreme Court are "generally known" even to reasonably well-informed people. Yet it is clear that these names can readily be verified through an unimpeachable source. n6 Where the sources of information are questionable, disputable, or spotty, judicial notice cannot be taken. n7

The categories of indisputable adjudicative facts are limited and intentionally so. The point of going to trial is to give both parties a chance to examine each other's evidence and to present all sides to the trier of fact. Our system disfavors short-cutting the trial process. As the Court recognized in United States v. Boyd, 289 F.3d 1254 (10th Cir. 2002) :

> In applying FRE 201, we are mindful that if a court takes judicial notice of a fact whose application is in dispute, the court removes the weapons of rebuttal evidence, cross-examination and argument from the parties and raises doubt as to whether the parties received a fair hearing. The effect of taking judicial notice is to preclude a party from introducing contrary evidence and, in effect, directing a verdict against him as to the fact noticed.

So for example, a Trial Judge who resorts to outside sources to determine an adjudicative fact should resist the temptation to decide the entire case on the basis of his or her own independent research. Counsel should be permitted to examine the sources relied upon, to suggest other sources, and to present argument about the meaning of the sources upon which the Trial Judge might be prepared to rule. n8

[3] Judicial Records and Findings

A number of cases have considered whether judicial notice can be taken of matters in judicial records. The reliability of judicial records is not in question. However, the underlying facts in a judicial record are not beyond dispute. For example, in Taylor v. Charter Medical Corp., 162 F.3d 827 (5th Cir. 1998) , a former patient at a residential hospital sued under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 for alleged mistreatment. The defendant argued that it was not a state actor. The plaintiff responded that the Court was required to take judicial notice that the defendant's predecessor had been found by another court to be a state actor in an unrelated litigation. The Court rejected this argument, holding that "a court cannot take judicial notice of the factual findings of another court." This is so because "(1) such findings do not constitute facts 'not subject to reasonable dispute' within the meaning of Rule 201; and (2) were it permissible for a court to take judicial notice of a fact merely because it had been found to be true in some other action, the doctrine of collateral estoppel would be superfluous." n9

The distinction is therefore between the existence of judicial records and the truth of the facts recorded. A Court can take judicial notice that a pleading was filed or that a judgment was entered. Likewise, a Court can take judicial notice that court filings contained certain allegations, or that findings of fact were made by another Court. But the truth of these allegations and findings are not proper subjects of judicial notice. n10

[4] "Legislative" Facts Unregulated

The most serious problem with Rule 201 may be its total failure to address legislative facts. Thus, if something is a "legislative" fact, it may be judicially noticed even though none of the requirements of Rule 201 -- most importantly, indisputability and notice -- are met. For example, a Court may decide to extend strict liability in tort on the assumption that defendants and their insurers can spread the cost. Or it may decide to expand the attorney-client privilege to protect the communications between low-level corporate agents and corporate counsel, on the assumption that a less generous privilege would deter the free flow of communication necessary to guarantee the attorney's effectiveness. These are factual assumptions that are disputable, yet they are legislative facts and the Court is not bound, when making policy choices, to adhere to Rule 201. If the law is to develop, then Courts must respond to changed conditions and new ideas, before the conditions and ideas become indisputable. n11

Although we do not challenge either the basic distinction between adjudicative and legislative facts or the need to treat them differently for purposes of judicial notice, we are greatly troubled by the implications of the Advisory Committee's Note that it is acceptable for Courts to take judicial notice of important legislative facts without affording the parties an opportunity to be heard. The Note indicates that evidence of legislative facts should be taken in appropriate situations, but implies that such situations will be rare. Certainly no one would seriously contend that evidence should be taken or argument heard on each of the factual assumptions that might be relevant to establishing or developing a legal rule. But at least when a Judge departs from the theories, evidence, and arguments of the parties to embrace a new approach, we favor participation by the parties. The line between relying upon material facts not addressed by the parties and general background reading may be a fine one. Yet if one has to choose between too much or too little participation by the parties, we would favor the former. We do not claim that Judges cannot rely on a broad range of facts to move the law forward. We suggest only that the parties should be permitted to participate in the march. Trial Judges should keep in mind that the dichotomy between adjudicative and legislative facts may be a useful tool, but that it is dangerous to attempt to use the tool as if it were a sharply honed device. n12 If a fact or set of facts is likely to be critical to a decision on the law to be applied to parties, there is every reason to want the parties to be heard on the factual question. Evidence need not always be taken. Briefs may work better in many situations. A trial need not be unduly delayed. But some chance for the parties to be heard on decisive legislative facts is desirable. n13

[5] Procedure

According to the Rule, which is consistent with most common-law authority, a Court may take judicial notice upon its own motion. The reason for this is that if judicial notice is truly a means of conserving scarce judicial resources, the parties should not be totally free to impose unnecessary burdens on the Court. Thus, even without a motion by a party, a Court has the discretion to take judicial notice in appropriate circumstances. In contrast to this discretionary power, a Judge must take judicial notice when requested to do so by a party who supplies the necessary information.

In order to be fair to both parties, the party opposing the taking of judicial notice is entitled to be heard. An opposing party who has notice prior to a Court ruling may make a presentation. If prior notification is not given, a request for the abandonment of judicial notice may be made after the Trial Court's ruling. In jury trials, it is clearly preferable for the parties to receive an opportunity to be heard before the judicially noticed matter is introduced.

[6] Effect of Judicial Notice

There has been a great division of authority as to whether a party should have a chance to introduce facts that rebut the facts judicially noticed. According to the Rule, in civil cases the Court shall instruct the jury to accept as conclusive any fact judicially noticed. This means that the opposing party cannot present contradictory evidence on the fact once it has been judicially noticed; the time for presenting such evidence is when the matter is heard by the Trial Judge under Rule 201(e). Allowing rebuttal before the factfinder would undermine the very basis of noticing an adjudicative fact under Rule 201, i.e., that the fact is indisputable; it would also contradict the Court's instructions on the matter.

In a criminal case, the Court may only instruct the jury that it may, but is not required to, accept as conclusive the facts judicially noticed. Judicially noticed facts are not binding on the jury in criminal cases because of a concern for the defendant's Sixth Amendment right to jury trial. The Trial Judge may not direct a verdict for the prosecution, n14 and it follows that the Judge may not grant a "partial" directed verdict by way of judicial notice. n15 In effect, Rule 201 treats judicial notice in criminal cases on a par with a permissible inference. n16 This would seem to permit the party, usually the defendant, against whom notice is taken, to offer evidence to rebut the noticed fact (although relevant evidence of a fact not reasonably disputed should be hard to find). The real advantage of judicial notice in a criminal case is to excuse the prosecution (or the defendant in the rare case in which the defense takes advantage of judicial notice) from having to make a formal presentation of evidence to establish a point. Judicial notice spares the expense of proof.

[7] Jury Instructions in a Criminal Case

If the Judge in a criminal case takes judicial notice of facts and instructs the jury that they may find the facts as noticed, what additional instructions may be needed?

It may well be necessary for the Judge to assure the jury that factfinding is its function. Normally the Judge will tell the jury that it is the sole judge of the credibility of the witnesses and that the existence or nonexistence of particular facts is a matter for the jury to decide. If this is the only instruction given, however, and if the Judge attempts to take judicial notice of facts, there is the possibility that an Appellate Court would reverse on the ground that the jury was misled as to precisely what the effect of judicial notice was. The Rule clearly permits the jury to reject the Judge's notice in a criminal case, and there seems to be no reason for the Judge to be anything but explicit on this point. n17

The Federal Judicial Center has proposed the following jury instruction with respect to judicially noticed facts in criminal cases:

> Even though no evidence has been introduced about it, I have decided to accept as proved the fact that [e.g., the city of San Francisco is north of the city of Los Angeles]. I believe that this fact is of such common knowledge [or alternative justification per rule 201(b)(2) of the Federal Rules of Evidence] that it would be a waste of our time to hear evidence about it. Thus, you may treat it as proved, even though no evidence was brought out on the point. Of course, with this fact, as with any fact, you will have to make the final decision and you are not required to agree with me. n18

[8] Judicial Notice on Appeal

Because of the special recognition in the Rule of the jury's role, an Appellate Court must be careful not to judicially notice facts in a way that would deprive a litigant of jury consideration of those facts. For example, in reviewing a criminal case tried to a jury, an Appellate Court should not take judicial notice of an adjudicative fact in order to find that the evidence was sufficient for a conviction. To do so would be tantamount to the use of a binding instruction concerning a judicially noticed fact at trial, which is prohibited under Rule 201(g); it would be the same as directing the jury to find a fact. n19 The same concerns would not apply to appellate judicial notice in the context of review of civil trials or criminal bench trials. n20 Likewise, the Appellate Court's use of judicial notice is permissible when addressing a legal challenge to the proceedings in the Trial Court. n21

The provision for mandatory judicial notice in Rule 201(d) should not be automatically applied on appeal, if the party could have and yet failed to raise the issue at trial. A requirement of mandatory judicial notice on appeal would, in these circumstances, conflict with the provisions of Rule 103, which require timely objection and an offer of proof. Consequently, if the party missed an opportunity to raise the issue at trial, an Appellate Court should judicially notice a fact in the party's favor only if the Trial Court's failure to do so was plain error. This is particularly true where the asserted ground of indisputability is that the fact could have been readily verified by accurate sources. The party's failure to raise the issue at trial means that the Trial Judge was never directed to any sources.

[9] Judicial Notice of Law

There is no provision in the Rule with respect to so-called judicial notice of law. n22 Rule 44.1 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and Rule 26.1 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure provide a method for invoking the law of a foreign country. These rules received praise from the Advisory Committee, which concluded that questions involving determination of law are better left for the procedural rules. At common law, it was likely that a Court would take judicial notice of domestic law, i.e., the law of the jurisdiction in which the Court sat. As for the law of sister states (usually noticed by Federal Courts, but not by State Courts) and the law of foreign countries, these were often matters to be pleaded and proved, although various presumptions might be invoked to make proof easier. There seems to be a movement to permit the Judge to decide what the law is in any jurisdiction when it is necessary to determine such law to decide a case. n23

Given the federal procedural rules already enacted and the favorable commentary contained in the Advisory Committee Note, in most cases Federal Judges will utilize a procedure that permits the Judge to determine all questions of law, at least on a federal, state or international level. n24 It does not seem unwise, however, to require a party who asks the Court to take judicial notice of law to do some of the digging that is necessary to discover the law. n25 All that the procedural rules and the current trend provide is that the Court itself is free to consult its own sources and to attempt to determine the appropriate law on the basis of all available statutes, decisions and other sources.

[10] Application of Noticed Facts to the Case

In most cases, there are some underlying facts that are so obvious as to be subject to judicial notice. But this is often of little importance, because the parties disagree as to whether and how a particular judicially noticed fact would be applicable to the facts of the case. For example, in Wooden v. Missouri P. R. Co., 862 F.2d 560 (5th Cir. 1989) , the plaintiff was exposed to silicon dust while he worked for a railroad. He contracted silicosis, and sued the railroad for failing to provide him with a respiratory mask. The plaintiff sought judicial notice of the fact that "it was common knowledge in the late 1950's that working in a cloud of silicon dust without respiratory gear could cause severe lung diseases." The Court held that judicial notice was not appropriate, because the application of the "indisputable" fact was in dispute:

> The essential defect in Wooden's argument is that the fact he asks be noticed is closely joined to an obviously, and legitimately, controverted issue: even if it was common knowledge in 1955 that inhaling silica dust could lead to lung disease, that does not resolve the crucial question of whether the railroad should have known that the particular concentration of dust to which Wooden was exposed entailed a significant risk of silicosis. To notice the fact that some concentrations of silica dusts were known to be harmful would only confuse the jury's consideration of whether the railroad did know, or should have known, a particular substance to be harmful. n26

The result in Wooden is consistent with Rule 403. Essentially, the Court held that the application of judicial notice would be only marginally probative, because it would not factor in the degree of exposure. For that very reason, the judicially noticed fact might confuse the jury into thinking that the railroad should have known that any exposure could be harmful. n27

The differentiation between judicial notice of a fact and the application of that fact has also arisen in the presentation of forensic evidence in criminal cases. Courts have taken judicial notice that certain forensic techniques (e.g., DNA testing) are reliable; however, if the reliable procedures are applied incorrectly in a particular case, exclusion of the test results may be warranted under Rules 403 and 702, at which point the judicially noticed fact is taken out of the case. n28

In other circumstances, a judicially noticed fact may be only conditionally relevant; satisfying Rule 201 is obviously insufficient in these circumstances. The requirements of Rule 104(b) must also be met. For example, in United States v. Southard, 700 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1983) , the prosecution in an interstate gambling case sought to establish that the defendant knew that a telephone call from a bettor was made to him from out-of-state. The defendant knew that the bettor had made a non-gambling-related call from the New Haven area at 6:35; fifteen minutes later, the bettor called the defendant, who was in Rhode Island, and placed a bet. The Trial Court took judicial notice that "no one could have driven from New Haven, Connecticut to the Rhode Island line in 15 minutes" and therefore that the defendant must have known that the caller was still in Connecticut when he made the betting call. But the Court of Appeals reversed, on the ground that the prosecution presented no evidence from which it could be found that the defendant "knew or should have known the driving time between New Haven, Connecticut and the Rhode Island line." Thus, the prosecution failed to ask "the questions necessary for the judicially-noticed fact to become operative," such as whether the defendant had a car, whether he had ever driven to New Haven, whether he had ever studied geography, etc.

[11] Relationship to Discovery Rules

Counsel in civil cases should be aware of Rule 36 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, which permits one party to ask the other to admit certain facts. More can be accomplished by way of admissions than by way of judicial notice. A party who unreasonably refuses to admit a fact after being served with a request to admit is subject to sanctions under Fed. R. Civ. P. 37. Alternatively, a pretrial conference may produce agreement on many issues, thus avoiding unnecessary trial issues.

It has been held that the requirements of Rule 201 are not specifically applicable when a Court is asked to rule on a discovery matter, such as a motion to compel or for a protective order. n29 This does not mean that a Court's use of judicial notice in passing on a discovery motion is unreviewable, however. As one Court put it: "Discovery is not made subject to the same evidence rules that would apply at trial, but Rule 201 does supply a well-accepted standard for judicial notice, and radical departure from this standard could amount to an abuse of the trial court's discretion in overseeing the discovery process." n30

[12] Relationship to Other Doctrines

The term "judicial notice" is often used to describe an action of a Court that would be better characterized in another way. For example, judicial factfinding may sometimes be confused with the concept of taking judicial notice. When a Trial Judge draws inferences from a writing, the Judge is not taking judicial notice; she is engaging in factfinding and Rule 201 does not apply. Another example of confusion among concepts is the use of Rule 201 where another Rule would be more appropriate -- for example, the hearsay rule. A document that qualifies for admission into evidence under an exception to the hearsay rule becomes evidence in the case; it can be used without the necessity of taking judicial notice under Rule 201. n31

[13] Relationship to Plain Error

One of the most difficult distinctions to make is that between a ruling on a claim of plain error under Rule 103(d) and the taking of judicial notice. By definition, plain error signifies that a point was not properly raised in the Lower Court. Because evidence on the point is not in the record, in deciding whether a miscarriage of justice occurred, a reviewing Court often will go outside the record to evaluate the importance of the error. Although the actions of the reviewing Court look very much like the taking of judicial notice, the Court actually is doing something slightly different from taking notice. The Court is not conclusively finding any facts; it is making an assessment of the significance of an error. Often the reviewing Court will be willing to concede that the question of whether or not the error was harmful is fairly debatable. But having conceded this, the Court may find no plain error, not because it conclusively determines that a fact is true or false, but because it determines that the party who failed to properly preserve the point for appeal has not been damaged enough to warrant a reversal. n32 Actually, the reviewing Court is not engaged in the kind of factfinding associated with judicial notice of adjudicative facts; it is making a judgment about the requirements of fair procedure based upon an educated guess in an area of uncertainty.

(n11)Footnote 11. One of the authors of this Manual was the Reporter for the Supreme Court of Alaska when it drafted its evidence code. The following quotation is drawn from the Reporter's Comment that accompanied Alaska Rule 201. Although the Alaska Rule does not use the terms adjudicative and legislative fact, it covers approximately the same ground as the Federal Rule, and the Comment may help Judges and lawyers understand when formal procedures are to be employed in taking judicial notice.

> One aspect not covered by Rule 201 involves assumptions made by the court in its determination of policy; e.g., that a particular change in the law would probably do more harm than good. This is not the sort of fact question that, in a jury trial, would normally be put to the jury, and so is not subsumed by Rule 201's definition of "judicial notice of fact." Rather than findings of fact, these are policy determinations made by the court acting in its lawmaking capacity. The court as lawmaker is held to the same standard as the legislature is for the veracity of its inferences: it must be rational. The court taking judicial notice of a fact as that term is used in Rule 201 is held to a different and more demanding standard -- the same standard required for it to direct a verdict; it must be right, meaning that rational minds would not dispute the fact that the court notices.

Stated more specifically, Rule 201 does not bar:

> (1) Common law rule-making on the basis of factual assumptions based on the court's familiarity with non-evidence sources.
>
> (2) Rule-making pursuant to a constitutional grant of authority on the basis of disputable factual assumptions.
>
> (3) Constitutional interpretation based upon disputable factual assumptions -- for example the balancing of interests in the vague area of due process.
>
> (4) Judicial creation of remedies assumed to be necessary to carry out the legislative intent of a statute.

Jones, 580 F.2d 219 (6th Cir. 1978)* :

> Rule 201(g) plainly contemplates that the jury in a criminal case shall pass upon facts which are judicially noticed. This it could not do if this notice were taken for the first time after it had been discharged and the case was on appeal. We, therefore, hold that Rule 201(f), authorizing judicial notice at the appellate level, must yield in the face of the express congressional intent manifested in 201(g) for criminal jury trials.

Pa. 1981)* (Court took judicial notice of the laws of Australia, noting that these were the kinds of matters capable of accurate determination by reliable sources). However, it has been held that Federal Courts do not take judicial notice of municipal ordinances and private codes referred to in statutes. See Getty v. Petroleum Marketing v. Capital Terminal Co., 391 F.3d 312 (1st Cir. 2004) ("Generally, in the federal system, the law of any state of the Union, whether depending upon statutes or upon judicial opinions, is a matter of which the courts of the United States are bound to take judicial notice without plea or proof. Municipal ordinances and private codes referred to in statutes historically have not been included within this general rule of judicial notice of law. Under traditional rules, even a municipal ordinance must be placed into evidence.").

(n25)Footnote 25. See, e.g., Universal Sales Co., v. Silver Castle, Ltd., 182 F.3d 1036 (9th Cir. 1999) (expert's assessment of foreign law should have been credited where adversary had opportunity to proffer its own expert and failed to do so, and Trial Court performed no independent research of foreign law).

(n26)Footnote 26. See also General Elec. Capital v. Lease Resolution, 128 F.3d 1074 (7th Cir. 1997) ("A district court may not take judicial notice of fact where its application may be reasonably disputed because use of this evidentiary device in this manner would abrogate the fundamental requirement of due process."); United States v. Judge, 846 F.2d 274 (5th Cir. 1988) (judicial notice of DEA inventory regulations would not be helpful because the application of the regulations "to the facts presented here is subject to reasonable dispute").

(n27)Footnote 27. See also Laster v. Celotex Corp., 587 F. Supp. 542 (S.D. Ohio 1984) (taking "judicial notice that the inhalation of asbestos may cause asbestosis under certain conditions would have no appreciable impact on the length of expert testimony").

(n28)Footnote 28. United States v. Beasley, 102 F.3d 1440 (8th Cir. 1996) (DNA testing by the polymerase chain reaction method (PCR) was so reliable that courts could take judicial notice of its reliability in the future; however, in any particular case, "the reliability of the proffered test results may be challenged by showing that a scientifically sound methodology has been undercut by sloppy handling of the samples, failure to properly train those performing the testing, failure to follow the proper protocols, and the like.").

(n29)Footnote 29. See Marshall v. Bramer, 828 F.2d 355 (6th Cir. 1987) (in taking judicial notice of a fact pertinent to plaintiff's discovery demand, "the judge here was not finding the adjudicative facts of the case"; he simply determined, on the basis of the noticed fact, that the defendant probably had custody of certain discoverable information).

(n30)Footnote 30. Marshall v. Bramer, 828 F.2d 355, 358 (6th Cir. 1987) (no abuse of discretion where Trial Court took judicial notice of the fact that the Ku Klux Klan is a violent, racist organization).

(n31)Footnote 31. See, e.g., United States v. Posner, 405 F. Supp. 934 (D. Md. 1975) (judicial notice taken of an affidavit that might have qualified under Rule 803(8)).

(n32)Footnote 32. See Johnson v. United States, 520 U.S. 461 (1997) (plain error was committed where the Judge, rather than the jury, decided the question of materiality in a perjury trial; however, reversal was not required because the error did not affect the fairness or integrity of the proceedings; the evidence supporting materiality was "overwhelming," therefore, "no miscarriage of justice will occur if we do not notice the error").

Article II. Judicial Notice
CHAPTER 201 RULE 201

1-201 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 201.03

201.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Rule 201(a) -- Scope of Rule

[a] Rule 201(a) -- Administrative Notice

Llana-Castellon v. INS, 16 F.3d 1093 (10th Cir. 1994) : Although the Court noted that the scope of administrative notice may be somewhat broader than judicial notice because of an agency's specialized expertise, it held that the Board of Immigration Appeals denied aliens due process by overturning an Immigration Judge's finding that the aliens had a well-founded fear of prosecution on the basis of administrative notice that control of the government in Nicaragua had changed and by denying the aliens an opportunity to be heard on the issue.

[b] Rule 201(a) -- Jurisdictional Questions

United States v. Hernandez-Fundora, 58 F.3d 802 (2d Cir. 1995) : The defendant, who beat up a fellow inmate at Raybrook penitentiary, was convicted of assault committed within the special territorial jurisdiction of the United States. The defendant argued that a jury instruction that Raybrook "is a place that falls within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States" violated Rule 201(g) because it gave the jury no opportunity to reject the judicially noticed fact. Affirming, the Court held that "any factual issues whose resolution is necessary to a determination of a ... geographical/jurisdictional issue would invoke judicial notice of legislative," not adjudicative, facts, so the procedural requirements of Rule 201(g) were inapplicable.

[c] Rule 201(a) -- Legislative Facts

Qualley v. Clo-Tex Int'l, Inc., 212 F.3d 1123 (8th Cir. 2000) : The Court vacated a judgment for a plaintiff who sued a corporation and an individual under RICO and state law, alleging a conspiracy to defraud involving a purchase of Nigerian crude oil that was never delivered. The Court found that the Trial Judge erred in taking judicial notice of a congressional report, newspaper articles, and television reports regarding Nigerian fraud scams involving oil. It concluded that the noticed facts were legislative, not adjudicative, and should not have been used with respect to the particular case. The facts of which the Judge took notice "did not specifically concern the parties before the court." The error was compounded by jury instructions that required the jury to accept the noticed facts as true.

United States v. Wolny, 133 F.3d 758 (10th Cir. 1998) : The Court affirmed convictions for attempted money laundering, finding no error in the Trial Judge's failure to take judicial notice of the regulations governing the filing of Currency Transaction Reports. Those regulations had relevance only to legal reasoning and the law-making process, rather than to the facts of the particular case, so they were legislative facts not subject to the requirement of mandatory judicial notice under Rule 201(d).

[d] Rule 201(a) -- Notice of Law

Getty Petroleum Mktg., Inc. v. Capital Terminal Co., 391 F.3d 312 (1st Cir. 2004) : In an action between a pier owner and operators of a terminal facility serviced by the pier to determine which was responsible for costs of installing a fire suppression system, the Court held that the Trial Judge was not required to take judicial notice of a fire protection standard referenced in a state statute relied upon by the pier owner. The standard was not readily available and the owner did not provide the Judge with a properly certified copy. In a separate opinion, the concurring Judge helpfully discussed the doctrine of judicial notice of law generally and some changes taking place in application of the doctrine to municipal ordinances and mandatory safety codes.

Siderius, Inc. v. M.V. "Amilla," 880 F.2d 662 (2d Cir. 1989): In an action by a manufacturer against a shipowner and ship charterer for cargo damage, the Trial Judge looked to the New York Produce Exchange Interclub Agreement in apportioning damages between the defendants. The Court held that the charterer was not entitled to notice before the Judge referred to the Agreement because it was more like law, to which Rule 201 has no application, than an adjudicative fact. Even if the Agreement were considered an adjudicative fact, adequate notice was given by its incorporation by reference in one of the parties' key joint exhibits, the charter party between them.

Mutual Serv. Ins. Co. v. Frit Indus., Inc., 358 F.3d 1312 (11th Cir. 2004) : In a insurance coverage dispute contractually governed by Cayman Islands law, the Court found no error when Alabama law was applied to the case after the offshore insurers never offered citations to substantive Cayman law. "Although the court is permitted to take judicial notice of authoritiative statements of foreign law, nothing requires the court to conduct its own research into obscure sources."

[2] Rule 201(b) -- Kinds of Facts

[a] Rule 201(b) -- Business or Government Custom

Nadherny v. Roseland Prop. Co., 390 F.3d 44 (1st Cir. 2004) : In reversing summary judgment for the plaintiff in an action for breach of an employment contract, the Court held it was error to take judicial notice of industry usages in construing the contract. Industry custom and practice was a subject of dispute in the case. In Rivera-Torres v. Ortiz Velez, 341 F.3d 86 (1st Cir. 2003) , an action alleging employment discrimination motivated by political animus, the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff, finding no abuse of discretion when the Judge refused to take judicial notice of a local law that prohibited converting a "transitory" governmental appointment into a tenured appointment. The Judge's knowledge, based on sixteen years' experience, that the law was frequently disregarded meant that the law could not be treated as stating a fact "not subject to reasonable dispute." In Eagle-Picher Indus. v. Liberty Mut. Ins. Co., 682 F.2d 12 (1st Cir. 1982) , a suit by a manufacturer of asbestos products for a declaratory judgment as to rights and liabilities of various insurers, the Court declined to take judicial notice of the drafting history of standardized insurance policies that were at issue.

Kaggen v. IRS, 71 F.3d 1018 (2d Cir. 1995) : Affirming summary judgment for the IRS in an action brought by taxpayers who challenged a levy against their bank accounts for lack of notice, the Court held that it was proper to take judicial notice "that banks send customers monthly statements which inform customers to whom their money was paid." A dissenting Judge argued that other facts, upon which the adequacy of notice depended, were not the proper subjects for judicial notice, e.g., that bank statements are timely read by depositors and reflect that a particular withdrawal represents a seizure by the IRS. In Pina v. Henderson, n1 the District Court granted habeas corpus relief to a state prisoner, finding that the prosecution failed to reveal in a timely fashion to the petitioner that a codefendant had admitted sole responsibility for the crime charged. The Judge took judicial notice of the fact that it was common practice for the police to make a record of statements made by suspects and that the record would have been similar to the one found in the petitioner's probation report. The Court of Appeals reversed, holding that judicial notice was inappropriate when the fact noticed was an essential part of the party's case and was not clearly beyond dispute.

United States v. George, 971 F.2d 1113 (4th Cir. 1992) : Remanding a suppression order in a racketeering case for a determination of whether hacksaw blades seized from the defendant's truck would inevitably have been discovered in a lawful inventory search, the Court said that judicial notice should be taken of the county police's published policies and procedures for inventory searches. See also Raleigh-Durham Airport Auth. v. Delta Air Lines n2(judicial notice taken in suit for airport landing fees, of nationwide practice of establishing, by process of negotiation, rates to be charged for airport landing fees and space rental).

Harcon Barge Co. v. D & G Boat Rentals, Inc., 746 F.2d 278 (5th Cir. 1984) , aff'd en banc , 784 F.2d 665 (5th Cir. 1986) : The Court took judicial notice as to the uniform practice of the clerks of District Courts within the Circuit with respect to signifying the date of entry of an order or a judgment. See also Lawrence v. Commodity Futures Trading Comm'n n3(claim of associated person of commodity broker that suspension would cause broker to lose customers and income was not proper subject of judicial notice).

[b] Rule 201(b) -- Business Records

United States v. Cooper, 375 F.3d 1041 (10th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed bank robbery and firearm convictions, holding that the Trial Judge did not err in taking judicial notice that Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation certificates were business records.

[c] RULE 201(b) -- Calendar and Time

Lloyd v. Cessna Aircraft Co., 430 F. Supp. 25 (E.D. Tenn. 1976) : When one party to this litigation served notice on opposing parties of an intention to take a deposition, the District Court quashed the notice on the ground that it gave opposing counsel insufficient time to get ready for the depositions. The Court took judicial notice of the fact that one of the days between the time of notice and the scheduled deposition was a national holiday.

[d] Rule 201(b) -- Current Events

Barnes v. Bosley, 568 F. Supp. 1406 (E.D. Mo. 1983) , modified, 745 F.2d 501 (8th Cir. 1984) : In an action by discharged public employees claiming that they were victims of politically motivated action, the Court took judicial notice that the Democratic Party was currently in firm control of political offices within the City of St. Louis.

Orantes-Hernandez v. Smith, 541 F. Supp. 351 (C.D. Cal. 1982) : In the course of granting injunctive relief against the Immigration and Naturalization Service's treatment of Salvadoran aliens, the Court took judicial notice that El Salvador was in the midst of a civil war that created a substantial danger of violence to civilians residing there and that both government forces and guerrillas had been responsible for human rights violations and political persecution.

[e] Rule 201(b) -- Dangers of Smoking

Roysdon v. R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., 849 F.2d 230 (6th Cir. 1988) : Affirming a judgment for the defendant in a product liability action to recover for smoking-related disease, the Court noted that the Trial Judge had taken judicial notice that the "[k]nowledge that cigarette smoking is harmful to health is widespread and can be considered part of the common knowledge of the community."

Rivera v. Philip Morris, Inc., 395 F.3d 1142 (9th Cir. 2005) : Reversing in part summary judgment for the defendant in a product liability action to recover for a smoker's lung cancer death, the Court held that although the Trial Judge took judicial notice of the fact that the health risks and addictive nature of smoking have been common knowledge in Nevada, it was premature to take judicial notice of the fact that the link between smoking and specific diseases was common knowledge in 1969.

[f] Rule 201(b) -- Economic Information

In re Warfarin Sodium Antitrust Litig., 214 F.3d 395 (3d Cir. 2000) : Plaintiffs suing on behalf of a class of prescription drug consumers alleged that they had paid inflated prices because the defendant had thwarted generic drug manufacturers from entering the market. The Trial Judge dismissed the complaint for failure to allege antitrust injury, relying heavily on facts concerning the effects of third party payor and prescription drug insurance plans on the prices paid, which were not discussed in the plaintiffs' complaint. Reversing, the Court held that the facts relied upon -- that class members were likely being reimbursed to some extent -- were neither generally known nor capable of accurate and ready determination through unquestionably reliable sources. In Cardio-Medical Assocs. v. Crozer-Chester Med. Center, n4 the Court, holding that an antitrust plaintiff's allegations were sufficient to state a claim, found that the District Judge erred in taking judicial notice of the proposition that it was "logically inconceivable" that the defendants' conduct affected the interstate movement of patients seeking cardiological therapy. This, said the Court, "[c]learly ... is reasonably disputable." In a personal injury action, Varlack v. SWC Caribbean, Inc., n5 the Court noted that a Trial Judge is empowered to take judicial notice of the appropriate discount rate to be applied to a lump sum payment in a tort action.

Fox v. Kane-Miller Corp., 398 F. Supp. 609 (D. Md. 1975) , aff'd, 542 F.2d 915 (4th Cir. 1976) : The Court took judicial notice of the rate of inflation.

Transorient Navigators Co., S.A. v. M/S Southwind, 788 F.2d 288 (5th Cir. 1986) : The Court held in an admiralty case that a Trial Judge may take judicial notice of prevailing interest rates. See also Mainline Inv. Corp. v. Gaines n6(taking judicial notice of economic events in the oil industry, in determining whether breach of contract was excused by "act of God or other extraordinary cause" over which party had no control).

Ohio River Co. v. Peavey Co., 731 F.2d 547 (8th Cir. 1984) : In an admiralty case, the Court held that the Trial Judge could not take judicial notice that a ten percent rate was appropriate for prejudgment interest, where evidence was offered to the contrary.

Grason Elec. Co. v. Sacramento Mun. Util. Dist., 571 F. Supp. 1504 (E.D. Cal. 1983) : In the course of denying summary judgment for the plaintiff in an antitrust case using a "monopoly leveraging" theory, the Court took judicial notice that "there is no alternative to which consumers could readily turn should they desire to live their lives as they presently do, but without electricity." This notice led the Court to conclude that the relevant product market was electrical energy and that the relevant geographic market was the area in which the defendant utility operated, since it had no competitors.

[g] Rule 201(b) -- Facts About Litigants

Lussier v. Runyon, 50 F.3d 1103 (1st Cir. 1995) : The plaintiff's judgment for disability discrimination in his firing by the Postal Service was to be reduced by the amount of disability benefits that he would receive from the Civil Service Retirement System. The Court held that it was error to accept, without an adversary hearing, the plaintiff's evidence as to the amount of CSRS benefits he would receive. The level of benefits to be received by the plaintiff was neither generally known, nor capable of accurate and ready determination through unquestionable sources; rather, the Trial Judge acquired the information "through untested unilateral submissions."

City of New Brunswick v. Borough of Milltown, 686 F.2d 120 (3d Cir. 1982) : In a suit by a city against a borough and a county utilities authority to void a contract concerning sewage disposal, the Court refused to take judicial notice of the amount of sewage flowing from the borough into a plant. It observed that "[t]he doctrines of 'legislative facts' and 'judicial notice' are not talismans by which gaps in a litigant's evidentiary presentation before the district court may be repaired on appeal."

United States v. Hawkins, 76 F.3d 545 (4th Cir. 1996) : The Court held that it was error in a criminal contempt prosecution to permit the prosecutor to identify Hawkins as the person who had been recalcitrant and uttered obscenities when called as a witness in a criminal case, since "testimony taken from a witness who has not given an oath or affirmation to testify truthfully is inadmissible." Judicial notice was improper because the defendant's identity was not a fact generally known in West Virginia or capable of determination by resort to sources of unquestionable accuracy. In Haavistola v. Community Fire Co., 6 F.3d 211 (4th Cir. 1993) , the Court reversed summary judgment granted to a volunteer fire company in a Title VII and § 1983 sex discrimination action, holding it was an abuse of discretion to take judicial notice of the defendant's status as a State actor.

Cantrell v. Knoxville Community Dev. Corp., 60 F.3d 1177 (6th Cir. 1995) : The Court remanded a Title VII action because the Trial Judge took judicial notice of the plaintiff's attorney's mental instability when holding that the 180-day filing requirement was equitably tolled. An individual's mental state is a fact about which reasonable professionals can disagree, and even if (as the dissenting Judge believed) the attorney's mental instability at the time of the decision was unquestioned and widely known in the jurisdiction, the question remained whether the attorney suffered from mental instability during the 180-day filing period.

Hennessy v. Penril Datacomm Networks, Inc., 69 F.3d 1344 (7th Cir. 1995) : The Court held that, in determining the number of the defendant's employees for purposes of assessing damages in an employment discrimination action, there was no error in refusing to take judicial notice of a 10-K form filed with the SEC, since exactly what employees were referred to in the form was a matter of dispute. In Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp. v. Jacobson, n7 the Court held that a Trial Judge could not take judicial notice that media coverage of a verdict in favor of a cigarette manufacturer who successfully proved actual malice in a television broadcast was "fair." The Court found error in the Judge's reliance on the noticed fact as justification for reducing a compensatory damage award.

Holloway v. Lockhart, 813 F.2d 874 (8th Cir. 1987) : The Court reversed summary judgments for prison guards and officials in a suit by an inmate who alleged that the defendants used or approved the use of tear-gas that caused him an unconstitutional injury. The Court found that the Trial Judge erred in adopting findings of fact concerning the reasonableness of the defendants' actions that were made in another lawsuit arising out of the same tear-gas incident, since the plaintiff could not be estopped by the findings and they were not the kind of findings as to which judicial notice could be taken.

Ritter v. Hughes Aircraft Co., 58 F.3d 454 (9th Cir. 1995) : The Court held, in a laid-off employee's age discrimination action, that there was no abuse of discretion in taking judicial notice of the employer's widespread layoffs based on a newspaper article, as the fact was generally known in the area and could be capable of sufficiently accurate and ready determination.

Switzer v. Coan, 261 F.3d 985 (10th Cir. 2001) : The plaintiff pro se sued a long list of Judges, law clerks, and court personnel. He alleged that they had conspired to deprive him of meaningful access to the courts, including by the issuance of orders written by law clerks and staff attorneys and signed by Judges without having been read. Dismissing the complaint and precluding amendment as futile, the District Court took judicial notice that the Judges review, approve, and sign all orders. The Court held that the Judge's personal knowledge, if any, was not a proper basis for taking judicial notice of such a fact, which was not either generally known or capable of ready determination from incontestable sources. However, the ruling below was affirmed because the plaintiff had never indicated otherwise than that he was standing on his pleading. In Storm Plastics, Inc. v. United States, 770 F.2d 148 (10th Cir. 1985) , the Court reversed a judgment for the government in a suit involving excise taxes on fishing lures, holding that the Trial Judge improperly took judicial notice of the quality of the plaintiff's fishing lures. This was neither a subject generally known in the community nor one capable of accurate and ready determination by plainly accurate sources.

Cofield v. Alabama Pub. Serv. Comm'n, 936 F.2d 512 (11th Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed in part an order requiring an inmate to seek prefiling approval of any complaints or papers he filed in the future, and held that judicial notice should not have been taken of a newspaper article as proof that the inmate had access to thousands of dollars hidden somewhere. Just because a statement appears in a newspaper does not establish that the fact is capable of accurate and ready determination by resort to sources whose accuracy cannot reasonably be questioned. In Nationalist Movement v. City of Cumming, n8 the Court held there had been no error in taking judicial notice that the plaintiff organization's rallies were often loud and attracted boisterous and sometimes violent counter-demonstrators. The Trial Judge's observations were apparently based on local and national media accounts, as well as on public records, of the organization's marches and counter-marches in the county. In any event, because the plaintiffs had not requested a hearing under Rule 201(e), the judicial notice issue was nonappealable.

[h] Rule 201(b) -- Fees, Salaries, etc.

Whitman v. Fuqua, 561 F. Supp. 175 (W.D. Pa. 1983) : In considering a joint motion for approval of attorneys' fees in a bitter corporate control contest, the Court observed that it was entitled to "take notice of the customary rates in the community for attorneys of comparable standing, skill and experience."

Rutherford v. Sea-Land Serv., 575 F. Supp. 1365 (N.D. Cal. 1983) : The Court took judicial notice that the eight dollars per day provided for in a collective bargaining agreement was an unreasonably low sum for obtaining a room and three meals in the San Francisco Bay area.

[i] Rule 201(b) -- General Information

United States v. Simon, 842 F.2d 552 (1st Cir. 1988) : Affirming drug-related convictions, the Court held that the Trial Judge was not required to take judicial notice of the facts that there is a University of the West Indies in Jamaica and that Rastafarians use marijuana as part of their religion. No showing was made that these facts were either generally known or capable of accurate and ready determination by sources that could not reasonably be questioned. See also United States v. Bourque n9(not proper for District Court to take judicial notice of whether the Internal Revenue Service ever loses tax returns).

Brennan's Inc. v. Brennan's Restaurant, L.L.C., 360 F.3d 125 (2d Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed the denial of a preliminary injunction in a trademark infringement case. Noting that "[i]n the case at hand plaintiff and defendant have a common last name," it stated "[w]e take judicial notice that a current Manhattan telephone book lists 184 residences and 20 businesses with the name Brennan."

Record Museum v. Lawrence Township, 481 F. Supp. 768 (D.N.J. 1979) : The Court took judicial notice of "the phenomenon known as the counterculture of the seventies." See also Newark Morning Ledger Co. v. United States n10(taking judicial notice in income tax case that plaintiff was New Jersey's largest and only statewide newspaper, both on weekdays and on Sunday).

Wooden v. Missouri P. R. Co., 862 F.2d 560 (5th Cir. 1989) : In a suit by a railroad employee alleging that he contracted silicosis from tamping gravel, the Court held that judicial notice could not be taken of the fact that it was common knowledge in the 1950s that working in a cloud of silicon dust without respiratory gear could cause severe lung disease. In United Klans of Am. v. McGovern, n11 the District Court took judicial notice that the plaintiff organization was a "white hate" organization. In Blacks United for Lasting Leadership, Inc. v. City of Shreveport, n12 the District Judge, holding that at-large elections for the mayor and city commissioners unconstitutionally diluted black voting strength, took judicial notice that until recently de jure segregation affected the lives of all black persons in ways described by the District Court. The Judge also took judicial notice of a 1974 city-wide census in order to supplement evidence introduced at trial based on the 1970 Census. Finally, the Judge judicially noticed that, in contrast to the government's lack of concern for the condition of streets in black neighborhoods, similar streets located in more affluent neighborhoods were not permitted to lapse into such disrepair. See also Clark v. South Cent. Bell Tel. Co. n13(Court refused to take judicial notice of black population of particular parish in employment discrimination suit, where source of information not placed before Court).

United States v. Deckard, 816 F.2d 426 (8th Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed a defendant's conviction for an illegal wiretap, holding there was no error in taking judicial notice that interstate communications were carried over the telephone company's lines. The Trial Judge had properly instructed the jury that it could, but was not required to, accept as conclusive a fact that was judicially noticed.

United States v. Baker, 641 F.2d 1311 (9th Cir. 1981) : The Court said that nonparties to an injunction must have actual notice of it before they can be held in criminal contempt for violating it and that judicial notice of "actual notice" could not be taken on the basis of "unproved, widespread publicity."

Lozano v. Ashcroft, 258 F.3d 1160 (10th Cir. 2001) : In an employment discrimination action, the Court held it was error to take judicial notice of the date a decision was received by the defendant, where there was a genuine dispute over the accuracy of the receipt date. In York v. American Tel. & Tel. Co., 95 F.3d 948 (10th Cir. 1996) , the Court held in a Title VII case that there was no abuse of discretion in refusing to take judicial notice that "few if any women in the Oklahoma City area would be able to satisfy a two-year experience requirement," as that fact is neither generally known nor readily determinable.

Dippin' Dots, Inc. v. Frosty Bites Distrib., LLC, 369 F.3d 1197 (11th Cir. 2004) : In an action for trade dress infringement brought by the manufacturer of flash-frozen novelty ice cream, the Court held that judicial notice was properly taken of the fact that color is indicative of flavor in ice cream, since the fact is generally known among consumers.

[j] Rule 201(b) -- Geography

United States v. Southard, 700 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1983) : The Court reversed a gambling conviction because the District Judge took judicial notice in a bench trial that "no one could have driven from New Haven, Connecticut to the Rhode Island line in 15 minutes," and used this as the basis for concluding that the defendant knew that a key telephone call had been made from out of state. The Court said that notice of the facts might have been proper, but that such notice could not support a finding that the defendant actually knew the facts, since there was no evidence that the defendant knew the distances that were judicially noticed.

United States v. Ramirez, 910 F.2d 1069 (2d Cir. 1990) : Affirming the defendant's sentence for a drug offense, the Court held that the sentencing Judge could take judicial notice that New York had no firearms manufacturers and conclude that a handgun illegally in the defendant's possession came from interstate commerce.

Berkshire Fashions, Inc. v. M.V. Hakusan II, 954 F.2d 874 (3d Cir. 1992) : An admiralty action seeking to recover for loss of umbrellas to be shipped from Taiwan to New Jersey was dismissed for lack of subject matter jurisdiction on the ground that the bill of lading did not contemplate carriage by sea alone. In reversing for further factfinding, the Court held that while it would be proper to notice judicially that a purely maritime route was elongated, it would be inappropriate to take judicial notice that parties would never contract for shipment over that geographical distance. See also Deary v. Evans n14(taking judicial notice, in action for a false arrest arising out of a bank robbery investigation, that a downtown business area was small and that two buildings were within several blocks of one another).

United States v. Lossiah, 537 F.2d 1250 (4th Cir. 1976) : The Court of Appeals approved the District Court's judicial notice that a certain town was within the Cherokee Indian Reservation, but reversed on another ground. See also Otto v. Alper n15(judicial notice that Rehoboth Bay in Delaware is navigable waterway for purposes of admiralty jurisdiction).

United States v. Anderson, 528 F.2d 590 (5th Cir. 1976) : Affirming a conviction for assault with intent to do bodily harm, the Court approved taking judicial notice that the Federal Correctional Institution in Tallahassee, Fla., where the assault was proved to have taken place, was "within the special maritime and territorial jurisdiction of the United States." See also Smith v. Hustler, Inc. n16(taking judicial notice in admiralty case that lake on which accident occurred was not "navigable," a fact generally known in the community).

Northwest Airlines v. County of Kent, Mich., 955 F.2d 1054 (6th Cir. 1992) , aff'd on other grounds, 510 U.S. 355 (1994) : In an action by airlines over the reasonableness of rates charged by an airport, judicial notice was taken that the airport was located less than an hour and a half from two airports serviced by major airlines. In United States v. Blunt, n17 the Court affirmed a conviction for assault with a deadly weapon, noting that the Trial Judge would have been correct in taking judicial notice under Rule 201 of the fact that the federal prison in which the assault giving rise to the instant prosecution took place was within the special territorial jurisdiction of the United States.

Horton v. Taylor, 585 F. Supp. 224 (W.D. Ark. 1984) , rev'd on other grounds, 767 F.2d 471 (8th Cir. 1985) : The Court took judicial notice that a county was predominantly rural and was located in mountainous regions.

United States v. Coutchavlis, 260 F.3d 1149 (9th Cir. 2001) : Affirming a conviction for disorderly conduct, the Court held that a Magistrate Judge, who actually holds court in Yosemite National Park, could take judicial notice of a map to conclude that the conduct took place with the Park.

United States v. Garcia, 672 F.2d 1349 (11th Cir. 1982) : The Court found that a Trial Judge was entitled to take judicial notice that a location was well beyond the three mile territorial limit of the United States. It also reminded Trial Judges that when they are taking notice they should notify the parties and give them a chance to be heard.

[k] Rule 201(b) -- Historical Information

Oneida Indian Nation v. New York, 691 F.2d 1070 (2d Cir. 1982) : In an action by the Nation to invalidate land purchases by New York from Indian tribes prior to the adoption of the Constitution, the Court said that the District Judge should not have taken judicial notice of various historical materials in order to interpret the Articles of Confederation. The historical material had not been subject to adversarial testing, and the Court of Appeals remanded for an evidentiary hearing.

Korematsu v. United States, 584 F. Supp. 1406 (N.D. Cal. 1984) : In a landmark case, the Court utilized the writ of coram nobis to vacate the conviction (which had been affirmed by the Supreme Court in 1944 n18) of an American citizen of Japanese ancestry who had violated an order excluding persons of such ancestry from various places after the United States declared war on Japan in 1941. In making its ruling, the Court declined to take judicial notice of certain adjudicative facts -- i.e., that there was no military necessity for relocation and detention of ethnic Japanese and that the government had failed to disclose crucial information to Courts considering the military necessity question. Even though the government did not oppose judicial notice, the Court expressed its view that notice of the ultimate facts in a case was inappropriate. Instead, the Court suggested that a report of a Congressional Commission on Wartime Relocation could be considered under Rule 803(8) and that certain internal government documents either were not hearsay and were admissible to show notice to the government or they satisfied one or more hearsay exceptions.

[l] Rule 201(b) -- Intellectual Property

Eden Toys, Inc. v. Marshall Field & Co., 675 F.2d 498 (2d Cir. 1982) : Affirming summary judgment for the defendant in a copyright infringement action, the Court said that the traditional features of a "snowman" are generally enough known to be judicially noticed. See also Nestle Co. v. Chester's Mkt., Inc. n19(taking judicial notice of dictionary and cookbook excerpts, Court concluded "Toll House" was a generic term that could not be claimed by Nestle as its trademark).

Marcyan v. Nissen Corp., 578 F. Supp. 485 (N.D. Ind. 1982) , aff'd, 725 F.2d 687 (1983) : In the course of finding for the defendants in a patent infringement case involving an exercise device with an invertible handlebar, the Court took judicial notice of the fact that handlebars of bicycles are routinely inverted and have been for some time.

[m] Rule 201(b) -- IRS Materials

American Stores Co. v. Commissioner, 170 F.3d 1267 (10th Cir. 1999) : In a tax dispute, the Court upheld the Trial Judge's refusal to take judicial notice of Private Letter Rulings, unpublished Technical Advice Memoranda, and other related IRS materials. The taxpayer sought to have the Judge take judicial notice that these materials demonstrated that IRS administrative practice was consistent with the position taken by the taxpayer in the instant litigation. But the Court held that none of this information was generally known, nor was it capable of accurate and ready determination; almost all of the information was in the nature of unpublished rulings issued to private taxpayers. The Court noted that the taxpayer's request for judicial notice was "essentially an attempt to introduce evidence after judgment," because the taxpayer had never attempted to introduce the information as evidence in the case. The Court concluded that judicial notice "is not a talisman by which gaps in a litigant's evidentiary presentation may be repaired on appeal."

[n] Rule 201(b) -- Judicial Records and Proceedings

United States v. Haldeman, 559 F.2d 31 (D.C. Cir. 1976) : The Court said: "The District Judge could surely take judicial notice, in a preliminary hearing merely on the admissibility of certain evidence, that ... testimony [read into the record by the government] was in fact presented in a hearing at which he presided on a not unrelated matter."

Guzma'n-Ruiz v. Herna'ndez-Colo'n, 406 F.3d 31 (1st Cir. 2005): The Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendants in a political discharge suit, finding no error in the Judge's refusal to take judicial notice of the record and ruling in another case in which the plaintiffs' counsel represented other dismissed employees. The Court stated that the "plaintiffs cannot sidestep their neglect to offer evidence in this case by asking the court to rule on the basis of the record in another case" in which the "pleadings, parties, issues, and facts differ." In Rodi v. Southern New England School of Law, 389 F.3d 5 (1st Cir. 2004) , a graduate of the law school brought fraudulent misrepresentation claims after the school did not achieve final accreditation. Reversing dismissal of the suit for failure to state a claim, the Court held that it was proper to take judicial notice of a related state proceeding in determining that the statute of limitations for the claim had been tolled. In Kowalski v. Gagne, 914 F.2d 299 (1st Cir. 1990) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff in a wrongful death action brought by the widow against the man convicted of murdering her husband, holding that the conviction was properly established by judicial notice rather than a certified copy.

International Star Class Yacht Racing v. Tommy Hilfiger U.S.A., Inc., 146 F.3d 66 (2d Cir. 1998) : In a Lanham Act case, the Court held it was error to rely on statements of fact in a prior Lanham Act opinion to establish prevailing trademark search practices, since "[f]acts adjudicated in a prior case do not meet either test of indisputability contained in Rule 201(b)." In Liberty Mut. Ins. Co. v. Rotches Pork Packers, Inc., 969 F.2d 1384 (2d Cir. 1992) , the Court reversed a judgment for the subrogee of a bankrupt meat packer, holding it was error to take judicial notice of a Bankruptcy Court's orders in order to prove that a statutory trust had been created, as judicial notice of documents filed in another Court may be used only to establish the fact of the other litigation and related filings, not the truth of matters asserted in the filings.

O'Neill v. Heckler, 579 F. Supp. 979 (E.D. Pa. 1984) : Although the Court dismissed a complaint seeking review of the denial of disability benefits on the ground that the complaint was not filed in a timely manner, it took judicial notice that the complaint was actually filed, along with a motion to proceed in forma pauperis, before the Court clerk stamped "filed" on it.

Taylor v. Charter Med. Corp., 162 F.3d 827 (5th Cir. 1998) : In a § 1983 suit against a psychiatric hospital, the Court found no error in refusing the plaintiff's request, based on the determination made in another suit that the defendant's corporate predecessor was a state actor, to take judicial notice that the defendant was a state actor. The entity's status as state actor was not a fact beyond reasonable dispute, and the status, being a mixed question of fact and law, was not an "adjudicative fact" within the meaning of Rule 201. In In re Missionary Baptist Found. of Am., Inc., n20 the Court found no error in a Bankruptcy Judge's taking judicial notice of a record developed in the same bankruptcy case, but in a different proceeding. See also MacMillan Bloedel Ltd. v. Flintkote Co. n21(upholding summary judgment for a seller in a suit by the buyer of corporate assets and observing that "[a] court may take judicial notice of related proceedings and records in cases before the same court"); Kinnett Dairies, Inc. v. Farrow n22(in absence of any complaint or claim by party that procedure violated due process, no error in Trial Court's taking judicial notice of materials in its files from prior proceedings even though one of the parties in the instant case had not been a party in the prior proceedings).

Deal v. Hamilton County Board of Educ., 392 F.3d 840 (6th Cir. 2004) : The parents of an autistic child were successful in an administrative proceeding seeking reimbursement for various educational costs, but the Trial Judge rejected the determination after a bench trial at which additional evidence was presented. On appeal, the Court held there was no error with the Judge's refusal to take judicial notice of declarations made in an unrelated California case by one of the testifying experts, which the plaintiffs characterized as suggesting that the expert's positions "can turn on which party is paying his bill." While there was no dispute about occurrence of the California proceeding or the existence of the declarations, the expert's credibility was very much in dispute, so judicial notice on that issue would have been improper; the proper use of the allegedly contradictory declarations was in cross-examination of the expert.

General Elec. Capital Corp. v. Lease Resolution Corp., 128 F.3d 1074 (7th Cir. 1997) : In a lender's action to collect a deficiency claim against guarantors on the ground of fraudulent transfer and successor liability, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to take judicial notice of a finding in a prior class action related to the subject matter of this suit. The "fairness" of a proposed settlement is sufficiently different from the issue whether the resulting transfer of assets was for "fair" value that the Trial Judge should have determined that the earlier finding indisputably applied in the later proceeding before dismissing claims on the basis of the finding. The Judge likewise erred in taking judicial notice of recitals in a private settlement agreement in deciding whether continuity of ownership existed between the purchaser and seller of assets in the settlement transaction. In Scholes v. Lehmann, 56 F.3d 750 (7th Cir. 1995) , summary judgment was granted for the plaintiff in a receiver's action to recover funds that had been distributed by the since-convicted mastermind of a Ponzi scheme. Affirming in part, the Court said that judicial notice was properly taken of the mastermind's plea agreement, so as to establish the defendants' liability.

United States v. Daychild, 357 F.3d 1082 (9th Cir. 2004) : Rejecting a motion to dismiss the indictment in a marijuana distribution case, the Trial Judge properly took judicial notice that the indictment had been returned before an open court and that twelve jurors concurred in the indictment. That the indictment had been properly returned is a fact capable of accurate and ready determination by resort to a source whose accuracy cannot reasonably be questioned. In Wyatt v. Terhune, 315 F.3d 1108 (9th Cir. 2002) , the Court reversed summary judgment against a prisoner challenging hair-length regulations, noting that it was error when the Magistrate Judge took judicial notice of findings in another case regarding justifications for grooming regulations, the adverse impact of accommodating religion by providing an exception to grooming regulations, and the escalating number of searches that must be conducted. In Lee v. County of Los Angeles, 240 F.3d 754 (9th Cir. 2001) , a mentally-impaired man was mistakenly arrested in California and extradited to New York as an escaped felon. Reversing dismissal of a civil rights complaint filed on the man's behalf, the Court held it was error to take judicial notice of a waiver of extradition signed by the man and of the transcript of the extradition hearing. The Judge took judicial notice not only of the undisputed facts that an extradition hearing was held, the waiver was signed, and the man purportedly waived his right to challenge extradition, but also of the disputed facts included in the transcript, that the man had informed the hearing Judge and counsel that he was in fact the person sought in New York. In ruling on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion, judicial notice of another Court's opinion may not be for the truth of the facts recited therein but only for the existence of the opinion. In United States v. Wilson, n23 the Court reversed a bail-jumping conviction, holding it was error to take judicial notice of the fact that the defendant was absent from the jurisdiction of the Court for approximately seven months, where the warrant for arrest showed only the date of arrest and not the date on which the defendant was taken into state custody.

Meredith v. Beech Aircraft Corp., 18 F.3d 890 (10th Cir. 1994) : The plaintiff claimed that the defendant discriminated against her on the basis of her sex in connection with a promotion, and the Trial Court granted summary judgment, taking into consideration another case in which a District Judge had decided that the defendant had discriminated on grounds of sex in connection with the very same promotion. The Court held it was error to take judicial notice of the determination in the other action, because the fact that the plaintiff in the other action was the most qualified for the position was not a "kind of universal truth."

United States v. Jones, 29 F.3d 1549 (11th Cir. 1994) : In a suit by the government to recover a medical-student loan, the Court held it was error for the Trial Judge to take judicial notice of facts stated in the opinion from another case between the parties. A Court may take notice of another Court's order only for the limited purpose of recognizing the "judicial act" that the order represents or the subject matter of the litigation, not for the truth of matters asserted in the other litigation. Accord In re Delta Resources, Inc., 54 F.3d 722 (11th Cir. 1995) .

[o] Rule 201(b) -- Local Ordinances

Rivera-Torres v. Ortiz Velez, 341 F.3d 86 (1st Cir. 2003) : In an action alleging employment discrimination motivated by political animus, the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff, finding no abuse of discretion when the Judge refused to take judicial notice of a local law that prohibited converting a "transitory" governmental appointment into a tenured appointment. The Judge's knowledge, based on sixteen years' experience, that the law was frequently disregarded meant that the law could not be treated as stating a fact "not subject to reasonable dispute."

Demos v. City of Indianapolis, 302 F.3d 698 (7th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed summary judgment granted for the City in an action brought by employees suing for failure to pay for overtime work. The Judge rejected an argument that the plaintiffs were not salaried employees because their pay was docked if they failed to work an eight-hour day, on the ground that they were subject to the Department of Labor's "public accountability" exception to the no-docking rule. The Court held it was proper to take judicial notice of a Municipal Code provision and a state statute against "ghost employees" as evidence of the public accountability standard, since city ordinances and state statutes are matters of "common knowledge" and therefore proper subjects for judicial notice.

Zimomra v. Alamo Rent-A-Car, Inc., 111 F.3d 1495 (10th Cir. 1997) : The Court dismissed antitrust actions brought by a customer against car rental companies, finding no error when the Trial Judge took judicial notice of a municipal ordinance to conclude that the municipality actively supervised a daily usage fee which was the core of the plaintiff's suit. The Court concluded that where, as here, a party asked the Trial Judge to take notice of the ordinance and supplied the proper information, Rule 201(d) "requires the court to comply with the request."

[p] Rule 201(b) -- Medical Information

Weeks v. Scott, 55 F.3d 1059 (5th Cir. 1995) : A prison inmate who tested HIV positive was convicted in a State Court for attempted murder because he spat on a prison guard. The Court affirmed denial of the inmate's habeas corpus petition. The petitioner argued that the District Court erred in failing to take judicial notice that HIV cannot be transmitted by spitting. But the Court found no error, stating that "whether saliva can transmit the HIV virus is not conclusively established and is not free from reasonable dispute." In Hardy v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., n24 an asbestos-related product liability action, the Court refused to take judicial notice that asbestos causes cancer, as that proposition was inextricably linked to a host of disputed issues.

Hines v. Secretary of Health & Human Servs., 940 F.2d 1518 (Fed. Cir. 1991) : Reviewing a Vaccine Act proceeding, the Court noted that the incubation period of measles is the sort of well-known medical fact of which judicial notice may be taken.

[q] Rule 201(b) -- Official Records and Public Reports

Island Software & Computer Serv., Inc. v. Microsoft Corp., 413 F.3d 257 (2d Cir. 2005) : The plaintiff in a copyright infringement action argued that the defendant was not entitled to summary judgment because the only evidence that it owned the copyrights was unauthenticated copies of the federal copyright registrations. Rejecting the argument, the Court noted that the Judge could take judicial notice of the copyright registrations as published in the Copyright Office's registry, because registration is a fact "capable of accurate and ready determination by resort to sources whose accuracy cannot reasonably be questioned," so error, if any, in granting summary judgment based on the unauthenticated copies was harmless. In Kavowras v. New York Times Co., 328 F.3d 50 (2d Cir. 2003) , the Court affirmed dismissal of an employee's Labor Management Relations Act complaint as untimely. The Court held that the Trial Judge properly took judicial notice of a charge filed by the employee before the NLRB as indicating that by the date of the charge, at least, the employee had notice of the alleged LMRA violation. In Kramer v. Time Warner, Inc., 937 F.2d 767 (2d Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed dismissal of a securities action, holding that a District Court may consider relevant documents filed with the SEC in determining a motion to dismiss, even though those documents were not part of the complaint. In Wiscope v. Commodity Futures Trading Comm'n, n25 the Court held that in proceedings before the Commodity Futures Trading Commission official notice should not have been taken of an edited transcript of a Commission meeting with its staff, since the transcript was not usually kept as a public record. In fact, it was created for the purpose of this proceeding.

United States v. 97. 19 Acres, 511 F. Supp. 565 (D. Md. 1981): In a condemnation case, the Court approved the judicial notice by the Magistrate of the final rate of interest on corporate debt obligations as set forth in the Federal Reserve Bulletin for 1980.

Denius v. Dunlap, 330 F.3d 919 (7th Cir. 2003) : In an employee's § 1983 action against a state-run program for unconstitutionally requiring him to release certain documents as a condition of a contract renewal, it was the plaintiff's burden to prove that the National Personnel Records Center, which was specified in the release, held medical records, which were protected against disclosure, during the period covered by the release. Because the plaintiff's only evidence of that fact was his testimony that he obtained his medical records from the NPRC the day before trial, the defendants claimed it was error to grant JMOL for the plaintiff. Affirming, the Court held that it was an abuse of discretion for the Trial Court to withdraw its judicial notice of the fact that the NPRC maintained medical records. The information came from the NPRC's official website, and was confirmed by the Court from numerous Notices in the Federal Register, so it could not reasonably be disputed and was a proper subject of judicial notice.

United States v. Ritchie, 342 F.3d 903 (9th Cir. 2003) : In a proceeding to set aside the forfeiture of property in a criminal case, the Court held that it was error to take judicial notice of DEA records and documents attached to an affidavit alleging that the claimant had received adequate notice of the forfeiture proceeding. The underlying facts in the documents were neither generally known nor capable of determination by resort to sources whose accuracy cannot be reasonably questioned, so they did "not remotely fit the requirements of Rule 201." And while judicial notice may be taken of the records and reports of an administrative body, and the DEA is an administrative body, not all the evidence in the case, e.g., the handwriting on an envelope mailed to the DEA, fit within the exception. In Nugget Hydroelectric, L.P. v. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co., 981 F.2d 429 (9th Cir. 1992) , an antitrust case in which a defendant claimed immunity under the state action doctrine, the Court held that the Trial Judge could take judicial notice of published decisions of the California Public Power Commission. In Mack v. South Bay Beer Distribs., Inc., n26 the Court reversed a judgment based on collateral estoppel principles in an age discrimination action, but it stated that a Court may take judicial notice of the records and reports of administrative bodies. See also Haye v. United States n27(in action to quiet title and enjoin enforcement of federal tax lien, Court took notice of recorded deeds, recorded notice of a lien, and county general index).

Zimomra v. Alamo Rent-A-Car, Inc., 111 F.3d 1495 (10th Cir. 1997) : Affirming dismissal of an antitrust class action against defendants who alleged they were complying with a municipal ordinance, the Court held that the District Court had appropriately taken judicial notice of the ordinance's provisions upon a request by a party and that the appeal was a sufficient opportunity to be heard as to the propriety of taking notice and the tenor of the matter noticed.

[r] Rule 201(b) -- Performance of Equipment

Granholm v. TFL Express, 576 F. Supp. 435 (S.D.N.Y. 1983) : In an admiralty action, the Court took judicial notice that service lives of radar sets are finite and that indiscriminate use could cause radar to fail when it was most needed.

[s] Rule 201(b) -- Personal Knowledge of Court

LaSalle Nat'l Bank v. First Conn. Holding Group, L.L.C. XXIII, 287 F.3d 279 (3d Cir. 2002) : The Trial Judge imposed sanctions on an attorney for allegedly representing, in communications with the Judge's law clerk, that "defense counsel" did not object to appointment of a receiver in a foreclosure action when in fact some defending parties did object. The attorney claimed that he had said "borrower's counsel," from whom he had authority. Rather than call the law clerk to testify at a hearing on the order to show cause, the Judge took "judicial notice" that the attorney had used the term "defense counsel." Reversing the sanctions order, the Court held that it was improper for the Judge to take judicial notice of conversations with her law clerk, since "[t]he contents of those conversations are certainly not a matter of common knowledge, nor are they easily provable from a source whose accuracy cannot reasonably be questioned."

United States v. Lewis, 833 F.2d 1380 (9th Cir. 1987) : Reversing an order suppressing a confession, the Court held that the Judge had erred in relying upon his personal experience concerning the effects of a general anesthetic following an operation. The Court observed that the record was silent as to the Judge's surgical procedure and the type of anesthetic with which he had experience, and concluded that the parties had no fair opportunity to respond to the facts that the Judge was noticing.

Switzer v. Coan, 261 F.3d 985 (10th Cir. 2001) : The plaintiff pro se sued a long list of Judges, law clerks, and court personnel alleging that they had conspired to deprive him of meaningful access to the courts, including by the issuance of orders written by law clerks and staff attorneys and signed by Judges without having been read. Dismissing the complaint and precluding amendment as futile, the District Court took judicial notice that the Judges review, approve, and sign all orders. The Court held that the Judge's personal knowledge, if any, was not a proper basis for taking judicial notice of such a fact, which was not either generally known or capable of ready determination from incontestable sources. However, the ruling below was affirmed because the plaintiff had never indicated otherwise than that he was standing on his pleading.

[t] Rule 201(b) -- Public Preferences

United States v. Hoyts Cinemas Corp., 380 F.3d 558 (1st Cir. 2004) : The Court vacated the Trial Judge's sua sponte grant of summary judgment to the United States in an action seeking declaratory and injunctive relief that wheelchair seating in stadium style movie theaters violated the Americans with Disabilities Act. The Trial Judge's reliance upon judicial notice to establish the preferences of movie theater patrons was improper, since the seating preferences were neither generally known or capable of being determined by an undeniably accurate source.

[u] Rule 201(b) -- Scientific Facts

United States v. Jakobetz, 955 F.2d 786 (2d Cir. 1992) : Affirming the defendant's conviction for kidnapping, the Court held that, given the findings made by the District Court and after careful consideration and review on appeal, in future cases, judicial notice could properly be taken of the general acceptability of the general theory and the use of the specific techniques of DNA profiling.

United States v. Mitchell, 365 F.3d 215 (3d Cir. 2004) : Affirming convictions of Hobbs Act robbery and use of a firearm in an extensive opinion examining numerous sources, the Court held that fingerprint evidence was sufficiently reliable to be admitted. However, it found that the Trial Judge improperly took judicial notice that "human friction ridges are unique and permanent throughout the area of the friction ridge skin, including small friction ridge areas, and that ... human friction skin arrangements are unique and permanent." The Court noted that the defendant, at a Daubert hearing, disputed the very proposition judicially noticed; "if the question merited such an extensive Daubert hearing, it surely was not suitable for resolution by judicial notice." The error was harmless, however, because "the government could have adduced estimable testimony -- both in its quantity and quality -- in place of the District Court's taking judicial notice" and "Mitchell was free to put on evidence to rebut the substance of the Court's judicial notice ... but did not do so."

United States v. Beasley, 102 F.3d 1440 (8th Cir. 1996) : The Court held that DNA testing by the polymerase chain reaction method was reliable under Daubert, and that Courts could take judicial notice of its reliability in the future. The Court noted, however, that in any particular case, "the reliability of the proffered test results may be challenged by showing that a scientifically sound methodology has been undercut by sloppy handling of the samples, failure to properly train those performing the testing, failure to follow the proper protocols, and the like."

United States v. Boyd, 289 F.3d 1254 (10th Cir. 2002) : The Court vacated the defendant's sentence for distribution of crack cocaine because the Judge took judicial notice that static cling, consumptive testing, evaporation, or particular atmospheric conditions accounted for the full differential of 3.34 grams between the quantity of drug when tested by the government and when tested by the defense eight months later. Being "neither 'generally known ...' nor 'capable of accurate and ready determination by resort to sources whose accuracy cannot be reasonably questioned,' that fact is not one amenable to judicial notice."

[v] Rule 201(b) -- SEC Filings

Bryant v. Avado Brands, Inc., 187 F.3d 1271 (11th Cir. 1999) : The Court vacated the denial of a motion to dismiss a securities class action, holding that documents publicly filed with the SEC could be judicially noticed -- for the statements they contained but not for the truth of those statements -- and considered in deciding a motion to dismiss under Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6).

[w] Rule 201(b) -- Statutes and Regulations

United States v. Woods, 335 F.3d 993 (9th Cir. 2003) : The defendants were convicted of mail and wire fraud in a telemarketing scheme for selling magazines in which they falsely informed potential customers they had been selected to win certain awards and of the cost of receiving the award. The Court held there was no error when the Trial Judge judicially noticed an FTC Rule governing telemarketing sales, since published rules of federal agencies "shall be judicially noticed," and the jury was instructed that the defendants were not on trial for violating the Rule and that violation of the Rule would not by itself constitute mail or wire fraud.

[x] Rule 201(b) -- Technological Facts

Carley v. Wheeled Coach, 991 F.2d 1117 (3d Cir. 1993) : The defendant manufacturer of a government ambulance involved in a roll-over accident asserted a government contractor defense, which required that it warn the government of dangers in the use of its product known to it but not the government. Reversing summary judgment for the defendant, the Court held it was error to find the government's equal knowledge by taking judicial notice that vehicles with a high center of gravity have rollover problems. Most people probably know little, if anything, about how high centers of gravity cause vehicular accidents.

[y] Rule 201(b) -- Weather

Newman v. Village of Hinsdale, 592 F. Supp. 1307 (N.D. Ill. 1984) , aff'd, 767 F.2d 925 (7th Cir. 1985) : To determine the amount of snowfall on a given day, the Court indicated that it would take judicial notice of the records of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration.

[3] Rule 201(d) -- When Mandatory

United States v. Wolny, 133 F.3d 758 (10th Cir. 1998) : The Court affirmed convictions for attempted money laundering, finding no abuse of discretion in the failure to take judicial notice of the regulations governing the filing of Currency Transaction Reports. Judicial notice was not mandatory under Rule 201 because the regulations were legislative, rather than judicial, facts. Neither was it mandatory under the Federal Register statute, 44 U.S.C. § 1507, because the contents of the regulations were not relevant to the proceeding at hand.

[4] Rule 201(e) -- Opportunity to be Heard

United States v. Hoyts Cinemas Corp., 380 F.3d 558 (1st Cir. 2004) : The Court vacated the Trial Judge's sua sponte grant of summary judgment to the United States in an action seeking declaratory and injunctive relief that wheelchair seating in stadium style movie theaters violated the Americans with Disabilities Act. The Judge's reliance upon judicial notice to establish the preferences of movie theater patrons was improper, since the seating preferences were neither generally known or capable of being determined by an undeniably accurate source. The Court also questioned whether the defendant had been given sufficient notice and opportunity to be heard: "The district judge did refer in the hearing to his own experience in a particular stadium theater, but this is less than a clear-cut warning that judicial notice will be used to convert this single instance into a universal proposition that may not be disputed." In Cooperativa de Ahorro y Credito Aguada v. Kidder, Peabody & Co., 993 F.2d 269 (1st Cir. 1993) , the Court held that the Trial Judge improperly dismissed a securities action as time-barred on the basis of judicial notice of articles in the national press that had not been submitted by either party, where the parties had not been given an opportunity to be heard with respect to the material noticed.

Chen v. Metropolitan Ins. & Annuity Co., 907 F.2d 566 (5th Cir. 1990) : In an action on a double indemnity provision in a life insurance policy where the insurer defended on the ground that the insured's death by drinking too much brandy was not an "accident" and was caused by a "drug" within the meaning of the policy, the Court reversed a summary judgment for the defendant, noting that although it is usually the party's burden to request a hearing to challenge the taking of judicial notice, here the judicial notice taken that alcohol is a drug involved a matter of contractual interpretation reviewable as a matter of law.

United States v. Ritchie, 342 F.3d 903 (9th Cir. 2003) : In a proceeding to set aside the forfeiture of property in a criminal case, the Court held that it was error to take judicial notice of DEA records and documents attached to an affidavit alleging that the claimant had received adequate notice of the forfeiture proceeding. The underlying facts in the documents were neither generally known nor capable of determination by resort to sources whose accuracy cannot be reasonably questioned, so they did "not remotely fit the requirements of Rule 201." Even if the documents were properly the subject of judicial notice, the claimant should have been given some opportunity to respond to the propriety of taking judicial notice of the facts alleged in them.

American Stores Co. v. Commissioner, 170 F.3d 1267 (10th Cir. 1999) : In a tax dispute, the Court found no error in the Trial Judge's refusal to hold a hearing on whether certain information proffered by the taxpayer should be judicially noticed. The Court noted that the hearing requirement is intended mainly to protect the opponent of the judicially noticed fact. The Court did not "read the rule to require a court to hold a formal hearing every time a proponent of judicial notice so demands." In Zimomra v. Alamo Rent-A-Car, Inc., 111 F.3d 1495 (10th Cir. 1997) , the Court affirmed dismissal of an antitrust class action against defendants who alleged they were complying with a municipal ordinance, and held that the District Court had appropriately taken judicial notice of the ordinance's provisions upon a request by a party and that the appeal was a sufficient opportunity to be heard as to the propriety of taking notice and the tenor of the matter noticed. In In re Calder, n28 the Court affirmed denial of discharge in bankruptcy, holding that the Bankruptcy Court was not required to give the debtor prior notice before taking judicial notice of the contents of his petition in deciding whether to deny discharge for material false statements. The burden rested with the debtor to request a hearing to challenge the propriety of taking judicial notice even after notice had been taken.

[5] Rule 201(f) -- Time of Taking Notice

Bulova Watch Co. v. K. Hattori & Co., 508 F. Supp. 1322 (E.D.N.Y. 1981) : Ruling on a motion to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction, the District Court said that not only could judicial notice be employed at this stage of the proceeding, but also that the judgment to be made was a mixed question of fact and law which permitted broader, more flexible judicial notice than is typically allowed in connection with standard adjudicative facts.

Colonial Leasing Co. v. Logistics Control Group Int'l, 762 F.2d 454 (5th Cir. 1985) , reh'g granted in part on other grounds, 770 F.2d 479 (5th Cir. 1985) : The Court reversed a judgment for a purported creditor who sued a purported debtor and a third party alleging a fraudulent transfer of assets. It found that the Trial Judge erred in taking judicial notice of an Oregon State Court judgment after a trial in which the Judge had excluded such evidence. Although the judgment was admissible and its existence was the proper subject of judicial notice, the Court of Appeals reasoned that since the transferee declined to produce evidence at trial when the plaintiff failed to establish a prima facie case and since the judicial notice that established the prima facie case took place after trial, the transferee was deprived of an opportunity to adduce evidence on a critical fact. The case serves as a reminder that in a jury trial, judicial notice ordinarily will be required before the jury returns its verdict if it is to have any effect.

United States v. Wessels, 12 F.3d 746 (8th Cir. 1993) : During the defendant's sentencing for drug offenses, the Judge took judicial notice that a particular type of methamphetamine had been involved, on the ground that none of the fifty-some cases in the state with which the Judge was familiar involved the alternative type. The Court remanded, holding that the particular type was essential to the calculation of the proper sentence and the government rather than the defendant bore the burden of producing evidence on the issue.

Bryant v. Avado Brands, Inc., 187 F.3d 1271 (11th Cir. 1999) : The Court vacated the denial of a motion to dismiss a securities class action, holding that documents publicly filed with the SEC could be judicially noticed and considered in deciding a motion to dismiss under Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6).

[6] Rule 201(g) -- Instructing Jury

United States v. Hernandez-Fundora, 58 F.3d 802 (2d Cir. 1995) : The Court affirmed an assault conviction, finding that the jury was properly instructed that a prison was within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States and that it was to decide whether the defendant committed an action at the prison. The Court concluded that "resolution of the jurisdictional issue in this case requires the determination of legislative facts, rather than 'adjudicative facts' within the meaning of Rule 201(a), with the result that Rule 201(g) is inapplicable." It reasoned that legislative facts are "established truths, facts or pronouncements that do not change from case to case but apply universally, while adjudicative facts are those developed in a particular case." The location of the prison was a legislative fact because it "does not change from case to case but, instead, remains fixed."

United States v. Mentz, 840 F.2d 315 (6th Cir. 1988) : The Court reversed a conviction for bank robbery, finding that the Trial Judge invaded the province of the jury and violated the Sixth Amendment by instructing the jury that banks were insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. One Judge would have found the erroneous instruction to have been harmless error. In United States v. Jones, n29 at the defendant's trial for illegally intercepting telephone conversations of his estranged wife, the government introduced evidence that he had tapped a telephone furnished by South Central Bell Telephone Company, but offered no evidence to show that the company was at the time a "person engaged as a common carrier in providing or operating ... facilities for the transmission of interstate or foreign communications." After the jury convicted on three of five counts, the District Judge granted the defendant's motion for a judgment of acquittal on the ground that the government failed to prove that the tapped conversation was a wire communication covered by the statute. The Court examined the legislative history of Rule 201(g) and concluded that it could not take judicial notice of the common carrier status of the telephone company involved in the case, because "[a]s enacted by Congress, Rule 201(g) plainly contemplates that the jury in a criminal case shall pass upon facts which are judicially noticed. This it could not do if this notice were taken for the first time after it had been discharged and the case was on appeal." To the extent that subdivision (f) authorizes judicial notice at the appellate level, that subdivision, said the Court, "must yield in the face of the express congressional intent manifested in 201(g) for criminal jury trials."

United States v. Chapel, 41 F.3d 1338 (9th Cir. 1994) : The Court affirmed an armed bank robbery conviction, finding that the Trial Judge properly took judicial notice of the federally insured status of a bank while leaving to the jury the final decision whether to accept as true what the Judge noticed.

United States v. Bliss, 642 F.2d 390 (10th Cir. 1981) : In affirming postverdict judgments of acquittal in a case charging falsification of bank records, the Court cited United States v. Jones, supra , and concluded that acquittal was proper because the government had offered no evidence that the bank was a member of the Federal Reserve System and had not requested that judicial notice be taken of the fact. In United States v. Piggie, n30 the Court found no error in taking judicial notice that Leavenworth Penitentiary is United States territory. Although the Trial Judge did not instruct in the language of subdivision (g), no request for any instruction was made, and there really was no dispute about the fact.

CHAPTER 201 RULE 201

1-201 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 201.04

201.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Advisory Committee's Note

Subdivision (a). This is the only evidence rule on the subject of judicial notice. It deals only with judicial notice of "adjudicative" facts. No rule deals with judicial notice of "legislative" facts. Judicial notice of matters of foreign law is treated in Rule 44.1 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and Rule 26.1 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

The omission of any treatment of legislative facts results from fundamental differences between adjudicative facts and legislative facts. Adjudicative facts are simply the facts of the particular case. Legislative facts, on the other hand, are those which have relevance to legal reasoning and the lawmaking process, whether in the formulation of a legal principle or ruling by a judge or court or in the enactment of a legislative body. The terminology was coined by Professor Kenneth Davis in his article An Approach to Problems of Evidence in the Administrative Process, 55 Harv. L. Rev. 364, 404-07 (1942). The following discussion draws extensively upon his writings. In addition, see the same author's Judicial Notice, 55 Colum. L. Rev. 945 (1955); Administrative Law Treatise, ch. 15 (1958); A System of Judicial Notice Based on Fairness and Convenience, in Perspectives of Law 69 (1964).

The usual method of establishing adjudicative facts is through the introduction of evidence, ordinarily consisting of the testimony of witnesses. If particular facts are outside the area of reasonable controversy, this process is dispensed with as unnecessary. A high degree of indisputability is the essential prerequisite.

Legislative facts are quite different. As Professor Davis says:

> My opinion is that judge-made law would stop growing if judges, in thinking about questions of law and policy, were forbidden to take into account the facts they believe, as distinguished from facts which are "clearly ... within the domain of the indisputable." Facts most needed in thinking about difficult problems of law and policy have a way of being outside the domain of the clearly indisputable.

A System of Judicial Notice Based on Fairness and Convenience, supra, at 82.

> An illustration is Hawkins v. United States, 358 U.S. 74, 79 S. Ct. 136, 3 L. Ed. 2d 125 (1958), in which the Court refused to discard the common law rule that one spouse could not testify against the other, saying, "Adverse testimony given in criminal proceedings would, we think, be likely to destroy almost any marriage." This conclusion has a large intermixture of fact, but the factual aspect is scarcely "indisputable." See Hutchins and Slesinger, Some Observations on the Law of Evidence -- Family Relations, 13 Minn. L. Rev. 675 (1929). If the destructive effect of the giving of adverse testimony by a spouse is not indisputable, should the Court have refrained from considering it in the absence of supporting evidence?
>
> If the Model Code or the Uniform Rules had been applicable, the Court would have been barred from thinking about the essential factual ingredient of the problems before it, and such a result would be obviously intolerable. What the law needs at its growing points is more, not less, judicial thinking about the factual ingredients of problems of what the law ought to be, and the needed facts are seldom "clearly" indisputable.

Davis, supra, at 83.

Professor Morgan gave the following description of the methodology of determining domestic law:

> In determining the content or applicability of a rule of domestic law, the judge is unrestricted in his investigation and conclusion. He may reject the propositions of either party or of both parties. He may consult the sources of pertinent data to which they refer, or he may refuse to do so. He may make an independent search for persuasive data or rest content with what he has or what the parties present... . [T]he parties do no more than to assist; they control no part of the process.

Morgan, Judicial Notice, *57 Harv. L. Rev. 269, 270-*71 (1944).

This is the view which should govern judicial access to legislative facts. It renders inappropriate any limitation in the form of indisputability, any formal requirements of notice other than those already inherent in affording opportunity to hear and be heard and exchanging briefs, and any requirement of formal findings at any level. It should, however, leave open the possibility of introducing evidence through regular channels in appropriate situations. See Borden's Farm Products Co. v. Baldwin, 293 U.S. 194, 55 S. Ct. 187, 79 L. Ed. 281 (1934), where the cause was remanded for the taking of evidence as to the economic conditions and trade practices underlying the New York Milk Control Law.

Similar considerations govern the judicial use of non-adjudicative facts in ways other than formulating laws and rules. Thayer described them as a part of the judicial reasoning process.

> In conducting a process of judicial reasoning, as of other reasoning, not a step can be taken without assuming something which has not been proved; and the capacity to do this with competent judgment and efficiency, is imputed to judges and juries as part of their necessary mental outfit.

Thayer, Preliminary Treatise on Evidence 279-80 (1898).

As Professor Davis points out, A System of Judicial Notice Based on Fairness and Convenience, in Perspectives of Law 69, 73 (1964), every case involves the use of hundreds or thousands of non-evidence facts. When a witness in an automobile accident case says "car," everyone, judge and jury included, furnishes, from non-evidence sources within himself, the supplementing information that the "car" is an automobile, not a railroad car, that it is self-propelled, probably by an internal combustion engine, that it may be assumed to have four wheels with pneumatic rubber tires, and so on. The judicial process cannot construct every case from scratch, like Descartes creating a world based on the postulate Cogito, ergo sum. These items could not possibly be introduced into evidence, and no one suggests that they be. Nor are they appropriate subjects for any formalized treatment of judicial notice of facts. See Levin and Levy, Persuading the Jury with Facts Not in Evidence: The Fiction-Science Spectrum, 105 U. Pa. L. Rev. 139 (1956).

Another aspect of what Thayer had in mind is the use of non-evidence facts to appraise or assess the adjudicative facts of the case. Pairs of cases from two jurisdictions illustrate this use and also the difference between non-evidence facts thus used and adjudicative facts. In People v. Strook, 347 Ill. 460, 179 N.E. 821 (1932) , venue in Cook County had been held not established by testimony that the crime was committed at 7956 South Chicago Avenue, since judicial notice would not be taken that the address was in Chicago. However, the same court subsequently ruled that venue in Cook County was established by testimony that a crime occurred at 8900 South Anthony Avenue, since notice would be taken of the common practice of omitting the name of the city when speaking of local addresses, and the witness was testifying in Chicago. People v. Pride, 16 Ill. 2d 82, 156 N.E.2d 551 (1951) . And in Hughes v. Vestal, 264 N.C. 500, 142 S.E.2d 361 (1965) , the Supreme Court of North Carolina disapproved the trial judge's admission in evidence of a state-published table of automobile stopping distances on the basis of judicial notice, though the court itself had referred to the same table in an earlier case in a "rhetorical and illustrative" way in determining that the defendant could not have stopped her car in time to avoid striking a child who suddenly appeared in the highway and that nonsuit was properly granted. Ennis v. Dupree, 262 N.C. 224, 136 S.E.2d 702 (1964) . See also Brown v. Hale, 263 N.C. 176, 139 S.E.2d 210 (1964) ; Clayton v. Rimmer, 262 N.C. 302, 136 S.E.2d 562 (1964) . It is apparent that this use of non-evidence facts in evaluating the adjudicative facts of the case is not an appropriate subject for a formalized judicial notice treatment.

In view of these considerations, the regulation of judicial notice of facts by the present rule extends only to adjudicative facts.

What, then, are "adjudicative" facts? Davis refers to them as those "which relate to the parties," or more fully:

> When a court or an agency finds facts concerning the immediate parties -- who did what, where, when, how, and with what motive or intent -- the court or agency is performing an adjudicative function, and the facts are conveniently called adjudicative facts. ...
>
> Stated in other terms, the adjudicative facts are those to which the law is applied in the process of adjudication. They are the facts that normally go to the jury in a jury case. They relate to the parties, their activities, their properties, their businesses.

2 Administrative Law Treatise 353.

Subdivision (b). With respect to judicial notice of adjudicative facts, the tradition has been one of caution in requiring that the matter be beyond reasonable controversy. This tradition of circumspection appears to be soundly based, and no reason to depart from it is apparent. As Professor Davis says:

> The reason we use trial-type procedure, I think, is that we make the practical judgment, on the basis of experience, that taking evidence, subject to cross-examination and rebuttal, is the best way to resolve controversies involving disputes of adjudicative facts, that is, facts pertaining to the parties. The reason we require a determination on the record is that we think fair procedure in resolving disputes of adjudicative facts calls for giving each party a chance to meet in the appropriate fashion the facts that come to the tribunal's attention, and the appropriate fashion for meeting disputed adjudicative facts includes rebuttal evidence, cross-examination, usually confrontation, and argument (either written or oral or both). The key to a fair trial is opportunity to use the appropriate weapons (rebuttal evidence, cross-examination, and argument) to meet adverse materials that come to the tribunal's attention.

A System of Judicial Notice Based on Fairness and Convenience, in Perspectives of Law 69, 93 (1964).

The rule proceeds upon the theory that these considerations call for dispensing with traditional methods of proof only in clear cases. Compare Professor Davis' conclusion that judicial notice should be a matter of convenience, subject to requirements of procedural fairness. Id., 94 .

This rule is consistent with Uniform Rule 9(1) and (2) which limit judicial notice of facts to those "so universally known that they cannot reasonably be the subject of dispute," those "so generally known or of such common notoriety within the territorial jurisdiction of the court that they cannot reasonably be the subject of dispute," and those "capable of immediate and accurate determination by resort to easily accessible sources of indisputable accuracy." The traditional textbook treatment has included these general categories (matters of common knowledge, facts capable of verification), McCormick §§ 324, 325, and then has passed on into detailed treatment of such specific topics as facts relating to the personnel and records of the court, id. § 327, and other governmental facts, id. § 328. The California draftsmen, with a background of detailed statutory regulation of judicial notice, followed a somewhat similar pattern. California Evidence Code §§ 451, 452. The Uniform Rules, however, were drafted on the theory that these particular matters are included within the general categories and need no specific mention. This approach is followed in the present rule.

The phrase "propositions of generalized knowledge," found in Uniform Rule 9(1) and (2) is not included in the present rule. It was, it is believed, originally included in Model Code Rules 801 and 802 primarily in order to afford some minimum recognition to the right of the judge in his "legislative" capacity (not acting as the trier of fact) to take judicial notice of very limited categories of generalized knowledge. The limitations thus imposed have been discarded herein as undesirable, unworkable, and contrary to existing practice. What is left, then, to be considered, is the status of a "proposition of generalized knowledge" as an "adjudicative" fact to be noticed judicially and communicated by the judge to the jury. Thus viewed, it is considered to be lacking practical significance. While judges use judicial notice of "propositions of generalized knowledge" in a variety of situations: determining the validity and meaning of statutes, formulating common law rules, deciding whether evidence should be admitted, assessing the sufficiency and effect of evidence, all are essentially nonadjudicative in nature. When judicial notice is seen as a significant vehicle for progress in the law, these are the areas involved, particularly in developing fields of scientific knowledge. See McCormick 712. It is not believed that judges now instruct juries as to "propositions of generalized knowledge" derived from encyclopedias or other sources, or that they are likely to do so, or, indeed, that it is desirable that they do so. There is a vast difference between ruling on the basis of judicial notice that radar evidence of speed is admissible and explaining to the jury its principles and degree of accuracy, or between using a table of stopping distances of automobiles at various speeds in a judicial evaluation of testimony and telling the jury its precise application in the case. For cases raising doubt as to the propriety of the use of medical texts by lay triers of fact in passing on disability claims in administrative proceedings, see Sayers v. Gardner, 380 F.2d 940 (6th Cir. 1967) ; Ross v. Gardner, 365 F.2d 554 (6th Cir. 1966) ; Sosna v. Celebrezze, 234 F. Supp. 289 (E.D. Pa. 1964) ; Glendenning v. Ribicoff, 213 F. Supp. 301 (W.D. Mo. 1962) .

Subdivisions (c) and (d). Under subdivision (c) the judge has a discretionary authority to take judicial notice, regardless of whether he is so requested by a party. The taking of judicial notice is mandatory, under subdivision (d), only when a party requests it and the necessary information is supplied. This scheme is believed to reflect existing practice. It is simple and workable. It avoids troublesome distinctions in the many situations in which the process of taking judicial notice is not recognized as such.

Compare Uniform Rule 9 making judicial notice of facts universally known mandatory without request, and making judicial notice of facts generally known in the jurisdiction or capable of determination by resort to accurate sources discretionary in the absence of request but mandatory if request is made and the information furnished. But see Uniform Rule 10(3), which directs the judge to decline to take judicial notice if available information fails to convince him that the matter falls clearly within Uniform Rule 9 or is insufficient to enable him to notice it judicially. Substantially the same approach is found in California Evidence Code §§ 451-453 and in New Jersey Evidence Rule 9. In contrast, the present rule treats alike all adjudicative facts which are subject to judicial notice.

Subdivision (e). Basic considerations of procedural fairness demand an opportunity to be heard on the propriety of taking judicial notice and the tenor of the matter noticed. The rule requires the granting of that opportunity upon request. No formal scheme of giving notice is provided. An adversely affected party may learn in advance that judicial notice is in contemplation, either by virtue of being served with a copy of a request by another party under subdivision (d) that judicial notice be taken, or through an advance indication by the judge. Or he may have no advance notice at all.

The likelihood of the latter is enhanced by the frequent failure to recognize judicial notice as such. And in the absence of advance notice, a request made after the fact could not in fairness be considered untimely. See the provision for hearing on timely request in the Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C. § 556(e). See also Revised Model State Administrative Procedure Act (1961), 9C U.L.A. § 10(4) (Supp. 1967).

Subdivision (f). In accord with the usual view, judicial notice may be taken at any stage of the proceedings, whether in the trial court or on appeal. Uniform Rule 12; California Evidence Code § 459; Kansas Rules of Evidence § 60-412; New Jersey Evidence Rule 12; McCormick § 330 p. 712.

Subdivision (g). Much of the controversy about judicial notice has centered upon the question whether evidence should be admitted in disproof of facts of which judicial notice is taken.

The writers have been divided. Favoring admissibility are Thayer, Preliminary Treatise on Evidence 308 (1898); 9 Wigmore § 2567; Davis, A System of Judicial Notice Based on Fairness and Convenience, in Perspectives of Law, 69, 76-77 (1964). Opposing admissibility are Keeffe, Landis and Shaad, Sense and Nonsense about Judicial Notice, 2 Stan. L. Rev. 664, 668 (1950); McNaughton, Judicial Notice -- Excerpts Relating to the Morgan-Wigmore Controversy, 14 Vand. L. Rev. 779 (1961); Morgan, Judicial Notice, 57 Harv. L. Rev. 269, 279 (1944); McCormick 710-11. The Model Code and the Uniform Rules are predicated upon indisputability of judicially noticed facts.

The proponents of admitting evidence in disproof have concentrated largely upon legislative facts. Since the present rule deals only with judicial notice of adjudicative facts, arguments directed to legislative facts lose their relevancy.

Within its relatively narrow area of adjudicative facts, the rule contemplates there is to be no evidence before the jury in disproof. The judge instructs the jury to take judicially noticed facts as established. This position is justified by the undesirable effects of the opposite rule in limiting the rebutting party, though not his opponent, to admissible evidence, in defeating the reasons for judicial notice, and in affecting the substantive law to an extent and in ways largely unforeseeable. Ample protection and flexibility are afforded by the broad provision for opportunity to be heard on request, set forth in subdivision (e).

Authority upon the propriety of taking judicial notice against an accused in a criminal case with respect to matters other than venue is relatively meager. Proceeding upon the theory that the right of jury trial does not extend to matters which are beyond reasonable dispute, the rule does not distinguish between criminal and civil cases. People v. Mayes, 113 Cal. 618, 45 P. 860 (1896) ; Ross v. United States, 374 F.2d 97 (8th Cir. 1967) . Cf. State v. Main, 94 R.I. 338, 180 A.2d 814 (1962) ; State v. Lawrence, 120 Utah 323, 234 P.2d 600 (1951) . [This treatment was rejected by the Congress, which provided that notice is not conclusive in criminal cases. Ed.]

[2] Note on Judicial Notice of Law

By rules effective July 1, 1966, the method of invoking the law of a foreign country is covered elsewhere. Rule 44.1 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure; Rule 26.1 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. These two new admirably designed rules are founded upon the assumption that the manner in which law is fed into the judicial process is never a proper concern of the rules of evidence but rather of the rules of procedure. The Advisory Committee on Evidence, believing that this assumption is entirely correct, proposes no evidence rule with respect to judicial notice of law, and suggests that those matters of law which, in addition to foreign-country law, have traditionally been treated as requiring pleading and proof and more recently as the subject of judicial notice be left to the Rules of Civil and Criminal Procedure.

Judicial Notice -- Rule 201(g)

Federal Rule 201(g) determines the instructions that a court must give when a fact satisfies the standards for judicial notice proscribed in Rule 201(b). (Rule 201(b) provides that a fact is subject to judicial notice when it is cannot be reasonably disputed, either because it is generally known within the jurisdiction or because its accuracy can be readily determined by reference to unimpeachable sources.) The Advisory Committee Note to Rule 201(g) states as follows:

> Proceeding upon the theory that the right of jury trial does not extend to matters which are beyond reasonable dispute, the rule does not distinguish between criminal and civil cases.

In fact, however, the rule does distinguish between civil and criminal cases. The jury must accept a judicially noticed fact as conclusive; in criminal cases, the court must instruct the jury "that it may, but is not required to, accept as conclusive any fact judicially noticed." Congress rejected the Advisory Committee proposal on the ground that a mandatory instruction was "contrary to the Sixth Amendment right to a jury trial."

[4] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

June 28, 1973

As proposed, Article II was restricted by subdivision (a) to "adjudicative" facts, as contrasted with "legislative" facts. The import of both terms was discussed in the Advisory Committee's note, but the Subcommittee nonetheless felt that the distinction was not clear and would breed litigation. The Subcommittee also felt that differing treatment for the two types of facts was unjustified. Accordingly, subdivision (a) was deleted.

As proposed, subdivision (g) would have precluded a judge from admitting evidence in disproof of facts of which judicial notice had been taken. Believing that judicial notice should be treated on the same basis as any other evidence which is admitted -- subject to refutation -- the Subcommittee deleted this subdivision.

October 10, 1973

Being of the view that a mandatory instruction to a jury in a criminal case to accept as established any fact judicially noticed was inappropriate because contrary to the spirit of the Sixth Amendment right to a jury trial, the Subcommittee adopted the 1969 Advisory Committee draft of subsection (g) allowing a mandatory instruction in civil actions and proceedings, but not in criminal cases. [The Reader will note that the June 28 change relating to section (a) was abandoned, and the change relating to section (g) was modified.]

[5] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

Rule 201(g) as received from the Supreme Court provided that when judicial notice of a fact is taken, the court shall instruct the jury to accept that fact as established. Being of the view that mandatory instruction to a jury in a criminal case to accept as conclusive any fact judicially noticed is inappropriate because contrary to the spirit of the Sixth Amendment right to a jury trial, the Committee adopted the 1969 Advisory Committee draft of this subsection, allowing a mandatory instruction in civil actions and proceedings and a discretionary instruction in criminal cases.

[1] Rule 201(a) -- Scope of Rule [Go To Main]

[d] Rule 201(a) -- Notice of Law

United States v. Dedman, 527 F.3d 577 (6th Cir. 2008) : The defendant was convicted of conspiracy to defraud the government of military pension benefits by arranging a marriage between her adoptive father and her adoptive daughter. Affirming, the Court held it was error for the Judge to take "judicial notice" that the marriage was invalid under the applicable state law, since under modern practice the content of applicable law is to be determined by the court. Following the pattern jury instruction for judicial notice of adjudicative facts in criminal cases, the Judge had erroneously instructed the jury that it was not required to accept the marriage law as he stated it. Had the jury rejected the judicially-noticed statement of law, it should have acquitted, so the error was harmless.

[2] Rule 201(b) -- Kinds of Facts [Go To Main]

[b] Rule 201(b) -- Business Records

Am. Prairie Constr. Co. v. Hoich, 560 F.3d 780 (8th Cir. 2009) : In an action by the creditor of a Chapter 11 debtor against a company that sought to acquire the creditor's claims, an investor in the company, and the debtor for breach of a settlement agreed to in the bankruptcy proceeding, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to take judicial notice of the corporate records of the defendant company and of a book written by the investor to find that the investor had given an accountant a proxy to act as his agent. The Court found that the documents did not permit a Judge to make such a finding, and it added that "[c]aution must also be taken to avoid admitting evidence, through the use of judicial notice, in contravention of the relevancy, foundation and hearsay rules."

[f] Rule 201(b) -- Economic Information

O'Toole v. Northrop Grumman Corp., 499 F.3d 1218 (10th Cir. 2007) : In the bench trial of an employee's action against a former employer to recover consequential damages arising from a failure to reimburse relocation expenses, the Judge refused to award earnings lost on money withdrawn from the plaintiff's retirement fund, saying there was no evidence of the fund's results. Reversing, the Court held that judicial notice should have been taken of the actual earnings history on the defendant's website, after the plaintiff provided the complete address for the page to which the quarterly reports were linked.

[g] Rule 201(b) -- Facts About Litigants

Fagin v. Gilmartin, 432 F.3d 276 (3d Cir. 2005) : In a shareholders' derivative action, the defendants attached the report of an internal investigation to their motion to dismiss. The District Court denied the shareholders' cross-motion to convert the motion to dismiss into a motion for summary judgment and granted the defendants' motion, expressly stating that it had decided the motion without aid from outside materials. Reversing in part and remanding, because the Judge's opinion contained several items of information that appeared to have come only from the report, the Court noted that the Judge could not have taken judicial notice of that document unless the plaintiffs' claims were based on it, and here the plaintiffs did not even receive the report until after their complaint was filed.

[i] Rule 201(b) -- General Information

Jespersen v. Harrah's Operating Co., 444 F.3d 1104 (9th Cir. 2006) (en banc): Affirming partial summary judgment for an employer sued by a female bartender who was terminated for refusing to wear makeup, the Court refused "to take judicial notice of the fact that it costs more money and takes more time for a woman to comply with the makeup requirement than it takes for a man to comply with the requirement that he keep his hair short."

[l.1] Rule 201(b) -- Internet Information

Victaulic Co. v. Tieman, 499 F.3d 227 (3d Cir. 2007) : In a suit by a former employee and his new employer seeking a declaratory judgment that a non-compete covenant was invalid, the Trial Judge ruled that the covenant was invalid and dismissed most counterclaims of the former employer. The Court reversed and held that the Trial Judge should not have taken judicial notice of facts about the former employer's business based on information contained on its website. The Court reasoned that the information was not properly authenticated: "Anyone may purchase an internet address, and so, without proceeding to discovery or some other means of authentication, it is premature to assume that a webpage is owned by a company merely because its trade name appears in the uniform resource locator." It added that a company's website is a marketing tool that often "is full of imprecise puffery that no one should take at face value," so that "courts should be wary of finding judicially noticeable facts amongst all the fluff." Finally, the Court noted that, while judicial notice may be taken at any stage of a proceeding, "it should be done sparingly at the pleadings stage," and "[o]nly in the clearest of cases should a district court reach outside the pleadings for facts necessary to resolve a case at that point."

United States v. Husein, 478 F.3d 318 (6th Cir. 2007) : The defendant's sentencing memorandum indicated that he was the only family member with a valid driver's license. The Court declined to take judicial notice of the government's post-sentencing facts obtained from an online research site indicating that both the defendant's mother and sister had valid driver's licenses. The Court noted that "[t]he government in the present case ... has offered us nothing but a vague reference to 'westlaw.com,' " and "[a]lthough the relevant information might well be available in one of Westlaw's many online databases, that fact alone, without any guidance from the government as to where in Westlaw one might locate the information, hardly fulfills the mandate of Rule 201(d)."

O'Toole v. Northrop Grumman Corp., 499 F.3d 1218 (10th Cir. 2007) : In the bench trial of an employee's action against a former employer to recover consequential damages arising from a failure to reimburse relocation expenses, the Judge refused to award earnings lost on money withdrawn from the plaintiff's retirement fund, saying there was no evidence of the fund's results. Reversing, the Court held that judicial notice should have been taken of the actual earnings history on the defendant's website, after the plaintiff provided the complete address for the page to which the quarterly reports were linked. The amount of earnings was not reasonably subject to dispute by the defendant, because the defendant had created the site and had not sought a hearing about its accuracy.

[n] Rule 201(b) -- Judicial Records and Proceedings

Prescott v. Higgins, 538 F.3d 32 (1st Cir. 2008) : Affirming summary judgment for the defendant in an employment discrimination case, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the Judge's refusal to take judicial notice of evidence in another case purporting to show disparate impact. The validity of the statistics and whether they showed disparate impact was at issue in that case, so the proof offered was not a "matter beyond reasonable controversy."

Mangiafico v. Blumenthal, 471 F.3d 391 (2d Cir. 2006) : Affirming dismissal of the complaint in a § 1983 action by a corrections officer who was not provided a defense by the state in a suit for using excessive force, the Court held that the Judge properly took judicial notice of the docket sheet in the excessive-force suit when ruling on the motion to dismiss.

Buck v. Thomas M. Cooley Law School, 597 F.3d 812 (6th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a judgment that a former student's action alleging that her dismissal from a school violated federal and state law was barred by res judicata. It observed that "[a]lthough typically courts are limited to the pleadings when faced with a motion under Rule 12(b)(6), a court may take judicial notice of other court proceedings without converting the motion into one for summary judgment."

United States v. Guerrero-Velasquez, 434 F.3d 1193 (9th Cir. 2006) : Vacating a sentence upon the government's appeal, the Court held that judicial notice should have been taken of the defendant's guilty plea in a state prosecution for burglary, to establish that he had been convicted of unlawfully entering a residence.

[q] Rule 201(b) -- Official Records and Public Reports

Global Network Communs., Inc. v. City of New York, 458 F.3d 150 (2d Cir. 2006) : In an action by a public pay phone supplier challenging City regulations, the Court vacated dismissal of the complaint because the Judge had considered material outside the pleadings and had not treated the proceeding as a motion for summary judgment. The Court noted that judicial notice could not properly be given to a City administrative determination, as the determination was offered not simply to establish its existence but for its truth, to provide a basis for the Judge's conclusion.

Doss v. Clearwater Title Co., 551 F.3d 634 (7th Cir. 2008) : A mortgagor's action against the mortgagee, title company, and others for Truth in Lending Act violations was dismissed on the ground that the plaintiff had sold the property. The Judge relied on a deed of sale attached to the motion to dismiss, explaining that the deed was a public record of which judicial notice could be taken, even though the plaintiff claimed that the recorded deed was a forgery. Reversing, the Court noted that if the Judge were going to consider a matter outside the pleadings, the motion must be treated as one for summary judgment and all parties must be given a reasonable opportunity to present all the material that is pertinent to the motion. The Court added that taking judicial notice was inappropriate, given that the plaintiff's claim of forgery made the deed "subject to reasonable dispute," and the fact that recorded deeds come within the hearsay exception of Rule 803(15) was insufficient to justify judicial notice.

Noble Sys. Corp. v. Alorica Cent., LLC, 543 F.3d 978 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed summary judgment and judgment on the pleadings for a senior creditor in an action by a junior creditor for tortious interference and misrepresentation. It found no error when the Judge granted a motion to take judicial notice of a financing statement filed with the Minnesota Secretary of State. The financing statement was a public record and could be considered in ruling on a motion to dismiss even though it was not mentioned expressly in the pleadings.

United States v. 14.02 Acres of Land More or Less, 547 F.3d 943 (9th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a summary judgment for the United States in an eminent domain case. It held that a Trial Judge may take judicial notice of records and reports of administrative bodies and it found no abuse of discretion here when judicial notice was taken of a Department of Energy study.

[r] Rule 201(b) -- Performance of Equipment

United States v. Munoz-Tello, 531 F.3d 1174 (10th Cir. 2008) : The defendant had been driving an overcrowded van full of illegal aliens when it overturned, killing four. The Court affirmed upward adjustments in the sentence because of reckless conduct, but held it was plain error for the Judge to have found that the overloading of the van likely adversely affected its handling or maneuverability. There was no evidence in the record supporting the assumption, nor are the rollover propensities of vehicles matters of common knowledge or the kind of readily ascertainable facts satisfying Rule 201(b).

[s] Rule 201(b) -- Personal Knowledge of Court

United States v. Berber-Tinoco, 510 F.3d 1083 (9th Cir. 2007) : Although it affirmed a conviction for unlawful re-entry after deportation, the Court held that the Trial Judge violated Rule 605 when, in a suppression hearing, he interjected his own observations regarding the location of stop signs along a certain road near the border and the narrowness of the road, as well as when he relied on his personal knowledge that no speed limit was posted on a certain road near the border and that the speed limit was therefore 55 miles per hour. It emphasized that a Trial Judge may not take judicial notice relying on personal experience.

[w] Rule 201(b) -- Statutes and Regulations

United States v. Williams, 442 F.3d 1259 (10th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no abuse of discretion when the Trial Judge took judicial notice that a violation of the state statute under which the defendant had previously been convicted was a crime punishable by more than one year of imprisonment.

[3] Rule 201(d) -- When Mandatory [Go To Main]

Cravens v. Smith, 610 F.3d 1019 (8th Cir. 2010) : A medical clinic sought indemnification from a radiologist and the agency that placed him for a malpractice judgment against it entered after it conceded liability and agreed to seek indemnification. The Judge ruled before trial in the indemnification action that the judgment was not preclusive against the defendants. The first issue tried was whether the plaintiff's settlement had increased the risks to the defendants or prejudiced their rights, and the plaintiff requested that judicial notice be taken of the preclusion ruling and that it be permitted to argue the fact to the jury. Affirming a judgment for the defendants, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in refusing judicial notice. Even though it is proper to take judicial notice of prior orders in a case, here introduction of the ruling would likely have confused the jury.

O'Toole v. Northrop Grumman Corp., 499 F.3d 1218 (10th Cir. 2007) : In the bench trial of an employee's action against a former employer to recover consequential damages arising from a failure to reimburse relocation expenses, the Judge refused to award earnings lost on funds withdrawn from the plaintiff's retirement fund, saying there was no evidence of the fund's results. Reversing, the Court held that judicial notice should have been taken of the actual earnings history on the defendant's website, after the plaintiff provided the complete address for the page to which the quarterly reports were linked.

Rule 301. Presumptions in General in Civil Actions and Proceedings

In all civil actions and proceedings not otherwise provided for by Act of Congress or by these rules, a presumption imposes on the party against whom it is directed the burden of going forward with evidence to rebut or meet the presumption, but does not shift to such party the burden of proof in the sense of the risk of nonpersuasion, which remains throughout the trial upon the party on whom it was originally cast.

CHAPTER 301 RULE 301

1-301 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 301.02

301.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Effect of a Presumption

There has been substantial disagreement among common law Courts regarding the proper weight to be given a presumption. In some Courts, a presumption would place the burden of persuasion on the party opposing the fact presumed to establish its nonexistence, once the party invoking the presumption establishes the basic fact giving rise to it. Thus a presumption under this view operates as a burden-shifting device. In other Courts, the presumption vanishes upon the introduction of enough evidence to support a finding of the nonexistence of the presumed fact. The practical difference between these views -- known respectively as the Morgan and Thayer views n1-- is in the quantity and quality of evidence required to overcome the presumption. Under the Morgan view, the opponent of the presumption must establish, by a preponderance of the evidence in a civil case, the nonexistence of the presumed fact. Under the Thayer view, the opponent must merely offer credible evidence sufficient to support a finding contrary to the presumed fact in order to "burst" the presumption and take it out of the case. n2

The Federal Rule provides that a presumption imposes on the party against whom it is directed the burden of going forward with evidence to rebut the presumption. But the burden of persuasion remains with the party on whom it was originally cast, despite an Advisory Committee preference for shifting the burden. The Advisory Committee was of the view that a presumption would have too slight an effect if it merely served to shift the burden of going forward; the Advisory Committee's proposed Rule 301 thus provided for burden-shifting. n3 But Congress rejected this position. As adopted, Rule 301 operates merely as a procedural device to shift the burden of producing evidence, exposing the opponent of the presumption to the risk of an adverse result on a directed verdict if he fails to present enough evidence to support a finding of the nonexistence of the presumed fact. n4

Because Congress rejected the Advisory Committee's proposal, the Advisory Committee Note to Rule 301 -- unlike the Notes to most of the other Rules -- is not to be relied upon in construing the Rule. Indeed, the Note operates as a critique of the Rule Congress ultimately adopted.

Rule 301 does not itself determine whether a particular presumption applies; that is left to substantive law. n5 In some cases the substantive law creating the presumption might also specify the effect that the presumption is to have, for example, that it shifts the burden of proof and not merely the burden of production. Where substantive law governs not only the existence but also the effect of the presumption, Rule 301 is by its terms inapplicable. n6

Generally speaking, presumptions under the substantive law are based on one or more of the following rationales: (1) one party has superior access to proof; (2) social or economic policies warrant a presumption; (3) experience indicates the high probability of a given conclusion from a given set of facts; (4) a presumption will promote efficiency and convenience. The annotated cases under this Rule contain many examples of substantive law presumptions.

The Rule does not say anything about the original placement of the burden of proof, the degree of proof required to meet that burden, n7 or the burden of production. Again, these questions are governed by substantive law. n8

The legislative history is rather clear that the Congress intended the words "civil actions and proceedings" to cover all civil proceedings that are reached by the Federal Rules of Evidence under Rule 1101. The Rule does not cover criminal cases. The Advisory Committee proposed a Rule 303 to govern presumptions in criminal cases, but this proposal was rejected by Congress. In criminal cases, the use of presumptions presents a sensitive constitutional inquiry, because of the constitutional right to a jury trial and the due process requirement that the government prove every element of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt. n9

[2] How the Rule Works

An example may help to illustrate how the Rule works in practice. If there is a presumption that a letter once mailed is received, and one party to litigation introduces evidence of mailing, an opposing party must produce evidence of nonreceipt to rebut the presumption or the Judge will find that receipt is established on the basis of the evidence of mailing together with the presumption; if there is no rebuttal evidence, the jury in a civil case should be instructed that it must find the presumed fact. n10 If evidence sufficient to support a finding of nonreceipt is offered, the presumption disappears. This is true regardless of the strength of the evidence on mailing, and regardless of whether the Judge actually believes the evidence of nonreceipt. If the presumption disappears, the party who mailed the letter must then offer affirmative evidence of receipt in order to prevail. n11

In instructing the jury, the Court should avoid using the word "presumption." The term is a slippery one, and lay jurors may well misinterpret the import of the evidence when it is labeled as a "presumption" in a jury instruction. While the Senate Report and the Conferees' Report do not explicitly state that the word "presumption" shall not be used before the jury, this certainly seems to be the intent in view of the comments that a presumption is not evidence. n12

[3] Dispute as to Facts Underlying the Presumption

A presumption is established by proof of certain underlying facts. For example, the presumption that a letter once mailed is received comes into play only after proof that the letter was mailed. But what happens if the underlying facts are themselves in dispute? What if the plaintiff testifies that he mailed a letter, but the defendant calls a witness who testifies that he saw the plaintiff throw the letter in the trash? If jurors could decide either way as to the underlying facts, then they must be allowed to do so. It would be proper to instruct on the presumption, assuming no contrary evidence is presented as to the presumed fact -- e.g., no evidence of nonreceipt. But the instruction must be conditional; it must emphasize that the presumption comes into play only if the jury is satisfied that the underlying fact has been proven.

It may also be appropriate in some cases to instruct the jury that if the underlying fact is not found, then the presumed fact cannot be found. This will occur where the presumed fact cannot exist without the basic underlying fact, or where there is no other evidence that supports the existence of the presumed fact. Thus, if the jury does not find that a letter was mailed, and there is no other evidence that the letter was delivered by other means, then it cannot find that the letter was received.

[4] Rebuttal Evidence

The Rule does not explicitly state how much opposing evidence is needed to take a presumption out of a case. However, the only logical conclusion is that the opponent must produce the same amount of evidence necessary to avoid a directed verdict or peremptory instruction in the usual context of a civil case. Given the language of the Rule -- requiring as it does that a party opposing a presumption come forward with evidence to rebut it, but not necessarily with sufficient evidence to carry a burden of persuasion -- and given that Congress was trying to give some weight to presumptions but not too much weight -- the requirement of enough evidence for a reasonable person to find the fact is all that is intended. n13 If less proof were satisfactory, the presumption would be worth little because it would be almost automatically rebuttable; and one of the purposes of the Rule as drafted is to give the presumption significant, but not overwhelming, weight.

[5] Peremptory Instructions

Neither the Rule itself nor its legislative history clearly indicates whether a party favored by a presumption is entitled to a peremptory instruction or a partial directed verdict if the party against whom the presumption operates fails to offer any rebuttal evidence. Under the Thayer view of presumptions, where there is no rebuttal evidence the instruction to the jury would be a binding instruction. But the Conferees' Report contains a sentence that states that "the court will instruct the jury that if it finds the basic facts, it may presume the existence of the presumed fact" (emphasis added) when "the adverse party offers no evidence contradicting the presumed fact." Despite the language of the Conferees' Report, we believe that the best reading of Rule 301 is that a peremptory instruction is mandated upon request when the party against whom a presumption operates offers no proof to rebut the presumption. n14 It appears that the Conferees confused a presumption with a permissible inference; but that should have no bearing on how the Rule is applied.

Our reasoning is as follows: The Advisory Committee believed that the choice was between the Thayer approach and the Morgan approach. It spoke of no middle ground. When the Subcommittee on Criminal Justice received the Rule from the Supreme Court, it refused to go along with the Morgan approach of shifting the ultimate burden of persuasion. But it said that it thought that the "bursting bubble" or Thayer approach to presumptions gave presumptions too slight an effect. It made clear its intent to opt for a provision that gave presumptions more force than they would have under the Thayer view. This was the approach taken by the House Judiciary Committee. n15

The Senate Judiciary Committee wisely rejected the confusing language chosen by the House. But the Senate Judiciary Committee was so concerned with demonstrating that a treatment of presumptions as evidence was improper that it failed to explain whether it really meant to say that the traditional Thayer approach was not to be followed. The confusion engendered by the Senate Judiciary Committee Report continued in the Conferees' Report. The only change that the Senate Committee stated that it wanted to make was deletion of the provision in the House draft that would have treated presumptions as evidence. The Senate Committee did not indicate that it wanted to weaken the traditional force of presumptions. Certainly, it is doubtful that the House would have joined in the adoption of an approach to presumptions that gives them less force than the Thayer approach did.

Thus, we conclude that the Senate Committee, and ultimately the Conferees, were confused as to the traditional Thayer approach to presumptions and that there is no demonstrable intention on the part of the Congress to depart from the traditional "bursting bubble" approach. We recognize that the language of both the Senate Committee Report and the Conferees' Report can be read otherwise, but we do not believe that the cryptic wording concerning a permissive instruction to be given a jury represents the view of the House Committee, which wanted to strengthen the force of presumptions, or the Senate Committee, which only wanted to assure that presumptions were not treated as evidence. We believe that both Houses of Congress thought they were adopting the Thayer approach and that the Rule should be read as if they did. n16

[6] Conflicting Presumptions

In some cases, conflicting presumptions may arise. This is not a problem if rebuttal evidence is offered as to both presumptions, since both presumptions then drop out of the case. When no rebuttal evidence is offered as to either presumption, the stronger presumption should predominate. The Court must determine which is the stronger presumption based on policy and probability. n17 In the unlikely situation that the presumptions are in equipoise in terms of social policy and probability, they should both be discarded.

[7] Judicially-created Presumptions

No mention is made in the Rule of judicial power to create presumptions. But the Courts can and have created and applied presumptions as a matter of federal common law. n18 In admiralty cases, where Federal Courts exercise common-law power, judicially created presumptions have been found to be outside the scope of Rule 301. n19 Another example of a judicially-created presumption that overrides Rule 301 is the presumption employed in tax cases that a deficiency determination is entitled to a presumption of correctness, which shifts the burden of proof to the taxpayer. n20

[8] Burdens of Proof Under Statutes

Quite surprisingly, some commentators appear to assume that Rule 301 requires the plaintiff to bear the burden of proof in civil cases on all issues unless Congress explicitly requires otherwise. n21

We believe that Rule 301 need not stand in the way of judicial interpretation of legislation so that it places the burden of proof on civil defendants on certain issues; as stated previously, Rule 301 is simply a procedural device that does not allocate the burden of proof. While the line separating presumptions that shift burdens of persuasion from rulings placing burdens of persuasion in the first instance is not clear, we believe that a judicial decision that requires a civil defendant to bear the burden of proving issue D after plaintiff proves issues A, B, and C is generally not a decision about presumptions within the meaning of Rule 301. In such a case all four issues are material to the outcome. Rule 301 will usually apply when one fact is used as a bridge to another, and only by traveling the bridge is a material issue reached. For example, under a statute like 42 U.S.C. § 1982, plaintiffs might have the burden of proving that (1) African-Americans were treated more poorly than whites under similar circumstances, and (2) that defendants knew or had reason to know of the disparity; and defendants might have the burden of showing a nonracial reason for any disparity in the particular case. One could employ presumptions, but one need not. n22

[9] Conclusive Presumptions

Ordinarily, a "conclusive" presumption is essentially a rule of law, rather than a presumption as that term is used in Rule 301. Thus, a conclusive presumption that a child under the age of seven is incapable of forming a criminal intent is really a legal rule that children under seven are not criminally responsible.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. The Thayer view, which is the view adopted in Rule 301, has also been described as the "bursting bubble" theory. The theory is that the presumption ceases to exist when contrary evidence as to the presumed fact is introduced.

(n3)Footnote 3. The Advisory Committee was persuaded by Morgan's critique of the Thayer view on presumptions. Morgan's critique is well stated in the following passage:

> If a policy is strong enough to call a presumption into existence, it is hard to imagine it so weak as to be satisfied by the bare recital of words on the witness stand or the reception in evidence of a writing.

> And if the judicial desire for the result expressed in a presumption is buttressed by either the demands of procedural convenience or is in accord with the usual balance of probability, it is little short of ridiculous to allow so valuable a presumption to be destroyed by the introduction of evidence without actual persuasive effect.

William T. Burnett & Co., 691 F.2d 658 (4th Cir. 1982)* (construing 35 U.S.C. § 282, the Court concludes that the statutory presumption of patent validity "does not merely shift the burden of coming forward with evidence of invalidity to the party contesting the patent but shifts the ultimate burden of establishing invalidity by clear and convincing evidence"). See also Plough, Inc. v. Mason & Dixon Lines, 630 F.2d 468 (6th Cir. 1980) :

> It is immediately apparent that Rule 301 does not affect the burden of proof in Carmack Amendment cases. For well articulated reasons Congress chose to place the burden of proof on a carrier in whose hands goods are damaged rather than on the shipper. This is more than a burden of going forward with the evidence. It is a true burden of proof in the sense of the risk of nonpersuasion and it remains on the carrier once the prima facie showing has been made.

provide affirmative evidence of receipt by the plaintiff in order to prevail on the question of notice); Fisher v. Supp. 1354 (E.D.N.Y. 1983) ("In order to rebut the presumption that a notice of reconsideration is received five days after it is dated, the claimant must adduce evidence that would be sufficient to overcome a directed verdict."); *In re Dodd, 82 B.R. 924 (Bankr. (n15)Footnote 15. The House Rule provided that in civil cases, a presumption imposed on the party against whom it was directed the burden of going forward with the evidence. Moreover, even if the party produced evidence, a presumption was sufficient evidence of the fact presumed to be considered by the trier of fact. One confusing thing about the House Rule was that it did not indicate whether the Judge was supposed to tell the jury that there was such a thing as a presumption operating in the case. And, if the jury was to be told of the presumption, deciding what it should be told would not have been easy.

[1] Admiralty Cases

City of Boston v. S.S. Texaco Texas, 773 F.2d 1396 (1st Cir. 1985) : The Court held that Rule 301 does not disturb the well-settled rule that "when a vessel under its own power collides with an anchored vessel or a navigational structure, the burden of proving absence of fault or vis major rests on the pilot vessel."

Brunet v. United Gas Pipeline Co., 15 F.3d 500 (5th Cir. 1994) : In an admiralty limitation action brought by owners of a pushboat that came into contact with a gas pipeline, the Court held that a moving vessel colliding with a stationary object, including an obstruction to navigation known to the mariner, is presumed to be at fault and the presumption shifts the burdens of producing evidence and of persuasion onto the moving vessel. In an action by a deckhand on a moored vessel who was injured when it was struck by a drifting barge, James v. River Parishes Co., n1 the plaintiff offered no proof of negligence and instead relied on a presumption of negligence. A majority of the Court held that the law imposed the burden of persuasion on the negligence question on the party whose vessel was adrift. One dissenter argued that Rule 301 was applicable and that the plaintiff should have borne the burden of persuasion. In our view the majority was correct. Although Congress' decisions concerning burdens of persuasion would provide exceptions to Rule 301 in other areas, judicial rulings in admiralty cases make up the bulk of admiralty law, and longstanding precedents should not be disturbed absent some indication that in drafting Rule 301 Congress intended to change prior holdings.

City of Chicago v. M/V Morgan, 375 F.3d 563 (7th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed a decision finding the parties equally liable for an accident in which a tugboat pushing four barges struck a city-owned bridge. The defendants complained about the application of the presumption, recognized by The Oregon, 158 U.S. 186 (1895) , that a moving vessel, which under its own power collides with a stationary object, is at fault. The Court reasoned that application of the presumption did not relieve the City of the burden of proving negligence; the presumption "merely satisfies the plaintiff's prima facie case." The Court stated that "[o]nce fault is presumed the defendant may come forward with evidence to rebut the presumption," and added that "[r]ebutting the presumption does not necessarily exonerate the vessel from all liability."

Hood v. Knappton Corp., 986 F.2d 329 (9th Cir. 1993) : In a negligence action by boaters against the owner of a log raft that had drifted into collision with their boats, the Court held that the rule in The Louisiana, 70 U.S. (3 Wall.) 164 (1866) , that the owner of a drifting vessel bears the burden of persuasion on the fault issue, remains the law of the Circuit, notwithstanding Rule 301.

[2] Attorney Disqualification

Panduit Corp. v. All States Plastic Mfg. Co., 744 F.2d 1564 (Fed. Cir. 1984) : In a patent infringement suit, the Court reversed an order that had disqualified a law firm because one of its attorneys had previously worked on related matters for another firm that had represented an opposing party. The Trial Judge had relied upon the presumptions that a party who performed legal services for a client received confidential information and that attorneys within a firm share each other's confidential information, but the Court found that the presumptions had been rebutted and that under Rule 301 the burden remained on the party seeking disqualification to demonstrate that it was necessary.

[3] Bankruptcy Cases

In re Yoder Co., 758 F.2d 1114 (6th Cir. 1985) : The Court reversed a judgment that a product liability claim was barred for failure to file a timely proof of claim. The Bankruptcy Court had relied mainly on a presumption of receipt arising from evidence that notice of the "bar date" was sent to the claimant, but the Court of Appeals held that "a presumption has no probative effect once rebutted." There was no evidence that the claimant had received notice, and the only alleged mailing had been to his lawyer, who testified that he received no mailing. Because there was no evidence of notice, the Court concluded that the proof of claim should have been filed.

Clay v. Traders Bank, 708 F.2d 1347 (8th Cir. 1983) : In a bankruptcy appeal, the Court interpreted 11 U.S.C. § 547(f), which creates a presumption that a debtor was insolvent ninety days before filing a petition, as imposing a burden on a party claiming that the debtor was solvent during the ninety-day period to offer evidence rebutting the presumption. The burden of persuasion did not shift as a result of the presumption.

In re Carter, 182 F.3d 1027 (9th Cir. 1999) : In ruling that certain earnings of an entertainer should have been found exempt from her estate, the Court set forth the governing presumptions principles:

> A claimed exemption is "presumptively valid." ... Once an exemption has been claimed, it is the objecting party's burden (the trustee in this case) to prove that the exemption is not properly claimed. Initially, this means that the objecting party has the burden of production and the burden of persuasion. The objecting party must provide evidence to rebut the presumptively valid exemption. If the objecting party can produce evidence to rebut the exemption, the burden of production then shifts to the debtor to come forward with unequivocal evidence to demonstrate that the exemption is proper. Fed.R.Evid. 301. The burden of persuasion, however, always remains with the objecting party.

In re East Coast Brokers & Packers, Inc., 961 F.2d 1543 (11th Cir. 1992) : The Court reversed an order denying relief from the automatic stay and turnover of property in a bankruptcy proceeding, holding that the evidence presented was sufficient to raise the presumption of mailing to establish receipt by the debtor of notices of intent to preserve trust benefits under the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act.

[4] Burden of Proof Distinguished

In re G-I Holdings, Inc., 385 F.3d 313 (3d Cir. 2004) : In reviewing a motion for appointment of a Chapter 11 trustee in a bankruptcy proceeding, the Court noted that its previous reference to "the strong presumption against appointment of an outside trustee" used the term "presumption" not in the technical evidentiary sense expressed in Rule 301, of using basic facts to prove presumed facts, but simply as another way of referring to the heavy burden of persuasion (i.e., clear and convincing evidence) faced by a party seeking appointment of an outside trustee.

[5] Civil Rights Cases

Patterson v. McLean Credit Union, 491 U.S. 164 (1989) : In this racial harassment and promotion-discrimination case brought under 42 U.S.C. § 1981, the Supreme Court held that on the promotion claim the plaintiff had an initial burden of proving, by a preponderance of the evidence, a prima facie case of discrimination; that when she did so, by showing she was qualified but defendant filled the position with a white person after rejecting her, an inference of discrimination arose, which imposed a burden on the defendant to present evidence of a legitimate nondiscriminatory reason for the action; and that when the defendant presented evidence the white applicant was better qualified, the presumption of discrimination was rebutted and the plaintiff retained the final burden of persuading the jury of intentional discrimination. The District Court had erred by instructing the jury that the plaintiff was required to show she was better qualified than the person chosen in order to show the defendant's stated reasons were pretextual and satisfy her burden of proof; the Supreme Court held that showing she was better qualified was only one of the ways the plaintiff might prove intentional discrimination.

Jund v. Town of Hempstead, 941 F.2d 1271 (2d Cir. 1991) : In a RICO and civil rights action arising out of a coercive political contributions scheme, the Trial Judge instructed the jurors that they could infer, because there was a coercive policy in 1973-76, that there was such a policy in 1978. Reinstating a verdict for the plaintiff, the Court held that it would have been proper to instruct the jury on the general presumption of the continuance of a status or condition once proved to exist, so it was not improper to shift the burden to the defendants to prove that the coercive practice did not continue in 1978.

Smiddy v. Varney, 665 F.2d 261 (9th Cir. 1981) : In a civil rights suit alleging false arrest by police officers, the Court held that there is a presumption that a district attorney files complaints on the basis of an independent judgment and, unless rebutted, that presumption immunizes officers from liability for any time period after the complaint is filed. The Court added: "Where the plaintiff has introduced evidence to rebut the presumption, the burden remains on the defendant to prove that an independent intervening cause cuts off his tort liability. Rule 301. If for reasons of privilege or otherwise the relevant evidence is not available, no presumption will arise."

[6] Conflicting Presumptions

Legille v. Dann, 544 F.2d 1 (D.C. Cir. 1976) : In this patent case the applicant relied on the presumption of regularity of the mails and the Commissioner of Patents relied upon a presumption of regularity in its office. The Trial Judge granted summary judgment on the basis of the first presumption, but a divided Court of Appeals reversed. The majority said that "we perceive no legal or practical justification for preferring either of the two involved presumptions over the other." The Court seemed to recognize that a presumption might survive a battle of presumptions if its grounding in policy were firm enough, but held that when two presumptions were based on probabilities, proof of the basic facts as to both resulted in their disappearance, leaving only any inferences from the evidence of the basic facts that the trier might wish to draw.

[7] Electronic Communications and Receipt

Kennell v. Gates, 215 F.3d 825 (8th Cir. 2000) : The plaintiff sued a police officer who kept the plaintiff in custody on an arrest warrant for a period of eight days after it was learned that the warrant was for a different person. At the beginning of the eight-day period, an in-house computer message was sent to the police officer notifying her that the wrong person was in custody. The defendant testified that she never received the message and that there must have been some computer glitch. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court stated that a jury is permitted to presume that information "sent via a reliable means -- such as the postal service or a telegram -- was received." It saw "no principled reason why a jury would not be able to make the same inference regarding other forms of communication -- such as facsimiles, electronic mail, and in-house computer message systems -- provided they are accepted as generally reliable and that the particular message is properly dispatched." The Court found a sufficient foundation for such a presumption in this case.

[8] Employment Discrimination Cases

St. Mary's Honor Center v. Hicks, 509 U.S. 502 (1993) : The Supreme Court noted that the McDonnell Douglas presumption in employment discrimination cases operates like all presumptions under the Rule in that it imposes a burden on the defendant to produce admissible evidence to rebut the prima facie case, but it does not shift the plaintiff's ultimate burden of proving that the defendant intentionally discriminated. In Price Waterhouse v. Hopkins, n2 the Court held that once a plaintiff in a mixed-motive, disparate-treatment Title VII case shows that gender played a motivating part in an employment decision, the defendant may avoid a finding of liability only by proving by a preponderance of the evidence that it would have made the same decision even if it had not allowed gender to play such a role. See also Patterson v. McLean Credit Union, discussed in § 301.03[4]. In Texas Dep't of Community Affairs v. Burdine, n3 the Court held that once the plaintiff in a Title VII case makes a showing that she applied for an available position for which she was qualified but was rejected under circumstances that give rise to an inference of unlawful discrimination, there is a presumption of discrimination that imposes upon a defendant the burden of producing evidence that the employment decision was made for a legitimate, nondiscriminatory reason. "It is sufficient if the defendant's evidence raises a genuine issue of fact ... ." The plaintiff retains the burden of persuasion if the presumption is rebutted.

Reeves v. General Foods Corp., 682 F.2d 515 (5th Cir. 1982) : In an age discrimination suit, the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff. The Court reasoned that although a plaintiff's proof that established a prima facie case of discrimination might not be sufficient to warrant sending a case to the jury after an employer submitted evidence of nondiscriminatory reasons for a discharge, in this case the plaintiff offered sufficient evidence to support the jury verdict.

[9] Faxing and Confirmation

Stevens Shipping & Term. Co. v. Japan Rainbow II MV, 334 F.3d 439 (5th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed the dismissal of a stevedore's in rem claims against a vessel, seeking payment for agency and stevedoring services. In finding that the plaintiff had actual knowledge that the charter of the vessel contained a prohibition of liens clause, the Trial Judge relied upon the facts that the vessel owners' managing agent had faxed a copy of the prohibition of liens clause to the plaintiff at the fax number listed in the charter and that the agent had received a fax confirmation that a letter and the notice were successfully transmitted. The Court found no error when the Judge adopted a rebuttable presumption that the plaintiff received the fax notice, analogizing to the presumption that a properly addressed and mailed letter is received within a reasonable time. The plaintiff had failed to rebut the presumption.

[10] Intellectual Property Cases

America Online Inc. v. AT & T Corp., 243 F.3d 812 (4th Cir. 2001) : In an action by AOL alleging that AT & T infringed AOL's trademarks, the Court affirmed summary judgment for AT & T in part but held that AOL had raised a genuine issue of material fact as to whether its use of the phrase "Buddy List" constituted a valid service mark in connection with its instant messaging service. AOL had obtained a certificate of registration from the Patent and Trademark Office, which was prima facie evidence of the validity of the mark and its registration and AOL's exclusive right to use the mark in connection with the goods and services set forth in the certificate. Although the Court held that the Trial Judge was not required to defer to the PTO certification, the fact that it was prima facie evidence was sufficient to raise a material question of fact. The Court referred to the Advisory Committee Note to Rule 301 which indicates that evidence may be sufficient to neutralize a presumption (or prima facie evidence), but it does not eliminate from the case the evidence that gave rise to the presumption. Affirming a judgment for the defendants in a copyright infringement case, Keeler Brass Co. v. Continental Brass Co., n4 the Court analogized to Rule 301 in holding that the establishment of a prima facie case creates a presumption of copying that can be rebutted with evidence of independent creation. It concluded that if the presumption is rebutted, the plaintiff has the ultimate burden of persuading the trier of fact that there was copying. In Tenneco Chems., Inc. v. William T. Burnett & Co., n5 the Court, reviewing challenges to two patents, observed that the statutory presumption of patent validity requires a party challenging a patent not only to produce evidence of invalidity, but also to prove invalidity by clear and convincing evidence.

Selle v. Gibb, 567 F. Supp. 1173 (N.D. Ill. 1983) , aff'd, 741 F.2d 896 (7th Cir. 1984) : In a suit alleging the infringement of a copyright on a song, the Court entered a judgment n.o.v. for the defendants. It reasoned that the plaintiff's evidence that his song was similar to one put out by the defendants supported an inference that the defendants might have had access to the plaintiff's song, but that the undisputed testimony demonstrated that the defendants had never heard of the plaintiff or his music. The Court relied on the traditional analysis of presumptions in concluding that "[w]here the case of a plaintiff is based on an inference or inferences, it must fail upon proof of undisputed facts inconsistent with such inference or inferences."

A.C. Aukerman Co. v. R.L. Chaides Constr. Co., 960 F.2d 1020 (Fed. Cir. 1992) (en banc): The Court reversed summary judgment for the defendant in a patent infringement case, holding that the presumption of laches arising from a six-year delay in bringing suit may be eliminated by offering evidence to show an excuse for the delay or that the delay was reasonable, and that (contrary to the decision below and suggestions in recent patent cases) at all times the defendant bears the ultimate burden of persuasion on the affirmative defense of laches. In Solder Removal Co. v. United States Int'l Trade Comm'n, n6 the Court noted that the statutory presumption of patent validity under 35 U.S.C. § 282 must be given precedence over Rule 301. Because a specific statute governs the matter, "a party asserting invalidity [must] bear not only the presumption-generated burden of going forward with proof but also the burden of persuasion on that issue."

[11] Labor Cases

NLRB v. Tahoe Nugget, Inc., 584 F.2d 293 (9th Cir. 1978) : A burden of persuasion placed on an employer as a result of a presumption was held to govern, notwithstanding Rule 301.

American Coal Co. v. Benefits Review Bd., 738 F.2d 387 (10th Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed an award of benefits to an employee claiming a black lung illness. It rejected the employer's argument that Rule 301 governed administrative proceedings and found that Congress delegated to the Secretary of Labor authority to designate how the presumptions set forth in the statute could be rebutted. In Presbyterian/St. Luke's Med. Center v. NLRB, 653 F.2d 450 (10th Cir. 1981) , the Court found that under Rule 301 the General Counsel must prove that an unfair labor practice occurred and that the burden of persuasion as to the appropriateness of a bargaining unit had been improperly shifted to the employer.

[12] Mailing and Receipt

[a] Inadequate Foundation for Presumption

United States v. Wilson, 322 F.3d 353 (5th Cir. 2003) : The Court reversed a conviction for money laundering because of insufficient evidence that the Justice Department's Office of International Affairs actually sent an official request for assistance to the Commonwealth of the Bahamas, thereby tolling the statute of limitations. The Court held that the presumption of mailing and receipt upon proof of an office's routine correspondence practices was not satisfied in this case because the foundation witness was a paralegal, not a secretary or docketing clerk, and she was not responsible for drafting or mailing assistance requests or for making correspondence log entries. Aside from the witness' lack of personal knowledge of the practices in the OIA during the time in question, her testimony indicated that there were no consistent procedures or practices at that time.

Busquets-Ivars v. Ashcroft, 333 F.3d 1008 (9th Cir. 2003) : To provide notice of a hearing, the Immigration and Naturalization Service used certified mail, although the statute required only regular mail, but it coupled the petitioners' correct street address with an incorrect ZIP code. Expressing no opinion on whether the INS was deprived of the presumption of effective notice because it presented no return receipt for the certified mail, the Court nevertheless found the presumption inapplicable because the incorrect ZIP code meant that the letter was not "properly directed," which is a required predicate for the presumption. One Judge dissented, noting that an absent or incorrect ZIP code does not make mail undeliverable. In Huizar v. Carey, 273 F.3d 1220 (9th Cir. 2001) , a habeas corpus proceeding dismissed as untimely because a state petition was never received or filed, the Court held that a prisoner's habeas petition would be deemed filed at the time he delivered it to the prison authorities for forwarding to the appropriate Court's clerk. The case was remanded to determine when the petition was delivered to prison authorities and whether the petitioner had followed up after receiving no reply.

Davis v. United States Postal Serv., 142 F.3d 1334 (10th Cir. 1998) : The Court affirmed in part judgment as a matter of law granted for the defendant in a Rehabilitation Act case, and upheld a finding that an EEO officer had not received the plaintiff's request to file a formal complaint. The plaintiff's testimony that her attorney mailed the letter was insufficient to trigger the presumption of receipt on proof of mailing, since the plaintiff had no personal knowledge and there was no affidavit or other proof of the customary mailing practices in the attorney's office. In a Federal Tort Claims Act case, Moya v. United States, n7 the Court affirmed summary judgment against the plaintiff for failure to show that the agency had received notice of the claim. The Court held that an affidavit by the plaintiff's attorney that she mailed the letter certified mail, without evidence regarding the return receipt, did not establish the presumption of receipt for the notice. Where the sender does not receive the return receipt for certified mail, she is on notice that the addressee may not have received the letter.

[b] Mailing and Receipt -- Presumption Applied

Boomer v. AT&T Corp., 309 F.3d 404 (7th Cir. 2002) : Reversing a decision refusing to compel arbitration in an action involving long distance telephone charges, the Court rejected the plaintiff's claim that his continued use of the defendant's service did not constitute an acceptance of an offer that the defendant mailed. The Court reasoned that when a letter is properly addressed and mailed, there is a presumption that it reached its destination in usual time and was actually received by the person to whom it was addressed. In this case the defendant presented evidence of its mailing procedures, and the plaintiff did not offer evidence that it was not received.

Maghee v. Ault, 410 F.3d 473 (8th Cir. 2005) : Affirming denial of habeas corpus relief because the statute of limitations had run, the Court rejected the petitioner's argument that his state proceeding for post-conviction relief was still pending because he had not received notice it had been dismissed. It found sufficient evidence that the notice was properly addressed and mailed to trigger the presumption of delivery. In Davis v. U.S. Bancorp, 383 F.3d 761 (8th Cir. 2004) , the Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendants in a prospective borrower's suit arising from denial of a loan, holding that an officer's affidavit that notice of adverse action was prepared in accordance with the underwriter's procedures and mailed "on or about" a particular date was sufficient to trigger the presumption that a notice properly mailed was received.

Schikore v. BankAmerica Supplemental Retirement Plan, 269 F.3d 956 (9th Cir. 2001) : The Plan denied the plaintiff's request for lump-sum distribution of retirement benefits on the grounds that she failed to timely submit the required election form and that it had no record of having received the form. The plaintiff offered proof of mailing the form well in advance of the deadline. The Plan asserted that the common-law mailbox rule was superseded by ERISA and by Plan rules requiring actual receipt. The Court held (2-1) that it was an abuse of discretion for the Plan to fail to apply the presumption, which has long been followed " 'precisely to avoid the type of swearing contest in which the parties are presently involved.' " In Mahon v. Credit Bureau of Placer County Inc., 171 F.3d 1197 (9th Cir. 1999) , the Court affirmed summary judgment against debtors suing under the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act, finding no genuine dispute that the debtors timely received the required collection notice, given unrebutted proof of the defendant's mailing practices for its computer-generated notices and the common-law presumption of receipt on proof of a document's proper and timely mailing.

Konst v. Florida E.C. Ry., 71 F.3d 850 (11th Cir. 1996) : Reversing summary judgment for the railroad in an action by a shipper alleging damage to furniture during a shipment, the Court concluded that the shipper's evidence that it mailed a claim was sufficient to trigger the presumption that the railroad received it.

[c] Mailing and Receipt -- Sufficiency of Rebuttal

Chavis v. Heckler, 577 F. Supp. 201 (D.D.C. 1983) : In an action seeking supplementary social security income, the District Court granted summary judgment for the plaintiff on the ground that the agency's notice of termination was not reasonably calculated to reach the plaintiff. The Judge noted that the statutory presumption that a mailed letter is received is rebuttable and disappeared in this case when the plaintiff testified before an Administrative Law Judge that he never received the notice.

Barrs v. Lockheed Martin Corp., 287 F.3d 202 (1st Cir. 2002) : In an action for breach of fiduciary duties under ERISA, the plaintiff testified that she mailed a change of address postcard to the defendant. Affirming judgment for the defendant after a bench trial, the Court found that the common-law presumption of receipt had been rebutted by testimony from the defendant's employee responsible for the relevant file that the postcard was never received. Although the plaintiff argued that a simple denial should not rebut the presumption, the Court held that here the defendant offered a witness in a position to know, who offered direct testimony and who could be cross-examined. "To demand much more would elevate the presumption into one that is effectively not rebuttable--which would hardly be justified by common experience with the postal system."

Sinatra v. Heckler, 566 F. Supp. 1354 (E.D.N.Y. 1983) : Remanding a case to the Social Security Administration for consideration of whether the plaintiff's request for a hearing was untimely, the Court ruled that the presumption under SSA regulations that a letter is received five days after its date is rebuttable. It declined to decide whether a bare affidavit by a claimant denying receipt of a letter would be sufficient rebuttal evidence, because judicial notice of the usual delay in mail delivery associated with the year-end holiday season supported the claimant.

In re Cendant Corp. Prides Litig., 311 F.3d 298 (3d Cir. 2002) : The Court reversed an order that excluded a mutual funds custodian from a class action settlement fund on the ground that proofs of claims had been filed tardily. The Court noted that the presumption of receipt upon mailing was rebuttable, and that at least one Circuit had held that testimony denying receipt suffices to rebut. As the Court observed, "Although the presumption of mailing rests on the dependability of the U.S. Postal Service, human experience has shown that reliance has not always been justified." On the facts of this case, the Court found application of the presumption "troublesome," and excused the custodian's late filing.

Beck v. Somerset Technologies, Inc., 882 F.2d 993 (5th Cir. 1989) : In a product liability action, the Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendants on the ground that the plaintiff's employer had been given notice of the defects before the injury. The defendant's summary judgment record included a copy of a properly addressed letter to the employer and signed return postcards, and the resulting presumption of receipt was not rebutted by an affidavit from one of the employer's employees that he did not remember receiving the warning letter or the person who signed the return receipt.

Lozano v. Ashcroft, 258 F.3d 1160 (10th Cir. 2001) : In an employment discrimination action, the Court reversed a judgment for the defendant Department of Justice, holding that its rejection of an EEOC decision was untimely. A DOJ employee's affidavit that was not based on personal knowledge, and a photocopy of the decision letter with a partially illegible stamp purportedly indicating the date of receipt were insufficient to rebut the presumption of timely receipt upon proof of mailing. In Witt v. Roadway Express, 136 F.3d 1424 (10th Cir. 1998) , the plaintiff's employment discrimination claim against his union was dismissed as untimely, after the Trial Judge presumed that the plaintiff had received his right-to-sue letter within five days after a certified mail receipt showed it was mailed. Reversing, the Court held that the presumption applied, but that in this case the plaintiff had presented evidence that could reasonably be found to have rebutted it.

[d] Mailing and Receipt -- Tax Cases

Carroll v. Commissioner, 71 F.3d 1228 (6th Cir. 1995) : Affirming a Tax Court decision assessing a deficiency against a taxpayer, the Court held that the common-law presumption that a properly addressed and mailed communication is also received "has no application where the IRS is involved," and "[i]n this circuit, a taxpayer who sends a document to the IRS by regular mail, as opposed to registered or certified mail, does so at his peril."

Anderson v. United States, 966 F.2d 487 (9th Cir. 1992) : In a taxpayer's suit for a refund, the Court held that the government had not rebutted the common-law presumption of receipt that arose on the taxpayer's proof of mailing her return.

[13] Miscellaneous Cases

Pennzoil Co. v. Federal Energy Regulatory Comm'n, 789 F.2d 1128 (5th Cir. 1986) : The Court found that the FERC misconstrued a previous decision, and vacated and remanded proceedings involving rates charged by natural gas producers. The earlier decision affirmed procedures that created a rebuttable presumption that an assertion by a producer and a purchaser that they intended in their contract to permit certain rates to be charged was accurate and not unreasonable. A party protesting the rates must bear the "burden of coming forward with substantial evidence of the lack of contractual authority to overcome the presumption." Once the burden is borne, the presumption disappears, which the Court observed is also true under Rule 301.

Howing Co. v. Nationwide Corp., 927 F.2d 263 (6th Cir. 1991) , vacated on other grounds, 502 U.S. 801 (1991) : Reversing a summary judgment for the defendant in a securities action by minority public shareholders arising from a freeze-out merger, the Court held that the specific language of the instructions to SEC proxy rules creates a presumption that a discussion of book, going concern, and liquidation value in the proxy statement would be material to a reasonable investor. In this case, the defendants did not rebut the presumption so as to avoid trial because they did not establish the lack of significance of the omitted information with sufficient clarity. In Plough, Inc. v. Mason & Dixon Lines, n8 the Court vacated a judgment for a motor carrier charged with injury to shipped goods, finding that the District Court misallocated the burden of persuasion. Noting that the Supreme Court has interpreted Congress' intent in the 1906 Carmack Amendment to the Interstate Commerce Act as codifying the common-law rule that a carrier is liable for damage to goods except when it can make certain special showings that it was not responsible for the damage, the Court said that Rule 301 did not bar placement of the burden of persuasion on the carrier, since Congress had placed it there.

Godfrey v. United States, 997 F.2d 335 (7th Cir. 1993) : The Court reversed denial of a taxpayer's claim for interest on a delayed refund check, holding that a computer transcript indicating that refund of an overpayment had been authorized was insufficient to create a presumption of delivery, absent any evidence indicating regular procedures for mailing refund checks after authorization of refunds.

Pennsylvania v. United States, 643 F.2d 758 (Ct. Cl. 1981) : The Court found that since Congress did not provide otherwise, a presumption for reimbursement of a State under the Federal-Aid Highways Act related only to the burden of production of evidence, not to the ultimate burden of persuasion.

[14] Social Security Cases

Patti v. Schweiker, 669 F.2d 582 (9th Cir. 1982) : The Court reversed a District Court that had upheld the termination of social security benefits. It recognized that "when a claimant is entitled to the benefit of a presumption that her disability still exists, the burden is still on her to prove her case," but the Court found that there was insufficient rebuttal evidence to warrant disregard of the presumption in this case.

[15] Summary Judgment

America Online Inc. v. AT & T Corp., 243 F.3d 812 (4th Cir. 2001) : In an action by AOL alleging that AT & T infringed AOL's trademarks, the Court affirmed summary judgment for AT & T in part but held that AOL had raised a genuine issue of material fact as to whether its use of the phrase "Buddy List" constituted a valid service mark in connection with its instant messaging service. AOL had obtained a certificate of registration from the Patent and Trademark Office, which was prima facie evidence of the validity of the mark and its registration and AOL's exclusive right to use the mark in connection with the goods and services set forth in the certificate. Although the Court held that the Trial Judge was not required to defer to the PTO certification, the fact that it was prima facie evidence was sufficient to raise a material question of fact. The Court referred to the Advisory Committee Note to Rule 301 which indicates that evidence may be sufficient to neutralize a presumption (or prima facie evidence), but it does not eliminate from the case the evidence that gave rise to the presumption.

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Advisory Committee's Note

This rule governs presumptions generally. See Rule 302 for presumptions controlled by state law and Rule 303 for those against an accused in a criminal case. [The latter rule was deleted by Congress. Ed.]

Presumptions governed by this rule are given the effect of placing upon the opposing party the burden of establishing the nonexistence of the presumed fact, once the party invoking the presumption establishes the basic facts giving rise to it. The same considerations of fairness, policy, and probability which dictate the allocation of the burden of the various elements of a case as between the prima facie case of a plaintiff and affirmative defenses also underlie the creation of presumptions. These considerations are not satisfied by giving a lesser effect to presumptions. Morgan and Maguire, Looking Backward and Forward at Evidence, 50 Harv. L. Rev. 909, 913 (1937); Morgan, Instructing the Jury upon Presumptions and Burden of Proof, 47 Harv. L. Rev. 59, 82 (1933); Cleary, Presuming and Pleading: An Essay on Juristic Immaturity, 12 Stan. L. Rev. 5 (1959). [This approach was rejected by the Congress. Ed.]

The so-called "bursting bubble" theory, under which a presumption vanishes upon the introduction of evidence which would support a finding of the nonexistence of the presumed fact, even though not believed, is rejected as according presumptions too "slight and evanescent" an effect. Morgan and Maguire, supra, at p. 913. [This approach was adopted by the Congress. Ed.]

In the opinion of the Advisory Committee, no constitutional infirmity attends this view of presumptions. In Mobile, J. & K. C. R. Co. v. Turnipseed, 219 U.S. 35, 31 S. Ct. 136, 55 L. Ed. 78 (1910) , the Court upheld a Mississippi statute which provided that in actions against railroads proof of injury inflicted by the running of trains should be prima facie evidence of negligence by the railroad. The injury in the case had resulted from a derailment. The opinion made the points (1) that the only effect of the statute was to impose on the railroad the duty of producing some evidence to the contrary, (2) that an inference may be supplied by law if there is a rational connection between the fact proved and the fact presumed, as long as the opposite party is not precluded from presenting his evidence to the contrary, and (3) that considerations of public policy arising from the character of the business justified the application in question. Nineteen years later, in Western & Atlantic R. Co. v. Henderson, 279 U.S. 639, 49 S. Ct. 445, 73 L. Ed. 884 (1929) , the Court overturned a Georgia statute making railroads liable for damages done by trains, unless the railroad made it appear that reasonable care had been used, the presumption being against the railroad. The declaration alleged the death of plaintiff's husband from a grade crossing collision, due to specific acts of negligence by defendant. The jury were instructed that proof of the injury raised a presumption of negligence; the burden shifted to the railroad to prove ordinary care; and unless it did so, they should find for the plaintiff. The instruction was held erroneous in an opinion stating (1) that there was no rational connection between the mere fact of collision and negligence on the part of anyone, and (2) that the statute was different from that in Turnipseed in imposing a burden upon the railroad. The reader is left in a state of some confusion. Is the difference between a derailment and a grade crossing collision of no significance? Would the Turnipseed presumption have been bad if it had imposed a burden of persuasion on defendant, although that would in nowise have impaired its "rational connection"? If Henderson forbids imposing a burden of persuasion on defendants, what happens to affirmative defenses?

Two factors serve to explain Henderson. The first was that it was common ground that negligence was indispensable to liability. Plaintiff thought so, drafted her complaint accordingly, and relied upon the presumption. But how in logic could the same presumption establish her alternative grounds of negligence that the engineer was so blind he could not see decedent's truck and that he failed to stop after he saw it? Second, take away the basic assumption of no liability without fault, as Turnipseed intimated might be done ("considerations of public policy arising out of the character of the business"), and the structure of the decision in Henderson fails. No question of logic would have arisen if the statute had simply said: a prima facie case of liability is made by proof of injury by a train; lack of negligence is an affirmative defense, to be pleaded and proved as other affirmative defenses. The problem would be one of economic due process only. While it seems likely that the Supreme Court of 1920 would have voted that due process was denied, that result today would be unlikely. See, for example, the shift in the direction of absolute liability in the consumer cases. Prosser, The Assault upon the Citadel (Strict Liability to the Consumer), 69 Yale L.J. 1099 (1960).

Any doubt as to the constitutional permissibility of a presumption imposing a burden of persuasion of the nonexistence of the presumed fact in civil cases is laid at rest by Dick v. New York Life Ins. Co., 359 U.S. 437, 79 S. Ct. 921, 3 L. Ed. 2d 935 (1959) . The Court unhesitatingly applied the North Dakota rule that the presumption against suicide imposed on defendant the burden of proving that the death of insured, under an accidental death clause, was due to suicide.

"Proof of coverage and of death by gunshot wound shifts the burden to the insurer to establish that the death of the insured was due to his suicide." 359 U.S. at 443, 79 S. Ct. at 925 .

"In a case like this one, North Dakota presumes that death was accidental and places on the insurer the burden of proving that death resulted from suicide." Id. at 446, 79 S. Ct. at 927 .

The rational connection requirement survives in criminal cases, Tot v. United States, 319 U.S. 463, 63 S. Ct. 1241, 87 L. Ed. 1519 (1943) , because the Court has been unwilling to extend into that area the greater-includes-the-lesser theory of Ferry v. Ramsey, 277 U.S. 88, 48 S. Ct. 443, 72 L. Ed. 796 (1928) . In that case the Court sustained a Kansas statute under which bank directors were personally liable for deposits made with their assent and with knowledge of insolvency, and the fact of insolvency was prima facie evidence of assent and knowledge of insolvency. Mr. Justice Holmes pointed out that the state legislature could have made the directors personally liable to depositors in every case. Since the statute imposed a less stringent liability, "the thing to be considered is the result reached, not the possibly inartificial or clumsy way of reaching it." Id. at 94, 48 S. Ct. at 444 . Mr. Justice Sutherland dissented: though the state could have created an absolute liability, it did not purport to do so; a rational connection was necessary, but lacking, between the liability created and the prima facie evidence of it; the result might be different if the basis of the presumption were being open for business.

The Sutherland view has prevailed in criminal cases by virtue of the higher standard of notice there required. The fiction that everyone is presumed to know the law is applied to the substantive law of crimes as an alternative to complete unenforceability. But the need does not extend to criminal evidence and procedure, and the fiction does not encompass them. "Rational connection" is not fictional or artificial, and so it is reasonable to suppose that Gainey should have known that his presence at the site of an illicit still could convict him of being connected with (carrying on) the business, United States v. Gainey, 380 U.S. 63, 85 S. Ct. 754, 13 L. Ed. 2d 658 (1965) , but not that Romano should have known that his presence at a still could convict him of possessing it, United States v. Romano, 382 U.S. 136, 86 S. Ct. 279, 15 L. Ed. 2d 210 (1965) .

In his dissent in Gainey, Mr. Justice Black put it more artistically:

> It might be argued, although the Court does not so argue or hold, that Congress if it wished could make presence at a still a crime in itself, and so Congress should be free to create crimes which are called "possession" and "carrying on an illegal distillery business" but which are defined in such a way that unexplained presence is sufficient and indisputable evidence in all cases to support conviction for those offenses. See Ferry v. Ramsey, 277 U.S. 88, 48 S. Ct. 443, 72 L. Ed. 796 . Assuming for the sake of argument that Congress could make unexplained presence a criminal act, and ignoring also the refusal of this Court in other cases to uphold a statutory presumption on such a theory, see Heiner v. Donnan, 285 U.S. 312, 52 S. Ct. 358, 76 L. Ed. 772 , there is no indication here that Congress intended to adopt such a misleading method of draftsmanship, nor in my judgment could the statutory provisions if so construed escape condemnation for vagueness, under the principles applied in Lanzetta v. New Jersey, 306 U.S. 451, 59 S. Ct. 618, 83 L. Ed. 888 , and many other cases.

380 U.S. at 84, n. 12, 85 S. Ct. at 766 .

And the majority opinion in Romano agreed with him:

> It may be, of course, that Congress has the power to make presence at an illegal still a punishable crime, but we find no clear indication that it intended to so exercise this power. The crime remains possession, not presence, and with all due deference to the judgment of Congress, the former may not constitutionally be inferred from the latter.

382 U.S. at 144, 86 S. Ct. at 284 .

The rule does not spell out the procedural aspects of its application. Questions as to when the evidence warrants submission of a presumption and what instructions are proper under varying states of fact are believed to present no particular difficulties.

[2] Excerpt from "Advisory Committee Notes to the Federal Rules of Evidence That May Require Clarification," by Daniel Capra, 182 F.R.D. 268, 273 (1999)

Presumptions -- Rule 301

Federal Rule 301 ... is a culmination of a battle between two conflicting views of the effect a presumption should have. The views are known by the law professors who propounded them. Under the "Morgan" view, a presumption shifts the risk of nonpersuasion to the party against whom the presumption operates. Thus, if there is a presumption that a mailed letter is received, the party claiming non-receipt has the burden shifted to it to prove, by a preponderance of the evidence, that the letter was never received. In contrast, under the "Thayer" view, the opponent must merely offer evidence sufficient to support a finding contrary to the presumed fact in order to take the presumption out of the case. (The Thayer view has been termed the "bursting bubble" view of presumptions, because the presumption "bursts" when contrary evidence as to the presumed fact is introduced.) The practical difference between these views is in the quality and quantity of evidence required to overcome the presumption.

The Advisory Committee Note to Rule 301 is essentially a brief for the Morgan view of presumptions. It states that presumptions under the rule are given "the effect of placing upon the opposing party the burden of establishing the nonexistence of the presumed fact, once the party invoking the presumption establishes the basic fact giving rise to it." The Advisory Committee reasoned that presumptions are based on a combination of probability and fairness. If that combination of factors is strong enough to warrant a presumption, it should also be strong enough to shift the risk of nonpersuasion to the party against whom the presumption operates. The Advisory Committee Note has this to say about the Thayer view:

> The so-called "bursting bubble" theory, under which a presumption vanishes upon the introduction of evidence which would support a finding of the nonexistence of the presumed fact, even though not believed, is rejected as according presumptions too "slight and evanescent" an effect.

The problem with the Advisory Committee Noted is that Congress rejected the Advisory Committee's view of the matter. Rule 301 adopts the "bursting bubble" view of presumptions -- the party against whom the presumption operates need only present evidence sufficient to support a finding contrary to the presumed fact. When that occurs, the presumption vanishes from the case. Thus, a lawyer operating with a presumption in her favor should not rely on the Advisory Committee Note; if she did, she would have a misplaced confidence in the ability of the presumption to withstand contrary evidence.

[3] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

Being persuaded that the term "cases" might be construed to exclude certain bankruptcy and other civil proceedings, the Subcommittee determined to use the phrase "actions and proceedings" to include all types of civil litigation, and to use the term "cases" to include all criminal litigation. Such changes in terminology appear consistently throughout the Rules.

The word "civil" was added to effectuate the Subcommittee's decision not to deal with the question of presumptions in criminal cases. See Rule 303. [Proposed Rule 303, governing presumptions in criminal cases, was never adopted. Ed.]

With respect to the weight to be given a presumption in a civil case, the Subcommittee agreed with the conclusion reflected in the Court's version that the so-called "bursting bubble" theory of presumptions, whereby a presumption vanishes upon the appearance of any contradicting evidence by the other party, gives to presumptions too slight an effect. On the other hand, the Subcommittee believed that the rule proposed by the Court, whereby a presumption permanently alters the burden of persuasion, no matter how much contradicting evidence is introduced" a view adopted by only a few courts -- lent too great a force to presumptions. The Subcommittee accordingly adopted an intermediate position under which a presumption does not vanish upon the introduction of contradicting evidence, and does not change the burden of persuasion; instead it is merely deemed sufficient evidence of the fact presumed to be considered by the jury or other finder of fact.

[4] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

Rule 301 as submitted by the Supreme Court provided that in all cases a presumption imposes on the party against whom it is directed the burden of proving that the nonexistence of the presumed fact is more probable than its existence. The Committee limited the scope of Rule 301 to "civil actions and proceedings" to effectuate its decision not to deal with the question of presumptions in criminal cases. [Rejected Rule 303 is set forth in Part Three of this Manual. Ed.] With respect to the weight to be given a presumption in a civil case, the Committee agreed with the judgment implicit in the Court's version that the so-called "bursting bubble" theory of presumptions, whereby a presumption vanishes upon the appearance of any contradicting evidence by the other party, gives to presumptions too slight an effect. On the other hand, the Committee believed that the Rule proposed by the Court, whereby a presumption permanently alters the burden of persuasion, no matter how much contradicting evidence is introduced -- a view shared by only a few courts -- lends too great a force to presumptions. Accordingly, the Committee amended the Rule to adopt an intermediate position under which a presumption does not vanish upon the introduction of contradicting evidence, and does not change the burden of persuasion; instead it is merely deemed sufficient evidence of the fact presumed to be considered by the jury or other finder of fact.

[5] Report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary

This rule governs presumptions in civil cases generally. Rule 302 provides for presumptions in cases controlled by State law.

As submitted by the Supreme Court, presumptions governed by this rule were given the effect of placing upon the opposing party the burden of establishing the nonexistence of the presumed fact, once the party invoking the presumption established the basic facts giving rise to it.

Instead of imposing a burden of persuasion on the party against whom the presumption is directed, the House adopted a provision which shifted the burden of going forward with the evidence. They further provided that "even though met with contradicting evidence, a presumption is sufficient evidence of the fact presumed, to be considered by the trier of fact." The effect of the amendment is that presumptions are to be treated as evidence.

The committee feels the House amendment is ill-advised. As the joint committees (the Standing Committee on Practice and Procedure of the Judicial Conference and the Advisory Committee on the Rules of Evidence) stated: "Presumptions are not evidence, but ways of dealing with evidence." This treatment requires juries to perform the task of considering "as evidence" facts upon which they have no direct evidence and which may confuse them in performance of their duties. California had a rule much like that contained in the House amendment. It was sharply criticized by Justice Traynor in Speck v. Sarver and was repealed after 93 troublesome years.

Professor McCormick gives a concise and compelling critique of the presumption as evidence rule:

> Another solution, formerly more popular than now, is to instruct the jury that the presumption is "evidence," to be weighed and considered with the testimony in the case. This avoids the danger that the jury may infer that the presumption is conclusive, but it probably means little to the jury, and certainly runs counter to accepted theories of the nature of evidence.

For these reasons the committee has deleted that provision of the House-passed rule that treats presumptions as evidence. The effect of the rule as adopted by the committee is to make clear that while evidence of facts giving rise to a presumption shifts the burden of coming forward with evidence to rebut or meet the presumption, it does not shift the burden of persuasion on the existence of the presumed facts. The burden of persuasion remains on the party to whom it is allocated under the rules governing the allocation in the first instance.

The court may instruct the jury that they may infer the existence of the presumed fact from proof of the basic facts giving rise to the presumption. However, it would be inappropriate under this rule to instruct the jury that the inference they are to draw is conclusive.

[Footnotes deleted.]

[6] Report of the House and Senate Conferees

The House bill provides that a presumption in civil actions and proceedings shifts to the party against whom it is directed the burden of going forward with evidence to meet or rebut it. Even though evidence contradicting the presumption is offered, a presumption is considered sufficient evidence of the presumed fact to be considered by the jury. The Senate amendment provides that a presumption shifts to the party against whom it is directed the burden of going forward with evidence to meet or rebut the presumption but it does not shift to that party the burden of persuasion on the existence of the presumed fact.

Under the Senate amendment, a presumption is sufficient to get a party past an adverse party's motion to dismiss made at the end of his case-in-chief. If the adverse party offers no evidence contradicting the presumed fact, the court will instruct the jury that if it finds the basic facts, it may [probably meant "must." Ed.] presume the existence of the presumed fact. If the adverse party does offer evidence contradicting the presumed fact, the court cannot instruct the jury that it may presume the existence of the presumed fact from proof of the basic facts. The court may, however, instruct the jury that it may infer the existence of the presumed fact from proof of the basic facts.

The Conference adopts the Senate amendment.

[Go To Main]

[1] Admiralty Cases [Go To Main]

Zerega Ave. Realty Corp. v. Hornbeck Offshore Transp., LLC, 571 F.3d 206 (2d Cir. 2009) : The Court reversed a judgment for landowners whose waterfront bulkhead had collapsed after a barge hit it, in part because the Judge improperly applied the " Oregon rule" presumption regarding contact between moving vessels and anchored or stationary objects. The presumption applies only to the issue of negligence (the moving vessel is presumed to be negligent), but the Judge had also applied it to the issue of causation, finding that defendants failed to disprove that the contact caused collapse of the bulkhead.

[12] Mailing and Receipt [Go To Main]

[.a] Electronic Communications

Laouini v. CLM Freight Lines, Inc., 586 F.3d 473 (7th Cir. 2009) : A Title IV action was dismissed on the ground that the charge had not been timely filed, where the EEOC had processed a hard copy of the charge more than 300 days after the alleged violation, although the plaintiff's counsel claimed that the charge had been sent by fax on the last day of the statutory period. Vacating and remanding, the Court held that the confirmation on the sender's fax machine created a factual dispute sufficient to preclude summary judgment where, as here, it was the defendant's burden to prove absence of receipt.

Am. Boat Co., Inc. v. Unknown Sunken Barge, 567 F.3d 348 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court held that the appellant failed to rebut the presumption of delivery and receipt of an electronic notice of a ruling by the District Court, so it affirmed denial of a motion to reopen the time to appeal a summary judgment.

[a] Mailing and Receipt -- Inadequate Foundation for Presumption

Duron v. Albertson's LLC, 560 F.3d 288 (5th Cir. 2009) : The Court reversed summary judgment that had been granted for the employer in an employment discrimination action on the ground that the plaintiff had not filed within 90 days of the right-to-sue letter. The plaintiff's affidavit that she did not receive a letter from the EEOC until a specified date and evidence that she and her attorney made several attempts to contact the EEOC to learn the status of her case, together with the absence of any evidence that the EEOC notice was actually mailed to the plaintiff on the date stated in the letter, created a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the plaintiff's action was timely filed.

[b] Mailing and Receipt -- Presumption Applied

In re Oca, Inc., 551 F.3d 359 (5th Cir. 2008) : The Court vacated the denial of a motion in a bankruptcy proceeding to set aside a default judgment entered against a debtor of the bankrupt, but it upheld the decision below that the debtor had failed to present clear and convincing evidence that he had not received process proved to have been properly addressed, stamped, and deposited into the mails.

Rios v. Nicholson, 490 F.3d 928 (Fed. Cir. 2007) : The Court reversed a decision that dismissed as untimely a veteran's appeal from a denial of his claim challenging the reduction of his disability benefits. The veteran produced a copy of a "Page of Registry of Sent Correspondence" maintained by the Puerto Rico Public Advocate for Veterans Affairs and two affidavits from an employee of that organization responsible for handling mail. The form and the affidavits indicated that the notice of appeal was mailed to the Veterans Court and the VA Office of General Counsel well before the deadline. The governing statute provided that a notice of appeal that is mailed to the Veterans Court is deemed received on the date of the United States Postal Service postmark. Relying upon the common law mailbox rule, which it concluded applied absent clear statutory abrogation, the Court reasoned that the presumption of receipt of a properly addressed, stamped, and mailed letter is rebuttable, suggested that evidence of the habit and custom of a court's officers and employees in handling the mail has no appreciable value in rebutting the presumption, and ultimately did "not purport to determine what evidence would be sufficient to overcome a presumption of receipt."

[c] Mailing and Receipt -- Sufficiency of Rebuttal

Kozak v. Gonzales, 502 F.3d 34 (1st Cir. 2007) : The alien petitioner was ordered deported in absentia because he did not appear for a hearing on the date specified in a notice sent to him by regular mail. Granting his petition to reopen the order, the Court held that the "strong presumption" of receipt applied to service by certified mail did not apply to service by regular mail. Here, the petitioner's sworn affidavit of non-receipt, the fact that the notice had been properly addressed, and the absence of any evidence that some household breakdown caused loss of the notice were sufficient to raise a factual issue regarding the receipt for the Board of Immigration Appeals to resolve.

Silva-Carvalho v. Mukasey, 517 F.3d 156 (2d Cir. 2008) : The Court vacated and remanded a decision of the Board of Immigration Appeals denying a petitioner's motion to reopen and rescind an in absentia order of removal. It held that the BIA improperly employed a strong presumption that the petitioner had received notice to appear at the removal proceeding, and reasoned that, because the petitioner's notice was sent by ordinary mail, "a statement or affidavit by the petitioner stating that he or she had not received notice should ordinarily suffice to overcome the presumption of receipt." The Court added that "[t]his approach appears to us to be sound in light of the reduced reliability of regular mail." The Court concluded that "the presumption of receipt in regular mail cases does no more than shift a tie-breaking burden of proof to the alien claiming non-receipt."

United States v. Ekong, 518 F.3d 285 (5th Cir. 2007) : The Court upheld a writ of garnishment upon the defendant's interest in pension benefits, which was granted after the defendant was convicted of health care fraud. In response to the defendant's claim that the government did not make a demand for payment more than 30 days before seeking the writ, as required by statute, the government introduced evidence that a demand for payment was mailed to the defendant. In a brief opinion on its summary calendar, the Court found that proof that a properly addressed letter was mailed creates a presumption that it was received in the usual time by the person to whom it was sent. The Court then added that the addressee's "bare assertion of nonreceipt" is insufficient to rebut the presumption, citing Custer v. Murphy Oil USA Inc., 503 F.3d 415 (5th Cir. 2007) . We suggest that sworn testimony that a mailing was not received ought to be sufficient to rebut the presumption and require the trier of fact to decide whether the mailing reached the addressee. The Court states that the defendant's "affidavit of non-receipt was not supported by circumstantial evidence." We believe that in most cases there will be no circumstantial evidence regarding non-receipt. If someone does receive a mailing, they may act on it in a way that indicates they did receive it. If a person never receives a mailing, there often will be no possibility of circumstantial evidence to show the absence of receipt.

Crosby v. Rohm & Haas Co., 480 F.3d 423 (6th Cir. 2007) : Affirming summary judgment for the employer in an ERISA action brought by the beneficiary of a deceased employee's life insurance policy, the Court held that the presumption from evidence of mailing plan documents that the employee received them was not rebutted by evidence that the plaintiff was not able to find them in the employee's files a year later.

Sembiring v. Gonzales, 499 F.3d 981 (9th Cir. 2007) : When the alien petitioner appeared for a hearing on her application for asylum, she was told that the hearing had been rescheduled for an earlier date and an order for her removal had been issued in absentia. Granting her petition to reopen the order, the Court ruled that notices sent by regular mail are entitled to a lesser presumption of effective service than notices sent by certified mail, and that the petitioner had presented sufficient evidence to overcome the presumption. Payan v. Aramark Mgmt. Servs. Ltd., 495 F.3d 1119 (9th Cir. 2007) , involved application of the rule in a Title VII action that the limitations period is measured from the date on which a right-to-sue letter arrives at the claimant's address of record. The plaintiff in this action did not dispute having received the letter, but claimed not to know the date on which it arrived. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant granted because the suit was untimely, the Court applied a presumption that the letter was mailed on the date of its issuance and a presumption (based on the additional time given by Fed. R. Civ. P. 6(e) [now, 6(d)] for responding to service of papers made by mail) that it was received three days after it was mailed. The plaintiff's "unsupported conjectures" were insufficient to rebut the presumptions.

Laborers' Int'l Union, Local 578 v. NLRB, 594 F.3d 737 (10th Cir. 2010) : The Court granted the NLRB's petition to enforce its decision holding that a union engaged in unfair labor practices when it persuaded an employer to fire an employee for failing to pay his union dues. The NLRB found that the union failed to provide the employee with a legally sufficient notice about his delinquent dues or a reasonable opportunity to cure the delinquency. Although the union claimed that it sent a letter to the employee and properly addressed it, applied postage, and mailed it, the employee testified he did not receive it. The Court pointed out that, assuming that the NLRB was required to apply the "mailbox rule, " the rule "is not the sort of immutable legal command the union suggests. Rather, it is simply an evidentiary presumption ... that may be rebutted by other evidence suggesting that the addressee did not receive the letter."

[d] Mailing and Receipt -- Tax Cases

Philadelphia Marine Trade Ass'n v. Commissioner, 523 F.3d 140 (3d Cir. 2008) : In an action for refund of tax penalties, summary judgment was granted against the plaintiffs on the ground that the refund request was untimely because they did not produce direct evidence of timely receipt by the IRS, although there was testimony that refund requests had been mailed. Reversing, the Court held there was sufficient evidence to invoke the common-law mailbox rule. It rejected the view taken by the Second and Sixth Circuits that 26 U.S.C. § 7502 preempted the mailbox rule; in the Court's view, that statute, which makes the postmark date the date of delivery, applies only to cases where delivery occurs after the due date. Here, the testimony indicated that the request had been mailed in plenty of time to be delivered timely.

302.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Deference to State Law

Rule 302 provides that whenever a Federal Court in a civil case looks to state law to find the rule of decision with respect to a claim or a defense, state law will also govern with respect to the effect of a presumption. In other words, just as Federal Courts normally follow state rules regarding burdens of proof and standards of proof, they will also follow state law regarding the treatment of a presumption. n1 This is neither surprising nor unusual, given that a presumption serves an important function in allocating responsibility between parties to bring forth evidence. Moreover, to the extent that a presumption places the burden of persuasion on the party against whom the presumption operates, it seems that it is part and parcel of the state substantive law, proper deference to which requires the Federal Court to follow the state law. Erie R.R. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64 (1938) , is, of course, the most relevant case. Although Erie involved on its facts only the diversity jurisdiction of the Federal Courts, its general thesis concerning the manner in which Federal Courts must observe state substantive law is clearly important in explaining why Federal Courts follow state law regarding presumptions.

State law may provide the rule of decision even in a nondiversity case, and where that is so, Rule 302 provides that state law controls the effect of a presumption concerning a fact that is an element of the claim or defense. n2

Where state law applies under Rule 302, the state law governs not only the existence of the presumption, but also the effect of the presumption. Thus, if the state gives burden-shifting effect to the presumption, the Federal Court must do so as well -- even though Rule 301 opts for a "bursting bubble" effect for presumptions under federal law. n3

Nothing in this Comment or elsewhere in this Manual is intended to suggest that Congress is without constitutional power to abolish Rule 302 and to bring all presumptions under the umbrella of Rule 301. Congress (not the Supreme Court) may possess such power. See Ely, The Irrepressible Myth of Erie, 87 Harv. L. Rev. 693 (1974); Hanna v. Plumer, 380 U.S. 460 (1965) . In fact, our proposed treatment of federal-state conflict when federal and state presumptions arise in a single case, which we offer in § 302.02[3], suggests some such power and also suggests that Rule 301 should be interpreted in some cases as an exercise of the power. Putting the question of power aside, Rule 302 can be understood as an expression of Congress' concern about comity and respect for state law -- much like Rules 501 and 601 in that regard. See Mishkin, Some Further Last Words on Erie -- The Thread, 87 Harv. L. Rev. 1682 (1974).

[2] Element of a Claim or Defense

Because Rule 302 has not been subjected to much judicial analysis, it remains difficult to determine when "a fact ... is an element of a claim or defense ... to which state law supplies the rule of decision."

Apparently, Congress was of the view that where Federal Courts traditionally deferred to state presumptions, Rule 302 would require continued deference.

Some have suggested that Rule 302 should be read restrictively, but it is apparent that Congress intended to defer to state law whenever state law provides the rule of decision and a particular presumption is important to furthering state policies.

Our suggestion is that Federal Judges should defer to state rules on presumptions whenever they are in doubt in a case otherwise governed by state law. n4 Federal Courts should assume that presumptions are expressions of a state's policy toward its litigants. While a certain presumption may appear to be based only on logic and experience, the fact is that most presumptions are based on a combination of logic, probability, policy, and considerations of access to proof. At least some, and probably most of these considerations can be considered substantive. n5 For example, the presumption that a death was the result of accident rather than suicide may be based somewhat on probability; but it also reflects the state's substantive concern that where access to proof is difficult, the burden should be placed on the insurer. Similarly, a presumption that a buyer read an adequate warning may be based somewhat on probability, but it is also based on the substantive premise that adequate warnings should be read and should provide protection to manufacturers. n6

Whenever a Federal Judge is compelled to follow state law generally, it makes good sense for the Judge to use state law on presumptions as well. It is difficult to see a substantial federal interest in applying federal law in those circumstances. Perhaps the most that can be said is that if the presumption is clearly designed only to operate only for purposes of judicial convenience, the presumption is purely procedural, and the Court may apply the federal law if there is a conflict.

The distinction proposed by the Advisory Committee -- between "tactical" presumptions to be governed by federal law and presumptions as to an element of a claim or defense to be governed by state law -- is problematic because it is so vague. The distinction also ignores the fact that certain presumptions may embody substantive state policy even if they are "tactical." The distinction proposed by the Advisory Committee is certainly not mandated by the words of the Rule itself. So again, we conclude that state law presumptions are "presumptively" applicable whenever state law provides the rule of decision.

We note, however, that there is a distinction between a presumption, as that term is used in Rule 302, and a permissible inference from a given set of facts. If a rule of law simply permits an inference, the federal law will govern in a Federal Court. n7

[3] Federal and State Claims Joined

Where state and federal claims are joined together in a given case, and where the federal law, statutory or otherwise, would treat a presumption one way while state law would treat it differently, the determination of governing law may be difficult. Although Rule 302 does not address this problem, there are three possible solutions. First, a Court could read Rule 302 as applying only in cases in which the presumption that relates to a fact that is an element of a claim or defense governed by state law has no bearing on any federal question involved in the case. Such a reading would mean that federal law would predominate whenever there are conflicting presumptions. Or, this Rule could be read literally, in which case the rule of decision would be determined in accordance with state law, meaning that state law would predominate over Federal law whenever there are conflicting presumptions. There is also a third possibility, which is to treat the presumption differently in dealing with the federal and state claims.

The third view is probably the correct view with respect to a presumption that is not met by conflicting evidence. In other words, if the sole issue is whether a presumption standing alone is sufficient for the party utilizing it to take his case to the jury, or perhaps to prevent the other party's case from going to the jury, there is no reason why the presumption cannot be treated differently when it is applied to the federal and to the state claims. The Trial Judge should have little difficulty applying the presumption rules in making the respective peremptory rulings.

Once conflicting evidence is introduced, however, the situation is complicated. If the state law places the burden of proof on the party against whom a presumption operates, it may appear that the Judge can give a simple instruction to the jury with respect to burden of proof on the state claim and then proceed to follow Rule 301 with respect to the federal claim and tell the jury about the permissible inference it is entitled to draw. But once the jury is told about both the burden of proof and the permissible inference, it is possible that there may be a double burden on the party against whom the presumption operates.

An appropriate solution would be to follow the Federal Rule and to apply it to both claims in most cases. Since Rule 302 apparently reflects notions of comity and the proper relationship of Federal Courts and State Courts in a federal system, there is no reason to give it a wooden and inflexible reading. Comity works both ways, and one jurisdiction's interests may have to accommodate the other's at times. Given that Congress has firmly expressed its view as to the proper treatment of presumptions in Rule 301, given that Congress knew that a choice might have to be made when federal and state claims are brought together, and given the Supremacy Clause, it would seem that state law should give way to federal law in the infrequent situation where there is a federal cause of action in the case and the use of conflicting presumptions would be confusing to the jury or unfair to a litigant.

But even this limited assumption need not necessarily be unyielding. It might give way to state interests in cases in which it is apparent that the state presumption is critical to proper application of state law, whereas the federal presumption upon close scrutiny seems relatively unimportant in the federal scheme. In such cases, the state law could govern both claims. Where a presumption expresses both strong state and federal policies, a severance might well be the appropriate course.

For example, suppose both Federal and State Courts have a presumption that a state of affairs, once proved to exist, continues as long as is usual with things of that nature. Assume that a plaintiff sues to recover damages for various violations of federal securities laws from directors and officers of a corporation and that state common-law claims are joined by pendent jurisdiction to the federal claims. Once an illegality is demonstrated to have occurred at one point in time, an issue may arise as to whether it continued for some period. The presumption may be useful to assist a plaintiff in proving a continuing state of affairs. If federal and state law are in conflict as to the effect of the presumption, which governs? Our suggestion is that ordinarily the Federal Rule would govern both claims. This is somewhat analogous to the theory in common-law jurisdictions that when conflicting presumptions appear, often one must predominate. n8 This is also similar to the result adopted by the Courts under Rule 501, in pendent jurisdiction cases where the state and federal rules on privilege are in conflict. Courts have held that the federal law of privilege applies to both the federal and the pendent state claims. n9 Applying the general rule that federal law controls the effect of the presumption is justified in the interest of consistency, and in recognition of the importance of the federal cause of action. On the other hand, in cases where state policy is more critical, the Court should have discretion to apply state law to both claims.

The states that have followed the federal lead and adopted codes of evidence have not been quick to adopt identical versions of Rule 301. n10 This would seem to suggest that over time the possibility that federal presumption rules will differ from state presumption rules is a real one. It is encouraging, however, to note that to date there are almost no reported cases in which the conflict between federal and state rules appears to have presented a problem for Federal Judges.

[1] Conflicting State Presumptions

Melville v. American Home Assur. Co., 443 F. Supp. 1064 (E.D. Pa. 1977) , rev'd on other grounds, 584 F.2d 1306 (3d Cir. 1978) : In a diversity action to recover the proceeds of an insurance policy, the District Court cited Rule 302 as persuasive authority for its conclusion that presumptions often are more "substantive" than "procedural." The Court carefully observed that although Rule 302 directs the application of state law, it does not set forth a formula for deciding which state's law should apply in a case when several states' laws arguably govern.

[2] Inference

Herbert v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 911 F.2d 1044 (5th Cir. 1990) : Appealing a diversity slip-and-fall case for allegedly inadequate damages, the plaintiff argued that the District Court erred in refusing to draw an adverse inference from the defendant's failure to call a witness purportedly under its control. In the course of affirming, the Court noted that Rule 302 did not apply to the state uncalled-witness rule, which merely permits an inference and does not create a true presumption.

[3] Presumptive Authenticity

In re Bobby Boggs, Inc., 819 F.2d 574 (5th Cir. 1987) : In a bankruptcy dispute over entitlement to a subcontractor's funds, the Court held that there was ample evidence to authenticate certain bonds issued by a surety that was defunct at the time of trial. It observed in a footnote that state law made the presence of the bonds in a defunct insurer's files presumptively authentic. Without deciding whether the state presumption would, standing alone, have been sufficient to satisfy Rule 901, the Court reasoned that the failure of the opposing party to offer any evidence to suggest that the bonds were not authentic supported their admissibility.

Advisory Committee's Note

A series of Supreme Court decisions in diversity cases leaves no doubt of the relevance of Erie Railroad Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64, 58 S. Ct. 817, 82 L. Ed. 1188 (1938) , to questions of burden of proof. These decisions are Cities Service Oil Co. v. Dunlap, 308 U.S. 208, 60 S. Ct. 201, 84 L. Ed. 196 (1939) , Palmer v. Hoffman, 318 U.S. 109, 63 S. Ct. 477, 87 L. Ed. 645 (1943) , and Dick v. New York Life Ins. Co., 359 U.S. 437, 79 S. Ct. 921, 3 L. Ed. 2d 935 (1959) . They involved burden of proof, respectively, as to status as bona fide purchaser, contributory negligence, and nonaccidental death (suicide) of an insured. In each instance the state rule was held to be applicable. It does not follow, however, that all presumptions in diversity cases are governed by state law. In each case cited, the burden of proof question had to do with a substantive element of the claim or defense. Application of the state law is called for only when the presumption operates upon such an element. Accordingly the rule does not apply state law when the presumption operates upon a lesser aspect of the case, i.e., "tactical" presumptions.

The situations in which the state law is applied have been tagged for convenience in the preceding discussion as "diversity cases." The designation is not a completely accurate one since Erie applies to any claim or issue having its source in state law, regardless of the basis of federal jurisdiction, and does not apply to a federal claim or issue, even though jurisdiction is based on diversity. Vestal, Erie R.R. v. Tompkins: A Projection, 48 Iowa L. Rev. 248, 257 (1963); Hart and Wechsler, The Federal Courts and the Federal System, 697 (1953); 1A Moore, Federal Practice § 0.305[3] (2d ed. 1965); Wright, Federal Courts, 217-18 (1963). Hence the rule employs, as appropriately descriptive, the phrase "as to which state law supplies the rule of decision." See A.L.I. Study of the Division of Jurisdiction Between State and Federal Courts, § 2344(c), p. 40, P.F.D. No. 1 (1965).

Harris, 523 F.3d 477 (5th Cir. 2008) : Affirming a judgment for a customer who sued a fast food restaurant operator to recover for injuries sustained on its premises as a result of an assault by an off-duty employee, the Court found no error in permitting the plaintiff to testify as to his medical bills and to introduce the bills in evidence. Because a Mississippi statute specifically provided that such evidence is admissible and establishes a presumption shifting the burden of production to the defendant, the Court reasoned that Rule 302 required the Judge in this diversity case to follow state law on the effect of the presumption.

Rule 401. Definition of "Relevant Evidence"

"Relevant evidence" means evidence having any tendency to make the existence of any fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence.

CHAPTER 401 RULE 401

1-401 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 401.02

401.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Basic Definition

This Rule defines the term "relevant evidence." The definition provides that evidence is relevant if it has any tendency to make the existence of a material fact more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence. The question for the Trial Judge is whether a reasonable person would find the probability of a consequential fact to be altered, one way or the other, by the proffered evidence. n1

Rule 401 is purely definitional, and has no operational effect on its own. Therefore, Rule 401 is usually cited together with Rule 402 (providing that relevant evidence is generally admissible and that irrelevant evidence is inadmissible) or, more frequently, with Rule 403 (providing that evidence even though relevant may be excluded on grounds of prejudice, confusion or delay).

The important thing for the Judge and for counsel to remember is that the evidence does not by itself have to prove the ultimate proposition for which it is offered; nor does it have to make that ultimate proposition more probable than not. To be relevant it is enough that the evidence has a tendency to make a consequential fact even the least bit more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence. The question of relevance is thus different from whether evidence is sufficient to prove a point. n2

An example may help to clarify the difference between relevance and sufficiency. Assume that a defendant is charged with an armed robbery committed by someone carrying a handgun. The prosecution wants to offer into evidence testimony that the defendant owned a handgun prior to the time the robbery was committed. Defendant claims the evidence is irrelevant. Certainly this evidence, standing alone, does not make it more probable than not that the defendant committed the crime. Furthermore, it is a fortiori not sufficient to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant committed the crime. The evidence is clearly insufficient on its own to prove the defendant's guilt. But it is a piece of evidence, the existence of which makes it somewhat more likely that the defendant committed the crime than if there were no such evidence. Therefore it is relevant. Thus, relevancy is a threshold admissibility standard to be applied by the Trial Judge. It is up to the trier of fact to weigh the evidence and to determine whether the entirety of the evidence is sufficient to prove a point.

It should be emphasized that "any tendency" is enough. The fact that the evidence is of weak probative value does not make it irrelevant. n3 When the Judge strikes a balance between the negative and positive features of evidence, as must be done under Rule 403, the minimal value of the evidence then becomes important.

[2] Materiality

Notice that the Rule does not explicitly treat "materiality" as a separate concept. Both traditional requirements of relevance analysis -- that evidence must relate to issues that are properly in dispute and that it must shed some light on those issues -- are combined into one rule. Whether an issue is properly in dispute is, of course, determined by the applicable substantive law. n4

[3] Direct and Circumstantial Evidence

The difficult relevance issues involve circumstantial, as opposed to direct, evidence. The only question to be asked in regard to direct evidence is whether it relates to an issue that is properly in dispute -- i.e., one that is of consequence to the action under Rule 401 (what was called a material issue at common law). If an eyewitness testifies, for instance, that she saw the defendant in our previous robbery example commit the armed robbery, the evidence is clearly relevant, since it relates directly to a proposition disputed in the case. No inferences are required between the proof itself and the ultimate fact to be established. If, however, the testimony proves the robber wore a blue coat and the defendant owns a blue coat, this is circumstantial evidence and the Judge must decide whether, if believed, it makes a disputed fact more or less probable. It is here that hard questions can arise.

There is no litmus test or simple formula for applying the general definition of relevance. Logic and experience together must supply the Judge with skills in determining whether a given piece of evidence tends to prove a disputed proposition. n5 Sometimes expert witnesses may be necessary to assist the Court in making a relevance determination. And the Trial Judge should consider not only whether the admission of evidence is likely to advance the cause, but also whether its absence might produce negative inferences that would unfairly hurt a party -- i.e., the absence of evidence might be probative to a jury. n6

All this is not to say that circumstantial evidence is less important or less significant than direct evidence. To the contrary, in some cases, circumstantial evidence (e.g., a large amount of trace money from a bank robbery) may indeed have more weight than direct evidence (e.g., dubious or cursory eyewitness testimony). n7

[4] Standard of Review

A good argument can be made that the standard of review for pure relevance determinations should be de novo, and some Courts have so held. n8 As the First Circuit stated, the question of relevance is different from other evidentiary rulings:

> Yes, the standard of review on appeal of evidentiary rulings is often said to be for "abuse of discretion" ... . But whether a fact tends to make another fact more or less likely depends heavily on the logic of the connection, and there is no "discretion" to ignore a logical relationship.

United States v. Amaya-Manzanares, 377 F.3d 39 (1st Cir. 2004) .

Thus unlike Rule 403, which requires a balancing process that is necessarily discretionary and trial-sensitive, the question of whether evidence is relevant is one based in experience and logic. For example, the Appellate Court need not be constrained by a "cold record" in deciding whether a defendant's poor financial condition is probative of a motive to commit a crime, or whether statistical evidence is probative of employment discrimination. The Appellate Court and the Trial Judge are ordinarily in equally good positions to determine whether such an inference can be drawn in logic and experience; trial context is not important. Many Appellate Courts do not see it that way, however. There are a number of cases stating broadly that the Trial Judge "possesses broad discretion in determining the relevance of proffered evidence." n9

Of course, it must be remembered that very few rulings are "pure" relevance rulings. Ordinarily, the objection to proffered evidence is not that it is totally irrelevant, but rather that the probative value of the evidence is so minimal that it is substantially outweighed by the negative factors of prejudice, confusion, and delay. This is a Rule 403 question, which for good reason is governed by a deferential, abuse-of-discretion standard of review. n10

[5] Disputed Issues

The first sentence of the final paragraph of the Advisory Committee's Note to Rule 401 states that "[t]he fact to which the evidence is directed need not be in dispute" and cites the California Evidence Code in a rather cryptic attempt to support its view. In our view, the wording "fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action" requires that all proof be directed to the issues in dispute. Contrary to the suggestion of the Committee, illustrative evidence -- such as evidence provided for background or context -- would not be barred under such a reading, as long as the illustrative evidence was reasonably related to a disputed issue. n11 We believe the Advisory Committee's Note places undue reliance on Rule 403. Although we would probably reach the same result as the Committee in most cases, we think that it is important to emphasize that the first step in a relevance analysis is to decide whether the trier of fact conceivably could be helped by evidence. If the answer is "no," the evidence should be excluded without reference to a balancing test that requires a specific demonstration of an extant evil before evidence is excluded. n12

[6] Applicability of State Law

State law in diversity cases determines the issues that are in dispute (what had been called the question of "materiality"), and in that way controls whether proffered evidence is relevant. For example, assume that the plaintiff is a mother whose child was run down and killed by a car. Assume further that the plaintiff proffers compelling evidence of emotional distress that she suffered as a result of losing her child. In many states, this evidence is not relevant unless the mother could prove that she was in the "zone of danger" at the time that her child was killed. Where such a state law provides the rule of decision in Federal Court, the evidence of emotional distress is irrelevant under Rule 401 if the mother was outside the zone of danger. This is because the mother's emotional distress is not "in dispute" under the state's substantive law unless she was in the zone of danger, and it is the state substantive law that determines the issues in dispute in such cases. n13

[7] Offers of Proof

During the course of a trial, it is often unnecessary to require parties to explain how offered evidence relates to the issues in dispute, because the relationship is obvious. There are times, however, when the Trial Judge may be unclear as to the relationship of the evidence to the issues and may require counsel to explain the purpose of an offer. In order for the Trial Judge to give proper limiting instructions under Rule 105 and to strike a proper balance between probative value and prejudicial effect under Rule 403, the Judge must be sure that there is no doubt as to why evidence is being offered. When a doubt arises, the party offering the evidence should be prepared to explain the reason for the offer. n14

[8] Relevance and Credibility

In determining whether evidence is relevant, the Trial Judge must keep in mind that the credibility of the evidence is a separate issue. For example, in Ballou v. Henri Studios, Inc., 656 F.2d 1147 (5th Cir. 1981) , a wrongful death action arising from a two-car accident, the plaintiffs filed a motion in limine to exclude any evidence that the decedent was intoxicated while driving at the time of the accident. At the hearing the defendants proffered a blood test indicating that the decedent had a blood alcohol content of 0.24% at the time of his death. The plaintiffs sought to refute the test evidence by calling a Mrs. Eisenhower, who saw the decedent just before the accident. Mrs. Eisenhower stated that she had stood right next to the decedent, and that he had no alcohol on his breath. The Trial Judge excluded the blood tests

"because of the lack of credibility of the tests of alcoholism at the time of the wreck, especially in view of the testimony of Mrs. Eisenhower." The Court of Appeals held that the Trial Court abused its discretion in excluding the blood tests. The Court concluded that exclusion of evidence on relevance grounds is not permitted merely because "the judge does not find it credible." It reasoned as follows:

> Although we find the court's skepticism about the test results understandable in light of Mrs. Eisenhower's testimony, we cannot sanction the type of credibility choice made by the district court here... . Rather than discounting the probative value of the test results on the basis of its perception of the degree to which the evidence was worthy of belief, the district court should have determined the probative value of the test results if true ... leaving to the jury the difficult choice of whether to credit the evidence. [emphasis in original] n15

It should be noted, however, that the Trial Judge in Ballou might have properly excluded the blood tests on other grounds. It is true that the Trial Judge was in error by confusing relevance with credibility. However, evidence is not always admissible merely because it is relevant if believed by the jury. Other rules of evidence may operate to exclude otherwise probative evidence on the ground that it is unreliable. Thus, scientific evidence, such as a blood test, can be excluded under Rule 702 or Rule 403 if the Trial Judge has legitimate and substantial doubts as to its reliability.

[9] Conditional Relevancy

By its terms, Rule 401 does not cover the concept of "conditional" relevancy. Evidence is conditionally relevant when its probative value depends upon the existence of another fact. For example, a statement may be probative that a party was aware of a dangerous condition -- but only if the party heard the statement. Under Rule 104(b), the proponent of evidence that is conditionally relevant must provide enough evidence to support a finding of the conditional fact. Then the relevance of the evidence is considered under Rules 401-403. n16

[10] Remoteness

Occasionally, a Trial Judge will exclude evidence on the basis of remoteness, which is to say that the evidence is too far removed in space or time from the proposition that it is offered to prove. For example, assume a two-car accident where the defendant is trying to prove that the plaintiff was not wearing a seatbelt. If the defendant calls a witness who testifies that he saw the plaintiff driving without a seatbelt an hour before the accident, this testimony is undoubtedly relevant; it tends to prove that the plaintiff was not wearing a seatbelt an hour later. n17 On the other hand, if the witness testifies that he saw the plaintiff driving without a seatbelt two years before the accident, the Trial Court is likely to exclude the testimony as too remote. Or assume that the plaintiff must prove icy conditions at 2 a.m. on a road in Montana. Evidence that the road was icy at midnight tends to prove that it was icy two hours later. But evidence that it was icy two weeks before or after the pertinent time is probably too remote, as is evidence of an icy road 20 miles west.

When evidence is excluded as too remote, it is usually not because it fails to fit the definition of relevant evidence. The definition of relevance in Rule 401 is permissive, to say the least, and the fact that the plaintiff was not wearing a seatbelt two years earlier has at least some tendency to prove that he was not wearing one at the time of the accident. n18 Exclusion on grounds of remoteness is better understood as an exercise of the Trial Court's discretion under Rule 403. That is, the probative value of the evidence is, while not nonexistent, at least minimal if there is a significant gap in time and/or space between the fact proffered and the event to be proved. Exclusion results because the minimal probative value of remote evidence is substantially outweighed by the confusion and delay that would result from introducing it. n19

[11] Examples of Relevant Evidence

No piece of evidence is relevant in itself. It must be evaluated in the light of the facts that are consequential to the action and in the light of logic and experience. Relevance is relative. So it is not surprising that most rulings on relevance are case-specific. However, over time, certain fact situations have recurred and some generalizations are possible. Of course, even if a certain class of evidence is relevant in a certain type of case, the evidence in any particular case may be so prejudicial as to warrant exclusion under Rule 403. Also, counsel must remember Rules 404-412, under which classes of relevant evidence may be excluded because of policy considerations and other concerns. All that said, and with no intent to be comprehensive, the following generalizations on relevance can be made:

1. Similar occurrences. Evidence of similar incidents or accidents is often relevant on a number of issues, such as to show notice, causation, or defect in a personal injury case. The relevance of these occurrences depends of course on the degree of similarity and the purpose for which the evidence is offered. If offered to prove causation or defect, the occurrence must share "substantial" similarity with the event at issue in the case. n20 In contrast, if the occurrence is offered to prove notice, substantial similarity is not required; the occurrence need only have been of a type that would give notice to a reasonable person as to the condition in issue. n21 Obviously, even an identical occurrence is not relevant to prove notice if it occurs subsequent to the event in issue. n22

2. Consciousness of a weak case. Where a criminal defendant flees prosecution, or bribes a juror, or threatens a witness, or gives a false exculpatory story, this evidence is ordinarily held relevant to the defendant's consciousness of guilt. The inferences work as follows: A person who flees, changes his story, etc., is more likely to believe that he is guilty than a person who has not done any of these things; a person who believes he is guilty is more likely to be guilty than a person who does not; and a person who is guilty is more likely to be guilty of the crime charged than one who is not guilty of any crime. n23 Of course, evidence of consciousness of guilt is prejudicial to the defendant, and as such is subject to exclusion if the probative value of the evidence is diminished by a plausible alternative explanation for the defendant's conduct. n24 The Court must employ logic and experience in assessing whether a defendant's conduct is in fact flight or some other indication of consciousness of guilt. n25

Comparable issues of relevance arise in a civil context, where a party intentionally destroys or fails to preserve relevant evidence. Assuming a proper foundation -- that, for example, the party recognized the potential relevance of the evidence and wilfully destroyed or failed to preserve it -- this type of conduct is admissible to show consciousness of a weak case. n26

3. Evidence of financial condition. In criminal cases, evidence of a defendant's poor financial condition before the crime has often been found relevant where the crime charged involved possible financial gain. n27 Conversely, evidence of a sudden acquisition of wealth after the crime charged has been found relevant as tending to prove that the defendant committed the crime. n28

4. Government, professional, and industry standards. Government, professional, and industry standards and regulations are usually held relevant to prove customary practice or a standard of care. n29 They have also been found relevant to establish the defendant's knowledge or intent in a criminal case. n30

5. Comparable sales to show the value of real property. Where the fact of consequence is the value of property, evidence of recent sales of similarly situated property has been found relevant. n31 Of course, the greater the time differential, the less probative the sale is as to the current value of the subject property, and the more likely the sale will be excluded as a proper comparable under Rule 403. n32

(n10)Footnote 10. See United States v. Beasley, 809 F.2d 1273 (7th Cir. 1987) :

> When the same evidence has legitimate and forbidden uses, when the introduction is valuable yet > dangerous, the district judge has great discretion. ... Trial judges have a comparative advantage because they alone see all the evidence in context, and the judicial system as a whole takes advantage of the division of labor.

(n11)Footnote 11. See, e.g., United States v. Daly, 842 F.2d 1380, 1388 (2d Cir. 1988) . In a racketeering trial against members of an organized crime family, the Trial Court allowed an FBI expert to testify to the nature and structure of the five New York crime families, including membership requirements, rules of conduct, and code of silence; this testimony was relevant background evidence to ultimate issues that were in dispute:

> [T]he trial court may admit evidence that does not directly establish an element of the offense charged, in order to provide background for the events alleged in the indictment. Background evidence may be admitted to show, for example, the circumstances surrounding the events or to furnish an explanation of the understanding or intent with which certain acts were performed.

(n12)Footnote 12. See, e.g., United States v. Doe, 903 F.2d 16 (D.C. Cir. 1990) (testimony concerning takeover of the local drug trade by Jamaicans was irrelevant, since it did not go to the disputed issue of whether the defendants were involved in drug transactions).

(n13)Footnote 13. See, e.g., Garland v. Herrin, 724 F.2d 16 (2d Cir. 1983) (evidence of parents' emotional distress over the murder of their daughter held irrelevant because "New York law does not permit a bystander to recover for psychic injury for harm inflicted on another").

(n14)Footnote 14. An example is Daskarolis v. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., 651 F.2d 937 (4th Cir. 1981) . In this diversity product liability case, the Court declined to consider whether the Trial Judge erred in excluding a tire offered as demonstrative evidence on the ground that it was not necessary, when defense counsel did nothing to explain its importance.

(n15)Footnote 15. See also United States v. Welsh, 774 F.2d 670, 672 (4th Cir. 1985) ("The credibility of a witness has nothing to do with whether or not his testimony is probative with respect to the fact it seeks to prove... . [T]he law does not consider credibility as a component to relevance.").

(n16)Footnote 16. See, e.g., Blinzler v. Marriott Int'l, 81 F.3d 1148 (1st Cir. 1996) (destruction by the defendant of a document relevant to litigation can give rise to a negative inference; however, "[b]efore such an inference may be drawn there must be a sufficient foundation showing that the party who destroyed the document had notice both of the potential claim and the document's potential relevance.").

(n17)Footnote 17. See Hill v. Rolleri, 615 F.2d 886 (9th Cir. 1980) (testimony concerning driver's reckless driving ten minutes before an accident was probative of whether he was engaged in reckless driving at the time of the accident).

(n18)Footnote 18. See, e.g., United States v. Eagle, 133 F.3d 608 (8th Cir. 1998) (in a child sexual assault case, medical evidence obtained by a doctor who examined the victim three months after the alleged assault was not so remote that it became irrelevant).

(n19)Footnote 19. See, e.g., Broaddus v. Florida Power Corp., 145 F.3d 1283 (11th Cir. 1998) (in an age discrimination action, the Court did not abuse its discretion in excluding a memorandum written by an executive of the defendant that mentioned that older workers are more expensive; the relevance of the memorandum was marginal because it was written four years before the plaintiff's termination; moreover, the jury could draw an improper inference from the evidence because the memorandum did not state that older workers should be terminated; therefore, the memorandum was properly excluded under Rule 403); United States v. Ellzey, 936 F.2d 492 (10th Cir. 1991) (evidence properly excluded under Rule 403 due to the "remote and tenuous link" between the evidence and the charged crime).

(n20)Footnote 20. Smith v. Ingersoll-Rand Co., 214 F.3d 1235 (10th Cir. 2000) (in a product liability action against the manufacturer of a machine for removing road pavement, there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of six other accidents involving similar machines; the conditions of the other accidents were substantially similar with respect to the claimed defect of lack of visibility); Barker v. Deere & Co., 60 F.3d 158 (3d Cir. 1995) (evidence of tractor accidents offered by the plaintiff constituted only "raw numbers and statistical extrapolations"; in the absence of any foundation of substantial similarity, the evidence was irrelevant to prove either a design defect or that a safer design was feasible). Evidence of lack of similar accidents is also relevant if the conditions are substantially similar. See, e.g., Pandit v. American Honda Motor Co., 82 F.3d 376 (10th Cir. 1996) , where the Court held that "evidence of the absence of similar accidents or claims is admissible as long as the proponent provides adequate foundation." A proper foundation requires a showing that a substantially similar product was used in settings and circumstances sufficiently similar to those surrounding the accident in dispute, so that a jury can connect past experience with the disputed accident. The Court in Pandit found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence of absence of similar claims involving the same model of Honda Accord in which the plaintiff was injured.

(n21)Footnote 21. See, e.g., Four Corners Helicopters, Inc. v. Turbomeca, S.A., 979 F.2d 1434 (10th Cir. 1992) :

> Evidence proffered to illustrate the existence of a dangerous condition necessitates a high degree of similarity because it weighs directly on the ultimate issue to be decided by the jury. The requirement of substantial similarity is relaxed, however, when the evidence of other incidents is used to demonstrate notice or awareness of a potential defect ... .

In this case, the plaintiffs offered evidence to prove a design defect and notice thereof and to refute the defendant's assertion that there was no mechanical failure; the Court found that the incidents, though not identical, were substantially similar and were admissible to indicate the existence of a defect; the incidents also met the relaxed requirement of similarity to prove notice, and therefore the Court found they were admissible for all purposes offered by the plaintiffs. See also Johnson v. Ford Motor Co., 988 F.2d 573 (5th Cir. 1993) (evidence of other accidents held inadmissible even for notice since there was no reasonable similarity to the facts at issue; the accidents involved different vehicle models or different years, and none involved the precise mechanical defect at issue in the litigation).

(n22)Footnote 22. See, e.g., Smith v. Ingersoll-Rand Co., 214 F.3d 1235 (10th Cir. 2000) (in a product liability action against the manufacturer of a machine for removing road pavement, evidence of four similar accidents was not admissible to prove notice because they occurred subsequent to the accident at issue).

(n23)Footnote 23. See, e.g., United States v. Tracy, 989 F.2d 1279 (1st Cir. 1993) (evidence of flight by a defendant is admissible as probative of a "guilty mind" if "there is an adequate factual predicate creating an inference of guilt of the crime charged"; a sufficient factual predicate was established in this case; the defendant was scheduled for trial but left the state and did not appear; independent evidence established his drug dealings); United States v. Horton, 873 F.2d 180, 181 (8th Cir. 1989) (no error in admitting the fact that the defendant gave a false name during his pretrial booking interview; "false identification is relevant and admissible to show consciousness of guilt").

(n24)Footnote 24. The Federal Judicial Center suggests the following instruction to be given when evidence of consciousness of guilt is admitted:

> [Name of witness] testified that, after the crime was supposed to have been committed, the defendant [brief description of behavior, such as flight]. If you believe that the defendant [same brief description], you should keep that in mind when deciding whether the government has proved beyond a reasonable doubt that he committed the crime. On the one hand, you may think that what he did at that time indicated that he knew he was guilty and was attempting to avoid punishment. On the other hand, it is sometimes true that an innocent person will [same brief description] in order to avoid being arrested and charged with a crime.

(n25)Footnote 25. See, e.g., United States v. Martinez, 190 F.3d 673 (5th Cir. 1999) (in a narcotics prosecution, one defendant hid in a closet during a bust; this "flight" evidence was properly admitted and an instruction on flight was warranted; although hiding in a closet "may not be the standard method of escape, it can still constitute flight where, as in this case, the cornered defendant was attempting to elude capture.").

(n28)Footnote 28. See, e.g., United States v. Chagra, 669 F.2d 241 (5th Cir. 1982) (in narcotics prosecution, evidence that the defendant bought two expensive homes was relevant proof of guilt).

(n29)Footnote 29. See, e.g., Horne v. Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corp., 4 F.3d 276 (4th Cir. 1993) (in a product liability case, OSHA regulations requiring warnings to be placed on asbestos were admissible to show state of the art in the industry); Brown v. Cedar Rapids & I.C. Ry., 650 F.2d 159, 163 (8th Cir. 1981) (allowing admission of "advisory safety codes promulgated by governmental authority as showing an acceptable standard of care").

(n31)Footnote 31. See, e.g., United States v. 179. 26 Acres, 644 F.2d 367, 371 (10th Cir. 1981) ("The best evidence of market value of real property in condemnation is, of course, found in sales of comparable land within a reasonable time before the taking.").

(n32)Footnote 32. See, e.g., United States v. 33. 90 Acres of Land, 709 F.2d 1012 (5th Cir. 1983) (where there was a time differential of seven or eight years between the proffered sales and the taking, the Trial Court did not err in excluding evidence of the sales).

[1] Causation and Damages

Sir Speedy, Inc. v. L & P Graphics, Inc., 957 F.2d 1033 (2d Cir. 1992) : After a jury verdict in an action over breach of a franchise agreement, the Trial Judge ruled that income projections made by the franchiser should not have been admitted in proof of the franchisee's damages because they predated the applicable limitations period. The Court reversed the judgment n.o.v., holding it was error to exclude the documents, as the statute of limitations only bars stale claims and is not a rule of evidence. A suggestion that evidence is too old goes to its relevance and to its weight, which is a matter for the jury.

Blancha v. Raymark Indus., 972 F.2d 507 (3d Cir. 1992) : The plaintiffs' theory in an asbestos case was that all asbestos could cause the decedent's mesothelioma; the defendant's expert indicated that asbestos products containing chrysotile did not cause mesothelioma. Reversing a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court held that the expert's testimony was relevant, given the theory advanced and the plaintiffs' burden of proof on proximate causation, and that the danger of confusion did not so clearly outweigh the probative value of the expert's testimony as to justify exclusion.

Jimenez v. DaimlerChrysler Corp., 269 F.3d 439 (4th Cir. 2001) : The estate of a six-year-old sued for his wrongful death, incurred when the minivan in which he was riding was involved in an accident and he was thrown through the rear liftgate, which was allegedly defectively designed. Reversing a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that the driver of the minivan was a cause of the accident, but held it was reversible error to exclude evidence that the decedent was not wearing a seatbelt. The driver's negligence was irrelevant because the plaintiff's claim was for defects making the minivan not crashworthy rather than ones causing the accident, and because the driver's contributory negligence would not be imputed to affect the claims for the decedent's pain and suffering. By contrast, the seatbelt evidence was relevant because the use or nonuse of a seatbelt tends to show whether a vehicle is crashworthy as a whole, since the liftgate and its latch were not the only mechanisms designed to secure an occupant inside the vehicle. In addition, the evidence was relevant to damages, since the decedent would have sustained at most relatively minor injuries had he stayed inside the minivan. One Judge thought the seatbelt evidence relevant only on the damages issue.

Carroll v. Morgan, 17 F.3d 787 (5th Cir. 1994) : The Court held in a medical malpractice wrongful death action that evidence showing the decedent's ill health and intemperate lifestyle was relevant to the possible causes of his death and to the issue of damages. His intemperance might have resulted in a reduced life expectancy and, to the extent it included lustful sexual behavior and marital infidelity, was probative of the extent of the survivor's noneconomic loss.

United States v. Morris, 957 F.2d 1391 (7th Cir. 1992) : The Court held, in a prosecution for conspiring to defraud the United States arising out of the purchase of a nursing home at an inflated price, that evidence of a 1980 partnership buyback valuation was relevant to the 1984 value of the nursing home partnership.

O'Dell v. Hercules, Inc., 904 F.2d 1194 (8th Cir. 1990) : In the first phase of a bifurcated trial against a chemical manufacturer for environmental pollution, the Trial Judge excluded evidence of objective symptoms of injury, property marketability, and the plaintiffs' subjective fear resulting from the exposure. The Court found no error, since those facts were not relevant to the causation issues that were the sole focus of that phase of the trial.

Maryland Cas. Co. v. Knight, 96 F.3d 1284 (9th Cir. 1996) : In a declaratory judgment action by an insurer seeking determination of disputes arising out of a fire loss, the insured counterclaimed for emotional distress and tortious breach of contract, and introduced evidence that failure to resolve his claim had caused him to file for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection to avoid foreclosure, which led to emotional distress. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the insured's favorable settlement with the bank that had been threatening foreclosure, as the settlement tended to show that the bankruptcy filing was more a successful token in negotiating with the bank than a cause of emotional distress, and it tended to show that any delay by the insurer had not damaged the insured.

Haney v. Mizell Mem. Hosp., 744 F.2d 1467 (11th Cir. 1984) : Affirming a judgment for the defendants in a diversity medical malpractice case, the Court upheld the admission of evidence concerning the plaintiff's use of alcohol and drugs. The evidence was relevant to his ability to communicate with medical personnel following an accident and to his claim for damages.

[2] Civil Rights Cases

[a] Civil Rights Cases -- Irrelevant Evidence

Provost v. City of Newburgh, 262 F.3d 146 (2d Cir. 2001) : Affirming a judgment for an arrestee against the arresting officer and reversing a judgment against a supervisor, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the plaintiff was not permitted to testify regarding abuse of other detainees while he was incarcerated at the police station. The evidence was either irrelevant, since there was no showing that the individual defendants took part, or unduly prejudicial.

Blackburn v. United Parcel Serv., Inc., 179 F.3d 81 (3d Cir. 1999) : The plaintiff alleged that he had been discharged from UPS in violation of a state whistleblower statute; the defendant countered that he had violated the company's anti-nepotism policy. In support of his contention that the defense was pretextual, the plaintiff offered testimony that other UPS employees had informed him that certain named employees were related. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant, the Court held that several of the statements were irrelevant, either because they referred to situations before UPS adopted its anti-nepotism policy or because there was no showing UPS was aware of the relationship.

Chestnut v. Hall, 284 F.3d 816 (7th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed a judgment for police officers sued by plaintiffs who alleged civil rights violations while protesting during a strike. It upheld an in limine ruling excluding evidence that a defense witness had been involved in a brawl while employed by the Indianapolis Police Department, on the ground that the evidence was irrelevant, especially given the witness' minor role in the case. In Palmquist v. Selvik, 111 F.3d 1332 (7th Cir. 1997) , the defendants, sued for using excessive force in making an arrest, argued that the plaintiff's decedent had a "death wish" and sought "suicide by police." The Court held there was no error in excluding evidence of the victim's "mental unraveling" in the six months before he died, as the issue in a case like this is the reasonableness of the police conduct and the only relevant evidence is the facts and circumstances known to the officers at the time of the incident. The Court noted that evidence of the victim's intoxication and marijuana possession a few hours before the incident might have been admissible, but its exclusion could be viewed as cumulative or as harmless error. The Court also concluded that the evidence of the victim's mental state could have been admissible during the damages phase of the trial, as it was directly relevant to his life expectancy, but the defendants did not preserve the argument. One Judge disagreed with the Circuit's narrow approach to the evidence relevant in excessive force cases (see Sherrod v. Berry, infra) especially as applied in cases like this. In Hirsch v. Burke, n1 the plaintiff claimed that the defendant police officer had falsely arrested her deceased husband for public intoxication when, in fact, he was a diabetic in a state of insulin shock. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court held that post-arrest evidence of a blood-alcohol test, which showed no alcohol but substantial amounts of insulin in the decedent's blood, was irrelevant to prove the plaintiff's claim for false arrest. The Court reasoned that "the probable cause determination is made at the moment the arrest is made." In Sherrod v. Berry, n2 the Court en banc reversed a panel opinion and held it was error to admit evidence that the plaintiff was unarmed in a § 1983 action brought against police officers for use of excessive force. The Court said that the evidence was irrelevant to deciding whether the officer acted reasonably, which under the applicable law depended on the circumstances known to him at the time. The evidence was also irrelevant for impeachment and it tended to lead the jury to make its decision on an improper basis. Two Judges dissented on the ground that the evidence was relevant to how the decedent moved before he was attacked by the police officers. In Lenard v. Argento, n3 a civil rights action arising from the plaintiff's arrest at the scene of an auto accident, the Court held it was not error to exclude evidence that defendant police officers had been suspended thirty days following their guilty pleas to bribery charges, as the evidence was not probative of the defendant village's intent to condone misconduct.

Tanberg v. Sholtis, 401 F.3d 1151 (10th Cir. 2005) : Affirming a judgment for the defendants in an action by arrestees alleging excessive force by a police officer, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence regarding the police department's standard operating procedures. To the extent that the SOPs required an assessment of an officer's choice among various techniques for de-escalating confrontations, the evidence was irrelevant because the law requires only that an officer use reasonable, not optimal, force. Insofar as they restated the reasonableness standards governing excessive force claims, they were irrelevant because to the extent that "the SOP required precisely what the law required of him does not make it more or less likely that Officer Sholtis's use of force was reasonable." In addition, the Supreme Court has held that local police regulations cannot be used as a standard for evaluating the constitutionality of police conduct in the exclusionary rule context, and the same logic would apply equally to damage suits under § 1983. Finally, the Court held that even if the SOPs might be relevant to the plaintiffs' pendent state law claims, there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the evidence because of the risk that the jury would confuse violation of the administrative standards for a constitutional violation. In Garcia-Martinez v. City & County of Denver, 392 F.3d 1187 (10th Cir. 2004) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendants in a § 1983 action for excessive force, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence that the officers had been disciplined for careless handling of a firearm and for improperly approaching the vehicle during the arrest. The plaintiff failed to show that the procedures at issue in the disciplinary proceeding involved excessive force as opposed to general weapon safety and officer efficiency.

[b] Civil Rights Cases -- Other Cases

Hobson v. Wilson, 556 F. Supp. 1157 (D.D.C. 1982) , modified on other grounds, 737 F.2d 1 (D.C. Cir. 1984) : In an action awarding damages for deprivation of First Amendment rights by police and FBI defendants, the Court concluded that the plaintiffs' FBI files were properly admitted as evidence so that the jury could fully understand the extent of the defendants' efforts to interfere with protected activities. The Court also concluded that a leaflet, anonymously authored by an FBI agent who was not a defendant, that purported to come from an antiwar protester was properly admitted, since there was credible evidence that such a document would not have been prepared without some review by various defendants.

Iacobucci v. Boulter, 193 F.3d 14 (1st Cir. 1999) : A journalist was arrested after videotaping a local board meeting; when he retrieved his videotape, the video portion was erased, but the audio portion picked up after he was taken into custody. In a subsequent § 1983 action, the defendant officer objected that the after-the-fact recording necessarily lacked relevance. Noting that "relevancy typically presents a rather low barrier to admissibility," the Court found no abuse of discretion in admission of the tape after the Trial Judge determined that rational jurors might find that some of the statements referred back to what transpired at the time of the arrest

Davis v. Rodriguez, 364 F.3d 424 (2d Cir. 2004) : The Court reversed a judgment in a § 1983 excessive force action because the plaintiff had not been permitted to ask the defendant officer about the charge on which he initially decided to arrest the plaintiff. The question was directly relevant because the reasonableness of the force used was partly dependent on the crime in question, so it was an abuse of discretion to preclude that line of questioning.

Paschal v. Flagstar Bank, FSB, 295 F.3d 565 (6th Cir. 2002) : Affirming in part a Fair Housing Act case that held the defendant engaged in racially discriminatory mortgage lending, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding matched-pair testing conducted by a local fair housing group. The defendant objected that the evidence was irrelevant to prove the charged discrimination because, inter alia, the testers did not fill out loan applications. The Court reasoned that the testers were given some of the same financial attributes as the plaintiffs, their experiences suggested that the defendant might treat African-American and white customers differently (at least during the preapplication stage), and while the testing was "inconclusive" on whether the defendant was less likely to grant a mortgage to an African-American, that did not mean the evidence was irrelevant, because it had a "tendency" to make the charged discrimination more likely.

[3] Consciousness of a Weak Case -- Civil Cases

[a] Destruction or Loss of Evidence

Blinzler v. Marriott Int'l, Inc., 81 F.3d 1148 (1st Cir. 1996) : In a negligence action against a hotel for failing to summon aid promptly on behalf of a guest suffering a heart attack, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the hotel had destroyed the relevant printout cataloging all outgoing calls thirty days after the incident. The defendant had knowledge all along that the report would be significant, which gave it ample reason to preserve the report, and when it nevertheless destroyed the report, the jury could reasonably infer that it did so because the report would harm its case.

Hodge v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 360 F.3d 446 (4th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant store in an action by a customer who was injured when a display of mirrors allegedly fell down on her. The plaintiff claimed that she was entitled to an adverse inference because the assistant manager who investigated the accident did not even try to obtain the account of an eyewitness or the witness' identification and contact information. The Court held, however, that while an adverse inference may be proper when a party has deliberately (though not necessarily in bad faith) destroyed or lost evidence in its possession, there is no authority requiring a party to investigate an accident and obtain evidence, at least in the absence of bad faith. In Hinkle v. City of Clarksburg, 81 F.3d 416 (4th Cir. 1996) , a civil rights action on behalf of a person shot by police officers during an armed standoff, the most hotly disputed point was whether the decedent was shot in the chest or in the back. The Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that a police officer destroyed the decedent's shirt a few days after the shooting, and that when the decedent's body was exhumed for a second autopsy, it was discovered that the bullet wound had been completely excised. The plaintiffs had made no showing that these acts were the result of a deliberate attempt to hide evidence. In Vodusek v. Bayliner Marine Corp., 71 F.3d 148 (4th Cir. 1995) , a suit against the manufacturer and seller of a boat that exploded, the Court affirmed judgments for the defendants, holding it was proper to instruct the jury that if they found that the plaintiff's expert caused the destruction or loss of relevant evidence (portions of the boat), they could assume that the evidence made unavailable would have been favorable to the defendants. The Court rejected the argument that a showing of bad faith is necessary to permit an adverse inference, but concluded that "[a]n adverse inference about a party's consciousness of the weakness of his case ... cannot be drawn merely from his negligent loss or destruction of evidence; the inference requires a showing that the party knew the evidence was relevant to some issue at trial and that his willful conduct resulted in its loss or destruction." In Albrecht v. Baltimore & O. R.R., n4 the Court reversed a judgment for an employee in a FELA case because of the erroneous admission of subsequent repair evidence, but it upheld admission of evidence that the railroad destroyed the ladder on which the plaintiff was standing at the time of the accident. The Court stated that "[w]e should not ... sanction the deliberate destruction of highly relevant evidence."

Park v. City of Chicago, 297 F.3d 606 (7th Cir. 2002) : Affirming a judgment for the City in a suit by a former police officer of Korean ancestry who alleged race and national origin discrimination, the Court held there was no error when the Trial Judge declined to give an adverse inference instruction to the jury because the City destroyed or lost documents. The Court noted that there must be evidence of bad faith to justify the giving of such an instruction, and the evidence presented did not require a finding of bad faith. In S.C. Johnson & Son v. Louisville & N. R.R., n5 the Court affirmed a judgment for a rail carrier in an action by a manufacturer for damages to freight, noting that it is not proper to infer that the contents of evidence that a party has destroyed would have been unfavorable to that party unless the destruction was done in bad faith. In Coates v. Johnson & Johnson, n6 the Court affirmed a judgment for an employer in an employment discrimination action. It found that no presumption arose that files destroyed by a plant manager would have been unfavorable to the employer where the files were destroyed only after the manager consulted with the EEOC concerning files that must be maintained and the files were destroyed before litigation was foreseen.

Johnson v. Ready Mixed Concrete, Co., 424 F.3d 806 (8th Cir. 2005) : In a discrimination action, the defendant claimed that the former employee was discharged because of dishonesty after the defendant's truck was damaged by acid while the plaintiff was washing it. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant, the Court found no error in the refusal to draw a negative inference from the company's failure to produce pictures of the damage to the truck. Although there was some evidence that the company should have taken pictures and typically did take pictures of truck damage, there was no evidence that any pictures were ever taken in this case, so there was no evidence that the company intentionally destroyed evidence and no basis for a negative inference. Furthermore, the extent of damage was irrelevant, because the defendant was contending that the plaintiff was fired for dishonesty rather than for damaging the truck.

Kieffer v. Weston Land, Inc., 90 F.3d 1496 (10th Cir. 1996) : A few days after the plaintiff allegedly received an electric shock from touching a defendant's vending machine, the machine was removed and stored at a dump on the defendant's property. By the time it was retrieved over a year later in preparation for the litigation, the electrical plug was missing. The Court held there was no error in permitting the jury to draw an adverse inference against the defendant in assessing the plaintiff's expert's opinion that the shock was caused by a defective plug.

[b] Consciousness of a Weak Case -- Civil Cases -- Other Evidence

Dykes v. Raymark Indus., 801 F.2d 810 (6th Cir. 1986) : In an asbestosis action, the Court held there was no error in admitting documents created by a defendant after the last possible date on which the plaintiff's deceased was exposed to asbestos. The documents were consistent with an attitude that the plaintiff claimed existed prior to the deceased's injury and supported a punitive damage award.

Cerro Gordo Charity v. Fireman's Fund Am. Life Ins. Co., 819 F.2d 1471 (8th Cir. 1987) : The Court held that evidence a witness had been threatened in a phone call was admissible, where only one party had a motive to frighten the witness.

[4] Consciousness of Guilt -- Criminal Cases

[a] Flight, Resisting Arrest

United States v. Tracy, 989 F.2d 1279 (1st Cir. 1993) : The Court held that evidence of flight by a defendant is admissible as probative of a "guilty mind" if "there is an adequate factual predicate creating an inference of guilt of the crime charged." A sufficient factual predicate was established in this case: the defendant was scheduled for trial but left the state and did not appear, and independent evidence established his drug dealings.

United States v. Cook, 580 F. Supp. 948 (N.D. W. Va. 1983) , aff'd, 782 F.2d 1037 (4th Cir. 1986) : Rejecting a new trial motion, the Court held that a jury could consider a defendant's flight as evidence, when he knew he was a suspect in a bombing investigation and he fled in response to an officer's approach only three days after being questioned about involvement in the bombing.

United States v. Myers, 550 F.2d 1036 (5th Cir. 1977) : One ground for reversing the defendant's conviction for bank robbery was an erroneous instruction concerning flight. The Court said that the probative value of flight evidence depends upon the degree of confidence with which four inferences can be drawn: "(1) from the defendant's behavior to flight; (2) from flight to consciousness of guilt; (3) from consciousness of guilt to consciousness of guilt concerning the crime charged; and (4) from consciousness of guilt concerning the crime charged to actual guilt of the crime charged." Because flight evidence is inherently unreliable and dangerous, an instruction regarding the inference to be drawn from flight "is improper unless the evidence is sufficient to furnish reasonable support for all four of the necessary inferences." There must be actual evidence of flight, and the government must be able to show that the flight relates to the crime charged. "The more remote in time the alleged flight is from the commission or accusation of an offense, the greater the likelihood that it resulted from something other than feelings of guilt concerning that offense."

United States v. Touchstone, 726 F.2d 1116 (6th Cir. 1984) : Affirming drug convictions, the Court held that the government was properly permitted to present evidence that the defendants fled after the trial commenced. The Court rejected the argument that flight almost three years after the crime charged was of very low probative value and stated that flight evidence "is generally admissible as evidence of guilt and that juries are given the power to determine 'how much weight should be given to such evidence.' "

United States v. Lewis, 797 F.2d 358 (7th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed a conviction for attempted extortion, holding that evidence that the defendant moved to a different hotel in New York City and assumed another alias after a warrant was issued for his arrest was properly admitted to show consciousness of guilt.

United States v. Chipps, 410 F.3d 438 (8th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a conviction for assault, finding no error in the admission of evidence that the defendant had fled from law enforcement. The Court reasoned that although flight evidence is often only marginally probative of guilt, in this case the defendant fled within days of being given a copy of the warrant for his arrest, did not turn himself in, could not be found for two years, and sped away from the police, and other circumstances supported the inference that his consciousness of guilt derived from actually having committed the charged assault. In United States v. Eggleton, n7 the Court affirmed a bank robbery conviction, holding that evidence that the defendant used false names and identification and fled after he learned that he was being sought in connection with the robbery was admissible to prove consciousness of guilt. In United States v. Schepp, n8 the Court affirmed convictions arising out of a car bombing, holding that evidence of the defendant's flight from the city after learning that the FBI had made inquiries about him was properly admitted.

United States v. Tille, 729 F.2d 615 (9th Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed RICO convictions, upholding the admission of evidence that the defendant attempted to flee at the time of his arrest. Rejecting an argument that the evidence was not probative absent other evidence that the defendant was aware of the crime for which he was sought, the Court stated that "[t]he probative value of flight evidence depends on all of the circumstances and is a jury question" where "[t]he evidence was sufficient to permit an inference of knowledge of the crime at issue." In United States v. Guerrero, n9 the Court affirmed convictions for bank robbery and drug offenses, finding that evidence of an escape one day before the defendants were to be arraigned could be used to support an inference of consciousness of guilt.

United States v. De Parias, 805 F.2d 1447 (11th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed extortion convictions, holding that evidence of a defendant's resisting arrest was admissible to demonstrate consciousness of guilt, even though the defendant was suspected of other crimes besides the one charged. Such evidence would be insufficient to prove guilt, however. See also United States v. Beard n10(permissible for marshal to testify that defendants switched shirts during trial break).

[b] Consciousness of Guilt -- Criminal Cases -- Other Evidence

United States v. Perholtz, 842 F.2d 343 (D.C. Cir. 1988) : In a racketeering case involving procurement of Postal Service contracts, the Court held that a "script" prepared by one defendant for another person, in an effort to influence what he would say about the scheme, was evidence of consciousness of the defendants' role in the criminal scheme.

United States v. Kaplan, 832 F.2d 676 (1st Cir. 1987) : The Court held that evidence that a lawyer-defendant removed files prior to a government search and that the government could not find them was properly admitted, since a jury could infer that the motive for such action by the defendant was something other than to protect client confidences.

United States v. Trala, 386 F.3d 536 (3d Cir. 2004) : At the time the defendant in a robbery case was arrested, his companion made conflicting false statements regarding her identity and the source of money in their car. The Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit the statements as evidence of the defendant's consciousness of guilt, since there was no proof that the defendant was standing at the time in a place where he could have heard the statements and corrected misstatements. However, evidence that the companion provided the same false name for the defendant when questioned was properly admitted to prove his consciousness of guilt, as the jury could reasonably infer that the two agreed to lie about the defendant's true identity and that they did so to help him avoid apprehension.

United States v. Hall, 565 F.2d 1052 (8th Cir. 1977) : The Court held that evidence the defendant distorted handwriting exemplars was admissible to show consciousness of guilt.

People of Terr. of Guam v. Ojeda, 758 F.2d 403 (9th Cir. 1985) : The Court held that a burglary defendant's offer to pay damages to the victim if charges were dropped was admissible, since "statements need not be incriminating to be admissions." It found the offer to be relevant to show consciousness of guilt. In United States v. Miller, n11 a prosecution for receipt of stolen goods, the Court upheld the introduction of photographs of a stolen trailer that showed alterations made after the theft. The photos supported an inference of knowledge that the property was stolen.

United States v. Nabors, 707 F.2d 1294 (11th Cir. 1983) : The Court found that evidence that a defendant, the named insured of an airplane, did not make a claim concerning the plane after it burned was admissible to show his involvement in a drug scheme in which the plane was used.

[c] Consciousness of Guilt -- Criminal Cases -- Threats, etc. to Witnesses

United States v. Pina, 844 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1988) : The Court noted that evidence that the defendant allegedly threatened a witness had no probative value, since the witness had completed giving testimony and could not be influenced by the threat. Although the evidence was inflammatory, the Court held that its admission was harmless error.

United States v. Guerrero, 803 F.2d 783 (3d Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed drug convictions, holding that evidence that a defendant threatened an alleged coconspirator to discourage him from testifying was properly admitted with an immediate and appropriate limiting instruction. Although threat evidence may be admitted to prove consciousness of guilt, it can be extremely prejudicial, so the Judge should consider before admitting it "the importance and centrality to the ultimate issue in the case of the fact sought to be proved by the threat evidence, and the availability of other evidence to establish the fact sought to be proven by use of the threat evidence."

United States v. Marks, 816 F.2d 1207 (7th Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed convictions for conspiring to distribute marijuana, holding that evidence that a defendant threatened a government witness during trial was admissible to prove consciousness of a weak case, notwithstanding the assertion that the threat might have represented righteous indignation against a perjurer.

United States v. Hammond, 781 F.2d 1536 (11th Cir. 1986) : In a prosecution of a pharmacist for illegally distributing controlled substances, the Court upheld the government's questioning of the defendant concerning various means, including offers of money, that he used to attempt to dissuade a witness from testifying. In United States v. Griffin, n12 the Court found reversible error in the admission of an agent's testimony that a conspirator had been served with a subpoena before he subsequently disappeared, when there was no charge that the defendant was responsible for the disappearance.

[5] Consciousness of Innocence

United States v. Biaggi, 909 F.2d 662 (2d Cir. 1990) : The Court reversed a defendant's convictions in a political corruption case because evidence that he had denied knowledge of others' wrongdoing, at a time when admitting such knowledge would have secured him immunity, was erroneously excluded. This evidence of "consciousness of innocence" tended to preclude a finding that he had knowledge of the wrongdoing.

[6] Conspiracy Cases

United States v. Smith, 294 F.3d 473 (3d Cir. 2002) : Police officers were found guilty of conspiring to violate the civil rights of an arrestee who died while in custody. After the verdict, the Trial Judge entered an order of acquittal, reasoning among other things that any acts of concealment occurring after the victim's death could not be considered as relevant evidence of conspiracy. The Court reversed the order and reinstated the conspiracy convictions. It held that concerted efforts to conceal a crime are relevant evidence of a conspiracy to commit the crime, and so should not have been disregarded by the Judge in assessing the sufficiency of the evidence: "[I]t is intuitive that concerted actions to cover up the circumstances of Faison's death, taken just minutes after his death, have a tendency to suggest that the acts of brutality were undertaken as part of an agreement, as opposed to having been random, uncoordinated acts."

United States v. Duran, 407 F.3d 828 (7th Cir. 2005) : The defendant was convicted of crimes in connection with a drug trafficking conspiracy. On appeal he challenged the relevance of crimes committed by his brother, who was a cooperating witness, on the ground that while he knew of his brother's dealings, he did not intend to join in all of his individual activities, and that those crimes were his brother's drug dealing alone and not connected to the conspiracy with which the defendant was involved. Affirming, the Court noted that coconspirator liability is determined by the scope of the agreement among the conspirators, that it does not require knowledge of the specific acts performed, and that the record evidence supported the conclusion that the defendant not only knew of but also joined a very broad drug-dealing conspiracy that encompassed the brother's activities as presented to the jury.

[7] Criminal Cases -- Defense Evidence

United States v. Carriger, 592 F.2d 312 (6th Cir. 1979) : Reversing a conviction for income tax evasion, the Court held that certain promissory notes offered by the defendant to show his net worth were relevant and should have been admitted, even though no proof was offered of the underlying transactions.

United States v. Holmes, 413 F.3d 770 (8th Cir. 2005) : Reversing a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court held that the defendant should have been permitted to offer testimony from three witnesses regarding the circumstances of his presence in the apartment where he was when the gun was found. The excluded testimony provided background and contextual information that would have been useful in assessing the relative credibility of the arresting officers' and the defendant's differing accounts. The Judge had excluded the testimony as irrelevant, but the threshold for relevance is "quite minimal," and this evidence satisfied that requirement because it made the defendant's explanation somewhat more plausible than it was without the evidence. In United States v. Swink, 21 F.3d 852 (8th Cir. 1994) , the Court reversed perjury convictions for, inter alia, excluding the testimony by the defendant's father. The father was a participant in the events and would have testified that the defendant did not fully understand the bond transactions he had entered into. The Trial Judge erred in concluding that the defendant knew his conduct was illegal, since that was a jury question and the father's testimony might have persuaded the jury that the defendant lacked criminal intent.

United States v. Thompson, 25 F.3d 1558 (11th Cir. 1994) : A defendant charged with firearms offenses presented a defense of entrapment by estoppel, alleging that he had been given an oral grant of immunity in exchange for testimony in other cases. The Court held it was error to grant the government's motion in limine to exclude the evidence, even if the testimony regarding the alleged immunity agreement was not credible; if there were any basis to support the defendant's contention he had been told he could possess a firearm, the jury should have been permitted to hear the testimony and weigh it.

[8] Curative Admissibility

Nguyen v. Southwest Leasing & Rental, Inc., 282 F.3d 1061 (9th Cir. 2002) : In a personal injury action arising from the failure of a tire, the plaintiffs relied solely on a strict liability claim of manufacturing defect. Although they did not need to prove how the defect developed in order to sustain the claim, their expert testified (without objection) to several possible errors and deficiencies in the manufacturing process that could have been responsible. The plaintiffs' objections to defense evidence concerning quality control precautions in the manufacturing process were overruled, and the Court affirmed, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence under the doctrine of curative admissibility. The defense evidence went to rebut any false impression created by the irrelevant evidence from the plaintiff's expert.

Bearint v. Dorell Juvenile, 389 F.3d 1339 (11th Cir. 2004) : After an infant in a child safety seat was injured during a rear-end collision, a product liability action was brought against the seat's manufacturer on the ground that it was not crashworthy. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding an expert witness report proffered by the plaintiffs that detailed a crash test recreating the conditions of the accident using identical vehicles. The report was untimely and the defendant had not opened the door to its use by asking the expert whether he had recreated the accident conditions by crashing the vehicles together with a different model of child safety seat. The distinction was significant because the defendant asked its question in an effort to show that no child safety seat would have functioned properly in that accident, while the plaintiffs wished to use the report to support their calculations of the movements of the following vehicle and to bolster their version of what happened to the child safety seat after that collision. The jury would not have been misled by any implications from the defendant's question.

[9] Economic Testimony

Kearns v. Ford Motor Co., 726 F. Supp. 159 (E.D. Mich. 1989) : In an action for patent infringement, the Court ruled on a motion in limine that evidence of the manufacturer's markup over manufacturing costs was irrelevant in calculating the reasonable royalty that would be negotiated by willing parties in an arm's-length transaction, but that the manufacturer's manufacturing costs would be relevant to that damages computation.

Pierce Packing Co. v. John Morrell & Co., 633 F.2d 1362 (9th Cir. 1980) : In a suit for violating federal antitrust and state fair competition laws, the Court held that even though the relevant product market was "pork and pork products," evidence of sales of unrelated products was admissible to show that the defendant's total sales were profitable and that pork sales were generally more profitable than other sales. The evidence undercut the claim that pork products were sold below marginal cost.

[10] Employment Discrimination Cases

[a] Irrelevant Evidence

McDonald v. Piedmont Aviation, Inc., 930 F.2d 220 (2d Cir. 1991) : The Court held there was no error in excluding the defendant airline's evidence of a pilot's qualifications in his suit for violation of preferential hiring requirements. Because the airline did not have any of the information at the time it refused to hire the plaintiff, the evidence was irrelevant.

Mooney v. Aramco Servs. Co., 54 F.3d 1207 (5th Cir. 1995) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding anecdotal testimony relating to the plaintiffs' pattern-or-practice claim in an age discrimination case. Because the witnesses had different supervisors and worked in different parts of the company, the testimony would simply have been evidence of sporadic and isolated occurrences rather than showing a standard operating procedure similar to that of which the plaintiffs complained. In an employment discrimination action, Goff v. Continental Oil Co., n13 the Court upheld a ruling excluding evidence that the defendant had also discriminated against three other former employees. Since plaintiff alleged individual discrimination, the other acts were irrelevant. Without deciding whether a pattern or practice of discrimination could be proved to support a claim of individualized discrimination, the Court found that the three other claims of discrimination were too sporadic and isolated to establish any pattern or practice.

Turner v. Allstate Ins. Co., 902 F.2d 1208 (6th Cir. 1990) : In a former agent's action for wrongful discharge, the Court held that statistical evidence offered by the defendant insurance company as tending to prove its good faith or reasonableness was properly excluded when the plaintiff conceded good faith and disputed only that he had falsified documents. A dissenting Judge thought the statistical evidence that a particular discount was given the plaintiff's clients at a rate four times the statewide average was probative on whether he was shorting or defrauding his employer.

Fortino v. Quasar Co., 950 F.2d 389 (7th Cir. 1991) : The Court reversed judgments for plaintiffs allegedly discharged because of national origin and age discrimination, holding that it was error to admit a videotaped speech by one of the defendant's executives that indicated age discrimination, as none of the plaintiffs was in the executive's group and he had no role in their discharge or in that of any other employee. In those circumstances, his comments had no probative value and, being prejudicial, were inadmissible.

Bradford v. Norfolk S. Corp., 54 F.3d 1412 (8th Cir. 1995) : In an age discrimination action by railroad clerks who alleged that they were constructively discharged by the defendant's moving their positions from St. Louis to Roanoke, Va., the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence of the plaintiffs' personal circumstances, as there was no showing that the defendant had any knowledge of the personal circumstances or that they were a factor in the decision to consolidate work and transfer employees. In Lee v. Rapid City Area School Dist. No. 51-4, 981 F.2d 316 (8th Cir. 1992) (en banc), an ADEA action by a teacher whose contract was not renewed, evidence that school administrators had received complaints about the plaintiff from students and parents was admitted but the Trial Judge refused, on grounds that the evidence was hearsay and the witnesses repeatedly volunteered nonresponsive statements, to allow testimony about the substance of the complaints unless they had been documented. The Court held, inter alia, that oral complaints were irrelevant because the defendant's agreement with its teachers limited what administrators were permitted to consider in evaluating teachers. Three Judges dissented from this point, on the ground that the ADEA is concerned with whether the defendant's decision was in fact based on oral complaints, not with whether such action might have violated the agreement; noncompliance with the agreement might have weakened the administrators' credibility as to their motivation, but it did not render that motive evidence irrelevant.

[b] Employment Discrimination Cases -- Miscellaneous Cases

Cummings v. Standard Register Co., 265 F.3d 56 (1st Cir. 2001) : In an age discrimination case brought by a discharged employee, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by two other former employees of the company that they had been terminated after having been told they were "too old" and that the company need to make room for "young blood." Although the testimony covered different time periods, different supervisors, and different areas of the company from the plaintiff's situation, it was particularly relevant because the defendant had introduced evidence of its national corporate practices of nondiscrimination.

Perry v. Ethan Allen, Inc., 115 F.3d 143 (2d Cir. 1997) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in a sexual harassment case, but it found that the Trial Judge excluded relevant evidence in ruling that sexual harassment of other women employees of the defendant would not be admitted unless the plaintiff had personal knowledge of the harassment. The Court reasoned that the issue of a hostile workplace involves the totality of the circumstances, including evidence of harassment directed at employees other than the plaintiff.

Glass v. Philadelphia Elec. Co., 34 F.3d 188 (3d Cir. 1994) : The Court reversed a judgment in an employment discrimination case because the defendant was permitted to offer evidence of the plaintiff's performance at one plant, but the plaintiff was not permitted to cross-examine the witnesses about the racially hostile work environment at that plant. The cross-examination was relevant to the question whether the defendant's reasons for its actions were pretextual.

Rutherford v. Harris County, Tex., 197 F.3d 173 (5th Cir. 1999) : In a deputy constable's Title VII action against her employer for failing to promote her on account of sex, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that her sergeant had asked the deputy to have sexual relations with him. The plaintiff had not made a sexual harassment claim, but the evidence was relevant to show her supervisor's discriminatory intent and to suggest a reason why, after she had rebuffed him, her work was more closely scrutinized and heavily criticized.

Jackson v. Quanex Corp., 191 F.3d 647 (6th Cir. 1999) : Reversing a judgment for the employer in a racial harassment case, the Court held that evidence of racial graffiti at the defendant's manufacturing plant and evidence of racially offensive conduct directed at African-American workers should have been admitted, whether or not the graffiti or conduct was directed at the plaintiff: "Comments that single out members of a protected class are relevant not only as to whether a particular work environment was objectively hostile to members of the protected class but also as to whether an employee belonging to the protected class subjectively felt harassed."

Lust v. Sealy, Inc., 383 F.3d 580 (7th Cir. 2004) : In an action by an employee who claimed that she had been denied a promotion because of gender discrimination, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of comments by the plaintiff's supervisor that the plaintiff was "just like a woman to say that" and "you're being a blonde again today." Although the comments were too trivial to constitute harassment and might have been made remote in time from the plaintiff's suit, it was the Judge's call whether they were so stale as to lack any probative value on the supervisor's discriminatory mindset. In Bell v. Environmental Protection Agency, 232 F.3d 546 (7th Cir. 2000) , EPA employees who had been denied promotions brought Title VII claims based on race and national origin discrimination. Reversing summary judgment for the defendant, the Court held that the plaintiffs' analysis of all promotions in the upper Midwest region of the EPA, rather than just the sixteen eligible applicants for the position used by the Judge, encompassed the appropriate labor market.

Obrey v. Johnson, 400 F.3d 691 (9th Cir. 2005) : In an employee's race discrimination action, the Court reversed a judgment for the defendant because a statistical report showing a correlation between race and promotion was erroneously excluded. Although the report failed to account for the relative qualifications of the applicant pool, it was not irrelevant in this case alleging a discriminatory pattern or practice; "[a] statistical study may fall short of proving the plaintiff's case, but still remain relevant to the issues in dispute." It was also an abuse of discretion to exclude on the ground of irrelevance a co-worker's testimony that the defendant's officials had made disparaging remarks about the ethnic group to which the plaintiff belonged, as such evidence was relevant to the defendant's prejudice and to whether the proffered race-neutral reasons were pretextual. In a Title VII class action against a defendant for discrimination in laying off and not rehiring women employees, EEOC v. Farmer Bros. Co., 31 F.3d 891 (9th Cir. 1994) , the Court held that evidence of sexual harassment by supervisory employees was relevant to prove that the defendant intentionally discriminated.

[c] Employment Discrimination Cases -- Remedial Actions by Employer

Swinton v. Potomac Corp., 270 F.3d 794 (9th Cir. 2001) : Affirming a judgment for an African-American plaintiff who alleged racial harassment in the workplace, the Court found no error in the exclusion of evidence that the defendant took steps to remedy the discrimination after suit was filed. The Court noted that post-charge remediation may be relevant to whether punitive damages are necessary to "teach the defendant a lesson." However, the evidence proffered here that supervisors underwent anti-harassment training two months after the defendant filed suit would have done little, if anything, to undermine the uncontroverted evidence that none of the supervisors involved in the harassment was ever disciplined.

[d] Employment Discrimination Cases -- Statistical Evidence

Bell v. Environmental Protection Agency, 232 F.3d 546 (7th Cir. 2000) : EPA employees who had been denied promotions brought Title VII claims based on race and national origin discrimination. Reversing summary judgment for the defendant, the Court held it was error not to have considered expert evidence that there were statistically significant differences between native and foreign born applicants in receiving promotions and that there were differences, although not statistically significant, regarding promotion of African-Americans. Although statistics cannot be used as the primary means of establishing discrimination in disparate treatment situations, they can be used in conjunction with other evidence of disparate treatment to show whether the alleged disparity is the result of discrimination.

[e] Employment Discrimination Cases -- Time-Barred Conduct Evidence

Rivera-Torres v. Ortiz Velez, 341 F.3d 86 (1st Cir. 2003) : In an action alleging employment discrimination motivated by political animus, the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff, finding no abuse of discretion when evidence was admitted regarding allegations that the Judge had dismissed before trial as time-barred. The evidence was relevant as background for the surviving claims that were being tried.

Taylor v. Western & S. Life Ins. Co., 966 F.2d 1188 (7th Cir. 1992) : Affirming in part a judgment for the plaintiffs in a Title VII action, the Court held that prior acts of racial discrimination not included in the EEOC charge were nevertheless relevant to show the plaintiff's reasonableness in believing he had been compelled to resign.

Kline v. City of Kansas City, Mo., Fire Dep't, 175 F.3d 660 (8th Cir. 1999) : In an employment discrimination action brought by female employees of the Fire Department, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to exclude evidence of incidents predating the limitations period with respect to a plaintiff's hostile environment claim. The plaintiff's offered evidence of discriminatory acts and working conditions was sufficient to constitute a continuing violation that began prior to the limitations period; it should have been admitted as " 'relevant background,' ... at the very least."

[11] Examples of Relevant Circumstantial Evidence

[a] Civil Cases

DCPB, Inc. v. City of Lebanon, 957 F.2d 913 (1st Cir. 1992) : The City defended a breach of contract action on the ground that the plaintiff consultant's charges were exorbitant. The Court held that evidence tending to show that the City withheld payment not because of overcharging but for purposes unrelated to the reasonableness of the invoices was probative of the City's real motives and thus relevant.

Schiavone Constr. Co. v. County of Nassau, 717 F.2d 747 (2d Cir. 1983) : In an action by a construction company to recover the cost of repair work on a sewage pipeline, the Court held it was proper to admit specifications for backfill material that had been revised when the county attempted to lower the cost of the project. The Court found that the superseded specifications were relevant to the contractor's claim that the materials the county decided to use in later specifications were not suitable.

Snyder Oil Corp. v. Samedan Oil Corp., 208 F.3d 521 (5th Cir. 2000) : In a dispute regarding development of a federal oil and gas lease on the Outer Continental Shelf, the applicable law is that of the on-shore State. For those purposes, the State boundaries are extended to the outer margin of the Shelf, with the official lines to be determined and published by a presidential agency. To date, no such determination has been made, so the Court held that boundaries determined by other federal agencies are relevant, because they "make it more probable that if the President does ever 'project boundaries' those boundaries will be consistent with these other agency determinations."

Cook v. Hoppin, 783 F.2d 684 (7th Cir. 1986) : Although the Court reversed a judgment for a landlord in a suit by a tenant's visitor who sustained injuries in a fall from an exterior stairway, it found that a witness was properly permitted to testify that during one evening in the winter of 1979 she had heard two men arguing and had later seen one man lying on the ground near the spot where the plaintiff had fallen. Although she could not place the incident within a strict time frame or identify the fallen man, the Court concluded that the likelihood of two such occurrences happening in one winter was small enough that the evidence was relevant.

Allied Sys., Ltd. v. Teamsters Local 604, 304 F.3d 785 (8th Cir. 2002) : The union was sued for breach of a collective bargaining agreement, after it struck without notice. The Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that a steward had threatened to kill one of the employer's administrators, since evidence of the threats and the employee's resulting termination was probative of the true reason for the work stoppages and thus whether they were a breach of the agreement. In Porchia v. Design Equip. Co., 113 F.3d 877 (8th Cir. 1997) , an employee in a food processing plant brought a product liability action against the manufacturer of a meat tenderizing machine in which his arm was severed. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the plaintiff's employer had been cited by OSHA after the accident, since the employer's liability for inadequate training and machinery controls tended to rebut the plaintiff's claim that the defendant's machine was the sole proximate cause of his injuries. In MDU Resources Group v. W.R. Grace & Co., 14 F.3d 1274 (8th Cir. 1994) , an action by a building owner for expenses in removing asbestos fireproofing, the defendant contended that there was no nonasbestos substitute available when the building was constructed in 1968. The plaintiff presented evidence that replacement with a particular substitute was technologically feasible in the early 1970s, but was not permitted to introduce the product's 1943 trademark because the trademark did not by itself show that the product would be an adequate substitute. The Court held that exclusion was an abuse of discretion, since the defendant was denying that a substitute even existed in 1968, not just that it was not feasible then.

Bearint v. Dorell Juvenile, 389 F.3d 1339 (11th Cir. 2004) : After an infant in a child safety seat was injured during a rear-end collision, a product liability action was brought against the seat's manufacturer on the ground that it was not crashworthy. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court held there was no error in admitting evidence that the car's front seat contributed to the plaintiff's enhanced injuries. Although evidence of the initial conduct causing the accident is irrelevant in a crashworthiness case (because the suit is not for the initial, but only the enhanced, injuries), here the evidence of the car seat's defect went only to the enhanced injuries, and the only way for the jury to determine the extent, if any, to which the child seat's manufacturer was liable for the enhanced injuries was to also determine the car manufacturer's role in enhancing the injuries.

[b] Examples of Relevant Circumstantial Evidence -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Russo, 104 F.3d 431 (D.C. Cir. 1997) : The defendant was convicted for perjury in telling a grand jury that he had been paid to clean a congressman's office, when in fact the money was paid over an eleven-year period to the defendant's wife for cleaning the congressman's home. Affirming, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to exclude evidence that the defendant's wife had a "penchant for cleaning" and had been observed doing so without charge over the years. Because the evidence was responsive to the prosecutor's expressed doubts that anyone would clean for free over a period of years because "she enjoys doing it," the evidence was not irrelevant.

United States v. Amaya-Manzanares, 377 F.3d 39 (1st Cir. 2004) : A defendant charged with use of a forged green card claimed that he did not know the card was a forgery. The Court reversed an in limine ruling that precluded the government from showing that the defendant entered the country illegally. The Court reasoned that an unlawful entrant who has not upgraded his status is more likely to have acquired the forged green card by buying it from someone who was obviously not a government agent authorized to issue it, because an unlawful entrant has a motive to buy a forged green card or because he would have been rebuffed if he had sought a green card from the INS, thus requiring resort to the black market. In a robbery conspiracy case, United States v. LiCausi, 167 F.3d 36 (1st Cir. 1999) , the Court held that evidence of a call made to one of the conspirators from a phone outside one of the stores robbed on the day prior to a robbery attempt was relevant circumstantial evidence that the conspirators had cased the store, decided to rob it, and did attempt to rob it. In United States v. Fahey, n14 the Court sustained mail and wire fraud convictions, finding that evidence of a television news show's report on the practices of a gold investment company was properly admitted. The company made changes in its sales presentations in response to the broadcast but failed to change the operation of the company. In United States v. Contenti, n15 the Court found that the loans made to a defendant before and after a fire were relevant to show his financial position and a motive to burn down his business in order to seek insurance proceeds.

United States v. Anglin, 169 F.3d 154 (2d Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed an armed robbery conviction, holding that there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the defendant's post-robbery cash expenditures, as his sudden wealth was relevant to rebut a mistaken identity defense. In a loansharking prosecution, United States v. Scotti, 47 F.3d 1237 (2d Cir. 1995) , the Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence of the victim's HIV infection and the defendant's knowledge of it. Although the evidence might have been relevant to whether the defendant would punch the victim in the face, that argument was not made until the parties had rested. In United States v. Amuso, n16 a prosecution of a mob boss for RICO and other offenses, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that a close associate's safe deposit box contained $200,000 in cash in a dog biscuit box. Together with testimony about the way the crime family's business was conducted and the modest incomes reported on the defendant's and his associate's tax returns, the evidence tended to make it more probable he was involved in illegal racketeering activities. In United States v. Simmons, n17 the Court affirmed RICO convictions arising out of a massive heroin distribution conspiracy, holding that evidence that the ringleader referred his attorney to other defendants and made benefactor payments to the attorney on their behalf was probative of a link among them. In United States v. Diaz, n18 the Court held that evidence of apparent cocaine-related events near a house on February 20 were relevant in a conspiracy prosecution charging cocaine transactions at that house on May 7 because, with other evidence, it had a tendency to make it more probable that the house was used on the latter date as a money "stash pad" for the charged cocaine operation.

United States v. Leftenant, 341 F.3d 338 (4th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possession of counterfeit bills, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of Secret Service records that documented the passing of counterfeit bills bearing identical serial numbers to those confiscated from the defendant. The fact that the serial numbers on the defendant's bills were identical to those in the Secret Service records made it reasonable to conclude that they were from the same source and were of similar stock and quality, and thus tended to prove that the defendant possessed counterfeit bills of such quality that they could be mistaken for real currency, and were therefore "counterfeit" within the meaning of the statute. In United States v. Russell, 971 F.2d 1098 (4th Cir. 1992) , the Court affirmed a murder conviction in a case in which no body or murder weapon was ever found, and held the following evidence relevant to the government's theory that the murder had been committed in a storage shed and the body transported to Pennsylvania and disposed of in a mine shaft: testimony that the defendant had purchased a gun; a tape recording of test firings conducted at the shed; testimony that the defendant had discussed the best means for committing suicide; expert testimony about blood splatter from a point-blank shot behind the ear; and testimony about the defendant's familiarity with Pennsylvania mining regions.

United States v. Brackett, 113 F.3d 1396 (5th Cir. 1997) : The defendant had been charged with knowing possession of marijuana with intent to distribute after marijuana had been found in his truck. He conceded possession but denied knowledge and was acquitted. A subsequent investigation led to his being charged with conspiracy to possess marijuana with intent to distribute, with the incident for which he was acquitted being one of the acts of the conspiracy. The Trial Judge denied his motion to dismiss the indictment on double jeopardy grounds, but granted a suppression motion against evidence from the previously charged incident. The Court reversed the suppression motion, holding that the evidence was highly relevant to whether the defendant participated in the conspiracy, even though it had not been sufficient to prove his guilt of the substantive offense beyond a reasonable doubt.

United States v. Duranseau, 19 F.3d 1117 (6th Cir. 1994) : In a prosecution for making false statements in a financial affidavit supporting a request for court-appointed counsel, the government sought to prove that the defendant used false names in order to conceal income and real estate. The Court held that evidence found in the defendant's home, including the title of a book about getting new ID and disappearing, a note containing references to deceased parties, and a death certificate and automobile license documents containing names the defendant allegedly used was relevant to prove the defendant was using aliases.

United States v. Sweeney, 688 F.2d 1131 (7th Cir. 1982) : In a drug conspiracy case, the Court found that evidence of glassware apparently being used for innocent purposes was properly admitted because it could readily have been assembled into an apparatus for making drugs.

United States v. Westbrook, 896 F.2d 330 (8th Cir. 1990) : The Court held in a prosecution for offenses involving amphetamine that the identity of the substance sold or manufactured could be proven by circumstantial evidence, including the name by which members of the conspiracy referred to the substance.

United States v. Blaylock, 20 F.3d 1458 (9th Cir. 1994) : The Court reversed a firearm conviction, holding it was error to exclude medical records of the defendant offered to show that he was receiving medical treatment for a bad back at the time of his arrest. These records might have cast doubt on police officers' testimony that they saw the defendant running with a gun in his hand.

United States v. Higgins, 282 F.3d 1261 (10th Cir. 2002) : Affirming convictions for methamphetamine offenses, the Court held that evidence that a defendant made three purchases of iodine from a chemical supply store was relevant even if it did not dispositively show that the iodine found at the methamphetamine lab was his. The Court quoted with favor from the government's brief: "People who buy large quantities of precursor chemicals are more likely to manufacture methamphetamine than are persons who do not purchase large quantities of precursor chemical."

[12] Experts

United States v. Carter, 522 F.2d 666 (D.C. Cir. 1975) : The defendant's conviction for offenses related to a burglary was reversed because "doodles" that he made during the trial were admitted into evidence for comparison with a photo of a "doodle" found at the scene of the crime. An FBI agent testified that there was insufficient time to make a comparison of the handwriting and that more experienced agents concluded that there were insufficient points of comparison to warrant a conclusion as to whether the same "doodler" did all of the drawings. The Court concluded (2-1) that without expert evidence to support the comparison, "the exhibits, as offered, were not possessed of probative value."

United States v. Onumonu, 967 F.2d 782 (2d Cir. 1992) : The defendant, charged with knowingly smuggling heroin from Nigeria in his alimentary canal, asserted he thought he was smuggling diamonds and offered an expert to testify to the feasibility and prevalence of smuggling diamonds in the same manner from Nigeria. The Court held it was error to exclude the testimony, as it was relevant to the defendant's subjective belief, did not fall under any of the Rule 403 exceptions to admissibility, and would have been helpful to a New York jury unlikely to be familiar with diamond smuggling out of Nigeria and even less so about the feasibility of smuggling diamonds by swallowing condoms. In United States v. Torniero, n19 a prosecution for transportation of stolen goods, the government's motion to exclude expert testimony on compulsive gambling was granted. Affirming, the Court stated that "we do not believe that an hypothesis subscribed to by only a small number of professionals establishes that a proposed defense can carry the day on relevance." Assuming arguendo that compulsive gambling could be a mental disease or defect, the Court agreed that there was no demonstrable connection betweenwith this mental disease or defect and the offense charged in this case, so the proffered evidence was irrelevant. This result anticipated the Supreme Court's holding in Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., that expert testimony could be excluded on relevance grounds if it did not connect with or "fit" the facts (see the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 702, § 702.02[6]).

Saldana v. Kmart Corp., 260 F.3d 228 (3d Cir. 2001) : The Court affirmed a summary judgment granted against the plaintiff in a slip-and-fall case, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony from a safety expert. The expert's conclusion that the defendant was negligent because it failed to follow OSHA regulations applied an incorrect legal standard and was therefore irrelevant. Her conclusion (offered on the issue of constructive notice) regarding the time it would take a bottle of wax to empty and cause a puddle like that in the case was based on tests of questionable accuracy and provided no assistance on the essential question when the spill commenced or concluded. In an asbestos case, Blancha v. Raymark Indus., 972 F.2d 507 (3d Cir. 1992) , the plaintiffs' theory was that all asbestos could cause the decedent's mesothelioma; the defendant's expert indicated that asbestos products containing chrysotile did not cause mesothelioma. Reversing a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court held that the expert's testimony was relevant, given the theory advanced and the plaintiffs' burden of proof on proximate causation, and that the danger of confusion did not so clearly outweigh the probative value of the expert's testimony as to justify exclusion.

United States v. Gillis, 773 F.2d 549 (4th Cir. 1985) : The Court affirmed a defendant's convictions for involvement with stolen property and held that expert testimony concerning pathological gambling was properly excluded where there was no causal connection between the condition and the offenses charged.

United States v. Dixon, 413 F.3d 520 (5th Cir. 2005) : In a prosecution for making a false statement to purchase a firearm, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of expert evidence, offered in support of a duress defense, concerning the psychological effects on the defendant of physical abuse by a boyfriend. The expert's testimony described the defendant's subjective perceptions, so it was not relevant to the issue at hand, whether those perceptions were "well-grounded" or objectively reasonable under the circumstances, and wholly conclusory assertions regarding that issue did not make the testimony admissible. In United States v. Willis, 38 F.3d 170 (5th Cir. 1994) , the Court held it was not an abuse of discretion to exclude expert evidence that the defendant suffered from battered woman syndrome, which was offered in support of her duress defense to a charge of carrying a firearm during a drug transaction. The syndrome evidence bears on the defendant's subjective susceptibility to coercion, so it is irrelevant to the duress defense, which employs an objective standard.

United States v. Hartmann, 958 F.2d 774 (7th Cir. 1992) : A man was murdered as part of a scheme by his wife and others to defraud life insurance companies. The Court held that even though only fraud was charged, it was not an abuse of discretion to admit expert testimony regarding the brutal manner in which the victim was slain, since the evidence provided corroboration and enhanced the credibility of conspirators' out-of-court admissions. In United States v. Davis, n20 the Court upheld convictions for defrauding the government, finding no error in exclusion of expert testimony concerning the defendant's compulsive gambling that was offered to support an insanity defense. The witness had not shown that she was qualified to testify on the disputed issues, and there was no nexus shown between the gambling and the failure to refrain from stealing money.

United States v. Hernando Ospina, 798 F.2d 1570 (11th Cir. 1986) : Affirming convictions for various financial reporting requirement offenses growing out of a scheme to launder drug proceeds, the Court found that testimony by dog handlers that narcotic detector dogs reacted positively to the presence of narcotic residue on currency was relevant.

[13] Failure To Produce Evidence

Simon v. Commissioner, 830 F.2d 499 (3d Cir. 1987) : Affirming a Tax Court determination of deficiencies, the Court reasoned that it was permissible to infer from the failure of the taxpayers to adduce testimony from persons who were substantially involved in structuring financial transactions that their testimony would not have supported the taxpayer's claim that the transactions were engaged in to make a profit. In Gumbs v. International Harvester, Inc., n21 the Court vacated a judgment for the plaintiff in a product liability action, noting that it would be improper to instruct the jury that it could draw an adverse inference from the defendant's failure to produce certain evidence. The Court recognized that "[t]he unexplained failure or refusal of a party ... to produce evidence that would tend to throw light on the issues authorizes, under certain circumstances, an inference or a presumption unfavorable to such party," but it found that there was no indication on the facts that the defendant either had the missing evidence or had wilfully destroyed it.

King v. Illinois Cent. R.R., 337 F.3d 550 (5th Cir. 2003) : In a personal injury action by a motorist who struck boxcars occupying a crossing at night, the plaintiff claimed that an adverse inference should be drawn against the railroad because it allegedly destroyed both a signal and maintenance records before trial. The Court held that federal rather than state law governed the evidentiary effect of spoliation in diversity actions, and that an adverse inference was not called for because there was no showing that the defendant had acted in bad faith. In United States v. Wilson, 322 F.3d 353 (5th Cir. 2003) , the Court reversed a conviction for money laundering because of insufficient evidence that the Justice Department's Office of International Affairs actually sent an official request for assistance to the Commonwealth of the Bahamas, thereby tolling the statute of limitations. The government had failed to call a single witness with personal knowledge of the purported official request, even though all three government employees involved were still in the government's employ at the time of the hearing, so the Judge should have drawn a "particularly strong" adverse inference against the government.

Tyler v. White, 811 F.2d 1204 (8th Cir. 1987) : Affirming a judgment for prison officers sued by inmates, the Court found it was error (but harmless) to rule that counsel for some defendants could ask the jury to infer from the plaintiffs' failure to call other defendants as witnesses that their testimony would have been unfavorable to the plaintiffs. Where, as in this case, a witness would likely be prejudiced against a party, no such inference is proper.

United States v. Tory, 52 F.3d 207 (9th Cir. 1995) : In a trial for armed bank robbery, the bank teller testified that the defendant had a gun stuffed in the waist of his pants, but the defendant argued that he was wearing sweatpants during the robbery, and thus he could not have been carrying a gun in his waistband since the gun would have fallen from his sweatpants as he ran from the bank. Reversing, the Court held, inter alia, that it was an abuse of discretion to prohibit defense counsel from arguing that the prosecution could have resolved the factual dispute by simply presenting the bank surveillance photos in its possession. The defense "should have been allowed to argue that the government's failure to produce relevant evidence within its control gives rise to an inference that the evidence would be unfavorable to it."

[14] Identity

United States v. Foster, 986 F.2d 541 (D.C. Cir. 1993) : The Court reversed a conviction for distributing crack cocaine because the defense had not been permitted to cross-examine officers about their ability to identify other persons they mentioned in connection with the transaction. The answers to the questions would have made it more or less probable that the officers had correctly identified the defendant, so relevancy objections should have been overruled. Under the Rules, evidence is either relevant or it is not; there is no such thing as "marginally relevant" evidence.

United States v. Ewings, 936 F.2d 903 (7th Cir. 1991) : Affirming the defendant's conviction for fraudulently procuring insurance policies on his niece's life, the Court held that evidence he engaged in a colorful spending spree with the insurance proceeds should not have been admitted on the issue of his intent or motive, but it was relevant to rebut his argument that insurance agents who took the applications had committed the fraud.

[15] Impeachment

[a] Impeachment -- Generally

United States v. Brown, 938 F.2d 1482 (1st Cir. 1991) : Affirming convictions for passing counterfeit notes, the Court held it was error, but harmless, to exclude evidence that State Court proceedings against a prosecution witness had been dropped the day after he testified, as the evidence clearly went to the issue of bias. In United States v. Goguen, n22 the Court held that evidence about the size of a fire was properly admitted in a prosecution for making a false statement to show that the defendant would have remembered whether he was in the vicinity of the fire.

United States v. Goldin, 311 F.3d 191 (3d Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed convictions of protesters at a National Historic Park, finding no abuse of discretion when the defendants were not permitted to impeach the camera operator who videotaped the demonstration with questions about his membership in a group that had criticized the protesters in the past. Since the tape showed scenes of what actually happened during the discretion, any possible bias of the operator "would have been marginally relevant at best."

United States v. Benson, 941 F.2d 598 (7th Cir. 1991) , amended, 957 F.2d 301 (7th Cir. 1992) : Reviewing a tax evasion conviction, the Court noted that a witness' statement advising jurors in criminal tax cases to vote not guilty regardless of the law was probative on whether the witness might not regard an oath as binding.

United States v. Spetz, 721 F.2d 1457 (9th Cir. 1983) : Affirming convictions on drug charges, the Court found that a book concerning drugs was properly admitted to impeach a father's claim on direct examination that he had no inkling that his son (a defendant) knew about drug dealing, since the father had admitted reading or looking through the book and talking about it with his son.

Whiteley v. OKC Corp., 719 F.2d 1051 (10th Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff in a breach of warranty action for personal injuries from defective propane. The Court noted that as a general rule it is impermissible to admit evidence of a party's financial condition "unless necessary to determine the damages sustained," but it found that the defendant opened the door to testimony about its financial condition by eliciting testimony that was intended to show its impecunious condition.

United States v. Hands, 184 F.3d 1322 (11th Cir. 1999) : In a cocaine prosecution the defendant's wife testified that she had never witnessed any drug dealing on their property and that she had been home full time caring for children. When cross-examining the defendant, the prosecutor elicited testimony that the defendant had been charged with beating his wife, and then introduced six color photos taken of the wife shortly after the abuse. Reversing, the Court found that the evidence was irrelevant and unduly prejudicial. The evidence did not impeach the wife's testimony, because she had not testified about her relationship with her husband. The Court also found that cross-examination of the defendant concerning revocation of a handgun permit was irrelevant and reasoned that "the government could not bootstrap irrelevant evidence into the trial by using it to impeach the answers to irrelevant questions."

[b] Impeachment -- Rebuttal

United States v. Edwards, 388 F.3d 896 (D.C. Cir. 2004) : At a trial for felon firearm possession, the arresting officer testified that he apprehended the defendant after a chase that ended when the officer knocked a gun from the defendant's hand. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the officer was permitted to testify on redirect examination that he had chased the defendant because the defendant ran from him, and people who had run from him in the past had been carrying guns or drugs. Although the redirect testimony would not have been relevant had it been offered on direct examination, it became relevant to rebut cross-examination that suggested the officer had given chase in order to harass the defendant after having been incensed by the defendant's vulgarity and profanity.

[16] Inconsistent Witnesses

United States v. Roman, 728 F.2d 846 (7th Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiring to distribute LSD, rejecting an argument that it was error not to strike the testimony of two witnesses as being too inconsistent and confusing. The credibility of the witnesses was a question for the jury.

[17] Innocent Explanations

United States v. Martel, 792 F.2d 630 (7th Cir. 1986) : Affirming convictions of a defense contractor and two principal officers for conspiring to make false statements to the United States, the Court held that a letter from an employee of the contractor to one of the individual defendants was properly admitted even though its author testified and offered an innocent explanation for it. The Court observed that "a rule requiring a trial judge to accept as true a witness' testimony would eviscerate the jury's historic function of assessing the credibility of witnesses."

[18] Intent, Knowledge, Motive, Plan

[a] Civil Cases

Williams v. Borough of West Chester, Pa., 891 F.2d 458 (3d Cir. 1989) : The Court affirmed a summary judgment for the defendants in a civil rights action brought on behalf of an arrestee who hanged himself in his cell, holding that an affidavit stating that the arrestee's suicidal tendencies were widely known in the police department would be admissible to contradict the defendant officers' denial of such knowledge, but it was insufficient to create a genuine issue of material fact.

Jackson v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 750 F.2d 1314 (5th Cir. 1985) (en banc), modifying 727 F.2d 506 (1984) : In an action by a former shipyard worker against manufacturers of asbestos, the Court held that letters written to and by the defendants were relevant on the question whether these defendants knew or should have known of the dangers of asbestos. Although the letters referred to other groups of workers, not to shipyard workers, the Court reasoned that "[a] study indicating that exposure to asbestos fibers is likely to cause harm to one group of workers is at least suggestive of the fact that other groups of workers who are also exposed to asbestos fibers face similar dangers." In Dartez v. Fibreboard Corp., n23 another worker's suit against asbestos manufacturers, the Court held that a physician, who had worked for one manufacturer, could testify as to scientific studies linking exposure to asbestos and disease and the extent of dissemination of these studies throughout the asbestos industry. It concluded that one manufacturer's knowledge was a proper basis for concluding that other manufacturers should have had similar knowledge. In Aetna Cas. & Sur. Co. v. Guynes, n24 an insurance company claimed arson by the insureds under a home fire insurance policy, and also that the insureds had misrepresented facts in seeking to recover on the policy. Affirming a judgment for the insureds, the Court held it was proper to exclude evidence that one of the insureds was allegedly involved in a conspiracy with a close relative to commit insurance fraud, since there was no evidence tying that fraud to an intent to commit arson.

Bilski v. Scientific Atlanta, 964 F.2d 697 (7th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in a product liability action for injuries suffered when the plaintiff slipped while cleaning snow and ice off a satellite dish, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by the plaintiff's witnesses about other falls from satellite dishes, as none had resulted in injuries reported to the defendant, so the testimony would have had little if any tendency to prove a risk foreseeable to the defendant.

Borden, Inc. v. Florida E. C. R. Co., 772 F.2d 750 (11th Cir. 1985) : The Court reversed a judgment for a railroad because evidence of a prior incident of vandalism, similar to the one that resulted in the accident giving rise to this case, was improperly excluded. The evidence was relevant to show that the railroad had reason to know of a problem with its equipment. Exclusion was especially damaging because the railroad had argued that no similar vandalism had occurred previously. In a personal injury action arising out of the discharge of an army revolver that had been dropped, Johnson v. Colt Indus. Operating Corp., n25 the Court said that a judicial opinion in another case was admissible to prove the manufacturer's knowledge of similar accidents.

[b] Intent, Knowledge, Motive, Plan -- Criminal Cases

United States v. St. Michael's Credit Union, 880 F.2d 579 (1st Cir. 1989) : In a prosecution of a credit union and its bookkeeper for failing to file currency transaction reports, the government offered evidence that the bookkeeper's father was involved in a gambling operation as probative of her motive and intent in failing to file the reports. The Court held that the evidence was irrelevant because there was no evidence the bookkeeper knew of her father's gambling activities, and its admission was prejudicial error because she might have been convicted on guilt by association. In United States v. Nichols, n26 the Court affirmed convictions for conspiracy and theft of government property, holding that evidence offered by a defendant who was employed as a Customs officer that Customs may have "set him up" in retaliation for an investigation he had made was irrelevant. It observed that no entrapment defense was raised and no motion was made to dismiss the indictment on vindictive prosecution grounds. In United States v. Goguen, n27 a prosecution for knowingly making a false statement to a grand jury, the Court upheld the exclusion of recantation evidence. It found that a false statement prosecution, unlike a perjury prosecution, which requires proof of an intent to deceive, requires the government to prove only that the defendant knew he was making false statements. The Court reasoned that a later retraction may be excluded as tangential when the only question is knowledge at the time of the testimony.

United States v. Schultz, 333 F.3d 393 (2d Cir. 2003) : The defendant was convicted of conspiracy to receive stolen property in a scheme to import Egyptian antiquities. The prosecution introduced evidence that persons with whom the defendant had dealt, and the defendant's own employee, were aware that Egypt claimed ownership of all antiquities found after 1983. The Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence, as widespread awareness of the Egyptian claim was relevant to whether the defendant, who had long worked in the field, knew that Egypt owned the antiquities and thus knew they were stolen. In United States v. Harwood, 998 F.2d 91 (2d Cir. 1993) , the Court held it was error to permit DEA agents to testify that they learned from intelligence sources that the defendant had a large supply of LSD. This was inadmissible hearsay and it could not be offered as "background" to explain why the officers approached the defendant for an undercover buy, because the officers' motive in approaching the defendant were irrelevant to the case. In United States v. Biaggi, 909 F.2d 662 (2d Cir. 1990) , the Court reversed a defendant's convictions in a political corruption case because evidence that he had denied knowledge of others' wrongdoing, at a time when admitting such knowledge would have secured him immunity, was erroneously excluded. This evidence of "consciousness of innocence" tended to preclude a finding that he had knowledge of the wrongdoing.

United States v. Copple, 24 F.3d 535 (3d Cir. 1994) : In a mail-fraud prosecution arising from a scheme to invest "pre-need" funds of funeral directors, the Court held that evidence of the extent of the victims' losses could be probative of the defendant's intent to convert the funds to his personal use. However, the victims' testimony about the personal tragedies they suffered was unfairly prejudicial (but the error in admitting that evidence was harmless).

United States v. Sanders, 404 F.3d 980 (6th Cir. 2005) : In a prosecution for felon firearm possession, there was evidence that the ammunition in a gun seized from the defendant had moved in interstate commerce but not that the gun itself had. Affirming, the Court held that burglary tools found in a backpack seized from the defendant's car at the time of his arrest were properly admitted as probative of his knowing possession of the ammunition, since the ammunition "could be considered a tool of the burglary trade and useful in protecting ill-gotten booty."

United States v. Ewings, 936 F.2d 903 (7th Cir. 1991) : Affirming the defendant's conviction for fraudulently procuring insurance policies on his niece's life, the Court held that evidence he engaged in a colorful spending spree with the insurance proceeds should not have been admitted on the issue of his intent or motive, but it was relevant to rebut the defendant's argument that insurance agents who took the applications had committed the fraud. In United States v. Touloumis, n28 the Court upheld the admission in an extortionate credit prosecution of a gun found on a person other than the defendant. One means of the defendant's collecting a debt was the threat of violence from this other person.

United States v. Yockel, 320 F.3d 818 (8th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed a bank robbery conviction, holding the defendant was not denied a fair opportunity to present a defense when evidence of his history of mental illness was excluded. Since intent is not an issue in bank robbery, a general intent crime, and the defendant had withdrawn an insanity defense, the evidence was irrelevant. In United States v. Swink, 21 F.3d 852 (8th Cir. 1994) , the Court reversed perjury convictions for, inter alia, excluding testimony by the defendant's father. The father was a participant in the events and would have testified that the defendant did not fully understand the bond transactions he had entered into. The Trial Judge erred in concluding that the defendant knew his conduct was illegal, since that was a jury question and the father's testimony might have persuaded the jury that the defendant lacked criminal intent. In United States v. Eckmann, n29 the Court reversed a conviction for receiving stolen merchandise, finding it was error to admit evidence showing that other prospective purchasers of the merchandise decided not to buy. This evidence was irrelevant to the appellant's intent and may have suggested to the jury that somehow he should be held to a standard of what others did rather than to a knowledge standard.

United States v. Hernandez-Miranda, 601 F.2d 1104 (9th Cir. 1979) : The Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit evidence that a defendant charged with smuggling heroin in an auto had previously carried marijuana across the border in a backpack, since there was no logical basis to connect the two events. Unfortunately, the definition of relevance used by the Court was that it must be "more probable than not" that a person who has knowingly smuggled marijuana on his person will know of the presence of contraband concealed in a vehicle. This is the wrong test of relevance. The evidence would have been relevant if it had "any tendency" to make intent seem more likely than if there were no such evidence. Of course, a Rule 403 balancing analysis still might have warranted exclusion, but the Court never reached the stage of balancing in this case.

United States v. Kelly, 888 F.2d 732 (11th Cir. 1989) : The Court reversed a criminal defense attorney's conviction for conspiring with clients to distribute cocaine on the ground, inter alia, that he should have been permitted to testify regarding his understanding of his professional obligations as an attorney, as that would have been relevant to the crucial issue of his state of mind regarding his dealings with his clients.

[19] Invocation of Privilege

[a] Nonparty Witness

[i] Civil Cases

Brink's, Inc. v. City of New York, 717 F.2d 700 (2d Cir. 1983) : The City brought an action against Brink's claiming that the company's employees stole parking meter revenues. Brink's filed a third-party claim for indemnification against 16 employees. In pretrial depositions the suspected employees invoked the privilege against self-incrimination in response to questions about whether they ever stole money or knew of employees who did. The Trial Judge held that the employees could be called to testify against Brink's at trial even though they might well invoke the privilege again, saying that invocation of the privilege was relevant both in the City's action against Brink's and in the company's action for indemnification. After finding that there is no constitutional bar against drawing adverse inferences in a civil case from a witness' invocation of the self-incrimination privilege, the majority in the Court agreed that the probative value of the adverse inference was not outweighed by the prejudicial effect of the evidence. One Judge dissented, arguing that "permitting the systematic interrogation of witnesses on direct examination by counsel who knows they will assert the privilege against self-incrimination ... allows juries to draw prejudicial inferences from leading questions put to witnesses, denies parties the right to cross-examine, and is an invitation to sharp practices."

RAD Servs. v. Aetna Cas. & Sur. Co., 808 F.2d 271 (3d Cir. 1986) : Affirming a judgment for an insurer in an action by a company to recover costs incurred in disposing of hazardous waste, the Court held that a jury was properly permitted to infer from company agents' invocation during depositions of the self-incrimination privilege with respect to critical facts that their answers would have been adverse to the company. It reasoned that "[a]n employee's self-interest would counsel him to exculpate his employer, if possible." Although that was not equally true for past employees, the Court declined to hold invocations of the privilege to be per se inadmissible, since a witness bent on incriminating a former employer would likely offer damaging testimony rather than hope for an adverse inference, and an employer could stymie the discovery process by discharging employees potentially responsible for wrongdoing. In Lionti v. Lloyd's Ins. Co., n30 an action on a fire insurance policy, the insurer alleged that the insured burned down the building. A former employee called by the insurer to rebut a suggestion that this employee actually might have been responsible for the burning invoked the Fifth Amendment when asked whether he was involved in the fire. The insurer subsequently produced an investigator to testify that an hour before testifying, the witness had said that he had nothing to do with the fire. Because the Trial Judge told the jury that the witness' invocation of the privilege had no evidentiary value, the Court concluded that the investigator's testimony could not properly have been used to impeach the witness. Thus, it was hearsay and should not have been admitted, although the error was harmless. The dissenting Judge disagreed with the majority's implicit holding that a nonparty witness' invocation of the privilege could have evidentiary value.

FDIC v. Fidelity & Deposit Co., 45 F.3d 969 (5th Cir. 1995) : Affirming a judgment for the FDIC against a surety on an employee fidelity bond, the Court rejected the insurer's claim that "inferences from the invocation of the Fifth Amendment are not allowed when a non-party asserts the privilege." The Court reasoned that a jury could determine that a witness who colluded with a lending officer invoked the Fifth Amendment to avoid disclosing the collusion. While recognizing the concern "that a non-party who stands in no special relationship to the party at the time of trial may purposefully invoke the privilege solely to discredit the party," the Court rejected any categorical rule of exclusion and said this concern must be evaluated on a case-by-case basis.

Mayer v. Angelica, 790 F.2d 1315 (7th Cir. 1986) : The Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff in an action alleging racketeering and fraud in the sale of gemstones, holding that the assertion of the privilege at a deposition by a nonparty witness, a codefendant who had settled, could not be used to authenticate letters written by the codefendant. In Old Security Life Ins. Co. v. Continental Ill. Nat'l Bank & Trust Co., n31 the Court affirmed a judgment for a group insurance fund that had intervened in an action by an insurance company against a bank. The fund claimed a superior right to any recovery that the insurance company obtained. Since the insurance company failed to prove any malfeasance by the fund's trustees, it was unnecessary (although it otherwise would be possible) to draw an adverse inference against the fund from the fact that three trustees exercised their privilege against self-incrimination.

Cerro Gordo Charity v. Fireman's Fund Am. Life Ins. Co., 819 F.2d 1471 (8th Cir. 1987) : A charitable trust created by an insured's brother sued to recover the proceeds of life insurance policies after the insured was murdered; the defense was that the policies were obtained as part of a scheme to defraud the insurer. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court held that the company was properly permitted to call the insured's brother to the stand and to question him, despite knowledge that he would invoke his privilege against self-incrimination. Since the brother had been a member of the charitable entity, there was some reason to believe that he retained loyalty to the entity at the time of trial, and there was some evidence that he might have resigned from the entity as a matter of litigation strategy, so the Court held that it was proper to call the brother and permit the jury to infer from his unwillingness to testify that he probably did the acts alleged against him. In Rosebud Sioux Tribe v. A & P Steel, Inc., n32 a suit arising out of a contract to develop an irrigation system on the Tribe's land, the chairperson of a tribal subsidiary responsible for all land owned by the Tribe gave deposition testimony flatly contradicting the Tribe's complaint. The Tribe unsuccessfully objected to admission of the deposition, while the defendant successfully objected to the Tribe's calling the witness to the stand, since it was clear he would invoke his self-incrimination privilege. After entry of judgment for the defendant, the witness admitted before a federal grand jury that he had perjured himself during the deposition. This was enough, the Court found, to warrant a new trial. The Court went on to say that the Tribe should have been allowed to call the witness to the stand despite his intention to invoke the privilege, reasoning that the Tribe could not cross-examine the witness and "[o]nce the deposition was allowed into evidence, it was necessary to allow the Tribe to call [the] witness in order to offset the unfair advantage A & P gained by being allowed to use the deposition."

[ii] Invocation of Privilege -- Nonparty Witness -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Reyes, 362 F.3d 536 (8th Cir. 2004) : Affirming drug-related convictions, the Court found no abuse of discretion in precluding the defendants from calling an alleged coconspirator to have him invoke his privilege against self-incrimination in the presence of the jury. The Court reasoned that "[v]ery rarely will these rules [401 and 403] allow a party to argue inferences from a witness's privilege invocation," "due to the courtroom drama an invocation creates, the jury is likely to place far too much emphasis upon an ambiguous invocation," and therefore "absent extraordinary circumstances, trial courts should exercise their discretion to forbid parties from calling witnesses who, when called, will only invoke a privilege." In United States v. Doddington, 822 F.2d 818 (8th Cir. 1987) , the Court said that "a defendant does not have the right to call a witness to the stand simply to force invocation of the right against self-incrimination in the presence of a jury," since neither side may benefit from inferences drawn from assertion of the privilege. The entire testimony of a defense witness who refused to answer questions on cross-examination was held properly stricken.

United States v. Larranaga, 787 F.2d 489 (10th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed a perjury conviction, finding no error in the exclusion of evidence that a government witness previously refused to testify before a grand jury on self-incrimination grounds, as the evidence lacked probative value. In United States v. Hart, n33 the Court affirmed firearms convictions, finding that the Trial Judge properly refused to permit the defendant to force a witness to assert his privilege against self-incrimination before the jury. Since the jury could draw no inference from the privilege claim, the Court found that the defendant had no right to have the jury hear the witness claim his privilege.

[b] Invocation of Privilege -- Party Witness

Brink's, Inc. v. City of New York, 717 F.2d 700 (2d Cir. 1983) : The City brought an action against Brink's claiming that the company's employees stole parking meter revenues. Brink's filed a third-party claim for indemnification against 16 employees. In pretrial depositions the suspected employees invoked the privilege against self-incrimination in response to questions about whether they ever stole money or knew of employees who did. The Trial Judge held that the employees could be called to testify against Brink's at trial even though they might well invoke the privilege again, saying that invocation of the privilege was relevant both in the City's action against Brink's and in the company's action for indemnification. After finding that there is no constitutional bar against drawing adverse inferences in a civil case from a witness' invocation of the self-incrimination privilege, the majority in the Court agreed that the probative value of the adverse inference was not outweighed by the prejudicial effect of the evidence. One Judge dissented, arguing that "permitting the systematic interrogation of witnesses on direct examination by counsel who knows they will assert the privilege against self-incrimination ... allows juries to draw prejudicial inferences from leading questions put to witnesses, denies parties the right to cross-examine, and is an invitation to sharp practices."

In re Tudor Assoc., Ltd., II, 20 F.3d 115 (4th Cir. 1994) : The Court held, in a bankruptcy proceeding to set aside a transfer of the debtor's property on grounds of fraud, that no inference could be drawn from the transferees' proper invocation of the attorney-client privilege to disqualify them as good-faith purchasers for value. In Morley v. Cohen, n34 a civil RICO action arising out of an allegedly fraudulent tax shelter, the Court held there had been no abuse of discretion in denying the defendant's motion in limine to restrict the scope of cross-examination if he should testify so that he would not have to assert his self-incrimination privilege before the jury regarding a pending criminal investigation of another fraudulent scheme. Drawing an adverse inference from a claim of the privilege is permissible in a civil action.

Farace v. Independent Fire Ins. Co., 699 F.2d 204 (5th Cir. 1983) : Affirming judgments for a husband and wife in their suit to recover fire insurance proceeds, the Court held there was no error in excluding evidence, offered to impeach the husband, that he had asserted his privilege against self-incrimination in a fire marshal's investigation. The evidence had little probative value, especially since the defendant conceded that the husband cooperated fully in its investigation, and a jury might attach undue weight to the claim of privilege.

Lenard v. Argento, 699 F.2d 874 (7th Cir. 1983) : In a civil rights action arising from the plaintiff's arrest at the scene of an auto accident, the Court upheld a ruling barring any inquiry into whether the defendant police officers invoked their self-incrimination privilege during internal police and grand jury investigations.

Allstate Ins. Co. v. James, 845 F.2d 315 (11th Cir. 1988) : The Court reversed a judgment voiding a home insurance policy, concluding that evidence that the homeowners refused to answer questions during a criminal investigation of a fire should have been excluded. The homeowners had cooperated on two occasions and could have inferred that they were the subject of an investigation, so "[t]he fact that they chose to exercise their Constitutional rights as explained to them upon the advice of their attorney provides little probative evidence of their involvement" and was prejudicial, particularly because the fire marshal testified concerning the refusal to answer questions and the jury was unaware that the homeowners were exercising their constitutional rights upon advice of counsel.

[i] Civil Rights and Employment Cases

See annotations under "Civil Rights Cases -- Irrelevant Evidence," § 401.03[2][a], and "Employment Discrimination Cases -- Irrelevant Evidence," § 401.03[10][a].

[ii] Irrelevant Evidence -- Civil Cases -- Damages Issues

Shatkin v. McDonnell Douglas Corp., 727 F.2d 202 (2d Cir. 1984) : In a suit by the mother of an airline passenger killed in a crash, the Court held there was no error in excluding evidence of her financial needs and of the deceased's probable future income. The mother had offered virtually no evidence that the deceased would support her or of the amount of any support he would offer, and because she was only a secondary beneficiary under the deceased's will, she would have received nothing had his wife lived.

Jimenez v. DaimlerChrysler Corp., 269 F.3d 439 (4th Cir. 2001) : The estate of a six-year-old sued for his wrongful death, incurred when the minivan in which he was riding was involved in an accident and he was thrown through the rear liftgate, which was allegedly defectively designed. Reversing a judgment for the plaintiff on other grounds, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that the driver of the minivan was a cause of the accident. The driver's negligence was irrelevant because the plaintiff's claim was for defects making the minivan not crashworthy rather than ones causing the accident, and because the driver's contributory negligence would not be imputed to affect the claims for the decedent's pain and suffering.

Phillips v. Western Co. of N. Am., 953 F.2d 923 (5th Cir. 1992) : In an oil rig worker's Jones Act case, the Court granted a new trial to determine whether disability and other payments he received following the accident were collateral benefits. Given the substantive rule under the Act denying a tortfeasor any reduction of its liability for payments from collateral sources, collateral benefits evidence would be irrelevant and should not be admitted. In Pregeant v. Pan Am. World Airways, n35 the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit evidence of cockpit conversations that the passengers could not hear in an action seeking damages for preimpact fear on the part of passengers killed in a plane crash.

Van Bumble v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 407 F.3d 823 (7th Cir. 2005) : A husband and wife moved for a new trial or additur in their slip-and-fall action after the jury found for the wife on her negligence claim, but determined she was 49% responsible, and found for Wal-Mart on the husband's loss of consortium claim. Affirming denial of the motions, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence of the plaintiffs' financial situation, including that they lacked medical insurance. Although they argued that the evidence was relevant to prove why the wife did not seek medical treatment for two years, the Court noted that Wal-Mart did not question why the wife did not seek treatment, so the evidence was irrelevant and would have been prejudicial on the damages issue.

[iii] Irrelevant Evidence -- Civil Cases -- Insurance Cases

American Home Assur. Co. v. Sunshine Supermarket, 753 F.2d 321 (3d Cir. 1985) : In an action on a fire insurance policy, the Trial Judge ruled in limine that evidence that the insured was not prosecuted for arson could be admitted if the company relied on opinions by local fire officials that the insured was responsible for the fire. Holding the ruling erroneous, the Court said that evidence of nonprosecution is not very probative, given the different standard of proof in civil and criminal cases and the discretion of a prosecutor not to bring charges. The nonprosecution evidence did not rebut the opinion testimony of fire officials and therefore should have been excluded.

Aetna Cas. & Sur. Co. v. Guynes, 713 F.2d 1187 (5th Cir. 1983) : The company claimed arson by the insureds under a home fire insurance policy, and also that the insureds had misrepresented facts in seeking to recover on the policy. Affirming a judgment for the insureds, the Court held it was proper to exclude evidence that one of the insureds was allegedly involved in a conspiracy with a close relative to commit insurance fraud, since there was no evidence tying that fraud to an intent to commit arson.

Kelly's Auto Parts, No. 1, Inc. v. Boughton, 809 F.2d 1247 (6th Cir. 1987) : In an action by insureds to recover on a fire insurance policy, the Court held that evidence that the insured's sole shareholder was not prosecuted for arson was properly excluded. The Court relied on cases that had reasoned as follows: a criminal prosecution might not be brought as a result of the exercise of prosecutorial discretion based upon factors not relevant to a civil suit, the decision not to prosecute was a type of opinion evidence that was not very helpful, and the burden of persuasion in a criminal prosecution is different from a civil suit. See also Salamey v. Aetna Cas. & Sur. Co., 741 F.2d 874 (6th Cir. 1984) (evidence that an insured's father changed ownership of his store a year after the insured's store burned down was irrelevant in a suit by the insured to recover on a fire insurance policy).

[iv] Irrelevant Evidence -- Civil Cases -- Liability for Accident, Defective Product, Malpractice, etc.

Connelly v. Hyundai Motor Co., 351 F.3d 535 (1st Cir. 2003) : Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff in an action arising from the death of a child when an airbag deployed in a collision, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence that the child's father, who was driving at the time of the accident, had twice been cited for driving his car without fastening the child's seatbelt. The evidence had no tendency to demonstrate that the father's use of the car was in a manner unforeseeable to the defendant manufacturer. In a seaman's personal injury action, Richards v. Relentless, Inc., 341 F.3d 35 (1st Cir. 2003) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in a Jones Act case, finding no error in the exclusion of evidence from a physician who began seeing the plaintiff three years after the accident. The plaintiff argued that the physician's diagnosis contradicted that of a doctor who had seen him earlier and thus cast doubt on whether he had adequate medical advice when he signed a release. The Court held that in the absence of proof linking the witness' evidence to the adequacy of the medical advice the plaintiff was receiving at the time he signed the release, such as testimony that the then-treating physician erred by failing to make the diagnosis made by the later physician, the evidence was irrelevant.

Schneider v. Revici, 817 F.2d 987 (2d Cir. 1987) : The Court remanded a medical malpractice action for a trial on an assumption of risk defense. The Court identified several items of evidence introduced by the plaintiff that were of doubtful relevance, including a suspension of the defendant's license and a suspension of Medicaid payments to a drug treatment program he administered some twenty years earlier, but declined to disturb the jury's finding of malpractice. Admission of the evidence was harmless, since the jury was told that the license and the payments were reinstated.

Saldana v. Kmart Corp., 260 F.3d 228 (3d Cir. 2001) : The Court affirmed a summary judgment granted against the plaintiff in a slip-and-fall case, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony from a safety expert. The expert's conclusion that the defendant was negligent because it failed to follow OSHA regulations applied an incorrect legal standard and was therefore irrelevant. Her conclusion (offered on the issue of constructive notice) regarding the time it would take a bottle of wax to empty and cause a puddle like that in the case was based on tests of questionable accuracy and provided no assistance on the essential question when the spill commenced or concluded.

Jaurequi v. Carter Mfg. Co., 173 F.3d 1076 (8th Cir. 1999) : The Court held in a product liability case that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony for the plaintiff by a mechanical engineer and a human factors engineer that the farm machinery at issue was unreasonably dangerous because the warnings on it were deficient in placement, design, orientation, and content. The evidence failed the reliability prong of Daubert, but an even more serious problem was its irrelevance. It was undisputed that the manufacturer's warnings had twice been painted over by other persons and there was substantial evidence that the plaintiff was fully aware of the danger that a warning would alert him to, so any inadequacies in the warnings could not be considered a cause in fact of his injuries. In Campbell v. Vinjamuri, 19 F.3d 1274 (8th Cir. 1994) , the Court affirmed a judgment against the plaintiff in a medical malpractice action, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that a defendant had failed the board-certifying examination in anesthesiology on several occasions, as his performance on a written or oral examination was not probative of his ability to meet the standard of care of properly positioning the plaintiff's head on the specific occasion.

Ahrens v. Ford Motor Co., 340 F.3d 1142 (10th Cir. 2003) : The plaintiff's decedent was killed when the tractor he was driving was hit by an unidentified motorist, throwing him to the ground, where the tractor ran over him. The plaintiff sued the tractor's manufacturer, alleging a defect because the tractor was not equipped with a rollover protection system, which includes a rollover bar and a seat belt, that is designed to protect the operator from rollover accidents and being thrown from the tractor. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant, the Court held that evidence regarding rollover accidents was irrelevant to whether the tractor was unreasonably dangerous because the case did not involve a rollover accident, so the evidence was properly excluded. In a medical malpractice action alleging improper diagnosis and treatment in a hospital emergency room, Phillips v. Hillcrest Medical Center, 244 F.3d 790 (10th Cir. 2001) , the Court found no abuse of discretion when the plaintiff's expert was not permitted to testify that prior drug use, which the patient failed to mention when providing his medical history, did not cause the infection from which he died. The Trial Judge had ruled that the cause of the infection was irrelevant to the negligence claim at issue, and the defendants offered no proof on the causation issue, so there was no need to offer the testimony.

[v] Irrelevant Evidence -- Civil Cases -- Other Cases

Fleet Nat'l Bank v. Anchor Media Television, Inc., 45 F.3d 546 (1st Cir. 1995) : After a new trial was granted in an interpleader action related to the sale of a television station, a witness who testified in the first trial was not permitted to testify in the second. The Court held there was no error, as the issues on which the witness had testified had been removed by judgment on them as a matter of law, so the testimony was irrelevant in the second trial.

Redman v. John D. Brush & Co., 111 F.3d 1174 (4th Cir. 1997) : Reversing a judgment against the manufacturer of a safe after it was burglarized and the plaintiff's coin collection was stolen, the Court held it was error to admit an advertisement describing a safe made by the defendant as "burglar deterrent." The advertisement appeared three years after the plaintiff bought his safe, it depicted a different model from the plaintiff's, and there was no showing that the ad, which had been placed by the dealer from whom the plaintiff bought the safe, had been authorized by the defendant.

Columbia Pictures TV, Inc. v. Krypton Broadcasting of Birmingham, Inc., 259 F.3d 1186 (9th Cir. 2001) : The defendant continued to broadcast four television series after its license was revoked for nonpayment of fees. The defendant was found liable for copyright infringement and the case was submitted to a jury for determination of statutory damages. Affirming, the Court found no error in the exclusion of a witness' testimony, which was relevant only to questions of liability, not to the damages issues before the jury.

Magnivision, Inc. v. Bonneau Co., 115 F.3d 956 (Fed. Cir. 1997) : The Court reversed a judgment for the defendant in a patent infringement action, holding that a defense based on improper procedures by the patent examiner during prosecution of the patent had been resolved by a summary judgment in favor of the plaintiff, so evidence of the allegedly improper procedures was irrelevant and prejudicial when offered at trial.

[b] Irrelevant Evidence -- Criminal Cases

[i] Drug Cases

United States v. Doe, 903 F.2d 16 (D.C. Cir. 1990) : A black American and two Jamaicans were jointly charged with drug offenses. The Court reversed their convictions, in part because a detective was permitted to testify to the modus operandi of Jamaican drug dealers and how the market "has been taken over basically by Jamaicans"; comments of the latter sort had no bearing on any issue in the trial and tended to link the charges to the defendants solely on the basis of the ancestry of two of them.

United States v. Spinosa, 982 F.2d 620 (1st Cir. 1992) : In a prosecution for cocaine distribution, the Court held it was an error (but harmless) to admit testimony by a detective that when he called three New York numbers on the defendant's telephone records, two connected to beepers and the third was disconnected. The calls were made six months after the transactions at issue and the detective had no information about who subscribed to the numbers at the earlier time when they were called from the defendant's phone; neither was there any evidence explaining the relevance to drug dealing that two of the numbers connected to beepers rather than to standard telephones.

United States v. Williams, 205 F.3d 23 (2d Cir. 2000) : The defendant was charged with traveling to Jamaica, buying drugs, and smuggling them into the United States. The Court found no error in the exclusion of evidence that the defendant had taken two previous trips to Jamaica and had not engaged in drug activity on those trips. The evidence was irrelevant, since a defendant "may not seek to establish his innocence through proof of the absence of criminal acts on specific occasions," and there was no contention that the defendant had engaged in criminal activity on the two previous trips to rebut.

United States v. Hernandez, 750 F.2d 1256 (5th Cir. 1985) : The Court reversed cocaine convictions because a government witness was permitted to testify that U.S. Customs had identified the defendant as a drug smuggler. The testimony was hearsay and could not be used to prove the state of mind of the witness, a DEA agent, since his state of mind was irrelevant. See also United States v. Hall n36(drug convictions reversed because testimony of a drug agent, offered to explain the absence of physical evidence, that it is not always possible to make a "controlled buy" in drug investigations added nothing to the government's case against the defendant).

United States v. Carter, 969 F.2d 197 (6th Cir. 1992) : The Court reversed a conviction for selling cocaine to FBI agents, holding it was error to admit evidence of the defendant's purchase of household items, his two bank loan applications, and his failure to file tax returns. As this prosecution did not involve either a continuing criminal enterprise or an allegation that the defendant lacked a legitimate source of income to support an affluent lifestyle, the evidence was irrelevant and extremely prejudicial.

United States v. Young, 20 F.3d 758 (7th Cir. 1994) : The Court affirmed a conviction for attempted possession of cocaine with intent to distribute, holding there was no error in an in limine ruling that precluded the defendant from introducing evidence that one of the people arrested along with him had been released and not criminally charged. Whether or not the other was charged would not make the facts relating to the defendant's knowledge and participation in the attempted purchase more or less probable. In United States v. Mancillas, n37 the Court affirmed drug convictions, noting that although testimony concerning an informant's tip to law enforcement agents was not hearsay (because the statement was offered for the purpose of explaining how the enforcement agents determined to make an investigation), the tip was irrelevant because it did not matter why law enforcement officers conducted an investigation. Admission of the evidence was harmless, however.

United States v. Moreno, 102 F.3d 994 (9th Cir. 1996) : The Court held in a prosecution for transporting cocaine base that evidence of the defendant's state of mind was irrelevant in the absence of evidence establishing a prima facie case of duress. In United States v. Robertson, 15 F.3d 862 (9th Cir. 1994) , rev'd on other grounds, 514 U.S. 669 (1995) , reinstated in pertinent part, 73 F.3d 249 (1996) the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit evidence that a drug dealer who had been trying to collect a debt from the defendant was never seen again after a car similar to the defendant's was observed at the drug dealer's house. The evidence, as well as evidence of the defendant's drug use and spousal abuse, did not tend to prove any material element of the cocaine distribution and RICO offenses charged. In United States v. Hernandez-Miranda, n38 the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit evidence that a defendant charged with smuggling heroin in an auto had previously carried marijuana across the border in a backpack, since there was no logical basis to connect the two events. Unfortunately, the definition of relevance used by the Court was that it must be "more probable than not" that a person who has knowingly smuggled marijuana on his person will know of the presence of contraband concealed in a vehicle. This is the wrong test of relevance. The evidence would have been relevant if it had "any tendency" to make intent seem more likely than if there were no such evidence. Of course, a Rule 403 balancing analysis still might have warranted exclusion, but the Court never reached the stage of balancing in this case.

[ii] Irrelevant Evidence -- Criminal Cases -- Fraud and False Statement Cases

United States v. Newman, 49 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1995) : The Court affirmed a conviction for fraud in connection with the defendant's acquisition of an insurance company, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding correspondence, offered as evidence of the defendant's state of mind, between the defendant and an investment firm. The correspondence was exchanged four months after the charged conduct, so it was not probative of the defendant's state of mind at the time in issue. In United States v. Brandon, 17 F.3d 409 (1st Cir. 1994) , the Court affirmed convictions for bank fraud arising out of a scheme to falsify down payments, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding defense evidence that 100% financing was common at the time, as a no-down-payment custom does not establish a fake down payment custom and it would have no relevance to whether the defendants knew of, or intended to violate, the bank's down payment requirement. In United States v. Goguen, n39 a prosecution for knowingly making a false statement to a grand jury, the Court upheld the exclusion of recantation evidence. It found that a false statement prosecution, unlike a perjury prosecution, which requires proof of an intent to deceive, requires the government to prove only that the defendant knew he was making false statements. The Court reasoned that a later retraction may be excluded as tangential when the only question is knowledge at the time of the testimony.

United States v. Prince-Oyibo, 320 F.3d 494 (4th Cir. 2003) : Affirming a conviction for using a counterfeit visa, the Court held that the defendant had not been denied his constitutional right to present a defense when he was not permitted to present evidence related to his fear of religious persecution. The evidence was irrelevant because the only issue for the jury was whether the defendant actually knew his visa to be counterfeit. While the testimony might have been relevant to counter a "willful blindness" instruction or in support of a duress defense, neither of those theories was made an issue in the case.

United States v. Lane, 323 F.3d 568 (7th Cir. 2003) : The defendant was charged with making false statements in loan applications by not disclosing a large outstanding debt. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that the lenders did not rely on the defendant's financial condition and that the lenders suffered no losses, since the statute under which the defendant was charged (18 U.S.C. § 1014) excludes any element of materiality or loss. In United States v. Catalfo, 64 F.3d 1070 (7th Cir. 1995) , the Court affirmed a conviction for wire fraud in an options trading scheme, holding there was no error in excluding testimony that an accomplice was unstable and that the defendant's mother would have given him any money needed to cover any losses. Evidence of the accomplice's instability did not make it any less likely he would have had a coconspirator, and there was no indication the defrauded firm knew of or had any legal basis for relying on the mother's alleged willingness to provide collateral.

[iii] Irrelevant Evidence -- Criminal Cases -- Other Cases

United States v. Carter, 522 F.2d 666 (D.C. Cir. 1975) : The defendant's conviction for offenses related to a burglary was reversed because "doodles" that he made during the trial were admitted into evidence for comparison with a photo of a "doodle" found at the scene of the crime. An FBI agent testified that there was insufficient time to make a comparison of the handwriting and that more experienced agents concluded that there were insufficient points of comparison to warrant a conclusion as to whether the same "doodler" did all of the drawings. The Court concluded (2-1) that without expert evidence to support the comparison, "the exhibits, as offered, were not possessed of probative value."

United States v. St. Michael's Credit Union, 880 F.2d 579 (1st Cir. 1989) : In a prosecution of a credit union and its bookkeeper for failing to file currency transaction reports, the government offered evidence that the bookkeeper's father was involved in a gambling operation as probative of her motive and intent in failing to file the reports. The Court held that the evidence was irrelevant because there was no evidence the bookkeeper knew of her father's gambling activities, and its admission was prejudicial error because she might have been convicted on guilt by association. In United States v. Nichols, n40 the Court affirmed convictions for conspiracy and theft of government property, holding that evidence offered by a defendant who was employed as a Customs officer that Customs may have "set him up" in retaliation for an investigation he had made was irrelevant. It observed that no entrapment defense was raised and no motion was made to dismiss the indictment on vindictive prosecution grounds.

United States v. Griffith, 284 F.3d 338 (2d Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed convictions for sexually exploiting a minor, holding there was no error in restricting the cross-examination of the victim as to her relationships with men in general, her father in particular, her drug use, and her sexual history. The evidence was not relevant and the jury was presented with sufficient evidence to assess credibility. In United States v. Bifield, n41 the Court held that a defendant charged with escape could not claim the benefit of a duress defense, and upheld a ruling excluding testimony concerning duress. It rejected the defendant's constitutional claim that the exclusion of the evidence denied him the right to testify in his own behalf.

United States v. Lancaster, 96 F.3d 734 (4th Cir. 1996) (en banc): In an assault prosecution arising out of a prison altercation, the defendants argued that they were acting in self-defense against other inmates, including one Davis. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that three days after the charged incident one of the defendants was assaulted by Davis' cousin, another inmate. There was no support for the defendant's theory that the later attack occurred because the first attempt had failed and no showing that Davis was associated with the later attack, so the evidence did not serve to illuminate the circumstances of the charged incident.

United States v. Ragsdale, 426 F.3d 765 (5th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed convictions for mailing obscene materials, finding no abuse of discretion when an attorney with experience trying obscenity cases in the locality was not permitted to testify about the verdicts in those cases. "Evidence of jury verdicts that declared comparable materials non-obscene does not assist the jury in determining whether the materials in question are obscene or non-obscene." In United States v. Kang, 934 F.2d 621 (5th Cir. 1991) , a prosecution for bribing an IRS agent, the defendant had stipulated to willful commission of the offense and asserted only an entrapment defense. The Court reversed his conviction, finding an abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the defendant's flight. It was not relevant to show his predisposition or the manner of the government's investigation; thus, it was not only inadmissible under Rule 403 balancing because of the risk of prejudice, but it was also inadmissible under Rule 401 on relevancy grounds. In United States v. Reeves, 892 F.2d 1223 (5th Cir. 1990) , the Court affirmed convictions for extortion, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence, offered on an entrapment defense, of a government witness' remote and unrelated contact with State officials, as it was not pertinent to the defendants' predisposition to commit the crimes charged.

United States v. Saadey, 393 F.3d 669 (6th Cir. 2005) : Affirming convictions for attempted extortion and filing false tax returns and credit applications, the Court found no error in the exclusion of evidence that an FBI investigator had a sexual relationship with the wife of a government witness and expressed his personal desire to obtain evidence against the defendant. The agent did not testify at trial or create any exhibits that were used as evidence, and thus his credibility was not relevant.

United States v. Westmoreland, 312 F.3d 302 (7th Cir. 2002) : Affirming a conviction of murder-for-hire in connection with drug trafficking, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to admit a letter purportedly authored by the defendant's wife and submitted at the sentencing hearing in the defendant's earlier drug trial. The letter was offered in support of the government's contention that the defendant's family sought to obstruct justice on numerous occasions. The Court found no relevance for the letter, since it was well established that the wife had not written it, the true author was never identified, there was no evidence that the defendant authorized or even knew of the letter when it was presented in the hearing, and there was no evidence that the wife used the letter to obstruct justice in this case. In United States v. Bouye, n42 the Court found no error in the exclusion of evidence in a bank robbery case that two witnesses would have identified the defendant as the man who robbed another bank, which was impossible since the defendant was in custody at the time the other bank was robbed. See also United States v. Hyman. n43

United States v. Gianakos, 415 F.3d 912 (8th Cir. 2005) : In a trial for kidnapping with a death resulting, the defendant sought to introduce a tape recording of a conversation in which he told his mother that he had received a letter from another inmate who had met the defendant's wife during her incarceration, and the letter stated that the wife admitted that she lied about the defendant's involvement in the crime during her testimony in a state trial. The defendant argued in response to a hearsay objection that his elation about the letter came within the state of mind exception, but the Court held that his elation had no tendency to make any consequential fact more or less probable. In United States v. Yockel, 320 F.3d 818 (8th Cir. 2003) , the Court affirmed a bank robbery conviction, holding the defendant was not denied a fair opportunity to present a defense when evidence of his history of mental illness was excluded. Since intent is not an issue in bank robbery, a general intent crime, and the defendant had withdrawn an insanity defense, the evidence was irrelevant. In United States v. Bear Ribs, n44 the Court affirmed a conviction for assault with intent to commit rape, and upheld the exclusion of evidence that the victim, when intoxicated, routinely undressed and exposed herself. There was no evidence in this case that the defendant or any other witness saw the victim in a nude or semi-nude condition and the defendant denied seeing the victim at all. In United States v. Eckmann, n45 the Court reversed a conviction for receiving stolen merchandise, finding it was error to admit evidence showing that other prospective purchasers of the merchandise decided not to buy. This evidence was irrelevant to the defendant's intent and may have suggested to the jury that somehow he should be held to a standard of what others did rather than to a knowledge standard.

United States v. Springer, 51 F.3d 861 (9th Cir. 1995) : The defendant, a nuclear weapons protester charged with failing to surrender for service of a sentence, asserted an affirmative defense of uncontrollable circumstances. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding expert testimony on the state of nuclear weapons testing at the time. The evidence was irrelevant because the defendant's beliefs and his desire to protest were not proper grounds for an uncontrollable circumstances defense. In United States v. Dean, 980 F.2d 1286 (9th Cir. 1992) , the Court held that statements accusing the defendant of criminal activity, made to a police officer, were improperly admitted for the nonhearsay purpose of explaining why the officer went to the defendant's home to arrest him. The Court stated that the officer's reasons for going to the defendant's home "are not of consequence to the determination of the action, i.e., they do not bear on any issue involving the elements of the charged offense."

United States v. Markey, 393 F.3d 1132 (10th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed a conviction for being a felon in possession of explosives. It rejected the defendant's argument that it was error to exclude evidence that the defendant's dynamite could not actually explode. The Court found that the actual explosive capacity of the materials was irrelevant under 18 U.S.C. § 842(i)(1).

United States v. Breitweiser, 357 F.3d 1249 (11th Cir. 2004) : The defendant was convicted for abusive sexual contact with a minor following an incident in which he rubbed a girl's thigh and allegedly masturbated while they were passengers on an airplane. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony from a doctor at a psychiatric clinic who examined the defendant eleven days after the incident. The doctor would have testified that the defendant suffered from a bipolar disorder and made "bizarre movements" during his hospitalization, which the defense claimed would explain the touching and the alleged masturbation. The Court concluded that the evidence "fails the relevance test" and was properly excluded under Rule 403.

[21] Jones Act Cases

Shade v. Great Lakes Dredge & Dock Co., 154 F.3d 143 (3d Cir. 1998) : In a personal injury case brought under the Jones Act, the plaintiff sought to prove that he was employed as a seaman by introducing evidence of his previous employment as a seaman with other employers as well as with the defendant. Reversing, the Court found that the plaintiff was not entitled to invoke the "Fleet Seaman Doctrine," which permits a seaman to aggregate his contacts with multiple vessels, unless the contacts occurred with vessels owned or controlled by the same employer. Therefore, the evidence of employment with other companies was irrelevant. As to evidence of prior employment with the defendant, the Court held that seaman status had to be determined with each new job, so "evidence of an employee's prior assignment with the same employer is not admissible under the Fleet Seaman Doctrine if those assignments were not part of a continuous employment relationship between the employer and the employee."

[22] Real Evidence

United States v. Alvarez, 358 F.3d 1194 (9th Cir. 2004) : In a drug smuggling prosecution, the Court found no abuse of discretion when hand-held radios seized from a defendant's home were admitted, although there was no evidence that the radios were functional or that they were compatible either with each other or with radios seized from other codefendants. The presence of the radios, including the specific brand used in the conspiracy, made it more likely that the defendant was heard on the radio and had given them out as witnesses had testified. The evidence was relevant, and the compatibility issue went to its weight, not its admissibility.

[23] Relationship to Other Rules

United States v. Meserve, 271 F.3d 314 (1st Cir. 2001) : Affirming convictions for robbery and firearms offenses, the Court found it was error (but harmless) to permit a detective to testify that he drove by the defendant's house on the night of the robbery because the defendant met the description of the robber given by eyewitnesses. The prosecution claimed that the testimony was not hearsay because it was offered to prove why the detective drove by the house, but the Court found that his motivation was irrelevant to any fact in dispute.

United States v. Harwood, 998 F.2d 91 (2d Cir. 1993) : The Court held it was error to permit DEA agents to testify that they learned from intelligence sources that the defendant had a large supply of LSD. This was inadmissible hearsay and it could not be offered as "background" to explain why the officers approached the defendant for an undercover buy, because the officers' motive in approaching the defendant was irrelevant to the case.

United States v. Gonzalez-Lira, 936 F.2d 184 (5th Cir. 1991) : At the trial of a defendant charged with smuggling marijuana into the United States in a tractor-trailer, the government introduced evidence that two years earlier a tractor-trailer owned by the defendant and driven by another man was stopped at the same border checkpoint and found to contain 2,000 pounds of marijuana. The Court held that even though the defendant was not charged in that incident, the evidence tended to show the thoroughness of the government's investigation, the defendant's awareness of means used to smuggle large quantities of marijuana, the defendant's awareness that his own rig had been used to smuggle marijuana, and the source of funds used to purchase the tractor involved in this case. The majority held that the evidence was not admissible under Rule 404(b), but was properly admitted under Rules 402 and 403; the concurring Judge believed that the evidence was admissible under Rule 404(b) to show knowledge and absence of mistake. In Lubbock Feed Lots, Inc. v. Iowa Beef Processors, Inc., n46 an action for the unpaid price of cattle, the Court analyzed the relationship of Rules 401-403, which exclude irrelevant evidence totally and permit relevant evidence to be excluded, with Rule 105, which requires a limiting instruction upon request after it is decided that evidence is relevant and is to be admitted.

United States v. Fountain, 2 F.3d 656 (6th Cir. 1993) : The Court held that information regarding the defendant's criminal activity, offered not for its truth but rather to explain why the agents searched where they did, was improperly admitted because the "reason Agent Primak searched the back bedroom simply was not a matter of dispute and was not in issue in this case." In Douglass v. Eaton Corp., 956 F.2d 1339 (6th Cir. 1992) , an action by an employee who alleged she was discharged on racial grounds following an altercation, the Court found no error when evidence of discipline imposed on other employees for fighting was admitted, as the evidence met the threshold test of relevance and the other situations were not distinguishable in whether the employees had been aggressors or victims in the fights. The concurring Judge believed that the Trial Judge had erred in granting a new trial by treating the admissibility question under Rule 104(a) alone instead of as a conditional relevancy issue to be submitted to the jury under Rule 104(b). In United States v. Williams, n47 evidence against the defendant, who was charged with attempted cocaine possession, included testimony that $3400 was confiscated from him when he was arrested, money the government claimed was to be used to make a cocaine purchase. The defendant offered testimony by an IRS employee that the defendant had stated that he owed $3300 in taxes and had expressed an intention to repay that amount if his mother sold a house and gave him the money. The defendant's statement to the witness qualified as a statement of a present intention to do a future act, a hearsay exception under Rule 803(3), but the statement was not probative and was inadmissible absent evidence that the mother had sold the house and given him money. This is simply a question of conditional relevance, governed by Rule 104(b).

United States v. Freeman, 816 F.2d 558 (10th Cir. 1987) : Affirming a conviction for dealing in counterfeit notes, the Court held that testimony concerning agents' discussions with an informant were not hearsay, since they were offered to show steps taken in the investigation rather than the truth of any statements that were made. The Court observed, however, that "out-of-court statements by informants offered to explain the background of an investigation, like all evidence, must be evaluated under the criteria in Rule Rules 401 and 403 for relevance and to prevent confusion or prejudice on the part of the jury."

[24] Relevancy Distinguished From Sufficiency

United States v. Williams, 264 F.3d 561 (5th Cir. 2001) : The Court affirmed the conviction of a former city councilman for conspiracy to commit extortion and solicitation of bribes. It upheld the admission of a summary chart detailing telephone calls between the defendant and other alleged conspirators. The Court agreed with the defendant that United States v. Galvan, 693 F.2d 417, 419 (5th Cir. 1982) , established that telephone records are insufficient evidence to support a conspiracy conviction unless the government can show who participated in the calls and the substance of their conversation, and that the government in this case could not prove who made the calls or their contents. The Court noted, however, that Galvan "did not hold that telephone records are inadmissible absent such a showing." It reasoned that, whether or not the government could prove who made the calls or their contents, "[e]vidence that telephone calls were made between phones owned by Defendant and other alleged conspirators, at times consistent with the events alleged to be part of the conspiracy, makes the existence of the conspiracy, and Defendant's participation in it, more likely."

[25] Remote Evidence

Sir Speedy, Inc. v. L & P Graphics, Inc., 957 F.2d 1033 (2d Cir. 1992) : After a jury verdict in an action over breach of a franchise agreement, the Trial Judge ruled that income projections made by the franchiser should not have been admitted in proof of the franchisee's damages because they predated the applicable limitations period. The Court reversed the judgment n.o.v., holding it was error to exclude the documents, as the statute of limitations only bars stale claims and is not a rule of evidence. A suggestion that evidence is too old goes to its relevance and to its weight, which is a matter for the jury.

United States v. Morris, 957 F.2d 1391 (7th Cir. 1992) : The Court held, in a prosecution for conspiring to defraud the United States arising out of the purchase of a nursing home at an inflated price, that evidence of a 1980 partnership buyback valuation was relevant to the 1984 value of the nursing home partnership.

[26] Similar Circumstance Evidence

[a] Accident and Injury Cases

[i] Absence of Other Accidents

DeMarines v. KLM Royal Dutch Airlines, 580 F.2d 1193 (3d Cir. 1978) : Reversing on other grounds a judgment for plaintiffs who sued for an alleged airplane accident, the Court noted that the Trial Judge should not have excluded evidence that no other claims arose out of the same flight. The plaintiff's own injury, and other proof the plaintiff introduced of an injurious effect upon the passengers, tended to show that an accident had occurred; the defendant's "proffered proof of an absence of other claims tends to prove the absence of other injuries and is, therefore, comparably relevant."

Hines v. Joy Mfg. Co., 850 F.2d 1146 (6th Cir. 1988) : The Court held that evidence of the lack of prior claims against the manufacturer of a mobile bridge unit was admissible to prove the absence of notice of any design defect in the unit.

Bilski v. Scientific Atlanta, 964 F.2d 697 (7th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in a product liability action for injuries suffered when the plaintiff slipped while cleaning snow and ice off a satellite dish, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the defendant's records of injuries involving its products, which showed no prior accidents of this sort.

Sturm v. Clark Equip. Co., 547 F. Supp. 144 (W.D. Mo. 1982) , aff'd, 732 F.2d 161 (8th Cir. 1984) : Holding that evidence of the absence of prior accidents was admissible where it was limited to the same model of machine involved in the accident giving rise to the suit, the District Court denied the plaintiff's motion for a new trial following a jury verdict for the defendant in a product liability case.

Pandit v. American Honda Motor Co., 82 F.3d 376 (10th Cir. 1996) : Affirming a judgment for an automobile manufacturer in a product liability case, the Court held that "evidence of the absence of similar accidents or claims is admissible as long as the proponent provides adequate foundation." That foundation requires a showing that a substantially similar product was used in settings and circumstances sufficiently similar to those surrounding the accident in dispute, so that a jury can connect past experience with the disputed accident. In this case there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the defendants, sued for defective design of an automobile warning light, to introduce evidence that there had been no other similar claims or accidents, as the evidence related to nearly 1.9 million automobiles using a warning light system of that design and there was no significant dissimilarity between the use of the car in the instant case and normal use of any other car with a system of the same design.

[ii] Similar Circumstance Evidence -- Accident and Injury Cases -- Miscellaneous Cases

Melton v. Deere & Co., 887 F.2d 1241 (5th Cir. 1989) : The Court noted that evidence of similar accidents postdating manufacture of the machine causing the plaintiff's injuries could show that the machine design was more dangerous than users contemplated. See also Jackson v. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. n48(error to exclude evidence of similar wheel rim accidents); Ramos v. Liberty Mut. Ins. Co. n49(error to exclude evidence of a prior, similar collapse of a mast of an offshore oil-drilling rig).

R.W. Murray Co. v. Shatterproof Glass Corp., 758 F.2d 266 (8th Cir. 1985) : In a suit for breach of warranty with respect to glass panels, the Court upheld the admission of evidence concerning other failures of similar panels.

Whiteley v. OKC Corp., 719 F.2d 1051 (10th Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff in a breach of warranty action for personal injuries from defective propane, finding no error in the admission of evidence of a subsequent accident at the defendant's yard, since the accident was consistent with testimony that the defendant had been delivering adulterated gas. In Ponder v. Warren Tool Corp., n50 the Court observed that the decision whether to admit similar circumstance evidence of accidents depends on the theory urged in a case. It found no error in this case where the Trial Judge took a conservative approach and excluded evidence.

[iii] Similar Circumstance Evidence -- Accident and Injury Cases -- Relevance Beyond Showing Defect or Negligence

Joy v. Bell Helicopter Textron, Inc., 999 F.2d 549 (D.C. Cir. 1993) : In a suit by estates of helicopter crash victims against the manufacturer of an engine, the Court held that evidence of two other engine failures was properly admitted. The Court noted that other accidents need not have occurred in precisely the same manner to qualify as substantially similar, and the substantial similarity requirement is relaxed when unrelated incidents are offered for a purpose other than to prove that a product was unreasonably dangerous, e.g., to refute a suggestion that a helicopter part could not have been defective if made to a manufacturer's specifications.

Burke v. Deere & Co., 6 F.3d 497 (8th Cir. 1993) : The Court reversed (2-1) a judgment for the plaintiff, whose hand had been injured by an auger when he reached into a clean-out door on farm equipment manufactured by the defendant. Evidence of postsale accidents involving similar machines was admissible to prove defect, causation, and foreseeability of misuse, but in this case the evidence was impermissibly used on the issue of punitive damages.

Smith v. Ingersoll-Rand Co., 214 F.3d 1235 (10th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff in a product liability action against the manufacturer of a machine for removing road pavement, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of six other accidents involving similar machines produced by the same manufacturer. Four of the incidents were incorrectly admitted on the issue of notice because they occurred subsequent to the accident at issue. However, all were relevant to the issue of defect; although some involved different models, all were sufficiently similar with respect to the claimed defect of lack of visibility. Furthermore, all were relevant to the issue of punitive damages, since they indicated the defendant had "rushed" to enter the market, without sufficiently conducting a "human factors" analysis.

[iv] Similar Circumstance Evidence -- Accident and Injury Cases -- Requirement of Similarity

Barker v. Deere & Co., 60 F.3d 158 (3d Cir. 1995) : The plaintiff was injured when a log that he was towing with his tractor got stuck in the ground, rose in the air, and flipped over in a "pole-vault type fashion," striking the plaintiff from behind and causing him to be ejected from the tractor cab and run over by the tractor. At trial, the plaintiff introduced evidence that tractor accidents accounted for thousands of deaths and injuries; that most of the fatalities were caused by rollover accidents; and that thirty percent of the fatalities occurred after the driver was ejected from the tractor cab. The Court found that the admission of this evidence was error requiring reversal of the judgment for the plaintiff, as there was no foundation that the other accidents were "substantially similar" to his accident. The evidence, consisting only of "raw numbers and statistical extrapolations," was irrelevant to prove either a design defect or that a safer design was feasible. In Seese v. Volkswagenwerk A.G., n51 the Court upheld the introduction of information gathered as part of the Fatal Accident Reporting System operated under the auspices of the National Highway Traffic and Safety Administration in a suit arising from a single-car "roll over" accident. Although the data did not reveal much information about the other accidents, the Court said that missing details went to the weight to be given the evidence, not to its admissibility.

Johnson v. Ford Motor Co., 988 F.2d 573 (5th Cir. 1993) : The Court held that evidence of other car accidents was inadmissible even for proving notice of a dangerous condition, since there was no reasonable similarity to the facts at issue. The other accidents involved different vehicle models or different years, and none involved the precise mechanical defect alleged in this case. In McGonigal v. Gearhart Indus., n52 a personal injury suit against the manufacturer and assembler of a grenade that exploded prematurely, the Court held that evidence that another grenade manufactured by the defendant exploded prematurely was probative of the plaintiff's claim that the defendant was negligent in approving grenades with short fuses. The Court concluded, however, that it was error (but harmless) to admit evidence concerning explosions of grenades manufactured by others.

Nachtsheim v. Beech Aircraft Corp., 847 F.2d 1261 (7th Cir. 1988) : The Court affirmed a judgment for a manufacturer whose plane crashed. Although it recognized broad discretion on the part of the Trial Judge to rule on the admissibility of other accident evidence, it also recognized that because direct evidence of causation disappears in airplane crash cases, a plaintiff may have a special need for other accident evidence. The Court concluded there was an insufficient showing of substantial similarity between the crash involved in the instant case and another upon which the plaintiff relied, and that admission of the evidence would have forced the defendant to litigate two crashes instead of one.

Harris v. Pacific Floor Mach. Mfg. Co., 856 F.2d 64 (8th Cir. 1988) : In a suit against the manufacturer of a floor buffer, the Court held that evidence of other lawsuits arising from accidents involving floor buffers made by other manufacturers was properly excluded in an action by a minor who was injured while using gasoline and a buffer to strip paint off a school floor. In Hale v. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., n53 a product liability action against manufacturers of a tire rim that separated and struck one of the plaintiffs as he attempted to inflate a truck tire, the Court found it was an abuse of discretion to admit evidence concerning defects in a type of Firestone tire that was not involved in the case. In Held v. Mitsubishi Aircraft Int'l, Inc., n54 a suit arising out of an airplane crash, the Judge ruled that an FAA report of an investigation of one model of aircraft made by a manufacturer was admissible in an action involving a different model. Most documents produced in connection with the investigation related to the model in question, and the FAA evaluated all of the manufacturer's models.

Wheeler v. John Deere Co., 862 F.2d 1404 (10th Cir. 1988) : The Court held that it was not error to allow five witnesses, all of whom had lost limbs in past incidents, to testify as to their experiences with the defendant's defective machines, since their experiences were similar and tended to prove a defect. However, it was error to permit the plaintiff to question the manufacturer's expert about other accidents that had not been determined to involve similar circumstances.

[v] Similar Circumstance Evidence -- Accident and Injury Cases -- Toxic Exposures

Grenier v. Dow Chem. Co., 628 F. Supp. 1529 (D. Me. 1986) : In a product liability action against a herbicide manufacturer, the Court held that the plaintiff could introduce evidence that two of his six coworkers were suffering from the same neurological disease, as long as the plaintiff could establish that the coworkers' exposure to the defendant's product and their medical condition were substantially similar to the plaintiff's.

[b] Similar Circumstance Evidence -- Civil Rights and Discrimination Cases

Outley v. City of New York, 837 F.2d 587 (2d Cir. 1988) : The Court reversed a judgment for police officers in a civil rights case, holding that it was error to admit evidence of previous lawsuits brought by an arrestee and his wife against the City, when there was no evidence that the suits were fraudulent.

Garraghty v. Jordan, 830 F.2d 1295 (4th Cir. 1987) : In a civil rights action by a prison warden who sued following a five-day suspension without pay, the Court upheld the exclusion of evidence of disciplinary responses to actions by other employees.

Douglass v. Eaton Corp., 956 F.2d 1339 (6th Cir. 1992) : After a jury verdict for an employee who alleged she was discharged on racial grounds following an altercation, the Trial Judge ruled that evidence of discipline imposed on other employees for fighting had been improperly admitted. The Court reversed the grant of a new trial, holding that the evidence met the threshold test of relevance and it was error to find the other situations distinguishable based on an assessment of whether the employees had been aggressors or victims in the fights. In Schrand v. Federal Pac. Elec. Co., n55 the Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff in an age discrimination action, because of the admission of testimony of two other discharged employees about statements made to them concerning their age. Since the person who made the decision to terminate the plaintiff was not involved in the termination decisions regarding the other two employees, who worked in a different region and division from the plaintiff, the Court reasoned that the evidence was irrelevant and prejudicial.

Roy v. Austin Co., 194 F.3d 840 (7th Cir. 1999) : The plaintiff was fired after he obscenely insulted the lead player for his firm's most important client at a critical meeting. In the plaintiff's Title VII suit, the Trial Judge excluded evidence that four white employees of the defendant had been transferred rather than fired after disagreements with clients. The Court found no abuse of discretion, in light of the finding below that since the other employees had been disciplined by different supervisors and had not held the same position as the plaintiff, the evidence was "irrelevant and likely to confuse the jury." The Court also found no abuse of discretion in excluding, as irrelevant, evidence that all the executives at the defendant's headquarters in Cleveland were white, given that the plaintiff was neither an executive nor part of the Cleveland office.

Williams v. ConAgra Poultry Co., 378 F.3d 790 (8th Cir. 2004) : In an action alleging a hostile work environment and racially-based termination, the defendant argued that evidence of racist remarks, threatening actions directed at black employees, and other discriminatory treatment at the plant should not have been admitted because the plaintiff was not aware of the incidents. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court held that, while the evidence was irrelevant to the hostile environment claim, it was admissible to support the credibility of the plaintiff's testimony about the environment he was exposed to, to provide evidence of the company's racial bias or retaliatory motivation in firing him, and to support an award of punitive damages.

Iervolino v. Delta Air Lines, Inc., 796 F.2d 1408 (11th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed a judgment for an airline in an age discrimination suit by a former captain. It found no error in the admission of evidence concerning the medical condition of another former captain to show how age could affect a captain, and in the admission of a cockpit tape recording of an emergency aboard a flight to show the problems that might arise if a former captain served as a flight engineer. The Court found it was error to bar the plaintiff from revealing the names of other major airlines who would have permitted a captain to serve as a flight engineer, but a majority held the error was harmless. A dissenting Judge argued that the condition of the other captain was not shown to be representative of pilots over the age of sixty and that the tape recording amounted to theatrics designed to inflame the jury. In Murphy v. City of Flagler Beach, n56 the Court granted a police officer, who claimed that he was fired in bad faith, a new trial because evidence that the police chief had engaged in and not criticized other officers for engaging in the same conduct used to justify the plaintiff's firing was erroneously excluded.

[c] Similar Circumstance Evidence -- Contract Cases

Cibro Petroleum Prods. v. Sohio Alaska Petroleum Co., 602 F. Supp. 1520 (N.D.N.Y. 1985) , aff'd, 798 F.2d 1421 (Temp. Emer. Ct. App. 1986) : In a suit by a refining company against a supplier for alleged breach of a crude oil supply contract, the Court held that evidence of the supplier's contracts with other parties was admissible to assist in interpreting the contract with the plaintiff, and that this was true irrespective of a trade usage or course of performance analysis.

Dyno Constr. Co. v. McWane, Inc., 198 F.3d 567 (6th Cir. 1999) : In a breach of contract action, the Court held that the defendant seller was properly permitted to adduce testimony from one of the plaintiff's owners concerning the contracts that he was familiar with between the defendant and the owner's former employer, since the evidence was relevant to show the plaintiff's knowledge of the defendant's standard terms and conditions.

SCNO Barge Lines, Inc. v. Anderson Clayton & Co., 745 F.2d 1188 (8th Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed a judgment for a lessor who claimed breach of an agreement to use the lessor's barges to transport soybean meal, holding that the Trial Judge properly excluded evidence of earlier contracts between the parties. The lessee's obligation under the earlier contracts shed no light on the dispute in the instant case.

[d] Similar Circumstance Evidence -- Miscellaneous Cases

Marathon LeTourneau Co. v. NLRB, 699 F.2d 248 (5th Cir. 1983) : The Court enforced a Labor Board order based on a finding that an employer had engaged in unfair labor practices during an organizational campaign by discharging certain individuals. Although the Court noted that a summary prepared by the employer setting forth all discharges for a one-year period was admissible under Rule 1006 if it was relevant, it concluded that the Administrative Law Judge properly rejected the summary because it lacked probative value. The company claimed that the employees were fired because of their attendance records, but the summary failed to quantify the absenteeism or tardiness for which other employees were discharged and neglected to show whether explanations were considered and past violations tolerated.

United States v. Hart, 70 F.3d 854 (6th Cir. 1995) : The Court affirmed a former police chief's conviction for fraud in administering a secret fund, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that an accomplice had "conned" the FBI and the IRS in an unrelated criminal matter. The circumstances when the accomplice had misled agents investigating fraud charges against him were too different to have probative value on whether the accomplice had, in the course of a business relationship, misled the defendant regarding use of the secret fund for legitimate law enforcement purposes. In Finch v. Monumental Life Ins. Co., n57 the Court affirmed a judgment holding an insurer liable on a life insurance policy, ruling that testimony of another insured as to nonreceipt of a premium notice for the same month as that in which the plaintiff's deceased failed to make a payment was relevant and admissible.

Agristor Leasing v. Meuli, 865 F.2d 1150 (10th Cir. 1988) : The Court held there was no error in excluding evidence pertaining to litigation over performance and marketing of a manufacturer's silos more than twenty years earlier, given the danger of confusing the jury with respect to differences between the older and newer experiences with silos.

[27] Standard of Care

Rolick v. Collins Pine Co., 975 F.2d 1009 (3d Cir. 1992) : In a diversity negligence action by a logger, the Court held it was error to exclude evidence of OSHA regulations as evidence of the defendant's standard of care, even though the OSHA law did not govern the relationship between the plaintiff and the defendant. Although the language of the OSHA standard was presented to the jury through evidence of an identical industry standard, the difference from a nationwide legal standard in the "quality" of the proof meant the error was not harmless. In Josephs v. Harris Corp., n58 the Court, applying state law in a product liability case, held it was error to exclude evidence of standards or text materials used by an expert to support a conclusion that a product was defective. State law made the time of sale, not the time of manufacture, critical, so it was error to limit the evidence to material in existence at the time of manufacture. In Seese v. Volkswagenwerk A.G., n59 the Court approved the admission of a Federal Motor Vehicle Safety Standard which was not binding on the vehicle involved in the single-car "roll over" accident, but which was offered as evidence of what was reasonably necessary to make a window resistant to a "pop-out" crash.

Horne v. Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corp., 4 F.3d 276 (4th Cir. 1993) : In a product liability case, the defendant introduced OSHA regulations requiring warnings to be placed on asbestos, to prove that it had issued even stronger warnings before being required to make any warnings under OSHA regulation. The Court found that the regulations were properly admitted as state-of-the-art evidence, even though they were promulgated many years after the plaintiff's exposure to asbestos. The Court stated that "state-of-the-art evidence, because it often is scientific in nature and results from a cumulative review of a field over time, should not be applied retroactively to discredit conduct at a given time prior to the culmination of the relevant research." But there was no such concern in this case because the defendant "was using subsequent findings and standards to credit prior conduct."

Dixon v. International Harvester Co., 754 F.2d 573 (5th Cir. 1985) : The Court overturned a judgment n.o.v. for the defendant in a personal injury action against the manufacturer of a crawler tractor. The Court declined to decide whether OSHA standards should have been admitted to establish a standard of care where the standards were directed at employers and the defendant was a manufacturer, but it did hold that standards of the American National Standards Institute were admissible. In Johnson v. Ford Motor Co., 988 F.2d 573 (5th Cir. 1993) , the Court held that cautionary letters sent to Ford by the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration were properly excluded, since the letters were merely preliminary inquiries that did not result in action against Ford, and they concerned vehicle models different from that involved in the litigation.

Ross v. Black & Decker, Inc., 977 F.2d 1178 (7th Cir. 1992) : In a product liability action arising out of injuries caused by a circular saw, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting an Underwriters Laboratories standard for saw guards adopted after the saw was manufactured, as it was relevant to the dangerousness of the product.

Smith v. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., 755 F.2d 129 (8th Cir. 1985) : The Court held that it was not error to admit OSHA standards on behalf of a tire manufacturer as a response to the plaintiffs' claim that the manufacturer should have warned of defects in a rim. See also Donovan v. General Motors n60(OSHA standards should have been admitted as evidence of standard of care owed to plaintiff by his employer).

[28] State Law

McInnis v. A.M.F., Inc., 765 F.2d 240 (1st Cir. 1985) : The Court reversed a judgment for a motorcycle manufacturer in an action by a motorcyclist injured when her cycle was struck by a car, but it sustained the admission of evidence that the plaintiff had been drinking prior to the accident. Although this was a diversity case and State Courts required independent proof of intoxication other than evidence of drinking, the Court reasoned that the Federal Rules governed the question of relevance and possible prejudice.

Habecker v. Clark Equip. Co., 942 F.2d 210 (3d Cir. 1991) : The Court reversed a judgment for the defendants in a product liability action arising out of a forklift accident because evidence had been admitted of what was known in the industry when the forklift was manufactured about the desirability of operating restraint systems. The Court believed that evidence of what was known at the time of manufacture about the desirability of a safety feature is irrelevant under the applicable Pennsylvania law in a crashworthiness case. In another product liability action, Leeds v. Cincinnati, Inc., n61 the Court found that a patent document offered by the plaintiff to prove that the defendant had notice of a problem with a machine was properly excluded. New Jersey irrebuttably presumes that a manufacturer has knowledge of the dangerous propensities of its products, so the proffered evidence "was at worst irrelevant and at most cumulative in that it wasted time."

Hottle v. Beech Aircraft Corp., 47 F.3d 106 (4th Cir. 1995) : The Court held in a product liability action that the Virginia rule excluding a party's internal rules and regulations when offered to show negligence was sufficiently bound up with state policy as to require its application in a diversity case governed by Virginia law. The defendant manufacturer's internal manual was therefore properly excluded.

Carter v. Massey-Ferguson, Inc., 716 F.2d 344 (5th Cir. 1983) : The Court sustained a judgment for a woodcutter injured when a skidder manufactured by the defendant backed into him, concluding that Texas law, which governed this product liability case, made industry custom relevant and that it was error to exclude evidence of that custom. Exclusion was harmless error, however, where evidence of industry standards was admitted. In Caldarera v. Eastern Airlines, n62 a diversity action arising out of an airplane crash, the Court observed that state law barring evidence of remarriage on the question of damages was binding on a Federal Court. In response to the defendants' claim that the plaintiffs opened the door to the evidence by presenting evidence concerning the emotional problems arising from one plaintiff's loss of his mother, wife, and child, the Court found that there were other ways for the defendants to challenge this evidence and that it was not error to exclude evidence of the remarriage under Rule 403.

Barron v. Ford Motor Co. of Can. Ltd., 965 F.2d 195 (7th Cir. 1992) : In an action by an automobile passenger allegedly thrown through a defective sunroof in an accident, the Court held that the state rule barring evidence of seatbelt nonuse was a substantive rule to be applied in diversity cases, but that the rule covered only seatbelt evidence offered to prove the plaintiff's failure to exercise due care. In this case, the manufacturer was using the evidence only to show its reasonableness in not making the sunroof out of laminated glass, so it was admissible. In In re Air Crash Disaster, n63 the Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiffs in an action against an airplane manufacturer, holding that evidence of a decedent's income tax liability should have been admitted, since such evidence was relevant to the plaintiff's pecuniary damages under Arizona's wrongful death statute. It also held, however, that the jury should be instructed that its award would not be subject to federal income taxation, even though Arizona Courts would not give such an instruction. The Court found a federal interest in preventing the jury from inflating an award as a result of an erroneous assumption concerning taxation. In a prior decision on interlocutory appeal from in limine rulings in the case, In re Air Crash Disaster Near Chicago, n64 the Court observed that a state's rule concerning evidence of damages may be so closely linked with the state's view of the proper measure of damages that the evidence rule may involve substantive rights and may be binding on Federal Courts under the Erie doctrine. But the Court also observed that a state's rule concerning proof of damages may represent a judgment concerning a jury's ability to handle evidence, in which case the Federal Rules would govern admissibility decisions in Federal Courts. In a suit by a tenant against a landlord for breach of a duty to keep premises in repair, American Nat'l Bank & Trust Co. v. K-Mart Corp., n65 state law permitted a tenant to sue a landlord who failed to keep premises in repair and to seek as damages the difference in the rental value of the premises in and out of repair. Since state law did not require that the tenant seek to sublet the premises, the Court held that an expert should have been permitted to give an opinion on the amount of the damages notwithstanding the fact that there was no sublease.

Potts v. Benjamin, 882 F.2d 1320 (8th Cir. 1989) : In this personal injury and wrongful death action arising out of a car-truck collision, the Trial Judge excluded evidence that the plaintiff's children were not in child restraint seats at the time of the accident on the ground that the governing Arkansas law made failure to use safety seats inadmissible. The Court held that although the Federal Rules govern admissibility and the state statute is phrased in procedural terms, it is clear that the statute establishes a substantive rule to be followed in a diversity action. In Adams v. Fuqua Indus., n66 the Court reversed a plaintiff's judgment in a product liability suit against the manufacturer of a lawn mower, holding that the defendant was improperly denied the opportunity to offer rebuttal evidence concerning the feasibility of safety features when the mower was made. It also held that state law should govern the question whether the jury should be told that a damage award would not be taxable to the plaintiff.

Beacham v. Lee-Norse, 714 F.2d 1010 (10th Cir. 1983) : In a product liability action, the Court excluded evidence of contributory negligence since state law recognized only unreasonable use, not contributory negligence, as a defense.

[29] State of Mind

United States v. Hanson, 994 F.2d 403 (7th Cir. 1993) : In a fraud case, the defendant offered an out-of-court statement made to him, to the effect that he did not have to file a certain form. The Trial Judge excluded the statement as hearsay, but the Court held that the statement was not offered for its truth but rather for its impact on the defendant's state of mind. For this nonhearsay purpose, the evidence met the low threshold of relevance set forth in Rule 401. Erroneous exclusion of the statement was harmless, however. In a DES product liability action, Wetherill v. University of Chicago, n67 the District Court ruled that medical evidence concerning the relationship of DES to cancer could be admitted to prove the reasonableness of the plaintiffs' fears of contracting cancer as a result of exposure to the drug.

United States v. Munoz, 412 F.3d 1043 (9th Cir. 2005) : The Court upheld a defendant's convictions for bringing illegal aliens into the United States, finding no error when a border inspector was permitted to testify as to his reasons for referring the defendant to a secondary inspection at the border crossing. The Court reasoned that the testimony that Munoz was sweating despite cool weather, avoided eye contact, and gave very brief answers to questions was relevant to prove the border inspector's state of mind. In United States v. Castiglione, 876 F.2d 73 (9th Cir. 1989) , the Court affirmed a conviction for mailing a letter that threatened a Federal Judge, and held that the Judge's testimony regarding his knowledge of a prior assassination of a Federal Judge, and evidence of steps taken to protect him, showed his state of mind and was relevant to the essential issue of whether the letter could reasonably be read as containing a threat of injury.

[30] Statute of Limitations

Sir Speedy, Inc. v. L & P Graphics, Inc., 957 F.2d 1033 (2d Cir. 1992) : After a jury verdict in an action over breach of a franchise agreement, the Trial Judge ruled that income projections made by the franchiser should not have been admitted in proof of the franchisee's damages because they predated the applicable limitations period. The Court reversed the judgment n.o.v., holding it was error to exclude the documents, as the statute of limitations only bars stale claims and is not a rule of evidence. A suggestion that evidence is too old goes to its relevance and to its weight, which is a matter for the jury.

401.04 Legislative History

Advisory Committee's Note

Problems of relevancy call for an answer to the question whether an item of evidence, when tested by the processes of legal reasoning, possesses sufficient probative value to justify receiving it in evidence. Thus, assessment of the probative value of evidence that a person purchased a revolver shortly prior to a fatal shooting with which he is charged is a matter of analysis and reasoning.

The variety of relevancy problems is coextensive with the ingenuity of counsel in using circumstantial evidence as a means of proof. An enormous number of cases fall in no set pattern, and this rule is designed as a guide for handling them. On the other hand, some situations recur with sufficient frequency to create patterns susceptible of treatment by specific rules. Rule 404 and those following it are of that variety; they also serve as illustrations of the application of the present rule as limited by the exclusionary principles of Rule 403.

Passing mention should be made of so-called "conditional" relevancy. Morgan, Basic Problems of Evidence 45-46 (1962). In this situation, probative value depends not only upon satisfying the basic requirement of relevancy as described above but also upon the existence of some matter of fact. For example, if evidence of a spoken statement is relied upon to prove notice, probative value is lacking unless the person sought to be charged heard the statement. The problem is one of fact, and the only rules needed are for the purpose of determining the respective functions of judge and jury. See Rules 104(b) and 901. The discussion which follows in the present note is concerned with relevancy generally, not with any particular problem of conditional relevancy.

Relevancy is not an inherent characteristic of any item of evidence but exists only as a relation between an item of evidence and a matter properly provable in the case. Does the item of evidence tend to prove the matter sought to be proved? Whether the relationship exists depends upon principles evolved by experience or science, applied logically to the situation at hand. James, Relevancy, Probability and the Law, 29 Calif. L. Rev. 689, 696, n. 15 (1941), in Selected Writings on Evidence and Trial 610, 615, n. 15 (Fryer ed. 1957). The rule summarizes this relationship as a "tendency to make the existence" of the fact to be proved "more probable or less probable." Compare Uniform Rule 1(2) which states the crux of relevancy as "a tendency in reason," thus perhaps emphasizing unduly the logical process and ignoring the need to draw upon experience or science to validate the general principle upon which relevancy in a particular situation depends.

The standard of probability under the rule is "more ... probable than it would be without the evidence." Any more stringent requirement is unworkable and unrealistic. As McCormick § 152, p. 317, says, "[a] brick is not a wall," or, as Falknor, Extrinsic Policies Affecting Admissibility, 10 Rutgers L. Rev. 574, 576 (1956), quotes Professor McBaine, "it is not to be supposed that every witness can make a home run." Dealing with probability in the language of the rule has the added virtue of avoiding confusion between questions of admissibility and questions of the sufficiency of the evidence.

The rule uses the phrase "fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action" to describe the kind of fact to which proof may properly be directed. The language is that of California Evidence Code § 210; it has the advantage of avoiding the loosely used and ambiguous word "material." Tentative Recommendation and a Study Relating to the Uniform Rules of Evidence (Art. I. General Provisions), Cal. Law Revision Comm'n, Rep., Rec. & Studies, 10-11 (1964). The fact to be proved may be ultimate, intermediate, or evidentiary; it matters not, so long as it is of consequence in the determination of the action. Cf. Uniform Rule 1(2) which requires that the evidence relate to a "material" fact.

The fact to which the evidence is directed need not be in dispute. While situations will arise which call for the exclusion of evidence offered to prove a point conceded by the opponent, the ruling should be made on the basis of such considerations as waste of time and undue prejudice (see Rule 403), rather than under any general requirement that evidence is admissible only if directed to matters in dispute. Evidence which is essentially background in nature can scarcely be said to involve disputed matter, yet it is universally offered and admitted as an aid to understanding. Charts, photographs, views of real estate, murder weapons, and many other items of evidence fall in this category. A rule limiting admissibility to evidence directed to a controversial point would invite the exclusion of this helpful evidence, or at least the raising of endless questions over its admission. Cf. California Evidence Code § 210, defining relevant evidence in terms of tendency to prove a disputed fact.

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 401, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Supp. to § 401.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[2] Civil Rights Cases [Go To Main]

[a] Irrelevant Evidence

Thompson v. City of Chicago, 472 F.3d 444 (7th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a judgment for police officers sued for using excessive force in an arrest, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence of a city police department general order regarding use of force. The evidence was irrelevant on the question whether the officers violated the Fourth Amendment, since that requires showing that the officers' conduct was objectively unreasonable, and the violation of police regulations or state law is irrelevant to a determination of objective reasonableness.

[3] Consciousness of a Weak Case -- Civil Cases [Go To Main]

[a] Destruction or Loss of Evidence

Allstate Ins. v. Hamilton Beach/Proctor Silex, 473 F.3d 450 (2d Cir. 2007) : In a subrogation action against the manufacturer of a coffee pot to recover money paid to insureds for covered losses sustained from a house fire, the Magistrate Judge excluded evidence that an electric range was not the cause of the fire, on the ground that the insureds had not preserved the electric range. But the Court found that this spoliation sanction was an abuse of discretion. The defendant had been provided a full and fair opportunity to examine the fire scene and all other potential sources of the fire, and the defendant's representative affirmatively disclaimed any interest in the electric range as an alternative source of the fire. The Court rejected the argument that "there is a broad duty to preserve evidence irrespective of the absence of a request by the opposing party."

[4] Consciousness of Guilt -- Criminal Cases [Go To Main]

[a] Flight, Resisting Arrest

United States v. Wallace, 461 F.3d 15 (1st Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for armed robbery, the Court found no error when an airline reservation was admitted as evidence of the defendant's flight. There was a sufficient foundation linking the defendant to the reservation, as it was made in name of the defendant's alias and he admitted that it was "possible" that he had made such a reservation.

[7] Criminal Cases -- Defense Evidence [Go To Main]

United States v. Stever, 603 F.3d 747 (9th Cir. 2010) : The Court reversed the defendant's conviction for having a marijuana growing operation on his property because the Judge precluded evidence that Mexican drug trafficking organizations (DTO) in the defendant's area operate their own growing operations in remote areas without the knowledge of the homeowners. The evidence was excluded on the ground that it was not relevant to whether the defendant was involved in marijuana-growing, but the Court noted that evidence is relevant if it has any tendency to prove a disputed fact, and in this case the DTO evidence "tended to make it more probable that Stever was not involved, as there would then be an alternative explanation for the grow that would not entail the consent, much less the participation, of any of the Stevers." Rejecting the government's argument that the evidence was irrelevant because it would not have eliminated the possibility that Stever cooperated with a Mexican DTO, the Court noted that, while such cooperation was possible, the evidence nonetheless made Stever's guilt less likely.

[10] Employment Discrimination Cases [Go To Main]

[b] Employment Discrimination Cases -- Miscellaneous Cases

Brady v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 531 F.3d 127 (2d Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a judgment for a former employee who sued his former employer alleging a constructive discharge in violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act and state law. It found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of a nationwide consent decree the company agreed to as part of litigation brought by the EEOC. The Trial Judge instructed the jury that it could consider the decree only as an implicit acknowledgment that the company was familiar with the ADA.

Hasan v. Foley & Lardner LLP, 552 F.3d 520 (7th Cir. 2008) : The Court reversed summary judgment for a law firm that dismissed a Muslim associate after September 11, allegedly because of religious and national origin discrimination. The Court held that evidence of a partner's anti-Muslim comments, the timing of the employer's conduct, and the treatment of other Muslims in the department was relevant evidence that should have been considered.

[11] Examples of Relevant Circumstantial Evidence [Go To Main]

[a] Civil Cases

Owner-Operator Ind. Drivers Ass'n v. USIS Commercial Servs., Inc., 537 F.3d 1184 (10th Cir. 2008) : In an action by truck drivers claiming violation of the Fair Credit Reporting Act when a service compiling and disseminating drivers' employment histories included information alleged to be so imprecise as to be willfully inaccurate, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion when the defendant introduced evidence as to how the carriers used the information they received. The evidence tended to show that any ambiguity was not in reckless disregard of statutory duties but a reasonable accommodation to the needs of the industry by providing the carriers with a tool from which to conduct further investigations.

[b] Examples of Relevant Circumstantial Evidence -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Quattrone, 441 F.3d 153 (2d Cir. 2006) : In a prosecution for obstructing securities law investigations, the government introduced evidence that the defendant falsely denied knowledge of a grand jury investigation when he was questioned about the matter by his employer's counsel two years later. The defendant sought to explain how he could have been mistaken by offering evidence that he had not been reprimanded by his employer, had been promoted to its executive board, and had not been called as a witness or interviewed in connection with the investigations, and that the investigations had ended without criminal charges against the employer or its employees. Vacating the conviction on other grounds, the Court noted that it was error to exclude the evidence simply on the ground it was not relevant to a fact of consequence in the case, since evidence that it was reasonable for the defendant to have forgotten about the investigation under the circumstances tended to rebut the government's theory that the misstatement was an intentionally false exculpatory statement tending to show the defendant's guilt. On remand, the Judge should "consider the prejudicial offset of this evidence against its probative value before making a decision to accept or reject the evidence."

United States v. Brown, 553 F.3d 768 (5th Cir. 2008) : Two pharmacists were convicted of conspiring with physicians to distribute large quantities of pain medications under cover of false prescriptions written by the physicians. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of a state trooper's testimony that he had pulled over a motorist who was under the influence of drugs, and found 39 bottles of pain medications (none bearing the motorist's name) that had labels from a defendant's pharmacy and listed one of the conspiring physicians as the prescriber. The bottles, their labels, and the circumstances of their discovery spoke to the defendant pharmacist's prescription-filling practices.

United States v. Ellis, 548 F.3d 539 (7th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for failure to remit employment taxes, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant spent two and a half million dollars on a personal residence and over half a million dollars on trips, a luxury car, and home decorations during the period when tax payments were not being made. The evidence was relevant to rebut the defendant's claim that she was too busy to notice or remember her tax obligations and to prove willfulness, since the amount spent was about the same amount she failed to pay, and "most people would inquire as to why they have an unexpected additional two million dollars to spend on themselves." In United States v. Lee, 502 F.3d 691 (7th Cir. 2007) , the defendant was arrested when police, after receiving a report that gunshots had been fired on two consecutive mornings, stopped a car in which the defendant was a passenger and found a gun near him. The defendant claimed that the gun was not his and that he was in the wrong place at the wrong time. Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court agreed with the defendant that evidence that the car had been involved in prior shootings might well have been relevant to prove that gunshot residue found on the defendant's jacket may have come from inside the car rather than from his possession of a firearm, but it found any error in exclusion of the evidence concerning the prior shootings to be harmless. The Court also held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony from a government fingerprint expert that a partial print found on the gun recovered near the defendant did not belong to the driver of the car and that she could not exclude or identify the defendant as the source of the print. The fact that the testimony excluded the driver rendered the testimony relevant.

United States v. Tucker, 533 F.3d 711 (8th Cir. 2008) : Affirming a conviction for being an accessory after the fact to bank robbery, the Court held that evidence that the defendant knew her boyfriend had robbed banks earlier in the year was relevant to whether she knew he robbed a bank when she waited for him in the car as he entered a bank, ran from the bank to the car, and spilled cash as he went. In United States v. Kent, 531 F.3d 642 (8th Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed drug, firearm, and child pornography convictions. finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of DNA evidence that the defendant could not be excluded as the contributor of DNA found in a 16-year-old victim's room. Although the expert could not testify that the defendant was definitely the contributor because other males in the defendant's family had the same marker on their Y chromosomes, the Court reasoned that "a 'cannot exclude' finding can tell a lot, and can increase the probability that the person's DNA is present." In United States v. Gardner, 447 F.3d 558 (8th Cir. 2006) , the court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to distribute methamphetamine, holding that an airline document showing the numerous flight reservations made in a coconspirator's name was relevant to support the coconspirator's testimony that he was serving as a drug courier by air.

[12] Experts [Go To Main]

Wipf v. Kowalski, 519 F.3d 380 (7th Cir. 2008) : In a medical malpractice case, the plaintiff's counsel asked her expert witness about a 2000 article by another expert regarding the surgery at issue. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion when defense counsel asked the witness about a 2005 article in which the author of the 2000 article tempered some of his earlier views. Although plaintiff's operation took place in 2003, the Court commented that "[t]o the extent that Dr. Kleier was questioned on direct examination about Dr. Strasberg's 200 article, cross-examining him about the 2005 article, in which Dr. Strasberg updated his views, strikes us as relevant and fair."

United States v. Wallenfang, 568 F.3d 649 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for production, distribution, and possession of child pornography, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of expert testimony that the defendant was not a pedophile and was not sexually attracted to young girls. The evidence was not relevant to any of the charges, since the only issue was whether the pictures appeared to be of a sexual character, not whether they appealed or were intended to appeal to the defendant's sexual interests.

United States v. Hickey, 580 F.3d 922 (9th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for mail and securities fraud, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony by the defendant's expert that if the SEC had not intervened, the investments would have been profitable and the investors would not have lost money. The evidence was irrelevant, as loss to investors is not an element of either fraud charge, nor is an intent to cause loss. In United States v. 87. 98 Acres of Land, 530 F.3d 899 (9th Cir. 2008) , the Court, affirming the judgment in an eminent domain proceeding to secure an easement for high-voltage electrical transmission lines, the Court found no abuse of discretion when an environmental planner with extensive experience advising developers regarding the impact of electromagnetic frequencies from power transmission lines on the use and development of property was permitted to testify to public perceptions on the effects of EMFs among residential homeowners and home buyers, but was not permitted to testify to the extent and level of EMFs from the transmission line at issue. While the existence of EMFs was relevant to public perceptions and property values, there was no evidence that EMF measurements affect public perceptions, so a jury could only speculate concerning the effect of a particular measurement on public perception.

[18] Intent, Knowledge, Motive, Plan [Go To Main]

[b] Intent, Knowledge, Motive, Plan -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Leonard, 439 F.3d 648 (10th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for involuntary manslaughter and assault arising from a head-on collision, the Court held that the defendant's nine citations for driving without a valid license, together with six other citations, over a 15-year period were relevant and admissible to prove malice aforethought.

United States v. Hoffman-Vaile, 568 F.3d 1335 (11th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions of a dermatologist for health care fraud, finding no plain error in the admission of testimony by an employee of the Medicare administrator to whom the defendant submitted claims that she repeatedly told the defendant how to bill under a particular code. The evidence was relevant to prove intent and to undermine the defense that the defendant did not know how to bill correctly. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that some of the defendant's procedures disfigured some patients, because the evidence was probative of whether the defendant performed the procedures that she billed to Medicare.

[20] Irrelevant Evidence [Go To Main]

[a] Civil Cases

[i] Civil Rights and Employment Cases

Arlio v. Lively, 474 F.3d 46 (2d Cir. 2007) : A police officer sued the acting chief of the department, alleging that he had been disciplined in violation of his constitutional rights. The Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff because evidence was presented that an arbitration panel had overturned the discipline and awarded the officer back pay. The evidence was irrelevant because the arbitration was based solely on the particulars of the union collective bargaining agreement and was not in any way an adjudication of constitutional claims. Furthermore, as an explanation of why the plaintiff was not seeking back wages, it was probative of a non-material issue, since "[l]ost wages were simply not an issue in the federal proceeding." In any event, the prejudicial effect of the evidence would outweigh any probative value, "as the jury might have felt a strong compulsion to conform their verdict to the conclusion of the Arbitration Board 'experts.' "

Keri v. Board of Trustees of Purdue Univ., 458 F.3d 620 (7th Cir. 2006) : A black assistant professor who was not reappointed sued under Title VII. Affirming summary judgment for the defendant, the Court upheld exclusion of statements about the racial climate at the university made by another professor at the University, who also was of African descent, had a doctoral degree, was subject to the same tenure and promotion standards, and was subordinate to the same Vice Chancellor and Chancellor. The Court held that the similarities between the declarant and the plaintiff were too remote for the statements to have any relevance to the plaintiff's claims, since the two men worked at different schools of the university and had different immediate supervisors, the declarant was tenured ten years before the plaintiff was hired, and most of the plaintiff's dealings were with an immediate supervisor whom the declarant had never met.

[ii] Irrelevant Evidence -- Civil Cases -- Damages Issues

Wingert & Assoc. v. Paramount Apparel Int'l, Inc., 458 F.3d 740 (8th Cir. 2006) : The defendant terminated the plaintiff sales representative firm and hired its sales agents. In an action for failure to provide notice of termination required by statute and for business interference, the plaintiff claimed damages arising from its inability to arrange for replacement agents to serve a new replacement line. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence that the plaintiff had noncompete agreements with its former agents that it could have enforced in order to mitigate its damages. The evidence was irrelevant because it was not established that the plaintiff had a duty to enforce such agreements to mitigate losses.

[iv] Irrelevant Evidence -- Civil Cases -- Liability for Accident, Defective Product, Malpractice, etc.

Ahlberg v. Chrysler Corp., 481 F.3d 630 (8th Cir. 2007) : The plaintiff's decedent was killed when he attempted to stop a Dodge Ram rolling down a driveway after his two-year-old grandson, who had been left alone in the truck with the key in the ignition and the engine running, apparently shifted the gear out of park. In an action against the manufacturer, the plaintiff alleged that the truck was defective because it did not have a brake-shift interlock device requiring the brake pedal to be depressed in order to shift out of park. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence that the defendant had voluntarily retrofitted Jeeps with BSI devices. The evidence was irrelevant to prove that the decision not to retrofit the Ram was negligent because there is no independent duty to retrofit under the governing state law. It was also irrelevant to prove feasibility: Chrysler conceded it was feasible to install a BSI device on the Ram, so feasibility was not an issue in the case.

[v] Irrelevant Evidence -- Civil Cases -- Other Cases

Cameron v. City of New York, 598 F.3d 50 (2d Cir. 2010) : In a false arrest and malicious prosecution action against police officers who arrested the plaintiffs, the defendants introduced evidence that the prosecutors who prepared the charging documents following the arrests considered the police officers' complaints credible. Vacating a judgment for the defendants, the Court held that the evidence was inadmissible because the prosecutors' belief in the officers' credibility was irrelevant to whether they had probable cause to make the arrests and because it is improper for one witness to vouch for the credibility of another.

Wall Data Inc. v. Los Angeles County Sheriff's Dep't, 447 F.3d 769 (9th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a judgment of copyright infringement against a software customer that installed the program on more computers than it had licenses for. The Court found no abuse of discretion in rulings that the following evidence was irrelevant: (a) a statement in the plaintiff software developer's 10-K report to the SEC that its shrink-wrap licenses "may be unenforceable" was irrelevant because they were clearly enforceable in the jurisdictions involved in this case; (b) the Master Vendor Agreements governing the defendant's purchase of software were irrelevant because they governed the relationship with the defendant's vendor, not with the plaintiff, and the plaintiff had no knowledge of the contents of the agreements; (c) the plaintiff's communications with other customers about another of its software products were irrelevant because the plaintiff used a different licensing system for the other software; and (d) the plaintiff's instructions to sales personnel regarding the licenses were irrelevant because the licenses clearly stated that reliance should not be placed on representations made by the plaintiff's employees.

[b] Irrelevant Evidence -- Criminal Cases

[i] Drug Cases

United States v. Ashton, 555 F.3d 1015 (D.C. Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a drug conviction, finding no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence of the Miranda rights card that the defendant signed at the police station invoking his rights, because the card was not probative of whether the defendant made an incriminating statement at the time of his arrest: "[T]he fact that Ashton invoked his Miranda rights only suggests that after he was transported to the police station and had time to consider his situation, he was unwilling to consent to custodial interrogation, at least without the presence of a lawyer."

United States v. Dunbar, 553 F.3d 48 (1st Cir. 2009) : In a prosecution on drug and firearms charges, the defendant's former girlfriend testified to actions she took to further the defendant's drug trade. She also testified that the defendant beat her and that she was molested at a young age by her stepfather. Holding that the girlfriend's testimony about her sexual abuse was erroneously admitted, the Court rejected a government argument that the testimony was relevant to explain why she acted as she did -- "e.g., moving in with Dunbar after his actions led to her arrest and continuing to follow his instructions despite his controlling and abusive behavior" -- since there had been no attack on the girlfriend's credibility based on the fact she remained with the defendant. "Thus, though the testimony served to make it more plausible that Spaulding remained with Dunbar, this fact was not ultimately 'of consequence to the determination of the action.' " The error was harmless, however. In United States v. Maldonado-Garcia, 446 F.3d 227 (1st Cir. 2006) , a marijuana distribution and firearms case, one firearm had been found in a truck that the defendant rented. The defendant proffered evidence that an individual who rented the truck two days before the defendant met a violent death, but the Court found no error in exclusion of this evidence as irrelevant. The defendant "offered no evidence that the prior lessee owned a gun, carried a gun, was observed with a gun, or used a gun at any time." Moreover, the evidence "had no bearing on the key issue in the case: whether the appellant knew that the gun was in the truck and constructively possessed it."

United States v. Ozuna, 561 F.3d 728 (7th Cir. 2009) : In the defendant's first trial for possession of cocaine with intent to distribute, the prosecution introduced evidence of the incident in which the cocaine was found and of the defendant's subsequent flight from prosecution; in the second trial, the government confined its case to the original incident. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence that the defendant claimed demonstrated that the government fabricated evidence to obtain a conviction. The proffered evidence related only to the alleged flight from prosecution, and was thus irrelevant in the narrower second trial. In United States v. Cunningham, 462 F.3d 708 (7th Cir. 2006) , the Court reversed convictions for distributing heroin because the prosecution had introduced substantial evidence regarding the procedures for obtaining authority to conduct telephone wiretaps in the case. The evidence was irrelevant to any issue in the case, and it was prejudicial in its implication that "there were several senior government attorneys and agents who all believed there was probable cause that the defendants were involved in a drug conspiracy, and, indirectly, that they all believed, in their professional judgment, the defendants were in fact committing drug-related crimes."

United States v. Sells, 477 F.3d 1226 (10th Cir. 2007) : Affirming convictions of a father and son for offenses connected to large-scale methamphetamine manufacture and distribution, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit against the son evidence found in a grandson's house located on the same 10-acre property as the two defendants' houses. There was no evidence presented to show a substantial connection between the son and the grandson's house.

[ii] Irrelevant Evidence -- Criminal Cases -- Fraud and False Statement Cases

United States v. Hatch, 514 F.3d 145 (1st Cir. 2008) : The defendant was convicted for filing false tax returns, having not reported income received as the first winner of the "reality-TV" show "Survivor." On appeal, he complained of not being permitted to introduce evidence that the producers had changed the rules of the show, leading him to think that they would pay the taxes on any winnings, thus negating the willfulness element of the charges that he had not reported the income. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion, as the Trial Judge had repeatedly ruled that evidence of anything the producers did or said to induce the defendant's belief they were assuming the tax liability would be admissible, but that evidence simply of changing the rules of the show was irrelevant to the charges and would be inadmissible.

United States v. Vasilakos, 508 F.3d 401 (6th Cir. 2007) : The defendants were convicted of defrauding their employer, an insurance company, by setting up fictitious accounts into which they directed unearned commissions. Affirming, the Court found no error in the exclusion of evidence that other employees operated similar schemes, which was offered to prove that the defendants were in good faith. The evidence was irrelevant: "Simply stated, evidence of fraudulent acts by other employees including policy making executives would have no tendency to prove that the defendants' acts were innocent."

United States v. Leahy, 464 F.3d 773 (7th Cir. 2006) : Affirming convictions arising from schemes to cheat the City of Chicago out of funds slotted for minority-owned and women-owned businesses and to swindle workers compensation providers out of proper premiums, the Court found no abuse of discretion when evidence of audits showing that a defendant's companies were not responsible for any insurance fraud was excluded. The audits were conducted after one fraudulent scheme had been revealed, and the Court concluded that "[j] st because Leahy did not continue with the fraud after the scheme had been discovered has no bearing on whether he participated before the fraud was out in the open."

United States v. Marston, 517 F.3d 996 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed convictions for tax evasion, finding no abuse of discretion in excluding a videotape of a person whose teachings the defendant claimed to have relied on in deciding certain income was not taxable. The tape was created in 2002, while the alleged evasion took place in 1999-2001, so it was irrelevant to the defendant's belief at the time of the charged acts.

United States v. Masferrer, 514 F.3d 1158 (11th Cir. 2008) : A bank CEO was convicted of fraudulently misrepresenting certain transactions related to bank assets that had dramatically lost value. To prove that he reasonably believed the transactions were worth full face value at the time he made them, the defendant offered evidence that some subsequently were paid off in full. Affirming, the Court found no error in excluding the evidence, as it was not relevant to what the defendant believed at the time of the transactions and his intent at that time.

[iii] Irrelevant Evidence -- Criminal Cases -- Other Cases

United States v. Dupre, 462 F.3d 131 (2d Cir. 2006) : The defendants were convicted for wire fraud in a scheme promising 1000-to-1 returns for funds invested purportedly to unfreeze assets once held by the family of Philippines president Marcos. The Court affirmed, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony from a psychologist that a defendant's "intense, pervasive religious beliefs significantly interfere with her ability to see her involvement in the 'investment project' in a realistic manner and significantly contribute to her ongoing conviction that she has been involved in a legitimate enterprise with benevolent intentions." The expert's report had a "capacity to mislead and confuse the jury, and to permit the defendant to put an impermissible theory of justification before the jury without meeting her burden of presenting the affirmative defense of insanity."

United States v. Whitfield, 590 F.3d 325 (5th Cir. 2009) : An attorney was convicted for a bribery scheme in which he arranged, guaranteed, and paid off loans for state judges, in order to corruptly influence the outcome of cases he had filed in their courts. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony from a fellow attorney that the defendant had guaranteed a loan for him in the past, as " 'evidence of noncriminal conduct to negate the inference of criminal conduct is generally irrelevant.'" Likewise, evidence that the attorney did not file the most significant and potentially lucrative case he was working on at the time of the alleged conspiracy in the court of one of the judges was properly excluded as irrelevant. In United States v. Miller, 576 F.3d 528 (5th Cir. 2009) , the defendant was convicted of an attempted forcible assault against federal officers, after he backed his pickup truck toward officers making an arrest. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of a photograph that showed a serious gunshot wound to the face suffered by the defendant in the incident. The photograph was irrelevant on the issue of the defendant's intent, as he "could certainly have formed an intent to assault before he was shot, and this seems to have been the dominant theory at trial." In United States v. Wofford, 560 F.3d 341 (5th Cir. 2009) , the Court affirmed a conviction for theft or embezzlement from an employee benefit plan, finding no abuse of discretion when an expert for the defendant was not permitted to testify that the plan was not qualified under Internal Revenue Code provisions permitting corporate deductibility and employee tax deferment for contributions. As the only requirement under the charged statute was that the plan be subject to "any provision of title I" of the ERISA statute, evidence that the plan was not "tax-qualified" was irrelevant.

United States v. Klebig, 600 F.3d 700 (7th Cir. 2009) : The defendant was prosecuted for possession of an unregistered firearm (a rifle with its barrel sawed off and its stock missing) and an unregistered silencer (an automobile oil filter) after the items, along with more than 20 legal firearms, were found in his junk-filled house. Reversing, the Court held it was error to admit evidence of a sign on the defendant's front door that "nothing here is worth dying for," as it had no tendency to prove that the defendant knew the firearm was an illegal modified rifle or a legal modified pistol, or his intent to use the oil filter as an illegal silencer or a legal flash suppressor. In United States v. Dooley, 578 F.3d 582 (7th Cir. 2009) , the Court affirmed the conviction of a police officer for theft from the police department evidence vault. It found no abuse of discretion when the defense was precluded from introducing evidence of other thefts from the department's vault, since those thefts occurred at another, less secure facility and were thus irrelevant to supporting the defendant's explanation for the missing evidence in this case. In United States v. Lee, 502 F.3d 691 (7th Cir. 2007) , the defendant was arrested when police, after receiving a report that gunshots had been fired on two consecutive mornings, stopped a car in which the defendant was a passenger and found a gun near him. The defendant claimed that the gun was not his and that he was in the wrong place at the wrong time. Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of defense testimony from witnesses to the shootings that occurred on the two mornings before the defendant was arrested. The most that the testimony could establish was that the defendant was not implicated in the shootings, and this was irrelevant to whether the defendant had a firearm when he got out of the car that the police stopped.

United States v. Wallenfang, 568 F.3d 649 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for production, distribution, and possession of child pornography, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of expert testimony that the defendant was not a pedophile and was not sexually attracted to young girls. The evidence was not relevant to any of the charges, since the only issue was whether the pictures appeared to be of a sexual character, not whether they appealed or were intended to appeal to the defendant's sexual interests. In United States v. Raplinger, 555 F.3d 687 (8th Cir. 2009) , the Court affirmed convictions for sexual exploitation of a child and child pornography, finding no abuse of discretion when the defendant was barred from offering evidence of certain specific instances of conduct and of discussions that he had with the child victim, as well as evidence that the victim kept and uploaded to the internet certain pictures. Because consent was not a defense, the evidence was not relevant. In United States v. Street, 531 F.3d 703 (8th Cir. 2008) , the court affirmed convictions for sexual exploitation of a minor and possession of visual depictions of a minor engaging in sexually explicit conduct. It held that evidence that the minor, the eldest daughter of the defendant's wife, set fire to the family house in an effort to kill not only the defendant but also the entire family was irrelevant. The evidence tended to show that the victim was deeply disturbed "but sheds no light on Street's purpose for creating the sexually explicit photographs."

United States v. Oldbear, 568 F.3d 814 (10th Cir. 2009) : Affirming the conviction of an administrative assistant in tribal offices for embezzling from a tribal emergency assistance program, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony from three witnesses that they also received emergency assistance funds for similar expenses. Because the witnesses had no knowledge of any tribal guidelines for disbursement of such funds, their testimony was irrelevant on the consequential facts whether the defendant's expenditures were authorized and whether she possessed the requisite intent.

United States v. Duran, 596 F.3d 1283 (11th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for knowingly acting in the United States as a foreign government's agent without prior notification to the Attorney General, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence that the defendant and his coconspirators did not know of the requirement to notify the Attorney General. Because the offense charged was a general intent offense, the prosecution need not prove the defendant's lack of knowledge and the evidence was irrelevant. In United States v. Wilk, 572 F.3d 1229 (11th Cir. 2009) , the defendant, convicted for killing a police officer assisting in execution of a search warrant during a federal investigation, claimed he acted in self-defense. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence that the officer had ingested steroids, as there was no evidence that the officer had engaged in aggressive or erratic behavior or that he was the aggressor in the shoot-out. The Court also found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of expert testimony that the officers executing the warrant had not followed proper police procedure, as the evidence relevant to the defendant's self-defense claim was his perception of the officers' actions, not whether they followed proper procedure.

[a] Accident and Injury Cases

Dortch v. Fowler, 588 F.3d 396 (6th Cir. 2009) : In a personal injury action arising from a car-truck collision, the trial boiled down to whether the accident occurred in the plaintiff's or the defendant's lane of travel, and central to that inquiry was whether either of two gouges (one in each lane) was caused by the accident. To disprove that the gouge in the plaintiff's lane was so caused, the defendant made an extensive search of past accident records in hopes of finding some evidence of an accident that might have caused the gouge. When that search was unsuccessful, the defendant obtained an in limine ruling, on the ground of irrelevance, that precluded the plaintiff from asking about the search. Affirming a judgment for the defendants, the Court held that the ruling was an abuse of discretion, but harmless error. Although not strong evidence, the unsuccessful search was probative on the plaintiff's theory: "the absence of any past accident record is exactly what you would expect to find if [the plaintiff]'s theory that the gouge was caused by this accident is correct." A concurring Judge thought "[t]he majority is likely correct" that it was error to exclude the evidence for lack of relevancy, but would have affirmed simply because any probative value the evidence had "was slight and the potential for prejudice and jury confusion significant." In Croskey v. BMW of No. Am., Inc., 532 F.3d 511 (6th Cir. 2008) , the plaintiff, who was injured by scalding fluid when the plastic neck on a car's radiator failed, brought product liability claims alleging both that the design of the radiator was defective and that the defendant manufacturer failed to provide warnings after becoming aware that the plastic radiator neck might fail. When the plaintiff offered evidence of other incidents in which the neck failed, the Judge admitted the evidence only on the failure to warn claim, limiting it to incidents occurring before the plaintiff's accident of which the defendant was notified. Reversing a judgment for the defendant, the Court held that under the governing law evidence of similar incidents was also relevant to prove that the design was defective. The Court cited a state case suggesting that in a case like this evidence of incidents postdating the plaintiff's accident, which would be relevant to a defect claim but irrelevant to a warning claim, could be excluded under Rule 403 as confusing. The Court also noted that on remand the defendant could offer evidence of the total number of cars sold having a radiator with the allegedly defective design. In the Judge's discretion, evidence of a positive safety history might tend to rebut the defect claim; cross-examination could help the jury understand the statistics offered. Finally, the Court held it was error to exclude testimony by non-BMW mechanics regarding performance of the radiator neck on the design defect claim, but proper to exclude their testimony on the warning claim, as knowledge was not notice to the defendant.

[ii] Similar Circumstance Evidence -- Accident and Injury Cases -- Miscellaneous Cases

Croskey v. BMW of No. Am., Inc., 532 F.3d 511 (6th Cir. 2008) : The plaintiff, who was injured by scalding fluid when the plastic neck on a car's radiator failed, brought product liability claims alleging both that the design of the radiator was defective and that the defendant manufacturer failed to provide warnings after becoming aware that the plastic radiator neck might fail. When the plaintiff offered evidence of other incidents in which the neck failed, the Judge admitted the evidence only on the failure to warn claim, limiting it to incidents occurring before the plaintiff's accident of which the defendant was notified. Reversing a judgment for the defendant, the Court held that under the governing law evidence of similar incidents was also relevant to prove that the design was defective. The Court cited a state case suggesting that in a case like this evidence of incidents postdating the plaintiff's accident, which would be relevant to a defect claim but irrelevant to a warning claim, could be excluded under Rule 403 as confusing. The Court also noted that on remand the defendant could offer evidence of the total number of cars sold having a radiator with the allegedly defective design. In the Judge's discretion, evidence of a positive safety history might tend to rebut the defect claim; cross-examination could help the jury understand the statistics offered. Finally, the Court held it was error to exclude testimony by non-BMW mechanics regarding performance of the radiator neck on the design defect claim, but proper to exclude their testimony on the warning claim, as knowledge was not notice to the defendant.

[b] Similar Circumstance Evidence -- Civil Rights and Discrimination Cases

Timmerman v. U.S. Bank, N.A., 483 F.3d 1106 (10th Cir. 2007) : Affirming summary judgment for the defendant in an age and gender discrimination action by a terminated bank manager, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence regarding replacement of female branch managers over age 40 two years previously. The Court found that the circumstances were "not remotely comparable" and there was "a logical disconnect" between them: the replacements took place as part of a post-acquisition reorganization, while the plaintiff was terminated for disciplinary reasons; there was a lack of temporal proximity; and there was no showing that the replacements made discriminatorily.

[c] Similar Circumstance Evidence -- Contract Cases

Craig Outdoor Advertising, Inc. v. Viacom Outdoor, Inc., 528 F.3d 1001 (8th Cir. 2008) : Small billboard companies alleged that the defendant, a billboard operator acting as leasing agent for railroads, had wrongfully appropriated for itself billboard sites for which the plaintiffs had applied. Affirming in part a judgment for the plaintiffs, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting two railroad employees to testify that the defendant's process of reviewing site applications internally was outside the industry norm and contrary to their expectations as representatives of the railroads and that it was not fair for the defendant to surreptitiously review applications and appropriate sites. The witnesses spoke from their experience in railroad real estate management and billboard site review and approval, and their testimony was helpful to the jury in refuting testimony by the defendant's witnesses that its process was permissible under the terms of its contracts with the railroads.

[c.1] Similar Circumstance Evidence -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Whitfield, 590 F.3d 325 (5th Cir. 2009) : An attorney was convicted for a bribery scheme in which he arranged, guaranteed, and paid off loans for state judges, in order to corruptly influence the outcome of cases he had filed in their courts. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony from a fellow attorney that the defendant had guaranteed a loan for him in the past, as "'evidence of noncriminal conduct to negate the inference of criminal conduct is generally irrelevant.'" Likewise, evidence that the attorney did not file the most significant and potentially lucrative case he was working on at the time of the alleged conspiracy in the court of one of the judges was properly excluded as irrelevant.

[28] State Law [Go To Main]

Moyer v. United Dominion Indus., Inc., 473 F.3d 532 (3d Cir. 2007) : In an action by factory workers alleging serious and permanent hand injuries as a result of using the defendant's "swager" (a machine used to form metal) for years, evidence that the plaintiffs had misused the machine was excluded as irrelevant. Reversing denial of the defendant's motion for a new trial, the Court noted that under Pennsylvania law, "evidence of misuse is generally admissible to defeat causation in a strict liability design defect case." It reiterated its caution in Gibson v. Mayor & Council of Wilmington, 355 F.3d 215 (3d Cir. 2004) : "[W]hile Rule 401 gives judges great freedom to admit evidence, [it] diminishes substantially their authority to exclude evidence as irrelevant."

Hodges v. Mack Trucks, Inc., 474 F.3d 188 (5th Cir. 2006) : The injured driver of a truck sued the manufacturer of the truck and the manufacturer of the seatbelt alleging design defects in the seatbelt and in the passenger-side door latch that caused him to be ejected in the accident. The Court held that a Texas statute stating that "[u]se or nonuse of a safety belt is not admissible evidence in a civil trial ... " was "substantive, rather than procedural." The statute was intended to bar the use of seatbelt evidence to prove contributory negligence, but it was not intended to bar evidence in a case like this, where it was offered to rebut the essential element of causation, whether the door latch was the proximate cause of the injuries. Therefore, it was an abuse of discretion to exclude evidence as to whether the driver was wearing a seatbelt, and so a judgment against the truck manufacturer was vacated.

Sims v. Great Am. Life Ins. Co., 469 F.3d 870 (10th Cir. 2006) : In an action against a life insurer who refused to pay on the ground that the insured committed suicide, the insurer attempted to prove the decedent's state of mind by showing that he was not wearing a seatbelt (although he habitually did) at the time of his one-car accident. Affirming in part a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to exclude the evidence pursuant to a state law making evidence of the use or non-use of a seatbelt inadmissible "in any civil suit in Oklahoma." After an extensive analysis of the Erie issue, the Court held that the Rules of Evidence "exclusively govern in federal diversity cases," but that the relevancy assessment under Rule 401 required a determination of whether the seatbelt provision "is a procedural rule or a substantive one." It concluded that the entire purpose of the statute was to regulate primary conduct, and so where, as here, the seatbelt evidence is not being used to affect negligence liability but only to draw an inference of the driver's state of mind in a contract action, the federal "procedural" principles governed. The Trial Judge had also followed state law in excluding expert opinions included in the medical examiner's report, the death certificate, and the investigating officer's report and testimony. The Court held that exclusion of this evidence was also error (but harmless): the state rules reflected state "procedural" policies, which are of no concern when applying the Federal Rules, including its relevancy rules.

CHAPTER 402 RULE 402

402.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Importance of the Rule

Federal Rule of Evidence 402 is one of the most important and yet least invoked of the Evidence Rules. Rule 401 sets the definition of relevant evidence, but that Rule itself provides no authority for admitting evidence. Rule 403, the most invoked Evidence Rule, gives the Trial Court the discretion to exclude evidence if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the risk of prejudice, confusion of the jury, or delay. But like Rule 401, Rule 403 is not a positive source for the admission of evidence. Rather, it is Rule 402 that provides the authority for admitting every piece of evidence that is ever admitted in a Federal Court.

[2] Relevant Evidence Admissible

Rule 402 makes clear that all relevant evidence is admissible, except as otherwise provided by the Constitution, federal statute, or valid Supreme Court-promulgated rules. All evidence that is not relevant is inadmissible. If evidence is relevant, it is up to the nonoffering party to invoke a specific rule, from the body of rules listed in Rule 402, which justifies exclusion of the evidence.

Sometimes it appears that Judges decide doubtful questions of relevance on the side of admissibility, at least where no strong cry of prejudice supports the relevance objection. In view of the rather undemanding standard of relevance in Rule 401, this is not surprising. Fearing that evidence may tend to prove a fact in dispute in some hard-to-see way, Judges may be extraordinarily wary of exclusion.

The question arises whether, absent a specific claim of prejudice or confusion or a reasonable concern about undue consumption of time, Judges should worry about basic relevance objections. At first blush it may seem that the answer should be "no," since no harm is apparently done when irrelevant evidence is introduced.

Harm comes in subtle forms, however, as well as in obvious ways. Irrelevant evidence by definition cannot help the trier of fact. It can only hurt. It must be apparent that in offering such evidence the proponent seeks some advantage from it. Whatever the advantage that is sought, it is an edge to which the proponent cannot properly lay claim. Yet the opponent may be helpless to identify the precise mischief at hand. Damage is not always demonstrable. For this reason, a Court should exclude irrelevant evidence upon proper objection without requiring an articulated demonstration of harm. Even without the showing of damage, the fact remains that at best irrelevant evidence is useless, and at worst it is time-consuming as well as damaging in some indeterminate way. We prefer to err on the side of caution and to exclude anything that cannot satisfy even the low relevance threshold to admissibility.

[3] Irrelevant Evidence in Response to Irrelevant Evidence

As a general proposition it is correct to assert that irrelevant evidence is not admissible in litigation (assuming that a proper objection is made). There is one class of cases in which this general statement must be further refined, however: where one party offers evidence that is properly classified as irrelevant and the other party, after failing to object, offers to meet the irrelevant evidence with additional irrelevancies. The notion of "fighting fire with fire" (also called "curative admissibility") is an old one, and the decision whether to admit irrelevant evidence in order to counter other irrelevant evidence seems to be the same under the Federal Rules of Evidence as at common law. n1

The Trial Judge must decide whether the interests of justice are better served by penalizing the party who failed to object, or by treating the party who began the parade of irrelevant evidence as being in no position to complain. Among the factors that the Trial Judge is likely to take into account in making a ruling are: the damage that can fairly be attributable to the initial offer of irrelevant evidence; whether the party who failed to object intentionally sat on his rights; whether a limiting instruction to disregard all of the irrelevant evidence is likely to work in the particular case; the amount of time that it would take to hear further irrelevant evidence; and the extent to which a failure of one party to respond to irrelevant evidence might mislead a jury untrained in evidence law to think that the irrelevant evidence was beyond challenge and therefore somewhat probative.

One thing, however, is clear: The doctrine of curative admissibility is only applicable where the adversary has already brought forth irrelevant or inadmissible evidence. It does not apply where the adversary's evidence was properly admitted in the first place. One cannot fight "fire with fire" if there was no "fire" to begin with. n2

[4] Sources of Rules Excluding Relevant Evidence

Rule 402 refers to four sources of possible exclusionary rules for relevant evidence: (1) the Constitution; (2) federal statutes; (3) the Federal Rules of Evidence; and (4) other Supreme Court rules, promulgated pursuant to statutory authority.

At the constitutional level, the most often invoked exclusionary rules are those excluding evidence obtained in violation of the Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure; n3 the Fifth Amendment right to be free from compelled self-incrimination; n4 the Fifth Amendment right to due process; n5 and the Sixth Amendment right to counsel. n6

There are a number of federal statutes that mandate exclusion of relevant evidence. The most often invoked example is the wiretapping statute, Title III of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968, as Modified by Title I of the 1986 Electronic Communications Privacy Act. n7 This Act requires the exclusion of evidence obtained through electronic surveillance conducted in violation of the Act, despite the relevance of the information. Other statutes have also been invoked to exclude relevant evidence from time to time. n8

Ordinarily, the statute must expressly provide for the exclusion of evidence; where Congress has not specifically provided for exclusion, the Courts have generally not imposed it as a remedy. n9

The Federal Rules of Evidence contain many exclusionary rules. These rules can be divided into two types: (1) rules that guard against prejudicial or untrustworthy evidence, such as Rules 403, 608, 609, 702, 703, and the hearsay rule -- the policy behind these rules is that even if evidence is relevant, its admission in certain cases could actually harm rather than advance the search for truth, due to the risk that the jury will be unfairly affected by prejudicial or unreliable evidence; and (2) rules based on the premise that certain policies are more important than the need to admit all relevant evidence, such as Rules 407 through 412, the rules on privileges, and Rule 606.

As to other Supreme Court rules that may result in the exclusion of relevant evidence, the most important are those contained in the Federal Rules of Civil and Criminal Procedure. For example, Rule 37 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure provides that the Trial Judge may sanction a litigant who commits a discovery violation by precluding that litigant from introducing relevant evidence. But most of the Civil and Criminal Rules do not specifically provide for exclusion of any evidence obtained in violation of the requirements set forth. Most Courts have held that in the absence of specific exclusionary language, a violation of a Federal Rule of Civil or Criminal Procedure does not result in exclusion of otherwise relevant evidence. n10 However, certain rules requiring notice or mandating discovery do permit a Trial Judge in the exercise of discretion to exclude evidence as a sanction. See, e.g., Fed. R. Crim. P. 12.1(d), 12.2(d), 12.3(d), and 16(d)(2). Also, Fed. R. Crim. P. 15 imposes some limits on the use of depositions in criminal cases, even though the testimony is relevant.

[5] Other Sources of Exclusion?

What if the asserted source of exclusion is not specifically mentioned in Rule 402? This was a question encountered by the Eleventh Circuit in the important case of United States v. Lowery, 166 F.3d 1119 (11th Cir. 1999) .

Lowery was an appeal by the government, challenging rulings from the District Court that suppressed the testimony of alleged coconspirators. The expected testimony was obtained as a result of plea agreements, whereby the government promised to consider recommending a lighter sentence in exchange for the alleged co-conspirators' substantial assistance in the prosecution of the defendants. The District Court held that such agreements, although commonplace in the criminal justice system, were prohibited by 18 U.S.C. § 201(c)(2), which makes it a crime for anyone to give or promise anything of value for testimony. The Court also held that the agreements violated Rule 4-3.4(b) of the Florida Bar Rules of Professional Conduct, which states that a lawyer shall not "fabricate evidence, counsel or assist a witness to testify falsely, or offer an inducement to a witness ... ." The District Court reasoned that both of these sources of authority mandated exclusion of the testimony of the cooperating witnesses, even though that testimony was undoubtedly relevant.

The statutory source of exclusion cited in Lowery has been the subject of some controversy. The possible use of the statute as a source of exclusion of cooperating witness testimony came to be known as "the Singleton issue," after the now-reversed Tenth Circuit panel decision in United States v. Singleton, 144 F.3d 1343 (10th Cir. 1998) , rev'd en banc, 165 F.3d 1297 (10th Cir. 1999) . The question posed by Singleton was whether plea agreements violate the federal prohibition against bribing witnesses contained in 18 U.S.C. § 201(c)(2). The Court of Appeals in Lowery made short shrift of the defendants' argument that the statute prohibited prosecutors from offering leniency in exchange for testimony. The Court noted that Singleton had been rejected by every Court of Appeals, including the Tenth Circuit itself in an en banc opinion. The Lowery Court observed that if the statute clearly prohibited promises of leniency in exchange for testimony, "the legions of attorneys who have represented defendants convicted over the years because of testimony dependent upon such illegal agreements would have raised the issue day in and day out in every district court in every circuit in the country. They did not. The sound of their silence is deafening." Thus, because the statute did not prohibit offering a deal to a cooperating witness, it could not be used as a source of excluding the resulting evidence under Rule 402.

The Florida Rule of Professional Conduct prohibiting a lawyer from offering an inducement to a witness presented a somewhat more complicated question. Could that rule be the source of exclusion of relevant evidence in a federal trial? The Lowery Court observed that Rule 402 provides "an exclusive list of the sources of authority for exclusion of evidence in federal court." Thus, the source of exclusion of relevant evidence must come from the Federal Constitution, a federal statute, an Evidence Rule, or another Rule promulgated by the Supreme Court under the Enabling Act. The Lowery Court concluded simply that state rules of professional conduct "are not included in the list."

But while the state rule itself could not be a source of exclusion, there was another complication: a local rule of the Florida District Court incorporated the Florida Rules of Professional Conduct, and applied those rules to regulate the practice of lawyers in the District Court. Thus, the asserted source of exclusion of relevant evidence was not a state rule of professional responsibility, but rather a federal-based local rule. But the existence of a local rule did not help the defendants in Lowery. As the Court noted, local federal court rules are not promulgated by the Supreme Court pursuant to the Enabling Act; nor are they promulgated under any other Act of Congress. The authority for local court rules is found in Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 83, which provides authority for District Courts to promulgate local rules, but only if they are not inconsistent with the Federal Rules of Evidence or Procedure. Consequently, the Court concluded that local rules could not provide an independent source of exclusion of relevant evidence under Rule 402. n11

The defendant in Lowery, in a last-ditch effort at exclusion, relied on a federal statute commonly referred to as the "McDade amendment" (28 U.S.C. § 530(b)) which provides that a lawyer for the federal government "shall be subject to State laws and rules, and local Federal court rules, governing attorneys in each State where such attorney engages in that attorney's duties, to the same extent and in the same manner as other attorneys in that State." The McDade amendment, as a matter of federal law, requires federal prosecutors to comply with state rules of professional responsibility, to the same degree as any other lawyer. The defendant argued that the McDade amendment incorporated the local rule of professional responsibility as a matter of federal statutory law, and that this was a specified source of exclusion under Rule 402. The Lowery Court obviously recognized that Acts of Congress like the McDade amendment are included on the Rule 402 list because "Congress has the authority to exclude from evidence in federal courts anything it pleases, subject only to the limits placed upon it by the Constitution." But the important remaining question was whether the McDade amendment reasonably could be construed as a statute excluding evidence.

The McDade amendment by its terms is directed toward controlling the conduct of federal prosecutors and not toward whether evidence should be excluded. The Lowery Court stated that "nothing in the language or legislative history of the Act that would support" the "radical notion" that a rule designed to control prosecutorial ethics should also be employed as a source for excluding evidence in federal court. Making state professional conduct rules applicable to federal attorneys is one thing. Letting those rules govern the admission of evidence in federal court is quite another. The Lowery Court properly concluded that "[i]f Congress wants to give state courts and legislatures veto power over the admission of evidence in federal court, it will have to tell us that in plain language using clear terms." n12

The resolution in Lowery makes a good deal of sense. The Rules of Professional Conduct, whether based in state or federal law, are not designed to control the admissibility of evidence. Rather, they are designed to control the conduct of lawyers. The Preamble to the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct states that "the purpose of the Rules can be subverted when they are invoked by opposing parties as procedural weapons." Thus, the proper remedy for a violation of a Rule of Professional Conduct is a sanction on the lawyer, not exclusion of any evidence that might have been derived from the misconduct. As one Court stated: "The ethical rules were intended by their drafters to regulate the conduct of the profession, not to create actionable duties in favor of third parties." n13

A possibly different situation arises in criminal cases where defense counsel is operating under a conflict of interest. The most common example in which exclusion might be considered is where the defense counsel has previously represented a witness who is now cooperating with the government. The lawyer in this circumstance is subject to disqualification because she cannot cross-examine the former client with confidential information, leading her to possibly softpedal the cross-examination at the expense of the current client. Defendants have argued that the way to protect against this conflict is simply to exclude the testimony of the cooperating witness. In United State v. Messino, 181 F.3d 826 (7th Cir. 1999) , the Court stated that a Trial Court can exclude relevant testimony "on rare occasions" to resolve a conflict of interest. The source of authority for exclusion is not a rule of professional responsibility, but rather Rule 44 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. That Rule gives Trial Courts broad discretion to fashion remedies to avoid defense counsel conflicts of interest. And of course that Rule was promulgated by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority, so it is a designated source of exclusion in Rule 402. As to whether the testimony of the cooperating witness should be excluded in order to alleviate a conflict of interest, the Messino Court held that "a balancing of the kind contemplated by Rule 403 is in order. That is, the probative value of the evidence must be weighed against the negative consequences of admitting the evidence." In Messino, the Court balanced the probative value of the testimony of the government witness against the negative effects that would result from disqualification of defense counsel if the witness were to testify. The Court found that the cooperating witness' testimony would be highly probative, while the consequences of disqualification were inconvenience to the defendant and potentially less effective representation. The Court concluded that the costs of disqualification did not substantially outweigh the probative value of the cooperating witness' testimony, and therefore exclusion of that testimony was not warranted under the circumstances.

[1] Juvenile Delinquency Act

United States v. Delatorre, 157 F.3d 1205 (10th Cir. 1998) : A defendant who was charged with multiple gang-related crimes moved in limine to exclude evidence of his alleged participation in a murder before he was 18 years old. The Trial Judge ruled that the evidence was inadmissible to prove guilt on racketeering and conspiracy charges, but reserved ruling on whether the evidence could be introduced under Rule 404(b). Reversing, on an interlocutory appeal, the Court held that the Juvenile Delinquency Act, 18 U.S.C. §§ 5031-5042, governs only jurisdiction over juvenile offenses, and does not address the individual acts comprising the offense or the evidence necessary to prove the acts. Thus, the Act had no application to the murder as an offense, because the defendant was not separately charged with it; nor did it apply to the racketeering and conspiracy charges, because those offenses continued into the defendant's majority.

[2] Rules of Professional Responsibility

United States v. Messino, 181 F.3d 826 (7th Cir. 1999) : The Court reversed an order based on the rules of professional responsibility that disqualified a government witness from testifying because the witness had been represented previously by one of the defense attorneys. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 402.02[5].

United States v. Lowery, 166 F.3d 1119 (11th Cir. 1999) : In a case in which the prosecution entered into cooperation agreements with several witnesses, the Trial Judge held that the witnesses would not be permitted to testify because such agreements violated a Florida Bar Rule of Professional Responsibility, which states that a lawyer shall not "offer an inducement to a witness." The Court held, however, that neither the state rule of professional responsibility, nor the local rule of court, nor the federal statute, warranted exclusion of the witnesses' testimony. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 402.02[5].

[3] Statutory Exclusion

United States v. Griffith, 385 F.3d 124 (2004) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, holding that statements made by the defendant during a pretrial-services interview could be used to impeach him at trial. The Court held that the bar in 18 U.S.C. § 3153 on use at trial of such statements applied only to their substantive use on the issue of guilt, not their use for impeachment.

Morales v. American Honda Motor Co., 151 F.3d 500 (6th Cir. 1998) : In a product liability action for injuries to a nine-year-old riding a small motorbike, the Court held that 15 U.S.C. § 2074(b), which makes inadmissible "[t]he failure of the [Consumer Products Safety] Commission to take any action or commence a proceeding with respect to the safety of a consumer product," does not apply when the CPSC has decided not to adopt a proposal. Therefore, it was error (but harmless) to exclude evidence that the CPSC denied a petition to regulate use of unlicensed motorbikes by children under age 14.

CHAPTER 402 RULE 402

402.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Advisory Committee's Note

The provisions that all relevant evidence is admissible, with certain exceptions, and that evidence which is not relevant is not admissible are "a presupposition involved in the very conception of a rational system of evidence." Thayer, Preliminary Treatise on Evidence 264 (1898). They constitute the foundation upon which the structure of admission and exclusion rests. For similar provisions see California Evidence Code §§ 350, 351. Provisions that all relevant evidence is admissible are found in Uniform Rule 7(f); Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60-407(f); and New Jersey Evidence Rule 7(f); but the exclusion of evidence which is not relevant is left to implication.

Not all relevant evidence is admissible. The exclusion of relevant evidence occurs in a variety of situations and may be called for by these rules, by the Rules of Civil and Criminal Procedure, by Bankruptcy Rules, by act of Congress, or by constitutional considerations.

Succeeding rules in the present article, in response to the demands of particular policies, require the exclusion of evidence despite its relevancy. In addition, Article V recognizes a number of privileges [Editor's Note: The Advisory Committee proposals on Article V were subsequently rejected by Congress]; Article VI imposes limitations upon witnesses and the manner of dealing with them; Article VII specifies requirements with respect to opinions and expert testimony; Article VIII excludes hearsay not falling within an exception; Article IX spells out the handling of authentication and identification; and Article X restricts the manner of proving the contents of writings and recordings.

The Rules of Civil and Criminal Procedure in some instances require the exclusion of relevant evidence. For example, Rules 30(b) and 32(a)(3) of the Rules of Civil Procedure, by imposing requirements of notice and unavailability of the deponent, place limits on the use of relevant depositions. Similarly, Rule 15 of the Rules of Criminal Procedure restricts the use of depositions in criminal cases, even though relevant. And the effective enforcement of the command, originally statutory and now found in Rule 5(a) of the Rules of Criminal Procedure, that an arrested person be taken without unnecessary delay before a commissioner or other similar officer is held to require the exclusion of statements elicited during detention in violation thereof. Mallory v. United States, 354 U.S. 449, 77 S. Ct. 1356, 1 L. Ed. 2d 1479 (1957) ; 18 U.S.C. § 3501(c).

While congressional enactments in the field of evidence have generally tended to expand admissibility beyond the scope of the common law rules, in some particular situations they have restricted the admissibility of relevant evidence. Most of this legislation has consisted of the formulation of a privilege or of a prohibition against disclosure. 8 U.S.C. § 1202(f), records of refusal of visas or permits to enter United States confidential, subject to discretion of Secretary of State to make available to court upon certification of need; 10 U.S.C. § 3693, replacement certificate of honorable discharge from Army not admissible in evidence; 10 U.S.C. § 8693, same as to Air Force; 11 U.S.C. § 25(a)(10), testimony given by bankrupt on his examination not admissible in criminal proceedings against him, except that given in hearing upon objection to discharge; 11 U.S.C. § 205(a), railroad reorganization petition, if dismissed, not admissible in evidence; 11 U.S.C. § 403(a), list of creditors filed with municipal composition plan not an admission; 13 U.S.C. § 9(a), census information confidential, retained copies of reports privileged; 47 U.S.C. § 605, interception and divulgence of wire or radio communications prohibited unless authorized by sender. These statutory provisions would remain undisturbed by the rules.

The rule recognizes but makes no attempt to spell out the constitutional considerations which impose basic limitations upon the admissibility of relevant evidence. Examples are evidence obtained by unlawful search and seizure, Weeks v. United States, 232 U.S. 383, 34 S. Ct. 341, 58 L. Ed. 652 (1914) ; Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347, 88 S. Ct. 507, 19 L. Ed. 2d 576 (1967) ; incriminating statement elicited from an accused in violation of right to counsel, Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201, 84 S. Ct. 1199, 12 L. Ed. 2d 246 (1964) .

[2] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

To accommodate the view that the Congress should not acquiesce in the Court's judgment that it has authority under the existing Rules Enabling Acts to promulgate Rules of Evidence, and the concern that the Congress must not affect adversely whatever authority the Court does have to promulgate rules, the Subcommittee amended "by other rules adopted by the Supreme Court" to read "by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority" in this and other rules where the reference appears.

[3] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

Rule 402 as submitted to the Congress contained the phrase "or by other rules adopted by the Supreme Court." To accommodate the view that the Congress should not appear to acquiesce in the Court's judgment that it has authority under the existing Rules Enabling Acts to promulgate Rules of Evidence, the Committee amended the above phrase to read "or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority" in this and other Rules where the reference appears.

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 402, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 402. Relevant Evidence Generally Admissible; Irrelevant Evidence Inadmissible	Rule 402. General Admissibility of Relevant Evidence

admissible

All relevant evidence is admissible, except as otherwise provided by the Constitution of the United States, by Act of Congress, by these rules, or by other rules prescribed

Relevant evidence is admissible unless any of the following provides otherwise:

by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority. Evidence which is not relevant is not admissible.

- the United States Constitution;
- a federal statute;
- these rules; or
- other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court.

Irrelevant evidence is not admissible.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 402 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Rule 403. Exclusion of Relevant Evidence on Grounds of Prejudice, Confusion, or Waste of Time

Although relevant, evidence may be excluded if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury, or by considerations of undue delay, waste of time, or needless presentation of cumulative evidence.

CHAPTER 403 RULE 403

403.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Presumption of Admissibility

This Rule codifies the common-law powers of the Trial Judge and states these powers as explicitly as they ever have been stated. Where the probative value of evidence is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion, or undue consumption of time, the evidence may be excluded even though it is relevant. The drafters of the Rule provided that the probative value must be "substantially" outweighed by these other factors before evidence is excluded. "Substantially" is not defined and there is nothing in the Advisory Committee's Note or in the congressional material that indicates exactly what this word is intended to mean. But the policy of the Rule is that if the balance between probative value and countervailing factors is close, the Judge should admit the evidence. n1 In other words, there is a presumption in favor of admitting relevant evidence. In order to overcome this presumption, the negative countervailing factors must be demonstrably greater than the probative value of the evidence. n2 The rationale is that exclusion amounts to a total deprivation of the offeror's probative evidence, while admission may be accompanied by redaction, limiting instruction, or other safeguard by which both the objector and the offeror can ordinarily be accommodated. n3

[2] Balancing Standard

There has been some dispute as to the proper standard to be used in balancing probative value against prejudicial effect under Rule 403. One possibility is to give the evidence its maximum reasonable probative force and its minimum reasonable prejudicial value. Another possibility, recommended by Professor Dolan, is to "resolve all doubts concerning the balance between probative value and prejudice in favor of prejudice." n4

We believe that the proper equation places on one side the maximum reasonable probative force of the offered evidence. n5 Since parties must produce evidence in order to make a case, and since our evidence system allows juries to make all inferences reasonably deducible from the proof presented and allows the parties to argue about those inferences, it is evident to us that the maximum probative force of the evidence is properly viewed as the cost of excluding the evidence.

The other side of the equation should include the likely prejudicial impact of the evidence, rather than the minimum or maximum prejudicial effects. Few of us believe that juries will act perfectly in practice. In fact, Rule 403 assumes that juries cannot act this way. But there is no reason to assume that they will act as imperfectly as possible. We are confident that Trial Judges can identify the likely harm associated with probative evidence and can estimate its impact on the jury. Thus, the proper balance pits the maximum probative value of evidence against the likely prejudicial effect.

[3] The Meaning of "Prejudice"

Evidence is not "prejudicial" merely because it is harmful to the adversary. After all, if it didn't harm the adversary, it wouldn't be relevant in the first place. Rather, the Rule refers to the negative consequence of "unfair" prejudice. n6 Unfair prejudice is that which could lead the jury to make an emotional or irrational decision, or to use the evidence in a manner not permitted by the rules of evidence. n7 Professor Lempert, in Modeling Relevance, 75 Mich. L. Rev. 1021 (1977), defines prejudicial evidence as "any evidence that influences jury verdicts without relating logically to the issue of guilt or innocence." We would prefer a slightly different definition: "prejudicial evidence is any evidence that affects the trier of fact in a manner not attributable to the permissible probative force of the evidence." This definition makes clear that evidence that strongly relates to the issue of guilt or liability might still be highly prejudicial, and also that evidence that is probative for a permissible use may nonetheless be prejudicial because the jury could use it for an impermissible purpose.

There are, of course, varying degrees of prejudice, and the Trial Court must take that into account when balancing under Rule 403. In a criminal case, any evidence of a defendant's prior criminal activity that is extremely similar to the charges is clearly on the high end of the prejudice scale. The degree of prejudice may well diminish if the evidence might permit some unsavory inferences, and yet does not clearly indicate criminal or highly immoral activity. Thus, in United States v. Thompson, 990 F.2d 301 (7th Cir. 1993) , the defendant was charged with being a felon in possession of a gun; the gun was found in an apartment in which he was sleeping. He argued that he neither knew of nor exercised control over the gun and was an infrequent guest at the apartment. The Trial Court permitted an agent to testify that officers found $13,000 cash, and expensive jewelry engraved with the defendant's first name, in the bedroom of the apartment. The defendant argued that this testimony should have been excluded under Rule 403, as it prejudiced the jury into thinking the defendant "was a bad guy." The Court of Appeals held that the evidence was properly admitted to show the defendant's control over the premises, and that the probative value was not substantially outweighed by the prejudicial effect because "it is not a crime to keep jewelry or cash in one's bedroom." n8

[4] Where Limiting Prejudicial Effect Would Reduce Probative Value

The Trial Court should of course take all reasonable steps to limit the prejudicial effect of proffered evidence. However, in some cases any measure taken to control prejudice would result in a corresponding loss of probative value. This was the problem confronted by the Court in United States v. Mackie, 893 F. Supp. 12 (E.D. La. 1995) . Mackie was charged with money-laundering. The government sought to admit surreptitiously recorded conversations in which the defendant took part. These conversations involved discussions of several schemes to launder money. The defendant argued that under Rule 403 the tapes should be redacted to exclude the defendant's liberal use of racial and ethnic slurs. The Court recognized that the admission of such language could inflame the jury against the defendant. The problem, though, was that the tape was so "heavily seasoned" with racial and ethnic slurs that redaction of the slurs would severely damage the flow of the taped conversation. Moreover, redaction of some of the ethnic slurs would deprive the tape of probative value on the point of money-laundering, since the tape included discussion of the defendant's plan to deposit cash with insurance companies in the name of deceased African-Americans. Under these circumstances, the tape could not be redacted to limit prejudice since to do so would also limit probative value. And while the presence of racial slurs was undeniably prejudicial, the prejudice did not substantially outweigh the probative value of the tape, as is required for exclusion under Rule 403. The Court noted, however, that it would take "sufficient steps during voir dire of prospective jurors to ensure that no jurors are seated who would allow their judgment to be influenced by the slurs or who could not disregard race."

[5] Less Prejudicial Alternatives

If other less prejudicial proof is available, or if the prejudice raised by the evidence could be minimized easily without destroying its probative value, the Trial Judge may decide to require such less prejudicial alternatives by excluding the more prejudicial evidence -- at least where the balance between probative value and prejudicial effect of the proffered evidence is close. n9 A Court should be more willing to exclude evidence when there are less prejudicial alternative means to prove the fact in issue. n10

An example of this proposition arose in United States v. Torres-Flores, 827 F.2d 1031 (5th Cir. 1987) . Border Patrol Agent Rosario was chasing three suspected illegal aliens when one of them shot at him from a distance of fifty feet, then escaped across the border. Rosario filed a report of the incident, but no investigation was undertaken. Three months later, Rosario was sitting in the Border Patrol locker room, when he happened to look through a stack of nine photographs of men "suspected to be thieves, smugglers, transvestites and the like," taken by Border Patrol agents when the suspects were in custody. He noticed a picture of a man who resembled the man who had shot at him. That man was Torres-Flores. At trial, when Rosario was questioned about the circumstances of his viewing the photographs, he stated that they were "pictures of various people we take, smugglers, transvestites." Eight of the nine photographs had descriptive material handwritten next to the individual's body, such as "robbery suspect," "in slammer for murder," "river bandit," "thief," and "transvestite." The defendant's photograph also had something written on it, but this was covered up by brown paper and tape when the picture was shown to the jury. There was no attempt to cover up the notations on the other photographs, which were also shown to the jury.

The Court of Appeals held that the Trial Judge committed reversible error in admitting the photographs and allowing them to be viewed by the jury in the manner presented by the government. Of course, it was clear that the photographic array was relevant, because Rosario's identification was crucial to the case and the jury would have to be apprised of the circumstances of the prior identification. But the Court reasoned as follows:

> While the photo-array was not without probative value, this value was substantially outweighed, Fed.R.Evid. 403, in the circumstances of this case, especially as the pictures could easily have been modified so as to avoid characteristics which would cause the jury to identify the defendant as having a prior record. The masking that was attempted was so inartful and incomplete as merely to invite the jury's attention to these prejudicial matters.

The Court instructed that at a new trial, the government should "take more effective steps than mere taping to disguise the nature of the photographs." n11

Of course, the reality is that the prejudice attendant to the photographs in Torres-Flores can never be completely rooted out. The jury would surely surmise that the photographs found by Rosario in the Border Patrol locker room were photographs of suspects with prior criminal contacts with the Border Patrol. Nobody would think that the photographs were culled from a pack of baseball cards or a family photo album. However, the Court in Torres-Flores did not require the government to eradicate all traces of prejudice before evidence could be admitted; it simply held that in a close case, Rule 403 may warrant exclusion if the offering party fails to take reasonable steps to control the prejudicial effect of the evidence. n12

[6] Balancing as a Comparative Process

In Old Chief v. United States, 519 U.S. 172 (1997) , the Court emphasized the point made in the previous section: that the balancing process under Rule 403 requires the Trial Judge to consider whether other evidence is available to prove the point, and specifically whether the alternative evidence is less prejudicial than the evidence proffered. The Court explained that a piece of proffered evidence could not be viewed in isolation, because that would "leave the party offering evidence with the option to structure a trial in whatever way would produce the maximum unfair prejudice consistent with relevance. He could choose the available alternative carrying the greatest threat of improper influence, despite the availability of less prejudicial but equally probative evidence. The worst he would have to fear would be a ruling sustaining a Rule 403 objection, and if that occurred, he could simply fall back to offering substitute evidence. This would be a strange rule." Instead, Rule 403 requires the Trial Court to consider "evidentiary alternatives."

In Old Chief, the defendant was charged with felon-firearm-possession. To prove the felony element, the government offered the defendant's prior conviction for an act of violence. The defendant sought to exclude the evidence by providing an alternative -- he offered to stipulate that he was a felon. The Trial Judge admitted the conviction despite the defendant's proffer. The Old Chief Court held that the District Court abused its discretion. Old Chief's stipulation was alternative evidence to prove the felony element. This evidence was just as probative and yet much less prejudicial than the judgment of conviction.

[7] Stipulations

The Court held that Old Chief could force the government to accept a stipulation that he was a felon -- the stipulation rendered the judgment of conviction inadmissible under Rule 403. An important question after Old Chief is the extent to which an opponent can control the admission of prejudicial evidence by forcing the proponent to accept a stipulation.

Even a cursory reading of Old Chief indicates that the Court's holding is limited to the unusual circumstances posed by the case. It by no means held that offers to stipulate can always, or even often, preclude evidence proffered by the proponent. Most of the Old Chief majority opinion is devoted to explaining why a proponent ordinarily should be permitted to prove its case through evidence rather than forced to accept a stipulation. Justice Souter, writing for the majority, discussed why a proponent might legitimately be concerned about accepting a stipulation:

> Unlike an abstract premise, whose force depends on going precisely to a particular step in a course of reasoning, a piece of evidence may address any number of separate elements, striking hard just because it shows so much at once; the account of a shooting that establishes capacity and causation may tell just as much about the triggerman's motive and intent. ... This persuasive power of the concrete and particular is often essential to the capacity of jurors to satisfy the obligations that the law places on them. ... When a juror's duty does seem hard, the evidentiary account of what a defendant has thought and done can accomplish what no set of abstract statements ever could, not just to prove a fact but to establish its human significance, and so to implicate the law's moral underpinnings and a juror's obligation to sit in judgment. Thus, the prosecution may fairly seek to place its evidence before the jurors, as much to tell a story of guiltiness as to support an inference of guilt, to convince the jurors that a guilty verdict would be morally reasonable as much as to point to the discrete elements of a defendant's legal fault. (emphasis added.)
> But there is something even more to the prosecution's interest in resisting efforts to replace the evidence of its choice with admissions and stipulations, for beyond the power of conventional evidence to support allegations and give life to the moral underpinnings of law's claims, there lies the need for evidence in all its particularity to satisfy the jurors' expectations about what proper proof should be. Some such demands they bring with them to the Courthouse, assuming, for example, that a charge of using a firearm to commit an offense will be proven by introducing a gun in evidence. A prosecutor who fails to produce one, or some good reason for his failure, has something to be concerned about. "If [jurors'] expectations are not satisfied, triers of fact may penalize the party who disappoints them by drawing a negative inference against that party." Saltzburg, A Special Aspect of Relevance: Countering Negative Inferences Associated with the Absence of Evidence, 66 Calif. L. Rev. 1011, 1019 (1978). Expectations may also arise in jurors' minds simply from the experience of a trial itself. The use of witnesses to describe a train of events naturally related can raise the prospect of learning about every ingredient of that natural sequence the same way. If suddenly the prosecution presents some occurrence > in the series differently, as by announcing a stipulation or admission, the effect may be like saying, "never mind what's behind the door," and jurors may well wonder what they are being kept from knowing. A party seemingly responsible for cloaking something has reason for apprehension, and the prosecution with its burden of proof may prudently demur at a defense request to interrupt the flow of evidence telling the story in the usual way.

Despite this paean to proof by evidence rather than forced stipulation, the Old Chief Court held that the prosecution is required to accept a stipulation of the felony element in a felon-firearm prosecution. Justice Souter reasoned as follows:

> This recognition that the prosecution with its burden of persuasion needs evidentiary depth to tell a continuous story has, however, virtually no application when the point at issue is a defendant's legal status, dependent on some judgment rendered wholly independently of the concrete events of later criminal behavior charged against him. As in this case, the choice of evidence for such an element is usually not between eventful narrative and abstract proposition, but between propositions of slightly varying abstraction, either a record saying that conviction for some crime occurred at a certain time or a statement admitting the same thing without naming the particular offense. ... Nor can it be argued that the events behind the prior conviction are proper nourishment for the jurors' sense of obligation to vindicate the public interest. ... Congress ... has made it plain that distinctions among generic felonies do not count ...; the fact of the qualifying conviction is alone what matters under the statute. ... Finally, the most obvious reason that the general presumption that the prosecution may choose its evidence is so remote from application here is that proof of the defendant's status goes to an element entirely outside the natural sequence of what the defendant is charged with thinking and doing to commit the current offense. Proving status without telling exactly why that status was imposed leaves no gap in the story of a defendant's subsequent criminality, and its demonstration by stipulation or admission neither displaces a chapter from a continuous sequence of conventional evidence nor comes across as an officious substitution, to confuse or offend or provoke reproach.
> Given these peculiarities of the element of felony-convict status and of admissions and the like when used to prove it, there is no cognizable difference between the evidentiary significance of an admission and of the legitimately probative component of the official record the prosecution would prefer to place in evidence. ... What we have said shows why this will be the general rule when proof of convict status is at issue, just as the prosecutor's choice will generally survive a Rule 403 analysis when a defendant seeks to force the substitution of an admission for evidence creating a coherent narrative of his thoughts and actions in perpetrating the offense for which he is being tried.

The probable consequence of the analysis in Old Chief is that the prosecutor (or for that matter a party in a civil case) will be required to accept a proffered stipulation only in extremely narrow circumstances, such as with a conviction element of a status crime, as in Old Chief itself. n13 Another example would be a case where the defendant is charged with escape. Conviction of escape requires proof of a predicate conviction, which the defendant can, after Old Chief, stipulate in order to keep the judgment of conviction out of the case. n14

Suppose, however, that the prosecution in a drug case offers the defendant's prior drug conviction to prove intent, and the defendant tries to keep this evidence out by stipulating to intent. After Old Chief, the government has a strong argument that it should be permitted to prove the conviction. Otherwise, the government would be forced to suffer a "break in the natural sequence of narrative evidence." Indeed, the Old Chief Court stated: "if there were a justification for receiving evidence of the nature of prior acts on some issue other than status (i.e., to prove 'motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident,' Fed. Rule Evid. 404(b)), Rule 404(b) guarantees the opportunity to seek its admission." (Emphasis added.) Thus, while the defendant won in Old Chief, the decision probably represents a net loss for defendants in the effort to keep out prejudicial evidence by way of an offer to stipulate. n15

[8] Old Chief and Plea Agreements of Cooperating Witnesses

Most Courts have held that Old Chief generally precludes defendants from using a concession or stipulation to control prejudicial evidence. An important example of the consequences of Old Chief arises when the government enters into a deal with a cooperating witness, and that witness testifies at trial. The usual practice is for the government to introduce the fact and the terms of the plea agreement. A plea agreement is a two-edged sword. The defendant might want to bring out the plea agreement to show that the witness has a reason to lie, because his deal is at least in some way contingent on successful testimony against the defendant. The prosecution might want to bring out the agreement because in some respects it actually supports the witness' credibility, and it may lead the jury to think that because the witness pleaded guilty the defendant must be guilty as well. This latter inference is prejudicial however. The jury should not be permitted to think that because the defendant's associate pled guilty, the defendant must be guilty as well. The Courts under Rule 403 have held that a defendant has a right to have his guilt or innocence determined by the evidence presented against him, not by what has happened with regard to a criminal prosecution against someone else. n16

But this does not mean that the prosecution should be prohibited from admitting the plea agreement of a cooperating witness on direct examination. In most cases, the defendant is going to introduce the agreement on cross-examination in an attempt to show the witness is lying as part of his deal. If this attack is going to be made on cross, it is only fair to permit the government to bring out the agreement on direct. n17 If the government cannot refer to the plea agreement on direct, it will suffer a negative inference when the agreement is raised on cross-examination. The jury may think that the government was trying to hide the fact that a deal was made with the witness. Moreover, under Rule 607, the prosecution has the right to impeach a witness it calls, and to the extent a plea agreement impeaches a witness for bias, the prosecution would much rather conduct that impeachment in a relatively gentle manner on direct examination -- leaving defense counsel to seem overreactive if she emphasizes the agreement on cross-examination. So where the defendant is going to raise the agreement on cross-examination, the agreement carries substantial probative value for the government's case. As a general rule, this probative value is probably not substantially outweighed by the risk that the jury will use the agreement as evidence of the defendant's guilt even though instructed not to do so.

But is the situation different if the defendant promises not to refer to the agreement on cross-examination or elsewhere in the trial? If the defendant makes such a concession, why should the plea agreement be admissible to remove the sting of a cross-examination that the defendant promises will never occur? This is where the Old Chief ruling, generally prohibiting the defendant from controlling the prosecution's proof by way of concession, will have an impact. The en banc consideration by the Third Circuit in United States v. Universal Rehabilitation Services (PA), Inc., n18 provides a good overview and a thorough discussion of both sides of the issue. The defendants were tried for mail fraud and related offenses. Two cooperating witnesses testified and on direct examination, their guilty pleas and plea agreements were offered into evidence.

To head off the prosecution's legitimate concern that the plea agreements would be raised on cross-examination, the defendants in Universal promised that at trial they would "not raise the guilty plea/plea agreements on cross examination nor seek to raise any inference on which the accomplices' pleas of guilty would be admissible to rebut." The defendants argued that in light of their concession there was no longer any need to bring out the plea agreements on direct examination. They asserted that their concession robbed the plea agreements of any probative value, so that admitting the agreements would be an abuse of discretion under Federal Rule of Evidence 403.

The Trial Court in Universal was unpersuaded by the defendants' argument. It reasoned that the agreements were still probative despite the defendants' proffered concession because if the agreements were not introduced, "the jury is going to wonder whether or not [the witnesses] have been charged. It's going to wonder perhaps what they have been promised by the prosecutor if anything and what they may be getting in return for their testimony." This risk of jury speculation would not be ameliorated by the defendants' promise not to bring up the plea agreements.

The jury was instructed not to use the agreements as evidence of the defendants' guilt. The defendants were convicted of a single count of mail fraud. Notably, they had been charged with a number of counts and acquitted of all but one: the count to which the cooperating witnesses had pleaded guilty. What a coincidence!

On appeal, the question was whether the Trial Court abused its discretion under Rule 403 when it admitted the plea agreements even though the defendants agreed not to bring them up at the trial. The majority of the en banc Court found no abuse of discretion. It argued that the plea agreements were probative on three points even after the defendants agreed not to raise them. Specifically, the plea agreements were probative: "(1) to allow the jury accurately to assess the credibility of the witness; (2) to eliminate any concern that the jury may harbor concerning whether the government has selectively prosecuted the defendant; and (3) to explain how the witness has first hand knowledge concerning the events about which he/she is testifying."

The defendants responded to the majority's argument that credibility could not be taken out of the case by citing Old Chief. But the majority in Universal distinguished Old Chief as a case where the proffered stipulation "was of equal probative value to the government's proffered evidence." This was not the case with the defendants' offer to refrain from bringing up the plea agreements of the cooperating witnesses. The plea agreements were still probative (1) to counteract the possibility that the jury might believe that the defendants were being selectively prosecuted instead of the equally culpable witnesses, and (2) to explain how the witnesses had first hand knowledge concerning the matters to which they were testifying.

Since the plea agreements retained probative value despite the defendants' concession, the remaining question was whether the Trial Court in Universal properly balanced that probative value with the risk of prejudicial effect. The majority argued that the prejudicial effect in this case was diminished by the fact that the jury was instructed a number of times not to use the plea agreements as proof of the defendants' guilt. These instructions minimized the risk that the jury would use the agreements impermissibly. In the majority's view, the Trial Court was within its discretion in finding that the minimized prejudice did not substantially outweigh the probative value of the cooperation agreements.

Despite the majority's decision in Universal, there is a strong argument that where the defendant promises not to bring up the plea agreement, it should fall out of the case unless the defendant reneges on that promise.

The analysis of both the Trial Court and the majority in Universal basically ends by stating that the proffered concession and the plea agreements are not "equally probative" and therefore the agreements can still be admitted under Rule 403. But this is not a very careful Rule 403 analysis, and it ignores the fundamental teaching of Old Chief. As Judge Becker states in dissent in Universal, Old Chief stands for the proposition that under Rule 403, "proffered evidence must not be analyzed as an island unto itself." Rather, admissibility of a piece of evidence under Rule 403 can only be evaluated in comparison to other available means of proof on the same point. The reason the Court reversed Old Chief's conviction for felon firearm possession was that his proffered stipulation of a felony conviction was just as probative as and far less prejudicial than actual proof of the conviction itself. Put another way, the probative value of the felony conviction was diminished by the availability of other proof of the defendant's felony status (i.e., the stipulation).

Applying this more nuanced Old Chief analysis to the facts of Universal, the question is whether the diminished probative value, in light of the defendant's promise not to raise the plea agreements, is substantially outweighed by the obvious risk that the jury will use the agreements as proof that the defendants are guilty. As Judge Roth states in dissent in Universal, the evaluation of the probative value of the plea agreements "cannot be made without a consideration of the defendants' commitment" not to raise the agreements.

According to the majority the plea agreements were still probative despite the defendants' concession, (1) to allay any jury concerns that the defendants had been selectively prosecuted, and (2) to establish that the witnesses had personal knowledge of the events to which they were testifying. But what is the probative value of the agreements for these purposes?

As to selective prosecution, evidence of the plea agreements seems at first blush to be very probative. The cooperating witnesses in Universal were relatively major players in the charged scheme. The jury may well have wondered why the defendants were being prosecuted and these witnesses were not. Evidence of the plea agreements would explain the situation and diminish any such speculation. The jury would see that the defendants were not being singled out, because the witnesses were charged as well.

But this does not end the inquiry. If the government is concerned about jury speculation, why not just ask the Court to instruct the jury that it should not speculate about selective prosecution? Judge Roth in dissent makes the compelling argument that the best way to avoid jury speculation is "to instruct the jury members that they should concern themselves only with the guilt or innocence of defendants and not with the possibility of selective prosecution or the involvement of any other persons in any alleged scheme." Again, the possibility of less prejudicial alternatives -- in this case a limiting instruction -- did not receive proper consideration by the Universal majority.

In fact the use of an instruction is a more efficient way to deal with jury speculation than is introducing the prejudicial plea agreement. Under the prosecution's scenario, the plea agreement must be presented to eliminate the risk of jury speculation. But this evidence carries with it prejudicial effect, so the jury is instructed that it cannot use the plea agreement as evidence of the defendant's guilt. In other words, to allay the risk of jury speculation, the prosecution proposes admission of evidence, and then a limiting instruction to prevent jury speculation on a different subject. (Obviously, the prosecution's view of jury speculation and the curative powers of jury instruction vary depending on which shoe is on which foot). Under the defendants' view, the risk of jury speculation is handled by a cautionary instruction without the need to introduce any evidence. As Judge Becker notes in dissent in Universal, the defendants' suggested mode of presentation "takes less time and is more direct." Efficiency is surely a consideration that must be taken into account when balancing the probative value of evidence against the risks of prejudice, confusion and delay under Rule 403.

What about the probative value of the plea agreement in establishing that the witnesses had personal knowledge about the matters to which they testified? It seems obvious that the probative value for this purpose is minimal. The plea agreement proves nothing more about the witnesses' personal knowledge than their in-Court testimony already shows. Judge Roth, in dissent points up the flaw in the government's argument on this point:

> I am left wondering ... how the introduction of a witness's guilty plea into evidence establishes the basis for his or her firsthand knowledge of the crime. ... It is the witness's testimony itself that establishes the basis for his or her firsthand knowledge of the crime-the witness has firsthand knowledge because s/he was present during or participated in the crime, not because s/he pleaded guilty to the crime.

Admitting the plea agreement to prove the witness' personal knowledge amounts to impermissible bolstering. The witness has stated on the stand that she witnessed the crime. In the absence of an attack on that assertion (e.g., cross-examination asserting that the witness wasn't really there) there is no reason to introduce the plea agreement. It is simply cumulative on the question of personal knowledge.

So how should the Rule 403 balancing have come out in Universal, where the defendants conceded that they would not raise the plea agreement on cross-examination? The plea agreements carry probative value that is significantly diminished by the defendants' promise not to raise them and the possibility of an instruction to limit jury speculation on the question of selective prosecution. On the other hand, the risk of prejudice is high, albeit somewhat diminished by a limiting instruction not to use the plea agreement as evidence of the defendant's guilt. Despite the instruction, the jury will likely find it hard to ignore the inference that the defendants must be guilty because their associates pleaded guilty to the same crime.

It must be remembered that under Rule 403, the evidence is excluded only if the prejudicial effect substantially outweighs the probative value. This is where judgment calls are made and reasonable minds often differ. So given the role of Appellate Judges in reviewing Rule 403 determinations, the majority's viewpoint in Universal is understandable. After all, the Trial Court did explicitly balance the Rule 403 factors, and it was the Trial Court who saw the witnesses and heard the defendants' proffered concession. It is hard to reverse that decision on a cold record.

But the fundamental problem with affirming the Trial Court in Universal is that it means that plea agreements will always be admissible on direct examination. The Universal facts present the strongest facts possible for exclusion of the plea agreements. The best reasons for admitting the agreements on direct are to remove the sting of anticipated impeachment and to counter the implication that the prosecution is hiding negative evidence. Where these risks are virtually eliminated by the defendants' promise not to raise the agreements, and yet the Trial Court still holds that the agreements are admissible under Rule 403, it is apparent that plea agreements will be admissible in every case and there is nothing that the defendant can do to keep them out. The only real prohibition remaining is that the prosecution will not be able to argue explicitly that the witnesses must be telling the truth because they entered into these agreements.

Because affirming the Trial Court in Universal means that plea agreements are essentially automatically admissible, the Court of Appeals should have stepped in and found an abuse of discretion. While the abuse of discretion standard is deferential, it should not mean that Trial Court decisions admitting prejudicial evidence are impervious to review, no matter the circumstances. As Judge Sloviter stated in her dissent in Universal:

> The majority's holding that a guilty plea is admissible to permit the jury to assess the credibility of the witness, even in the absence of an attack on the witness's credibility, or to dispel jury concern about selective prosecution, even if the defendant has not so contended, transmutes a case-by-case analysis under Fed.R.Evid. 403 into a general rule of admissibility. I see no justification for such a rule.

It does not follow, however, that the decision in Universal means that plea agreements of cooperating witnesses are to be automatically admitted in all trials, no matter what the defendant does. The Court in Universal did not hold that Trial Courts must admit these agreements. It simply held that the Trial Court did not abuse its wide discretion in admitting the plea agreements. It is very likely that if the Court had reviewed a decision to exclude the agreements, it would have found no abuse of the Trial Court's wide discretion.

So it is to be hoped even after Old Chief and Universal that Trial Courts will use their discretion to exclude plea agreements from jury consideration when the defendant makes a solid, clear commitment that he will not raise (1) the plea or plea agreement, (2) any attack on the witness' motive to falsify that might arise from an interest in cooperation or cutting a deal, or (3) any inference that the defendant was selectively prosecuted. The jury can be instructed upon request not to speculate about selective prosecution.

It must be recognized that a Trial Court might be concerned about how the defendant's commitment not to attack a cooperating witness will be enforced. In Universal, the defendants' proffered concession was that they would not "raise the guilty plea/plea agreements on cross examination nor seek to raise any inference on which the accomplices' pleas of guilty would be admissible to rebut." This is not the most crystal-clear of stipulations. By way of contrast, Old Chief's proffered stipulation left no ambiguity. He offered to stipulate that he had been convicted of a felony, which was the precise element of the crime with which he was charged. Now consider the defendants' promise in Universal not to "raise" the plea agreement. What does "raise" mean? Does it mean that the defendants will make no specific reference to the guilty pleas? What if defense counsel asks the witness "have you ever spoken with a government agent before testifying today?" The prosecution would howl that this is an indirect reference that "raises" the plea agreement. But defense counsel would respond that he was not referring to the agreement at all -- he was just inquiring into whether anyone in the government had helped the witness prepare his trial testimony. What does the Court do then?

Other questions arise about the stipulation procedure in practice. What if the defense counsel simply accuses the witness of being a liar? Does this "raise" the plea agreement? What if counsel charges the witness with being the person who duped the defendant to commit the crime that the witness himself benefitted from? Indeed, where the witness is obviously involved with the same activity as the defendant, what kind of cross-examination would not raise an inference that could be rebutted by the plea agreement?

The above questions raise a legitimate concern that the defendants' proffered concession in Universal was too vague and slippery to be enforceable -- or at least raise the possibility that a Court might be wary before holding that the defendants' promise rendered alternative evidence inadmissible. Under these circumstances, the government is justifiably concerned that the defense is impinging on the prosecution's ability to present its evidence in the most meaningful and compelling way.

There is another practical problem with the defendants' proffered concession in Universal. Assume it can be determined that the defendants violated the concession by either raising the agreements or raising an inference that the agreements can rebut. To take a simple example, assume the prosecution is not permitted to elicit the agreements on direct, and defense counsel on cross-examination accuses the defendant of being a government snitch, only out for what he can get from the government. The prosecution would then, presumably, get to introduce the plea agreement on re-direct. But that is less protective of the government interest than when the agreement is brought out on direct. The prosecution wants to introduce the agreement on direct in order to remove the sting of anticipated impeachment and prevent the jury from thinking that the prosecution is hiding negative evidence. These legitimate prosecutorial objectives are not protected by the ability to introduce the agreements on redirect after defense counsel violates the stipulation. The damage at that point has been done. Perhaps some of the damage can be alleviated by a limiting instruction, in which the trial judge tells the jury that it is not to draw a negative inference from the fact that the prosecutor brought out the agreements on re-direct rather than on direct examination. But this instruction, even if effective, cannot restore the prosecution's interest in removing the sting of anticipated impeachment by bringing out the agreements gently and lovingly on direct examination.

An even more serious practical problem exists if defense counsel attacks the motives of the cooperating witnesses in closing argument. Now what is the Court to do? Must it allow the government to reopen its case to introduce proof of the agreements? That remedy will not satisfy the prosecution, because reopening will look like a desperate ploy by the government. The government will look like it has a lack of confidence in the strength of the evidence it has already presented. Again, a limiting instruction might diminish some of the prejudice suffered by the government if it were to reopen its case -- the jury could be instructed not to draw a negative inference about the strength of the government's case or the timing of its presentation of the agreement. But the possibility of having to reopen the case after defense counsel violates its proffered concession might well give a Court pause before holding that the defendant, by proffering such a concession, can prevent the government from bringing out a plea agreement on direct.

Perhaps the real answer to the problems that might arise if defense counsel violates the terms of the concession is this: If the Trial Judge agrees to exclude the agreement conditioned on defense counsel complying with its promise not to raise the agreement, defense counsel is very unlikely to violate that promise. If the defense counsel raises the plea agreements after agreeing not to do so, he certainly risks sanctions from the Court. He also risks a Court holding that the entirety of the plea agreement is admissible, including provisions which defense counsel would rather not have the jury hear about. And finally, if Courts were to hold that defendants could keep plea agreements out of the case by agreeing not to raise them, and then defendants continually reneged on their promises and raised the agreements anyway, Courts over the long run would no longer permit the practice. Defendants would be back to facing the admission of the entire plea agreement on direct examination without any ability to control the risk of prejudice by promising not to mention the agreement on cross.

So perhaps any concern over the costs of the "defense concession" approach is overstated. Even so, the concern is not negligible, and the Universal majority may have thought that a rule allowing defendants to control the proof of plea agreements would be fraught with difficulty. If that was the concern, however, the Court should have expressed it plainly. Its reliance on a cramped reading of Old Chief leads to unnecessarily complex procedures and unnecessarily prejudicial evidence introduced against defendants.

[9] Old Chief and the Moral Reasonableness of a Guilty Verdict

One passage in Old Chief indicates that the prosecution should be unfettered by a proffered stipulation because a stipulation would deprive the government of an opportunity "to convince the jurors that a guilty verdict would be morally reasonable as much as to point to the discrete elements of a defendant's legal fault." This would seem to mean that the government could proffer evidence beyond the actual facts in dispute, in order to provide a broader perspective on the morality of the defendant's conduct or the morality of the government's objectives. Such a broad analysis of relevance was implicitly adopted by the Court in Universal, discussed in § 403.02[8]. The Court there held that the plea agreement of a cooperating witness remained probative even though the defendant conceded that he would not attack the witness' motives for testifying. It was relevant because when the jury hears the testimony from the defendant's cohort, it will wonder why the cohort isn't being punished along with the defendant. In other words, it might speculate -- even though no evidence had been presented on the point -- that the prosecution was acting improperly (immorally) by selectively prosecuting the defendant.

Thus, one reading of Old Chief is that evidence can be relevant on broader issues of morality, even if those issues are not contested by the parties. Professor Todd Pettys refers to this reading of Old Chief as adopting an "Enhanced Relevance Model." n19 Professor Pettys demonstrates the disastrous consequences that flow from the view that evidence is relevant to prove the moral reasonableness of a litigant's position:

> Imagine two jurors who have conflicting notions of moral behavior. The jurors are asked to determine whether the defendant, an African-American male, is guilty of possessing crack cocaine with the intent to distribute. Juror One believes that recreational drug use is morally neutral behavior -- it is neither blameworthy nor praiseworthy -- and that racist prosecutors use the nation's drug laws to incarcerate as many young African-American males as possible. Juror Two, on the other hand, believes that possessing or distributing illegal drugs is always morally wrong because those drugs might wind up in the hands of people who lack the knowledge to use them responsibly and innocent people might be harmed. The prosecutor offers the testimony of a witness who will say that, one week before the defendant's arrest, she saw the defendant sell several small bags of crack cocaine to another man, who in turn gave the cocaine to children. Though the Government never charged the defendant in connection with that alleged incident, the prosecutor argues that the testimony is relevant because it tends to show that the defendant intended to distribute the small bags of crack cocaine he was carrying at the time of his arrest. The defendant objects under Rule 403, arguing that the jury is likely to conclude that he is a dangerous person who should be sent to prison regardless of whether he is guilty of the charged offense.
> Might the Enhanced Relevance Model tip the balance more decisively in favor of admission? That is, might the probative weight of the evidence be further increased by its tendency to show that it would be morally reasonable to convict the defendant, thereby increasing the degree of prejudicial risk required to render the evidence inadmissible under Rule 403? The answer depends on the moral premises employed in the analysis. In the eyes of Juror One, the testimony might carry little moral weight, while Juror Two might regard the testimony as morally significant. In the language of Old Chief, the evidence might provide Juror Two with "concrete and particular" details that "give life to the moral underpinnings of the law's claims." The testimony might confirm for Juror Two that it makes good moral sense to prohibit the possession and distribution of controlled substances, since those dangerous substances might find their way into the hands of youths.
>
> Before one can determine whether evidence tends to establish the moral reasonableness of a guilty verdict in any given case, then, one must identify the moral criteria that describe the conditions when, in fact, it would be morally appropriate to convict. The difficulties one encounters when trying to identify those criteria are so daunting that the very notion of assigning weight to evidence in accordance with its moral probity should probably be abandoned. If the Enhanced Relevance Model requires agreement upon > a general moral theory, it is surely doomed. While jurors undoubtedly do sometimes render verdicts that best comport with their own notions of morality, those basic conceptions of morality just as surely vary from juror to juror. ...

Besides the problems of moral relativism, Professor Pettys also notes that the "enhanced relevance" view of Old Chief might permit defense counsel to present counteractive evidence with a goal toward jury nullification.

> At least three consequences would flow from holding, in any given case, that an item of evidence's probative weight is increased because the evidence tends to show that a guilty verdict would be morally reasonable. First, the Court might have to give the defendant increased leeway to present evidence that a guilty verdict would be morally unreasonable, in order both to ensure that jurors are able wisely to evaluate the Government's implicit moral argument and to preserve the appearance of fairness within the criminal justice system. Second, the defendant would have a limited right, under the Fifth and Sixth Amendments, to contend in his closing argument that the Government's evidence fails to show that it would be morally reasonable to convict. Third, the defendant would be entitled to a jury instruction that states, at a minimum, that evidence has been admitted in part for the purpose of persuading the jury that a guilty verdict would be morally reasonable.

For all the reasons given by Professor Pettys, it is profoundly hoped that the Court will not take an expansive, "moral reasonableness" view of relevance. The Enhanced Relevance view of Old Chief leads to an indeterminate system of evidence, a system that will result in less accurate determination of the facts that are legally in dispute between the parties.

[10] Old Chief and the Concern Over Forced Acceptance of an Adversary's Proffered Concession

The Old Chief Court was rightfully wary about an opponent's attempts to stipulate away relevant evidence. There is a real danger that the proponent of relevant evidence can be "sandbagged" by an opponent who proffers a stipulation. The proffered stipulation may well be crafted in such a way as to deny the proponent the fair effect of the evidence. One problem with forced stipulations is that it is rare for relevant evidence to be offered to prove only a single point in dispute in a trial. n20 A common risk of stipulations is that the opponent will offer to stipulate to the fact in such a way that the stipulation is probative on only one of the multiple points on which the evidence is actually relevant. If the proponent is forced to accept that stipulation, then the stipulation will deprive the proponent of the rightful weight of the evidence. To take an easy example: eyewitness testimony that the defendant shot the victim will usually prove a number of points in issue -- the bare fact of shooting proves the act of shooting, but the circumstances seen by the eyewitness will usually be evocative of the defendant's intent, absence of mistake, etc. Assume that the defendant offers to stipulate that he shot the victim. The Court in Old Chief is right to declare that the government should not be forced to accept that stipulation; to do so would rob the evidence of its fair weight in proving intent. And this is not to speak of all the other deleterious consequences of forced stipulations mentioned by the Court in Old Chief, e.g., depriving the jury of traditional means of proof and a full narrative.

Another problem with stipulations is that the opponent has an incentive to frame the stipulation in such a way as to give away as little ground as possible. Lawyers being as they are, there is a possibility that a stipulation does not even concede the point on which the evidence is offered. For example, in United States v. Colon, n21 the defendant was charged with intent to distribute narcotics, specifically that he was operating as a "steerer" in a drug transaction (i.e., a conspirator who "steered" prospective buyers to the conspirator holding the drugs). The government planned to offer the defendant's prior steering convictions to prove intent. Defense counsel sought to head this off by proffering a stipulation. He offered to stipulate that if the government proved that Colon knew the drug seller and was in fact directing the undercover buyer specifically to that drug seller, "then I will acknowledge that he intended to violate the federal narcotics law and intended to aid in the sale of drugs." But this stipulation was rightly rejected, because in effect, the stipulation said, "if you can prove intent, then I admit intent." The Court concluded that defense counsel's offer "stipulated nothing." Tactics like these indicate that the Old Chief Court was rightfully reluctant to hold that a defendant can always control the government's choice of proof by way of stipulation.

As discussed above, the Court in Old Chief declared that the prosecution ordinarily should be permitted to present evidence unfettered by the defendant's proffered concessions. This does not mean, however, that the prosecution after Old Chief is unlimited in its evidentiary choices. While generally not constrained by the defendant, the government is still bound by Rule 403 and the other rules of evidence. United States v. Evans, 216 F.3d 80 (D.C. Cir. 2000) , provides a good illustration. Thomas Rose was serving time and sought to cooperate with the authorities in order to get his sentence reduced. He told FBI agents that Evans was involved in drug trafficking. Thomas Rose then had his uncle George contact Evans, using Thomas' name as a reference. Eventually, George asked Evans to find some drugs for him, and Evans did so. At trial, Evans claimed entrapment.

The government's first witness at trial was FBI agent Darnell. He testified about the origins of the undercover operation, including the FBI's contacts with Thomas and George Rose. The agent was asked how he "came about knowing Mr. Evans." Over defense objection, the agent testified that the FBI had "received information that Mr. Evans was involved in drug trafficking" and that George Rose "was in a position to directly go and approach Mr. Evans about narcotics." Evans claimed that admission of this testimony was error, because it referred to an out-of-Court accusation and thus violated the hearsay rule and Rule 403.

The government admitted that the FBI agent's testimony related an out-of-Court statement, i.e., a statement from an unnamed person that Evans was involved in drug trafficking. But the government argued that this statement was not offered to prove that Evans was in fact involved in drug trafficking. Rather, it was offered to explain why the FBI suspected Evans and decided to target him for an undercover investigation. The government in Evans proffered three interconnected explanations for how the out-of-Court statement could have been used other than for its truth.

First, the government argued that Thomas Rose's accusation was relevant to show that Evans had not been improperly targeted or selectively prosecuted. The contention was that even if the accusation were not in fact true, it could have provided a proper basis for the FBI agents to turn their suspicions and investigative resources toward Evans. The problem for the government, however, was that this not-for-truth purpose was not in dispute in the case; Evans did not contend that he had been selectively prosecuted. Thus, if the statement were in fact offered to rebut an inference of selective prosecution, it should have been excluded as insufficiently probative under Rule 403. As the Court noted, "selective prosecution may qualify as an issue of consequence in some proceedings," but "it was not at issue in Evans' trial."

The Evans Court declared that if Rule 403 could not operate to exclude out-of-Court statements when offered to "explain" the uncontested conduct of government agents, it would "open a large loophole in the hearsay rule." As the Court observed: "If we were to accept the government's rationale here, then explaining why the government agents 'did what they did' through reference to statements of absent informants would be acceptable in almost any case involving an undercover operation, and in many others as well."

The government's second explanation in Evans, for why the out-of-Court statement was probative of something other than the truth of its contents, fared no better. The government argued that the accusation against Evans was necessary to combat "the threat of jury nullification." The government expressed concern that without the accusation, the jury might miss "the moral significance of the allegations, and thus render an unjustified acquittal." The problem with this argument was that it depended specifically on the truth of the accusation that Evans was a drug dealer. If Thomas Rose's allegation were false, then the allegation would have no "moral significance" and acquittal would not be "unjustified." Thus, the government's nullification argument failed to articulate a not-for-truth purpose for the evidence.

The government's final articulation of a not-for-truth purpose for the accusation in Evans was that the statement was relevant as "background." This explanation was found infirm as well. It was simply another way of saying "we want to provide an explanation for the actions of the police leading up to the arrest of Evans." The Court found that the probative value of the accusation for "background" was minimal. It was not very important to the case to show why the officers focused on Evans. The background of the investigation was not completely irrelevant, for surely the jury would be curious as to how the government set its sights on Evans. However, the probative value, given the relative lack of importance of the police investigation to the contested issues of guilt, was found substantially outweighed by the risk of prejudice to Evans. Therefore, the accusations should have been excluded under Rule 403.

The government's response to the Evans Court's Rule 403 analysis was to invoke Old Chief. The government contended that Old Chief permitted it to present its case in its own way, and that therefore it was not necessary for the defendant to raise issues of selective prosecution or to address the circumstances of the government investigation in order for the evidence to be probative. The government asserted that it had the right in all cases to present evidence to counteract the possibility of jury nullification and to assure the jury that a guilty verdict was morally reasonable. But the Evans Court found that Old Chief did not justify the admission of hearsay. It was not enough that the prosecution wanted to tell its story in its own way. The Court explained:

> It is true, of course, that as a general matter the prosecution is entitled to present the "whole story" of criminal misconduct in order to [assure] that the jury does not miss the context of the events and the moral significance of the allegations, and thus render an unjustified acquittal. See Old Chief v. United States, 519 U.S. 172 (1997) ; United States v. Crowder, 141 F.3d 1202, 1207 (D.C. Cir. 1998) (en banc). n22 But in presenting that story, the government is as much bound by the rules of evidence as it is on any other issue. No matter how important it is for the government to present a complete, morally compelling narrative, it must present that narrative through admissible evidence, not through hearsay.

Thus Old Chief, when properly read, is simply a case that prevents an opponent in the ordinary case from controlling the adversary's evidentiary presentation by proffering stipulations and concessions. The premise in Old Chief -- that the prosecution generally has the right to tell the story of the crime through evidence rather than stipulation -- should not be used as the springboard to a more dramatic argument that the prosecution has the right to tell the story of the crime with whatever evidence it chooses to present. A Court that is suspicious about stipulations is not thereby accepting of hearsay or any other inadmissible evidence. And a defendant who moves to exclude evidence under the Federal Rules is in no sense as problematic as a defendant who tries to control the government's proof by forcing it to accept a stipulation.

[12] Demonstrative Evidence

In order to explain or prove how a disputed event occurred, a party may find it helpful to demonstrate the event in Court, or to provide a videotaped or even a computerized recreation of the disputed event. Such demonstrative evidence is regulated by the Trial Court under Rule 403. n23 Obviously, a demonstration can never fully and accurately recreate a real-life event, and so there will be questions of probative value, jury confusion and prejudice; the degree to which the demonstration comes close to recreating a real-life event is crucial in determining admissibility. n24

Trial Courts have often exercised their discretion to admit demonstrations when relevant, so long as they do not create a serious misimpression as to how an event might have occurred. n25 Moreover, some demonstrations may not purport to prove how an event occurred. Instead, they may be proffered to illustrate an expert's opinion, or to illustrate the party's version of the events. In either of these circumstances, the demonstration need not necessarily come close to recreating a disputed event, so long as the jury is made aware of the limited goal of the demonstration. n26

For example, in Hinkle v. City of Clarksburg, 81 F.3d 416 (4th Cir. 1996) , the estate of a person shot by police officers during an armed standoff brought a civil rights action for excessive force and conspiracy. The events surrounding the shooting were heavily contested, the most hotly disputed point being whether the decedent was shot in the chest or in the back. The Trial Court admitted a computer-animated videotape offered by the defendants. The tape tracked the facts as contended by the defendants, showing the decedent being shot in the chest and spinning around and falling face down. The videotape, which ended with a computer animation of the trajectory of the bullet, was offered to illustrate the expert testimony of a forensic animation technologist, who concluded that the defendants' version of the facts was consistent with the physical evidence. The Court found no error in the admission of the videotape. It reasoned that the jury was properly instructed that the animation was designed merely to illustrate the defendant's version of the shooting and to demonstrate how this version was consistent with the physical evidence. It observed as follows:

> Although there is a fine line between a recreation and an illustration, the practical distinction is the difference between a jury believing that they are seeing a repeat of the actual event and a jury understanding that they are seeing an illustration of someone else's opinion of what happened. The jury understood that the very thing disputed in this trial was the condition under which the shooting occurred. In light of this fact and the Court's cautionary instruction, there was no reason for the jury to credit the illustration any more than they credit the underlying opinion. n27

However, Rule 403 does provide a limit on such demonstrations in egregious cases. One example is United States v. Gaskell, 985 F.2d 1056 (11th Cir. 1993) . The defendant's daughter died from shaken baby syndrome, caused by the defendant's having shaken her. The dispositive question was whether the defendant intended to injure or to revive his daughter when he shook her. The Trial Judge allowed a government expert to demonstrate shaken baby syndrome to the jury by shaking an infant mannequin used to practice CPR techniques. The expert shook the doll so forcefully that the head repeatedly swung back against the doll's back and then forward against the doll's chest. The expert testified that the neck of the CPR doll was stiffer than an infant's, and so greater force was required to produce the head movement associated with shaken baby syndrome.

The Court of Appeals held that the courtroom demonstration was reversible error, because the conditions of the demonstration "were not sufficiently similar to the alleged actions of the defendant to allow a fair comparison." While the demonstration did indicate how a baby's head would move during an event leading to shaken baby syndrome, this could have been demonstrated in a less inflammatory manner by a direct manipulation of the doll's head. The Court concluded:

> The sight of an adult male repeatedly shaking a representation of an infant with the degree of force necessary to manipulate the doll's head in the required fashion was likely to form a strong impression upon the jury ... . By displaying a greater degree of force than the level required to produce shaken baby syndrome in a seven month-old infant and by arbitrarily selecting a number of oscillations, the demonstration tended to implant a vision of Gaskell's actions in the jurors' minds that was not supported by any factual basis for the demonstration.

Thus, the Court found that allowing the courtroom demonstration was an abuse of discretion under Rule 403. n28

Similarly, demonstrations admitted in the guise of illustrating expert testimony or one side's version of the facts are subject to exclusion under Rule 403 if there is a substantial risk that the jury, despite instructions, may misuse the evidence as proof of how the disputed event actually occurred. The chance of exclusion is especially high if the "illustrative" demonstration is too close, but yet not close enough, to an approximation of the real-life event. A good example is Finchum v. Ford Motor Co., 57 F.3d 526 (7th Cir. 1995) . The Finchums were injured in a car accident when their vehicle was rear-ended and their car seats released from the seat tracks and rotated rearward. In a product liability action in which the plaintiffs unsuccessfully sought to prove that the car seats were defectively designed, the Court upheld the exclusion of a videotape depicting a test conducted by the plaintiffs' expert. In the video, two car seats were attached to a platform sled; one seat was a seat of the type involved in the accident, and the other was an alternative design prepared by the expert. Crash dummies were in each seat but, unlike the accident in which the plaintiffs were involved, neither of the dummies was wearing a seatbelt. When the sleds were pulled into a barrier to simulate a rear impact, the dummy in the production seat flipped backward, somersaulting through the air. The plaintiffs argued that the demonstration was not offered as proof of how the accident occurred, but rather to illustrate the principles used by the expert in concluding that alternative designs were feasible. But the Court held that the demonstration was "just similar enough to the Finchums' accident to confuse the jury and leave jurors with the prejudicial suggestion that the Finchums flipped over backwards during the crash." n29

[13] Experts

In Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 509 U.S. 579 (1993) , the Supreme Court declared that expert testimony "can be both powerful and quite misleading because of the difficulty in evaluating it." The Court concluded that because of the heightened risks attendant to expert evidence, "the judge in weighing possible prejudice against probative force under Rule 403 ... exercises more control over experts than over lay witnesses." After Daubert, some Courts have used Rule 403 more aggressively to exclude the testimony of experts, especially where the testimony is based on questionable methodology or where it does not completely fit with the issues in the case. n30 Daubert is discussed extensively in § 702.02[5].

[14] Bench Trials

Where the case is tried to a Judge, the risk of prejudice is not a proper ground for excluding evidence under Rule 403. n31 It is nonsensical to ask the Judge to exclude evidence on the ground that it will prejudice her, since the Judge would have to be exposed to the evidence in order to make such a ruling. n32 Moreover, we presume that Trial Judges are unlikely to rule emotionally, or to misuse evidence, in the way that juries might. n33

Similarly, an objection on the ground that evidence would be confusing has no place in a bench trial. Nor would it be a good idea even to suggest that the Trial Judge should exclude evidence because it would confuse the Judge. Consequently, the only reason for excluding probative evidence under Rule 403 in a bench trial is that the evidence would be cumulative or a waste of time.

[15] Cumulative Evidence

Rule 403 addresses the possibility that parties may go overboard in trying to prove a point. While generally it is up to the litigants to determine whether they have sufficiently proven a point, the Judge has discretion under Rule 403 to find that "enough is enough."

The Court in United States v. Kizeart, 102 F.3d 320 (7th Cir. 1996) , provided the following useful definition of cumulative evidence:

> Evidence is "cumulative" when it adds very little to the probative force of the other evidence in the case, so that if it were admitted its contribution to the determination of truth would be outweighed by its contribution to the length of trial, with all the potential for confusion, as well as prejudice to other litigants, who must wait longer for their trial, that a long trial creates.

In Kizeart, the Court rejected the defendant's contention that a taped statement of a witness was cumulative. The witness was called as a hostile witness by the government, and he denied having given a taped statement to police detectives identifying the defendant as taking part in an armed robbery. The government then called the detectives, who testified that the witness had inculpated the defendant, and then the government introduced the witness' taped statement. The defendant argued that in these circumstances the taped statement was cumulative of the detectives' testimony. The Court found that the tape recording was not cumulative in this case. The tape "added considerable probative force on the issue of [the witness'] veracity because it addressed the contradictions between the statements of [the witness] and the detectives." In other words, the tape was proper corroboration where it was the witness' word against that of the officers; if the government had offered the tape together with corroborating testimony of twelve officers, that would have been cumulative. n34

[16] Relationship to Other Rules

When evidence is absolutely barred by some other Rule, Rule 403 does not give the Trial Judge the authority to admit evidence. The Rule is one of exclusion of otherwise admissible evidence.

Some specific Rules may take precedence Rule 403. The clearest example is Rule 609(a)(2), which provides that crimen falsi offenses are admissible for purposes of impeachment of a witness irrespective of the prejudicial impact of such evidence. See Green v. Bock Laundry Mach. Co., 490 U.S. 504 (1989) (discussed in § 609.02[3]), where the Supreme Court stated that the automatic admissibility provision of Rule 609(a)(2) permitted no judicial discretion to exclude evidence on Rule 403 grounds. n35 Also, for convictions not involving dishonesty or false statement, Rule 609(a)(1) provides a special balancing test for criminal defendants, under which the prior conviction is excluded unless the probative value outweighs the prejudicial effect. Rule 609(b) provides for a special balancing test for all convictions as to which ten years have passed since the witness' conviction or confinement. Finally, Rule 703 provides for a restrictive balancing test that is more exclusionary than Rule 403, when otherwise inadmissible evidence is offered to illustrate the basis of an expert's opinion.

Where Rule 403 is not pre-empted by a specific Rule, the Trial Judge must apply it in tandem with other Federal Rules under which evidence would be admissible. This is particularly true with respect to other Rules that distinguish between permissible and impermissible purposes. So for example, Rule 404(b) provides that prior bad acts cannot be used to prove the propensity of a person to commit an act, but that they can be used for other purposes. The Trial Court must then determine whether the probative value for the nonpropensity purpose is substantially outweighed by the risk that the jury will misuse the evidence for propensity. See the discussion in § 404.02[21]. Similarly, Rule 407 provides that evidence of subsequent remedial measures cannot be admitted to prove negligence, fault, or the existence of a defect, but that such evidence can be offered for such purposes as impeachment and feasability if controverted. When subsequent remedial measure evidence is offered for a permissible purpose, the Trial Court must upon request apply Rule 403 to determine whether the probative value of the evidence for the permissible purpose is substantially outweighed by the risk that the jury will misuse the evidence as proof on an impermissible purpose. See § 407.20[11].

Rule 403 has an interesting and complex relationship with Rule 801, the hearsay rule. The hearsay rule is purpose-specific in its exclusion; it operates only where the statement is offered for the truth of the matter asserted. When an out-of-Court statement is offered for something other than its truth the Trial Court, upon appropriate objection, must balance the probative value and the prejudicial effect of the statement under Rule 403.

An example of the relationship between Rule 403 and the hearsay rule is provided in the case of United States v. Harwood, 998 F.2d 91 (2d Cir. 1994) . Harwood was tried with McKee for possession and conspiracy to possess LSD with intent to distribute. The defendants were arrested after leaving an annual gathering of the "Rainbow Family" in Vermont. One undercover agent bought a small amount of LSD from McKee, who later drove away in a van. The van was driven by Harwood, who was subsequently found to be the owner. Police stopped the van and a subsequent search uncovered LSD in the door panels, and a large amount of cash in the interior. At trial, government agents were permitted to testify that through their "intelligence" sources they had learned that McKee was the main supplier of LSD at the Rainbow Family gathering.

The government argued that the "intelligence" testimony was not hearsay because it was not offered for its truth. Rather, it was merely offered as "background" evidence to explain the context of the police investigation.

Specifically, the government stated that the "intelligence" testimony was offered only to explain why the undercover agents approached McKee -- as opposed to anyone else at the Rainbow Family gathering -- in order to obtain LSD. However, the Court saw through this artificial construction. It pointed out that if the "intelligence" evidence was really offered to explain the motivation of the undercover agents, it would have minimal probative value. The motivation of the officers, and the need for the jury to understand the background of the investigation, was not a crucial issue in the context of the case. The contested issue was the identity of the drug dealer, not the police officer's conduct. While the evidence had minimal probative value, it carried a risk of substantial prejudice, in the form of potential misuse by the jury. The risk that the jury would use the intelligence testimony for its truth -- even though it would not be permitted to do so when offered only for background purposes -- substantially outweighed the probative value of the testimony in explaining "background." n36

Harwood illustrates that Rule 403 provides an important protection when an out-of-Court accusation is offered as nonhearsay for its effect on the person who heard the statement, in this case the law enforcement officer. In order to be admissible nonhearsay, the conduct of the listener in response to the statement must be of some importance in the case, and the statement must be probative to explain the listener's response or state of mind regardless of its truth. In many cases statements accusing defendants of crime are subject to exclusion under Rule 403 when offered for "background" or "to explain the officer's conduct." When the question is whether the defendant is guilty, there is often only minimal probative value in explaining why an officer acted in a certain way; and in contrast, there is a substantial risk of prejudice because the jury could impermissibly use the statement for its truth, despite a limiting instruction. n37

Unfortunately, there have been many instances in which the Courts have ignored the Rule 403 questions inherent in "background" evidence, and in which hearsay statements have been offered to "explain" events that are of minimal or no relevance. One example is United States v. Norquay, 987 F.2d 475 (8th Cir. 1993) . Norquay was charged with rape, and witnesses testified that the victim told them that she had been raped. The Court held that the statements were properly admitted as not hearsay, because they were offered not for the truth of their content but rather "to explain why the witnesses stopped on the highway late at night, took her to the police station, and sent her to be interviewed by the investigator." This analysis is misguided: the probative value of the statements for the articulated purpose was minimal, because the conduct of the witnesses at the time was only marginally relevant to the case. The prosecution really had no need to explain why the witnesses acted as they did, when there was no dispute as to their actions. In contrast, the prejudicial effect of the statement was obvious, because there was a strong likelihood that the jury would impermissibly use the statement for its truth -- that the victim was actually raped.

Perhaps the Norquay Court would have ruled differently had defense counsel specifically objected to the statements on Rule 403 grounds. It appears that defense counsel in Norquay made only a hearsay objection. Once the prosecution articulated a legitimate not-for-truth purpose, the hearsay objection was properly overruled, and it was incumbent on defense counsel to argue that the prejudicial effect of the jury's misuse of the statement would substantially outweigh the minimal probative value of the statement for the purpose stated by the prosecution. If such an objection is not specifically made at trial, it ordinarily will not be entertained on appeal. n38

In some cases, of course, out-of-Court accusations offered for "background" will survive a Rule 403 analysis. United States v. Freeman, 816 F.2d 558 (10th Cir. 1987) , is one example. Freeman with charged with taking part in a counterfeiting transaction. The report of a confidential informant was offered to explain why officers had the defendant under surveillance on a day when he received counterfeit money. The officer had received a report from an informant that two people, Martin and Grady, were passing counterfeit money. The informant also stated that Martin and Grady planned to meet with an unidentified white male on a particular weekend for the purpose of passing counterfeit money. The officer then undertook surveillance of Martin and Grady, and in following them he witnessed their meeting with Freeman on the identified weekend. The Court held that it was within the Trial Judge's discretion to find that the probative value of the informant's tip as background was not substantially outweighed by the risk that the jury would consider the accusation for its truth. This analysis seems sound. The jury was bound to wonder how the police could be in the position to testify that they saw a counterfeit money transaction take place. Were they just on patrol and happened to spot suspicious counterfeiters? If that was the purported scenario, the testimony of the officer would be implausible and suspect. The prosecution clearly had a legitimate interest in preventing jury speculation on how the officers came to know what they knew. Of course, there was a risk of prejudice, i.e., that the jury could use the informant's accusation for its truth. But under Rule 403 the risk of prejudice must substantially outweigh probative value for the accusation to be excluded. A Judge could reasonably conclude that there was no such substantial outweighing under the facts of Freeman. This is especially so because the confidential informant did not even identify Freeman by name -- this is hardly a fatal accusation that will surely be misused for its truth. And the jury was instructed not to use the accusation as evidence of Freeman's guilt. While such an instruction doesn't eliminate prejudice, it does reduce the risk of prejudice that is to be balanced against probative value under Rule 403. Moreover, a limiting instruction is probably more effective in a case like Freeman, where the out-of-Court statement does not explicitly accuse the defendant by name.

[17] Surprise

If a claim of surprise is made, the Advisory Committee indicates a preference for a continuance, rather than exclusion, and post-Rules decisions support that view. n39 Of course, this does not mean that a party is entitled to a continuance by merely invoking the term "surprise." A claim of surprise will not be considered if the party has not diligently prepared for trial, or if the party had a good indication of the evidence and that it might be presented. n40

It also must be remembered that certain provisions of the Federal Rules of Civil and Criminal Procedure are designed to protect against unfair surprise. One example is a pretrial order entered pursuant to Civil Rule 16. This order controls the subsequent course of the action, and evidence and testimony may be disallowed to the extent that it is contrary to the order; exclusion is warranted without regard to Rule 403.

There are also notice provisions throughout the Federal Rules of Evidence, such as those found in Rules 404(b), 412, 609(b), 807, and 902(11) and (12). All these notice provisions are designed to protect against unfair surprise, and a failure to comply with these provisions may warrant exclusion irrespective of Rule 403. See the discussion in the Editorial Explanatory Comment for each of these Rules.

While surprise is not an independent ground for exclusion under Rule 403, it may, in some cases, bear upon the Rule 403 analysis. If a continuance is required to meet surprising evidence, there is a negative consequence of delay. If the surprising evidence is of marginal probative value, the Trial Judge may decide that the cost of delay substantially outweighs the probative value of the evidence and thus that exclusion is warranted under Rule 403.

[18] Procedure for Balancing

The practice in the Federal Courts since the adoption of Rule 403 leads us to conclude that rulings would probably be sounder at trial and more easily reviewed on appeal if trial counsel would take care to state their theories of relevance and claims of prejudice as clearly as possible before the Trial Judge rules. Along the same line, the Trial Judge would improve the record by stating, if only briefly, his or her reasons for a Rule 403 ruling. n41 Such reasons could be quickly dictated to the Court reporter outside the presence of the jury unless the Trial Judge wishes to comment on the evidence that is admitted, in which case the reasons may be shared with the jury. If the Trial Court decides to exclude the evidence, a statement of reasons is especially necessary in order to provide counsel an opportunity to try to obviate the objection. n42

Throughout this Manual, we note the utility of Trial Judges stating reasons on the record to explain their rulings. n43 Yet, we take exception to United States v. Dolliole, 597 F.2d 102 (7th Cir. 1979) . In the course of affirming the appellant's conviction as an accomplice to bank robbery, the Court of Appeals stated that the practice of entering a written finding as to the reasons for striking a balance under Rule 403 "should definitely be encouraged." Our position is that a statement for the record is as useful as a written statement, and that often it saves time during trial. n44

[19] Trial Court Discretion

While the Rule 403 balancing process should be carefully conducted on the record, this is not to say that the Trial

Judge's decision to admit or exclude evidence is itself strictly scrutinized. Rule 403 provides that evidence "may" be excluded, thus imparting significant discretion to the Trial Judge. The Appellate Court will not reverse a Rule 403 decision simply because the Appellate Judges would have ruled differently had they been trying the case. n45 Error will be found only if the Trial Judge's decision cannot be supported by reasonable argument. n46 Appellate Courts recognize that the Trial Judge has a unique vantage point from which to detect and assess the negative factors that might arise from proffered evidence, and from which to balance these factors against the probative value of the evidence. n47 Appellate Courts are also sympathetic to the fact that the Trial Court must ordinarily conduct its Rule 403 balancing process on the spot, during the trial. The Trial Court does not usually have the luxury of carefully balancing, and even if it had the time, the balance of factors is rarely crystal-clear. As the Court stated in Cooley v. Carmike Cinemas, Inc., 25 F.3d 1325 (6th Cir. 1994) :

> In our review of any trial record, we are mindful that evidentiary questions often require a trial judge to make quick decisions on doubtful questions. This is why we review evidentiary decisions for abuse of discretion. [Rule 403 challenges] demand swift but judicious weighing and balancing. Indeed, because such questions are often subject to a judge's discretion, this Court often would affirm a judge's evidentiary decision "either way," whether the response to the lawyer's objection had been "sustained" or "overruled."

Essentially, Appellate Courts will check to see that the Trial Court has conducted a balancing process. n48 The result of a careful balancing process will not itself be second-guessed. n49 See the cases discussed in § 403.03[3].

On the other hand, the Trial Judge's discretion under Rule 403 is not unlimited. The following are some general limitations that have been imposed upon the Trial Judge's discretion:

(1) Power to exclude is to be rarely invoked: Because Rule 403 provides that the negative factors set forth in the Rule must substantially outweigh the probative value, it follows that the discretionary power to exclude should rarely be used. n50 Generally speaking, the Trial Court's decision to exclude evidence is more likely to be found an abuse of discretion than is a decision to admit evidence. n51

(2) Credibility questions are for the factfinder: The Trial Judge may not invoke Rule 403 to exclude evidence merely because he or she finds it unbelievable. n52 Rather, the Trial Judge must assess the probative value of the evidence if believed by the jury, and balance that against the risk of prejudice, confusion and delay. n53

(3) Balancing process must be conducted: As discussed above, a Trial Court that conducts a balancing process on the record is more likely to be affirmed than one that excludes or admits evidence in a conclusory fashion; at a minimum, remand is a good possibility in the latter instance. n54

(4) Prejudice must be properly analyzed: As discussed above, evidence is not prejudicial within the meaning of Rule 403 merely because it is harmful to the adversary's case. A Trial Court that excludes evidence as "prejudicial" merely because it is harmful -- as opposed to unfair -- runs a substantial risk of reversal. n55

[20] In limine Rulings

When a party can anticipate the use of prejudicial evidence, it is often helpful to get a pretrial, in limine ruling on the Rule 403 question. Rule 103 is very general in setting forth the guidelines for offering and objecting to evidence. The Rule provides sufficient leeway when read in connection with Rule 403's direction to guard against undue prejudice to permit Trial Judges to rule on motions in limine. At the same time, it must be remembered that many motions under Rule 403 are particularly difficult to give final rulings on before trial, depending as they do on assessments of probative value and prejudicial effect that become manifest only in the trial itself. Therefore, it is prudent practice for counsel wishing to admit or exclude evidence that has been subject to a Rule 403 in limine motion to renew the offer of proof or objection at trial. For further discussion on this point, see § 103.02[13], [16].

[21] Limiting Instructions

As discussed in § 105.02[4], the impact of a limiting instruction in controlling prejudice must be considered by the Trial Court when balancing probative value and prejudice under Rule 403. The prejudice to be considered is that which remains after a limiting instruction is given. n56 Exclusion is warranted where the remaining prejudice and confusion -- i.e., that which cannot be "instructed away" -- substantially outweighs the probative value of the evidence. n57

> As this Court has consistently held, unfair prejudice as used in Rule 403 is not to be equated with testimony simply adverse to the opposing party. Virtually all evidence is prejudicial or it isn't material. The prejudice must be unfair. Unfair prejudice within the context of Rule 403 means an undue tendency to suggest a decision on an improper basis, commonly, though not necessarily, an emotional one.

Runyon, 149 F.3d 507 (6th Cir. 1998)* (evidence of supervisor's use of racial epithets should have been admitted in case charging racial discrimination in employment; the evidence was improperly excluded as prejudicial: "the racially inflammatory nature of the evidence involved here is precisely why it is probative of the racially discriminatory motives alleged in this case."); United States v. McNeill, 166 F.3d 943 (9th Cir. 1999) (error, in a robbery case, to permit testimony that the defendant was living in a Work Release Center at the time of the robbery; while evidence of the defendant's residence was probative of the defendant's ability to commit the crime, it would have been possible to call the Work Release Center a "residential program," thus avoiding the prejudicial effect of specifically identifying the center: "Precedent for tailoring of terms to avoid a more prejudicial term exists and should have been adopted in this case"); United States v. Pace, 10 F.3d 1106 (5th Cir. 1993) (in a narcotics case, the Trial Court erred when it permitted the prosecution to call the defendant's parole officer solely to establish the defendant's address; the testimony was prejudicial, since it informed the jury that the defendant had previously committed crimes; the probative value was minimal, since the defendant's address was not a major issue in dispute in the case; the Court emphasized the fact that the defendant's address could have been proven in a variety of less prejudicial ways).

(n10)Footnote 10. See, e.g., Carter v. District of Columbia, 795 F.2d 116 (D.C. Cir. 1986) (error to admit prejudicial evidence where "there were certainly other ways the evidence could have been admitted so that relevant aspects were retained and the prejudicial aspect minimized").

(n11)Footnote 11. See also United States v. Lachman, 48 F.3d 586 (1st Cir. 1995) : In a criminal prosecution involving the Export Administration Act, the defendants were charged only with exporting technical equipment to the Indian government without a license; the government proffered exhibits indicating that the defendants knew that the Indian government was going to use the equipment in order to make nuclear missiles. The Court noted that a jury, conscious of the risks of nuclear proliferation, "could easily regard the defendants' alleged conduct as highly unattractive even if it turned out to be technically legal." While the exhibits had some probative value as to the defendants' scienter -- to suggest that, knowing the potential military use of the equipment, the defendants had more reason in prudence to have reviewed the pertinent export regulations -- the government had less dangerous evidence available to prove this point. The Court stated that under Rule 403, "it is plainly pertinent whether a litigant has some alternative way to establish a fact that involves no (or at least a lesser) risk of prejudice or confusion."

The pictures apparently were selected with a view to highlighting the most offensive features of the magazine."); United States v. McManaman, 606 F.2d 919 (10th Cir. 1979) (evidence of conversation not admissible under Rule 403, even though parts of the conversation were relevant for impeachment; the government proffered the entire conversation, including inflammatory portions concerning murder plans: "the explosive portions were not excised, as can be done to avoid such dangers of prejudice").

(n13)Footnote 13. Silva v. Showcase Cinemas Concessions, Inc., 736 F.2d 810 (1st Cir. 1984) , is a civil case that may survive the Old Chief analysis. Silva was an action against a movie theater arising from an attack on a movie patron. The defense sought to introduce the fact that the attacker had been convicted of manslaughter for the attack, as a means of proving that such an attack was not foreseeable by the defendant. The Court found that it was not error to exclude evidence of a manslaughter conviction, where the plaintiffs were willing to stipulate that the assault was a "criminal act"; under these circumstances, there was no need to prove the conviction since the stipulation "should have made defendant's point." There seems little difference between a judgment of conviction and a stipulation to a criminal act in these circumstances. The opponent loses nothing in the way of narrative or probative value by being forced to accept the stipulation. The term "manslaughter" is not needed to further the narrative or to assure the jurors that their verdict will be morally reasonable.

(n14)Footnote 14. See United States v. Spletzer, 535 F.2d 950 (5th Cir. 1976) (abuse of discretion to admit prior conviction in an escape prosecution, where the defendant offered to stipulate to the conviction).

conviction properly admitted to prove intent even though the defendant offered to stipulate to intent; noting that Old Chief distinguished between "stipulations to the status elements of a crime, which can be forced upon the prosecution, and stipulations to other elements of the crime, which the prosecution should remain free to reject."); United States v. Velazquez, 246 F.3d 204 (2d Cir. 2000) (prison guards charged with beating a prisoner and covering up the beating: gory photos of the victim were properly admitted even though the defendants offered to stipulate that the victim was assaulted: "the extent of Pizzutto's injuries established that cruel and unusual punishment had occurred, and underscored the moral blame attaching to Bergen's decision to cover up the crime."); United States v. Campos, 221 F.3d 1143 (10th Cir. 2000) (in a child pornography case, jury was properly permitted to view two pictures that the defendant allegedly transported, even though he offered to stipulate that they were pornographic: "Old Chief's holding is thus based on peculiarities of the element of felony-convict status and or admissions and the like when used to prove it. ... In contrast to the defendant in Old Chief, Mr. Campos's offer to stipulate did not involve his legal status but rather the gist of the government's current case against him-the two pornographic images that he allegedly transported via computer. Mr. Campos's offer thus sought to deprive the prosecution of the very opportunity that should be protected: the opportunity to present the concrete events of later criminal behavior charged against a defendant.").

(n17)Footnote 17. The rule that a party may "remove the sting" of anticipated cross-examination and impeachment is not solely for the benefit of prosecutors. Defense counsel often find it advisable to refer in direct examination to the prior convictions of their witnesses. See generally Wilson v. Williams, 182 F.3d 562 (7th Cir. 1999) (en banc).

(n21)Footnote 21. United States v. Colon, 880 F.2d 650 (2nd Cir. 1989)

(n22)Footnote 22. In Crowder, the Court held that the government was not required to accept the defendant's stipulation that he intended to commit the narcotics crime with which he was charged. The proffered stipulation was an attempt to prevent the government from introducing evidence of Crowder's prior drug crimes to prove intent to commit the charged crime. The Crowder Court cited Old Chief, as well as this Treatise, for the proposition that the government is permitted to prove intent through admissible proof, and is not forced to accept a stipulation on the intent element of a crime. Neither Crowder nor Old Chief, however, stand for the proposition that the prosecution can tell the story its own way, unconstrained by rules of admissibility. Instead, both cases stand for the proposition that the prosecution generally can tell the story in its own way, unconstrained by a defendant's proffered stipulation.

(n24)Footnote 24. See, e.g., United States v. Birch, 39 F.3d 1089 (10th Cir. 1994) : The defendant was charged with shooting a federal officer as his car passed the officer's car. At trial the defendant testified that a passenger in his car had fired at the officer and then fled from the car. On cross-examination, the defendant was asked to demonstrate his version of the shooting. Two chairs were placed side by side, simulating the front seat of the defendant's car, and the defendant was asked to show how the shooting occurred, and to describe the position of the gun when it fired. The prosecution then called witnesses who testified that the defendant's version of events was impossible, because a bullet fired from a gun in the position demonstrated by the defendant could not possibly have the trajectory of the bullet that wounded the officer. The Court affirmed the defendant's conviction, finding no error in the introduction of the demonstrative evidence. The Court held that the prosecution "met its burden of demonstrating substantial similarity between the courtroom demonstration and the seating in defendant's car" and that the demonstration was "sufficiently similar to actual events to provide a fair comparison."

(n25)Footnote 25. See, e.g., Hale v. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., 820 F.2d 928 (8th Cir. 1987) (no error to admit demonstration of mannequin hit by an exploding tire); Kehm v. Procter & Gamble Mfg. Co., 724 F.2d 613 (8th Cir. 1983) (in toxic shock syndrome case, there was no error in allowing the plaintiff's expert to conduct a courtroom experiment that purported to show how the defendant's "Rely" component interacted with a female enzyme; the expert's testimony explained the difference between experimental conditions and those that would be found in the female body).

(n26)Footnote 26. See, e.g., Crossley v. General Motors Corp., 33 F.3d 818 (7th Cir. 1994) (no error in the admission of a videotape of rollover sequences involving a General Motors car, even though the car was a different model from that involved in the accident, and the conditions of the demonstration were much different from those at the time of the accident; the tape was properly admitted to help illustrate the testimony of the defendant's expert concerning the complicated vehicular dynamics of rollover accidents). The Court in Crossley noted with approval that the Trial Court imposed substantial limitations on the use of the tape at trial, including: limiting the defendant to one test of the three it sought to show the jury; prohibiting the defendant from stopping the tape during the expert's testimony; inviting the plaintiff to play any portion of the tape during cross-examination of the expert; instructing the jury that the tape was "not intended to be a reenactment of this accident or the cause of this accident"; and prohibiting the tape from going into the jury room. See also Pandit v. American Honda Motor Co., 82 F.3d 376 (10th Cir. 1996) (videotape of experiments conducted by an expert witness was properly admitted even though the experiments were conducted under substantially different conditions from those involved in the case; "the experiments ultimately were used to assist an expert in demonstrating principles which formed the basis of his opinion"; the expert "testified he performed the experiments merely to demonstrate the basic principles underlying his opinion"; and "on three different occasions the Court instructed the jury about the limited purpose for which it could use" the videotape).

Honda Motor Co., Ltd., 75 F.3d 1414 (10th Cir. 1996)* (Trial Judge properly admitted a videotape depicting a collision between a train and a car to illustrate the physical forces at play in a collision; the Trial Judge "specifically instructed the jury not to consider the videotape as a re-creation of Mrs. Montag's accident").

(n28)Footnote 28. Compare United States v. Norris, 217 F.3d 262 (5th Cir. 2000) : The defendant was charged with making false statements in a bankruptcy proceeding. At the bankruptcy proceeding, he claimed that he burned a large amount of currency, after dousing it with gasoline, in order to keep the money from his former law partners. At the defendant's trial, the government offered a videotaped recreation of the burning of currency as the defendant had described it. This recreation demonstrated that most of the cash could not have burned under the defendant's description of the incident. The defendant argued that the reenactment should not have been admitted under Rule 403 because it was conducted under conditions substantially different from those existing when the defendant burned his currency. Among the differences were: the demonstration occurred at a different time of year in a different part of the country; the government burned the currency under a ceiling while the defendant burned his currency in the open; the government used $5 bills while the defendant used $100 bills, which are not as heavy as $5 bills; the government burned newly-minted bills; the government burned the bills in a new barrel while the defendant burned his in an old barrel; and the government ignited the bills with an electric match while the defendant tossed a kitchen match into the barrel. The Court found no error in admitting the government's reenactment. It noted that in all instances in which the defendant's testimony contained ambiguities on a particular step in his alleged process of burning (including how much gasoline was used and the duration of the burn) the government erred "in favor of a hotter, longer burn." In this case, the Trial Court did not err in finding that the conditions of the government burn were "substantially similar" -- the conditions "need not be precisely reproduced, but they must only be so nearly the same as to provide a fair comparison."

(n29)Footnote 29. See also Four Corners Helicopters, Inc. v. Turbomeca, S.A., 979 F.2d 1434 (10th Cir. 1992) (in a case arising from a helicopter crash, the defendant claimed that the Trial Court erred in excluding evidence of an experiment conducted by their expert; although experiments purporting to simulate actual events are only admissible if made under substantially similar conditions, filmed evidence may be admitted to show relevant mechanical principles upon a lesser showing "that the experiment [was] conducted under conditions that were at least similar to those which existed at the time of the accident"; here, however, the experiment was not being offered simply to show physical principles but instead to demonstrate what the expert believed occurred in the helicopter engine; thus, substantial similarity was required and the Court held that the Trial Court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the experiment).

(n30)Footnote 30. See, e.g., Porter v. Whitehall Lab., 9 F.3d 607 (7th Cir. 1993) ("the suggested scientific testimony must fit the issue to which the expert is testifying"; expert testimony was properly excluded for lack of "fit" where the expert admitted that his conclusion was contingent upon ruling out certain alternative causes for plaintiff's medical condition, which could not in fact be ruled out).

(n31)Footnote 31. Schultz v. Butcher, 24 F.3d 626 (4th Cir. 1994) (error to exclude evidence in a bench trial on grounds of prejudicial effect).

(n32)Footnote 32. See, e.g., Gulf States Utils. Co. v. Ecodyne Corp., 635 F.2d 517, 519 (5th Cir. 1981) (the portion of Rule 403 referring to prejudice "has no logical application in bench trials. Excluding relevant evidence in a bench trial because it is cumulative or a waste of time is clearly a proper exercise of the judge's power, but excluding relevant evidence on the basis of unfair prejudice is a useless procedure.").

(n33)Footnote 33. Gulf States Utils. Co. v. Ecodyne Corp., 635 F.2d 517, 519 (5th Cir. 1981) :

> Rule 403 assumes that a trial judge is able to discern and weigh the improper inferences that a jury might draw from certain evidence, then balance those improprieties against probative value and necessity. Certainly, in a bench trial, the same judge can also exclude those improper inferences from his mind in reaching a decision.

(n36)Footnote 36. For a result similar to Harwood, see United States v. Fountain, 2 F.3d 656 (6th Cir. 1993) , where information on the defendant's criminal activity, offered not for its truth but rather to explain why the agents searched where they did, was held improperly admitted because the "reason Agent Primak searched the back bedroom simply was not a matter of dispute and was not in issue in this case." The Court stated that "because the agents' action needed no explanation, we can conclude only that Primak's information was offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted -- that guns and narcotics were in the bedroom." See also United States v. Dean, 980 F.2d 1286 (9th Cir. 1992) (statements accusing the defendant of criminal activity, made to a police officer, were improperly admitted for the nonhearsay purpose of explaining why the officer went to the defendant's home to arrest him: the officer's reasons for going to the defendant's home "are not of consequence to the determination of the action, i.e., they do not bear on any issue involving the elements of the charged offense"); United States v. Hanson, 994 F.2d 403 (7th Cir. 1993) (statement made to the defendant, that he did not have to file a certain form, was not offered for its truth but rather for its impact on the defendant's state of mind, and it was relevant for this purpose; exclusion was error, but harmless).

(n37)Footnote 37. For another case illustrating this point, see United States v. Reyes, 18 F.3d 65 (2d Cir. 1994) , reversing a conviction due to error in admitting statements made to a Customs agent which implicated the defendant in a conspiracy. Even though the jury in Reyes was instructed that the accusations were admitted only as "background," and even though the statements were somewhat relevant to explain the background of the investigation, the Court found a substantial danger that the jury would have considered the statements for their truth anyway. As the Reyes Court stated, "the mere identification of a relevant nonhearsay use of such evidence is insufficient to justify its admission if the jury is likely to consider the statement for the truth of what was stated with significant resultant prejudice."

(n38)Footnote 38. See, e.g., Lewis v. Kendrick, 944 F.2d 949 (1st Cir. 1991) (hearsay objection at trial did not specifically request the Trial Court to weigh the prejudicial nature of the evidence against its probative value; therefore the objection to the prejudicial nature of the evidence was not properly preserved for appeal). See the further discussion in § 103.02[1].

(n39)Footnote 39. See, e.g., Le Maire v. United States, 826 F.2d 949 (10th Cir. 1987) (no error to admit physician's testimony despite the plaintiff's objection that he was surprised by certain aspects of testimony that were different from the pretrial statement; the remedy for coping with surprise is not to seek reversal after an unfavorable judgment, but rather to seek a continuance at the time the evidence is proffered); Conway v. Chemical Leaman Tank Lines, Inc., 687 F.2d 108 (5th Cir. 1982) ("the granting of a continuance is a generally more appropriate remedy than exclusion of evidence when claims of unfair surprise are raised").

(n40)Footnote 40. See, e.g, Hurley v. Atlantic City Police Dep't, 174 F.3d 95 (3d Cir. 1999) (defendant was not entitled to relief on grounds of surprise where it had actual knowledge of the existence of the challenged evidence).

(n41)Footnote 41. United States v. Sampson, 980 F.2d 883 (3d Cir. 1992) (abuse of discretion to admit prior bad acts of a criminal defendant where the Trial Court's determination of probative value was conclusory, and there was no statement in the record that indicated that the Trial Court had even performed the required Rule 403 balancing); United States v. Stovall, 825 F.2d 817 (5th Cir. 1987) , amended by, 833 F.2d 526 (5th Cir. 1987) (Trial Court's Rule 403 balancing would not be disturbed where there was an explicit, on-the-record determination that prejudice did not substantially outweigh probative value).

(n42)Footnote 42. See, e.g., United States v. Jamil, 707 F.2d 638 (2d Cir. 1983) (Trial Court should provide a clear statement of its reasons for excluding evidence under Rule 403, so as to allow counsel to explain or to obviate the objection).

(n43)Footnote 43. See, e.g., United States v. Collorafi, 876 F.2d 303 (2d Cir. 1989) (Trial Court making Rule 403 ruling should provide "a clear statement of its reasons" on the record); United States v. Robinson, 700 F.2d 205, 213 (5th Cir. 1983) ("In the absence of on-the-record findings ... we will be obliged to remand unless the factors upon which the probative value/prejudice evaluation were made are readily apparent from the record, and there is no substantial uncertainty about the correctness of the ruling.").

(n44)Footnote 44. See also United States v. Lavelle, 751 F.2d 1266 (D.C. Cir. 1985) (written findings "assist appellate Courts in determining whether the proper analysis was employed"; however, failure to make written findings does not warrant reversal or remand where no request was made for such findings, or where the relevant factors are apparent and there is no uncertainty as to the correctness of the ruling).

(n45)Footnote 45. See, e.g., United States v. Cunningham, 194 F.3d 1186 (11th Cir. 1999) (Trial Court did not abuse its discretion in excluding defense-proffered evidence under Rule 403; panel states that they would probably have admitted the evidence had they been sitting as District Judges); United States v. Long, 574 F.2d 761, 767 (3d Cir. 1978) (Trial Court's Rule 403 ruling "should not be reversed simply because an appellate Court believes that it would have decided the matter otherwise").

(n46)Footnote 46. See, e.g., United States v. Coiro, 922 F.2d 1008 (2d Cir. 1991) (Rule 403 ruling can be set aside only if the Trial Judge acted "arbitrarily or irrationally"); United States v. York, 933 F.2d 1343 (7th Cir. 1991) (no error unless the Trial Court's decision was "so unprincipled" as to amount to an abuse of discretion); United States v. Currier, 821 F.2d 52 (1st Cir. 1987) (the balance of probative value and prejudicial effect is "best left to the sound discretion of the trial judge" and Appellate Court will "impose our judgment only if a complaining party can demonstrate that the district Court's ruling did not fall within the ambit of reasonable debate"); United States v. De Peri, 778 F.2d 963 (3d Cir. 1985) (Trial Judge's ruling under Rule 403 will only be reversed if it was "arbitrary or irrational").

(n47)Footnote 47. See, e.g., C.A. Associates v. Dow Chem. Co., 918 F.2d 1485 (10th Cir. 1990) (Trial Judge is uniquely suited to balancing probative value against the harmful effects of proffered evidence, because of his or her familiarity with "the full array of the evidence"); United States v. Lau, 828 F.2d 871, 874 (1st Cir. 1987) (Trial Court is "more directly familiar than a Court of appeals with the need for the evidence and its likely effect on the jury").

(n48)Footnote 48. See United States v. Brooks, 145 F.3d 446 (1st Cir. 1998) (ruling excluding evidence under Rule 403 vacated on interlocutory appeal by the government; the Trial Judge had not permitted the government to be heard and had made no specific findings, even though the evidentiary question was complex and the answer was not self-evident; in those circumstances, the Trial Court was not entitled to a deferential standard of review).

(n49)Footnote 49. See, e.g., United States v. Beasley, 809 F.2d 1273 (7th Cir. 1987) :

> [A]lthough appellate Courts cannot often tell whether it was best, all things considered, to let in a given piece of evidence, it may be possible to tell whether the district Court and the parties took the right things into account. A flaw in the process is easier to detect than is a flaw in the result ... .

See also McCarty v. Pheasant Run, Inc., 826 F.2d 1554 (7th Cir. 1987) (Trial Judge's exercise of discretion under Rule 403 will rarely be overturned where he "explains the reasoning process behind his conclusion").

(n50)Footnote 50. See, e.g., Herrington v. Hiller, 883 F.2d 411 (5th Cir. 1989) (Trial Court's power to exclude relevant evidence should be used "sparingly"; abuse of discretion to exclude highly probative evidence where there was no strong indication that it would have been confusing or distracting).

(n51)Footnote 51. See, e.g., United States v. Finestone, 816 F.2d 583, 585 (11th Cir. 1987) (Rule 403 provides extraordinary remedy that should be used only sparingly, and consequently the Trial Judge's discretion to exclude evidence is more limited than is the discretion to admit evidence). See also Petruzzi's IGA v. Darling-Delaware, 998 F.2d 1224 (3d Cir. 1993) (Trial Court's use of Rule 403 to exclude expert testimony, in the context of a pre-trial ruling, was inappropriate, because Rule 403 is only to be used as a last resort with respect to expert testimony; this is especially true at the pretrial level, where there is a danger that the perceived risk of confusion and prejudice cannot be accurately assessed; in order to exclude expert testimony under Rule 403, a Court must have a record complete enough to be considered a "virtual surrogate for a trial record").

(n52)Footnote 52. See, e.g., Western Indus. v. Newcor Canada, Ltd., 739 F.2d 1198, 1202 (7th Cir. 1984) (Trial Judge "does not have the right to prevent evidence from getting to the jury merely because he does not think it deserves to be given much weight"; error to exclude under Rule 403 merely because the Trial Judge did not believe the witnesses); United States v. Thompson, 615 F.2d 329 (5th Cir. 1980) ("Rule 403 does not permit exclusion of evidence because the judge does not find it credible.").

(n53)Footnote 53. See, e.g., Bowden v. McKenna, 600 F.2d 282, 284 (1st Cir. 1979) ("Weighing probative value against unfair prejudice under Fed.R.Evid. 403 means probative value with respect to a material fact if the evidence is believed, not the degree the Court finds it believable.").

(n54)Footnote 54. See, e.g., McQueeney v. Wilmington Trust Co., 779 F.2d 916 (3d Cir. 1985) (where the Trial Court "did not articulate its reasons for its finding of prejudice" and the evidence was not obviously prejudicial, remand was required).

(n55)Footnote 55. See, e.g., Borden, Inc. v. Florida E. C. R. Co., 772 F.2d 750 (11th Cir. 1985) (in property damage action arising from improper switching of a train after vandals had tampered with a switchbox, the Trial Court excluded a prior similar vandalization on the ground that it would be prejudicial to the railroad; this was error, because "unfair prejudice as used in Rule 403 cannot be equated with evidence that is simply adverse to the opposing party" and the evidence was not unfair simply because the railroad did not know the identities of the vandals in the prior incident).

(n56)Footnote 56. See, e.g., United States v. Figueroa, 618 F.2d 934, 943 (2d Cir. 1980) (when balancing probative value and prejudicial effect under Rule 403, the Trial Judge "should carefully consider the likely effectiveness of a cautionary instruction that tries to limit the jury's consideration of the evidence to the purpose for which it is admissible"; the Trial Judge, "sensitive to the realities of the courtroom context as in all other trial rulings, must simply include a sound estimate of the likely force of limiting instructions in the overall Rule 403 determination").

(n57)Footnote 57. See, e.g., Government of Virgin Islands v. Pinney, 967 F.2d 912 (3d Cir. 1992) (in trial on rape charge, prior act of rape was unduly prejudicial, despite limiting instruction; a "realistic view of the capabilities of the human mind" requires Courts to acknowledge that in some situations there may be an unacceptable risk that jurors cannot follow limiting instructions).

[1] Abuse of Discretion

[a] Admission of Evidence

[i] Association

United States v. Parada-Talamantes, 32 F.3d 168 (5th Cir. 1994) : The Court reversed a drug conviction on the ground that the prosecution was improperly allowed to show that the defendant's brother was a drug dealer. The Court stated that the introduction of the evidence was "a highly prejudicial attempt to taint defendant's character through guilt by association."

United States v. Roark, 924 F.2d 1426 (8th Cir. 1991) : The Court reversed the defendant's conviction for a conspiracy to manufacture methamphetamine because of government argument and two witnesses' testimony linking him to the Hell's Angels motorcycle club. Instructions to the jury at the conclusion of the trial to disregard the witnesses' testimony was completely insufficient to overcome the entire theme of the trial, which was "guilty by association."

[ii] Abuse of Discretion -- Admission of Evidence -- Codefendant's Conviction

United States v. Mitchell, 1 F.3d 235 (4th Cir. 1993) : The Court reversed a conviction for a cocaine distribution conspiracy because the prosecutor referred to and emphasized that the defendant's brother had been convicted for participation in the conspiracy and the Trial Court gave no cautionary instructions. In United States v. Blevins, 960 F.2d 1252 (4th Cir. 1992) , the Court held it was error, but harmless beyond a reasonable doubt, to permit mention that six nontestifying codefendants in the charged drug distribution conspiracy had pleaded guilty.

United States v. Leach, 918 F.2d 464 (5th Cir. 1990) : The defendant's conviction for a methamphetamine conspiracy was reversed in part because of plain error in admitting prosecution evidence that a nontestifying coconspirator had pleaded guilty in the case.

United States v. De La Vega, 913 F.2d 861 (11th Cir. 1990) : During a trial on racketeering, narcotics, civil rights, and tax charges, evidence was elicited that a codefendant had been separately tried and convicted for his involvement in the case. The Court held that although the admission of guilty pleas or convictions of codefendants not subject to cross-examination is generally considered plain error because the jury may regard the issue of the remaining defendant's guilt as settled and the trial as a mere formality, in this case the error was harmless because of prompt and proper curative instructions. See also United States v. Eason, 920 F.2d 731 (11th Cir. 1990) (reversing conviction for defrauding the Farmers Home Administration because the government introduced evidence of a nontestifying coconspirator's prior conviction in the scheme).

[iii] Abuse of Discretion -- Admission of Evidence -- Confusing Evidence

Adams v. Providence & Worcester Co., 721 F.2d 870 (1st Cir. 1983) : The Court held it was error in a FELA case to admit a letter to the plaintiff in which the general manager of the defendant railroad stated that he had been apprised by the plaintiff's lawyer that the plaintiff was incapacitated and that the defendant would remove the plaintiff from train-service for the protection of the public in light of the information supplied by the lawyer. During the trial it became clear that the plaintiff was not totally disabled and did not claim to be. The Court found that the letter must have confused the jury, since the question before it was whether the plaintiff had been "medically discharged," not whether he was able to work, and the letter was of little probative value on that issue.

[iv] Abuse of Discretion -- Admission of Evidence -- Criminal Acts

United States v. Dockery, 955 F.2d 50 (D.C. Cir. 1992) : The Court vacated and remanded convictions for drug trafficking and felon firearms possession on the ground that evidence of prior convictions offered on the firearms count and on cross-examination of a defense witness had an unduly prejudicial effect as to the trafficking counts. Reversing a judgment for the plaintiffs in Jordan v. Medley, n1 an action for assault and intentional infliction of emotional distress, the Court found that evidence that the defendant had been charged with criminal assault "went directly to the central issue of the case" and held that "where the evidence on that issue was closely balanced (as the hung jury in the first trial would suggest), we do not have the necessary assurance that the jury's judgment was not substantially swayed."

United States v. DiNome, 954 F.2d 839 (2d Cir. 1992) : In a massive RICO prosecution, the Court held that evidence of certain crimes in which various defendants claimed no participation was relevant to prove the existence and nature of the RICO enterprise. Convictions of two defendants were reversed, however, because after RICO charges against them were dismissed, the evidence was irrelevant and highly prejudicial and their mistrial motions should have been granted.

United States v. Murray, 103 F.3d 310 (3d Cir. 1997) : The Court reversed a conviction for intentional killing in furtherance of a continuing criminal enterprise because of error in admitting, inter alia, evidence that the defendant previously committed another murder. There was no showing that the uncharged murder was connected to the charged CCE or that the two killings were planned together or involved a common design, nor were the similarities between the two sufficient to be relevant on the identity issue. Even if the evidence had some slight probative value, it would be substantially outweighed by the prejudicial effect of showing the defendant's murderous propensity.

United States v. Brito, 136 F.3d 397 (5th Cir. 1998) : In a marijuana-importation prosecution, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit evidence that a small user-quantity of marijuana was found in the house of one defendant six months after the end of the charged conspiracy. In a narcotics case, United States v. Pace, 10 F.3d 1106 (5th Cir. 1993) , the Court held it was error (but harmless) for the prosecution to call the defendant's parole officer as a witness solely to establish the defendant's address. The testimony was prejudicial, since it informed the jury that the defendant had previously committed crimes; and its probative value was minimal, since the defendant's address was not a major issue in dispute in the case and it could have been proved in a variety of less prejudicial ways.

United States v. Jenkins, 345 F.3d 928 (6th Cir. 2003) : The defendant was charged with possessing crack cocaine with intent to distribute, after express mail packages containing crack were delivered to her. She claimed that she did not know what was in the packages, but that she only received them and turned them over (unopened) to a long-time acquaintance for $50 each time. Reversing, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to admit evidence that she was a current user of crack cocaine, since it was not probative of her knowledge of the contents of the packages and tended only to establish a propensity to commit the charged offense. Furthermore, any probative value of evidence of crack cocaine use was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, given the tendency of drug use evidence to elicit jury opprobrium, the weakness of the other evidence regarding the defendant's knowledge, and the inability of the Judge's limiting instruction to minimize the prejudice. In a prosecution for cocaine base distribution, United States v. Thomas, 49 F.3d 253 (6th Cir. 1995) , the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit a sawed-off shotgun owned by the defendant. Although the gun might tend to show that the defendant was a dealer rather than just a user, it had not been used in any of the charged transactions, there were tape recordings and full testimony regarding the transactions, and the crack and other items seized from the defendant at his arrest were introduced. Thus, the gun had little, if any, incremental probative value and it served only to inflame the jury regarding the violence often associated with crack dealers.

United States v. Sargent, 98 F.3d 325 (7th Cir. 1996) : The defendant, charged with making misrepresentations in connection with purchases of weapons for a street gang, contended that he was coerced into making these purchases. The Trial Court admitted evidence that he had previously pointed a gun at a woman, threatened to kill her, and beat her face with his fists, because it tended "to demonstrate that the defendant was capable of defending himself in that he had no fear of using a revolver." Holding this was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error), the Court said that the prior act was irrelevant to the coercion defense because violent acts do not demonstrate an ability to defend oneself against a street gang, and the evidence was not necessary to prove the defendant's facility with a gun, because there was already evidence that he had been in the army and had worked as a security guard. Finally, the evidence was highly prejudicial: "the unexplained image of Sargent abusing a woman could do much to alienate a jury." In Wilson v. City of Chicago, 6 F.3d 1233 (7th Cir. 1993) , the plaintiff, who had shot and killed two policemen, brought a civil rights action alleging that police had tortured him in extracting a confession. Reversing a judgment for the individual defendants, the Court held that evidence of the killings was admissible, but that there had been an abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the ugly details of the crimes. Arguments that the evidence was relevant to show the plaintiff's injuries were self-inflicted or were suffered while arrested were not remotely plausible.

United States v. Fawbush, 900 F.2d 150 (8th Cir. 1990) : The Court reversed a conviction for aggravated sexual abuse of two children, holding that evidence the defendant sexually abused his daughters when they were children, even if relevant, was so inflammatory on its face as to divert the jury's attention from the material issues in the trial.

United States v. Blackstone, 56 F.3d 1143 (9th Cir. 1995) : The Court reversed a conviction for felon firearm possession because marijuana paraphernalia and methamphetamine recipes found in the defendant's truck at the time of his arrest were erroneously admitted. Evidence of marijuana for personal use was simply irrelevant to knowing possession of the seized gun; and the recipes by themselves were not closely linked to immediate illegal activity, but were likely to prejudice the defendant by connecting him to the highly charged public issue of drug trafficking. In United States v. Bland, n2 the defendant, charged with felon firearm possession, gave notice that his theory at trial would be that an officer planted the gun in order to justify shooting him in making an arrest. At the voir dire the Trial Judge told the jury not only that it was anticipated that the officer would testify he shot the defendant to prevent his escape and that he was aware of an outstanding warrant for the defendant, but also that the warrant was for the molestation, torture, and murder of a seven-year-old girl. The Court reversed the conviction because, although the existence of the warrant was relevant to show the officer did not have a motive to plant the gun, the members of the jury panel were not likely to forget details leading them to believe that acquitting the defendant might mean releasing an extremely dangerous child molester and killer into the community.

United States v. Sullivan, 919 F.2d 1403 (10th Cir. 1990) : The Court reversed convictions for offenses arising out of a conspiracy to manufacture amphetamine because the Trial Judge permitted a prosecutor to offer evidence despite rulings excluding it and denied a mistrial motion. Testimony that the arresting agents were heavily armed because of a fear that one of the defendants was acting as a sniper at the lab site, and that another defendant had previously participated in an unrelated amphetamine "cook," was more prejudicial than probative.

United States v. Perez, 30 F.3d 1407 (11th Cir. 1994) : The principal witness for the prosecution in a drug case was extensively cross-examined regarding the amount of money the government was paying him; on re-direct he was permitted to testify that he had refused an offer of $5,000 to not testify at trial. The Court held this was error (but harmless), as the witness' own testimony that he refused the offer because he feared for his life meant the evidence had no probative value, and the inherent prejudice of the jury's assumption that the defendants were connected with the offer far outweighed any possible probative value. In United States v. Hines, 955 F.2d 1449 (11th Cir. 1992) , the Court reversed convictions for aggravated sexual assault, holding it was an abuse of discretion to admit photospreads from which the complainant had identified the defendants as her assailants, as there was no demonstrable need to introduce the photographs, the photos implied the defendants had prior criminal records, and the agent's testimony highlighted that the photos were of known criminals. In United States v. Church, n3 a RICO prosecution for acts, including conspiracy to murder, committed in 1983 and 1984, the Court held it was harmless error to admit a tape recording of a 1979 conversation discussing a defendant's plan to kill a prosecutor.

[v] Abuse of Discretion -- Admission of Evidence -- Domestic Violence

United States v. Hands, 184 F.3d 1322 (11th Cir. 1999) : In a cocaine prosecution the defendant's wife testified that she had never witnessed any drug dealing on their property and that she had been home full-time caring for children. When cross-examining the defendant, the prosecutor elicited testimony that the defendant had been charged with beating his wife, and then introduced six color photos taken of the wife shortly after the abuse. Reversing, the Court found that the evidence was irrelevant and unduly prejudicial. The evidence did not impeach the wife's testimony, because she had not testified about her relationship with her husband. The Court concluded that "[t]he domestic violence evidence in this case was particularly likely to incite the jury to an irrational decision because it was graphic and arresting."

[vi] Abuse of Discretion -- Admission of Evidence -- Flight

United States v. Kang, 934 F.2d 621 (5th Cir. 1991) : In a prosecution for bribing an IRS agent, the defendant asserted only an entrapment defense. The Court reversed his conviction, finding an abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the defendant's flight, as it was not relevant to show his predisposition or the manner of the government's investigation. Thus, it was not only inadmissible under Rule 403 balancing because of the risk of prejudice, but it was also inadmissible under Rule 401 on relevancy grounds.

[vii] Abuse of Discretion -- Admission of Evidence -- Hearsay

United States v. Kang, 934 F.2d 621 (5th Cir. 1991) : In a prosecution for bribing an IRS agent, the accused made an entrapment defense. The agent's testimony that his superiors had told him the defendant had violated liquor control commission regulations was admitted as evidence of the agent's state of mind, but the prosecutor argued in summation that it showed a predisposition to cheat on taxes. The Court reversed, as the prosecutor's attempt to exploit the testimony concerning out-of-court statements by linking it explicitly to impermissible propositions only aggravated the inherent prejudice of evidence having little probative value; the government's good faith, motive, or reasonableness is only of secondary significance, if relevant at all, in an entrapment case.

United States v. Logan, 121 F.3d 1172 (8th Cir. 1997) : A government witness in a drug case gave testimony that was largely neither inculpatory nor exculpatory of the defendant. The prosecution then introduced testimony by an officer recounting a highly inculpatory statement the witness had earlier given to him. The witness had been released early from jail in return for giving the interview with the officer and had tried to retract the statements after her release. The Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit the officer's testimony, since its value for impeaching the witness was relatively low, while the danger of prejudice from the jury using the prior statements as substantive evidence was very high.

[viii] Abuse of Discretion -- Admission of Evidence -- Hearsay Offered for Background

United States v. Williams, 358 F.3d 956 (D.C. Cir. 2004) : The Court remanded the defendant's case for a hearing on whether his counsel's performance was constitutionally ineffective, where no objection had been made to testimony from the arresting officers that they had pursued the defendant after receiving complaints from nontestifying witnesses that they had been victims of armed robberies. To the extent that the testimony was relevant to a fact of consequence in the trial for felon firearm possession, it was hearsay because it was relevant only for the truth of the assertion that the defendant possessed a weapon. To the extent that the testimony was offered as "background" information, it was inadmissible because its considerable prejudicial effect substantially outweighed its minimal value as background. See also United States v. Evans, 216 F.3d 80 (D.C. Cir. 2000) , discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 403.02[11].

United States v. Johnston, 127 F.3d 380 (5th Cir. 1997) : The Court held that the prosecutors engaged in misconduct in a massive drug trafficking prosecution when they repeatedly asked law enforcement agents what steps they took during their investigation and why they took those steps. They were thereby able to introduce indirectly hearsay testimony of informants and other law enforcement agents that was damaging to the defendants. The Court said that "[t]he questions were clearly improper and highly prejudicial to the defendants," but concluded that the errors were harmless in the circumstances.

United States v. Lovelace, 123 F.3d 650 (7th Cir. 1997) : The defendant was arrested driving a rental car with its trunk full of cocaine and drug paraphernalia, after police received an informant's tip that the defendant was to be at a particular location with cocaine for sale. Testimony about the tip was admitted over objection at trial. Reversing, the Court held that the prejudicial effect of the tip in connecting the defendant to the drugs substantially exceeded any probative value in giving context to the officers' conduct. The Court noted that it is the Judge's instruction that distinguishes a tip from hearsay for the jury, but that "[a] jury is unlikely to follow an instruction given where the admission of the tip adds little to the context of the investigation or where the substance of the tip is overwhelmingly incriminating," as here.

[ix] Abuse of Discretion -- Admission of Evidence -- Less Prejudicial Alternative

Carter v. District of Columbia, 795 F.2d 116 (D.C. Cir. 1986) : In a suit by arrestees asserting brutality claims against police, the Court held it was error for the plaintiffs to present detailed evidence of allegations of misconduct against narcotics officers contained in administrative complaints, pleadings in other cases, personnel files, and newspaper articles. The Court concluded that the plaintiffs could have elicited evidence that allegations were made and could have asked about the police department's response without exploring the alleged events in detail.

Wilk v. American Med. Ass'n, 719 F.2d 207 (7th Cir. 1983) : Reversing on another ground a judgment for the defendants in an antitrust action by chiropractors, the Court indicated that it would have been obliged to reverse also because highly prejudicial evidence about one particular chiropractic school and one plaintiff's one-time arrangement with a furniture store to sell mattresses to his patients was admitted. The Court recognized that the evidence was relevant to the defendants' belief that "chiropractic is quackery," but it concluded that the defendants' beliefs could have been explored in a less prejudicial way with much less emphasis on alleged financial greed. In United States v. Hansen, n4 the Court reversed a perjury conviction because the foreman of the grand jury that indicted a defendant was called to testify against him. The Court said that a transcript was to be preferred, because "when the foreman of the grand jury is called without any sufficient reason and in effect justifies the grand jury's actions and the resulting indictment, all precautions about the undue influence of the indictment are very likely for naught."

United States v. Neill, 166 F.3d 943 (9th Cir. 1999) : In a robbery case, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to refer to the fact that the defendant was on work release at the time of the robberies. The evidence of the defendant's residence was probative, because it tended to prove that he knew his codefendant, who also resided in the Work Release Center, and because records showed that the defendant had checked out of the Center during the time in which the crimes occurred and returned that night with money. However, it would have been possible to call the Work Release Center a "residential program," thus avoiding the prejudicial effects of specifically identifying the Center. Reversing a conviction for illegally reentering the United States in United States v. Bejar-Matrecios, n5 the Court concluded it was error to admit a certified copy of a judgment showing that the appellant once pleaded guilty to the misdemeanor of illegal entry. Although the plea conclusively established that the appellant was an alien when he pleaded guilty, the jury was never told why the prior conviction was being used, the evidence was cumulative, and the jury might have used the evidence as proof of predisposition.

United States v. Gaskell, 985 F.2d 1056 (11th Cir. 1993) : In a prosecution arising from a baby's death by shaking, an expert was permitted to demonstrate shaken baby syndrome to the jury by shaking an infant mannequin used to practice CPR techniques. The expert testified that the neck of the CPR doll was stiffer than an infant's, and so greater force was required to produce the head movement associated with shaken baby syndrome. The Court held that the courtroom demonstration was reversible error, because the conditions of the demonstration "were not sufficiently similar to the alleged actions of the defendant to allow a fair comparison." While the demonstration did indicate how a baby's head would move during shaken baby syndrome, this could have been demonstrated in a less inflammatory manner by a direct manipulation of the doll's head.

[x] Abuse of Discretion -- Admission of Evidence -- Miscellaneous Civil Cases

LaPlante v. American Honda Motor Co., 27 F.3d 731 (1st Cir. 1994) : In an action for injuries suffered while operating an all-terrain vehicle, the plaintiff contended that Honda knew that its ATVs would fail to turn properly unless the rider shifted his or her weight in a counterintuitive manner. The Court stated that evidence that Honda had made $73,371,000 in profits from the sale of ATVs over a six-year period was somewhat probative of "the credibility of Honda's explanation for its inaction" -- i.e., that the failure to provide adequate warnings about plowing may have resulted from greed rather than lack of knowledge. The Court ruled, however, that the risk of prejudice substantially outweighed the "scant probative value" of the evidence, and therefore that the Trial Court had "miscalibrated its Rule 403 scales" in admitting it.

Annis v. County of Westchester, 136 F.3d 239 (2d Cir. 1998) : The plaintiff brought a civil rights suit against the County and two County police officials for gender discrimination while she served as a police officer. She had joined a City police force in 1977; in 1981 one of the officials became her superior on the City force, and in 1984 both the plaintiff and the official joined the County force. The statute of limitations period for the plaintiff extended back only to 1990, but she introduced evidence of discriminatory practices on the City force in 1977-81 to show notice to the official, and evidence of practices on the City and County forces in 1981-90 to show a continuing violation of her rights. The Court held that the 1977-81 evidence should have been excluded because it was only minimally probative and "fiercely prejudicial" in leading the jury to associate the official with deplorable conditions existing before his tenure. As to the 1981-90 evidence, the Court found that it was insufficient to establish a continuing violation and, being outside the limitations period, it was irrelevant to show the source of the plaintiff's emotional distress; moreover, it would naturally prejudice the jury's views with regard to the events occurring within the limitations period. Thus, admitting the evidence was an abuse of discretion, but the errors were harmless in the circumstances. In Davidson v. Smith, 9 F.3d 4 (2d Cir. 1993) , the Court reversed a judgment for the defendants in a prisoner's civil rights action because a defense witness violated an in limine order not to refer to the plaintiff's psychiatric history or his treatment at a state hospital for the criminally insane. Given the prejudicial effect of the evidence, the questionable efficacy of a curative instruction, and the relative strength of the plaintiff's case, it was error to deny the plaintiff's motion for a mistrial.

Caparotta v. Entergy Corp., 168 F.3d 754 (5th Cir. 1999) : In an age discrimination action, in-house counsel for the defendant was in custody of the plaintiff's employment records when they were destroyed. The Trial Judge held a hearing and ruled that the records were destroyed inadvertently. At trial, the plaintiff called the in-house counsel to testify to the facts surrounding the destruction of the documents, and both parties mentioned the loss of the documents in argument to the jury. The Court held that it was an abuse of discretion to allow the trial to proceed in this manner, since the prejudicial impact of the testimony was substantial and it was confusing to the jury because it was not clear to which issue the evidence was relevant.

Collins v. Kibort, 143 F.3d 331 (7th Cir. 1998) : In a Title VII race discrimination case, the Court found it was error (but harmless) to permit the plaintiff to introduce evaluations referring to his performance in years after the employment decision at issue. Those evaluations did not aid in determining whether the decision was made on a discriminatory basis, and the prejudicial effect of their suggestion that the plaintiff was considered a valued employee substantially outweighed their probative value. In Fortino v. Quasar Co., n6 the Court reversed judgments for plaintiffs allegedly discharged because of national origin and age discrimination, holding that it was error to admit a videotaped speech by one of the defendant's executives that indicated age bias, as none of the plaintiffs was in the executive's group and he had no role in their discharge or in that of any other employee.

Crane v. Crest Tankers, Inc., 47 F.3d 292 (8th Cir. 1995) : The Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff in a seaman's Jones Act case because a "Future Damage Calculator" was improperly admitted into evidence. The exhibit was a slide-rule-type device with life and work expectancy and present value tables. The jury was given the device with no instruction about which damages were to be reduced to present value, how the rate of interest was to be determined, or how the device was to be used, and the defendant was given no opportunity to challenge the expertise or methods of calculation of the device's author. There was no showing that the device was generally used and relied upon, but the name of the publisher ("Lawyers and Judges Publishing Co.") suggested that the judiciary had vouched for it. In Silbergleit v. First Interstate Bank, 37 F.3d 394 (8th Cir. 1994) , the Court reversed a judgment against the plaintiff in an age discrimination suit because the defendant's counsel asked questions and made comments that improperly suggested to or informed the jury that the plaintiff was a millionaire, received unemployment benefits, and was Jewish.

Stump v. Gates, 211 F.3d 527 (10th Cir. 2000) : A decedent's children brought an action under § 1983 and for outrageous conduct against a city, its police chief, and a detective, alleging that they had denied the children access to the State Courts to assert a wrongful death claim against the decedent's wife by bungling an investigation into the decedent's 1984 death and destroying the relevant evidence. At trial the plaintiffs introduced a 1989 state grand jury report, which had concluded that the decedent's death was a homicide and not a suicide as previously characterized by the police department. The report was admitted not for its truth but to show that through the report the plaintiffs had learned there was a cover-up for which they had an outrageous conduct claim. Reversing a judgment for the plaintiffs, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to admit the grand jury report. It had little if any probative value in establishing when or how the plaintiffs received notice of their claims, since their complaint was filed seven months before they saw the report, and it was highly prejudicial as a hearsay conclusion that the police chief had deliberately and egregiously covered up the cause of the decedent's death.

[xi] Abuse of Discretion -- Admission of Evidence -- Miscellaneous Prosecution Evidence

United States v. Fulmer, 108 F.3d 1486 (1st Cir. 1997) : Fulmer had gone to a federal agent to ask him to investigate Fulmer's family members for criminal activity. The agent investigated and informed Fulmer that no charges would be filed. Fulmer then sent the agent a voicemail promising that the agent would receive "silver bullets" in the near future. At his trial for threatening the agent, Fulmer contended that he was not referring to violence when he mentioned "silver bullets," but rather to critical evidence in the case against his family members. The Court reversed the conviction because three pieces of evidence created an unacceptable risk of prejudice. First, the agent was allowed to testify that he considered the voicemail especially threatening due to the fact that the Federal Building in Oklahoma City had recently been bombed and many federal agents had been killed. This evidence had at best "slight" probative value, because Fulmer had not referred to the Oklahoma City bombing nor to any explosives in his voicemail, while the danger of unfair prejudice was "tremendous." Second, the admission of actual bullets of a silvery color, possessed by the agent, was error. It was unnecessary for the prosecution to demonstrate to the jury that silver bullets actually existed, and it was not clear "what possession by the victim of these bullets has to do with whether the defendant's statement constituted a threat, particularly since he was unaware of their existence." Finally, it was an abuse of discretion to admit testimony that the agent brought an extra magazine of ammunition home with him on the day that he received Fulmer's voicemail. While this evidence was probative of the agent's reaction, there was an unacceptable risk that it would evoke "an emotional or biased response in the jury that may have confused the issues in the case."

United States v. Irizarry, 341 F.3d 273 (3d Cir. 2003) : Affirming RICO convictions, the Court ruled that it was error (but not plain error) to admit testimony about a high ranking member of a crime family that was completely unrelated to his dealings with the charged enterprise. In a footnote, the Court found it "necessary to once again caution against the dangers of eliciting this kind of evidence and the propriety of admitting it," since "irrelevant references to such notorious figures as the members of the Gambino crime family can poison the deliberative well to an extent that will fatally undermine the integrity of any subsequent conviction." In a mail fraud prosecution arising from a scheme to invest "pre-need" funds of funeral directors, United States v. Copple, 24 F.3d 535 (3d Cir. 1994) , the Court held that evidence of the extent of the victims' losses could be probative of the defendant's intent to convert the funds to his personal use, but the victims' testimony about the personal tragedies they suffered as a result of the fraud was unfairly prejudicial. The error was harmless, however.

United States v. Grimes, 244 F.3d 375 (5th Cir. 2001) : The defendant was charged with possession of child pornography after pictures of nude children were found on his computer. The Court vacated his conviction because two sexually-explicit narratives, also found on the computer, were introduced as evidence of his intent and state of mind. The narratives were relevant to help show that the possession of the photographs was unlikely an accident when a person was also downloading narratives that involved sexual contact between adults and minors. However, their probative value was substantially outweighed by their prejudicial effect; they were "vile in their graphic and violent nature," depicting violent rapes and moderate torture, while the photographs depicted no violence. In United States v. Riddle, 103 F.3d 423 (5th Cir. 1997) , the Court, reversing a bank chairman's conviction for fraud in connection with loans in which he was interested, found an abuse of discretion in the admission of bank examination reports detailing violations of laws and regulations in other situations. Although the reports were relevant to the defendant's knowledge of his obligations to fully inform the bank's board, the probative value was slight in comparison to the risk of prejudicing, confusing, or misleading the jury by a four-year history tying the defendant to dozens of regulatory violations. It was also error to admit another participant's plea-bargaining proffer, which included the defendant's name in an unspecific list of institutions, individuals, and situations involving banking violations. In United States v. Oreira, n7 the Court reversed convictions for structuring currency transactions, holding it was error to admit evidence that a narcotics-detecting dog alerted on a deposit of cash made by the defendants. Offered to show that the defendants knew the money was drug proceeds, the probative value of the evidence was minimal (since most American currency contains narcotics traces) and was substantially outweighed by the prejudicial impact of injecting the specter of narcotics trafficking into the case.

United States v. Baldwin, 418 F.3d 575 (6th Cir. 2005) : The defendant was convicted of faking his own kidnapping. The Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit a psychological profile of the defendant prepared by the government, which essentially concluded that the defendant lived off his parents and wanted a lot of money without having to work for it. The government argued that the profile was properly admitted to show why the police investigator focused on the defendant as a suspect in his own kidnapping and why the officer conducted the interview with the defendant the way he did. However, the Court noted that the issues of police motivation and techniques used in the interview were not raised at trial, and that the profile "had nothing to do with the modus operandi of the staged kidnaping, so it could not have been relevant in that respect." In United States v. DeSantis, 134 F.3d 760 (6th Cir. 1998) , the defendant was convicted for mail and securities fraud in selling interests in a limited partnership, which collapsed when bars that it owned lost their liquor licenses. The government contended that the investor loss was caused by the defendant hiding excessive commissions when selling the interests; the defendant claimed that the loss occurred because his partner had sabotaged the business, after they had a falling out, by falsely representing to the state liquor control commission that the defendant still controlled the bars although he was required to dispose of them when convicted of another felony. In counter-rebuttal, the government offered testimony of the partner that he had heard the defendant had been stealing from the bars, which was why he had taken the actions leading to their falling out. Reversing, the Court held that the partner's testimony was irrelevant to challenge the defendant's claim that the investor losses were due to factors other than fraudulent representations at the time of the sale. As its only probative value was for the impermissible purposes of either showing the defendant's bad character or impeaching the defendant's testimony, admission of the testimony was an abuse of discretion. Furthermore, the defendant was prejudiced when he was improperly compelled on cross-examination to read into evidence a State Appellate Court decision affirming liquor control commission findings that he had not relinquished control over the bars. In United States v. Carter, n8 the Court reversed a conviction for selling cocaine to FBI agents, holding it was error to admit evidence of the defendant's purchase of household items, his two bank loan applications, and his failure to file tax returns. As this prosecution did not involve either a continuing criminal enterprise or an allegation that the defendant lacked a legitimate source of income to support an affluent lifestyle, the evidence was irrelevant and extremely prejudicial.

United States v. Duran, 407 F.3d 828 (7th Cir. 2005) : Affirming convictions for drug-trafficking offenses, the Court held that evidence of firearms and marijuana recovered at a coconspirator's house used by the conspirators was properly admitted, but it also held that the probative value of guns recovered from the apartment of the coconspirator's sister was substantially outweighed by its prejudice when no drugs or drug paraphernalia were found in the apartment. Admission of the evidence was harmless error, however. In United States v. Westmoreland, 312 F.3d 302 (7th Cir. 2002) , a prosecution of murder-for-hire in connection with drug trafficking, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to admit a letter purportedly authored by the defendant's wife and submitted at the sentencing hearing in the defendant's earlier drug trial. The letter was offered in support of the government's contention that the defendant's family sought to obstruct justice on numerous occasions. The Court found no relevance for the letter, since it was well established that the wife had not written it, the true author was never identified, there was no evidence that the defendant authorized or even knew of the letter when it was presented in the hearing, and there was no evidence that the wife used the letter to obstruct justice in this case. At the very least, the letter should have been excluded because its prejudicial effect substantially outweighed any probative value.

United States v. LaChapelle, 969 F.2d 632 (8th Cir. 1992) : The defendant, charged with receiving child pornography through the mail, asserted an entrapment defense, and the government introduced a pornographic videotape seized from the defendant's home to show his knowledge of and intent to order child pornography. The Court held admission of the evidence was error (but harmless) because the possession was legal when the defendant first possessed the videotape. Evidence of predisposition to do what was once lawful is not by itself sufficient to show predisposition to do what is now illegal, so the slight probative value of the evidence was outweighed by its prejudicial effect.

United States v. Gonzalez-Flores, 418 F.3d 1093 (9th Cir. 2005) : Reversing a conviction for alien smuggling, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion under Rule 403 (but harmless error) to admit testimony that two girls transported across the border by the defendant later suffered heat stroke walking through the Arizona desert because they had not been given enough water. The probative value of the testimony was low but it was highly prejudicial because of the jury's likely sympathetic reaction to the girls. In a prosecution for drug importation and possession with intent to distribute, United States v. Varela-Rivera, 279 F.3d 1174 (9th Cir. 2002) , the defendant denied knowing that he was carrying the drugs and a Customs agent was permitted to testify about the methods and techniques used by narcotics smugglers, including that a smuggler would not risk using an unknowing courier to transport drugs. The Court held that admission of the expert's testimony was reversible error, since it prejudicially portrayed the defendant as a member of an international drug trafficking organization even though he was indicted only as an individual and there was no charge that he was acting in a conspiracy. In a prosecution for felon firearm possession, United States v. Jimenez, n9 the government sought to impeach the defendant with his prior felony convictions for burglary and for assault with a deadly weapon. The Trial Judge granted the request, but ordered that the assault conviction be referred to as a "felony involving a firearm." The Court reversed the conviction because the Judge's well-meaning attempt to mitigate the prejudice to the defendant inadvertently made it worse. Altering the nature of the assault conviction from one involving a deadly weapon to one involving a firearm increased rather than decreased the likelihood that the jury would draw an impermissible inference, since the only issue in dispute was whether the defendant in fact possessed a firearm. In a mail fraud case, United States v. Lawrence, n10 the defendant had an unconventional "marriage of convenience" to a flight attendant, in which she received tax benefits, he was able to fly for free, they lived apart, and both dated other people. The Court reversed the defendant's conviction because evidence of this marriage was introduced. The circumstances of the relationship were not probative of his guilt or innocence, and any relevance the testimony might have had was easily outweighed by its unfair prejudicial effect on the jury's ability to focus on the issues relevant to the charges. In United States v. Mitchell, n11 the Court reversed a bank robbery conviction because the prosecution erroneously introduced evidence that the defendant was in very poor financial condition and unemployed at the time of the robbery. The evidence was offered under Rule 404(b) as proof of motive, but the Court found the Rule inapplicable because "[b]eing poor is not a crime, wrong, or act" within the Rule. The poverty evidence in this case was not only of negligible probative value -- "almost everyone, poor or not, has a motive to get more money [a]nd most people, rich or poor, do not steal to get it" -- but it also produced a high danger of unfair prejudice when the prosecutor effectively portrayed the defendant as both poor and feckless, not supporting his wife and children. In United States v. Ellis, n12 the defendant was convicted of receiving and concealing stolen explosives. The Trial Judge admitted the entirety of "The Anarchist Cookbook," a book found in the defendant's possession, which was a primer for "individual actions of destruction" that advocated drug use, anarchy, and violent revolution. An expert was also permitted to testify that the stolen explosives had the capability of destroying an office building. Reversing, the Court held that because the defendant was charged only with the receipt and possession of stolen explosives, there was no issue of intent to use the explosives, so the probative value of the possession of the book and the destructive capacity of the explosives was minimal, while the prejudice was obvious.

United States v. Griffin, 389 F.3d 1100 (10th Cir. 2004) : In a felon firearm possession case, the Court found it was error (but harmless) to admit a document listing all of the terms and conditions of the defendant's probation, one of which was a prohibition on possessing firearms, since "the defendant was not on trial for violating the terms and conditions of his probation but for violating [the statute criminalizing felon firearm possession]. Moreover, his knowledge that he was not to possess a firearm as a convicted felon is not an element" of the crime. In United States v. Wood, 207 F.3d 1222 (10th Cir. 2000) , a doctor was charged with murder and lesser included offenses after a patient died from a large dose of potassium chloride the doctor had injected in an attempt to treat the patient. Reversing a conviction for involuntary manslaughter, the Court held it was error to admit testimony of a medical expert that potassium chloride is the drug most commonly used to execute criminals and euthanize animals. The testimony clearly prejudiced the defendant by creating the impression that potassium chloride "is purely an instrument of death and Dr. Wood was acting as an executioner." While the testimony was probative of the potassium chloride's lethal effect, the compound's dangers and benefits were adequately established by other testimony.

[b] Abuse of Discretion -- Exclusion of Evidence

[i] Civil Rights Cases

Doe v. Claiborne County, Tenn., 103 F.3d 495 (6th Cir. 1996) : The Court reversed dismissal of the student-plaintiff's Title IX claims that she had been sexually abused by a teacher, and held it was an abuse of discretion to exclude before trial all of the plaintiff's evidence of incidents that provided the defendants with notice of the teacher's propensity. Because what the defendants knew and when they knew was relevant to material issues in the case, the evidence did not have an undue tendency to suggest a decision on an improper basis, nor was it related to a collateral matter or cumulative. In Shahid v. City of Detroit, n13 the Court reversed judgments for the defendants in a civil rights action, brought for alleged failure to provide medical care to a jail inmate prior to his death, because the Trial Judge had excluded black-and-white photographs of the decedent's body in his cell shortly after his death. By depicting paint dustings, bruises, and blood traces, the photos were relevant to whether he had sought assistance and the obviousness of his injuries, and the fact the body may have been moved before the photos were taken did not mean they were an inaccurate representation of what they depicted.

Brown v. City of Hialeah, 30 F.3d 1433 (11th Cir. 1994) : The Court reversed a judgment for defendants in a civil rights action for excessive force in effecting an arrest, because the Trial Court abused its discretion in excluding portions of a tape recording in which the officers used racial slurs.

[ii] Abuse of Discretion -- Exclusion of Evidence -- Criminal Defense

United States v. Morgan, 581 F.2d 933 (D.C. Cir. 1978) : The defendant, charged with possession of narcotics with intent to distribute, attempted to introduce evidence that one of the occupants of an apartment in which drugs were found was involved in selling drugs and that the seized drugs belonged to this person, not the defendant. The Court, finding an abuse of discretion in the exclusion of this evidence, emphasized that the jury might have speculated in an improper way about the meaning of the drugs that were discovered unless it knew that there was some evidence that a person other than appellant might have been selling the drugs.

United States v. Davis, 639 F.2d 239 (5th Cir. 1981) : In reversing marijuana convictions, the Court found it was an abuse of discretion to exclude character evidence offered to impeach the key government witness. The Court warned that the exclusion of admissible evidence offered by defendants raises compulsory process problems and that an abuse of discretion is an error of constitutional dimension. In United States v. Thompson, n14 the Court reversed a conviction for violating federal election laws, holding it was error to dismiss a witness from the stand because the Judge did not believe her testimony. "Rule 403 does not permit exclusion of evidence because the judge does not find it credible"; the Court added that the error also denied the appellant his constitutional right to a fair trial. In United States v. Riley, n15 a former national bank examiner was convicted of misapplying bank funds by inducing the bank to issue cashier's checks for his remittance before he paid for them. These transactions differ from a customer's occasional overdraft, because a personal check does not require the bank to disburse any money that it does not have, while a cashier's check is a commitment by the bank to deliver cash to the payee. Reversing, the Court held it was error to exclude evidence of 80 other instances during the same time period in which the bank had issued cashier's checks without contemporaneous payment, which was offered to show that the transactions were regarded as informal loans or extensions of credit to bank officers. "Although the trial judge is traditionally accorded a wide range of discretion in the admission of evidence, ... it is axiomatic that such discretion does not extend to the exclusion of crucial relevant evidence establishing a valid defense."

United States v. Lucas, 357 F.3d 599 (6th Cir. 2004) : The defendant, who was stopped with a large quantity of cocaine in her car, sought to explain her nervousness (which the arresting officer testified to) by evidence that she had been repeatedly raped when she was previously imprisoned. The Judge ruled that the defendant could use the large settlement she received as a result of the rapes to explain the cash she had when arrested, but that she could not mention the rapes. The Court found there was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error), since the rape evidence was "technically relevant, as it suggests that her behavior, which might otherwise be taken as evidence of guilt and was argued as such by the prosecution, was potentially explainable for other reasons," and "the risk of undue sympathy could have been managed to some extent by a limiting instruction." In United States v. Arthur, 949 F.2d 211 (6th Cir. 1991) , the Court reversed a conviction for bank robbery, with one Judge considering it was an abuse of discretion to refuse to allow the defendant's brother, a codefendant who was trying to exculpate the defendant at trial, to put on a wig and baseball cap to demonstrate that with the disguise there was a close resemblance. The other Judges, concurring in the judgment, found no abuse of discretion, as all eyewitnesses except the codefendant testified that whoever robbed the bank was not wearing a wig.

United States v. Cavender, 228 F.3d 792 (7th Cir. 2000) : In a trial for conspiring to possess and distribute cocaine base, the principal prosecution witness testified on direct and reiterated on cross that he had not used, sold, or dealt drugs when he previously lived in Chicago. The Trial Judge precluded the defense from introducing evidence that the witness had been convicted of a felony in Chicago for possession of a controlled substance. Reversing, the Court held that it was error under Rule 609(a)(1) to exclude the evidence of the narcotics conviction. Under the applicable Rule 403 balancing test, the evidence was highly probative in contradicting the witness' testimony and would not be cumulative or a waste of time, since the jury had "heard absolutely nothing that would have hinted to them that [the witness] was lying to them right there as he sat in the witness stand." In United States v. Byrd, 208 F.3d 592 (7th Cir. 2000) , the Court reversed a conviction for assaulting federal officers because the defendant, appearing pro se, had been denied leave to obtain and present to the jury actual shackles and restraints such as the ones used on him at the time of the alleged assault. The Trial Judge ruled that the defendant's description of the restraints would be sufficient, and worth more than showing shackles that were not the ones used on the defendant. The Court noted that the evidence "would have grounded the case in reality and left less to the imagination" and found it "hard to imagine an adequate reason for failing to obtain shackles or for their exclusion at trial." One Judge dissented on the ground that the evidence was merely cumulative, so its exclusion was not an abuse of discretion. In United States v. Santos, 201 F.3d 953 (7th Cir. 2000) , the Chicago City Treasurer was charged with illegally soliciting political contributions from banks and securities firms. The government presented evidence that firms refusing to contribute were denied new business with the City Treasurer's office even though they were low bidders, and argued that previously the office always gave business to the low bidder. However, the defense was not permitted to show that some of the recalcitrant bidders were not cut off and that nonextorted low bidders did not always get the business; the Judge considered the evidence merely evidence of "good acts" that was irrelevant because the government was not contending that every transaction during the period was corrupt. Reversing the defendant's conviction, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion for the Judge, having misunderstood the purpose for which the evidence was being offered, to have failed to balance its probative value (i.e., as tending to show that the requests for campaign contributions were not threats) against its potential for confusing the jury.

United States v. Bear, 357 F.3d 730 (8th Cir. 2004) : The Court reversed a conviction for aggravated sexual assault because the defense was erroneously prevented from introducing a lay witness' opinion that one of the alleged victims (who testified) "was untruthful" and "didn't always tell the truth." The witness was the foster care parent with whom the child had lived following the initial report and investigation of abuse. She saw him on a daily basis during the four to six months that he resided with her, so her opinion about his credibility was more than a "bare assertion" or "conclusory observation." The evidence was highly probative on the credibility of the victim's testimony, which was one of the central issues of the case, and the Judge's decision to exclude the testimony because "[t]hat's strictly her personal opinion and that would be a slippery slope" did not raise countervailing considerations appropriate under Rule 403. In United States v. Rushing, 313 F.3d 428 (8th Cir. 2002) , the defendants were charged with immigration fraud in a scheme to import Chinese women to satisfy one defendant's sexual appetite. The government alleged that the defendant had a year-long sexual relationship with one of the women. The defense proffered an expert to testify that since the woman was infected with hepatitis B, it was highly likely that the defendant would also be so infected if they had such a relationship, but he was not. The Trial Judge excluded the evidence on the ground that it was collateral and of little probative value on the central issues of the case. Reversing, the Court concluded that the evidence was highly probative, since evidence that there were no sexual relations would have undermined the government's central theory, leaving it with no explanation of why the defendants engaged in immigration fraud. On remand, the Court left open the question of whether the expert's testimony satisfied Daubert. To prove bank fraud in United States v. Mulder, n16 the government introduced financial statements given to the allegedly defrauded bank in which the defendant represented that he owned property that he actually rented. The Judge excluded a financial statement prepared by another bank and signed by the defendant that listed the property as rented, on the grounds that the statement had not been relied on by the lending bank (although it was in its files), was "internally inconsistent" and contained a clear error, and was highlighted to mislead the jury. Reversing, the Court found an abuse of discretion in exclusion of the statement, since it was probative of the defendant's intent and good faith. One Judge dissented on the ground that the probative value of the statement, dated before five of the six financial statements introduced by the government, was so slight that any error was harmless.

United States v. Vallejo, 237 F.3d 1008 (9th Cir. 2001) : Marijuana was found in the defendant's car during a search at a Mexican border checkpoint. His defense was that he was duped to drive the car by Jaramillo, a former owner of the car who was involved in drug trafficking, but he was not permitted to introduce evidence that Jaramillo had previously been convicted of bringing the same amount of marijuana into the country at the same port of entry using the same method of concealment in a different car. Reversing, the Court held it error to exclude the testimony, since it was highly probative to establish the defendant's lack of knowledge that drugs were in the car, and there was little danger of unfair prejudice. In United States v. Crosby, 75 F.3d 1343 (9th Cir. 1996) , the Court reversed a conviction for assault resulting in serious bodily harm, finding that it was error to exclude defense evidence that the victim's husband was in the vicinity at the time of the assault and that the husband had beaten both the victim and the defendant on prior occasions. The excluded evidence tended to show that the husband had the requisite strength and emotional instability to commit the assault, and that the husband was angry about the relationship the victim was having with the defendant. Exclusion denied the defendant a fair opportunity to establish his alternative theory of who committed the crime, for no good reason. In United States v. Dees, n17 the Court affirmed a conviction for mail and wire fraud arising out of a scheme to sell the same baby to different people at the same time, holding it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) when the defense was not permitted to ask a victim witness on cross-examination whether she had sold to a motion picture company the rights to the story of her experiences with the defendant. The potential pecuniary and nonpecuniary benefits of a movie contract were relevant to the witness' bias, and any prejudice from the evidence would not be unfair. In United States v. Blaylock, n18 the Court reversed a firearm conviction, holding it was error to exclude medical records of the defendant offered to show that he was receiving medical treatment for a bad back at the time of his arrest. These records might have cast doubt on police officers' testimony that they saw the defendant running with a gun in his hand. Further, there was no risk justifying exclusion under Rule 403 that a reasonable jury would be misled by the contents, even without expert interpretation, as the records were written in plain language.

United States v. Austin, 933 F.2d 833 (10th Cir. 1991) : Reversing a conviction for resisting correctional officers, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion when the defense was mental illness to exclude records of prior hospitalizations on the ground solely of remoteness. The Court was unwilling to place a temporal limit on relevant proof of mental illness in view of its frequently long duration, its possible chronicity, and its recurrent manifestations.

[iii] Abuse of Discretion -- Exclusion of Evidence -- Employment Discrimination Cases

Perry v. Ethan Allen, Inc., 115 F.3d 143 (2d Cir. 1997) : The Court held it was error (but harmless) in a hostile environment case to exclude evidence of sexual harassment not witnessed personally by the plaintiff. The evidence tended to show the general work atmosphere, and possibly the defendant's notice of that environment, and it was not unfairly prejudicial to the defendant. In Zaken v. Boerer, 964 F.2d 1319 (2d Cir. 1992) , the Court reversed a judgment for the defendant, principal owner and executive of a company designing and selling women's clothing, in an action alleging employment discrimination based on pregnancy. The Court held that it was error to exclude a statement by the vice president for sales that the plaintiff's predecessor had been fired because she was pregnant. Where none of the plaintiff's three witnesses testified to the statement or gave objective direct evidence that pregnancy played a role in the defendant's employment decisions, the evidence should not have been excluded as cumulative.

Glass v. Philadelphia Elec. Co., 34 F.3d 188 (3d Cir. 1994) : The Court reversed a judgment in an employment discrimination case because the defendant was permitted to offer evidence of the plaintiff's performance at one plant, but the plaintiff was not permitted to cross-examine the witnesses about the racially hostile work environment at that plant. The cross-examination was relevant to the question whether the defendant's reasons for its actions were pretextual. Because neither the in limine objection nor the ruling precluding the cross-examination had been explicitly based on Rule 403, the Court left the balancing of particular items of the evidence to the Trial Judge on remand. The dissenting Judge believed that the Rule 403 ruling had been made sufficiently on the in limine motion, that the probative value of the evidence was minimal, and that permitting the proof might have led to a mini-trial and caused substantial unfair prejudice. In Spain v. Gallegos, 26 F.3d 439 (3d Cir. 1994) , an EEOC employee alleged that a sexually hostile work environment was created when her supervisor demanded and received loans from her, in violation of Title VII employment rules, and that the private meetings between them gave rise to the rumors about an affair. Reversing dismissal of the case, the Court found that it was an abuse of discretion to exclude evidence of the loan transactions. The reason for the private meetings was relevant because it would demonstrate why the supervisor wanted to keep the meetings private, and why the meetings were so frequent. Moreover, the evidence would lend credibility to the plaintiff's assertion that the supervisor made no effort to stop the rumors, because doing so would have required the supervisor to "explain his conduct." The Court recognized the possibility of prejudice because "the evidence would make the jury more likely to turn a breach of ethics into a finding of sexual harassment," but believed traditional tools of the adversary process were adequate to protect the defendant.

Conner v. Schrader-Bridgeport Int'l, Inc., 227 F.3d 179 (4th Cir. 2000) : In a female factory worker's suit for sexual harassment due to a hostile and abusive work environment, the Trial Judge determined that comments like "Are you on the rag?" and "Didn't you get any last night?" were irrelevant, prejudicial, and insufficient to constitute harassment, in light of the "rugged environment of physically demanding work" in the factory. The Court reversed, reasoning that there is no "inhospitable environment" exception to Title VII, so the factual development concerning the work atmosphere was entirely appropriate and necessary. Although it affirmed a judgment for a fire company sued by a plaintiff who alleged that its membership policies were discriminatory in Mullen v. Princess Anne Volunteer Fire Co., n19 the Court stated that racial statements by a decision-maker are relevant to demonstrating racial animus and have great probative value. The Court recognized that "[t]estimony concerning racial remarks is certain to be emotionally charged," but reasoned that "[w]ords produce emotion as a result of the ideas that they represent," and "[t]he epithets involved here are offensive precisely because they convey the idea of racial bigotry."

EEOC v. Manville Sales Corp., 27 F.3d 1089 (5th Cir. 1994) : The Court reversed a judgment for the defendant in an employee's age discrimination action, holding that age-related remarks by the employee's supervisor should not have been excluded. Even though the supervisor did not ultimately decide to terminate the plaintiff, his recommendation was highly influential, so his remarks, made over a four-year period, were clearly probative; and no showing was made that the remarks would be confusing or unduly prejudicial. In Plemer v. Parsons-Gilbane, n20 the Court found that the Trial Judge should not have excluded as irrelevant a letter written by a government contract compliance officer to the defendant that gave notice of deficiencies discovered in an on-site review. The letter might have shown widespread discrimination and thus would have tended to show that justifications for salary differences were pretextual.

Jackson v. Quanex Corp., 191 F.3d 647 (6th Cir. 1999) : Reversing a judgment entered for an employer sued for racial harassment, the Court held that evidence of racial graffiti at the defendant's manufacturing plant and evidence of racially offensive conduct directed at African-American workers should have been admitted, whether or not the graffiti or conduct was directed at the plaintiff: "Comments that single out members of a protected class are relevant not only as to whether a particular work environment was objectively hostile to members of the protected class but also as to whether an employee belonging to the protected class subjectively felt harassed."

White v. Honeywell, Inc., 141 F.3d 1270 (8th Cir. 1998) : In a Title VII hostile environment case, the plaintiff offered evidence that a supervisor (since deceased) had made racist remarks when told that the plaintiff had complained of treatment by a co-worker. The Trial Judge excluded the evidence on the grounds that the statement was "so prejudicial and so inflammatory" even though it was of "heavy" relevance, that the statement was not made during the actionable period of time, that the plaintiff had other evidence of the employer's attitude, and that the supervisor could not deny or explain the statement on the stand. Reversing a judgment for the defendant, the Court noted that introduction of alleged racist remarks is not unexpected in a case where race discrimination is at issue, and that the jury was unlikely to decide the case on an unfair basis, since it already heard other racially pejorative appellations. Because the evidence was so highly probative on the issues of the employer's attitude and environment, its value was not substantially outweighed by its potential unfair prejudicial effect. In Estes v. Dick Smith Ford, Inc., n21 the Court reversed a judgment in an employment discrimination case, finding that the plaintiff should have been permitted to introduce evidence of prior acts of discrimination against black customers by the service department for which he formerly worked. This evidence could have assisted the jury in resolving the issue of the employer's motive for discharging the plaintiff.

Obrey v. Johnson, 400 F.3d 691 (9th Cir. 2005) : In an employee's race discrimination action, the Court reversed a judgment for the defendant because a statistical report showing a correlation between race and promotion was erroneously excluded. Although the report failed to account for the relative qualifications of the applicant pool, it was not irrelevant in this case alleging a discriminatory pattern or practice; "[a] statistical study may fall short of proving the plaintiff's case, but still remain relevant to the issues in dispute." It was also an abuse of discretion to exclude on the ground of irrelevance a co-worker's testimony that the defendant's officials had made disparaging remarks about the ethnic group to which the plaintiff belonged, as such evidence was relevant to the defendant's prejudice and to whether the proffered race-neutral reasons were pretextual. The Judge had also excluded testimony from three co-workers, prepared to testify that they had been denied promotion because of racial discrimination, on the ground that it would essentially require conducting three abbreviated employment discrimination trials. The Court held that exclusion of the testimony was an abuse of discretion, since none of it was excludable as clearly involving undue delay or a waste of time or as being cumulative. In Heyne v. Caruso, 69 F.3d 1475 (9th Cir. 1995) , the Trial Judge excluded testimony regarding the defendant's harassment of employees other than the plaintiff in a quid pro quo sexual harassment action, on the ground that it was relevant only to prove a hostile work environment and was more prejudicial than probative. Reversing, the Court held that the evidence was probative of the employer's motive or intent in discharging the plaintiff, and its probative value was not significantly outweighed by its prejudicial effect. One Judge dissented on the ground that the ruling below was not an abuse of discretion. In an age discrimination case, Baker v. Delta Air Lines, Inc., n22 the Trial Judge excluded memos written in 1978 as having only attenuated relevance to the defendant's policy or practice in the period at issue. Reversing in part, the Court held that the memos were probative both of whether the defendants had a particular policy at that time (a fact put in issue by the defendants) and the motivation behind that policy (which was probative of the rationale for the policy later), and that this probative value outweighed the risks of jury confusion and time wasting. In Miller v. Fairchild Indus., n23 the plaintiffs, who alleged that they were discharged in retaliation for filing discrimination charges with the EEOC, were not permitted to introduce evidence of the defendant's hirings in other job categories after they were laid off, but the defendant was permitted to prove layoffs in other categories in order to show its economic condition. The Court held that excluding the plaintiffs' evidence was an abuse of discretion, but harmless because it would have provided only weak support for their contention that the defendant's economic condition was but a pretext for their layoffs.

Wilson v. City of Aliceville, 779 F.2d 631 (11th Cir. 1986) : The Court reversed a judgment for the City in an employment discrimination suit by a black officer who claimed that the City refused to hire him as police chief because of his race. It found clear error in the exclusion of evidence that the Mayor made a racial slur in a statement to the effect that the federal government would not tell him whom to hire. It rejected the Trial Judge's reliance on Rule 403, which it said should be used "sparingly," and concluded that reversal was proper, even though the case was tried to an advisory, not a regular, jury.

[iv] Abuse of Discretion -- Exclusion of Evidence -- Miscellaneous Cases

Kassel v. Gannett Co., 875 F.2d 935 (1st Cir. 1989) : The Court ordered a retrial on the damages issue in a defamation action by a Veterans Administration psychologist who alleged that the defendant's libelous newspaper story led to the VA's reassigning him to a position where he had nothing to do. The Court held that a brief filed pro se by the plaintiff in a labor grievance proceeding protesting the reassignment should not have been excluded, because his statements there that he had been transferred in reprisal for union activities and prior successful grievances were highly probative admissions directly contrary to his position at trial.

Westfield Ins. Co. v. Harris, 134 F.3d 608 (4th Cir. 1998) : After the defendant's home was destroyed by a suspicious fire, his insurer hired an independent investigator who made factual findings and concluded that the fire had been deliberately set. At the trial of the insurer's declaratory judgment action to disclaim coverage, a state deputy fire marshal testified for the insurer that in his opinion the fire was incendiary, but the witness' testimony was stricken after he said that his opinion was based roughly 90 percent on what the investigator had discovered. Reversing a judgment for the insured, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to exclude the marshal's testimony, since the fact that testimony from a "high official" of the state might be given "much credibility" by the jury or that it might "bolster" a similar opinion that was expected from the investigator was not the sort of "prejudice" of concern under Rule 403. The Trial Judge also erred in excluding as too prejudicial highly probative evidence of other suspicious fire claims involving the insured, which were offered to negative any argument of accident.

Sutkiewicz v. Monroe County Sheriff, 110 F.3d 352 (6th Cir. 1997) : The plaintiff had confessed to a murder, and was declared incompetent to stand trial; he was detained in a mental institution for ten years as a result of the murder charges. Eventually he was released without being tried for the murder. Reversing a judgment for police officers in the plaintiff's action claiming that his detention had resulted from malicious prosecution and false imprisonment, the Court held it was error to exclude two hours of tape-recorded conversations between the plaintiff and a Baptist minister at whose mission the plaintiff spent two nights during a temporary release following his arrest for the murder. The minister repeatedly urged the plaintiff to confess and fed him facts about the murder. Shortly thereafter, the plaintiff confessed to the police. The Court found that the tapes might have swayed the probable cause calculus in the defendants' favor; the probative value of the tapes was high and although there were portions of the tapes that were confusing, the confusion was due to the plaintiff's mental illness, and the tapes were not likely to lead a jury to decide the case on an improper basis. A dissenting Judge argued that there was no evidence that the defendant officers knew what was on the tapes, so that they could not be relevant to the issue of probable cause.

Western Indus. v. Newcor Canada, Ltd., 739 F.2d 1198 (7th Cir. 1984) : In a suit arising out of a contract to purchase certain machines, the Court found it was reversible error to exclude three expert witnesses who would have testified about customary practice in the specialty welding machine trade. The Court said that a Judge may not listen to cross-examination of witnesses before their testimony is presented to the jury and forbid them to testify because the Judge disbelieves them.

SEC v. Peters, 978 F.2d 1162 (10th Cir. 1992) : The Court reversed a judgment for the defendant in a civil action for insider trading violations, holding the SEC had been improperly precluded from asking the defendant and his character witnesses about allegations of other securities law violations, as the defendant had made his character and his unblemished history a very important part of his defense and the rulings deprived the jury of a fair and balanced opportunity to evaluate his character. The Trial Judge had erroneously assigned the proposed evidence a probative value of "nil" and overemphasized its prejudicial effect and tendencies to raise collateral issues.

Johnson v. United States, 780 F.2d 902 (11th Cir. 1986) : The Court remanded a wrongful death case brought by the parents of an infant who died after being taken to a military hospital, holding it was error to exclude as cumulative the testimony of a third expert witness who arguably had better credentials than the first two and whose analysis was somewhat different from the others.

[v] Abuse of Discretion -- Exclusion of Evidence -- Product Liability Cases

Swajian v. General Motors Corp., 916 F.2d 31 (1st Cir. 1990) : The plaintiff in a product liability action alleged that his decedent was killed in a rollover accident caused by a defective axle in the vehicle she was driving. The Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff, holding that the Trial Judge had not properly weighed probative value and prejudicial effect in excluding evidence relating to the decedent's alcohol consumption and blood alcohol level.

Diehl v. Blaw-Knox, 360 F.3d 426 (3d Cir. 2004) : A road construction worker sued the manufacturer of a road widener machine that backed over his legs. The Court reversed a judgment for the defendant, holding it was error to exclude evidence that the plaintiff's employer had modified the machine after the accident. The Court held that the alternative ground for exclusion proffered by the District Judge, Rule 403, did not apply because the evidence presented no potential for confusion. The precautions taken by the employer were clearly available to the defendant at the time of manufacture, so there was no temporal distinction that the jury might overlook, and there was no dispute that the redesign was done in direct response to the plaintiff's accident and for the sole purpose of preventing the same kind of accident in the future. In an asbestos case, Blancha v. Raymark Indus., 972 F.2d 507 (3d Cir. 1992) , the plaintiffs' theory was that all asbestos could cause the decedent's mesothelioma; the defendant's expert indicated that asbestos products containing chrysotile did not cause mesothelioma. Reversing a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court held that the expert's testimony was relevant, given the theory advanced and the plaintiffs' burden of proof on proximate causation, and that the danger of confusion did not so clearly outweigh the probative value of the expert's testimony as to justify exclusion. In Herber v. Johns-Manville Corp., n24 the Court vacated a judgment for a worker who sued several asbestos suppliers but was awarded no damages by a jury. It held that the Trial Judge clearly erred in excluding under Rule 403 two types of evidence relevant to damages compensable under state law: evidence that the plaintiff would have to undergo preventative monitoring for cancer in the future, and evidence of the plaintiff's fear of future cancer.

Yarbrough v. Sturm, Ruger & Co., 964 F.2d 376 (5th Cir. 1992) : The Court reversed a judgment against the defendant manufacturer in a product liability action for injuries suffered when a pistol stolen by the infant plaintiff accidentally discharged. Excluding evidence that the gun was stolen, which was probative because of the resulting tendency to carry it in a careless, concealed manner predictably increasing the risk of harm, unfairly prevented the defendant from fully making its contributory fault defense. In Jackson v. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., n25 the Court reversed a part of a judgment against a wife whose husband was killed when a wheel rim exploded, finding that evidence of an alternative design, offered to demonstrate why the rim that caused the injury was defective, had been erroneously excluded. It also found that other evidence should have been admitted: evidence of other wheel components, which was relevant to the plaintiff's claim that a rim with several parts might end up mismatched; evidence of similar accidents; and evidence of various records of the defendants, even though some postdated the accident, since the records tended to show a long and continuous experience with certain tires and rims.

Laney v. Celotex Corp., 901 F.2d 1319 (6th Cir. 1990) : In a worker's action for personal injuries arising from alleged asbestos exposure, the Court reversed a verdict for the plaintiff on the ground that evidence of his exposure to other asbestos products should have been admitted to support the defendant's argument that its asbestos was not a substantial factor in causing the plaintiff's injuries. In Koloda v. General Motors Parts Div., n26 the Court reversed a judgment for an auto mechanic who sued for injuries allegedly arising out of his use of a lubricant and inhalation of its vapors. General Motors should have been permitted to offer evidence that there were no prior claims or accidents brought to its attention concerning the lubricant. The evidence was probative of GM's knowledge, which was important to the plaintiff's theory of a failure to warn, and there was no reason why the evidence would have been unfairly prejudicial.

[vi] Abuse of Discretion -- Exclusion of Evidence -- Prosecution Evidence

United States v. Gilbert, 229 F.3d 15 (1st Cir. 2000) : A nurse at a VA hospital was charged with capital murder after patients in her care died in suspicious circumstances. The prosecution theory was that she had injected the patients with drugs causing cardiac difficulties in order to gain attention, especially from a hospital police officer with whom she was having an affair. Before the trial the Judge granted an in limine motion to exclude, inter alia, evidence that the defendant had (a) made anonymous threatening calls to the hospital when she knew the officer would be answering the telephone, (b) harassed and threatened the officer after he ended their relationship and agreed to cooperate with authorities, and (c) one time blocked his car in his driveway and pleaded with him not to keep an appointment with investigators, and when he refused, followed him to the appointment and vandalized his car while he was being interviewed. On an interlocutory appeal, the Court affirmed all the rulings except the last. Since the Judge heard much of the evidence in the defendant's prior trial for making the threatening calls, it was within his discretion to conclude that most of the defendant's conduct was far more likely attributable to anger at the disloyal officer and other co-workers than to a quixotic attempt to head off the criminal investigation, and thus its probative value as consciousness of guilt was substantially outweighed by the risks of undue prejudice and misleading the jury. However, the Court found that the evidence regarding blocking the officer's car was more readily explainable as the product of an obstructive intent and therefore far more probative of a guilty conscience, and at the same time far less inflammatory, so it was an abuse of discretion to exclude the evidence.

United States v. Blyden, 964 F.2d 1375 (3d Cir. 1992) : The Court reversed a ruling in limine that evidence of an alleged assault for which the defendants had previously been acquitted could not be introduced in a prosecution for other offenses arising out of the same incident. The evidence was essential to the charge of gun possession during a crime of violence, so it was not "other crime" evidence and it had great probative value. In United States v. Gatto, 924 F.2d 491 (3d Cir. 1991) , the Court reversed a ruling that granted a defendant's motion in limine to suppress a prospective eyewitness' trial testimony because the witness had allegedly been hypnotized during the criminal investigation. Even if the witness had been hypnotized, the probative value of his identification was substantial and could not be significantly discounted by the prejudice resulting from possibly suggestive police procedures. In a Hobbs Act prosecution, United States v. Driggs, n27 a pretrial ruling precluded the government from introducing recorded conversations in which a union officer discussed payments to various public officials, unless they related to the defendant, who had been elected a Judge. The Court concluded that the ruling was an abuse of discretion, because the evidence tended to prove the union officer's payment was made to the defendant because of his official position. In our view, the ruling below was correct. The issue in the case was whether the defendant used his official position to obtain payment, and evidence of the union officer's intent, without evidence the defendant knew of that intent, was irrelevant and tended to confuse the officer's motive with the defendant's. In United States v. Clifford, n28 the government was not permitted to introduce correspondence in the defendant's handwriting to show stylistic similarities between it and threatening letters that allegedly were written by the defendant. The Court recognized the broad discretion that Rule 403 gives a Trial Judge, but found that the Judge had misconstrued the government's offer of proof and confused the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to convict with the question of the admissibility of the correspondence. The Court saw no reason "why jurors cannot examine the documents for themselves and consider the similarities between the documents along with the rest of the evidence presented by the government."

United States v. Hans, 684 F.2d 343 (6th Cir. 1982) : The government had obtained certain ledgers in which the defendant, a lawyer, had personally entered figures that the government claimed represented fees earned for workers' compensation services. To support its claim, the government secured the testimony of 60 of the defendant's clients, who indicated that they endorsed checks, which the defendant second-endorsed and cashed. The figures to the left of each client's name on the ledger coincided with the amounts that each client claimed had been paid to the lawyer. The government wanted to offer several hundred other checks that also had been second-endorsed by the defendant after being endorsed by clients whose names were in the ledger, but the Trial Judge excluded this evidence. The Court reversed, holding that the checks were relevant to prove gross receipts and that it could not be said that the evidence was substantially more prejudicial than probative.

United States v. Centracchio, 265 F.3d 518 (7th Cir. 2001) : In an official corruption RICO prosecution, the defense moved in limine to exclude a police officer's testimony that a deceased and unindicted coconspirator had attempted more than 20 years earlier to bribe him to install illegal gambling equipment in his town. The Judge excluded the evidence under Rule 403 on grounds that it was too remote in time, the declarant was deceased, it probably involved a different conspiracy because it was outside the towns where most of the corruption took place, and it was not probative. On interlocutory appeal, the Court reversed and remanded for a determination whether the evidence was properly admissible under the coconspirator exception. The evidence was probative, even though remote, because the charged conspiracy was alleged to have begun in 1978. The evidence showed an attempted (but unsuccessful) expansion of the charged conspiracy into a town other than one specifically named in the indictment, so it was an abuse of discretion to exclude the evidence as relating to a separate conspiracy. There was no indication why the declarant's death would create a danger of unfair prejudice, confusion, or misleading the jury. And the testimony was certainly probative of the existence and structure of the conspiracy and its objective of bribing law enforcement and public officials. The fact it tended to make the defendants look guilty was not unfairly prejudicial. In United States v. Mobley, 193 F.3d 492 (7th Cir. 1999) , a village mayor and her husband, the village's street superintendent, were charged with theft from the village. The Trial Judge granted a defense motion in limine to exclude evidence that the defendants' spending exceeded their combined lawful income. Reversing on an interlocutory appeal, the Court held that the fact the defendants had spent their extra resources on gambling, fur coats, and other extravagances had probative value on their motivation that was not substantially exceeded by any unduly prejudicial effect.

[c] Abuse of Discretion -- Exclusion of Party from Courtroom

Rubert-Torres v. Hospital San Pablo, Inc., 205 F.3d 472 (1st Cir. 2000) : In a medical malpractice action brought on behalf of a woman with cerebral palsy against the doctor who delivered her, the Trial Judge entered an order, without stating reasons, barring the plaintiff from the courthouse after she was briefly introduced to the pool of potential jurors before jury selection. Experts for both sides indicated that the plaintiff's appearance would be the clearest evidence on whether her affliction was caused genetically or by the circumstances of her delivery, but she was not allowed into the courtroom for a physical demonstration during the plaintiff's expert's testimony. The Court reversed a judgment for the defendant, finding it was an abuse of discretion to exclude the plaintiff totally, especially when the Judge had not stated the evidentiary rule relied upon, had not allowed argument on the plaintiff's objection to exclusion, and had not made findings concerning the prejudicial versus probative effect of the evidence. The Court noted that seeing the plaintiff would have been highly probative on the central issue in the case, and that any prejudicial effect could have been minimized by means less restrictive than entirely excluding the plaintiff from the courtroom.

[2] Acquittals and Dismissals

United States v. Candelaria-Silva, 166 F.3d 19 (1st Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed narcotics convictions, holding that there was no error in excluding defense evidence concerning the dismissal of certain local criminal charges related to conduct involved in the charged conspiracy. The Court reasoned that "[t]he reasons supporting exclusion of evidence about the dismissal of a prior prosecution are even stronger than those that support exclusion with respect to a prior acquittal," and that "cases are dismissed for many reasons unrelated to the defendant's guilt." In United States v. Marrero-Ortiz, 160 F.3d 768 (1st Cir. 1998) , a drug conspiracy case, the Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in barring the defendant from eliciting on cross-examination of a prosecution witness that local charges related to the defendant's arrest for weapons possession had been dismissed. Because cases are dismissed for a variety of reasons, many of which are unrelated to culpability, such evidence ordinarily does not prove innocence and may have served to confuse the jury rather than assist it.

United States v. Gricco, 277 F.3d 339 (3d Cir. 2002) : Affirming convictions for tax fraud arising from a scheme to skim parking lot revenues, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence that the defendants had been acquitted in a state prosecution for theft in the scheme, since the danger of jury confusion would greatly outweigh the evidence's limited probative value. In United States v. Blyden, 964 F.2d 1375 (3d Cir. 1992) , the Court reversed a ruling in limine that evidence of an alleged assault for which the defendants had previously been acquitted could not be introduced in a prosecution for other offenses arising out of the same incident. The evidence was essential to the charge of gun possession during a crime of violence, so it was not "other crime" evidence and it had great probative value. Any argument that it would be prejudicial essentially restated the double jeopardy and collateral estoppel claims previously rejected by the Court. It was, therefore, error to exclude the evidence on the possession count; as for the other counts, rulings would have to await the trial context.

United States v. Posada-Rios, 158 F.3d 832 (5th Cir. 1998) : A defendant in a drug trafficking case was charged with having falsely denied on a visa application that she "[was] or has been a trafficker in any controlled substance." Affirming, the Court found no error in the exclusion of evidence that she had been acquitted of state drug charges arising from her delivery of 40 kg of cocaine. The question for the jury was whether she had falsely denied trafficking, not whether she had denied a conviction, and the acquittal did not establish innocence but only the prosecutor's failure to prove beyond a reasonable doubt at least one element of the charge.

Estate of Moreland v. Dieter, 395 F.3d 747 (7th Cir. 2005) : Affirming a judgment for the plaintiffs in a § 1983 action arising from the death of an inmate in custody, the Court found no abuse of discretion when videotaped interviews with the defendant deputy sheriffs were admitted without disclosing to the jury that the criminal investigation to which the interviews related had been concluded with acquittal of the defendants. Evidence of an acquittal in a criminal action is generally irrelevant and inadmissible in a civil case involving the same incident, because of the differing burdens of proof.

Arizona v. Elmer, 21 F.3d 331 (9th Cir. 1994) : In a state prosecution of a Border Patrol agent for shooting aliens crossing the Mexican border, the Court held it was not an abuse of discretion to exclude, on the defendant's in limine motion, evidence of a fatal shooting three months later for which the defendant had been charged and acquitted. The evidence was not relevant to any issue in the case and, while the record of balancing was not clearly articulated, the evidence would be extremely prejudicial, in all probability seizing and holding the jury's attention at trial. In Borunda v. Richmond, n29 a civil rights action brought against the arresting officers after the plaintiffs had been acquitted of criminal charges, the plaintiffs introduced evidence of the acquittals solely to show the damages they had incurred. The Court said that, although it would have been inclined to exclude the evidence altogether because of its potential for prejudice and confusion, the Trial Court did not abuse its "very broad" discretion in admitting the evidence with limiting instructions and instructions about the differing burdens of proof.

[3] Appellate Review Standard

United States v. Akers, 702 F.2d 1145 (D.C. Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed a drug conviction, finding no error in the exclusion of photos of the crime area offered by the defense. The photos were excluded on the ground that they did not reflect the view of the officers who testified concerning their observations from a second-story view. Although the photos were admitted in a first trial in which the jury was unable to reach a verdict, the Court found no requirement that they must be admitted in a second trial. A concurring opinion suggested that when evidence admitted in one trial is excluded in a second trial, the Trial Judge should explain the reasoning carefully and the decision to exclude the evidence should be subjected to heightened judicial review.

United States v. Brooks, 145 F.3d 446 (1st Cir. 1998) : In a perjury prosecution arising out of a grand jury's murder investigation, the Trial Judge granted an eve-of-trial in limine motion by the defendant to exclude any evidence of the target's animosity toward the murder victim. The Court vacated the ruling on an interlocutory appeal, because the Judge had not permitted the government to file an opposition or to be heard and had made no specific findings, even though the evidentiary question was highly nuanced and the correct answer was not self-evident. In those circumstances the abuse-of-discretion standard applied by the Court was not as forgiving as in the ordinary case.

United States v. Robinson, 560 F.2d 507 (2d Cir. 1977) (en banc): The en banc decision of the Court referred to the "remarkable coincidence" of possession of a.38 caliber gun some weeks after a bank robbery and held that it was admissible to corroborate the government's chief witness and to show an opportunity to commit the robbery. Emphasizing the broad discretion afforded the Trial Judge in making Rule 403 rulings, the Court decided that it would be reluctant to reverse on the basis of a cold record unless it is convinced that the Judge acted "arbitrarily or irrationally." Judge Oakes' dissenting opinion preferred a less deferential "abuse of discretion under the circumstances" standard. Judge Gurfein, who concurred in Judge Oakes' opinion, emphasized his view that the test of appellate review adopted by the majority was far too narrow. The Court reiterated the Robinson language in United States v. Schiff, n30 but reversed a Trial Judge who admitted a videotape of a talk show in which negative comments about the defendant were made.

Rovegno v. Geppert Bros., 677 F.2d 327 (3d Cir. 1982) : The Court upheld the exclusion of evidence that the driver of a truck involved in an accident had a blood alcohol level that plaintiff's expert said rendered him unfit to drive, saying that its standard of review was "abuse of discretion" and it could find none. In our view, the evidence was obviously probative and it is difficult to see what unfair prejudice it would have worked to the defendant. The standard of abuse of discretion should be utilized so as to assure that a Trial Judge at least had a good reason for excluding evidence that on its face would seem important.

United States v. Johnson, 558 F.2d 744 (5th Cir. 1977) : Affirming convictions for making and subscribing false and fraudulent corporate income tax returns, the Court held that a Trial Judge's ruling balancing the probative value of evidence against its prejudicial effect may not be disturbed unless the decision was clearly erroneous.

United States v. Beasley, 809 F.2d 1273 (7th Cir. 1987) : The Court held it was an abuse of discretion in a narcotics prosecution to admit evidence of the defendant's prior narcotics activity. The Court observed that "[a] flaw in the process is easier to detect than is a flaw in the result -- and over the run of cases the consistent operation of process is more important, too." The Court found that the pretrial hearing on the bad acts evidence was "perfunctory" and that the record indicated that the Trial Court had not carefully assessed whether the evidence would be probative for a permissible purpose; nor had it demonstrated "an effort to determine the likely effect of the evidence in poisoning Beasley's character." The Court emphasized that it would probably not have reversed if the record indicated that the evidence was admitted after the Trial Judge carefully considered its probative value and prejudicial effect.

Borunda v. Richmond, 885 F.2d 1384 (9th Cir. 1988) : In a civil rights action brought against the arresting officers after the plaintiffs had been acquitted of criminal charges, the plaintiffs introduced evidence of the acquittals solely to show the damages they had incurred. The Court said that, although it would have been inclined to exclude the evidence altogether because of its potential for prejudice and confusion, the Trial Court did not abuse its "very broad" discretion in admitting it with limiting instructions and instructions about the differing burdens of proof.

United States v. Cunningham, 194 F.3d 1186 (11th Cir. 1999) : The defendant was convicted for knowingly transporting and disposing of hazardous waste that had been stored at his farm. At trial he offered evidence that in 1993 soil testing at the farm did not indicate any characteristics of toxicity or any listed waste. The government responded that he was only charged with transporting the waste from the farm in 1989, so the subsequent condition of the farm soil was irrelevant. The defense countered that the government had introduced a significant amount of evidence regarding the poor condition of the farm, which opened the door to evidence that would rebut the prejudicial impression created by the government. The Court said that they might have admitted the 1993 test results had they been sitting as District Judges, but they found no abuse of discretion in excluding the evidence, since there was no proffer that the 1993 soil tests would indicate the defendant had been properly storing and recycling the material in 1989, which would have rebutted the government's assertion that the material was not actually being recycled as the defendant claimed. In United States v. Terzado-Madruga, 897 F.2d 1099 (11th Cir. 1990) , the Court rejected the appellant's arguments that the government improperly introduced highly inflammatory evidence under the guise of other acts, noting that the Trial Judge has broad discretion to admit evidence if it has any tendency to prove or disprove a fact in issue and only limited discretion to exclude it on grounds of unfair prejudice, so a decision to admit probative evidence will not be disturbed on appeal absent a clear showing of abuse of that discretion.

[4] Arbitration Decisions

Rubens v. Mason, 387 F.3d 183 (2d Cir. 2004) : Rubens' claim that she was injured by using the Dalkon Shield was denied in a proceeding before a single arbitrator. In Rubens' subsequent action for legal malpractice in prosecuting the claim before the arbitrator, the Judge granted summary judgment for the law firm, relying heavily on an affidavit in which the arbitrator stated that none of the alleged acts of malpractice -- either misfeasance or nonfeasance--had or would have affected his decision on the merits. Reversing, the Court held that the arbitrator's affidavit would not be admissible at trial under Rule 403 because it was "subjective" and "had the potential to usurp the factfinder's responsibilities in the trial within the malpractice trial." We question this result. The arbitrator's affidavit was probative to show that there were no damages suffered as the result of any malpractice; if the arbitrator's decision would be the same even with no malpractice, then Rubens would not satisfy her burden of proving that the malpractice made a difference.

Graef v. Chemical Leaman Corp., 106 F.3d 112 (5th Cir. 1997) : Reversing a judgment for the plaintiff in a retaliatory discharge case, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to exclude an arbitration award denying the employee's grievance. The arbitrator found that the employer had acted within its contractual rights in removing the plaintiff from a seniority list, because the employee had failed a physical examination. This was the same defense interposed by the employer in the civil action, in response to the plaintiff's allegation that he had been denied seniority because he had filed a workers' compensation claim. The Court found that the arbitration award was probative because it made the defendant's non-retaliatory reason for the discharge more believable, and the evidence was not unduly prejudicial. In United States v. Fisher, 106 F.3d 622 (5th Cir. 1997) , the defendants were charged with a fraudulent scheme involving, inter alia, repurchase agreements with some professional athletes. Reversing their convictions, the Court held it was error to exclude evidence that they had prevailed in arbitration proceedings by the athletes to enforce the agreements. Whether the defendants were obliged to repurchase the athletes' interests went to the heart of the case, and the arbitrator's unexplained decision was not so inherently confusing or prejudicial that the defense should have been precluded from introducing it. Furthermore, the decision was not being offered to prove the defendants' innocence, but to show that the legal position taken against the athletes was not taken in bad faith.

Elsayed Mukhtar v. California State Univ., Hayward, 299 F.3d 1053 (9th Cir. 2002) : Vacating a judgment in favor of a professor who alleged racial discrimination in the decision to deny him tenure, the Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that, after two rounds of arbitration, an arbitrator ordered that the plaintiff be granted tenure because the university did not have reasonable support for its decision. The Court concluded that "[w]hile we agree that the prejudice of having the jury hear this marginally relevant evidence would normally outweigh the value of providing the jury with the case's entire factual history, the jury repeatedly heard that a state court had vacated the arbitrator's decision." With the full story before it, "the jury was able to give the arbitrator's decision the weight it merited -- very little."

[5] Attorney as Witness

United States v. Ziesman, 409 F.3d 941 (8th Cir. 2005) : Affirming convictions for manufacturing methamphetamine and making a false statement to a federal agent, the Court found no abuse of discretion in permitting the government to call the defendant's former lawyer to testify to a conversation he overheard between a government agent and the defendant. The defendant disputed the agent's version of the testimony, making the former lawyer the only corroborative witness available on the false statement charge. The Court agreed that "the mere appearance of an attorney testifying against a former client is distasteful and should only be used in rare instances." But the Court concluded that this was "one of those rare instances" in which the testimony was important enough to be admitted, and it found nothing in the former attorney's testimony that would have signaled to the jury the attorney's belief in the defendant's guilt.

[6] Balancing

[a] Availability of Alternatives

Old Chief v. United States, 519 U.S. 172 (1997) : This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 403.02[6]-[11].

United States v. Lachman, 48 F.3d 586 (1st Cir. 1995) : Deciding an interlocutory appeal of a pretrial ruling that excluded 13 government exhibits from an Export Administration Act prosecution, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding the evidence under Rule 403 since the exhibits posed genuine dangers of prejudice and confusion. The defendants were charged only with exporting technical equipment to the Indian government without a license, but the exhibits indicated that the defendants knew that the Indian government was going to use the equipment in order to make nuclear missiles, and a jury "could easily regard the defendants' alleged conduct as highly unattractive even if it turned out to be technically legal." While the exhibits had some probative value as to the defendants' scienter, the government had less dangerous evidence available to prove this point. Under Rule 403, "it is plainly pertinent whether a litigant has some alternative way to establish a fact that involves no (or at least a lesser) risk of prejudice or confusion."

United States v. Belk, 346 F.3d 305 (2d Cir. 2003) : In a felon firearm possession case, the defendant asked the Trial Judge to bifurcate the issues of possession and predicate felony, with the former issue tried first, so that the jury would not be prejudiced by the fact that the defendant had a criminal record. Finding no abuse of discretion in the Judge's refusal to bifurcate, the Court reasoned that the existence of a felony is a critical element of the crime of felon gun possession, as it is not per se illegal to possess a gun unless the possessor is a felon. As such, proof of the felony element, "when accompanied by a proper curative instruction and limited to the fact of the conviction itself, is by definition not prejudicial" so "a district court cannot err by failing to take additional measures, such as bifurcation, intended to mitigate any asserted prejudice."

United States v. Merino-Balderrama, 146 F.3d 758 (9th Cir. 1998) : During a traffic stop of the defendant, the police found film boxes, the covers of which showed children engaged in sex acts. The boxes contained films that the defendant claimed he never viewed. To prove scienter at the defendant's trial for possession of child pornography, the government introduced the film boxes and played the films to the jury. The Court found that the playing of the films was reversible error, under the Supreme Court's analysis in Old Chief v. United States. The films were less probative of scienter than their box covers, since the government never proved that the defendant had actually viewed the films, whereas it was clear that he had viewed the boxes. Also, the films carried a greater potential for unfair prejudice than did their packaging. The Judge's limiting instruction did little to alleviate the prejudice, because it gave no indication of how the films were to be used, and the jury was never instructed to disregard the films if it found that the defendant never viewed them.

[b] Balancing -- Bounds of Discretion To Admit

United States v. Li, 206 F.3d 78 (1st Cir. 2000) : In a prosecution for smuggling Chinese nationals into the United States by boat, the defendants objected to evidence of the deplorable conditions on the boat, including the fact that many of the passengers were beaten. The Court recognized that the evidence "had the potential to inflame the jury against those who created and controlled this inhumane environment," but it was also probative. The statute required proof that the defendants engaged in smuggling for a profit; the evidence of shipboard conditions tended to prove the minimal costs to the defendant. And the evidence of beatings was critical in proving the roles of several members of the conspiracy. The Court concluded that "[t]his case simply does not present the type of extraordinarily compelling circumstances that would warrant our upsetting the balance already struck by the district court."

United States v. Salameh, 152 F.3d 88 (2d Cir. 1998) : Affirming convictions arising out of the 1993 terrorist bombing of the World Trade Center, the Court found no error in the admission of a "terrorist kit" seized from one of the conspirators when he tried to enter the country. The "terrorist kit" included such things as instruction books on how to make explosives, a videotape containing a chemistry lesson on explosives, and a book urging acts of terrorism against the enemies of Islam. The Court held that the materials established a link between the conspirators, and provided the jury with "background and an explanation of the understanding or intent with which certain acts were performed." While the materials were prejudicial, there was no abuse of discretion in concluding that the significant probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. The Court also found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony and photographs concerning the injuries, some fatal, suffered by the victims of the bombing. This evidence was probative of the nature and location of the explosion that killed the victims, which the defendants disputed at trial, and its prejudicial effect did not substantially outweigh the probative value.

United States v. Wilson, 355 F.3d 358 (5th Cir. 2003) : Affirming drug convictions, the Court found no abuse of discretion when evidence that one of the defendants physically abused his female coconspirators was admitted, since it was probative of their fear of him -- and thus of the likelihood that they acted at his behest when picking up money -- and this probative value was not substantially outweighed by the risk that the defendant would be convicted based on his behavior toward the women.

United States v. Cope, 312 F.3d 757 (6th Cir. 2002) : Affirming convictions of two brothers for attempted murder and firearms violations, the Court upheld the admission of three guns recovered from the defendants' father's house and one gun found in one defendant's yard. Although the government could not show that the bullets in the incident were fired from any particular gun, the Court held that the guns could properly have been admitted to prove that one of the brothers had access to the type of gun used in the shooting. It found that "[a] closer issue" was presented by the Trial Judge's permitting the guns to be left on display during the trial, despite testimony by a government ballistics expert that any of 50 to 100 million guns could have been used in the shooting. The Court ultimately concluded that the defendants did not show that the continued display of the guns affected their substantial rights.

United States v. Terzado-Madruga, 897 F.2d 1099 (11th Cir. 1990) : The Court rejected the appellant's arguments that the government introduced highly inflammatory evidence under the guise of other acts, and noted that the Trial Judge has broad discretion to admit evidence if it has any tendency to prove or disprove a fact in issue and only limited discretion to exclude it on grounds of unfair prejudice, so a decision to admit probative evidence will not be disturbed on appeal absent a clear showing of abuse of that discretion. In United States v. Betancourt, n31 the Court noted that Rule 403 exclusion is an extraordinary remedy that should be used only sparingly.

[c] Balancing -- Bounds of Discretion To Exclude

United States v. Gilbert, 229 F.3d 15 (1st Cir. 2000) : A nurse at a VA hospital was charged with capital murder after patients in her care died in suspicious circumstances. The prosecution theory was that she had injected the patients with drugs causing cardiac difficulties in order to gain attention, especially from a hospital police officer with whom she was having an affair. Before the trial the Judge granted an in limine motion to exclude, inter alia, evidence that the defendant had attempted to murder her husband by giving him a poisonous injection. On interlocutory appeal, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the ruling. The probative value of the evidence was "very much open to question," in both the lack of similarity of circumstances between the alleged attempt and the crimes charged and the fact that the evidence consisted almost entirely of allegations by the husband made months later, after he and the defendant were engaged in a bitter divorce and custody dispute. Furthermore, the evidence would not be very probative on the issues likely to be litigated in the case -- the intent of the perpetrator and the knowledge and opportunity of the defendant were not seriously disputed, and inferring causation from the uncharged crimes would require the impermissible use of a propensity inference. Given that the defendant disputed the incident, its presentation would require a mini-trial, taking time and injecting collateral issues, such as the background of the divorce proceedings to explain the husband's hostility. And the inflammatory nature of the evidence made it highly susceptible to being misused by the jury. In Williams v. Drake, 146 F.3d 44 (1st Cir. 1998) , a prisoner brought an action against two correctional officers, claiming the use of excessive force in a dayroom scuffle. The prisoner was charged by the prison disciplinary board with inflicting bodily harm on the officers, and he eventually pleaded guilty to that charge. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of the guilty plea; its probative value was minimal, and the potential for confusion was high, because of the procedural and substantive differences between a disciplinary board hearing and a jury trial. Moreover, the plaintiff claimed that he pleaded guilty because the disciplinary board was biased, so introducing the plea would have required delving into the plaintiff's motivation, which could have created "an unwarranted sideshow, drawing attention from the main event." In Brown v. Trustees of Boston Univ., n32 the plaintiff, suing for breach of contract and sexual discrimination after she was denied tenure, offered testimony of several professors comparing her qualifications with those of other faculty considered for tenure at the defendant University. The Court held that even though the professors' testimony was not in the file and thus not available to the University when it decided her case, it was relevant proof of pretext because it showed that the qualifications of others granted tenure were below the plaintiff's known qualifications. Because admitting such comparative evidence presents the risk of improperly substituting a tenure decision with a judicial determination, the evidence must be so compelling as to permit a reasonable finding of one-sidedness going beyond a mere difference in judgment, as in this case.

United States v. George, 266 F.3d 52 (2d Cir. 2001) : In a prosecution for making a false statement in a passport application, the Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding a videotape of the defendant's wedding ceremony, offered to show that the defendant's slow and unresponsive behavior was consistent with the problems he had in acquiring a passport. There was no dispute that the defendant was married, and the Trial Judge could reasonably have determined that the tape presented a danger of creating undue sympathy for the defendant.

United States v. Mejia, 909 F.2d 242 (7th Cir. 1990) : In affirming a conviction for possession of cocaine with intent to distribute, the Court noted that it is not reversible error to admit irrelevant details that have no probative value but do not prejudice a defendant.

United States v. McVeigh, 153 F.3d 1166 (10th Cir. 1998) : The defendant, convicted of the Oklahoma City Federal Building bombing, claimed error in the exclusion of testimony from a government agent concerning a group of right-wing terrorists who were engaged in building explosives and who had discussed plans to bomb buildings in Oklahoma, including the Federal Building in Oklahoma City. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion, since the probative value of the evidence was "slight because of its highly generalized and speculative nature." Moreover, the evidence had the potential of creating significant confusion, because it would have required the government to attempt to disprove McVeigh's "nebulous" allegations, tending to lead the jury away from the question whether McVeigh bombed the building. There was also a risk of prejudice, because the evidence would "invite the jury to blame absent, unrepresented individuals and groups for whom there often may be strong underlying emotional responses." Affirming the admission of a document in a suit alleging fraudulent misrepresentation, K-B Trucking Co. v. Riss Int'l Co., n33 the Court observed that exclusion of evidence under Rule 403 is an extraordinary remedy that is to be used sparingly.

[d] Balancing -- Careful Consideration Required

United States v. Doe, 903 F.2d 16 (D.C. Cir. 1990) : A black American and two Jamaicans were jointly charged with drug offenses. The Court reversed their convictions, in part because a detective was permitted to testify to the modus operandi of Jamaican drug dealers and how the market "has been taken over basically by Jamaicans." The Trial Judge had not balanced the severely prejudicial effect of the references, but had admitted the testimony solely because defense counsel had inquired on voir dire whether jurors would have greater difficulty affording Jamaicans a fair trial.

United States v. Delia, 944 F.2d 1010 (2d Cir. 1991) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the defendant had told the principal prosecution witness he was a member of an organized crime family, as the careful balancing of the probative value of the evidence against its prejudicial effect, done only after the witness' cross-examination had been completed and her credibility vigorously challenged, warranted the decision to admit the evidence.

United States v. Beasley, 809 F.2d 1273 (7th Cir. 1987) : The Court held it was an abuse of discretion in a narcotics prosecution to admit evidence of the defendant's prior narcotics activity. It found that the pretrial hearing on the bad acts evidence was "perfunctory" and that the record indicated that the Trial Court had not carefully assessed whether the evidence would be probative for a permissible purpose; nor had it demonstrated "an effort to determine the likely effect of the evidence in poisoning Beasley's character." The Court emphasized that it would probably not have reversed if the record indicated that the evidence was admitted after careful consideration of its probative value and prejudicial effect.

Blind-Doan v. Sanders, 291 F.3d 1079 (9th Cir. 2002) : An arrestee sued a police sergeant, claiming that he sexually assaulted her in a jail cell. Overturning a judgment for the sergeant, the Court found a failure to make a clear record justifying exclusion of evidence regarding alleged improper sexual conduct by the sergeant toward a different detainee, which was offered to rebut his testimony that he had no "opportunity" to assault the plaintiff because another officer was a witness to his conduct. The Court concluded that "[d]etermination of what would have been 'unduly prejudicial' requires a delicate balancing," and that "[i]n the first instance, the balancing must be undertaken by the trial court and, as far as we can see, was not undertaken here." A dissenting Judge did "not agree that a district court must explicitly set out its thought processes on the record, even if it is 'important' that it 'make a clear record concerning its decision.' "

[e] Balancing -- Factors To Be Considered

United States v. Pelullo, 14 F.3d 881 (3d Cir. 1994) : In the second trial of a fraud and RICO case, the judgment of conviction on one of the fraud counts, which had been affirmed on appeal, was introduced to prove a predicate act. Reversing because the prior conviction was given preclusive effect, the Court noted that there had not been the required balancing of appropriate factors, such as the value of the conviction for the government, the relatively slight burden of re-proving the facts on which the conviction was based, and the potential prejudicial effect of admitting the judgment; on the remand, the Trial Court was directed to conduct a balancing analysis and state its reasons on the record for admitting or excluding the judgment of conviction.

United States v. Pizarro, 717 F.2d 336 (7th Cir. 1983) : The Court held that when a defendant raised an entrapment defense in a prosecution for selling heroin, the government was properly permitted to question him as to his supplier. Evidence that the defendant changed suppliers shed light on his disposition to commit the offense. The Court rejected an argument that the defendant should not have had to identify the supplier because he was afraid that a codefendant would seek reprisals against him. The Court noted that any dilemma in which the defendant found himself arose out of his own decision to become involved in illegal activities and was unsympathetic to the defendant's argument that his fear was a "prejudicial factor" to be weighed against the probative value of the answers sought by the government.

[f] Balancing -- Generally

United States v. Bradshaw, 935 F.2d 295 (D.C. Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed a bank robbery conviction, noting that admission of prior convictions where sanity is the only issue presents different considerations from the usual case. Probativeness is generally unquestionable, since the insanity defense directly puts state of mind in issue, and a prior criminal record is highly relevant to the defendant's appreciation of the unacceptability of his conduct; there is no risk of primary prejudicial effect, since the defendant does not deny commission of the act; and there is a possibility that the evidence will prove prejudicial to the government by permitting the inference that the defendant is insane, since he continues to commit the same easily-detectable crime. Although the Trial Judge's ruling was terse, it appeared from the record as a whole that the relevant factors were considered.

Doty v. Sewall, 908 F.2d 1053 (1st Cir. 1990) : In an action by a union member for mistreatment by union officials, the Court held that the emotional appeal of the plaintiff's Vietnam experience did not significantly outweigh its relevance on the issue of damages. It also found no abuse of discretion in allowing the plaintiff to testify he knew one of the defendants carried a gun to union meetings. The evidence made it less probable the plaintiff had assaulted the official, as the official contended.

Hurt v. Coyne Cylinder Co., 956 F.2d 1319 (6th Cir. 1992) : In reversing a product liability judgment for the defendants on other grounds, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding a film offered by the plaintiffs. There was nothing improper in the Trial Judge's making a subjective determination that the film would be prejudicial, where there was no indication that the Judge's reaction was idiosyncratic and there is an obvious possibility of prejudice from a dramatic film that resembles but does not depict the accident in question.

United States v. McKinney, 954 F.2d 471 (7th Cir. 1992) : In a prosecution for murder in a prison, the government was permitted to introduce some evidence that the gang to which the defendant belonged had committed other murders. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion, as the government's theory was that the murder resulted from a gang contract; thus, how the gang operated was relevant to the charge, and the Trial Judge had been careful to limit the testimony about the gang and to preclude testimony implicating the defendant in any other murders.

United States v. Fleming, 215 F.3d 930 (9th Cir. 2000) : The defendant had filed a lien on all of the property owned by a Federal Judge and his wife, after the Judge dismissed the defendant's civil action for failure to state a claim. At the defendant's trial for attempting to influence a Federal Judge in the discharge of his duties, both the Judge and his wife testified that they became concerned and upset when they were notified that the lien had been filed. The Court found no error in admitting the testimony. The fact that the Judge and his wife were upset and concerned by the defendant's actions tended to prove that the defendant acted with the intent to influence the Judge -- an intent that was an element of the offense charged. The fact that the Judge and his wife were credible, sympathetic witnesses did not mean that their testimony was unfairly prejudicial to the defendant. Affirming fraud and conspiracy convictions in United States v. Mende, 43 F.3d 1298 (9th Cir. 1995) , the Court found no error in admitting evidence that Mende's codefendants were aware that he had been previously involved in a fraudulent scheme similar to that with which all the defendants were charged. The evidence was probative to rebut the codefendants' arguments that they lacked knowledge that Mende's companies were fraudulent. Any prejudice to Mende was lessened by a limiting instruction. The Court stressed that Rule 403 is "an extraordinary remedy to be used sparingly" and that "the danger of prejudice must not merely outweigh the probative value of the evidence, but must substantially outweigh it."

Ross v. Buckeye Cellulose Corp., 980 F.2d 648 (11th Cir. 1993) : In an employment discrimination action, evidence that managers who later worked at the plant had made racially derogatory remarks was excluded on the ground that it would open the door to further evidence about another of the defendant's plants, thereby substantially and unnecessarily prolonging the trial. The Court held that although the evidence may have been the "smoking gun" on the disparate treatment issue, there was no clear abuse of discretion where, even after the Trial Court indicated its willingness to admit the evidence if it were significant, plaintiffs' counsel did not highlight the significance of the evidence.

[g] Balancing -- Opportunity To Be Heard

United States v. Brooks, 145 F.3d 446 (1st Cir. 1998) : The Court vacated an in limine ruling excluding government evidence in a prosecution for perjury and obstruction of justice. The Trial Judge had granted the defense motion without permitting the prosecution to be heard. The Court held it was an abuse of discretion to make a "hair-trigger evidentiary determination" in a manner that "precluded reasoned consideration." The case was remanded for further proceeding before a different Judge.

[h] Balancing -- Requirement of Record

United States v. Petrov, 747 F.2d 824 (2d Cir. 1984) : Reviewing obscenity convictions, the Court stated that, in assessing the community standards in an obscenity case, comparable material can be viewed as relevant under Rule 401. The Court emphasized, however, that Rule 403 should be used to carefully balance the value of comparable material against the dangers of admitting it. It added that "[e]ffective appellate review of such an issue requires the Trial Court to explain its decision. This is particularly so when the Trial Court decides an evidentiary question under Rule 403 ... ."

United States v. Eufrasio, 935 F.2d 553 (3d Cir. 1991) : Appellants challenging RICO convictions asserted that Rule 403 objections to evidence of uncharged Mafia crimes had been made by motions in limine and that the Trial Judge had erred by not articulating the balance between probative value and prejudicial effect; the government asserted any Rule 403 errors had been waived by a failure to object explicitly when the evidence was introduced at trial. The Court held that the failure to articulate the balance was not per se reversible error. If the in limine motions did not constitute specific objections, the Trial Judge was not required to strike the balance on the record sua sponte. If the motions were the equivalent to a specific objection, the Appellate Court must decide whether the required balance was implicitly performed and, if not, must perform the balance itself. Repeating its injunction that Trial Judges should make the balancing explicit, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence in this case. See also United States v. Long, n34 in which the Court likewise observed that "[w]here an objection does invoke Rule 403, the trial judge should record his balancing analysis to the extent that his exercise of discretion may be fairly reviewed on appeal. However, where Rule 403 is not invoked, the trial judge's balancing will be subsumed in his ruling."

Blind-Doan v. Sanders, 291 F.3d 1079 (9th Cir. 2002) : An arrestee sued a police sergeant claiming that he sexually assaulted her in a jail cell. Overturning a judgment for the sergeant, the Court found a failure to make a clear record justifying exclusion of evidence regarding alleged improper sexual conduct by the sergeant toward a different detainee, which was offered to rebut his testimony that he had no "opportunity" to assault the plaintiff because another officer was a witness to his conduct. The Court concluded that "[d]etermination of what would have been 'unduly prejudicial' requires a delicate balancing," and that "[i]n the first instance, the balancing must be undertaken by the trial court and, as far as we can see, was not undertaken here." A dissenting Judge did "not agree that a district court must explicitly set out its thought processes on the record, even if it is 'important' that it 'make a clear record concerning its decision.' "

[7] Bench Trials

Schultz v. Butcher, 24 F.3d 626 (4th Cir. 1994) : The Court reversed a judgment against the owner of a large boat in a personal injury action because evidence that the operators of the small boat in which the plaintiff was riding had been drinking was improperly excluded. In a bench trial, exclusion of unfairly prejudicial evidence is a useless procedure because the Judge is capable of rejecting any improper inferences; here, exclusion of the evidence prevented the large boat owner from fully developing a material issue.

Buscaglia v. United States, 25 F.3d 530 (7th Cir. 1994) : Summary judgment was granted against the plaintiff in a slip-and-fall case brought under the Federal Tort Claims Act, after the Trial Judge rejected an affidavit from the plaintiff's expert which concluded that the tile on which the plaintiff slipped was unreasonably slippery for use in public buildings. The Judge reasoned that under Rule 403 the expert's testimony was only marginally probative and was unduly prejudicial because of the "allure of scientific jargon and a witness with an advanced degree." Finding "clear error on the basis of an incorrect weighing of the relevant factors," the Court noted that the Trial Court erred because it had assumed that the case would be tried to a jury, whereas "the trier of fact in FTCA cases is the district court judge," so the prejudice factor should weigh "far less heavily" than it would in a jury case.

[8] Bodily Exhibitions

Allen v. Seacoast Prods., Inc., 623 F.2d 355 (5th Cir. 1980) : The Court upheld a ruling allowing an injured seaman to remove and replace his artificial eye in front of the jury.

Harris v. Illinois-California Express, Inc., 687 F.2d 1361 (10th Cir. 1982) : In a wrongful death action, the Court indicated that it might have been improper for the Trial Judge to permit physical identification of the decedent's daughter to the jury, but it found that any error was harmless. In United States v. Lowe, n35 a prosecution for kidnapping an infant, the Court held it was not an abuse of discretion to permit the government to bring the tiny infant into the courtroom for identification by the mother, despite the fact that the defendant offered to stipulate as to identity.

[9] Child Party as Witness

Trevino v. Gates, 99 F.3d 911 (9th Cir. 1996) : The Court affirmed a judgment granting only nominal damages for the plaintiff, the daughter of a man killed by the Los Angeles police during a robbery. It held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the testimony of the five-year-old plaintiff since she could not meaningfully testify as to the distress she had suffered in the past or would suffer in the future. Any probative value of testimony about her impressions of how her father died was outweighed by the clear prejudicial effect of a sympathetic child who knew nothing of the circumstances of the death. The Judge had permitted a psychiatrist who examined the child to testify to her emotional distress.

[10] Civil Rights Cases

[a] Arrestee's or Prisoner's Evidence

United States v. Williams, 343 F.3d 423 (5th Cir. 2003) : Affirming the civil rights conviction of a deputy sheriff for shooting an unarmed arrestee in the back, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the victim was permitted to testify that he fled from the defendant because he knew the defendant had previously shot another man. Although the defendant argued that the victim's state of mind was irrelevant, the Court concluded that the victim's knowledge or belief about the defendant was relevant in assessing whether the victim would have acted as the defendant claimed or as the government claimed. The Court concluded that the testimony was not unduly prejudicial because "[l]aw enforcement officers must shoot suspects sometimes, and the jury just as easily could have believed that the prior shooting was justified and that [the victim's] fear was unfounded."

Vance v. Peters, 97 F.3d 987 (7th Cir. 1996) : In a prisoner's § 1983 action for excessive force and deliberate indifference to medical needs, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding a hearing officer's final report, which concluded that the corrections officer had used excessive force and recommended a twenty-day suspension. Given that the evidence considered by the hearing officer had already been admitted at the trial, there was a risk that the jury would be confused by and give inordinate weight to the conclusion, which was not based on Eighth Amendment criteria.

[b] Civil Rights Cases -- Guard's or Officer's Evidence

Stevenson v. District of Columbia Metro. Police Dep't, 248 F.3d 1187 (D.C. Cir. 2001) : When the plaintiff was asked by police officers to exit the car he was driving, he instead attempted to drive it away, hitting an officer. His § 1983 action for injuries suffered in the ensuing hail of bullets resulted in a judgment for the defendants. Affirming, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant's companion was carrying a semiautomatic weapon. The plaintiff argued that the evidence was irrelevant to the reasonableness of the officers' actions because they did not know before the shooting that the companion was armed. However, the Court found that it tended to support the proposition that, as a convicted felon on parole in the presence of a firearm, the plaintiff was intent on escaping at all costs and in so doing placed the officers at risk.

Palmquist v. Selvik, 111 F.3d 1332 (7th Cir. 1997) : The defendants, sued for police use of excessive force in making an arrest, argued that the plaintiff's decedent had a "death wish" and sought "suicide by police." The Court held there was no error in excluding evidence of the victim's "mental unraveling" in the six months before he died, as the issue in a case like this is the reasonableness of the police conduct and the only relevant evidence is the facts and circumstances known to the officers at the time of the incident. Evidence of the victim's prior mental state would tend to shift the focus from his actions to his condition, prejudicially overemphasizing the likelihood that he acted in a manner that justified the officers' reaction. The Court noted that evidence of the victim's intoxication and marijuana possession a few hours before the incident might have been admissible, but its exclusion could be viewed as cumulative or as harmless error. The Court also concluded that the evidence of the victim's mental state could have been admissible during the damages phase of the trial, as it was directly relevant to his life expectancy, but the defendants did not preserve the argument. One Judge disagreed with the Circuit's narrow approach to the evidence relevant in excessive force cases, especially as applied in cases like this. In Wilson v. Groaning, 25 F.3d 581 (7th Cir. 1994) , a prisoner (Wilson) alleged that a guard (Groaning) used excessive force by punching him in the face in an attempt to return him to his cell. Groaning testified that Wilson spat on him and raised his arms as if to strike him, and that he responded by punching Wilson. Wilson argued that the evidence of spitting was irrelevant, because Groaning admitted that such an act would not justify the use of force, and that the evidence was extremely prejudicial. Finding no error in the admission of the evidence of spitting, the Court said that "[l]eaving out this evidence would have left the jury with an unduly sanitized and incomplete version of the facts" and that "the evidence that Wilson spat on Groaning was relevant because it had tendency to make Groaning's claims that he felt threatened more probable." Also, there was no unfair prejudice from the evidence. The Court did agree with Wilson that Groaning should not have been permitted to testify that Wilson had sprayed him with a mixture of urine and fecal matter some hours after the punching incident. This evidence had no relevance to whether Groaning had previously used excessive force, and it was obviously prejudicial, but the error was immediately rectified by a limiting instruction.

Williams v. Nebraska State Penitentiary, 57 F.3d 667 (8th Cir. 1995) : A prisoner brought a § 1983 action alleging that prison officials disregarded the risk of harm posed by a cellmate, who had savagely beaten him. The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendants, finding no error in the admission of the plaintiff's two murder convictions, since the evidence was probative on the reasonableness of the officials' belief that the plaintiff could protect himself from a potentially violent inmate. The Trial Judge properly conditioned admission of the evidence on proof that the officials were aware of the plaintiff's criminal history.

Ruvalcaba v. City of Los Angeles, 64 F.3d 1323 (9th Cir. 1995) : The plaintiff in a § 1983 action alleged that police officers had used excessive force during a vehicle stop. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting officers to testify about their knowledge of the plaintiff's criminal history, as that was relevant to the reasonableness of their conduct under the circumstances.

[c] Civil Rights Cases -- Other Evidence

Wills v. Brown Univ., 184 F.3d 20 (1st Cir. 1999) : The Court held in a student's Title IX case that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence of the defendant's failure to take action when other students were harassed by the same instructor subsequent to the single incident for which the plaintiff was suing. Because the plaintiff's hostile environment claim under Title IX required proof of the defendant's actual knowledge of the instructor's illegal conduct and deliberate indifference to it, subsequent incidents were irrelevant to the defendant's prior knowledge and at best of marginal relevance in showing the defendant's "deliberate indifference" to disputed prior incidents, while having a potential for severe prejudice. One Judge dissented, on the ground that the plaintiff was not suing for just the single incident but also for damages caused to her by the defendant's continued inadequate response, as to which the subsequent incidents were relevant evidence.

Hampton v. Dillard Dep't Stores, Inc., 247 F.3d 1091 (10th Cir. 2001) : African-American plaintiffs, who had been stopped by a security guard for suspected shoplifting, brought a § 1981 action against the store. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiffs, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of (1) racial epithets used by the guard's supervisor in his previous position as director of security for another employer, (2) training received by the security officers regarding treatment of minority shoppers, and (3) the racial makeup of the store's shoppers and shift logs and arrest reports. The evidence was probative of a discriminatory animus.

[11] Codefendant's or Cooperating Witness' Guilty Plea or Immunity

United States v. Dworken, 855 F.2d 12 (1st Cir. 1988) : The Court noted that a codefendant's plea may be elicited on direct to dampen the likely effects of an attack by a defendant, but cautioned that prosecutors may not use such a plea to support an inference of guilt on the part of other defendants. Although it found misconduct in the prosecutor's statements, reversal was not required.

United States v. Ramirez, 973 F.2d 102 (2d Cir. 1992) : The Court reversed a conviction for narcotics and firearms offenses, holding it was error to refuse to instruct the jury that they should not consider a testifying codefendant's guilty plea as evidence of the defendant's guilt.

United States v. Universal Rehab. Servs. (PA), Inc., 205 F.3d 657 (3d Cir. 2000) : This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 403.02[8]. In United States v. Cohen, 171 F.3d 796 (3d Cir. 1999) , a mail fraud case arising from a scheme to pay kickbacks, the prosecution introduced evidence that three of its witnesses had pleaded guilty to receiving kickbacks from the defendant. Although the defendant had promised not to attack the witnesses for bias, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence, as it would be responsive to the jurors' natural questions why only the defendant was prosecuted and the jury was properly instructed not to draw conclusions or inferences about the defendant's guilt from the witnesses' guilty pleas. In United States v. Werme, n36 the Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to violate the Travel Act, noting that evidence of another party's guilty plea is not admissible to prove the defendant's guilt but may be admitted to show the witness' bias. The Court held it was error, but harmless, to fail to give a requested limiting instruction when a coconspirator's guilty plea was introduced. See also Government of Virgin Islands v. Mujahid n37(error, but harmless, merely to instruct jury to be cautious in evaluating cooperating witness without telling them witness' guilty plea could not be considered evidence of defendant's guilt); United States v. Frankenberry n38(government may elicit on direct examination that a witness is in a protection program and has received substantial benefit, as long as it does not exploit any inference of threats by the defendant).

United States v. Countryman, 758 F.2d 574 (5th Cir. 1985) : The Court held that it was permissible for the government to elicit on direct examination an alleged coconspirator's testimony concerning his guilty plea in order to blunt the impact of expected cross-examination, but it observed that the prosecutor may not attempt to use the plea as affirmative evidence of the defendant's guilt.

United States v. Odom, 13 F.3d 949 (6th Cir. 1994) : The Court held that evidence of accomplices' convictions was relevant to the reliability of another accomplice's recantation of grand jury testimony regarding a conspiracy. In United States v. Lochmondy, n39 the Court held there was no error in admitting the guilty pleas of codefendants who testified at trial, not as evidence of the defendants' guilt, but as evidence of the witnesses' credibility after it had been attacked. In United States v. Christian, n40 the Court affirmed drug convictions, holding there was no plain error in the failure to give a limiting instruction sua sponte concerning a codefendant's guilty plea. After observing that a plea by a codefendant can be especially prejudicial, the Court reasoned that the potential for prejudice is greatly reduced where the codefendant testifies regarding the specific facts underlying the crimes in issue.

United States v. Carraway, 108 F.3d 745 (7th Cir. 1997) (per curiam): Affirming convictions for narcotics-related offenses, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to introduce the guilty pleas of five codefendants who did not testify at trial. When the codefendant does not testify, his plea has little probative value because his credibility is not at issue, and it presents the risk that the jury will infer the guilt of the defendants on trial. The jury's curiosity why a codefendant who has been named in the indictment and in the course of the trial does not appear before them can be dealt with simply by instructing them not to concern themselves with that question. In United States v. Sanders, 893 F.2d 133 (7th Cir. 1990) , the Court affirmed a fraud conviction, holding that there was no abuse of discretion in admitting former codefendants' guilty pleas during the government's case-in-chief. The Court reasoned that the defendant's trial strategy was to imply that he was singled out while the former codefendant-witness went unpunished, which made admission of the plea evidence inevitable, and the jury was properly instructed not to consider the pleas as evidence against the defendant.

United States v. Wadlington, 233 F.3d 1067 (8th Cir. 2000) : Affirming a conviction for conspiracy to possess and distribute cocaine, the Court held it was error for the prosecutor to reveal, in examining a case agent, that a codefendant in the case had been convicted. One person's conviction may not be used as substantive evidence of the guilt of another, and defense allegations that the prosecution was a fraud did not open the door to this evidence that would otherwise be inadmissible. The error was harmless, however, because the Judge immediately sustained an objection to the question and later cautioned the jury that questions by lawyers were not to be considered.

United States v. Smith, 893 F.2d 1269 (11th Cir. 1990) : After the beginning of a trial of a drug conspiracy, two codefendants made a plea agreement and testified for the government. The Court held that evidence of the plea agreement was properly offered by the government to counter an anticipated contention of bias and that instructions made it clear that the evidence was not to be used as substantive evidence of guilt.

[12] Collateral Benefits

Hancock v. Dodson, 958 F.2d 1367 (6th Cir. 1992) : In a civil rights action on behalf of an arrestee rendered incompetent allegedly as a result of the arrest, the Court held that there was no error in admitting evidence of an earlier no-fault lawsuit filed against an insurance company, as it was probative of whether the arrestee's condition was caused by a subsequent accident rather than the arrest and there was no showing it was unfairly prejudicial. A dissenting Judge believed that the evidence was not relevant because the claim against the insurer was not inconsistent with the theory that the accident aggravated a preexisting condition and it was prejudicial in suggesting that the plaintiff was making separate and inconsistent assertions regarding the cause of the injuries.

Lawson v. Trowbridge, 153 F.3d 368 (7th Cir. 1998) : In an arrestee's civil rights action against a sheriff and a jailer, the defendants devoted almost all their direct testimony to documenting their limited net worth. Because any judgment against them would be paid by their employer so long as they had been acting within the scope of their employment, the testimony was inadmissible. The plaintiff did not object, but did seek to introduce the indemnification statute in rebuttal. Reversing nominal damages judgments against the defendants, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion not to admit the statute once the defendants' direct testimony opened the door, since the rationale for excluding the evidence -- fear that damages will be inflated when the government, rather than the individual, is paying -- had dissolved. In a suit against an aircraft manufacturer, In re Air Crash Disaster, n41 the Court held that evidence of a widow's receipt of insurance benefits was properly excluded as unduly prejudicial, although it was relevant to her claim for nonpecuniary damages.

Cowens v. Siemens-Elema AB, 837 F.2d 817 (8th Cir. 1988) : In a product liability action, the Court held that evidence that the plaintiff received worker's compensation benefits was properly admitted after the plaintiff testified about the financial stress he had undergone following the accident giving rise to the suit.

[13] Collateral Inquiries

Ramos-Melendez v. Valdejully, 960 F.2d 4 (1st Cir. 1992) : In an employment civil rights case, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by the plaintiff's fellow employees, as they also had pending employment discrimination suits against the defendant and for their testimony to be significant it would be necessary in effect to try their cases as well as the plaintiff's.

United States v. LaRouche, 896 F.2d 815 (4th Cir. 1990) : Affirming the defendants' convictions for fraud in obtaining loans they never intended to repay, the Court held that evidence of government intelligence and other activities directed at their organization was properly excluded, except as to unexpected actions frustrating their intent that lenders would be repaid, because any potential relevance was outweighed by the distraction that the inquiry into collateral issues would cause the jury.

[14] Competency Determinations

United States v. Vazquez-Pulido, 155 F.3d 1213 (10th Cir. 1998) : The Court held there was no error in cross-examining a psychiatrist, who testified for the defense that the defendant was suffering from a psychosis, about tests conducted during a pretrial competency examination. The defendant argued that information obtained during a competency examination must be excluded from the trial, because the issues of mental competency and mental capacity to commit a crime are legally distinct, but the Court was unwilling to adopt a per se rule of inadmissibility. Because such evidence could be relevant to the question of the defendant's mental capacity to commit the crime, "the better approach to determining whether test results from competency determinations should be admissible at trial is to evaluate the evidence on a case-by-case basis for relevance, prejudice, or confusion of the issues." The safeguards provided by Rule 403 were considered sufficient to alleviate any concern that defense counsel might not move for a competency determination for fear that the results might be admissible at trial.

[15] Complex Cases and Evidence

United States v. International Business Machs. Corp., 87 F.R.D. 411 (S.D.N.Y. 1980) : In a protracted antitrust case, the District Court denied permission to the defendant to call 124 witnesses not previously identified as part of its direct case. The Court observed that "[p]articularly in a protracted case, Rule 403 may serve as a predicate for imposition of blanket limits on a party's right to introduce evidence where the indicia of delay and cumulation are, generally, present." In SCM Corp. v. Xerox Corp., n42 a complex antitrust case, the Trial Judge became concerned that the number of trial days was excessive, so he imposed a limit on the number of additional days available to the plaintiff to present its case. Although the Court recognized that Rule 403 "normally contemplates that the time-consuming nature of evidence will be determined as to each particular item of evidence offered," it concluded that "in a protracted case such as this, the purpose of the rule can best be achieved by considering time in the aggregate and leaving to counsel the initial responsibility for making individualized selections as to the relative degree of probative value from the mass of evidence available."

[16] Confusing Evidence

[a] Civil Cases

[i] Civil Rights and Employment Discrimination Cases

Kinan v. City of Brockton, 876 F.2d 1029 (1st Cir. 1989) : The Court held, in a civil rights action for injuries received after being arrested as a result of an allegedly improper police broadcast, that evidence of two prior judgments against the defendants was properly excluded. The judgments were based on settlements rather than adjudications, and the prior claims involved excessive force rather than recklessly inaccurate police broadcasts, so their probative value on the adequacy of police training would be substantially outweighed by the risks of confusion and prejudice and the consumption of much unnecessary time in essentially retrying part or all of the two prior cases.

Sanders v. New York City Human Resources Admin., 361 F.3d 749 (2d Cir. 2004) : Affirming a judgment for the defendant in a Title VII action, the Court held that exclusion of a statement made by an agency employee who had investigated the plaintiff's complaints, which concluded that the actions of the plaintiff's supervisor were retaliatory and prohibited by law, did not entitle the plaintiff to a new trial. The statement was a legal conclusion concerning one of the ultimate issues to be decided by the jury, so there was no error in the Judge's decision to exclude it under Rule 403 because its potential for unfair prejudice or confusion substantially outweighed its probative value. In Hathaway v. Coughlin, 99 F.3d 550 (2d Cir. 1996) , an inmate brought a § 1983 action alleging deliberate indifference by a prison doctor to his medical needs, based on the failure for two years to disclose and repair broken pins in his hip, despite his frequent complaints of severe pain in the hip. The Court found there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that the doctor also failed to treat the plaintiff's inactive syphilis, since the jury could easily have been confused by equating and interchanging the negligence in treating the syphilis with the deliberate indifference in treating the hip pain.

Bhaya v. Westinghouse Elec. Corp., 922 F.2d 184 (3d Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in the second trial of an age discrimination case, holding there had been no error in granting a new trial after testimony indicating the defendant's management might be willing to "violat[e] ... the labor laws of their contract" or do "something illegal." The statements lacked any appreciable link to age discrimination or the ADEA, and they tended to confuse the jury by diverting attention from age discrimination to other unspecified illegality. One Judge dissented, arguing that the evidence was highly relevant to the employer's defense that it at all times tried to conform to the collective bargaining agreement.

Heft v. Moore, 351 F.3d 278 (7th Cir. 2003) : A homeowner sued various police officers who executed a valid warrant at her house. Affirming judgment as a matter of law for a defendant who, the plaintiff claimed, struck her with a battering ram, the Court found no error in the exclusion of evidence that another officer allegedly planted drugs and that the plaintiff believed the officers were searching the wrong house. This other evidence "created the substantial risk of confusion of the issues at trial."

West v. Carson, 49 F.3d 433 (8th Cir. 1995) : The plaintiff in a § 1983 action sought to offer evidence tending to show his innocence of the underlying charge, to support his allegation that arresting officers coerced an involuntary confession. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the evidence, as its probative value toward showing he was unlikely to have confessed voluntarily was small, but the jury was likely to be confused into thinking the case turned on the plaintiff's guilt or innocence on the criminal charge rather than on whether his constitutional rights were violated. In a § 1983 action by a pretrial detainee, Johnson v. Busby, n43 the Court held it was no abuse of discretion to exclude evidence of state minimum jail standards, as the standards, while helpful and relevant in some cases, do not represent minimum constitutional standards and would tend to mislead and confuse the jury as to the relevant standard of conduct.

Quintanilla v. City of Downey, 84 F.3d 353 (9th Cir. 1996) : An arrestee's § 1983 trial was bifurcated so that the first phase involved only individual officers' use of a police dog in making the arrest. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence in the first phase of injuries from unrelated incidents of police dog bites, as well as of police dog training procedures. Because the evidence was offered only to show that the Police Chief's and City's policy of using police dogs was unconstitutional, its introduction was premature; its introduction could well have unfairly prejudiced the Chief and the City and confused the jury considering the individual officers' actions.

Tanberg v. Sholtis, 401 F.3d 1151 (10th Cir. 2005) : Affirming a judgment for the defendants in an action by arrestees alleging excessive force by a police officer, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence regarding the police department's standard operating procedures. The Court held that the SOPs were irrelevant to the plaintiffs' federal law claims, and that even if they might be relevant to the plaintiffs' pendent state law claims, there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the evidence because of the risk that the jury would confuse violation of the administrative standards for a constitutional violation. The Court also held that the risk of jury confusion justified precluding use of the SOPs in examining an expert presenting testimony in rebuttal of defense evidence that the officer had "conformed to his training."

[ii] Confusing Evidence -- Civil Cases -- Intellectual Property Cases

Yankee Candle Co. v. Bridgewater Candle Co., 259 F.3d 25 (1st Cir. 2001) : Having granted summary judgment on all claims except tortious interference to the defendant in a suit by a manufacturer of scented candles that alleged the defendant infringed the plaintiff's copyright and trade dress rights and violated state law, the Trial Judge held that evidence of copyright and trademark infringement would not be admissible in the tortious interference trial. Affirming, the Court recognized that the evidence might have been relevant to show improper motive, but it cited Rule 403 and found that any inference regarding motive would have been cumulative at best and could have created "substantial confusion and delay, given that the more obvious use of the evidence would be to support the defunct copyright and trade dress claims."

Monotype Corp. v. International Typeface Corp., 43 F.3d 443 (9th Cir. 1994) : In an action by a typeface designer against a licensor of typefaces, the Court held that a document prepared by an employee of the designer's customer, which expressed the employee's views that certain typefaces were copies violating a typographical association's "moral code," was properly excluded. The conclusion of copying had little probative value because it was made without seeing the actual typefaces, and the reference to the association's moral code would only confuse the jury as to the proper standard.

Cytologix Corp. v. Ventana Medical Sys., Inc., 424 F.3d 1168 (Fed. Cir. 2005) : In a patent infringement action, the Court noted that it was improper to have expert witnesses testify before the jury regarding claim construction. The risk of confusing the jury is high even when, as here, the jury is instructed that the Judge's claim constructions control. In an action for patent infringement, Mendenhall v. Cedarapids, Inc., 5 F.3d 1557 (Fed. Cir. 1993) , the Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the judgment, opinion, and other evidence of an earlier proceeding in which patents at issue had been held valid. There was a high possibility of prejudice and confusion, since the opinion was not fact evidence on the myriad issues in the present case, and the jury may well have been confused by exposure to another Judge's statements on the law. The dissenting Judge believed that the prior holding of validity had substantial probative value and that the jury should be presumed to take its role seriously and to carry out its factfinding function competently and thoroughly.

[iii] Confusing Evidence -- Civil Cases -- Miscellaneous Cases

Langer v. Monarch Life Ins. Co., 966 F.2d 786 (3d Cir. 1992) : In an action by a physician against his employer and an insurer over disability insurance coverage, the physician and the insurer settled under a loan receipt agreement. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence of the settlement from the trial of claims against the employer, as it may have confused the jury and misplaced their focus onto the subsidiary mitigation issue whether the settlement was a good deal rather than on the major issues in the case.

Redman v. John D. Brush & Co., 111 F.3d 1174 (4th Cir. 1997) : Reversing a judgment against the manufacturer of a safe after it was burglarized and the plaintiff's coin collection stolen, the Court held it was error to admit a copy of the warranty accompanying the safe. Although offered to impeach the defendant's witness, the warranty was not contrary to the witness' testimony, and it likely confused the jury by reminding them that the defendant had given a warranty when, in fact, the plaintiff's cause of action for breach of warranty had been dismissed. In Tony Guiffre Distrib. Co. v. Washington Metro. Area Transit Auth., n44 the Court affirmed an inverse condemnation, finding no error in the exclusion of evidence concerning certain rents that were payable on property, since the circumstances concerning the rents might confuse the jury. The Trial Judge did permit experts to testify concerning the fair rental value of the property.

Campbell v. Keystone Aerial Surveys, Inc., 138 F.3d 996 (5th Cir. 1998) : The Court held in a wrongful death action arising from an airplane crash that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that the decedent's son committed suicide a little more than a year after his father's death. There was a substantial risk that the jury would confuse the mental anguish suffered by family members as a result of the son's suicide with the anguish resulting from the decedent's death. The Court also noted that the probative value of the evidence to show the degree of mental anguish suffered by family members from the decedent's death was tenuous, especially when no claim for mental anguish was asserted on behalf of the son's estate.

City of Cleveland v. Cleveland Elec. Illuminating Co., 734 F.2d 1157 (6th Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the utility in an antitrust action, holding there was no error in excluding a stipulation, entered into before the first of two trials, that the defendant utility had sponsored a taxpayer's suit that challenged a Federal Power Commission decision to require it to interconnect with the City's utility. The Court found that the stipulation was cumulative of other evidence concerning the defendant's attempts to eliminate competition and that it might have confused the jury by leading it to think that the taxpayer's suit was an anticompetitive act, which it was not. A dissenting Judge argued that sponsorship of the taxpayer suit, standing alone, might not have been anticompetitive, but the jury should have been permitted to consider the defendant's role in the suit as it might bear on a determination of whether the defendant was engaged in anticompetitive behavior.

Harrison v. Dean Witter Reynolds, Inc., 79 F.3d 609 (7th Cir. 1996) : An investor in a Ponzi scheme brought a securities fraud action against the brokerage firm employing the brokers who executed the scheme. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that the investor underreported his income from his investment, as the probative value of the evidence in showing the investor's lack of reliance was substantially outweighed by the risk of jury confusion and undue consumption of time if a complicated tax evasion trial were to begin in the midst of the securities fraud trial.

Moses.com v. Comprehensive Software Sys., Inc., 406 F.3d 1052 (8th Cir. 2005) : A brokerage firm sued a software developer on various tort theories, claiming that the developer failed to produce a software system as promised. The Court affirmed a judgment for the developer, finding no abuse of discretion when evidence as to how the developer's software worked at two other companies was excluded. It reasoned that the evidence might have been confusing and was not probative of the central issues in the case, particularly because the brokerage firm failed to establish an adequate basis for assuming that the other companies' systems were identical to its system. In Firemen's Fund Ins. Co. v. Thien, 63 F.3d 754 (8th Cir. 1995) , a declaratory judgment action to determine whether a fellow-employee exclusion in a liability policy applied to a fatal crash of a company plane, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding FAA investigation reports that indicated the company's operations director had neglected or falsified logbook entries. The reports had no tendency to show that payroll records at issue were inaccurate, and they were likely to lead the jury away from the question of the decedent's status toward the irrelevant question whether the company was responsible for the decedent's death. The likelihood of jury confusion and prejudice similarly justified excluding the FAA reports as evidence of the director's motive to falsify the payroll records or of his testimonial credibility.

Thurman Indus. v. Pay'N Pak Stores, Inc., 875 F.2d 1369 (9th Cir. 1989) : In an antitrust action the plaintiff offered, as evidence of anticompetitive conduct directed toward realizing monopoly power, testimony that the defendant, a competing chain of home improvement stores, attempted to coerce suppliers to refuse to sell home improvement products to competitors. The Court held the evidence was properly excluded, as the alleged conduct was only ambiguously anticompetitive, so it had little probative value, while it had a great potential to confuse or mislead the jury on the issue of specific intent to monopolize through predatory pricing.

Schafer v. Time, Inc., 142 F.3d 1361 (11th Cir. 1998) : A picture of the plaintiff was erroneously misidentified in a magazine article as being that of a person involved in the Pan Am 103 bombing. Reversing a judgment for the defendant on other grounds, the Court held there no abuse of discretion in excluding a memorandum prepared by the defendant's public affairs director that addressed a number of charges that the sources for the article were unreliable. Although the memorandum tended to show that publication of the article may have violated internal policies and procedures, it had little probative value because it did not refer to the particular photograph at issue, and it had a clear potential for confusing and misleading the jury into believing that the lack of care in publishing the article was also the source of the decision to publish the photograph.

[iv] Confusing Evidence -- Civil Cases -- Product Liability and Toxic Tort Cases

Santos v. Sunrise Medical, Inc., 351 F.3d 587 (1st Cir. 2003) : Affirming a judgment for two nursing home workers injured while using a hydraulic lift manufactured by the defendant, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of a letter written by the plaintiffs' lawyer to OSHA alleging that the nursing home improperly maintained the lift in violation of OSHA standards. The Court found that the letter would have been potentially confusing and would have opened up the subject of OSHA's investigations and findings.

Blancha v. Raymark Indus., 972 F.2d 507 (3d Cir. 1992) : The plaintiffs' theory in an asbestos case was that all asbestos could cause the decedent's mesothelioma; the defendant's expert indicated that asbestos products containing chrysotile did not cause mesothelioma. After a verdict for the defendant, a new trial was granted, first on the ground that the expert's testimony was irrelevant without evidence that the defendant's product contained chrysotile, and later (on reconsideration) on the ground that the jury might have been confused by the expert testimony in the absence of evidence about the defendant's product. Reversing a judgment for the plaintiff on the new trial, the Court held that the expert's testimony was relevant, given the theory advanced and the plaintiffs' burden of proof on proximate causation, and that the danger of confusion did not so clearly outweigh the probative value of the expert's testimony as to justify exclusion.

Jackson v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 727 F.2d 506 (1984) , superseded, 750 F.2d 1314 (5th Cir. 1985) (en banc): In an action by a former shipyard worker for injuries allegedly caused by the defendants' failures to warn of the hazards of exposure to asbestos products, a panel of the Court found that 25-year-old letters that were among the papers of the chairman of the board of one of the defendants should not have been admitted because they shed almost no light on the foreseeability of injury and would have confused and misled the jury. On rehearing en banc, the Court said the letters were not so remote in subject matter as to be devoid of probative value, and admission was not an abuse of discretion when the letters were not inflammatory and the defendants had ample opportunity to make the jury aware of their remoteness.

Stull v. Fuqua Indus., 906 F.2d 1271 (8th Cir. 1990) : In a product liability action for injuries suffered when the plaintiff's foot was caught beneath a riding mower, the Court held that a statement in a letter by the plaintiff's counsel to the CPSC that the plaintiff "tried to jump off the mower" was properly excluded under Rules 403 and 611(a) because the word "jump" is ambiguous, with meanings that could support each side's theory of the case. In a product liability action brought on behalf of a child injured by a riding mower, Ryan v. McDonough Power Equip. Co., n45 the defendants were granted a new trial on the issue of liability. At the second trial, the Judge excluded the deposition of an expert who explained the nature of the girl's injury and the medical treatment she received. The Court affirmed, on the ground that the probative value of the deposition on the liability question was low and the possibility that the jury might be distracted by consideration of the extent of the damages was substantial.

McEuin v. Crown Equip. Corp., 328 F.3d 1028 (9th Cir. 2003) : In an action by the operator of a doorless, stand-up forklift against the manufacturer arising from injuries suffered by the operator in a collision, a jury found for the operator. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence that the United States military specifies that forklifts must be built without doors. The Court noted that the Trial Judge indicated that he would not preclude the designer of the forklift from testifying that he was aware of and relied upon the military standard. That ruling permitted the manufacturer to offer evidence as to its state of mind, but properly excluded the military specifications because they "would appear to carry the imprimatur of government sanction, and might therefore resemble in the jury's mind something akin to an actual regulation."

Wheeler v. John Deere Co., 935 F.2d 1090 (10th Cir. 1991) : Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff in an action for injuries suffered while servicing a combine, the Court rejected the manufacturer's contention that admitting design and product safety manuals diverted the jury's attention from reasonable consumer expectations to manufacturer's fault, which is irrelevant in a strict product liability action. Evidence of the defendant's knowledge of dangers is relevant in considering the adequacy of any warnings.

[b] Confusing Evidence -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Mulinelli-Navas, 111 F.3d 983 (1st Cir. 1997) : The Court held in a bank fraud prosecution that there was no abuse of discretion in precluding cross-examination of a cooperating witness for the prosecution about the sentences he faced and avoided by his plea bargain. That would have put before the jury the defendant's potential punishment, which could confuse the issues they were supposed to be deciding.

United States v. Thompson, 710 F.2d 915 (2d Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed the denial of a new trial motion by a former Congressman convicted in one of the ABSCAM prosecutions. It agreed with the Trial Judge that the dangers of confusion and delay associated with evidence offered to prove that a government witness had duped another person, and therefore that it was more likely that he also duped Thompson, substantially outweighed its probative value and did not warrant a new trial.

United States v. Driggs, 823 F.2d 52 (3d Cir. 1987) : In a Hobbs Act prosecution, a pretrial ruling precluded the government from introducing recorded conversations in which a union officer discussed payments to various public officials, unless they related to the defendant, who had been elected a Judge. The Court concluded that the ruling was an abuse of discretion, because the evidence tended to prove the union officer's payment was made to the defendant because of his official position. In our view, the ruling below was correct. The issue in the case was whether the defendant used his official position to obtain payment, and evidence of the union officer's intent, without evidence the defendant knew of that intent, was irrelevant and tended to confuse the officer's motive with the defendant's.

United States v. Iskander, 407 F.3d 232 (4th Cir. 2005) : In a prosecution for tax evasion and structuring financial transactions to avoid reporting, the government alleged that the defendant skimmed cash and credit card proceeds from two corporations, each of which operated a hotel. The government offered evidence showing that the gross receipts of the hotels greatly exceeded the amounts shown on the corporate tax returns. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding portions of the defendant's expert testimony that his corporations were entitled to take depreciation deductions that were not taken on the corporate tax returns. The Court reasoned that the government charged the defendant with failing to report income on his personal tax return, and the availability of the depreciation deductions did not affect the amount of the gross receipts of the company from which the government alleged the defendant skimmed the cash and credit card proceeds. Thus, the expert's testimony was irrelevant and potentially confusing. In United States v. Grossman, 400 F.3d 212 (4th Cir. 2005) , following the defendant's arrest, officers waited inside an apartment to which the defendant had keys. A man knocked on the apartment's door, was admitted and gave a false name to the officers, and at their request wrote a brief statement indicating that he had come to see a man by the defendant's name. Affirming a conviction for possession of cocaine with intent to distribute, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion when the defense was precluded from admitting evidence of the man's criminal history. The probative value of the evidence was weak because the man was not a witness at the trial and--as shown by the facts he had to knock on the door and had no key of his own--his connection to the apartment was minimal compared to the defendant's. The insignificant probative value was easily outweighed by the risk of confusing and distracting the jury. In United States v. Reevey, n46 the Court affirmed convictions for carjacking, kidnapping, and possession of a firearm during a violent crime, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of ballistic evidence that the defendant's weapons were inoperable. The defendant claimed that the evidence rebutted testimony by officers who testified that the defendant fired upon them at the scene of the arrest. The Court reasoned that the defendant was not charged with any offense arising out of his arrest, and the Trial Judge was warranted in excluding the evidence as likely to confuse or mislead the jury. In United States v. Hill, n47 the defendant, charged with misrepresenting himself as a financial advisor and defrauding a retired history professor of almost $100,000, claimed that the money was a gift, which the victim relabelled as investment only after their relationship dissolved. To support this defense he offered to prove an allegedly similar situation, through a "gift letter" from the victim relating to $10,000 and the victim's complaint in a subsequent lawsuit against the recipient seeking repayment of a "personal loan" for $15,000 that had been advanced in $5,000 and $10,000 installments. The defendant had no concrete evidence as to what happened in these collateral transactions, so the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the evidence, since it "would have necessitated an exhaustive case within a case that would have confused the jury as to the issues to be decided."

United States v. O'Keefe, 426 F.3d 274 (5th Cir. 2005) : The defendant, charged with "seaman's manslaughter" after he capsized a tugboat causing a passenger to drown, proffered the Coast Guard's accident report of the incident. The Trial Judge ruled that the body of the report could be admitted, but that the conclusory headings in the report would be excluded because, among other things, the jury might be confused as to the different burdens of proof used for the report and at the criminal trial. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion and rejected the argument that this analysis was inappropriate under Rule 803(8), as that rule authorizes exclusion of a public report only if it is untrustworthy and not if it is confusing. It stated that Rule 803(8) "is not the only basis upon which a district court may rely to exclude evidence stemming from investigative reports." In United States v. Jimenez, 256 F.3d 330 (5th Cir. 2001) , the defendants were convicted for arson of a house containing the office of the victim's family business. The Judge excluded evidence that the neighborhood was not zoned for businesses. Affirming, the Court noted that there is no requirement that a business be lawfully zoned in order to satisfy the statutory interstate commerce nexus, so the proposed testimony would be unduly confusing and misleading to the jury. In United States v. Morris, n48 the defendant was acquitted on a charge of money laundering, but the jury was unable to reach a verdict on additional counts of money laundering and conspiracy to commit money laundering, so a mistrial was granted. The Trial Judge ruled in limine that evidence of the acts on which the defendant was acquitted would not be admissible in the retrial and the government appealed. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the evidence, as the jury might have been misled and confused that the evidence went to a substantive illegal act (for which the defendant was acquitted) rather than an overt act in a conspiracy scheme, and the government did not offer any limiting instruction that might have reduced the jury's confusion. In United States v. Valencia, n49 a drug prosecution, the government and defense joined in a request to play an authenticated tape recording of a conversation between Spanish-speaking conspirators, but the Trial Judge permitted only an English transcript that had been stipulated by the parties. In a careful opinion indicating some doubts about the ruling, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion, where two of the jurors could speak Spanish and hearing the tape might have been confusing. In United States v. Moody, n50 a mail and wire fraud prosecution, the defendant argued that absent coconspirators were especially adept at misleading people and that he was especially naive, so he sought to introduce extensive evidence of their character, organization, and practices. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding much of the evidence because it would shift the focus away from the defendant's culpability.

United States v. Fuller, 387 F.3d 643 (7th Cir. 2004) : Affirming a conviction for threatening to kill the President, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the defendant was denied the opportunity to call a psychiatrist to testify that the defendant made the threat because he wanted to stay in prison, not because he intended to carry it out. The Court reasoned that the defendant's subjective intent was irrelevant to the crime involved, and therefore the testimony "would merely have been confusing to the jury" and was properly excluded under Rule 403. In United States v. Thomas, 11 F.3d 1392 (7th Cir. 1993) , a defendant charged with bank robbery sought to prove she had been coerced into participation by her codefendant. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in refusing to allow her to present evidence regarding each specific incident of abuse, as the marginal relevance of the evidence was clearly outweighed by the dangers of confusion of the issues, waste of time, and unnecessary presentation of evidence that would result if the defendant were allowed to conduct minitrials of each alleged incident.

United States v. Hairston, 819 F.2d 971 (10th Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed convictions for willful failure to file tax returns, holding that the defendant's testimony concerning the impact that tax protest literature and seminars had on his understanding of tax law requirements was more probative than the literature itself and that there was no error in excluding the literature on the ground that it might confuse the jury.

United States v. Costa, 947 F.2d 919 (11th Cir. 1991) : Defendants charged with cocaine importation called a witness who would have testified that he had imported cocaine with three of the government witnesses but he had never known of the defendants in connection with his smuggling. The testimony was excluded on the ground that it related to a different conspiracy than the one alleged at trial, and its admission would therefore tend to confuse the jury. The Court found no abuse of discretion, but expressed concern about the ruling; it noted that excluding evidence of a different conspiracy, on the ground that it might cause jury confusion, will usually be inconsistent with the general rule favoring the admission of such evidence and allowing the jury to decide if it relates to the indicted conspiracy.

[17] Connection Not Established

United States v. Etsitty, 130 F.3d 420 (9th Cir. 1997) : The defendant was convicted of kidnapping and assault, after a trial in which identity was the disputed issue. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of a suicide note written by the defendant's brother, which stated that it was better to commit suicide than to serve a five-year prison term. There was no evidence connecting the defendant's brother and his motive for suicide to the crime charged against the defendant. The Court noted that the suicide occurred more than a month after the defendant pleaded no contest to the kidnapping charge in tribal Court, and no steps had been taken to prosecute the brother.

[18] Consciousness of a Weak Case -- Civil Cases

McQueeney v. Wilmington Trust Co., 779 F.2d 916 (3d Cir. 1985) : The Court reversed a judgment for a seaman in a Jones Act case, holding it was error to exclude evidence suggesting that the seaman had suborned perjury of a proffered witness. The Court found that "subornation of perjury by a party is strong evidence that the party's case is weak" and that there was little chance of "unfair prejudice" in the use of the evidence.

TY Inc. v. Softbelly's Inc., 353 F.3d 528 (7th Cir. 2003) : Reversing a judgment as a matter of law for a plaintiff who sued the manufacturer of a computer screen cleaner for trademark infringement, the Court held it was error to exclude evidence that a witness who testified in his deposition favorably for the defendant had been asked by the plaintiff not to testify in the case. An attempt by a litigant to persuade a witness not to testify is admissible as an indication that the litigant's claim is weak or unfounded. In a high school student's § 1983 action against a truant officer for nonconsensual sexual relations, Berry v. Deloney, 28 F.3d 604 (7th Cir. 1994) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant, holding there was no error in precluding cross-examination of the defendant about a missing report. The evidence was totally out of the defendant's control shortly after he made it, and testimony about it would not so much support inferences that he was lying as simply invite conjecture.

Aramburu v. Boeing Co., 112 F.3d 1398 (10th Cir. 1997) : Affirming summary judgment for the defendant in an employment discrimination case, the Court held that the defendant's mere negligence in losing or destroying some attendance records did not support an inference of consciousness of a weak case.

Bashir v. Amtrak, 119 F.3d 929 (11th Cir. 1997) : Affirming the grant of summary judgment against the estate of a pedestrian hit by a train, the Court held that no adverse inference could be drawn from the defendant's failure to preserve the train's speed tape, in the absence of evidence of bad faith.

[19] Consciousness of Guilt -- Criminal Cases

[a] False Statements and Suppression of Evidence

United States v. Maravilla, 907 F.2d 216 (1st Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed convictions of former Customs officers for robbery-related offenses in connection with the murder of a money courier, holding that there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence a defendant had tried to have the barrel on his gun changed. The effort to replace the barrel suggested an effort to eliminate features of the gun that might have linked it with a bullet found in or near the victim's body, which suggested a consciousness of guilt; there is no requirement that the prosecution introduce the much stronger evidence of the gun and the bullet, particularly since there was no showing that the government ever found such a bullet.

United States v. Perez, 387 F.3d 201 (2d Cir. 2004) : Affirming convictions for cocaine offenses, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by a witness who said that the defendant asked her on four occasions to give a false statement to investigators concerning the circumstances of a search she witnessed. The Court reasoned that the testimony related to the defendant's knowledge and intent and "merely strengthened inferences that were derived from other evidence." In an armed robbery case, United States v. Burrous, 147 F.3d 111 (2d Cir. 1998) , the Court held that evidence that the defendant tossed a box containing $128 in cash from his apartment window at the time of his arrest was properly admitted. The jury could infer from the act consciousness of guilt or that the money was stolen. In United States v. Perrone, n51 the Court reversed a conviction for conspiring to manufacture cocaine because there was insufficient evidence the defendant knew the illegal purpose for listed chemicals he possessed, and it held that his false exculpatory statement was not usable as direct evidence of guilt when made in circumstances consistent with the innocent proposition that he felt the need to disassociate himself from criminal activity with which he surmised he was implicated.

United States v. D'Anjou, 16 F.3d 604 (4th Cir. 1994) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the defendant's false statements given to an agent of the Immigration and Naturalization Service after his arrest, as his lying was probative of consciousness of guilt of narcotics offenses.

United States v. Fozo, 904 F.2d 1166 (7th Cir. 1990) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion when a "script," written by one defendant for his codefendant's testimony in their trial for giving willfully false testimony to a grand jury, was admitted as evidence of consciousness of guilt.

United States v. Frost, 234 F.3d 1023 (8th Cir. 2000) : The defendant was charged with defrauding a trust by forging the signature of his co-trustee on various financial documents. In a deposition given in a civil action brought by the trust, the defendant denied signing the co-trustee's name or initials on the documents in question. However, in the criminal case the defendant asserted that he had a power of attorney to sign for the co-trustee. Concluding that the jury would be led to convict the defendant solely on the ground that he was untruthful, the Judge granted a motion in limine to exclude the defendant's deposition testimony. On interlocutory appeal, the Court reversed, on the ground that the deposition testimony was probative of fraudulent intent and consciousness of guilt, and although it would be damaging to the defendant's case, it would not be unfairly so.

United States v. Ramirez, 176 F.3d 1179 (9th Cir. 1999) : Six days after the defendant was arrested returning from Mexico while driving a rental vehicle that contained marijuana, his sister registered title in her name to vehicles he had owned. The government contended that the transfer showed consciousness of guilt, in that the defendant was trying to cover up the fact that he could have used a personal vehicle rather than a rental car for his trip to Mexico. The Court found admission of the title transfer evidence harmless error: the consciousness of guilt argument was "tenuous, at best," but the fact the defendant chose to use a rental car rather than one he owned was admissible and probative, given evidence that personal vehicles containing narcotics are seized at the border, while rental vehicles are returned to the rental agency.

[b] Consciousness of Guilt -- Criminal Cases -- Flight

[i] Flight Instructions

United States v. Martinez, 190 F.3d 673 (5th Cir. 1999) : In a narcotics prosecution, two defendants challenged instructions to the jury that evidence of flight could reflect a consciousness of guilt. One defendant argued that the instruction was not warranted because he had not fled when officers entered the premises -- he hid in a closet. But the Court found that although hiding in a closet "may not be the standard method of escape, it can still constitute flight where, as in this case, the cornered defendant was attempting to elude capture." The Court held it was error (but harmless) to give a flight instruction as to the other defendant; while he had run around the house when the officers approached, by the time the officers entered he was simply standing in the living room.

United States v. Dixon, 201 F.3d 1223 (9th Cir. 2000) : When a Customs officer at a port of entry became suspicious and requested that the defendant hand over his car keys for a further inspection, the defendant sped away, crashed through a chain link fence, entered the wrong lane of an Interstate, and was arrested shortly after his car was found abandoned in the nearby city. The defendant was charged with unlawfully importing two aliens found in the trunk of the car. Although instructions that flight could be considered evidence of guilt are generally discouraged, the Court found that the required four inferences were sufficiently supported in this case: (1) from the defendant's behavior to flight; (2) from flight to consciousness of guilt; (3) from consciousness of guilt to consciousness of guilt concerning the crime charged; and (4) from consciousness of guilt concerning the crime charged to actual guilt of the crime charged.

[ii] Consciousness of Guilt -- Criminal Cases -- Flight -- Flight of Another

United States v. Ortland, 109 F.3d 539 (9th Cir. 1997) : Affirming a conviction for mail fraud, the Court found no error in the exclusion of evidence offered by the defendant that one of his business partners had fled prosecution. The Court had already rejected the idea that a codefendant's flight is relevant to show the guilt of anyone other than the fleeing defendant in United States v. Candoli, 870 F.2d 496, 501 (9th Cir. 1989) . Similarly, flight does not tend to show that someone else is innocent, at least where there can easily be more than one guilty person, as in this case.

United States v. Borders, 693 F.2d 1318 (11th Cir. 1982) : The Court affirmed the conviction of a lawyer charged with involvement in an effort to bribe a Federal Judge, holding that evidence that the Judge fled once he learned of the defendant's arrest was admissible to prove the Judge's involvement in a conspiracy with the defendant.

[iii] Consciousness of Guilt -- Criminal Cases -- Flight -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Zanghi, 189 F.3d 71 (1st Cir. 1999) : Affirming convictions for securities fraud and tax evasion, the Court found no error in the admission of evidence that the defendant had moved from Connecticut to North Carolina, leased a house for a year, vacated the premises early, called his landlord from Spain to say that he had to leave unexpectedly and was not going to be able to honor the lease because of "problems" in the United States, and that there was no extradition treaty with Spain. "These factual predicates made it sufficiently clear that Zanghi's departure to Spain was in fact flight indicative of a guilty conscience, not normal travel." In United States v. Candelaria-Silva, 162 F.3d 698 (1st Cir. 1998) , the Court affirmed convictions for drug trafficking, finding there was an adequate showing that the defendant had fled the area for reasons related to the charged crime and not other offenses, so evidence of his flight and attempts to create a false identity was properly admitted.

United States v. Glenn, 312 F.3d 58 (2d Cir. 2002) : The Court reversed a murder conviction partly because the government's argument that testimony about the defendant's obtaining a ride shortly after the shooting was evidence of flight tending to show consciousness of guilt was unsupported by the record. Any such inference would be improper, given there was no evidence of suspicious conduct, such as running, aggressively demanding a ride, or requesting to be taken to a remote location. In United States v. Amuso, 21 F.3d 1251 (2d Cir. 1994) , the defendant mob boss went into hiding upon learning that he and 14 others were to be indicted for RICO offenses and he remained a fugitive during that trial. After he was later arrested and convicted on RICO, murder, and other charges in a subsequent indictment, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of his flight, as a jury could as reasonably have found he fled out of consciousness of guilt as that he was concerned about spillover prejudice in being tried with 14 others. However, it was error (but harmless) to instruct the jury that it could consider his "continued absence," where there was an insufficient factual predicate that he remained absent because of his consciousness of guilt with respect to the crimes charged.

United States v. Pungitore, 910 F.2d 1084 (3d Cir. 1990) : Affirming RICO convictions of Mafia members, the Court held that evidence of a defendant's flight soon after a coconspirator became a government informant was properly admitted, and a limiting instruction that the evidence be considered in connection with only one of the predicate acts, because the defendant was in custody at the time the RICO indictment was returned, had been properly rejected.

United States v. Oliver, 397 F.3d 369 (6th Cir. 2005) : In a prosecution for conspiracy to possess methamphetamine with intent to distribute, the Court found no plain error in the admission of evidence that the defendant, while on pretrial release, had left a halfway house and drug treatment program without permission and intending not to return. Together with evidence that the defendant had installed surveillance cameras around his home to tell whether police were approaching and admissions regarding meth manufacture and use, the flight was probative of the defendant's consciousness of guilt of the crime charged. Given the defendant's knowledge of the charges against him, it was not necessary that the flight immediately follow the crime or the defendant's discovery that he was charged in order to show consciousness of guilt. In United States v. Gaitan-Acevedo, 148 F.3d 577 (6th Cir. 1998) , the Court affirmed convictions for drug offenses, finding no error in the admission of evidence that after one defendant had been arrested and released, he fled to Mexico. The defendant departed the country immediately after his release, carrying $60,000 and two handguns. This was sufficient to indicate that the defendant was actually fleeing due to a consciousness of guilt as to the crime charged. Affirming drug convictions in United States v. Dillon, n52 the Court found that the defendant's flight two years after the alleged crime and before the indictment was admissible, since it occurred within days of his learning of a codefendant's intent to implicate him in grand jury testimony.

United States v. Robinson, 161 F.3d 463 (7th Cir. 1998) : The defendant was charged with a bank robbery committed on April 8. The Trial Judge admitted evidence of the defendant's apprehension after a virtually identical bank robbery that the defendant committed on April 18, a time at which the April 8 robbery was still unsolved. After the April 18 robbery, the defendant was apprehended in a high-speed chase, at the end of which he drew a handgun on his pursuers. In his car was evidence that tied the defendant to both robberies. The defendant argued that the flight evidence was erroneously admitted, since it had minimal relevance to his consciousness of guilt regarding the April 8 bank robbery, the only robbery with which he was charged in the case. Finding no error, the Court stated that "it is not the role of the District Court to parse the mind of a defendant to determine which act may have created a higher consciousness of guilt on a given occasion when the defendant is in possession of evidence linking him to both robberies and when the underlying crimes are virtually identical and separated by a mere ten days." In United States v. Hunter, 145 F.3d 946 (7th Cir. 1998) , police sought to approach conspirators in a cocaine deal. The suspects drove away, leading the officers on a high-speed chase before abandoning the car and running away. At the defendant's trial the Judge excluded evidence of the car chase, since the other conspirator was driving the car, but did admit evidence that the defendant attempted to flee from the car on foot. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion, since running away evinced the defendant's consciousness of guilt. Furthermore, admitting the evidence avoided any implication that the defendant had not been running when another conspirator had sought to evade the police and had dropped a jacket containing cocaine packages that were the basis of the charged offenses.

United States v. Richardson, 427 F.3d 1128 (8th Cir. 2005), vacated on other grounds,439 F.3d 421 (8th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a conviction for being a felon and a drug user in possession of a firearms, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant had fled from police when they tried to apprehend him. The flight and the defendant's failure to appear for mandatory drug tests showed a consciousness that his drug use would be discovered if he were tested, which was directly relevant to an element of the crime charged. In United States v. Chipps, 410 F.3d 438 (8th Cir. 2005) , the Court affirmed a conviction for assault, finding no error in the admission of evidence that the defendant had fled from law enforcement. The Court reasoned that although flight evidence is often only marginally probative of guilt, in this case the defendant fled within days of being given a copy of the warrant for his arrest, did not turn himself in, could not be found for two years, and sped away from the police, and other circumstances supported the inference that his consciousness of guilt derived from actually having committed the charged assault. In United States v. Lupino, n53 an officer testified that he was alone and out of uniform when he encountered the defendant the morning after the charged assault and the defendant asked if he were interested in buying some "smoke." Not wishing to effect an arrest without his weapon, handcuffs, or backup, he said he was interested in buying marijuana and would be back, but when he returned, the defendant was no longer there and was shortly thereafter found hiding in a neighbor's house. The Court held that the officer's testimony was relevant to show the factual context for the arrest and as evidence of consciousness of guilt, but depiction of the defendant as a drug dealer was unnecessary and prejudicial; however, the error was harmless.

United States v. King, 200 F.3d 1207 (9th Cir. 1999) : Affirming bank and mail fraud convictions, the Court held that evidence that the defendant fled to Mexico shortly before an extradition hearing in Canada was admissible to show consciousness of guilt. The flight related to the charges in the United States for which he would have been extradited.

United States v. Lacey, 86 F.3d 956 (10th Cir. 1996) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the defendant, charged with drug offenses, fled on the eve of his scheduled trial. Although remote from the commission or accusation of the offense, the flight was in close proximity to another significant event in the course of the prosecution, so it was probative of the defendant's guilt. In United States v. Martinez, n54 a prosecution for sending explosives through the mail, the Court held it was error to exclude evidence of the defendant's flight. Flight evidence is often highly relevant, and "[t]he fact that the accused may seek to rebut flight evidence in a way that would create new evidentiary problems is not a justification for excluding it, where, as here, it has highly probative value."

United States v. Blakey, 960 F.2d 996 (11th Cir. 1992) : In reversing a conviction for bank fraud and counterfeiting, the Court noted that there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the defendant's flight when FBI agents tried to arrest him. The flight occurred in the city where the crime had been committed when the defendant was with a coconspirator he knew was being prosecuted for the crime, and there was some evidence he knew an indictment had been issued against him. One Judge dissented in part, believing that, on balance, admission of the flight evidence was reversible error.

[c] Consciousness of Guilt -- Criminal Cases -- Other Evidence

United States v. Edwards, 342 F.3d 168 (2d Cir. 2003) : The defendant, charged with conspiring to import a substance containing cocaine, admitted that after his arrest he went to the DEA to volunteer as an informer. The Court found no error when the prosecution was permitted to cross-examine the defendant about whether his visit to the DEA violated his bond, since the evidence tended to prove consciousness of guilt: i.e., "he was so desperate to find a way to avoid prosecution that he was willing to violate his bail bond conditions." In a RICO prosecution, United States v. Padilla, 203 F.3d 156 (2d Cir. 2000) , the Court held there was no clear error when a note from one defendant to a bribed witness was admitted against the other defendant as tending to prove his consciousness of guilt. A reference to the second defendant in the note demonstrated a relationship between the defendants not existing in a vacuum but in the context of what the jury could find was a conspiracy to suborn perjury, and so was independent evidence sufficient to corroborate the substantial hearsay evidence that the second defendant was a member of the conspiracy to obstruct justice. Thus, the statements to the bribed witness in furtherance of the conspiracy were highly probative of both defendants' consciousness of guilt. In United States v. Bein, n55 the Court affirmed convictions for fraud and conspiracy growing out of a scheme to sell illegal commodity option contracts, upholding the admission of evidence that one defendant attacked a fellow corporate officer when the officer complained of an improper transfer of funds. The evidence was relevant to show consciousness of guilt.

United States v. Allee, 299 F.3d 996 (8th Cir. 2002) : Affirming convictions for bank robbery, carjacking, and related offenses, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of excerpts from taped telephone calls made by the defendant while he was in jail awaiting trial. The excerpts permitted the jury to infer that the defendant was attempting to create an alibi, implicate others in the crimes, or persuade witnesses to remain silent.

United States v. Gonzalez-Torres, 309 F.3d 594 (9th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed a conviction for smuggling illegal aliens, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that defendant's index finger was badly defaced, since this tended to prove that he sought to evade the Border Patrol's identification system.

United States v. Wright, 392 F.3d 1269 (11th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, holding that evidence of the defendant's resistance to arrest following a traffic stop and his battery on a law enforcement officer was inextricably intertwined with the discovery of the weapon. The Court also found that the evidence was relevant to showing consciousness of guilt.

[d] Consciousness of Guilt -- Criminal Cases -- Threats to Witnesses

United States v. Gilbert, 229 F.3d 15 (1st Cir. 2000) : A nurse at a VA hospital was charged with capital murder after patients in her care died in suspicious circumstances. The prosecution theory was that she had injected the patients with drugs causing cardiac difficulties in order to gain attention, especially from a hospital police officer with whom she was having an affair. Before the trial the Judge granted an in limine motion to exclude, inter alia, evidence that the defendant had (a) made anonymous threatening calls to the hospital when she knew the officer would be answering the telephone, (b) harassed and threatened the officer after he ended their relationship and agreed to cooperate with authorities, and (c) one time blocked his car in his driveway and pleaded with him not to keep an appointment with investigators, and when he refused, followed him to the appointment and vandalized his car while he was being interviewed. On an interlocutory appeal, the Court affirmed all the rulings except the last. Since the Judge heard much of the evidence in the defendant's prior trial for making the threatening calls, it was within his discretion to conclude that most of the defendant's conduct was far more likely attributable to anger at the disloyal officer and other co-workers than to a quixotic attempt to head off the criminal investigation, and thus its probative value as consciousness of guilt was substantially outweighed by the risks of undue prejudice and misleading the jury. However, the Court found that the evidence regarding blocking the officer's car was more readily explainable as the product of an obstructive intent and therefore far more probative of a guilty conscience, and at the same time far less inflammatory, so it was an abuse of discretion to exclude the evidence. Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession in United States v. Bartelho, 71 F.3d 436 (1st Cir. 1995) , the Court held that evidence that the defendant threatened to kill a witness was properly admitted. Before trial the witness testified on tape that the defendant had a gun, but at trial the witness denied this. The evidence of the death threats was important as the jury decided which version of events to believe. In United States v. Pina, n56 the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit evidence of alleged threats made by the defendant to a witness after he testified, since the inflammatory potential outweighed any probative value, given that the witness had completed the testimony and could not be influenced by the threat.

United States v. Guerrero, 803 F.2d 783 (3d Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed drug convictions, holding that evidence that a defendant threatened an alleged coconspirator to discourage him from testifying was properly admitted with an appropriate limiting instruction. Although threat evidence may be admitted to prove consciousness of guilt, it can be extremely prejudicial. The factors that should be weighed "include the importance and centrality to the ultimate issue in the case of the fact sought to be proved by the threat evidence, and the availability of other evidence to establish the fact sought to be proven by use of the threat evidence."

United States v. Savage, 390 F.3d 823 (4th Cir. 2004), vacated on other grounds, 545 U.S. 1102 (2005) : The Court affirmed convictions arising out of a scheme to defraud several investors, especially single, older women, by inducing them to invest in phony business ventures. It found no abuse of discretion when evidence of recorded calls on the defendant's ex-wife's answering machine, in which the defendant threatened her for cooperating with the government, was admitted. In a prosecution on charges of interstate kidnapping and causing the death of another through the use of a firearm, United States v. Young, 248 F.3d 260 (4th Cir. 2001) , the Judge admitted evidence that the defendant had threatened and intimidated the victim's mother. Affirming the convictions, the Court found that this evidence was properly admitted to demonstrate the defendant's consciousness of guilt: "Young did not chase and assault a random bystander; he assaulted the victim's mother, who was a potential witness against him in a federal prosecution for murder."

United States v. Copeland, 321 F.3d 582 (6th Cir. 2002) : Affirming convictions for conspiracy to distribute a controlled substance, the Court found an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) when the prosecution was permitted to introduce testimony from a jailhouse informant that he overheard two defendants discuss their intention to pay someone $500 to "get" an Assistant United States Attorney. While the threat could indicate that the defendants believed the AUSA would succeed in obtaining guilty verdicts, and thus possessed some probative value as to the defendants' consciousness of guilt, "the lack of specificity linking the statements to the charged conduct permits only a weak inference." The slight probative value of the statements was substantially outweighed by their tendency to cast an extremely negative light upon the defendants' characters and to cause the jury to make impermissible inferences.

United States v. Miller, 276 F.3d 370 (7th Cir. 2002) : Affirming fraud convictions, the Court found no error in the refusal to grant a mistrial after the jury heard that Miller's husband had threatened a codefendant who was thinking about cooperating with the prosecution. The Court held that threats to potential government witnesses made by a person connected with the defendant are admissible to show the defendant's consciousness of guilt. In this case, the threat was relevant to show that the defendant was conscious that the codefendant's potential cooperation with the prosecution could damage her case, and thus that she was conscious of her guilt. In United States v. Holly, 167 F.3d 393 (7th Cir. 1999) , the Court affirmed fraud convictions, finding no error when the government was permitted to bring out on direct examination that the defendant had threatened witnesses, since defense counsel indicated that he intended to use the witnesses' prior statements exculpatory of the defendant on cross-examination. In a drug trafficking prosecution, United States v. Thomas, n57 the Court held that it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to admit evidence of threats against witnesses by the ringleader's brother and other unidentified individuals. The threat evidence did not explain specific behavior of the witnesses, such as inconsistent statements, delays in testifying, or courtroom demeanor; rather, it was offered only to aid in evaluating the witnesses' "general credibility." For that latter purpose, the evidence had extremely limited probative value, while it could be highly prejudicial in appealing to the jury's sympathies, arousing a sense of horror, and provoking an instinct to punish.

United States v. Davis, 154 F.3d 772 (8th Cir. 1998) : The Court affirmed convictions for drug and firearm offenses. It held that taped telephone conversations in which one defendant tried to convince his girlfriend not to cooperate with authorities were properly admitted, where the Trial Judge redacted the tapes and related transcripts to limit possible references to other defendants.

[20] Conviction Offered in Civil Case

Gray v. Genlyte Group, Inc., 289 F.3d 128 (1st Cir. 2002) : Affirming a judgment for the employer in a sexual harassment action, the Court upheld the exclusion of the harasser's misdemeanor conviction for "accosting" the plaintiff by making tongue gestures mimicking oral sex. Although the Court found that the conviction was relevant, the accosting statute and the sexual harassment statute set different standards, so it was "easy to imagine violations of the [accosting] statute that would not constitute serious harassment." In Gil de Rebollo v. Miami Heat Ass'n, 137 F.3d 56 (1st Cir. 1998) , a spectator at a professional basketball game was injured when a team mascot pulled her from her front row seat. As a result of charges filed by the spectator, the mascot was convicted of misdemeanor battery. The Court found no abuse of discretion when evidence of the conviction was excluded in this personal injury action based on the same incident. The jurors had sufficient other evidence to gauge the seriousness of the mascot's actions, and there was a risk that admission of the conviction would allow the jury to substitute the judgment reached in the criminal proceeding for its own.

[21] Courtroom Identifications

United States v. Brien, 59 F.3d 274 (1st Cir. 1995) : The Court affirmed an armed bank robbery conviction, holding there was no abuse of discretion in rejecting defense counsel's proposal to have the defendant seated in the spectator section of the courtroom and to salt the audience with three or four individuals of the same general description as the bank robber. The proposed plan, which counsel had ample invitations to modify, was fully capable of misleading the jury.

[22] Cultural Stereotypes

United States v. Verduzco, 373 F.3d 1022 (9th Cir. 2004) : Affirming a conviction for illegal drug importation, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony of a sociologist expert, in support of a duress defense, about the pervasiveness and violence of the Tijuana drug cartels. The Court held that the testimony was properly excluded under Rule 403 because the defendant was asking the jury to draw inferences based on cultural stereotypes. Moreover, the testimony lacked connection to the facts of the case: the defendant testified that he lacked a reasonable opportunity to escape threatened harm because of distrust of police authorities who previously stopped him and asked for money, but he did not mention fear of drug cartels.

[23] Cumulative Evidence

[a] Civil Cases

Miller v. Town of Hull, 878 F.2d 523 (1st Cir. 1989) : In this action by members of a town redevelopment authority alleging violation of First Amendment rights by the defendant Town and its Board of Selectmen in removing them, the Trial Court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the Board's 95-page final decision. The Judge weighed the document's probative value against its prejudicial and cumulative effects and permitted the defendants to put the information it contained, which the plaintiffs were not attacking, before the jury through testimony.

International Minerals & Resources, S.A. v. Pappas, 96 F.3d 586 (2d Cir. 1996) : In an action for tortious interference with a contract to acquire a ship, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding letters relating to the plaintiffs' plans for the ship, which were relevant to damages, as the evidence was already before the jury in the form of testimony from witnesses. In Zaken v. Boerer, 964 F.2d 1319 (2d Cir. 1992) , an action alleging employment discrimination based on pregnancy, the Court reversed a judgment for the defendant, principal owner and executive of a company designing and selling women's clothing, on the ground that it was error to exclude a statement by the vice president for sales that the plaintiff's predecessor had been fired because she was pregnant. Where none of the plaintiff's three witnesses testified to the statement or gave objective direct evidence that pregnancy played a role in the defendant's employment decisions, the evidence should not have been excluded as cumulative.

Robert S. v. Stetson School, Inc., 256 F.3d 159 (3d Cir. 2001) : The plaintiff, who had been placed in a school specializing in the treatment and education of juvenile sex offenders, alleged that staff members subjected him to physical and psychological abuse in violation of the school's policy against "horseplay." The Court found no abuse of discretion in precluding testimony by an expert in child abuse on grounds that would result in undue delay, waste of time, or needless presentation of cumulative evidence, since two other witnesses, both psychologists, testified at length about the impact that the alleged abuse could have.

City of Cleveland v. Cleveland Elec. Illuminating Co., 734 F.2d 1157 (6th Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the utility in an antitrust action, holding there was no error in excluding a stipulation, entered into before the first of two trials, that the defendant utility had sponsored a taxpayer's suit that challenged a Federal Power Commission decision to require it to interconnect with the City's utility. The Court found (2-1) that the stipulation was cumulative of other evidence concerning the defendant's attempts to eliminate competition and that it might have confused the jury by leading it to think that the taxpayer's suit was an anticompetitive act, which it was not.

Goodwin v. MTD Prods., Inc., 232 F.3d 600 (7th Cir. 2000) : A plaintiff alleged that he suffered an eye injury when struck by a plastic wingnut that had vibrated loose from the lawnmower he was using. The Court affirmed a judgment against the manufacturer, finding no abuse of discretion when the defendant's expert witness was not permitted to show videotapes of tests he conducted demonstrating how various objects were thrown from a moving mower and how vibration from a running mower would not cause a properly tightened wingnut to loosen. The videos were cumulative of the witness' testimony regarding the tests and a therefore a waste of the jury's time. A videotape showing proper assembly of a lawnmower was likewise cumulative, since the mower was in plain view of the jury and assembly of the wingnut in question could be readily demonstrated.

Tran v. Toyota Motor Corp., 420 F.3d 1310 (11th Cir. 2005) : In a product liability action the Court held there was no abuse of discretion when testimony from an expert witness for the plaintiff was excluded on the ground that the expert's opinions, and the bases for those opinions, were the same as those of another expert who was permitted to testify. The Judge had considered the excluded expert's deposition and expert witness report and had extensively examined his qualifications, and while the Court suggested that it might have reached a contrary conclusion, it found the decision that the evidence was cumulative was within the Judge's permissible "range of choice."

[b] Cumulative Evidence -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Crosby, 713 F.2d 1066 (5th Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed convictions for kidnapping offenses, finding no error in the exclusion of out-of-court writings in a journal and oral statements by the defendant that were offered in support of his defense that he suffered posttraumatic stress syndrome as a result of his service in Vietnam. Expert witnesses were permitted to rely on this evidence and it was disclosed to the jury. Admission of additional testimony would have been cumulative. The Court also upheld the exclusion of records of a Veterans Outreach Center that contained opinions by counselors without training in psychiatry and were cumulative of testimony provided by experts for the defense. In United States v. Edwards, n58 the Court upheld extortion and mail fraud convictions, finding that a Trial Judge who admitted the testimony of five character witnesses for the defense did not abuse his discretion in refusing a continuance so that the defendant could present 25 additional character witnesses.

United States v. Williamson, 202 F.3d 974 (7th Cir. 2000) : Affirming a conviction for cocaine possession, the Court rejected an argument that cross-examination of the informant who purchased cocaine from the defendant was impermissibly curtailed. The Court observed that the defendant had numerous opportunities to attack the witness, and noted that a Trial Judge has discretion to exclude cumulative evidence even though the evidence is offered to impeach an important witness. See also United States v. Kizeart, n59 discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 403.02[15]. In United States v. Williams, n60 a long drug conspiracy trial, prisoner witnesses testified that they had been separated in jail and had no opportunity to coordinate their testimony, but the defendants found out that the witnesses had in fact been assigned for a year to a unit in which they could mingle 16 hours a day. The Trial Judge refused to admit this evidence, on the ground that it was merely cumulative of evidence that the witnesses had been let out of their cells for an hour each day in which they could freely mingle. Vacating and remanding for further proceedings on a motion for new trial, the Court held that there was a significant difference between one and 16 hours daily freedom in coordinating testimony, and therefore in the impeaching effect of the evidence, so it was not merely cumulative.

United States v. Koessel, 706 F.2d 271 (8th Cir. 1983) : The Court found no error in a cocaine possession case in limiting the defense to three character witnesses.

United States v. Scholl, 166 F.3d 964 (9th Cir. 1999) : Appealing convictions for filing false tax returns and currency structuring, the defendant contended that it was error to limit him to three character witnesses. The Court found no error in the Judge's reasoning that additional character witnesses would be cumulative under the circumstances. In United States v. Ives, n61 the Court said it was error (but harmless) to reject defense evidence of past mental condition in support of an insanity defense and emphasized that Judges should not be quick to exclude (as cumulative) evidence of medical history that supports such a defense.

United States v. Shelton, 736 F.2d 1397 (10th Cir. 1984) : The Court held it was not an abuse of discretion to reduce the number of defense witnesses from 78 to five where each witness would have said the same thing -- i.e., the defendant did not ask for kickbacks and none were paid -- even though the defendant was charged with 177 counts of mail fraud and extortion.

United States v. Johnson, 730 F.2d 683 (11th Cir. 1984) : Upholding convictions involving the filing of false statements with a federal agency, the Court affirmed a ruling that the defense could only present three character witnesses to testify as to a government witness' character for untruthfulness.

[24] Defendant's Exculpatory Evidence

United States v. Reynolds, 268 F.3d 572 (8th Cir. 2001) : The Court affirmed convictions for dealing in stolen property, finding no error in the exclusion of evidence that syringes were found in the vehicle of a cooperating witness. Because the witness admitted stealing property, the evidence, which tended to show he stole to support his drug habit, was irrelevant on the issue of whether the witness stole it alone or with the defendant. The Court also found no error in refusing to admit the syringes to impeach the witness's testimony, since the evidence was cumulative of the impeachment evidence offered, including a prior drug conviction and purchases of methamphetamine with a fraudulent credit card. In United States v. Flaherty, 76 F.3d 967 (8th Cir. 1996) , the defendant, who owned the business that was destroyed by two deliberately set fires, argued that a high school student, T.E.H., set the fire in retaliation for being fired by the defendant, and as part of a long-standing dispute with the defendant's son. The defendant proffered evidence that T.E.H. had started a fire in the defendant's son's locker three months before the defendant's business was destroyed. Affirming a conviction for aiding and abetting arson, the Court found no abuse of discretion in exclusion of the evidence, noting that at the time of the ruling, the defendant had made only a "weak" offer of proof, i.e., a dismissed arson charge as to the locker incident. Moreover, the fire in the locker was lit with a match while the fires at the defendant's business were "of more sophisticated origin." The dissenting Judge argued that the evidence of the locker fire was relevant to prove that someone else did the crime, and that the evidence would not have influenced the jury to decide the case on an improper basis.

United States v. Spencer, 1 F.3d 742 (9th Cir. 1992) , amended (9th Cir. 1993): The defendant was charged with felon firearm possession after a gun was found in a search of a car in which he was a passenger. When Miller, the owner of the car, was arrested five days later, a gun was found in the car he was driving. Pursuing a theory that the gun charged to him belonged to Miller, the defendant offered police reports of Miller's arrest to show that Miller possessed a gun similar to the one attributed to the defendant. A divided Court held there was no error in excluding the police reports under Rule 403. The dissenting Judge argued that the reports clearly were probative of mistaken identity and that there was no reason to believe that evidence relating to Miller would have confused the issues, misled the jury, or prejudiced the government, and that the Court was perpetuating "an increasingly common double-standard in criminal cases -- a standard that allows prosecutors inordinate leeway with respect to the introduction of evidence harmful to the defendant while precluding defendants from introducing evidence that would tend to establish their innocence."

[25] Dog Sniff Evidence

United States v. Rosario-Peralta, 199 F.3d 552 (1st Cir. 1999) : Customs officials boarded the defendants' nearby vessel after bales of cocaine were found floating on the high seas. They found no drugs, but a drug-detecting dog gave a positive alert. Affirming, the Court noted that opinions indicating that a positive dog sniff is not probative because most of the currency in the United States is contaminated by trace amounts of cocaine were "irrelevant" because the dog in this case was sniffing a vessel, not currency. The possibilities that the dog might have alerted to a different drug than the cocaine found floating in the ocean, or to a drug contamination occurring months previously, went only to the weight of the evidence. While the evidence of a positive dog sniff was detrimental to the defendants' case, this was not "unfair" prejudice within the meaning of Rule 403. In United States v. Saccoccia, 58 F.3d 754 (1st Cir. 1995) , the Court affirmed convictions arising from a conspiracy to launder drug money, holding that evidence that a drug-detecting dog alerted to the presence of drugs in bundles of cash brought to local banks by the conspirators was properly admitted. Although the probative value of a dog's positive alert is subject to question, the Court reasoned that a trained dog's alert has some probative value, and the dog's frenzied reaction in this case was caused by more than a mere trace of contamination. In addition, several human witnesses detected a funny smell on the money. The Court also observed that the defendant called experts who questioned the protocol used by the dog's handler.

United States v. Carr, 25 F.3d 1194 (3d Cir. 1994) : The Court held in a money laundering prosecution that evidence, including the reactions of drug-sniffing canines, was sufficient to show that the defendants knew the money involved was derived from illegal drug trafficking. One Judge believed that unrefuted studies indicating a trained dog will alert to all bundles of used currency, because a substantial portion of currency now in circulation is tainted with controlled substances, mean that it is not reasonable to infer that a person in possession of used currency bundles was a drug trafficker or associated with one, and that it is unfairly prejudicial to admit dog-alert evidence.

United States v. Buchanan, 213 F.3d 302 (6th Cir. 2000) : In a drug conspiracy case, the prosecution was permitted to introduce evidence that dogs trained to detect the scent of narcotics had reacted positively to currency seized from the defendants. A majority of the Court concluded that there should be a presumption against the admissibility of dog sniff evidence -- because of the widespread contamination of currency with narcotics residues and the likely prejudicial effect of the evidence -- and that admission of the evidence was an abuse of discretion in this case, but held that the error was harmless.

United States v. Hubbard, 61 F.3d 1261 (7th Cir. 1995) : In a drug trafficking prosecution, the government introduced evidence that after the defendant was arrested a narcotics detection dog alerted to the scent of narcotics on a speaker cover camouflaging a secret compartment in the back of the defendant's vehicle. Agreeing that the canine alert was presumptively inadmissible to show that the defendant had trafficked in cocaine 17 months earlier, the Court held nevertheless that the evidence was relevant to rebut the defendant's contention that the compartment had been used solely to carry cash from his gas stations, and that the existence of innocent explanations for the dog's alerting did not make the evidence unduly prejudicial.

[26] Drugs; Drug and Alcohol Use

[a] Civil Cases

Swajian v. General Motors Corp., 916 F.2d 31 (1st Cir. 1990) : The plaintiff in a product liability action alleged that his decedent was killed in a rollover accident caused by a defective axle in the vehicle she was driving. The Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff, holding that the Trial Judge had not properly weighed probative value and prejudicial effect in excluding evidence relating to the decedent's alcohol consumption and blood alcohol level.

Burke v. Spartanics Ltd., 252 F.3d 131 (2d Cir. 2001) : In a product liability action by a worker whose fingers were amputated in a metal shearing machine, the plaintiff's pretrial motion to preclude evidence of his illegal drug use was granted after he agreed not to pursue a damages theory based on his increased drug use in the aftermath of the accident. However, at trial his psychiatrist, answering a cross-examination question concerning the number of sessions conducted with the plaintiff, referred to the plaintiff's "increasing use of marijuana and alcohol." The Court held there was no abuse of discretion when defense counsel immediately followed with further questions about the plaintiff's preaccident drug use. The psychiatrist, not the defense, had opened the door to the inquiry, and the Trial Judge gave appropriate limiting instructions to minimize the danger of unfair prejudice. In an investor's action against his broker for selling securities to satisfy a margin call in October 1987, Conway v. Icahn & Co., 16 F.3d 504 (2d Cir. 1994) , the defendant sought to introduce records that the plaintiff had been hospitalized in 1978, 1986, 1987, and 1988 for alcohol abuse, to show that he was incapable of making investment decisions during the relevant period. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the 1987 records, since they related to hospitalization immediately after the relevant period, and in excluding the other records, which would have been more prejudicial than probative.

Estate of Larkins v. Farrell Lines, Inc., 806 F.2d 510 (4th Cir. 1986) : In an action by a sailor's estate against a shipowner, the Court held that evidence of the sailor's prior alcoholism was relevant to the cause, severity, and treatment of epileptic seizures, to his complaint of medical malpractice, and to the allegations of the shipowner's negligence in failing to take special precautions in his behalf.

Harless v. Boyle-Midway Div., 594 F.2d 1051 (5th Cir. 1979) : In a wrongful death action resulting from a youth's death from inhaling a Freon propellant in a household product, the Court said that evidence that the youth used marijuana should not have been admitted on the issue of the value of the loss sustained by the mother, since it was more prejudicial than probative.

Grimes v. Mazda North Am. Operations, 355 F.3d 566 (6th Cir. 2004) : In a product liability action against the manufacturer of a truck involved in a rollover accident, an important question was whether the plaintiff was wearing a seatbelt at the time. The plaintiff testified that she always wore a seatbelt and was wearing one at the time of the accident. But when she was brought to the hospital after the accident, she told hospital personnel that she had not been wearing a seatbelt. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the plaintiff had consumed alcohol, marijuana, and cocaine before the accident. It reasoned that the evidence would help the jury sort out which of the plaintiff's accounts of seat belt usage was accurate, since alcohol or drug use before the accident "could have impaired plaintiff's memory of the evening or caused her to not use a seatbelt even if she would normally use it." In Diamond v. Howd, 288 F.3d 932 (6th Cir. 2002) , a civil rights action against a police officer for an illegal arrest, the Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in admitting an audiotape of the arrestee's hysterical telephone conversation with a police dispatcher. The tape showed the arrestee's state of mind prior to the officer's arrival and "was no more prejudicial than [the officer's] account of her drunken behavior."

Jenkins v. Chrysler Motors Corp., 316 F.3d 663 (7th Cir. 2002) : Affirming a judgment for a truck manufacturer in a suit by a plaintiff injured by a fire while sleeping in a truck, the Court found no abuse of discretion when evidence of the plaintiff's past alcohol use was admitted. A pretrial motion in limine had excluded evidence of the past alcohol use and drunk driving convictions, but at trial the plaintiff's father testified that before the fire the defendant was a happy person with a "twinkle in his eye" and afterwards he was depressed. The Court held that the alcohol evidence was admissible because it "purportedly showed that he couldn't have been all that happy before, either." The father's testimony opened the door to the alcohol evidence. In a personal injury action arising from an automobile accident, Mankey v. Bennett, 38 F.3d 353 (7th Cir. 1994) , the defendant sought to introduce evidence of the plaintiff's drug and alcohol abuse and expert testimony regarding the effect of such abuse on the plaintiff's life expectancy and earning capacity. The Trial Judge excluded the expert testimony because the expert had not been listed on the pretrial order and excluded the substance abuse evidence. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court upheld exclusion of the expert testimony and held that without the expert testimony, any probative value of the substance abuse evidence was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice.

Simco v. Ellis, 303 F.3d 929 (8th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiffs in an automobile accident case, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence that the driver of a tractor-trailer involved in the accident had ingested cocaine on the morning of the accident. The Trial Judge had found that the drug test was incomplete and the results unreliable, and that there was no evidence that the driver was intoxicated or impaired at the time of the accident. In a product liability case brought by a passenger who was injured while riding in a vehicle manufactured by the defendant, Dillon v. Nissan Motor Co., 986 F.2d 263 (8th Cir. 1993) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant, holding that evidence of the plaintiff's cocaine and marijuana use was properly admitted as a possible cause for the aggressive and hostile behavior that the plaintiff attributed to the accident. In O'Dell v. Hercules, Inc., n62 an action for personal injuries from exposure to a toxic landfill, the defendant called one plaintiff as an adverse witness and asked about his use of marijuana and cocaine. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion, as the evidence had some tendency to indicate the plaintiff's attitude to risks from exposure to toxic chemicals, and in the circumstances was not harmfully prejudicial.

Phillips v. Hillcrest Medical Center, 244 F.3d 790 (10th Cir. 2001) : In a medical malpractice action alleging improper diagnosis and treatment in a hospital emergency room, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the patient failed to inform the defendants of his prior drug use. This failure to give a complete medical history was clearly relevant to the defense of contributory negligence, and any prejudicial effect did not unfairly and substantially outweigh the probative value.

Fitzgerald v. McDaniel, 833 F.2d 1516 (11th Cir. 1987) : Affirming a judgment for an arrestee in a suit alleging excessive force, the Court upheld the exclusion as unduly prejudicial of evidence of marijuana cultivation as well as threats allegedly made by the plaintiff to the arresting officer.

[b] Drugs; Drug and Alcohol Use -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Carlos Cruz, 352 F.3d 499 (1st Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed drug-trafficking convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony from an arresting officer that the site of the incident in question was a drug point. The evidence "was probative not only to explain [the agent's] presence at the scene but also to corroborate the inference that [the defendants] were involved in a drug-trafficking scheme ... . So understood, the district court could have concluded that the prejudice caused by such testimony was not unfair; it was, instead, merely the negative result of the testimony's probative value." In a drug conspiracy case, United States v. Gonzalez-Vazquez, 219 F.3d 37 (1st Cir. 2000) , the Court found no error in the admission of testimony from a police officer that he had arrested the defendant for a traffic violation as the defendant left the housing project where the drug activity occurred, and the defendant was found to be carrying drug paraphernalia. The testimony was relevant because it suggested that the defendant was a member of the drug ring at the housing project and the evidence did not create any "unfair" prejudice within the meaning of Rule 403.

United States v. Ruggiero, 934 F.2d 440 (2d Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed convictions for conspiring to obstruct a grand jury investigation into the former whereabouts of a deceased narcotics fugitive, holding there had been no abuse of discretion when an FBI agent testified on redirect that many of those who attended the fugitive's memorial service, including the defendants, had been arrested for drug offenses. After defense counsel suggested repeatedly on cross-examination that the FBI acted improperly in observing the service, it was proper to correct this misimpression by testimony as to the reasons for the surveillance, including prior arrests. The Court also held that evidence of the fugitive's narcotics activities was relevant to the defendants' motives for conspiring to obstruct justice; it was not an abuse of discretion to determine that this probative value outweighed any possible prejudicial effect of guilt by association.

United States v. Blandina, 895 F.2d 293 (7th Cir. 1989) : In a tax evasion prosecution, the government offered evidence of large marijuana transactions involving the defendant. The Court held that the evidence was clearly relevant in a "net worth" case, where the government was required to prove a likely source of income; the Trial Judge had made a finding that the witness was credible before allowing him to testify and had given a careful instruction about the limited purpose for the evidence, which abated any possible unfair prejudice.

United States v. Lupino, 301 F.3d 642 (8th Cir. 2002) : An officer testified that he was alone and out of uniform when he encountered the defendant the morning after the charged assault and the defendant asked if he were interested in buying some "smoke." Not wishing to effect an arrest without his weapon, handcuffs, or backup, he said he was interested in buying marijuana and would be back, but when he returned, the defendant was no longer there and was shortly thereafter found hiding in a neighbor's house. The Court held that the officer's testimony was relevant to show the factual context for the arrest and as evidence of consciousness of guilt, but depiction of the defendant as a drug dealer was unnecessary and prejudicial: "[b]y disclosing the content of the conversation, the government risked creating an undue tendency for the jury to reach a decision on an improper basis." However, the error in permitting mention of the marijuana was harmless. In United States v. Gundersen, 195 F.3d 1035 (8th Cir. 1999) , the defendant was charged with conspiring to possess methamphetamine with intent to distribute after he showed up for a controlled delivery. The Court found no error in asking the defendant on cross-examination whether he used the drug. Use would have been relevant, because "[t]he fact that one uses a certain drug places one in proximity to that drug and can make it more likely than it otherwise would be, depending on the other proof in the case, that the same person was dealing in the drug."

United States v. Blackstone, 56 F.3d 1143 (9th Cir. 1995) : The Court reversed a conviction for felon firearm possession because marijuana paraphernalia and methamphetamine recipes found in the defendant's truck at the time of his arrest were erroneously admitted. It stated that "[t]he reasons the Courts have been willing to assume that drug-trafficking is relevant to the question whether the defendant possessed a firearm do not support drawing a connection between the possession of marijuana for personal use and the possession of a firearm." The recipes by themselves were not closely linked to immediate illegal activity, and they were likely to prejudice the defendant by connecting him to the highly charged public issue of drug trafficking.

United States v. Espinoza, 244 F.3d 1234 (10th Cir. 2001) : Affirming a marijuana conviction, the Court held that evidence that the defendant's wife had a pending drug charge and accompanied the defendant when he previously transported drugs was properly admitted as probative of the defendant's knowledge that drugs were in his truck. However, it held that it was error (but harmless) to admit evidence that the defendant's sons had drug convictions and one had escaped from a halfway house. There was no suggestion at trial that the sons were involved in the drug transaction at issue. Moreover, even if the evidence had some tangential relevance, that was substantially outweighed by the prejudicial impression that most if not all members of the defendant's immediate family were involved in drug trafficking.

[27] Employment Discrimination Cases

[a] Administrative Determinations

Coleman v. Home Depot, Inc., 306 F.3d 1333 (3d Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed a judgment for an employer sued by a discharged African-American female employee, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of an EEOC right-to-sue letter. The Court noted that the admissibility of such reports under the hearsay exception for public records was dependent in part on an analysis of the Rule 403 factors. Although some prior decisions intimated that the probative value of EEOC determinations almost always outweighs any prejudicial impact, the Court noted that the other Rule 403 factors could be dispositive, especially where the report has low probative value. In this case, the "proof value could be said to be low, given the fact that it would have been introduced to the jury after all the evidence had been offered (which evidence was at odds with the EEOC report), and was more conclusory than factual in nature," while "a great deal of time would have had to have been consumed to counter the report's conclusion about the fate of other employees, male and female."

Martin v. Cavalier Hotel Corp., 48 F.3d 1343 (4th Cir. 1995) : In a former employee's Title VII action alleging constructive discharge as a result of sexual harassment, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding a report by a state agency concluding that the plaintiff was not entitled to unemployment benefits because she left her job voluntarily. The parties to the report were available to testify at the trial, and the jury might have placed undue weight on the official report.

Plemer v. Parsons-Gilbane, 713 F.2d 1127 (5th Cir. 1983) : In an employment discrimination case, the Court indicated there was no error in excluding the plaintiff's evidence of an administrative settlement indicating that another woman had been paid discriminatorily, since this shed almost no light on whether the plaintiff's salary resulted from discrimination. However, the Trial Judge should not have excluded as irrelevant a letter written by a government contract compliance officer to the defendant that gave notice of deficiencies discovered in an on-site review. The letter might have shown widespread discrimination and thus would have tended to show that justifications for salary differences were pretextual.

White v. Honeywell, Inc., 141 F.3d 1270 (8th Cir. 1998) : The Court reversed a judgment for the employer in a Title VII action on other grounds, but it found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding the outcome of three administrative charges brought by the plaintiff. Admission or exclusion of EEOC determinations is a matter left to the sound discretion of the Trial Judge, and here they were relevant to an expert diagnosis of the plaintiff's mental condition, the sequence of events, and the plaintiff's testimony of improper acts on behalf of the defendant. The plaintiff was given an opportunity to discredit the agency determinations, and the jury was warned not to consider the agency findings as binding.

Beachy v. Boise Cascade Corp., 191 F.3d 1010 (9th Cir. 1999) : In a disability discrimination case, the Judge admitted a state agency determination that there was insufficient evidence to continue its investigation of the plaintiff's case without balancing probative value and prejudicial effect of the determination, apparently feeling compelled to admit the evidence by Plummer v. Western Int'l Hotels Co., n63 which held that probable cause determinations were per se admissible in employment discrimination cases. The Court held that the two types of determination are distinguishable, since there is much greater risk of prejudice to the plaintiff's case with a final agency determination of insufficient facts than to the defendant's case with a finding of probable cause, which is not a finding of discrimination but only a preliminary finding. In this case, however, the failure to balance was at worst harmless error.

Walker v. NationsBank of Fla. N.A., 53 F.3d 1548 (11th Cir. 1995) : In a Title VII and ADEA action by a discharged bank manager, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding a letter from the EEOC finding reasonable cause to believe the bank had discriminated. Although it is well established in the Circuit that EEOC determinations are generally admissible in bench trials, the Judge was properly concerned in this jury trial that the determination by another EEOC office that there was no probable cause would shift the jury's focus away from the issue of whether the bank had discriminated and towards the procedural adequacy of the two investigations.

[b] Employment Discrimination Cases -- Balancing Required

Lyons v. England, 307 F.3d 1092 (9th Cir. 2002) : The Trial Judge granted summary judgment for the Secretary of the Navy in a suit by male African-American military veterans alleging that they were subjected to disparate treatment because of their race and were subjected to retaliation in violation of Title VII. Affirming in part and reversing in part, the Court held that although pre-limitations period claims are time-barred under AMTRAK v. Morgan, 536 U.S. 101, 122 S. Ct. 2061, 153 L. Ed. 2d 106 (2002) , it looked to the Supreme Court's decision in United Air Lines, Inc. v. Evans, 431 U.S. 553 (1977) , and concluded that untimely evidence of the employer's discriminatory acts may constitute relevant background evidence in a proceeding in which the status of a current practice is at issue, subject to Rule 403.

Heno v. Sprint/United Mgmt. Co., 208 F.3d 847 (10th Cir. 2000) : Remanding an employment discrimination action, the Court observed that if a fake employment application incorporating sterotypes of African-Americans, which was discovered on the desks of one or more of the defendant company's employees, were again offered by the plaintiff, the Judge should require a foundation showing a causal nexus between the document and the defendant company (particularly through the defendant supervisor) that is substantial, because of the highly prejudicial nature of the document. If such a foundation is laid and the Judge determines that the probative value of the document is not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, it should be admitted in its entirety rather than merely referred to as a "one page racially defamatory document," as was done at the first trial; such a reference, made repeatedly, served only to heighten the jury's view of the document's importance.

[c] Employment Discrimination Cases -- Evidence of Discrimination Admissible

Fredrick v. District of Columbia, 254 F.3d 156 (D.C. Cir. 2001) : Affirming a judgment for black police officers in a Title VII action alleging discrimination in assignment and promotion, the Court upheld the admission of evidence regarding the actions of a lieutenant who was allegedly responsible in part for the discrimination in dealing with another black officer involved in an altercation with a white officer. The evidence was relevant to show racial bias on the part of the lieutenant and there was little danger that evidence concerning this isolated incident would lead to a "mini-trial" or would confuse the jury.

Cummings v. Standard Register Co., 265 F.3d 56 (1st Cir. 2001) : In an age discrimination case brought by a discharged employee, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by two other former employees of the company that they had been terminated after having been told they were "too old" and that the company needed to make room for "young blood." Although the testimony covered different time periods, different supervisors, and different areas of the company from the plaintiff's situation, it was particularly relevant because the defendant had introduced evidence of its national corporate practices of nondiscrimination. Because the plaintiff had more direct evidence of age discrimination, the Court found that the anecdotal testimony was not so central to his case that it overwhelmingly influenced the jury's verdict and thus its probative value was not substantially outweighed by the potential for prejudice. In Kelley v. Airborne Freight Corp., 140 F.3d 335 (1st Cir. 1998) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff, who alleged that he was fired due to age discrimination, finding no error in the admission of age-related comments made by supervisors in the company. These statements were relevant to show an age-related basis for the plaintiff's termination, and were also probative to show a "discriminatory atmosphere" at the company.

Perry v. Ethan Allen, Inc., 115 F.3d 143 (2d Cir. 1997) : Although the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in a sexual harassment case, it found that the Trial Judge excluded relevant evidence in ruling that sexual harassment of other women employees of the defendant would not be admitted unless the plaintiff had personal knowledge of the harassment. The issue of a hostile workplace involves the totality of the circumstances, which includes evidence of harassment directed at employees other than the plaintiff. The Court criticized the Judge's approach to Rule 403, treating evidence as unfairly prejudicial when it establishes the defendant's liability, rather than only when it had an undue tendency to lead to the case being decided on an improper basis.

Hurley v. Atlantic City Police Dep't, 174 F.3d 95 (3d Cir. 1999) : In a sexual discrimination case brought by a female police officer, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of other women's experiences at the police department and of derogatory comments made by male officers about women generally, even though the plaintiff was not aware of any of the alleged harassment until after she commenced suit. The evidence created a basis for an inference that the plaintiff was targeted for abuse because she was a woman and gave reason to infer that the department knew or should have known not only what was happening to its female officers but also that its written sexual harassment policy was patently ineffective. Because the evidence was highly probative for those purposes, it was unlikely that any putative prejudice from it would be unfair or would outweigh its value. In an age discrimination case, Abrams v. Lightolier, Inc., 50 F.3d 1204 (3d Cir. 1995) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff, holding that statements by the plaintiff's supervisor indicating an age animus were properly admitted. "Because discriminatory comments by an executive connected with the decisionmaking process will often be the plaintiff's strongest circumstantial evidence of discrimination, they are highly relevant and a Trial Court's decision to admit such evidence should ordinarily be upheld."

Robinson v. Runyon, 149 F.3d 507 (6th Cir. 1998) : In a Title VII action by a Postal Service employee who alleged that she had been subjected to a racially discriminatory discharge, the Magistrate Judge excluded evidence that a fake employment application incorporating a litany of racial stereotypes of African-Americans had been widely circulating through the facility where the plaintiff worked and that no disciplinary action had been taken. Reversing, the Court found an abuse of discretion, since the evidence was relevant to show the racially hostile attitudes in the office and the racial insensitivity among the supervisors within the office, while the racially inflammatory nature of the evidence did not give rise to prejudice unfair in the context of a race discrimination claim. In an age discrimination case, Cooley v. Carmike Cinemas, Inc., 25 F.3d 1325 (6th Cir. 1994) , the Court held it was no abuse of discretion (or was harmless error) to admit evidence that the plaintiff's supervisor had said two decades earlier, in his teen years, that he wanted to put older people in "a concentration camp," and that some years later he had said he did not want to go to a Thanksgiving Day dinner where his grandmother would be because he "[did not] like to be around old people." The comments were probative of the supervisor's state of mind and reflected a deep-rooted ongoing pattern that was anything but isolated.

Deters v. Equifax Credit Information Servs., 202 F.3d 1262 (10th Cir. 2000) : The plaintiff in a sexual harassment case alleged that she had been harassed by three male coworkers and her male supervisor. The plaintiff offered evidence that one of the men who harassed her also harassed a female coworker, including a videotape of this man describing how he leered at the other female coworker during a cab ride. Although the company argued that this harassment was different in nature, the Court found that it related to events that occurred about the time of the plaintiff's harassment and was relevant to show notice on the part of the company. In McCue v. Kansas Dep't of Human Resources, 165 F.3d 784 (10th Cir. 1999) , the plaintiff brought a Title VII retaliation action, arguing that she was fired for having filed a claim of sexual harassment. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the plaintiff had been sexually harassed by her supervisor. The evidence was probative to rebut the defendant's claim that the plaintiff had been fired for poor performance, since it supported the plaintiff's claim that her decreased productivity was the direct result of the ongoing sexual harassment. Although the evidence of sexual harassment was highly prejudicial, its prejudicial effect did not substantially outweigh its probative value.

[d] Employment Discrimination Cases -- Evidence of Discrimination Excludable or Required To Be Excluded

Annis v. County of Westchester, 136 F.3d 239 (2d Cir. 1998) : The plaintiff brought a civil rights suit against the County and two County police officials for gender discrimination while she served as a police officer. She had joined a City police force in 1977; in 1981 one of the officials became her superior on the City force, and in 1984 both the plaintiff and the official joined the County force. The statute of limitations period for the plaintiff extended back only to 1990, but she introduced evidence of discriminatory practices on the City force in 1977-81 to show notice to the official, and evidence of practices on the City and County forces in 1981-90 to show a continuing violation of her rights. The Court held that the 1977-81 evidence should have been excluded because it was only minimally probative and "fiercely prejudicial" in leading the jury to associate the official with deplorable conditions existing before his tenure. As to the 1981-90 evidence, the Court found that it was insufficient to establish a continuing violation and, being outside the limitations period, it was irrelevant to show the source of the plaintiff's emotional distress; moreover, it would naturally prejudice the jury's views with regard to the events occurring within the statute of limitations. Thus, admitting the evidence was an abuse of discretion, but the errors were harmless in the circumstances.

Hurley v. Atlantic City Police Dep't, 174 F.3d 95 (3d Cir. 1999) : In a sexual discrimination case brought by a female police officer for harassment occurring from 1987 to 1992, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion, but harmless error, to admit evidence of alleged acts of discrimination that occurred in 1979-81, because they were too distant in time from the events at the center of the department's liability. In West v. Philadelphia Elec. Co., 45 F.3d 744 (3d Cir. 1995) , a worker suing for injuries from a racially hostile work environment attempted to prove that while he was attending a high school gym meet, his truck was vandalized when a freshly killed deer's head was tied to its hood. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the evidence, since the incident occurred more than 40 miles from the workplace and there was no direct showing that linked the defendant's employees to it, although some of them enjoyed deer hunting, they discussed hunting at work, and one of them ate venison at work. Thus, the probative value was slight, while the fact that the incident was appallingly grotesque and abusive of the plaintiff created a risk of inducing unfair bias in favor of him and against the defendant.

Williams v. Nashville Network, 132 F.3d 1123 (6th Cir. 1997) : In a suit alleging race discrimination in refusing to hire an African-American, the Court found no error in the exclusion of testimony concerning rejection of another African-American's application. That applicant had applied for a different position, with different qualifications and hiring requirements; he applied six years prior to the plaintiff; and his application was rejected by different personnel.

Manuel v. City of Chicago, 335 F.3d 592 (7th Cir. 2003) : In a Title VII action, the Judge ruled in limine that a witness for the plaintiff could only testify about an allegedly racist supervisor's treatment of the plaintiff. At trial, the supervisor testified that he had not treated either the plaintiff or "anyone" differently because they were

African-American. The Judge agreed that this opened the door to evidence regarding the supervisor's treatment of other employees, but out of a concern for "trying cases that ... have no relationship to this," instructed the jury to strike the question and the supervisor's answer about his treatment of others, rather than admitting the plaintiff's evidence. Affirming a judgment for the City, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the initial in limine ruling, since the lack of specific examples in the plaintiff's offer of proof significantly limited the probative value of the offered evidence, while labeling the supervisor a "racist" had the potential for being unfairly prejudicial, and the significant prospect of engaging in a series of mini-trials over the other accusations of discrimination had the potential for confusing or misleading the jury. Even after the door was opened by the supervisor's testimony, the potential for undue delay, confusion, and prejudice remained, so the decision to continue to exclude the evidence was not an abuse of discretion. In Speedy v. Rexnord Corp., 243 F.3d 397 (7th Cir. 2001) , a union steward alleged that he had been fired in retaliation for accompanying two union members when they went to the EEOC office to file sex discrimination charges against the employer for harassment by their supervisor. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence that two other employees had made complaints against the supervisor and that the plaintiff had confronted the supervisor and met with management in relation to those complaints. The excluded evidence would have been relevant if the plaintiff had based his claim on the part of the statute making it unlawful to retaliate for "oppos[ing]" an unlawful employment practice, but his allegations implicated the part barring retaliation for "participat[ing]" in a proceeding, and the litigation had been conducted along that theory, for which the evidence had little probative value. At the same time, the evidence could have been highly prejudicial, with the jury confused into thinking that the impropriety of the supervisor's actions was the issue rather than the employer's retaliation. In Roy v. Austin Co., n64 the plaintiff was fired after he obscenely insulted the lead player for his firm's most important client at a critical meeting. In the plaintiff's Title VII suit, the Trial Judge excluded evidence that four white employees of the defendant had been transferred rather than fired after disagreements with clients. The Court found no abuse of discretion, in light of the finding below that, since the other employees had been disciplined by different supervisors and had not held the same position as the plaintiff, the evidence was "irrelevant and likely to confuse the jury."

Williams v. City of Kansas City, Mo., 223 F.3d 749 (8th Cir. 2000) : Affirming in part a judgment for the plaintiff in a hostile work environment case, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to admit evidence that the plaintiff's supervisor had made a sexually explicit comment to a co-worker and had two prior consensual relationships that began on the job. The comment to the co-worker took place after the plaintiff had left the City's employ, so it was irrelevant to the plaintiff's state of mind in failing to use the City's internal grievance procedure and to whether the City had an effective sexual harassment policy in place while the plaintiff was employed. The supervisor's prior relationships were at best minimally relevant, since both took place on other jobs, one was with a customer rather than a co-worker, and the one with a co-worker took place 19 years previously. Whatever probative value the evidence might have was outweighed by its inflammatory nature. In LaClair v. City of St. Paul, 187 F.3d 824 (8th Cir. 1999) , a sexual harassment action brought by a police officer, the plaintiff sought to introduce evidence of alleged retaliation by the defendant after she had reported prior harassment incidents. The Trial Judge excluded the evidence as part of a blanket ruling against all evidence regarding the defendant's policy or custom prior to a date 11 months before the charged incident, a date when the police department's new Chief took office. Although the Court reiterated that "proof of incidents other than those actually in suit should, in general, be freely allowed in discrimination cases," it found no abuse of discretion in this case because of special circumstances. First, because most of the evidence related to two incidents in which impartial decisionmakers had found against the plaintiff, it would not only have taken considerable time to bring out the facts of the incidents but the jury would also learn of the unfavorable results. Furthermore, the fact that the incidents occurred during the administration of a prior Chief was important. In Kline v. City of Kansas City, Mo., Fire Dep't, n65 an employment discrimination action brought by female employees of the Fire Department, the Court held that evidence of incidents predating the limitations period was properly excluded with respect to a plaintiff's disparate treatment claim. Because the incidents involved isolated acts, they could not be part of a continuing violation relevant to the claim. Similar evidence from another plaintiff was properly excluded on her hostile environment claim because the isolated nature of the acts kept them from being parts of a continuing violation. In Easley v. American Greetings Corp., n66 when an employee complained about sexual harassment by her supervisor, the employer investigated and fired the supervisor within five days. The employee and the replacement supervisor did not get along -- he was a friend of the man fired -- and when she was eventually terminated herself, allegedly for poor performance, she sued claiming retaliation for complaining about the harassment. Before trial the Judge granted motions in limine to exclude (1) evidence regarding the specific details of the first supervisor's harassment and (2) evidence of overtures made to the plaintiff by the second supervisor before he held that position. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court found no abuse of discretion in exclusion of the first evidence, because the severity of harassment had little probative value on the likelihood of retaliation but it created a risk of unfair prejudice, both in minimizing the employer's prompt and serious response to the complaint and in confusing the plaintiff's harm from the harassment with harm from retaliation. Likewise, there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the second evidence, which had little relevance to the plaintiff's theory that she was fired for making her original complaint and would have opened the door to collateral issues and created a risk of unfair prejudice by confusing the jury about the theory of the plaintiff's claim. In a disparate treatment gender discrimination case, Callanan v. Runyun, n67 the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence of other acts of alleged discrimination in the facility where the plaintiff was employed. The evidence consisted largely of generalized, subjective assertions of perceived bias; and to the extent discrete acts of discrimination were identified, they did not involve the plaintiff's own supervisors. In Slathar v. Sather Trucking Corp., n68 the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that a former human resources manager of the defendant's had told the defendant's director of personnel after the decision to terminate the plaintiff had been made that it was a risky decision because of his age. The evidence was irrelevant because the manager had not participated in the decision and her opinion was offered only after the decision had been made, and the director's response that the company "would take care of it" was too ambiguous to be considered a company admission and did not indicate discriminatory intent. At the same time, the testimony would have been quite prejudicial.

Tennison v. Circus Circus Enters., Inc., 244 F.3d 684 (9th Cir. 2001) : In a suit by casino employees alleging sexual harassment by a co-worker and the employer's failure to take proper corrective action, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence about complaints concerning the co-worker made six or seven years before the plaintiffs complained. The evidence of the earlier complaints was relevant to the plaintiffs' contention that the employer was on constructive notice and should have taken more drastic measures in response to their complaints, but determining the facts about the prior complaints might well have resulted in a wasteful "mini-trial" and there was a significant danger that the jury would base its assessment of liability on remote events involving other employees rather than on the recent events concerning the plaintiffs.

Palmer v. Board of Regents of Univ. Sys., 208 F.3d 969 (11th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in an employment discrimination action by a college professor who alleged that she had been denied a permanent appointment because she was Jewish. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence of other suits filed against the defendant for discriminating against Jewish people, since they involved different decision-makers, different departments, and different hiring processes from the ones about which the plaintiff complained.

[e] Employment Discrimination Cases -- Other Evidence

Rivera-Torres v. Ortiz Velez, 341 F.3d 86 (1st Cir. 2003) : In an action alleging employment discrimination motivated by political animus, the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff, finding no abuse of discretion when evidence was admitted regarding allegations that the Judge had dismissed before trial as time-barred. The evidence was relevant as background for the surviving claims that were being tried, and its probative value was not outweighed by the risk of jury confusion or prejudice. "The dismissed claims involve employment decisions that resulted in inconvenience or brief financial hardship; the surviving claims implicate adverse employment acts that threatened plaintiff's livelihood." In an age discrimination case, Kelley v. Airborne Freight Corp., 140 F.3d 335 (1st Cir. 1998) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff, holding there was no error in admitting the defendant's employee relations guidelines, which required managers to take specific steps prior to discharging poorly performing employees. The guidelines were probative because they were not followed in the plaintiff's case, thus rendering less plausible the defendant's claim that the plaintiff was fired for incompetence.

Leopold v. Baccarat, Inc., 174 F.3d 261 (2d Cir. 1999) : The plaintiff claimed she was fired because of her age. The Court found no error in the admission of bigoted comments that the plaintiff had made to co-workers while on the job, including saying to a Jewish co-worker that "they should have made a lamp shade out of you like the rest of your people." The evidence had substantial probative value, because the defendant contended that the plaintiff was fired because of chronic conflicts with other personnel.

Ansell v. Green Acres Contracting Co., 347 F.3d 515 (3d Cir. 2003) : In an age discrimination case, the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendants, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that two years after terminating the 45-year-old plaintiff, the foreman hired a 45-year-old man into a position similar to the plaintiff's former position. The Court reasoned that "[e]vidence of an employer's conduct towards other employees has long been held relevant and admissible to show that an employer's proffered justification is pretext." It concluded that the subsequent hiring was admissible not to prove propensity, but to negate the theory that the defendants were trying to get rid of older workers to increase productivity. In Goodman v. Pennsylvania Turnpike Comm'n, 293 F.3d 655 (3d Cir. 2002) , the Court affirmed a judgment for a public employee who alleged that the Commission failed to promote him because of his political affiliation. It found no error in the admission of a report of a legislative committee, which indicated that promotion practices at the Commission were not optimum and should be different. The suggestion in the report that the Commission used patronage to make promotions was probative and not unfairly prejudicial.

Brown v. McLean, 159 F.3d 898 (4th Cir. 1998) : The plaintiff, who was terminated from a city job when its functions were combined with another position, claimed reverse discrimination in the elimination of his position and the failure to hire him for the combined position. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of the city's affirmative action plan. Although one might infer a nexus between the plan and the employment decisions at issue, it was not error to conclude, when there was no other evidence of such a connection, that the prejudicial effect of admitting the plan substantially outweighed its probative value.

Tisdale v. Federal Express Corp., 415 F.3d 516 (6th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff in a Title VII retaliation case, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence regarding the plaintiff's post-termination employment history. Any probative value of the evidence, which included his being disciplined for misappropriating company property (the offense for which the defendant allegedly terminated him), was outweighed by the prejudicial effect of showing a propensity for misappropriating property.

Hasham v. California State Bd. of Equalization, 200 F.3d 1035 (7th Cir. 2000) : Affirming a judgment that the defendant discriminated against the plaintiff on the basis of his Pakistani national origin, the Court upheld the exclusion of testimony regarding an administrator's friendly interaction with an employee of Iranian descent and an employee married to an Iranian, as well as a photograph of the administrator's son's Bar Mitzvah showing "minority friends." The exclusion "was proper because of the apparent prejudice and lack of relevance to the case such evidence demonstrates."

Sellers v. Mineta, 350 F.3d 706 (8th Cir. 2003) : Affirming a judgment for a former air traffic controller who brought an action alleging sexual harassment and assault against the Secretary of Transportation and a coworker, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the FAA issued a letter to a supervisor who investigated the plaintiff's charges reprimanding the supervisor for inadequately handling the matter. The letter was relevant to show that the FAA did not take adequate steps to respond to the plaintiff's allegations, not to prove that sexual harassment had actually occurred.

Cadena v. Pacesetter Corp., 224 F.3d 1203 (10th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff in a hostile environment sexual harassment case, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the harassing supervisor and another manager in the office were having an affair and that the manager had lied about the relationship in her deposition. The evidence was relevant to indicate why the plaintiff did not report the harassment to the manager, even though she was the plaintiff's only female supervisor, and the danger of prejudicing the jury did not substantially outweigh the probative value of the evidence.

Lambert v. Fulton County, Ga., 253 F.3d 588 (11th Cir. 2001) : Affirming a judgment for county employees in a reverse discrimination case, the Court held that the probative value of newspaper articles and a television broadcast about the disciplining of the plaintiffs was sufficiently great on the issue of public humiliation to outweigh any prejudicial effect.

[f] Employment Discrimination Cases -- Prior Misconduct of Employee

Janes v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 279 F.3d 883 (9th Cir. 2002) : Affirming a judgment for a former employee who alleged breach of an implied-in-fact employment contract, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence that the employee was fired from a different job eight years earlier for stealing cigarettes. The defendant offered the incident to prove that the plaintiff knew he could be fired for stealing, but that proposition was undisputed. The Court found that the evidence posed the risk of unfair prejudice because the jury might have concluded the plaintiff was a person of bad character.

[28] Experiments and Demonstrations

[a] Aircraft

Stecyk v. Bell Helicopter Textron, Inc., 295 F.3d 408 (3d Cir. 2002) : The plaintiffs, suing for wrongful death in a helicopter crash, alleged that a shaft seal was installed backwards and leaked flammable fluid, which was ingested by an engine as the craft was attempting to land. The defendant manufacturer's expert did tests to determine whether reversed seals would leak. When the defendant sought to introduce videotapes of the tests, the plaintiffs objected that the conditions were not substantially similar to conditions on the helicopter that crashed. The Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the videotapes, since the expert testified to the substantial similarity of conditions and the plaintiffs presented no evidence, even after being given an opportunity to take late depositions, that differences between the crash and the tests rendered the conditions meaningfully dissimilar.

Engebretsen v. Fairchild Aircraft Corp., 21 F.3d 721 (6th Cir. 1994) : The Court upheld admission of expert testimony regarding post-incident tests. Although the tests were not intended to duplicate the airplane landing that injured the plaintiff, the Court found they had probative value in showing what happened during the incident.

Nachtsheim v. Beech Aircraft Corp., 847 F.2d 1261 (7th Cir. 1988) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the manufacturer in an airplane crash case, holding that the defendant's videotape, which was used to demonstrate how ice accumulated and was removed from a plane, was admissible. Seventy-three hours of flight time went into the experiment, 40 hours of that were taped, and a 51-minute, edited film was made. The Court emphasized the Trial

Judge's discretion and the fact that the tape was not offered to reenact the accident or to suggest that the experiment simulated actual events.

Four Corners Helicopters, Inc. v. Turbomeca, S.A., 979 F.2d 1434 (10th Cir. 1992) : In a wrongful death action arising out of a helicopter crash, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding videotape evidence of an experiment conducted by the defendant's expert, as there were substantial dissimilarities from the situation at issue. An experiment used simply to demonstrate the principles used in forming an expert's opinion need not strictly adhere to the facts, but this experiment was also used to demonstrate what the defendant believed occurred in the helicopter's engine.

[b] Experiments and Demonstrations -- Automobiles and Auto Parts

Hall v. General Motors Corp., 647 F.2d 175 (D.C. Cir. 1980) : The Court affirmed a plaintiff's judgment in this product liability suit, upholding a ruling excluding some of the defendant's experimental test results as not having been conducted under circumstances sufficiently similar to the plaintiff's accident.

Jodoin v. Toyota Motor Corp., 284 F.3d 272 (1st Cir. 2002) : In an action for injuries suffered when a light truck rolled over, the Trial Judge rejected evidence that the plaintiffs' expert had tested another Toyota truck to determine its rollover propensity, because there was no foundation that the exemplar was "virtually identical" with the plaintiff's truck. The Court vacated a judgment for the defendant, holding that a "substantial similarity" standard should have been applied and that the plaintiffs had satisfied the standard by testimony from an expert that he had performed a thorough inspection of the tested truck, which was of the same model and year, and detected no evidence of accidents, damage, or modification. In a product liability action, Fusco v. General Motors Corp., 11 F.3d 259 (1st Cir. 1993) , a videotape in which the defendant purportedly demonstrated what would have happened had the product failed in the manner contended by the plaintiff was excluded. The Court found no abuse of discretion, as the demonstration was rife with the risk of misunderstanding by the jury. In Swajian v. General Motors Corp., n69 the Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff in a wrongful death action arising from a rollover accident, but held there was no error in excluding a videotape demonstration prepared by the defendant, as it depicted an experienced test driver knowing what to expect in tests at controlled facilities involving axles that had been rigged to fracture. In Szeliga v. General Motors Corp., n70 the Court affirmed a judgment for an automobile manufacturer, holding there was no error in finding films -- prepared by the manufacturer and offered to support its theory that a wheel fell off because of impact, not because of the loss of lug nuts -- to be more probative than prejudicial. Dissimilarities between experimental and actual conditions went to the weight a jury might give the films, not admissibility.

Chase v. General Motors Corp., 856 F.2d 17 (4th Cir. 1988) : The Court reversed a judgment in a product liability case, finding that a videotape of braking tests performed by the National Highway Transportation Safety Administration should have been excluded. The conditions of the test were not similar to the conditions existing at the time of the accident. The Court also held that a videotape of braking tests made by the company's expert was properly excluded because of insufficient similarities between the test and accident conditions.

Shipp v. General Motors Corp., 750 F.2d 418 (5th Cir. 1985) : The Court affirmed a judgment against the defendant in an action by the owner-driver of a car injured in a rollover accident, holding that the Trial Judge properly admitted the plaintiff's film and photographs depicting an automobile similar to the one involved in the plaintiff's accident being dropped onto the driver's side of its roof from an elevation of one foot and also properly excluded the defendant's film illustrating unrestrained occupant movement in a rollover accident. The Court concluded that the plaintiff's film was relevant in that it obviously related to the kind of accident that occurred, while the defendant's involved a different vehicle with a substantially different roof and passenger compartment from the one involved in the accident. Moreover, the defendant's film portrayed multiple rollovers, rather than a single rollover such as that which occurred in the accident.

Finchum v. Ford Motor Co., 57 F.3d 526 (7th Cir. 1995) : The Court upheld exclusion of a videotape depicting a test conducted by the plaintiffs' expert simulating a rear impact accident. The case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 403.02[12]. In Crossley v. General Motors Corp., 33 F.3d 818 (7th Cir. 1994) , a product liability action arising from a single automobile rollover accident, the Court found no error in the admission of a videotape of rollover sequences involving a General Motors car, even though the car was a different model from that involved in the accident and the conditions of the demonstration were much different from those at the time of the accident. The tape helped illustrate the testimony of a defense expert who testified about the complicated vehicular dynamics of rollover accidents. The Court noted with approval that substantial limitations were imposed on the use of the tape at trial, including: limiting the defendant to one test of the three it sought to show the jury; prohibiting the defendant from stopping the tape during the expert's testimony; inviting the plaintiff to play any portion of the tape during cross-examination of the expert; instructing the jury that the tape was "not intended to be a reenactment of this accident or the cause of this accident"; and prohibiting the tape from going into the jury room.

McKnight v. Johnson Controls, Inc., 36 F.3d 1396 (8th Cir. 1994) : The Court held, in a personal injury action against the manufacturer by the user of a car battery that exploded, that it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to admit evidence of an experiment conducted by the plaintiff's expert, where there were significant differences between the test conditions and the accident. Although the plaintiff argued that substantial similarity was not required where the experiment was intended only to demonstrate scientific principles, the Court noted that the closer the experiment gets to simulating the accident, the more similar the conditions of the experiment must be to the accident conditions. In Hale v. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., n71 an action for injuries caused by a wheel rim explosion, the Court held that a videotape of an explosion of a wheel rim striking a mannequin was properly admitted, even though the tire was inflated more than the tire involved in the explosion. The fact that the photographer did not retain a tape of six unsuccessful attempts to explode the tire was an issue for cross-examination, not a bar to admissibility. The Court had reversed a plaintiffs' judgment in the first trial of the action because a film was admitted that involved substantially different conditions from those giving rise to the suit. n72

Montag v. Honda Motor Co., 75 F.3d 1414 (10th Cir. 1996) : Plaintiffs in a wrongful death action alleged that the driver's injuries were caused when a seat belt proved defective in an automobile-train collision. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting a videotape prepared by the defendant that depicted a collision between a train and an automobile, even though it was substantially dissimilar from the accident. The videotape was introduced for the limited purpose of portraying the forces at work in such a collision, and the jury was specifically instructed not to consider it as a recreation of the accident. The videotape was not inflammatory or misleading when considered with the limiting instructions that were given. In Pandit v. American Honda Motor Co., 82 F.3d 376 (10th Cir. 1996) , the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting an expert for the defendants sued for defective design of an automobile warning light to demonstrate the principles of his opinion by showing a videotape of an experiment he had conducted. The jury was repeatedly instructed that the videotape was merely demonstrative of basic principles, so there was no impermissible risk of the plaintiff being unfairly prejudiced by the jury thinking that the expert had recreated the events leading up to the accident. See also Gilbert v. Cosco Inc. n73(no abuse of discretion to admit "sled" tests of child restraint to illustrate scientific principles); Hinds v. General Motors Corp. n74(no abuse of discretion in excluding the defendant's crash test, where the test was not substantially similar to the accident in question and the defendant proffered no articulable engineering principles that the test demonstrated).

[c] Experiments and Demonstrations -- Computer Animations

Hinkle v. City of Clarksburg, 81 F.3d 416 (4th Cir. 1996) : In a civil rights action on behalf of a person shot during an armed standoff, the defendants introduced a computer-animated videotape, which tracked the facts as contended by the defendants, showing the decedent being shot in the chest and spinning around and falling face down. The videotape, which ended with a computer animation of the trajectory of the bullet, was offered to illustrate the expert testimony of a forensic animation technologist, who testified that the defendants' version of the facts was consistent with the physical evidence. The Court found no error in the admission of the videotape, since the jury was properly instructed that the animation was designed merely to illustrate the defendants' version of the shooting and to demonstrate how this version was consistent with the physical evidence.

[d] Experiments and Demonstrations -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Lopez-Lopez, 282 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2002) : Affirming drug convictions resulting from a seizure of cocaine on a boat, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion when the Trial Judge made a sua sponte request for a demonstration as to the use of one of two spotlights used on the night of the arrests. The demonstration was "highly relevant," because the defendants put into dispute the extent to which the spotlight would have permitted the officers to view the defendants' actions. The Court noted that the light was flashed under "controlled conditions," only for a few seconds, only in a corner of the courtroom, and not on any of the defendants.

United States v. Moreno, 897 F.2d 26 (2d Cir. 1990) : In a drug distribution prosecution in which an issue was whether a warrantless seizure of a brick of cocaine wrapped in brown paper and tape came within the plain view doctrine, the Court held there was no error in denying a defendant's requests to make a physical demonstration with the brick and the bag from which it was seized, since the defense was accorded considerable leeway to explore their characteristics on cross-examination.

United States v. Verna, 113 F.3d 499 (4th Cir. 1997) : The Court held in a firearms case that there was no error in admitting a videotape that depicted the detonation of a laboratory-constructed bomb almost identical to the one that the defendant was charged with constructing. The demonstration was relevant to show that the defendant's bomb, which never exploded, was a destructive device, and the only differences were those required to protect the safety of the experimenters and to ensure that, unlike the actual bomb, the experimental bomb would detonate.

United States v. Norris, 217 F.3d 262 (5th Cir. 2000) : The Court upheld the convictions of a lawyer for false declarations in a bankruptcy proceeding in which he testified that he had burned almost a half million dollars in cash in order to spite his former partners; the government contended that this statement was false and that the defendant had kept the money. The prosecution introduced a videotape in which an ATF agent reenacted the steps that the defendant allegedly took when he burned the cash. The reenactment showed that most of the bills would not have burned. Although the reenactment was not an exact duplication of the defendant's alleged burning, whenever there were inconsistencies in the defendant's statements the agent erred in favor of a longer, hotter burn. The Court found that the reenactment was substantially similar and therefore admissible under Rule 403.

United States v. Baldwin, 418 F.3d 575 (6th Cir. 2005) : The defendant was convicted of faking his own kidnapping. When he was found by police, he gave an account of his captivity that the government argued was implausible because, for one thing, the defendant stated that he urinated while bound in the back seat of a car and the government argued that he could not have unzipped his pants under the circumstances described. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of a videotaped demonstration proffered by the defendant in which he was shown to be physically able to unzip his pants while bound in the back seat of a car. The Court noted the dissimilarities between the conditions of the demonstration and the circumstances described by the defendant to the police, but it acknowledged "that the video is not so far removed from reality that we would have found an abuse of discretion had the district court reached the opposite result and admitted the evidence." In United States v. Humphrey, 279 F.3d 372 (6th Cir. 2002) , the Court affirmed an embezzlement conviction, finding no error in permitting the government to show the jury coin bags from the bank, some stuffed with styrofoam peanuts, to demonstrate the amount of coinage stolen from the bank. Although the defendant complained that the bags were bigger than those filled with coins, the Court observed that the Trial Judge heard expert testimony indicating that the bags were representative of those filled with coins, and the defense had the opportunity to cross-examine. In a prosecution for manufacturing marijuana and using a destructive device during drug trafficking, United States v. Jones, n75 the Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the government to show the videotaped explosion of a bomb that had been built as a replica of the bomb discovered near the defendant's property. An expert testified that the replica was constructed to be identical to the bomb in question. Any prejudicial effect was minimized by permitting the jury to see the explosion but turning the videotape off immediately thereafter, so as not to show styrofoam silhouettes set up nearby and how they were hit by shrapnel and gravel. In United States v. Metzger, n76 the Court affirmed a conviction for crimes relating to an automobile explosion that killed two people, and upheld the admission of a videotape of an experiment in which another car was destroyed by explosion. It stated that "the substantially similar standard is a flexible one which, even when construed strictly, does not require that all variables be controlled."

United States v. Birch, 39 F.3d 1089 (10th Cir. 1994) : This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 403.02[12].

United States v. Gaskell, 985 F.2d 1056 (11th Cir. 1993) : The Court reversed the defendant's conviction for involuntary manslaughter of his infant daughter, holding that an expert's demonstration of "shaken baby syndrome" using a rubber infant mannequin was not sufficiently similar to the circumstances of the infant's death to afford a fair comparison, and that the unfairly prejudicial nature of the demonstration outweighed any probative value. In United States v. Rackley, n77 the Court affirmed a conviction for cocaine offenses, finding that the Trial Judge properly exercised his discretion to allow a demonstration of how a trained dog sniffed out narcotics after the defendant questioned the dog's ability to sniff out cocaine.

[e] Experiments and Demonstrations -- Miscellaneous Cases

Starter Corp. v. Converse, Inc., 170 F.3d 286 (2d Cir. 1999) : In Starter's declaratory judgment action to establish its right to use a "star" trademark on athletic footwear, Converse introduced a prototype shoe it had designed, to illustrate how the marks at issue might appear on a shoe that Starter might offer. Starter argued that the prototype created a danger of unfair prejudice because it had not actually marketed shoes yet, but the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence. The prototype was sufficiently similar to shoes about which testimony was given; Starter had offered its own prototype and could argue (as it did) that Converse's prototype was a gross exaggeration; and by bringing a declaratory judgment action before actually producing shoes bearing the disputed marks, Starter opened itself up to prototype evidence from Converse.

Slakan v. Porter, 737 F.2d 368 (4th Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed a judgment for an inmate against prison guards in a civil rights suit, finding no error in the admission of videotape evidence depicting a hose squirting water. The tape was properly used to demonstrate how the guards' actions could have injured an inmate; the water pressure and hose nozzle on the hose depicted were the same as those on the hose used against the plaintiff; and an expert was present to explain the tape.

Paschal v. Flagstar Bank, FSB, 295 F.3d 565 (6th Cir. 2002) : Affirming in part a Fair Housing Act case that held the defendant engaged in racially discriminatory mortgage lending, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding matched-pair testing conducted by a local fair housing group. The defendant objected that any probative value the evidence had was substantially outweighed by the prejudicial effect of its focus on the discriminatory conduct of a loan officer who was not involved in processing the plaintiffs' applications. Although extrapolation from one racist loan officer to the institutional defendant would be unfairly prejudicial, making admission "a close question," the Court found no abuse of discretion, noting both that the Trial Judge had excluded part of the testing evidence as excessively inflammatory and that the animus of the loan officer was directed against Arab-Americans, while the plaintiffs were African-Americans. In Persian Galleries, Inc. v. Transcontinental Ins. Co., 38 F.3d 253 (6th Cir. 1994) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff rug dealer in an action against its insurer for the alleged theft of oriental rugs from its store, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of a videotaped reenactment of the theft, where the experiment and the actual conditions at the scene were substantially similar, even though not identical.

Abernathy v. Superior Hardwoods, Inc., 704 F.2d 963 (7th Cir. 1983) : In a negligence action brought by a truckdriver against a forklift operator, the Court found no error in the decision to admit a videotape made by the defendant's president several years after the accident, which attempted to depict how logs are unloaded, in support of a contributory negligence claim. The Trial Judge permitted the film to be shown but did not allow the jury to hear the sound portion of the tape. Although the level of background noise was an issue in the case, the Court recognized that the microphone used to record the sound on the tape was not placed where the plaintiff had been and there was no indication that the courtroom volume control would have produced the same sound level as actually recorded. It commended the Judge "for not taking the easy way out, which would have been to let in all the minimally relevant nonprivileged evidence either party cared to offer."

Jones v. Ralls, 187 F.3d 848 (8th Cir. 1999) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in a civil rights case when defendant officers were permitted to demonstrate a "kneeling wristlock" such as they had applied to the plaintiff when taking him into custody. Although the demonstration did not accurately reflect the entire course of events, it was not intended to be a reenactment so much as a demonstration of a technique unfamiliar to the jurors. The plaintiff had an adequate opportunity on cross-examination to explore differences between the demonstration and the actual events. In Borough v. Duluth, M. & I.R. Ry., n78 the Court affirmed a judgment for an injured railway worker, finding that the Trial Judge properly excluded the railroad's film, which demonstrated the proper way of stepping from a moving locomotive, as cumulative and as "carefully staged by the railroad for the purpose of this litigation."

Robinson v. Missouri Pac. R.R., 16 F.3d 1083 (10th Cir. 1994) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiffs in a wrongful death action arising out of a train's collision with a car, but found that a video animation illustrating the plaintiff's expert's theory about how the collision had occurred presented a close question. The Court was not concerned that certain details were left out of the animation, since they did not bear on the purpose of the exhibit, i.e., to illustrate the expert's testimony. It was bothered, however, with the tape's showing the car angling toward the approach of the train and rotating at impact and spinning off the tracks, since it was also possible that the train impaled the car on its front. On balance, the Court found no abuse of discretion, as the exhibit was entered for the limited purpose of illustrating expert testimony, a cautionary instruction was given, and the defendant was given opportunity for vigorous cross-examination.

[f] Experiments and Demonstrations -- Other Product Liability Cases

Lubanski v. Coleco Indus., 929 F.2d 42 (1st Cir. 1991): The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant toy manufacturer in an action brought by the mother of a child who was killed while riding on a three-wheeled riding apparatus. The Court held there was no error in admitting a series of photographic enlargements portraying a staged version of the accident scene. The Trial Judge made the required preliminary determination that the photographs depicted a correct likeness and the plaintiff had not objected to the photographs in their original five-by-seven-inch format.

Hurt v. Coyne Cylinder Co., 956 F.2d 1319 (6th Cir. 1992) : The Court reversed a judgment for the defendants on other grounds, but held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding a film offered by the plaintiffs. There was nothing improper in the Trial Judge's making a subjective determination that the film would be prejudicial, where there was no indication that the Judge's reaction was idiosyncratic and there is an obvious possibility of prejudice from a dramatic film that resembles but does not depict the accident in question.

Goodwin v. MTD Prods., Inc., 232 F.3d 600 (7th Cir. 2000) : A plaintiff alleged that he suffered an eye injury when struck by a plastic wingnut that had vibrated loose from the lawnmower he was using. The Court affirmed a judgment against the manufacturer, finding no abuse of discretion when the defendant's expert witness was not permitted to show videotapes of tests he conducted demonstrating how various objects were thrown from a moving mower and how vibration from a running mower would not cause a properly tightened wingnut to loosen. The videos were cumulative of the witness' testimony regarding the tests and a therefore a waste of the jury's time.

Pullman v. Land O'Lakes, Inc., 262 F.3d 759 (8th Cir. 2001) : Affirming a judgment for dairy farmers against a dairy consultant whose employee negligently prepared feed that sickened and killed dairy cows, the Court upheld the admission of an experimental test conducted at a college which sought to recreate the situation that occurred at the plaintiffs' farms when the cows became sick and died. The test was done under conditions substantially similar to the actual conditions at the farm, since the cows were the same breed, the feed formula was the same, the feed was prepared by the same procedure, and the study was conducted at the same time of the year. In Patterson v. F.W. Woolworth Co., n79 the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendants in an action alleging damage from an electric-fan fire, finding that expert testimony concerning experiments the witness conducted was properly admitted, since admissibility "does not depend on perfect identity between actual and experimental conditions." In Cowens v. Siemens-Elema AB, n80 the Court affirmed a judgment for a manufacturer and distributor of an electronic lung ventilator. It held that evidence of experiments was properly excluded in the absence of proof that screens used in the experiment were manufactured at or near the time of the screen used in the ventilator. In Randall v. Warnaco, Inc., n81 a suit by a tent user injured by a fire in the tent, the Court observed that admissibility "does not depend on perfect identity between actual and experimental conditions. Ordinarily, dissimilarities affect the weight of the evidence, not its admissibility." The Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of an experiment shown to the jury via videotape, but it warned that since the film duplicated the accident scene and almost reenacted the accident, it could have been deemed unduly prejudicial.

Marsee v. United States Tobacco Co., 866 F.2d 319 (10th Cir. 1989) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in a suit by a plaintiff who claimed that her son developed oral cancer from using snuff. It held there was no error in excluding a videotape deposition of a severely disfigured, postsurgical cancer patient whose case was similar to the son's in many respects. The proof of causation of injury was weak while the possibility of prejudice was great.

[a] Civil Cases -- Evidence Admissible or Required To Be Admitted

Sinai v. New England Tel. & Tel. Co., 3 F.3d 471 (1st Cir. 1993) : Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff in an employment discrimination action, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting certain testimony by the plaintiff's psychologist. Prognosis evidence about the plaintiff's depression was very important to the damages issue, and the Trial Judge took care to ensure that the jury would not reach a verdict on improper grounds; evidence of the plaintiff's wife's own harassment and discrimination claims was proper on redirect in response to implications that the plaintiff's depression stemmed from preexisting marital difficulties.

Corneveaux v. CUNA Mut. Ins. Group, 76 F.3d 1498 (10th Cir. 1996) : The Court held it was an abuse of discretion to preclude an expert in educational and value testing from testifying on behalf of the plaintiff in an employment discrimination case that the employer had improperly used screening tests to confirm his preexisting notions about the plaintiff.

Busby v. City of Orlando, 931 F.2d 764 (11th Cir. 1991) : The Court reversed in part a judgment against a discharged black employee of a city police department, holding that the plaintiff's expert witness should have been permitted to introduce testimony and a graph summarizing and explaining raw data introduced at trial in support of the plaintiff's claim of racial discrimination; without the witness' testimony there was no way for the jury to discern the meaning of the data accurately, so the evidence clearly was not cumulative. The witness, a psychological counselor, should also have been permitted to give testimony on the psychological impact of the termination, as it was directly relevant to the issue of damages and there was no other testimony regarding the psychological impact. In Johnson v. United States, n82 the Court remanded a wrongful death case brought by the parents of an infant who died after being taken to a military hospital, holding it was error to exclude as cumulative the testimony of a third expert witness who arguably had better credentials than the first two and whose analysis was somewhat different from the others'.

[b] Experts -- Civil Cases -- Evidence Excludable or Required To Be Excluded

Pinkham v. Burgess, 933 F.2d 1066 (1st Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the client in an attorney malpractice action, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by the defendant's psychological expert that a mental condition possibly existing years before the expert examined the defendant might have affected his ability to perceive the harm he was causing a client. The weak probative value of the evidence was substantially outweighed by the likelihood the jury would improperly consider it on the negligence issue. In a product liability action arising out of injuries allegedly caused by an IUD, Nickerson v. G.D. Searle & Co., n83 the Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in prohibiting the plaintiff's counsel from cross-examining a defense expert witness about his experience in the abortion field, given the fierce emotional reaction engendered in many people by the subject.

Robert S. v. Stetson School, Inc., 256 F.3d 159 (3d. Cir. 2001) : The plaintiff, who had been placed in a school specializing in the treatment and education of juvenile sex offenders, alleged that staff members subjected him to physical and psychological abuse in violation of the school's policy against "horseplay." The Court found no abuse of discretion in precluding testimony by an expert in child abuse on grounds that it would result in undue delay, waste of time, or needless presentation of cumulative evidence, since two other witnesses, both psychologists, testified at length about the impact that the alleged abuse could have on someone with the plaintiff's history.

Dixon v. CSX Transp., Inc., 990 F.2d 1440 (4th Cir. 1993) : In a FELA and state tort law action arising out of a train's collision with an automobile, the Court held it was reversible error to admit evidence from a human factors expert of an observational survey showing that 98 percent of motorists did not stop at the crossing and 64 percent did not look left. According to the Court, the evidence was wholly irrelevant to whether the plaintiff fulfilled the burden imposed by state law to act as a reasonably prudent person and, when taken with evidence that the plaintiff had looked left, it was prejudicial to the defendant because it strongly suggested the plaintiff was a more careful driver than most and could not be considered contributorily negligent. The dissenting Judge believed that because local custom is relevant to the duty of care, the evidence was properly admitted. In Lohrmann v. Pittsburgh Corning Corp., n84 the Court affirmed a judgment against a shipyard pipe fitter who claimed he contracted asbestosis from exposure to the defendants' products, holding that the Trial Judge properly ruled that the danger of unfair prejudice from mention of the plaintiff's fear of contracting cancer outweighed its probative value in light of the inability of the plaintiff's medical expert to state, with a reasonable degree of certainty, that the plaintiff would develop cancer.

Wallace v. Mulholland, 957 F.2d 333 (7th Cir. 1992) : In a civil rights action for excessive force used by police in enforcing a commitment petition, the Court held there was no error in excluding evidence of the committed person's psychiatric history. Where the issue in the case was his actual behavior and how the officers responded to it, evidence about the general nature of his condition and the likelihood that someone with that condition would act aggressively was probably irrelevant and certainly prejudicial.

United States v. Pend Oreille County Public Util. Dist. No. 1, 135 F.3d 602 (9th Cir. 1998) : The Judge trying the damages phase of a trespass action refused to allow proof on rebuttal from an expert who would have provided an estimate of acreage relevant to the plaintiffs' damages. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion, as the Judge had already heard from two other experts on the point and "reasonably could have concluded that introducing in rebuttal yet a third, much higher estimate ... would needlessly complicate the issue and unduly delay the proceeding." In a product liability wrongful death case arising out of World War II shipyard asbestos exposure, Rogers v. Raymark Indus., 922 F.2d 1426 (9th Cir. 1991) , the Trial Judge had excluded testimony by one of the plaintiff's experts as minimally probative, confusing, and cumulative. The Court found no abuse of discretion, rejecting the plaintiff's argument that she needed the testimony because it would be more articulate, eloquent, and clear than that from coworkers who had forgotten the details or were too unsophisticated to describe their working conditions accurately.

Corneveaux v. CUNA Mut. Ins. Group, 76 F.3d 1498 (10th Cir. 1996) : In an employment discrimination case, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to preclude an expert in educational and value testing from testifying on behalf of the plaintiff in an employment discrimination case that the employer had improperly used screening tests to confirm his preexisting notions about the plaintiff. However, there was no abuse of discretion in precluding a psychologist from explaining what the employer's notations of age and reliance on second-hand reports indicated about his decision-making process in hiring, as the jury had other testimony about those practices.

Tran v. Toyota Motor Corp., 420 F.3d 1310 (11th Cir. 2005) : In a product liability action, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion when testimony from an expert witness for the plaintiff was excluded on the ground that the expert's opinions, and the bases for those opinions, were the same as those of another expert who was permitted to testify. The Judge had examined the excluded expert's deposition and expert witness report and had extensively examined his qualifications, and while the Court suggested that it might have reached a contrary conclusion, it found the decision that the evidence was cumulative was within the Judge's permissible "range of choice." In an action brought by a pretrial detainee for deliberate indifference to his medical needs, Peterson v. Willie, 81 F.3d 1033 (11th Cir. 1996) , the defendants called an expert who the plaintiff had retained and designated as an expert witness expected to testify, but who had subsequently been discharged by the plaintiff's counsel. The expert was permitted to testify and to state that he had been previously retained by the plaintiff. The Court noted that some decisions have permitted experts initially retained by one side to be called by the other but have prohibited reference to the initial retainer; others have refused to permit such experts to testify absent a showing of need. The Court concluded that the issue is committed to the discretion of the Trial Judge, but cautioned that leave to call such experts should not ordinarily be granted if other experts are readily available. As to whether the expert can refer to the previous retention, the Court concluded that "the unfair prejudice resulting from disclosing this fact usually outweighs any probative value"; however, a reference would be warranted if the adversary were to attack the qualifications of the expert. Since the plaintiff made no such attack in this case, the Court found it was error (but harmless) to permit evidence that the expert had previously been retained by the plaintiff.

Cytologix Corp. v. Ventana Medical Sys., Inc., 424 F.3d 1168 (Fed. Cir. 2005) : In a patent infringement action, the Court noted that it was improper to have expert witnesses testify before the jury regarding claim construction. The risk of confusing the jury is high even when, as here, the jury is instructed that the Judge's claim constructions control.

[c] Experts -- Criminal Cases

[i] Defense Evidence

United States v. Onumonu, 967 F.2d 782 (2d Cir. 1992) : The defendant, charged with knowingly smuggling heroin from Nigeria in his alimentary canal, asserted he thought he was smuggling diamonds and offered an expert to testify to the feasibility and prevalence of smuggling diamonds in the same manner from Nigeria. The Court held it was error to exclude the testimony, as it was relevant to the defendant's subjective belief, did not fall under any of the Rule 403 exceptions to admissibility, and would have been helpful to a New York jury unlikely to be familiar with diamond smuggling out of Nigeria and even less so about the feasibility of smuggling diamonds by swallowing condoms.

United States v. Mathis, 264 F.3d 321 (3d Cir. 2001) : Affirming convictions for bank robbery and conspiracy, the Court found it was error (but harmless) to exclude some expert testimony by a clinical psychologist regarding eyewitness identification. Relying heavily on its decision in United States v. Stevens, 935 F.2d 1380 (3d Cir. 1991) , the Court found that expert testimony regarding "double identification" or "post-event information" and about the relationship between accuracy of identification and confidence of a witness fit the facts of the case and should have been admitted. Testimony about "weapons focus" was relevant and should have been admitted, even though the witness who saw the defendant was a police officer. The Court declined to affirm exclusion of the evidence under Rule 403 because "the District Court explained its ruling with little more than a series of conclusions" about an "aura of reliability that's attached to an expert witness" and a danger of usurping the jury's function.

United States v. Sutton, 337 F.3d 792 (7th Cir. 2003) : A defendant charged with several robberies sought to introduce reports made by the police laboratory indicating that his fingerprints did not match fingerprints taken from the crime scenes. The Court held that under Rule 803(8)(C) the reports were not excludable as hearsay, but there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the reports under Rule 403. Without an expert to explain them, the reports' probative value was outweighed by the risk that the jury would improperly rely on the reports in the absence of context and believe that the reports proved the negative, that the defendant had not been at the crime scene. In a prosecution of a banker for making false statements in loan applications, United States v. Swanquist, 161 F.3d 1064 (7th Cir. 1998) , the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in preventing an accountant called by the defendant from testifying about "off balance sheet financing." As an accountant with no banking experience, the witness was not qualified to tell the jury that a practice of omitting certain assets and liabilities was acceptable within the banking community. Furthermore, the applications at issue specifically requested the information, so testimony about this sort of financing was clearly intended to throw smoke in the jurors' eyes.

United States v. Rushing, 313 F.3d 428 (8th Cir. 2002) : The defendants were charged with immigration fraud in a scheme to import Chinese women to satisfy one defendant's sexual appetite. The government alleged that the defendant had a year-long sexual relationship with one of the women. The defense proffered an expert to testify that since the woman was infected with hepatitis B, it was highly likely that the defendant would also be infected if they had such a relationship, but he was not. The Trial Judge excluded the evidence on the ground that it was collateral and of little probative value on the central issues of the case. Reversing, the Court concluded that the evidence was highly probative, since evidence that there were no sexual relations would have undermined the government's central theory, leaving it with no explanation of why the defendants engaged in immigration fraud. In United States v. Kime, 99 F.3d 870 (8th Cir. 1996) , the Court affirmed drug conspiracy convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of expert testimony on the unreliability of eyewitness identification, which was proffered by a defendant. There was an insufficient basis for finding that the proposed testimony qualified as "scientific knowledge" under Daubert; the testimony intruded into the jury's domain when it opined that the in-court identification in the case was "inherently untrustworthy"; and there was a "very real danger that the proffered expert testimony could either confuse the jury or cause it to substitute the expert's credibility assessment for its own."

United States v. Petrie, 302 F.3d 1280 (11th Cir. 2002) : Affirming a conviction for conspiracy to launder money in a scheme involving venture capital funding contracts, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion when the defense was not permitted to call a lawyer to testify that the contracts were legal. The legality of the contracts was not at issue in the case, and any probative value the testimony might have had "did not outweigh the potential jury confusion that would have arisen from the presentation of contract issues in the context of a criminal case." In United States v. Gaskell, 985 F.2d 1056 (11th Cir. 1993) , the Court reversed the defendant's conviction for involuntary manslaughter of his infant daughter, holding that it was an abuse of discretion to exclude expert testimony on the general lack of public awareness of the dangers of shaking an infant. Where the dispositive issue in the case was whether the defendant intended to revive the infant or to injure her, the evidence would be probative of his knowledge and intent, helpful to the trier, and not cumulative.

[ii] Experts -- Criminal Cases -- Prosecution Evidence

United States v. Moore, 104 F.3d 377 (D.C. Cir. 1997) : Hidden in the car in which the defendant was arrested were drugs, weapons, and a roll of duct tape. Affirming a conviction for drug trafficking offenses, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting a detective knowledgeable about narcotics to testify that duct tape was often used in the drug trade to bind people being robbed or who otherwise needed to be restrained. The evidence was helpful to the jury in determining the defendant's intent to distribute the drugs found in his possession, and its probative value was not substantially outweighed by its tendency to suggest he was a violent person who binds people with duct tape.

United States v. Rutland, 372 F.3d 543 (3d Cir. 2004) : Convicted for defrauding an elderly brokerage customer by forging her signature on financial forms, the defendant argued that in light of the government handwriting expert's extensive qualifications and impressive experience, "the probative value of his opinion on authorship was substantially outweighed by the danger that the jury would accept his opinion based on his extraordinary experience rather than on his underlying analysis." Affirming, the Court rejected this "novel argument," noting that "[a]n expert's experience and credentials are properly taken into account by jurors when determining how much weight to give the expert's testimony," and that the defendant's argument would lead to an absurd result, requiring parties to find experts who have less than stellar qualifications.

United States v. Katz, 178 F.3d 368 (5th Cir. 1999) : The defendant, charged with receiving child pornography, filed a motion to exclude all expert witness testimony purporting to determine the age of persons portrayed in the videotapes and computer files at issue on the basis of applying the "Tanner Scale" (which is a recognized scientific test for determining the age of postpubescent Caucasian females according to pubic hair and breast development). On interlocutory appeal, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding several of the computer images at issue, where the government witness' expertise was linked to the Tanner Scale method and he testified that the method was not scientifically useful in determining the age of the models depicted because the range of ages for each stage was too broad and extended beyond the critical age of 18.

United States v. Webster, 125 F.3d 1024 (7th Cir. 1997) : In a bankruptcy fraud prosecution, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding expert testimony as to the value of allegedly concealed property, since the opinion could have at best only tangential relevance either to the defendant's opinion as to that value years earlier or to the defendant's intent to conceal assets, and its potential to confuse the jury was significant. In United States v. Hartmann, 958 F.2d 774 (7th Cir. 1992) , a man had been murdered as part of a scheme by his wife and others to defraud life insurance companies. The Court held that even though only fraud was charged, it was not an abuse of discretion to admit expert testimony regarding the brutal manner in which the victim was slain, since the evidence provided corroboration and enhanced the credibility of conspirators' out-of-court admissions.

United States v. Sdoulam, 398 F.3d 981 (8th Cir. 2005) : The defendant, an operator of convenience stores, was charged with conspiring to distribute pseudophedrine with reason to believe it would be used to manufacture methamphetamine. The prosecution offered testimony from a statistician who, using local and national census and marketing data, compared the pseudophedrine sales at the defendant's stores with the estimated monthly average at convenience stores nationwide and opined that the difference was so great that the possibility of its occurring by chance was infinitesimal. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion, since the evidence was relevant to whether the defendant had reason to believe that the pseudophedrine was being used to manufacture a controlled substance, and the expert made no statement regarding the mathematical probability that the defendant was guilty of the crimes charged, leaving it to the jury to draw whatever conclusions it wished from the comparison he made.

United States v. Pineda-Torres, 287 F.3d 860 (9th Cir. 2002) : The Court reversed convictions for importation and possession of marijuana, finding that it was an abuse of discretion to admit expert testimony regarding the structure of drug trafficking organizations and the futility of collecting fingerprints because of the compartmentalized nature of drug trafficking organizations in a simple, non-conspiracy importation case. The Court noted that it had rejected the notion that evidence of the structure of drug organizations could prove that a particular defendant had knowledge that drugs were in his car, in United States v. Vallejo, infra. In United States v. Varela-Rivera, 279 F.3d 1174 (9th Cir. 2002) , a prosecution for drug importation and possession with intent to distribute, the defendant denied knowing that he was carrying the drugs and a Customs agent was permitted to testify about the methods and techniques used by narcotics smugglers, including that a smuggler would not risk using an unknowing courier to transport drugs. The Court held that admission of the expert's testimony was reversible error, since it prejudicially portrayed the defendant as a member of an international drug trafficking organization even though he was indicted only as an individual and there was no charge that he was acting in a conspiracy. In United States v. McGowan, 274 F.3d 1251 (9th Cir. 2001) , the Court reversed convictions for importation of marijuana and possession of marijuana with intent to distribute because expert testimony regarding the structure of drug trafficking organizations was improperly admitted. Under United States v. Vallejo, infra, such expert testimony is not admissible unless the defendant is charged with being part of a drug conspiracy. Without a conspiracy charge, the expert testimony is substantially more prejudicial than probative. The government argued that the defense opened the door to the expert testimony by asserting that the defendant's fingerprints were not found on the packages of drugs, and the expert testimony was necessary to explain that the defendant's fingerprints would not be found because drug conspiracies operate in such a way that the driver does not touch the drugs. But the Court found that the defense counsel only questioned defense agents about whether they used gloves when examining the evidence, which was not enough to affirmatively raise a lack-of-fingerprint defense. The Court distinguished United States v. Murillo, 255 F.3d 1169 (9th Cir. 2001) , where expert testimony on the operation of a drug conspiracy was allowed after the defendant designated a fingerprint expert and argued in his defense at trial that no fingerprints were found on the drug packages. In United States v. Vallejo, 237 F.3d 1008 (9th Cir. 2001) , amended, 246 F.3d 1150 (9th Cir. 2001) , marijuana was found in the defendant's car during a search at a Mexican border checkpoint. His defense was that he was duped to drive the car by Jaramillo, a former owner of the car who was involved in drug trafficking. The government offered extensive testimony from a law enforcement expert regarding the structure of drug trafficking organizations and the wages earned by drug couriers. Reversing, the Court held that admission of this testimony was error under Rule 403. Although the government argued that this testimony was admissible to explain why the defendant's fingerprints were not found on the drugs, the defendant had not indicated that he planned to, and in fact did not, raise the lack of fingerprint evidence as probative of his lack of knowledge. The Court noted that Vallejo was not charged with conspiracy and emphasized that this was a simple case; therefore the expert testimony was not "needed to assist the jury's understanding of a complex criminal case." See also United States v. Echavarria-Olarte n85(an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) for DEA agent to give expert testimony on the operations of the Medellin drug cartel, which were unrelated to the offenses with which the defendant was charged).

United States v. Tinoco, 304 F.3d 1088 (11th Cir. 2002) : The defendants were convicted of drug offenses after their boat, carrying more than 1,000 kilos of cocaine, was intercepted in the Pacific Ocean west of the Colombia-Ecuador border. The Court found no abuse of discretion when experienced narcotics agents were permitted to describe the defendants' vessel as a "go-fast," which was Coast Guard workplace vernacular. Although the term may have been somewhat prejudicial, it was not unfairly so, since it was used in the context of permissible testimony showing the significance of conduct or operation methods unique to the drug distribution business. There was also no abuse of discretion when an agent was permitted to testify to the market value of the cocaine in the United States, since it was relevant to the defendants' knowing participation in the conspiracy and to show that the cocaine was most likely intended for large-scale distribution rather than for personal consumption.

[30] Failure To Prosecute

In re High Fructose Corn Syrup Antitrust Litig., 295 F.3d 651 (7th Cir. 2002) : Reversing summary judgment for the defendants in a price-fixing case, the Court noted that the defendants could not use the Justice Department's failure to move against this conspiracy as evidence that there was no conspiracy. The Department has limited resources; the evidence in the case might not have been strong enough to establish guilt beyond a reasonable doubt; and the Department may have thought that its antitrust enforcement aims were sufficiently advanced by its prosecution of many of the defendants for another price-fixing conspiracy.

[31] Family Relationships

United States v. Nguyen, 284 F.3d 1086 (9th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed methamphetamine convictions, finding no error in the admission of evidence that the defendants were related to the holder of a driver's license bearing the same address as on a label attached to an express mail container that contained the drugs. The evidence tended to prove that the defendants did not just accidentally pick up and open a package mailed by mistake from an unknown address.

[32] Fraudulent Activities

United States v. Cusack, 229 F.3d 344 (2d Cir. 2000) : In a prosecution for fraud in a scheme to sell forged documents falsely attributed to President Kennedy, the Trial Judge admitted evidence that the defendant had lied to a dealer in historical memorabilia by concocting a distinguished military career and sometimes wearing military uniforms and medals in the dealer's presence. Finding no abuse of discretion, the Court held that the evidence was properly admitted "as evidence of the fraudulent scheme and to rebut the defense that Cusack did not know the documents were forged," since the lies were made to bolster the defendant's credibility with the dealer. The evidence was not unduly prejudicial when compared to "the audacious fraud with which Cusack was charged."

[33] Gang Membership

United States v. Liranzo, 385 F.3d 66 (1st Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no abuse of discretion when the arresting officers were permitted to testify that they were members of a gang task force. Their assignment helped explain why they were conducting surveillance of a known gang member's house when they first observed the defendant and why the procedures used in stopping the defendant's car were not those usually used for a traffic stop. The evidence was also relevant to rebut a defense argument implying racial profiling by the officers. Any risk of unfair prejudice was minimized by the Judge's limiting instruction and the prosecutor's explanation that the case was not about gang membership.

United States v. Barnes, 158 F.3d 662 (2d Cir. 1998) : The defendant was charged in a single count of a 33-count indictment, which generally charged members of the Latin Kings street gang with a racketeering enterprise engaged in narcotics trafficking, murder, and other acts of violence. The defendant was named only as part of a conspiracy to distribute drugs; he was not charged as a member or associate of the Latin Kings. During the defendant's trial, a photograph and testimony were introduced regarding guns and ammunition seized during a search of a Latin Kings meeting place. Although acknowledging that the evidence "could have been excluded without in any way weakening the case against the defendant," the Court held there was no error in its admission. Since the jury was fully aware, from the evidence and from both defense and prosecution summations, that the defendant was not a member of the Latin Kings and was not connected with the weapons or any violence associated with them, "the prejudicial effect of the evidence was simply undermined by its lack of probative value."

United States v. Gibbs, 182 F.3d 408 (6th Cir. 1999) : The defendants allegedly formed a gang ("SNP") to effectuate a drug conspiracy. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of photographs of two T-shirts found in a defendant's bedroom during execution of a search warrant. The shirts contained references to SNP, which were highly probative of the defendant's membership, and any prejudicial effect of violent language also on the T-shirts did not substantially outweigh that probative value. The Court did find, however, that it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to admit photographs of graffiti-covered buildings in the area in which the gang operated. Although the graffiti included references to SNP, it also included writings such as "cop killer," "slob killer," and "Crips." The graffiti provided no circumstantial evidence that SNP was the charged drug conspiracy and it was not connected with any of the defendants. Given that the jury could have improperly attributed the violent references to the defendants, any probative value was substantially outweighed by the potential for unfair prejudice.

United States v. Montgomery, 390 F.3d 1013 (7th Cir. 2004) : Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court found no plain error in the admission of evidence of the defendant's membership in a gang. The Court found the required "strong and direct link between the gang activity introduced and the possession of the firearm" here, as the defendant was charged with possessing a gun while at a street festival; there were problems between the defendant's gang and another gang that were expected to break out at the festival; and therefore the defendant's gang connection made it more likely that he was carrying a gun to the festival in anticipation of a confrontation. The Court also noted that the Judge "took the useful precaution of giving the jury a limiting instruction" to the effect that the jury could consider the defendant's gang membership only as it related to a motive for possessing the gun, and not for any other purpose. In United States v. Suggs, 374 F.3d 508 (7th Cir. 2004) , the Court affirmed narcotics convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence of the defendants' gang affiliations. The evidence tended to demonstrate the existence of a conspiracy and the connections between members of the gang and the conspiracy; evidence of their group's affiliation with a major Chicago gang tended to disprove the defense theory that they were merely members of a rap group. Exhibits showing the defendants' tattoos and one defendant's gold tooth helped to establish gang membership that was circumstantial support for the existence of a conspiracy (as opposed to unconnected drug transactions). In United States v. Hodges, 315 F.3d 794 (7th Cir. 2003) , the defendant was convicted for being a felon in possession, as a result of selling stolen firearms. The Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the defendant's affiliation with a street gang, since it corroborated testimony that he had said he could sell the guns through connections in Chicago, and evidence that the guns were recovered by a Chicago police tactical gang unit further corroborated the testimony. In United States v. Westbrook, n86 at the defendant's trial for conspiracy to distribute cocaine base, he testified that a cooperating witness was a gang member and that he was afraid of the witness, which was why he initially misidentified the witness to the police. He was not, however, permitted to ask other witnesses about the gang affiliations of two men who were not called to testify and who were not involved in the events at issue, nor was he permitted to elicit general information about the gang. Affirming, the Court noted that this was not like the usual case, in which the defendant is concerned about the prejudicial effect of gang membership evidence. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the rulings, since the defendant was permitted to introduce evidence of gang membership where it was relevant and not permitted to where there was no showing of relevance. See also United States v. Sargent n87(evidence of gang membership tended to undermine the coercion defense and explain the defendant's illegal behavior); United States v. Irvin n88(reversing conviction for improper admission of motorcycle gang membership, which had little value in proving the defendants were engaged in a common venture to distribute drugs, yet posed a substantial risk of arousing negative connotations and invoking images of criminal activity); United States v. Butler n89(gang membership evidence properly admitted to prove defendant knowingly possessed a firearm, since it showed that he served as a gang security guard, which made it more probable that he knowingly possessed a gun).

United States v. Hull, 419 F.3d 762 (8th Cir. 2005) : The defendant, charged with marijuana traffficking, testified that he had no reason to deal in drugs because he had several successful businesses, including a record company. Affirming, the Court held that, after the defendant's attorney characterized the company's music as "hip-hop" in his opening statement, the government's cross-examination of the defendant as to whether the music could be characterized as "gangster rap" and introduction of one of the company's CDs was within the scope of direct examination. The Court noted that the jury was instructed that the evidence was not to be used to prove either Hull's association with a gang or guilt in this case. In United States v. Bradford, 246 F.3d 1107 (8th Cir. 2001) , the Court affirmed drug conspiracy convictions, finding no error when evidence of gang membership was admitted to clarify the connections between the defendants. The Trial Judge had prohibited the government from mentioning gang membership in its opening and closing argument, but did not impose a blanket prohibition on all such evidence. In United States v. Lemon, n90 the defendant was charged with constructive possession of narcotics and ammunition found in a house where he was arrested. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that he was a member of a gang called the Family Mob, when offered to prove his ownership of a Family Mob ring that was found on a dresser in the room where the narcotics and ammunition were located. The Trial Judge had excluded evidence of the defendant's prior conviction for gang-related activity, so "gang evidence did not become a pervasive theme of the trial." See also United States v. Sills n91(defendant's gang-related activities were probative of his knowledge that a sawed-off shotgun was under the seat of the car he was driving when arrested); United States v. Johnson n92(evidence of gang-related activities served to establish the historical, geographical, and business connections the defendants had with each other).

United States v. Fernandez, 388 F.3d 1199 (9th Cir. 2004) : In a prosecution of RICO and drug trafficking charges related to the defendants' involvement with the "Mexican Mafia," the Court found no abuse of discretion when photographs of defendants' gang-related tattoos were introduced. The tattoos tended to prove gang membership, which the government alleged was a precursor to membership in the Mexican Mafia, and the Court concluded that admission of the relevant photographs did not unfairly prejudice the defendants. In United States v. Padilla, 387 F.3d 1087 (9th Cir. 2004) , the Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no abuse of discretion when a detective having extensive experience with local gangs was permitted to testify regarding gang punishment for junior members who fail to support senior members. The testimony was admitted for the limited purpose of impeaching exculpatory testimony offered by a passenger in the defendant's car, who testified that both he and the defendant were gang members and that the gun found in the car was his rather than the defendant's. The probative value of the expert's testimony on the witness' truthfulness was not substantially outweighed by any prejudicial effect. Affirming a conviction for drug possession with intent to distribute in United States v. Takahashi, n93 the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant and a favorable witness belonged to a secretive Japanese organized crime group whose members will perjure themselves for one another. The evidence was probative of bias, and the Judge both gave a limiting instruction and induced the government not to show photographs of the gang's distinctive tattoos on the defendant. See also United States v. Hankey n94(expert testimony on gang retribution for informing was highly probative to explain a codefendant's motive for testifying in Hankey's favor; testimony was not proffered to prove a substantive element of the crime and the jury received an "adamant" limiting instruction); United States v. Easter n95(testimony that the defendants were all affiliated with the same gang was probative of identity, because the person who admitted planning both robberies was also a member of the same gang; the government refrained from inquiring into the nature and history of the gang, and did not emphasize the gang affiliation in its closing argument, the Trial Judge on voir dire probed for bias about gang affiliation, and a cautionary instruction was given).

United States v. Brown, 200 F.3d 700 (10th Cir. 1999) : Affirming a conviction for carjacking, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the two defendants and a cooperating witness, who was driving the victim's vehicle, were members of a gang. The evidence tended to rebut the defendants' argument that they had no part in the theft by showing identity, joint venture, and existence of a conspiracy, and it illuminated the relationship between the cooperating witness and the defendants as to both the charged crimes and the witness' subsequent testimony. In United States v. Robinson, 978 F.2d 1554 (10th Cir. 1992) , the Court affirmed convictions for cocaine base possession and conspiracy, and held that expert evidence tending to show that the defendants were active members of a gang whose main purpose was to sell cocaine was not impermissible "profile" evidence. Although the Trial Judge had admitted the evidence under Rule 404(b), a majority of the Court suggested that the evidence might not qualify under the Rule and concluded that the pertinent test is relevancy. The majority rejected the argument that evidence concerning gang membership tends only to show propensity and reasoned that "associational evidence may be directly relevant on the issues of formation, agreement and purpose of a conspiracy." The dissenting Judge believed that the government had impermissibly sought to prove that by exhibiting the characteristics of gang members, the defendants were members of a gang with criminal purposes and therefore were guilty of the charged conspiracy and underlying crimes; in any event, the gang affiliation evidence should have been inadmissible because it is inherently and unfairly prejudicial.

United States v. Jernigan, 341 F.3d 1273 (11th Cir. 2003) : Two defendants were convicted for felon firearms possession, after one was permitted to introduce evidence that the other was a member of the Bloods gang and that the gang used the color red as a symbol of membership. Affirming, the Court found that evidence of gang membership was "especially probative in this case because the weapon was found wrapped in a red bandanna," but added that "we do not wish to understate the prejudicial effect that evidence of a criminal defendant's gang membership may entail" and "the Rule 403 calculus was in our view a close one, and the district court would have been justified in the deciding this issue either way."

[34] Grand Jury Report

Stump v. Gates, 211 F.3d 527 (10th Cir. 2000) : A decedent's children brought an action under § 1983 and for outrageous conduct against a city, its police chief, and a detective, alleging that they had denied the children access to the state Courts to assert a wrongful death claim against the decedent's wife by bungling an investigation into the decedent's 1984 death and destroying the relevant evidence. At trial the plaintiffs introduced a 1989 state grand jury report, which had concluded that the decedent's death was a homicide and not a suicide as previously characterized by the police department. The report was admitted not for its truth but to show that through the report the plaintiffs had learned there was a cover-up for which they had an outrageous conduct claim. Reversing a judgment for the plaintiffs, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to admit the grand jury report. It had little if any probative value in establishing when or how the plaintiffs received notice of their claims, since their complaint was filed seven months before they saw the report, and it was highly prejudicial as a hearsay conclusion that the police chief had deliberately and egregiously covered up the cause of the decedent's death.

[35] Guilt by Association

United States v. Felton, 417 F.3d 97 (1st Cir. 2005) : In a prosecution for bank robbery, counterfeiting, and planning construction of an explosive device, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the defendants' white supremacist beliefs and of their associations with like-minded organizations and activities. The evidence was highly probative of one defendant's participation in the entire conspiracy and of another's purpose in manufacturing a bomb to use it to kill or injure persons or to destroy property. In United States v. Flemmi, 402 F.3d 79 (1st Cir. 2005) , the Court affirmed the convictions of a retired Boston police officer arising from his assistance in hiding weapons and impeding an investigation of a criminal enterprise in which his brother was a controlling member. It held that testimony concerning the criminal enterprise and the defendant's relationship to it was relevant and not unduly prejudicial and demonstrated the close connection of the defendant with the enterprise and his knowledge of criminal acts of the enterprise. In a prosecution for violating arms export controls in connection with terrorist activities in Northern Ireland, United States v. Johnson, n96 the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence about the Provisional Irish Republican Army and the history of the Irish conflict. The evidence was probative of the indictment's characterization of the PIRA as a "body of insurgents" and, given the other evidence of the defendants' approval of and contribution to the methods and goals of the PIRA, presented at most a remote risk of guilt by association.

SEC v. Warde, 151 F.3d 42 (2d Cir. 1998) : The SEC charged the defendant Warde and one Downe in a civil enforcement proceeding with insider trading based on nonpublic information received by Downe as director of the affected company. Although Downe settled, he and Warde denied that any nonpublic information had been used in their trading, and Warde went to trial. Affirming a judgment against Warde, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that Downe illegally attempted to conceal his trading by using offshore accounts and accounts of others. The probative value of the evidence on the issue of whether Downe was trading illegally on inside information was not substantially outweighed by the risk of condemning Warde by association in the eyes of the jurors. In United States v. Ruggiero, 934 F.2d 440 (2d Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed convictions for conspiring to obstruct a grand jury investigation into the former whereabouts of a deceased narcotics fugitive, holding that evidence of the fugitive's narcotics activities was relevant to the defendants' motives for conspiring to obstruct justice; it was not an abuse of discretion to determine that this probative value outweighed any possible prejudicial effect of guilt by association.

United States v. Irizarry, 341 F.3d 273 (3d Cir. 2003) : Affirming RICO convictions, the Court ruled that it was error (but not plain error) to admit testimony about a high ranking member of a crime family that was completely unrelated to his dealings with the charged enterprise. In a footnote, the Court found it "necessary to once again caution against the dangers of eliciting this kind of evidence and the propriety of admitting it," since "irrelevant references to such notorious figures as the members of the Gambino crime family can poison the deliberative well to an extent that will fatally undermine the integrity of any subsequent conviction."

United States v. Taylor, 210 F.3d 311 (5th Cir. 2000) : The Court reversed the defendant's convictions for drug trafficking offenses because two prior state convictions of the purported head of the conspiracy, who was not tried with or called as a witness against the defendant, were improperly admitted. The Court held that the convictions were excessively prejudicial because they permitted the jury to infer that the defendant must be guilty because she associated with convicted felons and to assume that if the conspiracy's leader had delivered drugs, he must have delivered them to the defendant. In United States v. Polasek, 162 F.3d 878 (5th Cir. 1998) , the defendant, who operated a service that transferred motor vehicle documents from dealers to purchasers, was charged with fraudulently altering the mileage on titles and related documents. After the defendant's testimony denying any fraudulent alteration, the government called a special agent of the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration, who testified that the defendant had done title work for persons who were subsequently convicted of odometer fraud. Reversing, the Court held that the rebuttal testimony was improper evidence of guilt by association. In United States v. Parad-Talamantes, n97 the Court reversed a drug conviction on the ground that the prosecution was improperly allowed to show that the defendant's brother was a drug dealer. Introduction of the evidence was "a highly prejudicial attempt to taint defendant's character through guilt by association."

United States v. Looking Cloud, 419 F.3d 781 (8th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a conviction for a murder committed in the mid-1970s, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding the American Indian Movement and its violent activities at that time. The evidence was probative of the prosecution theory that the defendant and the victim were associated with the Movement and that the murder was committed because of concerns in the Movement that the victim had become a government informant, and any prejudicial effect was minimal because Movement violence was not a focus of the trial but was elicited only in a matter-of-fact and non-inflammatory way.

United States v. Haynes, 372 F.3d 1164 (10th Cir. 2004) : When officers went to the defendant's home to arrest him on an unrelated warrant, they found equipment and supplies frequently used in manufacturing methamphetamine, as well as P2P, a controlled substance with no commercial use that can be used in manufacturing methamphetamine. After his arrest, the defendant told a DEA agent that he knew a woman who manufactured methamphetamine using P2P. The Court held that the agent's testimony about that statement was properly admitted although it might pose a danger that the jury would convict on the ground the defendant apparently associated with drug dealers, since it was highly probative on the defendant's knowledge of methamphetamine manufacture, and thus could shed light on why he possessed the items seized from his home. In United States v. Espinoza, 244 F.3d 1234 (10th Cir. 2001) , the Court affirmed a marijuana conviction, holding that evidence that the defendant's wife had a pending drug charge and had accompanied the defendant when he previously transported drugs was properly admitted as probative of the defendant's knowledge that drugs were in his truck. However, it held that it was error (but harmless) to admit evidence that the defendant's sons had drug convictions and one had escaped from a halfway house. There was no suggestion at trial that the sons were involved in the drug transaction at issue. Moreover, even if the evidence had some tangential relevance, that was substantially outweighed by the prejudicial impression that most if not all members of the defendant's immediate family were involved in drug trafficking.

[36] High Crime Neighborhood

United States v. Quinn, 230 F.3d 862 (6th Cir. 2000) : Affirming a defendant's convictions for drug trafficking and firearms possession offenses, the Court found no error in admission of an officer's testimony that the neighborhood in which the defendant was arrested was a high drug-trafficking area. The evidence was at least marginally probative to explain why the arresting officers acted as they did, so the Court did not find an abuse of discretion.

[37] Hypnotized Witness

Mersch v. City of Dallas, 207 F.3d 732 (5th Cir. 2000) : A Magistrate Judge held that the plaintiff's hypnotically refreshed testimony about what happened during her arrest was sufficient to create a triable issue of fact in her suit against police officers for using excessive force. The Trial Court reversed and the Court of Appeals affirmed the grant of summary judgment to the defendants, holding that the hypnotically-enhanced evidence was per se inadmissible under United States v. Valdez, infra. In this case, the plaintiff did not initially accuse the police of beating her, but after her sister visited her in the hospital and expressed a suspicion that the police had caused her injuries, she "remembered" an alleged assault under hypnosis. In United States v. Valdez, n98 the Court reversed a conviction for extortion, finding that "when, as here, a hypnotized subject identifies for the first time a person he has reason to know is already under suspicion, the post-hypnotic testimony is inadmissible whatever procedural safeguards were used to attempt to sanitize the hypnotic session." The use of hypnosis in this context presents dangers of undue suggestiveness and the resulting evidence is more prejudicial than probative. The Court went on to state that its holding did not make a hypnotized witness incompetent for all purposes and that "[i]f a sufficiently reliable method exists for the witness to separate pre-hypnotic memory from post-hypnotic pseudomemory, such testimony may be admissible." It also observed that it was not adopting a per se rule excluding the use of hypnosis under all circumstances, since "[i]n a particular case, the evidence favoring admissibility might make the probative value of the testimony outweigh its prejudicial effect." See also United States v. Harrelson n99(in a prosecution charging defendants with conspiring and killing a Federal Judge, the Court distinguished Valdez on the ground that two witnesses who made identifications had either identified or described a defendant prior to being hypnotized).

Sprynczynatyk v. General Motors Corp., 771 F.2d 1112 (8th Cir. 1985) : The Court reversed a judgment for a plaintiff who alleged product liability and negligence in the design of automobile brakes because the Trial Judge erred in admitting videotapes of a hypnotic session and rejecting the defendant's request for a limiting instruction explaining that the videotapes were admitted only to evaluate the opinions of an expert witness. The Court also rejected a per se rule barring the use of hypnosis to refresh the recollection of a witness. Instead, it held that hypnotically-refreshed testimony may be admitted if its proponent bears the burden of demonstrating that the procedures utilized were sufficient to guarantee reliability.

[38] Illness or Disease

Sinai v. New England Tel. & Tel. Co., 3 F.3d 471 (1st Cir. 1993) : Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff in an employment discrimination action, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting certain testimony by the plaintiff's psychologist. Prognosis evidence about the plaintiff's depression was very important to the damages issue, and the Trial Judge took care to ensure that the jury would not reach a verdict on improper grounds; evidence of the plaintiff's wife's own harassment and discrimination claims was proper on redirect in response to implications that the plaintiff's depression stemmed from preexisting marital difficulties. In Pinkham v. Burgess, 933 F.2d 1066 (1st Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the client in an attorney malpractice action, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by the defendant's psychological expert that a mental condition possibly existing years before the expert examined the defendant might have affected his ability to perceive the harm he was causing a client. The weak probative value of the evidence was substantially outweighed by the likelihood the jury would improperly consider it on the negligence issue.

United States v. Scotti, 47 F.3d 1237 (2d Cir. 1995) : The Court held in a loansharking prosecution that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence of the victim's HIV infection and the defendant's knowledge of it. Although the evidence might have been relevant to whether the defendant would punch the victim in the face, that argument was not made until the parties had rested. The only argument made when the government objected referred to the victim's drug habits and sexual proclivities, and since those were already in evidence, examination concerning HIV infection was at best cumulative and at worst highly prejudicial, especially given the risk that a juror might discredit the victim's testimony solely because of his HIV status. In Davidson v. Smith, 9 F.3d 4 (2d Cir. 1993) , the Court reversed a judgment for the defendants in a prisoner's civil rights action because a defense witness violated an in limine order not to refer to the plaintiff's psychiatric history or his treatment at a state hospital for the criminally insane. Given the prejudicial effect of the evidence, the questionable efficacy of a curative instruction, and the relative strength of the plaintiff's case, it was error to deny the plaintiff's motion for a mistrial.

Wallace v. Mulholland, 957 F.2d 333 (7th Cir. 1992) : In a civil rights action for excessive force used by police in enforcing a commitment petition, the Court held there was no error in excluding evidence of the committed person's psychiatric history. Where the issue in the case was his actual behavior and how the officers responded to it, evidence about the general nature of his condition and the likelihood that someone with that condition would act aggressively was probably irrelevant and certainly prejudicial.

Cisar v. Home Depot U.S.A., Inc., 351 F.3d 800 (8th Cir. 2003) : In a personal injury action arising from the sale of an allegedly defective chain saw, the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of "embarassing and damaging pre-accident and post-accident incidents involving [the plaintiffs husband and wife]. Given the nature of [their] claims, Home Depot could legitimately attack the claims that Cisar's brain injury caused his post-accident behavior and damaged his familial relationships."

United States v. Ives, 609 F.2d 930 (9th Cir. 1979) : The Court said that it was error (but harmless) to reject defense evidence of past mental condition in support of an insanity defense and emphasized that Trial Judges should not be quick to exclude (as cumulative) evidence of medical history that supports such a defense.

O'Banion v. Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corp., 968 F.2d 1011 (10th Cir. 1992) : Affirming a judgment for the defendants in an action for asbestos-related disease, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in prohibiting mention of the word "cancer" where the plaintiff offered no expert evidence that there was a reasonable medical probability of his developing cancer. In United States v. Austin, 933 F.2d 833 (10th Cir. 1991) , the Court reversed a conviction for resisting correctional officers, holding it was an abuse of discretion when the defense was mental illness to exclude records of prior hospitalizations solely on the ground of remoteness. The Court was unwilling to place a temporal limit on relevant proof of mental illness in view of its frequently long duration, its possible chronicity, and its recurrent manifestations.

United States v. Breitweiser, 357 F.3d 1249 (11th Cir. 2004) : The defendant was convicted for abusive sexual contact with a minor following an incident in which he rubbed a girl's thigh and allegedly masturbated while they were passengers on an airplane. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony from a doctor at a psychiatric clinic who examined the defendant eleven days after the incident. The doctor would have testified that the defendant suffered from a bipolar disorder and made "bizarre movements" during his hospitalization, which the defense claimed would explain the touching and the alleged masturbation. The Court concluded that the evidence "fails the relevance test" and was properly excluded under Rule 403. In Wright v. Commercial Union Ins. Co., 818 F.2d 832 (11th Cir. 1987) , the Court affirmed a judgment for an insured who sued to recover on a policy covering business property, and held that evidence that the insured was suffering from terminal cancer when his building was damaged was admissible to rebut the defendant's claim that the insured had failed to comply with certain policy requirements.

[39] Impeachment and Rebuttal Evidence -- Civil Cases

Connelly v. Hyundai Motor Co., 351 F.3d 535 (1st Cir. 2003) : Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff in a suit for the death of a child caused when an airbag deployed in a collision, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence that the child's father, who was driving at the time of the accident, had twice been cited for driving his car without fastening the child's seatbelt. The defense argued that the evidence should have been admitted to impeach the father's testimony on cross-examination that he did not remember a police officer advising him that the child was to be wearing a seatbelt when the car was moving, but the Court found the father was sufficiently impeached by a prior inconsistent statement from his deposition, and that the Judge could reasonably have concluded that the citation evidence would have been excessively prejudicial. In Danco, Inc. v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 178 F.3d 8 (1st Cir. 1999) , the sole shareholder of a corporation that had a contract to maintain the defendant's parking lot alleged violation of § 1983 by a hostile work environment. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in precluding impeachment of the individual plaintiff on the basis of a 15-year-old incident, as the probative value of the incident was minimal and a danger of prejudice existed.

Pitasi v. Stratton Corp., 968 F.2d 1558 (2d Cir. 1992) : In a suit against a ski resort, the defendant offered testimony that it had never placed ropes between two trails where the plaintiff was injured. When the plaintiff recalled one of the defendant's employees, evidence that ropes had been placed between the trails the previous year was excluded on the grounds it was improper rebuttal and any probative value was outweighed by the prejudicial effect. The Court reversed, holding the evidence was both proper rebuttal, as not necessary to the plaintiff's prima facie case, and highly relevant to impeach the defendant's employee witnesses on the central issue of the defendant's negligence.

Elcock v. Kmart Corp., 233 F.3d 734 (3d Cir. 2000) : In a personal injury action arising from a slip and fall, the Trial Judge admitted evidence that one of the plaintiff's expert witnesses had pleaded guilty to embezzlement, but the Judge forbade questions regarding the amount embezzled or the facts and circumstances of the crimes. Reversing a judgment for the plaintiff on other grounds, the Court noted that the guilty pleas were properly admitted under Rule 609(a)(2). The underlying misconduct, involving dishonesty, was probative of the witness' character for truthfulness, and thus admissible, at the Judge's discretion, under Rule 608(b). That discretion is governed by Rules 403 and 611. The Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding reference to the underlying acts, but it noted that the amount of money misappropriated and the manner in which it was done were certainly relevant to prove the witness' dishonesty. On remand, the Judge was free to balance once again whether the gain from this probative value justified the time required to ask about the details.

Dollar v. Long Mfg., N.C., Inc., 561 F.2d 613 (5th Cir. 1977) : The Court reversed a judgment for the defendant in a product liability action because of an erroneous ruling that a defense witness, who testified that the instrument used by the deceased was safe to operate, could not be impeached by a letter the witness sent to dealers selling the instrument warning them about its "death-dealing propensities" when used in the fashion it was used by the deceased. Finding error in the exclusion of the evidence under Rule 407, the Court stated that the evidence should not have been excluded under Rule 403 because there was no danger of unfair prejudice to the defendant.

Fort v. C. W. Keller Trucking, Inc., 330 F.3d 1006 (7th Cir. 2003) : The plaintiff in a wrongful death action arising from a truck accident had entered received $2.25 million under a loan receipt agreement with the contractor for which the truck was operating. The agreement released all defendants except the trucking company, and provided that the plaintiff would pay the contractor one-third of money recovered from the trucking company or its insurer. At trial the defendant sought to introduce the agreement to impeach a manager for the contractor. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the evidence, since (1) the witness had no personal knowledge of the agreement, (2) the defendant had ample opportunity otherwise to expose the witness' bias resulting from his employer's potential liability, and (3) "the jury might have been unable to limit its consideration of the loan receipt agreement to the issue of bias, and instead inferred that the plaintiff had already been fully compensated for her loss through the loan receipt agreement." In a breach of contract action between a manufacturer and a sales representative, Jabat, Inc. v. Smith, 201 F.3d 852 (7th Cir. 2000) , the plaintiff was permitted to introduce the defendant's income tax returns and to cross-examine him on the information they contained, but was prohibited from showing that the defendant had not timely filed his tax returns. The Court found no abuse of discretion: the returns were relevant to the issues of mitigation of damages and the claim that the representative was receiving income from the manufacturer's competitor, but the timeliness of the returns' filing was irrelevant to those issues and would raise collateral questions likely to confuse the jury and be unduly prejudicial.

Lampkins v. Thompson, 337 F.3d 1009 (8th Cir. 2003) : The plaintiff in a civil rights action alleged that federal agents had unconstitutionally detained him at an airport. When the agents testified that they had seen the plaintiff's ticket before the stop and it had another passenger's name on it, the plaintiff sought unsuccessfully to introduce the agents' prior sworn statement, which said nothing about seeing the name on the ticket until after the stop. Affirming a judgment for the defendants, the Court found no abuse of discretion in exclusion of the evidence, since the omission was not probative to impeach in the absence of a statement that the affidavits contained all the facts the declarant knew about the incident, and since the affidavits were likely to mislead or confuse the jury. In Swan v. Interstate Brands Corp., 333 F.3d 863 (8th Cir. 2003) , a terminated employee suing for age discrimination sought to introduce a severance agreement and release that he had signed, ostensibly only to impeach the testimony of a witness for the defendant regarding the date of the termination decision. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the evidence: the timing of the decision was collateral to whether the defendant discriminated on the basis of age; without a valid exception such as impeachment, the agreement was inadmissible evidence of discrimination under Rule 408; and the evidence was unduly prejudicial to the defendant. In a product liability action involving a pneumatic nailer, Drabik v. Stanley-Bostitch, Inc., n100 the Court held there was an abuse of discretion in admitting extensive evidence of dissimilar nailer accidents to impeach the defendant's expert. To hold that an expert who simply offers an opinion that the product is "generally safe" opens the door to all other accident evidence would create an exception swallowing the general rule requiring substantial similarity.

Glover v. BIC Corp., 6 F.3d 1318 (9th Cir. 1993) : In a product liability wrongful death action in which the defendant manufacturer of a cigarette lighter attempted to show that the decedent was the victim of a cooking accident, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to exclude evidence of past fires in the victim's home.

SEC v. Peters, 978 F.2d 1162 (10th Cir. 1992) : The Court reversed a judgment for the defendant in a civil action for insider trading violations, holding the SEC had been improperly precluded from asking the defendant and his character witnesses about allegations of other securities law violations committed by the defendant, as he had made his character and his unblemished history a very important part of his defense and the rulings deprived the jury of a fair and balanced opportunity to evaluate his character. The Trial Judge had erroneously assigned the proposed evidence a probative value of "nil" and overemphasized its prejudicial effect and tendencies to raise collateral issues.

Ad-Vantage Tel. Directory Consultants, Inc. v. GTE Directories Corp., 37 F.3d 1460 (11th Cir. 1994) : The Court reversed a judgment on a jury verdict of no damages in a suit by a business selling yellow pages advertising that alleged the defendant had committed antitrust and state law violations. The plaintiff relied upon an expert lawyer-CPA to testify about lost profits, and the Magistrate Judge permitted the defendant to question the expert about his bankruptcy, an accusation of forgery, and a sanction in 1969 by a state board of accountancy. The Court found that the evidence was unduly prejudicial.

[40] Impeachment and Rebuttal -- Criminal Cases

[a] Accused Witness

United States v. Cudlitz, 72 F.3d 992 (1st Cir. 1996) : A defendant charged with arson and insurance fraud testified on direct that, when previously faced with an unprofitable business venture, he had duly paid his debts, had never had a fire connected with any other enterprise, and had never made a claim for fire damage on any of his other properties. On cross-examination, he was asked about his prior attempt to solicit arson of a different property. The Court held that the question was proper, even though the prosecutors knew that he would deny it (based on his direct testimony) and they would be prohibited under Rule 608(b) from proving the event through extrinsic evidence. "[C]ross-examination of this kind is part of a system of checks and balances that the law has developed to caution a credulous jury against possible perjury." The requirement that the government have a good-faith basis for the question, the preclusion of extrinsic evidence to contradict the witness' denials, and the balancing of Rule 403 provide the defendant sufficient protection. The Court found reversible error, however, when the prosecutor insinuated that the person solicited by the defendant for the prior arson had been convicted of the crime, when in fact this was not the case.

United States v. Markarian, 967 F.2d 1098 (6th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to possess heroin with intent to distribute, holding there was no abuse of discretion in permitting rebuttal testimony about an incident connecting the defendant with drugs, as it was relevant to his knowledge or intent to deal and was introduced in response to the defendant's sweeping statements (going far beyond the particular crimes charged) on direct examination concerning his experiences with drugs.

United States v. Woodard, 315 F.3d 1000 (8th Cir. 2003) : In a prosecution for Medicaid fraud, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the defendant was cross-examined about receiving the proceeds of an irregular business loan through a series of related partnerships. The evidence was relevant both to the financial condition of the defendant's business and to the defendant's credibility, which he placed in issue by testifying about the loan during direct examination.

United States v. Jimenez, 214 F.3d 1095 (9th Cir. 2000) : In a trial for felon firearm possession, the government sought to impeach the defendant with his prior felony convictions for burglary and for assault with a deadly weapon. The Trial Judge granted the request, but ordered that the assault conviction be referred to as a "felony involving a firearm." The Court reversed because the Judge's well-meaning attempt to mitigate the prejudice to the defendant inadvertently made it worse. Altering the nature of the assault conviction from one involving a deadly weapon to one involving a firearm increased rather than decreased the likelihood that the jury would draw an impermissible inference, since the only issue in dispute was whether the defendant in fact possessed a firearm. In United States v. Takahashi, 205 F.3d 1161 (9th Cir. 2000) , the Court affirmed a conviction for drug possession with intent to distribute, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant and a favorable witness belonged to a secretive Japanese organized crime group whose members will perjure themselves for one another. The evidence was probative of bias, and the Judge both gave a limiting instruction and induced the government not to show photographs of the gang's distinctive tattoos on the defendant.

United States v. Smith, 63 F.3d 956 (10th Cir. 1995) , vacated on other grounds, 516 U.S. 1105 , on remand, 82 F.3d 1564 (1996) : The Court affirmed drug trafficking convictions, holding that photographs showing the defendant and others posing with firearms and making gang signals were properly admitted during cross-examination to impeach the defendant's testimony that he was not a gang member and that he possessed the guns only for protection from another gang.

[b] Impeachment and Rebuttal -- Criminal Cases -- Defense Witnesses

United States v. Mercado, 412 F.3d 243 (1st Cir. 2005) : Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court found no abuse of discretion in permitting the prosecution to cross-examine the defendant's ex-girlfriend about why she waited nine months to come forward if her exculpatory evidence were true. In the course of the cross-examination, the prosecution established that the witness knew the defendant was facing proceedings in State Court arising from the same gun possession giving rise to the federal prosecution and failed to come forward to assist the defendant in the state case. The Court noted that the jury was properly instructed that the state proceedings were only relevant to "action or inaction" by the witness. In United States v. Bartelho, 71 F.3d 436 (1st Cir. 1995) , the defendant was charged with felon firearm possession after a domestic dispute. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion when the prosecutor asked the defendant's girlfriend on rebuttal whether the defendant had threatened to kill her, as she was the best witness to his physical possession of the gun and the evidence was highly relevant to the jury's decision whether to credit her recorded pretrial testimony that he in fact possessed the gun or her in-court denial of that fact. Furthermore, only the bare facts, not sensational details, of the threats were elicited.

United States v. Wallach, 935 F.2d 445 (2d Cir. 1991) : The prosecutor asked character witnesses for a defendant charged with racketeering about an incident where a State Judge the defendant was promoting for appointment to the federal bench had approved a 60 percent legal fee for him in the settlement of a personal injury case. Reversing the convictions on other grounds, the Court noted that the government had a good faith reason for inquiring into the matter to challenge the basis for the character witnesses' opinions, but that the prosecutor argued the evidence to the jury in a manner well beyond the bounds of propriety and relevance.

United States v. Bradley, 173 F.3d 225 (3d Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed a public official's conviction for corruption, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that $157,000 in cash was found in lockboxes in the attic of his girlfriend's home. She claimed that the money had been found in her father's house after his death and it was in her house until she could discuss it with her sister. The Court found that the evidence properly impeached the girlfriend's testimony that $3,600 she had received from the defendant had been lent to her father, since he was unlikely to have borrowed if he had so much money, and it also impeached her testimony that payments the defendant made to her were loans, since she did not repay him when she found the cash. The Trial Judge properly gave limiting instructions that the evidence was admitted only to impeach and that it was not offered to show any connection between the cash, the defendant, and any crime.

United States v. Thompson, 359 F.3d 470 (7th Cir. 2004) : The defendant was charged with possession of ammunition by a felon after bullets were found in a jacket in a car in which he and his girlfriend had been traveling. Shortly after the arrest, she told police that the jacket and the bullets belonged to the defendant, but at trial she testified for the defense that they were hers. Although an in limine ruling precluded mention of the defendant's prior convictions and status as a suspect in uncharged crimes, the government was permitted to ask the girlfriend on cross-examination about past threats the defendant had made against her and past charges she had brought against him. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion, since even without evidence that the witness was intimidated, the evidence of threats was probative of the witness' bias and its probative value was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice.

United States v. Takahashi, 205 F.3d 1161 (9th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed a conviction for drug possession with intent to distribute, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant and a favorable witness belonged to a secretive Japanese organized crime group whose members will perjure themselves for one another. The evidence was probative of bias, and the Judge both gave a limiting instruction and induced the government not to show photographs of the gang's distinctive tattoos on the defendant. In a fraud prosecution, United States v. Bush, 58 F.3d 482 (9th Cir. 1995) , after a witness said, in response to a question from defense counsel, that he had never known the defendant union official to have any problems, the government asked whether he was aware that civil RICO charges accusing the defendant of financial misconduct had been filed. Although the prosecutor appeared to be referring to a separate incident, in fact the civil charges arose out of the same situation as the criminal charges. The Court held it was error (but harmless) under Rule 403 to permit the question: the evidence lacked probative value because the witness' knowledge of the civil RICO case was entirely consistent with his original testimony that he had never known the defendant to be in trouble before, and it was prejudicial because it falsely suggested that the RICO charges represented a separate incident of misconduct somewhere in the defendant's past.

[c] Impeachment and Rebuttal -- Criminal Cases -- Opinions on Credibility

United States v. Torres-Galindo, 206 F.3d 136 (1st Cir. 2000) : Although the Court affirmed carjacking and firearms convictions, it noted that it was troubled by the testimony of an FBI special agent whose "vouching" the Court had criticized in United States v. Rosario-Diaz, 202 F.3d 54 (1st Cir. 2000) . The agent opined with respect to custodial statements made by one defendant that "it is difficult for me to remember a time when a defendant or a suspect in a case has immediately told me the truth" and that "[m]ost of the time they always start with a lie." The Court observed that the agent appeared to be giving improper expert testimony, and it added that "any effort to test the basis for Agent Huff's opinion by examining the individual instances involving other confessions in the prior ten years obviously created a threat of a distracting exploration of the facts in unrelated cases. See Rule 403." Any error in admission of the testimony was harmless, however.

[d] Impeachment and Rebuttal -- Criminal Cases -- Prosecution Witnesses

[i] Defense Evidence or Questioning

United States v. Watson, 409 F.3d 458 (D.C. Cir. 2005) : The defendant, an African-American, was stopped by an officer for a window-tint violation, and a search of his car uncovered drugs and firearms. At trial for weapons and drug offenses, the defendant wanted to cross-examine the officer about 30 instances in which he stopped black men for window-tint violations but eventually arrested them on drug charges. Affirming, the Court found no error in prohibiting this inquiry: the relevance of the evidence to impeach the witness for bias "was not readily apparent given the lack of information regarding [the officer's] arrests of members of other demographic groups, and its probative value was substantially outweighed by the threat of undue delay or confusion of issues inherent in a drawn-out inquiry into the details of [the officer's] history of arrests."

United States v. Zaccaria, 240 F.3d 75 (1st Cir. 2001) : During the investigation of a counterfeiting scheme, a principal prosecution witness at the defendant's trial had elected to remain silent after receiving Miranda warnings. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion when the defendant was precluded from introducing evidence of this prior silence to impeach the witness. In the Court's view, "[s]ilence per se generally has little or no probative value for impeachment purposes[;] ... evidence of the invocation of the right to remain silent is inherently prejudicial"; and there were no "special trappings that might imbue [the witness'] silence with unaccustomed probative force" or other special circumstances that called for making an exception to the usual rule. In a bank fraud prosecution, United States v. Mulinelli-Navas, 111 F.3d 983 (1st Cir. 1997) , the Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in precluding cross-examination of a cooperating witness about the sentences he faced and avoided by his plea bargain. That would have put before the jury the potential punishment the defendant faced, which could confuse the issues that the jury was supposed to be deciding.

United States v. Holland, 381 F.3d 80 (2d Cir. 2004) : In a Mann Act prosecution, the defense sought to introduce the indictment, plea agreement, and judgment in the Mann Act prosecution of another pimp who had employed some of the prosecution witnesses after they stopped working for the defendant. The defendant argued that the evidence showed the witnesses lied in order to protect the other pimp or were confused about who had transported them on particular occasions, but the Court found no abuse of discretion when the evidence was excluded, since it would have added nothing to the defendant's efforts to discredit the witness' testimony through cross-examination. The excluded filings did not even name the women transported. In United States v. Harvey, 547 F.2d 720 (2d Cir. 1976) , the Court reversed a conviction for bank robbery on the ground that a key prosecution identification witness was improperly protected against evidence that the witness once had accused the appellant of fathering a child of hers. The Court emphasized that "bias of a witness is not a collateral issue and extrinsic evidence is admissible to prove that a witness has a motive to testify falsely," and said that "given the importance of ... biased testimony to the defense, whatever confusion or delay that may have resulted from its admission would have to have been overwhelming to satisfy Rule 403's balancing test."

United States v. Cropp, 127 F.3d 354 (4th Cir. 1997) : The Court held in a crack distribution conspiracy prosecution that there was no abuse of discretion in prohibiting cross-examination of cooperating witnesses regarding the specific penalties that they would have received absent cooperation or that they hoped to receive due to their cooperation. Defense counsel were permitted to ask the witnesses whether they faced a "severe penalty" prior to cooperating and whether they expected to receive a lesser sentence because of their cooperation. Any additional probative value from quantitative questions was outweighed by the certain prejudice that would result when a sympathetic jury learned that a finding of guilt results in 10-20 years of imprisonment.

United States v. Dixon, 413 F.3d 540 (6th Cir. 2005) : In a prosecution for attempted bank extortion, the Trial Judge granted a defense motion in limine to exclude testimony by the defendant's son and former wives that, in their respective opinions, the person depicted in a bank surveillance photograph was the defendant. The Court affirmed on interlocutory appeal, finding no abuse of discretion in the rulings. Testimony from one of the former wives was properly excluded because her potential bias could not be explored on cross-examination without bringing in highly prejudicial information concerning the defendant, such as his alleged spousal abuse and nonpayment of child support.

United States v. Re, 401 F.3d 828 (7th Cir. 2005) : The chief prosecution witness in an extortion trial had identified the defendant in a photo line-up but had made an inaccurate identification of another man as the defendant's accomplice. The Court held there was no error when the defense was barred from asking the witness on cross-examination, "You don't see [the person you identified as the accomplice] in the courtroom today?" The defense was properly permitted to (and did) cross-examine the witness about his ability to identify the perpetrators, but the objectionable question went to the government's exercise of prosecutorial discretion, which is not a proper subject of cross-examination. In a prosecution for conspiring to possess and distribute cocaine base, United States v. Cavender, n101 the principal prosecution witness testified on direct and reiterated on cross that he had not used, sold, or dealt drugs when he previously lived in Chicago. The Trial Judge precluded the defense from introducing evidence that the witness had been convicted of a felony in Chicago for possession of a controlled substance. Reversing, the Court held that it was error under Rule 609(a)(1) to exclude the evidence of the narcotics conviction. Under the applicable Rule 403 balancing test, the evidence was highly probative in contradicting the witness' testimony and would not be cumulative or a waste of time, since the jury had "heard absolutely nothing that would have hinted to them that [the witness] was lying to them right there as he sat in the witness stand." In United States v. Santos, n102 the Chicago City Treasurer was charged with illegally soliciting political contributions from banks and securities firms. At trial the defense was not permitted to cross-examine one of the Treasurer's office employees, a lesbian, about her alleged hostility to the defendant because he had fired her lover, whom the witness had recruited as the defendant's campaign manager, breaking up their relationship. Reversing, the Court held that although there was some risk that anti-homosexual stigmatization could lead jurors to be distracted or to make them irrationally doubt the witness' truthfulness, the evidence sought would be highly probative in rebutting the government's contention that the witness was testifying only out of disgust at the defendant's behavior. Even the government's offer to permit cross-examination as to the firing of the campaign manager would not have had the probative force on credibility of knowing that the defendant had broken up the witness' relationship.

United States v. Bear, 357 F.3d 730 (8th Cir. 2004) : The Court reversed a conviction for aggravated sexual assault because the defense was erroneously prevented from introducing a lay witness' opinion that one of the alleged victims (who testified) "was untruthful" and "didn't always tell the truth." The witness was the foster care parent with whom the child had lived following the initial report and investigation of abuse. She saw him on a daily basis during the four to six months that he resided with her, so her opinion about his credibility was more than a "bare assertion" or "conclusory observation." The evidence was permissible under Rule 608(a), and highly probative on the credibility of the victim's testimony, which was one of the central issues of the case. The Judge's decision to exclude the testimony because "[t]hat's strictly her personal opinion and that would be a slippery slope" did not raise countervailing considerations appropriate under Rule 403.

United States v. Dees, 34 F.3d 838 (9th Cir. 1994) : The Court affirmed a conviction for mail and wire fraud arising out of a scheme to sell the same baby to different people at the same time, holding it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) when the defense was not permitted to ask a victim witness on cross-examination whether she had sold to a motion picture company the rights to the story of her experiences with the defendant. The potential pecuniary and nonpecuniary benefits of a movie contract were relevant to the witness' bias, and any prejudice from the evidence would not be unfair.

[ii] Impeachment and Rebuttal -- Criminal Cases -- Prosecution Witnesses -- Prosecution Evidence or Questioning

United States v. Edwards, 388 F.3d 896 (D.C. Cir. 2004) : At a trial for felon firearm possession, the arresting officer testified that he apprehended the defendant after a chase that ended when the officer knocked a gun from the defendant's hand. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the officer was permitted to testify on redirect examination that he had chased the defendant because the defendant ran from him, and people who had run from him in the past had been carrying guns or drugs. Although the redirect testimony would not have been relevant had it been offered on direct examination, it became relevant to rebut cross-examination that suggested the officer had given chase in order to harass the defendant after having been incensed by the defendant's vulgarity and profanity. The Court concluded that the probative value of the testimony in countering the implication of bias was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice.

United States v. Richardson, 421 F.3d 17 (1st Cir. 2005) : The defendant was convicted for perjury before a grand jury investigating Medicare/Medicaid fraud, when she lied about illegal discounts for pharmaceuticals from her employer. The prosecution introduced testimony from a former supervisor that the employer expected accurate reports from employees and gave bonuses to increase sales, and it also introduced evidence that the witness had pleaded guilty to charges of fraud against the government based on conduct while working for the employer. The defendant argued that the guilty plea evidence was prejudicial in suggesting guilt by association, the risk of prejudice substantially outweighed the weak probative value of the substantive testimony, and the preemptive impeachment was unnecessary because the defendant offered to forgo impeachment of the witness. Affirming, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion, since the evidence was relevant, and any risk of undue prejudice was minimized by lengthy and repeated cautionary instructions to the jury. In United States v. Coviello, 225 F.3d 54 (1st Cir. 2000) , the Court affirmed convictions for transporting stolen property, holding there was no abuse of discretion when the prosecution was permitted to ask a cooperating witness on redirect whether a defendant was paying her attorney's fees and whether the defendant's trial attorney had represented her at her grand jury appearance. On cross-examination, the witness had minimized the defendant's role in the conspiracy, and the redirect examination was relevant to the witness' bias. In a bank robbery prosecution, United States v. Balsam, n103 one defendant made a motion in limine announcing his intention to offer, as proof that the principal cooperating witness was biased against him, evidence that after his arrest the witness attempted to have the defendant murdered; the defendant sought to exclude any evidence that the basis for the witness' animus was a mistaken belief that the defendant had implicated the witness in the robbery scheme in order to obtain favorable treatment in an unrelated extortion case then pending against the defendant. The Court found no abuse of discretion when the government was permitted to rebut the defendant's evidence that the witness was biased against him with evidence that the defendant was then faced with a criminal case on unspecified charges. Absent an explanation, the jury might have been misled to conclude that the witness' feelings were irrational or arbitrary. The Court also found no abuse of discretion when a prosecution witness was permitted to testify to her fear of a defendant who was a former boyfriend. The witness was not permitted to describe the bad acts causing this fear, and any prejudicial effect was slight, since she testified she feared him on but one occasion, while the evidence was relevant to explain her reluctance to testify as a government witness.

United States v. Vasquez, 267 F.3d 79 (2d Cir. 2001) : A witness in a prosecution for murder in aid of racketeering testified on direct about two violent confrontations he had with the defendant, one of which involved gunshots through an apartment's door after the witness had observed the defendant through the peephole. On cross-examination, defense counsel brought out that the witness went and got a gun although he had not seen a gun on the defendant, and suggested that the witness had started the shooting. On redirect, the witness was permitted to explain that he got the gun because he knew the defendant's reputation for killing people. The Court affirmed and found no abuse of discretion, noting that the balance of probative value and prejudicial effect is altered when evidence that might be inadmissible on direct is necessary to rebut testimony elicited on cross-examination that created a false impression. Here, the cross-examination tended to show that the witness had gone for his gun in aggression and the redirect questioning merely clarified why the witness acted as he did. In United States v. Eisen, 974 F.2d 246 (2d Cir. 1992) , the Court affirmed RICO convictions for a law firm's fraudulent conduct in prosecuting personal injury litigations, holding there was no abuse of discretion in allowing the government to call witnesses that it had said "have refused to give up the lie." Where the government has called a witness whose corroborating testimony is instrumental in constructing its case, it has a right to question the witness, and to attempt to impeach him, about those aspects of his testimony that conflict with the government's account of the same events. The prejudicial effect of the impeachment in this case did not substantially outweigh the probative value of the evidence.

United States v. Universal Rehabilitation Servs. (PA), Inc., 205 F.3d 657 (3d Cir. 2000) (en banc): This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 403.02[8].

United States v. Ince, 21 F.3d 576 (4th Cir. 1994) : The Court reversed a conviction for assault with a dangerous weapon, finding that "the United States' only apparent purpose for impeaching one of its own witnesses was to circumvent the hearsay rule and to expose the jury to otherwise inadmissible evidence of [the defendant]'s alleged confession." The Court noted that when the prosecution attempts to introduce a prior inconsistent statement to impeach its own witness, the statement's likely prejudicial impact often substantially outweighs its probative value for impeachment purposes because the jury may ignore limiting instructions and consider the "impeachment" testimony for substantive purposes.

United States v. Segines, 17 F.3d 847 (6th Cir. 1994) : In a prosecution for cocaine distribution offenses, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting redirect testimony by a government witness that his apartment had been firebombed by friends of a defendant. Although the probative value of the evidence might have been outweighed by its prejudicial effect if offered on direct examination, here the defense opened the door by eliciting on cross-examination that the government had been supporting the witness for three months before the trial. The firebombing evidence addressed the witness' need for government support and protection and rebutted the suggestion that he was selling his testimony.

United States v. Henderson, 337 F.3d 914 (7th Cir. 2003) : The defendant was convicted for distributing cocaine base after he sold drugs to an informant, who was cooperating in a transaction for the first time. The informant did not testify, but the defendant introduced evidence suggesting that the informant had framed him in order to improve a plea bargain. On rebuttal, the government was permitted to introduce evidence that the informant subsequently cooperated in cases concerning approximately 20 other individuals, resulting in guilty pleas in three of the six cases that had been resolved to that time. The Judge gave a cautionary instruction that guilty pleas in the other cases could not be considered as evidence of the defendant's guilt. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence, since it tended to rebut the attack on the informant's credibility. Even though the informant did not testify, the argument that he had framed the defendant was an attack on his credibility, and the evidence tended to make it less likely that the defendant's case was the informant's only "bargaining chip" in negotiating a lesser sentence. In United States v. Holly, 167 F.3d 393 (7th Cir. 1999) , the Court affirmed fraud convictions, finding no error when the government was permitted to bring out on direct examination that the defendant had threatened witnesses, since defense counsel indicated that he intended to use the witnesses' prior statements exculpatory of the defendant on cross-examination.

United States v. Perez, 30 F.3d 1407 (11th Cir. 1994) : The principal witness for the prosecution in a drug case was extensively cross-examined regarding the amount of money the government was paying him; on re-direct he was permitted to testify that he had refused an offer of $5,000 to not testify at trial. The Court held this was error (but harmless), as the witness' own testimony that he refused the offer because he feared for his life meant the evidence had no probative value, and the inherent prejudice of the jury's assumption that the defendants were connected with the offer far outweighed any possible probative value.

[41] Impeachment with Collateral Matter

United States v. Tarantino, 846 F.2d 1384 (D.C. Cir. 1988) : Affirming drug conspiracy convictions, the Court held that the "specific contradiction" rule, which bars impeachment of a witness on a collateral issue, is a particular example of balancing under Rule 403 and may be invoked by a Trial Judge.

United States v. Mulinelli-Navas, 111 F.3d 983 (1st Cir. 1997) : A prosecution witness in a bank fraud case explained differences between his trial testimony and pretrial statements he gave to an attorney on the ground that the attorney had said the purpose of the interview was to "protect" the defendant. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in precluding the defense from calling the attorney to impeach the witness' explanation, since the evidence would be collateral because it would go only to the witness' credibility and would not be material to the defendant's guilt or innocence. In United States v. Beauchamp, 986 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1993) , the Court affirmed a forged check conviction, holding there was no error in precluding the defendant from calling a witness to testify that a government witness did not live at the address he testified to. Drawing an analogy to Rule 608(b)'s ban on extrinsic evidence, the Court reasoned that "[i]t is well established that a party may not present extrinsic evidence to impeach a witness by contradiction on a collateral matter." The Court concluded that the power to exclude evidence offered to impeach on a collateral matter is a particular example of the Trial Judge's authority to exclude evidence under Rule 403.

United States v. Benedetto, 571 F.2d 1246, 1250 (2d Cir. 1978) : Reviewing a ruling that permitted other crimes evidence to be introduced in a public corruption case, the Court observed that "[o]nce a witness (especially a defendant-witness) testifies as to any specific fact on direct testimony, the trial judge has broad discretion to admit extrinsic evidence tending to contradict the specific statement, even if such statement concerns a collateral matter in the case." The Court cited both Rule 607 and Rule 403 and noted in a footnote that "Rule 607 appears to allow the continuation of federal practice in admitting extrinsic evidence to impeach specific errors or falsehoods in a witness' direct testimony, subject to Rule 403 considerations."

United States v. Montgomery, 262 F.3d 233 (4th Cir. 2001) : In the prosecution of a drug distribution conspiracy, the defendant proffered certain housing administration documents and testimony by a former girlfriend to refute testimony that he received drugs at a residence in late 1992. The records would have shown that the girlfriend did not rent the premises until March 1993. Affirming exclusion of the evidence, the Court agreed with the Trial Judge that this was impeachment on a collateral matter.

United States v. Bitterman, 320 F.3d 723 (7th Cir. 2003) : On cross-examination in an armed bank robbery case, a cooperating witness admitted that he told authorities that the defendant had purchased a 9-mm. handgun from one Pantaleo. Then, during the defense case-in-chief, Pantaleo was called to testify that he had never sold the gun, but the Trial Judge ruled that the evidence was collateral because there was no question that the gun used in the robbery was a BB gun. Since the evidence regarding the 9-mm. gun was irrelevant except for impeachment by contradiction, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding it as "collateral." In United States v. Bonner, 302 F.3d 776 (7th Cir. 2002) , the defendant swindled a widow out of her VA benefit payments. Affirming his conviction for fraud, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony of a defense witness, which was offered to rebut the widow's testimony that she had not spoken to the witness on the telephone. The evidence was relevant only for impeachment, so it was a collateral matter and properly excluded. In United States v. Kozinski, n104 the Court affirmed drug trafficking convictions, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by witnesses that would contradict government witnesses only on matters irrelevant to issues in the trial. In Taylor v. National R.R. Passenger Corp., n105 a judgment for the plaintiff in a FELA case was reversed because 14-year-old military medical records indicating complaints of back pain and a job application not mentioning back injuries had been erroneously admitted. The Court held that the records were irrelevant to the plaintiff's injury claim and were collateral extrinsic evidence inadmissible to impeach his testimony.

United States v. Grooms, 978 F.2d 425 (8th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed a conviction for abusive sexual contact, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding extrinsic evidence of an alleged prior inconsistent statement offered to impeach a government witness, as the disputed statement related only to a collateral matter not affecting the substantive issues of the case.

[42] Inadequate Police Investigation

United States v. Patrick, 248 F.3d 11 (1st Cir. 2001) : In a RICO prosecution, the defendant offered handwritten notes found in police files, which recorded tips the police had received about a murder with which the defendant was eventually charged, indicating that the murder might have been committed by someone else. The defense argued that the notes were probative of an inadequate police investigation, but the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the notes. The Court explained that "speculative evidence of the inadequacy of the police investigation would have shifted the jury's focus from the accusations against Arthur to accusations against the police, thus creating a real danger of unfair prejudice and jury confusion."

[43] Incarceration

Battle v. Memorial Hosp., 228 F.3d 544 (5th Cir. 2000) : After the infant plaintiff suffered extensive neurological injuries from viral encephalitis, he and his parents brought a medical malpractice action against the physicians and hospitals that had treated him. Before trial the plaintiffs made a motion in limine to exclude evidence that the father was in prison at the time of the incident. The Magistrate Judge trying the case ruled that the danger of undue prejudice did not outweigh the fact and duration of incarceration, but ordered the defendants not to name or refer to the specific felonies. Ultimately, the father chose not to testify and the only evidence admitted on the issue was a handwritten note on a social service report at page 98 of approximately 1000 pages of medical records, which stated that the father was not part of the family unit because he was in jail and had been denied leave to visit; no one referred to the note in front of the jury. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the note, since the fact that the father was not part of the family unit during the infant's illness and its aftermath was relevant to the father's individual claim for damages.

[44] In Limine Rulings

Zenith Radio Corp. v. Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co., 723 F.2d 238 (3d Cir. 1983) , rev'd on other grounds, 475 U.S. 574 (1986) : In a massive antitrust case in which the plaintiffs alleged that the defendants conspired to drive them out of the market for television receivers, the Court reversed most of the summary judgment entered by the District Court. In the course of its opinion the Court expressed approval of the Judge's substantial use of in limine hearings on evidence questions "not only because the Court's in limine consideration was far more efficient than if the rulings were deferred until the trial, with consequent interruptions, but also because the in limine procedure permitted more thorough briefing and argument than would have been likely had the rulings been deferred." Although the Court noted that there are "countervailing considerations, especially with respect to relevancy rulings under Rule 403 that may be made pre-trial without the benefit of the flavor of the record developed at trial," it found that the Trial Judge has discretion to make those rulings prior to trial and that the discretion was properly exercised in this case.

[45] Insurance

Wheeling Pittsburgh Steel Corp. v. Beelman River Terminals, Inc., 254 F.3d 706 (8th Cir. 2001) : In an action for damages to steel kept in the defendant's warehouse when the Mississippi River flooded, the Court reversed a judgment for the defendant, but found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of statements by the defendant's president which might have been read as admissions of liability. The statements were ambiguous as to fault, and explaining them would have required devoting substantial time to questions of insurance coverage, diverting the jury's attention from the real dispute in the case and potentially causing unfair prejudice to the defendant.

[46] Invocation of Privilege

LiButti v. United States, 178 F.3d 114 (2d Cir. 1999) : The daughter of a delinquent taxpayer brought an action against the IRS seeking a permanent injunction against enforcing a levy against a racehorse that the IRS believed the daughter owned only as a nominee for the taxpayer. The Court held that the Trial Court did not abuse its discretion in giving considerable weight to an adverse inference arising from the taxpayer's refusal to answer questions on Fifth Amendment grounds.

United States v. Morris, 988 F.2d 1335 (4th Cir. 1993) : The Court reversed an attorney's conviction for narcotics offenses because the prosecutor had been allowed to cross-examine the accused's wife about her invocation of the marital privilege before the grand jury. To permit the inference that she would have testified before the grand jury if she had something exculpatory to say would, in the Court's view, destroy the privilege.

Curtis v. M&S Petroleum, Inc., 174 F.3d 661 (5th Cir. 1999) : In an action by refinery workers for injuries from benzene exposure, the Trial Judge excluded evidence that the president of a defendant company had invoked his self-incrimination privilege and refused to answer deposition questions, reasoning that evidence of the president's invocation of the privilege in his individual capacity would be unfairly prejudicial against the defendant corporation. The Court found the ruling an abuse of discretion, since there would be no unfairness in drawing an adverse inference against the corporation when it had designated the president as a witness to give a deposition on its behalf. In an action on a fidelity bond, FDIC v. Fidelity & Deposit Co., 45 F.3d 969 (5th Cir. 1995) , the Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that nonparties, with whom a corrupt bank officer had been associated in a fraudulent loan scheme, had invoked their Fifth Amendment privilege. Any danger that the jury might have found the officer had committed dishonest acts merely from his association with the witnesses was avoided by an instruction not to find liability absent evidence corroborating the relationship between the invoking witnesses and the officer. In Harrell v. DCS Equip. Leasing Corp., n106 the Court affirmed judgments in fraud suits arising out of a computer leasing program, holding there was no error in excluding evidence that a defendant had invoked his Fifth Amendment privilege at a deposition, although he subsequently complied with an order compelling him to answer. The evidence might have had some probative value on his credibility and the alleged fraud, but that was substantially outweighed by the potential prejudice because the jury might attach undue weight to the privilege claim or misunderstand the decision to invoke it.

United States v. Vandetti, 623 F.2d 1144 (6th Cir. 1980) : After reversing a conviction for operating a gambling business on another ground, the Court discussed the difficulties that arise when codefendants, previously tried and convicted, are to be identified as part of the government's case, but have indicated that, if called, they will refuse to testify on self-incrimination grounds. If they assert the privilege in the presence of the jury, there is a danger of prejudice to the defendant. If, however, they do not testify at all once they are identified, the jury may wonder why they were not called. One suggestion by the Court was that the words "fifth amendment" not be used by the witnesses; instead, they simply could indicate before the jury that they will not testify.

In re High Fructose Corn Syrup Antitrust Litig., 295 F.3d 651 (7th Cir. 2002) : Reversing summary judgment for the defendants in a price-fixing case, the Court held it was error for the Judge to disregard the fact that three officers of one defendant had asserted their privilege against self-incrimination when asked about the conspiracy. The Court noted that an adverse inference can be drawn from such a refusal in a civil case. Here, the Judge had erred by incorrectly assuming there was no other evidence of the conspiracy to support the adverse inference. In Harris v. City of Chicago, 266 F.3d 750 (7th Cir. 2001) , a civil rights suit arising from an allegedly unlawful arrest, the defendant police officer refused to answer any questions in discovery, claiming his Fifth Amendment privilege. At trial he was permitted to testify, and the Judge, apparently relying on Rule 403, refused to admit evidence of his prior invocation of privilege. The Court found that this was reversible error, since the ruling effectively allowed the defendant to avoid discovery altogether. The Judge should either have prevented the witness from testifying to matters about which he had previously refused to testify or allowed the plaintiff to impeach him with his prior silence.

United States v. Reyes, 362 F.3d 536 (8th Cir. 2004) : Affirming drug-related convictions, the Court found no abuse of discretion in precluding the defendants from calling an alleged coconspirator to have him invoke his privilege against self-incrimination in the presence of the jury. The Court reasoned that "[v]ery rarely will these rules [401 and 403] allow a party to argue inferences from a witness's privilege invocation"; "due to the courtroom drama an invocation creates, the jury is likely to place far too much emphasis upon an ambiguous invocation," and therefore "absent extraordinary circumstances, trial courts should exercise their discretion to forbid parties from calling witnesses who, when called, will only invoke a privilege."

Doe ex rel. Rudy-Glanzer v. Glanzer, 232 F.3d 1258 (9th Cir. 2000) : The plaintiff brought an action on behalf of her minor daughter for alleged sexual abuse. At his deposition, the defendant was asked whether he had ever taken a penile plethysmograph test; this test is used by therapists to help determine whether a person has a sexual interest in children. The defendant refused to answer on Fifth Amendment grounds. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court found no error when the plaintiff was precluded at trial from referring to the defendant's assertion of the privilege. Under Rule 403 such evidence is not sufficiently probative "unless there is a substantial need for the information and there is not another less burdensome way of obtaining that information." The Court also noted that there was no evidence that the defendant had submitted to the penile plethysmograph test; nor was there any showing that the results of such a test would have been admissible if offered.

[47] Joint Parties

United States v. Figueroa, 618 F.2d 934 (2d Cir. 1980) : Acosta, Lebron, and Figueroa were charged with conspiracy to possess and distribute heroin. At trial they suggested that the substance they had was not really heroin, but was brown sugar used to "rip off" a purchaser. The Court held that Acosta's prior conviction for selling heroin could not be used to show the identity of a substance in dispute, nor could it be offered to show that Acosta intended to join a conspiracy between Figueroa and Lebron, since Acosta's counsel clearly stated that he was not disputing the fact that Acosta was involved with the other two. The Court said the Trial Judge erred in not conducting a proper Rule 403 balancing as to all three defendants. Because the evidence concerning the nature of the substance the defendants had was the same as to all, the risk of prejudice to Figueroa and Lebron was almost the same as the risk to Acosta, and all three won reversal. The Court noted that it was a close question whether, had the prior conviction been properly admitted against Acosta, a severance as to the others would have been required.

United States v. Bodden, 736 F.2d 142 (4th Cir. 1984) : Affirming drug convictions, the Court upheld a ruling that barred one defendant from eliciting on cross-examination of a government agent a statement this defendant had made concerning the financial temptation of poor Colombians to engage in the smuggling business. The Court found that the statement would have been prejudicial to the Colombian defendants and that its value to the one defendant was not very great.

Gross v. Black & Decker, Inc., 695 F.2d 858 (5th Cir. 1983) : In an action by an employee of a furniture company who lost fingers while using a radial arm saw, the manufacturer claimed that the injury was the result of the employer's failure to warn and to provide safety equipment. The Court held that evidence of the employer's activities was properly admitted. The probative value of the evidence, which was essential to the defendant's claim that it was the employer who was responsible for the accident, outweighed any prejudicial effects.

In re Beverly Hills Fire Litig., 695 F.2d 207 (6th Cir. 1982) : Although it reversed a judgment for defendant manufacturers of aluminum wiring alleged to be responsible for a supper club fire in which many persons died, the Court upheld a ruling that certain documents, which would have been admissions as to some defendants but hearsay as to others, should be excluded or redacted. The Court noted that the Trial Judge had severed the issue of causation from the question of liability and that the excluded evidence was cumulative on the causation issue. If the issues were combined, some of the evidence might be admitted with appropriate limiting instructions.

United States v. Davis, 154 F.3d 772 (8th Cir. 1998) : The Court affirmed convictions for drug and firearm offenses. It held that taped telephone conversations in which one defendant tried to convince his girlfriend not to cooperate with authorities were properly admitted, where the Trial Judge redacted the tapes and related transcripts to limit possible references to other defendants.

[48] Judgments, Court Orders, and Judicial Opinions

[a] Civil Cases

Faigin v. Kelly, 184 F.3d 67 (1st Cir. 1999) : In a defamation action against a former professional athlete who implied that his former agent had been dismissed for unlawful conduct, the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of a Rule 11 sanctions order in another proceeding that found no factual support for the athlete's claims that the agent had misled him about certain investments. The order stemmed from an undeveloped record on a matter that had not been litigated; the probative value of the order on the truth or falsity of the defamatory statement was slight, especially where additional evidence regarding the agent's misconduct had been introduced; and there was a substantial risk that the jury would give undue weight to the prior judicial findings and be confused about their significance. In a civil rights action for injuries received after being arrested as a result of an allegedly improper police broadcast, Kinan v. City of Brockton, n107 the Court held that evidence of two prior judgments against the defendants was properly excluded. The judgments were based on settlements rather than adjudications, and the prior claims involved excessive force rather than recklessly inaccurate police broadcasts, so their probative value on the adequacy of police training would be substantially outweighed by the risks of confusion and prejudice and the consumption of much unnecessary time in essentially retrying part or all of the two prior cases. In Silva v. Showcase Cinemas Concessions, Inc., n108 the Court upheld a judgment against a movie theater for the wrongful death of the plaintiff's son, who was killed in a parking lot after a movie, rejecting the defendant's argument that it should have been permitted to show that the assailant was convicted of manslaughter. Since the plaintiff stipulated that the killing was criminal, the manslaughter conviction was unnecessary to prove that it was an intentional act.

Carter v. Burch, 34 F.3d 257 (4th Cir. 1994) : The plaintiff in a § 1983 action had been released on a writ of habeas corpus after serving four years on a malicious wounding conviction, because material exculpatory evidence had not been disclosed to him. After his acquittal in a second trial, he sued the prosecutor and a police officer for civil rights violations. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the opinion by the Judge who granted the writ of habeas corpus, and expert testimony to interpret that opinion. Because the opinion decided the precise issue before the jury in the civil rights suit, the jury would likely give it undue weight.

Streber v. Hunter, 221 F.3d 701 (5th Cir. 2000) : In a malpractice action against attorneys who had represented the plaintiffs in connection with a property transaction that led to a Tax Court deficiency proceeding, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the Tax Court's opinion. The opinion, which stated that one of the plaintiffs "failed to tell the truth" even though she did not testify at the trial and was absent from the entire proceeding, could mislead the jury into thinking the Tax Court had some particular expertise in judging credibility, and thus into thinking the plaintiff incredible in this case. Admission of the opinion would also be confusing, because it had been reversed in part on appeal. Affirming judgments in fraud suits arising out of a computer leasing program in Harrell v. DCS Equip. Leasing Corp., 951 F.2d 1453 (5th Cir. 1992) , the Court held there was no error in excluding evidence of a nonfinal judgment in another case as proof of a predicate act under RICO, as the jury might give undue value to the previous determination. In a suit for recovery of the unpaid purchase price of cattle, Brumley Estate v. Iowa Beef Processors, Inc., n109 the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant based on a finding that the person who bought the cattle was not the defendant's agent. In two other cases, juries had found the same person to be an agent of the defendant, and in one other case a jury reached a no-agency conclusion as in this case. The Court held that the judgments entered pursuant to thoese findings were properly excluded under Rule 403, because they would have confused the jury. In Rozier v. Ford Motor Co., n110 a product liability action arising out of a fatal automobile accident, the Court held it was improper to admit evidence that the driver of the other car had pleaded guilty to involuntary manslaughter. Although it recognized that the convictions were admissible under Rule 803(22), the Court said that they should have been excluded under Rule 403. The admission of responsibility was made in the context of a criminal action to deter reckless driving and therefore "its relevance in a civil action based on a legal doctrine presumably intended to deter the negligent manufacture of automobiles is attenuated at best." The guilty plea would tend to confuse the jury into thinking that the manufacturer could not be the legal cause, in the civil action, of the plaintiff's decedent's death if the other driver was found to be the cause in the criminal action.

Johnson v. Colt Indus. Operating Corp., 797 F.2d 1530 (10th Cir. 1986) : The Court upheld a judgment for the plaintiff against a manufacturer of a revolver that discharged when dropped. It found that a judicial opinion in another action was relevant to impeach the testimony of the manufacturer's officer that he was unaware of any other drop-fire lawsuits and also to show indifference toward known risk for punitive damage purposes. A majority of the Court held, however, that admission of the opinion was error (but harmless): The jury might have been confused by its relationship to the instant case, and the evidence of the accident giving rise to the other case and its results could have been accepted without using the opinion. A concurring Judge argued that admission of the full opinion was not error, since it had special probative value.

U.S. Steel, LLC, v. Tieco, Inc., 261 F.3d 271 (11th Cir. 2001) : In a RICO action against an equipment vendor for an alleged fraudulent billing scheme, the defendants asserted civil rights and state law counterclaims alleging improper cooperation between the plaintiffs and the state attorney general's office during a criminal investigation and prosecution of the defendants. The Court reversed judgments for the defendants on the counterclaims because a State Judge's opinion dismissing an indictment against the defendants was improperly admitted. The opinion, which adopted in toto a memorandum of facts prepared by the defendants, was hearsay, and although the plaintiffs had not objected on that ground, its unreliability only added to the prejudicial effect of its self- serving presentation. The risk of unfair prejudice, and the likelihood that the jury would be misled by the inclusion of the defendants' memorandum in a judicial opinion, substantially outweighed any probative value and made admission reversible error. In a suit for damages on an injunction bond, Milan Express, Inc. v. Averitt Express, Inc., 254 F.3d 966 (11th Cir. 2001) , the Court noted in a footnote that the Trial Judge erred in allowing the jury to receive two of its published opinions reviewing the ICC's orders and charging the jury that it was to decide the effect of the prior opinions.

Mendenhall v. Cedarapids, Inc., 5 F.3d 1557 (Fed. Cir. 1993) : The Court held, in an action for patent infringement, that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the judgment, opinion, and other evidence of an earlier proceeding in which patents at issue had been held valid. There was a high possibility of prejudice and confusion, since the opinion was not fact evidence on the myriad issues in the present case, and the jury may well have been confused by exposure to another Judge's statements on the law. The dissenting Judge believed that the prior holding of validity had substantial probative value and that the jury should be presumed to take its role seriously and to carry out its factfinding function competently and thoroughly.

[b] Judgments, Court Orders, and Judicial Opinions -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Ebner, 782 F.2d 1120 (2d Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed tax evasion convictions, upholding the admission of portions of a State Court opinion revealing that the defendants had been given an authoritative statement that their bogus religion did not qualify for a tax exemption. The Trial Judge excluded portions of the opinion reciting facts and instructed the jury to consider the opinion only on the issue of intent.

United States v. Blood, 806 F.2d 1218 (4th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed an embezzlement conviction and upheld permitting an IRS agent to support his expert opinion by reading portions of a prior Tax Court decision involving the defendant. The 1976 opinion involved similar issues and was relevant to proving that the defendant willfully violated the law in the instant case.

United States v. Cook, 557 F.2d 1149 (5th Cir. 1977) : The Court reversed a fraud conviction because an injunction order entered in another case was erroneously admitted.

United States v. Merklinger, 16 F.3d 670 (6th Cir. 1994) : The defendant, charged with fraud, sought to introduce evidence that he had previously been acquitted of similar charges in a similar case. He argued that he made admissions to investigators in this case because he was despondent and that the previous acquittal was relevant to his state of mind. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the evidence, as there was no logical connection between the favorable verdict and the alleged despondency, and evidence of the verdict could confuse the jury.

United States v. Vitek Supply Corp., 144 F.3d 476 (7th Cir. 1998) : Affirming convictions for a conspiracy to defraud Customs and the FDA by smuggling misbranded animal drugs, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence of an opinion and stipulations entered by the government in a prior Court of International Trade proceeding, since the evidence could well have led to a complex mini-trial focusing on the significance of the CIT opinion and the actions taken by the parties in its aftermath.

United States v. Bejar-Matrecios, 618 F.2d 81 (9th Cir. 1980) : Reversing a conviction for illegally reentering the United States, the Court concluded it was error to admit a certified copy of a judgment showing that the appellant once pleaded guilty to the misdemeanor of illegal entry. Although the plea conclusively established that the appellant was an alien when he pleaded guilty, the jury was never told why the prior conviction was being used, the evidence was cumulative, and the jury might have used the evidence as proof of predisposition.

United States v. Alahmad, 211 F.3d 538 (10th Cir. 2000) : The defendant was charged with violating the International Parental Kidnapping Crime Act after he removed his daughter to Jordan in 1996 despite a 1993 order affirming the visitation rights of the child's mother and grandmother. The defendant argued that a 1997 order transferring custody to the child's mother was not relevant to his intent in 1996 and was in any event excessively prejudicial. Affirming, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion, since the 1997 order, which recited that the defendant had violated the 1993 order, tended to rebut the defendant's claim that he had been acting within the earlier order's custody provisions. Further, there was no indication that the jury gave exaggerated or controlling weight to the 1997 order when determining the defendant's intentions in 1996, given his opportunities to argue his compliance with the 1993 order and the abundant additional proof of his intentions in 1996.

[49] Learned Treatises

Costantino v. David M. Herzog, M.D., P.C., 203 F.3d 164 (2d Cir. 2000) : In a medical malpractice action against an obstetrician for injuries during delivery, the defendant introduced a 15-minute videotape put out by the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists to educate physicians and show various techniques used with the condition at issue. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court held that the videotape was a learned treatise and there was no abuse of discretion in its admission. The tape was highly probative of the applicable standard of care, and that value was not substantially outweighed by any risks that the jury would be confused by seeing the depiction of births other than the one at issue or that it would be prejudiced by seeing procedures suggesting that the condition at issue raised a complicated problem seemingly requiring drastic measures. The Court mentioned that although no objection had been made, the Judge should have redacted a statement in the closing credits that "[t]his video does not define a standard of care," since it and other allusions to litigation in other learned treatises offered at the trial tended to suggest that the condition at issue was the source of much unjustified litigation.

[50] Legislative Materials

Goodman v. Pennsylvania Turnpike Comm'n, 293 F.3d 655 (3d Cir. 2002) : Affirming a judgment for a public employee who alleged that the Commission failed to promote him because of his political affiliation, the Court found no error in the admission of a report of a legislative committee, which discussed the fact that promotion practices at the Commission were not optimum and should be different. The Court concluded that the suggestion in the report that the Commission used patronage to make promotions was probative and not unfairly prejudicial.

[51] Litigation Conduct

W.V. Realty Inc. v. Northern Ins. Co., 334 F.3d 306 (3d Cir. 2003) : The Court reversed a judgment for the owner-operator of a hotel banquet hall who sued its insurer to recover for business interruption losses that occurred when the roof collapsed from the weight of snow, finding error in the admission of evidence that the insurer failed in discovery to disclose other bad faith actions brought against it. The plaintiffs did not explain why the defendant's discovery violation constituted insurance bad faith rather than a pure discovery violation, and that there was no evidence that the failure to disclose was an effort to avoid paying the plaintiffs' claim. The Court added that, even if it were to assume that the discovery violation was committed by the defendant to avoid its obligations under the policy, the evidence would have been inadmissible under Rule 403, because "[t]he jury may well have concluded, in contravention of the strictures of the Rules of Evidence, that the fact that hundreds of bad faith lawsuits had been filed against Northern made it more likely that it committed bad faith in this lawsuit."

Timberlake Constr. Co. v. United States Fid. & Guar. Co., 71 F.3d 335 (10th Cir. 1995) : Reversing a judgment for a contractor who sued his builder's risk insurer claiming bad faith in handling a fire loss claim, the Court held it was error to admit evidence of the insurer's alleged litigation misconduct in the current action to serve as evidence of the insurer's bad faith in handling the underlying claim. The Court noted that the civil procedure rules provide adequate means to redress and deter litigation misconduct, and it concluded that "while evidence of an insurer's litigation conduct may, in some rare instances, be admissible on the issue of bad faith, such evidence will generally be inadmissible because it lacks probative value and carries a high risk of prejudice."

[52] Money from Unexplained Sources

United States v. Le'on- Delfis, 203 F.3d 103 (1st Cir. 2000): In a prosecution for embezzlement from the Department of Veterans Affairs, the government offered evidence that a defendant made two large bank deposits in 1996, which allegedly related to money laundering charges against him. The defendant's wife testified on his behalf that their family finances in 1996 were such that the deposit could have come from personal funds. On cross-examination she was asked about money seized in a civil forfeiture proceeding related to the criminal case; she said the amount seized was the family's entire savings, and she did not think the sum exceeded $200,000. When questioned about the legitimate sources of the money seized, she could explain only $105,500. On rebuttal the government proved that the amount seized was $203,000; it argued that this evidence impeached the wife's testimony and was circumstantial evidence of the defendant's wrongdoing. The Court found no abuse of discretion, since evidence of possession or control over substantial sums of money from unexplained sources is relevant in criminal cases involving money, and this was "not one of those rare circumstances" to reverse the Trial Judge's judgment concerning the relative weighing of probative value and unfair effect.

[53] Nicknames and Aliases

United States v. Mitchell, 328 F.3d 77 (2d Cir. 2003) : During the defendant's trial for illegal firearms dealing, the prosecutor referred to the defendant's nickname, "Phox," asked him whether "a fox is an animal that is considered sly," and noted in summation that he had "outfox[ed]" questions while testifying. The Court noted that references to the defendant's nickname were arguably inappropriate, where his identity was not at issue and the nickname did not directly relate to the proof of the acts alleged, but the references were not prejudicial because they were brief and isolated and the evidence of guilt was substantial.

[54] Notice and Knowledge

Exum v. General Elec. Co., 819 F.2d 1158 (D.C. Cir. 1987) : In a product liability suit by an employee injured while using a french fryer, the Court held that it was error to exclude evidence concerning 15 similar incidents. All but one occurred before the plaintiff was injured, and the Court reasoned that to prove notice, prior acts need not be as similar as they would have to be to prove the dangerousness of a product. Although the Court recognized that the incident arising after the plaintiff was injured could not prove notice, it concluded that it was so similar to the plaintiff's accident that it was probative of dangerousness.

Fiacco v. City of Rensselaer, 783 F.2d 319 (2d Cir. 1986) : Affirming a judgment for an arrestee in a civil rights suit against a city and police officers, the Court stated that it had no doubt that, in the context of a claim that the City negligently supervised its officers in the use of force, evidence that a number of claims of brutality had been made by other persons was admissible. Even if the claims were invalid, the Court reasoned that the City was on notice of a possibility that its officers were using excessive force. In United States v. Ebner, n111 the Court affirmed tax evasion convictions, upholding the admission of portions of a State Court opinion revealing that the defendants had been given an authoritative statement that their bogus religion did not qualify for a tax exemption. The Trial Judge excluded portions of the opinion reciting facts and instructed the jury to consider the opinion only on the issue of intent.

Mills v. Beech Aircraft Corp., 886 F.2d 758 (5th Cir. 1989) : A letter from the French aviation authorities to the defendant manufacturer warning of certain defects was held properly excluded. The letter was offered to show the defendant's knowledge, but there was no showing that the letter applied to the type of airplane in issue and that the defect had manifested itself in circumstances substantially similar to the case at bar.

Koloda v. General Motors Parts Div., 716 F.2d 373 (6th Cir. 1983) : The Court reversed a judgment for an auto mechanic who sued for injuries allegedly arising out of his use of a lubricant and inhalation of its vapors. General Motors should have been permitted to offer evidence that there were no prior claims or accidents brought to its attention concerning the lubricant. The Court agreed with GM that the evidence was probative of its knowledge, which was important to the plaintiff's theory of a failure to warn, and it stated that it could see no reason why the evidence would have been unfairly prejudicial.

McCarty v. Pheasant Run, Inc., 826 F.2d 1554 (7th Cir. 1987) : Affirming a judgment for a hotel owner sued by a guest who was assaulted in her room, the Court held that the Trial Judge did not err in excluding evidence of criminal activity at the hotel that did not involve an entry like the one alleged in the instant case, while admitting evidence of prior similar entries.

Hale v. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., 820 F.2d 928 (8th Cir. 1987) : In a suit involving the explosion of a wheel rim, the Trial Judge admitted evidence of 13 prior claims to prove notice of a defect, but excluded the defendant's evidence concerning the disposition of the claims, which was offered to demonstrate that the extent of the notice was exaggerated. Although the Court did not deem the limitation on the defendant's proof an abuse of discretion, it declared that "if this case is retried, the evidence should be admitted."

United States v. Navarro-Varelas, 541 F.2d 1331 (9th Cir. 1976) : The defendant, charged with knowingly importing cocaine, testified that he had no knowledge that cocaine was in a suitcase that he carried. He attempted to call a DEA agent to testify as an expert that narcotics smugglers commonly plant narcotics in secret compartments of suitcases and have an unwary traveler bring them into this country. Although the Court agreed with the Trial Judge that this evidence would have had no probative value in tending to disprove the defendant's guilt, we have some doubts. While it may be true that the defendant at trial had an opportunity to protest his innocence, a jury unschooled in narcotics traffic may find a story about planted drugs more incredible than it really is.

Middlebrooks v. Hillcrest Foods, Inc., 256 F.3d 1241 (11th Cir. 2001) : Affirming a judgment for African-American high school students and an adult chaperone against a restaurant for intentional infliction of emotional distress caused by a white cook employed at the restaurant, the Court found no error in the admission of evidence of the cook's altercation with a customer on a previous occasion. The evidence was relevant to the issues of negligent hiring and retention and punitive damages. In Hendrix v. Raybestos-Manhattan, Inc., n112 the Court emphasized the leeway afforded the Trial Judge in making Rule 403 rulings, as it upheld the introduction of studies concerning asbestos dust exposure and asbestosis to prove knowledge of harm in personal injury actions. In Worsham v. A.H. Robins Co., n113 the Court affirmed a judgment against the manufacturer of the Dalkon Shield IUD, finding no error in rulings admitting documents and permitting cross-examination that mentioned other litigation involving the Shield. The documents and cross-examination tended to show the kind of notice that the company had about problems caused by the Shield and the mention of the other litigation was not unduly prejudicial.

[55] Official Findings

Daigle v. Maine Med. Center, Inc., 14 F.3d 684 (1st Cir. 1994) : The Trial Court in a diversity medical malpractice action ordered that the plaintiff present her case to a prelitigation screening panel as required by state law, and when the panel unanimously found no acts of negligence, followed the state law by admitting the findings into evidence without providing an opportunity for impeachment. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court held that the federal evidence rules governing hearsay and impeachment do not seek to displace the state's substantive policy implemented by the screening panel procedure. Furthermore, the official seal of the State Court and the Court caption were redacted, to avoid unfairly prejudicial impact.

United States v. Riddle, 103 F.3d 423 (5th Cir. 1997) : Reversing a bank chairman's conviction for fraud in connection with loans in which he was interested, the Court found an abuse of discretion in the admission of bank examination reports detailing violations of laws and regulations in other situations. Although the reports were relevant to the defendant's knowledge of his obligations to fully inform the bank's board, the probative value was slight in comparison to the risk of prejudicing, confusing, or misleading the jury by a four-year history tying the defendant to dozens of regulatory violations.

Black v. Ryder/P.I.E. Nationwide, Inc., 15 F.3d 573 (6th Cir. 1994) : The Court held in an employee's action against his union for breach of the duty of fair representation that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding an NLRB decision refusing to issue a complaint in the case. Lacking any stated factual basis, the decision had almost no probative value, and the jury would be quite likely to assign it greater value than it was worth, given that it was the product only of an administrative investigation and not of an adjudicatory procedure.

United States v. Sutton, 337 F.3d 792 (7th Cir. 2003) : A defendant charged with several robberies sought to introduce reports made by the police laboratory indicating that his fingerprints did not match fingerprints taken from the crime scenes. The Court held that under Rule 803(8)(C) the reports were not excludable as hearsay, but there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the reports under Rule 403. Without an expert to explain them, the reports' probative value was outweighed by the risk that the jury would improperly rely on the reports in the absence of context and believe that the reports provee the negative, that the defendant had not been at the crime scene. In a prisoner's § 1983 action for excessive force and deliberate indifference to medical needs, Vance v. Peters, 97 F.3d 987 (7th Cir. 1996) , the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding a hearing officer's final report, which concluded that the corrections officer had used excessive force and recommended a 20-day suspension. Given that the evidence considered by the hearing officer had already been admitted at the trial, there was a risk that the jury would be confused by and give inordinate weight to the conclusion, which was not based on the appropriate constitutional criteria.

Firemen's Fund Ins. Co. v. Thien, 63 F.3d 754 (8th Cir. 1995) : In a declaratory judgment action to determine whether a fellow-employee exclusion in a liability policy applied to a fatal crash of a company plane, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding FAA investigation reports that indicated the company's operations director had neglected or falsified logbook entries. The reports had no tendency to show that payroll records at issue were inaccurate, and they were likely to lead the jury away from the question of the decedent's status toward the irrelevant question whether the company was responsible for the decedent's death. The likelihood of jury confusion and prejudice similarly justified excluding the FAA reports as evidence of the director's motive to falsify the payroll records or of his testimonial credibility.

Jetcraft Corp. v. Flight Safety Int'l, 16 F.3d 362 (10th Cir. 1993) : In a negligence action arising out of a pilot-training accident, the Court held there was no error in excluding evidence of FAA enforcement actions taken against the defendants following the accident. The FAA's own characterization of the violation as a record-keeping omission undermined its relevance, and the spectre of any regulatory violation, however collateral to the alleged violation, has a potential for prejudice or confusion.

[56] Opening the Door

United States v. Baird, 29 F.3d 647 (D.C. Cir. 1994) : In a prosecution for conflict of interest violations, the government showed that a legal officer had advised the defendant against his conduct, and the defendant attempted to introduce evidence that other legal and contracting officers had given contrary advice, which was relayed to the defendant by another officer. The evidence was excluded as irrelevant, on the grounds that the crime contained no scienter element and that the legal officer called by the government was the only one it was proper for the defendant to consult. Reversing, the Court held that the government had opened the door on the matter of the defendant's state of mind, and he was entitled to introduce otherwise irrelevant evidence to remove any unfair prejudice.

United States v. Yousef, 327 F.3d 56 (2d Cir. 2003) : Affirming convictions for terrorist conspiracies, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of fingerprints on documents handled by one defendant to demonstrate a match with prints found in an apartment. The defendant argued that the fingerprint evidence exaggerated the government's case, since it had already offered evidence of fingerprints obtained by Jordanian officials for the same purpose. But the Court held that the defendant's challenge to the integrity of the government's procedures in collecting evidence opened the door to additional evidence.

Bender v. Brumley, 1 F.3d 271 (5th Cir. 1993) : In a pretrial detainee's action against officers who allegedly beat him, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting inflammatory details of the murder for which the detainee had been arrested, as he had discussed the facts in great detail on direct examination.

United States v. Khalil, 279 F.3d 358 (6th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed RICO conspiracy convictions that arose from the defendant's role as national president of the Avengers Motorcycle Club. After the defense suggested in cross-examination of an FBI agent that the FBI had improperly targeted the defendant because of his presidency, the government elicited that the agent had interviewed witnesses and had discussions with other agents, all of whom indicated that the defendant was engaged in drug trafficking. The Court found that the evidence was not offered for its truth but to explain the FBI's focus on the defendant and to rebut the suggestion made on cross-examination.

Manuel v. City of Chicago, 335 F.3d 592 (7th Cir. 2003) : In a Title VII action, the Judge ruled in limine that a witness for the plaintiff could only testify about an allegedly racist supervisor's treatment of the plaintiff. At trial, the supervisor testified that he had not treated either the plaintiff or "anyone" differently because they were African-American. The Judge agreed that this opened the door to evidence regarding the supervisor's treatment of other employees, but out of a concern for "trying cases that ... have no relationship to this," instructed the jury to strike the question and the supervisor's answer about his treatment of others, rather than admitting the plaintiff's evidence. Affirming a judgment for the City, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the initial in limine ruling, since the lack of specific examples in the plaintiff's offer of proof significantly limited the probative value of the offered evidence, while labeling the supervisor a "racist" had the potential for being unfairly prejudicial, and the significant prospect of engaging in a series of mini-trials over the other accusations of discrimination had the potential for confusing or misleading the jury. Even after the door was opened by the supervisor's testimony, the potential for undue delay, confusion, and prejudice remained, so the decision to continue to exclude the evidence was not an abuse of discretion. In Jenkins v. Chrysler Motors Corp., 316 F.3d 663 (7th Cir. 2002) , the Court affirmed a judgment for a truck manufacturer in a suit by a plaintiff injured by a fire while sleeping in a truck, finding no abuse of discretion when evidence of the plaintiff's past alcohol use was admitted. A pretrial motion in limine had excluded evidence of the past alcohol use and drunk driving convictions, but at trial the plaintiff's father testified that before the fire the defendant was a happy person with a "twinkle in his eye" and afterwards he was depressed. The Court concluded that the father's testimony opened the door to the alcohol evidence, which was admissible because it "purportedly showed that he couldn't have been all that happy before, either." In United States v. Alwan, n114 the Court affirmed a defendant's contempt of court conviction for failure to testify before a grand jury, and held that the prosecution was properly permitted to mention the defendant's involvement with the terrorist group Hamas. The evidence was only offered by the government as rebuttal in response to the defendant's efforts to establish a coercion defense regarding a statement he had made to authorities concerning his involvement with that group. In an arrestee's civil rights action against a sheriff and a jailer, Lawson v. Trowbridge, n115 the defendants devoted almost all their direct testimony to documenting their limited net worth. Because any judgment against them would be paid by their employer so long as they had been acting within the scope of their employment, the testimony was inadmissible. The plaintiff did not object, but did seek to introduce the indemnification statute in rebuttal. Reversing nominal damages judgments against the defendants, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion not to admit the statute once the defendants' direct testimony opened the door, since the rationale for excluding the evidence -- fear that damages will be inflated when the government, rather than the individual, is paying -- had dissolved.

Westcott v. Crinklaw, 68 F.3d 1073 (8th Cir. 1995) : Reversing a judgment for the defendant in a civil rights action brought by the widow of a man shot and killed by a police officer, the Court found an abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence that the officer had been suspended for a prior shooting incident. While testifying, the defendant had made an issue of his employment record by stating that before shooting the plaintiff's husband, he had never fired his weapon in the line of duty, and that his service as an officer had been uninterrupted. Exclusion of the evidence of a prior shooting incident and suspension was inappropriate because it "permitted Crinklaw's testimony to go before the jury uncontested."

United States v. Baron, 94 F.3d 1312 (9th Cir. 1996) : Reversing a drug conviction on non-evidentiary grounds, the Court held that "profile" testimony from an expert on drug transactions was properly admitted. Defense counsel suggested, in cross-examining one of the arresting officers, that the defendant was not a drug courier because when arrested he did not have with him the items that a typical drug courier might be expected to carry. In rebuttal, an expert on drug transactions testified that it was not unusual for a drug courier to be found without large sums of cash, drug ledgers, or drug paraphernalia. While profile testimony is usually inadmissible to prove guilt, the defendant opened the door in this case.

[57] Other Cases Involving Party

Hemphill v. Washington Metro. Area Transit Auth., 982 F.2d 572 (D.C. Cir. 1993) : The Court, in three separate opinions, held that a judgment for a defendant in an automobile accident case must be reversed, because the Magistrate Judge erroneously instructed the jury that it could consider whether the plaintiff, whose prior accidents were admitted as relevant to the cause of her injuries, "was merely unlucky or whether or not she is claims minded." The Court unanimously agreed that when no charge of fabrication is made, it is improper to permit a jury to infer that a plaintiff is claims minded.

Outley v. City of New York, 837 F.2d 587 (2d Cir. 1988) : The Court reversed a judgment for police officers in a civil rights case, holding that it was error to admit evidence of previous lawsuits by an arrestee and his wife against the City when there was no evidence that the suits were fraudulent. In Raysor v. Port Auth., n116 a civil rights action for false arrest and malicious prosecution, the Court upheld the rejection of evidence concerning the plaintiff's litigiousness, since such evidence raised a substantial danger of jury bias.

W.V. Realty Inc. v. Northern Ins. Co., 334 F.3d 306 (3d Cir. 2003) : The Court reversed a judgment for the owner-operator of a hotel banquet hall who sued its insurer to recover for business interruption losses that occurred when the roof collapsed from the weight of snow, finding error in the admission of evidence that the insurer, in a separate subrogation action against the contractor who built the banquet facility, alleged that it had paid the plaintiffs $1,200,000 for repairs when in reality the insurer had paid $318,000 and refused to pay more. The Court found that the subrogation complaint by the insurer had minimal probative value in showing bad faith while its prejudicial effect was great.

Bufford v. Rowan Cos., 994 F.2d 155 (5th Cir. 1993) : When an employee sued for workplace injuries, the defendants contended that the action was fraudulent, copying a claim by the employee's former co-worker. In reversing a judgment for the defendants, the Court recognized it is a perfectly legitimate and valid defense to assert that a personal injury claim is fabricated or exaggerated, but it is not permissible to make an unsupported attack on the integrity of opposing counsel by relying on the identity of counsel in the two cases as a basis for contending the claim was fraudulent.

Mathis v. Phillips Chevrolet, Inc., 269 F.3d 771 (7th Cir. 2001) : The plaintiff sued for age and race discrimination after he was not hired as a car salesman. The defendant sought to introduce evidence that the plaintiff had applied for positions at other dealerships about the same time and had sued after he was denied the jobs. The Trial Judge excluded the evidence on the ground that it was relevant only to show a propensity to file baseless discrimination suits, but the Court found that it could have been used to show a scheme to harass area car dealerships and a similar modus operandi in doing so to that used in this situation. However, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding the evidence, since the Judge had also noted that any probative value the evidence had was substantially outweighed by the prejudice to the plaintiff. Furthermore, disputes over whether the other suits were baseless could consume far more time than the evidence justified. In a sexual discrimination lawsuit, Gastineau v. Fleet Mtge. Corp., 137 F.3d 490 (7th Cir. 1998) , the plaintiff introduced a memorandum that, if authentic, showed that the employer intended to fire the plaintiff because he was complaining of being sexually harassed. The Court found that evidence of two other lawsuits brought by the plaintiff against prior employers was admissible, as the evidence went beyond showing the plaintiff's litigiousness by also showing the reasons one defendant kept a diary in this case, casting doubt on the plaintiff's credibility, and establishing a modus operandi of creating fraudulent documents in anticipation of litigation against his employers.

Porous Media Corp. v. Pall Corp., 173 F.3d 1109 (8th Cir. 1999) : In an unfair competition case between filter manufacturers, the Trial Judge bifurcated the trial, deferring claims of trade libel until after the jury had resolved Lanham Act claims. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence of other litigation between the parties until the libel part of the trial, when it was relevant to the "actual malice" issue. Any probative value the evidence would have in the Lanham Act part to show the defendant's "willful and bad faith conduct" under the Act was slight because the types of filters involved in the two litigations were used in fundamentally different industries and the underlying events were separated by at least four years, while it could be highly prejudicial and confusing or misleading.

Koch v. Koch Indus., Inc., 203 F.3d 1202 (10th Cir. 2000) : Two brothers involved in a family-run business bought out their other two brothers. The sellers claimed that they had been defrauded by understatements of the corporation's value. On appeal of a judgment for the defendants, the Court held that it was error to admit the fact that one of the plaintiffs had brought a number of other suits against the defendant, and had even sued his mother in one of these litigations. The Court noted that the evidence of other lawsuits might show that the plaintiff was biased against his brothers if the other lawsuits were frivolous, but no such showing was made. Moreover, evidence that the plaintiff had sued his own mother had no bearing on whether he was biased against his brothers. Evidence of the other lawsuits could not help to prove that the plaintiff would not rely on any assertion as to corporate value that the defendants would have made, since the agreement at issue was executed well before the plaintiff brought any lawsuits.

[58] Photographs, Movies, Videotapes

[a] Events at Issue

United States v. Weisz, 718 F.2d 413 (D.C. Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed convictions involving conspiracy to commit bribery, as it found that videotape evidence showing a Congressman stuffing money in his pockets was properly admitted to prove the crime that the defendants were charged with committing. See also United States v. Perry n117(affirming Trial Judge who declined to edit audiotape containing one defendant's racially derogatory remark where defense tried to discredit tape and its totality was important).

United States v. Marvin, 687 F.2d 1221 (8th Cir. 1982) : Reviewing a conviction for food stamp offenses, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of a videotape that recorded only part of a transaction and that was ambiguous.

United States v. Begay, 42 F.3d 486 (9th Cir. 1994) : The Court affirmed convictions for various offenses arising out of a civil disturbance on a Navajo reservation, holding there was no abuse of discretion in permitting an officer to narrate a videotape that was a half-speed version, with color-coded circles and arrows added, of an original videotape of the incident. The officer had reviewed the original over 100 times, aided by a magnifying glass, so his testimony and the enhanced tape were helpful to the jury in evaluating the original tape, and they were neither cumulative nor invasive of the province of the jury.

[b] Photographs, Movies, Videotapes -- Fair Depiction of the Evidence

Lubanski v. Coleco Indus., 929 F.2d 42 (1st Cir. 1991) : Affirming a judgment for the defendant toy manufacturer in a product liability action brought by the mother of a child killed when struck by a car while using a three-wheeled riding apparatus, the Court found no error in admitting a series of photographic enlargements portraying a staged version of the accident scene. The Trial Judge made the required preliminary determination that the photographs depicted a correct likeness and the plaintiff had not objected to the photographs in their original five-by-seven-inch form.

United States v. Diaz, 176 F.3d 52 (2d Cir. 1999) : In a prosecution for killing a rival drug dealer, the defendant's former girlfriend testified that she could see the flashes from the guns during the killing, from a window in the defendant's apartment. To contradict this testimony, the defendant offered a photograph showing a building between the apartment and the scene of the murder. The Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding the photograph, since the owner of the blocking building had testified that at the time of the murder, his building had suffered a fire, making it possible to see right through the building to the scene of the murder. Thus, the photograph was properly excluded because it was not a fair depiction of the scene. In contrast, a government exhibit depicting the murder scene was properly admitted because the defendant's girlfriend testified that it was a fair depiction of the scene.

Shahid v. City of Detroit, 889 F.2d 1543 (6th Cir. 1989) : The Court reversed judgments for the defendants in a civil rights action, brought for alleged failure to provide medical care to a jail inmate prior to his death, because the Trial Judge had excluded black-and-white photographs of the decedent's body in his cell shortly after his death. By depicting paint dustings, bruises, and blood traces, the photos were relevant to whether he had sought assistance and the obviousness of his injuries, and the fact the body may have been moved before the photos were taken did not mean they were an inaccurate representation of what they depicted.

[c] Photographs, Movies, Videotapes -- Inflammatory Depictions

[i] Civil Cases

Navarro de Cosme v. Hospital Pavia, 922 F.2d 926 (1st Cir. 1991) : Affirming a judgment for the defendants in an action by the parents of a stillborn fetus, the Court held there was no error in excluding photographs of the fetus taken just before the autopsy, when it was already macerated and had begun to decompose.

Campbell v. Keystone Aerial Surveys, Inc., 138 F.3d 996 (5th Cir. 1998) : The Court held in a wrongful death action arising from the crash of a plane being used to conduct an aerial survey that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding photographs of the crash scene, which showed the decedent's remains decapitated and badly burned. Although there was no dispute as to the manner of the decedent's death and the plaintiffs did not pursue a claim for conscious pain and suffering on behalf of the estate, the evidence was probative of the plaintiffs' mental anguish upon knowing the decedent was decapitated and badly burned in the crash. However, the risk that the jury's decision would be based on a visceral response to the images justified the Judge's exercise of discretion. In contrast, it was an abuse of discretion to preclude testimony regarding the condition of the decedent's remains, since the testimony's potential to inflame the jury would not substantially outweigh the probative value of the evidence.

Walker v. Norris, 917 F.2d 1449 (6th Cir. 1990) : Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff in a civil rights action against prison guards who failed to prevent an inmate's stabbing death, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting photographs of the inmate's body as evidence of conscious pain and suffering.

Aliotta v. Amtrak, 315 F.3d 756 (7th Cir. 2003) : In a wrongful death action arising from a high-speed train hitting a railroad patron at a station, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of a photograph of the victim's body. Because there was no reconstructive testimony based on the position of the body, the position of the body in the picture did not support any theory of where the victim was when he was struck by the train, so the prejudicial effect of the picture significantly outweighed any probative value. In Haley v. Gross, 86 F.3d 630 (7th Cir. 1996) , the Court affirmed a judgment for an inmate who sued prison officials after another inmate set his cell on fire and severely burned the plaintiff. It held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting a photograph of the plaintiff taken after the fire that showed ankle shackles around his burned legs. The jury was aware that he was a convicted felon, necessitating the shackles, and counsel never drew attention toward them or implied that the defendants were responsible. There was no abuse of discretion in admitting a picture of the burned-out cell showing the body of the other inmate, as the photograph was highly probative of the cause and extent of the fire.

BE & K Constr. Co. v. United Bhd. of Carpenters, 90 F.3d 1318 (8th Cir. 1996) : The Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff in a nonunion contractor's suit against a union for tortious interference with a contract with an employer, because of the erroneous admission of a videotape of a pro-union riot that occurred several years earlier when another employer hired the plaintiff. There was no showing that the videotape or the events it recorded affected the employer's understanding or state of mind in the situation at issue, which was the ostensible reason for its being admitted, and its focus on violence on another occasion was prejudicial and misleading.

Quintanilla v. City of Downey, 84 F.3d 353 (9th Cir. 1996) : In an arrestee's § 1983 trial regarding officers' use of a police dog in making the arrest, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence of unrelated incidents of police dog bites. The numerous photographs of dog bite victims and a videotape of another arrestee being attacked by a police dog were unusually graphic and probably unfairly prejudicial.

[ii] Photographs, Movies, Videotapes -- Inflammatory Depictions -- Defendants and Their Surroundings in Criminal Cases

United States v. Gibbs, 182 F.3d 408 (6th Cir. 1999) : The defendants allegedly formed a gang ("SNP") to effectuate a drug conspiracy. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of photographs of two T-shirts found in a defendant's bedroom during execution of a search warrant. The shirts contained references to SNP, which were highly probative of the defendant's membership, and any prejudicial effect of violent language also on the T-shirts did not substantially outweigh that probative value. The Court did find, however, that it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to admit photographs of graffiti-covered buildings in the area in which the gang operated. Although the graffiti included references to SNP, it also included writings such as "cop killer," "slob killer," and "Crips." The graffiti provided no circumstantial evidence that SNP was the charged drug conspiracy and it was not connected with any of the defendants. Given that the jury could have improperly attributed the violent references to the defendants, any probative value was substantially outweighed by the potential for unfair prejudice.

United States v. Thompson, 76 F.3d 166 (7th Cir. 1996) : In a prosecution of a secretary charged with delivering five kilos of cocaine at a business office, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting photographs of a storage room at the office in which FBI agents found an additional 20 kilos on the same day as the charged transaction. The secretary's conduct had been consistent with her retrieving the bag containing cocaine from this storage room, and the presence of additional cocaine similarly packaged was highly probative of her knowledge that she was distributing cocaine.

United States v. Hester, 140 F.3d 753 (8th Cir. 1998) : A defendant appealing convictions for conspiracy to manufacture and distribute methamphetamine argued that it was error to admit two photographs, taken by the defendant's coconspirators at the farm where the methamphetamine was manufactured, which showed the defendant proudly holding his young children in front of large quantities of the drug. The Court found no abuse of discretion, because the photographs were relevant to defining the defendant's role in the conspiracy, and served to refute the defendant's claim that his only involvement was as a mere user. The fact that his children were in the pictures "demonstrates his comfort with handling large amounts of methamphetamine in his home with the conspirators, tending to refute his claim that he was not part of the conspiracy." In United States v. Smith, 63 F.3d 766 (8th Cir. 1995) , the Court affirmed cocaine convictions, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting albums seized at the defendant's house which contained "family-type" photographs of the defendant posing with cash or cars. The presence of the albums tended to prove that the house was the defendant's home and that he had control over its contents, including cocaine found in a safe there. In a drug prosecution, United States v. Thomlinson, n118 the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the defendant's motorcycle club membership and photographs of his tattooed torso, as the evidence tended to prove his ownership of a briefcase discovered in his office, which contained notes of drug transactions, business cards for tattoo parlors, and a motorcycle club brochure.

United States v. Chambers, 918 F.2d 1455 (9th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed a cocaine distribution conviction, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting pictures of the defendant wearing expensive clothing and gold jewelry. The photos were probative of his connection with another person in the case and it was highly unlikely that jurors would attach the same meaning to his dress as would a DEA agent, even though his dress may fit the agency's drug courier profile.

United States v. Smith, 63 F.3d 956 (10th Cir. 1995), vacated on other grounds, 516 U.S. 1105, on remand, 82 F.3d 1564 (10th Cir. 1996): The Court affirmed drug trafficking convictions, holding that photographs showing the defendant and others posing with firearms and making gang signals were properly admitted during cross-examination to impeach the defendant's testimony that he was not a gang member and that he possessed the guns only for protection from another gang.

[iii] Photographs, Movies, Videotapes -- Inflammatory Depictions -- Miscellaneous Evidence in Criminal Cases

United States v. Hitt, 981 F.2d 422 (9th Cir. 1992) : The Court reversed a conviction for possessing a machine gun, holding it was reversible error to admit a photograph that showed a dozen weapons in addition to the one charged. Because the photo did not depict the weapon's mechanism, it was of marginal probative value, and it "could do no more than arouse irrational fears and prejudices." In United States v. Carpenter, 933 F.2d 748 (9th Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed convictions for killing migratory birds, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting an hour-and-a-half videotape showing federal agents digging up pits where the birds' bodies were buried and opening an incinerator containing charred bird parts, as the pictures, although gruesome, tended to refute the defenses that only a few hundred birds had been killed.

[iv] Photographs, Movies, Videotapes -- Inflammatory Depictions -- Victims in Criminal Cases

United States v. Rezaq, 134 F.3d 1121 (D.C. Cir. 1998) : Affirming a conviction for air piracy, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of autopsy photographs of two passengers shot during the hijacking. The photographs had probative value, because the fact that passengers were killed was an element of the offense with which the defendant was charged. The photographs were also relevant to the "force and intimidation" element of the statute, because they "corroborated the government's account of the way in which Rezaq used systematic executions to maintain control of passengers and airport personnel." As to prejudice, all but one of the photographs were "fairly antiseptic." The remaining photograph, showing a close-up of the removal of a bullet from the skull of a victim, presented a "harder case," but its admission was no abuse of discretion. The fact that it was taken in a clinical setting "somewhat reduced its prejudicial effect," and it did have some probative value.

United States v. Velazquez, 246 F.3d 204 (2d Cir. 2001) : In a civil rights prosecution of a corrections officer for being an accessory after the fact to the fatal beating of an inmate, the Court found there was no abuse of discretion when autopsy photographs of the victim were introduced, despite the defendant's offer to stipulate that the beating occurred.

By showing the extent of the injuries, the photographs established that a cruel and unusual punishment had occurred and underscored the moral blame attaching to the defendant's decision to cover up the crime; they also tended to prove that the victim's signature on the defendant's cover-up report was coerced by the beating he had just received.

Government of Virgin Islands v. Albert, 241 F.3d 344 (3d Cir. 2001) : Affirming a felony murder conviction, the Court found no error in the admission of a videotape of the crime scene which included graphic views of the victim. The defendant claimed that another person killed the victim without assistance. The videotape was therefore "clearly relevant to demonstrate the government's theory that one small man could not have subdued the struggling [victim] and have inflicted the massive injuries on her unassisted." While the tape was graphic, its prejudicial effect did not substantially outweigh its probative value. A concurring Judge argued that it was error (but harmless) to admit the tape because it was unnecessarily graphic, no effort was made to redact the 45-minute-long videotape, and the government's theory of the case was already established by less inflammatory still photographs.

United States v. Whitfield, 715 F.2d 145 (4th Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed murder and robbery convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting photographs of the murder victim that were used to show that a crescent wrench might have been used to strike the fatal blows.

United States v. Lewis, 92 F.3d 1371 (5th Cir. 1996) , vacated on other grounds, 523 U.S. 155 (1998) : Affirming convictions of parents for murdering their child, the Court held that photographs of the victim, including autopsy photographs, were properly admitted. The photos were relevant to the defendants' intent, since the defendants argued at trial that they had no reason to know that their discipline of the child had caused serious injury. The Court also found that the prejudice was minimized by the Trial Judge's requirement that the government reduce the number of pictures to be admitted from 130 to 16. In United States v. Hall, 152 F.3d 381 (5th Cir. 1998) , the Court affirmed a conviction for kidnapping resulting in death, and found no error in the introduction of photos of the victim's body in the grave dug by the defendant. The photos were relevant to prove the victim's identity and the cause of her death. The defendant's offer to stipulate to these facts did not render the photos irrelevant, under the Supreme Court's decision in Old Chief v. United States (see the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 403.02[8]).

United States v. Ortiz, 315 F.3d 873 (8th Cir. 2002) : The Court found no abuse of discretion in a murder prosecution when graphic photographs of the victim's bloody corpse were introduced. The photos corroborated witness testimony that the victim had been bound with duct tape and beaten before his murder, and supported the government's contention that the crime was particularly heinous and depraved. In a capital murder case, United States v. Allen, 247 F.3d 741 (8th Cir. 2001), vacated on other grounds, 536 U.S. 953 (2002), the Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in admitting four victim autopsy photographs. The photos had substantial probative value in showing the entry angles of the bullets, the locations of each wound, and the extent of injuries caused by hollow point bullets, thus assisting the jury in determining the relative positions of the victim and the shooters (a key issue directly impacting on each defendant's culpability) and in determining intent, since the choice of using hollow point ammunition also bears on culpability. See also United States v. Kime n119(photographs of robbery scene and of gunshot wounds and head injuries incurred by the robbery victim tended to corroborate testimony implicating the defendant in the robbery and to show why the victim would have misidentified one of the participants); United States v. Ingle n120(photographs of the victim taken at the crime scene and during the autopsy tended to corroborate testimony of the defendant and an informant, to demonstrate the extent of the defendant's knowledge of the crime, and to assist in understanding the medical examiner's testimony -- and they were not unfairly prejudicial or inflammatory); United States v. Davidson n121(no error to admit four autopsy photographs of murder victim that were less gruesome than the crime scene photographs already admitted, to help explain the testimony of the witness who performed the autopsy).

United States v. Sarracino, 340 F.3d 1148 (10th Cir. 2003) : Affirming murder convictions, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of a photo of the victim's body in the autopsy room. Although somewhat gruesome because towels around the head made it look like the victim had been decapitated, the photo was admitted for the proper purpose of assisting the pathologist in describing the injuries and the pathologist had explained that the towels were placed only to cover blood, assuring the jury that the head had not been severed. The Court also upheld admission of a photo of the victim's body after it was found. Although the prosecutor incorrectly argued that the photo showed the victim's appearance when the defendants left him some hours earlier, the government's pathologist testified that discoloration and swelling would have increased in the period before the body was found. The Court concluded that because the bloodied head and face gave some indication of the victim's appearance when he was abandoned, the photo had probative value, which was not substantially outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice. In United States v. Naranjo, 710 F.2d 1465 (10th Cir. 1983) , the Court affirmed a murder conviction, holding that a photograph of the victim's head and torso, while gruesome, was properly admitted since it shed light on the pathologist's finding as to the cause of death and also was probative on the defense of accident.

United States v. Eyster, 948 F.2d 1196 (11th Cir. 1991) : In the trial of a drug smuggling conspiracy, the government introduced a photograph of a plane crash involved in the conspiracy that clearly showed the torso of a burned body with an arm extending over a faceless head. The Court held that the photo was not probative of whether anyone else was willing to risk death to engage in smuggling, but there was not sufficient prejudice to find an abuse of discretion. The convictions were reversed on other grounds and the Trial Judge was urged to give greater focus to Rule 403 determinations on retrial. See also United States v. De Parias, 805 F.2d 1447 (11th Cir. 1986) (photos of murder victim's badly decomposed body properly admitted to identify the victim, prove the means of death, and corroborate a crucial government witness).

[d] Photographs, Movies, Videotapes -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Long, 328 F.3d 655 (D.C. Cir. 2003) : Affirming a conviction for possession of visual depictions of minors engaged in sexually explicit conduct, the Court upheld the admission of 250 photos showing the minor victims and other young males in sexually explicit positions, noting that the Trial Judge had painstakingly reviewed in camera 301 photos, and permitted the 250 to be admitted for four specific purposes, carefully explaining the reason for admitting each photo. The Court found that this was the type of "thoughtful consideration" required by Rule 403 and United States v. Boney, 977 F.2d 624 (D.C. Cir. 1992) . The photos were relevant because Long denied possession of the photos alleged in two counts of the indictment, and his possession of other photos demonstrated intent to possess such photographs. The Judge instructed the jury that it could not consider the photos as evidence of bad character.

United States v. Schiff, 612 F.2d 73 (2d Cir. 1979) : The Court reversed the conviction of a tax protester who challenged the government's right to compel him to answer questions on a tax return and to pay his taxes because the Trial Judge admitted a videotape of a talk show appearance during which the host and a former assistant United States Attorney (who prosecuted tax cases) predicted with assurance that the defendant would be convicted and concluded that he ought to be. The Court found the evidence to be of limited probative value, since the defendant admitted nothing on the show, and concluded that there was a substantial chance of prejudice in the "fervid commentary that conveyed an air of incontestable truth."

United States v. Tibbetts, 646 F.2d 193 (5th Cir. 1981) : The Court approved admission of a videotape of a talk show in which the taxpayer-defendant participated when there were no prejudicial remarks by anyone else on the tape.

Estate of Moreland v. Dieter, 395 F.3d 747 (7th Cir. 2005) : Affirming a judgment for the plaintiffs in a § 1983 action arising from the death of an inmate in custody, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of videotapes made when the defendant deputy sheriffs were interviewed by investigators. The Court observed that the tapes were highly probative of the defendants' actions, state of mind, and credibility and were "not so dramatic, confusing, or misleading as to induce the jury to disregard the other evidence or to decide the case on an improper basis." In United States v. Allen, 390 F.3d 944 (7th Cir. 2004) , the Court affirmed a conviction for aiding and abetting a bank burglary, finding no plain error in the admission of a photo of the defendant standing in front of a police car with his hands behind his back and his arm held by a police officer. The photo was probative because it showed that the defendant's appearance was consistent with the description the police gave of the suspect; there was nothing in the photo to suggest that the defendant was involved in uncharged criminal activity; and the jury already knew that the defendant was arrested by the police on the night of the burglary. In United States v. Adames, n122 a defendant attempted to support an alibi that he was Christmas shopping on December 23 with a videotape showing his children opening gifts from him on Christmas morning. The Court upheld exclusion of the tape, since it was not only irrelevant to show his location on the 23rd, but was also prejudicial in leading the jury to feel sympathy for the defendant or his children.

Saturn Mfg. Co. v. Williams Patent Crusher & Pulverizing Co., 713 F.2d 1347 (8th Cir. 1983) : In a patent infringement action, the Court upheld the admission of a motion picture of the plaintiff's device and the allegedly infringing product. The Court said that "[m]otion pictures of commercial devices are admissible to aid the jury in understanding the language of patent claims provided they are properly authenticated and are shown to have been made in substantial compliance with the teachings and claims of the patent alleged to be infringed." It also approved exclusion of the defendant's movie of another device, which was offered to show obviousness. This movie was not discovered until the second week of trial, and the Trial Judge had found that there was a danger of "ambush" sufficient to require a ruling that the risk of unfair prejudice outweighed the probative value of the film.

United States v. Binder, 769 F.2d 595 (9th Cir. 1985) : The Court reversed a conviction for sexual offenses upon minor children, holding (2-1) that it was error to permit the jury to replay during deliberations the videotaped testimony of the victims. The majority reasoned that the procedure unduly emphasized the victims' testimony and suggested that permitting the jury to replay the tape in an abridged fashion compounded the unfairness.

Wolfgang v. Mid-America Motorsports, Inc., 111 F.3d 1515 (10th Cir. 1997) : A race car driver alleged that the defendants' wanton conduct in failing to provide adequate fire safety and rescue operations had made his injuries in a crash more serious. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding video and audio tapes of speeches made after the crash by the plaintiff. Although the speeches were party admissions under Rule 801(d)(2)(A), they would be unfairly prejudicial because they went to the plaintiff's comparative fault, which was not an issue in the case. In Durflinger v. Artiles, n123 the Court found no abuse of discretion when the Trial Judge, in a wrongful death action against doctors responsible for releasing a mental patient who killed his mother and brother, admitted a videotaped confession by the patient on the day of the murders to show the patient's state of mind near the time of the crimes.

[e] Photographs, Movies, Videotapes -- Mug Shots

United States v. Lewis, 40 F.3d 1325 (1st Cir. 1994) : In a prosecution for drug and firearms offenses, the Court held that any error in admitting a folder consisting of the defendants' booking photographs stapled alongside photographs of the guns and cocaine discovered near them when arrested was harmless. Although the array prejudicially suggested an as-yet-unproven connection between the defendants and the contraband, overwhelming evidence of the connection was ultimately supplied.

Hygh v. Jacobs, 961 F.2d 359 (2d Cir. 1992) : The Court reversed a damages award in a civil rights action by an arrestee who alleged that excessive force was used, because a mug shot photograph ostensibly offered to show the plaintiff was going through booking was irrelevant to false arrest damages. The photo related to events after arraignment and it prejudicially fastened the jury's attention on injuries for which the plaintiff had already been fully compensated.

United States v. Carrillo, 20 F.3d 617 (5th Cir. 1994) : Affirming a conviction for distribution of cocaine and heroin, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting photographs of the defendant that were mug shots separated into front and side views and cropped and enlarged so that no identifying marks or measuring lines were visible. As altered, the photos minimized the implication that the defendant had a criminal record, and the manner of their introduction did not prejudicially draw attention to their source. See also United States v. Torres-Flores, 827 F.2d 1031 (5th Cir. 1987) , discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 403.02[5], where an assault conviction was reversed because mug shots of the defendant had been admitted. The Court observed that mug shots should only be admitted where the government has a genuine need for the evidence, the photos do not imply that the defendant has a prior criminal record, and the use at trial does not draw particular attention to the source or implications of the photos.

United States v. Hines, 955 F.2d 1449 (11th Cir. 1992) : Reversing convictions for aggravated sexual assault, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to admit photospreads from which the complainant had identified the defendants as her assailants, as there was no demonstrable need to introduce the photographs, the photos implied the defendants had prior criminal records, and the agent's testimony highlighted that the photos were of known criminals.

[f] Photographs, Movies, Videotapes -- Pornography Cases

United States v. Katz, 178 F.3d 368 (5th Cir. 1999) : The defendant, charged with receiving child pornography, filed a motion to exclude all expert witness testimony purporting to determine the age of persons portrayed in the videotapes and computer files at issue on the basis of applying the "Tanner Scale" (which is a recognized scientific test for determining the age of postpubescent Caucasian females according to pubic hair and breast development). On interlocutory appeal, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding several of the computer images at issue, where the government witness' expertise was linked to the Tanner Scale method and he testified that the method was not scientifically useful in determining the age of the models depicted because the range of ages for each stage was too broad and extended beyond the critical age of eighteen.

United States v. Becht, 267 F.3d 767 (8th Cir. 2001) : The defendant was charged with possessing and disseminating child pornography, after numerous pornographic files were found on his computer. At trial the prosecution introduced 39 images from the pornographic files, although there was some indication that the government had offered and the defendant had accepted a stipulation that the images were child pornography. The Court held that regardless of any stipulation, the images were also relevant to the defendant's knowledge of what was on his computer. For that purpose the images were highly probative, and the Trial Judge took pains, by limiting the number shown and the time they were shown to the jury, to limit any prejudicial effect. As there were no satisfactory evidentiary alternatives to prove knowledge, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the images.

United States v. Dodds, 347 F.3d 893 (11th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed convictions for knowingly possessing child pornography and receiving obscene pictures, holding there was no abuse of discretion when 66 of the 3,400 images of child pornography found in the defendant's possession were admitted. There was evidence indicating that the defendant placed the images in a particular computer file, and the images tended to prove that they constituted child pornography and that the defendant would have known the nature of the images. The Court noted that "[d]uring voir dire, prospective jurors were warned of the nature of the images and the court excused for cause three jurors who stated that they 'would not be able to view such images without prejudicing the defendant.' "

[g] Photographs, Movies, Videotapes -- Surveillance and "Day in the Life" Films

Grothusen v. National R.R. Passenger Corp., 603 F. Supp. 486 (E.D. Pa. 1984) : The Court held that a surveillance film of the plaintiff, showing him without a limp, was properly admitted in a FELA case.

DeBiasio v. Illinois Cent. R.R., 52 F.3d 678 (7th Cir. 1995) : Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff in a FELA action, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting a "day in the life" video that included scenes of the plaintiff interacting with his family, even though the family's loss was not compensable under the Act. The jury was explicitly instructed not to consider the accident's harm to the family, and the plaintiff was subject to cross-examination, which significantly reduces the possibility of prejudice from a film.

Bannister v. Town of Noble, 812 F.2d 1265 (10th Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed a judgment for a plaintiff injured in an automobile accident, upholding the admission of a "day in the life" film offered to prove how the plaintiff's paralysis adversely affected his daily life. The Trial Judge had examined the film outside the jury's presence to make a Rule 403 determination as to its admissibility; the film accurately portrayed the plaintiff's daily routine and was not unduly prejudicial, even though it contained a couple of scenes that showed the plaintiff doing things he would not frequently do.

[59] Physical Evidence

[a] Civil Cases

Starter Corp. v. Converse, Inc., 170 F.3d 286 (2d Cir. 1999) : In Starter's declaratory judgment action to establish its right to use a "star" trademark on athletic footwear, Converse introduced a prototype shoe it had designed, to illustrate how the marks at issue might appear on a shoe that Starter might offer. Starter argued that the prototype created a danger of unfair prejudice because it had not actually marketed shoes yet, but the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence. The prototype was sufficiently similar to shoes about which testimony was given; Starter had offered its own prototype and could argue (as it did) that Converse's prototype was a gross exaggeration; and by bringing a declaratory judgment action before actually producing shoes bearing the disputed marks, Starter opened itself up to prototype evidence from Converse.

Braun v. Flynt, 726 F.2d 245 (5th Cir. 1984) : A novelty entertainer who performed an act with a swimming pig at an amusement park sued the publisher of Chic Magazine, a publication that emphasized female nudity, alleging defamation and invasion of privacy. Although the Court vacated a judgment for the plaintiff and remanded for a new trial on damages, it upheld a ruling that the jury should see the entire magazine in which her picture appeared "so that the jury could, in effect, be placed in the position of the ordinary reader." The Court rejected an argument that the evidentiary impact of the other portions of the magazine was unfairly prejudicial.

Douglass v. Hustler Magazine, Inc., 769 F.2d 1128 (7th Cir. 1985) : The Court reversed an actress' judgment against a magazine for invasion of privacy, finding that it was error to permit an expert to show the jury the most offensive 128 photos from various years of the magazine, since the sample was not representative.

[b] Physical Evidence -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Alston, 112 F.3d 32 (1st Cir. 1997) : The defendant was arrested carrying a very rusty, inoperable handgun. During a subsequent investigation, ATF agents cleaned up the weapon and restored it to operable condition. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the cleaned-up gun, even though its changed condition may have affected the defendant's scienter argument that he thought he had just picked up a rusty piece of metal in the dark, since the evidence was patently relevant and important and testimony about its prior condition was available to mitigate prejudice.

United States v. Arango-Correa, 851 F.2d 54 (2d Cir. 1988) : Affirming cocaine convictions, the Court held there was no error in permitting the government to display 500 pounds of cocaine to the jury. The Trial Judge carefully limited the duration of the display, and the cocaine was the principal physical evidence in the case.

United States v. MacDonald, 688 F.2d 224 (4th Cir. 1982) : In the prosecution of a former Army doctor for the murder of his wife and children, the Court found that the government proceeded properly in introducing the defendant's pajama top, which had been found draped over the wife's body, in order to show icepick wounds and to compare the pattern of the wounds with the pattern of wounds in the murdered wife's chest.

United States v. Kapp, 419 F.3d 666 (7th Cir. 2005) : The defendant was convicted of trafficking in and killing tigers and other exotic cats, in violation of endangered species laws. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion when mounted tigers and leopards were admitted into evidence. Although the evidence may have had some potential to arouse antipathy against the defendant for killing beautiful animals, that effect did not outweigh the probative value in helping the jury understand and evaluate the testimony of government witnesses regarding identification of the animals in question. In United States v. Smith, 415 F.3d 682 (7th Cir. 2005) , the Court affirmed a conviction for aiding and abetting an armed bank robbery, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of a gun that was found in the trunk of one of the getaway cars. Even though it was not used inside the bank, it was available to assist in warding off police, and thus was part of the plan for escape, so it was probative of the charged crime. In United States v. Gonzalez, n124 the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the display for a few hours of the 2,248 kilograms of cocaine seized from the defendants, as the evidence was relevant to establish the magnitude of the conspiracy and the likely purpose for possessing it, while the short period it was displayed and cautionary instructions regarding the purpose limited any prejudicial effect. In United States v. Davis, n125 a prosecution for conspiracy to distribute marijuana, the Court said that it could see no reason why the jury was permitted to examine a container filled with cash. The defendants did not challenge the fact that there was cash in the container, and the jury's examination added nothing to the case. There was no plain error, however.

United States v. Parks, 364 F.3d 902 (8th Cir. 2004) : In a trial for aiding and abetting the making of false statements in connection with firearms purchases, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion when the prosecution was permitted to introduce handguns similar to those purchased. The guns did not go to the jury room during deliberations, and any risks of jury confusion were avoided by instructions that the guns were not the actual guns purchased and were admitted only "so you get a sense of what the guns looked like, what type of gun it was." In United States v. Barry, 133 F.3d 580 (8th Cir. 1998) , the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of a handgun seized from the defendant, who was charged with a drug distribution conspiracy. The evidence supported an inference that the possessor needed to protect his drugs and money, and therefore had an intent to distribute drugs. In a drug conspiracy case, United States v. Kime, n126 the Court found no abuse of discretion when the prosecution introduced books seized at the conspiracy's cover business, including "Marijuana Grower's Guide," "Psychedelic Chemistry," and "The Complete Guide to Lockpicking by 'Eddie the Wire.' " Although there was no evidence that the conspirators had ever read the books, the opportunity to read the books and exploit the techniques therein was clearly probative of the defendant's criminal intent. In United States v. Thomlinson, n127 the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting in a drug prosecution evidence of the defendant's motorcycle club membership and photographs of his tattooed torso, as the evidence tended to prove his ownership of a briefcase discovered in his office, which contained notes of drug transactions, business cards for tattoo parlors, and a motorcycle club brochure.

[60] Plea Agreements

United States v. Sua, 307 F.3d 1150 (9th Cir. 2002) : Affirming convictions for methamphetamine involvement, the Court held that a plea agreement between the government and a codefendant who pled to a cocaine charge in exchange for dismissal of other counts was properly excluded. The Court noted the decision of the Eleventh Circuit in United States v. Delgado, 903 F.2d 1495 (11th Cir. 1990) , but declined to address "the soundness of Delgado's suggestion that plea agreements are not admissions because they do not necessarily establish the government believed the defendant was innocent of the charges dropped." The Court "embrace[d] Delgado's holding that a district court may properly exclude, under Rule 403, a plea agreement offered for the purpose of establishing the government's belief in a person's innocence."

[61] Police, Probation, and Parole Officer Testimony

United States v. Cruz, 326 F.3d 392 (3d Cir. 2003) : In a prosecution for distributing cocaine base, the government called his parole officer and others who gave testimony indicating that the defendant was on parole at the time. The Court found no abuse of discretion in admission of the evidence, since his parole status was relevant to explain why he used codefendants to perform the hand-to-hand street transactions. Additionally, the Trial Judge had been very careful to minimize the possibility of any unfair prejudice by, for example, making sure that the jury was never given any hint as to the type of crime leading to the defendant's parole status or as to whether he had served time in prison.

United States v. Garrison, 849 F.2d 103 (4th Cir. 1988) : The Court held it was proper to allow a probation officer to testify concerning the defendant's weight loss after the time of the robbery for which he was being tried. In United States v. Allen, n128 the Court upheld the admission of testimony by a police officer and a parole officer identifying two defendants from bank surveillance films. The witnesses were able to provide the jury "a perspective it could not acquire in its limited exposure to the defendants." The jury was not told that the witnesses were law enforcement officers, but the defendants complained that cross-examination concerning the witnesses' occupations and bias would necessarily elicit testimony concerning the defendants' criminal activities. The Court observed that "[n]othing in the Rules of Evidence or any other source is intended to relieve criminal defendants from difficult strategic choices."

United States v. Jackson, 339 F.3d 349 (5th Cir. 2003) : In a prosecution for transporting stolen goods from a jewelry store burglary, the government introduced evidence that the defendant had a previous felony conviction for stealing watches, and it elicited testimony from his parole officer (ostensibly called only to prove his address) regarding the defendant's parole status. Reversing, the Court held that the parole officer's testimony had minuscule probative value, because the defendant's residence was not really at issue and there was other evidence on the point, while it had substantial potential for prejudice. In a narcotics case, United States v. Pace, 10 F.3d 1106 (5th Cir. 1993) , the Court found it was error (but harmless) to permit the prosecution to call the defendant's parole officer solely to establish the defendant's address. The testimony was prejudicial, since it informed the jury that the defendant had previously committed crimes; and its probative value was minimal, since the defendant's address was not a major issue in dispute in the case, and since the fact could have been proved in less prejudicial ways.

United States v. Calhoun, 544 F.2d 291 (6th Cir. 1976) : The Court reversed a conviction for armed bank robbery because the defendant's parole officer was permitted to testify that the defendant was the person shown in photographs of the robbery. Although the government did not reveal the officer's relationship with the defendant, to avoid prejudicing the jury, the Court reasoned that the defendant could not effectively cross-examine the witness without risking undue prejudice. Note that cases from other Circuits have disapproved Calhoun to the extent that it implies "that a Trial Court's decision to allow a defendant's parole officer to testify against the defendant is a per se violation of Rule 403." n129 In most Circuits, the parole officer's testimony will be admissible if it is important to the case and if it cannot reasonably be provided by another person.

United States v. Stormer, 938 F.2d 759 (7th Cir. 1991) : In the prosecution of a former police officer for bank robbery, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting other police officers to give opinion testimony as to the identity of the robber in the bank surveillance photographs. The testimony was helpful because the person pictured had made efforts to alter his appearance; this probative value was not substantially outweighed by the risk of disclosing rumors of the defendant's alleged impropriety during the course of examining the witnesses as to their possible bias and prejudice.

United States v. Wright, 904 F.2d 403 (8th Cir. 1990) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony from witnesses familiar with the defendant from his previous involvement in the criminal justice system, where that connection was not disclosed and the witnesses' contacts were extensive enough to be helpful in identifying the person depicted in surveillance films of bank robbery. The Court also held there was no confrontation violation where the failure to cross-examine the witnesses for bias resulted from a tactical decision, not a prohibition by the Trial Judge. In United States v. Farnsworth, n130 the Court affirmed a bank robbery conviction, holding it was no abuse of discretion to admit testimony by parole officers who identified the defendant in surveillance films. The parole officers' status was not revealed nor was the defendant's prior record. The Court suggested that the use of lay opinion identification by police or parole officers should only be used where no other adequate identification testimony is available, since the defendant obviously is severely restricted in cross-examining officers who might reveal a prior record.

United States v. Beck, 418 F.3d 1008 (9th Cir. 2005) : Affirming a conviction for bank robbery, the Court found no error in the admission of testimony by the defendant's probation officer, who identified him as the person in the bank surveillance photograph. The Court noted that the witness was instructed to conceal from the jury his status as a probation officer -- he testified that he had a "professional relationship" with the defendant, which limited the prejudicial effect that otherwise would arise. In United States v. Henderson, 68 F.3d 323 (9th Cir. 1995) , the Court found no abuse of discretion when a police officer was permitted in a bank robbery case to identify the defendant in surveillance photographs, where the officer testified to having seen the defendant on a daily, weekly, or biweekly basis throughout a 15-year period and to having seen him wear a heavy overcoat like that worn by the robber in the surveillance photos. The Court noted that although there is a significant degree of prejudice whenever a police officer offers lay opinion identification of a defendant, in this case there were no identification witnesses to one of the robberies and there were two eyewitnesses identifying the defendant as the robber in the other, so there was no reason to overturn either conviction. In United States v. LaPierre, n131 the Court noted, in vacating the defendant's conviction for bank robbery and firearms offenses, that it was an abuse of discretion to permit an investigating officer to give an opinion that the individual pictured in the bank surveillance photographs was the defendant. The testimony was unnecessary because the defendant's appearance had not changed, and it ran the risk of invading the province of the jury and prejudicing the defendant, especially because the officer had never seen the defendant in person. In United States v. Butcher, n132 two police officers and a parole officer were permitted to testify, because the defendant's appearance at the time of trial was slightly different from his appearance when arrested and prior to the robbery, that the defendant was the individual depicted in bank surveillance photographs. The Court upheld the opinions under Rule 701, but noted two problems: First, the witnesses were testifying on the basis of contact with the defendant at a time when his appearance was even less similar to the appearance of the person in the surveillance photos than it was at the time of trial, so it was arguable that the jury needed no help. More importantly, the use of police and parole officers could be prejudicial to the defendant by suggesting prior prolonged contact with law enforcement officials. The Court warned "that use of lay opinion identification by policemen or parole officers is not to be encouraged, and should be used only if no other adequate identification testimony is available to the prosecution."

United States v. Pierce, 136 F.3d 770 (11th Cir. 1998) : The Court affirmed a bank robbery conviction, holding there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the defendant's probation officer to give an opinion that the defendant was the person depicted in surveillance photographs. Although the defendant's appearance had not changed between the robbery and trial, and the subject was not obscured from view in the photograph, the witness' greater familiarity with the defendant's appearance meant that her testimony could be of assistance to the jury. The probation officer testified that she knew the defendant in that capacity, but her testimony was neither the sole nor even the primary source of evidence about the defendant's criminal history.

[62] Polygraph and Similar Evidence

[a] Civil Cases

Dowd v. Calabrese, 585 F. Supp. 430 (D.D.C. 1984) : In a libel action, the Court rejected the defendants' request that polygraph evidence supporting a reporter's claims concerning his interviews with the plaintiffs and confidential sources be admitted as evidence. Although bound by precedent to exclude the evidence, the Court indicated that, in any event, "the scientific reliability of such evidence is substantially outweighed by its confusing effect on the jury."

deVries v. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 716 F.2d 939 (1st Cir. 1983) : Affirming a judgment for the plaintiffs in a suit alleging bad faith denial of coverage under an insurance policy, the Court upheld a ruling excluding evidence that the plaintiffs refused to take a polygraph test. It reasoned that polygraph evidence has been deemed to be of dubious value by Federal Courts, and that any probative value that the evidence would have had on the question of the company's good faith was substantially outweighed by the prejudicial impact it might have had on the jury.

Joubert v. Travelers Indem. Co., 736 F.2d 191 (5th Cir. 1984) : Affirming a judgment for the defendant insurer, which alleged that an insured was responsible for setting two fires in his home, the Court stated that the plaintiff's "argument that the Trial Court erred in holding that a voice stress test was inadmissible is without merit."

Wolff v. Moore, 199 F.3d 324 (6th Cir. 1999) : The Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit testimony in an inmate's § 1983 action against correction officers that another inmate, who allegedly was an eyewitness, had agreed to take a polygraph test. The testimony was not relevant to the proof developed by the probative evidence. Affirming a Tax Court finding that the taxpayers had substantially understated their income in Conti v. Commissioner, 39 F.3d 658 (6th Cir. 1994) , the Court found no error in the exclusion of polygraph evidence offered by the taxpayers. The Court noted that the taxpayers had unilaterally arranged for polygraph tests after the Commissioner refused to agree to such tests. Under Circuit precedent, unilaterally obtained polygraph tests are excluded under Rule 403 because the results of the tests would not be disclosed if they were unfavorable, and therefore the party offering them does not have a sufficiently "adverse interest at stake while taking the test." In Wolfel v. Holbrook, n133 the Court reversed a judgment for an inmate who sued a corrections officer for an alleged beating. It observed that polygraph evidence is generally inadmissible absent a stipulation of the parties. Here, it was error to admit evidence that the inmate was willing to take a lie detector test and to permit the inmate to interrogate a corrections officer concerning his refusal to submit to a polygraph examination regarding the alleged beating of another prisoner. In Murphy v. Cincinnati Ins. Co., n134 the Court affirmed a judgment for an insured on a fire policy, finding no error when the plaintiff was permitted to testify about his willingness to take a lie detector test and to cooperate with the company. The Court found that the testimony was relevant both to his credibility and to the company's claim of good faith in rejecting a claim.

United Fire & Cas. Co. v. Historic Preservation Trust, 265 F.3d 722 (8th Cir. 2001) : After the Trust submitted a fire damage claim, the insurer brought an action seeking a declaration of nonliability on grounds that the sole trustee intentionally set the fire and otherwise violated the policy terms. At trial the insurer sought to offer evidence that the trustee had refused to take a lie detector test, as requested by the state fire marshal; the evidence was offered to show the insurer's reasonableness, which was relevant to the Trust's counterclaim for vexatious refusal to pay. The Court held that exclusion of the evidence was not an abuse of discretion, since the refusal to take a lie detector test has little probative value and may be highly prejudicial to the insured.

Palmer v. City of Monticello, 31 F.3d 1499 (10th Cir. 1994) : The plaintiff brought a § 1983 action alleging that he had been denied due process when he was terminated from employment as a police officer, allegedly for falsifying a speeding ticket. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence that the plaintiff, before he was terminated, had taken a polygraph test in connection with the false speeding ticket charge. Although the polygraph evidence had some relevance as an operative fact, to show the precautions taken by the City before deciding to fire the plaintiff, the Trial Judge was justifiably concerned that improper inferences would likely be drawn that the plaintiff failed the polygraph.

[b] Polygraph and Similar Evidence -- Criminal Cases

[i] Defense Evidence Admissible

United States v. Lynn, 856 F.2d 430 (1st Cir. 1988) : The Court reversed drug convictions, holding it was error to deny the defendant an opportunity to question a government witness concerning "inconclusive" answers on two polygraph tests. Since the government presented the plea agreement, which required that the defendant successfully complete a polygraph examination, the Court concluded that the defendant should have been permitted to demonstrate that the witness had a reason to curry favor with the government to avoid nullification of his agreement as a result of the tests.

United States v. A & S Council Oil Co., 947 F.2d 1128 (4th Cir. 1991) : In a prosecution for false claims fraud, the principal government witness had taken polygraph tests in which the government examiner concluded he was "not truthful." A government motion in limine to exclude polygraph evidence was granted, and at trial the defense was not permitted to inquire about the tests while cross-examining a government expert whose report (entered in evidence) concluded that the key witness was competent. The Court reversed, holding that as a panel it could not overturn the Circuit's rule excluding polygraph evidence offered to prove the examinee's truthfulness, but that under Rule 705 the expert could be examined on the polygraph report he had considered in reaching his opinion on competency.

United States v. Weiner, 988 F.2d 629 (6th Cir. 1993) : The Court held there was no error in admitting evidence that the defendant in a fraud case had taken a polygraph examination, as it was offered only to show why he was no longer being used as an informant. In United States v. Barger, 931 F.2d 359 (6th Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed the conviction of a motorcycle gang member for arson and related offenses, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of a polygraph test given to an informant-witness, as it was relevant to his credibility and the test was part of his contract with the FBI, which the defense put in issue several times, and it was the defense rather than the government that elicited the results of the test.

[ii] Polygraph and Similar Evidence -- Criminal Cases -- Defense Evidence Excludable

United States v. Kwong, 69 F.3d 663 (2d Cir. 1995) : Affirming a conviction for attempted murder of an Assistant U.S. Attorney, the Court held it was proper to exclude evidence that the defendant "passed" a polygraph examination. The questions posed to the defendant by the polygraph examiner were so ambiguous that the responses, while apparently exculpatory, did not preclude the defendant's participation in the crime charged. Thus, the risk of confusion and prejudice substantially outweighed the probative value of the polygraph test.

United States v. Sanchez, 118 F.3d 192 (4th Cir. 1997) : Affirming cocaine conspiracy convictions, the Court held there was no error in precluding the defendant from introducing evidence that a cooperating witness had failed a polygraph test in the course of her cooperation. The Court noted that the Circuit, unlike some others, continues to exclude absolutely polygraph evidence to impeach the credibility of a witness.

United States v. Pettigrew, 77 F.3d 1500 (5th Cir. 1996) : In a bank fraud prosecution, the Court noted its Posado decision (§ 403.03[62][b][iii]) and held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding results of a polygraph examination taken by the defendant. Some of the results were simply immaterial; as to others, the testing lacked safeguards that operate to counterbalance the prejudicial effect of polygraph results.

United States v. Sherlin, 67 F.3d 1208 (6th Cir. 1995) : The defendant argued that polygraph results were admissible pursuant to Rule 702 following the Daubert decision (see the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 702, § 702.02[5]). However, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding results of a unilaterally-taken polygraph, since Rule 403 offers a basis for exclusion independent of Daubert. The Court observed that "in the absence of a prior agreement between the parties that the results of an examination would be admissible, the probative value of the polygraph is substantially less because the defendant would have no adverse interest at stake in the polygraph." See also United States v. Harris, 9 F.3d 493 (6th Cir. 1993) (no abuse of discretion to exclude evidence that the defendant offered to take a polygraph exam; because he did not agree to allow the results of any such examination, whatever they might be, to be admitted at trial, the evidence was at best marginally relevant on the credibility issue).

United States v. Ross, 412 F.3d 771 (7th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession and found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion under Rule 403 of evidence that two weeks before trial the defendant passed a polygraph test indicating that he did not possess the gun. Observing that the test was administered at the eleventh hour without notice to the government and was "highly suspect," the Court noted that "courts have routinely rejected unilateral and clandestine polygraph examinations like the one taken here, citing concern that a test taken without the government's knowledge is unreliable because it carries no negative consequences, and probably won't see the light of day if a defendant flunks." See also United States v. Feldman n135(upholding exclusion of test that defendant passed four days before trial); United States v. Tucker n136(no error to exclude polygraph results where the defendant refused to agree to the admissibility of the results before taking the test). In United States v. Brown, 289 F.3d 989 (7th Cir. 2002) , the Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no abuse of discretion when the defendant was precluded from cross-examining a witness about his failure to appear for a scheduled voice stress test. The Court noted that "[v]oice stress tests are if anything less reliable than polygraphs, and the evidence was simply that [the witness] failed to show up for the interview without explanation, not that he had affirmatively refused to take the test. The jury therefore could have read more into this than there was." In United States v. Lea, n137 after a business deal went sour, the defendant was charged with contaminating a rendering works and causing a massive recall of its products. Affirming, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence offered by the defense that another person had failed a polygraph test regarding the incident. The Trial Judge had not been provided with information about the accuracy rate of the test, and had been concerned that the examiner had been unable to complete the examination and determine why it was he considered the examinee "deception indicated." In United States v. Robbins, n138 the Court affirmed convictions arising out of a large-scale marijuana operation. It found no abuse of discretion when the defense was barred from asking witnesses, whose plea agreements and proffer letters stated that each of them was willing to submit to a polygraph examination at the request of the government, whether they had taken the polygraph tests. The Court reasoned that "even the threshold question as to whether a polygraph test had been administered would confuse and cause speculation among the jury." In a cocaine prosecution, United States v. Pulido, n139 the Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that the police examiner had noted "deception indicated" on a polygraph report of the principal government witness when he had been examined about murders tangentially connected with the case. Because the report did not remark on the degree or extent of deception "indicated" or on the answers thought deceptive, it did not provide an adequate basis for inferring that the witness had lied to police or had been involved in the murders. The polygraph exam was peripheral to the core issues of the case and the defendant was able to impeach the witness successfully without use of the report.

United States v. Gianakos, 415 F.3d 912 (8th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a conviction of kidnapping with a death resulting, finding no abuse of discretion when the defendant was precluded from cross-examining a detective, who said that two witnesses had always been consistent, about the witnesses' failed polygraph tests. The Court reasoned that the defense could cross-examine about consistency without reference to the tests. In United States v. Williams, 95 F.3d 723 (8th Cir. 1996) , the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding a polygraph examination offered to show that the government's chief witness in a kidnapping case had lied about the events. Because the questions asked had dealt only with peripheral details and the defendants rejected an offer to conduct a second test regarding the critical facts, the probative value of evidence that the witness had lied on any questions was outweighed by the potential for prejudice and misleading the jury.

United States v. Ramirez-Robles, 386 F.3d 1234 (9th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed convictions for methamphetamine distribution. Although the Trial Judge did not cite a specific evidence rule in excluding polygraph testimony, the Court concluded that the Judge appeared to rely on Rule 403 and did not abuse discretion in excluding the testimony. The testimony was potentially confusing, because the defendant was asked by the polygrapher whether he owned the methamphetamine that was sold and whether he ordered it, but was not asked whether he masterminded the sale, which was sufficient to convict him. In United States v. Falsia, n140 the Court sustained a cocaine conspiracy conviction and upheld the refusal to admit evidence of a polygraph test that was favorable to the defendant, reasoning that the Trial Judge could have concluded that the evidence might have been time-consuming, prejudicial, and confusing. In United States v. Solomon, n141 the Court affirmed murder convictions, finding no error in the exclusion of a defense psychiatrist's testimony concerning narcoanalysis of one defendant. Since narcoanalysis does not reliably induce truthful statements, the Trial Judge had discretion to exclude the evidence as not being helpful and as being more prejudicial than probative.

[iii] Polygraph and Similar Evidence -- Criminal Cases -- Generally

United States v. Posado, 57 F.3d 428 (5th Cir. 1995) : Concluding that the Circuit's per se rule against admission of polygraph testimony could not survive the Supreme Court's opinion in Daubert (see the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 702, § 702.02[5]), the Court reversed drug convictions because defense polygraph evidence had been excluded, and remanded the case for further proceedings. The Court emphasized that it was not holding that polygraph examinations are scientifically valid or that they always will assist the trier of fact; furthermore, it observed that Rule 403 might appropriately be invoked in some cases, even though polygraph evidence was no longer inadmissible per se.

United States v. Dietrich, 854 F.2d 1056 (7th Cir. 1988) : The Court affirmed convictions for dealing in counterfeit notes, observing that "[d]istrict judges generally exercise their discretion in this area in favor of excluding polygraph evidence, because doubts about the probative value and reliability of this evidence are usually found to [be outweighed by] the risk of prejudice." In this case, the Trial Judge struck a witness' mention of having taken a polygraph test and admonished the jury to disregard the testimony. Although the defendant claimed that the Judge should have given a more elaborate instruction, he failed to request one and the instruction given was deemed adequate.

United States v. Cordoba, 104 F.3d 225 (9th Cir. 1997) : The Court revisited the Circuit's rule that unstipulated polygraph evidence is per se inadmissible. The Court held that after the "flexible inquiry" mandated by the Supreme Court's decision in Daubert, such a per se rule of exclusion was no longer tenable. The Court reasoned further that while Daubert did not deal directly with Rule 403, a per se rule of inadmissibility under that Rule is equally inconsistent with Daubert. The Court remanded for a determination of whether the defendant's exculpatory polygraph examination was sufficiently reliable under Daubert and sufficiently probative under Rule 403.

United States v. Piccinonna, 885 F.2d 1529 (11th Cir. 1989) (en banc): Overturning its prior rule holding polygraph evidence inadmissible per se, the Court en banc vacated a conviction for knowingly making false statements to a grand jury and held that polygraph evidence was now sufficiently accepted as reliable that it could be admitted on stipulation or for impeachment or corroboration under Rule 608 upon adequate notice and opportunity for the opponent also to conduct a polygraph examination, subject to the discretion of the Trial Judge.

[iv] Polygraph and Similar Evidence -- Criminal Cases -- Prosecution Evidence

United States v. Brevard, 739 F.2d 180 (4th Cir. 1984) : The Court reversed a bank robbery conviction because an FBI agent made statements while testifying that the jury might have interpreted as indicating that the defendant had failed a polygraph test. The Court found that the defendant's credibility was crucial and that the instruction to the jury to disregard the agent's references was not sufficient protection against the possibility of prejudice.

United States v. Bowen, 857 F.2d 1337 (9th Cir. 1988) : In a prosecution for violating civil rights and conspiracy to defraud the government, the government alleged as overt acts one defendant's meeting with a polygrapher who prepared a false report. The Trial Judge ruled that evidence concerning the polygraphy would be excluded, even though it was offered to prove a conspiracy rather than to prove the falsity of statements made. The Court affirmed, finding that the evidence had the potential to confuse the jury, especially in light of defense evidence that the defendant whose report was allegedly falsified passed a second polygraph test. Moreover, the Court found that the prosecution had represented on numerous occasions that it would not seek admission of the evidence and that its change of heart was "beneath the standards we expect of our public prosecutors." In United States v. Miller, n142 the Court held that a limiting instruction was insufficient to cure the erroneous admission of evidence that the defendant had made false statements on a polygraph test. In United States v. Candoli, n143 the Court found error (harmless, however) in a police agent's reference to asking an unindicted suspect in an arson case to take a lie detector test, since the jury might have improperly inferred that the suspect took a test, passed it, and was therefore properly eliminated as a suspect.

United States v. Soundingsides, 820 F.2d 1232 (10th Cir. 1987) : The Court reversed a murder conviction on other grounds, but indicated that no reference should be made on retrial to a polygraph examination that appeared to indicate that a witness' statement to FBI agents that he saw the defendant beat the victim was true and his trial testimony to the contrary was false.

[63] Prejudice

[a] Duty To Minimize

Old Chief v. United States, 519 U.S. 172 (1997) : See the discussion in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 403.02[6].

[b] Prejudice -- Limiting Instruction

Shanklin v. Norfolk & S. Ry., 369 F.3d 978 (6th Cir. 2004) : During the trial of a wrongful death case arising from a grade-crossing accident, a videotaped deposition of the defendant's president, taken in another case, was admitted on the issue of the defendant's knowledge of the importance of identifying and eliminating hazardous conditions at its grade crossings. Although the deposition had been redacted to eliminate inadmissible evidence, a statement that the defendant had the highest rate of grade-crossing accidents in the industry was inadvertently shown to the jury. "Notwithstanding the undoubtedly prejudicial nature of the erroneously admitted information," the Court held that the Judge's immediate response by striking the evidence and issuing a curative instruction sufficiently minimized the prejudice to the defendant.

United States v. Figueroa-Lopez, 125 F.3d 1241 (9th Cir. 1997) : The defendant in a drug case claimed that he was entrapped, after a man who owed him money introduced an informant with the suggestion that he should sell the informant drugs in order to pay off the debt, and that feeling pressured and realizing it was the only way to get his money back, the defendant arranged the charged transaction as a middleman. In the government's rebuttal, the informant testified that he did not entrap the defendant, but that the defendant was eager to sell. He also testified that he and the debtor had previously been engaged in a marijuana transaction, for which, according to what he was told by the debtor and the debtor's mother, the defendant was the supplier. The Court concluded that "[w]hether or not such testimony [regarding the statements from the debtor and his mother] was relevant or admissible as nonhearsay, we recognize that the prejudicial aspect of this testimony is clear, even if it might be outweighed by its probative value," so it was error (but harmless) not to "contain[] the force of this evidence with a limiting instruction."

[c] Prejudice -- "Prejudice" Covered by the Rule

United States v. Gartmon, 146 F.3d 1015 (D.C. Cir. 1998) : When the defendant's girlfriend, who had been helping him defraud her employer, indicated that she wanted to get out of the scheme, he threatened her by inserting a gun into her vagina. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the incident, since the defendant's conduct, although clearly outrageous, was probative of his intent and controlling role, and the evidence was not offered for an unfair purpose, on an ancillary issue, or to inflame the jury. Although there was some risk that recitation of the facts would evoke emotions in the courtroom, there was no "unfair prejudice" or "undue tendency to suggest decision on an improper basis."

United States v. Marrero-Ortiz, 160 F.3d 768 (1st Cir. 1998) : Noting that "[v]irtually all evidence is meant to be prejudicial, and it is only unfair prejudice against which Rule 403 protects," the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence about a shooting incident that tended to show the defendant was a member of the charged drug conspiracy.

United States v. Sprick, 233 F.3d 845 (5th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed fraud and money laundering convictions arising out of the defendant's service as a financial advisor. The government had searched the defendant's home and had discovered a failed e-mail transmission addressed to a radio personality in which the defendant admitted that he misappropriated a large amount of money and that he had been contacted by the government. The Court held that the e-mail "did not influence the jury in any improper way; rather its effect corresponds with the purpose for its admission, namely its bearing on Sprick's guilt. ... Thus the e-mail had no unfairly prejudicial effect." In Dollar v. Long Mfg., N.C., Inc., n144 the Court reversed a judgment for the defendant in a product liability action because of an erroneous ruling that a defense witness, who testified that the instrument used by the deceased was safe to operate, could not be impeached by a letter that the witness had sent to dealers selling the instrument warning them about its "death-dealing propensities" when used in the fashion it was used by the deceased. The Court stated that the evidence should not have been excluded under Rule 403 because there was no danger of unfair prejudice to the defendant. The Court said that "[o]f course, 'unfair prejudice' as used in Rule 403 is not to be equated with testimony simply adverse to the opposing party. Virtually all evidence is prejudicial or it isn't material. The prejudice must be 'unfair.' "

In re Air Crash Disaster, 86 F.3d 498 (6th Cir. 1996) : In a suit between the airline and the aircraft manufacturer for contribution and reimbursement for settlements arising from the crash of an airplane on takeoff, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting records of the pilot in command's training and of the training practices of the airline's corporate predecessor. The Court found the records probative to show the pilot's longstanding problems with checklist usage and the airline's failure to correct them. It rejected the argument that the records were prejudicial to the airline, saying "Rule 403 does not exclude evidence because it is strongly persuasive or compellingly relevant -- the rule only applies when it is likely that the jury will be moved by a piece of evidence in a manner that is somehow unfair or inappropriate."

United States v. Wipf, 397 F.3d 632 (8th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a conviction for involuntary manslaughter arising from the defendant's driving while intoxicated. Evidence that the defendant's blood alcohol content was.214 was "certainly prejudicial because it was strong evidence that he committed the crime of involuntary manslaughter" but it "was not unfairly prejudicial because it would not lead the jury to find Wipf guilty on an 'improper basis.' " Thus, the evidence was not subject to exclusion under Rule 403.

United States v. Cruz-Garcia, 344 F.3d 951 (9th Cir. 2003) : The Court reversed a drug conviction because the defendant was not permitted to introduce evidence of the facts underlying a cooperating witness' prior convictions. In his plea allocution the witness had not mentioned the defendant, but at trial he testified that the defendant was the drug dealer and he was just along for the ride; the prosecutor argued that the witness was "dumb as a box of rocks" and would have needed the defendant's help to pull off the crime. The Court held that the underlying facts were not offered to show the witness' propensity to commit the charged crime but to show his ability to commit the crime on his own, which the prosecutor had made the central issue. Proving the underlying facts could only have prejudiced the government's case by undermining its theory that the witness was too dumb to act on his own, and that would not be unfair prejudice.

[d] Prejudice -- Prejudice to Prosecution

United States v. Malpeso, 115 F.3d 155 (2d Cir. 1997) : Defendants, charged with offenses arising from a war between competing factions of a crime family in which they were members, sought to introduce evidence that an FBI agent had leaked information to a member of a rival faction during that time, in order to show that there was no mob war but rather "one nut running amok" and everyone else "taking cover." The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the evidence, since it was of at best marginal relevance, and the likely (and presumably intended) effect of admitting it would have been to shift the focus away from the defendants' wrongdoing to the tangentially related misdeeds of one government agent, which not only risked needlessly delaying the trial but also created a real possibility that the jury would improperly discredit the government's case.

United States v. Cropp, 127 F.3d 354 (4th Cir. 1997) : The Court held in a crack distribution conspiracy prosecution that there was no abuse of discretion in prohibiting cross-examination of cooperating witnesses regarding the specific penalties that they would have received absent cooperation or that they hoped to receive due to their cooperation. Defense counsel were permitted to ask the witnesses whether they faced a "severe penalty" prior to cooperating and whether they expected to receive a lesser sentence because of their cooperation. Any additional probative value from quantitative questions was outweighed by the certain prejudice that would result when a sympathetic jury learns that a finding of guilt results in 10-20 years of imprisonment.

United States v. Cruz-Garcia, 344 F.3d 951 (9th Cir. 2003) : The Court reversed a drug conviction because the defendant was not permitted to introduce evidence of the facts underlying a cooperating witness' prior convictions. In his plea allocution the witness had not mentioned the defendant, but at trial he testified that the defendant was the drug dealer and he was just along for the ride; the prosecutor argued that he witness was "dumb as a box of rocks" and would have needed the defendant's help to pull off the crime. The Court held that the underlying facts were not offered to show the witness' propensity to commit the charged crime but to show his ability to commit the crime on his own, which the prosecutor had made the central issue. Proving the underlying facts could only have prejudiced the government's case by undermining its theory that the witness was too dumb to act on his own, and that would not be unfair prejudice.

[64] Prison Disciplinary Decision

United States v. Thomas, 155 F.3d 833 (7th Cir. 1998) : In a prosecution for mailing threatening letters, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit a prison counselor's testimony that a prison disciplinary hearing concluded that the defendant was responsible for writing one of the letters. The risk of unfair prejudice was substantial, since the jury learned that the hearing decided one element of the offense, even though the hearing did not decide whether the defendant was guilty beyond a reasonable doubt and the defendant was not given the procedural protections afforded at trial.

[65] Privacy and Confidential Information

Fraser v. Major League Soccer, L.L.C., 284 F.3d 47 (1st Cir. 2002) : Although the Court affirmed a judgment for a professional soccer league and its investor-owners in an antitrust suit brought by soccer players, it found an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) when the cross-examination of a defense witness was restricted. The witness was the co-owner of a minor league team, who testified that he was competing with Major League Soccer for two specific players. The plaintiffs asked for the names of the players on cross-examination, but the witness claimed he wanted to keep the information confidential. The Court held that, while a Trial Judge has authority to protect witnesses from an invasion of privacy, it was not clear that any substantial privacy interest was at stake in this case.

[66] Product Design

United States Fid. & Guar. Co. v. Baker Material Handling Corp., 62 F.3d 24 (1st Cir. 1995) : In an action arising out of a fatal accident involving a forklift, the Court held that Rule 407 did not bar evidence of a design change made after manufacture of the forklift but before the accident. However, there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the evidence under Rule 403, because the dissimilarities between the redesigned forklift and the model involved in the accident could have been misleading to the jury and unfairly prejudicial to the defendant.

Alevromagiros v. Hechinger Co., 993 F.2d 417 (4th Cir. 1993) : In an action brought by a consumer injured by an allegedly defective ladder, the Court held there was no error in excluding evidence of a competing ladder with more safety features. The jury did not need to see examples of competing products to understand the nature of the product at issue and could easily have been misled or confused by the assumption that the competing product represented the relevant industry-wide standard.

[67] "Profile" Evidence

United States v. Simpson, 910 F.2d 154 (4th Cir. 1990) : The Court reversed a conviction for unlawfully possessing a firearm and attempting to board an aircraft with a concealed weapon, holding it was an abuse of discretion to admit drug courier profile testimony. Even giving the evidence its maximum probative value and minimizing its prejudicial effect, the evidence had de minimis relevance but highly prejudicial impact in its insinuation of drug crimes in the trial.

United States v. Mendoza-Medina, 346 F.3d 121 (5th Cir. 2003) : In the defendant truck driver's trial for possession of marijuana, a DEA agent testified about how drug traffickers recruit smugglers. The witness suggested that such smugglers knew they were transporting drugs, and he mentioned specifically facts closely paralleling the case, including the amount of drugs given to new recruits and the presence of wives and children to mask the trafficking offense. Affirming, the Court found that admission of the agent's testimony was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error). The testimony was closely akin to drug courier profile evidence, which is inadmissible because it is inherently prejudicial and violates Rule 704(b)'s bar on expert testimony to prove a mental element: in these cases, the courier's knowledge that he was transporting drugs. In a marijuana-importation prosecution, United States v. Brito, 136 F.3d 397 (5th Cir. 1998) , the Court held it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to admit testimony from a law enforcement expert regarding the structure of family drug gangs generally and then, based on the testimony of other witnesses, to permit him to ascribe certain roles to the members of the family in this case. This type of profile evidence is inadmissible to prove substantive guilt based upon similarities between the defendants and a profile.

United States v. Carter, 901 F.2d 683 (8th Cir. 1990) : The Court held in a cocaine possession case that drug courier profiles are investigative tools, not evidence of guilt, and that their admission is inherently prejudicial, but that the error in admitting the evidence in this case, where there was no need to establish the validity of a search before the jury, was harmless. In United States v. Wilson, 930 F.2d 616 (8th Cir. 1991) , a drug trafficking prosecution, the Court held that introducing evidence of frequent flights, which was part of a drug courier profile, was relevant to rebut the defendant's argument he was ignorant of the contents of a package picked up from an airline; it was error (but harmless), however, for the prosecutor to argue in summation that the defendant fit the profile.

United States v. Baron, 94 F.3d 1312 (9th Cir. 1996) : Reversing a drug conviction on non-evidentiary grounds, the Court held that "profile" testimony from an expert on drug transactions was properly admitted. Defense counsel suggested, in cross-examining one of the arresting officers, that the defendant was not a drug courier because when arrested he did not have with him the items that a typical drug courier might be expected to carry. In rebuttal, an expert on drug transactions testified that it was not unusual for a drug courier to be found without large sums of cash, drug ledgers, or drug paraphernalia. While profile testimony is usually inadmissible to prove guilt, the defendant opened the door in this case. In United States v. Lui, 941 F.2d 844 (9th Cir. 1991) , the Court held it was an abuse of discretion, but harmless, to admit drug courier profile evidence to show modus operandi, where the defendant was caught red-handed with suitcases full of heroin and the government had no need to explain a complex criminal scheme. See also United States v. Gomez-Norena n145(no plain error to admit drug courier profile testimony where it was not offered to prove that the defendant was guilty, and the jury was twice cautioned to consider it only as background material).

United States v. Robinson, 978 F.2d 1554 (10th Cir. 1992) : Affirming convictions for cocaine base possession and conspiracy, the Court held that expert evidence tending to show that the defendants were active members of a gang whose main purpose was to sell cocaine was not impermissible "profile" evidence. Profiles only help investigators decide whether to pursue a matter, but the expert in this case was explaining the physical evidence so as to connect the defendants to the charged crime. The dissenting Judge believed that the government had impermissibly sought to prove that by exhibiting the characteristics of gang members, the defendants were members of a gang with criminal purposes and therefore were guilty of the charged conspiracy and underlying crimes.

[68] Race and Ancestry

United States v. Doe, 903 F.2d 16 (D.C. Cir. 1990) : A black American and two Jamaicans were jointly charged with drug offenses. The Court reversed their convictions, in part because a detective was permitted to testify to the modus operandi of Jamaican drug dealers and how the market has been taken over basically by Jamaicans. The Trial Judge had not balanced the severely prejudicial effect of the references, but had admitted the testimony solely because defense counsel had inquired on voir dire whether jurors would have greater difficulty affording Jamaicans a fair trial.

United States v. Rodriguez Cortes, 949 F.2d 532 (1st Cir. 1991) : The Court held it was reversible error to admit an unauthenticated Colombian identification card seized from a defendant charged with importing cocaine. In the majority's view, prosecution argument based on the card appealed to the jury to find the defendant guilty by reason of his national origin, inviting them to believe that if a person is born in Colombia he must be involved in drug trafficking. One Judge, concurring dubitante, agreed that the card's prejudicial effect substantially exceeded its probative value, but disagreed that the prosecutor's argument crossed the line.

United States v. Blackwood, 913 F.2d 139 (4th Cir. 1990) : Affirming a conviction for possessing crack cocaine with intent to distribute, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting two Jamaican passports in the defendant's name found in one of the rooms where the drugs were located, as the value of the evidence in showing control of the room was not substantially outweighed by the risk that the passports would incite xenophobic hostility.

United States v. Bonty, 383 F.3d 575 (7th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed convictions of two men for interstate transportation of minors with intent to commit aggravated sexual abuse, after one of them raped one of a pair of girls they had enticed to go with them. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the rapist's accomplice had made sexual advances toward the other girl. Although the accomplice argued that evidence a 31-year-old black man propositioned a 15-year-old white girl inflamed the jury, the Court found that the evidence was relevant to whether the accomplice knew the purpose of picking the girls up at a mall was to later engage in a sexual encounter, and that any prejudicial effect was lessened because the testimony was not repeated and the jury was instructed not to be "influenced by any person's race, color, religion, national ancestry, or sex." In United States v. Kibler, 279 F.3d 511 (7th Cir. 2002) , the Court affirmed cocaine-related convictions. It concluded that evidence that the defendant obtained sex from both black and white girls in exchange for drugs was probative because it concerned the drug transactions that formed the basis for the indictment, and that it was not unduly prejudicial because "the race of the women involved was raised only incidentally when witnesses were identifying the persons involved."

United States v. Jankowski, 194 F.3d 878 (8th Cir. 1999) : The Court found no abuse of discretion in an armored car robbery trial when a witness was permitted to testify that one of the conspirators spoke Polish on the telephone. The evidence was relevant to showing that she was communicating with her Polish-speaking husband and that she was seeking not to be understood if overheard. The probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by any prejudicial effect, as the evidence was not linked with any argument or other evidence implying she was more likely to have committed the crime because of her national origin. In EEOC v. HBE Corp., 135 F.3d 543 (8th Cir. 1998) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiffs in an action alleging racial discrimination and retaliatory discharge by a hotel owned by the defendant. It upheld the admission of various statements by company employees concerning the racial views of the man who was the controlling figure in running the hotel. However, the Court found that evidence that the general manager of the hotel referred to his co-worker as a "camel jockey" and made anti-Semitic statements should not have been admitted, but the error was harmless. In United States v. Vue, n146 the Court reversed the Hmong defendants' convictions for opium smuggling because a customs officer was permitted to testify that much of the opium smuggling in the area involved Hmongs.

Jinro America Inc. v. Secure Investments, Inc., 266 F.3d 993 (9th Cir. 2001) : In a breach of contract and fraud action by a South Korean company, the Court reversed summary judgment granted for the defendants after a jury, in the first stage of a bifurcated trial, found for the defendants on their claim that the contract at issue was a sham designed to cover up a high-risk investment scheme that circumvented South Korea's currency regulations. The Court held that the trial "was prejudicially infected by ethnically biased, 'xenophobic' expert testimony" by a private investigator, alleging a modus operandi of Korean businessmen to seek to circumvent laws that restrict their money-making ability and to use the United States as a safe haven for schemes to evade currency requirements. On cross-examination, he stated that "the prevalence of corruption and fraud in the Korean business community is very great and very extensive." The Court found that the testimony "was so tinged with ethnic bias and stereotyping that it should have been excluded under Rule 403's balancing test." The Court rejected as "both astonishing and irrelevant" the defense argument that the testimony could not have been racist because the expert was married to a Korean. In United States v. Cabrera, 222 F.3d 590 (9th Cir. 2000) , the Court reversed the drug convictions of two defendants of Cuban origin, finding plain error in the admission of extensive testimony by the arresting officer concerning the number of Cubans in the drug trade, the "typical way that Cubans do their drugs," and the flight risk posed by Cuban suspects. Such generalizations were unnecessary and prejudicial, because persons "cannot be tried on the basis of their ethnic backgrounds or national origin." In Price v. Kramer, 200 F.3d 1237 (9th Cir. 2000) , the Court affirmed a judgment against police officers in favor of three teenaged boys, two African-American and one white, who alleged an illegal stop of their vehicle followed by use of excessive force. The Court found that the relevance of racial bias evidence was "readily apparent": "proving the officers' actions were racially motivated could explain why they stopped the boys' vehicle without probable cause or reasonable suspicion and also why they used excessive force without cause"; "[e]stablishing the officer's racial motivation tends to demonstrate why the plaintiffs' testimony, and not the officers', should be deemed credible by the jurors"; and racial bias was important to proving the malicious, wanton, or oppressive behavior of the officers.

United States v. Bowman, 302 F.3d 1228 (11th Cir. 2002) : Affirming the racketeering conviction of the international president of a motorcycle club, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to disclose the whites-only policy in several iterations of the club's constitution. The only relevance of the evidence was that its repetition tended to show the uniformity of the enterprise, but that was outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice from the introduction of irrelevant and inflammatory racial issues. In a civil rights action for excessive force in effecting an arrest, Brown v. City of Hialeah, 30 F.3d 1433 (11th Cir. 1994) , the Court reversed a judgment for the defendants, because portions of a tape recording in which the officers used racial slurs were excluded.

[69] Reading Materials

United States v. Walters, 351 F.3d 159 (5th Cir. 2003) : Affirming a conviction for sending an explosive package to an Air Force officer, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting portions of a book, The Anarchist's Cookbook, including a title page with the defendant's name written on it and a chapter detailing the making of a device similar to that sent to the officer. The Court concluded that the evidence was relevant to prove knowledge and ability to make the type of device at issue in the case. Noting that the Judge instructed the jury on the limited use it could make of the evidence, the Court suggested that the defendant "understates the probative value of the excerpts admitted and overstates their prejudicial impact."

People of Terr. of Guam v. Shymanovitz, 157 F.3d 1154 (9th Cir. 1998) : The Court reversed a conviction for unlawful sexual activity with minors, because of the improper admission of testimony regarding the contents of sexually explicit gay adult magazines found in the defendant's house. While the magazines could possibly have been relevant to whether the defendant had the purpose of being sexually aroused, or was actually sexually aroused, by the charged improper touching of underage boys, the statute under which he was prosecuted applied only an objective test, which made the character of the touching, not the purpose of the toucher, at issue. Furthermore, possession of the magazines was not probative of whether the conduct with which the defendant was charged was intentional. Even if the evidence were somehow relevant, its suggestion of the defendant's sexual orientation, and implication of sexual deviancy, was highly prejudicial and substantially outweighed any probative value.

[70] Rebutting Negative Inference

United States v. Pinillos-Prieto, 419 F.3d 61 (1st Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed cocaine convictions, holding that a law enforcement officer was properly permitted to testify as a lay witness that drug organizations were dangerous and that they protected their drugs with firearms, and that the moment when drugs and money were handed over was the most dangerous part of the work of an undercover agent. The evidence tended to explain why an organization's leader would not be present at an exchange, why a defendant present at a meeting was unlikely to be an innocent bystander, and other aspects of a drug arrest, and any danger of unfair prejudice was substantially dissipated.

United States v. Christians, 200 F.3d 1124 (8th Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed firearm convictions, finding no error when the government was permitted to elicit testimony that the defendant had an opportunity in the jailhouse video room to erase videotapes of an alleged confession. Because the defense challenged the officers' testimony that they provided Miranda warnings to the defendant and repeatedly alluded to the fact that the confession was videotaped, the Court held there was no error in permitting the government to clarify the reason that it could not present the videotapes to the jury.

[71] Relationship to Other Rules

[a] Hearsay Rules

Li v. Canarozzi, 142 F.3d 83 (2d Cir. 1998) : An inmate, suing for civil rights violations following an alleged assault by corrections officers, sought to introduce deposition testimony given by another inmate, who refused to testify at trial. Although the deposition qualified as former testimony under Rule 804(b)(1), the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding the deposition under Rule 403. On the basis of the deponent's testimony (out of the jury's presence) that his answers had not been full, complete, and truthful, and in light of other evidence very much along the same lines, there was no abuse of discretion in concluding that the potential prejudicial effect of the evidence substantially outweighed its probative value.

Holbrook v. Lykes Bros. S.S. Co., 80 F.3d 777 (3d Cir. 1996) : In an action alleging that a seaman's death from mesothelioma was caused by asbestos exposure, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in redacting references to mesothelioma in the death certificate, autopsy report, and hospital records. Although documents admissible under Rules 803(6), (8), and (9) may contain opinions, the difficulty of diagnosing mesothelioma meant that unexamined references to the disease were not helpful to and could potentially have misled the jury.

Cortes v. Maxus Exploration Co., 977 F.2d 195 (5th Cir. 1992) : Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff in a Title VII sexual harassment action, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the EEOC's determination of no probable cause for the charge. Although agency reports are presumptively admissible under Rule 803(8)(C), this report did not contain detailed evidentiary statements and findings of fact; rather, it was a conclusory determination that could have unfairly prejudiced the plaintiff's case.

United States v. Linwood, 142 F.3d 418 (7th Cir. 1998) : When officers entered the defendant's house to arrest her for selling cocaine base, the defendant was not there but her 12-year-old daughter was. When the defendant returned to the house minutes later and was told that her daughter had told the officers that her mother had been selling crack, the defendant began to pound her fists and yell at her daughter that she was not a cocaine dealer and to insist that the drugs belonged to her live-in boyfriend. The daughter also told the officers where the "dope money" was kept. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the daughter's statements, since they were offered only to establish why the defendant reacted as she did upon hearing the first statement and to show why an officer found the money where it was hidden. Any prejudicial effect from the jury's using the statements for their truth was minimized by repeated and careful instructions as to the proper non-hearsay purposes for which the statements could be used. Furthermore, the daughter testified at trial and could be cross-examined about the facts asserted in her statements.

McEuin v. Crown Equip. Corp., 328 F.3d 1028 (9th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff in an action by the operator of a doorless, stand-up forklift against the manufacturer for personal injuries suffered in a collision. It held there was no error in excluding independent engineering reports as inadmissible hearsay. Although the manufacturer suggested that the reports would not be used for their truth, but only to show its state of mind when designing the forklift, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the Judge decided that the jury would be unable to use the reports in a limited way. One Judge dissented, arguing that the plaintiff's argument about reckless indifference made it an abuse of discretion to exclude the reports.

Wolfgang v. Mid-America Motorsports, Inc., 111 F.3d 1515 (10th Cir. 1997) : A race car driver alleged that the defendants' wanton conduct in failing to provide adequate fire safety and rescue operations had made his injuries in a crash more serious. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding video and audio tapes of speeches made after the crash by the plaintiff. Although the speeches were party admissions under Rule 801(d)(2)(A), they would be unfairly prejudicial because they went to the plaintiff's comparative fault, which was not an issue in the case.

United States v. King, 713 F.2d 627 (11th Cir. 1983) : Reversing a ruling that prior testimony of a key witness would be excluded in a retrial, the Court rejected the government's argument that the Trial Judge lacked authority to exclude evidence under Rule 403 that was admissible under Rule 804(b)(1), but it found that the Judge had reached an incorrect balancing ruling. The Court pointed out that evidence should be excluded only sparingly under Rule 403 and that the greater the need for the evidence the less likely it is to be excluded. The Court recognized the legitimacy of the Judge's concern that without seeing and hearing a key witness the jury might have trouble evaluating his credibility, but it concluded that the probative value of the testimony was extremely high and the risk of prejudice was low.

[b] Relationship to Other Rules -- Other Rules

United States v. Long, 917 F.2d 691 (2d Cir. 1990) : The Court reversed RICO convictions, holding that an FBI agent had been improperly permitted under Rule 702 to testify about organized crime families. The extensive descriptions had a highly prejudicial effect and only marginal relevance when the enterprise alleged was not a crime family and had only a single connection with organized crime.

United States v. Salmon, 944 F.2d 1106 (3d Cir. 1991) : A defendant charged with cocaine offenses was precluded from cross-examining a codefendant regarding the confidential informant's use of cocaine with them on the ground that it was extrinsic evidence inadmissible under Rule 608. The Court held that the evidence might have been relevant to the defendant's entrapment defense, but its probative value was at best slight and it was potentially prejudicial to the codefendant.

United States v. Young, 248 F.3d 260 (4th Cir. 2001) : In a prosecution related to a kidnapping, the Court found no error in the exclusion of a prior statement made by a government witness in a conversation with the defendant that the defendant surreptitiously taped. The statement could have been construed as an admission that the witness and not the defendant committed the crime. Although the defendant had established a foundation for admitting the statement as inconsistent under Rule 613(b), the Trial Judge still had discretion to exclude it under Rule 403. In this case, the witness did not make an unequivocal statement that was inconsistent with his trial testimony, but instead answered affirmatively to leading questions posed by the defendant, in a tape replete with the defendant's self-serving hearsay.

United States v. Crawford, 130 F.3d 1321 (8th Cir. 1997) : In a trial on charges of felon firearm possession, the prosecution admitted evidence of the predicate felony convictions, even though the defendant offered to stipulate that he was a felon. This was error under the Supreme Court's decision in Old Chief v. United States (see the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 403.02[7]), which was decided after Crawford's conviction. On appeal the Court found the Old Chief error to be harmless, because the defendant testified at trial and thus the convictions could have been admitted anyway, to impeach the witness under Rule 609(a)(1). In Wood v. Minnesota Mining & Mfg. Co., 112 F.3d 306 (8th Cir. 1997) , following a collision between a truck driven by the plaintiff and the defendant's train, the plaintiff's employer paid the defendant for damages to the train. In the plaintiff's personal injury action, the Court held there was no error in excluding evidence of the employer's settlement. It was not relevant because it was not binding in any way on the plaintiff's legal action, and even if relevant, the risk that the jury would be unfairly swayed made its prejudicial effect substantially outweigh its probative value. Since the evidence was properly excluded, it was not necessary to decide whether the Trial Judge had properly excluded it under Rule 408 although no litigation was even threatened at the time.

Breeden v. ABF Freight Sys., Inc., 115 F.3d 749 (10th Cir. 1997) : A jury found that the defendant's truck driver was 10 percent negligent in causing an accident while a third party was 90 percent negligent. The plaintiffs had settled with the third party before trial. The defendant argued that it was error to exclude evidence of the settlement after the plaintiffs testified that they did not seek additional medical treatment in part because of financial inability. Although the Court recognized that Rule 408 did not require exclusion of the settlement evidence, it mentioned that plaintiffs had settled for only $17,000 and found no error in the conclusion that the prejudicial effect of the evidence would far outweigh its probative value. In Orth v. Emerson Elec. Co., 980 F.2d 632 (10th Cir. 1992) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiffs in a product liability action arising out of a gas heater explosion, holding that there was no abuse of discretion in informing the jury that the plaintiffs had settled claims against the regulator manufacturer and instructing them to disregard any further reference to the settlement. Although mention of the settlement was not barred by Rule 408, the Court upheld the instruction because many of the same concerns about prejudice and deterrence to settlements exist regardless of the purposes for which the evidence is offered, and further reference to the settlement would tend to confuse the jury.

[c] Relationship to Other Rules -- Rules 412-415

Jaros v. LodgeNet Entertainment Corp., 294 F.3d 960 (8th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed a judgment for a former employee who alleged that she was sexually harassed by a supervisor and constructively discharged. The defendant sought to introduce evidence that the plaintiff used swear words, wore suggestive clothing, and once said that she liked to pick up men in bars for sex. Upholding exclusion of the evidence, the Court noted that the plaintiff's language was not shown to be an inducement to harassment, the comment about meeting men in bars was not known to the supervisor, and the defendant never admonished the plaintiff about her dress. Moreover, evidence concerning the plaintiff's dress was inadmissible under Rule 412 and could also have been excluded under Rule 403. In United States v. One Feather, n147 the Court upheld a rape conviction, finding no error when the defendant was prohibited from asking the victim, who testified on direct examination that she was divorced and had an infant son, where her marriage and divorce took place. The defendant had been unable to find applicable records and believed that the witness had lied. Using Rule 412 as persuasive authority, the Court found that the Judge properly relied on Rule 403 to bar the questioning, since it would have prejudicially suggested that the victim had an illegitimate child.

[72] Religious Affiliations and Beliefs

United States v. Brandon, 17 F.3d 409 (1st Cir. 1994) : After a witness in a bank fraud prosecution mentioned that two of the defendants were Jewish, defense counsel moved to dismiss and for a mistrial on the grounds that the testimony invited an impermissible inference that members of the same religion would be more likely to join a conspiracy, and may have provoked anti-Semitic feelings. When the Trial Judge offered to try to ferret out any anti-Semitism on the jury, the counsel requested only dismissal, not further questioning of the jury, and expressed displeasure with the possibility of providing curative instructions that "would only magnify the problem." Affirming despite the possible inappropriateness of the testimony, the Court found that the level of prejudice, if any, was not sufficiently significant to overturn the decision to accept "the defendants' tactical choice to forgo more appropriate methods of addressing the potential prejudice in favor of the unrealistic and unnecessary solution of a dismissal or a new trial."

United States v. Rahman, 189 F.3d 88 (2d Cir. 1999) : The Court upheld convictions related to the 1993 World Trade Center bombing, finding no error in the exclusion of expert testimony offered to suggest that it would have been contrary to the teachings of Islam for the lead defendant, a cleric, to have conspired in acts of terrorism. Such testimony was of marginal relevance and was likely to confuse the jury. In United States v. Sun Myung Moon, n148 the Court affirmed convictions arising from the filing of false tax returns, as it found that evidence of certain religious practices of the Unification Church was properly admitted on the central issue of whether stock and bank accounts belonged to the Church or to its leader personally.

Munn v. Algee, 924 F.2d 568 (5th Cir. 1991) : An automobile accident victim, following the tenets of her Jehovah's Witnesses faith, refused blood transfusions and died of her injuries. In the trial of the ensuing wrongful death action, her husband was asked about the Jehovah's Witnesses' refusal to "do service to their country" and to salute the flag. One Judge concluded that admission of the evidence was an abuse of discretion under the Rule primarily because it was utterly irrelevant to how sincerely the victim and her husband adhered to the faith, but believed that the error did not affect the party's substantial rights. The concurring Judge disagreed that the evidence was irrelevant and said nothing about its prejudicial effect. The dissenting Judge considered that the calculated inflammatory effect of cross-examination regarding the views of other members of the faith had a prejudicial effect far beyond the probative value of the examination on the personal beliefs of the plaintiff-witness.

Silbergleit v. First Interstate Bank, 37 F.3d 394 (8th Cir. 1994) : The Court reversed a judgment against the plaintiff in an age discrimination suit because the defendant's counsel asked questions and made comments that improperly suggested to or informed the jury that the plaintiff was a millionaire, received unemployment benefits, and was Jewish.

United States v. Beasley, 72 F.3d 1518 (11th Cir. 1996) : Affirming RICO convictions arising from murders and other crimes committed by members of a religious cult, the Court found no error in admitting evidence about the practices and beliefs of the cult. The evidence was relevant "to show the background of the RICO enterprise, which the defendants used to carry out acts of murder and arson," and admission of the evidence did not result in putting the defendants' religion "on trial."

[73] Remoteness

Hurley v. Atlantic City Police Dep't, 174 F.3d 95 (3d Cir. 1999) : In a sexual discrimination case brought by a female police officer for harassment occurring from 1987 to 1992, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion, but harmless error, to admit evidence of alleged acts of discrimination in 1979-81, because they were too distant in time from the events at the center of the department's liability.

United States v. Chavez, 119 F.3d 342 (5th Cir. 1997) : Affirming convictions for a marijuana distribution conspiracy, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting a defendant's 15-year-old conviction for conspiring to distribute cocaine. In light of the similarity of the offenses and the paucity of other evidence of intent, the probative value of the conviction, though weakened by its age, was not substantially outweighed by any prejudicial effect. In Jackson v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., n149 an action by a former shipyard worker for injuries allegedly caused by the defendants' failures to warn of the hazards of exposure to asbestos products, the Court affirmed admission of 25-year-old letters that were among the papers of the chairman of the board of one of the defendants. The letters were not so remote in time or subject matter as to be devoid of probative value, they were not inflammatory, and the defendants had ample opportunity to make the jury aware of their remoteness.

Cooley v. Carmike Cinemas, Inc., 25 F.3d 1325 (6th Cir. 1994) : In an age discrimination case the Court held it was no abuse of discretion (or harmless error) to admit evidence that the plaintiff's supervisor had said two decades earlier, in his teen years, that he wanted to put older people in "a concentration camp," and some years later that he did not want to go to a Thanksgiving Day dinner where his grandmother would be because he "[did not] like to be around old people." The comments were probative of the supervisor's state of mind and reflected a deep-rooted ongoing pattern that was anything but isolated.

Walker v. Soo Line R.R., 208 F.3d 581 (7th Cir. 2000) : In a FELA action by an employee suing for injuries allegedly sustained when lightning struck a railroad tower, the defendant introduced records showing that the plaintiff was a patient at a state hospital in 1972, 1973, and 1978. Rejecting the plaintiff's argument that the records were too remote to be relevant, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the records, since the plaintiff's expert psychologist acknowledged at trial that he would have liked to have known about the hospital stays when preparing his report of the plaintiff's pre-incident abilities.

Fortune Funding, LLC v. Ceridian Corp., 368 F.3d 985 (8th Cir. 2004) : In a dispute arising out of a lease of a commercial building, including a claim of fraudulent representation as to the condition of the premises, the lessee claimed that the glass wall at the front of the building was defective. The lessee attempted to introduce evidence of the glass wall's condition in 1998 to prove that the condition also existed in 1985, at the time the building was leased. The Court found no error in excluding this evidence and affirmed a judgment for the lessor. The evidence of the wall's condition in 1998 was "obviously too remote" to be probative of its condition in 1985. In an aggravated sexual assault case, United States v. Eagle, 133 F.3d 608 (8th Cir. 1998) , the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence from a physician who examined the victim three months after the incident. The evidence was not so remote that it became irrelevant and the jury was made aware of the flaws in the physician's examination.

United States v. Austin, 933 F.2d 833 (10th Cir. 1991) : Reversing a conviction for resisting correctional officers, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion when the defense was mental illness to exclude records of prior hospitalizations on the ground solely of remoteness. The Court was unwilling to place a temporal limit on relevant proof of mental illness in view of its frequently long duration, its possible chronicity, and its recurrent manifestations.

Broaddus v. Florida Power Corp., 145 F.3d 1283 (11th Cir. 1998) : In an action by an employee who alleged that he had been illegally terminated as a result of age discrimination, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of a memorandum written by an executive of the defendant that mentioned that older workers are more expensive. The relevance of the memorandum was marginal because it was written four years before the plaintiff was terminated. Further, it did not suggest that older, more expensive workers be terminated, but only that new workers should be hired below the midpoint salary level in order to compete better with other firms that had eliminated "older and higher paid employees."

[74] Restricted Admission of Evidence

Clausen v. Sea-3, Inc., 21 F.3d 1181 (1st Cir. 1994) : In an employee's action for personal injuries caused by a fall on a ramp, the Court found no plain error in admission of evidence that a defendant had replaced the ramp with steps three years later. The evidence was probative on the issue of which defendant controlled the premises, and the cautionary instruction sufficiently informed the jury as to the limited purpose for which it was admitted.

United States v. Reyes, 18 F.3d 65 (2d Cir. 1994) : The Court reversed a conviction for conspiring to import narcotics, holding it was error to admit as nonhearsay a Customs agent's testimony regarding statements by two persons who implicated the defendant in the conspiracy, even though the declarants' exact words were not repeated. Although the jury was instructed that the statements were not admitted for their truth, the likelihood was sufficiently high that the jury would have treated the evidence for its truth anyway. The Court also rejected the argument that the evidence was properly admitted as "background" and observed that "contrary to the government's contention, the mere identification of a relevant non-hearsay use of such evidence is insufficient to justify its admission if the jury is likely to consider the statement for the truth of what was stated with significant resultant prejudice."

Morgan v. Woessner, 997 F.2d 1244 (9th Cir. 1993) : In a civil rights action for false arrest, evidence of the plaintiff's character and reputation was admitted to show his damages, with the jury instructed not to consider it in deciding what the plaintiff had done. The Court, believing the issue a close one, held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence; although the jury may have been more inclined to believe the plaintiff once they heard of his good reputation, there was plenty of evidence that the defendant was the aggressor and the cautionary instruction blunted any improper impact of the testimony.

[75] Self-serving Statements

United States v. Cianci, 378 F.3d 71 (1st Cir. 2004) : During an investigation of public corruption, an FBI agent who was posing as a businessperson taped a conversation in which one of the defendants (not prompted by any reference to corruption) referred the agent to another person with the recommendation that the other was "honest as the day is long" and an injunction that if the agent was asked for anything to call the defendant, who would have the man arrested. The defendant sought to introduce this tape as evidence of his state of mind, but the Court upheld its exclusion as self-serving. The statements were at best relevant of the declarant's state of mind at the time they were made, and even that was doubtful, given his statement toward the end of the recording that "He's [i.e., the agent] probably an FBI agent."

Healey v. Chelsea Resources Ltd., 947 F.2d 611 (2d Cir. 1991) : In a securities fraud action, the Court held that the plaintiff's testimony regarding his reliance should not have been curtailed on the ground it was self-serving, as that goes to weight rather than admissibility, but the error was harmless because the ruling may only have prevented a cumulative summary.

[76] Settlement Agreements

Wood v. Minnesota Mining & Mfg. Co., 112 F.3d 306 (8th Cir. 1997) : Following a collision between a truck driven by the plaintiff and the defendant's train, the plaintiff's employer paid the defendant for damages to the train. In the plaintiff's personal injury action, the Court held there was no error in excluding evidence of the employer's settlement. It was not relevant because it was not binding in any way on the plaintiff's legal action, and even if relevant, the risk that the jury would be unfairly swayed made its prejudicial effect substantially outweigh its probative value. Since the evidence was properly excluded, it was not necessary to decide whether the Trial Judge had properly excluded it under Rule 408 although no litigation was even threatened at the time. In Hose v. Chicago N.W. Transp. Co., 70 F.3d 968 (8th Cir. 1995) , the Court affirmed a judgment for an employee who brought a FELA action alleging that his employer was liable for his suffering from manganese encephalopathy, upholding the exclusion of the plaintiff's settlement with two other defendants who manufactured the employer's welding equipment. Although the employer contended that evidence of the fact that the plaintiff initially sued other defendants was evidence that they were responsible for the injuries, and that the ultimate amounts of the settlements were admissible to rebut the plaintiff's claim that certain treatment was not obtained because of its cost, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of the evidence as unduly prejudicial.

Breeden v. ABF Freight Sys., Inc., 115 F.3d 749 (10th Cir. 1997) : A jury found that the defendant's truck driver was 10 percent negligent in causing an accident while a third party was 90 percent negligent. The plaintiffs had settled with the third party before trial. The defendant argued that it was error to exclude evidence of the settlement after the plaintiffs testified that they did not seek additional medical treatment in part because of financial inability. Although the Court recognized that Rule 408 did not require exclusion of the settlement evidence, it mentioned that plaintiffs had settled for only $17,000 and found no error in the conclusion that the prejudicial effect of the evidence would far outweigh its probative value. In Orth v. Emerson Elec. Co., 980 F.2d 632 (10th Cir. 1992) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiffs in a product liability action arising out of a gas heater explosion, holding that there was no abuse of discretion in informing the jury that the plaintiffs had settled claims against the regulator manufacturer and instructing them to disregard any further reference to the settlement. Although mention of the settlement was not barred by Rule 408, the Court upheld the instruction because many of the same concerns about prejudice and deterrence to settlements exist regardless of the purposes for which the evidence is offered, and further reference to the settlement would tend to confuse the jury.

[77] Sexual Activities

[a] Civil Cases

Berry v. Deloney, 28 F.3d 604 (7th Cir. 1994) : A high school student brought a § 1983 action against a truant officer for nonconsensual sexual relations; the plaintiff's in limine motion to exclude evidence of her sexual activity with others was denied. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court held there was no error in admitting evidence of other sexual activity and prior and subsequent abortions with instructions that it be considered solely on the issues of the amount of damages and whether alleged damages were attributable to the defendant. In Campbell v. Ingersoll Milling Mach. Co., 893 F.2d 925 (7th Cir. 1990) , the Court affirmed a judgment n.o.v. for the defendant employer in a suit alleging race and sex discrimination in the plaintiff's termination, holding that evidence of an alleged sexual assault on the plaintiff by her supervisor was of little or no probative value on the motivation for her discharge or on her damages and was likely to lead the jury to a decision on an improper basis, such as sympathy.

Jaros v. LodgeNet Entertainment Corp., 294 F.3d 960 (8th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed a judgment for a former employee who alleged that she was sexually harassed by a supervisor and constructively discharged. The defendant sought to introduce evidence that the plaintiff used swear words, wore suggestive clothing, and once said that she liked to pick up men in bars for sex. Upholding exclusion of the evidence, the Court noted that the plaintiff's language was not shown to be an inducement to harassment, the comment about meeting men in bars was not known to the supervisor, and the defendant never admonished the plaintiff about her dress. Moreover, evidence concerning the plaintiff's dress was inadmissible under Rule 412 and could also have been excluded under Rule 403. In a prisoner's civil rights action for excessive force during a prison investigation, Cummings v. Malone, 995 F.2d 817 (8th Cir. 1993) , the Court upheld the exclusion, as irrelevant and highly prejudicial, of evidence that the investigation centered on an allegation that the plaintiff had attempted to rape a prison employee. The Court also held that the defendants were properly permitted to show the plaintiff's possible bias because they had testified against him on felony charges, but not that the charges were for attempted rape and assault arising out of the investigation incident.

Stahl v. Sun Microsys., Inc., 19 F.3d 533 (10th Cir. 1994) : In an action alleging sex discrimination in employment by means of a hostile work environment, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence of a sexual relationship between the supervisor whose conduct was at issue and another defense witness. The evidence was not relevant to the merits, as there was no quid pro quo harassment claim, and its probative value as to the two witness' credibility was slight while its potential for unfair prejudice was obvious.

Aetna Cas. & Sur. Co. v. Gosdin, 803 F.2d 1153 (11th Cir. 1986) : The Court reversed a judgment for the insurer in a dispute with its insured concerning the cause of a fire. Although it upheld the introduction of motive evidence that the insured had been charged with burglary and needed money to mount a defense, the Court held that evidence of pimping, pandering, and drug charges was unduly prejudicial.

[b] Sexual Activities -- Offered by Accused

United States v. Scotti, 47 F.3d 1237 (2d Cir. 1995) : The Court held in a loansharking prosecution that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence of the victim's HIV infection and the defendant's knowledge of it. Although the evidence might have been relevant to whether the defendant would punch the victim in the face, that argument was not made until the parties had rested. The only argument made when the government objected referred to the victim's drug habits and sexual proclivities, and since those were already in evidence, the proffered evidence was at best cumulative and at worst highly prejudicial, especially given the risk that a juror might discredit the victim's testimony solely because of his HIV status.

United States v. McMillon, 14 F.3d 948 (4th Cir. 1994) : The Court held that it was not an abuse of discretion to preclude a defendant in a drug case from cross-examining a cooperating coconspirator about the witness' use of drugs to force men to engage in sexual acts with him. Testimony regarding a witness' sexual life is not probative of his character for truthfulness; rather, it impairs the search for truth and harasses, annoys, or humiliates the witness in the process. In United States v. Saunders, n150 the Court affirmed a prisoner's assault conviction, but it rejected the government's argument that a prison evaluation report, which tended to prove the alleged victim's homosexual tendencies, should have been excluded under Rule 403. The report lent credence to the defendant's self-defense theory and bolstered his claim that the incident was sexually related.

In United States v. Davila, 704 F.2d 749 (5th Cir. 1983) : The Court upheld convictions for depriving illegal aliens of their liberty by coercing sexual favors from them and for sexually abusing illegal aliens. It found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence that the complaining witnesses had previously engaged in prostitution: "[W]hatever probative value lay in the evidence as to possible prostitution was minuscule and the potential for confusion was substantial."

United States v. Lucas, 357 F.3d 599 (6th Cir. 2004) : The defendant, who was stopped with a large quantity of cocaine in her car, sought to explain her nervousness (which the arresting officer testified to) by evidence that she had been repeatedly raped when she was previously imprisoned. The Judge ruled that the defendant could use the large settlement she received as a result of the rapes to explain the cash she had when arrested, but that she could not mention the rapes. The Court found there was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error), since the rape evidence was "technically relevant, as it suggests that her behavior, which might otherwise be taken as evidence of guilt and was argued as such by the prosecution, was potentially explainable for other reasons," and "the risk of undue sympathy could have been managed to some extent by a limiting instruction."

United States v. Ford, 17 F.3d 1100 (8th Cir. 1994) : The Court held it was not an abuse of discretion to preclude evidence that the felony conviction of the prosecution's primary witness had been for a sex offense against a minor. Introduction of the specific felony could easily have distracted the jury without adding any real probative information. In United States v. One Feather, n151 the Court upheld a rape conviction, finding no error when the defendant was prohibited from asking the victim, who testified on direct examination that she was divorced and had an infant son, where her marriage and divorce took place. The defendant had been unable to find applicable records and believed that the witness had lied. Using Rule 412 as persuasive authority, the Court found that the Judge properly relied on Rule 403 to bar the questioning, since it would have prejudicially suggested that the victim had an illegitimate child.

United States v. Bautista, 145 F.3d 1140 (10th Cir. 1998) : The Court affirmed a conviction for murder, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding defense evidence that the victim was homosexual. The victim's sexual orientation was irrelevant -- since a homosexual advance could not legally justify so great a rage as to support a heat-of-passion defense, and homosexuality by itself is not evidence that a person will make aggressive advances -- and the evidence was potentially highly prejudicial.

[c] Sexual Activities -- Offered by Prosecution

United States v. Pindell, 336 F.3d 1049 (D.C. Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed a police officer's conviction for civil rights violations and armed robbery of prostitutes and their customers, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by two of the prostitutes that the defendant had previously paid them to engage in sexual acts. The evidence showed the prostitutes' familiarity with the defendant, thus supporting their ability to identify him, and its probative value on the contested identity issue was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. In United States v. Long, 328 F.3d 655 (D.C. Cir. 2003) , the Court affirmed convictions for sexual offenses involving minors and possession of visual depictions of minors engaged in sexually explicit conduct. It upheld the admission of testimony by two witnesses that the defendant had engaged in similar patterns of conduct with them, which tended to rebut defense allegations that the six victims fabricated the story of sexual abuse. The Court also upheld the admission of 250 photos showing the minor victims and other young males in sexually explicit positions, noting that the Trial Judge had painstakingly reviewed the photos in camera and had carefully explained the reason for admitting each photo. The photos were relevant because Long denied possession of the photos alleged in two counts of the indictment, and his possession of other similar photos demonstrated intent to possess such photographs. The Judge had instructed the jury that it could not consider the photos as evidence of bad character. Finally, the Court upheld the admission of testimony by an FBI agent concerning "the typology, identification, characteristics and strategies of a sexual offender, particularly preferential sex offenders, and the characteristics and behavior of child victims of sexual abuse." The Court rejected the contention that the testimony was profile evidence that should have been excluded under Rule 403, finding that it shed light on a critical issue.

United States v. Adams, 375 F.3d 108 (1st Cir. 2004) : Affirming convictions for firearms offenses, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the 33-year-old African-American defendant had engaged in an interracial sexual relationship with a 15-year-old girl while staying with an acquaintance during the time of the charged offenses. Although there was some potential for prejudice associated with the evidence, the jury already knew that the defendant slept in the same bed with the girl and that a lockbox with a firearm and ammunition was under the bed. The Court was not persuaded either that the evidence of sexual relations added much to the evidence of where the defendant slept or that the probability of unfair prejudice was high given the evidence that the defendant and the girl slept in the same bed. Ultimately, the Court said that "[v]iewed in the cold light of post-trial reflection, the judges on this panel might well have excluded the sexual relationship evidence," but "[i]n this case, the trial judge's call, although debatable, was not an egregious error."

United States v. McDermott, 245 F.3d 133 (2d Cir. 2001) : The defendant, charged with insider trading offenses, allegedly gave insider information to a woman (Gannon) with whom he was having an extramarital affair. The Court found no abuse of discretion when the government was permitted to show that Gannon was a dancer, model, and actress who used a stage name, since the stage name "Marilyn Star" did not necessarily imply that Gannon was an adult-film actress. The Court held, however, that it was error to admit evidence that Gannon "knew a clientele of lawyers, stockbrokers, and such, high level people" and that she had obtained stock trading tips from a "client" or "boyfriend client," since "references to Gannon's 'clientele' unfairly prejudiced McDermott by casting an illicit light on his relationship with her by suggesting that her occupation was of a 'sleazy' nature." In United States v. Harvey, 991 F.2d 981 (2d Cir. 1993) , the Court reversed a conviction for knowingly receiving child pornography, holding that testimony concerning other pornography seized from the defendant's residence was irrelevant and so overwhelmingly prejudicial as to deny him a fair trial.

United States v. Savage, 390 F.3d 823 (4th Cir. 2004), vacated on other grounds, 545 U.S. 1102 (2005) : The Court affirmed convictions arising out of a scheme to defraud several investors, especially single, older women, by inducing them to invest in phony business ventures. It found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by the defendant's ex-wife that he had dressed up as one of the women victims. The Court reasoned that, while the incident might have been distasteful to some jurors, it was probative of the defendant's fraudulent activities as to this victim. In United States v. Aramony, 88 F.3d 1369 (4th Cir. 1996) , the Court affirmed in part the fraud conviction of the former CEO of United Way of America, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the defendant's sexual advances toward female employees. The evidence was relevant to motive, as it tended to prove that he defrauded UWA in order to seek sexual pleasure at no financial cost to himself, and it presented no risk of unfair prejudice, particularly since the Trial Judge excluded the "gory details" and gave a cautionary instruction. In United States v. Ham, n152 the Court reversed convictions for racketeering and mail fraud, holding that implications of child molestation, homosexuality, and abuse of women were unfairly prejudicial when they were not directly implicated in the crimes charged. In United States v. Kilbourne, n153 the Court affirmed a murder conviction, holding that evidence of the defendant's sexual relations with the victim was relevant to show motive and that the probative value was not substantially outweighed by the danger of prejudice.

United States v. Grimes, 244 F.3d 375 (5th Cir. 2001) : The defendant was charged with possession of child pornography after pictures of nude children were found on his computer. The Court vacated his conviction because two sexually-explicit narratives, also found on the computer, were introduced as evidence of his intent and state of mind. The narratives were relevant to help show that the possession of the photographs was unlikely an accident when a person was also downloading narratives that involved sexual contact between adults and minors. However, their probative value was substantially outweighed by their prejudicial effect; they were "vile in their graphic and violent nature," depicting violent rapes and moderate torture, while the photographs depicted no violence. In United States v. Frick, n154 the Court reversed conspiracy and fraud convictions on the ground that testimony concerning the defendant's sexual relations with a codefendant's secretary was highly prejudicial to him. The government's contention that the evidence was properly admitted to show motive failed because there was no evidence that the defendant knew that the secretary had been instructed to make herself available to him. In United States v. Grassi, n155 a prosecution for interstate transportation of obscene material, defense counsel offered to stipulate that the films were obscene. The prosecutor objected, and the jury was shown three films that portrayed "homosexual acts of the most bizarre and repulsive nature." The Court said that a Rule 403 balancing analysis must be used and sustained the Trial Judge, finding that the films had probative value above and beyond the stipulation.

United States v. Bonty, 383 F.3d 575 (7th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed convictions of two men for interstate transportation of minors with intent to commit aggravated sexual abuse, after one of them raped one of a pair of girls they had enticed to go with them. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the rapist's accomplice had made sexual advances toward the other girl. Although the accomplice argued that evidence a 31-year-old black man propositioned a 15-year-old white girl inflamed the jury, the Court found that the evidence was relevant to whether the accomplice knew the purpose of picking the girls up at a mall was to later engage in a sexual encounter, and that any prejudicial effect was lessened because the testimony was not repeated and the jury was instructed not to be "influenced by any person's race, color, religion, national ancestry, or sex."

United States v. Carter, 410 F.3d 1017 (8th Cir. 2005) : Affirming convictions for child sexual abuse, the Court found no error in the admission of pornography found in the defendant's home. The evidence of pornography was probative because the defendant's modus operandi was to have young girls watch pornographic movies featuring young adult women. The Court noted that the prejudice of this evidence diminished because the testimony was limited to the movie titles and a description of the movies' general theme of depicting young women. In United States v. Chipps, 410 F.3d 438 (8th Cir. 2005) , the Court affirmed a conviction for assault, finding no abuse of discretion when the defendant was cross-examined about an affair he had had with a woman who was having a relationship with the victim at the time of the assault. The defendant had denied on direct that he had any motive to assault the victim, so the evidence was relevant, and its probative value was not outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. In United States v. Blue Bird, 372 F.3d 989 (8th Cir. 2004) , the Court reversed a conviction for sexual abuse of a minor, holding that the victim's testimony that she was a virgin when she had sexual intercourse with the defendant was irrelevant to the case and unduly prejudicial given its lack of probative value on any relevant issue. The Court ruled, however, that there was no error in the admission of the minor's panties, which were covered with menstrual blood and had dried semen on them. Because the panties had pictures of Winnie-the-Pooh on them and the minor testified that the defendant had removed them, they could have been highly probative on the hotly contested issue of the defendant's belief about the victim's age. Any prejudicial effect of the blood was mitigated by informing the jury that it was menstrual and by the absence of any testimony that the encounter had been any way violent. In United States v. LaChapelle, n156 the defendant, charged with receiving child pornography through the mail, asserted an entrapment defense and the government introduced a pornographic videotape seized from the defendant's home to show his knowledge of and intent to order child pornography. The Court held admission of the evidence was error (but harmless) because the possession was legal when the defendant first possessed the videotape. Evidence of predisposition to do what was once lawful is not by itself sufficient to show predisposition to do what is now illegal, so the slight probative value of the evidence was substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect. In United States v. Fawbush, n157 a conviction for aggravated sexual abuse of children was reversed, the Court holding that evidence the defendant sexually abused his daughters when they were children, even if relevant, was so inflammatory on its face as to divert the jury's attention from the material issues in the trial. See also United States v. Abodeely n158(probative value of evidence of the defendant's receipt of income from prostitution and of gambling activities outweighed any prejudicial effects in income tax evasion prosecution).

People of Terr. of Guam v. Shymanovitz, 157 F.3d 1154 (9th Cir. 1998) : The Court reversed a conviction for unlawful sexual activity with minors, because of the improper admission of testimony regarding the contents of sexually explicit gay adult magazines found in the defendant's house. While the magazines could possibly have been relevant to whether the defendant had the purpose of being sexually aroused, or was actually sexually aroused, by the charged improper touching of underage boys, the statute under which he was prosecuted applied only an objective test, which made the character of the touching, not the purpose of the toucher, at issue. Furthermore, possession of the magazines was not probative of whether the conduct with which the defendant was charged was intentional. Even if the evidence were somehow relevant, its suggestion of the defendant's sexual orientation, and implication of sexual deviancy, was highly prejudicial and substantially outweighed any probative value. In United States v. Bland, n159 the defendant, charged with felon firearm possession, gave notice that his theory at trial would be that an officer planted the gun in order to justify shooting him in making an arrest. At the voir dire, the Trial Judge told the jury not only that it was anticipated that the officer would testify he shot the defendant to prevent his escape and that he was aware of an outstanding warrant for the defendant, but also that the warrant was for the molestation, torture, and murder of a seven-year-old girl. The Court reversed the conviction because, although the existence of the warrant was relevant to show the officer did not have a motive to plant the gun, the members of the jury panel were not likely to forget details leading them to believe that acquitting the defendant might mean releasing an extremely dangerous child molester and killer into the community. In United States v. Gillespie, n160 the Court reversed a conviction for importing an alien for immoral purposes, holding it was error to admit evidence that the defendant had a homosexual relationship with the father who adopted him. This evidence was not relevant to any claim made by the defendant and was extremely prejudicial.

United States v. Garot, 801 F.2d 1241 (10th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed convictions for mailing obscene matter and dealing in material exploiting minors, holding there was no error in admitting evidence of an envelope postmarked in Sweden that contained a brochure showing a color slide of explicit child pornography and a box containing hard-core films of child pornography. The evidence was relevant to prove scienter.

United States v. Lehder-Rivas, 955 F.2d 1510 (11th Cir. 1992) : The Court held that it was harmless error when the government suggested that the defendant in a cocaine importation conspiracy engaged in frequent "partying" and fathered an illegitimate child.

[78] Similar Circumstances

[a] Absence of Accidents or Complaints

Espeaignnette v. Gene Tierney Co., 43 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1994) : The Court reversed a judgment for the defendant manufacturer on other grounds in a product liability action brought after the plaintiff's arm was severed in a lumber company's saw, but held there was no error in admitting evidence concerning lack of similar accidents involving saws designed by the defendant. The evidence tended to disprove causation by making less likely the plaintiff's account of how the accident happened; it was also probative on whether the saw as designed was unreasonably dangerous. In Harrison v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 981 F.2d 25 (1st Cir. 1992) , a product liability suit involving a carpentry tool, the defendant's expert testified that the accident described by the plaintiff could not have occurred as alleged and that there had never been a similar complaint made to the manufacturer. The Court rejected an argument that the negative evidence was irrelevant on the issue of causation.

Klonowski v. International Armament Corp., 17 F.3d 992 (7th Cir. 1994) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff in a product liability action for injuries when a shotgun misfired, finding no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that the defendant had imported 50,000 shotguns of the type involved in the accident without receiving any report of an accident, as there was no showing that all the guns imported had substantially identical trigger mechanisms. The Court also noted that negative evidence "is generally held inadmissible because of its insignificant probative qualities and its tendency to introduce a multitude of collateral inquiries." In Bilski v. Scientific Atlanta, 964 F.2d 697 (7th Cir. 1992) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in a product liability action for injuries suffered when the plaintiff slipped while cleaning snow and ice off a satellite dish, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the defendant's records of injuries involving its products, which showed no prior accidents of this sort.

[b] Similar Circumstances -- Civil Rights Cases

Foley v. City of Lowell, Mass., 948 F.2d 10 (1st Cir. 1991) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting in an arrestee's civil rights case evidence of a particularly vile incident of police brutality six months after the plaintiff's arrest. Evidence of subsequent incidents can provide reliable insight into the policy in force at a previous time; the fact the later conduct was egregious is a hallmark of its probative value not its prejudicial effect, as the more outrageous the occurrences, the more probable that a policy of tolerance of brutality was in place.

Morgan v. City of Marmaduke, Ark., 958 F.2d 207 (8th Cir. 1992) : In a civil rights suit alleging a police officer had used excessive force when making an arrest by intentionally colliding his patrol car with the plaintiff's motorcycle, the Court held it was error to admit evidence that the officer had three years earlier accidentally collided with a motorcycle whose driver he was attempting to arrest. Admitting evidence of the remote and dissimilar situation had a prejudicial effect against the officer. The Trial Judge also had excluded evidence of another situation involving the officer's using his patrol car as a roadblock to stop a motorcyclist. The Court held that although the circumstances were not entirely dissimilar from the plaintiff's case, exclusion was not an abuse of discretion.

Cook ex rel. Tessier v. Sheriff of Monroe County, Fla., 402 F.3d 1092 (11th Cir. 2005) : In an action brought after an inmate hanged himself, the plaintiff offered evidence that five other inmates had hanged themselves in a 23-month period. The Court found no error in the exclusion of all five suicides. Two of the suicides occurred after the decedent's and so could not have put the defendant on notice that jail procedures were faulty. The facts and circumstances of the other three suicides "differed materially" from those surrounding the decedent's, most importantly because those three inmates were incarcerated for a far shorter period than was the decedent.

United States v. Perez, 325 F.3d 115 (2d Cir. 2003) : The defendant was convicted for violating currency reporting requirements after money was found secreted in aerosol cans in his luggage as he began a flight to the Dominican Republic. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that another man had engaged in a virtually identical scheme, since the other man was a client of the lawyer for whom the defendant was working as a paralegal. Moreover, the defendant had some role in assisting the lawyer on the other man's case, so the evidence was relevant to the defendant's knowledge of a means to smuggle currency and of the probability that the five aerosol cans in his luggage contained reportable currency.

[d] Similar Circumstances -- Employment Discrimination Cases

Morris v. Washington Metro. Area Transit Auth., 702 F.2d 1037 (D.C. Cir. 1983) : The plaintiff claimed that he was discharged as a transit police officer because of his criticism of racial discrimination by the Authority. Reversing a judgment for the defendant, the Court held that testimony by other employees offered to prove a custom or policy of retaliation by the Authority against employees who complained about the Authority's employment practices was improperly excluded. Likewise, it was error to exclude the plaintiff's testimony concerning disciplinary action against him following each of his complaints to the Authority. He should have been permitted "to testify to the discipline in a way that made evident the retaliatory motivation for the discipline."

Brown v. Trustees of Boston Univ., 891 F.2d 337 (1st Cir. 1989) : The plaintiff, suing for breach of contract and sexual discrimination after she was denied tenure, offered testimony of several professors comparing her qualifications with those of other faculty considered for tenure at the defendant University. The Court held that, even though the professors' testimony was not in the file and thus was not available to the University when it decided her case, it was relevant proof of pretext because it showed that the qualifications of others granted tenure were below the plaintiff's known qualifications. Because admitting such comparative evidence presents the risk of improperly substituting a judicial determination for a tenure decision, the evidence must be so compelling as to permit a reasonable finding of one-sidedness going beyond a mere difference in judgment, as in this case.

Perry v. Ethan Allen, Inc., 115 F.3d 143 (2d Cir. 1997) : Although the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in a sexual harassment case, it held that the Trial Judge excluded relevant evidence in ruling that sexual harassment of other women employees of the defendant would be excluded unless the plaintiff had personal knowledge of the harassment. The Court reasoned that the issue of a hostile workplace involves the totality of the circumstances, including evidence of harassment directed at employees other than the plaintiff. The Court criticized the Trial Judge's use of Rule 403 and stated that it is not unfairly prejudicial that evidence establishes liability on the part of a defendant, and that unfairness indicates an undue tendency to decide a case on an improper basis.

Anderson v. WBMG-42, 253 F.3d 561 (11th Cir. 2001) : In support of her race discrimination claim, an African-American employee discharged for "unprofessional behavior" proffered evidence that two similarly situated white employees, likewise guilty of "unprofessional behavior," had not been terminated. The Court rejected the defendant's argument that the other employees must have been involved in or accused of the same or nearly identical conduct in order for the evidence to be relevant, since dissimilar treatment of "similar" conduct is an important indicator of discrimination when the employer's decisionmaking process depends on the application of subjective criteria. However, even if the other situations were comparable, the Court found no abuse of discretion in exclusion of the evidence, since presentation would have required a lengthy examination of matters that had not been developed during discovery.

[e] Similar Circumstances -- Miscellaneous Cases

CPC Int'l v. Northbrook Excess & Surplus Ins. Co., 144 F.3d 35 (1st Cir. 1998) : An excess insurer appealed from a verdict holding it liable for environmental response costs incurred by the insured. The insurer's defense was that the insured should have known about the property damage resulting from a toxic spill far earlier than it did. To prove notice, the insurer proffered judicial decisions in two previous coverage suits involving contamination from toxic spills at two of the insured's facilities, but the Trial Judge excluded this evidence under Rule 403. The Court found no error, because the other judicial proceedings involved different facilities and different toxins; the inquiry into the other proceedings would have resulted in "a replay of the litigation of those other two cases"; and the evidence was prejudicial because "[c]itizens do not look fondly on industrial polluters, particularly where the industries have been found to be such by a Court."

Gerber v. Computer Assocs. Int'l, Inc., 303 F.3d 126 (2d Cir. 2002) : Shareholders of an acquired corporation brought a class action alleging that the CEO was paid more for his shares than they were in a tender offer. To prove that an additional payment to the CEO was legitimate consideration for a non-compete agreement, the defendants offered evidence of other transactions in which they had made substantial payments to individuals in exchange for non-compete agreements. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of most of this evidence, since it would have had minimal probative value because "every deal is a different deal," and going into the details would lead to a waste of time.

Davidson Oil Country Supply Co. v. Klockner, Inc., 908 F.2d 1238 (5th Cir. 1990) , amended, 917 F.2d 185 (5th Cir. 1990) : In an action for breach of warranty against the distributor of well tubing, the Trial Judge granted the defendant's motion in limine excluding evidence that other substantially similar tubing made by the same manufacturer, but sold by other distributors, had failed in a similar manner. The Court reversed a judgment for the defendant, holding that the plaintiff should have been permitted to use the excluded evidence to show that the tubing had a latent manufacturing defect making it unmerchantable, that the defendant had knowledge of the defect, and that it had dealt with the plaintiff's claims in bad faith.

McCarty v. Pheasant Run, Inc., 826 F.2d 1554 (7th Cir. 1987) : Affirming a judgment for a hotel owner sued by a guest who was assaulted in her room, the Court found no error in excluding evidence of criminal activity at the hotel that did not involve an entry like the one alleged in the instant case, while admitting evidence of prior similar entries. In Will v. Comprehensive Accounting Corp., n161 the Court found no error in an antitrust-contracts case in the exclusion of evidence of how a franchiser acted with respect to 22 franchisees besides the plaintiff.

Edwards v. Consolidated Rail Corp., 567 F. Supp. 1087 (D.D.C. 1983) , aff'd, 733 F.2d 966 (D.C. Cir. 1984) : Summary judgment was granted for the railroad in a suit brought by a child trespasser injured when he was exposed to high voltage lines. The Court found that evidence of other accidents, offered to show that the defendant should have known of the danger on its tracks, would be excluded as dissimilar and insufficiently probative to justify admission in light of its prejudicial aspects.

Amatucci v. Delaware & H. Ry., 745 F.2d 180 (2d Cir. 1984) : The Court reversed a FELA judgment for an engineer who claimed that work conditions caused him to sustain a heart condition that rendered him unable to continue work. It found error in the admission of testimony that seven or eight other engineers had suffered heart attacks, since the circumstances and family histories concerning the other engineers was unknown.

Mihailovich v. Laatsch, 359 F.3d 892 (7th Cir. 2004) : The Court vacated a judgment for an attorney in a legal malpractice case in which the former client claimed that, but for the attorney's failure to adequately investigate a negligence case, he would have prevailed. This required a showing by the plaintiff that his underlying action had merit. The Court held it was an abuse of discretion to exclude all evidence of other accidents that occurred on the curve where the plaintiff was injured, since the other accidents were substantially similar to the plaintiff's and thus relevant to show the roadway was hazardous. In the Court's view, concerns about collateral issues did not require excluding all evidence of the other accidents. In an action arising out of a truck-train collision, Gardner v. Southern Ry., 675 F.2d 949 (7th Cir. 1982) , the Court found there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence of a prior collision between a train and truck since the prior accident was not similar enough to be of much probative value on the question whether the railroad was on notice of a dangerous condition. The Court noted that the Trial Judge admitted other, less prejudicial evidence that certain dangerous conditions had been evident for some time. See also Kelsay v. Consolidated Rail Corp., 749 F.2d 437 (7th Cir. 1984) (judgment for railroad in train-car crash was sustained, as Court held that there was no error in the exclusion of two accidents, 12 and 30 years earlier, at the same crossing).

First Sec. Bank v. Union Pac. R.R., 152 F.3d 877 (8th Cir. 1998) : Affirming a judgment for the defendant in a wrongful death action arising from a fatal accident at a train crossing, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence of three other accidents that occurred at the crossing. Even if offered as in this case to prove notice rather than causation, evidence of other accidents must be substantially similar to the facts of the case at bar. In one of the accidents, the warning lights at the crossing malfunctioned; there was no such claim in the instant case. In the other two accidents, the drivers approached the crossing from a different direction than the decedent, "giving the drivers an entirely different perspective of the crossing." In Hicks v. Six Flags Over Mid-America, n162 the Court held that evidence of an accident six years before the plaintiff's was properly excluded.

[i] Automobiles, Aircraft, etc.

Brooks v. Chrysler Corp., 786 F.2d 1191 (D.C. Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed a judgment for an auto manufacturer in an action claiming that an auto crashed into a telephone pole as a result of brake-piston seizure. Ruling in limine, the Trial Judge excluded five exhibits relating to a National Highway Safety Administration investigation into brake-piston seizures and barred the plaintiffs' expert from relying on the exhibits. The exhibits were drawn from complaints by Chrysler's customers, correspondence between the government agency and Chrysler, internal Chrysler memoranda, and Chrysler correspondence with the Canadian government. The Court agreed that the exhibits were minimally probative and potentially prejudicial.

Freund v. Fleetwood Enters., 956 F.2d 354 (1st Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in an action arising out of a fire in a recreational vehicle, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding recall documents tending to show that propane gas could leak from the vehicle's refrigerator. The probative value of the offered documents was undermined because the accidents they reported involved different brands of refrigerator, trailers rather than RVs, and different years and places of manufacture.

Gumbs v. International Harvester, Inc., 718 F.2d 88 (3d Cir. 1983) : The Court held that the plaintiff's evidence of other accidents involving similar bolts on trucks manufactured by the defendant was inadmissible, since there was no showing that the accidents took place under similar circumstances and some of the evidence involved vehicles with different parts.

Ridge v. Cessna Aircraft Co., 117 F.3d 126 (4th Cir. 1997) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the widow of an airplane pilot killed in a crash against the manufacturer of the plane. It held that evidence of other accidents involving the same model of plane was properly admitted where the Trial Judge held a pretrial evidentiary hearing and ruled that the other accidents were substantially similar to the accident that gave rise to the suit. "Any dissimilarities do not go to the question of admissibility but rather to its weight."

Guy v. Crown Equip. Corp., 394 F.3d 320 (5th Cir. 2004) : In a product liability action by a forklift operator injured when she lost her balance and her left leg came out through the operator-compartment opening and was crushed against a railing, the Court affirmed a judgment for the manufacturer. During adverse witness testimony by the defendant's expert, the plaintiff offered 2400 reports produced by the defendant concerning accidents involving its forklifts, but only 360 were admitted. The Court found no abuse of discretion, since only the admitted reports involved left-leg injuries like the plaintiff's, and the plaintiff's "theatrics" in offering boxes of accident reports, some of which did not even concern injuries while operating a forklift, would be prejudicial and likely to lead to confusing and misleading the jury. In Johnson v. Ford Motor Co., 988 F.2d 573 (5th Cir. 1993) , the Court affirmed a judgment for a manufacturer, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence of other accidents that did not involve the alleged mechanical defect relied upon by the plaintiff. See also Mills v. Beech Aircraft Corp. n163(letter from the French aviation authorities to the defendant manufacturer warning of certain defects, offered to show the defendant's knowledge, properly excluded in absence of showing that letter applied to the type of airplane in issue and that the defect had manifested itself in circumstances substantially similar to case at bar); Soden v. Freightliner Corp. n164(upholding admission of evidence concerning other lawsuits brought against the manufacturer to show notice of a possible defect in the fuel tank of the truck).

Morales v. American Honda Motor Co., 151 F.3d 500 (6th Cir. 1998) : In a product liability action for injuries to a nine-year-old riding a small motorbike, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting motorcycle-related accident statistics from the Consumer Product Safety Commission. The statistics were relevant to opinions by the plaintiffs' experts regarding the age appropriateness of motorbike operation, and any prejudicial effect was limited by excluding accident data related to all-terrain vehicles and permitting only data pertaining to the small, two-wheeled class of minibikes similar to that involved in this case. One Judge dissented, arguing that the facts underlying the accident statistics were not substantially similar to this case. In Brock v. Caterpillar, Inc., 94 F.3d 220 (6th Cir. 1996) , the Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff in a personal injury action arising out of an accident in which a bulldozer's brakes failed, holding it was error to admit as evidence of a feasible, available design that the defendant used a different braking system on later, heavier bulldozers. Although this "comparison" evidence might have been tenuously relevant, the dissimilarities in the models meant that its relevance was substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect.

Lovett v. Union Pac. R.R., 201 F.3d 1074 (8th Cir. 2000) : In an action for personal injuries sustained in a collision between a Jeep Cherokee and a locomotive, the Court found there was no error in excluding the plaintiff's offered evidence of four other incidents involving Jeep Cherokees. None of the incidents involved the same year model, none involved a collision with a locomotive, none occurred at a railroad crossing, none resulted in a rollover, and none involved similar speeds. In a suit involving the explosion of a wheel rim, Hale v. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., n165 the Trial Judge admitted evidence of 13 prior claims to prove notice of a defect, but excluded the defendant's evidence concerning the disposition of the claims, which was offered to demonstrate that the extent of the notice was exaggerated. Although the Court did not deem the limitation on the defendant's proof an abuse of discretion, it declared that "if this case is retried, the evidence should be admitted."

Cooper v. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., 945 F.2d 1103 (9th Cir. 1991) : In an action arising out of the explosion of a multipiece truck tire rim, the Court held there was no error in admitting evidence of dissimilar accidents involving the same type of rim. When an expert testifies that a product is generally safe, as the defendant's experts did, the witness' credibility can be undermined by showing that the witness had knowledge of prior accidents caused by the product, since evidence of other accidents, whether similar or not, tends to show the witness' claims of product safety are overstated and the witness therefore may not be reliable.

Montag v. Honda Motor Co., 75 F.3d 1414 (10th Cir. 1996) : Plaintiffs in a wrongful death action alleged that the driver's injuries were caused when a seat belt proved defective in an automobile-train collision. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting a videotape prepared by the defendant that depicted a collision between a train and an automobile, even though it was substantially dissimilar from the accident. The videotape was introduced for the limited purpose of portraying the forces at work in such a collision, and the jury was specifically instructed not to consider it as a recreation of the accident. Furthermore, the videotape was not inflammatory or misleading when considered with the limiting instructions that were given. In an action for injuries allegedly caused by a child restraint, Gilbert v. Cosco Inc., 989 F.2d 399 (10th Cir. 1993) , the Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding memoranda of the defendant pertaining to child restraint models that were not the subject of the suit, where the memoranda were mainly probative of "corporate mentality," which would be relevant only to punitive damages if liability were established. In Four Corners Helicopters, Inc. v. Turbomeca, S.A., n166 a wrongful death action arising out of a helicopter crash, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of other incidents involving defects in the manufacturer's helicopter engines, as there was sufficient similarity in the circumstances to be probative of defect, notice, and causation in this case.

Tran v. Toyota Motor Corp., 420 F.3d 1310 (11th Cir. 2005) : In a product liability action arising from injuries allegedly caused by an automobile seatbelt, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the defendant was permitted to introduce results of a study regarding accidents involving that car model. Although the accidents were not necessarily substantially similar to the plaintiff's, the evidence was offered on the general point that the restraint system was not defectively designed, and its probative value on that point was not outweighed by any possible prejudicial effect. In Heath v. Suzuki Motor Corp., 126 F.3d 1391 (11th Cir. 1997) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in an action arising from a rollover accident, finding no error in the admission of defense evidence of other rollover incidents involving dissimilar vehicles. The "substantial similarity" rule was not applicable, because the other incidents were offered only to explain how rollovers occur, not to reenact the incident in dispute. In fact, the defendant pointedly chose dissimilar vehicles for its illustration, so as not to confuse the jury.
