Cameron v. Otto Bock Orthopedic Indus., Inc., 43 F.3d 14 (1st Cir. 1994) : The Court held that reports of prosthesis failures received by the defendant manufacturer of prostheses were properly excluded. They were irrelevant to notice, being received after the alleged failure of the plaintiff's prosthesis, and they were also irrelevant to the existence of a design defect, since there was no indication whether the reports involved substantially similar circumstances.

Wolf v. Procter & Gamble Co., 555 F. Supp. 613 (D.N.J. 1982) : The Court ruled in limine in an action against the manufacturer and distributor of a tampon to recover for toxic shock syndrome that evidence of other injuries associated with the use of the tampon would be excluded. The other injuries were not similar enough to be helpful.

Benedi v. McNeil-P.P.C., Inc., 66 F.3d 1378 (4th Cir. 1995) : In a consumer's action for severe liver damage caused by the combination of alcohol and acetaminophen, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion when the Trial Judge admitted Drug Experience Reports. The reports were highly probative on the contested issue of whether the defendant had notice of dangers associated with therapeutic doses of its product, and dissimilarities (e.g., whether doses were therapeutic or overdoses and whether the person taking the drug was a chronic alcoholic or not) went to the weight rather than the admissibility of the evidence.

Worsham v. A.H. Robins Co., 734 F.2d 676 (11th Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff in a suit against the manufacturer of the Dalkon Shield IUD, finding no error in rulings admitting documents and permitting cross-examination that mentioned other litigation involving the Shield. The documents and cross-examination tended to show the kind of notice that the company had about problems caused by the Shield and the mention of the other litigation was not unduly prejudicial.

[iii] Similar Circumstances -- Product Liability Cases -- Miscellaneous Products

Exum v. General Elec. Co., 819 F.2d 1158 (D.C. Cir. 1987) : In a suit by an employee injured while using a french fryer, the Court held that it was error to exclude evidence concerning 15 similar incidents. All but one occurred before the plaintiff was injured, and the Court reasoned that to prove notice, prior acts need not be as similar as they would have to be to prove the dangerousness of a product. Although the Court recognized that the incident arising after the plaintiff was injured could not prove notice, it concluded that it was so similar to the plaintiff's accident that it was probative of dangerousness.

Moulton v. Rival Co., 116 F.3d 22 (1st Cir. 1997) : Affirming a judgment for an infant who was severely burned when liquid spilled from an electric "potpourri pot," the Court held that other accidents involving infants and the same or similar model of potpourri pot were properly admitted. Although the circumstances surrounding the other accidents were different from the instant case, the evidence satisfied the admissibility test of "substantial similarity," which is "a function of the theory of the case." Here, the plaintiff offered the other accidents to show that the product as designed allowed the rapid escape of a significant amount of extremely hot liquid and so was defective. For this purpose, the dissimilarities in how the potpourri pots tipped over were of no moment.

Crump v. Versa Prods., Inc., 400 F.3d 1104 (8th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in an action brought after one of the plaintiffs died in a fall from a ladder, which was allegedly caused by the failure of a hinge on the ladder while the ladder was in a straight position. The Court found no abuse of discretion when evidence of 44 other incidents involving alleged hinge failure of the same model ladder was excluded, since the incidents excluded had occurred after the date of the accident or resulted when the ladder was not in a straight position and the plaintiffs had been allowed to present evidence of accidents involving the ladder in a straight position that occurred before the date of the plaintiff's accident. In Mattis v. Carlon Elec. Prods., 295 F.3d 856 (8th Cir. 2002) , the Court affirmed a judgment for an electrician who claimed that vapors from polyvinyl chloride cement at a construction site caused his reactive airways dysfunction syndrome, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding field monitoring studies performed by the defendant to measure air quality at another site. The studies were done under significantly different working conditions and using different product types, and the exposures were not substantially similar but "confusingly similar."

Glover v. BIC Corp., 6 F.3d 1318 (9th Cir. 1993) : In a product liability wrongful death action in which the defendant manufacturer of a cigarette lighter attempted to show that the decedent was the victim of a cooking accident, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to exclude evidence of past fires in the victim's home related to the victim's intoxication.

Bitler v. A.O. Smith Corp., 391 F.3d 1114 (10th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiffs in an action arising from a propane explosion, allegedly caused by copper sulfide contamination from the gas pipe that kept a valve from seating. Although the valve at issue had a screen intended to protect against such contamination, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of accidents involving unscreened valves. The evidence was relevant to the possibility that contamination from the gas pipe could impede a valve and to the issue of the defendant's notice of the risk. In a product liability action against the manufacturer of a machine for removing road pavement, Smith v. Ingersoll-Rand Co., 214 F.3d 1235 (10th Cir. 2000) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of six other accidents involving similar machines produced by the same manufacturer. Four of the incidents were incorrectly admitted on the issue of notice because they occurred subsequent to the accident at issue. However, all were relevant to the issue of defect; although some involved different models, all were sufficiently similar with respect to the claimed defect of lack of visibility. Furthermore, all were relevant to the issue of punitive damages, since they indicated the defendant had "rushed" to enter the market, without sufficiently conducting a "human factors" analysis. In an action concerning an allegedly defective masonry mortar additive used on the plaintiff's building, C.A. Assoc. v. Dow Chem. Co., n167 the Trial Judge limited the plaintiff's proof regarding other buildings at which the mortar was used. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion, as the ruling was appropriate to avoid significant delay, confusion, and prejudice attendant on proof regarding numerous other buildings. In Marsee v. United States Tobacco Co., n168 a suit by a plaintiff who claimed that her son developed oral cancer from using snuff, the Court held that testimony of another cancer victim who used snuff products would be excluded, given its weak probative value on the question of causation and the great possibility of prejudice.

[iv] Similar Circumstances -- Product Liability Cases -- Tools

Ross v. Black & Decker, Inc., 977 F.2d 1178 (7th Cir. 1992) : In an action arising out of injuries caused by a circular saw, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of two other accidents involving the defendant's saw that occurred after the plaintiff's accident, as the circumstances were substantially similar and the fact the accidents occurred subsequently does not make them any less probative of the saw's unreasonably dangerous design or of the cause of the accident.

Drabik v. Stanley-Bostitch, Inc., 997 F.2d 496 (8th Cir. 1993) : In an action involving a pneumatic nailer, the Court held there was an abuse of discretion in admitting extensive evidence of dissimilar nailer accidents to impeach the defendant's expert. To hold that an expert who simply offers an opinion that the product is "generally safe" opens the door to all other accident evidence would create an exception swallowing the general rule requiring substantial similarity.

[h] Similar Circumstances -- Requirement of Similarity

Bilski v. Scientific Atlanta, 964 F.2d 697 (7th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in a product liability action for injuries suffered when the plaintiff slipped while cleaning snow and ice off a satellite dish, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony by the plaintiff's witnesses about other falls from satellite dishes, as none had resulted in injuries reported to the defendant, so the testimony would have had little if any tendency to prove a risk foreseeable to the defendant. In Estate of Carey v. Hy-Temp Mfg., Inc., 929 F.2d 1229 (7th Cir. 1991) , the Court remanded a product liability action for a new trial, noting that "substantially similar" circumstances does not mean "identical," that the range between similar and identical is a matter to be addressed on cross-examination, and that the range is especially broadened when the similar events are offered to show notice as opposed to showing defect.

Wilson v. Bicycle South, Inc., 915 F.2d 1503 (11th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed judgments for the defendants in a product liability action, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence of an allegedly similar accident because of the necessity for a considerable amount of extrinsic evidence to determine whether the incidents were sufficiently similar.

[79] Standard of Conduct

Johnson v. Busby, 953 F.2d 349 (8th Cir. 1991) : In a § 1983 action by a pretrial detainee, the Court held it was no abuse of discretion to exclude evidence of state minimum jail standards, as the standards, while helpful and relevant in some cases, do not represent minimum constitutional standards and would tend to mislead and confuse the jury as to the relevant standard of conduct.

Fulton v. St. Louis-S.F. Ry., 675 F.2d 1130 (10th Cir. 1982) : In a FELA case, the Court held that the Trial Judge properly admitted evidence of a railroad association's loading rules, not as a legal standard of care but as evidence of the appropriate measure of caution required under certain circumstances.

United States v. Betancourt, 734 F.2d 750 (11th Cir. 1984) : In a prosecution for illegally dispensing drugs, two doctors were properly permitted to testify for the government as to the applicable standard of conduct for medical practice.

[80] State Law

Fitzgerald v. Expressway Sewerage Constr., Inc., 177 F.3d 71 (1st Cir. 1999) : The Court held, in this diversity action, that the Massachusetts collateral source rule "must be given full credit in this case as a rule of damages." However, the "evidentiary implications flowing from that rule" are governed by the Federal Rules of Evidence. The Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the plaintiff's medical bills had been paid by an insurer. This evidence was admissible under Rule 403 after the plaintiff testified that payment of medical bills had put a severe financial strain on her family.

Croce v. Bromley Corp., 623 F.2d 1084 (5th Cir. 1980) : A rock music star was killed in an airplane crash, and his family brought a wrongful death action. The Court upheld the introduction of evidence concerning future earnings, saying that admissibility of particular evidence should be determined as a matter of federal, not state, law.

Blanke v. Alexander, 152 F.3d 1224 (10th Cir. 1998) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiffs in a diversity action brought against the driver, owner, and excess liability insurer of the truck for injuries received in a car-truck collision. The Court found no error when the plaintiffs were permitted to make references to the insurer, as that was consistent with the governing state law authorizing direct actions and state precedent that identification of the insurer in such actions is not prejudicial. Although the admissibility of evidence in diversity cases is generally governed by federal law, Congress did not intend to pre-empt "substantive" state rules of evidence. In Romine v. Parman, n169 the Court held that federal law governed the determination whether evidence was too prejudicial to be admitted and that evidence of a driver's drinking of beer on the day of an accident and his payment of a fine resulting from a traffic citation was properly admitted. Although the Court was aware that payment of a traffic citation has been viewed as of little probative value, it found that the preferable approach was to admit the evidence and to permit the driver to explain why the fine was paid.

[81] Statistical Evidence

United States v. Twitty, 72 F.3d 228 (1st Cir. 1995) : To show that members of a conspiracy to violate firearms laws had resold guns, statistical evidence was presented that during a particular period there was a sharp increase in police recoveries of particular models of guns with serial numbers obliterated in the same manner. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence: the inference from the statistics, the weapon types, and the timing showed a connection with the conspiracy; it reinforced the defendant's connection to the conspiracy, which he sought to deny at trial; and it was not prejudicial in connecting the defendant with a gun epidemic, since that was implicit in proof that the defendant's financial condition improved sharply as guns were delivered to another conspirator for the defendant.

Kovacevich v. Kent State Univ., 224 F.3d 806 (6th Cir. 2000) : In a professor's suit against a university for disparate treatment on the basis of sex and age in promotion and pay practices, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of a statistical study offered by the plaintiff. The study was based on the entire population of the University faculty, including all departments and the University's seven regional campuses, so it bore little relation to the practices in the plaintiff's department and their effects on the plaintiff.

Adams v. Ameritech Servs., Inc., 231 F.3d 414 (7th Cir. 2000) : Employees terminated or demoted during a downsizing program brought suits for age discrimination against their employers. The Trial Judge granted summary judgment for the defendants, after excluding evidence from a statistician that showed correlations between the ages of employees and the companies' decisions to terminate. Reversing, the Court noted that "statistical evidence can be very useful to prove discrimination in either or both of those two kinds of cases, but it will likely not be sufficient in itself," and held that the statistical studies "were prepared in a reliable and statistically sound way, such that they contained relevant evidence that a trier of fact would have been entitled to consider." The Court added that "while it is not unheard of to exclude evidence under Rule 403 at the summary judgment stage, ... normally the balancing process contemplated by that rule is best undertaken at the trial itself."

[82] Stipulations

[a] Civil Cases

Silva v. Showcase Cinemas Concessions, 736 F.2d 810 (1st Cir. 1984) : Upholding a judgment against a movie theater for the wrongful death of the plaintiff's son, who was killed in a parking lot after a movie, the Court rejected the defendant's argument that it should have been permitted to show that the assailant was convicted of manslaughter. Since the plaintiff stipulated that the killing was criminal, the manslaughter conviction was unnecessary to prove that it was an intentional act. We note that this decision may be questionable after Old Chief v. United States, discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 403.02[7]-[11].

Heath v. Cast, 813 F.2d 254 (9th Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed a judgment for police officers in a suit alleging illegal arrest and excessive use of force. Although the plaintiff offered to stipulate that he was biased against the police, the Trial Judge admitted evidence that the police had previously arrested the plaintiff and his brother. The Court affirmed, holding that the evidence was properly admitted to enable the jury to determine the extent of the bias.

Noel Shows, Inc. v. United States, 721 F.2d 327 (11th Cir. 1983) : Affirming a judgment against a taxpayer seeking to recover an excise tax paid on a coin-activated amusement device, the Court upheld the exclusion of the plaintiff's patent on the device, which both parties had stipulated to be admissible. A majority of the Court held that the Trial Judge did not act unreasonably in determining that the patent might confuse the jury when it came to decide the only issue in dispute -- i.e., whether the device involved a "substantial element of chance." A dissenting Judge noted that the stipulation had been approved by the Court and opined that the government, which objected to the evidence despite the stipulation, ought to be bound by its stipulations.

[b] Stipulations -- Criminal Cases

[i] Firearms Cases

Old Chief v. United States, 519 U.S. 172 (1997) : This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, §§ 403.02[6]-[11].

United States v. Dunford, 148 F.3d 385 (4th Cir. 1998) : The defendant was charged with violation of 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(3), which prohibits possession of firearms by an illegal drug user. At trial, he objected to admission of evidence of his illegal drug use, arguing that he had already stipulated to being a user of a controlled substance for purposes of the charges brought under 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(3), and that the drug use evidence was substantially more prejudicial than probative in light of his stipulation. Finding no error, the Court distinguished Old Chief: "The evidence of illegal drug use related not to facts far removed in time from the underlying criminal firearm possession with which Dunford was charged. On the contrary, it was ... a relevant part of the very transactions leading to Dunford's arrest and indictment in this case." In United States v. Grimmond, 137 F.3d 823 (4th Cir. 1998) , the Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, and found no error in the admission of prior convictions for shooting two individuals. The defendant stipulated to the fact that he was a felon, and this rendered the prior convictions inadmissible to prove the defendant's felony status under Old Chief v. United States. However, Old Chief did not prohibit the government from offering the prior crimes to prove the element of possession. The Court stated that the Supreme Court "intended its decision in Old Chief to be limited to stipulations involving a defendant's status as a convicted felon."

United States v. De Leon, 170 F.3d 494 (5th Cir. 1999) : At trial for being a convicted felon in possession of ammunition, the prosecution introduced a document that indicated the defendant was under parole supervision. The document had been found in his girlfriend's home along with the ammunition at issue. Despite the defendant's willingness to stipulate that he was a convicted felon, the Court held that the document was properly admitted. The parole document was relevant, because it was probative of the defendant's dominion and control over his girlfriend's house, and it was not unduly prejudicial, because it had been redacted to avoid mentioning the nature of the prior felony.

United States v. Hawkins, 215 F.3d 858 (8th Cir. 2000) : In a felon firearm possession case, the defendant offered to stipulate to his status as a felon, but the Trial Judge ruled that the stipulation would have to reflect the defendant's multiple felony convictions. Affirming, the Court held that the defendant waived any claim under Old Chief by accepting a stipulation that he had been convicted of "several crimes" that were felonies, rather than "press[ing] on appeal the government and district court's refusal to accept his stipulation." In United States v. Bass, n170 a defendant convicted for firearms violations claimed that the government should have been required to accept a stipulation as to identity and should have been barred from offering evidence of crimes committed by the defendants. Affirming, the Court observed that "a proper Rule 403 balancing analysis will incorporate some assessment of the need for the allegedly prejudicial information in light of a valid stipulation," but found that the stipulation was insufficient where the crimes the government offered were interconnected with those charged and proved more than identity.

[ii] Stipulations -- Criminal Cases -- Generally

United States v. Rezaq, 134 F.3d 1121 (D.C. Cir. 1998) : Appealing a conviction for air piracy, the defendant argued that it was error to admit evidence, including autopsy photographs, of the death of two passengers. The defendant offered at trial to stipulate that the passengers had died, and he contended that under Old Chief v. United States the Trial Judge should have compelled the prosecution to accept the stipulation. Finding no error, the Court concluded that Old Chief reaffirmed the general rule that the prosecution "is entitled to prove its case free from any defendant's option to stipulate the evidence away," and that Old Chief established a limited exception to this rule "for crimes like possession of a firearm by a convicted felon, in which the evidentiary issue is one of status." Since the exception did not apply in this case, the prosecution was free to decline to stipulate that the passengers had died.

United States v. Balsam, 203 F.3d 72 (1st Cir. 2000) : At a trial for multiple bank robberies, the government introduced the colloquy of one defendant when he pleaded guilty to state charges in an abortive robbery, despite the defendant's agreement to stipulate to the guilty pleas. The Court found no abuse of discretion, since the abortive robbery was the subject matter of a Hobbs Act conspiracy count in this case, which made the facts underlying the conviction (and not just the status of the defendant, as in Old Chief) relevant to the charges.

United States v. Velazquez, 246 F.3d 204 (2d Cir. 2001) : In a civil rights prosecution of a corrections officer for being an accessory after the fact to the fatal beating of an inmate, the Court found there was no abuse of discretion when autopsy photographs of the victim were introduced, despite the defendant's offer to stipulate that the beating occurred. By showing the extent of the injuries, the photographs established that a cruel and unusual punishment had occurred and underscored the moral blame attaching to the defendant's decision to cover up the crime; they also tended to prove that the victim's signature on the defendant's cover-up report was coerced by the beating he had just received. In United States v. Pedroza, n171 the Court reversed kidnapping convictions on another ground, but held that the admission of evidence concerning one defendant's involvement in a cocaine transaction, which explained the motive for the kidnapping, was proper. Although the defendants offered to stipulate that the ransom demanded for return of the kidnapped child was narcotics, the Court found that the stipulation "hardly sufficed to provide an understandable backdrop for the rather unusual theories offered to explain the events."

United States v. Hall, 152 F.3d 381 (5th Cir. 1998) : Affirming a conviction for kidnapping resulting in death, the Court found no error in the introduction of photos of the victim's body in the grave dug by the defendant. The photos were relevant to prove the victim's identity and the cause of her death. The defendant's offer to stipulate to these facts did not render the photos irrelevant, because under the Supreme Court's decision in Old Chief v. United States, "the government must be given the opportunity to present to the jury a picture of the events relied upon. To substitute for such a picture a naked admission might have the effect to rob the evidence of much of its fair and legitimate weight." In a prosecution for interstate transportation of obscene material, United States v. Grassi, n172 defense counsel offered to stipulate that the films were obscene. The prosecutor objected, and the jury was shown three films that portrayed "homosexual acts of the most bizarre and repulsive nature." The Court said that a Rule 403 balancing analysis must be used and sustained the Trial Judge, finding that the films had probative value above and beyond the stipulation.

United States v. Mackey, 265 F.3d 457 (6th Cir. 2001) : To prove that a house where the defendant was arrested was a crack house and that therefore the cocaine possessed by the defendant and his codefendant was for distribution, the government offered testimony by an officer that a confidential informant purchased cocaine in front of the house the previous day. When counsel for the codefendant asked to question the informant, the prosecutor, seeking to protect the informant's identity and to avoid calling him, agreed to stipulate that the informant did not purchase the cocaine from the codefendant. The defendant objected to the stipulation on the ground that it implied the informant purchased the cocaine from him. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion, or at most harmless error, since the unchallenged testimony about a controlled buy helped establish the house as a crack house, and a reasonable juror could find the amount of crack seized from the defendant was for resale and not for personal use, so the stipulation could not materially affect the verdict. In United States v. Owens, 159 F.3d 221 (6th Cir. 1998) , the defendant was convicted of drug, prostitution, and gambling offenses arising out of his operation of topless bars. He objected to the introduction of evidence indicating that he enforced certain racist policies in his clubs, arguing that the racial bias evidence was made irrelevant by his offer to stipulate to the fact that one witness was biased against him as the result of a racial incident. Finding no abuse of discretion, the Court held that Old Chief simply carved out "the limited exception of felony-convict status" to the general rule "that the prosecution is entitled to prove its case free from any defendant's option to stipulate the evidence away." The evidence was relevant to the bias of the witness, and also to prove the control that the defendant exercised over the clubs.

United States v. Becht, 267 F.3d 767 (8th Cir. 2001) : The defendant was charged with possessing and disseminating child pornography, after numerous pornographic files were found on his computer. At trial the prosecution introduced 39 images from the pornographic files, although there was some indication that the government had offered and the defendant had accepted a stipulation that the images were child pornography. The Court held that regardless of any stipulation, the images were also relevant to the defendant's knowledge of what was on his computer. For that purpose the images were highly probative, and the Trial Judge took pains, by limiting the number shown and the time they were shown to the jury, to limit any prejudicial effect. As there were no satisfactory evidentiary alternatives to prove knowledge, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the images. In United States v. Hiland, 909 F.2d 1114 (8th Cir. 1990) , the Court affirmed convictions related to unlawful sales of pharmaceuticals, holding that evidence regarding the drug's effects on premature infants was properly admitted despite the defendants' offered stipulation, because the stipulation reached only the drug's overall dangerousness, not its dangerousness when used as labeled, which was also part of the government's burden of proof. The Court also found that the evidence was not presented in an inflammatory manner and its use was carefully controlled.

United States v. Campos, 221 F.3d 1143 (10th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed a conviction for transporting child pornography on the Internet, finding no abuse of discretion when the jury was shown two of the images that were the subject of the charges. Although the defendant offered to stipulate that the images were child pornography, the prosecution was entitled under Old Chief to an opportunity to present the concrete events of the defendant's criminal behavior.

[iii] Stipulations -- Criminal Cases -- Mental Elements

United States v. Wilson, 160 F.3d 732 (D.C. Cir. 1998) : James Wilson was charged with a postal robbery on the basis of information from a witness who had worn a wire while imprisoned with James. The government turned the tape and a transcript over to James' attorney, who improperly disclosed at least parts to James' wife and his brother Ralph. The tape revealed that the key witness was Leroy Copeland; Ralph and another brother began looking for Copeland, and when they found him, murdered him. On trial for murdering a government witness, the brothers objected that it was improper to admit the whole tape, which, inter alia, described the Wilson family as a "family-run organized gang," because the tape was unduly prejudicial in disclosing other crimes and that they were prepared to stipulate they knew Copeland would be a witness. The Court found that there was no abuse of discretion in rejecting the offered stipulation, since hearing the tape provided "descriptive richness" to testimony that Ralph had heard the tape. The Court concluded that the Rule 403 challenge presented a close question, because half of the tape was prejudicial and only marginally probative, but because there was no incremental prejudice and editing the tape would have fragmented the narrative, there was no abuse of discretion.

United States v. Palmer, 37 F.3d 1080 (5th Cir. 1994) : Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court held there was no error in permitting the government to call the defendant's parole supervisor to testify that she explained the parole rules to the defendant, including a rule barring possession of any weapon, even though the defendant had offered to stipulate to the fact of a predicate felony conviction. The government witness did not testify as to the nature or details of the prior conviction, and only provided relevant evidence concerning the defendant's knowledge, so there was no abuse of discretion under Rule 403 in admitting the evidence.

United States v. Frost, 234 F.3d 1023 (8th Cir. 2000) : The defendant was charged with defrauding a trust by forging the signature of his co-trustee on various financial documents. In a deposition given in a civil action brought by the trust, the defendant denied signing the co-trustee's name or initials on the documents in question. However, in the criminal case the defendant asserted that he had a power of attorney to sign for the co-trustee. In effect planning to hinge his whole defense and focus the trial on the issue of authority, the defendant offered not to contest criminal intent if the jury determined that he was not authorized to sign the documents. Concluding that the jury would be led to convict the defendant solely on the ground that he was untruthful, the Judge granted a motion in limine to exclude the defendant's deposition testimony in which he denied signing the documents. On interlocutory appeal, the Court reversed, on the ground that the deposition testimony was probative of fraudulent intent and consciousness of guilt, and although it would be damaging to the defendant's case, it would not be unfairly so. The defendant's offer to stipulate did not remove the issue of intent from the case.

United States v. Tan, 254 F.3d 1204 (10th Cir. 2001) : On interlocutory appeal in a prosecution for alcohol-related vehicular homicide, the Court reversed an in limine ruling that excluded the defendant's prior convictions for drunk driving. Although the Trial Judge reasoned that the convictions were not offered for any proper purpose under Rule 404(b), the Court found that they were probative of malice. The case was remanded to determine whether the convictions were admissible under Rule 403, and the Trial Judge was instructed to disregard the fact that the defendant offered to stipulate that he "knows that drunk driving is dangerous." This stipulation was not a substitute for the convictions in proving malice, because they showed both that the defendant knew that drunk driving was dangerous and that he did not care about the danger to others. Moreover, regardless of the stipulation, the government is permitted under Old Chief to prove malice with its own evidence.

[iv] Stipulations -- Criminal Cases -- Predicate Convictions

Old Chief v. United States, 519 U.S. 172 (1997) : In a felon-firearm prosecution, the Court held that where the defendant had offered to stipulate to the felony element of the crime, it was an abuse of discretion under Rule 403 to permit the government to offer the judgment of conviction to prove the defendant's prior felony. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 403.02[7].

United States v. Joost, 133 F.3d 125 (1st Cir. 1998) : The defendant, charged with felon firearm possession, stipulated to his prior conviction for interfering with civil rights. After he testified in his own defense, the government was permitted to show the nature of the prior felony on cross-examination. The Court found no abuse of discretion, both because the defendant had opened the door by describing the prior felony on direct examination and had waived the error by failing to make a contemporaneous objection and because Rule 609(a) permits evidence of a prior conviction to impeach the credibility of a testifying defendant if its probative value outweighs its prejudicial effect. In United States v. Tavares, 21 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1994) (en banc), a defendant charged with felon firearm possession offered to stipulate that he had a prior felony conviction, but the prosecutor refused to accept the stipulation and was permitted to prove the fact of the conviction and its nature. Vacating in a careful en banc opinion anticipating Old Chief v. United States (see the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 403.02[7]), the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to permit the government to reject the stipulation and to admit evidence beyond the fact of the prior conviction. The nature of the predicate felony is wholly unrelated to the crime charged and, except in unusual circumstances of which the Court could not conceive, the prejudice to the defendant substantially outweighs the probativeness of the facts surrounding the prior conviction. The Court noted that its decision was limited: The defendant may not keep the fact of the predicate felony from the jury by stipulation or other procedural device; the prosecution ordinarily cannot be forced to accept a stipulation if it prefers to introduce a judgment of conviction properly redacted; in some cases evidence concerning the nature of the prior conviction will be admissible for impeachment or other reasons; and a stipulation to a defendant's status as a felon is easily distinguishable from those relating to his actions or state of mind in committing the crime.

United States v. Bender, 265 F.3d 464 (6th Cir. 2001) : One charge against a defendant in a drug distribution case was felon firearm possession. Rather than requiring the government to introduce evidence of the prior conviction, the parties agreed to stipulate that the defendant was convicted of a felony in 1987, and the defendant's cross-examination was to be limited to getting her to confirm she agreed to the stipulation. However, after the defendant twice testified that she never sold drugs, the government was permitted to bring out on cross-examination the fact that her prior conviction was for distribution of powder cocaine. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion, since the defendant's misleading testimony opened the door to the impeachment proof, and limiting instructions minimized any prejudicial effect. In a felon firearm possession case, United States v. Daniel, 134 F.3d 1259 (6th Cir. 1998) , the Court found that the admission of the defendant's predicate felonies was error (but harmless) under Old Chief v. United States, because the defendant had offered to stipulate to the convictions at trial. The Court rejected the prosecution's attempt to distinguish Old Chief on the ground that the defendant's convictions were very old and unrelated to the crimes charged.

United States v. Einfeldt, 138 F.3d 373 (8th Cir. 1998) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion when the defendant was required, in his stipulation for purposes of 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(1), to stipulate not just that he was a convicted felon, but that he had been convicted of "one or more felony offenses," so that the jury was not misled as to his criminal history. That did not lead to unfair prejudice, in contrast to description of the prior conviction in Old Chief. In United States v. Blake, 107 F.3d 651 (8th Cir. 1997) , the Court reversed convictions for felon firearm possession and methamphetamine possession, holding it was error under Old Chief to admit evidence of burglary, stealing, driving while intoxicated, and motor vehicle theft convictions after the defendant had offered to stipulate to his status as a felon.

United States v. Wilson, 107 F.3d 774 (10th Cir. 1997) : Affirming convictions for felon firearm possession and cocaine possession, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit evidence of a conviction for cocaine possession after the defendant had offered to stipulate to his status as a felon. The conviction was inadmissible under Old Chief on the firearm count and its prejudicial effect substantially outweighed its probative value on the drug count.

[83] Summary Judgment

Adams v. Ameritech Servs., Inc., 231 F.3d 414 (7th Cir. 2000) : Employees terminated or demoted during a downsizing program brought suits for age discrimination against their employers. The Trial Judge granted summary judgment for the defendants, after excluding evidence from a statistician that showed correlations between the ages of employees and the companies' decisions to terminate. Reversing, the Court noted that "while it is not unheard of to exclude evidence under Rule 403 at the summary judgment stage, ... normally the balancing process contemplated by that rule is best undertaken at the trial itself." It read the Supreme Court's decision in Reeves v. Sanderson Plumbing Prods, Inc., n173 as "a cautionary note not to grant summary judgment too readily when facts are susceptible to two interpretations, and not to dismiss as irrelevant damaging remarks like the one there (plaintiff so old he 'must have come over on the Mayflower,' ...) or, in our case, [a manager]'s proclaimed desire to hire people under the age of 45."

[84] Surprise

Szeliga v. General Motors Corp., 728 F.2d 566 (1st Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed a judgment for an automobile manufacturer, holding there was no error in finding films -- prepared by the manufacturer and offered to support its theory that a wheel fell off because of impact, not because of the loss of lug nuts -- to be more probative than prejudicial. Although a question was raised as to whether the films should have been disclosed before trial pursuant to a pretrial order, the Trial Judge could have decided the question either way. The Court commented that "the remedy for coping with surprise is not to seek reversal after an unfavorable verdict, but a request for continuance at the time the surprise occurs."

Hurley v. Atlantic City Police Dep't, 174 F.3d 95 (3d Cir. 1999) : In a sexual discrimination case brought by a female police officer, the plaintiff's psychological expert prepared one report and, in response to the report of the defendant's expert, a second report that the Magistrate Judge rejected as untimely. At trial, the plaintiff's expert testified, over an objection of "unfair surprise," to the diagnosis contained in his second report. The Court found no abuse of discretion, since the "second diagnosis" was hinted at strongly in the first report, the defendants had actual knowledge of the contents of the second report and an adequate opportunity to prepare rebuttal testimony, there was no need to call any witnesses out of order or otherwise to disrupt the trial, and there was no evidence of bad faith. In United States v. DiPasquale, n174 the Court affirmed loansharking convictions, finding no error in the admission of evidence of overt acts in addition to those alleged in the indictment. The Court stated that "[g]enerally speaking, surprise is not a ground for the exclusion of evidence in a criminal trial."

Black v. J.I. Case Co., Inc., 22 F.3d 568 (5th Cir. 1994) : In a product liability case, the plaintiffs objected to allowing Case to add a new defense on the first day of trial. The Court rejected the plaintiffs' claim that they were unfairly surprised, noting that the Trial Judge offered the plaintiffs a continuance, which they declined, and that where a party claims unfair surprise, "the granting of a continuance is a more appropriate remedy than exclusion of the evidence." In a diversity case arising out of a crash between two trucks, Conway v. Chemical Leaman Tank Lines, Inc., n175 the Court found there was no abuse of discretion in granting a new trial on the grounds of unfair surprise, after a witness called without any forewarning testified as to a new theory concerning asphalt marks on the highway. The Court said that the evidence was offered when the trial was almost completed and that "[a]lthough this Court has acknowledged that continuance is a preferable remedy for prejudicial error from unfair surprise, there is no ironclad rule requiring it."

[85] Surveys and Opinion Polls

Starter Corp. v. Converse, Inc., 170 F.3d 286 (2d Cir. 1999) : In Starter's declaratory judgment action to establish its right to use a "star" trademark on athletic footwear, Starter offered a consumer survey to prove the unlikelihood of confusion between the parties' trademarks. Finding no abuse of discretion in exclusion of the survey, the Court held that the survey was irrelevant because the method used did not test or demonstrate likelihood of consumer confusion, and any probative value was easily outweighed by its potential to confuse the issues.

United States v. Local 560, 780 F.2d 267 (3d Cir. 1985) : In a civil RICO action, the Court held it was error to admit testimony concerning the violent reputation of the union's executive board that was based on interviews the witness had with 15 former and current members of the union, since no attempt at random selection was made; the witness had approached only persons known to be hostile to the leadership.

[86] Terrorist Activities

United States v. Felton, 417 F.3d 97 (1st Cir. 2005) : In a prosecution for bank robbery, counterfeiting, and planning construction of an explosive device, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in allowing the government to use the word "terrorist" to describe the defendants and their activities. The Court reasoned that although it is "a provocative term, freighted with images of terrible events," in this case the description "was certainly an accurate lay use of the term 'terrorist,' and it is not easy to think of some softer description to summarize the gist of what the government's evidence suggested." Any prejudice was "a function of the acts that the defendants engaged in, not the government's inaccurate description of those acts."

United States v. Khalil, 214 F.3d 111 (2d Cir. 2000) : The defendant, charged with conspiring and threatening to use a weapon of mass destruction, claimed that he made bombs as a ploy to obtain funds from a government rewards program by pretending to prevent a terrorist attack. The Court found that photographs showing the defendant holding a shotgun over his forehead, wearing the garb of a terrorist, and kneeling on the floor in the posture of a martyr in prayer were relevant to rebut the defense portrayals of the defendant as a person having no destructive objective, and they were not unduly prejudicial. Similarly, there was no abuse of discretion in the admission of expert testimony that a mock-up bomb replicating those made by the defendant had been detonated and had fragmented into small pieces, spewing nails in all directions. Evidence as to the massively destructive effect of the defendant's bombs was clearly relevant to his "scam" defense, and any prejudice he might have suffered was not "unfair" within the meaning of Rule 403.

United States v. Hammoud, 381 F.3d 316 (4th Cir. 2004) (en banc): The defendant was convicted for activities supporting Hizballah, a designated foreign terrorist organization. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of videotapes found in the defendant's apartment, which depicted, inter alia, speeches by Hizballah leaders praising Hizballah military operations and men who martyred themselves. The evidence was probative of the defendant's intention during "prayer meetings" to solicit donations to Hizballah and of his knowledge of and agreement with the terrorist objectives of Hizballah. The evidence was not unfairly prejudicial toward the defendant and there was no less prejudicial alternative for the prosecution in proving the defendant's knowledge of Hizballah's activities.

[87] Threats

United States v. Perez-Montanez, 202 F.3d 434 (1st Cir. 2000) : Affirming carjacking and firearm convictions, the Court held that a coconspirator who testified as a government witness was properly permitted to testify about threats that he received and believed were from a defendant, since "[t]he evidence was admitted not to prove the truth of the threats or their origin but to show Serrano's [the witness's] motivation for having changed his version of events, which he did several times before trial."

United States v. Bicaksiz, 194 F.3d 390 (2d Cir. 1999) : In a prosecution of a conspiracy to commit murder for hire, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that a defendant made a death threat against his wife, as the wife's brother was the intended victim of the conspiracy and the government's theory was that murder of the brother was part of a scheme to intimidate the wife into accepting a disadvantageous settlement in divorce proceedings.

Tompkins v. Cyr, 202 F.3d 770 (5th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed a judgment for a doctor and his wife who claimed injuries as a result of harassment by abortion foes, holding there was no plain error in the admission of evidence of anonymous threats made against the plaintiff, even though there was no evidence that the defendants were responsible for the threats. The Court reasoned that under state law the defendants "take their victims as they find them," so that the anonymous threats made the plaintiffs particularly vulnerable to psychological harm from the defendant's unlawful conduct.

United States v. Mayes, 370 F.3d 703 (7th Cir. 2004), vacated on other grounds, 543 U.S. 1107 (2005) : Though affirming drug convictions, the Court found error in allowing a witness to testify that he and his family had been threatened with death by an anonymous caller. The prosecution argued that the threat evidence was necessary to explain why the witness was groggy and upset on the stand. But the Court found that the probative value in supporting the witness's credibility was "highly questionable" as the witness also testified that during the preceding 48 hours he had not slept and had worked three full shifts. Thus, the prejudicial effect of the threat evidence substantially outweighed its probative value. In United States v. Thompson, 359 F.3d 470 (7th Cir. 2004) , the defendant was charged with possession of ammunition by a felon after bullets were found in a jacket in a car in which he and his girlfriend had been traveling. Shortly after the arrest, she told police that the jacket and the bullets belonged to the defendant, but at trial she testified for the defense that they were hers. Although an in limine ruling precluded mention of the defendant's prior convictions and status as a suspect in uncharged crimes, the government was permitted to ask the girlfriend on cross-examination about past threats the defendant had made against her and past charges she had brought against him. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion, since even without evidence that the witness was intimidated, the evidence of threats was probative of the witness' bias and its probative value was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice.

United States v. Davis, 357 F.3d 726 (8th Cir. 2004), vacated on other grounds, 543 U.S. 1099 (2005) : In a prosecution for drug trafficking offenses, the Court found no abuse of discretion when evidence was admitted that the defendant had threatened and beaten women, including a young girl, for the purpose of silencing potential witnesses and furthering the drug conspiracy. "Because drug dealing is often a violent vocation, and because the evidence of threats and violence was presented to show the lengths that Davis would go to protect the conspiracy, its probative value was substantial and far outweighed any prejudicial effect."

[88] Time Limits

MCI Commun. Corp. v. American Tel. & Tel. Co., 708 F.2d 1081 (7th Cir. 1983) : In this complex antitrust case, the Court found no error in the Trial Judge's limiting each side to 26 days for presentation of its case-in-chief. The Court commented that > [t]his exercise of discretion may be appropriate in protracted litigation provided that witnesses are not excluded on the basis of mere numbers ... . Moreover, where the proffered testimony is presented to the Court in the form of a general summary, the time limits should be sufficiently flexible to accommodate adjustment if it appears during trial that the Court's initial assessment was too restrictive.

Johnson v. Ashby, 808 F.2d 676 (8th Cir. 1987) : In a medical malpractice case, the Trial Judge imposed in advance of trial a strict time limit on the presentation of evidence. The Court affirmed, noting that the unsuccessful plaintiff made no timely objection to the time limit. However, "it may be an abuse of the Trial Court's discretion to exclude probative, noncumulative evidence simply because its introduction will cause delay, and any time limits formulated in advance of trial must be fashioned with this in mind." The Court disapproved of "rigid hour limits such as those initially suggested here," but found that there was no showing that the Trial Judge would not have extended the time if a proper objection had been made.

General Signal Corp. v. MCI Telecomm. Corp., 66 F.3d 1500 (9th Cir. 1995) : In a breach of contract and fraud action between a telecommunications device developer and a long-distance telephone company, the developer was not permitted to offer rebuttal evidence or conduct some cross-examination because it had exceeded time limits imposed by the Trial Judge. The Court noted that generally evidence may not be excluded solely to avoid delay and that it would have been advisable for the Judge to have weighed explicitly the probative value of the proposed evidence in deciding whether to grant additional time, but held that the developer was not prejudiced by the exclusion on account of the time limit.

[89] Tools of the Crime

United States v. Savage, 390 F.3d 823 (4th Cir. 2004), vacated on other grounds, 545 U.S. 1102 (2005) : The Court affirmed convictions arising out of a scheme to defraud several investors, especially single, older women, by inducing them to invest in phony business ventures. It found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony that the defendant was arrested with more than $12,000 in cash and items relating to false identifications. The Trial Judge instructed the jury that the evidence was admitted only for the purpose of determining whether the items were tools and materials used in the conspiracy.

[90] Victim Impact Testimony

United States v. Sokolow, 91 F.3d 396 (3d Cir. 1996) : In a prosecution for a fraudulent scheme to market underfunded health plans to small businesses, the government called several witnesses whose claims for medical insurance were denied because the medical plans marketed by the defendant were unable to pay them. These witnesses testified not only that they were denied payment, but also to the collateral consequences they suffered from unreimbursed medical expenses. The Court noted that actual loss by the victim is not an element of the crime of mail fraud, though it recognized that evidence of loss is sometimes probative of the defendant's intent to defraud. It criticized the government's attempt "to highlight the personal tragedies of the victims" because such testimony has "little, if any, probative value and may be unfairly prejudicial." However, in this case the error, if any, was harmless.

United States v. McVeigh, 153 F.3d 1166 (10th Cir. 1998) : During the guilt phase of the defendant's trial for bombing the Oklahoma City Federal Building, the government presented 18 witnesses who identified deceased victims of the blast and described the impact of the explosion, the destruction caused by the bombing, and the long-term effects of the bombing. The Court affirmed, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of most of this testimony. Some provided background information relevant to credibility about the testifying witnesses; some described activity of the witnesses and other victims just before the bombing, setting a foundation for testimony describing the bombing and its aftermath. The testimony about the immediate impact of the bombing was probative to prove that the bomb was a weapon of mass destruction, that it substantially interfered with interstate commerce, and that it was detonated with a malicious intent to kill. While all this testimony about the explosion was prejudicial, the Court noted that the emotional impact of the testimony "stemmed directly from the enormity of the crime itself," and that the government "exercised considerable restraint in avoiding overly emotional testimony." The Court held that the testimony about the long-term effects of the bombing was prejudicial and "was not particularly relevant to the issues presented during the guilt phase." However, the error in admitting this evidence was harmless.

[91] Violent Crimes

Gray v. Genlyte Group, Inc., 289 F.3d 128 (1st Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed a judgment for an employer in a sexual harassment action, finding no abuse of discretion when the plaintiff was permitted to testify only that a co-worker told her something that greatly enhanced her fear of her harasser, but not specifically that the co-worker said that the harasser had physically assaulted his wife so severely that she required emergency treatment. The Judge could properly have found that the jury might have assumed the truth of the co-worker's statement rather than focus on its impact on the plaintiff, and the "compromise reached by the district court was a perfect example of a reasonable call that is not an abuse of discretion." In a carjacking prosecution, United States v. Cruz-Kuilan, 75 F.3d 59 (1st Cir. 1996) , the Court found no error in the admission of evidence that the defendant murdered the owner of the car before getting into the car and driving it away, noting that the federal carjacking statute requires proof that the car was taken "by force and violence or by intimidation." In this case, the evidence of murder "was so tightly linked to guilt as defined by the elements of the offense, that it would be surpassingly difficult to justify a finding of unfair prejudice stemming from its introduction."

United States v. Noe, 411 F.3d 878 (8th Cir. 2005) : Affirming convictions for drug offenses, the Court held that evidence of a brutal beating one defendant ordered inflicted on a "sub-dealer" was not unfairly prejudicial. The evidence "was highly probative of the conspiracy itself and Schultz's leadership role within it." In United States v. Al-Dabbi, 388 F.3d 1145 (8th Cir. 2004), vacated on other grounds, 126 S. Ct. 590 (2005) , a cocaine distribution conspiracy prosecution, the Court found no plain error when a cooperating coconspirator was permitted to testify that the defendant had assaulted his wife and that the wife had asked the witness to dispose of her husband's gun because she feared for her life. As the wife was a member of the conspiracy, the evidence was probative of the defendant's control over the conspiracy through violence and fear, and that probative value was not substantially outweighed by the danger of prejudice. In a drug trafficking case, United States v. Davis, n176 the Court found no abuse of discretion when evidence was admitted that the defendant had threatened and beaten women, including a young girl, for the purpose of silencing potential witnesses and furthering the drug conspiracy. "Because drug dealing is often a violent vocation, and because the evidence of threats and violence was presented to show the lengths that Davis would go to protect the conspiracy, its probative value was substantial and far outweighed any prejudicial effect."

[92] Waste of Time and Undue Delay

Stathos v. Bowden, 728 F.2d 15 (1st Cir. 1984) : Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff in a sex discrimination suit, the Court upheld rulings that permitted the defendants' expert to offer three statistical studies regarding the raises and salaries given to men and women at the defendant commission, but refused to permit the expert to offer six other studies comparing the salaries at other lighting commissions. Any probative value of these studies, the Court found, would have been so tangential as to warrant exclusion as a "waste of time."

Barrett v. Orange County Human Rights Comm'n, 194 F.3d 341 (2d Cir. 1999) : The Commission's former executive director alleged in a suit under § 1983 that he was dismissed for exercising First Amendment rights in relation to his handling of an August 1996 complaint to the Commission. At trial he was precluded from introducing, as proof that the reasons offered for his termination (violation of guidelines adopted in December 1996) were pretextual, evidence that the Commission had adopted guidelines for his conduct in March 1996 in retaliation for his exercise of free-speech rights in a prior controversy. The Court found no abuse of discretion, as any probative value the evidence might have could have been outweighed by the waste of time if the trial were diverted into an inquiry into an entirely different incident involving to a significant extent different people, places, and events.

In re Paoli R.R. Yard PCB Litig., 113 F.3d 444 (3d Cir. 1997) : In its third review of this toxic exposure case (see §§ 702.02[6]; 702.03[84][a]), the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence about "heat-degraded PCBs." The plaintiffs did not establish that the excluded evidence would have probative value, given the paucity of evidence that the plaintiffs sustained any abnormal exposure to PCBs, and admitting the evidence would require extensive mini-trials on the plaintiffs' exposure to these chemicals and the harm they cause.

United States v. Smithers, 212 F.3d 306 (6th Cir. 2000) : The Court reversed a conviction for bank robbery because the Trial Judge excluded an experienced psychologist from testifying about weaknesses in eyewitness identifications on behalf of the defense without conducting a Daubert hearing. The Trial Judge had commented that the proffer was "too late in the day," and the dissenting Judge argued that Rule 403 provided a basis for exclusion, but the Court held that "undue delay" in Rule 403 referred to prolongation of the trial, not delay in submission of motions or proffers. Besides, in this case the defendant had filed a ten-page motion in limine seeking admission of the testimony a full month before trial, and had renewed the motion orally at the beginning of trial. Given the importance of eyewitness testimony in the case, it was an abuse of discretion to exclude the testimony based on its supposed tardiness.

Wyninger v. New Venture Gear, Inc., 361 F.3d 965 (7th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant in a Title VII action, holding there was no abuse of discretion when the Judge excluded evidence of another employee's gender discrimination charge, which the plaintiff offered five months after the close of discovery and the submission of the defendant's summary judgment motion. The evidence had limited probative value because it involved a different employment decision in a different department made by different decisionmakers, and, because it consisted of contested allegations, it would have required undue consumption of time to decide the merits of the "case within a case." In United States v. Thomas, 11 F.3d 1392 (7th Cir. 1993) , a defendant charged with bank robbery sought to prove she had been coerced into participation by her codefendant. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in refusing to allow her to present evidence regarding each specific incident of abuse, as the marginal relevance of the evidence was clearly outweighed by the dangers of confusion of the issues, waste of time, and unnecessary presentation of evidence that would result if the defendant were allowed to conduct mini-trials of each alleged incident. In Scaggs v. Consolidated Rail Corp., n177 the defendant in an employee's personal injury action had conducted surveillance of the plaintiff but found no indication of malingering that it wished to introduce as evidence. The Court held there was no error in granting the defendant's motion in limine barring mention of the defendant's surveillance practices, as evidence of no evidence was a waste of time and possibly prejudicial in this case.

United States v. Pend Oreille County Public Util. Dist. No. 1, 135 F.3d 602 (9th Cir. 1998) : The Judge trying the damages phase of a trespass action refused to allow proof on rebuttal from an expert who would have provided an estimate of acreage relevant to the plaintiffs' damages. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion, as the Judge had already heard from two other experts on the point and "reasonably could have concluded that introducing in rebuttal yet a third, much higher estimate ... would needlessly complicate the issue and unduly delay the proceeding." In a fraud case, United States v. Rewald, n178 the defendant claimed that he was a CIA agent who had been instructed to spend investor funds to cultivate foreign intelligence sources. The Court held there had been no abuse of discretion in excluding classified documents regarding his meetings with foreign businessmen and government officials, because they were of little probative value on whether he had been instructed to spend the money; presentation of the extensive evidence, and rebuttal to it, would have drawn out the proceedings and confused the jury.

Ross v. Buckeye Cellulose Corp., 980 F.2d 648 (11th Cir. 1993) : In an employment discrimination action, evidence that managers who later worked at the plant had made racially derogatory remarks was excluded on the ground that it would open the door to further evidence about another of the defendant's plants, thereby substantially and unnecessarily prolonging the trial. The Court held that although the evidence may have been the "smoking gun" on the disparate treatment issue, there was no clear abuse of discretion where, even after the Trial Judge indicated willingness to admit the evidence if it were significant, plaintiffs' counsel did not highlight the significance of the evidence and only stated it was important to impeach testimony counsel had hoped unsuccessfully to elicit from another witness.

[93] Wealth or Poverty

Tesser v. Board of Educ., 370 F.3d 314 (2d Cir. 2004) : In an action by a school administrator who alleged religious discrimination and retaliation, the plaintiff claimed it was an abuse of discretion to admit into evidence unredacted copies of her joint tax return. The Court noted that evidence of wealth is generally not admitted in cases not involving punitive damages, but a party may open the door to wealth evidence. Although it did not decide whether the door was opened in this case by expert testimony concerning the income tax effect of a lump sum award, the Court observed that it might have been, but that any error in admitting the evidence was harmless. In Reilly v. NatWest Markets Group Inc., 181 F.3d 253 (2d Cir. 1999) , an investment banker with an employment contract in which his income was based on deals closed by the bank sued contending that his income was improperly diminished by the bank's unreasonably tight credit decisions during 1995. The defendant's officer testified that the credit decisions were reasonable because there was a recession in the early 1990s. The Court found no error when the plaintiff responded with evidence that the bank made a $457 million profit in 1995. While wealth evidence is generally inadmissible in trials not involving punitive damages because it "can be taken as suggesting that the defendant should respond in damages because he is rich," it can be admitted to impeach the testimony of a witness who opens the door to the subject. In this case, although the wealth evidence did not "directly contradict" the defense witness' testimony, and its introduction "may have been somewhat opportunistic," it was sufficiently inconsistent with that testimony to impeach the witness' credibility. In United States v. Weiss, 914 F.2d 1514 (2d Cir. 1990) , the Court held there was no error in a prosecution for Medicare and Medicaid fraud when the government presented evidence regarding a defendant's wealth and income, as the defendant sought to portray himself as virtually indigent and as not having profited from the alleged misconduct so not deserving punishment, and the Trial Judge twice instructed that the evidence was admitted only on credibility.

United States v. Sanchez-Gonzalez, 294 F.3d 563 (3d Cir. 2002) : Affirming cocaine-related convictions, the Court held that the defendant was not entitled to introduce evidence of impoverishment, where he failed to explain its relevance.

United States v. Jackson-Randolph, 282 F.3d 369 (6th Cir. 2002) : Affirming fraud convictions arising from false claims made to government agencies, the Court upheld the admission of evidence of the defendant's extravagant life style, involving expenditures of almost $4 million, to prove motive. Although the Court noted that in many cases such evidence is problematic to prove motive because extravagant expenditures may be made possible by legitimate means, it found that the evidence was properly admitted because (1) there was other evidence of the illegal activity, (2) the money spent by the defendant was not available to her from a legitimate source, and (3) the accumulation of wealth and extravagant spending occurred during the period of the illegal activity. That the defendant's "specified lavish expenditures far exceeded her legitimate income while her net worth almost doubled" was enough "to raise an inference of unlawful activity and made her participation in the fraud scheme more likely." In United States v. Zipkin, 729 F.2d 384 (6th Cir. 1984) , the Court reversed a conviction for fraudulently appropriating money belonging to an estate, and strongly suggested that the Trial Judge should reconsider the decision to admit records from the appellant's divorce proceedings to prove that he committed the offense because he needed money. The Court noted that extreme caution is called for in admitting such evidence, "lest the poor be in position of being at greater suspicion of having committed a crime, even if a theft offense, because of the very fact of their impecuniosity."

Van Bumble v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 407 F.3d 823 (7th Cir. 2005) : Affirming the denial of motions for a new trial or additur in a couple's slip-and-fall action, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence of the plaintiffs' financial situation, including that they lacked medical insurance. Although they argued that the evidence was relevant to prove why the wife did not seek medical treatment for two years, the Court noted that Wal-Mart did not question why the wife did not seek treatment, so the evidence was irrelevant and would have been prejudicial on the damages issue.

United States v. Mitchell, 172 F.3d 1104 (9th Cir. 1999) : The Court reversed a bank robbery conviction because the prosecution erroneously introduced evidence that the defendant was in very poor financial condition and unemployed at the time of the robbery. The evidence was offered under Rule 404(b) as proof of motive, but the Court found the Rule inapplicable because "[b]eing poor is not a crime, wrong, or act" within the Rule. The poverty evidence in this case was not only of negligible probative value -- "almost everyone, poor or not, has a motive to get more money[, a]nd most people, rich or poor, do not steal to get it" -- but it also produced a high danger of unfair prejudice when the prosecutor effectively portrayed the defendant as both poor and feckless, not supporting his wife and children.

United States v. Weller, 238 F.3d 1215 (10th Cir. 2001) : In a bank manager's trial for embezzlement, the prosecution introduced evidence that the defendant had an empty bank account and "maxed out" credit cards prior to the incident and had substantial cash in the weeks following. The Court found no abuse of discretion in admission of the evidence. Although ordinarily evidence of the defendant's poverty is inadmissible to show a motive for crime, a significant change in the defendant's financial status, as in this case, can be quite probative of the commission of a crime.

Shaps v. Provident Life & Acc. Ins. Co., 244 F.3d 876 (11th Cir. 2001) : In an action on a disability insurance policy, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion when the insurer was permitted to introduce evidence concerning the plaintiff's financial situation. The door was opened by counsel's remarks in his opening statement that the plaintiff had been expecting to receive her check from the defendant and had been relying on it to meet her needs, and by her testimony on direct about her inability to pay for treatment because her COBRA insurance had run out.

[94] Welfare Recipients

United States v. Jones, 72 F.3d 1324 (7th Cir. 1995) : Affirming convictions arising out of a counterfeiting scheme, the Court found no error in the admission of evidence that the defendants had received a small amount of public aid in the months prior to their arrests. The evidence was offered to establish the lack of a legitimate source of income for the $300 found in the pocket of one of the defendants when he was arrested in his home. The Court recognized that "testimony about a defendant's public aid history regrettably may pose a danger that the defendant will be stigmatized in the eyes of the jury," but "the source of the cash found on Mr. Jones' person after a day-long series of apparent sales of counterfeit was a significant issue in the case," and the evidence of public aid was especially probative because there was no genuine currency other than the $300 found in the defendants' home.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. Jordan v. Medley, 711 F.2d 211 (D.C. Cir. 1983) .

(n2)Footnote 2. United States v. Bland, 908 F.2d 471 (9th Cir. 1990) .

(n3)Footnote 3. United States v. Church, 955 F.2d 688 (11th Cir. 1992) .

(n4)Footnote 4. United States v. Hansen, 583 F.2d 325 (7th Cir. 1978) .

(n5)Footnote 5. United States v. Bejar-Matrecios, 618 F.2d 81 (9th Cir. 1980) .

(n6)Footnote 6. Fortino v. Quasar Co., 950 F.2d 389 (7th Cir. 1991) .

(n7)Footnote 7. United States v. Oreira, 29 F.3d 185 (5th Cir. 1994) .

(n8)Footnote 8. United States v. Carter, 969 F.2d 197 (6th Cir. 1992) .

(n9)Footnote 9. United States v. Jimenez, 214 F.3d 1095 (9th Cir. 2000) .

(n10)Footnote 10. United States v. Lawrence, 189 F.3d 838 (9th Cir. 1999) .

(n11)Footnote 11. United States v. Mitchell, 172 F.3d 1104 (9th Cir. 1999) .

(n12)Footnote 12. United States v. Ellis, 147 F.3d 1131 (9th Cir. 1998) .

(n13)Footnote 13. Shahid v. City of Detroit, 889 F.2d 1543 (6th Cir. 1989) .

(n14)Footnote 14. United States v. Thompson, 615 F.2d 329 (5th Cir. 1980) .

(n15)Footnote 15. United States v. Riley, 550 F.2d 233 (5th Cir. 1977) .

(n16)Footnote 16. United States v. Mulder, 147 F.3d 703 (8th Cir. 1998) .

(n17)Footnote 17. United States v. Dees, 34 F.3d 838 (9th Cir. 1994) .

(n18)Footnote 18. United States v. Blaylock, 20 F.3d 1458 (9th Cir. 1994) .

(n19)Footnote 19. Mullen v. Princess Anne Volunteer Fire Co., 853 F.2d 1130 (4th Cir. 1988) .

(n20)Footnote 20. Plemer v. Parsons-Gilbane, 713 F.2d 1127 (5th Cir. 1983) .

(n21)Footnote 21. Estes v. Dick Smith Ford, Inc., 856 F.2d 1097 (8th Cir. 1988) .

(n22)Footnote 22. Baker v. Delta Air Lines, Inc., 6 F.3d 632 (9th Cir. 1993) .

(n23)Footnote 23. Miller v. Fairchild Indus., 885 F.2d 498 (9th Cir. 1989) .

(n24)Footnote 24. Herber v. Johns-Manville Corp., 785 F.2d 79 (3d Cir. 1986) .

(n25)Footnote 25. Jackson v. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., 788 F.2d 1070 (5th Cir. 1986) .

(n26)Footnote 26. Koloda v. General Motors Parts Div., 716 F.2d 373 (6th Cir. 1983) .

(n27)Footnote 27. United States v. Driggs, 823 F.2d 52 (3d Cir. 1987) .

(n28)Footnote 28. United States v. Clifford, 704 F.2d 86 (3d Cir. 1983) .

(n29)Footnote 29. Borunda v. Richmond, 885 F.2d 1384 (9th Cir. 1988) .

(n30)Footnote 30. United States v. Schiff, 612 F.2d 73 (2d Cir. 1979) .

(n31)Footnote 31. United States v. Betancourt, 734 F.2d 750 (11th Cir. 1984) .

(n32)Footnote 32. Brown v. Trustees of Boston Univ., 891 F.2d 337 (1st Cir. 1989) .

(n33)Footnote 33. K-B Trucking Co. v. Riss Int'l Co., 763 F.2d 1148 (10th Cir. 1985) .

(n34)Footnote 34. United States v. Long, 574 F.2d 761 (3d Cir. 1978) .

(n35)Footnote 35. United States v. Lowe, 569 F.2d 1113 (10th Cir. 1978) .

(n36)Footnote 36. United States v. Werme, 939 F.2d 108 (3d Cir. 1991) .

(n37)Footnote 37. Government of Virgin Islands v. Mujahid, 990 F.2d 111 (3d Cir. 1993) .

(n38)Footnote 38. United States v. Frankenberry, 696 F.2d 239 (3d Cir. 1982) .

(n39)Footnote 39. United States v. Lochmondy, 890 F.2d 817 (6th Cir. 1989) .

(n40)Footnote 40. United States v. Christian, 786 F.2d 203 (6th Cir. 1986) .

(n41)Footnote 41. In re Air Crash Disaster, 803 F.2d 304 (7th Cir. 1986) .

(n42)Footnote 42. SCM Corp. v. Xerox Corp., 77 F.R.D. 10 (D. Conn. 1977) .

(n43)Footnote 43. Johnson v. Busby, 953 F.2d 349 (8th Cir. 1991) .

(n44)Footnote 44. Tony Guiffre Distrib. Co. v. Washington Metro. Area Transit Auth., 740 F.2d 295 (4th Cir. 1984) .

(n45)Footnote 45. Ryan v. McDonough Power Equip. Co., 734 F.2d 385 (8th Cir. 1984) .

(n46)Footnote 46. United States v. Reevey, 364 F.3d 151 (4th Cir. 2004) .

(n47)Footnote 47. United States v. Hill, 322 F.3d 301 (4th Cir. 2003) .

(n48)Footnote 48. United States v. Morris, 79 F.3d 409 (5th Cir. 1996) .

(n49)Footnote 49. United States v. Valencia, 957 F.2d 1189 (5th Cir. 1992) .

(n50)Footnote 50. United States v. Moody, 903 F.2d 321 (5th Cir. 1990) .

(n51)Footnote 51. United States v. Perrone, 936 F.2d 1403 (2d Cir. 1991) , clarified, 949 F.2d 36 (2d Cir. 1991) .

(n52)Footnote 52. United States v. Dillon, 870 F.2d 1125 (6th Cir. 1989)

(n53)Footnote 53. United States v. Lupino, 301 F.3d 642 (8th Cir. 2002) .

(n54)Footnote 54. United States v. Martinez, 681 F.2d 1248 (10th Cir. 1982) .

(n55)Footnote 55. United States v. Bein, 728 F.2d 107 (2d Cir. 1984) .

(n56)Footnote 56. United States v. Pina, 844 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1988) .

(n57)Footnote 57. United States v. Thomas, 86 F.3d 647 (7th Cir. 1996) .

(n58)Footnote 58. United States v. Edwards, 702 F.2d 529 (5th Cir. 1983) .

(n59)Footnote 59. United States v. Kizeart, 102 F.3d 320 (7th Cir. 1996) .

(n60)Footnote 60. United States v. Williams, 81 F.3d 1434 (7th Cir. 1996) .

(n61)Footnote 61. United States v. Ives, 609 F.2d 930 (9th Cir. 1979) .

(n62)Footnote 62. O'Dell v. Hercules, Inc., 904 F.2d 1194 (8th Cir. 1990) .

(n63)Footnote 63. Plummer v. Western Int'l Hotels Co., 656 F.2d 502 (9th Cir. 1981) , annotated under Rule 803(8) "Administrative Findings -- Investigations -- Employment Cases," § 803.03[8][a][i][A].

(n64)Footnote 64. Roy v. Austin Co., 194 F.3d 840 (7th Cir. 1999) .

(n65)Footnote 65. Kline v. City of Kansas City, Mo., Fire Dep't, 175 F.3d 660 (8th Cir. 1999) .

(n66)Footnote 66. Easley v. American Greetings Corp., 158 F.3d 974 (8th Cir. 1998) .

(n67)Footnote 67. Callanan v. Runyun, 75 F.3d 1293 (8th Cir. 1996) .

(n68)Footnote 68. Slathar v. Sather Trucking Corp., 78 F.3d 415 (8th Cir. 1996) .

(n69)Footnote 69. Swajian v. General Motors Corp., 916 F.2d 31 (1st Cir. 1990) .

(n70)Footnote 70. Szeliga v. General Motors Corp., 728 F.2d 566 (1st Cir. 1984) .

(n71)Footnote 71. Hale v. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., 820 F.2d 928 (8th Cir. 1987) .

(n72)Footnote 72. 756 F.2d 1322 (8th Cir. 1985) .

(n73)Footnote 73. Gilbert v. Cosco Inc., 989 F.2d 399 (10th Cir. 1993) .

(n74)Footnote 74. Hinds v. General Motors Corp., 988 F.2d 1039 (10th Cir. 1993) .

(n75)Footnote 75. United States v. Jones, 124 F.3d 781 (6th Cir. 1997) .

(n76)Footnote 76. United States v. Metzger, 778 F.2d 1195 (6th Cir. 1985) .

(n77)Footnote 77. United States v. Rackley, 742 F.2d 1266 (11th Cir. 1984) .

(n78)Footnote 78. Borough v. Duluth, M. & I.R. RR. Co., 762 F.2d 66 (8th Cir. 1985) .

(n79)Footnote 79. Patterson v. F.W. Woolworth Co., 786 F.2d 874 (8th Cir. 1986) .

(n80)Footnote 80. Cowens v. Siemens-Elema AB, 837 F.2d 817 (8th Cir. 1988) .

(n81)Footnote 81. Randall v. Warnaco, Inc., 677 F.2d 1226 (8th Cir. 1982) .

(n82)Footnote 82. Johnson v. United States, 780 F.2d 902 (11th Cir. 1986) .

(n83)Footnote 83. Nickerson v. G.D. Searle & Co., 900 F.2d 412 (1st Cir. 1990) .

(n84)Footnote 84. Lohrmann v. Pittsburgh Corning Corp., 782 F.2d 1156 (4th Cir. 1986) .

(n85)Footnote 85. United States v. Echavarria-Olarte, 904 F.2d 1391 (9th Cir. 1990) .

(n86)Footnote 86. United States v. Westbrook, 125 F.3d 996 (7th Cir. 1997) .

(n87)Footnote 87. United States v. Sargent, 98 F.3d 325 (7th Cir. 1996) .

(n88)Footnote 88. United States v. Irvin, 87 F.3d 860 (7th Cir. 1996) .

(n89)Footnote 89. United States v. Butler, 71 F.3d 243 (7th Cir. 1995) .

(n90)Footnote 90. United States v. Lemon, 239 F.3d 968 (8th Cir. 2001) .

(n91)Footnote 91. United States v. Sills, 120 F.3d 917 (8th Cir. 1997) .

(n92)Footnote 92. United States v. Johnson, 28 F.3d 1487 (8th Cir. 1994) .

(n93)Footnote 93. United States v. Takahashi, 205 F.3d 1161 (9th Cir. 2000) .

(n94)Footnote 94. United States v. Hankey, 203 F.3d 1160 (9th Cir. 2000) .

(n95)Footnote 95. United States v. Easter, 66 F.3d 1018 (9th Cir. 1995) .

(n96)Footnote 96. United States v. Johnson, 952 F.2d 565 (1st Cir. 1991) .

(n97)Footnote 97. United States v. Parada-Talamantes, 32 F.3d 168 (5th Cir. 1994) .

(n98)Footnote 98. United States v. Valdez, 722 F.2d 1196 (5th Cir. 1984) .

(n99)Footnote 99. United States v. Harrelson, 754 F.2d 1153 (5th Cir. 1985) .

(n100)Footnote 100. Drabik v. Stanley-Bostitch, Inc., 997 F.2d 496 (8th Cir. 1993) .

(n101)Footnote 101. United States v. Cavender, 228 F.3d 792 (7th Cir. 2000) .

(n102)Footnote 102. United States v. Santos, 201 F.3d 953 (7th Cir. 2000) .

(n103)Footnote 103. United States v. Balsam, 203 F.3d 72 (1st Cir. 2000) .

(n104)Footnote 104. United States v. Kozinski, 16 F.3d 795 (7th Cir. 1994) .

(n105)Footnote 105. Taylor v. National R.R. Passenger Corp., 920 F.2d 1372 (7th Cir. 1990) .

(n106)Footnote 106. Harrell v. DCS Equip. Leasing Corp., 951 F.2d 1453 (5th Cir. 1992) .

(n107)Footnote 107. Kinan v. City of Brockton, 876 F.2d 1029 (1st Cir. 1989) .

(n108)Footnote 108. Silva v. Showcase Cinemas Concessions, Inc., 736 F.2d 810 (1st Cir. 1984) .

(n109)Footnote 109. Brumley Estate v. Iowa Beef Processors, Inc., 704 F.2d 1351 (5th Cir. 1983) .

(n110)Footnote 110. Rozier v. Ford Motor Co., 573 F.2d 1332 (5th Cir. 1978) .

(n111)Footnote 111. United States v. Ebner, 782 F.2d 1120 (2d Cir. 1986) .

(n112)Footnote 112. Hendrix v. Raybestos-Manhattan, Inc., 776 F.2d 1492 (11th Cir. 1985) .

(n113)Footnote 113. Worsham v. A.H. Robins Co., 734 F.2d 676 (11th Cir. 1984) .

(n114)Footnote 114. United States v. Alwan, 279 F.3d 431 (7th Cir. 2002) .

(n115)Footnote 115. Lawson v. Trowbridge, 153 F.3d 368 (7th Cir. 1998) .

(n116)Footnote 116. Raysor v. Port Auth., 768 F.2d 34 (2d Cir. 1985) .

(n117)Footnote 117. United States v. Perry, 731 F.2d 985 (D.C. Cir. 1984) .

(n118)Footnote 118. United States v. Thomlinson, 897 F.2d 971 (8th Cir. 1990) .

(n119)Footnote 119. United States v. Kime, 99 F.3d 870 (8th Cir. 1996) .

(n120)Footnote 120. United States v. Ingle, 157 F.3d 1147 (8th Cir. 1998) .

(n121)Footnote 121. United States v. Davidson, 122 F.3d 531 (8th Cir. 1997) .

(n122)Footnote 122. United States v. Adames, 56 F.3d 737 (7th Cir. 1995) .

(n123)Footnote 123. Durflinger v. Artiles, 727 F.2d 888 (10th Cir. 1984) .

(n124)Footnote 124. United States v. Gonzalez, 933 F.2d 417 (7th Cir. 1991) .

(n125)Footnote 125. United States v. Davis, 838 F.2d 909 (7th Cir. 1988) .

(n126)Footnote 126. United States v. Kime, 99 F.3d 870 (8th Cir. 1996) .

(n127)Footnote 127. United States v. Thomlinson, 897 F.2d 971 (8th Cir. 1990) .

(n128)Footnote 128. United States v. Allen, 787 F.2d 933 (4th Cir. 1986) , vacated on other grounds, 479 U.S. 1077 (1987) .

(n129)Footnote 129. E.g., United States v. Pace, 10 F.3d 1106 (5th Cir. 1993) (supra).

(n130)Footnote 130. United States v. Farnsworth, 729 F.2d 1158 (8th Cir. 1984) .

(n131)Footnote 131. United States v. LaPierre, 998 F.2d 1460 (9th Cir. 1993) .

(n132)Footnote 132. United States v. Butcher, 557 F.2d 666 (9th Cir. 1977) .

(n133)Footnote 133. Wolfel v. Holbrook, 823 F.2d 970 (6th Cir. 1987) .

(n134)Footnote 134. Murphy v. Cincinnati Ins. Co., 772 F.2d 273 (6th Cir. 1985) .

(n135)Footnote 135. United States v. Feldman, 711 F.2d 758 (7th Cir. 1983) .

(n136)Footnote 136. United States v. Tucker, 773 F.2d 136 (7th Cir. 1985) .

(n137)Footnote 137. United States v. Lea, 249 F.3d 632 (7th Cir. 2001) .

(n138)Footnote 138. United States v. Robbins, 197 F.3d 829 (7th Cir. 1999) .

(n139)Footnote 139. United States v. Pulido, 69 F.3d 192 (7th Cir. 1995) .

(n140)Footnote 140. United States v. Falsia, 724 F.2d 1339 (9th Cir. 1983) .

(n141)Footnote 141. United States v. Solomon, 753 F.2d 1522 (9th Cir. 1985) .

(n142)Footnote 142. United States v. Miller, 874 F.2d 1255 (9th Cir. 1989) .

(n143)Footnote 143. United States v. Candoli, 870 F.2d 496 (9th Cir. 1989) .

(n144)Footnote 144. Dollar v. Long Mfg., N.C., Inc., 561 F.2d 613 (5th Cir. 1977) .

(n145)Footnote 145. United States v. Gomez-Norena, 908 F.2d 497 (9th Cir. 1990) .

(n146)Footnote 146. United States v. Vue, 13 F.3d 1206 (8th Cir. 1994) .

(n147)Footnote 147. United States v. One Feather, 702 F.2d 736 (8th Cir. 1983) .

(n148)Footnote 148. United States v. Sun Myung Moon, 718 F.2d 1210 (2d Cir. 1983) .

(n149)Footnote 149. Jackson v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 750 F.2d 1314 (5th Cir. 1985) (en banc).

(n150)Footnote 150. United States v. Saunders, 886 F.2d 56 (4th Cir. 1989) .

(n151)Footnote 151. United States v. One Feather, 702 F.2d 736 (8th Cir. 1983) .

(n152)Footnote 152. United States v. Ham, 998 F.2d 1247 (4th Cir. 1993) .

(n153)Footnote 153. United States v. Kilbourne, 559 F.2d 1263 (4th Cir. 1977) .

(n154)Footnote 154. United States v. Frick, 588 F.2d 531 (5th Cir. 1979) .

(n155)Footnote 155. United States v. Grassi, 602 F.2d 1192 (5th Cir. 1979) , vacated & remanded on other grounds, 448 U.S. 902 (1980) .

(n156)Footnote 156. United States v. LaChapelle, 969 F.2d 632 (8th Cir. 1992) .

(n157)Footnote 157. United States v. Fawbush, 900 F.2d 150 (8th Cir. 1990) .

(n158)Footnote 158. United States v. Abodeely, 801 F.2d 1020 (8th Cir. 1986) .

(n159)Footnote 159. United States v. Bland, 908 F.2d 471 (9th Cir. 1990) .

(n160)Footnote 160. United States v. Gillespie, 852 F.2d 475 (9th Cir. 1988) .

(n161)Footnote 161. Will v. Comprehensive Accounting Corp., 776 F.2d 665 (7th Cir. 1985) .

(n162)Footnote 162. Hicks v. Six Flags Over Mid-America, 821 F.2d 1311 (8th Cir. 1987) .

(n163)Footnote 163. Mills v. Beech Aircraft Corp., 886 F.2d. 758 (5th Cir. 1989) .

(n164)Footnote 164. Soden v. Freightliner Corp., 714 F.2d 498 (5th Cir. 1983) .

(n165)Footnote 165. Hale v. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., 820 F.2d 928 (8th Cir. 1987) .

(n166)Footnote 166. Four Corners Helicopters, Inc. v. Turbomeca, S.A., 979 F.2d 1434 (10th Cir. 1992) .

(n167)Footnote 167. C.A. Assoc. v. Dow Chem. Co., 918 F.2d 1485 (10th Cir. 1990) .

(n168)Footnote 168. Marsee v. United States Tobacco Co., 639 F. Supp. 466 (W.D. Okla. 1986) , aff'd, 866 F.2d 319 (10th Cir. 1989) .

(n169)Footnote 169. Romine v. Parman, 831 F.2d 944 (10th Cir. 1987) .

(n170)Footnote 170. United States v. Bass, 794 F.2d 1305 (8th Cir. 1986) .

(n171)Footnote 171. United States v. Pedroza, 750 F.2d 187 (2d Cir. 1984) .

(n172)Footnote 172. United States v. Grassi, 602 F.2d 1192 (5th Cir. 1979) , vacated & remanded on other grounds, 448 U.S. 902 (1980) .

(n173)Footnote 173. Reeves v. Sanderson Plumbing Prods, Inc., 530 U.S. 133 (2000) .

(n174)Footnote 174. United States v. Di Pasquale, 740 F.2d 1282 (3d Cir. 1984) .

(n175)Footnote 175. Conway v. Chemical Leaman Tank Lines, Inc., 687 F.2d 108 (5th Cir. 1982) .

(n176)Footnote 176. United States v. Davis, 357 F.3d 726 (8th Cir. 2004), vacated on other grounds, 543 U.S. 1099 (2005) .

(n177)Footnote 177. Scaggs v. Consolidated Rail Corp., 6 F.3d 1290 (7th Cir. 1993) .

(n178)Footnote 178. United States v. Rewald, 889 F.2d 836 (9th Cir. 1989) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 403 RULE 403

1-403 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 403.04

403.04 Legislative History

Advisory Committee's Note

The case law recognizes that certain circumstances call for the exclusion of evidence which is of unquestioned relevance. These circumstances entail risks which range all the way from inducing decision on a purely emotional basis, at one extreme, to nothing more harmful than merely wasting time, at the other extreme. Situations in this area call for balancing the probative value of and need for the evidence against the harm likely to result from its admission. Slough, Relevancy Unraveled, 5 Kan. L. Rev. 1, 12-15 (1956); Trautman, Logical or Legal Relevancy -- A Conflict in Theory, 5 Van. L. Rev. 385, 392 (1952); McCormick § 152, pp. 319-21. The rules which follow in this Article are concrete applications evolved for particular situations. However, they reflect the policies underlying the present rule, which is designed as a guide for the handling of situations for which no specific rules have been formulated.

Exclusion for risk of unfair prejudice, confusion of issues, misleading the jury, or waste of time, all find ample support in the authorities. "Unfair prejudice" within its context means an undue tendency to suggest decision on an improper basis, commonly, though not necessarily, an emotional one.

The rule does not enumerate surprise as a ground for exclusion, in this respect following Wigmore's view of the common law. 6 Wigmore § 1849. Cf. McCormick § 152, p. 320, n. 29, listing unfair surprise as a ground for exclusion but stating that it is usually "coupled with the danger of prejudice and confusion of issues." While Uniform Rule 45 incorporates surprise as a ground and is followed in Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60-445, surprise is not included in California Evidence Code § 352 or New Jersey Rule 4, though both the latter otherwise substantially embody Uniform Rule 45. While it can scarcely be doubted that claims of unfair surprise may still be justified despite procedural requirements of notice and instrumentalities of discovery, the granting of a continuance is a more appropriate remedy than exclusion of the evidence. Tentative Recommendation and a Study Relating to the Uniform Rules of Evidence (Art. VI. Extrinsic Policies Affecting Admissibility), Cal. Law Revision Comm'n, Rep., Rec. & Studies, 612 (1964). Moreover, the impact of a rule excluding evidence on the ground of surprise would be difficult to estimate.

In reaching a decision whether to exclude on grounds of unfair prejudice, consideration should be given to the probable effectiveness or lack of effectiveness of a limiting instruction. See Rule 106 [Ed. Note: This is now Rule 105.] and Advisory Committee's Note thereunder. The availability of other means of proof may also be an appropriate factor.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
Supp. To CHAPTER 403 RULE 403

1-403 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 403, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 403. Exclusion of Relevant Evidence on Grounds of Prejudice, Confusion,	Rule 403. Excluding Relevant Evidence for Prejudice, Confusion, Waste of Time, or

or Waste of Time	Other Reasons
Although relevant, evidence may be excluded if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading	The court may exclude relevant evidence if its probative value is substantially outweighed by a danger of one or more of the following: unfair prejudice, confusing the

ing the jury, or by con-sid-era-tions of un-due dela y, wast e of time , or need less pres enta-tion of cu-mu-lat-ive evid en-ce.	is-sues, mis-lead-ing the jury, un-due dela y, wast ing time , or need lessl y pres ent-ing cu-mu-lat-ive evid en-ce.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 403 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
Supp. To CHAPTER 403 RULE 403

1-403 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 403.03

Supp. to § 403.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[1] Abuse of Discretion [Go To Main]

[a] Admission of Evidence

[iv] Abuse of Discretion -- Admission of Evidence -- Criminal Acts

United States v. Quattrone, 441 F.3d 153 (2d Cir. 2006) : In a prosecution for obstructing securities law investigations by, inter alia, sending an e-mail that endorsed another e-mail regarding document retention, the defendant claimed that his endorsement e-mail was sent in a flurry of e-mails at the end of the day and he was not thinking of the then-pending investigation. The government cross-examined the defendant about one of the accompanying e-mails, which sought a disputed $2 million fee, in a way that intimated he had run afoul of the securities laws because the compensation was not disclosed in SEC filings. Vacating the conviction on other grounds, the Court held that evidence about the accompanying e-mail was relevant to show the defendant was contemplating significant, important issues around the time he sent the endorsement e-mail and to rebut his testimony implying that the fee dispute was a simple matter. However, the government's focus on the failure to make SEC disclosures simply "went too far" in creating the prospect that the jury might consider the evidence as further proof of the defendant's desire to obstruct the SEC in the pursuit of its regulatory responsibilities.

United States v. Morena, 547 F.3d 191 (3d Cir. 2008) : The Court reversed a conviction for felon firearm possession and possession of a sawed-off shotgun because "the government's repeated injection of prejudicial drug evidence into the trial testimony constituted prosecutorial misconduct resulting in a denial of due process." Although the defendant was never charged with any drug offenses, the government contended that some discussion of drugs was necessary for background and it would show the shotgun was possessed to protect a drug dealing enterprise. However, the prosecution repeatedly went beyond that purpose to inject inadmissible drug evidence, such as evidence of heroin dealing not connected with the defendant and evidence of the defendant's drug use problem, even though the Judge declared at least five times that the evidence was "too prejudicial." "Nevertheless, the District Court ultimately failed to prevent the rampant injection of inadmissible evidence into the trial and its single limiting instruction to the jury was inadequate to cure the prejudice."

[viii] Abuse of Discretion -- Admission of Evidence -- Hearsay Offered for Background

United States v. Davis, 449 F.3d 842 (8th Cir. 2006) : In a prosecution for felon firearm possession, the government introduced the first page of the warrant issued in the case. The government argued that the face sheet of the warrant was introduced for the limited purpose of explaining why the officers were present at the residence where the gun was found. The Court found that while the face sheet was offered for a non-hearsay purpose, it should have been excluded under Rule 403. The face sheet of the warrant indicated that there was probable cause to believe that there were weapons at a specific residence and that the defendant lived there. "Since a key issue in the case was whether the house was Davis' residence, there was a danger that the face sheet could unduly influence the jury in its factfinding. ... Given the danger that the jury could be confused and that the prejudicial effect of the exhibit could outweigh its probative value, we conclude that it was an abuse of discretion to admit the face sheet of the warrant, particularly when Davis was willing to admit that the officers had a legal basis to search." The error was harmless, however.

[x] Abuse of Discretion -- Admission of Evidence -- Miscellaneous Civil Cases

Arlio v. Lively, 474 F.3d 46 (2d Cir. 2007) : A police officer sued the acting chief of the department, alleging that he had been disciplined in violation of his constitutional rights. The Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff because evidence was presented that an arbitration panel had overturned the discipline and awarded the officer back pay. The evidence was irrelevant because the arbitration was based solely on the particulars of the union collective bargaining agreement and was not in any way an adjudication of constitutional claims. Furthermore, as an explanation of why the plaintiff was not seeking back wages, it was probative of a non-material issue, since "[l]ost wages were simply not an issue in the federal proceeding." In any event, the prejudicial effect of the evidence would outweigh any probative value, "as the jury might have felt a strong compulsion to conform their verdict to the conclusion of the Arbitration Board 'experts.' "

[xi] Abuse of Discretion -- Admission of Evidence -- Miscellaneous Prosecution Evidence

United States v. Massino, 546 F.3d 123 (2d Cir. 2008) : Affirming racketeering convictions, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to allow the government to pursue a line of questioning with a government witness (a former high-ranking member of a crime family) that was designed to "prompt the witness to declare that anyone linked to organized crime who is charged with a crime is guilty of that crime," as the potential for unfair prejudice substantially outweighed the probative value.

United States v. Klebig, 600 F.3d 700 (7th Cir. 2009) : The defendant was prosecuted for possession of an unregistered firearm (a rifle with its barrel sawed off and its stock missing) and an unregistered silencer (an automobile oil filter) after the items, along with more than 20 legal firearms, were found in his junk-filled house. Reversing, the Court held it was error to admit evidence of a sign on the defendant's front door that "nothing here is worth dying for," as it had no tendency to prove that the defendant knew the firearm was an illegal modified rifle or a legal modified pistol, or his intent to use the oil filter as an illegal silencer or a legal flash suppressor. Any slight relevance it might have was outweighed by the dangers of unfair prejudice and confusion of the issues. The Court also held it was error to admit an accumulation of evidence that made the defendant "appear to be a dangerous and perhaps unbalanced man, an oddball, perhaps a survivalist or a gun nut," and to permit presentation of evidence regarding his legal firearms in a way that played into jurors' apprehensions about guns. Finally, the Court found prosecutorial misconduct when in closing argument the government attorney demonstrated that the alleged silencer fit on to the sawed-off rifle, where there was no evidence in the record that tied the items together.

United States v. Baker, 432 F.3d 1189 (11th Cir. 2005) : The Court held that testimony that one defendant in a cocaine distribution conspiracy had appeared on the television shows "Crimestoppers" and "America's Most Wanted" was improperly admitted, since it was unfairly prejudicial, telling the jurors to believe that the defendant was guilty of the charged offenses.

[b] Abuse of Discretion -- Exclusion of Evidence

[iii] Abuse of Discretion -- Exclusion of Evidence -- Employment Discrimination Cases

Mattenson v. Baxter Healthcare Corp., 438 F.3d 763 (7th Cir. 2006) : The plaintiff in an ADEA case, who was terminated just days before retirement benefits vested, claimed that all his performance evaluations had been satisfactory until the last. The defendant claimed that the plaintiff was terminated because he refused to comply with a "performance" plan, but the plaintiff argued that the plan was just a subterfuge to fire him. Reversing a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court held it was error to exclude evidence that the plaintiff had been placed on a performance plan five years previously, since that would have undermined his claim that the employer always fires employees it places on performance plans.

[iv] Abuse of Discretion -- Exclusion of Evidence -- Miscellaneous Cases

Henderson v. George Washington Univ., 449 F.3d 127 (D.C. Cir. 2006) : The plaintiff sued a doctor for malpractice in performing stomach-shrinking surgery, contending that a connection he added (called an anastomosis) was too wide for the surgery to be effective. Evidence that the doctor performed the same surgery in which the anastomosis was too wide on another patient, and the doctor's deposition testimony in which he said that he always used that same width for the anastomosis in every surgery, were excluded at trial on the grounds they were minimally probative, would prejudice the defendants' case, and would confuse the jury. Reversing a judgment for the defendant, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to exclude the evidence. It found that the Judge "greatly overestimated the potential for prejudice and confusion, and seriously underestimated the probative value in light of appellant's need to impeach and rebut the case presented by appellees as well as to rehabilitate her expert witness." The evidence was probative because it provided direct proof of the width of the anastomosis in the plaintiff's surgery; the Judge mischaracterized the evidence as prejudicial when in fact the only "harm" caused to the defendant's case was that the evidence was probative; and the evidence could have been easily understood by the jury.

[2] Acquittals and Dismissals [Go To Main]

Munoz v. State Farm Lloyds of Texas, 522 F.3d 568 (5th Cir. 2008) : In an action on a fire insurance policy, the insurer defended on the ground that the plaintiffs had intentionally set the fire. Reversing a judgment for the plaintiffs, the Court held it was reversible error to admit evidence that a grand jury did not indict the husband for arson, as such evidence is highly prejudicial. Although the plaintiffs argued that the insurer had opened the door to the evidence by introducing evidence that the husband had failed a polygraph examination, which they said was per se inadmissible, the Court noted that Daubert governs the admissibility of polygraph examination results, that neither party alleged that the results in this case were improperly admitted under Daubert, and that the plaintiffs had not objected to the introduction of the results at trial. Therefore, there was no support for the contention that the polygraph evidence was inadmissible and the door was not opened to the evidence of non-indictment.

[2.1] Alternative Perpetrator Evidence [Go To Main]

United States v. Jordan, 485 F.3d 1214 (10th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed the defendant's conviction for the stabbing murder of a fellow inmate, finding no abuse of discretion (although "[i]n hindsight, we might have evaluated [the] proffer somewhat differently") in the exclusion of evidence proffered to support an argument that another inmate was the perpetrator. The evidence -- that the other inmate had possessed shanks in the past, that he was near the victim ten minutes prior to the stabbing, and that there was unidentified DNA on the murder weapon -- failed sufficiently to establish "a non-speculative 'nexus' between the crime charged and the alleged perpetrator."

[3] Appellate Review Standard [Go To Main]

United States v. Awadallah, 436 F.3d 125 (2d Cir. 2006) : In a prosecution for perjury before a grand jury, the Trial Judge ruled in limine that the government could call grand jurors to testify about the defendant's physical condition and the objective conditions surrounding his testimony, but could not ask the grand jurors about their subjective impressions of the defendant's demeanor and appearance. Affirming on interlocutory appeal, the Court observed that "the Government has tried hundreds, if not thousands, of perjury cases without eliciting opinion evidence from a grand juror to prove knowledge," and "[n]one of our opinions indicate that a grand juror has ever previously been called in this Circuit to give such testimony." The Court concluded that it was "well within the broad discretion afforded" a Trial Judge to rule that grand juror testimony could be interpreted as giving the petit jurors advice on how to determine the central issue in the case. It emphasized that only rarely "and in extraordinarily compelling circumstances" will a Trial Judge's Rule 403 rulings be reversed, and held that "[b]ecause the testimony, although relevant, indisputably has potential to be highly prejudicial, we cannot say that the district court's limitation on the testimony of grand jurors was arbitrary or irrational."

United States v. Cerno, 529 F.3d 926 (10th Cir. 2008) : Affirming a conviction for aggravated sexual abuse, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony that, upon returning home from a wake, the victim and other family members found the defendant passed out on a couch with his penis exposed while a pornographic videotape played on the television. The Trial Judge found that the evidence tended to impeach the defendant's testimony that drinking did not impair his judgment. The Court stated that "this is a close question and we may well have come to a different conclusion ourselves" but "our own view of the issue is not relevant under the applicable standard of review." The Court found the exposure evidence "had some relevance as impeachment by contradiction." And while the evidence was prejudicial, "it is not enough that the risk of unfair prejudice be greater than the probative value of the evidence; the danger of that evidence must substantially outweigh the evidence's probative value." The Court noted that in reviewing a decision under Rule 403, it gives the evidence "its maximum reasonable probative force and its minimum reasonable prejudicial value."

[4] Arbitration Decisions [Go To Main]

Arlio v. Lively, 474 F.3d 46 (2d Cir. 2007) : A police officer sued the acting chief of the department, alleging that he had been disciplined in violation of his constitutional rights. The Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff because evidence was presented that an arbitration panel had overturned the discipline and awarded the officer back pay. The evidence was irrelevant because the arbitration was based solely on the particulars of the union collective bargaining agreement and was not in any way an adjudication of constitutional claims. Furthermore, as an explanation of why the plaintiff was not seeking back wages, it was probative of a non-material issue, since "[l]ost wages were simply not an issue in the federal proceeding." In any event, the prejudicial effect of the evidence would outweigh any probative value, "as the jury might have felt a strong compulsion to conform their verdict to the conclusion of the Arbitration Board 'experts.' "

[6] Balancing [Go To Main]

[b] Balancing -- Bounds of Discretion To Admit

United States v. Starnes, 583 F.3d 196 (3d Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions for violating EPA work-practice standards for handling disposal of asbestos-containing materials and making false representations, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by an EPA technical coordinator regarding samples of ceiling material that contained unacceptable levels of asbestos, even though the samples were from a structure on the project site in which the defendants did not work and were taken a year after the conduct charged in the indictment. The government supported the introduction of the evidence by demonstrating that the ceilings in all the buildings on the site were made of the same materials and that no structural changes or significant renovations had been made.

United States v. Clark, 577 F.3d 273 (5th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed tax fraud convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the IRS audited the taxpayers whose returns the defendant prepared, and all taxpayers filed amended returns or agreed to deficiency assessments and were thereafter assessed additional tax liabilities. The evidence was probative of the materiality of the false information on the returns, and it was not unfairly prejudicial because there was nothing unfair about the inference that if the taxpayers had to make adjustments, it was due to the defendant's wrongdoing.

United States v. Caver, 470 F.3d 220 (6th Cir. 2006) : Affirming convictions for cocaine offenses, the Court found no plain error in the admission of various letters that two defendants wrote to coconspirators. The defendants were charged with obstruction of justice, and the letters could be construed as an on-going attempt to influence witnesses. Although the defendants complained that the letters contained foul language and derogatory terms for counsel and the criminal justice system, the Court found that any improper prejudice was slight, and in a case where the probative value was low and the prejudice was slight there was no plain error in admitting the evidence. In United States v. Whittington, 455 F.3d 736 (6th Cir. 2006), a prosecution for conspiracy to distribute cocaine base, the Trial Judge denied a defense motion in limine to exclude evidence from two officers that, at times when the defendant was unemployed, one officer found him with $500 cash and a cell phone and the other officer found him with $600 cash and a cell phone. While admitting the evidence, the Trial Judge required the government to question one officer without revealing that he was the defendant's parole officer. Affirming, the Court noted that in United States v. Rey, 923 F.2d 1217 (6th Cir. 1991) , it had held that a mobile phone, beeper, and answering machine did not tend to inflame the passions of a jury. It concluded that cash and a cell phone were similar neutral items.

[f] Balancing -- Generally

United States v. Cooper, 591 F.3d 582 (7th Cir. 2010) : In a prosecution for heroin distribution, the government was permitted to introduce evidence that a number of the defendant's customers died from heroin overdose. The Judge reasoned that the evidence was "relevant"; but nothing on the record indicated that the Judge had considered the risk of prejudice or the minimal probative value of the deaths to the question of drug distribution. The Court held that the Trial Court "erred by failing altogether to conduct a Rule 403 analysis, which was part of the process that it had no discretion to omit."

United States v. McCourt, 468 F.3d 1088 (8th Cir. 2006) : In a prosecution for attempted distribution and receipt of child pornography over the Internet, seven three-second video clips containing child pornography that were found on the defendant's computer were admitted. Affirming, the Court rejected a defense argument that the Judge had failed to conduct a Rule 403 balancing in deciding whether to admit the video clips rather than the defendant's stipulations that they contained child pornography. Although the Judge did not enter into a lengthy analysis during the motion in limine conference, "the Trial Court's mere failure to make a record of its rule 403 weighing is not reversible error." Moreover, a more thorough balancing evaluation would not have changed the result because " Rule 403 requires a preliminary showing of unfair prejudice before the need to balance the probative value of the evidence and its alternatives arises," and here there was no showing that the evidence was unfairly prejudicial. While video may be more prejudicial than still photographs, the Court concluded that "we see no reason here that the Government must limit its evidence to still images because McCourt did not so limit his collection."

United States v. Lyons, 472 F.3d 1055 (9th Cir. 2007) : Affirming convictions for mail fraud and money laundering arising from a telemarketing scheme, the Court held that the prejudicial effect of evidence that 80-90% of solicited funds went to telemarketers' fees did not substantially outweigh the probative value of the evidence. The evidence tended to show that the charities for which money was solicited spent virtually no money on charitable activities promised to donors.

United States v. Smith, 459 F.3d 1276 (11th Cir. 2006) : Affirming convictions for producing and possessing child pornography, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting photographs of the defendant naked by himself; the defendant with other women engaged in sexually explicit conduct; and other women striking sexually explicit poses. The Court recognized that balancing under Rule 403 "should be struck in favor of admissibility," so Judges should "look at the evidence in a light most favorable to its admission, maximizing its probative value and minimizing its undue prejudicial impact." Here, although there was a possibility of prejudice, the jury could have evaluated the evidence as probative of identity, knowledge, and sexual content. Furthermore, while "the nature of the crime itself, and therefore the nature of the evidence tending to prove it, is emotionally charged," this "does not mean that the prosecution must be deprived of its most probative evidence," and that "this is particularly true when the Trial Court ... offers limiting instructions as to the proper purpose of admitting evidence."

[9.1] Circumstantial Evidence [Go To Main]

United States v. Williams, 445 F.3d 724 (4th Cir. 2006) : In a trial for felon firearm possession, the prosecution proved the defendant's possession of the weapon (which was never found) through evidence linking the defendant to a murder. Arguing that the evidence of the uncharged crime was unfairly prejudicial, the defendant attempted to distinguish this case from others in which a shooting was used to prove weapons charges on the ground that here the evidence connecting him to the murder was purely circumstantial, while in the other cases the evidence linking the accused to a murder was overwhelming. The Court affirmed the conviction, noting that "circumstantial evidence is not inherently less valuable or less probative than direct evidence" and that there is no basis in Rule 403 for applying a heightened standard for circumstantial evidence. It further noted, however, that both the circumstantial nature of the evidence and the fact it pointed to an uncharged murder bore on the Rule 403 calculus of probative value and prejudicial effect. It concluded that the Judge's balancing here was not an abuse of discretion.

[10] Civil Rights Cases [Go To Main]

[a] Arrestee's or Prisoner's Evidence

Shepherd v. Dallas County, 591 F.3d 445 (5th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a judgment for a pretrial detainee who sued the county alleging that he was improperly denied pills needed to ameliorate chronic hypertension, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of a Department of Justice report regarding the conditions at the jail and the County's provision of medical care. The credibility of the authors of the report was for the jury to decide, the relevance of the report could not be "seriously doubted" given that the County did not challenge the findings in meetings with the Department in Washington, and the report was not unfairly prejudicial.

[c] Civil Rights Cases -- Other Evidence

Nolan v. Memphis City Schools, 589 F.3d 257 (6th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a judgment for defendants in an action by a high school basketball player and his father who alleged excessive use of corporal punishment against the player. It found no abuse of discretion in the Judge's refusal to allow the plaintiffs to recall the school superintendent to rebut testimony that no one other than the plaintiffs ever complained about the basketball coaches. The testimony that the superintendent would have given was on the subject of sexual harassment as opposed to corporal punishment and thus was properly excluded under Rule 403.

Quigley v. Winter, 598 F.3d 938 (8th Cir. 2010) : Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff in an action for sex discrimination in housing, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding sexual harassment committed by the defendant landlord against other tenants. The Court found that the evidence was sufficiently closely related to the circumstances and theory of the case, and that the Judge had exercised discretion in excluding testimony from another former tenant as being too remote. The Court also found no abuse of discretion in admitting a probable cause determination made in the case by a state agency, particularly because the jury was instructed that it, not the agency, was responsible for determining if the plaintiff had proved her case.

[11] Codefendant's or Cooperating Witness' Guilty Plea or Immunity [Go To Main]

United States ex rel. Miller v. Bill Harbert Int'l Constr., Inc., 608 F.3d 871 (D.C. Cir. 2010) : In a False Claims Act case arising from a bid-rigging conspiracy, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting one defendant's guilty plea to violating the Sherman Act by engaging in the conspiracy, and the accompanying memorandum, which explained the roles of the other defendants. Because this was a civil case, the guilty plea could be admitted against persons other than the pleader (i.e., the other defendants) to prove any fact essential to sustain the judgment, including the facts stated in the memorandum. To avoid prejudice to the other defendants in the FCA case, the Judge redacted the names of the other conspirators from the criminal case caption and the memorandum and instructed the jury that the fact of the defendant's guilty plea did not permit any inference against the others.

[13] Collateral Inquiries [Go To Main]

Olson v. Ford Motor Co., 481 F.3d 619 (8th Cir. 2007) : The plaintiff, whose decedent was killed when he lost control of his Ford Explorer, sued the manufacturer alleging that a defect in the cruise control caused a sudden acceleration that the driver could not overcome even with hard braking. Affirming a judgment for the manufacturer, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion when the plaintiff was not permitted to offer testimony from two witnesses who had experienced difficulty braking when the Explorers they were driving suddenly accelerated. The probative value of the testimony was outweighed by the danger that it would lead to mini-trials regarding the other incidents, diverting the jury's attention from the issues in the case.

[16] Confusing Evidence [Go To Main]

[a] Civil Cases

[i] Civil Rights and Employment Discrimination Cases

Torres-Arroyo v. Rullan, 436 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2006) : In an action by former contractors with the Puerto Rican Correctional Health Program, who alleged that nonrenewal of their contracts was due to political discrimination, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of documents from a long-running inmate class action case, which had resulted in certain duties being assigned to the contractors. While the documents provided relevant background information for the political discrimination claims, the Court noted that relevance "is a condition precedent to admissibility, not an ironclad guarantee of admissibility." The documents might have erroneously led the jury to draw unwarranted inferences concerning an official's capacity to make contract renewal determinations, and the plaintiffs' arguments for admitting the documents "indicate[d] that they wished to introduce them precisely for these (improper) purposes." Accordingly, there was "a legitimate risk that the jury might have been confused about the import of the proffered documents."

Suarez v. Town of Ogden Dunes, 581 F.3d 591 (7th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a judgment for police officers sued by a mother and her son who alleged that the officers used excessive force after entering their home to make arrests. It found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of recorded conversations concerning a police officer's decision to seek a search warrant for the arrestees' home, where the sole issue for the jury was whether the officers used excessive force after entering the home, not whether they had probable cause to enter. The Judge admitted the recording beginning with the entry into the home, but found that the earlier conversations would engender confusion.

[iii] Confusing Evidence -- Civil Cases -- Miscellaneous Cases

Galarneau v. Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith, Inc., 504 F.3d 189 (1st Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a judgment for a stockbroker who sued her former brokerage firm for defamation in a notice filed with the National Association of Securities Dealers in which the firm explained the termination of the broker. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence of communications between the broker's counsel and the firm's counsel with respect to the language that the firm proposed to use in the notice. Although the evidence was probative of both parties' contentions as to liability, it would likely require testimony from the attorneys as to the motivations behind the broker's proposed language and the firm's refusal to adopt it, which could well be more confusing than probative.

R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. v. Cigarettes Cheaper, 462 F.3d 690 (7th Cir. 2006) : In an action alleging that a discounter violated trademarks by reimporting cigarettes originally sold abroad, the defendant counterclaimed for antitrust violations. Affirming judgments for the plaintiff, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence that the defendant's retail rivals and the plaintiff intended to deal it a fatal blow. Intent is not an issue in a Robinson-Patman Act claim: a bad intent is not part of the claimant's prima facie case and a good intent does not excuse price discrimination. Even if the evidence were marginally relevant to some issue, it would likely confuse the jury "who, not being professional economists, may not have understood that markets respond to deeds rather than thoughts or hopes or words."

Cincinnati Ins. Co. v. Bluewood, Inc., 560 F.3d 798 (8th Cir. 2009) : Affirming a judgment for an apartment complex manager against a commercial property insurer in an action for breach of contract and unreasonable refusal to pay in connection with water damage to apartments, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence regarding the fair market value of the damaged property before and after the loss, given the fact that the jury was asked to award damages on the basis of replacement cost minus depreciation (the formula under the insurance policy).

[iv] Confusing Evidence -- Civil Cases -- Product Liability and Toxic Tort Cases

Ahlberg v. Chrysler Corp., 481 F.3d 630 (8th Cir. 2007) : The plaintiff's decedent was killed when he attempted to stop a Dodge Ram from rolling down a driveway after his two-year-old grandson, who had been left alone in the truck with the key in the ignition and the engine running, apparently shifted the gear out of park. In an action against the manufacturer, the plaintiff alleged that the truck was defective because it did not have a brake-shift interlock device requiring the brake pedal to be depressed in order to shift out of park. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence that the defendant had voluntarily retrofitted Jeeps with BSI devices. Given that the Jeep-retrofit evidence involved an entirely different vehicle, its probative value for negligence and strict liability claims was minimal, and was substantially outweighed by dangers of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, and misleading the jury.

[b] Confusing Evidence -- Criminal Cases

United States v. St. Pierre, 599 F.3d 19 (1st Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed tax evasion convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence regarding the standard of care accountants owed to the defendant. The government's evidence allowed the jury to find that the defendant had acted against warnings and used accounts not disclosed to the accountants, that the accountants were unaware of most of what was occurring, and that the defendant created false documents to cover her tracks. "By contrast, St. Pierre's proposed accounting standards evidence, by shifting the focus to whether the accountants were doing a good job, did have a potential to confuse and mislead a jury - precisely because her accountants' failure to prevent the fraud would not be a defense." In United States v. Ahrendt, 560 F.3d 69 (1st Cir. 2009) , the Court affirmed a conviction for cocaine conspiracy, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of expert testimony that the defendant (whose competency was questionable) viewed drug use as "sacramental consumption." The testimony about the defendant's beliefs in a higher law was not probative of his ability to form the requisite intent for conviction on a conspiracy charge, and it had a significant potential to confuse or mislead the jury into thinking that the defendant's " 'idiosyncratic philosophy amounts to a form of temporary insanity or ameliorates the offense.' " In United States v. Anthony, 545 F.3d 60 (1st Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed a conviction for tax evasion, finding no abuse of discretion when the defendant was not permitted to introduce legal materials on which he claimed to have relied in forming his good-faith belief that he did not have a duty to pay taxes. The probative value of the documents themselves was limited because the defendant's testimony listing, summarizing, and reading from the documents was more probative of his beliefs. The risks of confusion from admitting them was high because, in addition to the usual risk with legal materials that the jury might substitute its own view of the law, many of the materials were old or outdated, and the jury would likely be confused when the defendant claimed that careful study of the materials over a period of years was the basis for a view of the law that was at odds with the law instructed by the Judge. In United States v. Brown, 500 F.3d 48 (1st Cir. 2007) , the defendant was arrested for drug offenses based on a tip from a confidential informant. Affirming, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence about a tip regarding the defendant that the informant had provided three weeks earlier. Because the government's case made no reference to the earlier events, any slight value that the testimony might possess regarding the informant's reliability was substantially outweighed by the danger of confusing the issues and misleading the jury.

United States v. Arledge, 553 F.3d 881 (5th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed mail and wire fraud convictions arising from submission of false claims to a mass tort settlement, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of exhibits purportedly showing that other attorneys also represented fraudulent claimants, as the evidence had no bearing on whether the defendant had actual knowledge of the fraud or was deliberately indifferent to the fraud, and so was likely to confuse the jury and waste time.

United States v. Winkle, 477 F.3d 407 (6th Cir. 2007) : Investigation of the check-kiting scheme for which the defendant was convicted had led to discovery of long-running embezzlement by an officer of one of the affected banks. The defendant attempted to introduce an FDIC report regarding the failure of that bank, as minimizing his involvement and "pointing the causative finger" at others, but the Court found no abuse of discretion in exclusion of the report. The report had at most slight probative value on the issues in this case and presented "a danger of confusing the jury by presenting it with information about an entirely different crime in an already complicated case."

United States v. Savage, 505 F.3d 754 (7th Cir. 2007) : The defendant, charged with crack cocaine distribution, sought to offer threatening letters sent to him by his codefendant after the date of the drug purchase as evidence that he had been coerced into committing the offense. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding the letters. "The threats occurred well after the drug deal, which, though not a dispositive factor, lessens the probative value of the letters." More importantly, because the threats were made at a time when the defendant was cooperating with the government against his codefendant, the jury may have been confused whether the codefendant was coercing the defendant to do the drug deal or to end the cooperation. In United States v. Dabney, 498 F.3d 455 (7th Cir. 2007) , the Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no abuse of discretion when the Judge admitted the defendant's statement in a state court proceeding admitting possession of the gun in question, but excluded the defendant's state court guilty plea. The Court reasoned that "[t]he district court diminished any possibility of confusion regarding the separate state and federal judicial proceedings by taking the unnecessary precaution of excluding any reference to the fact that Dabney's statements were made during a guilty plea hearing."

United States v. Gustafson, 528 F.3d 587 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed convictions for failing to file tax returns, finding no abuse of discretion in excluding various documents the defendants offered to support their claim of a good faith belief that they were not required to file tax returns. The documents included an entry from Am. Jur., documents discussing Supreme Court decisions, and documents defining terms used in certain tax statutes. The Court concluded that the documents were cumulative of testimony offered by the defendants and, to the extent that the documents were legal materials, they would have a high potential to confuse the jury.

United States v. Hinkson, 585 F.3d 1247 (9th Cir. 2009) (en banc): In a prosecution for soliciting the murder of three officials, a witness who claimed the defendant had solicited him to do the murders stated on cross examination that a medal on his lapel was a Purple Heart and, when defense counsel showed him an official letter saying that his military file did not list him as entitled to any decorations, produced a "replacement" form stating he had been awarded several medals, including a Purple Heart. Later, the Judge, saying that a mistake had been made, instructed the jury that it should completely disregard all testimony regarding the medal. When further official records evidence became available, including some indicating the witness had not been awarded any medals, the Judge permitted defense counsel to re-open the cross-examination and to inquire about the witness' military record but cautioned that extrinsic evidence would be excluded under Rule 608(b). Defense counsel chose not to re-open cross-examination. Affirming denial of the defendant's new trial motion, the en banc Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding the extrinsic evidence under Rule 403. The limited probative value of the evidence, to impeach testimony about the Purple Heart medal that the jury had already been told to disregard, was substantially outweighed by the time it would take to authenticate and explain the military file (which the Judge had found facially indecipherable) and by the risk of confusing the jury with the tangential evidence. Four Judges, dissenting, argued that it was an abuse of discretion to exclude documentary evidence that would have contradicted the witness' claim on the stand that he was a decorated combat veteran and to deny a new trial motion based on the defendant's discovery after trial of new evidence conclusively establishing that the witness had lied.

United States v. Oldbear, 568 F.3d 814 (10th Cir. 2009) : Affirming the conviction of an administrative assistant in tribal offices for embezzling from a tribal emergency assistance program, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony from three witnesses that they also received emergency assistance funds for similar expenses. Even if the evidence were relevant, this "attempt to establish an 'everybody-is-doing-it defense,' " would serve only to sidetrack the jury into tangential factual disputes.

[17] Connection Not Established [Go To Main]

United States v. Kaplan, 490 F.3d 110 (2d Cir. 2007) : Reversing a conviction arising from participation in an insurance fraud scheme, the Court found an abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by the cooperating witness as to his and others' knowledge of the fraud, which the government contended was circumstantial evidence of what the defendant knew. In the Court's view, evidence regarding the knowledge of individuals other than the defendant should be admitted only if there is some other evidence in the record -- concerning, for example, the nature of the fraud or the relationship of the parties -- from which to conclude that the defendant would have had the same knowledge. Here, the required connection was not established, as there was no evidence that the knowledge of others had been communicated to the defendant, and much of the testimony regarding knowledge of the fraud was speculative. The limited probative value of the testimony was substantially outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice.

[19] Consciousness of Guilt -- Criminal Cases [Go To Main]

[a] False Statements and Suppression of Evidence

United States v. Kemp, 500 F.3d 257 (3d Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed convictions in a public corruption case, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence disproving claims of great wealth that the defendant had made in grand jury testimony. The defendant's claims had been made to support an argument that he would not deign to involve himself in the paltry corruption alleged in the case, and the Court held that the falsity of the claims tended to show his consciousness of guilt of the underlying charges. The high probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by any prejudicial effect.

[b] Consciousness of Guilt -- Criminal Cases -- Flight

[i] Flight Instructions

United States v. Mundy, 539 F.3d 154 (2d Cir. 2008) : The defendant in a drug and firearms case claimed that he had sublet the apartment in which he and his codefendant were arrested to another, who sublet it to the codefendant, and that the drugs found in the apartment belonged to the codefendant. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the failure to give the defendant's requested instruction that the jury could infer his codefendant's consciousness of guilt from his attempt to flee when the police entered, as the circumstances supported other inferences as well. The Court noted that although the instruction was denied, the defense was permitted to comment on the codefendant's attempted flight, and it suggested that the better practice in most cases was to rely on argument and avoid the instruction.

United States v. Webster, 442 F.3d 1065 (8th Cir. 2006) : When officers attempted a traffic stop, the defendant sped away; when they finally succeeded in stopping him, they found a large plastic bag of marijuana and a pistol on the floor in front of the driver's seat. At his trial for felon firearm possession, the Judge instructed that the jury could consider flight as evidence of consciousness of guilt. The defendant argued that the instruction allowed the jury to infer consciousness of guild with respect to the charged firearm possession when the evidence suggested that he had other reasons to flee, i.e., that he had illegal drugs in the car and had violated a traffic law. Affirming, the Court found no error in the instruction, since it directed the jury to consider all the evidence in the case and determine what significance, if any, to give to the flight evidence; it reminded the jury that there were any number of reasons for flight "fully consistent with innocence"; and the jury heard the defendant's evidence on other possible motives for flight.

United States v. Williams, 541 F.3d 1087 (11th Cir. 2008) : A distribution amount of cocaine was found in the defendant's vehicle after a high-speed chase, which occurred when an officer -- aware of outstanding warrants for the defendant's arrest -- pulled up behind the defendant, and the defendant responded by taking off at a high speed. The defendant argued that it was error to give a flight instruction to the jury, since a reasonable juror could not have inferred the defendant's consciousness of guilt concerning the crime charged as opposed to his more generalized consciousness of guilt based on his knowledge of outstanding warrants for his arrest. Affirming, the Court found no error, as the jury was "expressly instructed ... that it could take into consideration Defendant's flight from the police as circumstantial evidence of guilt only if it found, beyond a reasonable doubt, that he fled to avoid the charged crime." (Emphasis in original.)

[iii] Consciousness of Guilt -- Criminal Cases -- Flight -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Benedetti, 433 F.3d 111 (1st Cir. 2005) : The defendant, indicted for felon firearm possession, promised through his attorney to self-surrender but did not appear and was a fugitive for four years in Florida. The Trial Judge ruled in limine that the flight evidence was inadmissible on the government's case in chief, but admitted it during the defense case and on the government's rebuttal, after the defense emphasized that the events to which prosecution witnesses testified had occurred almost five years previously and presented exculpatory evidence from the defendant's ex-wife and his friend. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion, since the Judge's initial calculus that the prejudicial effect of the evidence outweighed its probative effect was properly adjusted when the evidence became relevant to rebut an implication of trumped-up charges and to impeach the exculpatory witnesses who would normally have been expected to come forward immediately if they knew their friend had been falsely accused.

United States v. Al-Sadawi, 432 F.3d 419 (2d Cir. 2005) : In a prosecution for currency violations, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit the government's flight evidence. The evidence showed that the defendant's wife attempted to obtain passports and airline tickets around the time that the defendant was complying with a grand jury subpoena. The Court held that the evidence failed to connect the defendant to his wife's activity: "While it may be possible that Al-Sadawi instructed his wife to obtain a different passport and purchase tickets to assist him to flee prosecution, this was not demonstrated and we have held that the flight evidence must provide the jury with more than an opportunity for mere conjecture and speculation." Furthermore, the defendant had known for a long time that he was under government surveillance, yet during that period "he did nothing consistent with an intention to flee." Finally, when the defendant was arrested about an hour before the scheduled flight was to depart, there was no evidence that he had bags packed or a ticket in his possession.

United States v. Johnson, 535 F.3d 892 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for drug and weapons offenses, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that a marked police vehicle had followed him after a controlled buy, he had not stopped his car when the cruiser activated its siren but only when he collided with another vehicle and injured its driver, and he had fled the scene on foot. The evidence supported all the necessary inferences for consciousness of guilt, as well as providing context for connecting evidence from the controlled buy that was found on him when apprehended after the transaction. Any prejudice from the evidence did not substantially outweigh its probative value.

[c] Consciousness of Guilt -- Criminal Cases -- Other Evidence

United States v. Mangual-Santiago, 562 F.3d 411 (1st Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions for drug and money laundering conspiracies, holding that evidence of a gun, drugs, a scale, and cash found in an apartment along with the defendant was evidence of the crime charged and was therefore admissible. But, it held that evidence of drugs found with the defendant when he was arrested four years after the charged conspiracy ended was not admissible to prove "consciousness of guilt." The Court could see "no relation between the drugs and Mangual's consciousness of guilt." Any error was harmless, however, because the jury was instructed not to consider the drug evidence for the purpose of determining the defendant's guilt.

United States v. Lentz, 524 F.3d 501 (4th Cir. 2008) : The defendant, arrested for murder, had consulted with another inmate about hiring a hit man to murder some witnesses. In a recorded conversation with his attorney, the defendant asked questions to check on the other inmate's reliability in the scheme. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the recorded conversation over a Rule 403 objection, as it was highly probative in demonstrating the defendant's consciousness of guilt, and there was no risk of unfair prejudice that would substantially outweigh the probative value.

United States v. White, 563 F.3d 184 (6th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to distribute cocaine, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the defendant took a grand jury witness to a lawyer to administer a polygraph test to see if she snitched on him to the government. The evidence was admissible to show consciousness of guilt. In United States v. Cody, 498 F.3d 582 (6th Cir. 2007) , the defendant appealed from convictions related to a robbery, contending that it was error to admit a statement he made to police that he was considering suicide as an alternative to going to prison for what he had done. The Court found that this evidence was properly admitted to prove consciousness of guilt -- "roughly analogous" to evidence of flight. Under the circumstances, the defendant's statement was probative of consciousness of guilt because it was made while under arrest for the crime charged, and it was not unduly prejudicial because there was nothing in it that would have inflamed the jury: "It might have equally made him appear to be a more sympathetic character."

United States v. Dodds, 569 F.3d 336 (7th Cir. 2009) : Affirming a felon-firearm conviction, the Court found no error in admitting evidence that the defendant did not give his legal name to police when he was arrested. He had been convicted of two felonies under that name, so the evidence was probative of his consciousness of guilt, as he may have hidden his legal name to "disguise his firearms disability."

United States v. El-Alamin, 574 F.3d 915 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no abuse of discretion when a flight instruction was given. Although the defendant may have had other possible reasons for fleeing from police, the flight instruction was proper, when the defendant had been standing still until he saw the search team, at which time he began to run. In United States v. Abdul-Aziz, 486 F.3d 471 (8th Cir. 2007) , the Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant had said to an agent executing a search warrant that "officers cold not lock him up forever and that when he gets out somebody will be sorry." The probative value of the evidence to show the defendant's consciousness of guilt was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. In United States v. McAtee, 481 F.3d 1099 (8th Cir. 2007) , the Court affirmed a conviction for attempting to manufacture methamphetamine, finding no abuse of discretion when the defendant's statement, made to a police officer shortly after being arrested, that now he was "fucked" was admitted. While an individual may make such a statement simply on the basis of being arrested, "it is just as likely that the sentiment reflected McAtee's consciousness of guilt." As to prejudice, "there is no reason to believe that the introduction of a single profanity would have swayed the jury improperly by leading them to believe that McAtee was therefore guilty of the offenses charged."

[d] Consciousness of Guilt -- Criminal Cases -- Threats to Witnesses

United States v. Burnett, 579 F.3d 129 (1st Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed drug and firearms convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the defendant made a death threat against his former girlfriend and her daughter. The evidence tended to prove that the defendant was going to great lengths to try to keep damaging evidence out of his trial, and also explained the girlfriend's motive for testifying against the defendant.

United States v. Calabrese, 572 F.3d 362 (7th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed robbery and firearm convictions, finding no abuse of discretion when an audiotape in which the defendant threatened a witness was admitted to show consciousness of guilt. The Court stated: "There's just not much to the argument that the conversation lacked relevance because it didn't explicitly refer to one of the crimes at issue. As a practical matter, specifics were unlikely to come up because Calabrese was worried about a wire. And the possibility that they were talking about another crime only made the conversation incrementally less relevant, not irrelevant altogether."

United States v. Begay, 567 F.3d 540 (9th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for using a firearm in relation to a crime of violence, finding no error in the admission of evidence that the defendant intimidated two of the witnesses to the crime. "[A] defendant's threats against a witness are admissible to show consciousness of guilt," and there was no error in the conclusion that the probative value of the threats outweighed any unfair prejudice.

[20] Conviction Offered in Civil Case [Go To Main]

Doe v. Smith, 470 F.3d 331 (7th Cir. 2006) : In a suit for alleged child molestation by a school official, evidence was admitted that the child had been convicted of three felonies, together with evidence of the nature of the felonies, the sentence for each, and the length of incarcerations and probation. Rejecting the plaintiffs' argument that the evidence was racially inflammatory and would confuse the jury, the Court found no error, as the evidence was relevant to rebut the claim that the child's post-traumatic stress disorder was due to the abuse.

[21.1] Criminal Record [Go To Main]

United States v. Rose, 522 F.3d 710 (6th Cir. 2008) : Affirming a conviction for selling a firearm to a known felon, the Court held that evidence that the defendant and the man to whom he sold a firearm were in prison together was relevant to prove that the defendant knew the other man was a convicted felon, and the probative value of the evidence significantly outweighed any prejudice that would arise from the jury's learning that the defendant had been imprisoned.

[23] Cumulative Evidence [Go To Main]

[a] Civil Cases

Olson v. Ford Motor Co., 481 F.3d 619 (8th Cir. 2007) : The plaintiff, whose decedent was killed when he lost control of his Ford Explorer, sued the manufacturer alleging that a defect in the cruise control caused a sudden acceleration that the driver could not overcome even with hard braking. Affirming a judgment for the manufacturer, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion when the plaintiff was not permitted to offer testimony from two witnesses who had experienced difficulty braking when the Explorers they were driving suddenly accelerated. The probative value of the testimony was outweighed by the danger that it would lead to mini-trials regarding the other incidents, diverting the jury's attention from the issues in the case, and the evidence was cumulative of testimony by an expert explaining his difficulty in bringing an accelerating Explorer under control by braking and the reasons for that difficulty.

[b] Cumulative Evidence -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Frabizio, 459 F.3d 80 (1st Cir. 2006) : The Court reversed a pre-trial order excluding three photographs containing child pornography from jury consideration, finding an abuse of discretion when the Trial Court failed to "properly weigh its concerns about cumulativeness against the probative value of the evidence."

United States v. Fields, 483 F.3d 313 (5th Cir. 2007) : In a capital murder prosecution, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of photos of the victim's body, showing it in an advanced state of decomposition. Most of the 19 crime-scene photos were relevant to rebut the defendant's contention that there was little physical evidence connecting him to the murder, while others were probative to corroborate witnesses who testified that the defendant had dragged the body, and others helped explain to the jury why the body was not found until weeks after the murder. The 13 autopsy photos "helped the jury understand the medical examiner's testimony" and supported the government's theory of the cause of death. The 32 photos were not cumulative because many photos had different relevance from other photos; furthermore, the Court noted that Rule 403 "does not ban per se all cumulative evidence" as "it is not required that each piece of evidence admitted have an entirely unique theory of relevancy." Finally, the marginal prejudice of any particular photo was trivial, given the fact that most of the photos were clearly admissible, so a replication of the same gruesome scene in another photo could not have had much impact on the jury.

United States v. Lloyd, 462 F.3d 510 (6th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a bank robbery conviction, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of a tape recording of the 911 calls from the bank during and immediately after the robbery. Although the information in the tapes was presented through testimony of the bank employees, thus lessening the tapes' probative value, the emotions evidenced in the employees' voices on the tape were quite unlikely to so incense and inflame the jury that it would convict simply to punish someone for the horrors suffered by the employees.

[23.1] Death Penalty Cases [Go To Main]

United States v. Pepin, 514 F.3d 193 (2d Cir. 2008) : In a prosecution for murders committed while engaged in drug trafficking, for which the government sought the death penalty, the Trial Judge granted pretrial motions to exclude evidence at the penalty phase of the defendant's " 'continuing pattern of violence,' including 'child abuse' " and his prior conviction for child endangerment and related behavior, as well as photographs of the victims' dismembered bodies at either the guilt phase or the penalty phase. On interlocutory appeal, the Court held that, although the Rules of Evidence do not apply to sentencing proceedings, the federal death penalty act, 18 U.S.C. § 3593(c), gives the Trial Judge discretion to exclude information "if its probative value is outweighed by the danger of creating unfair prejudice, confusing the issues, or misleading the jury." The Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence of child abuse by the defendant and of his child endangerment conviction, as the Trial Judge had "conscientiously balanced" the probative value -- "[This evidence does] not relate to the homicidal characteristics which form the basis of the prosecution," and because of the probability that the defendant, if convicted and spared, would spend the rest of his life in prison, his potential dangerousness to minor children and women is of little relevance -- with the risks of the jury overvaluing the evidence in light of recent publicity, the necessity of a diversionary trial within the trial regarding the abuse evidence, and the jury's passions becoming inflamed. The Court, however, reversed the ruling excluding evidence of post-mortem dismemberment at the guilt phase. It first held that "a district court ordinarily has somewhat less latitude to exclude probative evidence based on unfair prejudice at the guilt phase, under Rule 403, than it does where the evidence is offered only at the penalty phase," because Rule 403 permits exclusion only when the probative value is "substantially outweighed" by the countervailing dangers. Thus, to the extent the Judge had excluded the photographs at the guilt phase because they would be inadmissible at the penalty phase, it was an error of law. The Court also held it was an abuse of discretion to exclude the photographs at the guilt phase, because, as the Judge had concluded, they were highly probative of the defendant's mental state when committing the murders.

[24] Defendant's Exculpatory Evidence [Go To Main]

United States v. Milk, 447 F.3d 593 (8th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a conviction for second-degree murder, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion under Rule 403 of evidence that the victim had violently stabbed the defendant's acquaintance five years earlier. The Judge had admitted evidence concerning the victim's reputation for aggression and violence, and evidence of two assaults committed by the victim on the day of his murder.

[26] Drugs; Drug and Alcohol Use [Go To Main]

[a] Civil Cases

Alpha v. Hooper, 440 F.3d 670 (5th Cir. 2006) : Affirming summary judgment for the defendants in an action by relatives of a deceased motorist who alleged that excessive force was used when a deputy sheriff shot the motorist to death, the Court held that admitting evidence that the deceased motorist was under the influence of methamphetamine at the time of the shooting was not an abuse of discretion, because it corroborated the deputy's testimony about the events in dispute.

[b] Drugs; Drug and Alcohol Use -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Bermudez, 529 F.3d 158 (2d Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no abuse of discretion when an officer was permitted to testify on direct that, before the officers approached and arrested the defendant, he heard the defendant make statements suggestive of narcotics trafficking. Given that the defense had made clear beginning with the suppression hearing that it would challenge the police account of the incident, the testimony provided a foundation for the officers' credibility by showing why their attention was focused on the defendant as opposed to any number of other individuals in the high crime area. Furthermore, any prejudicial effect was minimized by two detailed limiting instructions. One Judge dissented in part, on the ground that the witness' credibility had not been attacked in the trial, and Circuit precedent required that potentially prejudicial evidence such as this await a credibility attack and be presented only in rebuttal.

United States v. Morena, 547 F.3d 191 (3d Cir. 2008) : The Court reversed a conviction for felon firearm possession and possession of a sawed-off shotgun because "the government's repeated injection of prejudicial drug evidence into the trial testimony constituted prosecutorial misconduct resulting in a denial of due process." Although the defendant was never charged with any drug offenses, the government contended that some discussion of drugs was necessary for background and it would show the shotgun was possessed to protect a drug dealing enterprise. However, the prosecution repeatedly went beyond that purpose to inject inadmissible drug evidence, such as evidence of heroin dealing not connected with the defendant and evidence of the defendant's drug use problem, even though the Judge declared at least five times that the evidence was "too prejudicial." "Nevertheless, the District Court ultimately failed to prevent the rampant injection of inadmissible evidence into the trial and its single limiting instruction to the jury was inadequate to cure the prejudice."

United States v. Leonard, 439 F.3d 648 (10th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for involuntary manslaughter and assault arising from a head-on collision, the Court held that the defendant's prescription medication history was relevant and admissible to prove malice aforethought in a case in which the defendant consumed prescription drugs before the accident.

[27] Employment Discrimination Cases [Go To Main]

[a] Administrative Determinations

Lewis v. City of Chicago Police Dep't, 590 F.3d 427 (7th Cir. 2009) : Affirming a judgment for the defendants in an action by a police officer who alleged that she had been retaliated against for making complaints of gender discrimination, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of the EEOC's probable cause decision. It stated only a conclusion, without additional probative information, and it could have confused the jury into thinking that the question the jury was tasked with answering had already been decided. For similar reasons, the City's internal investigation was also properly excluded.

[b] Employment Discrimination Cases -- Balancing Required

Sprint/United Mgmt. Co. v. Mendelsohn, 128 S. Ct. 1140 (2008) : In this age discrimination case, the Trial Judge excluded so-called "me too" evidence, testimony by nonparties alleging discrimination at the hands of supervisory employees of the defendant who played no role in the adverse employment decision challenged by the plaintiff. The Court of Appeals concluded that the Judge improperly applied a per se rule excluding the evidence; it did its own balancing analysis under Rule 403, and remanded with instructions to admit the challenged testimony. The Supreme Court agreed that a per se rule of admissibility or inadmissibility is not permissible, given that Rule 403 requires balancing the probative value of evidence against the dangers of prejudice, confusion, and delay. However, it was "not entirely clear" that the Judge in this case had excluded the evidence under a per se rule, so the case was remanded "to conduct the relevant inquiry under the appropriate standard." The Court noted that "[t]he question whether evidence of discrimination by other supervisors is relevant in an individual ADEA case is fact-based and depends on many factors, including how closely related the evidence is to the plaintiff's circumstances and theory of the case" and that "[a]pplying Rule 403 to determine if evidence is prejudicial also requires a fact-intensive, context-specific inquiry."

[c] Employment Discrimination Cases -- Evidence of Discrimination Admissible

King v. McMillan, 594 F.3d 301 (4th Cir. 2010) : In a Title VII sexual harassment action by a former deputy sheriff, the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by two other women who said they had been sexually harassed by the sheriff while working for him in the sheriff's office. The evidence was probative of whether the sheriff's unwelcome conduct was because of the plaintiff's sex and of whether the conduct was sufficiently severe or pervasive to create a hostile work environment. Any prejudice was limited by admitting only testimony of harassment that occurred during the same time frame as the plaintiff's employment. The Court found that there was no need to give a specific instruction that the testimony could not be considered on a state-law battery claim against the sheriff in his individual capacity.

Cobbins v. Tennessee DOT, 566 F.3d 582 (6th Cir. 2009) : The Court reversed a summary judgment for the state agency in a suit by an African-American employee alleging racial discrimination in the denial of a promotion. It held that the Trial Judge abused discretion in excluding evidence concerning other discrimination by the defendant against the plaintiff that took the form of disparate discipline, unfair job assignments, and racial harassment. This other evidence was relevant to a prior lawsuit by the plaintiff against the defendant in which summary judgment was granted against the plaintiff because he failed to file a timely response to the defendant's summary judgment motion. The Court rejected the defendant's argument that the evidence should have been excluded because it related to the alleged animus of a supervisor who was not the plaintiff's supervisor when he applied for the promotion. The Court agreed with the plaintiff that the evidence was relevant to prove that the former supervisor's conduct marred his work record and opportunity for promotion and concluded that, because the earlier judgment was a dismissal for failure to prosecute as opposed to a dismissal on the merits, the earlier judgment did not preclude the plaintiff from relying on the evidence. In Morgan v. New York Life Ins. Co., 559 F.3d 425 (6th Cir. 2009) , an age discrimination action, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence of managers' statements regarding the need to bring young people into the company and about the age of certain employees. Although the Court observed that most of the statements were not particularly probative of discrimination, it concluded that there was little risk in admitting them given that they were vague or isolated remarks that were not proximate in time to the plaintiff's termination.

[d] Employment Discrimination Cases -- Evidence of Discrimination Excludable or Required To Be Excluded

Price v. Rosiek Constr. Co., 509 F.3d 704 (5th Cir. 2007) (per curiam): The Court affirmed a judgment against a former employee who alleged that he had been discharged because of his race. It found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence from a co-worker relating to discriminatory jokes and other discrimination not involving the plaintiff that he had experienced. Because the witness had not been fired and because the plaintiff's case had not been brought on a hostile environment theory, the testimony was not relevant to whether the plaintiff's discharge racially motivated; but to the extent the testimony was marginally relevant, its probative value would be outweighed by its prejudicial effect.

[e] Employment Discrimination Cases -- Other Evidence

Stover v. Hattiesburg Public School Dist., 549 F.3d 985 (5th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed judgments for a school district sued by a former employee who alleged discrimination and retaliation, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence of a pattern of conduct by the plaintiff that showed a deteriorating professional attitude and work ethic as well as her deletion of computer information on the day she resigned. The plaintiff had portrayed herself as a victim, and her work attitude was an issue in the case.

Lewis v. City of Chicago Police Dep't, 590 F.3d 427 (7th Cir. 2009) : Affirming a judgment for the defendants in an action by a police officer who alleged that she had been retaliated against for making complaints of gender discrimination, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence that the plaintiff had been seriously injured on an assignment that she claimed was retaliatory. Since there was no dispute that the injury, inflicted by a fellow officer, was completely accidental, the prejudicial effect of the evidence substantially outweighed any probative value. In Mattenson v. Baxter Healthcare Corp., 438 F.3d 763 (7th Cir. 2006) , an ADEA case, the plaintiff, who was terminated just days before retirement benefits vested, claimed that all his performance evaluations had been satisfactory until the last. The defendant claimed that the plaintiff was terminated because he refused to comply with a "performance" plan, but the plaintiff argued that the plan was just a subterfuge to fire him. Reversing a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court held it was error to exclude evidence that the plaintiff had been placed on a performance plan five years previously, since that would have undermined his claim that the employer always fires employees it places on performance plans.

Finan v. Good Earth Tools, Inc., 565 F.3d 1076 (8th Cir. 2008) : The plaintiff, who suffered from epilepsy, sued his former employer under the ADA for "regarded as" discrimination when he was terminated. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that he was not given a reasonable accommodation for his condition. Although an employee who is "regarded as disabled" is not entitled to a reasonable accommodation, the defendant vigorously contended that the plaintiff was actually disabled (and unable to perform the essential functions of his job), so its responses to his request for accommodation were probative as to whether it harbored animosity toward him because of his epilepsy. The defendant failed to indicate how any prejudice from the limited amount of the accommodation evidence that was admitted outweighed its probative value.

[f] Employment Discrimination Cases -- Prior Misconduct of Employee

Desmond v. Mukasey, 530 F.3d 944 (D.C. Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the FBI on a retaliation claim in an employment discrimination suit brought by a trainee, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of a document compiled by a supervising special agent at the FBI Academy during his inquiry into the trainee's suitability. The document summarized the trainee's infractions and indiscretions at the Academy. The Court stated that "the report's probative value is obvious" because it showed what the decisionmaker had before him when he made his initial decision regarding the trainee. It found that the Trial Judge took steps to limit the possible prejudice: admitting the report only to prove the information before the decisionmaker, barring both sides from bolstering or attacking the report, and instructing the jury on the limited purpose for which the report was admitted.

[28] Experiments and Demonstrations [Go To Main]

[b] Experiments and Demonstrations -- Automobiles and Auto Parts

Muth v. Ford Motor Co., 461 F.3d 557 (5th Cir. 2006) : The Court found no abuse of discretion when a defense expert was not permitted to testify with video and photographs illustrating the results of an accident simulation (CRIS test), because the tests were "not conducted under substantially the same conditions as those that were involved in this particular litigation." The Court noted that "[w]hen demonstrative evidence is offered only as an illustration of general scientific principles, not as a reenactment of disputed events, it need not pass the substantial similarity test." However, a demonstration can be misleading when it resembles the disputed accident, so it was appropriate to exclude the demonstration that too closely resembled the accident, but yet was not conducted under substantially similar circumstances.

[d] Experiments and Demonstrations -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Smith, 502 F.3d 680 (7th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed convictions arising from the defendant's sending a pipe bomb via Federal Express, finding no abuse of discretion in permitting an explosives expert to use a replica of the pipe bomb in a demonstration that caused a small flash. The expert's testimony fairly showed the jury how the bomb was intended to work, and rebutted the defendant's theory that the bomb was designed so as not to explode. The Court observed that there was nothing inflammatory in the presentation and the Trial Judge reminded the jury that the bomb did not actually explode when it was delivered and opened by the intended victim. In United States v. Jackson, 479 F.3d 485 (7th Cir. 2007) , a felon firearm possession case, the defendant claimed that he could not have picked up his girlfriend at the time to which she testified (2:43 p.m.) if he had fired a handgun at a government witness at the time the witness stated (sometime after 2:00 p.m.). In rebuttal, the government offered testimony from an officer that it took him 12 minutes to drive the route from the place of the shooting to the girlfriend's place of employment. He conducted the experiment shortly after 7:00 p.m., he took the shortest route, and he exceeded the speed limit over part of the route in order to stay with the traffic. Although the experiment was not based on the actual route taken by the defendant, it was conducted at a different time of day, and the officer exceeded the speed limit, the Court held that the evidence of the experiment was properly admitted. When the proponent is attempting to prove exactly how an event occurred, the experiment must use conditions substantially similar to those of the event. But "where the purpose of the experiment is not to recreate events but simply to rebut or falsify the opposing party's sweeping hypothesis, the substantial similarity requirement is relaxed." The Court noted that had the testimony been offered in the government's case-in-chief, rather than in rebuttal of the defendant's story, "a different result might be warranted."

United States v. Two Elk, 536 F.3d 890 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for aggravated sexual abuse of a child, finding no abuse of discretion when three photographs of the normal structures in the genitalia of a small female child were admitted in connection with expert testimony. The Court noted that the doctors confirmed that the photographs would assist them in explaining to the jury the results of their respective examinations of the victim.

United States v. Spoerke, 568 F.3d 1236 (11th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions relating to destructive devices, finding no abuse of discretion when evidence of video recordings of pipe bombs exploding was admitted. It stated that the "video demonstration was relevant to prove the nature of the devices Spoerke constructed and the characteristics of those devices, which supported the charge that the devices were designed as weapons." The Judge was entitled to credit an agent's testimony that the devices used in the video were virtually identical in almost every respect to the defendant's.

[29] Experts [Go To Main]

[c] Experts -- Criminal Cases

[i] Defense Evidence

United States v. Dupre, 462 F.3d 131 (2d Cir. 2006) : The defendants were convicted for wire fraud in a scheme promising 1000-to-1 returns for funds invested purportedly to unfreeze assets once held by the family of Philippines president Marcos. The Court affirmed, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony from a psychologist that a defendant's "intense, pervasive religious beliefs significantly interfere with her ability to see her involvement in the 'investment project' in a realistic manner and significantly contribute to her ongoing conviction that she has been involved in a legitimate enterprise with benevolent intentions." The expert's report had a "capacity to mislead and confuse the jury, and to permit the defendant to put an impermissible theory of justification before the jury without meeting her burden of presenting the affirmative defense of insanity."

[ii] Experts -- Criminal Cases -- Prosecution Evidence

United States v. Benkahla, 530 F.3d 300 (4th Cir. 2008) : The defendant was part of a network of individuals the government was investigating for crimes connected to radical Islamic terrorism and violent jihad. Affirming a conviction for making false statements and obstructing justice, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of expert testimony on radical Islam and jihad, given the fact that "[t]he evidence in this case was complicated, touching by necessity on a wide variety of ideas, terms, people, and organizations connected to radical Islam." The Court observed that the jury acquitted the defendant of several alleged falsehoods, which was "not exactly the mark of irrational fervor." The Court also upheld the admission of testimony by an FBI agent regarding the agency's investigation and laying the foundation for several dozen videos, documents, and photographs, as the evidence was important to prove the materiality of the defendant's false statements. In United States v. Forrest, 429 F.3d 73 (4th Cir. 2005) , the court, affirming a conviction for production and possession of child pornography, found it "troubling," but any error harmless, that an expert was permitted to testify about the behavioral patterns of child sexual abusers. Although the defendant was not on trial for sexual abuse, the expert described a general profile of a serial child molester that closely resembled the defendant's behavior.

United States v. Lloyd, 462 F.3d 510 (6th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a bank robbery conviction, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by an expert in footwear impression analysis comparing a shoeprint taken from the teller's counter and the shoes the defendant was wearing when he was arrested shortly after the robbery. Although the expert was not able to positively identify the defendant's shoe as the source of the shoeprint, she testified it had the same tread design and was the same length from heel to toe. That evidence was highly probative, given the small number of such shoes likely present in the vicinity of the crime scene shortly after the robbery, and there was no indication of any danger of unfair prejudice.

United States v. Keiser, 578 F.3d 897 (8th Cir. 2009) : The defendant, a licensed commodities broker, was convicted of securities fraud in promoting fraudulent bank trading programs. Affirming, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony from an expert witness regarding the ethical training the defendant would have received as a commodities broker. Although the testimony concerned the fiduciary duties of commodities brokers rather than securities brokers, the evidence was not offered to demonstrate that the defendant actually violated any specific fiduciary duties, but only to show that he probably knew that the programs were potentially fraudulent and that he was obligated to disclose information to investors about the risks incumbent in the investments he marketed. The Court concluded that any prejudice or tendency to confuse the issues was insufficient to outweigh the probative value of the evidence in showing the defendant's general knowledge of fiduciary responsibility principles in investing.

United States v. Feingold, 454 F.3d 1001 (9th Cir. 2006) : In a prosecution for illegal distribution of controlled substances against a naturopathic physician who claimed that his prescribing practices were simply attributable to his incompetence, the Court found no abuse of discretion when a naturopathic physician and a medical doctor were permitted to testify about the standard of care applicable to the distribution of opioid and other drugs. Evidence of prevailing standards of care is relevant to support the absence of any legitimate medical purpose in the prescription of controlled substances.

United States v. Nevels, 490 F.3d 800 (10th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed firearm convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting expert testimony based on the reconstruction of the crime scene. The defense claimed that the victim was a violent, armed fugitive and that the defendant acted in self-defense. The reconstruction evidence was probative as it showed that the defendant was the only one with a weapon and that the victim was shot at close range and in a defensive position. Moreover, the expert's testimony was not especially prejudicial, given the fact that defense counsel conceded the shooting in her opening argument.

[31] Family Relationships [Go To Main]

United States v. Bright, 578 F.3d 547 (7th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for bank robbery, finding no abuse of discretion when a birth certificate showing that a relative of defendant worked in the bank was admitted, as the evidence tended to show why the defendant picked that particular bank and knew that an armored truck delivery was scheduled on the day the bank was robbed.

[31.1] Firearms and Ammunition [Go To Main]

United States v. Wescott, 576 F.3d 347 (7th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possession of a firearm by a person subject to a protective order, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding 22 firearms in the defendant's possession and of photographs of the considerable amount of ammunition found at the defendant's house. Although the defense argued that proof of a single firearm would be sufficient to convict, the Court held that proof of the additional weapons was not unduly prejudicial, where the defendant would not stipulate to the possession and the prosecution was limited to proof regarding only the weapons listed in the indictment, and not all of those seized. The evidence of the ammunition was probative of the defendant's knowing possession of the firearms, and the prejudicial effect was limited by precluding the most alarming pictures of the ton and a half of ammunition found and by confining the prosecutions argument to the proper purpose of demonstrating the defendant's knowing possession.

[32] Fraudulent Activities [Go To Main]

United States v. Jackson, 546 F.3d 801 (7th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed fraud convictions arising from a scheme to submit inflated insurance claims in connection with three motor vehicles that were stolen or damaged. It held that evidence that tires and rims for which the defendants sought compensation were obtained by fraud, even if the fraud was committed by another person, was relevant to prove that the defendants were seeking recovery for a loss that they had not suffered.

[33] Gang Membership [Go To Main]

United States v. Jones, 566 F.3d 353 (3d Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions for racketeering, conspiracy to commit murder, and other offenses, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of assorted gang-related evidence that the government used to prove guilt under the Violent Crimes in Aid of Racketeering Act. The Court noted that the "expansive definition" of "enterprise" in VICAR meant that "the gang-related evidence Jones complains of went to proving the VICAR offenses, specifically the expansive elements of 'enterprise' and racketeering activity."

United States v. Harris, 587 F.3d 861 (7th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed drug and firearm convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony by a police sergeant regarding the defendant's post-arrest statements that connected him to a gang. The evidence was relevant to the defendant's motive for possessing firearms, and the Judge took steps to reduce the prejudicial impact of evidence of gang membership. In United States v. Alviar, 573 F.3d 526 (7th Cir. 2009) , the Court affirmed convictions for drug conspiracy charges, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of gang membership evidence, where the majority of individuals employed by the conspiracy's leader to obtain and distribute drugs were in gangs with the leader, and the government did not simply equate membership in the gangs with being a coconspirator but showed how the operation used gang members in certain defined roles.

United States v. Street, 548 F.3d 618 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court reversed a conviction for aiding and abetting murder in furtherance of drug trafficking, holding it was error to admit testimony from a police expert about outlaw motorcycle gangs, including their violence toward women and "snitches." The defendant was not, however, a member of the gang on which the testimony focused, nor had he ever set foot in the gang's headquarters. The evidence indicated that two gang members had occasionally worked on motorcycles with the defendant, supplied him with precursor chemicals, and purchased and used the final product, but there was no factual grounding for the prosecutor's claim in his closing argument that the gang's lifestyle had "started to rub off on [the defendant]." All in all, the expert's gang testimony "was excessive, unduly prejudicial, and in great part completely irrelevant to the charged offenses." In United States v. McKay, 431 F.3d 1085 (8th Cir. 2005) , the Court affirmed drug distribution convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that a defendant was a gang member. The limited testimony was relevant on redirect to explain why the government had not attempted a controlled buy, and the jury was cautioned against using gang affiliation as a ground for conviction.

United States v. Bradberry, 466 F.3d 1249 (11th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for possession of a firearm in a school zone, the Court held that evidence of the defendant's membership in a gang tended to explain why he and the driver of the car in which the gun was found were at the school at that time. Because such evidence carries the potential for undue prejudice, "[t] is case presents a close question," but the Trial Court did not abuse its discretion.

[33.1] Grand Juror Testimony [Go To Main]

United States v. Awadallah, 436 F.3d 125 (2d Cir. 2006) : In a prosecution for perjury before a grand jury, the Trial Judge ruled in limine that the government could call grand jurors to testify about the defendant's physical condition and the objective conditions surrounding his testimony, but could not ask the grand jurors about their subjective impressions of the defendant's demeanor and appearance. Affirming on interlocutory appeal, the Court observed that "the Government has tried hundreds, if not thousands, of perjury cases without eliciting opinion evidence from a grand juror to prove knowledge," and "[n]one of our opinions indicate that a grand juror has ever previously been called in this Circuit to give such testimony." The Court concluded that it was "well within the broad discretion afforded" a Trial Judge to rule that grand juror testimony could be interpreted as giving the petit jurors advice on how to determine the central issue in the case. The Court agreed with the defense argument that the grand jurors were not better witnesses than the court reporter, the interpreter, or the Assistant United States Attorneys who were present in the grand jury room: "nothing about the grand jurors ... makes them clearly more reliable than other witnesses to the events that transpired in the grand jury room."

[35] Guilt by Association [Go To Main]

United States v. Lopez-Medina, 461 F.3d 724 (6th Cir. 2006) : The Court vacated a conviction for conspiracy to distribute a mixture of cocaine for the improper admission of evidence that acquaintances of the defendant had been convicted of drug crimes, which was nothing more than guilt by association.

United States v. Bright, 578 F.3d 547 (7th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for bank robbery, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony that when a companion boasted of committing a bank robbery, the defendant said, "Sound[s] like something I want to do." The evidence was not an attempt to taint the defendant's character through his association with an admitted bank robber; rather, the companion's boast provided context for the defendant's admission.

[35.1] Hearing on Admissibility [Go To Main]

Guerra v. North East Ind. School Dist., 496 F.3d 415 (5th Cir. 2007) (per curiam): The plaintiff in an ADEA action sought to introduce the EEOC's right-to-sue letter, the EEOC file, and the defendant's response to the EEOC charge. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court held that the Judge was not required to hold a hearing at which the plaintiff could make rebuttal arguments against a determination that the risk of prejudice outweighed the probative value of the evidence. The Court also held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the evidence, as the EEOC letter was created under questionable conditions, and all the evidence spoke directly to the ultimate issue in the case, which would likely have prejudiced the jury required to make its own factual determination.

[38.1] Illustrative Evidence [Go To Main]

United States v. Howe, 538 F.3d 842 (8th Cir. 2008) , overruled in part on other grounds, 562 F.3d 892 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession arising from a kidnapping and murder conspiracy. It found no abuse of discretion in the admission of a photograph of a pistol similar to that used in committing the murder. The government correctly used the photograph as demonstrative evidence and did not suggest that it pictured the actual firearm; rather, the witnesses were questioned about the similarities and differences between the two weapons. Thus, the photograph had probative value in identifying the type of pistol possessed by the defendant, and was not unfairly prejudicial because the jury could only have understood that it was being used as illustrative.

[38.2] Immigration Status [Go To Main]

United States v. Yi, 460 F.3d 623 (5th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a conviction for trafficking in counterfeit goods, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant was an illegal alien. The evidence explained why the arresting officer in a counterfeiting case was an immigration enforcement agent and "any prejudice from the evidence was insubstantial." Although the defendant argued that there is "strong public sentiment against illegal immigration in this country," the Court concluded that immigration status is not "the type of information that is 'of a heinous nature, likely to incite the jury to an irrational decision.' "

United States v. Lopez-Medina, 596 F.3d 716 (10th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possession of methamphetamine with intent to distribute, holding there was no abuse of discretion when the government elicited on cross-examination of the defendant that he had been illegally in the United States for over 13 years. The evidence was relevant to rebut efforts on direct exam to portray the defendant as a nice, law-abiding person who had never committed a crime.

[39] Impeachment and Rebuttal Evidence -- Civil Cases [Go To Main]

Fryar v. Curtis, 485 F.3d 179 (1st Cir. 2007) : Affirming a judgment in favor of a corrections officer sued by a prisoner for an alleged assault, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence, offered to impeach a witness, concerning the training of officers and the conditions at the jail, since such evidence might have confused the issues and misled the jury and appeared to be collateral. The Court noted that it had repeatedly observed that " 'a party may not present extrinsic evidence to impeach a witness by a contradiction on a collateral matter,' " and concluded that even if the evidence was of consequence to the defendant officer's conduct as to the plaintiff, any error was harmless.

SR Int'l Bus. Ins. Co. v. World Trade Center Properties, LLC, 467 F.3d 107 (2d Cir. 2006) : In litigation over whether destruction of the World Trade Center towers constituted one or two "occurrences" for purposes of insurance coverage, one of the defense witnesses was an insurance executive who was responsible for adjusting the WTC claims. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion when the witness was cross-examined about the insurer's treatment of claims associated with four fires that were set to four separate courthouses in California by a single arsonist. The witness had been responsible for adjusting the California claims and he had been well aware by the time of the WTC disaster that the insurer had decided to treat the California claims under a similar policy form as separate occurrences (to which separate deductibles applied), even though two of the four fires were set at closely situated buildings only minutes apart. The comparison he drew between the two claims was relevant to the insurer's pre-9/11 intent.

Gaillard v. Jim's Water Serv., Inc., 535 F.3d 771 (8th Cir. 2008) : After he was injured in a motorcycle accident, the plaintiff filed supplemental tax returns claiming additional income of as much as $120,000 per year. He produced the supplemental returns in the course of discovery in his personal injury action and used them in the first trial of the action (which ended with a hung jury) to support his lost income claim. Before the retrial, he moved unsuccessfully to exclude the returns as more prejudicial than probative. Affirming a judgment for the defendants, the Court found no abuse of discretion in allowing the returns to be admitted and utilized to impeach the credibility of the plaintiff and his expert witness. The Court explained that the returns were "highly relevant to the defense of this case. First, past income as established by tax returns is highly relevant to a loss of income claim. Second, the tax returns were probative of his character for truthfulness and thus relevant to keeping any damage award to a reasonable and fair level." Although the Court cited Rule 608(b) for the latter proposition, we observe that no attention was apparently paid to the Rule's bar on extrinsic evidence. And as to the first proposition, the supplemental return in particular was not being offered in that trial to prove the loss of income, but only to affect credibility. The Court also noted that the returns "were relevant to impeach the credibility of [the plaintiff's] economic expert, who testified he typically relies upon an individual's income tax return as the most reliable source of wage verification, yet ignored" the plaintiff's, "because he could not 'trust them' and they might be 'pure fiction.' " The Court said, "It matters not that [the plaintiff's] expert did not rely on the returns. The district court properly found the tax returns were admissible as impeachment evidence under Rule 608(b)," but it did not reconcile its ruling with either the "cross examination" or the "witness's own conduct" provisions of the Rule.

Harsco Corp. v. Renner, 475 F.3d 1179 (10th Cir. 2007) : Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff in a Title VII action claiming hostile work environment sexual harassment, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the defendant was precluded from cross-examining the plaintiff about an allegedly false statement in a document she signed in a bankruptcy proceeding and from introducing the document into evidence. The Court concluded that a conflict between the parties over whether the statement was in fact false "could have created a virtual mini-trial." Since "the sole point [the defendant] sought to prove by introducing the form is that [the plaintiff] has signed forms without verifying that their content is accurate," and the plaintiff "admitted this precise fact in her testimony," it was a proper exercise of discretion "to avoid a mini-trial over a collateral issue that the plaintiff already conceded."

[40] Impeachment and Rebuttal -- Criminal Cases [Go To Main]

[a] Accused Witness

United States v. Penney, 576 F.3d 297 (6th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions for felon firearm possession and attempting to kill a federal agent, which arose from an incident in which the defendant shot an agent during execution of a search warrant. It found no abuse of discretion in the admission on rebuttal of testimony by fellow inmates that the defendant had said he wished he had killed the police officers he had shot so that they could not testify against him. The Court rejected the government's argument that the statement, made months after the incident, was relevant to establishing the defendant's intent at the time of the offense, but it agreed that the statement was relevant to the defendant's credibility, since it contradicted his testimony denying that he had said he wished he had killed the officers.

[b] Impeachment and Rebuttal -- Criminal Cases -- Defense Witnesses

United States v. Durham, 470 F.3d 727 (8th Cir. 2006) : A prosecution witness was asked whether he had made statements to a detective regarding the defendants' use and manufacture of methamphetamine at a cooperating witness' apartment. He denied making any such statements and on cross-examination he reiterated the point, adding that he had never seen the defendants cook, sell, or buy methamphetamine. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the detective was permitted to testify that the witness had told him that he had seen the defendants use and manufacture the drug at the apartment. The detective's testimony carried a risk of prejudice to the defendants, as it recounted inculpatory statements that would not otherwise have been admissible, but it had probative value to impeach both the witness' denial of having made the statements to the detective and his testimony favoring the defense that he had not seen them on any occasion handling methamphetamine, and the potential prejudice was lessened by a limiting instruction given prior to the detective's testimony. In United States v. Davis, 457 F.3d 817 (8th Cir. 2006) , the Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to distribute crack cocaine, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony by the federal public defender regarding substantial assistance and the federal sentencing process, which had been offered to impeach the credibility of the government's cooperating witnesses. The jury already was aware that each witness testified that he was facing a lengthy prison term and hoped to reduce his sentence by testifying against the defendant, and the jury did not need to know the details of sentencing procedures to understand that the witnesses might have an incentive to incriminate the defendant.

[c] Impeachment and Rebuttal -- Criminal Cases -- Opinions on Credibility

United States v. Jumper, 497 F.3d 699 (7th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed marijuana convictions, holding there was no abuse of discretion when portions of a videotape of the defendant's postarrest interrogation were admitted. The defendant argued that the videotape was unduly prejudicial because the interrogating agent stated that he thought the defendant was lying. The Court noted that the agent did not directly comment on the defendant's guilt, and added that "the jury could reasonably have viewed these comments as a strategic interrogating tactic of the agent."

[d] Impeachment and Rebuttal -- Criminal Cases -- Prosecution Witnesses

[i] Defense Evidence or Questioning

United States v. Bunchan, 580 F.3d 66 (1st Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a mail fraud conviction, finding no abuse of discretion when the defense was permitted to ask a government witness about pending state criminal charges for assault but was not permitted to bring out that the charges were for indecent assault and battery of a child. The Judge's ruling permitted elicitation of the witness' motive to ingratiate himself with the government but avoided unnecessary and unfair prejudice against the witness. The Court also noted that reference to the particular nature of the charges was not admissible under Rule 608(b) because it was not relevant to the witness' character for truthfulness. In United States v. Van Anh, 523 F.3d 43 (1st Cir. 2008) , in a prosecution for using extortionate means to collect a debt, a defendant claimed that the victim had a temper and had used "fighting words" to incite him. The defense was not permitted to introduce evidence of two incidents occurring nine months after the events at issue that allegedly supported its claim. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion, as the evidence was both "too far afield" and "not very conclusive." In United States v. DeCologero, 530 F.3d 36 (1st Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed convictions for conspiracy, racketeering, and other crimes relating to a criminal enterprise that controlled a portion of Boston's drug trade, finding no abuse of discretion when a defense witness was precluded from recounting a conversation in which a government witness allegedly tried to coerce the defense witness into testifying for the government. The evidence was only relevant to impeaching the government witness, the impeachment went to a collateral matter, and the Judge has discretion to bar such impeachment. In United States v. Bishop, 453 F.3d 30 (1st Cir. 2006) , the Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no abuse of discretion in limiting the cross-examination of a government witness whom the defendant alleged had on another occasion falsely accused him of rape. The Court reasoned that the cross-examination posed the likelihood of diversion and prejudice and the unlikelihood that the defendant would be able to counter any denial by the witness in light of Rule 608(b). We question the reliance on Rule 608(b), given that the defendant's apparent motive in cross-examination was to suggest that the witness was biased against him. Extrinsic evidence of specific acts tending to show bias (as opposed to untruthfulness) is not excluded by Rule 608(b).

United States v. Smith, 451 F.3d 209 (4th Cir. 2006) : In a drug case, police officers testified that the defendant had been arrested in two previous cases with drugs on his person and that the drugs found in the previous arrests had been destroyed by the police. Defense efforts to cross-examine each witness about the circumstances of the destruction were denied on the grounds of limited relevance and waste of time. The Court found that precluding this cross-examination violated the defendant's constitutional right to an effective defense, although it was harmless error. The Court noted that "the availability of appropriate cross-examination by an accused is ... essential when the physical evidence, about which the witnesses are testifying, no longer exists," and explained that "the examination Smith sought to conduct was highly relevant to the issues in the case, in that the prosecution witnesses were testifying that the substances were contraband and had been seized from Smith. The trustworthiness and competence of these witnesses related directly to the charges in the indictment, and their credibility was crucial to the jury's assessment of the prosecution's case." In particular, an officer's testimony that drugs were destroyed when state charges were dismissed because of pending federal charges "raised obvious concerns." Where the officer testified that he was unaware of the pending federal charges when the evidence was destroyed, but the state charges were dismissed precisely because of the pending federal charges, cross-examination "would have cut to the core of [the officer's] credibility and was highly relevant to the issues before the jury. And any resulting prejudice to the prosecution from a thorough examination on the facts surrounding the evidence's destruction was plainly outweighed by Smith's right to inquire into the pertinent circumstances." The Judge's contrary conclusion -- that the relevance of such cross-examination would have been "extremely slight" -- was thus based on a "clearly erroneous assessment of the evidence" and constituted an abuse of discretion.

United States v. Harper, 527 F.3d 396 (5th Cir. 2008) : Affirming convictions for drug offenses, the Court found no abuse of discretion when certified copies of court records showing convictions of a testifying confidential informant were excluded. The exhibits were "repetitious" and a "waste of time," given that the witness admitted the impeaching offenses and defense counsel cross-examined him about the convictions and why deferred adjudication probation was revoked.

United States v. Acosta, 534 F.3d 574 (7th Cir. 2008) : During the FBI investigation of a drug distribution conspiracy, two of the witnesses made reference to an arson fire. At trial, a defendant was precluded from cross-examining the witnesses about vacillations in their answers to the agent's questions about the fire, which was wholly unrelated to the case being tried. Affirming, the Court found there was no abuse of discretion in precluding the cross-examination, as the defendant had ample opportunity to impeach the witnesses' credibility, and the examination would have sidetracked the trial and risked confusing the jury. In United States v. Seymour, 472 F.3d 969 (7th Cir. 2006) , the court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, holding there was no abuse of discretion in precluding the defense from cross-examining the arresting officer who found the gun about his failure to mention in a report about arresting a jaywalker that he had used force causing a concussion. Learning that he used excessive force against a minor lawbreaker was likely to prejudice the jury, but even though his omission was dishonest in the circumstances, the Court concluded that the evidence had "no probative value at all," since the defendant did not contest the officer's testimony or impugn his conduct.

United States v. Beal, 430 F.3d 950 (8th Cir. 2005) : Affirming a drug conviction, the Court found no error when the defendant was prohibited from impeaching a cooperating witness with the fact that he had testified in other criminal trials, in which the defendants were acquitted. This evidence was properly excluded because "[m]any factors influence a verdict, including the strength of each side's case, the instructions given to the jury, and the context in which the individual witnesses testify. Introduction of evidence about jury verdicts in unrelated cases would have prolonged the trial and confused the jury."

[ii] Impeachment and Rebuttal -- Criminal Cases -- Prosecution Witnesses -- Prosecution Evidence or Questioning

United States v. Massino, 546 F.3d 123 (2d Cir. 2008) : Affirming racketeering convictions, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony about a statement made by a leader of the defendant's crime family about "killing kids." On direct examination, a witness testified about the contents of two tape recorded conversations he had made at the direction of the government. On cross-examination, the defense attempted to show, through the witness' lack of recollection regarding 38 other conversations he recorded for the government, that his testimony had been coached. The government sought to rehabilitate the witness by asking about a recorded statement in which a leader of the crime family discussed killing the children and wives of cooperators. In light of "the abundance" of alternative evidence that could have been used to rehabilitate this witness, the Court was "troubled by" the government's reliance on such "highly inflammatory" evidence, but, because the record reflected the Judge's careful balancing of the probative value with the risk of prejudice, there was no abuse of discretion. In United States v. Bermudez, 529 F.3d 158 (2d Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no abuse of discretion when an officer was permitted to testify on direct that, before the officers approached and arrested the defendant, he heard the defendant make statements suggestive of narcotics trafficking. Given that the defense had made clear beginning with the suppression hearing that it would challenge the police account of the incident, the testimony provided a foundation for the officers' credibility by showing why their attention was focused on the defendant as opposed to any number of other individuals in the high crime area. Furthermore, any prejudicial effect was minimized by two detailed limiting instructions. One Judge dissented in part, on the ground that the witness' credibility had not been attacked in the trial, and Circuit precedent required that potentially prejudicial evidence such as this await a credibility attack and be presented only in rebuttal.

United States v. Durham, 470 F.3d 727 (8th Cir. 2006) : A prosecution witness was asked whether he had made statements to a detective regarding the defendants' use and manufacture of methamphetamine at a cooperating witness' apartment. He denied making any such statements and on cross-examination he reiterated the point, adding that he had never seen the defendants cook, sell, or buy methamphetamine. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the detective was permitted to testify that the witness had told him that he had seen the defendants use and manufacture the drug at the apartment. The detective's testimony carried a risk of prejudice to the defendants, as it recounted inculpatory statements that would not otherwise have been admissible, but it had probative value to impeach both the witness' denial of having made the statements to the detective and his testimony favoring the defense that he had not seen them on any occasion handling methamphetamine, and the potential prejudice was lessened by a limiting instruction given prior to the detective's testimony.

United States v. Rizvanovic, 572 F.3d 1152 (10th Cir. 2009) : Affirming a conviction for international parental kidnapping, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that a state court judge found in a custody proceeding that the defendant had committed emotional and domestic abuse against his children and their mother, and of testimony by the defendant's 17-year-old step-daughter that the defendant had been the sole source of domestic violence in the home. The evidence was properly admitted to rebut the defendant's explanation that he took the children out of the country to protect the children from abuse by the mother. The Court added that, although the defendant denied any abuse when questioned on cross-examination, Rule 608(b)'s bar on extrinsic evidence did not require exclusion of evidence that rebutted a defense and thus was admissible as substantive evidence. In United States v. Doddles, 539 F.3d 1291 (10th Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed drug and firearms convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of a witness' testimony that he feared retaliation, where the testimony explained prior inconsistent statements. The Court also found no abuse of discretion when -- after defense counsel suggested that a witness would testify to whatever he thought would keep him out of trouble -- the witness was permitted to testify that he had experienced negative consequences after providing similar testimony at a previous trial and was reluctant to testify at the defendant's trial.

[41] Impeachment with Collateral Matter [Go To Main]

United States v. Mahdi, 598 F.3d 883 (D.C. Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed drug trafficking convictions, finding no abuse of discretion when the defense was precluded from introducing evidence that a witness, who had denied having handled a gun, had shot and killed another man with a gun. The Trial Judge had properly excluded the extrinsic evidence for use in impeachment by contradiction, and the Court held that because the government was not aware of the shooting until the defense brought it up, the evidence had no tendency to impeach by showing bias. In United States v. Fonseca, 435 F.3d 369 (D.C. Cir. 2006) , a prosecution witness in a trial for unlawful possession of a firearm and ammunition testified that she had not used drugs since she suffered a heart attack in 2002. The defense questioned her about a positive test for crack cocaine in January 2003, refreshed her recollection by showing her a police report of her arrest which gave rise to the test, and had the test results admitted into evidence. The Court found no abuse of discretion when the defense was then barred from cross-examining the witness about a crack pipe found in her purse when she was arrested in January 2003, as the evidence was weaker than that actually admitted and its use for any other purpose would likely have led to confusion and delay.

Martinez v. Cui, 608 F.3d 54 (1st Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendants in a patient's action alleging that her civil rights had been violated when an emergency room physician sexually assaulted her by digital penetration of her vagina. It found no abuse of discretion when the plaintiff was cross-examined using records from her chiropractor's office, over an objection that they were collateral. "Her claim that she feared being treated by male practitioners went to both the credibility of her story and the extent of her damages." Showing that she had visited the chiropractor's office 18 times, including two days after the alleged assault, undermined those parts of her claim.

United States v. White, 563 F.3d 184 (6th Cir. 2009) : In a prosecution for conspiracy to distribute cocaine, the driver of a car in which the defendant was riding when it was stopped by police testified that the car belonged to a third person with whom she sometimes swapped cars. On rebuttal, the government presented a witness who denied ever seeing the driver in a car such as she described. Affirming, the Court held that the rebuttal evidence was not impeachment on a collateral matter, but rather went directly to the question whether the duffel bag containing drugs and tools of the drug trade that was found in the car belonged to the third person or to the defendant.

United States v. Jackson, 540 F.3d 578 (7th Cir. 2008) : In a prosecution for bank fraud arising from a scheme by bank employees to create false mortgage documents, one of the conspirators implicated another in her guilty plea proffer and her plea hearing, but then recanted the incriminating statements just before the trial. The Judge granted a government motion to preclude the defense from presenting evidence of the recantation and ruled that it was not admissible under Rule 804(b)(3) because of insufficient corroborating circumstances. Affirming, the Court observed that, since the incriminating statements related only to charges that had been dismissed and those statements were not before the jury, the only purpose for introducing the recantation was to impeach the declarant by contradiction. However, because the contradiction regarded collateral or irrelevant matters, the evidence could properly be excluded under Rule 403 because its tendency to mislead and confuse the jury outweighed its negligible probative value. The recanting conspirator never testified as a witness, but the Court stated that the rule barring impeachment by contradiction regarding collateral matters "is equally applicable where a party attempts to put a non-testifying person's statement before the trier of fact solely to impeach that person."

United States v. Ndiaye, 434 F.3d 1270 (11th Cir. 2006) : Affirming convictions for immigration offenses involving fraudulent Social Security documents, the Court found no abuse of discretion when a coconspirator who provided the false documents was precluded from offering testimony on the ground that it would be "collateral" to the proceeding. The Court found that most of the proffered testimony would serve only to impeach the star prosecution witness on matters irrelevant to the charges at issue, and the remainder would have been cumulative or of little assistance.

[46] Invocation of Privilege [Go To Main]

Hinojosa v. Butler, 547 F.3d 285 (5th Cir. 2008) : In an arrestee's civil rights action for excessive force, the Judge ruled in limine that the officer could be impeached by inquiry into incidents in which he had filed false reports, but that because he planned to invoke his Fifth Amendment right in response, the plaintiff's questions about the prior conduct should be done outside the presence of the jury. Reversing a judgment for the officer, the Court held that the ruling was an abuse of discretion, confusing the standard governing a defendant's invocation of the privilege in the criminal context with that applicable in the civil context. In criminal trials it is impermissible to require the defendant to invoke the self-incrimination privilege before the jury, but in civil cases a witness' refusal to testify on Fifth Amendment grounds permits an adverse inference against him.

[48] Judgments, Court Orders, and Judicial Opinions [Go To Main]

[a] Civil Cases

Athridge v. Aetna Cas. & Sur. Co., 604 F.3d 625 (D.C. Cir. 2010) : In an action by an accident victim against the driver's insurer, the plaintiff sought to introduce a judgment against the vehicle's owners, and a statement from the Judge's opinion in that other trial, as proof that the driver was acting with the owners' consent at the time of the accident. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding the judgment, which, because it reflected only the owners' failure to show by a preponderance that they did not consent, could have been confusing to the jury. Likewise, there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the opinion, as it had little probative value on the proposition for which it was offered compared to other available evidence.

Engquist v. Oregon Dep't of Agriculture, 478 F.3d 985 (9th Cir. 2007) , aff'd, 128 S. Ct. 977 (2008) : In a laid-off state employee's discrimination trial, the plaintiff sought to introduce the jury verdict from a co-worker's similar trial in state court. The Court found no abuse of discretion in exclusion of the verdict, as there was a danger that the jury would give the verdict more weight than warranted, deferring to the earlier result. "The verdict itself did not possess such additional probative value, beyond the [evidence from the earlier trial presented to the jury in this case], to overcome the risk of prejudice and confusion that the verdict posed."

[b] Judgments, Court Orders, and Judicial Opinions -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Higuera-Llamos, 574 F.3d 1206 (9th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for illegal reentry following deportation, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of a prior judgment against the defendant for the same offense. The judgment was probative of, and provided independent evidence corroborating the defendant's admission of, his alienage, and its prejudicial effect was minimized by redacting it to eliminate information regarding sentencing and by instructing the jury that it was to be used only on the issue of alienage. In United States v. Higuera-Llamos, 574 F.3d 1206 (9th Cir. 2009) , the Court affirmed a conviction for illegal reentry after deportation, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of a judgment related to the defendant's prior conviction for the same offense, which was offered to prove his alienage. The defendant's admission of alienage to the arresting officers was insufficient to prove that fact, so the judgment was highly probative; and its prejudicial effect was minimized by redacting extraneous information such as the sentence, and by instructions to the jury as to the limited purpose for its admission. In United States v. Sine, 493 F.3d 1021 (9th Cir. 2007) , a mail fraud prosecution, the Court held it was error, but not reversible plain error, to permit the government to ask witnesses on cross-examination questions that incorporated adverse findings by a Judge in related civil litigation. Factual determinations by a Judge in a civil action are inadmissible hearsay not coming within any hearsay exception, and a Judge's findings can unduly affect a jury, which is likely to defer to credibility determinations made by an authoritative, professional factfinder rather than determine those issues for themselves.

[51] Litigation Conduct [Go To Main]

McDonough v. City of Quincy, 452 F.3d 8 (1st Cir. 2006) : Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff in a Title VII retaliation action, the Court found no error in the exclusion of evidence that the plaintiff had lost a previous lawsuit against the City. Although the City claimed that this showed that the plaintiff was "litigious and had a history of bringing meritless lawsuits," the Court noted that "ordinarily proof that the plaintiff filed prior similar lawsuits is admissible to show the plaintiff's litigiousness only if there is also evidence that the prior lawsuits were fraudulently filed." Here, there was only a single lawsuit, and while it was unsuccessful, there was nothing suggesting that it was fraudulently filed.

[53] Nicknames and Aliases [Go To Main]

United States v. Farmer, 583 F.3d 131 (2d Cir. 2009) : In a prosecution for various offenses arising from a murder and an attempted murder, the Court affirmed the convictions arising from the murder and reversed the convictions arising from the attempted murder because "the prosecutors, in their addresses to the jury, invited prejudice by repeatedly emphasizing Farmer's nickname [Murder] in a manner designed to suggest that he was known by his associates as a murderer and that he acted in accordance with that propensity in carrying out the acts charged in the indictment." This was an "abuse of Farmer's nickname."

[54] Notice and Knowledge [Go To Main]

Dominguez v. Hendley, 545 F.3d 585 (7th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff in a § 1983 action against a municipality and its police officer, whose misconduct had led to the plaintiff's conviction for sexual assault, which was vacated after he was incarcerated for four years. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of a memorandum by a state prosecutor cautioning careful scrutiny of cases involving the officer, "because of questions which exist about his credibility." The Court concluded that "[n]aturally, this was quite prejudicial," but it was relevant and highly probative for the question of whether the municipality was aware that there were problems with the officer.

[55] Official Findings [Go To Main]

Chamberlin v. Town of Stoughton, 601 F.3d 25 (1st Cir. 2010) : The plaintiff police officers alleged that they were victims of retaliation for cooperating with an investigation into police misconduct and disclosing a hostile work environment. Affirming judgments for the defendants, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of a report from an attorney commissioned by the Town in response to the plaintiffs' letters alleging a hostile work environment. The evidence upon which the attorney relied was available to the plaintiffs, and it would have served no useful purpose to "superimpose Terry's [the lawyer's] evaluation on what the jury was expected to decide." The Court added that it did not matter whether the report qualified over a hearsay objection as a public record or an agent's statement, because it was properly excluded under Rule 403.

[56] Opening the Door [Go To Main]

Grossmith v. Noonan, 607 F.3d 277 (1st Cir. 2010) : In a civil rights action by an arrestee who shot his neighbor's dog, the plaintiff argued that he shot the dog to protect himself, his own dog, and his livestock, and that the dog was "vicious" and "bloodthirsty" and looked like a wolf or coyote. Affirming a judgment for the defendants, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony from a witness who had frequent contact with the dog that the dog was "a great dog" and "a nice dog" who was "well-fed and well-groomed," since the plaintiff's testimony made the dog's appearance and character relevant to the case. In Martinez-Velez v. Rey-Hernandez, 506 F.3d 32 (1st Cir. 2007) , in an action by employees of the Puerto Rico Department of Education alleging political discrimination in violation of the First Amendment, the Court held that the plaintiffs had properly been permitted to cross-examine the Secretary of the Department concerning officials he had appointed, after he testified on direct examination that he was unaware of the political affiliations of the plaintiffs and had no connection to a political party or to partisan politics. The Court found that "the questions went directly to Rey's own characterization of his relationship to partisan politics."

United States v. Elfgeeh, 515 F.3d 100 (2d Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed convictions for operating an unlicensed money-transmitting business and for structuring financial transactions, finding no abuse of discretion in a ruling that if the defendants testified that they merely helped Yemeni immigrants to send money home to their family and friends, the testimony would open the door to allow the government to show that the defendants sent money for purposes of fostering violence. The Court noted that a defendant "has no right to avoid cross-examination into the truth of his direct examination, even as to matters not related to the merits of the charges against him." There was, therefore, no error when, after a defendant testified to an innocent purpose for the transactions, the government inquired into a possible violent purpose.

Stover v. Hattiesburg Public School Dist., 549 F.3d 985 (5th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed judgments for a school district sued by a former employee who alleged discrimination and retaliation, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence of a pattern of conduct by the plaintiff that showed a deteriorating professional attitude and work ethic, as well as her deletion of computer information on the day she resigned. The plaintiff had portrayed herself as a victim, and her work attitude was an issue in the case. In Munoz v. State Farm Lloyds of Texas, 522 F.3d 568 (5th Cir. 2008) , an action on a fire insurance policy, the insurer defended on the ground that the plaintiffs had intentionally set the fire. Reversing a judgment for the plaintiffs, the Court held it was reversible error to admit evidence that a grand jury did not indict the husband for arson, as such evidence is highly prejudicial. Although the plaintiffs argued that the insurer had opened the door to the evidence by introducing evidence that the husband had failed a polygraph examination, which they said was per se inadmissible, the Court noted that Daubert governs the admissibility of polygraph examination results, that neither party alleged that the results in this case were improperly admitted under Daubert, and that the plaintiffs had not objected to the introduction of the results at trial. Therefore, there was no support for the contention that the polygraph evidence was inadmissible and the door was not opened to the evidence of non-indictment.

Gibson v. Moskowitz, 523 F.3d 657 (6th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed the liability portion of a judgment for the estate of a mentally disabled inmate that sued a prison psychiatrist and others alleging deliberate indifference to medical needs and malpractice. After the psychiatrist testified that he did everything within the standard of care and within his power to help the deceased inmate, the Judge admitted as impeachment evidence the fact that the prison discharged him for violating medical-treatment rules. The Court found no abuse of discretion, because the psychiatrist opened the door to the evidence. In another ruling, the Court upheld the exclusion of defense evidence that the deceased inmate had sexually assaulted a minor. Although the estate had offered evidence that the inmate worked hard, behaved responsibly, and helped others while in prison, the Court found that this did not open the door to evidence of the "highly charged crime." It reasoned that "[t]he estate's evidence concerned [the deceased's] behavior once he was in prison, not what he had done before he entered prison, and the court fairly could restrict any impeachment evidence to his conduct in jail."

Wright v. Ark. & Mo. R.R. Co., 574 F.3d 612 (8th Cir. 2009) : The plaintiff, a railroad employee injured on the job, appealed a favorable verdict in an FELA case on the ground that evidence he was subsequently terminated was irrelevant and prejudicial because it suggested his lost wages resulted from his termination and not from his injuries. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of the evidence, as the plaintiff had opened the door when he testified that he was physically unable to go back to work for the railroad and "had to leave work because [he] couldn't any longer do that work." Evidence of the dismissal was permissible to rebut the unfair impression that physical limitations were the only reason he no longer worked at the defendant. Likewise, evidence that he went to a casino after leaving work early and missed work without calling a supervisor was admissible to shed light on the plaintiff's credibility when he testified he left work early due to illness and that he loved his job. In United States v. Eagle, 515 F.3d 794 (8th Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed convictions for aggravated sexual abuse in Indian country, finding no abuse of discretion in permitting the prosecution to cross-examine the defendant about drinking alcohol before being injured in a car accident and failing to cooperate with authorities in the prosecution of the other car's driver. The Court noted that on direct examination the defendant testified that he never met an FBI agent, which opened the door to questions concerning whether he had met with an agent when he was in the hospital with injuries relating to the car accident. The Court observed that the defendant only objected on relevance grounds, not Rule 403 grounds, and found that there was no plain error.

Byrd v. Maricopa County Sheriff's Dep't, 565 F.3d 1205 (9th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a judgment against a detainee who alleged that a female training cadet groped him during a strip search. It found no abuse of discretion when the defense introduced a "video yearbook" produced for the cadets, despite the plaintiff's claims that it was irrelevant because it did not include footage of any searches performed by the cadet, prejudicial because it presented the cadets in a highly flattering light, and misleading because it showed searches performed on fully clothed supervisors rather than the search of the plaintiff in his underwear. The Court held that the plaintiff had opened the door to introduction of the videotape by insinuating in the opening and in a witness examination that the County had videotaped the incident and then erased the tape; the video yearbook was properly admitted so the jury could determine whether the original videotape was likely or unlikely to contain what the plaintiff alleged.

[57] Other Cases Involving Party [Go To Main]

United States v. Raplinger, 555 F.3d 687 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions for sexual exploitation of a child and child pornography, finding no abuse of discretion when the defendant was barred from offering evidence that he had been convicted in state court of sexual abuse of the same child involved in the federal prosecution. The evidence was of little or no probative value, and might have appealed to the passions of the jury by leading it to falsely conclude that convicting the defendant on the federal charges would impermissibly punish him twice for the same conduct. In Batiste-Davis v. Lincare, Inc., 526 F.3d 377 (8th Cir. 2008) , in a Title VII action by an employee alleging that she was discharged because of her race, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to admit evidence that the plaintiff had filed a pro se Title VII and ADA suit, which she subsequently voluntarily dismissed, against a former employer six years earlier. Since there was no indication that the prior lawsuit was fraudulently filed, any probative value of the evidence was substantially outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice.

United States v. Chisum, 502 F.3d 1237 (10th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed convictions on four counts of tax evasion, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the defendant's prior lawsuits against tax judges. The Court noted that the intent requirement in criminal tax cases is particularly strict and concluded that "[t]he lawsuits tended to show that he was not acting in good faith in continuing his scams."

[58] Photographs, Movies, Videotapes [Go To Main]

[a] Events at Issue

United States v. Guthrie, 557 F.3d 243 (6th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions for carjacking and firearms offenses, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting a videotape of the pursuit of the defendant's car, given that the video demonstrated a crime in progress and the defendant was charged with that crime.

United States v. Williams, 512 F.3d 1040 (8th Cir. 2008) : Affirming drug and gun convictions, the Court found no abuse of discretion in a determination that audio and video recordings of controlled drug buys were not more prejudicial than probative despite their poor quality and inclusion of graphic and obscene language. The videos showed the residence at issue, there was no dispute about the accuracy of transcripts of the audio, and the understandable portions of the audio were consistent with witness testimony.

[b] Photographs, Movies, Videotapes -- Fair Depiction of the Evidence

United States v. Perez-Gonzalez, 445 F.3d 39 (1st Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed convictions arising from violent and destructive conduct at the former U.S. Navy base at Vieques, Puerto Rico. A celebration on the night before the Navy was to transfer the lands making up the base to the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service turned into a riot that was captured on film by news cameras. The Trial Judge admitted videotapes and photographs of the riot, which showed the defendant smashing a Humvee with a sledgehammer, scuffling with police, and repeatedly crashing a water truck into the guard post until it collapsed. The Court concluded that the photographs were only "prejudicial" in the sense that they showed the offense as it occurred and that this was not unfair prejudice.

United States v. Smith, 502 F.3d 680 (7th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed convictions arising from the defendant's sending a pipe bomb via Federal Express to the boyfriend of the defendant's former girlfriend. It found not abuse of discretion in the admission of a photograph taken by the intended victim showing the defendant making an obscene gesture, as the photo was probative of the acrimonious nature of the relationship between the defendant and the intended victim.

United States v. Howe, 538 F.3d 842 (8th Cir. 2008) , overruled in part on other grounds, 562 F.3d 892 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession arising from a kidnapping and murder conspiracy. It found no abuse of discretion in the admission of a photograph of a pistol similar to that used in committing the murder. The government correctly used the photograph as demonstrative evidence and did not suggest that it pictured the actual firearm; rather, the witnesses were questioned about the similarities and differences between the weapons. Thus, the photograph had probative value in identifying the type of pistol possessed by the defendant, and was not unfairly prejudicial because the jury could only have understood that it was being used as illustrative.

[c] Photographs, Movies, Videotapes -- Inflammatory Depictions

[ii] Photographs, Movies, Videotapes -- Inflammatory Depictions -- Defendants and Their Surroundings in Criminal Cases

United States v. Hunter, 558 F.3d 495 (6th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed most of the defendant's convictions for drug distribution offenses, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting a photograph of him holding a gun. The gun in the photo was identical to one found in his hotel room, and the photo was provided by the defendant's girlfriend, who testified she took it, that the gun in the photo was the same gun found in the hotel room, and that the defendant possessed the gun in the photo on that night. The photo was highly relevant because it tended to establish the defendant's ownership of the gun as well as to corroborate the girlfriend's testimony, and even if the pose in the photo was "menacing," it was not unduly prejudicial. In United States v. Wheaton, 517 F.3d 350 (6th Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed cocaine convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of a photo showing a gun found at one of three houses associated with the defendant and others, even though there was no evidence that the defendant ever possessed the gun. While there was no evidence linking the defendant to the gun, there was substantial evidence linking him to the three houses in which drugs, firearms, and other drug paraphernalia were found on the day of his arrest. The Court noted that the prejudicial effect of the photo was "considerably weakened by the fact that the district court gave two limiting instructions related to the gun" which "explicitly stated that the handgun was found where Wheaton was alleged to have frequented or been at certain moments in time, and cautioned the jury that the gun could not be used as proof of Wheaton's character."

United States v. Berndt, 530 F.3d 553 (7th Cir. 2008) : Affirming a conviction for possession of unregistered pipe bombs, the Court held that the probative value of a video showing the defendant's living quarters in his parents' home where the bombs were found was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice even though the video showed images of Nazi memorabilia. The video showed the various alarms and motion detectors that had been rigged around the bombs, and the jury knew that the defendant had a collection of American and German World War II memorabilia.

[iii] Photographs, Movies, Videotapes -- Inflammatory Depictions -- Miscellaneous Evidence in Criminal Cases

United States v. Joseph, 542 F.3d 13 (2d Cir. 2008) : In a prosecution for using the Internet to entice an underage girl to engage in unlawful sexual activity, the defendant testified that he had joined numerous Internet groups concerned with bodybuilding, including a site called "Muscleteens." He testified that when he joined the group the picture on the front was an adult bodybuilder, that he normally looked at photos of 18- to 21-year-olds, and that when the site "started to change" he "didn't go back and visit" anymore. The Government introduced, to rebut testimony that the photos on the site were predominately of 18- and 19-year-old girls, a group of photos taken from the site in the period before the defendant was arrested, in which many of the girls pictured appeared to be under 18. The defense was not permitted to question whether the defendant had seen any of the photos that were introduced. Reversing the conviction on other grounds, the Court stated that "[a]lthough admission of the Muscleteens photos was not erroneous, if they become relevant at a retrial, the defendant must be accorded an opportunity to present evidence that he did not view them."

United States v. Forrest, 429 F.3d 73 (4th Cir. 2005) : Affirming a conviction for production and possession of child pornography, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of pornographic and nonpornographic photos of adult males. Even if the implication of the defendant's homosexuality were prejudicial, the photos were highly relevant to rebut the suggestion that an album in which some were found (and which also contained photos of the victim) had been "manufactured," since photos bearing the same logo were also found on the defendant's computers.

United States v. Sinks, 473 F.3d 1315 (10th Cir. 2007) : In a prosecution for knowingly possessing stolen explosive materials and being a felon in possession of explosives, the Trial Judge ruled in limine that photographs of the dynamite found in the car which the defendant was driving would be admitted, after the government indicated that it would not discuss any "improvised explosive device." Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the photograph, which showed the dynamite wrapped in tape with protruding wires, to prove the defendant's possession of the dynamite. The Court also held that evidence of the way the bomb squad handled the dynamite was relevant to prove that it believed the dynamite was an explosive (something that the defendant refused to stipulate) and to lay a chain of custody for the dynamite. The Court added that "[t]he government could have overstepped its bounds by lingering on this evidence or attempting to paint Sinks as some sort of mad bomber, but it did not."

[iv] Photographs, Movies, Videotapes -- Inflammatory Depictions -- Victims in Criminal Cases

United States v. Fields, 483 F.3d 313 (5th Cir. 2007) : In a capital murder prosecution, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of photos of the victim's body, showing it in an advanced state of decomposition. Most of the 19 crime-scene photos were relevant to rebut the defendant's contention that there was little physical evidence connecting him to the murder, while others were probative to corroborate witnesses who testified that the defendant had dragged the body, and others helped explain to the jury why the body was not found until weeks after the murder. The 13 autopsy photos "helped the jury understand the medical examiner's testimony" and supported the government's theory of the cause of death. The 32 photos were not cumulative, because many photos had different relevance from other photos; furthermore, the Court noted that Rule 403 "does not ban per se all cumulative evidence" as "it is not required that each piece of evidence admitted have an entirely unique theory of relevancy." Finally, the marginal prejudice of any particular photo was trivial, given the fact that most of the photos were clearly admissible, so a replication of the same gruesome scene in another photo could not have had much impact on the jury.

United States v. Pettigrew, 468 F.3d 626 (10th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a conviction for involuntary manslaughter after the defendant drove his truck while intoxicated and collided with a family van, killing the mother and injuring the father and two young daughters. A photograph of the family was relevant, since a photograph of a victim may be used to prove identity, and all four of the family members were victims. However, the Court was troubled by the government's using the photo of the mother "with the rest of her family while saying that she did not make it home that night." Although it did not disturb the Trial Judge's balancing, the Court said "we must admonish the Government -- the proffering of a photograph of the deceased victim, while living and posed with her family, as opposed to a photo depicting only the decedent, needlessly pushes the prosecutorial envelope, and could, if coupled with errors not present here, jeopardize a conviction."

[d] Photographs, Movies, Videotapes -- Miscellaneous Cases

Grossmith v. Noonan, 607 F.3d 277 (1st Cir. 2010) : In a civil rights action by an arrestee who shot his neighbor's dog, the plaintiff argued that he shot the dog to protect himself, his own dog, and his livestock, and that the dog was "vicious" and "bloodthirsty" and looked like a wolf or coyote. Affirming a judgment for the defendants, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of a photo of the dog, in which the dog's appearance was inconsistent with the description given by the plaintiff, since the photo was useful to the jury in evaluating the credibility of the plaintiff's account.

Chavez v. Carranza, 559 F.3d 486 (6th Cir. 2009) : The Court upheld an award of compensatory and punitive damages for victims of torture and their families in a suit against a former Salvadoran military officer. It found no abuse of discretion in admitting photos depicting dead bodies and victims of military atrocities, since the photos proved crimes against humanity and established liability under a theory of command responsibility, and also demonstrated that the defendant had notice of the human rights violations committed by his subordinates.

United States v. Pruneda, 518 F.3d 597 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed drug and firearm convictions, finding no unfair prejudice in the admission of photographs of one defendant's basement showing the firearms and drug paraphernalia seized by law enforcement. The photos also showed also that the defendant had a Hustler magazine and CD, but the Court held that this was unlikely to be prejudicial because these items were lawfully possessed and the government did nothing to draw attention to them.

United States v. Pintado-Isiordia, 448 F.3d 1155 (9th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for unlawful re-entry into the United States, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding a photograph of the defendant in his Army National Guard uniform. Evidence of his enlistment in the Guard had been admitted, and the Court "agree[d] with the district court that the only apparent purpose behind introducing the photograph was to elicit the jury's sympathy and patriotism, which runs afoul of Rule 403."

[e] Photographs, Movies, Videotapes -- Mug Shots

United States v. Castaldi, 547 F.3d 699 (7th Cir. 2008) : Affirming a conviction for mail fraud and embezzlement, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the prosecution was permitted to use a mug shot of the defendant during opening and closing statements as part of a demonstrative aid showing the flow of funds between the defendant and others involved in the embezzlement scheme. Although the Court expressed "reservations" about the need to introduce the mug shot and noted that prosecutors would be "well advised" to simply use the defendant's name or a different picture in the future, it found no error because the mug shot did not indicate that the defendant was incarcerated and the photo "lacked prejudicial features" (e.g., the defendant was wearing "street clothes" in the photo).

United States v. Condrin, 473 F.3d 1283 (10th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to transport illegal aliens, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of a photograph of the defendant taken at the time of his arrest. The photo, which showed the defendant nearly bald, was relevant to help explain the discrepancy between the defendant's full head of hair at the time of trial and witness testimony identifying him as the "bald man," and lacked the prejudicial markers of mug shots held inadmissible, such as police identification boards and prison garb.

[f] Photographs, Movies, Videotapes -- Pornography Cases

United States v. Vosburgh, 602 F.3d 512 (3d Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possession of child pornography, finding no abuse of discretion in the introduction of non-pornographic child erotica found on the defendant's computer. The evidence suggested that the defendant harbored a sexual interest in children, and tended to disprove any argument that he unknowingly possessed the charged pornography or attempted to access the source link by accident. A limiting instruction avoided the risk of unfair prejudice.

United States v. Caldwell, 586 F.3d 338 (5th Cir. 2009) : In a prosecution for knowing possession of child pornography, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the government showed short clips of videos seized from the defendant showing adult bestiality. Clips from videos being downloaded when agents entered the defendant's home were relevant to the defendant's knowledge (which he denied) that the program he was accessing provided pornography. A clip downloaded several weeks previously and last viewed three days before the defendant's arrest was "more troubling," but it tended to rebut any argument of accident or mistake regarding the videos viewed the day of the arrest.

United States v. Zawada, 552 F.3d 531 (7th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for attempting to entice a minor to engage in criminal sexual activity and for knowingly transferring obscene material to a person under the age of 16, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of images the defendant sent to a person posing as a minor in a chat room. The photographs were relevant to both crimes and helped to prove that the defendant was trying to entice the minor into unlawful sexual activity, and they were not unfairly prejudicial.

United States v. Sewell, 457 F.3d 841 (8th Cir. 2006) : In a child pornography case, the government proposed showing 23 or fewer of the images that had been found on the defendant's computer for 3-4 seconds each in its case in chief, if the defendant would stipulate that each of the images met the legal definition of child pornography and that 25 of the images in a computer folder depicted known child victims as recognized and maintained in the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children and/or Child Victim Identification databases. After the defendant refused to so stipulate, the Trial Judge ruled before trial that the government could describe the images and file names and field descriptions, but that the jury could not see the images unless it so requested at the time of deliberations. On an interlocutory appeal the defendant offered to stipulate that the images met the' legal definition of child pornography, but the Court concluded that limits on the government's proof were an abuse of discretion: "His now-tendered offer is not dispositive, for the government is entitled to prove its case with evidence of its own choice and is not required to accept the offer."

United States v. Schales, 546 F.3d 965 (9th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possession of child pornography and related offenses by a defendant who surreptitiously took photographs of minor girls in his community and "morphed" the images by pasting the faces onto sexually explicit images of other girls that he downloaded from the Internet. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of images found on his camera when he was first apprehended after placing his camera underneath the miniskirt of a 14-year-old at a Wal-Mart and taking a photograph, as the photographs were part of the res gestae of the charged offense, and the Judge had taken steps to limit the cumulation and prejudicial effect of the evidence. In United States v. Ganoe, 538 F.3d 1117 (9th Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed a conviction for receipt and possession of child pornography, finding no abuse of discretion in permitting a short display of selected images found on the defendant's home computer, where the defendant refused to stipulate that the file titles alone would convey to a reasonable user that the files contained child pornography.

United States v. Burgess, 576 F.3d 1078 (10th Cir. 2009) : A computer and two hard drives seized when the defendant was arrested on drug charges contained thousands of images of child pornography. At the trial for possession and transportation of child pornography, the defense stipulated to the admission of four images appearing on both hard drives (the four images on the Maxtor drive were specifically named in the indictment). To prove the defendant's knowledge that the defendant knew the drives contained pornography, the government introduced images from the Seagate drive, including some that showed the 14-year-old ward of the defendant's friend. The images were sexually suggestive or borderline pornographic, and some had lewd text superimposed. Affirming, the Court rejected the argument that the images were inadmissible because they were not "vital" to the government's case, there being ample other evidence connecting the hard drives with the defendant. "Although it may be a factor, the test is not necessarily whether the evidence is vital to the government's case. Vitality is often a matter of perspective. Within limits delineated in the Federal Rules of Evidence the government is entitled to introduce all relevant, probative evidence at its disposal." As to 12 images of the ward with superimposed lewd text, the Court noted that they were not admitted until the defendant's friend had testified that the defendant had no opportunity to take the pictures and other witnesses had testified they had never seen him behave inappropriately with children. Although the Court suggested that it might have concluded that fewer than 12 of the images might have been sufficient for impeachment, it found no abuse of discretion.

United States v. Alfaro-Moncada, 607 F.3d 720 (11th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possession of child pornography, finding no abuse of discretion in permitting the government to show five images of child pornography to the jury. Although the defendant stipulated that there was child pornography on his DVD, the Court observed "that the prosecution is entitled to prove its case by evidence of its own choice" and concluded that the images tended to prove that the defendant knew he possessed child pornography, something to which he did not stipulate. In

United States v. Smith, 459 F.3d 1276 (11th Cir. 2006) , the Court affirmed convictions for producing and possessing child pornography, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of photographs of the defendant naked by himself, the defendant with other women engaged in sexually explicit conduct, and other women striking sexually explicit poses. The naked pictures of the defendant were relevant because they were the actual photos the victim singled out as photographs of the defendant, and "[g]iven that Smith's defense was that another person took the pictures, the photographs were certainly relevant in establishing the photographer's identity." Similarly, the pictures of the defendant with other women were relevant to establish the defendant's role in the photograph's production because they were in a room identical to the one where the victim was photographed. The Court also held that "the pictures of other women in similar poses in the same setting as those of the victim were relevant to establishing that ... Smith knowingly, as opposed to inadvertently, possessed the pictures of the victim as required by [statute]."

[g] Photographs, Movies, Videotapes -- Surveillance and "Day in the Life" Films

Baker v. Canadian Nat'l/Ill. Cent. R.R., 536 F.3d 357 (5th Cir. 2008) : Affirming judgment for the defendant in an action brought by a workman injured in a grade-crossing collision with a train, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of surveillance videos of the plaintiff, as they rebutted the plaintiff's claims as to his post-accident quality of life.

[59] Physical Evidence [Go To Main]

[b] Physical Evidence -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Nadeau, 598 F.3d 966 (8th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for assault with a dangerous weapon, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of a metal pipe recovered from a car parked in the defendant's yard. Witnesses had testified that the defendant assaulted the victim with a pipe-like object and the car in which the pipe was found was the one in which the defendant was riding on the night of the assault; that there was no blood, tissue, or fingerprint evidence on the pipe did not render it inadmissible.

United States v. Hall, 473 F.3d 1295 (10th Cir. 2007) : Affirming a conviction for conspiracy to distribute crack cocaine, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of a shotgun discovered in an inoperable car parked outside the defendant's residence and various ammunition (but not shotgun shells) found inside the residence. The Court reasoned that "[s]ome items like 'firearms, large sums of cash, weighing scales, and uncharged quantities of illegal drugs' are generally viewed as 'tools of the trade' -- 'that is, means for the distribution of illegal drugs.' " It added that "[t]he Government is not required to prove that the firearms or ammunition were used for a particular transaction in order for the evidence to be probative." Here, although the shotgun was found in an abandoned car, it was itself oiled, cleaned, and spotless, and it was sitting on top of other items in the car and easily accessible to the defendant.

[61] Police, Probation, and Parole Officer Testimony [Go To Main]

United States v. Brown, 510 F.3d 57 (1st Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no abuse of discretion in denying the defendant's motion in limine to preclude police officers from testifying that they identified the defendant's voice in a cell phone conversation. The officers, although not trained in voice identification, had listened in on "hundreds of hours" of the defendant's telephone conversations and had debriefed him in person during an investigation in the early 1990s. The defendant had subsequently undergone cancer surgeries on his tongue, but one of the officers had later spoken with him on a couple of occasions, and even if his voice had changed, he also had a distinctive manner of speech. The Court also held that references to the prior investigation had been handled in a way that avoided undue prejudice.

United States v. Contreras, 536 F.3d 1167 (10th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for bank robbery, finding no abuse of discretion when a probation officer familiar with the defendant was permitted to identify the defendant as the perpetrator of the robbery from surveillance video footage. The Court noted that in this case the defendant could have cross-examined the witness regarding past interactions without eliciting testimony about her status as a probation officer, and concluded that the defendant had made a tactical decision not to cross-examine.

[62] Polygraph and Similar Evidence [Go To Main]

[a] Civil Cases

Munoz v. State Farm Lloyds of Texas, 522 F.3d 568 (5th Cir. 2008) : In an action on a fire insurance policy, the insurer defended on the ground that the plaintiffs had intentionally set the fire. Reversing a judgment for the plaintiffs, the Court held it was reversible error to admit evidence that a grand jury did not indict the husband for arson, as such evidence is highly prejudicial. Although the plaintiffs argued that the insurer had opened the door to the evidence by introducing evidence that the husband had failed a polygraph examination, which they said was per se inadmissible, the Court noted that Daubert governs the admissibility of polygraph examination results, that neither party alleged that the results in this case were improperly admitted under Daubert, and that the plaintiffs had not objected to the introduction of the results at trial. Therefore, there was no support for the contention that the polygraph evidence was inadmissible and the door was not opened to the evidence of non-indictment.

[b] Polygraph and Similar Evidence -- Criminal Cases

[ii] Polygraph and Similar Evidence -- Criminal Cases -- Defense Evidence Excludable

United States v. Dinga, 609 F.3d 904 (7th Cir. 2010) : Affirming a conviction for making a false statement to a federal law enforcement officer, the Court found no error in the exclusion of evidence that the defendant offered to take a polygraph test. It noted that the evidence showed the defendant did not offer to take the test; rather, he was "backed into a corner until, as a last resort, he agreed to take a test because he felt that he had no better options." Furthermore, there was no advance agreement that the test results would be admissible, so the defendant's offer would be only "marginally probative" of his credibility because he may have thought there would be little at stake if he failed the test.

United States v. Apperson, 441 F.3d 1162 (10th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for conspiring to manufacture LSD, the Court found no error in prohibiting the defendant from cross-examining a cooperating witness about the witness' failing a polygraph test during the investigation. The defendant was intending to impeach the witness's character for truthfulness, but the Court noted that a failed polygraph test "had the potential to be overvalued by the jury, and thus was excludable under Rule 403."

[iv] Polygraph and Similar Evidence -- Criminal Cases -- Prosecution Evidence

United States v. Blake, 571 F.3d 331 (4th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a carjacking conviction, finding no abuse of discretion when the prosecution was permitted to introduce evidence that the defendant had taken a polygraph examination. The evidence was admitted only on redirect to counter a defense implication that a one-on-one interrogation of the defendant was coercive, so the defense "essentially forced the court to admit the evidence"; the results of the examination were not disclosed; and jury instructions not to speculate on the results and to use the evidence only to consider the circumstances of the interrogation greatly minimized any danger of unfair prejudice.

United States v. Allard, 464 F.3d 529 (5th Cir. 2006) : The defendant had confessed to making a false claim of consumer product tampering after she was informed that she had failed a polygraph test, but at trial she claimed the confession was coerced. In response, the government introduced statements made during the examination and called the agent who administered it to explain the process and recount the events. The jury was instructed that it could consider the statements surrounding the test to determine the witness' credibility but that the results of the test were not admissible. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion. The requirements of Rule 702 did not apply because no technical, scientific, or expert testimony was being offered, and the probative value of the evidence to rebut the defendant's claim of a coerced confession was not substantially outweighed by any risk of prejudice to the defendant.

United States v. Street, 548 F.3d 618 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court reversed a conviction for aiding and abetting murder in furtherance of drug trafficking, holding it was error to deny the defendant a mistrial after a jailhouse informant testified that the defendant had said he failed a polygraph test regarding the murder. Although the Judge immediately instructed the jury that "polygraph examinations are not scientifically reliable and they're not admissible in evidence," the Court held that the instruction was insufficient protection for the defendant, whose credibility was vital to his defense in this case, which was largely built on the testimony of cooperating witnesses and jailhouse informants.

[62.1] Post-Event Conduct [Go To Main]

Foradori v. Harris, 523 F.3d 477 (5th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a judgment for a customer who sued a fast food restaurant operator to recover for injuries sustained on its premises as a result of an assault by an off-duty employee. It found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the operator's post-accident conduct, since "[t]he trial judge reasonably could have concluded that the evidence of Captain D's lack of concern and precautions for customer safety post-episode had probative value tending to show managerial attitudes at the time of the altercation and assault that was not substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effects."

[62.2] Predicate Felonies [Go To Main]

United States v. Banks, 553 F.3d 1101 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no abuse of discretion when the names of the predicate felonies were introduced. The particular felonies were relevant because the statute excludes certain felonies from serving as predicates, and the Judge gave a limiting instruction to minimize prejudice.

[63] Prejudice [Go To Main]

[c] Prejudice -- "Prejudice" Covered by the Rule

United States v. Harper, 463 F.3d 663 (7th Cir. 2006) : Affirming mail fraud convictions, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of a letter sent by the government to his previous attorney, which reported that the defendant had deposited unexplained cash into his accounts. The letter was offered to prove that the defendant knew of the government's awareness and responded by covering his tracks. The defendant testified that he never heard about the letter, and argued that it was impermissible and prejudicial to allow the jury to infer his receipt of it merely because it was addressed to his then-attorney. The Court noted that the prejudicial effects that the defendant alleged, such as having to take the stand in his own defense, were strategic decisions and not within the realm of Rule 403. The Court concluded that the "only prejudicial effect which would have been apparent to the factfinder was the letter's strong probative value -- the prejudice was not unfair and did not outweigh the probative value -- as such there is no basis for exclusion under Rule 403." The Court also noted that lawyers are expected to confer with their clients, and that it is not unreasonable to infer that they do so.

United States v. McCourt, 468 F.3d 1088 (8th Cir. 2006) : In a prosecution for attempted distribution and receipt of child pornography over the Internet, seven three-second video clips containing child pornography that were found on the defendant's computer were admitted. Affirming, the Court rejected a defense argument that the Judge had failed to conduct a Rule 403 balancing in deciding whether to admit the video clips rather than the defendant's stipulations that they contained child pornography. Although the Judge did not enter into a lengthy analysis during the motion in limine conference, "the Trial Court's mere failure to make a record of its rule 403 weighing is not reversible error." Moreover, a more thorough balancing evaluation would not have changed the result because " Rule 403 requires a preliminary showing of unfair prejudice before the need to balance the probative value of the evidence and its alternatives arises," and here there was no showing that the evidence was unfairly prejudicial. While video may be more prejudicial than still photographs, the Court concluded that "we see no reason here that the Government must limit its evidence to still images because McCourt did not so limit his collection."

[66.1] Product Warnings [Go To Main]

Giles v. Wyeth, Inc., 556 F.3d 596 (7th Cir. 2009) : In a product liability action alleging inadequate warnings regarding an antidepressant drug that allegedly caused the decedent's death, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence regarding warnings attached to the drug after the death. The subsequent warnings had little, if any, probative value, since they mainly referred to risks to children and young adults and disclaimed any increased risk to patients of the decedent's age (46); in any event, there was no showing they reflected information the defendant knew or reasonably knew at the time of the decedent's death. At the same time, the evidence could have confused the jury into thinking that warnings of increased suicidal thinking and behavior in adolescents and young adults also had some application to the decedent, when there was no evidence to support that.

[68] Race and Ancestry [Go To Main]

United States v. Orenuga, 430 F.3d 1158 (D.C. Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a bribery conviction, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of a videotape in which the defendant told a confidential informant not to set up transactions with Jews, black Americans, or white men. The evidence tended to rebut an entrapment defense by showing, through the defendant's statements about future deals and the types of people with whom he preferred to deal, that he was a willful participant in the charged criminal activity.

United States v. Seale, 600 F.3d 473 (5th Cir. 2010) : In the prosecution of a fatal kidnapping committed in 1964, the prosecution introduced contemporaneous statements regarding the defendant's racial animus and membership in the KKK. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence. The victims had been abducted because of their race by a band of men who shared membership in a group hostile to African-Americans and the Civil Rights movement, so even though the evidence was racially inflammatory, it was relevant to show the defendant's motive and intent and to identify his relationship to others in the conspiracy. In United States v. Anderson, 560 F.3d 275 (5th Cir. 2009) , the Court affirmed a conviction for sex trafficking of children, holding it was error (but harmless) when the testimony of an FBI special agent regarding the culture of prostitution implied that all pimps are black males. An implication that persons of the same race as the defendant are more likely to commit certain crimes is impermissible both on constitutional grounds and because its probative value is outweighed by its danger of unfair prejudice.

Farfaras v. Citizens Bank & Trust, 433 F.3d 558 (7th Cir. 2006) : In an action for sexual harassment, the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding the defendants' comments about the plaintiff's Greek ancestry. The comments led to, and were intertwined with, the defendants' sexually harassing statements and "[g]iven the egregious nature of the defendants' sexual comments, ... [there was no evidence] that the defendants' less severe, discriminatory comments had an injurious effect or prejudiced the jury's verdict."

[69] Reading Materials [Go To Main]

United States v. Parr, 545 F.3d 491 (7th Cir. 2008) : In a conversation with a fellow prisoner, the defendant threatened to blow up a federal building. At trial the government introduced The Anarchist Cookbook, a manual containing recipes for making homemade explosives and weaponry, which had been found in the defendant's possession before his imprisonment. Affirming, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to admit the entire book, as opposed to those sections the defendant had discussed in his conversation. The remaining portions, a hodgepodge of instructions for committing an array of illegal activities, many of which having nothing to do with explosives, could only risk inflaming the jury.

United States v. Caraway, 534 F.3d 1290 (10th Cir. 2008) : The defendant was convicted of mailing an explosive to a man who was dating his ex-wife. At trial a government witness testified that he found a book in the defendant's workshop that contained instructions and illustrations for making explosives. He never saw the defendant with the book, and noted that he found it near "some stuff that somebody was storing there." That "somebody" was a person other than the defendant. The defendant argued that it was error to admit this testimony under Rule 403, but the Court disagreed. The testimony was probative, because an issue in the case was whether the defendant had the knowledge to construct an explosive device, and "[e]vidence that there was at one time a book in Mr. Caraway's workshop that explained how to make an explosive device similar to the one sent to Mr. Owens makes his possession of that knowledge more probable." And the evidence was not unfairly prejudicial, since "[i]f the jury inferred that Mr. Caraway had read the book, that inference [of knowledge] was properly inculpatory. If the jury did not believe that he had read it, the jury was highly unlikely to hold against him that such a book was found on his property."

[72] Religious Affiliations and Beliefs [Go To Main]

United States v. Ahrendt, 560 F.3d 69 (1st Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for cocaine conspiracy, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of expert testimony that the defendant (whose competency was questionable) viewed drug use as "sacramental consumption." The testimony about the defendant's beliefs in a higher law was not probative of his ability to form the requisite intent for conviction on a conspiracy charge, and it had a significant potential to confuse or mislead the jury into thinking that the defendant's #x201c; 'idiosyncratic philosophy amounts to a form of temporary insanity or ameliorates the offense.' "

[76] Settlement Agreements [Go To Main]

United States v. Miller, 588 F.3d 897 (5th Cir. 2009) : The defendant physician was convicted for tax evasion related in part to his embezzlement from his employer. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence regarding a settlement agreement between the defendant and the employer, as the evidence did not relate to his alleged embezzlement activities and its "minimal probative value [was] outweighed substantially to confuse the jury, as it is unrelated to the specific charges of tax evasion in the indictment."

United States v. Roti, 484 F.3d 934 (7th Cir. 2007) : The defendant, charged with bankruptcy fraud and concealing assets from a bankruptcy trustee, claimed that his lawyer put him up to the scheme. The Trial Judge excluded, under Rule 408, evidence that the defendant had sued the lawyer and the lawyer settled that litigation, but also indicated that the evidence would have been excluded under Rule 403. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the Rule 403 analysis; it doubted that the evidence was even relevant, because the defendant was not arguing that he was duped by the lawyer into believing that his course of conduct was legal. "The problem is not only that Werth's culpability would not excuse Roti's but also that the settlement of a civil claim does not say anything helpful about Roti's state of mind."

[77] Sexual Activities [Go To Main]

[a] Civil Cases

Fox v. Hayes, 600 F.3d 819 (7th Cir. 2010) : After a three-year-old was abducted, sexually assaulted, and murdered, her father was arrested and detained for seven months before DNA tests showed that he was not the assailant. In a § 1983 action alleging false arrest and other state law claims, the defendant police officers claimed that they had probable cause for the arrest. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiffs, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that the father told the officers before he was arrest that he was "horny" on the night of the child's disappearance and had masturbated into a condom while watching an adult video, offered to show that he changed his story about not being able to remember what he watched that night. "Even putting aside the defendants' testimony that they did not know about the supposed change," they had been permitted to elicit the only fact they needed to demonstrate the supposed change, that the father had watched an adult video. The additional details were not simply "dramatic," as the defendants described them, but prejudicial.

Littleton v. McNeely, 562 F.3d 880 (8th Cir. 2009) : Littleton, the driver of a boat struck in a night-time collision with another boat driven by McNeely, brought an action against McNeely. McNeely counterclaimed for contribution and filed a third-party claim against the owner of Littleton's boat. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of photographs that showed the Littletons and the boat owner and his wife in a place called "Party Cove," with the wives depicted without their bikini tops. The Court reasoned that "[i]t is readily apparent jurors might consider such conduct lewd, offensive or immoral; the photographs did not reveal whether or not the beverages were alcoholic; they did not actually depict anyone drinking anything; and they were not date-stamped so there was no way to be certain they depicted activity on the day of the accident."

[c] Sexual Activities -- Offered by Prosecution

United States v. Brockenborrugh, 575 F.3d 726 (D.C. Cir. 2009) : In a prosecution for wire fraud arising from a scheme to file a fraudulent deed to obtain a property, the defendant explained on direct examination that his relationship with the other conspirator was that she did taxes for half of the court security officers (of which he was one) and was his property manager. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the government was permitted to cross-examine the defendant about his extramarital sexual relationship with the conspirator. The cross-examination was reasonable given the suggestion on direct examination that the conspirators had only a business relationship, and the only possible prejudicial effect arose from the inference that a person who "cheats" on his wife cannot be trusted; "[a]ny such effect was mitigated by the district court's instruction to the jury to disregard the relationship as evidence of bad character."

United States v. Udeozor, 515 F.3d 260 (4th Cir. 2008) : Affirming convictions for holding another in involuntary servitude and harboring a juvenile alien, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the defendant's former husband physically and sexually abused the victim, because the "abuse of the victim was one of the forms of force used to keep the minor victim in the condition of involuntary servitude."

United States v. Stout, 509 F.3d 796 (6th Cir. 2007) : On interlocutory appeal in a prosecution for possession of child pornography, the Court (2-1) affirmed an in limine ruling precluding the government from introducing evidence that the defendant had previously been convicted for installing a hidden camera in the home of family friends and videotaping their 14-year-old daughter in the shower. While the prior act evidence might have some probative value on the question whether the defendant knew that the images he was charged with possessing were of children, that probative value was slight. The government's need for the evidence to prove intent and knowledge to possess child pornography was likewise slight, since it had other means of proof, such as testimony by the defendant's ex-wife that she had discovered on his computer that he had been searching for child pornography. On the other hand, in the words of the Trial Judge, "[t]he prior bad acts evidence is prejudicial because it is both inflammatory and distracting. It is more lurid and frankly more interesting than the evidence surrounding the actual charges. Any jury will be more alarmed and disgusted by the prior acts than the actual charged conduct. As a consequence, the jury is likely to pay undue attention to it... . [T]here is a strong possibility that the jury will be improperly distracted from the primary evidence at hand." In United States v. Chambers, 441 F.3d 438 (6th Cir. 2006) , the court affirmed a conviction for interstate transportation of a minor for criminal sexual activity, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of the defendant's notebooks, which contained graphic descriptions of sex acts between him and his victims. The evidence was relevant to show that the defendant knew that the victims were minors and that he engaged in sexual acts with a particular victim. The evidence painted the defendant in a bad light, but it went to elements of proof essential to the prosecution's case.

United States v. Betcher, 534 F.3d 820 (8th Cir. 2008) : The defendant, charged with taking pornographic pictures of his minor granddaughters and distributing them, claimed that the girls took the pictures themselves. The Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting several pictures and a video of one or more of the girls, none of which contained graphic depictions of child pornography. The video was relevant "to show Betcher was in control of production and distribution" and that the photos indicated that they were taken in the defendant's home by someone other than the children themselves. The Court found no unfair prejudice in the evidence, and therefore "it is not necessary for us to evaluate the availability of evidentiary alternatives." In United States v. Anwar, 428 F.3d 1102 (8th Cir. 2005) , the court affirmed a conviction for conspiring to evade immigration laws by arranging fraudulent marriages, holding that evidence of the defendant's romantic relationship with two women who entered into the marriages was properly admitted to prove that they were sham arrangements, since it was unlikely that the defendant would solicit women with whom he was romantically involved to marry other men.

United States v. Curtin, 489 F.3d 935 (9th Cir. 2007) (en banc): The defendant engaged in sexually explicit conversation in an Internet chat room with an agent posing as a 14-year-old girl. When he was arrested after traveling to another state to meet her, his personal digital assistant was found to contain over 140 stories about adults having sex with children. Five of the stories (all of which involved incest) were introduced at his trial for interstate travel to engage in sex with a minor. A panel of the Court had reversed the conviction on the ground that the evidence was inadmissible under Rule 404(b) to prove intent, 443 F.3d 1084 (9th Cir. 2006) ; guided by People of Terr. of Guam v. Shymanovitz, 157 F.3d 1154, 1159 (9th Cir. 1998) (Manual § 403.03[77][c]), the panel concluded, " 'Possession of lawful reading material is simply not the type of conduct contemplated by Rule 404(b).' " On en banc review, the Court held that the some of the stories in the defendant's possession were relevant to rebut his contention that he was intending to meet a 30- to 40-year-old woman who liked to pretend that she was an inexperienced teenage girl, and could thus be admitted under Rule 404(b). However, it was an abuse of discretion under Rule 403 for the Judge to admit all five of the stories without reading them through completely, as they contained portions with graphic descriptions of sexual conduct bearing no relation at all to the scenarios presented by the parties. As to one story, the Court commented: "Had the district court read Exhibit 7C, the court would no doubt have spotted this excrescence and required that it be edited out of the exhibit as both irrelevant and dangerously prejudicial." Five Judges concurred, but argued that "what people read or fantasize should not be used to prove what they intend to do," and thus would not overrule Shymanovitz; in any event, they would find evidence of a person's fantasies prejudicial. On remand, only one carefully redacted story, which explicitly described prurient sexual activity between an adult and a child, was admitted. The defense brought out on cross-examination that the defendant's PDA contained other stories pertaining to innocent subjects that did not involve sex with juveniles or children. The agent then testified on redirect that the total number of child/sex stories in the PDA was 140. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion. United States v. Curtin, 588 F.3d 993 (9th Cir. 2009) . The Judge had faithfully followed the en banc opinion in admitting the story, and the redirect examination was more relevant than prejudicial in countering the inference the defendant attempted to create that the story introduced was only a small, insignificant part of the PDA's total content.

United States v. Burgess, 576 F.3d 1078 (10th Cir. 2009) : A computer and two hard drives seized when the defendant was arrested on drug charges contained thousands of images of child pornography. At the trial for possession and transportation of child pornography, the defense stipulated to the admission of four images appearing on both hard drives (the four images on the Maxtor drive were specifically named in the indictment). To prove the defendant's knowledge that the defendant knew the drives contained pornography, the government introduced images from the Seagate drive, including some that showed the 14-year-old ward of the defendant's friend. The images were sexually suggestive or borderline pornographic, and some had lewd text superimposed. Affirming, the Court rejected the argument that the images were inadmissible because they were not "vital" to the government's case, there being ample other evidence connecting the hard drives with the defendant. "Although it may be a factor, the test is not necessarily whether the evidence is vital to the government's case. Vitality is often a matter of perspective. Within limits delineated in the Federal Rules of Evidence the government is entitled to introduce all relevant, probative evidence at its disposal." As to 12 images of the ward with superimposed lewd text, the Court noted that they were not admitted until the defendant's friend had testified that the defendant had no opportunity to take the pictures and other witnesses had testified they had never seen him behave inappropriately with children. Although the Court suggested that it might have concluded that fewer than 12 of the images might have been sufficient for impeachment, it found no abuse of discretion. In United States v. Cerno, 529 F.3d 926 (10th Cir. 2008) , the Court affirming a conviction for aggravated sexual abuse, found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony that, upon returning home from a wake, the victim and other family members found the defendant passed out on a couch with his penis exposed while a pornographic videotape played on the television. The Trial Judge found that the evidence tended to impeach the defendant's testimony that drinking did not impair his judgment. The Court stated that "this is a close question and we may well have come to a different conclusion ourselves" but "our own view of the issue is not relevant under the applicable standard of review." The Court found the exposure evidence "had some relevance as impeachment by contradiction." And while the evidence was prejudicial, "it is not enough that the risk of unfair prejudice be greater than the probative value of the evidence; the danger of that evidence must substantially outweigh the evidence's probative value."

[78] Similar Circumstances [Go To Main]

[a] Absence of Accidents or Complaints

Moyer v. United Dominion Indus., Inc., 473 F.3d 532 (3d Cir. 2007) : In an action by factory workers alleging serious and permanent hand injuries as a result of using the defendant's "swager" (a machine used to form metal), evidence that there had been no prior claims against the defendant for injuries like those claimed by the plaintiffs was excluded. Reversing denial of the defendant's motion for a new trial, the Court held that exclusion of the evidence was an abuse of discretion because all swagers sold were basically the same, the defendants sold thousands of swagers, and the defendant kept a comprehensive database of claims and lawsuits involving swagers.

Croskey v. BMW of No. Am., Inc., 532 F.3d 511 (6th Cir. 2008) : The plaintiff, who was injured by scalding fluid when the plastic neck on a car's radiator failed, brought product liability claims alleging both that the design of the radiator was defective and that the defendant manufacturer failed to provide warnings after becoming aware that the plastic radiator neck might fail. When the plaintiff offered evidence of other incidents in which the neck failed, the Judge admitted the evidence only on the failure to warn claim, limiting it to incidents occurring before the plaintiff's accident of which the defendant was notified. Reversing a judgment for the defendant, the Court held that under the governing law evidence of similar incidents was also relevant to prove that the design was defective. The Court cited a state case suggesting that in a case like this evidence of incidents postdating the plaintiff's accident, which would be relevant to a defect claim but irrelevant to a warning claim, could be excluded under Rule 403 as confusing. The Court also noted that on remand the defendant could offer evidence of the total number of cars sold having a radiator with the allegedly defective design. In the Judge's discretion, evidence of a positive safety history might tend to rebut the defect claim; cross-examination could help the jury understand the statistics offered. Finally, the Court held it was error to exclude testimony by non-BMW mechanics regarding performance of the radiator neck on the design defect claim, but proper to exclude their testimony on the warning claim, as knowledge was not notice to the defendant.

[b] Similar Circumstances -- Civil Rights Cases

Quigley v. Winter, 598 F.3d 938 (8th Cir. 2010) : Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff in an action for sex discrimination in housing, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding sexual harassment committed by the defendant landlord against other tenants. The Court found that the evidence was sufficiently closely related to the circumstances and theory of the case, and that the Judge had exercised discretion in excluding testimony from another former tenant as being too remote. The Court also found no abuse of discretion in admitting a probable cause determination made in the case by a state agency, particularly because the jury was instructed that it, not the agency, was responsible for determining if the plaintiff had proved her case.

[d] Similar Circumstances -- Employment Discrimination Cases

King v. McMillan, 594 F.3d 301 (4th Cir. 2010) : In a Title VII sexual harassment action by a former deputy sheriff, the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by two other women who said they had been sexually harassed by the sheriff while working for him in the sheriff's office. The evidence was probative of whether the sheriff's unwelcome conduct was because of the plaintiff's sex and of whether the conduct was sufficiently severe or pervasive to create a hostile work environment. Any prejudice was limited by admitting only testimony of harassment that occurred during the same time frame as the plaintiff's employment. The Court found that there was no need to give a specific instruction that the testimony could not be considered on a state-law battery claim against the sheriff in his individual capacity.

Harris v. Chand, 506 F.3d 1135 (8th Cir. 2007) : Affirming a judgment for the employer in a Title VII race discrimination action, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence regarding a white employee who had a different position, in a different department, with a different supervisor. The circumstances were not sufficiently similar because there were different decision makers.

Josephs v. Pacific Bell, 432 F.3d 1006 (9th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a judgment for a former employee who alleged that the defendant's refusal to reinstate him after his discharge for fraudulent entries on his employment application violated the Americans with Disabilities Act and the California Fair Employment and Housing Act. It found no abuse of discretion when evidence of three other employees' grievance settlements with the defendant was admitted. The other employees had similar jobs and displayed similar conduct, so their settlements were properly admitted to show that the defendant treated similarly situated employees more favorably than the plaintiff. The dissenting Judge argued that none of the other employees displayed similar conduct and their settlements distracted the jury from determining whether the plaintiff was qualified for his position.

[e] Similar Circumstances -- Miscellaneous Cases

Brazos R. Auth. v. GE Ionics, Inc., 469 F.3d 416 (5th Cir. 2006) : The plaintiff sued for breach of warranty after a retrofitted desalinization plant supplied by the defendants suffered several fires. At trial, evidence of fires at similar plants was excluded on the ground that it was barred by Rule 404(b). Vacating a judgment for the defendants, the Court held it was error to exclude evidence of fires at similar plants under Rule 404(b), as that Rule does not apply to inanimate objects, and that the evidence was not excludable under Rule 403, either. The other fires involved substantially similar products under substantially similar circumstances, there was no risk of unfair prejudice, and any differences between the situations went to the weight of the evidence and not its admissibility.

Craig Outdoor Advertising, Inc. v. Viacom Outdoor, Inc., 528 F.3d 1001 (8th Cir. 2008) : Small billboard companies alleged that the defendant, a billboard operator acting as leasing agent for railroads, had wrongfully appropriated for itself billboard sites for which the plaintiffs had applied. Affirming in part a judgment for the plaintiffs, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting two railroad employees to testify that the defendant's process of reviewing site applications internally was outside the industry norm and contrary to their expectations as representatives of the railroads, and that it was not fair for the defendant to surreptitiously review applications and appropriate sites. The witnesses spoke from their experience in railroad real estate management and billboard site review and approval, and their testimony was helpful to the jury in refuting testimony by the defendant's witnesses that its process was permissible under the terms of its contracts with the railroads. The Court also found there was no abuse of the Judge's "considerable discretion" in determining that the probative value of testimony by billboard-site applicants other than the plaintiffs regarding their experiences with the defendant were not substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect.

[f] Similar Circumstances -- Other Accident Cases

Surles v. Greyhound Lines, Inc., 474 F.3d 288 (6th Cir. 2007) : The plaintiff, suing for personal injuries incurred when a deranged passenger attacked the driver of an interstate bus with a box cutter and caused a serious accident, argued that the defendant was on notice of incidents likely to lead to the kind of injury suffered by the plaintiff. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of 42 incidents in the prior four years in which a passenger had attempted to interfere with the operation of a moving bus. The Court rejected a defense argument that the evidence was not sufficiently similar because only five resulted in an accident and none involved armed passengers attacking and seriously injuring a driver, and noted that if a " 'prior occurrence is offered to prove notice, ... a lesser degree of similarity is required provided the accident would have tended to warn the defendant." The Court also rejected the plaintiff's argument on a cross-appeal that it was an abuse of discretion to exclude evidence of incidents more than four years before the plaintiff's accident.

[g] Similar Circumstances -- Product Liability Cases

[i] Automobiles, Aircraft, etc.

Croskey v. BMW of No. Am., Inc., 532 F.3d 511 (6th Cir. 2008) : The plaintiff, who was injured by scalding fluid when the plastic neck on a car's radiator failed, brought product liability claims alleging both that the design of the radiator was defective and that the defendant manufacturer failed to provide warnings after becoming aware that the plastic radiator neck might fail. When the plaintiff offered evidence of other incidents in which the neck failed, the Judge admitted the evidence only on the failure to warn claim, limiting it to incidents occurring before the plaintiff's accident of which the defendant was notified. Reversing a judgment for the defendant, the Court held that under the governing law evidence of similar incidents was also relevant to prove that the design was defective. The Court cited a state case suggesting that in a case like this evidence of incidents postdating the plaintiff's accident, which would be relevant to a defect claim but irrelevant to a warning claim, could be excluded under Rule 403 as confusing. The Court also noted that on remand the defendant could offer evidence of the total number of cars sold having a radiator with the allegedly defective design. In the Judge's discretion, evidence of a positive safety history might tend to rebut the defect claim; cross-examination could help the jury understand the statistics offered. Finally, the Court held it was error to exclude testimony by non-BMW mechanics regarding performance of the radiator neck on the design defect claim, but proper to exclude their testimony on the warning claim, as knowledge was not notice to the defendant.

United States Aviation Underwriters, Inc. v. Pilatus Bus. Aircraft, Ltd., 582 F.3d 1131 (10th Cir. 2009) : Reversing and remanding judgment for the plaintiffs in a product liability action arising from an accident when an aircraft's engine shut down, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to admit evidence of other in-flight shutdowns, where the incidents did not involve any of the causes alleged by the plaintiffs in this case.

[ii] Similar Circumstances -- Product Liability Cases -- Drugs, Medical Supplies, etc.

Chlopek v. Federal Ins. Co., 499 F.3d 692 (7th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendants in a product liability action arising from injuries allegedly caused by a device that delivers cooling therapy to postoperative patients. The plaintiff had offered incident reports of injuries related to the device and a prior model; the Judge had admitted only one of the ten reports involving the device at issue and none of those involving the other. The Court found no abuse of discretion, as the Judge had carefully considered each report and found only the one as being sufficiently similar in terms of the body part involved, the type of injury, and the nature of the complaint. Furthermore, no information was given in the excluded reports about the warnings provided, although the plaintiff's theory of the case was failure to warn.

[iii] Similar Circumstances -- Product Liability Cases -- Miscellaneous Products

Bryte v. American Household, Inc., 429 F.3d 469 (4th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a summary judgment for the manufacturer of an electric throw in a wrongful death action. It found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence of other accidents, where there was no showing that they were similar to the accident in question. The Court noted that "plaintiffs sought to introduce such evidence without establishing their premise: the salient characteristics of this incident, as well as the incident to which comparison is sought."

Daniel v. Coleman Co, Inc., 599 F.3d 1045 (9th Cir. 2010) : In a wrongful death action alleging that a defective heater caused deaths by carbon monoxide poisoning, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that users of different heaters manufactured by the defendant were killed by carbon monoxide poisoning. The evidence of other occurrences was not admissible to prove notice, because the parties had stipulated to the defendant's awareness of other deaths resulting from operation of its heaters in closed spaces, and that stipulation was read to the jury several times. Furthermore, because the heater at issue in this case was more powerful and larger, was designated for a different kind of use, and included different warning language from those involved in the other deaths, it was permissible to find that accidents caused by the other heater models were not "substantially similar" to the accident at issue.

[78.1] Sound Recordings [Go To Main]

United States v. Calabrese, 572 F.3d 362 (7th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed robbery and firearm convictions, finding no abuse of discretion when an audiotape in which the defendant threatened and beat a witness was admitted to show consciousness of guilt. The Court noted that there was a risk of prejudice because letting the jury " hear the sounds of the beating, as opposed to providing a transcript, might, in some minds, seem over the top." But it also noted that voices "can reveal meaning that words alone might mask." It concluded that "a reasonable judge could have decided to use a transcript instead, or even to eliminate some of the vulgarities, but that's just the point -- reasonable minds can differ."

[82] Stipulations [Go To Main]

[a] Civil Cases

United States ex rel. Miller v. Bill Harbert Int'l Constr., Inc., 608 F.3d 871 (D.C. Cir. 2010) : Remanding for a new trial in a False Claims Act case arising from a bid-rigging conspiracy, the Court held that it was an abuse of discretion to admit evidence contrary to a stipulation of the parties, as the jury would not be able to see the distinction that the proponent asserted between the evidence and the stipulated facts.

[b] Stipulations -- Criminal Cases

[ii] Stipulations -- Criminal Cases -- Generally

United States v. Morales-Aldahondo, 524 F.3d 115 (1st Cir. 2008) : The defendant, convicted of possessing child pornography, argued that it was error to admit 12 photographs and ten video clips of child pornography seized from a computer at his house. The defendant had offered to stipulate that the images met the legal definition of pornography, and he claimed that the stipulation obviated the government's need to introduce the photos and videos. Finding no error, the Court stated that the government "need not accept a defendant's attempt to use a stipulation to overcome the right of the government to make a full presentation of the crime currently charged." In this case, the evidence supported the government expert's description of how the photos and videos were organized on the computer in the defendant's home. This was probative because the defendant argued that the photos and videos were his brother's -- but his brother's storage methods were far less organized. Finally, the Court noted that under Rule 403, the Trial Court "is not required to scrub the trial clean of all evidence that may have an emotional impact, where the evidence is part of the government's narrative."

United States v. Polouizzi, 564 F.3d 142 (2d Cir. 2009) : The defendant interposed an insanity defense to charges that he received and possessed child pornography. The Court found no error when the government was permitted to introduce a number of pictures of child pornography that were found on the defendant's external hard drives. Although the defendant contended that the images were not probative of a disputed fact because he did not contest that he had received or possessed child pornography, the Court concluded that "the stipulation was not an adequate substitute for the evidence offered. The specific nature and content of the images were relevant to the jury's evaluation of Polizzi's claim that he did not understand the wrongfulness of receiving and possessing those images. Indeed, the Supreme Court has noted specifically that the government generally has a right to present evidence, rather than accept a stipulation, to establish the 'human significance' of the fact and 'to implicate the law's moral underpinnings.' " Moreover, the risk of unfair prejudice was minimized by the mode of presentation.

United States v. Caldwell, 586 F.3d 338 (5th Cir. 2009) : In a prosecution for knowing possession of child pornography, the defendant complained that admission of short clips from pornography found on his computer violated Rule 403 because he had stipulated that the videos "contain[ed] visual depictions of minors under the age of eighteen, engaging in sexually explicit conduct." Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion, noting that the stipulation "does not have the same evidentiary value [in meeting jurors' expectations] as actually seeing the particular explicit conduct of the specific minors." Furthermore, the specific videos presented "reflected how likely it was that the defendant knew that the video depicted child pornography (which knowledge the stipulation did not mention)."

United States v. McCourt, 468 F.3d 1088 (8th Cir. 2006) : In a prosecution for attempted distribution and receipt of child pornography over the Internet, seven three-second video clips containing child pornography that were found on the defendant's computer were admitted. Affirming, the Court rejected a defense argument that in light of a stipulation that the video clips contained child pornography, they should have been excluded as a matter of law under Old Chief v. United States, 519 U.S. 172 (1997) . The Court held that Old Chief was expressly limited to "cases where proof of convict status is at issue," and that "a criminal defendant may not stipulate or admit his way out of the full evidentiary force of the case as the Government chooses to present it." In a child pornography case, United States v. Sewell, 457 F.3d 841 (8th Cir. 2006) , the government proposed showing 23 or fewer of the images that had been found on the defendant's computer for 3-4 seconds each in its case in chief, if the defendant would stipulate that each of the images met the legal definition of child pornography and that 25 of the images in a computer folder depicted known child victims as recognized and maintained in the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children and/or Child Victim Identification databases. After the defendant refused to so stipulate, the Trial Judge ruled before trial that the government could describe the images and file names and field descriptions, but that the jury could not see the images unless it so requested at the time of deliberations. On an interlocutory appeal the defendant offered to stipulate that the images met the legal definition of child pornography, but the Court concluded that limits on the government's proof were an abuse of discretion: "His now-tendered offer is not dispositive, for the government is entitled to prove its case with evidence of its own choice and is not required to accept the offer."

United States v. Schene, 543 F.3d 627 (10th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a child pornography conviction, despite the defendant's argument that images of child pornography found on a computer in his home should not have been admitted because he had offered to stipulate that they were child pornography. The Court found no error in admitting the images, noting that the images "were the gist of the government's case against Schene. The government was entitled to prove its case, and given the charges against Schene, those images were not unfairly prejudicial under Rule 403."

United States v. Alfaro-Moncada, 607 F.3d 720 (11th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possession of child pornography, finding no abuse of discretion in permitting the government to show five images of child pornography to the jury. Although the defendant stipulated that there was child pornography on his DVD, the Court observed "that the prosecution is entitled to prove its case by evidence of its own choice" and concluded that the images tended to prove that the defendant knew he possessed child pornography, something to which he did not stipulate.

[86] Terrorist Activities [Go To Main]

United States v. Al-Moayad, 545 F.3d 139 (2d Cir. 2008) : The Court vacated convictions for a conspiracy to provide material support to designated terrorist organizations (Hamas and Al-Qaeda). The Court held it was an abuse of discretion to admit extensive testimony about a bus bombing by Hamas and about an Al-Qaeda training camp. The defendants were not charged with planning or carrying out the bus bombing and no evidence connected them to that or any other terrorist act, and they never denied knowledge of Hamas' involvement in violent acts, so the evidence had "questionable probative value," which was substantially outweighed by the effect of the "blatant appeal to the jury's emotions and prejudices." The Court found that the testimony regarding the training camp was highly inflammatory and irrelevant, since there was no evidence tying the defendant against whom the evidence was offered to the camp.

United States v. Benkahla, 530 F.3d 300 (4th Cir. 2008) : The defendant was part of a network of individuals the government was investigating for crimes connected to radical Islamic terrorism and violent jihad. Affirming convictions for making false statements and obstructing justice, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of expert testimony on radical Islam and jihad, given the fact that "[t]he evidence in this case was complicated, touching by necessity on a wide variety of ideas, terms, people, and organizations connected to radical Islam." The Court observed that the jury acquitted the defendant of several alleged falsehoods, which was "not exactly the mark of irrational fervor." The Court also upheld the admission of testimony by an FBI agent regarding the agency's investigation and laying the foundation for several dozen videos, documents, and photographs, as the evidence was important to prove the materiality of the defendant's false statements.

[87] Threats [Go To Main]

United States v. Diaz, 592 F.3d 467 (3d Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed drug and firearms convictions, finding that testimony by government witnesses that they feared what members of their community might do to them in retaliation for their cooperation with the government had little probative value, "as it only helped explain why certain Government witnesses were uncooperative," and that the danger of unfair prejudice from the testimony did not substantially outweigh its probative value, given that it did not state that the defendant himself was violent.

[89] Tools of the Crime [Go To Main]

United States v. Carr, 560 F.3d 849 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiring to possess cocaine with intent to distribute, finding no error in the admission of evidence that the defendant was carrying a firearm and a false I.D. at the time of arrest. It stated that "the fact that Carr was carrying a loaded firearm when he carried ten kilograms of cocaine to McGill's car was relevant to the charge that he knowingly participated in a drug conspiracy offense." And the use of false identification "is relevant and admissible to show consciousness of guilt, and in this case the use of similar false IDs tended to link the four conspirators." Any prejudicial "impact of this evidence was not unfair prejudice," and a government stipulation that the firearm was not stolen and had not been involved in any other crimes minimized any risk of unfair prejudice. In United States v. Jiminez, 487 F.3d 1140 (8th Cir. 2007) , the Court (in an opinion by retired Justice O'Connor) affirmed drug convictions, finding no error in the admission of evidence that the defendant, when arrested, was found with the driver's license of an accomplice. This evidence was more probative than prejudicial because "drug traffickers often carry another person's identification to conceal their identity."

[89.1] Training Manuals [Go To Main]

Foradori v. Harris, 523 F.3d 477 (5th Cir. 2008) : Affirming a judgment for a customer who sued a fast food restaurant operator to recover for injuries sustained on its premises as a result of an assault by an off-duty employee, the Court found no plain error in the admission of the operator's training manual which contained an instruction that employees should "never admit fault." The Judge had "admitted the training manual's statement for the relevant purpose of showing Captain D's failure to train and inculcate its employees in their responsibility for protecting customers from risks attendant to on-premises conflicts."

[89.2] Transcripts of Conversations [Go To Main]

United States v. Burt, 495 F.3d 733 (7th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed convictions for child pornography offenses, finding no error when "chat log" transcripts of chat room conversations between the defendant and a witness were admitted. The government had altered the chat logs by replacing the participants' screen names with their real names, but the Trial Judge had admonished the jury that it must independently evaluate whether the screen names were actually used by the two men. The Court found no abuse of discretion in permitting the altered logs to be used as demonstrative exhibits: "We see no reason not to extend the logic of allowing models, maps, sketches, and diagrams to incorporate these particular chat excerpts as well. In this case, the excerpted chat logs were used to aid two witnesses in interpreting and explaining the raw computer chat logs, which forensic examiners had recovered from Martin's computer. Just as a sketch or model of a crime scene can be used to help a witness to recount aspects of testimony and to make that testimony more accessible and understandable for the jury, so might affixing the names of real people in place of their aliases put the computer chat comments into a more useful context for the witnesses and the jury." The Court also found that attaching the real names to a sexually explicit conversation was not unfairly prejudicial, since the defendant "was being prosecuted for exactly what this chat log depicts: creating, trading, and distributing photos of children for the sexual satisfaction of himself and his online partners," and the Judge "very clearly instructed the jury about the limited extent to which that substitution of names could be considered by the jury."

[91] Violent Crimes [Go To Main]

United States v. Rivera Calderon, 578 F.3d 78 (1st Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed drug conspiracy convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that a defendant murdered another conspirator because of his refusal to adhere to the conspiracy's rules about drug packaging and a defendant murdered an individual who had threatened to take over the defendants' "drug points." The evidence tended to show there was a single cohesive conspiracy in which members protected their territory, and its presentation was not calculated to arouse the passions of the jury. In United States v. Dunbar, 553 F.3d 48 (1st Cir. 2009) , in a prosecution on drug and firearms charges, the defendant's former girlfriend testified to actions she took to further the defendant's drug trade when she was a minor. Affirming, the Court found no error when the witness also testified that the defendant once beat her. One of the charges was that the defendant "employed, hired, persuaded, induced, enticed, or coerced a person under eighteen years of age" to violate federal drug laws, so the assault was probative of the fact that the defendant coerced the girlfriend to follow his instructions in implementing acts in furtherance of their conspiracy. The evidence was not unfairly prejudicial, because it went "directly and precisely to the proposition of coercion that it sought to establish."

United States v. Royer, 549 F.3d 886 (2d Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed convictions for crimes arising out a scheme in which one defendant (Royer), who worked for the FBI when the scheme began, provided information that the other defendant (Elgindy) used to manipulate stock trading. It found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that when Elgindy used his connection with Royer to learn whether he was under investigation, he discovered that he was suspected (wrongly) of having connections to the 9/11 attacks. The evidence was directly relevant to the racketeering and obstruction charges, and the Trial Judge "was at pains to limit the amount and impact of such evidence because of the risk of prejudice."

[92] Waste of Time and Undue Delay [Go To Main]

United States v. Dohan, 508 F.3d 989 (11th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed convictions arising from a Ponzi scheme, finding no abuse of discretion in excluding a chart offered by the defense showing the defendant's profits from the scheme compared to those of a cooperating witness. Admitting the chart would have required extensive government cross-examination, and defense counsel was permitted to compare the relative profits in closing argument based on other admitted evidence.

[93] Wealth or Poverty [Go To Main]

United States ex rel. Miller v. Bill Harbert Int'l Constr., Inc., 608 F.3d 871 (D.C. Cir. 2010) : Remanding for a new trial in a False Claims Act case arising from a bid-rigging conspiracy, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to admit evidence of the defendants' wealth. The evidence had no probative value on any material issue and was prejudicial to the defendants. One Judge dissented, arguing that more deference should be given to the Trial Judge's finding that the evidence was probative of relationships among the defendants and was not unduly prejudicial.

United States v. Griffin, 524 F.3d 71 (1st Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for filing a false tax return, finding no error in the admission of evidence that the defendant had a penchant for gambling, jewelry, and fine foods. The defendant's spending habits were probative of whether her tax returns, which reported incomes of less than $20,000, were false.

United States v. Quattrone, 441 F.3d 153 (2d Cir. 2006) : In a prosecution for obstructing securities law investigations, the Court held that references to the defendant's substantial salary were relevant to his motive to protect his reputation and that of his business groups. The evidence was not unduly prejudicial, since references to it in the government's opening statement and summation specified that it was to be used only for the limited purpose of establishing a motive to obstruct, and could not be used to convict the defendant simply because of his wealth.

United States v. Arledge, 553 F.3d 881 (5th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed mail and wire fraud convictions arising from submission of false claims to a mass tort settlement, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding the defendant's lavish spending, as it was relevant to money laundering counts. The "spillover" prejudicial effect was found not substantial, as the prosecution did not use the evidence inappropriately and the jury actually acquitted on a fraud count as well as on the money laundering counts.

United States v. Harris, 536 F.3d 798 (7th Cir. 2008) : Affirming convictions for drug and firearms offenses, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the defendant drove numerous luxury autos. "Evidence of unexplained wealth, such as the testimony about Harris's luxury vehicles, is admissible as relevant circumstantial evidence of drug trafficking if the unexplained wealth was acquired contemporaneously with the alleged drug trafficking, if the wealth created an inference that the defendant was involved in drug trafficking, and if the government presents evidence that the wealth was not obtained through legitimate means." In United States v. Whiting, 471 F.3d 792 (7th Cir. 2006) , the Court affirmed a conviction for diverting employment benefit funds, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the management fees and expense reimbursements the defendant obtained from the company (which he owned) and of his substantial personal expenditures. The evidence that the defendant withdrew significant amounts for his own benefit, leaving insufficient funds to cover the benefit obligations, was relevant to his intent to defraud, as was the evidence of his wealth, which showed the manner in which he directed company funds to be spent. In the Court's view, the prejudicial effect of the wealth evidence was not great, since this was not a civil lawsuit seeking money damages. In United States v. Kuzlik, 468 F.3d 972 (7th Cir. 2006) , the court affirmed a conviction for mail fraud, rejecting the defendant's argument that evidence pertaining to his financial distress before the crime should not have been admitted because the "jury was unable to appreciate the extremely fine distinction between propensity and motive," and "as a result, the jury was confused and misled by the evidence of his financial condition." The Court held that "[t]he sorry state of Kuzlik's finances, his debts, default judgments, and bank overdrafts, was offered as evidence of his motive to embezzle the $44,246.44, not as evidence that Kuzlik had a taste or compulsion for financial fraud." Any even remote potential for unfair prejudice was cured by an instruction that the financial condition evidence was to be considered "only for the purpose of establishing his motive."

White v. Ford Motor Co., 500 F.3d 963 (9th Cir. 2007) : The Court reversed punitive damages awarded to parents of a child who was killed when a pickup truck rolled over him in the family driveway. It held, however, that there was no abuse of discretion in the admission of a redacted one-page balance sheet showing the defendant manufacturer's net worth, since Nevada law makes the defendant's wealth relevant in considering punitive damages, and there was no danger of unfair prejudice in the jury's consideration of the balance sheet.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 404 RULE 404

1-404 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 404.syn

§ 404.syn Synopsis to Chapter 404: RULE 404

404.01 Official Text

404.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Permissible and Impermissible Uses of Character Evidence

[2] The General Rule and its Exceptions

[3] Prohibition on Circumstantial Use of Character Evidence in Civil Cases

[4] Character Trait Must Be Relevant

[5] What is a Character Trait?

[6] Opening the Door to Character Evidence

[7] Self-Defense Issues

[8] Character Evidence "Standing Alone" Instruction

[9] Rebutting Character of the Victim With Character of the Accused

[10] Other Crimes, Wrongs, or Acts: Offered for Propensity or for a Proper Purpose?

[11] "Back Door" Admission

[12] Acts That Are Inextricably Intertwined With the Crime Charged

[13] Purposes For Bad Acts Evidence Not Listed in the Rule

[14] Prior Bad Acts Offered by the Accused: "Reverse 404(b)"

[15] Civil Cases

[16] Stipulating to a Mental Element

[17] Acts Committed After the Act Charged

[18] Standard of Proof

[19] Effect of Prior Acquittals

[20] Effect of Prior Arrests

[21] A Balancing Test for Evidence of Uncharged Misconduct

[22] Preliminary Rulings

[23] Limiting Instructions

[24] Notice

[25] Relationship to Rule 608

404.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Rule 404(a) -- Character Evidence Generally

[a] Rule 404(a) -- Animals

[b] Rule 404(a) -- Character of Accomplice

[c] Rule 404(a) -- Character of Accused

[i] Rule 404(a) -- Background

[ii] Rule 404(a) -- Character of Accused -- Cross-Examination of Character Witness

[iii] Rule 404(a) -- Character of Accused -- Defense Evidence

[iv] Rule 404(a) -- Character of Accused -- Demeanor Evidence

[v] Rule 404(a) -- Character of Accused -- Prosecution Evidence

[d] Rule 404(a) -- Character of Victim

[i] Rule 404(a) -- Civil Cases

[ii] Rule 404(a) -- Character of Victim -- Criminal Cases

[e] Rule 404(a) -- Civil Cases

[f] Rule 404(a) -- Jury Instructions

[g] Rule 404(a) -- Pertinent Traits

[h] Rule 404(a) -- Reputation Relevant to Another's State of Mind

[i] Rule 404(a) -- Witness' Character

[2] Rule 404(b) -- Other CRIMES, WRONGS, Or Acts

[a] Rule 404(b) -- Ability or Opportunity

[b] Rule404(b) -- Accident or Mistake

[i] RULE 404(b) -- Civil Cases

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Accident or Mistake -- Criminal Cases

[c] Rule404(b) -- Acquittals

[d] Rule 404(b) -- Acts Charged

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Acts Charged -- Acts Inextricably Interwoven, Intrinsic, or Part of a Single Criminal Episode

[A] Rule 404(b) -- Drug Cases

[B] Rule 404(b) -- Acts Charged -- Acts Inextricably Interwoven, Intrinsic, or Part of a Single Criminal Episode -- Firearms Cases

[C] Rule 404(b) -- Acts Charged -- Acts Inextricably Interwoven, Intrinsic, or Part of a Single Criminal Episode -- Fraud and False Statements Cases

[D] Rule 404(b) -- Acts Charged -- Acts Inextricably Interwoven, Intrinsic, or Part of a Single Criminal Episode -- Limitations on the Doctrine

[E] Rule 404(b) -- Acts Charged -- Acts Inextricably Interwoven, Intrinsic, or Part of a Single Criminal Episode -- Other Cases

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Acts Charged -- Conspiracy

[iii] Rule 404(b) -- Acts Charged -- Criminal Enterprises

[iv] Rule 404(b) -- Acts Charged -- Dealing

[v] Rule 404(b) -- Acts Charged -- Fraud

[e] Rule 404(b) -- Acts of Third Persons

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Civil Cases

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Acts of Third Persons -- Criminal Cases

[f] Rule 404(b) -- Acts Relevant to Another's State of Mind

[g] Rule 404(b) -- Acts Relevant To Prove Agency

[h] Rule 404(b) -- Alibi Witness

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Appellate Review

[j] Rule 404(b) -- Arrests

[k] Rule 404(b) -- Background

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Civil Cases

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Background -- Context Events

[iii] Rule 404(b) -- Background -- Miscellaneous Cases

[iv] Rule 404(b) -- Background -- Relationship of Participants

[v] Rule 404(b) -- Background -- Relationship to Hearsay Rule

[l] Rule 404(b) -- Balancing

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Discretion To Admit

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Balancing -- Error To Admit

[A] Rule 404(b) -- Doubts About Other Act

[B] Rule 404(b) -- Balancing -- Error To Admit -- Inflammatory Evidence

[C] Rule 404(b) -- Balancing -- Error To Admit -- Low Probative Value

[D] Rule 404(b) -- Balancing -- Error To Admit -- Miscellaneous Cases

[E] Rule 404(b) -- Balancing -- Error To Admit -- Other Purposes Not in Issue

[F] Rule 404(b) -- Balancing -- Error To Admit -- Purpose Uncertain

[G] Rule 404(b) -- Balancing -- Error To Admit -- Similarity to Crime Charged

[iii] Rule 404(b) -- Balancing -- Generally

[iv] Rule 404(b) -- Balancing -- Inclusionary Approach

[v] Rule 404(b) -- Balancing -- Requirement of Record

[m] RULE 404(b) -- Circumstances Indicating Criminality

[n] RULE 404(b) -- Civil Cases

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Accidents

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Civil Cases -- Antitrust, Franchises, Distributorships, etc.

[iii] Rule 404(b) -- Civil Cases -- Civil Rights Cases

[A] Rule 404(b) -- Miscellaneous Civil Rights Cases

[B] Rule 404(b) -- Civil Cases -- Civil Rights Cases -- Officers' Conduct

[C] Rule 404(b) -- Civil Cases -- Civil Rights Cases -- Prisoners' and Arrestees' Conduct

[iv] Rule 404(b) -- Civil Cases -- Contracts

[v] Rule 404(b) -- Civil Cases -- Employment Discrimination Cases

[vi] Rule 404(b) -- Civil Cases -- Evidence Relevant to Sanction

[vii] Rule 404(b) -- Civil Cases -- Fraud, Forgery, etc.

[viii] Rule 404(b) -- Civil Cases -- Insurance Claims

[ix] Rule 404(b) -- Civil Cases -- Miscellaneous Cases

[x] Rule 404(b) -- Civil Cases -- Securities Actions

[o] Rule 404(b) -- Common Plan or Scheme

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Evidence Admissible

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Common Plan or Scheme -- Evidence Inadmissible

[p] Rule 404(b) -- Connecting Accused with Instrumentalities or Fruits of Crime

[q] Rule 404(b) -- Consciousness of Guilt

[r] Rule 404(b) -- Conspiracy

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Background Evidence

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Conspiracy -- Particular Relevance and Problems

[s] Rule 404(b) -- Corroboration

[t] Rule 404(b) -- Duress Defense

[u] Rule 404(b) -- Entrapment Defense

[v] Rule 404(b) -- Explaining Conduct

[w] Rule 404(b) -- Foundation for Other Acts

[x] Rule 404(b) -- Identity

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Generally

[A] Rule 404(b) -- Circumstances Insufficiently Probative

[B] RULE 404(b) -- Identity -- Generally -- Circumstances Sufficiently Probative

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Identity -- Modus Operandi

[A] Rule 404(b) -- Bank Robbery

[B] Rule 404(b) -- Identity -- Modus Operandi -- Miscellaneous Cases

[iii] RULE 404(b) -- Identity -- Names

[y] Rule 404(b) -- Illegally Obtained Evidence of Other Acts

[z] Rule 404(b) -- "Inadvertent" Disclosure of Other Acts

[aa] Rule 404(b) -- Insanity Defense

[bb] Rule 404(b) -- Intent

[i] RULE 404(b) -- Assault, Homicide, Abuse, etc., Cases

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Civil Cases

[iii] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Civil Rights and Employment Discrimination Cases

[iv] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Conspiracy

[v] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Drug Cases

[A] Rule 404(b) -- Evidence of Different Drugs

[B] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Drug Cases -- Evidence of Different Quantities

[C] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Drug Cases -- Evidence of Possession Where Distribution Is Charged

[D] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Drug Cases -- Evidence of Similar Drugs

[E] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Drug Cases -- Firearms Evidence

[F] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Drug Cases -- Miscellaneous Cases

[G] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Drug Cases -- Whether Intent at Issue

[vi] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Extortion Cases

[vii] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Firearms Cases

[viii] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Fraud, Forgery, Counterfeiting, False Statements, etc., Cases

[ix] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- General Principles

[x] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Miscellaneous Cases

[xi] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Tax Cases

[xii] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Theft, Robbery, and Stolen Property Offenses

[cc] RULE 404(b) -- Joint Defendants

[dd] RULE 404(b) -- Jury Instructions

[ee] RULE 404(b) -- Knowledge

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Assault, Homicide, Abuse, etc., Cases

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Knowledge -- Civil Rights Cases

[iii] Rule 404(b) -- Knowledge -- Conspiracy Cases

[iv] Rule 404(b) -- Knowledge -- Drug Cases

[A] Rule 404(b) -- Different Amounts

[B] Rule 404(b) -- Knowledge -- Drug Cases -- Different Drugs

[C] Rule 404(b) -- Knowledge -- Drug Cases -- Miscellaneous Cases

[v] Rule 404(b) -- Knowledge -- Firearms Cases

[vi] Rule 404(b) -- Knowledge -- Fraud, Forgery, Counterfeiting, False Statements, etc., Cases

[vii] Rule 404(b) -- Knowledge -- Illegal Aliens Cases

[viii] Rule 404(b) -- Knowledge -- Miscellaneous Cases

[ix] Rule 404(b) -- Knowledge -- Tax Cases

[x] Rule 404(b) -- Knowledge -- Theft and Stolen Property Offenses

[ff] Rule 404(b) -- Malice

[gg] Rule 404(b) -- Modus Operandi

[hh] Rule 404(b) -- Motive

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Arson

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Motive -- Assault, Homicide, Kidnapping, etc.

[iii] Rule 404(b) -- Motive -- Civil Rights Cases

[iv] Rule 404(b) -- Motive -- Drug Activity

[v] Rule 404(b) -- Motive -- Firearms Offenses

[vi] Rule 404(b) -- Motive -- Fraud, False Statements, etc.

[vii] Rule 404(b) -- Motive -- Miscellaneous Cases

[viii] Rule 404(b) -- Motive -- Obstruction of Justice and Perjury

[ix] Rule 404(b) -- Motive -- Terrorism Cases

[x] Rule 404(b) -- Motive -- Theft, Robbery, and Stolen Property Offenses

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Multiple Permissible Uses

[jj] Rule 404(b) -- Notice of Intention To Introduce Evidence

[kk] Rule 404(b) -- Opportunity To Rebut Likely Jury Speculation

[ll] Rule 404(b) -- Plain Error To Admit

[mm] Rule 404(b) -- Predisposition

[nn] Rule 404(b) -- Preparation

[oo] Rule 404(b) -- Propensity Evidence

[pp] Rule 404(b) -- Purposes for Admission To Be Specified

[qq] Rule 404(b) -- Rebuttal Evidence

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Bias

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Rebuttal Evidence -- Contradiction

[A] Rule 404(b) -- Assault, etc., Cases

[B] Rule 404(b) -- Rebuttal Evidence -- Contradiction -- Civil Cases

[C] Rule 404(b) -- Rebuttal Evidence -- Contradiction -- Drug Cases

[D] Rule 404(b) -- Rebuttal Evidence -- Contradiction -- Firearms Cases

[E] Rule 404(b) -- Rebuttal Evidence -- Contradiction -- Fraud Cases

[F] Rule 404(b) -- Rebuttal Evidence -- Contradiction -- Miscellaneous Cases

[iii] Rule 404(b) -- Rebuttal Evidence -- Cross-Examination by Accused Opening the Door to Rebuttal

[iv] Rule 404(b) -- Rebuttal Evidence -- Government or Civil Party Opening the Door to Rebuttal

[v] Rule 404(b) -- Rebuttal Evidence -- Specific Acts To Impeach

[rr] Rule 404(b) -- Relationship to Other Rules

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Miscellaneous Rules

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Relationship to Other Rules -- Rules 413-415

[ss] Rule 404(b) -- Remoteness

[tt] Rule 404(b) -- Stipulations -- Criminal Cases

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Generally

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Stipulations -- Criminal Cases -- Intent

[iii] Rule 404(b) -- Stipulations -- Criminal Cases -- Predicate Convictions

[uu] Rule 404(b) -- Subsequent Acts

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Association

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Subsequent Acts -- Intent

[iii] Rule 404(b) -- Subsequent Acts -- Knowledge

[iv] Rule 404(b) -- Subsequent Acts -- Miscellaneous Cases

[v] Rule 404(b) -- Subsequent Acts -- Modus Operandi

[vv] Rule 404(b) -- Tax Returns

[ww] Rule 404(b) -- Threats

[xx] Rule 404(b) -- Timing for Introduction

[yy] Rule 404(b) -- Unfair Use

[zz] Rule 404(b) -- Use by Accused

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Accused's Bad Acts

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Use by Accused -- Bad Acts by Prosecution Witness

[iii] Rule 404(b) -- Use by Accused -- Bad Acts by Third Party

[iv] Rule 404(b) -- Use by Accused -- Good Acts by Accused

[v] Rule 404(b) -- Use by Accused -- Unsolved Other Crimes

[aaa] Rule 404(b) -- Witness' Credibility

404.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

[2] 1987 Amendment Committee Note

[3] 1991 Amendment Committee Note

[4] 2000 Amendment Committee Note

[5] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

[6] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

[7] Report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary

[8] Citations to Hearings and Debates

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 404 RULE 404

1-404 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 404.01

404.01 Official Text

[Go To Supp]

Rule 404. Character Evidence Not Admissible to Prove Conduct; Exceptions; Other Crimes

(a) Character evidence generally. -- Evidence of a person's character or a trait of character is not admissible for the purpose of proving action in conformity therewith on a particular occasion, except:

(1) Character of accused. -- Evidence of a pertinent trait of character offered by an accused, or by the prosecution to rebut the same, or if evidence of a trait of character of the alleged victim of the crime is offered by an accused and admitted under Rule 404(a)(2), evidence of the same trait of character of the accused offered by the prosecution;

(2) Character of alleged victim. -- Evidence of a pertinent trait of character of the alleged victim of the crime offered by an accused, or by the prosecution to rebut the same, or evidence of a character trait of peacefulness of the alleged victim offered by the prosecution in a homicide case to rebut evidence that the alleged victim was the first aggressor;

(3) Character of witness. -- Evidence of the character of a witness, as provided in rules 607, 608, and 609.

(b) Other crimes, wrongs, or acts. -- Evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show action in conformity therewith. It may, however, be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident, provided that upon request by the accused, the prosecution in a criminal case shall provide reasonable notice in advance of trial, or during trial if the court excuses pretrial notice on good cause shown, of the general nature of any such evidence it intends to introduce at trial.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 404 RULE 404

1-404 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 404.02

404.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Permissible and Impermissible Uses of Character Evidence

Character questions arise in two different ways in litigation. First, character may be an element of a crime, a claim, or a defense. When this occurs, Courts say that character is "in issue." An example is the competency of a driver in an action for negligently entrusting a motor vehicle to an incompetent driver; another is an action for defamation in which the defendant referred to the plaintiff as a dishonest person. In such cases, it is clear that character evidence is more than relevant. It is essential under the pertinent substantive law to prove character in order to prove the crime, claim, or defense. n1 These cases are not covered by the exclusionary principles of Rule 404. While not explicitly outside the Rule, they are implicitly excluded by the definition of "the purpose" of offering evidence in subdivision (a).

Sometimes character evidence is offered for an entirely different purpose: to demonstrate that because a person has a certain character trait, that person acted on a specific occasion in conformity with this trait. In other words, a proponent might wish to prove a person's character as circumstantial evidence of that person's actions on a particular occasion. That is, people with a certain character trait are more likely to act consistently with that trait than people who don't have it. It is these cases that are covered by Rule 404(a). Subdivision (b) covers the use of particular acts of a person that may be indicative of the person's character.

[2] The General Rule and its Exceptions

Subdivision (a) of the Rule states the general rule, which is that evidence of a person's character or trait of character is not admissible for the purpose of proving action in conformity therewith on a particular occasion. The rationale behind the general rule is set forth in the classic case of Michelson v. United States, 335 U.S. 469, 482 (1948) . The discussion in Michelson is in the context of a criminal case, but its rationale is equally applicable to excluding evidence of character in a civil case:

> The [character] inquiry is not rejected because character is irrelevant; on the contrary, it is said to weigh too much with the jury and to so overpersuade them as to prejudge one with a bad general record and deny him a fair opportunity to defend against a particular charge. The overriding policy of excluding such evidence, despite its admitted probative value, is the practical experience that its disallowance tends to prevent confusion of issues, unfair surprise and undue prejudice.

However, there are important exceptions to the general rule prohibiting character evidence when offered circumstantially to prove conduct. One is that defendants in criminal cases are given the right to introduce evidence of their own pertinent character traits. Thus, in a fraud case the criminal defendant is permitted to call witnesses to testify that the defendant is an honest person, as proof that the defendant was unlikely to have committed the dishonest act charged. The rationale for permitting character evidence from the accused is that the accused deserves the benefit of all reasonable doubts and that good character may produce a reasonable doubt. This exception is covered in subdivision (a)(1) of the Rule. Subdivision (a)(1) also gives the government the right to admit pertinent character evidence to rebut the defendant's character evidence. Thus, while the government cannot introduce character evidence to prove propensity in the first instance, it can do so if the defendant "opens the door" to the circumstantial use of character evidence. n2

Rule 404(a)(2) provides another exception. It permits the accused to introduce evidence of a pertinent character trait of the victim of a crime. The most common example is in a self-defense case. Under the Rule, the defendant is permitted to introduce evidence of the victim's character for aggressiveness (subject to the limitations on form provided by Rule 405), to create the inference that the victim acted in accordance with that character trait on the occasion in question. n3 Admissibility is not dependent on the defendant's prior awareness of the victim's character trait; the evidence is admissible to show how the victim acted. n4 The exception to the character evidence exclusion provided in Rule 404(a)(2) is not applicable in rape and sexual assault cases; Rule 412 governs such cases. n5

Another common exception, provided for in the Rule in subdivision (a)(3), is that when a witness is impeached (i.e., the witness's credibility is attacked) or rehabilitated (i.e., the witness's credibility is bolstered), this may be done by using character evidence, subject to rules governing impeachment. The forms of permissible and impermissible attack and rehabilitation are discussed under Rules 607, 608, 609, 610, and 613.

Finally, the limitations on circumstantial use of character evidence found in Rule 404 are generally inapplicable in cases where a civil or criminal defendant is charged with or being sued for sexual assault, molestation, etc. See the Editorial Explanatory Comments for Rules 413-415.

[3] Prohibition on Circumstantial Use of Character Evidence in Civil Cases

It is clear that the original Advisory Committee intended that the circumstantial use of character evidence would be prohibited in criminal cases. The only contemplated use of such character evidence was that the "accused" could admit it and the "prosecution" could rebut it. Despite this relatively clear language, a number of Courts have held that Rule 404(a) does not completely prohibit the circumstantial use of character evidence in civil cases. This led to a split in the Circuits.

In 2005, the Advisory Committee proposed an amendment to Rule 404(a) that would make it absolutely clear that the circumstantial use of character evidence is prohibited in civil cases. At this writing, the amendment has been approved by the Judicial Conference and the Supreme Court. The amendment is not controversial, and so it is all but certain that Congress will not act and therefore that the amendment will become law on December 1, 2006. The text of the amendment, and the Committee Note, is as follows:

> (a) Character evidence generally.--Evidence of a person's character or a trait of character is not admissible for the purpose of proving action in conformity therewith on a particular occasion, except:
>
> (1) Character of accused.-- The material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [Evidence] In a criminal case, evidence of a pertinent trait of character offered by an accused, or by the prosecution to rebut the same, or if evidence of a trait of character of the alleged victim of the crime is offered by an accused and admitted under Rule 404(a)(2), evidence of the same trait of character of the accused offered by the prosecution;

(2) Character of alleged victim.-- The material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [Evidence] In a criminal case, and subject to the limitations imposed by Rule 412, evidence of a pertinent trait of character of the alleged victim of the crime offered by an accused, or by the prosecution to rebut the same, or evidence of a character trait of peacefulness of the alleged victim offered by the prosecution in a homicide case to rebut evidence that the alleged victim was the first aggressor;

(3) Character of witness. -- Evidence of the character of a witness, as provided in Rules 607, 608, and 609.

* * *

Committee Note

The Rule has been amended to clarify that in a civil case evidence of a person's character is never admissible to prove that the person acted in conformity with the character trait. The amendment resolves the dispute in the case law over whether the exceptions in subdivisions (a)(1) and (2) permit the circumstantial use of character evidence in civil cases. Compare Carson v. Polley, 689 F.2d 562, 576 (5th Cir. 1982) ("when a central issue in a case is close to one of a criminal nature, the exceptions to the Rule 404(a) ban on character evidence may be invoked"), with SEC v. Towers Financial Corp., 966 F.Supp. 203 (S.D.N.Y. 1997) (relying on the terms "accused" and "prosecution" in Rule 404(a) to conclude that the exceptions in subdivisions (a)(1) and (2) are inapplicable in civil cases). The amendment is consistent with the original intent of the Rule, which was to prohibit the circumstantial use of character evidence in civil cases, even where closely related to criminal charges. See Ginter v. Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co., 576 F.Supp. 627, 629-30 (D. Ky.1984) ("It seems beyond peradventure of doubt that the drafters of F.R.Evi. 404(a) explicitly intended that all character evidence, except where 'character is at issue' was to be excluded" in civil cases).

The circumstantial use of character evidence is generally discouraged because it carries serious risks of prejudice, confusion and delay. See Michelson v. United States, 335 U.S. 469, 476 (1948) ("The overriding policy of excluding such evidence, despite its admitted probative value, is the practical experience that its disallowance tends to prevent confusion of issues, unfair surprise and undue prejudice."). In criminal cases, the so-called "mercy rule" permits a criminal defendant to introduce evidence of pertinent character traits of the defendant and the victim. But that is because the accused, whose liberty is at stake, may need "a counterweight against the strong investigative and prosecutorial resources of the government." C. Mueller & L. Kirkpatrick, Evidence: Practice Under the Rules, pp. 264-5 (2d ed. 1999). See also Richard Uviller, Evidence of Character to Prove Conduct: Illusion, Illogic, and Injustice in the Courtroom, 130 U.Pa.L.Rev. 845, 855 (1982) (the rule prohibiting circumstantial use of character evidence "was relaxed to allow the criminal defendant with so much at stake and so little available in the way of conventional proof to have special dispensation to tell the factfinder just what sort of person he really is"). Those concerns do not apply to parties in civil cases.

The amendment also clarifies that evidence otherwise admissible under Rule 404(a)(2) may nonetheless be excluded in a criminal case involving sexual misconduct. In such a case, the admissibility of evidence of the victim's sexual behavior and predisposition is governed by the more stringent provisions of Rule 412.

Nothing in the amendment is intended to affect the scope of Rule 404(b). While Rule 404(b) refers to the "accused", the "prosecution" and a "criminal case", it does so only in the context of a notice requirement. The admissibility standards of Rule 404(b) remain fully applicable to both civil and criminal cases.

[4] Character Trait Must Be Relevant

While criminal defendants have the option of introducing their character traits, or those of the victim, the character traits must be "pertinent" -- that is, they must be relevant to the case, or else they will be excluded under Rules 402 and 403. For example, in United States v. Martinez, 988 F.2d 685 (7th Cir. 1993) , the defendants were charged with murder arising from a prison conflagration. Evidence of the violent character of the victims was held properly excluded as not relevant where there was no viable self-defense claim. The evidence showed that the victims were rendered defenseless and were repeatedly stabbed while lying motionless on the ground. The defendants argued that they were acting in self-defense at the beginning of the fight; but this was not relevant to the subsequent conduct that was at the heart of the murder charge.

[5] What is a Character Trait?

The term "character" is susceptible to several meanings. For example, is "law-abidingness" a character trait? The government has often argued that "being prone to law-abiding conduct" is not an "actual" character trait but is rather a conclusion that must be drawn from other character traits such as honesty, reliability, and rectitude. However, the Courts have generally held that "character traits admissible under Rule 404(a)(1) need not constitute specific traits of character but may include general traits such as lawfulness and law-abidingness." n6

This does not mean, however, that the defendant has unbounded freedom to define a character trait. For example, in United States v. Diaz, 961 F.2d 1417 (9th Cir. 1992) , the defendant was charged with possession with intent to distribute more than 500 grams of cocaine. The Trial Court prohibited defense counsel from asking a defense witness whether Diaz had a "character trait for being prone to large-scale drug dealing." The Court of Appeals found no error because a defendant's propensity (or lack thereof) to engage in large-scale drug-dealing "is not an admissible character trait." The proposed testimony was not the same as testimony that the defendant was law-abiding, because it was in effect too specific. The Court reasoned that an inquiry into a propensity to engage in large-scale drug-dealing > would be misleading if addressed to a defendant with a record of criminal offenses other than drug-dealing: If answered in the negative [as the defendant in Diaz, of course, anticipated] the impression may be given that the defendant is a law-abiding person although the defendant has a record of other crimes.

[6] Opening the Door to Character Evidence

The prosecution cannot, in the first instance, introduce character evidence to show that a person acted in accordance with a character trait. n7 However, the prosecution can introduce character evidence responsively. As the Michelson Court put it: "The price a defendant must pay for attempting to prove his good name is to throw open the entire subject which the law has kept closed for his benefit and to make himself vulnerable where the law otherwise shields him." Thus, defense counsel must consider whether introduction of character evidence is worth the risk of rebuttal. n8

If defense counsel decides that the benefit of character evidence is not worth the cost of rebuttal, then counsel must guard against presenting any testimony that could be interpreted as character evidence. The character door can be deemed opened by means less obvious than calling a witness who testifies explicitly to a person's character trait. For example, in United States v. Dahlin, 734 F.2d 393 (8th Cir. 1984) , the defendant was charged with robbery; his alibi was that he was babysitting his sister's infant child at the time of the robbery. The prosecution argued that Dahlin could still have committed the robbery by leaving the infant at home, unattended, for a period of time. Dahlin took the stand and testified that he was deeply devoted to his niece and that he never left the child alone. The prosecution rebutted this claim of Dahlin's family relations by questioning Dahlin about a knife fight that he had had with his father. The Court of Appeals held that Dahlin had opened the door to this evidence because he had "put at issue his reliability, responsibility and familial devotion, which were traits pertinent to the jury's appraisal of his defense."

We think that Dahlin, while a close case, was correctly decided. Certainly a simple denial of guilt, or testimony in support of an alibi, cannot open the door to negative character evidence; if it could then the limitations in Rule 404(a) would be meaningless. n9 However, Dahlin did not simply deny that he left his niece unattended -- he testified that he was too devoted to his niece to leave her unattended, and that he never did so. That is just another way of saying that he was "not the type of guy" to leave an infant family member unattended. n10 Thus, Dahlin's testimony was far enough removed from the specific act at issue, and close enough to testimony about his personality and general conduct, to justify a ruling that he had opened the door to negative character evidence. n11 Dahlin said essentially that he "couldn't" or "wouldn't" have done the act charged by the prosecution; if he had simply said he "didn't do it" then that testimony would not have opened the door to rebuttal with character evidence.

Of course, even if the defendant opens the character door, the prosecution's rebuttal is limited to that which is responsive. So for example, if a defendant introduces positive evidence concerning one of the defendant's character traits, the prosecution cannot respond with negative evidence concerning a different character trait. n12 It makes sense, of course, for defense counsel to open the door only so far as is necessary to introduce favorable character evidence. While it is permissible, as discussed above, to introduce evidence that the defendant has a "law-abiding" character, this obviously opens the door about as broadly as it can be opened. Defense counsel might consider whether some subset of "law-abidingness" (such as honesty) would cover the favorable character evidence and yet limit the scope of rebuttal.

[7] Self-Defense Issues

Intricate questions of character evidence arise when the defendant claims self-defense. Suppose a defendant is charged with murdering a victim in a fight, and he claims self-defense. Suppose further that he wants to admit evidence that he knew: (1) that the victim had previously beaten up a number of people; (2) that the victim usually carried a knife; and (3) that the victim had a reputation in the community as a violent person. Is this evidence barred by Rule 404?

The answer should be no. A defendant in these circumstances is not seeking to prove that the alleged victim was a violent person, but that at the time of the fight he had specific reason to fear for his safety. This does not qualify as an attempt to attack a character trait of the alleged victim under Rule 404(a). n13 Thus evidence of the defendant's knowledge about the acts of an alleged victim does not amount to proof of the victim's character. This distinction is important for two reasons: (1) if the evidence is treated as proof of the victim's character, then the prosecution would have the right to rebut with character evidence; and (2) if it is character evidence, Rule 405 provides that permissible form is limited to opinion and reputation -- specific acts are not allowed.

The result is different if the defendant seeks to introduce information about the victim of which the defendant was unaware at the time of their encounter. To take the above examples, assume that the defendant wants to introduce evidence that the victim had previously beaten up a number of people; that the victim usually carried a knife on his person; and that the victim had a reputation in the community as a violent person. If the defendant did not know of any of this at the time the defendant encountered the victim, then this is character evidence. It is offered to show that the victim had a violent and aggressive character, and acted in accordance with that character on the occasion in question. As such, evidence that the victim had previously beaten up a number of people and that the victim usually carried a knife will be inadmissible -- this is specific act evidence that is barred by Rule 405. n14 Evidence of the victim's reputation for violence would be admissible, but it would come at a cost. It would give the prosecution the right to rebut with evidence of the victim's peaceable character. And it would give the prosecution the right to prove the defendant's violent character, under the amendment to Rule 404(a) that took effect in 2000 (discussed in § 404.02[9]).

The lesson for defense counsel is to be clear when they offer evidence in support of a self-defense claim whether they (1) are content to focus on what the defendant believed at the time the defendant acted or (2) intend to claim that the alleged victim possesses a certain trait.

[8] Character Evidence "Standing Alone" Instruction

Should the defendant be entitled to an instruction that positive character evidence, "standing alone," can be sufficient to create a reasonable doubt? The Federal Courts are in dispute about whether it is proper to give such a "standing alone" instruction. Some Courts have held that a "standing alone" instruction is never necessary and often, if not always, improper, because it misleads the jury. As the Seventh Circuit put it in United States v. Burke, 781 F.2d 1234, 1239 (7th Cir. 1985) :

> The "standing alone" instruction conveys to the jury the sense that even if it thinks the prosecution's case compelling, even if it thinks that defendant is a liar, if it also concludes that he has a good reputation this may be the "reasonable doubt" of which other instructions speak. A "standing alone" instruction invites attention to a single bit of evidence and suggests to jurors that they analyze this evidence all by itself. No instruction flags any other evidence for this analysis -- not eyewitness evidence, not physical evidence, not even confessions. There is no good reason to consider any evidence "standing alone." n15

Other Courts have stated that "standing alone" instructions are required where the defendant has presented positive character evidence. n16 Another variation is that a "standing alone" instruction is required where the accused has presented character evidence and "the only evidence linking the defendant to the crime is the victim's word." n17 Most Courts have held that while a defendant is never entitled to a "standing alone" instruction, it is ordinarily not an abuse of discretion to give one. n18

We agree with the majority position that character evidence is rarely so probative or compelling as to require it to be considered apart from the other evidence in the case. This does not mean, however, that the giving of a "standing alone" charge should always be considered an abuse of discretion. We think that there could be some limited instances in which the evidence of good character is so central to the case, and so compelling, that the Trial Judge could consider a "standing alone" instruction to be an appropriate exercise of discretion. This is nothing more than an exercise of the Judge's power to comment on the evidence. We think that the danger of a "standing alone" instruction -- that other evidence might be disregarded -- can be tempered by reminding the jury that it must consider all the evidence in the case. n19 Of course, the jury should in all cases be informed of the limited purpose for which the character evidence is offered. n20

[9] Rebutting Character of the Victim With Character of the Accused

Rule 404(a) was amended in 2000 to provide that if the defendant offers evidence of a negative character trait of the victim, the prosecution can counter with evidence that the defendant has the same negative character trait. Under prior law, an attack on the victim opened the door to evidence that rehabilitated the victim's character, but it did not open the defendant's character to attack. Now, defense counsel must think harder about whether to attack the victim's character -- the risk to the defendant is greater than before.

The amendment to Rule 404(a)(2) was a brainchild of the Department of Justice. DOJ members on the Advisory Committee convinced a majority of Committee members that the government is often prejudiced by a one-way presentation of character evidence. They argued that all too often a defendant attacks the character of the victim and the prosecution is not allowed to attack the character of the defendant in kind. What follows, according to the DOJ, is that jurors are misled; they think that the defendant must have a great character if the government says nothing about it.

The flaw in DOJ's analysis is that even without this amendment, the government will usually be able to find a way to introduce negative evidence about the defendant's character. The most obvious way is through the gaping loophole of Rule 404(b). That Rule permits negative evidence to be admitted, though ostensibly only for a not-for-character purpose. In fact, however, this evidence is often misused by the jury to draw inferences about the defendant's character. Moreover, if the defendant testifies as a witness, character evidence can often be introduced under Rules 608 and 609.

So it is questionable whether the amendment was needed to "protect" the government from negative inferences in what is probably a small number of cases.

Note that the amendment specifies that the prosecution's rebuttal is limited to the "same" character trait that the defendant raises as to the victim. For example, assume a case in which the prosecution brings two charges against the accused: one for a violent act and one for fraud. As to the violent act, the defendant claims self-defense and proffers evidence that the victim was a violent person. Under the amendment, the government can offer character evidence that the defendant is a violent person, but it cannot offer character evidence that the defendant is a dishonest person. The character trait must be more than simply "pertinent" to the case -- it must be the same character trait raised by the defendant.

[10] Other Crimes, Wrongs, or Acts: Offered for Propensity or for a Proper Purpose?

The first sentence of Rule 404(b) basically restates the principle that character evidence is forbidden when offered to prove that a person acted in conformity with a character trait. This sentence is probably unnecessary in light of Rule 404(a). It is the second sentence of Rule 404(b) that gets all the attention. Rule 404(b) provides that if evidence of other crimes or wrongs or acts (often referred to as "uncharged misconduct" or "prior bad acts") is offered for some purpose "other" than to prove character -- some not-for-character purpose -- the Rule does not exclude the evidence. n21 In effect, Rule 404(b) provides a basis for admitting evidence, not excluding it.

It is no great surprise to find the second sentence of subdivision (b) receiving the most attention in the decided cases. While the second sentence is permissive and not mandatory, Courts have traditionally been very willing to let evidence of other crimes in, even when the prosecution's theory of relevance is quite weak.

It is obviously not an easy task to distinguish between acts offered to prove propensity and acts offered for another purpose. Perhaps the most difficult distinction is between "intent" and "propensity." Assume the typical case in which the defendant is on trial for drug distribution, and the government offers evidence that the defendant has engaged in uncharged acts of drug distribution. The defendant objects that this evidence is offered only to prove character -- once a drug dealer, always a drug dealer. The government responds that the bad acts are offered to prove that the defendant intended to distribute drugs at the time of the event in dispute in the case. According to the government, the fact that a defendant intentionally distributed drugs on other occasions is probative that the defendant had the same state of mind at the time of the disputed event. Is this really a not-for-character purpose, or is it simply another way of saying "once a drug dealer always a drug dealer"? The Court in United States v. Jones, 389 F.3d 753 (7th Cir. 2004) , discussed this difficult distinction in the following passage:

> [T]he government argues that Jones's prior convictions demonstrate intent to possess the cocaine in this case because they show that he has, in the past, possessed other illegal drugs with the intent to distribute. But this argument fails to shed any light on the difference between propensity and intent. Propensity, according to Webster's Third International Dictionary, refers to "a natural inclination; innate or inherent tendency." Intent, in contrast, has a volitional overtone to it: synonyms in common usage include purpose, design, or plan. Our prior decisions have not always distinguished carefully between these two meanings. It is possible, on some facts, that prior convictions may reveal a common method of operation, an economic incentive, or other facts that might permit an inference that the same purpose or design motivated the current transaction. In [United States v.] Macedo, for example, the prior conviction was used to show intent to possess distribution amounts of the drug. In many situations, however, the existence of prior drug convictions will show nothing more than a propensity to deal in drugs. If that is all that can be inferred, then the evidence is inadmissible.
>
> It will be difficult, if not impossible, to know on which side of the line any particular past conviction falls without both specific evidence about the prior conviction and a well articulated theory of the > legitimate purpose that it allegedly serves for the present case. Here, unfortunately, the government did not introduce any facts or details associated with Jones's prior convictions. The Assistant U.S. Attorney then repeatedly told the jury that Jones's prior convictions showed that he was a drug dealer, and that they should, therefore, find that he intended to deal drugs in this case. This looks, walks, and sounds like the argument "once a drug dealer, always a drug dealer."

>
> The government has tried to salvage its position by noting, correctly enough, that all crimes charging intent to distribute are specific intent crimes and that this evidence was admissible to show intent. It also notes correctly that it has the burden of proving the specific intent element beyond a reasonable doubt. But these observations do nothing to help us tell the difference between the illegitimate use of a prior conviction to show propensity and the proper use of a prior conviction to prove intent. To do that, the government must affirmatively show why a particular prior conviction tends to show the more forward-looking fact of purpose, design, or volition to commit the new crime.

In deciding whether bad acts evidence is offered to prove character or for some not-for-character purpose, we think that it is helpful to consider whether the factfinder is asked to engage in a two-step reasoning process: to infer from behavior on one occasion something about the nature of a person and then to infer from that how the person probably would have behaved on another occasion when the only connection between the two occasions is that the factfinder believes that people of a certain type would act the same way both times. If so, then the evidence is character evidence. If the factfinder can reason from one act about another without going through the first step, the evidence is not character evidence. n22

It is critical to note that finding a not-for-character purpose is only the first step in admitting bad acts evidence. The second, critical step is to consider the probative value of the evidence for its not-for-character purpose, as balanced against the risk that the jury will use the evidence as proof of bad character. This analysis is mandated under Rule 403. n23

The Trial Judge should also be careful to ensure that the purpose for which the evidence is offered is more than just a sham for introducing the evidence and using it as proof of character. n24 In particular, Trial Judges should be wary when the proponent of bad act evidence cites a "laundry list" of possible purposes, without being able to articulate how the evidence is probative of those purposes or even that those matters are in issue in the case. n25 For example, in United States v. Rivera, 837 F.2d 906 (10th Cir. 1988) , modified on other grounds en banc, 874 F.2d 754 (10th Cir. 1989) , the appellant's conviction was reversed after bad act evidence was admitted to show (according to the prosecutor) "four or five things, one of which is absence of mistake, motive, intent, identity, I forget what all, there are four or five." Neither the prosecutor nor the Judge articulated which if any of the elements were disputed in the case. n26 The Court of Appeals panel found an abuse of discretion, due to the Trial Judge's failure to conduct an inquiry as to the appropriate (if any) not-for-character purpose for the evidence. While the panel opinion was vacated on other grounds by en banc review, Rivera stands as a lesson to lawyers and Judges about the need for specific articulation of not-for-character purposes under Rule 404(b).

[11] "Back Door" Admission

Counsel should be careful not to let the adversary squeeze other crimes evidence through a back door when such crimes, if offered explicitly under Rule 404(b), would be rejected. For example, in United States v. Williams, 739 F.2d 297 (7th Cir. 1984) , the prosecution called a police detective to testify about the investigation leading to the defendant's arrest. In the course of his testimony, the detective stated, over objection, that he knew the defendant by the sobriquet "Fast Eddie." The Court of Appeals found that this testimony constituted reversible error, because it was an impermissible reference to the defendant's character. The Court rejected the argument that "Fast Eddie" was a neutral name, concluding that it would "suggest to the jury that the defendant had some sort of history of or reputation for unsavory activity." The Court recognized that other cases had permitted evidence of a defendant's alias or nickname if it "aids in the identification of the defendant or in some other way directly relates to the proof of the acts charged in the indictment." n27 However, in this case, "the detective's testimony about the defendant's nickname was completely unrelated to any of the other proof against the defendant." n28 Counsel should be on guard against attempts such as that in Williams to sneak in references to other crimes, either by witnesses or by argument. n29

[12] Acts That Are Inextricably Intertwined With the Crime Charged

In a criminal case Rule 404(b) operates to assure that the jury convicts only on the offense charged, and not for general bad character. However, it is sometimes difficult to determine which acts are part of the offense charged, and which are uncharged acts subject to Rule 404(b). The test used by the Courts is whether the acts that are the subject of the proof are "inextricably intertwined" with the basic elements of the crime charged. If so, Rule 404(b) is inapplicable and there is no need to articulate a "not-for-character" purpose for the evidence. Nor is there any need to give prior notice of the intent to use the evidence, as is required if the evidence is covered by Rule 404(b). Of course, Rule 403 will still apply to the evidence. n30 However, it would be the rare case in which proof of an inextricably intertwined act could be considered so prejudicial as to justify exclusion under Rule 403.

Sometimes it is pretty clear that bad act evidence is "inextricably intertwined" with the charge. Consider United States v. Pace, 981 F.2d 1123 (10th Cir. 1992). Three defendants -- Pace, Leonard, and Carter -- were charged in a four-count indictment alleging violations of the federal drug laws. Pace claimed on appeal that the trial judge erred in admitting evidence concerning codefendant Leonard's distribution of methamphetamine on October 26, 1990. According to Pace, the evidence should have been excluded because the transaction occurred after the conspiracy ended. The problem for Pace was that the indictment charged Pace with a conspiracy to attempt to manufacture and distribute methamphetamine/amphetamine that ended on or about October 26, 1990. Thus, even though codefendant Carter was arrested before October 26, the fact remained that the other coconspirators remained free to carry on the objectives of the conspiracy. Thus, the conspiracy had not terminated. The Court of Appeals reasoned as follows:

> Rule 404(b) only applies to evidence of acts extrinsic to the charged crime. Evidence of Leonard's sale was direct evidence of the conspiracy, which the indictment charged as occurring between July 1 and October 26, 1990. Conduct during the life of a conspiracy that is evidence of the conspiracy is not Rule 404(b) evidence. United States v. Merida, 765 F.2d 1205, 1221 (5th Cir. 1985). n31

This reasoning makes some sense. Any act that was part of the conspiracy would seem to be sufficiently related to the conduct that the government alleged in the indictment so that there is no concern that it is primarily used to prove propensity. This would be true whether or not the act was specifically alleged as an overt act.

The notion of "intricably intertwined" evidence becomes more complicated when it is examined in cases such as United States v. Hilgeford, 7 F.3d 1340 (7th Cir. 1993). Hilgeford suffered what the Court described as "hard times." He had borrowed over one million dollars from a bank and the Farmer's Home Administration using the two farms he owned as security for the debt. When he suffered financial difficulties, the bank foreclosed on the mortgage it held on one of his farms. The bank then bought the farm at the foreclosure sale and evicted Hilgeford. The United States foreclosed on his other farm.

Hilgeford retaliated by sending bills to employees of the bank and the FHA and then taking deductions on his tax return for the unpaid bills. Among the charges brought against him were counts alleging willful filing of false tax returns. To prove the tax counts, the government offered evidence that in the years prior to the challenged tax returns, Hilgeford had generated "a blizzard of complicated and groundless litigation, primarily involving his fruitless attempts to regain his two farms." Hilgeford objected at trial under Rule 404(b). The Court held that Rule 404(b) was not applicable to this evidence, because it was "intricately related to the fact of the case at hand."

Cases such as Hilgeford are more difficult than a conspiracy case like Pace, where the bad acts offered occurred while the conspiracy was ongoing. n32 The bad acts in Hilgeford did not occur in the time period covered by the indictment. The fact that the groundless litigation was probative of an element of the prosecution's case does not distinguish it from bad act evidence covered by Rule 404(b); presumably all evidence offered by the prosecution in a criminal trial must be somehow probative of an element of the crime. The Court's statement that the groundless litigation concerning the farm was "intricately related" to the tax counts is vague and conclusory.

We note that there is no significant cost to requiring a Rule 404(b) analysis: all the prosecution must do is establish a not-for-character purpose for the bad acts evidence, and give pretrial notice, as discussed below. Nor does avoiding Rule 404(b) absolve the Court of the duty, upon request, to provide a limiting instruction. Therefore, we suggest that Rule 404(b) should apply to all specific bad acts proffered by the prosecution, unless such acts occurred in the time period covered by the indictment and are substantively related to the charges. n33

The D.C. Circuit has gone one step further, questioning the notion that there should even be an exception from Rule 404(b) for acts that are inextricably intertwined with charged offenses. In United States v. Bowie, 232 F.3d 923 (D.C. Cir. 2000) , a counterfeiting prosecution, the money that led to the charges was discovered on May 16, 1997, when a joint Federal Bureau of Investigation/Metropolitan Police Department narcotics task force executed a search warrant at a Washington, D.C. apartment. An officer outside the apartment approached a man sitting in the passenger side of a parked car. The man consented to a search of the car and indicated that the car belonged to "Boo," who was upstairs in the apartment building. In indicating where "Boo" was, the man motioned toward the apartment where the search was underway. The officers conducting the search found Bowie in the apartment. Bowie identified himself as "Boo" but denied owning the car below. A search of the car resulted in the discovery of more than $3,000 of counterfeit twenty and fifty dollar bills. These were contained inside a console between the driver's and passenger's seats, underneath a pager activation form signed by Bowie and dated May 16, 1997. Other items found included a Maryland traffic ticket issued ten days earlier with Bowie's name and the license number of the car both on it, and a court document that had Bowie's name printed on it and a signature purporting to be his. As the search continued, an additional $90 in counterfeit fifty and twenty dollar bills were inside the pocket of a black leather jacket in the trunk. All of the serial numbers on all of the bills found anywhere in the car were identical.

In order to prove Bowie's guilt, the prosecution sought to use evidence of Bowie's earlier arrest for possession of counterfeit money. On the morning of April 17, 1997, Bowie was involved in an automobile accident in a Washington suburb. The police later did an inventory search of the car and found approximately $1,300 in counterfeit currency inside the pocket of a jacket. This counterfeit currency matched the serial number of the currency later seized from "Boo's" car.

The Trial Court overruled Bowie's Rule 404(b) objection to the introduction of the April 17th evidence. The Court ruled that Rule 404(b) did not apply because the acts were inextricably intertwined with the charged crime. The court reasoned that, because the serial numbers on the bills seized in April were identical to those seized in May, the April evidence was "in some sense really evidence of the same crime." However, the Court of Appeals criticized the "inextricably intertwined" analysis as an unnecessary limitation on the exclusionary language in the first sentence of Rule 404(b):

> As a practical matter, it is hard to see what function this interpretation of Rule 404(b) performs. If the so-called "intrinsic" act is indeed part of the crime charged, evidence of it will, by definition, always satisfy Rule 404(b). ... So far as we can tell, the only consequences of labeling evidence "intrinsic" are to relieve the prosecution of Rule 404(b)'s notice requirement and the court of its obligation to give an appropriate limiting instruction upon defense counsel's request.

The Court of Appeals also questioned whether the distinction between intrinsic and extrinsic facts was workable.

> Bifurcating the universe into intrinsic and extrinsic evidence has proven difficult in practice. Which > of a defendant's acts should be considered the charged crime and which should not is often uncertain. In order to brighten the line separating intrinsic and extrinsic evidence, many courts have focused on the connection between a given crime or act and the charged crime. When evidence is "inextricably intertwined" with the charged crime, courts typically treat it as the same crime. Every circuit now applies some formulation of the inextricably intertwined "test." See United States v. Rodriguez- Estrada, 877 F.2d 153, 156 (1st Cir. 1989) ; United States v. Carboni, 204 F.3d 39, 44 (2d Cir. 2000) ; United States v. Gibbs, 190 F.3d 188, 217-218 (3d Cir. 1999) ; United States v. Lipford, 203 F.3d 259, 268 (4th Cir. 2000) ; United States v. Morgan, 117 F.3d 849, 861 (5th Cir. 1997) ; United States v. Barnes, 49 F.3d 1144, 1149 (6th Cir. 1995) ; United States v. Hughes, 213 F.3d 323, 329 (7th Cir. 2000) ; United States v. O'Dell, 204 F.3d 829, 833-834 (8th Cir. 2000) ; United States v. Matthews, 226 F.3d 1075, 1082 (9th Cir. 2000) ; United States v. O'Brien, 131 F.3d 1428, 1432 (10th Cir. 1997) ; United States v. Smith, 122 F.3d 1355, 1359 (11th Cir. 1997) .

The Court of Appeals concluded that not only is the line between intrinsic and extrinsic offenses difficult to draw, but that there is a danger when trial judges seek to find the line:

> [T]reating evidence as inextricably intertwined not only bypasses Rule 404(b) and its attendant notice requirement, but also carries the implicit finding that the evidence is admissible for all purposes notwithstanding its bearing on character, thus eliminating the defense's entitlement, upon request, to a jury instruction. There is, as well, a danger that finding evidence "inextricably intertwined" may too easily slip from analysis to mere conclusion. What does the "inextricably intertwined" concept entail? When is a defendant's crime or act so indistinguishable from the charged crime that an item of evidence is entirely removed from Rule 404(b)?
>
> We have not defined "inextricably intertwined" in the few Rule 404(b) cases in which we used those terms. Our sister circuits have attempted various formulations. The Seventh Circuit, for instance, examines "whether the evidence is properly admitted to provide the jury with a complete story of the crime on trial, whether its absence would create a chronological or conceptual void in the story of the crime or whether it is so blended or connected that it incidentally involves, explains the circumstances surrounding, or tends to prove any element of, the charged crime." United States v. Hughes, 213 F.3d 323, 329 (7th Cir. 2000) . According to the Second Circuit, "evidence of uncharged criminal activity is not considered other crimes evidence under Rule 404(b) if it arose out of the same transaction or series of transactions as the charged offense, if it is inextricably intertwined with the evidence regarding the charged offense, or if it is necessary to complete the story of the crime on trial." United States v. Carboni, 204 F.3d 39, 44 (2d Cir. 2000) .
>
> We do not find these formulations particularly helpful. Some are circular: inextricably intertwined evidence is intrinsic, and evidence is intrinsic if it is inextricably intertwined. Others are over-broad. The "complete the story" definition of "inextricably intertwined" threatens to override Rule 404(b). A defendant's bad act may be only tangentially related to the charged crime, but it nevertheless could "complete the story" or "incidentally involve" the charged offense or "explain the circumstances." If the prosecution's evidence did not "explain" or "incidentally involve" the charged crime, it is difficult to see how it could pass the minimal requirement for admissibility that evidence be relevant.

In the end, the Bowie Court concluded that "there is no general 'complete the story' or 'explain the circumstances' exception to Rule 404(b) in this Circuit. Such broad exclusions have no discernible grounding in the 'other crimes, wrongs, or acts' language of the Rule. Rule 404(b), and particularly its notice requirement, should not be disregarded on such a flimsy basis."

To demonstrate its concerns, the Court turned to the Bowie facts and concluded that the Trial Court was wrong to have concluded that the April 17th events were inextricably intertwined with the May 16th charged offense. Therefore, Rule 404(b) applied and the prosecution was required to: (1) articulate a not-for-character purpose for the evidence, and (2) provide notice of its intended use at trial. The Court reasoned as follows:

> As to Bowie's case, we do not see how his acts on April 17 constituted the same crime as that charged in the indictment. The authorities seized the counterfeit bills he had in possession on April 17, so the bills he possessed on May 16 could not have been the same ones. Contrast United States v. Towne, 870 F.2d 880, 886 (2d Cir. 1989) ("The continuous possession of the same gun does not amount to a series of crimes, but rather constitutes a single offense."). Eleven of the bills -- those recovered in April and those seized in May -- were doubtless from the same supplier and possibly the same batch, and the evidence indicated that Bowie purchased them at one time. But the indictment charged him only with possession of the counterfeit bills found on May 16. Given the charge, the April evidence was relevant [to prove intent and knowledge]. But it cannot be that all evidence tending to prove the crime is part of the crime. If that were so, Rule 404(b) would be a nullity.

The analysis in Bowie has much to recommend it. The "inextricably intertwined" exception substitutes a careful analysis with boilerplate jargon. It may also lead to a trial judge's failure to consider the possible prejudicial effect of other act evidence, since judges are unlikely to exclude evidence that is perceived as part of the charge brought by the government.

The Bowie opinion recognized that in a "narrow range" of cases, a bad act can be so close in time and space as to be part of the charged crime. "Rule 404(b), for instance, would not have barred testimony from a witness who saw Bowie put the counterfeit currency in the Pontiac's console. Although such testimony relates to one of defendant's acts, the act is the charged crime of possessing counterfeit currency." In other words, if the evidence is of an act that is part of the charged offense, it is properly considered intrinsic. The same is true of the Pace case discussed above. The overt acts, whether or not all are alleged in the charging instrument or must be proved, are the acts of a conspiracy and there is no need to subject them to a Rule 404(b) analysis.

Bowie is a signal that it is unnecessary to create an exception to Rule 404(b) in order to permit the government to offer relevant evidence that supports its case. The Bowie opinion affirmed the District Court's admission of the April 17th evidence to show knowledge and intent. Similarly, the Hilgeford opinion did not need to remove the other act evidence from Rule 404(b) to find it relevant and to hold that the District Court did not err in admitting it.

[13] Purposes For Bad Acts Evidence Not Listed in the Rule

Rule 404(b) provides a list of proper purposes for admitting bad acts evidence. This list is illustrative only; it is not intended to be exclusive. n34 A plain reading of Rule 404(b) indicates that it is satisfied whenever bad act evidence is offered for a purpose other than proving character. n35 Once the not-for-character purpose is articulated, admissibility becomes a Rule 403 question -- whether the probative value as to the not-for-character purpose is substantially outweighed by the risk that the jury will use the uncharged misconduct as evidence of bad character.

United States v. Reme, 738 F.2d 1156 (11th Cir. 1984) , provides an interesting example of the "inclusiveness" of Rule 404(b). Reme and Pierrot were charged with transporting illegal aliens to the United States. The defendants, Haitian nationals, arrived by boat with eighty of their countrymen. Their defense was that they were merely passengers and not transporters. The government called other occupants of the boat to testify that Pierrot made the passengers sing voodoo songs; that Pierrot made them submit to searches for valuables and black magic; that Pierrot conducted a voodoo ceremony that led to the disappearance of two passengers; and that Reme beat the passengers. The Court of Appeals held that all this testimony was properly admitted under Rule 404(b) to show "control"; the Court was unconcerned that "control" was not specifically listed as a proper purpose in the Rule, because the Rule permits bad acts to be admitted for any not-for-character purpose -- subject to Rule 403. On the Rule 403 question, the Reme Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the bad acts, since control was a contested issue in the case, the evidence was strongly probative of the government's argument that the defendants controlled the boat, and the prejudice, though significant, did not substantially outweigh the probative value.

[14] Prior Bad Acts Offered by the Accused: "Reverse 404(b)"

The second sentence of Rule 404(b) is not confined to evidence offered by a prosecutor. A defendant who claims that bad act evidence committed by a third party is probative of a not-for-character purpose is also able to take advantage of this part of the Rule. United States v. James, 169 F.3d 1210 (9th Cir. 1999) (en banc), provides a good example. James was convicted of aiding and abetting manslaughter. The victim was James's boyfriend, Ogden. After a night of drinking, Ogden had attacked James's daughter's boyfriend and knocked him unconscious. Both James and her daughter were in the vehicle where this violent confrontation occurred. In response to the attack, James gave her daughter a loaded gun, and the daughter used it to kill Ogden. James claimed self-defense, and testified that Ogden had previously told her that he had stabbed a person in the neck with a ballpoint pen; ripped the sideview mirror off a car and beat a man unconscious with it; and robbed an old man by holding him down with a knife in his face and threatening to cut his eyes out. The Trial Judge allowed the testimony, but refused to permit the defendant to offer proof that these events described by Ogden had actually occurred; nor was the defendant permitted to offer proof of any other specific act of violence perpetrated by Ogden. The Court held that the exclusion of proof of Ogden's specific acts of violence was reversible error. It stated that the evidence, if admitted, would have had two legitimate functions: "to corroborate James' own testimony that she had heard Ogden tell her these things and to corroborate her statement that she had reason to be afraid of Ogden in his vicious drunken mood." The evidence proved that Ogden had actually committed the acts, "so that the stories of his wild exploits would have had the ring of truth" to the defendant. Thus, the evidence should have been admitted under Rule 404(b) because it went to the credibility of the defendant's testimony, and not solely to the victim's character. n36

[15] Civil Cases

Civil litigants should remember that they too can use Rule 404(b). n37 For example, Dillon v. Nissan Motor Co., 986 F.2d 263 (8th Cir. 1993) , was a personal injury action, where the plaintiff claimed emotional injuries as a result of the accident. The plaintiff's drug use was held properly admitted for the not-for-character purpose of providing an alternative explanation for his emotional turmoil. n38

In employment discrimination cases, bad acts of the defendant are often admitted to prove intent to discriminate. See the Annotated Cases, § 404.03[2][n][v], [bb][iii].

[16] Stipulating to a Mental Element

One of the not-for-character purposes listed in Rule 404(b) is intent and another is knowledge. Often the prosecution seeks to admit a bad act similar to that with which the defendant is charged, as proof that the defendant intended to commit the act charged, or had the knowledge required by the statute. n39 Certainly, this can be probative evidence where defendants dispute intent or knowledge, for example by contending that they were duped or mistaken, or that "it was an accident." However, what if defendants contend instead that they did not commit the crime, were never at the scene, were falsely identified, that the witnesses are lying, etc.? To what extent does the defendant's refusal to contest intent or knowledge -- or offer to stipulate to these elements -- prevent the prosecution from proving it through uncharged misconduct?

Until the decision in Old Chief v. United States, 519 U.S. 172 (1997) , most Circuits had held that a defendant could prevent the use of uncharged acts to prove a mental element by offering an explicit stipulation, generally at the outset of the case. For example, in United States v. Crowder, 87 F.3d 1405 (D.C. Cir. 1996) (en banc), the Court held that it was error to admit prior bad act evidence to prove intent and knowledge, because the defendant had made an "unequivocal concession of both intent and knowledge." The majority reasoned that "a defendant's offer to concede knowledge and intent combined with an explicit jury instruction that the Government no longer needs to prove either element gives the Government everything the evidence could show with respect to those two elements, doing so without risk that the jury will use the evidence for impermissible propensity purposes." The dissenting Judges in Crowder argued that the majority erred in focusing solely on what the defendant conceded rather than on the nature of the evidence the government offers, and that the government's evidence remains relevant notwithstanding an offer to stipulate because the government bears the burden of proof as to all elements of all crimes charged.

Old Chief provides strong support for the dissenters' view of the matter in Crowder. n40 The Court in Old Chief held that under Rule 403, a defendant's proffered stipulation to the felony element in a felon-firearm prosecution rendered the evidence of the predicate conviction inadmissible. This was because the stipulation was as probative of the felony element of the crime as was the judgment of conviction, and yet was substantially less prejudicial. The stipulation deprived the government of nothing in the way of narrative or weight of the evidence. However, the Court took pains to emphasize that the prosecution is generally free to prove its case through evidence rather than forced stipulation. This is because in most cases, a stipulation does not carry the same weight as actual evidence; it can deprive the government of narrative power, and rob the government of the ability to prove that a conviction is morally reasonable. Most importantly, the Court in Old Chief specifically declared: "if there were a justification for receiving evidence of the nature of prior acts on some issue other than status (i.e., to prove 'motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident,' Fed. Rule Evid. 404(b)), Rule 404(b) guarantees the opportunity to seek its admission." (Emphasis added.)

The Old Chief Court distinguished between stipulations to the status element of a crime, which can be forced upon the prosecution, and stipulations to other elements of a crime, which the prosecution should remain free to reject. The rationale for the distinction is "that proof of the defendant's status goes to an element entirely outside the natural sequence of what the defendant is charged with thinking and doing to commit the current offense." In contrast, the intent and knowledge elements go directly to what the defendant was thinking and doing to commit the charged offense; if forced to accept a stipulation on these matters, the prosecution may be hampered in telling the entire story about the defendant's conduct in a meaningful way to the jury.

It is true that Old Chief is not a Rule 404(b) case. However, the fact that the Court went out of its way to state that the prosecution need not accept a stipulation as to a mental element of a crime makes it unlikely that a defendant can keep bad acts out of the case by forcing the prosecution to stipulate to intent or knowledge (as opposed to the status element) of a crime. n41 So it was not surprising that when Crowder came back to the D.C. Circuit (for reconsideration in light of Old Chief), the Court held that the defendant's offer to stipulate intent did not render the prior bad act inadmissible. n42 The Crowder court read Old Chief as distinguishing between stipulations as to the status element of a crime -- where the stipulation and the proof of status have equal probative value -- and stipulation to the elements of intent and knowledge -- where the stipulation is not as probative as actual evidence. It concluded that replacing proof of intent and knowledge with a stipulation "creates a gap in the story of a defendant's subsequent criminality." The Court stated that "[e]vidence about what the defendant said or did at other times can be a critical part of the story of a crime" and that "Old Chief establishes that the prosecution cannot be forced to stipulate away the force of such evidence." The Court concluded as follows:

> [W]e hold that a defendant's offer to stipulate to an element of an offense does not render the government's other crimes evidence inadmissible under Rule 404(b) to prove that element, even if the defendant's proposed stipulation is unequivocal.

Other courts, post-Old Chief, have reached similar results, holding that bad acts evidence offered for proof of a mental element can be admitted despite the defendant's offer to concede that mental element. The notion in Old Chief that the prosecution can be forced to accept a stipulation in lieu of introducing probative yet prejudicial evidence has been limited to proof of status -- as apparently was the Old Chief Court's intent. n43

Even assuming that a prosecutor can be forced to accept a stipulation to intent or knowledge after Old Chief (or is asked by the defendant to do so), the stipulation offered must be sufficient to take the relevant element out of the case; not every stipulation will do that. For example, in United States v. Garcia, 983 F.2d 1160 (1st Cir. 1993) , the defendant was arrested while sleeping in an apartment in which a large quantity of drugs was found. He was charged with possession of narcotics with intent to distribute. In an attempt to keep his prior drug transactions out of the trial, he offered to stipulate to "knowledge about cocaine trafficking." The proffered stipulation was rejected and the prior drug transactions were admitted. The Court found that the prosecution was free to reject the proffered stipulation of knowledge about cocaine trafficking, because it would not have removed the entire element of knowledge from the case to which the bad acts would be relevant. Stipulation to knowledge about cocaine trafficking is not the same as stipulating to knowing possession of narcotics at the time of the arrest. n44

Again assuming arguendo that the prosecution must accept a stipulation to an element of the crime (or agrees to do so), the jury would still have to be made aware that the charged crime contains that element. The defendant is not entitled to recharacterize the crime with which he is charged. For example, in United States v. Gilliam, 994 F.2d 97 (2d Cir. 1993) , the defendant was charged with being a felon in possession of a firearm -- the same crime charged in Old Chief. His proffered stipulation to the fact of his prior felony was accepted. However, he also sought to take the element of the felony out of the case. He asked the judge to instruct the jury that if it found that the defendant knowingly possessed the gun, it should find the defendant guilty. The Court held that such an instruction was inappropriate because it would deny the jury the right to know the crime for which it was convicting the defendant. The Court noted that "Gilliam is not charged with mere possession of a weapon, but with possession by a convicted felon. The jury speaks for the community in condemning such behavior, and it cannot condemn such behavior if it is unaware of the nature of the crime charged."

[17] Acts Committed After the Act Charged

Evidence offered under Rule 404(b) is often referred to as evidence of "prior bad acts." This is a misnomer, because it seems to imply that to be admissible under the Rule, the acts must have preceded those that are the subject of the lawsuit. Yet this is not always the case. For example, in United States v. Olivo, 69 F.3d 1057 (10th Cir. 1995) , the defendant was charged with conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute 1000 kilograms or more of marijuana. The Trial Judge admitted, as probative of intent, evidence that 185 pounds of marijuana was seized from the defendant's car more than a year after the charged conspiracy was terminated. The Court affirmed the defendant's conviction and stated that "Rule 404(b) does not specifically exclude acts subsequent to the incident or incidents giving rise to the indictment." The admissibility question was "close" given the long time between the charged offense and the uncharged misconduct, but the Court relied on other cases in which "extrinsic evidence separated by more than a year from the charged conduct has been found probative of intent."

It should be noted, however, that bad acts may be more probative of how a person will act than of how a person has acted. This is especially true of bad acts offered to prove knowledge. Suppose that a defendant is charged with transporting drugs in the back of a moving van in 2004; the drugs were hidden behind furniture. The defendant claims that he thought the van was full of furniture. Evidence that he had transported a similar shipment of furniture and drugs in 2003 is more probative of his knowledge in 2004 than is evidence of drug and furniture transportation in 1992. n45

The Court in United States v. Procopio, 88 F.3d 21 (1st Cir. 1996) , was confronted with the problem of the diminished probative value of uncharged misconduct occurring subsequent to the charged activity. The defendants were convicted of armed robbery and argued that it was error to admit evidence of armed robberies committed by them two years after the robbery that was the subject of the trial. The Court held that the evidence was properly admitted for the not-for-character purpose of proving a criminal association between the defendants. The inference of criminal association went "somewhat beyond the mere implication that either man was of bad character." The decision of the Trial Judge to admit the evidence was, however, a close one under Rule 403. The "need to reason backward from 1993 to 1991" weakened the probative value of the evidence as to criminal association in the charged crime. "And here, as is often the case with Rule 404(b) evidence, the permissible inference (criminal association) overlapped with, and went only a small step beyond, the forbidden one (criminal character)." However, because the issue was close, and a reasonable Judge might have decided either way, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence. Still, the case would not have been as close had the evidence of uncharged misconduct been a criminal association between the defendants that had occurred two years before the crime charged.

[18] Standard of Proof

In the early years of the Federal Rules, many Courts required "clear and convincing evidence" that a criminal defendant committed an uncharged act before proof of the act could be admitted. However, the Supreme Court rejected this standard as unduly stringent, and inconsistent with the language of Rule 104(b), in Huddleston v. United States, 485 U.S. 681 (1988) . Huddleston was charged with selling stolen goods and possessing stolen property, charges relating to video cassette tapes. To prove the defendant's knowledge that the items were stolen, the government offered evidence concerning Huddleston's previous offer to sell new black and white television sets and a large quantity of home appliances. Huddleston challenged the admission of the evidence concerning the televisions, because the government's proof that these items were stolen was based solely upon the defendant's failure to produce a bill of sale and their low selling price.

In the lower Courts, Huddleston had argued that the bad act evidence could not be admitted unless the government proved by clear and convincing evidence that the sets had been stolen. In the Supreme Court, however, he conceded that the clear and convincing evidence argument must fail in light of the Court's ruling in Bourjaily v. United States (discussed in § 104.02[9]), which held that admissibility requirements in the Federal Rules are determined by a preponderance of the evidence standard. The defendant in Huddleston argued instead that the evidence could not have been properly admitted unless the Trial Judge found by at least a preponderance of the evidence that the sets were stolen. The Supreme Court, however, unanimously rejected the argument.

Chief Justice Rehnquist's opinion for the Court reasoned that when evidence is offered for a proper purpose under Rule 404(b), "the evidence is subject only to general strictures limiting admissibility such as Rules 402 and 403." The Chief Justice declared that the question of whether the defendant had committed the bad act was simply one of conditional relevancy -- the bad act is relevant only if the defendant committed it. Questions of conditional relevancy are governed by Rule 104(b), under which the evidence is admitted if the proponent establishes enough evidence to support a finding of the conditional fact. As the Court put it in Huddleston: "The court simply examines all the evidence in the case and decides whether the jury could reasonably find the conditional fact -- here, that the television sets were stolen -- by a preponderance of the evidence." The Trial Court need not itself be convinced by a preponderance that the defendant committed the bad act.

Responding to the defendant's argument that other act evidence might be unduly prejudicial, Chief Justice Rehnquist wrote as follows:

> We share petitioner's concern that unduly prejudicial evidence might be introduced under Rule 404(b). ... We think, however, that the protection against such unfair prejudice emanates not from a requirement of preliminary factfinding by the trial court, but rather from four other sources: first, from the requirement of Rule 404(b) that the evidence be offered for a proper purpose; second, from the relevancy requirement of Rule 402 -- as enforced through Rule 104(b); third, from the assessment the trial court must make under Rule 403 to determine whether the probative value of the similar acts evidence is substantially outweighed by its potential for unfair prejudice ...; and fourth, from Federal Rule of Evidence 105, which provides that the trial court shall, upon request, instruct the jury that the similar acts evidence is to be considered only for the proper purpose for which it was admitted.

The Huddleston decision establishes that Rule 404(b) rulings on whether uncharged misconduct occurred fall within the conditional relevancy (subdivision (b)) rather than the preliminary factfinding (subdivision (a)) portion of Rule 104. It also highlights the importance of making Rule 403 objections when other act evidence is offered, and of explicitly seeking appellate review of Rule 403 objections that are overruled. The Court observed that the defendant had failed to explicitly seek such review in Huddleston.

[19] Effect of Prior Acquittals

In Dowling v. United States, 493 U.S. 342 (1990) , the Court strongly suggested that uncharged misconduct could be admissible under Rule 404(b) even if the defendant has been acquitted of that conduct. Dowling was charged with bank robbery. The perpetrator wore a ski mask and carried a gun. The Trial Court allowed a witness to testify that Dowling and a man named Christian assaulted her two weeks after the bank robbery and that during the assault Dowling was wearing a ski mask and carrying a handgun. This testimony was admitted to strengthen the identification of Dowling as the masked, gun-toting bank robber, and to link Dowling with Christian, who was the getaway driver for the bank robbery. Dowling had been acquitted of charges arising from that assault. The Third Circuit held that conduct for which the defendant had been acquitted could not be admitted under Rule 404(b).

The Rule 404(b) question was not raised in the Supreme Court in Dowling. Rather, Dowling argued that the collateral estoppel component of the Double Jeopardy Clause prohibited the government from introducing evidence of conduct for which he had been acquitted. In rejecting that claim, the Court relied heavily on the fact that the standard of proof governing the admissibility of Rule 404(b) evidence is considerably less than the beyond a reasonable doubt standard applied to determine guilt at a criminal trial. The Court noted that after Huddleston, the prosecution need only provide evidence sufficient to support a finding by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant committed the prior bad act. Therefore, when the government offered evidence of the assault at the bank robbery trial, the government was not trying to relitigate the question of whether Dowling had committed the assault beyond a reasonable doubt: "Because a jury might reasonably conclude that Dowling was the masked man who entered Henry's home, even if it did not believe beyond a reasonable doubt that Dowling committed the crimes charged at the first trial, the collateral estoppel component of the Double Jeopardy Clause is inapposite."

Dowling is not technically a Rule 404(b) case. But the Court's rationale leads to the conclusion that bad acts are not inadmissible under Rule 404(b) simply because the defendant has been acquitted of those acts. An acquittal is not dispositive given the significantly lower standard of proof applied to Rule 404(b) evidence after Huddleston. (See the cases admitting acquitted conduct in § 404.03[2][c].) However, the defendant should be prepared to argue that the probative value of the bad act is diminished in light of the acquittal. As the Court stated in Huddleston, "[T]he strength of the evidence establishing the similar act is one of the factors the court may consider when conducting the Rule 403 balancing."

[20] Effect of Prior Arrests

If a bad act can be admitted even when the defendant has been acquitted of charges arising from the act, what should the result be if the defendant has simply been arrested for the act? A cogent answer was provided by the Court in United States v. Robinson, 978 F.2d 1554 (10th Cir. 1992) . Robinson was a narcotics case in which conspiracy and intent were contested issues. The Trial Judge admitted evidence that two of the defendants had previously been arrested for narcotics violations. The Court of Appeals held that the mere evidence of arrest, without any showing of the underlying act or circumstances, was not probative of intent, knowledge, or any other of the permissible purposes for bad act evidence under Rule 404(b). It concluded: "Rule 404(b) allows evidence concerning the prior activity of a particular defendant, not simply testimony that records indicate an arrest took place." Put another way, the mere fact of arrest did not show sufficiently, under Huddleston, that the bad act was committed and that the defendant committed it.

In contrast, officers in Robinson testified with respect to another defendant not merely about prior arrests but about specific acts of the defendant and the circumstances that culminated in the arrest (i.e., that drugs were found in the apartment and that the defendant was apprehended while trying to jump from a second-story window). This evidence was found properly admitted because it was probative on the subject of intent and knowledge, and because the prosecution provided enough evidence to support a finding that the act was committed and that the defendant committed it. n46

[21] A Balancing Test for Evidence of Uncharged Misconduct

Bad act evidence is not automatically admissible simply because the proponent has articulated a not-for-character purpose to which the evidence could be put. The Supreme Court in Huddleston emphasized that the decision to admit evidence under Rule 404(b) depends as well on "whether the danger of unfair prejudice [substantially] outweighs the probative value of the evidence in view of the availability of other means of proof and other factors appropriate for making decisions of this kind under Rule 403." Thus, the Court has recognized that exclusion is mandated if the probative value of the bad act, in proving the permissible, not-for-character purpose, is substantially outweighed by the risk that the jury would misuse the evidence as proof of bad character.

Most Courts have applied a four-part test in assessing bad acts evidence. As stated by the Court in United States v. Rackstraw, 7 F.3d 1476, 1479 (10th Cir. 1993) , the basic test is as follows:

> (1) the evidence must be offered for a proper [not-for-character] purpose; (2) the evidence must be relevant [for that purpose]; (3) the trial court must make a Rule 403 determination of whether the probative value of the [bad] acts is substantially outweighed by its potential for unfair prejudice; and (4) pursuant to Rule 105, the trial court shall, upon request, instruct the jury that the evidence of similar acts is to be considered only for the proper purpose for which it was admitted.

n47

Under the Rule 403 test, evidence in a criminal case of serious uncharged criminal activity by the accused must be examined very carefully. The more heinous the uncharged acts, the more likely the jury will misuse the evidence and treat the defendant as a generally bad person, something the Rule does not permit. n48 Also, the more similar the bad act is to the act charged, the more likely the jury is to draw the impermissible inference that the defendant has a propensity to commit such acts.

Under Rules 403 and 404(b), the uncharged misconduct evidence should be admitted when the balance between probative value and prejudicial effect is close. n49 On the other hand, where the evidence is plainly prejudicial and is not very important to the government's case, it should be excluded. n50

As discussed in § 403.02[5], the Trial Court must take into account whether the same point can be proved with evidence that does not refer to uncharged bad acts. The cost of admitting prejudicial evidence is unacceptable if equally probative and less prejudicial evidence is reasonably available. n51 For example, it may be necessary in many cases to introduce the defendant's handwriting exemplar; but it is usually not necessary to do so by way of a document that refers to the defendant's uncharged crimes. n52

It is very important that counsel make clear to the Trial Judge why other crimes evidence is being offered and why it is opposed so that the Judge is able to articulate for the record the reasons for reaching a certain balance. If both sides clearly state their reasons for offering and objecting to evidence, and if the Trial Judge makes a diligent attempt to weigh the competing concerns and to reach an appropriate balance, the correct result will be reached in most cases. We think that this approach is basically what the Appellate Courts have been suggesting to their Trial Judges. The Court in United States v. Merriweather, 78 F.3d 1070, 1076 (6th Cir. 1996) , summed up the appropriate procedure as follows:

We undertake, once more, to explain how Rule 404(b) is properly applied:

> Upon objection by the defendant, the proponent of the evidence, usually the government, should be required to identify the specific purpose or purposes for which the government offers the evidence of "other crimes, wrongs, or acts." By so requiring, we do not mandate hypertechnicality.
>
> ... [T]he government's purpose in introducing the evidence must be to prove a fact that the defendant has placed, or conceivably will place, in issue, or a fact that the statutory elements obligate the government to prove.
>
> After requiring the proponent to identify the specific purpose for which the evidence is offered, the district court must determine whether the identified purpose, whether to prove motive or intent or identity [or] some other purpose, is "material"; that is, whether it is "in issue" in the case. If the court finds it is, the court must then determine, before admitting the other acts evidence, whether the probative value of the evidence is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice under Rule 403. If the evidence satisfies Rule 403, then, after receiving the evidence, the district court must "clearly, simply, and correctly" instruct the jury as to the specific purpose for which they may consider the evidence.

The Merriweather Court stated, as many other Courts have done, that the Rule 404(b)/403 analysis must be conducted on the record. n53 However, to be entitled to on-the-record findings on the probative value and prejudicial effect of uncharged misconduct evidence, the defendant must specifically request an on-the-record articulation of these factors. Thus, in United States v. Fox, 69 F.3d 15 (5th Cir. 1995) , the defendant objected to the admission of uncharged misconduct evidence, but did not specifically request an on-the-record articulation of probative value and prejudice; the Court therefore found no error in the Trial Judge's failure to make on-the-record findings.

[22] Preliminary Rulings

One way of avoiding problems at trial with bad act evidence is to seek a ruling by the Trial Judge before the bad acts are mentioned. One case recommending this is Grimaldi v. United States, 606 F.2d 332, 340 n.9 (1st Cir. 1979) . Of course, as discussed in § 103.02[12], a Trial Judge might not rule definitively in limine on questions involving a balancing of probative value and prejudicial effect. Accordingly, it behooves counsel to renew at trial an objection to evidence (or to reargue a decision to exclude it) previously considered by the Court in an in limine ruling.

[23] Limiting Instructions

Counsel, especially those representing criminal defendants, must be diligent if they are to limit the prejudicial effect of bad act evidence. If a Trial Judge is inclined to admit bad act evidence, defense counsel may want a limiting instruction. Although such an instruction may not work in some cases and even may be undesirable because it might call attention to the dangerous evidence, in other cases a caution to the jury from the Judge may be beneficial. Unless the defendant requests a limiting instruction, it is unlikely that one will be given -- though, as discussed in § 105.02[3], a Trial Judge may find it worthwhile in some cases to give a cautionary instruction sua sponte in order to protect against a reversal for plain error. If a proper request is made and the Trial Judge fails to give an instruction, an Appellate Court may well reverse. n54

Trial Judges should be alert to the possible ineffectiveness of defense counsel; the failure to request a limiting instruction may be the result of negligence rather than considered strategy. n55 Although a Court is entitled to rely to a great extent on the parties' attorneys to protect their own clients' interests, the Court, too, has a duty to ensure that a criminal defendant receives a fair trial. By asking whether defense counsel wants a limiting instruction in circumstances when one would seem desirable, Trial Judges might avoid plain error.

It is important that instructions concerning Rule 404(b) evidence specifically inform the jury of the permissible purpose for the evidence, and also specifically indicate that the uncharged misconduct is not to be used as evidence of bad character. n56 It is also important that the instruction be given contemporaneously with the introduction of the evidence. A Court that gives a fuzzy and/or untimely instruction risks reversal. A case in point is United States v. Jobson, 102 F.3d 214 (6th Cir. 1996) , in which evidence of gang activity was offered to show the defendant's increased opportunity to commit a firearms offense. The Court held that while the evidence was probative of opportunity, the Trial Judge's failure to give a proper limiting instruction deprived the defendant of a fair trial. The Trial Judge had rejected the defendant's proffered instruction, and gave the following instruction instead:

> You've heard testimony that the defendant committed some other acts other than the ones charged in the indictment. You cannot consider this testimony as evidence that the defendant committed the crime that he is on trial for now.
>
> Instead, you can only consider it in deciding for the purposes stated to you. You may only consider it for the purpose stated to you. Do not consider it for any other purpose.
>
> Remember the defendant is on trial here only for the offense of felon in possession of a firearm, not for the other acts. Do not return a guilty verdict unless the government proves the crime charged beyond a reasonable doubt.

The Court had this to say about the Trial Judge's instructions:

> These instructions were inadequate to safeguard against the impermissible use of the gang evidence because they do not inform the jury of the proper purpose for which the gang evidence could be considered. While the instructions indicate that the jury should consider the evidence only "for the purposes stated to you," the court never told the jury what these purposes were. In addition, no limiting instructions were given at the time the gang evidence was admitted. This is not a case, moreover, where the jurors would necessarily be aware of the other acts to which the court was referring so that the error could be found to be harmless. It is not enough for a district court to instruct jurors not to consider Rule 404(b) evidence as "evidence that the defendant committed the crime that he is on trial for now." The district court must expressly indicate the precise purpose for the other acts evidence. In this case, the District Court was obliged to instruct the jurors that they could consider the evidence of defendant's gang membership only to establish his opportunity to possess the firearm. Given the court's failure to provide an effective limiting instruction, the jurors could not have had the vaguest notion of the limited proper purpose for which [they] might have considered the evidence. n57

The Federal Judicial Center has approved the following model instruction for dealing with Rule 404(b) evidence: n58

> As you know, the defendant _____, is on trial here for [e.g., knowingly sending gambling material in interstate commerce]. In order for you to find the defendant guilty of this crime, the government must prove each of the following elements of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt. [First, the defendant sent gambling materials. Second, the defendant sent those materials in interstate commerce. Third, the defendant knew that these were gambling materials he was sending.]
>
> As I said, one of the things the government must prove beyond a reasonable doubt is that the defendant [knew that these were gambling materials]. You have heard testimony indicating that [on prior occasions the defendant sent gambling materials between two states]. That testimony is not evidence that [the defendant sent gambling materials in interstate commerce] on this particular occasion. The government must prove that from other evidence beyond a reasonable doubt. But if you conclude on the basis of other evidence that [the defendant did send gambling materials in interstate commerce as charged], you may consider the testimony about prior occasions in deciding whether [he knew that these were gambling materials].

> I remind you that the defendant is on trial here only for [description of the charge that distinguishes it from the earlier acts]. Do not convict him if the government has failed to prove this charge beyond a reasonable doubt.

The FJC commentary to the instruction states that "the best way to limit the confusion occasioned by evidence admitted under [Rule 404(b)] is to outline with clarity the elements of the offense and describe the testimony. The jury would then be told that after it has found the other elements beyond a reasonable doubt, the jury could look to the evidence to prove the remaining element."

[24] Notice

Rule 404(b) requires the prosecution, upon the defendant's request, to give notice in advance of trial of the "general nature" of any bad acts evidence it intends to introduce at trial. The purpose of the amendment is to prevent unfair surprise and to make it easier for the defendant to obtain a pretrial in limine ruling on bad acts evidence. The amendment plainly envisions that the notice requirement is to be flexibly applied.

No specific time limits are set, and indeed the amendment permits notice to be given as late as during trial upon a showing of good cause. n59 As to the substance of the notice, the prosecution need only disclose the "general nature" of the bad acts evidence. n60 However, it is not enough to simply inform defense counsel that the government's files are open for counsel's perusal. As one Court put it: "Simply making available mountains of documents without specifying which will likely be submitted has elements of unfairness causing needless expense to the defendant." n61 There is no requirement that the notice be in writing.

Several additional points can be made about the notice provision in Rule 404(b). First, the Rule requires that an accused request notice of uncharged acts. Defense counsel have reason to request pretrial notice in every case. Such notice permits defense counsel to advise the accused on the reasonableness of going to trial in the face of possibly devastating evidence of uncharged misconduct. The Rule does not state how specific a defense request must be to trigger the government's notice obligation. In one case, the defense simply requested a list of witnesses, and contended that this triggered the notice requirement under Rule 404(b). The Court stated that such a request was "so broad that it is questionable that it should have fairly alerted the government to supply evidence under Rule 404(b)." The Court found it unnecessary to decide whether the request was specific enough, however, because it was clear under the circumstances that the government considered the request as pertaining to Rule 404(b) evidence. The Court cautioned nonetheless that "the lesson that might be gleaned from this case is that it is more prudent for defense counsel to include a reference to Rule 404(b) in the boilerplate request for discovery under Fed.R.Crim.P. 16." n62

Second, the amendment is a one-way street. Although defendants may use Rule 404(b) to introduce other act evidence in their favor, the amendment does not provide the government with any discovery right. The difference in treatment of prosecutors and defendants reflects the different degrees of prejudice that might be anticipated when the defendant's personal acts are admitted as evidence (raising the possibility that they might be misused as propensity evidence) and when acts of persons not on trial are admitted (which are less likely to be misused, since the propensity of these persons to commit crimes is typically not relevant).

Third, the amendment is purely a notice provision. It does not supersede the Trial Judge's right to permit in limine motions by either the defense or the prosecution with respect to Rule 404(b) evidence or the Judge's power to bar mention of such evidence, even in an opening statement, unless and until the Judge has made a determination that the evidence is admissible.

Fourth, what happens if the government gives pretrial notice of its intent to proffer a prior bad act, and then subsequently discovers a different bad act that it wants to use as well? Or what if the government responds to a defense request by stating that it does not intend to use Rule 404(b) evidence, and then uncovers a bad act committed by the defendant that it does intend to use? The notice requirement of Rule 404(b) does not state whether the prosecution has a continuing obligation to notify the defendant should it discover Rule 404(b) evidence after an initial response to the defendant's request. However, it has been held that the Rule imposes a continuing obligation of notice. In United States v. Barnes, 49 F.3d 1144, 1148 (6th Cir. 1995) , the Court held that Rule 404(b) requires "a continuing obligation on the government to comply with the notice requirement ... whenever it discovers information that meets the previous defense request." The Court reasoned that a contrary reading "would force the defense to make numerous, periodic requests until the trial has been completed -- surely a wasteful procedure."

Fifth, the notice requirement is inapplicable in civil cases. However, other discovery provisions in the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure might well require pretrial disclosure.

Sixth, where the notice requirement is not complied with, the prosecution will be forced to argue that the uncharged misconduct evidence is not covered by Rule 404(b) at all. The government might, for example, try to argue that the evidence is "inextricably intertwined" with the crime charged. n63 Or it might seek to admit the evidence solely for impeachment purposes, since there is no similar notice requirement under Rules 608 or 609(a).

[25] Relationship to Rule 608

The basic distinction between evidence offered under Rule 404(b) and impeachment attempted under Rule 608(b) is that evidence is generally offered under the former Rule as affirmative proof of a disputed issue while evidence may only be offered under the latter Rule to impeach a witness. This basic distinction gives rise, therefore, to five general principles:

(1) Evidence may be admitted under Rule 404(b) even if the defense presents no evidence. Admissibility of Rule 404(b) evidence for the prosecution is not tied to the credibility of defense witnesses. In contrast, questions may not be asked with respect to a defendant's prior acts under Rule 608(b) unless the defendant testifies, in which case no extrinsic evidence may be admitted to contradict a denial of the uncharged act. Similarly, evidence may be admitted under Rule 404(b) for the defendant even if it does not purport to challenge the credibility of a prosecution witness.

(2) As a logical corollary of principle (1), it is clear that impeachment under Rule 608(b) cannot occur unless and until the witness who is to be impeached testifies, whereas evidence admissible under Rule 404(b) need not await the testimony of any particular witness.

(3) Extrinsic evidence is admissible, and indeed necessary, to prove acts that are relevant and admissible under Rule 404(b), but is not admissible under Rule 608(b). When the witness denies the occurrence of a bad act offered to impeach the witness' character for veracity, the opponent must accept the denial -- extrinsic evidence cannot be offered to prove the act occurred.

(4) In some cases, a prior act by a defendant or another witness may be admissible under both Rule 404(b) and Rule 608(b) if the defendant or witness testifies, and in these cases the prosecutor or defense counsel seeking to elicit evidence of the act should be clear which Rule is relied upon.

(5) In some cases, a prior act is not initially admissible under either Rule 404(b) or Rule 608(b)(1), but it may become admissible because a party "opens the door" to proof of the act as a result of a suggestion made in a question or information volunteered in an answer.

FOOTNOTES:
(n1)Footnote 1. See, e.g., United States v. Keiser, 57 F.3d 847 (9th Cir. 1995) (character is "in issue" within the meaning of the Rule when "proof, or failure of proof, of the character trait by itself [would] actually satisfy an element of the charge, claim or defense").

(n2)Footnote 2. See, e.g., United States v. Tran Trong Cuong, 18 F.3d 1132 (4th Cir. 1994) (doctor charged with illegally prescribing drugs; it was error to allow the government to ask witnesses about the doctor's reputation in the community for being an easy source of drugs; this was character evidence, and while the prosecution is permitted to offer such evidence in rebuttal, in this case the defendant never offered evidence of his good character).

(n3)Footnote 3. See United States v. Smith, 230 F.3d 300 (7th Cir. 2000) (Rule 404(a) permits the accused to offer evidence of the victim's violent character in a self-defense case; however, Rule 405 limits the form of the evidence to reputation and opinion; therefore, evidence of specific acts of violence by the victim was properly excluded).

(n4)Footnote 4. United States v. Keiser, 57 F.3d 847, 854 (9th Cir. 1995) ("The rule does not contemplate that the character evidence will somehow reveal the defendant's state of mind at the time he acted in self-defense.").

(n5)Footnote 5. See the Advisory Committee Note to the amendment to Rule 404(a), to take effect on December 1, 2006 (noting that one of the purposes of the amendment is to clarify that Rule 412 takes precedence over Rule 404(a) in the case to which Rule 412 is applicable).

(n6)Footnote 6. United States v. Diaz, 961 F.2d 1417, 1419 (9th Cir. 1992) . Indeed, the defendant in the landmark case of Michelson was permitted to prove his "law-abiding" character trait, and the Court held that a defendant may introduce favorable testimony concerning "the general estimate of his character." 335 U.S. at 476 . See also United States v. Hewitt, 634 F.2d 277 (5th Cir. 1981) (reversible error to exclude character evidence offered to show that the defendant was a law-abiding citizen).

(n7)Footnote 7. See, e.g., United States v. Utter, 97 F.3d 509 (11th Cir. 1996) (where defendant was charged with burning his restaurant to collect insurance proceeds, it was error to admit evidence that the defendant had a dispute with a tenant and threatened to burn her belongings if she did not vacate the premises; this evidence was probative only to show the defendant's propensity to commit arson); United States v. Whittington, 26 F.3d 456 (4th Cir. 1994) (error committed where prosecution witness was allowed to testify that the defendant was a "dangerous woman," a "snake," and a "rat"); United States v. Wright, 901 F.2d 68 (7th Cir. 1990) (error to admit evidence of prior drug dealings where the only relevance of the evidence was to prove the defendant's propensity to commit the charged crime).

(n8)Footnote 8. See, e.g., United States v. Gaertner, 705 F.2d 210 (7th Cir. 1983) (where defendant tried to depict himself as a "clean-liver," he opened the door to negative character evidence concerning drug involvement).

(n9)Footnote 9. Compare United States v. Fountain, 768 F.2d 790 (7th Cir. 1985) :

> To deny that one intended harm on a particular occasion is not to claim a generally peaceable character. And it cannot be right that merely by claiming self-defense ... a defendant puts his whole character in issue; that would make mincemeat of the limitations in Rule 404(a) on the use of character evidence.

(n10)Footnote 10. See also United States v. McHorse, 179 F.3d 889 (10th Cir. 1999) (in a child molestation case, the defendant's son testified that the defendant "couldn't" do anything bad to anyone, and "would not do anything like" the conduct he was charged with; by this testimony, the defendant's son became a character witness, opening the door to negative character evidence).

(n11)Footnote 11. The character door can be opened during defense counsel's opening statement as well. See, e.g., United States v. Inserra, 34 F.3d 83 (2d Cir. 1994) (prosecution can offer character evidence in its case-in-chief, where defense counsel's opening statement made reference to the defendant's good character).

(n12)Footnote 12. See, e.g., United States v. Fountain, 768 F.2d 790 (7th Cir. 1985) (while the door was opened for evidence concerning the defendant's credibility, the prosecution's reference to the defendant's violent character trait was not responsive: "Violent men are not necessary liars, and indeed one class of violent men consists of those with an exaggerated sense of honor.").

(n13)Footnote 13. See United States v. Burks, 470 F.2d 432 (D.C. Cir. 1972) (evidence of the alleged victim's violent character, when known by the accused, was admissible "on the issue of whether or not the defendant reasonably feared he was in danger of imminent great bodily harm"); United States v. James, 169 F.3d 1210 (9th Cir. 1999) (in a self-defense case a defendant may show her state of mind at the time of an attack by testifying that she knew about a victim's past acts of violence).

(n14)Footnote 14. See United States v. Keiser, 57 F.3d 847 (9th Cir. 1995) (evidence of previous violent activity by the victim is inadmissible where the defendant was not aware of that activity).

(n15)Footnote 15. See also United States v. Winter, 663 F.2d 1120 (1st Cir. 1981) ("standing alone" instruction disapproved in all cases); Black v. United States, 309 F.2d 331 (8th Cir. 1962) (disapproved in all cases).

(n16)Footnote 16. See, e.g., United States v. Lewis, 482 F.2d 632 (D.C. Cir. 1973) ("standing alone" instruction required where the defendant offers pertinent evidence of his good character).

(n17)Footnote 17. United States v. John, 309 F.3d 298 (5th Cir. 2002) .

(n18)Footnote 18. See, e.g., United States v. Pujana-Mena, 949 F.2d 24, 28 n.2 (2d Cir. 1991) .

(n19)Footnote 19. See the instruction approved by the Third Circuit in United States v. Logan, 717 F.2d 84, 92 (3d Cir. 1983) :

> Where a defendant has offered evidence of good general reputation for truth and veracity, or honesty and integrity, or as a law-abiding citizen, the jury should consider such evidence along with all the other evidence in the case.
>
> Evidence of a defendant's reputation, inconsistent with those traits of character ordinarily involved in the commission of the crime charged may give rise to a reasonable doubt, since the jury may think it improbable that a person of good character in respect to those traits would commit such a crime.

Compare United States v. Pujana-Mena, 949 F.2d 24, 31 (2d Cir. 1991) ("standing alone" instruction is within Trial Judge's discretion so long as it is accompanied with a qualifying instruction that character evidence is to be considered together with the other evidence in the case; but "such a hybrid charge would be less than ideal in most cases" because it is "inherently confusing and contradictory").

(n20)Footnote 20. See, e.g., United States v. Burke, 781 F.2d 1234 (7th Cir. 1985) (while a "standing alone" instruction is not permitted in this Circuit, the Trial Court should tell the jurors that they may use character evidence "to help evaluate the credibility of the innocent explanation" that the defendants offer for their acts).

Federal Judicial Center Pattern Criminal Jury Instruction 51 suggests the following when the defendant introduces positive character evidence:

> You have heard the testimony of _____, who said that the defendant, _____, (has a good reputation for [e.g.: honesty] in the community where he lives and works) (in his opinion is an [honest] person). Along with all the other evidence you have heard, you may take into consideration what you believe about the defendant's [honesty] when you decide whether the government has proved, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant committed the crime. Evidence of the defendant's [honesty] alone may create a reasonable doubt whether the government proved that the defendant committed the crime.

(n21)Footnote 21. In a criminal case, for example, evidence of bad acts can be introduced to show identity through a distinctive modus operandi. See, e.g., United States v. Connelly, 874 F.2d 412 (7th Cir. 1989) (prior robbery admitted to prove identity due to distinctive modus operandi, in particular that "it is much more than coincidence that [duct] tape was used and applied in exactly the same manner as the prior crime"; similarities relied upon must be "sufficiently idiosyncratic to permit an inference of pattern for purposes of proof").

(n22)Footnote 22. Kuhns, The Propensity to Misunderstand the Character of Specific Act Evidence, 66 IOWA L. REV. 777 (1981), is an excellent analysis of the problem of differentiating between acts offered to prove propensity and acts offered for another purpose. See also United States v. Mejia-Uribe, 75 F.3d 395 (8th Cir. 1996) (error, though harmless, in admitting the defendant's fifteen-year-old conviction for another cocaine offense; the conviction was not admissible to prove intent because it was (1) too remote in time, and (2) involved a single sale, while the instant case involved a large scale, ongoing operation; the prior conviction "offered little, if any, probative value beyond the tendency to show that Uribe was the type of person with a propensity to commit this type of crime."); United States v. Jenkins, 345 F.3d 928 (6th Cir. 2003) (evidence of prior drug use is not admissible to prove intent to distribute drugs or knowledge about drug distribution; the acts, though both involving drugs, are too dissimilar to justify a not-for-character inference, leaving only evidence of propensity).

(n23)Footnote 23. Huddleston v. United States, 485 U.S. 681 (1988) (admissibility of bad act evidence is dependent not only on Rule 404(b) but also on "whether the danger of unfair prejudice outweighs the probative value of the evidence in view of the availability of other means of proof and other factors appropriate for making decisions of this kind under Rule 403").

(n24)Footnote 24. See, e.g., United States v. Merriweather, 78 F.3d 1070 (6th Cir. 1996) (emphasizing the need for a "close and careful" analysis of evidence of uncharged misconduct).

(n25)Footnote 25. See, e.g., United States v. Hogue, 827 F.2d 660 (10th Cir. 1987) , in which a conviction was reversed where no proper purpose was articulated or evident for bad acts evidence:

> In demonstrating the relevance of proffered other acts evidence, the Government must articulate precisely the evidentiary hypothesis by which a fact of consequence may be inferred from the evidence of other acts. There must be a clear and logical connection between the alleged earlier offense or misconduct and the case being tried.

(n26)Footnote 26. See also United States v. Harvey, 845 F.2d 760, 762 (8th Cir. 1988) :

> Initially, we observe the district court's laundry list approach to Rule 404(b) is of little help to us. Rather than making a broad reference which merely restates the components of the rule, the district court should specify which components of the rule form the basis of its ruling and why. To that end the court should require the party invoking the rule to explain clearly its 404(b) analysis.

See also Becker v. ARCO Chem. Co., 207 F.3d 176 (3d Cir. 2000) (reversible error in admitting bad acts evidence offered by the plaintiff; the plaintiff simply cited to Rule 404(b) without articulating the particular not-for-character purpose for which the bad acts evidence would be probative).

(n27)Footnote 27. See, e.g., United States v. Kalish, 690 F.2d 1144 (5th Cir. 1982) (defendant's alias admissible where he had used it to conceal his identity from the arresting officer).

(n28)Footnote 28. See also United States v. Shelton, 628 F.2d 54 (D.C. Cir. 1980) , where the Court reversed a conviction for assault on a federal officer because the defendant and a defense witness were cross-examined in a way that was intended to suggest that they "were members of the drug underworld involved in all sorts of skullduggery." The Court said that the conduct of the prosecutor "is not rendered more acceptable by the fact that it is less focused and more subtly addressed than traditional 'other crimes' evidence." Compare United States v. Delpit, 94 F.3d 1134 (8th Cir. 1996) (the defendant, whose nickname was "Monster," was not deprived of a fair trial when the jury heard wiretaps in which people referred to him by his nickname; unlike in Williams, there was no way for the jury to avoid hearing the defendant's nickname, because the wiretaps were critical evidence, and the defendant was referred to in the wiretaps almost exclusively as "Monster").

(n29)Footnote 29. See also United States v. Vargas, 583 F.2d 380 (7th Cir. 1978) :

> The fact that in this case the reference to other crimes came not from evidence but from the prosecutor's argument and his suggestions does not undermine the need for [Rule 404 and 403] protections but rather enhances it, since coming from the mouth of the representative of the United States, the statements carry much weight against the accused when they should properly carry none.

(n30)Footnote 30. See United States v. Hilgeford, 7 F.3d 1340 (7th Cir. 1993) :

> When deciding if the other acts evidence was admissible without reference to Rule 404(b), we must determine whether such evidence was intricately related to the facts of the case at hand. If we find the evidence is so related, the only limitation on the admission of such evidence is the balancing test required by Rule 403.

(n31)Footnote 31. See also United States v. Royal, 972 F.2d 643 (5th Cir. 1992) (holding that background information concerning a conspiracy is not extrinsic evidence because it was "inextricably intertwined" with the crime charged); United States v. Stouffer, 986 F.2d 916 (10th Cir. 1993) (evidence relevant to establish the existence of a criminal enterprise is not extrinsic evidence).

(n32)Footnote 32. A similarly problematic case is United States v. Simon, 767 F.2d 524 (8th Cir. 1985) (drug-related evidence was "closely and integrally related" to the charges concerning ownership and possession of firearms, even though no drug-related activity was included in the indictment).

(n33)Footnote 33. For an application of the "inextricably intertwined" test in accordance with our suggestion, see United States v. Stotts, 792 F.2d 1318 (5th Cir. 1986) (no error to compare handwriting exemplars with extortion letters written by the defendants; Rule 404(b) was not applicable because the extortion letters were specifically described in the indictment: "There was no crime not alleged in the indictment which was testified to by the handwriting expert."). See also United States v. Vizcarra-Martinez, 66 F.3d 1006 (9th Cir. 1995) (defendant charged with conspiring to possess and for possessing a listed chemical knowing it was to be used to manufacture methamphetamine; the government offered evidence that when the defendant was arrested, he was carrying a small amount of methamphetamine on his person; admission of this evidence was reversible error; the evidence was not "inextricably intertwined" with the charged crime, because possession of the substance was not "part of the transaction" with which the defendant was charged).

(n34)Footnote 34. See, e.g., United States v. Simon, 767 F.2d 524 (8th Cir. 1985) ("Rule 404(b) is a rule of inclusion rather than exclusion and admits evidence of other crimes or acts relevant to any issue in the trial, unless it tends to prove only criminal disposition.").

(n35)Footnote 35. See United States v. James, 169 F.3d 1210 (9th Cir. 1999) (bad acts evidence admissible for corroboration under Rule 404(b), even though corroboration is not listed as a permissible purpose); United States v. Copelin, 996 F.2d 379, 382 (D.C. Cir. 1993) ("Although it is not one of the listed permissible purposes, an attempt to impeach through contradiction is indisputably a legitimate reason to introduce evidence of other crimes or wrongs.").

(n36)Footnote 36. See also United States v. Stevens, 935 F.2d 1380 (3d Cir. 1991) (reversible error to exclude other crimes committed by a third party in the same area in which the defendant was alleged to have committed similar crimes); United States v. Cruz-Garcia, 344 F.3d 951 (9th Cir. 2003) (in a drug prosecution, the details of prior crimes of a prosecution witness were erroneously excluded; the prosecution's theory was that the witness was not smart enough to conduct the drug deals himself, and the bad act evidence would have rebutted that assertion). Compare United States v. Seals, 419 F.3d 600 (7th Cir. 2005) (no error to exclude reverse Rule 404(b) evidence, which was offered to show that other people robbed a bank using the same modus operandi used in the bank robbery charged; there was not enough similarity between the two robberies to indicate a modus operandi).

(n37)Footnote 37. See, e.g., West v. Love, 776 F.2d 170 (7th Cir. 1985) (inmate brought civil rights action alleging that he had been attacked by prison guards; evidence that, before the attack, the plaintiff had been placed in an isolated ward due to his violent temper, was not impermissible character evidence; rather, it was offered to show the reasonableness of the guards' assessment of the danger presented by the plaintiff).

(n38)Footnote 38. See also Eaves v. Penn, 587 F.2d 453 (10th Cir. 1978) (bad acts were admitted to show intent in a civil case involving a claim that a trustee breached a fiduciary duty).

(n39)Footnote 39. See, e.g., United States v. Hernandez, 84 F.3d 931 (7th Cir. 1996) (prior large-scale marijuana transactions held probative of intent to engage in large-scale cocaine and heroin transactions; Court noted that it had "oft held that when a defendant is charged with a specific intent crime, the government may present other acts to prove intent"). See also United States v. Robichaux, 995 F.2d 565 (5th Cir. 1993) (prior fraudulent transaction properly admitted to rebut the defendant's claim that he did not know "what was going on" in the transaction for which he was charged); United States v. Arambula-Ruiz, 987 F.2d 599 (9th Cir. 1993) (prior conviction for possession of heroin with intent to distribute is probative of knowledge where the defendant is charged with conspiring to possess heroin, and claims that he was an innocent bystander in the wrong place at the wrong time).

(n40)Footnote 40. Old Chief is discussed extensively in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 403, § 403.02[6]-[11].

(n41)Footnote 41. Some Circuits, even before Old Chief, had held that if the crime charged requires a showing of specific intent, the defendant can never keep prior bad acts out of the case by stipulating to intent. See, e.g., United States v. Kramer, 955 F.2d 479 (7th Cir. 1992) (Cudahy, J., concurring) ("the specific-intent exception of this circuit automatically precludes defendants charged with specific-intent crimes from ever removing intent as an issue in the case, even by stipulation").

(n42)Footnote 42. United States v. Crowder, 141 F.3d 1202 (D.C. Cir. 1998) .

(n43)Footnote 43. See, e.g, United States v. Grimmond, 137 F.3d 823 (4th Cir. 1998) (bad act evidence can be admitted to prove possession of a firearm, even if defendant offers a stipulation: "We believe that the Supreme Court intended its decision in Old Chief to be limited to stipulations involving a defendant's status as a convicted felon."); United States v. Hill, 249 F.3d 707 (8th Cir. 2001) (Old Chief requires the government to accept a stipulation only where the purpose of the government's evidence is to prove the element of prior conviction in a felon-firearm-possession case).

(n44)Footnote 44. See also United States v. Colon, 880 F.2d 650 (2d Cir. 1989) (the government alleged that Colon "steered" an undercover buyer to a drug source; Colon's defense was that he had merely responded to the buyer's request for drugs by innocently pointing to the general direction of drug activity down the street; Colon's counsel offered a stipulation that if the government proved that Colon knew the drug seller and was in fact directing the undercover buyer specifically to that drug seller, "then I will acknowledge that he intended to violate the federal narcotics law and intended to aid in the sale of drugs"; this stipulation was insufficient to take the issue of intent out of the case; the stipulation "conceded nothing" on the issue of intent, "as the government would still have had to prove that Colon meant to point the detective to [the drug seller] and not down the street").

(n45)Footnote 45. See the excellent discussion of this issue in United States v. Latney, 108 F.3d 1446, 1449-1450 (D.C. Cir. 1997) . The Court set forth two contrasting hypotheticals to illustrate the differing probative value of bad acts that occur after the conduct charged:

> Suppose the defendant is charged with committing a murder in 1990. The fatal bullet contains distinctive rifle markings. In 1993 the defendant is arrested for illegal possession of a pistol. When the pistol is test fired, the bullets contain the same markings. No one would suppose that because the defendant was found in possession of the pistol three years after the murder this evidence is not relevant. ...
>
> ... [P]roof that a defendant knew how to make crack cocaine in 1995 is strong evidence that he also knew this at the time of a 1996 offense charged in an indictment. The assumption that people do not forget forms the connection. On the other hand, proof that the defendant was making crack in 1997 is weaker evidence that he knew how to do so in 1996. Here the connection comes from an assumption, not only about memory, but about the acquisition of knowledge -- if he knew it then, he may have learned it before. The evidence is weaker because the link is weaker.

(n46)Footnote 46. See also United States v. Williams, 244 F.3d 1208 (10th Cir. 2001) ("Past arrests for drug possession are admissible under Rule 404(b) if certain clearly defined conditions are met, but the rule requires more than simply testimony that records indicate an arrest took place.").

(n47)Footnote 47. A slightly different four-pronged test is applied by some circuits. For example, the Court in United States v. Kern, 12 F.3d 122 (8th Cir. 1993) , set forth the following test for assessing bad acts evidence offered under Rule 404(b):

> To properly admit Rule 404(b) evidence for purposes other than to prove propensity, it must (1) be relevant to a material issue raised at trial, (2) be similar in kind and close in time to the crime charged, (3) be supported by sufficient evidence to support a finding by a jury that the defendant committed the other act, and (4) not have a prejudicial value that substantially outweighs its probative value.

We note that the second (similarity and proximity) factor is more significant to some uses -- e.g., modus operanti to prove identity -- than to others -- e.g., motive.

(n48)Footnote 48. See, e.g., United States v. Williams, 985 F.2d 634 (1st Cir. 1993) (evidence of prior murder was admitted solely for propensity; no attempt was made to link the murder to a plan of intimidation, which would have been relevant; nor was the murder admissible to show modus operandi, since the identity of the perpetrator of the charged crime was not in dispute); United States v. Bradley, 5 F.3d 1317 (9th Cir. 1993) (evidence of uncharged, unrelated murder is not probative of motive for attempted murder, where uncharged act occurred after the act charged; uncharged act only shows propensity).

(n49)Footnote 49. See, e.g., United States v. Leahy, 82 F.3d 624 (5th Cir. 1996) : The defendants, members of a construction firm, were charged with presenting false invoices to the Veterans' Administration. They objected to the introduction of other bad acts, specifically their submission of false invoices on construction projects for the Department of Defense. The Court held that the bad acts evidence was properly admitted to prove intent: "because the defendant had unlawful intent in the extrinsic offense, it is more likely that he had unlawful intent in the present offense." Nor was the probative value as to intent substantially outweighed by the risk of prejudice. Exclusion under Rule 403 "should occur only sparingly" and in this case the prejudice was minimized by a limiting instruction. See also

United States v. Clark, 988 F.2d 1459 (6th Cir. 1993) (where the defendant was charged with killing a witness to a crime the defendant committed, evidence of the underlying crime, even though highly prejudicial, was properly admitted under Rule 404(b) and Rule 403 to prove motive).

(n50)Footnote 50. See, e.g., United States v. Gordon, 987 F.2d 902 (2d Cir. 1993) (prior minor drug transaction is not sufficiently probative of the defendant's participation in a major drug conspiracy; none of the alleged coconspirators were participants in the prior transaction; evidence should have been excluded under Rule 403).

(n51)Footnote 51. See, e.g., United States v. Varoudakis, 233 F.3d 113 (1st Cir. 2000) (in an arson case, the Trial Judge erred in allowing the defendant's girlfriend to testify that the defendant burned a car in her presence; this evidence was offered not to prove character, but rather to show that the defendant and the witness once had a relationship of trust and confidence; however, the girlfriend testified at length about her close relationship to the defendant, so the government did not need the car fire evidence to establish that fact, which was "the only legitimate purpose of the evidence under 404(b)"); United States v. Merriweather, 78 F.3d 1070, 1078 (6th Cir. 1996) (uncharged drug transactions were probative of intent, but admitting them was an abuse of discretion, because the government "had a number of means available to it to prove Merriweather's specific intent to distribute and possess cocaine, without showing that he was involved in another, uncharged, drug conspiracy.").

(n52)Footnote 52. See, e.g., United States v. Turquitt, 557 F.2d 464 (5th Cir. 1977) (reversible error to admit document referring to other crimes in order to authenticate defendant's handwriting, since "other known and less prejudicial specimens would have achieved the same result").

(n53)Footnote 53. See, e.g., United States v. Robinson, 700 F.2d 205 (5th Cir. 1983) (requiring an on-the-record determination on the admissibility of uncharged misconduct evidence); United States v. Roberts, 88 F.3d 872 (10th Cir. 1996) (remanding for an explicit on-the-record determination); United States v. Nagib, 56 F.3d 798 (7th Cir. 1995) (same).

(n54)Footnote 54. See, e.g., United States v. Yopp, 577 F.2d 362 (6th Cir. 1978) (reversible error for failure to give instruction, upon request, that bad acts evidence could be used only as proof of intent, and not as a reflection on the defendant's character).

(n55)Footnote 55. See, e.g., United States v. Bosch, 584 F.2d 1113, 1124 (1st Cir. 1978) (reversible error where defense counsel introduced an exhibit that made reference to the defendant's prior crimes, and made no attempt to delete these crimes, which were not probative on any point in the case; the Trial Judge should have known that defense counsel was incompetent because it was clear, based on statements defense counsel made in conference, that he had never even given any thought to deleting the references to prior crimes before admitting the exhibit)

(n56)Footnote 56. See United States v. Spikes, 158 F.3d 913 (6th Cir. 1998) (error, though harmless, when Trial Judge instructed the jury that it could not use bad act evidence for "guilt of the crimes charged" but did not tell them what the evidence could be properly used for).

(n57)Footnote 57. See also United States v. Hardwell, 80 F.3d 1471 (10th Cir. 1996) (the Trial Judge's limiting instructions as to other act evidence "were deficient," because some instructions "listed all of the purposes listed by the rule, others listed all but identity or absence of mistake or accident, and one stated that the evidence could be used only as proof of knowledge"; the Court disapproved of "laundry list" limiting instructions, but found that the erroneous instructions were harmless).

(n58)Footnote 58. Federal Judicial Center Pattern Criminal Jury Instruction 50.

(n59)Footnote 59. See, e.g., United States v. Smith, 383 F.3d 700 (8th Cir. 2004) (good cause found for providing notice during trial, where the bad act became relevant only after trial testimony indicated that the defendant had used a certain alias that connected him to the uncharged misconduct); United States v. Lopez-Gutierrez, 83 F.3d 1235 (10th Cir. 1996) (good cause for failure to give pretrial notice was found because the government was not made aware of the evidence until an interview with one of its witnesses the night before trial; the defendant was notified the next day, and the witness was made available to the defense before the evidence was put before the jury).

(n60)Footnote 60. As to how specific the notice must be, see United States v. Jackson, 850 F. Supp. 1481 (D. Kan. 1994) (government's notice must be sufficiently clear so as "to permit pretrial resolution" of the admissibility of evidence of uncharged misconduct).

(n61)Footnote 61. United States v. Swinton, 75 F.3d 374 (8th Cir. 1996) (notice requirement not complied with when the government, after receiving a request for Rule 404(b) material, responded that its files were open and the Rule 404(b) evidence could be found in those files). Notably, however, the Swinton Court found that most of the evidence requested was not Rule 404(b) material in the first place -- rather, it was evidence concerning acts "inextricably intertwined" with the crime charged, rendering Rule 404(b) and its notice requirement inapplicable.

(n62)Footnote 62. United States v. Barnes, 49 F.3d 1144, 1149 (6th Cir. 1995) ("The request need not be in technical terms, but it must be such as to be, in an objective sense, reasonably understandable."). See also United States v. Tuesta-Toro, 29 F.3d 771 (1st Cir. 1994) (omnibus defense motion requesting "confessions, admissions, and statements that in any way exculpate, inculpate or refer to the defendant" was insufficiently specific to trigger the Rule 404(b) notice requirement; defense request "must be sufficiently clear and particular, in an objective sense, fairly to alert the prosecution that the defense is requesting pretrial notification").

(n63)Footnote 63. See, e.g., United States v. Gorman, 312 F.3d 1159 (10th Cir. 2002) (notice requirement not applicable because evidence proffered by the government was "intertwined" with the facts of the crime); United States v. Barnes, 49 F.3d 1144 (6th Cir. 1995) (while the government might have failed to provide sufficient notice, the disputed testimony was held not within the scope of the Rule, because it referred to acts that were "intrinsic" to the charged offense).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 404 RULE 404

1-404 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 404.03

404.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Rule 404(a) -- Character Evidence Generally

[a] Rule 404(a) -- Animals

Durst v. Newby, 685 F. Supp. 250 (S.D. Ga. 1988) : The Judge denied a summary judgment motion by a defendant whose tractor-trailer collided with a cow, ruling that evidence of the wanderlust of cows is not character evidence excluded by Rule 404.

[b] Rule 404(a) -- Character of Accomplice

United States v. Wright, 363 F.3d 237 (3d Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to transport stolen property, holding there was no error in the exclusion of evidence, offered to show the absence of a conspiracy, which tended to show the good character of an unindicted coconspirator. The Court held that the term "accused" in Rule 404(a)(1) denotes only a criminal defendant and was not intended to sweep more broadly.

United States v. Hart, 70 F.3d 854 (6th Cir. 1995) : The Court affirmed a former police chief's conviction for fraud in administering a secret fund, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that an accomplice had "conned" the FBI and the IRS in an unrelated criminal matter. Offered to support a claim that the accomplice had conned the defendant, the evidence was an impermissible attempt to show that the accomplice possessed a deceptive character and that he acted in conformity with that character in his dealings with the defendant.

[c] Rule 404(a) -- Character of Accused

[i] Rule 404(a) -- Background

United States v. Paccione, 949 F.2d 1183 (2d Cir. 1991) : In affirming RICO convictions, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in preventing a defendant from introducing evidence that his teenage son was born with cerebral palsy and he would never do anything to risk disabling himself from caring for the boy. The defendant had been allowed to present four character witnesses to his honesty and integrity, and testimony about the son, which had no bearing on those traits, could well influence the jury by sympathies having no bearing on the merits of the case. In United States v. Blackwell, n1 the Court ruled that a defendant may introduce evidence of a lack of prior convictions or arrests as background evidence rather than to prove good character, but that that the exclusion of such evidence in this case was harmless error.

United States v. Gillespie, 852 F.2d 475 (9th Cir. 1988) : The Court reversed a conviction for importing an alien for immoral purposes, ruling that a defendant did not open the door to character evidence by offering limited background testimony concerning his childhood, and that it was error for the prosecution to call an expert to testify to the characteristics of child molesters.

[ii] Rule 404(a) -- Character of Accused -- Cross-Examination of Character Witness

United States v. Bruguier, 161 F.3d 1145 (8th Cir. 1998) : Witnesses testified on behalf of a defendant charged with child abuse that he was a good father. The Court held there was no error when the government was permitted to ask on cross-examination whether the witnesses were aware that the family had been supervised for two years by Child Protective Services, as the question was relevant to determining the credibility of the witnesses' opinions. However, the government should have established its good-faith basis for asking the question outside the presence of the jury. Another character witness, the defendant's wife, was asked on cross-examination whether she thought "it is a good father to be arrested thirty-six times." Objection to the question was sustained, and the Court agreed that the question was improper (since arrests do not show that a crime was committed or even that there is reasonable cause to believe one was), but the defendant was not harmed in the circumstances.

United States v. McHorse, 179 F.3d 889 (10th Cir. 1999) : The defendant, charged with child sexual abuse, called his adult son, who testified that he knew his father "couldn't" do anything bad to anybody and "would not do anything like that." Affirming, the Court found no error in asking the son on cross-examination whether he was aware that his sister and half-sister had said the defendant had abused them from a young age. Regardless of the purpose for which the son was called as a witness, he became a witness to his father's good character, so the government was entitled under Rule 405(a) to demonstrate that he was not fully informed as to his father's character by inquiring into the son's knowledge of specific instances of the father's conduct. Furthermore, the evidence was admissible to rebut any misleading impression from the son's direct testimony that his father had never taken any inappropriate sexual actions with him or his brother.

[iii] Rule 404(a) -- Character of Accused -- Defense Evidence

In re Sealed Case, 352 F.3d 409 (D.C. Cir. 2003) : The Court held, in a prosecution of a conspiracy to illegally purchase firearms, that it was error (but harmless) to exclude evidence offered by the defense of the defendant's good reputation for honesty and truthfulness. Because the indictment charged the defendant with being part of a conspiracy in which he recruited eligible firearms purchasers to "knowingly make false and fictitious statements" in order to purchase firearms for him, and because the government's proof of the conspiracy made his truth and honesty a part of the charged conspiracy, the defendant was "invited ... to introduce character evidence for those traits." The Judge had ruled that the evidence would be admissible only if the defendant testified. Evidence of the defendant's good reputation for lawabidingness was properly admitted.

United States v. Smith, 46 F.3d 1223 (1st Cir. 1995) : The Court affirmed fraud convictions, holding it was error (but harmless) when the Trial Judge ruled that a defendant could not elicit evidence of his reputation for truth and veracity until he had taken the stand, as the character traits were pertinent to the offense charged. Reversing a conviction for possession of methaqualone in United States v. Angelini, n2 the Court said that the defendant should have been permitted to offer character evidence that he was "a law-abiding person," since such evidence showed a pertinent trait of character. The Court equated "pertinent" with "relevant."

United States v. MacDonald, 688 F.2d 224 (4th Cir. 1982) : In the prosecution of a former Army doctor charged with killing his wife and children, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the testimony of a forensic psychiatrist who would have testified that the defendant's personality configuration was inconsistent with an outrageous murder. Exclusion came after 13 lay witnesses had vouched for the defendant's nonviolent character.

United States v. Roberts, 887 F.2d 534 (5th Cir. 1989) : The Court held it was error, but harmless, to exclude testimony by a psychologist that the personality of a defendant charged with cocaine offenses was consistent with his claimed activity as a self-appointed vigilante. In United States v. Hewitt, n3 the Court held that a defendant always may offer evidence that he is a "law-abiding citizen" and is not limited to more specific character traits. In United States v. Jackson, n4 the Court held there was no error in barring evidence of a defendant's good character for truthfulness, since truthfulness "is not pertinent to the criminal charges of conspiracy to distribute heroin or possession of heroin."

United States v. Cylkouski, 556 F.2d 799 (6th Cir. 1977) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to facilitate an illegal gambling business. Discussing the relationship between Rules 404(a) and 608(a), the Court noted that the former Rule permits a criminal defendant (whether or not he testifies) to open the door to character evidence relating to substantive issues, while the latter permits a criminal defendant, like any other party, to rehabilitate any witness' credibility only after the witness is attacked. Thus, the defendant's credibility is treated like that of any other witness: only after he testifies and is impeached may it be rehabilitated. This case is a reminder of the importance of citing the correct evidentiary theory: defense counsel who cites Rule 608 as authority for offering character evidence faces that Rule's limitation on the use of the evidence, but the limitation can be avoided if Rule 404(a) can be utilized.

United States v. Staggs, 553 F.2d 1073 (7th Cir. 1977) : The defendant's conviction for assaulting a federal officer was reversed because a psychologist was not permitted to testify that the defendant was more likely to hurt himself than to direct his aggressions toward others. Because Rule 404(a) permits an accused to introduce evidence of a pertinent character trait and the relevant federal statute required the government to prove a subjective intent to commit an assault, it was error to rule the psychologist's testimony irrelevant.

United States v. Diaz, 961 F.2d 1417 (9th Cir. 1992) : In a prosecution for possession of cocaine with intent to distribute, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to preclude the defendant from asking his pastor about the defendant's "being prone to criminal conduct," as the inquiry was encompassed within permissible "law-abidingness." There was no error in precluding inquiry of his mother about his "being prone to large-scale drug dealing," as that specific propensity is not simply the converse of general "law-abidingness."

[iv] Rule 404(a) -- Character of Accused -- Demeanor Evidence

United States v. Cortez, 935 F.2d 135 (8th Cir. 1991) : To help the jury understand the defendant's in-court testimony and the events surrounding his arrest and interrogation, the defense offered a psychologist to testify that the defendant had mental and emotional disorders manifested in an "inability to recall certain facts" and a withdrawn demeanor. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the evidence, as it did not refer to a character trait encompassed by the Rule and it would not be helpful to the jury because those aspects of the defendant's personality would be readily apparent when he testified.

United States v. Schuler, 813 F.2d 978 (9th Cir. 1987) : In a prosecution for threatening the life of the President, the prosecutor referred during closing argument to the nontestifying defendant's courtroom conduct -- including laughing during testimony regarding his threats. Reversing, the Court held that the argument violated Rule 404(a) by "suggesting to the jury that Schuler's laughter was relevant apparently for the purpose of showing that he was of bad character because he considered the charges of threatening the life of the President to be a joke." One Judge dissented on the grounds that a defendant's courtroom demeanor is properly considered as evidence and that the laughter was evidence of mental state.

[v] Rule 404(a) -- Character of Accused -- Prosecution Evidence

United States v. Long, 328 F.3d 655 (D.C. Cir. 2003) : Affirming convictions for sexual offenses involving minors, the Court upheld the admission of testimony by an FBI agent concerning "the typology, identification, characteristics and strategies of a sexual offender, particularly preferential sex offenders, and the characteristics and behavior of child victims of sexual abuse." The Court rejected the contention that the testimony was inadmissible profile evidence, explaining that it was designed to aid the jury in understanding the modus operandi of preferential sex offenders, as well as to help rebut defenses of innocent intent and fabrication.

United States v. Vasquez, 267 F.3d 79 (2d Cir. 2001) : A witness in a prosecution for murder in aid of racketeering testified on direct about two violent confrontations he had with the defendant, one of which involved gunshots through an apartment's door after the witness had observed the defendant through the peephole. On cross-examination, defense counsel brought out that the witness went and got a gun although he had not seen a gun on the defendant, and suggested that the witness had started the shooting. On redirect, the witness explained that he got the gun because he knew the defendant's reputation for killing people. Affirming, the Court found that the government offered the testimony to rebut the impression created during cross-examination, not as character evidence that would be inadmissible under Rule 404(a).

United States v. Hans, 738 F.2d 88 (3d Cir. 1984) : Reversing a bank robbery conviction on another ground, the Court ruled that it was error for the prosecution to elicit evidence concerning the government's focusing on the defendant as a suspect because agents in Detroit thought he was a likely suspect. The Court said that this testimony tended to establish only that the defendant was a known bank robber and that it was highly prejudicial to the defendant.

United States v. Tran Trong Cuong, 18 F.3d 1132 (4th Cir. 1994) : Reversing a doctor's conviction for illegal distribution of controlled substances, the Court held it was error to permit the prosecutor to cross-examine a witness about the defendant's reputation for being an easy source of drugs, where the defendant had not offered any evidence of his good character.

United States v. Tomblin, 46 F.3d 1369 (5th Cir. 1995) : In a bribery and extortion prosecution, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to permit the prosecutor to question a defense witness, beyond the scope of direct examination, about the defendant's involvement with bankrupt restaurants. The questioning, the Court decided, did not relate to any issue other than the defendant's character, and the witness had not testified as a character witness.

Washington v. Hofbauer, 228 F.3d 689 (6th Cir. 2000) : The Court reversed the denial of habeas corpus relief where the prosecutor in a sexual abuse case had explicitly urged the jurors in closing argument to consider the petitioner's unseemly character when rendering their verdict. Although much of the character evidence had been introduced as part of a defense strategy and some was relevant as to why the victim had not promptly informed others of the petitioner's alleged acts, the prosecutor went far beyond the bounds of permitted conduct when presenting the evidence to the jury and articulating "perhaps the paradigm of the improper 'bad character' argument -- that the alleged criminal acts 'fit' the evidence of [the petitioner]'s character and lifestyle." Affirming a conviction for bank robbery in United States v. Andrea, n5 the Court stated that the deliberate injection into the record by government witnesses of information pertaining to a defendant's incarceration on a different charge is offensive to the fair administration of justice; in this case, however, the error was harmless.

United States v. Bonner, 302 F.3d 776 (7th Cir. 2002) : The defendant swindled a widow out of her VA benefit payments. Affirming his conviction for fraud, the Court held there was no plain error (and no abuse of discretion, had the defendant objected) when the prosecution asked about the defendant's reputation for truthfulness, honesty, and generosity. The defense opened the door to the prosecution's questioning by introducing evidence of the defendant's honesty and generosity, harping on the bonds of trust between the defendant and the widow and pointing out that he did things for her that no one else bothered to do. In United States v. Williams, 739 F.2d 297 (7th Cir. 1984) , the Court reversed a conviction for dealing in stolen motor vehicles on the ground that the government impermissibly elicited character evidence when a detective testified that he knew the defendant as "Fast Eddie."

United States v. Delpit, 94 F.3d 1134 (8th Cir. 1996) : Affirming a conviction arising out of drug activity and gang rivalry, the Court rejected the defendant's argument that repeated reference to his nickname (which unfortunately was "Monster") throughout the trial was tantamount to testimony about his character. Citing United States v. Williams, supra , the Court noted that "in some cases, the use of a defendant's irrelevant nickname to suggest his bad character or unsavory proclivities may be prejudicial." However, in this case "there was no way for the jury to avoid hearing Delpit's nickname," since he was referred to in admissible wiretapped conversations almost exclusively as "Monster."

United States v. Mendoza-Prado, 314 F.3d 1099 (9th Cir. 2002) : The defense in a drug-trafficking case claimed entrapment and the prosecution offered evidence that the defendant had admitted uncharged offenses, including theft, extortion, and assisting a prison escape. The Court noted that an entrapment defense puts predisposition in issue, character is an essential element when determining predisposition, and Rule 405(b) permits proof of specific instances of conduct when a trait of character is an essential element of a defense. However, bad acts are not relevant to prove predisposition unless they are similar to the charged crime. The Court found "little relationship" between the charged and uncharged offenses in this case, but it concluded that the defendant opened the door to the prosecution evidence by offering character evidence that he was a working man and a family man who worked hard, had a substantial legitimate income, was law-abiding, and was afraid to get involved in drugs. We question this result: the defendant's testimony that he was not interested in narcotics and was a working man is hardly contradicted by evidence of theft, extortion, and assisting escape. It is true that the testimony that the defendant was law-abiding could have been subjected to cross-examination, but Rule 405 adopts the familiar Michelson rule that the cross-examiner is bound by a character witness's answer and extrinsic evidence is not permitted. In United States v. Pavon, 561 F.2d 799 (9th Cir. 1977) , the Court affirmed cocaine distribution convictions despite the fact that the government used a probation officer as a witness, apparently to establish the amount of income that the defendant was legally earning. The Court indicated that direct evidence of the defendant's criminal record could not have been admitted under Rule 404(b) or under Rule 404(a)(1), so evidence pointing to an inference to the same effect should also have been excluded. Although it found the error to be harmless, the Court issued a stern warning for future cases.

[d] Rule 404(a) -- Character of Victim

[i] Rule 404(a) -- Civil Cases

Prior decisions permitting the circumstantial use of character evidence in civil cases are inconsistent with the 2006 amendment of the Rule. See the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 404.02[3].

[ii] Rule 404(a) -- Character of Victim -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Bailey, 834 F.2d 218 (1st Cir. 1987) : The Court held that a defendant convicted of corruptly endeavoring to influence a juror had no right to introduce evidence that, while serving on the jury, the juror spoke about the case to neighbors in violation of her oath. The Court rejected the defendant's analysis of the juror as a victim whose character could be explored by the defense, and found that the neighbor's testimony involved specific instances of extrinsic conduct that were barred under Rule 608.

United States v. Schatzle, 901 F.2d 252 (2d Cir. 1990) : In the prosecution of a Secret Service agent for willfully depriving a citizen of his constitutional rights by subjecting him to excessive force, the defendant was permitted to prove that the victim had previously been arrested after an altercation with a police officer and, in order to rebut the victim's claim that failure to mention it on a bar application was inadvertent, to have the officer testify about the victim's attempt to have the charges dropped so as not to prejudice his bar application; however, the officer was not permitted to give details of the incident. The Court affirmed, holding that although Rule 404(a)(2) permits introduction of pertinent traits of a victim's character, it was no abuse of discretion under Rule 403 to exclude evidence posing a genuine risk of focusing the jury upon the wrong event.

United States v. Smith, 230 F.3d 300 (7th Cir. 2000) : The defendant was charged with retaliating against a witness who had given evidence against him in another proceeding by pushing the witness during a barroom encounter. At trial, the defense was precluded from offering evidence of the witness' prior misdemeanor conviction for domestic battery. Affirming, the Court held that the conviction was probative of the witness' character for violence, thus satisfying Rule 404(a)(2), but that it was evidence of a specific act, rather than reputation or opinion as required by Rule 405(a). The Court held that the victim's character for violence is not an essential element of a self-defense claim, so specific acts evidence is not admissible under Rule 405(b). In United States v. Martinez, 988 F.2d 685 (7th Cir. 1993) , the Court affirmed convictions for murder and assault in a prison, holding that even if some evidence of the victims' past violent acts and racism was theoretically relevant to prove self-defense, exclusion was not prejudicial in this case, as there could not have been a rational finding of self-defense.

United States v. Emeron Taken Alive, 262 F.3d 711 (8th Cir. 2001) : Reversing a conviction for assaulting a federal officer, the Court held that it was error to exclude evidence that the officer had a reputation for aggression and violence. Because this evidence tended to show that the officer was the first aggressor, it was critical to the defendant's self-defense claim.

United States v. Geston, 299 F.3d 1130 (9th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed a police officer's convictions for unreasonable use of force and assault with a dangerous weapon. It held that the Trial Judge properly excluded evidence that the victim was previously involved in two violent incidents after drinking alcohol, since specific instances of conduct are not admissible to prove the character of a victim. In United States v. Keiser, 57 F.3d 847 (9th Cir. 1995) , the Court affirmed an assault conviction, finding it was proper to exclude specific act evidence of the victim's character, which had been offered by the defendant to prove that he was acting in response to an attack by the victim. The Court observed that the defendant had the right under Rule 404(a)(2) to offer evidence to show that the alleged victim was a violent and angry person, and that because the evidence is not limited to its bearing on the defendant's state of mind, his personal knowledge of a victim's propensity is not a prerequisite to its admissibility. The Court concluded, however, that the victim's character is not an essential element of a self-defense claim; therefore, under the terms of Rule 405, character evidence of the victim must be limited to reputation and opinion testimony.

United States v. Yazzie, 188 F.3d 1178 (10th Cir. 1999) : Reversing murder convictions for inadequate instructions, the Court upheld rulings that permitted the defense to introduce evidence of the deceased's reputation for violence and permitted the woman with whom he lived to testify that the deceased routinely picked fights, manipulated and intimidated people, and carried a gun. It also upheld the introduction of rebuttal testimony by the deceased's mother to the effect that her son was in a good state of mind when she last spoke to him. The Court observed that "[a]lthough it is difficult to imagine any other purpose for calling a victim's mother to testify about her knowledge of her son's 'state of mind' than to backdoor some expression of his character," Rule 404(a)(2) permits the prosecution to offer rebuttal character evidence. In United States v. Bautista, 145 F.3d 1140 (10th Cir. 1998) , the Court affirmed a conviction for murder, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding defense evidence that the victim had made a homosexual pass at a friend of the defendant. The defendant was properly permitted to testify that he feared the victim's aggressive sexual advances, but evidence of the victim's pertinent traits of character could be proved only through reputation or opinion evidence.

[e] Rule 404(a) -- Civil Cases

Neuren v. Adduci, Mastriani, Meeks & Schill, 43 F.3d 1507 (D.C. Cir. 1995) : In a female lawyer's Title VII action against a law firm, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit evidence that the plaintiff had had difficulty in getting along with staff and in meeting deadlines at a firm where she had worked previously. The evidence went only to her character and did not fall within any of the Rule 404 exceptions; neither did it properly impeach her by showing character for untruthfulness or by contradicting her explanation of why she left the prior firm. In Rauh v. Coyne, 744 F. Supp. 1181 (D.D.C. 1990) , an action by a woman alleging sex and marital status discrimination in her discharge from employment, the Judge held she would not be permitted to give evidence of her performance at prior and subsequent jobs. Even though it would have a slight probative value on her performance for the defendants, it would be inadmissible character evidence vastly complicating the trial of the case.

Moorhead v. Mitsubishi Aircraft Int'l, Inc., 828 F.2d 278 (5th Cir. 1987) : In a suit by survivors of passengers killed in an airplane crash, the Court held it was error to admit evidence of the pilot's records from a flight school refresher course and testimony of one of the instructors. This was inadmissible character evidence, but its admission was harmless since the Judge did not rely upon it in making findings in a bench trial.

Ginter v. Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co., 576 F. Supp. 627 (E.D. Ky. 1984) : In an action to recover on a life insurance policy, the company claimed that the deceased omitted material facts when he applied for insurance. The Court ruled in limine that the plaintiff could not offer testimony of witnesses "that the deceased was a man of good character who would be unlikely to submit a fraudulent or erroneous application," since "it is the intention of Rule 404(a) to exclude evidence of a character trait in civil cases, except where character itself is an element of the claim or defense, as in cases involving defamation."

McCluney v. Jos. Schlitz Brewing Co., 728 F.2d 924 (7th Cir. 1984) : The plaintiff was fired after he threatened to resign if the secretary he had in North Carolina was not transferred to his new assignment in Wisconsin. In his civil rights employment action he claimed he was fired because he opposed the defendant's transfer policy on the ground that it discriminated against women. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court held that evidence concerning other alleged discrimination against women and the plaintiff's sincere and honest concern for female employees was properly excluded as an attempt to establish the plaintiff's good character. If offered under Rule 404(b), the evidence would have consumed far too much time in light of its limited probative value.

Blake v. Cich, 79 F.R.D. 398 (D. Minn. 1978) : Denying a new trial motion in a civil rights action against police officers, the District Court noted that character evidence proffered by plaintiffs to prove their own actions could not properly have been admitted because character evidence cannot be used circumstantially in a civil case.

Gates v. Rivera, 993 F.2d 697 (9th Cir. 1993) : In a civil rights action against a police officer for using excessive force, the Court held it was harmless error for the defendant to testify that in his 16 and a half years as a police officer, he had never shot anyone. The only issue in the case was whether the force used was excessive, not the officer's intent. In Palmerin v. Riverside, n6 the Court held it was not error, in a civil rights case alleging that police officers used excessive force, to admit the plaintiffs' guilty pleas that admitted that they had used excessive force against the officers. The pleas were not character evidence, but were relevant to an assessment of the propriety of the officers' response to the plaintiffs' actions. In Cohn v. Papke, n7 a civil rights action brought against police officers who arrested the plaintiff and charged him with soliciting a homosexual act, the Court found that it was reversible error to have permitted an inquiry into whether the plaintiff was bisexual. The Court found that this was impermissible under Rule 404 and also that it was too prejudicial to be permitted under Rule 403.

Rocky Mountain Helicopters, Inc. v. Bell Helicopters Textron, 805 F.2d 907 (10th Cir. 1986) : In an action by a helicopter buyer and its insurer against a manufacturer, the Court affirmed a judgment that the buyer and the seller were each negligent, holding there was no error in excluding evidence that the buyer had been warned that the pilot of its helicopter might be dangerous and that the pilot overloaded helicopters. Since the buyer stipulated that its helicopter was overloaded at the time of the crash, the Court reasoned that the Trial Judge properly determined that the excluded evidence might have been viewed as character evidence by the jury and thus misused.

[f] Rule 404(a) -- Jury Instructions

United States v. Pujana-Mena, 949 F.2d 24 (2d Cir. 1991) : Resolving apparently contradictory Circuit precedent and adopting the majority view, the Court held that under Rule 404(a)(1) the defendant may introduce evidence of good character to rebut an inference of guilt, but he is not entitled to an instruction that such evidence "standing alone" may be sufficient to create a reasonable doubt.

United States v. John, 309 F.3d 298 (5th Cir. 2002) : The Court reversed a conviction for sexual contact with a minor because the Trial Judge refused to instruct the jury that the defendant's evidence of good character should be considered and that character evidence "may give rise to a reasonable doubt, since you may think it improbable that a person of good character in respect to those traits would commit such a crime." The Court noted that the defendant "offered a host of admissible character evidence," that his good character was a central part of his defense that he did not commit the crime, and that the case boiled down to a credibility contest between the defendant and the victim.

United States v. Borders, 693 F.2d 1318 (11th Cir. 1982) : In the course of affirming a lawyer's conviction for involvement in a scheme to bribe a Federal Judge, the Court held that the jury was properly instructed to consider defense character evidence along with, not after, the other evidence in the case.

[g] Rule 404(a) -- Pertinent Traits

United States v. Nazzaro, 889 F.2d 1158 (1st Cir. 1989) : In a mail fraud conspiracy prosecution, the Court held there was no error in excluding evidence of commendations received by the defendant police officer because, even if they were character evidence, the traits of bravery, attention to duty, and community spirit they purported to show were not pertinent to the crimes of which he was accused.

United States v. Jackson, 588 F.2d 1046 (5th Cir. 1979) : The Court held there was no error in barring evidence of a defendant's good character for truthfulness, since truthfulness "is not pertinent to the criminal charges of conspiracy to distribute heroin or possession of heroin."

[h] Rule 404(a) -- Reputation Relevant to Another's State of Mind

United States v. Certain Real Prop. Known as 890 Noyac Rd., 945 F.2d 1252 (2d Cir. 1991) : In reversing an order of forfeiture against a mother whose son allegedly used the property for drug dealing, the Court noted that the son's reputation as a supplier of drugs was relevant to the mother's knowledge. Because the factual issue involved the son's reputation rather than his character, Rules 404 and 405 were inapplicable.

[i] Rule 404(a) -- Witness' Character

United States v. Lanza, 790 F.2d 1015 (2d Cir. 1986) : In a prosecution charging three defendants with wire fraud in a scheme to stage a fraudulent burglary at a jewelry store owned by the key prosecution witness, the Trial Judge prevented the defense from examining the witness concerning various loans and debts. The Court affirmed, finding that these were not bad acts under Rule 608(b), and that the evidence was not admissible under Rule 404(a) to show that the witness was the kind of person who borrowed money and did not repay it.

United States v. Bocra, 623 F.2d 281 (3d Cir. 1980) : The Court held that a defendant who wanted to ask an IRS agent questions about the agent's soliciting bribes in other tax cases to support his claim that the agent entrapped him was seeking to elicit only bad character evidence that was inadmissible.

[2] Rule 404(b) -- Other CRIMES, WRONGS, Or Acts

[a] Rule 404(b) -- Ability or Opportunity

United States v. Scott, 270 F.3d 30 (1st Cir. 2001) : The Court affirmed convictions for false claims and bank fraud, holding that testimony that the defendant had been an inmate in a halfway house was relevant to show that he had the opportunity to make withdrawals from an ATM near the house. In United States v. Carty, 993 F.2d 1005 (1st Cir. 1993) , the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the defendant's prior purchase of cocaine, as it was probative of his opportunity to commit the charged offense of possession with intent to distribute. The dissenting Judge believed proof of the prior purchase was only improper propensity evidence, and even though the defendant was acquitted of the possession offense, the evidence could have led the jury to believe him a drug dealer and thus guilty of the charged firearms offenses. See also United States v. Barrett n8(reversing conviction on other grounds, Court approved introduction of evidence that appellant had knowledge of the workings of alarm systems, to show his ability to commit crimes related to stolen postage stamps).

United States v. Robinson, 560 F.2d 507 (2d Cir. 1977) (en banc): The Court referred to the "remarkable coincidence" of possession of a .38 caliber gun some weeks after the charged bank robbery and held that it was admissible to corroborate the government's chief witness and to show an opportunity to commit the robbery. See also United States v. Sliker n9(in a bank fraud prosecution, testimony about a similar attempt to defraud explained the defendant's ability to get phony checks).

United States v. Echeverri, 854 F.2d 638 (3d Cir. 1988) : The Court held that a government witness' testimony that he had encountered the defendant one year before the charged conspiracy, when both went to a location to purchase substantial quantities of cocaine, was admissible to prove that the defendant had a source of such cocaine.

United States v. Jobson, 102 F.3d 214 (6th Cir. 1996) : The defendant was convicted of being a felon in possession of an assault weapon. The Court held that evidence of his membership in a gang could be properly admitted to show opportunity, because gang membership "undoubtedly made it easier and more likely for him to possess an assault rifle than for the average citizen." However, the conviction was reversed because of failure to give an effective limiting instruction on the use of the evidence of gang membership.

United States v. Mansoori, 304 F.3d 635 (7th Cir. 2002) : Affirming convictions for drug trafficking, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding the forfeiture of assets and the value of jewelry found in a defendant's home at the time of a prior narcotics offense, to which he had pleaded guilty. The evidence tended to demonstrate the defendant's ability to engage in substantial drug transactions involving large amounts of money, and the jury was properly instructed as to the limited purposes for which it was offered. In United States v. Yusufu, 63 F.3d 505 (7th Cir. 1995) , the Court affirmed a fraud conviction, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the defendant had been incarcerated on three occasions, since the defendant's domicile during specific periods of time was relevant to his opportunity to execute parts of the scheme, to explain chronological voids in the account of events, and to trace his identity. Affirming convictions for crimes arising out of a shop robbery in United States v. Covelli, n10 the Court upheld the admission of testimony that one of the defendants had previously been in possession of a small caliber pistol, saying that "evidence of prior possession of a weapon can be used to prove opportunity and identification even where it cannot be directly identified as the weapon used in the crime."

United States v. Conrad, 320 F.3d 851 (8th Cir. 2003) : The defendant was charged with unlawful possession of a sawed-off shotgun found in an apartment, after the renter of the apartment said the gun was the defendant's. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting real evidence seized from the apartment that was connected with the defendant, including drug paraphernalia, since it tended to show possession and control of the apartment. The Court did express "serious reservations about whether possession of drug paraphernalia without evidence of drug trafficking is admissible to show possession of an illegal weapon." In United States v. Heidebur, 122 F.3d 577 (8th Cir. 1997) , the Court reversed the defendant's conviction for knowingly possessing sexually explicit photographs of his minor stepdaughter because evidence that the defendant had sexual contact with his stepdaughter was erroneously admitted. Rejecting the argument that the evidence was admissible to prove the defendant's "opportunity," the Court noted that "[o]pportunity was hardly an issue in this case: the defendant lived in the same house with the victim, was in contact with her every day, and was often home alone with her." Consequently, the probative value of the uncharged misconduct evidence in proving opportunity was substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect.

United States v. Green, 648 F.2d 587 (9th Cir. 1981) : The Court approved the introduction of evidence that the appellants were involved in certain past drug transactions on the ground that it established an opportunity for them to obstruct justice by attempting to frame others. Trial Judges were reminded, however, that they must carefully restrict the other crimes evidence to that which actually is probative and that they must be concerned about the prejudicial effect of other crimes evidence.

United States v. Garcia, 880 F.2d 1277 (11th Cir. 1989) (per curiam): In a prosecution for making false statements on a loan application, a former employee had been permitted to testify that, as a joke, the defendant had signed the employee's name to a paper purporting to sell the employee's apartment to the defendant and had then ripped up the paper. Affirming, the Court said the evidence was relevant to demonstrate the defendant's ability to prepare documents with faked signatures, it did not tend to show bad character, and the defendant was not prejudiced by proof of his tendency to make jokes.

[b] Rule404(b) -- Accident or Mistake

[i] RULE 404(b) -- Civil Cases

Hynes v. Coughlin, 79 F.3d 285 (2d Cir. 1996) : In an inmate's § 1983 action against prison guards, the Court held that although the inmate's disciplinary record might have been properly admitted had he argued that he had struck a guard reflexively and by accident, it was reversible error to admit the record where the plaintiff denied having struck the officer at all and did not raise any issue of his intent, and the defendants repeatedly argued that the plaintiff's violent character tended to show he was the aggressor.

Westfield Ins. Co. v. Harris, 134 F.3d 608 (4th Cir. 1998) : In a declaratory judgment action by an insurer disclaiming liability on the ground that a fire that destroyed the insured's home had been deliberately set, the Trial Judge granted a motion in limine excluding evidence of six prior house-fire claims and one truck-fire claim in which the insured had been involved. Reversing a judgment for the insured, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to exclude the evidence. It was particularly relevant not only because of the "doctrine of chances," but also because of the striking similarities among the incidents. The Judge had erred in improperly treating the high probative value of the evidence as making it "prejudicial" under Rule 403.

Dial v. Travelers Indem. Co., 780 F.2d 520 (5th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed a judgment against insureds suing to collect on a fire insurance policy on their house. It upheld admission of evidence that the plaintiffs had been burned out of their previous home and that after the fire in this case two properties they occupied had burned. The Court applied the same test it uses in criminal cases to conclude that the evidence was relevant since "the essential issue is the difference between an accident and an intended act."

King v. Ahrens, 16 F.3d 265 (8th Cir. 1994) : In a medical malpractice case, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that the defendant's medical license had been suspended eight years earlier, as any probative value the evidence had on the absence of mistake in failing to note critical information on the medical chart and on the doctor's credibility was substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect, given the remoteness in time and the dissimilarity between the incidents.

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Accident or Mistake -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Linares, 367 F.3d 941 (D.C. Cir. 2004) : Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit testimony from a police officer that four-and-a-half years before the charged events she had arrested the defendant after seeing him drop a loaded handgun onto the ground. Because there was eyewitness testimony that the defendant was holding a gun in his hand and firing it, no reasonable argument could be made that his possession was unknowing or accidental, so the officer's testimony served only as impermissible propensity evidence.

United States v. Houle, 237 F.3d 71 (1st Cir. 2001) : The defendant was charged in a cocaine conspiracy arising from activities of a motorcycle club, which had been infiltrated by an informant who assisted the government in setting up a sham cocaine deal for which the defendant provided security. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that a few days after providing security for the cocaine deal the defendant provided security for the same government agent while he purportedly collected a gambling debt. The evidence was relevant to prove intent and absence of mistake.

United States v. Livoti, 196 F.3d 322 (2d Cir. 1999) : Affirming a police officer's conviction for violating the civil rights of an arrestee by putting him in a choke hold and causing his death, the Court held that evidence that the defendant had choked another arrestee in the past was properly admitted to rebut the defendant's assertion that he choked the victim in this case accidentally.

United States v. Naylor, 705 F.2d 110 (4th Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed convictions for transporting a stolen car and other offenses, noting there was no error in an in limine ruling that a prior conviction for attempting to steal a car would be admitted if the defendant testified. The Court found that the Trial Judge relied on Rule 404, not Rule 609, and that the evidence was admissible to prove absence of mistake. In United States v. Greenwood, n11 the Court affirmed a defendant's convictions for submitting false vouchers to his employer, the FBI. It held that two prior acts of bank loan misstatements and meal reimbursement cover-up were properly admitted to prove the absence of mistake.

United States v. Hernandez-Guevara, 162 F.3d 863 (5th Cir. 1998) : The defendant was arrested after he was observed on several occasions following a truck that was found to carry undocumented aliens. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the defendant had previously engaged in smuggling aliens, since it tended to rebut the argument that the defendant was simply in the wrong place at the wrong time when he was arrested. In United States v. Powell, 124 F.3d 655 (5th Cir. 1997) , the Court affirmed a conviction for evading fuel excise taxes, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence about the defendant spending large sums of money in topless clubs and a photograph of him posing in front of a car trunk filled with a large amount of cash. The evidence rebutted his argument that his tax evasion happened by accident or mistake, by showing that he was reaping the benefits and supporting an extravagant lifestyle.

United States v. Leight, 818 F.2d 1297 (7th Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed a mother's conviction for murdering her infant son, finding no error in admitting evidence of injuries suffered by two other of the defendant's children to prove that the death was not an accident. See also United States v. Wormick n12(evidence of prior falsification of records properly admitted to prove the absence of mistake).

United States v. Wonderly, 70 F.3d 1020 (8th Cir. 1995) : The defendant was charged with defrauding five people by promising high-yield, but virtually risk-free, investment opportunities. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion when two witnesses were permitted to testify that they invested money with the defendant after the dates charged in the indictment and never saw the money again. The evidence tended to rebut a defense of mistake, since the defendant's claim that she was merely an innocent messenger for another was belied by her continuing to seek out other investors and make the same promises even after the first five investors lost all their money. In United States v. Shannon, n13 the Court held that other instances in which currency reports were not filed were admissible to negate lack of mistake with respect to the defendant's actions.

United States v. Ogles, 406 F.3d 586 (9th Cir. 2005) , adopted in part, vacated in part, 440 F.3d 1095 (9th Cir. 2006) (en Banc) : The defendant was convicted for transferring a weapon at a gun show outside the state in which he was licensed. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant transferred other weapons in a similar manner at the same gun show, as it tended to diminish the likelihood that the charged transfer was a mistake or was made through inadvertence. In United States v. Harris, 185 F.3d 999 (9th Cir. 1999) , the Court affirmed a conviction for embezzling from an ERISA pension plan, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant had misappropriated money from several limited partnerships of which he was the general partner. Both the charged and uncharged situations involved breach of fiduciary duty, and the evidence of stealing from partnerships tended to rebut the defendant's claim that he took the pension fund money only because he did not understand the technicalities of his ERISA responsibilities. In People of Terr. of Guam v. Camacho, n14 a schoolbus driver was convicted for official misconduct in pinching a student's buttocks. The Court held (2-1) that there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of other incidents of sexual misconduct by the defendant against students, as it was probative on whether the charged contact was accidental. In United States v. Boise, n15 the Court affirmed a conviction for murder of a six-week-old child, holding that evidence of the victim's prior injuries when the defendant was the primary caretaker and of the victim's suffering from battered-child syndrome was properly admitted as evidence of intent and of the absence of accident.

United States v. Simpson, 152 F.3d 1241 (10th Cir. 1998) : In a trial for receiving child pornography over the Internet, the government introduced other images of child pornography on the defendant's computer at the time of his arrest besides those for which he was charged. The Court found no abuse of discretion, since the evidence tended to show that his possession of pornographic images was not an accident or mistake and that he had knowledge of the nature of the material he was receiving. In United States v. Cummings, n16 the Court affirmed a conviction for selling a stolen cab portion of a tractor-trailer, finding that evidence that the defendant was involved in a pattern or practice of dealing in stolen trucks and parts was admissible to prove intent and the absence of mistake.

[c] Rule404(b) -- Acquittals

Dowling v. United States, 493 U.S. 342 (1990) , aff'g 855 F.2d 114 (3d Cir. 1988) : To identify the perpetrator in a bank robbery case, the government offered evidence that the defendant had committed a house robbery two weeks later for which he had been charged and acquitted. The Court of Appeals held that the error in admitting the evidence was harmless; the Supreme Court held that there was no constitutional error. The Supreme Court's analysis is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 404.02[19].

United States v. Blyden, 964 F.2d 1375 (3d Cir. 1992) : The Court reversed a ruling in limine that evidence of an alleged assault for which the defendants had previously been acquitted could not be introduced in a prosecution for other offenses arising out of the same incident. The evidence was essential to the charge of gun possession during a crime of violence, so it was not "other crime" evidence and it had great probative value. Any argument that it would be prejudicial essentially restated the double jeopardy and collateral estoppel claims previously rejected by the Court. It was, therefore, error to exclude the evidence on the possession count; rulings with respect to other counts for which the evidence was not essential must await the trial context.

United States v. Carney, 387 F.3d 436 (6th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed convictions for falsifying paperwork in connection with firearms sales, holding that evidence of uncharged firearms transactions was properly admitted to prove that the defendants actually knew the true purchaser of the firearms that they sold in the transactions at issue in the case. The Court ruled that the fact that some acts were the subject of acquittal in a prior criminal trial did not bar their use as Rule 404(b) evidence. The proof of uncharged misconduct "must merely be sufficiently compelling such that the jury can conclude that the act occurred and that the defendant was the actor."

United States v. Hazelett, 32 F.3d 1313 (8th Cir. 1994) : The Court reversed a conviction for possessing cocaine with intent to distribute, but it found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the defendant had previously been arrested for possession of seven ounces of crack cocaine. Even though his conviction for the prior offense was overturned for insufficient evidence, the burden of proof under Rule 404(b) is significantly less stringent than the "beyond a reasonable doubt" standard required for conviction, so the holding that there was insufficient proof on the criminal charge did not preclude a finding by a preponderance that he was involved in the prior acts.

United States v. Gutierrez, 696 F.2d 753 (10th Cir. 1982) : The Court affirmed bank robbery convictions, finding that the Trial Judge properly admitted evidence of a second bank robbery involving the two defendants. The Court said that the crime charged and the other crime possessed "signature quality" and were therefore proper evidence, even though one of the defendants had been acquitted on the other charge.

[d] Rule 404(b) -- Acts Charged

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Acts Charged -- Acts Inextricably Interwoven, Intrinsic, or Part of a Single Criminal Episode

[A] Rule 404(b) -- Drug Cases

United States v. Badru, 97 F.3d 1471 (D.C. Cir. 1996) : In a prosecution for conspiracy to distribute heroin, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendants had smuggled heroin from Nigeria to the United States through couriers during the relevant time period of the indictment. The smuggling evidence was "intrinsic" evidence not regulated by Rule 404(b), since the defendants "had to obtain heroin from a source before they could distribute it."

United States v. McGuire, 389 F.3d 225 (1st Cir. 2004) , vacated on other grounds, 544 U.S. 946 (2005) : In a drug conspiracy case, the defendant objected to evidence that he had threatened a woman with a gun because he believed that the woman and her boyfriend had tried to rob him, and he also objected to evidence that he broke into another person's house to retrieve drugs that were stolen from him. Affirming, the Court held that this evidence was not Rule 404(b) evidence. These episodes occurred during the time of the charged drug conspiracy, and demonstrated an intent to protect the conspiracy. The probative value of this evidence in proving the conspiracy was not substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect. In United States v. Taylor, 284 F.3d 95 (1st Cir. 2002) , the court affirmed crack cocaine convictions, holding that testimony by a police informant that he saw a gun in the defendant's waistband during a drug transaction was "part and parcel" of the charged transactions and not "other crime" evidence. The Court noted that any potential prejudice arising from the gun evidence was diminished by a limiting instruction.

United States v. Birbal, 62 F.3d 456 (2d Cir. 1995) : Although the Court reversed heroin convictions on other grounds, it held that the prosecutor was properly permitted to elicit testimony concerning a drug user's death, as it was "inextricably intertwined" with the crime charged, narcotics distribution. In United States v. Levy, n17 the Court reversed a conviction for distribution of heroin, finding it was error to admit evidence concerning a "sample transaction" in which the defendant supplied heroin to an informant earlier in the day on which he was charged with distribution. The Court reasoned that the words "inextricably intertwined" are not always applicable to transactions that are related to one another. It was error to admit the evidence of the other transaction without considering the purpose of its admission and weighing its potential prejudicial effect against its probative value.

United States v. Sumler, 294 F.3d 579 (3d Cir. 2002) : Affirming convictions for conspiracy to distribute cocaine base and use of a firearm, the Court found no error in the admission of evidence that the defendant pointed a gun at individuals on three occasions during disagreements over the conduct of drug trafficking at a crack house. The Court found that these incidents were conduct connected with and occurring during the conspiracy. In United States v. Adams, n18 the Court held that weapons were properly introduced to show the scale of the charged narcotics conspiracy and the type of protection the defendants thought they needed.

United States v. Chin, 83 F.3d 83 (4th Cir. 1996) : The Court held in a drug trafficking case that the defendant's mention of murder-for-hire in the course of a recorded conversation setting up a heroin sale was an intrinsic part of the charged drug deal, it was not admitted solely to demonstrate the defendant's bad character, and its prejudicial effect did not outweigh its probative value in showing the extent to which the defendant indicated he would go to ensure that the drug deal went smoothly.

United States v. Morgan, 117 F.3d 849 (5th Cir. 1997) : Affirming convictions for drug-related offenses, the Court found no error in the admission of testimony by one of the undercover officers that when he bought drugs from the defendants, one of them held a shotgun to his head. This evidence was not extrinsic to the drug crimes charged. In United States v. Maceo, 947 F.2d 1191 (5th Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed cocaine conspiracy convictions, holding that evidence of a defendant's personal use of cocaine and receipt of cocaine as legal fees was not extrinsic evidence but inextricably intertwined with the evidence used to prove the crimes charged, so was properly admitted to prove he knew about the drug trafficking conspiracy and knowingly participated in it. Affirming convictions for cocaine distribution in United States v. Torres, n19 the Court held that two "sample transactions" involving sales of cocaine were not extrinsic offenses and were properly admitted where they were "inextricably intertwined" with the crime charged.

United States v. Barnes, 49 F.3d 1144 (6th Cir. 1995) : Defendants who had claimed a UPS package containing drugs were convicted of narcotics offenses. Affirming, the Court held that Rule 404(b) did not apply to a defendant's statement to a cellmate that the drugs picked up on the day of his arrest were sent to him to make up for a previous "short" drug shipment. Evidence of the previous shipment was directly connected to the one for which the defendants were charged, and thus was part of a single criminal episode, so the government did not have to give the advance notice required by Rule 404(b).

United States v. Harris, 271 F.3d 690 (7th Cir. 2001) : Affirming a conviction for selling powdered cocaine, the Court found no error in admission of evidence of prior drug transactions between the defendant and the government witness who was the purchaser in the drug transaction charged in the case. The evidence was necessary to explain to the jury the significance of the cryptic language used by the defendant during the drug transaction at issue, and it was admissible "under the intricately related doctrine" because it "completes the story of the crime, its absence would create a conceptual void, and the evidence is so blended with the charged offense that it explains the surrounding circumstances." In United States v. Gibson, 170 F.3d 673 (7th Cir. 1999) , the Court affirmed a conviction for crack cocaine distribution, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the defendant's conversations with the undercover agent regarding the possible sale of handguns. The handgun discussions were "intricately related" to conversations leading to crack sales, and by showing that the agent came to a meeting expecting to buy guns and therefore had excess money when the defendant did not want to sell guns, they helped to explain why the agent purchased substantially more crack than the initial negotiations contemplated. In a prosecution for conspiracy and attempt to possess with intent to distribute cocaine, United States v. Ramirez, 45 F.3d 1096 (7th Cir. 1995) , the Court held that evidence of 64 pounds of marijuana found in the apartment in which the defendants were arrested was properly admitted as "intricately related" to the charged crime, as it gave the jury a more accurate picture of the circumstances surrounding the charged crime and arrests.

United States v. Beltz, 385 F.3d 1158 (8th Cir. 2004) : Affirming methamphetamine-related convictions, the Court held that testimony about the defendant's prior involvement in production of methamphetamine at his residence was direct evidence of the charged crimes. The evidence provided a connection between the defendant and materials seized from his residence. In United States v. Alaniz, 148 F.3d 929 (8th Cir. 1998) , the Court affirmed convictions of conspiracy with intent to distribute marijuana, finding no error in allowing a cohort to testify that during the course of the conspiracy she was given methamphetamine to distribute in addition to marijuana. The testimony "showed methamphetamine was an integral part of the conspiracy's distribution system, and it was therefore not Rule 404(b) evidence of other crimes."

United States v. Lillard, 354 F.3d 850 (9th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to possess and distribute cocaine, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the defendant stole eight kilos from the 150-kilo shipment that he was transporting. The theft was inextricably intertwined with the charged conspiracy, and it also tended to prove the defendant's knowledge of the contents of the shipment. In United States v. Beckman, 298 F.3d 788 (9th Cir. 2002) , the Court affirmed marijuana-related convictions, holding that the testimony of a drug courier recruiter concerning the defendant's prior "drug run" was properly admitted to show the relationship between the defendant and the recruiter and was necessary to provide a "coherent and comprehensible story." Thus, the evidence was inextricably intertwined with the charged offense and not subject to Rule 404(b) exclusion. In United States v. Vizcarra-Martinez, n20 the Court reversed a conviction for possession of chemicals to be used in the manufacture of methamphetamine, holding that evidence the defendant possessed a small, personal-use amount of methamphetamine when arrested was neither part of the transaction serving as the basis for the criminal charge, nor necessary in offering a coherent and comprehensible story regarding the commission of the crime, so the drug use and possession could not be treated as inextricably intertwined with the charged offense.

United States v. Young, 39 F.3d 1561 (11th Cir. 1994) : The Court held that it was error (but harmless) to admit evidence of a family's use of an illegal still in a marijuana conspiracy case, since the marijuana and alcohol offenses were "neither similar nor intertwined, as the government suggests." In United States v. Leavitt, n21 the Court held, in affirming convictions for offenses committed in a narcotics importation conspiracy, that evidence of a threatened kidnapping and illegal gun purchases not charged in the indictment was not extrinsic evidence under Rule 404(b) because it was inextricably intertwined with evidence of the charged offenses or necessary to complete the story of the charged offenses. See also United States v. Martin n22(evidence of guns on a vessel carrying marijuana was direct evidence of crimes charged; no limiting instruction was required); United States v. Cole n23(videotaped conversations among conspirators admissible in drug prosecution despite references to money laundering, since the laundering was inextricably intertwined with the drug evidence).

[B] Rule 404(b) -- Acts Charged -- Acts Inextricably Interwoven, Intrinsic, or Part of a Single Criminal Episode -- Firearms Cases

United States v. Alexander, 331 F.3d 116 (D.C. Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed a conviction for unlawful possession of a firearm and ammunition by a felon, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting a statement by the defendant's girlfriend in a 911 call that the defendant had a gun on him. The gun that resulted in the charges was found in the defendant's car not long after the 911 call. Although the Court has recognized problems with the breadth of the "inextricably intertwined" analysis that some courts use in interpreting Rule 404(b), it held that in this case the statement related to the actual charge and did not involve another act.

United States v. Ridlehuber, 11 F.3d 516 (5th Cir. 1993) : The Court reversed a conviction for possession of a short-barreled shotgun, finding it was error to admit evidence which suggested that the defendant had been engaged in drug manufacturing when the weapon was seized. The drug manufacturing was not "inextricably intertwined" with the weapon possession in the sense that other acts furthering a conspiracy are, since the evidence did not arise out of the weapons charge; under the government's theory the opposite was true. Nor was the drug manufacturing part of a "single criminal episode," as the only episode proved was the weapon possession. One Judge dissented on the ground that the drug manufacturing evidence was intrinsic circumstantial evidence of knowledge and possession of the short-barreled shotgun.

United States v. Price, 329 F.3d 903 (6th Cir. 2003) : Affirming a conviction for being a felon in possession of firearms and ammunition, the Court held that a certificate found in the nightstand near the firearms and ammunition, which indicated that the defendant had completed a handgun safety course, was not other act evidence. Rather, it was evidence of the crime charged and inextricably intertwined with the charged offense.

United States v. Hite, 364 F.3d 874 (7th Cir. 2004) , vacated on other grounds, 543 U.S. 1103 (2005) : The Court affirmed a conviction for unlawful possession of firearms, holding that evidence that the defendant had played Russian roulette with one of the weapons two years before the charged offense was properly admitted. The Court concluded that the evidence was not evidence of other crimes; rather, because it was offered to satisfy the prosecution burden of showing knowing possession, by proving the defendant's knowledge and intention to exercise control over the prohibited weapons, the evidence was "inextricably intertwined" with the offenses. In United States v. Murray, 89 F.3d 459 (7th Cir. 1996) , crack cocaine and a gun were found when the defendant was arrested for a traffic violation after he had been observed at a suspected drug deal. The Court affirmed his conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence regarding the crack cocaine, since it enabled the jury to better understand that the defendant may have made a drug purchase while the officers watched and why he might want to be armed. In United States v. Roberts, n24 the Court affirmed convictions for armed bank robbery and felon firearm possession, holding there was no error in admitting evidence that the defendant was arrested two days after the robbery carrying a gun similar to the one used in the robbery. The evidence was not of extraneous other acts but rather "intricately connected" with the very crimes charged.

United States v. Rock, 282 F.3d 548 (8th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed convictions for felon firearm possession and tampering with a witness, holding that the defendant's burglary to obtain the firearms and subsequent display of the firearms merely completed the entire story of the criminal conduct and were not excluded by Rule 404(b). In a prosecution for weapons violations, United States v. Tate, n25 the Court held that the government properly proved that a defendant shot state troopers, since the shootings were intertwined with the weapons charges.

United States v. Matthews, 240 F.3d 806 (9th Cir. 2001) : The defendant was charged with felon firearm possession after he sold weapons to an informant. At trial the informant testified to meeting the defendant in a motel room, where there were "weapons, cameras, TVs, VCRs" for sale. The Court found that testimony was not all necessary to explain the weapons deal, but was done to portray the defendant as an individual who deals in goods that are presumably stolen. Thus, it was the government's obligation to give notice of its intent to introduce the evidence, and error (but not plain error) not to strike the material for failure to give notice.

United States v. Gorman, 312 F.3d 1159 (10th Cir. 2002) : Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court held that marijuana evidence found in the defendant's vehicle was not "other act" evidence. Rather, "the testimony relating to the marijuana ... was intertwined with the discovery of the firearm and therefore necessary to understand the flow of events and put police conduct in context."

United States v. Wright, 392 F.3d 1269 (11th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, holding that evidence of the defendant's resistance to arrest following a traffic stop and his battery on a law enforcement officer was inextricably intertwined with the discovery of the weapon; it was also relevant to showing consciousness of guilt.

[C] Rule 404(b) -- Acts Charged -- Acts Inextricably Interwoven, Intrinsic, or Part of a Single Criminal Episode -- Fraud and False Statements Cases

United States v. Lane, 323 F.3d 568 (7th Cir. 2003) : The defendant was charged with making false statements in loan applications by not disclosing a large outstanding debt. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of other debts the defendant owed at the same time, since the evidence (1) demonstrated his complete financial situation and lack of liquidity to meet his obligations, (2) showed his financial statements were incomplete, and (3) tended to show his intent to defraud because more than just his large debt had been omitted from his financial statements.

[D] Rule 404(b) -- Acts Charged -- Acts Inextricably Interwoven, Intrinsic, or Part of a Single Criminal Episode -- Limitations on the Doctrine

United States v. Bowie, 232 F.3d 923 (D.C. Cir. 2000) : In a prosecution for possession of counterfeit obligations discovered in May, the government offered evidence that the defendant was arrested a month earlier and counterfeit bills with the same serial numbers as the May bills were found. The Court rejected the notion that this evidence was "intextricably intertwined" with the charged offense so that it did not fall within Rule 404(b), although it was admissible under Rule 404(b), because it was relevant and not offered for the forbidden inference of propensity. In a detailed and thoughtful opinion, the Court suggested that all that the distinction did was relieve the government of the Rule's notice requirement, and it questioned whether the distinction should have the widespread recognition that it does. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 404.02[12].

United States v. Cross, 308 F.3d 308 (3d Cir. 2002) : The defendants were convicted of mail fraud and civil rights conspiracy in connection with a scheme to fix State-Court cases, but the fraud convictions were reversed. After resentencing, the defendants claimed that they had received ineffective assistance from appellate counsel, on the ground that counsel should have argued that dismissal of the fraud counts required dismissal of the civil rights count, because evidence offered on the vacated counts would not have been admissible on the latter count, and had a prejudicial spillover effect. Rejecting the government's argument that no analysis under Rule 404(b) was required because the evidence was "intrinsic" to the civil rights charge, the Court noted that while "[t]he distinction between intrinsic and extrinsic (i.e., 'other acts' or 'other crimes') evidence is often fuzzy," in this Circuit "acts are intrinsic when they directly prove the charged conspiracy." The challenged evidence here was not intrinsic in that sense, but it would be probative of motive and intent; much of it would have been excluded as cumulative, but any error in its admission would be harmless. United States v. Heidebur, 122 F.3d 577 (8th Cir. 1997) : The Court reversed the defendant's conviction for knowingly possessing sexually explicit photographs of his minor stepdaughter because evidence that the defendant had sexual contact with his stepdaughter was erroneously admitted. The sexual misconduct was not "inextricably intertwined" with the crime charged, since it was offered at trial only to explain why the victim's mother became suspicious about the defendant's having taken photographs of the victim. The mother's motivation had "nothing whatsoever to do with the factual setting of the crime charged in this case." In United States v. Forcelle, n26 the Court reversed a conviction for fraud arising out of the defendant's use of his employer's funds for a racing chassis and a beach-front house, holding it was error to admit evidence that he had stolen platinum from the employer. The evidence provided only a discrete example of the defendant's misappropriation of company resources and no additional context for the crime charged.

United States v. Ramirez-Lopez, 315 F.3d 1143 (9th Cir. 2003) : In a trial for alien smuggling, the government elicited from a prosecution witness that just before he began to testify, the defendant made a threatening gesture by moving his finger back and forth, indicating that the witness was not to say anything. Holding it was error (but not plain error) when the government failed to give notice required by Rule 404(b) of its intent to elicit the threat evidence, the Court rejected the argument that the threat was not Rule 404(b) evidence because it was "inextricably intertwined," since a threat at trial cannot be viewed as inextricably intertwined with the charged offense of alien smuggling.

[E] Rule 404(b) -- Acts Charged -- Acts Inextricably Interwoven, Intrinsic, or Part of a Single Criminal Episode -- Other Cases

United States v. Zanghi, 189 F.3d 71 (1st Cir. 1999) : Affirming convictions for securities fraud, tax evasion, and other offenses, the Court concluded that evidence of the defendant's theft of money by misrepresentation was relevant to one tax count and properly admitted, since the income from the theft was unreported. "In cases where a defendant is charged with under reporting income, there often will be instances where evidence of his acquisition of unreported income overlaps with evidence of other, uncharged acts." The Court also held that evidence of a theft of furniture was relevant and admissible as part of the defendant's fraudulent scheme to mislead prospective investors. In United States v. Shea, 159 F.3d 37 (1st Cir. 1998) , the Court affirmed a conviction for attempted bank robbery, finding no error in the admission of a gun found on the defendant when he was arrested for a different bank robbery. Although the gun was admitted as proof of identity under Rule 404(b), analysis under that Rule was unnecessary because the government sought to introduce the gun "as intrinsic, direct evidence of the charged crime -- not as Rule 404(b) evidence." Proceeding directly to the Rule 403 determination, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the gun.

United States v. Parker, 699 F.2d 177 (4th Cir. 1983) : In a prosecution for impersonating an IRS agent, the person to whom the impersonation was addressed (Brooks) reported it to the IRS. A real IRS agent phoned the defendant, pretended to be Brooks and had a follow-up conversation in which the defendant again claimed to work for the IRS. Although the Court referred to this as other act evidence, it found that it was admissible. We believe that this was not evidence of an unrelated transaction, but was proof of the very impersonation charged and, as the Court ruled, was plainly admissible. In United States v. Black, 692 F.2d 314 (4th Cir. 1982) , the Court reversed a conviction for assaulting and impeding a correctional officer on another ground, but held that the Trial Judge properly admitted evidence that after the assault, the defendant returned to his cell and threw human feces at the victim. This was not another bad act, but proof of an act that arguably was committed to enable the defendant to conceal a knife. Thus, it was proof of the crime charged.

United States v. Walker, 148 F.3d 518 (5th Cir. 1998) : The defendant Quinn was charged with firearms possession, and his friend Walker testified that Quinn was not at the scene where the firearm was found. Quinn was then charged with suborning the perjurious testimony of Walker. At the perjury trial, a prosecution witness (Taylor) testified that Quinn had approached him and asked Taylor to lie for him in the firearms possession trial. Affirming Quinn's conviction for suborning perjury, the Court found that Rule 404(b) was not applicable. "Quinn's attempt to suborn perjury from Taylor was part of the same transaction of shopping for an alibi of which the subornation of Walker's perjury was a part." In United States v. Stovall, n27 the Court held that a purchase made with the money received from a loan was inextricably intertwined with the charge of receiving a benefit from the loan.

United States v. Vincent, 681 F.2d 462 (6th Cir. 1982) : In a prosecution for threatening the President, the Court held that, although it might have reached a different conclusion, there was no abuse of discretion in admitting additional threats made by the defendant at a psychiatric hospital after his arrest to educate the jury as to the entire setting of the case. See also United States v. Reynolds n28(videotape of the defendant's conversation in which he mentioned future criminal activity in addition to the crime charged was admissible; statement involved intertwined events).

United States v. Senffner, 280 F.3d 755 (7th Cir. 2002) : The defendant in a fraud case repeated other Courts' criticism of the Circuit's "complete the story" definition of "inextricably intertwined," but the Court rejected the invitation to narrow the doctrine. Acts sharing a relationship with and connection (even in the broad sense) to the crime do not raise the same problem as that to which Rule 404(b) is addressed, evidence probative solely of bad character. In the Court's view, Rule 403 sufficiently protects against unnecessarily prejudicial presentation of barely probative evidence. In United States v. Bogan, 267 F.3d 614 (7th Cir. 2001) , the Court affirmed convictions for assaulting a corrections officer, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that just before the assault the officer had confiscated a small quantity of sugar and a few postage stamps from the inmates' cell. The evidence was "intricately related" to the charged incident and, together with the officer's testimony that sugar was used to make illegal intoxicants and stamps were used in prison for purchasing intoxicants, enabled the jury to fully understand and make sense of the defendants' vicious attack. In United States v. Ryan, n29 the Court affirmed a conviction for bank fraud, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant failed to report on his tax returns $136,000 received as kickbacks and commissions for his part in the scheme. The evidence was of a cover-up "intricately related" to the acts charged and tended to prove the defendant's required specific intent to defraud, as well as to cast doubt on his defense of being ignorant of the fraudulent aspects of the transactions. In United States v. Lahey, n30 the Court affirmed convictions for conspiracy to obstruct justice by providing false testimony to a grand jury, finding no error in the admission of evidence that one of the defendants, a lawyer, had destroyed records of fee payments in furtherance of a tax fraud. This evidence was inextricably intertwined with the conspiracy to obstruct justice, which was the culmination of the lawyer's continuous efforts to conceal the gross receipts of his law practice from the IRS and the grand jury. In a prosecution for arson resulting in the deaths of the defendant's two children, United States v. Menzer, n31 the Court held that evidence that the defendant was on probation for a 1986 conviction for sexual exploitation of a child was "intricately related" to the charged offense because it was the government's theory that the defendant burned down the house where his wife and children were sleeping in order to prevent their reporting his sexual abuse of the children, which would result in revocation of his probation. In our view, this was other crime evidence admissible under the Rule to prove motive, and the Court's characterization of it as "intricately related" (and therefore outside the Rule) is confusing, especially given the Court's conclusion that there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence "because it was intricately related to the arson prosecution as probative evidence of Menzer's intent (motive)." The problem the Court was apparently trying to get around arises from its current test for admissibility under Rule 404(b), which requires that "the other act is similar enough and close enough in time to be relevant to the matter in issue." n32 Similarity, however, is the measure of probative value for only some of the purposes listed in the Rule; rather than continue its confusing resort to "intricately related," the Court would be better off modifying its test to accommodate all the purposes permissible under the Rule.

United States v. Rolett, 151 F.3d 787 (8th Cir. 1998) : Affirming a conviction for conspiracy to commit murder in aid of racketeering, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant stole trucks for a chopshop operation, burglarized houses, and stole consumer electronics and guns. Although the evidence was admitted to show "motivation, intent, knowledge, mode and manner of operation, the absence of mistake or accident or the relationship between" the defendant and a cooperating witness, the Court held it was properly admitted "as intrinsic evidence" inextricably intertwined in the charged racketeering enterprise. In United States v. McGuire, n33 a murder-for-hire conspiracy prosecution, the Court held that prior bank robberies committed by conspirators were properly admitted as inextricably intertwined with the charged crimes because they clarified the relationship among defendants, and helped to explain why one would entrust others with knowledge concerning murders that had been committed. In Carter v. United States, 549 F.2d 77 (8th Cir. 1977) , the Court affirmed a conviction for unlawfully receiving a firearm that had been transported in interstate commerce, finding no error in admitting a druggist's testimony that the defendant had presented him with a forged prescription for narcotic drugs, since that explained why the druggist was chasing the defendant at the time he abandoned the weapon on which the charges were based.

United States v. Chase, 301 F.3d 1019 (9th Cir. 2002) : Affirming a conviction for threatening to murder federal law enforcement officers, the Court held that threats made to individuals other than federal agents were properly admitted as inextricably bound to the acts charged, since the defendant's anger at the FBI arose from the agency's failure to act against the defendant's perceived enemies (targets of the threats). In United States v. Williams, 291 F.3d 1180 (9th Cir. 2002) , the Court affirmed convictions for interstate travel in aid of racketeering and transporting a minor for prostitution, and held that evidence that the defendant engaged in beatings of prostitutes was not other-act evidence, but rather was evidence of how the defendant maintained control of his victims. The evidence was thus "inextricably intertwined" with the crimes charged and not excluded by Rule 404(b). In United States v. Kallin, n34 the Court reversed a tax evasion conviction on other grounds, but noted that certain corporate tax returns for the defendant's business would be admissible on retrial even though the statute of limitations prevented prosecution regarding those returns, as the defendant had been indicted with respect to his personal returns for those years and the under-reporting of his business income was integral to his scheme to evade personal income taxes. In United States v. Warren, n35 the defendant stabbed two men in a fight; one victim died and the other recovered. The defendant was charged only with the murder. The Court found no error in the introduction of evidence that he had stabbed another person in the fight, since the two acts of stabbing were "inextricably intertwined" because both were "part of a single course of action and occurred within moments of each other."

United States v. Fallen, 256 F.3d 1082 (11th Cir. 2001) : Affirming a conviction for assaulting two federal officers, the Court found that the agents' awareness of the defendant's prior firearms convictions made it more apparent to them that he was armed with a gun and reinforced their apprehension that the defendant might shoot them. In the Court's view, this established that the convictions were inextricably intertwined with the charged offense. In United States v. Prosperi, 201 F.3d 1335 (11th Cir. 2000) , the defendant, who represented an overseas investor in substantial financial matters, was charged with mail fraud, money laundering, counterfeiting, and tax fraud in connection with a scheme to misappropriate funds from the investor for his personal use. At the close of a two-month trial, the mail fraud and money laundering counts were dismissed. The defendant argued that his conviction on the counterfeiting and tax counts was impermissibly tainted by the substantial evidence admitted on the dismissed counts, but the Court found all the evidence related to an ongoing plan to deceive the investor and plunder his assets. In United States v. Calderon, 127 F.3d 1314 (11th Cir. 1997) , a defendant appealing a conviction for narcotics offenses complained that it was error to admit, as proof of intent, evidence of his guilty plea for kidnapping and marijuana trafficking. The Court found no abuse of discretion, although it stated that it might not have made the same ruling as the Trial Judge. The kidnapping portion of the conviction was "intertwined" with the prior drug conviction, because the kidnapping was part of a plan to collect on a drug debt; "the only realistic way for the government to explain to the jury how it was that appellant came to be in possession of a van loaded with 3,000 pounds of marijuana, that is that he was not just merely present in that situation as well, was to divulge some details of the kidnapping." In United States v. Veltmann, n36 the defendants, charged with setting a fire in which their wife and mother (respectively) had died, alleged that the victim had committed suicide. The Court held that evidence of a prior fire on the defendants' property was properly admitted, as it was inextricably intertwined with the charged crime because both defendants had mentioned it in such a way as to direct the investigation toward another suspect. In United States v. Montes-Cardenas, 746 F.2d 771 (11th Cir. 1984) , a defendant's importation of cocaine formed part of a series of cocaine offenses with which he was charged.

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Acts Charged -- Conspiracy

United States v. Soto-Beniquez, 356 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2003) : Affirming convictions in a complex drug conspiracy case, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding 15 murders, since there was sufficient evidence that each was committed in furtherance of the conspiracy. The Court also found no abuse of discretion when evidence that a gun was seized from one defendant was admitted as an overt act in furtherance of the charged conspiracy, even though the seizure occurred one day after the date the indictment stated was "on or about" the end of the conspiracy. In a drug conspiracy prosecution, United States v. Candelaria-Silva, 162 F.3d 698 (1st Cir.

1998) , the Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that a passenger in a car driven by the defendant brandished and discarded a handgun during a police car chase. The evidence of the car chase and the passenger's actions was relevant to the defendant's participation in the charged conspiracy. In a drug prosecution charging a conspiracy and substantive offenses, United States v. Moosey, n37 the Court found no error in admission of specific acts not charged as substantive offenses to prove the conspiracy. It observed that the Trial Judge explained to the jury that the acts could be considered only on the conspiracy count.

United States v. Baez, 349 F.3d 90 (2d Cir. 2003) (per curiam): The Court affirmed convictions for murder, racketeering, and conspiracy, finding no abuse of discretion when evidence of 16 uncharged crimes committed by the defendant was admitted. The uncharged criminal activity was not other-crimes evidence subject to Rule 404(b) because it went to establish the existence of the charged racketeering enterprise and of the charged conspiracy. In a massive drug conspiracy prosecution, United States v. Miller, 116 F.3d 641 (2d Cir. 1997) , the Court held that evidence of numerous killings not alleged in the indictment was not "other" act evidence within the meaning of Rule 404(b), but rather was proof of the existence of the RICO enterprise alleged in the indictment which used such acts of violence in furtherance of its narcotics conspiracy. In United States v. Thai, n38 the Court affirmed RICO convictions, holding that evidence of a beating administered to a member of the conspiracy, although it was uncharged, was not evidence of "other" crimes but was evidence as to the structure of the enterprise and the discipline imposed by the defendant leaders on the members.

United States v. Cross, 308 F.3d 308 (3d Cir. 2002) : The defendants were convicted of mail fraud and civil rights conspiracy in connection with a scheme to fix state-court cases, but the fraud convictions were reversed. After resentencing, the defendants claimed that they had received ineffective assistance from appellate counsel, on the ground that counsel should have argued that dismissal of the fraud counts required dismissal of the civil rights count, because evidence offered on the vacated counts would not have been admissible on the latter count, and had a prejudicial spillover effect. Rejecting the government's argument that no analysis under Rule 404(b) was required because the evidence was "intrinsic" to the civil rights charge, the Court noted that while "[t]he distinction between intrinsic and extrinsic (i.e., 'other acts' or 'other crimes') evidence is often fuzzy," in this Circuit "acts are intrinsic when they directly prove the charged conspiracy." The challenged evidence here was not intrinsic in that sense, but it would be probative of motive and intent; much of it would have been excluded as cumulative, but any error in its admission would be harmless.

United States v. Lipford, 203 F.3d 259 (4th Cir. 2000) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in a drug trafficking conspiracy prosecution when evidence was admitted that one of the defendants shot a police officer, who was executing a search warrant at the defendant's residence. The evidence confirmed the defendant's promise to defend the conspiracy's drug supply, it corroborated other evidence establishing his involvement in the conspiracy, and it demonstrated the scope of the conspiracy. In a marijuana importation case, United States v. Wooten, n39 the Court found that a prosecutor acted in good faith in asking a question concerning one defendant's possession of cocaine, where the defendant claimed to have withdrawn from a conspiracy and the question concerned the defendant's conduct at the time he claimed to have withdrawn.

United States v. Taylor, 210 F.3d 311 (5th Cir. 2000) : The Court reversed convictions for drug trafficking offenses because two prior state convictions of the purported head of the conspiracy, who was not tried with or called as a witness against the defendant, were improperly admitted. Although the convictions were based on delivery of drugs during the life of the charged conspiracy, the only proof offered was the judgments themselves, and "[c]riminal judgments are not acts in furtherance of a conspiracy." In United States v. Navarro, 169 F.3d 228 (5th Cir. 1999) , the Court affirmed convictions for conspiracy to possess methamphetamine, holding there was no error in admitting evidence of drugs found at a conspirator's residence in another state four months after the alleged end of the charged conspiracy. The evidence demonstrated the structure of the drug organization, as well as the continuing contact between the conspirators. Because the evidence was "intrinsic" to the charged crimes, there was no error in failing to make the required "Beechum findings" on the record. In a bank robbery conspiracy case, United States v. Silva, n40 the Court held that evidence that one conspirator kidnapped the bank president's wife and held her hostage was properly admitted to show the nature of the conspiracy and to connect the defendant to it.

United States v. Copeland, 304 F.3d 533 (6th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed convictions for conspiracy to distribute a controlled substance, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that one defendant had been arrested for drug possession three times during the course of the charged conspiracy. His repeated arrests, "especially with the presence of a firearm, significant amounts of cash, and a pager are relevant to the question of whether he knowingly and voluntarily participated in a drug conspiracy."

United States v. Mancari, 875 F.2d 103 (7th Cir. 1989) : The government had offered other crimes evidence under Rule 404(b) rather than as proof of the conspiracy charged. Because the evidence was not offered to prove the conspiracy charged, the Court ultimately found insufficient evidence to support that charge and remanded with directions to acquit. It observed that the government might have avoided the problem by offering the evidence without restricting the offer to an extremely narrow theory.

United States v. Hill, 410 F.3d 468 (8th Cir. 2005) : In the prosecution of a conspiracy to manufacture and distribute methamphetamine and marijuana, the Court held that testimony by a coconspirator that the defendant had three times given him a firearm with orders to kill or maim an individual was properly admitted as substantive evidence of the conspiracy, where two of the intended victims were slated to testify against the conspiracy before the grand jury and a third had stolen drugs and other property from it. In United States v. Maynie, 257 F.3d 908 (8th Cir. 2001) , the Court affirmed convictions for conspiracy to possess and distribute crack cocaine, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the defendant was driving a car from which gunshots were fired at a former coconspirator suspected of stealing from the operation. The evidence was relevant to the existence of a conspiracy and demonstrated acts in furtherance of the conspiracy. In United States v. O'Dell, n41 the Court affirmed convictions for money laundering and conspiracy to distribute methamphetamine and found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant had left behind a small coin purse containing individual packets later determined to be methamphetamine when he applied for general assistance. The defendant's possession of even a small amount of methamphetamine "during the period in which he is accused of conspiring to distribute the same drug is direct evidence that the defendant participated in the conspiracy, and therefore Rule 404(b) is not implicated." In United States v. Dierling, n42 the Court affirmed convictions for conspiring to manufacture and distribute methamphetamine, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that conspirators had slain one member who incurred a drug debt, that a leader had burned down a barn containing manufacturing equipment, that conspirators had been pursued in high-speed chases by law enforcement officials, and that a large cache of weapons had been found at the leader's home. All the evidence tended to show that a conspiracy existed among the defendants and the manner in which it operated; the probative value of the evidence for these purposes was not substantially exceeded by any prejudicial effect. In United States v. Tran, n43 the Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to traffic in counterfeit checks, finding no error in the admission of evidence that the defendant was involved in attempts to threaten and intimidate people who wanted to withdraw from the conspiracy. This was not "other crimes" evidence, but rather was evidence of the very crime charged.

United States v. Hill, 953 F.2d 452 (9th Cir. 1991) : The defendant's conviction for conspiracy to distribute cocaine was reversed because a coconspirator had been permitted to testify to having used cocaine with the defendant five years previously. The Court held that the evidence was not probative of the background and development of, nor inextricably intertwined with, the conspiracy. Although it might have been relevant to the defendant's knowledge and intent, when admitted as direct evidence of the conspiracy it was given more weight than it deserved and its prejudicial and confusing effect substantially outweighed its probative value. In United States v. Lai, 944 F.2d 1434 (9th Cir. 1991) , the Court held that evidence of drug transactions in late 1982 and around Thanksgiving 1985 were direct evidence of a drug conspiracy charging specific acts as early as July 1983 and "continuing to in or about October 1985." See also United States v. Patterson n44(evidence of a shooting properly admitted in prosecution of narcotics distribution conspiracy, as it showed that the conspirators used violence to control the members of the conspiracy).

United States v. Robinson, 978 F.2d 1554 (10th Cir. 1992) : Affirming cocaine base possession convictions, the Court held that evidence of the defendants' membership in a gang was not barred by the Rule, but was directly relevant on the issues of formation, agreement, and purpose of the conspiracy. The dissenting Judge believed that the government had impermissibly sought to prove that by exhibiting the characteristics of gang members, the defendants were members of a gang with criminal purposes and therefore were guilty of the charged conspiracy and underlying crimes.

[iii] Rule 404(b) -- Acts Charged -- Criminal Enterprises

United States v. Baez, 349 F.3d 90 (2d Cir. 2003) (per curiam): The Court affirmed convictions for murder, racketeering, and conspiracy, finding no abuse of discretion when evidence of 16 uncharged crimes committed by the defendant was admitted. The uncharged criminal activity was not other-crimes evidence subject to Rule 404(b) because it went to establish the existence of the charged racketeering enterprise and of the charged conspiracy.

United States v. Murray, 103 F.3d 310 (3d Cir. 1997) : The Court reversed a conviction for intentional killing in furtherance of a continuing criminal enterprise because of error in admitting evidence that the defendant had previously committed another murder. There was no showing that the uncharged murder was connected to the charged CCE or that the two killings were planned together or involved a common design, nor were the similarities between the two sufficient to be relevant on the identity issue. Even if the evidence had some slight probative value, it would be substantially outweighed by the prejudicial effect of showing the defendant's murderous propensity.

United States v. Stitt, 250 F.3d 878 (4th Cir. 2001) : In the prosecution of a CCE operating a large drug distribution ring during 1990-98, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony about a 1991 traffic stop in which the defendant and others were found to possess guns, bullets, and crack cocaine, and the defendant gave false pedigree information. The evidence was not "other crimes," but an integral component of the charged conspiracy, and it was also probative in connecting the defendant with an alias used on other occasions.

United States v. Flynn, 852 F.2d 1045 (8th Cir. 1988) : In a racketeering case, the Court upheld the admission of evidence concerning the defendant's acts of retaliation against a family, since it demonstrated his relationship to the enterprise. It concluded, however, that discussions among members of the enterprise concerning contemplated murders was unduly prejudicial, and that "[t]he RICO statute has a tremendous potential for guilt by association." Error in admitting the evidence was harmless, however.

United States v. Rubio, 727 F.2d 786 (9th Cir. 1983) , amended (9th Cir. 1984): The Court affirmed a racketeering conviction, finding no error in the admission of evidence concerning the defendant's prior narcotics conviction despite the defense's stipulation concerning the conviction. The Court distinguished convictions used for impeachment purposes under Rule 609 and other crimes offered under Rule 404(b). Details concerning convictions used for impeachment rarely may be proved, but details concerning other crimes may be important -- e.g., to prove a pattern of racketeering.

The Court also found that evidence that the defendant possessed firearms in addition to those charged in the indictment was properly admitted, since the firearms were relevant to show involvement in the narcotics trade.

United States v. Finestone, 816 F.2d 583 (11th Cir. 1987) : The Court held that evidence of an execution-style murder was properly admitted in proving a pattern of racketeering activity.

[iv] Rule 404(b) -- Acts Charged -- Dealing

United States v. Giraldo, 822 F.2d 205 (2d Cir. 1987) : The Court held that tapes from the defendant's answering machine that contained orders for cocaine were admissible to prove the defendant's intent to distribute.

United States v. Masters, 622 F.2d 83 (4th Cir. 1980) : In a prosecution for dealing in firearms without a license, the Court approved the admission of taped conversations between the defendant and undercover agents despite references to other sales and acts, since the evidence was necessary to complete the story of the crime charged and to prove that the defendant actually was "dealing."

[v] Rule 404(b) -- Acts Charged -- Fraud

United States v. Anzalone, 783 F.2d 10 (1st Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed a defendant's mail fraud convictions, finding that evidence of his prior dealings with insurance companies was admissible to prove the deception of the insurance companies that gave rise to the indictment.

United States v. Heinemann, 801 F.2d 86 (2d Cir. 1986) : Affirming convictions for conspiracy to defraud the United States in connection with the sale of "ministries" in purported tax-exempt churches, the Court found that evidence that a defendant had lied to a grand jury was proof of the conspiracy charged rather than an unrelated other act.

United States v. Brownlee, 890 F.2d 1036 (8th Cir. 1989) : In affirming convictions for fraud offenses involving stolen and retitled automobiles, the Court held that proof the defendant used a false address when applying for a title to a stolen car was not other crimes evidence, but proof of part of the fraudulent scheme.

United States v. Soliman, 813 F.2d 277 (9th Cir. 1987) : The Court upheld a conviction arising out of a scheme to forge death certificates and collect insurance proceeds, finding that a summary chart of 102 fraudulent insurance claims was direct evidence of the scheme alleged and not "other crimes" evidence. See also United States v. Vaccaro n45(evidence of specific uncharged jackpot cheating incidents was properly admitted to prove the conspiracy charged, i.e., to rig jackpots in hotels and casinos).

United States v. Roylance, 690 F.2d 164 (10th Cir. 1982) : Affirming mail and securities fraud convictions, the Court found that evidence that certain investors were defrauded in intrastate transactions was admissible to prove the very scheme that the government alleged was also taking place in interstate transactions.

[e] Rule 404(b) -- Acts of Third Persons

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Civil Cases

Agushi v. Duerr, 196 F.3d 754 (7th Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed a judgment in favor of police officers alleged to have used excessive force in making an arrest at the plaintiff's home while investigating whether the plaintiff's husband was abusing their daughter. The Trial Judge, concluding that Rule 404(b) does not apply to third-party acts, admitted testimony regarding the husband's beating the daughter. The Court held that "Rule 404(b) does apply to third parties" because the Rule "speaks not of the parties to the case, but of a 'person.' " It found, however, that the error in holding Rule 404(b) inapplicable was harmless, because the husband's acts of abuse were properly admitted to provide context for the arrest and an alternative source of the plaintiff's injuries.

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Acts of Third Persons -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Candelaria-Silva, 162 F.3d 698 (1st Cir. 1998) : The Court held in a drug conspiracy prosecution that there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that a passenger in a car driven by the defendant brandished and discarded a handgun during a police car chase. The evidence of the car chase and the passenger's actions was relevant to the defendant's participation in the charged conspiracy.

United States v. Lynch, 367 F.3d 1148 (9th Cir. 2004) , modified on other grounds, 437 F.3d 902 (9th Cir. 2005) : At the defendant's trial for violating the Hobbs Act after he and another were involved in killing a third man, the Judge granted a motion in limine precluding the defendant from cross-examining his accomplice (a cooperating witness) about violent acts or threats of violence unknown to the defendant at the time of the murder. Affirming, the Court held that the accomplice's violence known to the defendant was relevant to why the two stayed together after the killing. However, other violence by the accomplice showed only a propensity on the part of him, rather than the defendant, to kill the victim, and the identity of the killer was not relevant to the Hobbs Act charge or any defense thereto.

United States v. Sellers, 906 F.2d 597 (11th Cir. 1990) : In affirming convictions for violating a theft suspect's civil rights by allowing a codefendant to beat him, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the codefendant's violent acts and reputation for violence, as it supported the government's theory that the defendants knew of the codefendant's violent proclivities and intended to use him to beat a confession out of the suspect.

[f] Rule 404(b) -- Acts Relevant to Another's State of Mind

United States v. Miller, 895 F.2d 1431 (D.C. Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed a conviction for bank fraud, holding it was error (but harmless) to admit a witness' testimony as to her knowledge that the defendant had recently been released from jail, ostensibly to show her innocent motivation in agreeing to cash a forged check for him, because her state of mind had not been made relevant in the case, and any probative value was greatly outweighed by the prejudicial effect.

United States v. Alzanki, 54 F.3d 994 (1st Cir. 1995) : Affirming a conviction for holding a household servant in involuntary servitude, the Court held there was no error in admitting evidence of the defendant's abusive behavior toward his wife, as it was relevant to the reasonableness of the servant's stated fear that she would be a target of the defendant's physical violence should she disobey him. In United States v. DeVincent, n46 the Court, affirming loansharking convictions, held it was proper to allow testimony on the appellant's 20-year-old conviction for armed robbery and his ten-year-old murder indictment. The evidence was not admitted to show that the appellant was a bad man, but to show that the debtor understood that any default on the loan would be punished with violence. The Court stated that it had "qualms still, for this testimony was remote and cumulative ... However, the [trial] court, under these circumstances, may have reasoned that the testimony making these matters remote and cumulative also reduced their prejudicial impact."

United States v. Gigante, 729 F.2d 78 (2d Cir. 1984) : The Court held that evidence that the debtor believed a loanshark had organized crime connections, and evidence of other credit transactions, was admissible to show the reasonableness of the debtor's fears.

United States v. Powers, 59 F.3d 1460 (4th Cir. 1995) : Affirming a defendant's conviction for sexual abuse of his minor daughter, the Court held that evidence of the defendant's beating of the daughter and other family members was properly admitted to explain why the daughter failed to report the sexual abuse for 18 months.

United States v. Williams, 343 F.3d 423 (5th Cir. 2003) : Affirming the civil rights conviction of a deputy sheriff for shooting an unarmed arrestee in the back, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the victim was permitted to testify that he fled from the defendant because he knew the defendant had previously shot another man. Although the defendant argued that the victim's state of mind was irrelevant, the Court concluded that the victim's knowledge or belief about the defendant was relevant in assessing whether the victim would have acted as the defendant claimed or as the government claimed. The Court concluded that the testimony was not unduly prejudicial because "[l]aw enforcement officers must shoot suspects sometimes, and the jury just as easily could have believed that the prior shooting was justified and that [the victim's] fear was unfounded."

United States v. Hattaway, 740 F.2d 1419 (7th Cir. 1984) : The Court, upholding kidnapping convictions, found that evidence of the lifestyle of a motorcycle gang that held the woman victim was properly admitted to show how she was intimidated into remaining with the gang. See also United States v. Blackwood n47(statements by Judge concerning the defendant's admission of past acts held admissible in extortion case to prove why the victim would believe that the defendant was in a position to exercise official power).

[g] Rule 404(b) -- Acts Relevant To Prove Agency

United States v. Morgan, 354 F.3d 621 (7th Cir. 2003) : The defendant was convicted for distributing crack cocaine after a witness, Green, called him requesting a delivery and another man, Jones, delivered the drug to the witness. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony from Green that he bought cocaine from the defendant three or four times a week for an extended period and that Jones frequently delivered the merchandise. To prove that Jones was the defendant's agent in the charged transaction, it was necessary to show that Green and the defendant had an established business relationship in which the defendant used Jones as a courier for delivery.

[h] Rule 404(b) -- Alibi Witness

United States v. Walker, 272 F.3d 407 (7th Cir. 2001) : In a bank robbery case, cross-examination of the defendant's alibi witness elicited that defendant and the witness were selling drugs that day, as they did every day. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the cross-examination, since an accused who proffers an alibi witness opens the door to the prosecutor establishing exactly what the accused and the witness were doing that day and when they were doing it. Although the evidence may have reflected poorly on the defendant's character, it was used to refute the alibi and not to show his propensity to commit crimes. Further, the jury was instructed not to consider evidence of any drug dealing or to use it as evidence that the defendant committed the charged crimes.

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Appellate Review

United States v. Gessa, 971 F.2d 1257 (6th Cir. 1992) (en banc): The Court said that it would apply a clearly-erroneous standard of review to the factual determinations required by Rule 404(b) and an abuse-of-discretion standard to the required balancing of probative value and prejudicial effect, and held that evidence of other crimes was properly admitted in this case.

United States v. Beasley, 809 F.2d 1273 (7th Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed a conviction for attempting to obtain a controlled substance by misrepresenting the name of the person to appear on prescriptions, but reversed the defendant's convictions for obtaining the substance with the intent to distribute. The Court found that evidence that the defendant had acquired and distributed other drugs was erroneously admitted, since the other acts were not similar to the scheme alleged in the instant case. The Court observed that it might be better able "to tell whether the district court and the parties took the right things into account" than to decide whether a given piece of evidence should have been admitted. The Court added that "[d]iscretion, when exercised, will rarely be disturbed." It found that the record failed to demonstrate that the Trial Judge adequately considered the potential of the bad act evidence to impugn the defendant's character.

[j] Rule 404(b) -- Arrests

United States v. James, 555 F.2d 992 (D.C. Cir. 1977) : The Court reversed a conviction for possession of heroin with intent to distribute on the ground that evidence of an arrest 16 days before the charged offense was improperly admitted. After rejecting the argument that the defense opened the door to the evidence, the Court found that the probative value of the arrest, if offered on the issue of intent, was very weak, and in view of its lurid details, concluded that "we perceive no balance on which it properly could have been admitted."

United States v. Alarcon, 261 F.3d 416 (5th Cir. 2001) : Affirming convictions for narcotics trafficking, the Court held there was no error in admitting evidence that one defendant, who was arrested while driving a truck with marijuana in a hidden compartment, was previously arrested for transporting 131 pounds of marijuana concealed in a borrowed truck's hidden compartment. This evidence was admissible to prove intent, knowledge, and absence of mistake. We note that in many cases the mere fact of arrest might not be sufficient to warrant admission of other act evidence, but here it seems that the presence of the defendant and the marijuana in the two trucks is what mattered.

United States v. McCarthur, 6 F.3d 1270 (7th Cir. 1993) : The Court held it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to admit evidence that the defendant, who was charged with possessing three kilos of cocaine with intent to distribute, had previously been arrested for possession of a small amount of cocaine. Where the witness knew nothing of the circumstances of the arrest or the disposition of the charge, the arrest by itself did not establish any conduct by the defendant shedding any light on her intent or absence of mistake with respect to the charged offense.

United States v. Wilson, 244 F.3d 1208 (10th Cir. 2001) : Although the Court affirmed cocaine-related convictions, it found that it was error (but harmless) to permit cross-examination of one defendant about his past drug-related arrests. While Rule 404(b) authorizes admission of other acts for certain purposes, the Rule requires more evidence than simply that an arrest took place. In United States v. Robinson, 978 F.2d 1554 (10th Cir. 1992) , the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit evidence that two defendants charged with possession of cocaine base had previously been arrested, as the mere fact an arrest was made is not by itself an admissible "prior bad act." With respect to a third defendant, the Court upheld evidence of arrests, supported by testimony about specific drug-related acts, which was offered to prove knowledge and intent.

[k] Rule 404(b) -- Background

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Civil Cases

Agushi v. Duerr, 196 F.3d 754 (7th Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed a judgment in favor of police officers alleged to have used excessive force in making an arrest at the plaintiff's home while investigating whether the plaintiff's husband was abusing their daughter. The Trial Judge, citing Rule 404(b), prevented the daughter from testifying that days before the arrest she heard one of the defendants say that he was going to ruin her parents, but the Court held that "the statement is part and parcel of the case at hand and thus is not covered by Rule 404(b)." The Court noted that the Judge also appeared to exclude the testimony under Rule 403, but concluded that it would find any error in excluding the testimony to be harmless.

Williams v. Mensey, 785 F.2d 631 (8th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed a judgment against a prisoner who claimed he was assaulted in jail, holding that evidence that the plaintiff was involved in other fights was properly admitted to show his problems with other inmates before one of the defendants allegedly labeled him a "snitch."

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Background -- Context Events

United States v. Traitz, 871 F.2d 368 (3d Cir. 1989) : The Court held uncharged acts of violence were relevant to show the background of a conspiracy.

United States v. Wells, 163 F.3d 889 (4th Cir. 1998) : The defendant was charged in a scheme that involved paying liabilities to the IRS with funds obtained by depositing fraudulent "comptroller warrants." The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the IRS liabilities arose out of a prior tobacco fraud and tax evasion scheme, since the evidence provided context for the charged crimes. In United States v. Percy, n48 The Court held that evidence of prior drug activity was properly used to prove the background of subsequent activity. In United States v. Martin, n49 the Court affirmed a conviction for tax evasion, finding that evidence of the defendant's receipt of money from various activities, including bookmaking, was properly admitted to prove unreported income.

United States v. Shaw, 701 F.2d 367 (5th Cir. 1983) : Upholding convictions for murder and other offenses, the Court found that the prosecutor properly asked the defendant whether he had been drinking prior to the offenses charged and if he had become violent when drinking. This was not an attempt to establish character, but was a proper inquiry into whether intoxicants affected the defendant's behavior on the very night in question. On a petition for rehearing, n50 the Court observed that the evidence was relevant to show intent and to counter a defense of accident. See also United States v. Tafoya n51(evidence of defendant's assassination efforts was admissible in a tax prosecution to show that the defendant had earned money that he claimed was a gift).

United States v. Cunningham, 103 F.3d 553 (7th Cir. 1996) : A nurse was convicted for tampering with syringes by replacing Demerol with a saline solution. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the nurse's license had four years earlier been suspended as a result of Demerol addiction and her theft of Demerol from another hospital. The addiction provided a motive for the charged tampering, and the suspension provided essential context for evidence that she had previously falsified drug test results, which had permitted her to continue to work as a nurse, with access to Demerol. In United States v. Jordan, n52 the Court held it was proper to refer to the defendant's acts that caused him to be barred from an airbase, to show the background for a subsequent charge of aggravated battery upon a security officer.

United States v. Fleck, 413 F.3d 883 (8th Cir. 2005) : In a prosecution for felon firearm possession arising out of guns observed when officers were investigating the alleged possession of stolen property, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to permit a detective to testify that the search for stolen property arose from an insurance fraud investigation and to explain the alleged fraud. The fraud testimony in no way completed the story of the defendants' gun possession, since the facts did not "provide any context for and were not inextricably intertwined--indeed they had nothing to do with--the commission of the crime of possessing firearms as a felon." In a prosecution for gang-related murder and drug trafficking, United States v. Jefferson, 215 F.3d 820 (8th Cir. 2000) , the Court held that evidence of one defendant's felony conviction for witness tampering and another defendant's juvenile conviction for assault were properly admitted as background evidence. The government proved that the defendants decided to kill a witness after they concluded that assaulting him was insufficient retaliation. In United States v. Forcelle, n53 the Court reversed a conviction for fraud arising out of the defendant's use of his employer's funds for a racing chassis and a beach-front house, holding it was error to admit evidence that he had stolen platinum from the employer. The evidence provided only a discrete example of the defendant's misappropriation of company resources and no additional context for the crime charged.

United States v. Parks, 285 F.3d 1133 (9th Cir. 2002) : Affirming bank robbery and firearm convictions, the Court held that it was error (but harmless) when a police detective testified that he had been conducting "robbery surveillance" on the defendant prior to the robbery for which the defendant was arrested. The Court agreed that the testimony related to "prior crimes evidence," because "[t]he statement was directly related to other crimes and a jury would likely infer from the statement that Parks had committed bank robberies in the past." In United States v. Andaverde, 64 F.3d 1305 (9th Cir. 1995) , the Court affirmed a felon firearm possession conviction, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting police officers' mention of a burglary that was the basis of a search warrant, since the weapon was found during execution of that warrant. References to the burglary were not extensive, so not prejudicial, and they supplied background for the officers' behavior. In United States v. O'Connor, n54 the Court upheld the introduction of evidence concerning an aborted narcotics venture, which showed the background of subsequent cocaine activity that was the target of a government "sting" operation. See also United States v. Nadler n55(evidence of previous counterfeiting operation admissible in case charging counterfeiting offense to show background of conspiracy and common scheme).

United States v. Sarracino, 131 F.3d 943 (10th Cir. 1997) : While a fugitive after committing the two charged murders, the defendant violently assaulted two babysitters at his wife's house. During the attack he threatened to kill them, saying, "I'm down for two, what's two more." The Court held that although the context evidence of the assault related to the defendant's admission rather than directly to the charged crime (as in the usual case), it did not show merely that the defendant had a tendency to violence, and was admissible. In a prosecution for misappropriation of bank funds, United States v. Harenberg, n56 the Court held that evidence of the defendant's handling of other funds was admissible to show how the bank's funds were typically handled and who had authority to move funds.

United States v. Leichtman, 742 F.2d 598 (11th Cir. 1984) : The Court held that where a kidnapping conspiracy grew out of a marijuana transaction, marijuana evidence was not extrinsic or "other crime" evidence. See also United States v. Williford n57(evidence of cocaine transaction admissible to explain events in marijuana prosecution).

[iii] Rule 404(b) -- Background -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Childs, 598 F.2d 169 (D.C. Cir. 1979) : The Court upheld a conviction for obstruction of mailed matter, but warned that it did not "subscribe to the broad proposition that evidence of other offenses may be introduced simply because it recounts events temporally related to the commission of a crime for which the accused is on trial."

United States v. Hicks, 389 F.3d 514 (5th Cir. 2004) : Affirming a conviction for a firearms violation, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that an officer was shot to death in a high speed chase, the defendant was arrested for this crime, a search of his house turned up a.30-.30 rifle, and casings from such a rifle were found at the scene of the shooting. The evidence was relevant because it would explain to the jury why the officer was not available to testify, and the prejudice from the evidence was minimal, because the jury could not have concluded that the defendant was responsible for the officer's death unless it also concluded that he possessed the ammunition in question.

United States v. Boykin, 679 F.2d 1240 (8th Cir. 1982) : The Court upheld cross-examination of the defendant in a mail fraud case about his dating two women at the same time, as it showed the "blind trust" of one of them, which the defendant had exploited in his scheme.

United States v. DeGeorge, 380 F.3d 1203 (9th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed conspiracy, fraud, and perjury convictions of a defendant alleged to have participated in as scheme to defraud by purchasing a yacht, inflating its value through a series of sham transactions, obtaining insurance on the inflated value, and attempting to collect on the insurance after scuttling the vessel. The Trial Judge admitted evidence that the defendant had previously lost three insured vessels at sea, but excluded evidence that the defendant had collected on the insurance on those occasions. The Court rejected the argument that the loss of the boats constituted a part of the transaction giving rise to the charge, but it upheld the argument that the evidence was necessary for the prosecutor to explain to the jury why the defendant could not obtain insurance in his own name. In United States v. Beckman, 298 F.3d 788 (9th Cir. 2002) , the Court affirmed convictions for importing and possessing marijuana for distribution, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting a codefendant's testimony regarding prior drug runs by the defendant. The evidence helped provide a "coherent and comprehensible story" regarding the charged crimes, since it tended to establish the codefendant's relationship to the defendant, to show that the relationship was ongoing, to refute the defendant's claim that he had no knowledge of marijuana in a trailer, and to explain why he was entrusted with marijuana valued at more than $1,000,000.

United States v. Sullivan, 919 F.2d 1403 (10th Cir. 1990) : The Court reversed convictions for a conspiracy to manufacture amphetamine because of the erroneous admission of testimony that a defendant had previously participated in an unrelated amphetamine "cook." Although the prosecutor offered the evidence as "part of the history of the conspiracy," he made no effort to explain its probative purpose or to connect it to the charged crimes.

United States v. Chilcote, 724 F.2d 1498 (11th Cir. 1984) : The Court upheld cocaine convictions, although it found error in the admission of testimony by an undercover agent that the defendant had told him he had flown a plane to Colombia. The agent's testimony would have been completely comprehensible without mention of the defendant's statement, which was totally unrelated to the crimes charged.

[iv] Rule 404(b) -- Background -- Relationship of Participants

United States v. Gaviria, 116 F.3d 1498 (D.C. Cir. 1997) : The Court held in a prosecution for distribution of cocaine that evidence of separate heroin transactions was admissible to show a relationship among parties to the cocaine conspiracy.

United States v. Tse, 375 F.3d 148 (1st Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed a conviction for distributing cocaine, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the defendant engaged in a drug transaction with a confidential informant several months after the charged transaction, since it tended to refute the defendant's claim that his earlier meeting with the informant was innocent. In United States v. Flecha-Maldonado, 373 F.3d 170 (1st Cir. 2004) , the Court affirmed drug and firearm convictions, holding that the probative value of an informant's testimony that he had committed several crimes with the defendant was not substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect. The testimony explained why the defendant initially trusted the informant and was willing to participate in the criminal venture. In United States v. Balthazard, n58 the Court affirmed convictions for a conspiracy involving a massive marijuana growing operation, finding no error when one of the bud-pickers was asked whether he had ever received marijuana from one of the defendants. Even if the witness was not a member of the conspiracy when he received the marijuana, the evidence was admissible to show the background, formation, and development of his subsequent illegal relationship with the defendant. In United States v. Santana, n59 the Court affirmed cocaine convictions, finding no error in the admission of evidence that the defendant supplied drugs to a government witness for years prior to the charged conspiracy. The evidence was admissible to explain the background and formation of the conspiracy. Although the Court stated that it was "concerned" about the length of time between the first meeting of the defendant and the witness, it did not find the testimony unduly prejudicial in view of its importance in explaining how the drug conspiracy was formed. In United States v. Perrotta, n60 the Court affirmed convictions involving extortionate extensions of credit, finding no error in the admission of evidence that guns, brass knuckles, and a fake bomb were seized from the defendant's home and a billy club was seized from his car. Together with a recording of a conversation between the defendant and an accomplice the day after the searches and seizures in which the accomplice said that he was afraid that these very items had been taken from the defendant, the evidence tended to establish the connection between the defendant and the accomplice, to show that the accomplice was alarmed by the seizures, and thus to prove that the defendant was an important part of the racketeering conspiracy. In United States v. Morris, n61 the Court affirmed convictions on prostitution-related charges, upholding the admission of a witness' testimony that one of the defendants had broken into her apartment, abducted her, and beaten her on different occasions, to show the relationship of the witness to the defendant and the purpose behind any interstate transportation.

United States v. Williams, 205 F.3d 23 (2d Cir. 2000) : In a prosecution for conspiracy to import narcotics, the Court held that evidence of uncharged misconduct committed by the defendant with two of his conspirators in the crime charged was properly admitted "to inform the jury of the background of the conspiracy charged, to complete the story of the crimes charged, and to help explain to the jury how the illegal relationship between the participants in the crime developed." In a fraud prosecution arising out of a stolen check scheme, United States v. Pascarella, 84 F.3d 61 (2d Cir. 1996) , the Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of one defendant's past gambling dealings with some of the coconspirators. Although the prior bad acts were not similar to those charged, similarity is required only when the evidence is used to prove knowledge, intent, or a common scheme or plan; wholly different acts may be used to show the background of a conspiracy or the development of a relationship of trust between the participants, as here. In United States v. Brennan, n62 the Court affirmed bribery and corruption convictions of a former State Judge, finding that evidence of the alleged fixing of cases not charged in the indictment was properly admitted to prove the relationship of the defendant and another person. In United States v. Bufalino, n63 the Court upheld a conviction for conspiracy to violate civil rights, finding that the government was properly permitted to question the defendant about organized crime connections to show that he might have prevailed upon a member of a crime organization to commit a murder as a matter of "professional courtesy."

United States v. Vega, 285 F.3d 256 (3d Cir. 2002) : Affirming a conviction for heroin distribution offenses, the Court held that testimony of a witness regarding the defendant's participation in another conspiracy and notebook pages containing references to the defendant with regard to the other conspiracy were properly admitted over a Rule 404(b) objection. The evidence was relevant to prove the defendant's knowledge of the uncharged conspiracy and his relationship with a particular member in that conspiracy, which tended to support the government's claim of a continuing relationship in the charged conspiracy. In United States v. Butch, 256 F.3d 171 (3d Cir. 2001) , a dispatcher for a courier service was convicted of conspiring to possess and distribute drugs stolen from the service in June. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that in the preceding January the defendant had solicited one of the men actually involved in the drug theft to steal a drug shipment, as the evidence tended to show the background of the charged conspiracy and the relationship of the alleged conspirators. In United States v. Palma-Ruedas, n64 the defendants were charged with a conspiracy to sell 30 kilos of cocaine and with kidnapping a middleman after the purchaser absconded without paying. The deal had been set up after an earlier 14-kilo deal had been frustrated by the arrest of the courier. Affirming convictions, the Court held that evidence of the 14-kilo deal was admissible to show the relationship of the parties, who the government contended set up the later deal to offset the loss caused earlier. The Court expressed concern, but did not find reversible error, as to the admission of evidence concerning five other earlier deals, also offered to show relationships among the participants, because the risk of prejudice was significant.

United States v. Hardy, 228 F.3d 745 (6th Cir. 2000) : The Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit, in the prosecution of a 1996-97 cocaine distribution conspiracy, evidence that a cooperating witness had engaged in drug transactions with the defendant in 1990. The evidence had been admitted as "background" showing the development of the relationship between the witness and the defendant, but the Court noted that admissible background evidence is subject to "severe limitations in terms of temporal proximity, causal relationship, or special connections." In this case, the uncharged acts occurred six years prior to the charged conspiracy, did not establish the inception of the charged conspiracy, did not involve the same parties, and were not necessary to explain the charged offense or complete the story of the witness' testimony. Affirming a conviction for assisting an escaped felon in United States v. Fraser, n65 the Court held that evidence of occasions prior to the indictment when the defendant met with the escapee were properly admitted to show their relationship. See also United States v. Ismail n66(prior hashish and cocaine transactions admissible in heroin prosecution to demonstrate relationship between the defendant and another man and to demonstrate a scheme to import substances).

United States v. Hughes, 310 F.3d 557 (7th Cir. 2002) : Affirming convictions for offenses involving the production and distribution of counterfeit currency, the Court held that evidence of the defendants' involvement in an odometer tampering scheme was properly admitted to prove that the two "had a working relationship prior to the commission of this crime, a matter that might have been of some interest to the jury in light of the finger-pointing that took place between the defendants." The Court noted, however, that the admissibility issue was "a relatively close one." In United States v. Ward, 211 F.3d 356 (7th Cir. 2000) , the Court affirmed convictions for a large-scale drug distribution conspiracy, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by two cooperating witnesses regarding drug involvement with the defendant prior to the charged conspiracy. While there was no dispute that the defendant knew the witnesses, the testimony was integral to the complete story of the charged conspiracy, in that it outlined the development of the relationship of trust that led to the men's respective roles in the conspiracy. In a prosecution for murder in a prison, United States v. McKinney, n67 the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the gang to which the defendant belonged had committed other murders. The government's theory was that the murder resulted from a gang contract, so how the gang operated was relevant to the charge, and the Trial Judge had been careful to limit the testimony about the gang and to preclude testimony implicating the defendant in any other murders. See also United States v. Potts n68(evidence of the defendant's involvement in prison drug smuggling was admissible in prosecution for conspiracy to transport and present altered postal money orders, since the smuggling involved the same network of conspirators whose interests were intertwined).

United States v. Orozco-Rodriguez, 220 F.3d 940 (8th Cir. 2000) : A witness testified that he operated as a go-between in the charged narcotics transactions, and that the defendant had sold the witness drugs on prior occasions. The Court held that the evidence of uncharged misconduct was properly admitted, because it established a relationship between the defendant and the witness that helped explain why the witness could act as a go-between for drug transactions between the defendant and someone whom the defendant did not know. In United States v. Horvath, n69 the Court affirmed tax evasion convictions, finding that evidence of one defendant's participation in a drug conspiracy was properly admitted to show that he had knowledge of and involvement in the concealment of other defendants' drug income. See also United States v. DeLuna n70(various other crimes evidence was properly admitted in a prosecution for casino skimming conspiracy to show relationship of various people and interests in the casino).

United States v. Ramirez, 176 F.3d 1179 (9th Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiring to import marijuana, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant had previously crossed the Mexican border in a vehicle rented by the unindicted coconspirator, where the defendant was listed on the rental contract as an additional driver. Although there was no evidence of illegal conduct on the prior occasion, the repetition of similar border crossings tended to show an ongoing conspiracy. In United States v. Normandeau, n71 the Court held that evidence that defendants who imported marijuana in motor mounts had previously imported such mounts was admissible to show their prior relationship, whether or not it involved marijuana. See also United States v. McKoy n72(evidence that a defendant charged with involvement in stolen goods previously bought stolen merchandise from a codefendant was properly admitted to prove background).

United States v. Neal, 718 F.2d 1505 (10th Cir. 1983) : Evidence of the relationship between a government witness and the defendant's relatives was properly admitted to show a scheme to defraud.

United States v. McCrimmon, 362 F.3d 725 (11th Cir. 2004) : Affirming a conviction for conspiring to bring investors into an illegal scheme and to launder the proceeds, the Court found no error in admitting testimony by the scheme ringleader that the defendant and a coconspirator had worked together on other schemes, since the prior relationship was relevant to explain the chain of events leading to the charged scheme. In United States v. Alonso, n73 the defendants' personal use of cocaine was relevant to show why drug suppliers accepted their aid in criminal ventures.

[v] Rule 404(b) -- Background -- Relationship to Hearsay Rule

United States v. Evans, 216 F.3d 80 (D.C. Cir. 2000) : In a drug prosecution, the Trial Judge permitted an FBI agent to testify that he had received information from a federal inmate that the defendant was involved in drug trafficking. The testimony was ostensibly admitted not for its truth, but only as "background," to explain the agent's conduct in arresting the defendant. Finding admission of the out-of-court statements to be error (but harmless), the Court reasoned that the statement was of limited use as background evidence, and "[t]here was considerable danger that the jury would consider the information about Evans' prior drug crimes for its truth, and hence as evidence of his propensity to commit the crimes with which he was charged."

[l] Rule 404(b) -- Balancing

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Discretion To Admit

United States v. Kramer, 955 F.2d 479 (7th Cir. 1992) : Affirming convictions for conspiring to distribute marijuana as part of a continuing criminal enterprise that imported marijuana, the Court held that the Trial Judge exercised principled discretion in admitting evidence that one of the defendants had imported 15 tons of marijuana in 1981, as the evidence showed specific intent, was not too remote to be relevant, and its prejudicial effect, if any, did not substantially outweigh its probative value. In United States v. Chaverra-Cardona, n74 the Trial Judge properly admitted evidence of the underlying drug case and of the defendant's drug trafficking and finances to show motive, intent, and opportunity to carry out a charged conspiracy to murder a government attorney and a government witness. The Court held that details of most of the other acts were highly probative on those issues, so the value of the evidence was not significantly outweighed by the prejudicial effect of the image created of Colombian drug dealers; some of the minute details elicited regarding the investigation were not probative of the issues, but neither were they prejudicial.

United States v. Meester, 762 F.2d 867 (11th Cir. 1985) : Affirming drug conspiracy convictions, the Court held there was no error in admitting evidence that certain conspirators killed a pilot who refused to return an airplane until he was paid, as the evidence tended to show a continuing conspiracy. In United States v. Terebecki, n75 the Court affirmed a conviction for aiding and abetting wire fraud, finding no error in the admission of evidence concerning a questionable transaction that occurred some 15 months after the charged fraud. The Court found that the testimony of a participant in the later transaction was enough for the jury to find that it actually occurred and held that the Trial Judge's decision to admit such evidence despite a claim of unfair prejudice under Rule 403 "will not be disturbed on appeal absent a clear showing of an abuse of discretion." See also United States v. Messersmith n76(upholding, despite a Rule 403 challenge, admission of evidence that a defendant charged with unlawful possession and importation with intent to distribute methaqualone previously went out of the country to smuggle quaaludes).

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Balancing -- Error To Admit

[A] Rule 404(b) -- Doubts About Other Act

United States v. Rhodes, 886 F.2d 375 (D.C. Cir. 1989) : In reversing a conviction for bank fraud and forgery, the Court held it was plain error to admit evidence of other fraudulent activity. Because the activity was not sufficiently connected with the defendant, it did not undermine his defense that he did not know that the check he presented was bad.

United States v. Fortenberry, 860 F.2d 628 (5th Cir. 1988) : The Court reversed convictions for offenses allegedly committed when the defendant placed a small explosive device on a car belonging to his ex-wife's father. It concluded that evidence of a series of attacks against the ex-wife, her attorney, her father, and others was improperly admitted for several reasons: The evidence concerned highly prejudicial acts, the government had no evidence that the defendant committed the acts, there was not even evidence that all were committed by the same person, and the so-called pattern did not appear to prove any fact in dispute in light of the defendant's concession of motive and opportunity to commit the charged crimes. In United States v. Shavers, n77 an assault with a deadly weapon case, the Court found an abuse of discretion in the admission of ambiguous evidence regarding a prior act -- making an arguably threatening statement while using a knife to slice a grapefruit -- which "permitted the jury to infer that Shavers is a violent person with a propensity to use knives against people."

United States v. Latouf, 132 F.3d 320 (6th Cir. 1997) : The defendant was charged with an insurance fraud scheme to burn down her restaurant. The government introduced, as evidence of the defendant's motive and plan, testimony that she earlier had offered $5,000 to two employees to burn down her house. The Court found that admission of the evidence was error, but harmless. There was no factual finding below that the overtures allegedly made by the defendant had actually been made; the availability of ample more direct evidence of the defendant's financial problems and of the defendant's planning made the testimony unneeded and unduly prejudicial; and the limiting instruction, albeit appropriate in specifying the purpose for which the evidence might be considered, was poorly timed, being given only on Monday after the evidence was introduced on Friday. One Judge did not consider admission of the evidence to be error.

United States v. Heath, 188 F.3d 916 (7th Cir. 1999) : The Court reversed drug and firearm convictions, finding error in the admission of evidence that in an unrelated incident the defendant's companion was arrested on drug charges and the defendant was arrested on firearms charges related to a stop of the defendant's truck in which the police found two handguns and a bottle of pills on the defendant. At trial, the defendant claimed he was a drug user and buyer, not a seller, and that he lacked the intent to distribute. The Court found that the government had offered no evidence to demonstrate that the defendant intended to aid his companion in the prior incident or knew what the companion was doing with respect to drugs. It concluded that the prior incident failed to demonstrate that the defendant was knowingly in the company of a large-scale drug distributor or intentionally sought to protect such a distributor, and therefore the prior incident was not relevant to proving intent with respect to the charged offense.

United States v. Dozal, 173 F.3d 787 (10th Cir. 1999) : In a trial on cocaine charges, evidence that the defendant had previously been a passenger in a car in which police found bundles of marijuana stored in the door panels was admitted to show knowledge and intent. Finding admission of the evidence to be error (but harmless), the Court stated that "without either a conviction or some evidence that Mr. Dozal was knowingly involved with the concealed drugs, his prior arrest does not constitute a crime or wrong." The evidence was not probative of intent or knowledge because the government never demonstrated that the defendant was involved in the prior drug transaction or that he knew the door panels contained contraband.

[B] Rule 404(b) -- Balancing -- Error To Admit -- Inflammatory Evidence

United States v. Pratt, 73 F.3d 450 (1st Cir. 1996) : In a prosecution for mailing a threatening communication (a dead and badly mutilated pig) to a police chief, the Court held it was error (but not plain error) to admit evidence that the defendant had also called the chief's house and left a threatening message with a young friend of the chief's ten-year-old daughter. The evidence tended to show the identity of the person who mailed the pig, but the prosecution's use to show the emotional effect of the threats on the chief's family was not relevant and magnified the prejudice the Rule was designed to minimize.

United States v. Grimes, 244 F.3d 375 (5th Cir. 2001) : The defendant was charged with possession of child pornography after pictures of nude children were found on his computer. The Court vacated his conviction because two sexually-explicit narratives, also found on the computer, were introduced as evidence of his intent and state of mind. The narratives were relevant to help show that the possession of the photographs was unlikely to have been accidental when a person was also downloading narratives that involved sexual contact between adults and minors. However, their probative value was substantially outweighed by their prejudicial effect; they were "vile in their graphic and violent nature," depicting violent rapes and moderate torture, while the photographs depicted no violence. In a prosecution for misapplication of savings and loan funds, United States v. Hays, n78 the Court held that prejudicial error was committed when the government was permitted to introduce evidence concerning one defendant's allegedly improper activities during a time he was attempting to secure sufficient deposits to permit continued operation of another, provisionally chartered savings and loan association. The Court concluded that the evidence was cumulative, inflammatory and unduly prejudicial, and that it represented an effort to attack the character of the defendants.

United States v. Best, 250 F.3d 1084 (7th Cir. 2001) : In a prosecution for possession of crack cocaine with intent to distribute, the Court found it was error (but harmless) to admit an officer's testimony that on a prior occasion he had come upon the defendant while pursuing a homicide suspect into a house and that he saw ammunition there. The evidence that distribution levels of crack were also present was relevant and admissible to show the defendant's intent on the charged occasion, but the testimony about the homicide suspect and the ammunition "invited the jury to infer that Best associated with suspected murderers and possessed firearms, thereby potentially raising the specter of unfair prejudice."

United States v. Flynn, 852 F.2d 1045 (8th Cir. 1988) : In a racketeering case, the Court upheld the admission of evidence concerning the defendant's acts of retaliation against a family, since it demonstrated his relationship to the enterprise. It concluded, however, that discussions among members of the enterprise concerning contemplated murders was unduly prejudicial, and that "[t]he RICO statute has a tremendous potential for guilt by association." Error in admitting the evidence was harmless, however.

People of Terr. of Guam v. Shymanovitz, 157 F.3d 1154 (9th Cir. 1998) : The Court reversed a conviction for unlawful sexual activity with minors, because of the improper admission of testimony regarding the contents of sexually explicit gay adult magazines found in the defendant's house. While the magazines could possibly have been relevant to whether the defendant had the purpose of being sexually aroused, or was actually sexually aroused, by the charged improper touching of underage boys, the statute under which he was prosecuted applied only an objective test, which made the character of the touching, not the purpose of the toucher, at issue. Furthermore, possession of the magazines was not probative of whether the conduct with which the defendant was charged was intentional. Even if the evidence were somehow relevant, its suggestion of the defendant's sexual orientation, and implication of sexual deviancy, was highly prejudicial and substantially outweighed any probative value. In a suit for unpaid withholding taxes, Phillips v. United States IRS, 73 F.3d 939 (9th Cir. 1996) , the Court held that it was error (but harmless) to admit evidence that an airline administrator had said, when advised to hire more pilots for safety reasons, "Let's live dangerously." Such a comment would tend to make a jury think that he purposely endangered passengers, and would encourage the jury to punish him, but would have little tendency to prove he willfully caused withholding-tax reserves to be diverted to other creditors. In United States v. Robertson, n79 the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit evidence that a drug dealer who had been trying to collect a debt from the defendant was never seen again after a car similar to the defendant's was observed at the drug dealer's house. The evidence, as well as evidence of the defendant's drug use and spousal abuse, did not tend to prove any material element of the cocaine distribution and RICO offenses charged. One Judge, specially concurring, noted that reversal might have been warranted in a closer case and that prosecutors should "focus their attention more carefully on prosecuting the defendant under charges appropriate to his crimes, and on distinguishing legitimate substantive evidence from evidence of bad acts that serves principally to prejudice the jurors."

United States v. McDermott, 64 F.3d 1448 (10th Cir. 1995) : In reversing a defendant's drug-related convictions for violation of his right to self-representation, the Court held that evidence that the defendant had threatened to kill an associate's girlfriend should not have been admitted. Even if relevant to prove that the defendant was part of a criminal organization, the evidence was unduly prejudicial. In United States v. Soundingsides, n80 the Court reversed a murder conviction, finding, inter alia, that it was error to admit testimony by the defendant's former girlfriend that he frequently beat her and caused her to lose her baby. The testimony involved five-year-old events, and the Court concluded that the evidence was of little probative value. There was no real dispute that whoever killed the victim in the instant case did so with malice, and the prior act evidence was extremely prejudicial.

[C] Rule 404(b) -- Balancing -- Error To Admit -- Low Probative Value

United States v. Balthazard, 360 F.3d 309 (1st Cir. 2004) : Affirming a conviction for a conspiracy involving a massive marijuana growing operation, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit evidence that the defendant had used a false tax return to secure a loan for buying an expensive boat at a time when he was reporting limited income. The false return had no connection to the defendant's drug dealing; it added nothing to the prosecution evidence that his earnings had exceeded his legitimate income; and the government did not identify any other reason why the false return was relevant.

United States v. Hernandez, 975 F.2d 1035 (4th Cir. 1992) : The Court reversed a conviction for participation in a cocaine distribution conspiracy because a cooperating witness was permitted to testify during the government's direct case that the defendant had told him she had a special recipe for cooking crack because she "used to do that, sell that in New York." The relevance of the evidence to show intent was at best slight. The evidence was not necessary to show the context of the crime, and it was barely reliable. The Court held that, in any event, the balance of probative value and prejudicial effect was so one-sided that admission of the evidence was error. In United States v. Melia, n81 the Court found it was an abuse of discretion in a prosecution for receipt of stolen property to admit testimony that a government witness had been to the defendant's house on other occasions for illegal purposes. The Court emphasized that even though the defendant was tried for a "specific intent" crime, the other crime evidence offered against him was insufficiently probative to warrant admission in light of its prejudicial impact.

United States v. Jackson, 339 F.3d 349 (5th Cir. 2003) : Reversing a conviction for transporting stolen goods from a jewelry store burglary, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to admit evidence that the defendant had a previous felony conviction for stealing watches and testimony from his parole officer (ostensibly called only to prove his address) regarding the defendant's parole status. While prior conviction evidence has a tendency to prove the difficult intent element in conspiracy cases, that the defendant knowingly joined a plan to further an unlawful objective, in this case, where there was other evidence going to intent and only the identification issue was contested, the evidence had very little probative value. Moreover, it had a substantial potential to cause unfair prejudice, because of the great danger that the jury would decide that he was involved in the conspiracy because of his prior criminal conduct. Similarly, the parole officer's testimony had minuscule probative value, because the defendant's residence was not really at issue and there was other evidence on the point, while it had substantial potential for prejudice In a fraud case arising out of a scheme to sell and pass "Certified Money Orders," United States v. Mikolajczyk, 137 F.3d 237 (5th Cir. 1998) , the defendants included two of the scheme's instigators who, in representing themselves, attempted to justify their conduct by attacking the monetary system. The Court held it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to admit evidence that another defendant had filed a public notice "rescinding" her tax returns: the defendant's past protest activity did not impugn her credibility because it did not involve any fraud or illegal activity; its relevance to her intent or motive was only slight, since there was no suggestion she had a protest motive when using the CMOs; and the evidence presented an implication of the defendant's guilt by association with the two instigators. A concurring Judge would have found that the "rescinding" public notice, being filed within a month of the defendant's passing the CMO, was relevant to rebut her defense of good faith and lack of intent.

United States v. Haywood, 280 F.3d 715 (6th Cir. 2002) : The Court reversed a conviction for possession of crack cocaine with intent to distribute because the defendant's conviction for possession of crack four months later was erroneously admitted. The latter offense involved 1.3 grams of crack, while the charged offense was for 18 grams. Possession of the smaller amount, which was consistent with personal use, shed no light on the defendant's intent to distribute, so the only value of the evidence would be to show a propensity toward illegal drug possession. The dissenting Judge argued that "[e]vidence that a defendant carries a certain kind of drug with him suggests a degree of involvement in the trade that tends to support an inference of intent to distribute that drug at another time," and, in his view, it also tended to show that possession on the earlier (charged) occasion was knowing.

United States v. Beasley, 809 F.2d 1273 (7th Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed a conviction for attempting to obtain a controlled substance by misrepresenting the name of the person to appear on prescriptions, but reversed the defendant's convictions for obtaining the substance with the intent to distribute. Evidence that the defendant had acquired and distributed other drugs was erroneously admitted, since the other acts were not similar to the scheme alleged in the instant case.

United States v. Crenshaw, 359 F.3d 977 (8th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed convictions for murder in aid of racketeering although the government had been erroneously permitted to introduce a certified copy of one defendant's prior conviction for shooting another man. While evidence that the defendant was incarcerated along with a member of the gang that he joined had probative value, evidence of the charge for which he was incarcerated had little relevance. The prior conviction also had some probative value to prove an intent to murder, but there was no showing that theory was relied on by the government proffering, or the Judge in admitting, the evidence. In any event, the probative value of the evidence was limited, and substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect. In a narcotics case, United States v. Vaughn, 111 F.3d 610 (8th Cir. 1997) , the Court found it was error (but harmless) to admit evidence that the defendant purchased vehicles and put the titles in the names of other people. The government offered this evidence on the premise that drug dealers "frequently mistitle assets to conceal ill-gotten gains." However, the Court found that "Vaughn's past mistitling of assets creates at best only a weak inference that he has trafficked in drugs in the past," while the potential for unfair prejudice was high.

United States v. Bradley, 5 F.3d 1317 (9th Cir. 1993) : The Court reversed the defendants' convictions for conspiring and attempting to kill a witness scheduled to testify against one of their associates. Evidence of their involvement in another murder plot (in which a homicide actually occurred, although the wrong man was killed) had little probative value because the evidence connecting them with that murder was vague, the motivations in the two cases were dissimilar, and the evidence implicating their associate in the homicide was so weak that the testimony did little to advance the jurors' knowledge of the crucial relationship between the defendants and the associate. At the same time, the evidence was highly and unfairly prejudicial, especially in suggesting that the defendants were incompetent hired guns who could not even kill the right person. In United States v. Hill, 953 F.2d 452 (9th Cir. 1991) , a conviction for conspiracy to distribute cocaine was reversed because a coconspirator had been permitted to testify to having used cocaine with the defendant five years previously. The Court held that the evidence was not probative of the background and development of, nor inextricably intertwined with, the conspiracy. Although it might have been relevant to the defendant's knowledge and intent, when admitted as direct evidence of the conspiracy it was given more weight than it deserved and its prejudicial and confusing effect substantially outweighed its probative value. See also United States v. Hodges n82(reversing a conviction for conspiracy to defraud lending institutions; evidence that approximately five months after the last alleged act of the conspiracy the defendant attempted to extort money from an alleged coconspirator to paint a favorable picture of her involvement was not highly probative of the defendant's state of mind at the time of the alleged conspiracy).

United States v. Oberle, 136 F.3d 1414 (10th Cir. 1998) : In a bank robbery case the prosecution introduced a letter, written after his arrest by the defendant to his brother, that said: "Just tell her I'm going back to prison on a violation. Don't tell her that I have a new case." Because a natural reading of the statement is not particularly inculpatory on the crime charged and because it informed the jury of the defendant's prior record, the Court considered that "it may have been an abuse of discretion to conclude that the statement's probative value outweighed its prejudice," but any error was harmless.

[D] Rule 404(b) -- Balancing -- Error To Admit -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. James, 555 F.2d 992 (D.C. Cir. 1977) : The Court reversed a conviction for possession of heroin with intent to distribute on the ground that evidence of an arrest 16 days before the charged offense was improperly admitted. After rejecting the argument that the defense opened the door to the evidence, the Court found that the probative value of the arrest, if offered on the issue of intent, was very weak, and in view of its lurid details, concluded that "we perceive no balance on which it properly could have been admitted."

United States v. Gilbert, 229 F.3d 15 (1st Cir. 2000) : A nurse at a VA hospital was charged with capital murder after patients in her care died in suspicious circumstances. The prosecution theory was that she had injected the patients with drugs causing cardiac difficulties in order to gain attention, especially from a hospital police officer with whom she was having an affair. On interlocutory appeal of an in limine ruling that excluded evidence that the defendant had attempted to murder her husband by giving him a poisonous injection, the Court found no abuse of discretion. The probative value of the evidence was "very much open to question," and, given that the defendant disputed the incident, its presentation would require a mini-trial, taking time and injecting collateral issues. And the inflammatory nature of the evidence made it highly susceptible to being misused by the jury. In a prosecution for unlawful possession of a firearm, United States v. Currier, n83 the Court found error (albeit harmless) in the admission of portions of a tape recording in which the defendant offered to sell Valium, since the prejudicial effect of the evidence outweighed its probative value.

United States v. Latouf, 132 F.3d 320 (6th Cir. 1997) : The Court found it was error (but harmless) to admit, as evidence of the defendant's motive and plan to commit insurance fraud by burning down her restaurant, testimony that she earlier had offered $5,000 to two employees to burn down her house. There was no factual finding below that the overtures allegedly made by the defendant had actually been made; the availability of ample more direct evidence of the defendant's financial problems and of the defendant's planning made the testimony unneeded and unduly prejudicial; and the limiting instruction, albeit appropriate in specifying the purpose for which the evidence might be considered, was poorly timed, being given only on Monday after the evidence was introduced on Friday. In United States v. Ebens, n84 the Court reversed a conviction for interfering with the civil rights of a citizen of Chinese descent. It found that evidence that a man who might have been the defendant had made a derogatory remark about a black man some eight years earlier should have been excluded. There was a danger that the jury would use the evidence as character evidence, it was remote in time, and the showing that it was the defendant who made the statement was weak.

United States v. Forcelle, 86 F.3d 838 (8th Cir. 1996) : The Court reversed a conviction for fraud arising out of the defendant's use of his employer's funds for a racing chassis and a beach-front house, holding it was error to admit evidence that he had stolen platinum from the employer, since this act was not similar to the crimes charged. The Court found that the government emphasized this evidence and that its admission was prejudicial. In United States v. Sandow, 78 F.3d 388 (8th Cir. 1996) , the defendant, an insurance agent and broker, was tried on two fraud charges, one arising out of his inducing a customer in 1990 to pledge an annuity and the other arising out of a 1991-93 scheme to collect premiums without providing insurance. The government introduced evidence that in 1990 the defendant's insurance license was suspended for misappropriating customer funds, in order to show "motive, intent, or plan." The defendant conceded that the license suspension was properly admitted in the annuity pledge case. The Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit the evidence in the insurance fraud case, since any probative value it might have was far outweighed by its potential for generating unfair prejudice.

United States v. Brooke, 4 F.3d 1480 (9th Cir. 1993) : A conviction for offenses arising out of a pipe bombing was reversed for improper admission of evidence that the defendant had falsely claimed to friends to be suffering from terminal cancer. Any probative value the evidence had to show the defendant's efforts to gain help in disrupting the victim's relationship with the defendant's former boyfriend was substantially outweighed by the prejudicial effect of inducing resentment against one feigning cancer.

United States v. Shepherd, 739 F.2d 510 (10th Cir. 1984) : A conviction for transporting an explosive and conspiracy was overturned, as the Court found that an accomplice should not have been permitted to testify about the defendant's prior use of explosives. The Court concluded that the jury might have been led by the prior crime evidence to overlook the fact that the accomplice's uncorroborated testimony was the only evidence linking the defendant to the crime charged and to the prior crimes.

[E] Rule 404(b) -- Balancing -- Error To Admit -- Other Purposes Not in Issue

United States v. Miller, 895 F.2d 1431 (D.C. Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed a conviction for bank fraud, holding it was error (but harmless) to admit a witness' testimony as to her knowledge that the defendant had recently been released from jail, ostensibly to show her innocent motivation in agreeing to cash a forged check for him, because her state of mind had not been made relevant in the case, and any probative value was greatly outweighed by the prejudicial effect.

United States v. Ferreira, 821 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1987) : The Court reversed a bank robbery conviction, finding that it was not harmless error to admit evidence concerning weapons seized from the defendant upon his arrest. The evidence of firearms was irrelevant in a prosecution for an unarmed robbery in which there was no indication that the defendant had a gun at the time of the robbery.

United States v. Murray, 103 F.3d 310 (3d Cir. 1997) : The Court reversed a conviction for intentional killing in furtherance of a continuing criminal enterprise because of error in admitting, inter alia, evidence that the defendant had previously committed another murder. The prosecutor had only said that the evidence "wasn't just [offered for] identity. Role in the organization, common scheme, plan, a number of different reasons," and the Trial Judge's most complete explanation (in the jury charge) why it was admitted was "for the very limited purpose to show identity, role in the conspiracy, a common scheme or plan." However, there was no showing that the uncharged murder was connected to the charged CCE or that the two killings were planned together or involved a common design, nor were the similarities between the two sufficient to be relevant on the identity issue. Even if the evidence had some slight probative value, it would be substantially outweighed by the prejudicial effect of showing the defendant's murderous propensity.

[F] Rule 404(b) -- Balancing -- Error To Admit -- Purpose Uncertain

United States v. Zelinka, 862 F.2d 92 (6th Cir. 1988) : The Court found an abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant possessed cocaine at the time he was arrested, since the indictment charged a conspiracy that took place 17 months earlier. The Court faulted the Trial Judge for not requiring the prosecutor to show the relevance of the evidence and the need for its use.

United States v. Harvey, 845 F.2d 760 (8th Cir. 1988) : The Court reversed a conviction for avoiding payment of taxes relating to the sale of an airplane because the government introduced evidence that ten years earlier the defendant made large sums of money from drug transactions. The Court criticized the Trial Judge's "laundry list" approach to admissibility, "which merely restates the components of the rule," and stated that "the district court should specify which components of the rule form the basis of its ruling and why." The Court added that federal prosecutors should never have offered this other crime evidence.

United States v. Sullivan, 919 F.2d 1403 (10th Cir. 1990) : The Court reversed convictions for offenses arising out of a conspiracy to manufacture amphetamine because of the erroneous admission of testimony that a defendant had previously participated in an unrelated amphetamine "cook." Although the prosecutor offered the evidence as "part of the history of the conspiracy," he made no effort to explain its probative purpose or connect it to the charged crimes.

[G] Rule 404(b) -- Balancing -- Error To Admit -- Similarity to Crime Charged

United States v. Nichols, 781 F.2d 483 (5th Cir. 1986) : The defendant had previously been tried and convicted of two conspiracies arising out of the charged cocaine trafficking, and the Trial Judge admitted the conviction as evidence of intent and identity. The Court reversed, reasoning that "these convictions told the jury that Nichols had been found guilty of conspiring to commit the very crimes for which he was then on trial. The highly prejudicial nature of such evidence substantially outweighed its probative value for intent and identity."

United States v. Aguilar-Aranceta, 58 F.3d 796 (1st Cir. 1995) : The Court reversed a conviction for possession of cocaine with intent to distribute, which arose out of the defendant's having picked up two parcels from the Post Office that contained narcotics. Although a 1986 misdemeanor conviction for possession of cocaine was relevant to prove knowledge, the prejudicial effect of the similarity of the prior conviction to the crime charged "is likely to have significantly overshadowed any legitimate probative value." The probative value of the prior conviction was minimal because the conviction was remote in time, and the evidence of the defendant's knowledge that drugs were in the packages was ambiguous at best.

[iii] Rule 404(b) -- Balancing -- Generally

United States v. Bradshaw, 935 F.2d 295 (D.C. Cir. 1991) : Affirming a bank robbery conviction, the Court noted that admission of prior convictions where sanity is the only issue presents different considerations from the usual case. Probativeness is generally unquestionable, since the insanity defense directly puts state of mind in issue, and a prior criminal record is highly relevant to the defendant's appreciation of the unacceptability of his conduct; there is no risk of primary prejudicial effect, since the defendant does not deny commission of the act; and there is a possibility that the evidence will prove not to the government's advantage, by permitting the inference that the defendant is insane, since he continues to commit the same easily-detectable crime. Although the Trial Judge's ruling was terse, it appeared from the record as a whole that the relevant factors were considered.

United States v. Siegel, 717 F.2d 9 (2d Cir. 1983) : The Court found that evidence that one defendant arranged a bribe to assure peaceful union relations was properly admitted in a mail and wire fraud case. An important part of the government's case was using the $30,000 bribe to prove that a secret cash fund existed. The Court reasoned that "if the jury believed that the bribe money came from the fund, the evidence was damaging to the defendants' case; this, however, is not the type of unfair prejudice against which defendants are protected by Rule 403." The Court emphasized that the jury was instructed that if it did not find that a payment was made from the alleged fund, it could not consider that payment.

United States v. Beasley, 809 F.2d 1273 (7th Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed a conviction for attempting to obtain a controlled substance by misrepresenting the name of the person to appear on prescriptions, but reversed the defendant's convictions for obtaining the substance with the intent to distribute. Evidence that the defendant had acquired and distributed other drugs was erroneously admitted, since the other acts were not similar to the scheme alleged in the instant case. The Court observed that "[a]lmost any bad act evidence simultaneously condemns by besmirching character and by showing one or more" of the items listed in Rule 404(b). Therefore, it is important for the Judge both to identify the exception applying to the evidence and to evaluate whether the evidence is "sufficiently probative to make tolerable the risk that jurors will act on the basis of emotion or an inference via the blackening of the defendant's character."

[iv] Rule 404(b) -- Balancing -- Inclusionary Approach

United States v. Benedetto, 571 F.2d 1246, 1248-1250 (2d Cir. 1978) : The Court indicated that it favored an "inclusionary" approach toward other crimes evidence, but noted the dangers of accepting such evidence. Referring to its past decisions, the Court wrote that "we have emphasized that admission of such strongly prejudicial evidence should normally await the conclusion of the defendant's case, since the court will then be in the best position to balance the probative worth of, and the Government's need for, such testimony against the prejudice to the defendant."

United States v. Long, 574 F.2d 761 (3d Cir. 1978) : The Court indicated that it followed an "inclusionary" approach and, while recognizing the need for balancing probative value against prejudicial effect, concluded that "[t]he draftsmen of Rule 404(b) ... intended to emphasize admissibility of 'other crime' evidence."

United States v. Roberts, 88 F.3d 872 (10th Cir. 1996) : Reviewing three pretrial evidentiary rulings in a prosecution for aggravated sexual abuse and abusive sexual conduct, the Court held that the Trial Judge should have analyzed individually the proposed testimony of nine women not named in the indictment before ruling that their testimony would be excluded as unduly prejudicial. Although the Court noted that it gives substantial deference to a Judge's Rule 403 balancing, it cautioned that exclusion under Rule 403 is an extraordinary remedy that should be used sparingly. Here, the government claimed that the totality of the evidence demonstrated a pattern of verbal and physical conduct by the defendant while the victims were employed by the Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma. Not all Rule 404(b) matters require hearings, but the unique and specific circumstances presented in this case required a witness-by-witness evaluation of evidence.

[v] Rule 404(b) -- Balancing -- Requirement of Record

United States v. Lavelle, 751 F.2d 1266 (D.C. Cir. 1985) : The Court upheld perjury and obstruction convictions of a former Assistant Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency as it found that evidence of prior false statements by the defendant was properly admitted to prove intent. Although the Court expressed a preference for a statement of reasons by Trial Judges when admitting other act evidence over objection, it noted that the defendant made no request that the Judge state reasons on the record.

United States v. Rawle, 845 F.2d 1244 (4th Cir. 1988) : The Court affirmed a marijuana conviction, even though the Trial Judge did not identify the reason for admitting evidence of prior acts by the defendant that involved transportation of marijuana. The Court stated that "[w]hile an explicit ruling may be preferable and may indeed aid this Court in reviewing the record," it would not require such a ruling in every case.

United States v. Elwood, 993 F.2d 1146 (5th Cir. 1993) : The Court remanded a conviction for drug trafficking offenses with instructions to make (as the defendant had requested in limine) record findings regarding the probative value and prejudicial effect of other crimes evidence. This was a close case and there was nothing in the record to reflect that the Trial Judge applied the correct test for admission of the evidence. On remand, the evidence was found admissible; that finding was affirmed, 999 F.2d 814 (5th Cir. 1993) . In United States v. Zabaneh, n85 the Court remanded a drug case for a determination whether other acts of the defendant should have been admitted. It stated that in the absence of balancing on the record "we must remand unless the factors upon which the probative value/prejudice evaluation was made were readily apparent from the record and there was no substantial uncertainty about the correctness of the ruling."

United States v. Acosta-Cazares, 878 F.2d 945 (6th Cir. 1989) : The Court held in a cocaine conspiracy prosecution that the failure to make findings on the record was not reversible error where counsel did not request any balancing and review of the record indicated that the probative value of other acts evidence was not substantially outweighed by its potential for prejudice.

United States v. Nagib, 56 F.3d 798 (7th Cir. 1995) : The defendant had accompanied two others when a package subsequently found to contain drugs was shipped at an airport. At trial, the Judge, reciting the exceptions in Rule 404(b), admitted proof that police had previously found a package containing drugs when they stopped the defendant's van to question him. The jury was told that this evidence could be considered only on the question of motive; on appeal, the government indicated that the evidence was introduced to demonstrate knowledge or motive. Finding that the Trial Judge did not adequately explain the basis for the Rule 404(b) ruling or discuss the danger of unfair prejudice under Rule 403, the Court remanded for reconsideration and explanation. In United States v. Archer, n86 the Court observed that it was helpful for Trial Judges to state their balancing on the record in the course of admitting or excluding Rule 404(b) evidence, but affirmed a Judge who admitted, without balancing on the record, other crimes evidence to prove intent in a prosecution of a prisoner for possessing objects with intent to escape. See also United States v. Hudson n87(convictions for entering a credit union with the intent to commit larceny were reversed because some evidence of other crimes should not have been admitted; the Court noted that the Trial Judge did not engage in a careful on-the-record balancing of the relevant factors).

United States v. Evans, 697 F.2d 240 (8th Cir. 1983) : The Court recognized that an explicit finding by the Trial Judge would be helpful, but it declined to require one and assumed instead that the Judge who admitted evidence applied the correct standard. In this prosecution for conspiracy to possess marijuana, evidence of a witness' prior drug-related relationship with the defendant was offered to prove the defendant's motive and intention for meeting with the witness.

United States v. Dorsey, 819 F.2d 1055 (11th Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed marijuana-related convictions, holding that a Trial Judge is not required to engage in on-the-record balancing in ruling on the admissibility of other act evidence.

[m] RULE 404(b) -- Circumstances Indicating Criminality

United States v. Tafoya, 757 F.2d 1522 (5th Cir. 1985) : The Court held that evidence of the defendant's assassination efforts was admissible in a tax prosecution to show that he earned money that he claimed was a gift.

United States v. Wood, 834 F.2d 1382 (8th Cir. 1987) : The Court upheld admission of evidence that the defendant purchased an airplane for cash to prove he was engaged in drug trafficking.

United States v. Saintil, 753 F.2d 984 (11th Cir. 1985) : Evidence that defendants charged with attempted smuggling of illegal aliens had murdered, battered, and starved illegal immigrants was relevant to prove that they were in control of a smuggling vessel.

[n] RULE 404(b) -- Civil Cases

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Accidents

Hemphill v. Washington Metro. Area Transit Auth., 982 F.2d 572 (D.C. Cir. 1993) : The Court, in three separate opinions, held that a judgment for a defendant in an automobile accident case must be reversed, because the Magistrate Judge erroneously instructed the jury that it could consider whether the plaintiff, whose prior accidents were admitted as relevant to the cause of her injuries, "was merely unlucky or whether or not she is claims minded." The Court unanimously agreed that when no charge of fabrication is made, it is improper to permit a jury to infer that a plaintiff is claims minded.

In re Air Disaster at Lockerbie Scot. on Dec. 21, 1988, 37 F.3d 804 (2d Cir. 1994) : In this action by relatives of passengers killed in an aircraft bombing, the Court affirmed the jury's finding of liability against the airline for willful disregard of safety measures concerning security checks of baggage. Evidence of other security failures by the defendant was properly admitted to prove the cause of the disaster, since the other acts tended to prove "a contempt for security" which would permit the jury to infer willful misconduct.

Mosser v. Fruehauf Corp., 940 F.2d 77 (4th Cir. 1991) : In a product liability wrongful death action brought after a tractor-trailer overturned, the defendant offered the driver-decedent's personnel file, which showed that he had received citations for speeding, as evidence of habit or as proof of intent. The Court held that there was no error in declining to admit traffic citations unrelated to the incident in question against a dead man unable to defend himself.

Jones v. Southern Pac. R.R., 962 F.2d 447 (5th Cir. 1992) : The Court held there was no error in excluding evidence of the defendant's engineer's prior safety infractions in a personal injury action arising out of a truck-train collision, as the evidence had slight probative value and would tend to distract the trier of fact from the main question of what actually happened.

King v. Ahrens, 16 F.3d 265 (8th Cir. 1994) : In a medical malpractice case, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that the defendant's medical license had been suspended eight years earlier, as any probative value the evidence had on the absence of mistake in failing to note critical information on the medical chart and on the doctor's credibility was substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect, given the remoteness in time and the dissimilarity between the incidents. In Monger v. Cessna Aircraft Co., n88 the Court affirmed a judgment for an aircraft manufacturer in a wrongful death case, holding that evidence of prior accidents is not admissible to prove that a party is accident prone and therefore likely to have been at fault. It also held that a letter from the FAA to the manufacturer reciting prior misconduct and containing a warning was properly excluded where it was unclear whether the letter related to the fuel system at issue in the case.

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Civil Cases -- Antitrust, Franchises, Distributorships, etc.

Jay Edwards, Inc. v. New England Toyota Distrib., 708 F.2d 814 (1st Cir. 1983) : An automobile dealership sued its distributor claiming that the distributor engaged in several bad faith actions against it. The Court found that evidence that the distributor engaged in harsh treatment against other dealers who had joined the plaintiff in forming an "Alliance" was properly admitted: "By suggesting a pattern of retaliatory practices against Alliance members, it was probative of NET's motive and intent, and its possible bad faith, in dealings with Edwards."

United States Football League v. National Football League, 842 F.2d 1335 (2d Cir. 1988) : The Court affirmed a judgment awarding the plaintiff $1 in an antitrust action, holding that prior antitrust judgments against the defendant were properly excluded pursuant to Rule 403, even though "[p]rior antitrust violations and the history of competition in a market may, in appropriate cases, be admissible to establish market power and intent to monopolize."

J & R Ice Cream Corp. v. California Smoothie Licensing Corp., 31 F.3d 1259 (3d Cir. 1994) : In a franchisee's action against a franchiser for fraud and negligence in making representations about the financial prospects of a restaurant franchise, other franchisees testified that the defendant had made similar representations to them. Reversing a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court held it was error to admit the testimony as evidence of a common plan or scheme.

"Common plan" acts may be part of a single series of events -- thus tending to show a motive that will establish the commission of a disputed act, the identity of the actor, or his intention -- or they may be sufficiently similar and distinctive as to constitute signature evidence of identity. Since neither motive, intent, nor identity was in dispute, the evidence served only the impermissible purpose of showing the defendant's propensity to commit the charged act.

Coast-to-Coast Stores, Inc. v. Womack-Bowers, Inc., 818 F.2d 1398 (8th Cir. 1987) : The Court found no error in the exclusion of testimony by other franchise owners concerning complaints that were different in kind from those of franchisees involved in the instant suit.

Williamson Oil Co. v. Philip Morris USA, 346 F.3d 1287 (11th Cir. 2003) : Affirming summary judgment for the defendant cigarette manufacturers in an antitrust action by wholesalers, the Court found no error in the exclusion of evidence alleged by the plaintiffs to show that the defendants conspired to fix prices in ten foreign countries during and prior to the conspiracy at issue. In the absence of a showing of a tie between the defendants' overseas and domestic pricing actions, the evidence did not tend to exclude the possibility of independent action in the setting of domestic cigarette prices. Further, the evidence did not establish a prior crime, wrong, or act, since the plaintiffs failed to show that the foreign conduct was a crime or wrong under the laws of the foreign sovereigns.

[iii] Rule 404(b) -- Civil Cases -- Civil Rights Cases

[A] Rule 404(b) -- Miscellaneous Civil Rights Cases

Miller v. Poretsky, 595 F.2d 780 (D.C. Cir. 1978) : Although it affirmed a judgment for the defendant in a tenant's civil rights suit, the Court concluded that it was an abuse of discretion to exclude testimony that the landlord had similarly discriminated against other black tenants. As the landlord had been permitted to offer evidence that he had not discriminated against other tenants, the tenant should have been able to rebut this evidence. Judge Robinson, concurring, emphasized that whether or not the landlord had offered evidence concerning treatment of other tenants, the tenant should have been permitted to show discrimination against others. Citing Rule 404(b), he argued that discriminatory practices have grown more subtle and "victims may find it virtually impossible to prove [discriminatory purpose] unless permitted to introduce evidence that the defendant has engaged in one or more acts of discrimination against others." The Court's opinion indicated that the other Judges on the panel "concur in Judge Robinson's separate opinion."

Pennsylvania v. Porter, 659 F.2d 306 (3d Cir. 1981) (en banc): In a parens patriae civil rights action, the Court found that events occurring more than two years prior to the filing of the suit could be offered to show a pattern or practice of violating constitutional rights.

Johnson v. Hugo's Skateway, 974 F.2d 1408 (4th Cir. 1992) (en banc): The plaintiff in a civil rights action, alleging that he had been intimidated on racial grounds at a roller skating rink, introduced a prior consent decree in which the rink agreed to post signs of a nondiscriminatory policy and to instruct employees not to discriminate, as well as evidence that the rink had not complied with the decree. The Court held there was no error in admitting the decree, as it was not offered to prove that the rink had previously discriminated and was likely to do so again but to show, through the evidence of noncompliance, the rink's motive or intent on the present occasion.

Hitt v. Connell, 301 F.3d 240 (5th Cir. 2002) : In a civil rights action by a deputy constable who was discharged for his union activity, an associational right protected by the First Amendment, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the constable took disciplinary action against other deputies for their union activities. The evidence was admissible as proof of the constable's motive in firing the plaintiff and to impeach the constable's statements that he was "a union man" and had no animus against the union. In Brown v. Miller, n89 a civil rights action brought by a police chief against a town mayor, the Court reversed a punitive damage award on the ground that an independent bad act of the mayor was erroneously introduced as evidence.

Conklin v. Lovely, 834 F.2d 543 (6th Cir. 1987) : In a suit by a discharged employee who claimed that the discharge was the result of protected political activity, the Court held that testimony by another employee that she was told she was being terminated because of her support for a former incumbent was admissible to prove intent on the part of the defendants, whether or not the other employee was one who could be fired on the basis of political affiliation.

Treece v. Hochstetler, 213 F.3d 360 (7th Cir. 2000) : In a § 1983 action against a police officer for malicious prosecution of a complaint that the plaintiff threatened the officer, the plaintiff argued that the officer solicited a bribe on the occasion in question and attempted to show prior "bad acts" of the officer that would allegedly have shown a pattern of soliciting bribes and falsely charging individuals with crimes when the bribes were not paid. Affirming a judgment for the officer, the Court found no abuse of discretion in exclusion of the evidence, since the alleged incidents were not sufficiently idiosyncratic to permit an inference of pattern and did not bear a singular strong resemblance to the pattern of the offense charged.

McWhorter v. City of Birmingham, 906 F.2d 674 (11th Cir. 1990) : In a former police officer's civil rights suit for wrongful discharge, the plaintiff offered evidence that other officers were harassed and intimidated by the defendant police chief. The Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the evidence, as its admission could have led to a series of mini-trials regarding the other officers' grievances, and it did not rise to the level of a habit of harassing officers who exercised their First Amendment rights.

[B] Rule 404(b) -- Civil Cases -- Civil Rights Cases -- Officers' Conduct

Gutierrez-Rodriguez v. Cartagena, 882 F.2d 553 (1st Cir. 1989) : In a civil rights action for injuries suffered when the plaintiff was shot by plainclothes police officers, the Court held that evidence of past civilian complaints against one of the officers was properly admitted only to show gross lapses in supervising and disciplining the officer by defendant superior officers and that, particularly with the limiting instructions given, the probative value of the evidence was not significantly outweighed by its prejudicial effect.

Berkovich v. Hicks, 922 F.2d 1018 (2d Cir. 1991) : In an arrestee's civil rights action, the Court held that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence of seven prior civilian complaints against a defendant police officer, where the officer had been exonerated on all charges in six of the complaints and the seventh only involved using abusive language.

Carson v. Polley, 689 F.2d 562 (5th Cir. 1982) : The Court reversed a judgment in favor of a sheriff and four deputies who allegedly used excessive force in making an arrest. It found error in the exclusion of a sheriff's department performance evaluation report on one deputy that stated that the deputy tended to get into arguments with inmates and let his temper flare up quickly. According to the Court, the report should have been admitted under Rule 404(b) to show the deputy's intent. In our view, this evidence was more akin to character evidence than to specific conduct that might tend to show intent. Thus it was properly excluded, although it might have been admitted to show that the sheriff was on notice of a problem regarding this deputy.

Woodward v. Correctional Medical Servs. of Ill., Inc., 368 F.3d 917 (7th Cir. 2004) : In an action on behalf of a pretrial detainee who committed suicide in a county jail, the jury found that the contractor administering the jail and a nurse working there had acted with deliberate indifference to the deceased's health and safety. Finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence concerning intake backlogs, evidence that a nurse employed by the contractor was under the influence of drugs, and evidence that other inmates did not receive medical care or had their care delayed, the Court concluded that the evidence tended to prove knowledge and state of mind because it showed that the County had notice that its employees ignored the medical needs of inmates and that such practices could result in suicide. In Okai v. Verfuth, 275 F.3d 606 (7th Cir. 2001) , the Court affirmed a judgment for corrections officers sued by an inmate who claimed that he was beaten while being moved during a transfer that followed a prison riot. It found no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that the officers had been suspended following the riot, since the plaintiff made no showing of the basis for the officers' discipline and had no evidence of his theory that the suspensions served to establish the defendants' motive to retaliate against inmates who participated in riots or whom they disliked. In Wilson v. City of Chicago, n90 the plaintiff, who had shot and killed two policemen, alleged that police had tortured him in extracting a confession. Reversing a judgment for the individual defendants, the Court held that it was an abuse of discretion to exclude evidence that the officers had tortured two other suspects, since the other incidents tended to prove, inter alia, the defendants' intent and opportunity.

Clark v. Martinez, 295 F.3d 809 (8th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed a judgment against an arrestee suing for use of excessive force, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that the defendant officer had on another occasion used excessive force and demonstrated racially discriminatory animus. Given that the officer conceded that he struck the plaintiff intentionally, the evidence had little probative value on the issue of intent, which was substantially outweighed by the prejudicial effect of being used impermissibly to show propensity. The Court noted that the propensity to batter African-American males in custody might tend to show that the officer's "actions were motivated by hostility against African-Americans, but hostile motive is not an element" of assault or battery under the applicable state law. In Berry v. Oswalt, 143 F.3d 1127 (8th Cir. 1998) , the Court reversed judgment for a female prisoner claiming sexual harassment by a corrections officer because evidence of prior uncharged sexual misconduct by the corrections officer was erroneously admitted. The evidence was not admissible to prove intent to harass and absence of mistake, because it was highly inflammatory, and not similar in kind to the acts charged by the plaintiff. Nor was it admissible to prove a discriminatory motive, because motive is irrelevant to a charge of sexual harassment by a prison guard: a "guard who propositions an inmate cannot have a motive that the law would recognize as proper." In a civil rights action by a woman claiming she had been falsely arrested and sexually assaulted by a police officer, Parrish v. Luckie, n91 the Court held that evidence of the officer's prior violent behavior was properly admitted as relevant to the police chief's knowledge of the officer's violent propensities. In Tyler v. White, n92 a suit by prisoners alleging that guards injured them, the Court held that cross-examination of a defendant guard concerning his carrying brass knuckles after the incident was properly barred as calling for inadmissible character evidence.

Hirst v. Gertzen, 676 F.2d 1252 (9th Cir. 1982) : In a civil rights action brought after a Native American was found hanged in a jail cell, the Court upheld a ruling excluding evidence that a deputy had engaged in violent and brutal conduct toward Native Americans on previous occasions. The Court found the evidence inadequate to establish identity of the victim's killer by modus operandi and concluded that the Judge properly could have excluded the evidence so that it would not be improperly used as character evidence.

Tanberg v. Sholtis, 401 F.3d 1151 (10th Cir. 2005) : Affirming a judgment for the defendants in an action by arrestees alleging excessive force by a police officer, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence regarding three other occasions on which the officer allegedly arrested individuals without probable cause or used excessive force. To prove the officer's intent, the evidence was irrelevant because an objective standard is used to determine whether there is a constitutional violation. And to the extent that the evidence might have been relevant on pendent state law claims, the risk of prejudice in suggesting that the officer was prone to using excessive force outweighed any probative value.

[C] Rule 404(b) -- Civil Cases -- Civil Rights Cases -- Prisoners' and Arrestees' Conduct

Lewis v. District of Columbia, 793 F.2d 361 (D.C. Cir. 1986) : In a civil rights action by a person who was shot by an arresting officer, the Court held that evidence of the plaintiff's prior arrests and drug use was properly admitted. The arrests were probative of whether the plaintiff ran from the officer because he thought the officer was a thief or because he wanted to avoid arrest. The drug use was relevant because it might have accounted for some of the injuries that the plaintiff attributed to the shooting.

Surprenant v. Rivas, 424 F.3d 5 (1st Cir. 2005) : Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff in a civil rights action by a pretrial detainee, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence that seven years before the incident giving rise to the lawsuit the plaintiff "converged" on a correctional officer while incarcerated in a state prison. The evidence was clearly inadmissible as propensity evidence for the purpose offered by the defendant--i.e., that because the plaintiff converged on an officer in 1995, he was likely to do so again in 2002. In Senra v. Cunningham, 9 F.3d 168 (1st Cir. 1993) , an action against police officers for using excessive force in arresting a man at his home after his auto struck a parked car, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the defendants having previously responded to domestic disturbances resulting from the plaintiff's drunken and violent behavior, since it shed light on the reasonableness of the officers' responses. The plaintiff's prior conviction for driving while intoxicated had been admitted to show the plaintiff's motivation for leaving the scene, but the Court reasoned that the arrest would have been justified merely because he had departed, so the evidence was of no probative value; the error was harmless, however. In a civil rights action against police officers, Pittsley v. Warish, n93 the Court held that evidence of a plaintiff's prior arrest on gun-possession charges of which she was acquitted was properly admissible to show her motive and bias in bringing the lawsuit in light of one of the defendants' involvement in the prior proceeding. In Wierstak v. Heffernan, n94 a suit for use of excessive force in an arrest, the Court held there was no error in the exclusion of evidence concerning the plaintiff's involvement in a house-break and drug transaction earlier in the day of the arrest. Although the evidence was relevant to motive, it was unduly prejudicial. In Lataille v. Ponte, n95 the Court reversed a judgment for corrections officers in an action by a plaintiff who alleged that the officers had beaten him, because evidence of the plaintiff's disciplinary record was improperly admitted to prove that the plaintiff was a violent person and, therefore, probably was the first aggressor.

Hynes v. Coughlin, 79 F.3d 285 (2d Cir. 1996) : In an inmate's § 1983 action against prison guards, the Court held that although the inmate's disciplinary record might have been properly admitted in response to his argument that he had struck a guard reflexively and by accident, it was reversible error to admit the record where the plaintiff denied having struck the officer at all and he did not raise any issue of his intent, and the defendants repeatedly argued that the plaintiff's violent character tended to show he was the aggressor.

Young v. Rabideau, 821 F.2d 373 (7th Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed a judgment for corrections officers sued for allegedly using excessive force against an inmate, holding that evidence of the inmate's disciplinary history was admissible to rebut the inmate's contention that he did not intend to poke an officer in the face or snatch a chain from the officer's hand. It also noted that past misconduct of the inmate, as reflected in his disciplinary history, was not admissible to show "bias" against authority, since this type of bias is too likely to be used as propensity evidence. In Harris v. Davis, n96 the Court found it was error in a suit by a prisoner who alleged cruel and unusual punishment with respect to medical treatment to admit photographs of the prisoner that depicted him in suggestive poses and to admit evidence (ostensibly offered to show an alternative source of his injuries) concerning discipline for possession of moonshine.

Lewis v. Sheriff's Dep't, 817 F.2d 465 (8th Cir. 1987) : The Court held that the defendants should not have been permitted to cross-examine the plaintiff concerning a prior fight with a deputy sheriff. The evidence appeared relevant only to create an impression that the plaintiff had a violent disposition. The error was harmless, however.

[iv] Rule 404(b) -- Civil Cases -- Contracts

Rothberg v. Rosenbloom, 771 F.2d 818 (3d Cir. 1985) : In an action on promissory notes, the Court held that evidence concerning four other joint ventures was properly admitted since the defendants claimed an in pari delicto defense and the evidence was relevant to show knowledge and absence of mistake.

Pressman v. Franklin Nat'l Bank, 384 F.3d 182 (6th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed a judgment against an unsuccessful applicant for a loan, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony that the Bank's president corruptly made personal loans to certain customers at high interest rates and on condition of kickbacks. The plaintiff claimed that the evidence supported his contract claim by showing that the Bank breached its obligation of good faith and fair dealing, but the Court found that the allegations of corruption were completely unrelated to the activity at issue in the case, so the probative value of the evidence was substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect.

[v] Rule 404(b) -- Civil Cases -- Employment Discrimination Cases

Neuren v. Adduci, Mastriani, Meeks & Schill, 43 F.3d 1507 (D.C. Cir. 1995) : In a female lawyer's Title VII action against a law firm, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit evidence that the plaintiff had had difficulty in getting along with staff and in meeting deadlines at a firm where she had worked previously. The Court reasoned that to permit the defendant to show that the plaintiff had "the same problem" with a prior employer and to claim that the problem resulted in the plaintiff's termination was to admit character evidence, for which none of the Rule 404 exceptions applied.

Brown v. Trustees of Boston Univ., 891 F.2d 337 (1st Cir. 1989) : In an employment discrimination action brought after the plaintiff was denied tenure, the Court held that remarks derogatory to women made by the University's president were properly admitted as evidence of a discriminatory animus in making the tenure decision.

Ansell v. Green Acres Contracting Co., 347 F.3d 515 (3d Cir. 2003) : In an age discrimination case, the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendants, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that two years after terminating the 45-year-old plaintiff, the foreman hired a 45-year-old man into a position similar to the plaintiff's former position. The Court concluded that the subsequent hiring was admissible not to prove propensity, but to negate the theory that the defendants were trying to get rid of older workers to increase productivity. Thus, it was probative of the defendants' lack of intent to discriminate. In Becker v. ARCO Chem. Co., 207 F.3d 176 (3d Cir. 2000) , the Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff, who alleged age discrimination in his termination, because he had erroneously been permitted to testify regarding the "manner" in which the defendant allegedly had earlier terminated another employee. The evidence was not relevant to whether the defendant discriminated against the plaintiff absent the impermissible inference that the defendant had a propensity to act in a certain way. The evidence was not admissible as proof of a "plan," since where a plan or design is not an element of an offense, the evidence showing a plan must be relevant to some ultimate issue in the case, and this evidence was not relevant except under the impermissible propensity inference. Further, the evidence was not admissible as modus operandi, since identity was not a disputed issue in the case and the similarities between the two events were not sufficient to show a distinctive modus operandi. In a diversity action brought under a state disability law, Kelly v. Boeing Petroleum Servs., Inc., n97 the Court affirmed a judgment for an employer, finding no error in the exclusion of evidence that the plaintiff's supervisor engaged in other discriminatory acts and made discriminatory utterances. Acts of discrimination against those other than the disabled were irrelevant, and the supervisor's statements were at most "in typical, blue-collar (as distinguished from executive suite) workplace kidding, well short of cruel disparagement or mockery."

Barnes v. City of Cincinnati, 401 F.3d 729 (6th Cir. 2005) : In a Title VII action by a preoperative transsexual police officer who alleged that he was demoted because he failed to conform to gender stereotypes, the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff, holding that a supervisor's derogatory statements about lesbians and use of the word "fag" were properly admitted as evidence of the supervisor's intent to ensure that the plaintiff was demoted. In Jackson v. Quanex Corp., 191 F.3d 647 (6th Cir. 1999) , the Court reversed a judgment for an employer sued by an employee who claimed racial harassment. It held that evidence of racial graffiti at the defendant's manufacturing plant and evidence of racially offensive conduct directed at African-American workers should have been admitted, whether or not the graffiti or conduct was directed at the plaintiff: "Comments that single out members of a protected class are relevant not only as to whether a particular work environment was objectively hostile to members of the protected class but also as to whether an employee belonging to the protected class subjectively felt harassed."

Mathis v. Phillips Chevrolet, Inc., 269 F.3d 771 (7th Cir. 2001) : The plaintiff sued for age and race discrimination after he was not hired as a car salesman. The defendant sought to introduce evidence that the plaintiff had applied for positions at other dealerships about the same time and had sued after he was denied the jobs. The evidence was excluded on the ground that it was only relevant to show a propensity to file baseless discrimination suits, but the Court found that it could have been used to show a scheme to harass area car dealerships and a similar modus operandi in doing so to that used in this situation. However, there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the evidence, since any probative value the evidence had was substantially outweighed by the prejudice to the plaintiff. Furthermore, disputes over whether the other suits were baseless could consume far more time than the evidence justified. In Molnar v. Booth, 229 F.3d 593 (7th Cir. 2000) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff, who claimed that she was sexually harassed by her supervisor, and found no error in admission of evidence that the supervisor had made sexual advances toward another employee. This evidence was probative of intent to establish a sexual relationship with the plaintiff, and tended to prove that the supervisor "was not accidentally engaged in behavior that could be misconstrued." It was also admissible to impeach the supervisor's testimony that he had never asked out any female employee and would never do so. In Gastineau v. Fleet Mtge. Corp., n98 a sex discrimination lawsuit, the plaintiff introduced a memorandum that, if authentic, showed that the employer intended to fire the plaintiff because he was complaining of being sexually harassed. The defendants challenged the authenticity of the memorandum, and introduced a contract between the plaintiff and a former employer, very favorable to the plaintiff, that the former employer denied was authentic. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the contract for the plaintiff's "credibility, motive, interest, knowledge, common scheme and plan." It showed that the plaintiff "has a common scheme or plan in disputes with his former employers -- creating false documents in anticipation of litigation," and also showed his "motive in creating false documents as revenge against former employers and the hope of monetary gain." The Court also found that evidence of two other lawsuits brought by the plaintiff against prior employers was admissible, as the evidence went beyond showing the plaintiff's litigiousness by also showing the reasons one defendant kept a diary in this case, casting doubt on his credibility, and establishing a modus operandi of creating fraudulent documents in anticipation of litigation against his employers. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff in an employment discrimination action, Hunter v. Allis-Chalmers Corp., n99 the Court upheld the admission of evidence that black workers other than the plaintiff had been harassed, as it found that the other acts tended to support the claim that the employer must have known that white workers were systematically harassing black workers.

Kline v. City of Kansas City, Mo., Fire Dep't, 175 F.3d 660 (8th Cir. 1999) : The Court held in an employment discrimination action brought by female employees of the Fire Department that evidence of discrimination against other women in the Department was properly excluded. Evidence that the City employees who allegedly discriminated against the plaintiffs also discriminated against other women was properly admitted to show the defendant's knowledge of unlawful conduct toward the plaintiffs and its refusal to remedy it. However, evidence of acts by people who did not supervise or allegedly discriminate against the plaintiffs was not probative of the City's motive, opportunity, intent, or knowledge, and any probative value the evidence might have would be substantially outweighed by the threat of confusion of the issues and unfair prejudice. Affirming a judgment for an employer in an employment discrimination case, Hogan v. American Tel. & Tel. Co., n100 the Court noted that evidence of past acts of discrimination may be relevant to prove intent. It added, however, that such evidence may be excluded under Rule 403; it determined that any error in excluding evidence of prior acts of discrimination was harmless in this case, since the past acts involved facts substantially different from the demotion of the plaintiff.

Heyne v. Caruso, 69 F.3d 1475 (9th Cir. 1995) : The Trial Judge excluded testimony regarding the defendant's harassment of female employees other than the plaintiff in a quid pro quo sexual harassment action, on the ground that it was relevant only to prove a hostile work environment and was more prejudicial than probative. Reversing, the Court noted that "[i]t is clear that an employer's conduct tending to demonstrate hostility towards a certain group is both relevant and admissible where the employer's general hostility towards that group is the true reason behind firing an employee who is a member of that group." The Court held that the evidence was probative of the employer's motive or intent in discharging the plaintiff, and its probative value was not significantly outweighed by its prejudicial effect.

Minshall v. McGraw Hill Broadcasting Co., 323 F.3d 1273 (10th Cir. 2003) : In an age discrimination action brought by a former employee whose contract was not renewed by a television station, the Court held that the testimony by three other employees that they were subjected to discrimination by the station was properly admitted to show discriminatory intent, even though those employees were not discharged. The supervisor was involved in all the situations, and all the witnesses were over 40, which tended to support the plaintiff's claim that the supervisor, a new news director, intended to reduce the presence of on-air reporters who were over 40 years old. Comments made by the news director were also properly admitted to show discriminatory intent, because they were not stray comments but were consistent with the discriminatory intent alleged by the plaintiff. In a nurse's sexual harassment action, Wilson v. Muckala, 303 F.3d 1207 (10th Cir. 2002) , the Court held that alleged past instances of sexual harassment were not admissible under Rule 404(b), because "alleged previous harassment cannot be used to show that a defendant harassed a plaintiff on a specific subsequent occasion," and "because these alleged prior incidents of sexual harassment occurred in places outside the Hospital, they were not relevant to establish a hostile work environment." In an action by a former employee who alleged that he had been discharged in retaliation for making a workers' compensation claim, Sanjuan v. IBP, Inc., n101 the plaintiff introduced testimony by the defendant's supervisors that they had heard complaints by injured employees to the effect that they were harassed following injuries or medical benefit claims. The Court held that the evidence was not barred by Rule 404(b) because it was circumstantial evidence of the defendant's retaliatory motive or intent regarding employees with work-related injuries. However, the evidence was inadmissible hearsay. In Spulak v. K Mart Corp., n102 the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff in an age discrimination case, holding that testimony of other employees about their treatment by the defendant employer was relevant to the issue of the employer's discriminatory intent and that there was no abuse of discretion in finding the relevance of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect.

Allen v. County of Montgomery, 788 F.2d 1485 (11th Cir. 1986) : The Court overturned a judgment for the defendants in a suit by a black female employee who claimed discrimination in employment because evidence of prior discrimination, which was important in proving intent, had been erroneously excluded. In Phillips v. Smalley Maint. Servs., n103 the Court affirmed a judgment for an employee on a Title VII claim, finding that the Trial Judge properly admitted testimony by another former employee that the defendant had subjected her to treatment similar to that experienced by the plaintiff. The evidence was admissible to show intent, motive, or plan.

[vi] Rule 404(b) -- Civil Cases -- Evidence Relevant to Sanction

Colon v. Howard, 215 F.3d 227 (2d Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed a judgment against a prisoner who alleged he had been denied a fair disciplinary hearing, holding that it was proper for the prisoner's disciplinary record to be considered because it explained the penalty that was imposed by the hearing officer.

[vii] Rule 404(b) -- Civil Cases -- Fraud, Forgery, etc.

Jenkins v. TDC Mgt. Corp., 21 F.3d 436 (D.C. Cir. 1994) : The Court reversed a judgment for a plaintiff who claimed that a developer fraudulently induced him to enter into an employment contract and induced him to continue work by falsely promising to pay him fully for services rendered. The Court found error in the admission of testimony by three subcontractors that the developer had failed to pay them for their work. It noted that none of the subcontractors had indicated that their disputes with the developer were unusual in the construction industry, none indicated any indicia of fraud, and their disputes were remote in time from the plaintiff's. The Court observed that the line between inadmissible character evidence and evidence sufficient to show intent or a common scheme is imprecise, but reasoned that "when one must, in order to find similarity, define the character of the acts at such a high level of generality as here (greed, strategic behavior), and many of the events occur years after the conduct in dispute, we cannot find the conditions of admissibility under Rule 404(b) satisfied." In Faison v. Nationwide Mtg. Corp., n104 a suit by debtors against, inter alia, a settlement attorney to recover for the loss of a home alleged to have resulted from fraud, the Court found error in the admission of prior acts involving members of the defendant's law firm, which were not clearly tied to the defendant. The error was harmless, however.

Veranda Beach Club L.P. v. Western Sur. Co., 936 F.2d 1364 (1st Cir. 1991) : In an action by a partnership after its contract to purchase a resort fell through because of forgery by the defendant surety company's independent authorized agent, the Court held that evidence the agent's license had previously been suspended and that the defendant knew of the suspension was properly admitted under the Rule. Details of the event, including the fact that it arose from the agent's similar forgery, were properly excluded, as they would not have tended to show the agent's apparent authority or any other relevant fact.

Morley v. Cohen, 888 F.2d 1006 (4th Cir. 1989) : In a civil RICO action arising out of an allegedly fraudulent tax shelter, the Court held there had been no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the defendant's other business dealings, which were probative on the issue of intent.

Tschira v. Willingham, 135 F.3d 1077 (6th Cir. 1998) : Affirming a jury verdict for investors claiming breach of fiduciary duty and intentional misrepresentation arising from the sale and leaseback of certain buildings, the Court found no error in the admission of evidence that the defendant's false bank statements had been sent to other investors. The practice of sending false bank statements "tends to establish the existence of a plan or scheme whereby [the defendant] would provide false documentation of transactions to convince investors that their dealings with [the defendant] were more profitable than they, in fact, were."

Jordan v. Clayton Brokerage Co., 861 F.2d 172 (8th Cir. 1988) , vacated on other grounds, 499 U.S. 914 (1991) : The Court affirmed a judgment for a commodities investor who sued his brokerage company. It held that evidence of a larger plan pursued by a trader for the company was properly admitted to show knowledge and absence of mistake on the part of the company. See also Austin v. Loftsgaarden n105(no error to admit, in a securities fraud action, evidence of a prior fraud allegedly committed by the defendant, who denied any fraudulent intent).

Price v. Seydel, 961 F.2d 1470 (9th Cir. 1992) : In a fraud action by the purchaser of a hotel, the plaintiff attempted to show that the defendant kept two sets of books, one accurate and the other showing greater income in order to induce purchase of the property. The Magistrate Judge excluded evidence of the first set, presuming they were kept for the purpose of defrauding the IRS, as impermissible evidence of other fraud. Reversing on other grounds, the Court noted that exclusion may well have been an abuse of discretion because the evidence was the linchpin of the plaintiff's misrepresentation theory.

Hill v. Bache Halsey Stuart Shields Inc., 790 F.2d 817 (10th Cir. 1986) : Reversing a judgment for a customer against a commodities futures broker, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to exclude evidence of the plaintiff's trading five months after he closed his account with the defendant. The trading was similar to that done with the defendant, and the Court found that it was highly probative on the issue of whether the plaintiff authorized trades by the defendant.

[viii] Rule 404(b) -- Civil Cases -- Insurance Claims

Westfield Ins. Co. v. Harris, 134 F.3d 608 (4th Cir. 1998) : In a declaratory judgment action by an insurer disclaiming liability on the ground that a fire that destroyed the insured's home had been deliberately set, the Trial Judge granted a motion in limine excluding evidence of six prior house-fire claims and one truck-fire claim in which the insured had been involved. Reversing a judgment for the insured, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to exclude the evidence. It was particularly relevant not only because of the "doctrine of chances," but also because of the striking similarities among the incidents. The Trial Judge had erred in improperly treating the high probative value of the evidence as making it "prejudicial" under Rule 403.

Dial v. Travelers Indem. Co., 780 F.2d 520 (5th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed a judgment against insureds suing to collect on a fire insurance policy on their house. It upheld admission of evidence that the plaintiffs had been burned out of their previous home and that after the fire in this case two properties they occupied had burned. The Court applied the same test it uses in criminal cases to conclude that the evidence was relevant since "the essential issue is the difference between an accident and an intended act."

American Home Assur. Co. v. American President Lines, Ltd., 44 F.3d 774 (9th Cir. 1994) : In an insurer's subrogation action for freeze damage to fruit, the defendant carrier attempted to offer evidence that a surveyor who assessed the damage had a 12-year-old Hong Kong fraud conviction. The Court found no abuse of discretion in exclusion of the evidence, where there was doubt (because of the surveyor's claims that the conviction was coerced) that he had committed the offense, the motive and intent issues on which the evidence was offered were not material to the case, and the conviction was remote in time.

Turley v. State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 944 F.2d 669 (10th Cir. 1991) : The Court reversed a judgment for the owner of an allegedly stolen automobile against the insurer following denial of coverage for damage to the car, holding it was error to exclude evidence offered by the defendant that the plaintiff and his coinsured had previously conspired to fake "slip-and-fall" accidents. The evidence was probative of whether the coinsured had an intent to defraud and whether there was collusion on the part of the plaintiff.

Glados, Inc. v. Reliance Ins. Co., 888 F.2d 1309 (11th Cir. 1987) , modified (11th Cir. 1989): In an action by a restaurant owner on a fire insurance policy, the plaintiff attempted to rebut an arson defense by evidence that the prior owner had retained an interest as an insured party, and by showing similar fires at two other restaurants in which the prior owner had also retained a similar interest. The Court held that this evidence was properly admitted as relevant to whether the third party had a motive to set the fire.

[ix] Rule 404(b) -- Civil Cases -- Miscellaneous Cases

Doty v. Sewall, 908 F.2d 1053 (1st Cir. 1990) : In an action by a union member alleging mistreatment by local union officials, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that other locals mistreated their members who were associated with the plaintiff, as the fact that the other locals' actions were communicated to the defendants might have had a tendency to show that mistreatment of the plaintiff was motivated by a desire to suppress dissent in the union.

Howard Opera House Assoc. v. Urban Outfitters, Inc., 322 F.3d 125 (2d Cir. 2003) : The building landlord and a fellow tenant sued a retail chain because excessively loud music was being played at its store. The Court held that evidence of excessive noise problems at other stores in the chain was relevant to prove that the defendant "had intentionally breached the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, because it tended to show that Urban Outfitters knew that its music had a disruptive effect and insisted on playing it at excessive levels despite that knowledge."

Robert S. v. Stetson School, Inc., 256 F.3d 159 (3d Cir. 2001) : The plaintiff, who had been placed in a school specializing in the treatment and education of juvenile sex offenders, alleged that staff members subjected him to physical and psychological abuse in violation of the school's policy against "horseplay." At trial the plaintiff proffered evidence of prior bad acts by members of the school's staff, to show that the school had a permissive attitude regarding inappropriate behavior toward students by staff. The Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence of incidents that did not involve the plaintiff or the defendant staff members, since there was a distinct possibility that the jury would have considered the excluded evidence to show that the defendants acted in conformity with those prior bad acts on the occasions alleged by the plaintiff.

Morganroth & Morganroth v. DeLorean, 123 F.3d 374 (6th Cir. 1997) : In an action against a former client for attorney's fees, the defendant's ex-wife testified that he had forged documents and signatures. Affirming, the Court held that the evidence was relevant to demonstrate the complexity of the representation and the difficulties that the client created for the attorneys, as well as to rebut a defense of negligence in conducting investigations by showing that the defendant's forgery impeded the investigations.

Blankenship & Assocs. v. NLRB, 999 F.2d 248 (7th Cir. 1993) : The Court, enforcing the NLRB's cease-and-desist order against a consultant to an employer, held that the agency did not violate Rule 404(b) in taking notice of the facts of seven prior proceedings in which the consultant was involved although not named as a party. The Court said that the use of the previous decisions was "questionable," but emphasized that the consultant did not present any reason to the agency or to it to suggest that the earlier decisions contained erroneous findings of fact. See also Chicago Coll. of Osteopathic Medicine v. George A. Fuller Co. n106(although the evidence could have been admitted, there was no error in excluding under Rule 403 evidence of the defendant contractor's practices on other projects in this litigation involving disputes over various aspects of construction work on a medical clinic).

Elliot v. Turner Constr. Co., 381 F.3d 995 (10th Cir. 2004) : In a worker's action for injuries suffered during the installation of a temporary bridge, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding the defendant's unpreparedness for the project and their lack of planning for it. The defendant's claim that the evidence was inadmissible under Rule 404(b) was rejected because the evidence was intrinsic to the plaintiff's negligence claim and essential to portraying the events leading up to his injury. In a nuisance action against a waferboard manufacturer, Orjias v. Stevenson, 31 F.3d 995 (10th Cir. 1994) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiffs, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of air quality violations at the defendant's waferboard plant in another state, as the evidence tended to show knowledge and notice relevant to the plaintiffs' punitive damages claims. In Bradbury v. Phillips Petroleum Co., n107 the Court affirmed judgments for plaintiffs who sued a mineral exploration company for trespass, assault, and outrageous conduct. It found that evidence of other incidents in which the defendant trespassed or destroyed property was admissible to prove recklessness and to negate any claim of accident of mistake. Although the other incidents did not involve the same types of injuries as the plaintiffs alleged, they involved the same area, the same time period, and similar conduct.

[x] Rule 404(b) -- Civil Cases -- Securities Actions

SEC v. Happ, 392 F.3d 12 (1st Cir. 2005) : Affirming a judgment for the SEC in an action against a former corporate director who sold stock while in possession of nonpublic information, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence of two 1997 letters the defendant wrote to another company while he was a director. The letters were a response to a request by the company that the defendant sell stock he purchased improperly and to disgorge the profits to the company. The defendant acknowledged that he would confirm in advance with the company that a trading window was open before purchasing its stock. The Court reasoned that the letters were admissible to prove the defendant's state of mind in trading in the stock at issue in the instant case, and to show the defendant's understanding of what he could do under the securities laws.

[o] Rule 404(b) -- Common Plan or Scheme

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Evidence Admissible

United States v. Lewis, 693 F.2d 189 (D.C. Cir. 1982) : The Court upheld convictions on 20 counts of transporting forged money orders, finding that evidence of cashing other money orders from the same stolen shipment was properly admitted to prove a scheme of which the defendant was the mastermind.

United States v. DeCicco, 370 F.3d 206 (1st Cir. 2004) : In a case charging fraud and use of fire to commit a felony, the Court reversed a pretrial ruling that excluded evidence of an arson-related fire occurring in March 1992. The Court found that the 1992 fire was probative of a common scheme: it was similar in circumstances to the two fires charged against the defendant, and the object of all the fires was the same property. The Court concluded that "the previous offense leads in progression to the two charged fires, or, put more simply, that DeCicco had one common scheme to burn the Heard Street warehouse, which had previously proven financially unsuccessful." In United States v. Lau, n108 the Court held that evidence of the defendants' prior importation of cocaine was admissible to establish ownership of a plane and a common scheme. In United States v. Cepulonis, n109 the Court affirmed bank robbery convictions, upholding the admission of testimony that, in the course of their getaway after the robbery, the defendants fired at a police officer and a passing motorist, and of evidence of a shotgun not used in the robbery. The evidence was not admitted to show that the defendants were bad men, but to show that their plan was to distract the police by firing and that they had assembled weapons to be available for the task.

United States v. Levy, 865 F.2d 551 (3d Cir. 1989) : The Court held that the use of a false passport was properly admitted to show common plan in a heroin distribution case.

United States v. Billups, 692 F.2d 320 (4th Cir. 1982) : The Court affirmed convictions for violating the Hobbs Act, the Travel Act, and two criminal provisions in the Taft-Hartley Act. It found that evidence that the defendant had received other payoffs, which had been the subjects of counts dismissed by the Trial Judge, was admissible to show a common plan or scheme.

United States v. Colvin, 614 F.2d 44 (5th Cir. 1980) : The Court held that where the jury could conclude that the defendant was responsible for injuries previously sustained by her infant daughter, evidence of the prior injuries was admissible to show a pattern of abuse.

United States v. Hill, 898 F.2d 72 (7th Cir. 1990) : The defendant was charged with conspiring to manufacture marijuana after he was arrested near a marijuana garden in July 1988. The Court held that evidence he was arrested in December 1987 with six pounds of marijuana seeds was probative of his plan and intent to grow marijuana in the spring of 1988. See also United States v. Anderson n110 (in a prosecution for offenses relating to a scheme to fix cases involving driving under the influence, the Court held that evidence of a defendant's involvement in some bribery incidents could be used to prove a common plan involving another person).

United States v. Paul, 217 F.3d 989 (8th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed a murder conviction, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant had given the witness a gun and talked about using it to rob a liquor store and kill the owners. The evidence was relevant to establish that the defendant had access to a gun, as well as to show a plan to perform a robbery similar in kind and close in time to (only two weeks before) the charged robbery and murder. Affirming bank robbery convictions in United States v. Warfield, 97 F.3d 1014 (8th Cir. 1996) , the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that a defendant had been stopped in the vicinity of a bank on other occasions in an automobile containing stocking masks, work gloves, and a pillowcase, which were similar to items used in the charged robberies as the evidence tended to show a common pattern or scheme. In United States v. Miller, n111 the Court affirmed convictions for offenses arising out of a fraudulent cattle transaction, finding that a transaction not charged in the indictment was part of a scheme or plan and helped to prove the intent of the defendants to defraud.

United States v. Jackson, 845 F.2d 880 (9th Cir. 1988) : The Court held that evidence that the defendant submitted a first set of false claims concerning checks that he had received was admissible to prove the charged scheme, which involved a second set of claims relating to the checks. In United States v. Winters, n112 a prosecution for kidnapping and transporting two women for immoral purposes, the Court held that evidence of the defendant's actions toward other women was properly admitted to show his common scheme of using physical force and threats to compel women to engage in acts of prostitution.

United States v. Kravchuk, 335 F.3d 1147 (10th Cir. 2003) : In a prosecution for theft from an ATM machine, the government's evidence showed that the defendant and others had removed an ATM machine from a mall and had attempted to remove another from a convenience store before they committed the charged crime. The Court held that evidence of the earlier theft efforts was admissible to prove the defendant's plan. In United States v. Roberts, 185 F.3d 1125 (10th Cir. 1999) , the Court affirmed a conviction for sexual abuse, by the Principal Chief of the Choctaw Nation, of three female employees of the Nation. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony regarding similar abuse of six other women, as it showed "a common scheme of sexually abusive behavior committed against female employees of the Choctaw Nation, and the defendant's knowledge he could, by virtue of his position, abuse young female employees without fear of reprisal." Affirming convictions on 13 of 38 counts of mail fraud in United States v. Primrose, n113 the Court upheld the admission of evidence concerning 45 kickbacks not charged in the indictment. It concluded that the fact that some of the kickbacks occurred beyond the statute of limitations did not require that they be excluded, since the indictment charged a scheme that began before the 38 overt acts charged and the additional kickbacks were probative of that scheme.

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Common Plan or Scheme -- Evidence Inadmissible

United States v. Murray, 103 F.3d 310 (3d Cir. 1997) : The Court reversed a conviction for intentional killing in furtherance of a continuing criminal enterprise because of error in admitting, inter alia, evidence that the defendant had previously committed another murder. The prosecutor had only said that the evidence "wasn't just [offered for] identity. Role in the organization, common scheme, plan, a number of different reasons," and the Trial Judge's most complete explanation (in the jury charge) why it was admitted was "for the very limited purpose to show identity, role in the conspiracy, a common scheme or plan." However, there was no showing that the uncharged murder was connected to the charged CCE or that the two killings were planned together or involved a common design, nor were the similarities between the two sufficient to be relevant on the identity issue. Even if the evidence had some slight probative value, it would be substantially outweighed by the prejudicial effect of showing the defendant's murderous propensity. In J & R Ice Cream Corp. v. California Smoothie Licensing Corp., 31 F.3d 1259 (3d Cir. 1994) , a franchisee's action against a franchiser for fraud and negligence in making representations about the financial prospects of a restaurant franchise, other franchisees testified that the defendant had made similar representations to them. Reversing a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court held it was error to admit the testimony as evidence of a common plan or scheme. "Common plan" acts may be part of a single series of events -- thus tending to show a motive that will establish the commission of a disputed act, the identity of the actor, or his intention -- or they may be sufficiently similar and distinctive as to constitute signature evidence of identity. Since neither motive, intent, nor identity was in dispute, the evidence served only the impermissible purpose of showing the defendant's propensity to commit the charged act. In United States v. Himelwright, n114 the Court reversed a postal worker's conviction for interstate threats and extortionate demands, which arose from the defendant's failed attempt to get a transfer to a post office near his children, because evidence of his purchase and possession of firearms was improperly admitted at his trial. The government offered the evidence as proof of plan, but the Court held that the purchase of firearms could not have been part of a preconceived plan to threaten violence and extort a transfer, since it was not until well after the firearms purchase that it became apparent that the defendant would not receive the transfer he sought.

United States v. Krezdorn, 639 F.2d 1327 (5th Cir. 1981) : In a forgery case the Court found reversible error in the admission of 32 extrinsic forgeries, since the additional forgeries did not tend to establish a plan of which the charged forgeries were a smaller part. The Court noted also the possibility that a jury would be overwhelmed by the sheer number of the offenses.

United States v. Beasley, 809 F.2d 1273 (7th Cir. 1987) : In a prosecution for attempting to obtain a controlled substance by misrepresenting the name of the person to appear on prescriptions, the Court reversed convictions for obtaining the substance with the intent to distribute, finding that evidence that the defendant had acquired and distributed other drugs was erroneously admitted, since the other acts were not similar to the scheme alleged in the instant case. Although "[s]ome language in the government's brief suggests that any commission of similar crimes is the sort of 'pattern' that permits the evidence to come in," "[u]nless something more than a pattern and temporal proximity is required, the fundamental rule is gone" and "a pattern is not itself a reason to admit the evidence."

United States v. Carroll, 207 F.3d 465 (8th Cir. 2000) : The Court held, in a bank robbery prosecution, that it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to admit evidence that the defendant had committed a bank robbery ten years previously. The evidence could not show a plan or pattern because it did not show the full context of the charged crime, was not necessary to prove a plan or scheme element in the charged crime, and did not have such unusual and distinctive characteristics as to be like a signature identifying the perpetrator. In United States v. LeCompte, 99 F.3d 274 (8th Cir. 1996) , the Court reversed a conviction for abusive sexual contact with a minor, holding it was error to admit evidence of the defendant's prior acts of sex abuse with minors. The Trial Judge admitted the bad acts as evidence of "plan," but the Court noted that "the victims were different, and the events were far apart in time." Absent more specific linkage, the bad act evidence was relevant to "plan" "only insofar as it tends to prove a propensity to commit crimes, which Rule 404(b) prohibits."

[p] Rule 404(b) -- Connecting Accused with Instrumentalities or Fruits of Crime

United States v. Moreno, 991 F.2d 943 (1st Cir. 1993) : The Court affirmed a defendant's conviction for unlawful firearms possession, holding that evidence of gunshots heard prior to his companion's arrest and the companion's possession of a pistol when arrested made it more likely that the object the defendant was seen to pass along to a third companion was the sawed-off shotgun later found nearby. The dissenting Judge believed that the evidence at most showed the defendant's presence during the commission of other crimes by other persons, which is both irrelevant and highly prejudicial. In United States v. Walters, n115 the Court held that a photograph showing the defendant holding a weapon was properly admitted in his trial for using a firearm during drug trafficking to show the connection between him and guns that had been seized. In United States v. D'Alora, n116 the Court upheld the admission of evidence that the government gave marked money to a codefendant in connection with a drug sale several days before the purchase of larger amounts of drugs that it attributed to the appellant and the codefendant, and that the appellant ended up with some of the marked bills.

United States v. Higgs, 353 F.3d 281 (4th Cir. 2003) : Affirming convictions for murder and related offenses, the Court held that evidence of a nightclub shooting involving the defendant was properly admitted because both the charged murders and the uncharged shooting involved a.38 caliber weapon, the defendant told another that he could not plead guilty to the shooting because authorities would try to use the gun in another case, and the bullet from the shooting was forensically similar to those recovered in the murders. Moreover, the shooting evidence placed the murder weapon in the defendant's hands shortly before the murders, which was important because the weapon had been thrown into a river after the murders and was never found.

United States v. Miller, 688 F.2d 652 (9th Cir. 1982) : In a prosecution for theft of a trailer, the Court found no error in admitting evidence that three conveyor belts, stolen from the trailer's owner, were in the defendant's possession. The evidence tended to establish that the trailer found with the defendant was the same trailer that had been stolen. See also United States v. Calhoun n117(reversible error to admit evidence of "bait bills" taken in a bank robbery different from that charged in the instant case).

[q] Rule 404(b) -- Consciousness of Guilt

United States v. Levy-Cordero, 67 F.3d 1002 (1st Cir. 1995) : Immediately after a defendant charged in a drug trafficking conspiracy was notified of his impending arrest, he was seized carrying a false passport and social security card. The Court held it was error to admit the evidence with an instruction that it could be used "for the limited purpose of showing whether [he] had the required intent or knowledge." However, because there was no logical reason why possession of the false documents in 1992 would demonstrate his intent or knowledge with respect to drug trafficking in 1987, the error was more favorable to the defendant than would have been a proper instruction admitting the evidence solely on the issue of consciousness of guilt. In United States v. Boyle, n118 an armed bank robbery case, the Court held evidence that the defendant used an alias and had false identification cards six days after the robbery was admissible to show consciousness of guilt.

United States v. Gatto, 995 F.2d 449 (3d Cir. 1993) (en banc): Affirming racketeering convictions, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the prosecutor to question a witness as to whether he had seen threatening looks from a courtroom spectator and the defendant. The government contended that these looks intimidated the witness and caused him to become hostile to the government and accommodating to the defense. Although testimony that a defendant looks unhappy during trial or appears irritated at someone testifying for the government will in many instances have little probative value and may be prejudicial, in this case the defendant did not ask for a Rule 403 ruling and the Trial Judge pointed out that the defendants had an opportunity to examine the witness with respect to any gestures or looks.

United States v. Young, 248 F.3d 260 (4th Cir. 2001) : In a trial on charges of interstate kidnapping and causing death through the use of a firearm, the Court admitted evidence that the defendant had threatened and intimidated the victim's mother. Affirming the convictions, the Court found that this evidence was properly admitted under Rule 404(b) to demonstrate the defendant's consciousness of guilt. The Court noted that "Young did not chase and assault a random bystander; he assaulted the victim's mother, who was a potential witness against him in a federal prosecution for murder." In a drug trafficking prosecution, United States v. Hayden, 85 F.3d 153 (4th Cir. 1996) , the Court held that evidence of a defendant's threatening a witness was properly admitted to show consciousness of guilt and criminal intent. In United States v. Kibler, n119 the Court, upholding a conviction for endeavoring to intimidate a witness, found that evidence of an attempt by the appellant to persuade another witness to change testimony was properly admitted.

United States v. Rocha, 916 F.2d 219 (5th Cir. 1990): Affirming convictions for kidnapping, extortion, and conspiracy, the Court held that evidence a defendant made a death threat against a government witness during the trial was probative of his guilt and of the validity of his duress defense.

United States v. Jackson, 886 F.2d 838 (7th Cir. 1989) : The defendant, who was charged with fraudulently altering money orders, was ordered to provide handwriting exemplars but refused to do so. The Trial Judge granted the defendant's motion in limine against introducing evidence of his refusal. Affirming, on interlocutory review, the defendant's conviction of contempt for refusing to furnish the exemplars, the Court reversed the in limine ruling, holding that refusal to comply with a lawful order to provide exemplars was probative of the defendant's consciousness of guilt and not likely to produce an improper emotional decision by the jury.

[r] Rule 404(b) -- Conspiracy

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Background Evidence

United States v. Escobar-de Jesus, 187 F.3d 148 (1st Cir. 1999) : Affirming a defendant's convictions for drug-related offenses and engaging in a continuing criminal enterprise, the Court noted that "[i]n a conspiracy case, evidence of other bad acts, subject always to the requirements of Rule 403, can be admitted to explain the background, formation, and development of the illegal relationship, ... and, more specifically, to help the jury understand the basis for the co-conspirators' relationship of mutual trust."

United States v. Mathis, 264 F.3d 321 (3d Cir. 2001) : Affirming a conviction for bank robbery, the Court found no error in the admission of an unindicted coconspirator's testimony as to eleven uncharged bank robberies that he and the defendant committed. The witness was the only person who could describe the conspiracy directly and the evidence regarding the other robberies tended to show the trust that the defendant had in the witness and thus to prove the conspiracy. In United States v. Echeverri, n120 the Court held that a government witness' testimony that he had encountered the defendant one year before the charged conspiracy, when both went to a location to purchase substantial quantities of cocaine, was admissible to prove that the defendant had a source of such cocaine.

United States v. Nichols, 750 F.2d 1260 (5th Cir. 1985) : Evidence of the defendants' previous involvement in transporting cocaine was admissible in a conspiracy prosecution to prove the way in which the conspiracy was established and carried out.

United States v. Passarella, 788 F.2d 377 (6th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed counterfeiting and drug convictions, finding that testimony concerning prior drug deals was admissible to show the background and the development of the conspiracy charged.

United States v. Al-Dabbi, 388 F.3d 1145 (8th Cir. 2004) , vacated on other grounds, 546 U.S. 973 (2005) : In a cocaine distribution conspiracy prosecution, the Court found no plain error when a cooperating coconspirator was permitted to testify that the defendant had assaulted his wife and that the wife had asked the witness to dispose of her husband's gun because she feared for her life. As the wife was a member of the conspiracy, the evidence was probative of the defendant's control over the conspiracy through violence and fear, and that probative value was not substantially outweighed by the danger of prejudice. In United States v. Crenshaw, 359 F.3d 977 (8th Cir. 2004) , the Court affirmed convictions for murder in aid of racketeering although the government had been erroneously permitted to introduce a certified copy of one defendant's prior conviction for shooting another man. While evidence that the defendant was incarcerated along with a member of the gang that he joined had probative value, evidence of the charge for which he was incarcerated had little relevance.

United States v. Mora, 845 F.2d 233 (10th Cir. 1988) : The Court held that evidence of conspirator statements about an uncharged drug transaction one month before the charged transaction was admissible to explain how the conspiracy started. See also United States v. Orr n121(evidence of other acts explained how conspiracy started).

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Conspiracy -- Particular Relevance and Problems

United States v. Manner, 887 F.2d 317 (D.C. Cir. 1989) : The Court stated that a conspiracy charge "increases the probativeness of Rule 404(b) evidence," although it remanded for an on-the-record ruling under Rule 403. In United States v. Moore, n122 a majority of the Court affirmed convictions for conspiracy to sell cocaine, despite a vociferous dissent. The government's key witness, who had lived with one of the defendants, had set up a meeting for an undercover agent to purchase marijuana and cocaine. One defendant noticed that the agent's currency appeared to be marked, and no sale was actually made. The government arrested the defendants and charged them with conspiracy and a variety of substantive offenses. At trial, the witness detailed her former housemate's drug dealings. The majority found that the testimony was properly used to prove intent, especially since the defendants' theory was that the sale was a sham, not a real attempt to sell drugs, and the housemate raised an entrapment defense. The dissenting Judge observed that the witness could recall few specifics about any prior trafficking on the part of the housemate and expressed grave concern that the "vague and inferential bad acts testimony could not help but to aggravate the confusion, complexity and 'inherent dangers' that can be associated, even under the best of circumstances, with a conspiracy charge."

United States v. Tracy, 12 F.3d 1186 (2d Cir. 1993) : In the prosecution of two leaders of a large drug trafficking conspiracy, the government introduced a copy of the complaint in the case that was annotated by one of the defendants with death threats against informant and agent sources of the allegations. The annotations had apparently been made after all the other conspirators had been arrested. The document was admitted against the conspirator making the annotations as evidence he had sufficient familiarity with the operation to identify the unnamed informants; the Trial Judge instructed that it was not binding on the other defendant on trial, but that acts and statements of coconspirators could be considered against any defendant in determining whether the government had proved the charges. The Court held that the annotated complaint should not have been admitted against the codefendant who did not make it because the statements were not made during and in furtherance of the conspiracy and that the instruction was insufficient to protect the codefendant from its use against him, but the error was harmless.

United States v. Murray, 103 F.3d 310 (3d Cir. 1997) : The Court reversed a conviction for intentional killing in furtherance of a continuing criminal enterprise because of error in admitting, inter alia, evidence that the defendant had previously committed another murder. The prosecutor had only said that the evidence "wasn't just [offered for] identity. Role in the organization, common scheme, plan, a number of different reasons," and the Trial Judge's most complete explanation (in the jury charge) why it was admitted was "for the very limited purpose to show identity, role in the conspiracy, a common scheme or plan." However, there was no showing that the uncharged murder was connected to the charged CCE or that the two killings were planned together or involved a common design, nor were the similarities between the two sufficient to be relevant on the identity issue. Even if the evidence had some slight probative value, it would be substantially outweighed by the prejudicial effect of showing the defendant's murderous propensity.

United States v. Jackson, 339 F.3d 349 (5th Cir. 2003) : Reversing a conviction for transporting stolen goods from a jewelry store burglary, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to admit evidence that the defendant had a previous felony conviction for stealing watches. While prior conviction evidence has a tendency to prove the difficult intent element in conspiracy cases, that the defendant knowingly joined a plan to further an unlawful objective, in this case, where there was other evidence going to intent and only the identification issue was contested, the evidence had very little probative value. Moreover, it had a substantial potential to cause unfair prejudice, because of the great danger that the jury would decide that he was involved in the conspiracy because of his prior criminal conduct.

United States v. Dudek, 560 F.2d 1288 (6th Cir. 1977) : The Court upheld a ruling admitting evidence of crimes not charged in the indictment to show the appellant's intent. The Court suggested that in conspiracy cases, other crimes evidence might be "particularly probative" to show a system of criminal activity.

United States v. Grabiec, 563 F.2d 313 (7th Cir. 1977) : In a prosecution for conspiracy to extort money under color of official right, the government offered evidence that on four other occasions the appellant's coconspirator accepted money in exchange for providing state licenses. The majority held that two of the occasions fell within the conspiracy charged, that the other two were properly admitted as a part of a pattern of conduct, and that instructions to the jury that the evidence of the four other occasions was admissible only to show the coconspirator's intent and was not to be used against the appellant were adequate. The dissenting Judge emphasized that there was no evidence that the appellant was involved on the other occasions or that they related in any way to the conduct that was at the heart of the charged conspiracy, that the evidence was not really probative on the intent issue, and that jury instructions in a conspiracy case were of little value.

Moore v. United States, 178 F.3d 994 (9th Cir. 1999) : In a trial on bank robbery and conspiracy charges, the defendant argued that it was error to admit a statement made by the defendant to an accomplice just before the robbery. The accomplice expressed misgivings about committing the bank robbery, and the defendant told the accomplice that he had robbed a bank before and that it was easy. The Court found that this evidence was properly admitted to prove that the defendant had used his prior success as a bank robber to persuade the accomplice to enter into a conspiracy. In United States v. Bronco, n123 the Court reversed convictions for conspiracy to sell and possession and passing of counterfeit money, finding error in the refusal to grant a severance so that the conspiracy charge would be tried separately. The Court was concerned that evidence that the appellant was a violent man, admitted on the conspiracy charge, might have prejudiced the jury on the other charges.

United States v. Gamble, 541 F.2d 873 (10th Cir. 1976) : The Court approved the introduction of other crimes evidence in a criminal prosecution, noting that "[s]uch evidence is particularly relevant in a conspiracy case."

United States v. Glen-Archila, 677 F.2d 809 (11th Cir. 1982) : Glen-Archila was a crew member of a ship found by the Coast Guard to be carrying marijuana in 1979. At his conspiracy trial, the government introduced evidence that he had been aboard a ship that the Coast Guard found carrying marijuana in 1976. According to the Court, "the government often has [difficulty] in proving intent in conspiracy cases," so there was no error in admitting the evidence. We question whether this balance gave sufficient weight to the possibility that a jury would misuse the evidence as character evidence.

[s] Rule 404(b) -- Corroboration

United States v. Bailey, 319 F.3d 514 (D.C. Cir. 2003) : In a prosecution for conspiring to distribute cocaine, the government offered evidence of the defendant's uncharged drug deals, including two specific episodes in New York. The defendant argued that, while the incidents may have properly been admitted to show knowledge, intent, etc., the Trial Judge erred in instructing the jury that it could use the incidents to corroborate another witness' testimony that the defendant also engaged in uncharged drug transactions with the witness. Distinguishing between corroborating the defendant's propensity, which is impermissible, and corroborating inferences for proper purposes (e.g., knowledge, intent), the Court concluded that "the evidence had little probative value for permissible corroborative purposes" and "there were risks of unfair prejudice, confusion and misleading the jury," but the error was harmless.

United States v. Figueroa, 976 F.2d 1446 (1st Cir. 1992) : The Court held that evidence tending to show welfare fraud by defendants in a drug case was properly admitted as direct corroboration of significant conspiracy-related conversations with an informant.

United States v. Everett, 825 F.2d 658 (2d Cir. 1987) : Although the Court affirmed bank robbery convictions and the admission of testimony concerning a prior robbery, it indicated that when other crimes evidence is admitted for corroborative purposes, the corroboration must be "direct" and the matter corroborated must be "significant." In United States v. Williams, n124 the Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to commit bank larceny, observing that other crimes evidence could be admitted to directly corroborate a significant matter in a case.

United States v. Hans, 738 F.2d 88 (3d Cir. 1984) : The Court held that evidence seized from one codefendant was admissible against another, where the evidence corroborated a government witness' testimony about how the bank robbery occurred.

United States v. McCarty, 36 F.3d 1349 (5th Cir. 1994) : The Court affirmed a bank robbery conviction, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of a prior house burglary by the defendant, as weapons taken in the burglary were used in the robbery and the evidence corroborated admissions the defendant made to a fellow inmate while awaiting trial.

United States v. Copeland, 51 F.3d 611 (6th Cir. 1995) : Although finding that it was a close question, the Court held in a drug distribution prosecution that evidence of the defendant's arrest in 1988 for possessing a weapon was not too attenuated to corroborate a witness' testimony that he had been attacked by the defendant with a pistol in 1991.

[t] Rule 404(b) -- Duress Defense

United States v. Verduzco, 373 F.3d 1022 (9th Cir. 2004) : Affirming a conviction for illegal drug importation, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the defendant's prior drug smuggling to disprove the defendant's claim of duress. The defendant argued that evidence offered to rebut an affirmative defense should not be as readily admitted as evidence offered to prove a material element of a crime, but the Court concluded that "we are not persuaded that bad acts evidence admitted against an affirmative defense is somehow more troubling than when the same evidence is admitted to help prove a material element of the statutorily defined defense."

[u] Rule 404(b) -- Entrapment Defense

United States v. Ramsey, 165 F.3d 980 (D.C. Cir. 1999) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possession of cocaine with intent to distribute, holding there was no error in admitting evidence of the defendant's past criminal history. The evidence was not offered to show the defendant's propensity to commit a crime but to respond to defendant's attempts to challenge the voluntariness of a confession and to rebut defense arguments that he was entrapped by an informant.

United States v. Van Horn, 277 F.3d 48 (1st Cir. 2002) : The defendant was convicted for being a felon in possession of explosives, and the Court affirmed, holding that "in situations where the defendant employs entrapment as a defense to criminal liability, prior bad acts relevant to a defendant's predisposition to commit a crime are highly probative and can overcome the Rule 404(b) bar." Although the defendant complained about the admission of detailed evidence concerning his prior act, the Court observed that in an entrapment case the details are especially important if there was no conviction, to make the incident meaningful to the predisposition issue. In United States v. Houle, 237 F.3d 71 (1st Cir. 2001) , the defendant was charged in a cocaine conspiracy arising from activities of a motorcycle club, which was infiltrated by an informant who assisted the government in setting up a sham cocaine deal for which the defendant provided security. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that a few days after providing security for the cocaine deal, the defendant provided security for the same government agent while he purportedly collected a gambling debt. The evidence was relevant to prove intent and absence of mistake, and "other acts that bear on a defendant's predisposition are highly probative when, like here, the defendant claims entrapment."

United States v. Knox, 112 F.3d 802 (5th Cir. 1997) : In a trial for money laundering, the government responded to the defendant's claim of entrapment with evidence that he had solicited undercover agents to commit murder. The Court found no error, noting that "[t]he jury could conclude that a person just 'funnin' ' " would not solicit murder and, therefore, the real Knox was on the undercover tapes, not in the courtroom. If the jury believed the government's portrayal of Knox, it could infer that he was predisposed to launder money."

United States v. Higham, 98 F.3d 285 (7th Cir. 1996) : In a murder-for-hire prosecution, the defendant pursued an entrapment defense. In rebuttal, the prosecution offered several uncharged acts of extreme violence committed by the defendant against other individuals. The Court found no error, "for the government had a right to meet Higham's claim of entrapment with evidence that he was predisposed to engage in a murder-for-hire scheme."

United States v. Coleman, 284 F.3d 892 (8th Cir. 2002) : Where the defendant, charged with cocaine offenses, raised an entrapment defense, the Court held that evidence of a previous sale of crack cocaine by the defendant to the same undercover agent involved in the charged offense was properly admitted to show the defendant's predisposition to commit the charged crime.

United States v. Thomas, 134 F.3d 975 (9th Cir. 1998) : The defendant claimed that he was entrapped into participation in the charged sale of three pounds of methamphetamine. The government offered as proof of his predisposition that he was a methamphetamine user and that he had at some point in the past sold another participant a couple of single $20 doses of methamphetamine. However, the defendant was not permitted to testify that he had no prior arrest or conviction record and certainly no record of any past criminal behavior suggesting in any way that he might be predisposed to engage in large-scale drug trafficking. Reversing, the Court held that the excluded evidence was relevant to the defendant's intent, especially since a government informant had initiated the transaction, determined the type and volume of drugs involved, and arranged the meeting with the "buyer." It was also important to counter any prejudicial effect of the evidence of prior small sales. Because the defendant's character is an essential element of the entrapment defense, exclusion of the evidence was an abuse of discretion. One Judge dissented, arguing that an absence of arrests or criminal record is not relevant on the question of predisposition, because it may simply mean he has never been caught.

[v] Rule 404(b) -- Explaining Conduct

United States v. Roe, 210 F.3d 741 (7th Cir. 2000) : Affirming a conviction for conspiring to distribute cocaine, the Court found no error in the admission of the defendant's 1989 conviction for the same offense. The defendant had introduced testimony from police officers that no drug paraphernalia was ever found at his house and no evidence of drug activity was ever found in his trash because the defendant never placed trash in front of his house. The Court found that the earlier conviction helped to explain why the defendant would not keep drug paraphernalia at his house and why he did not put out trash in front of his home for collection by municipal crews.

[w] Rule 404(b) -- Foundation for Other Acts

Huddleston v. United States, 485 U.S. 681 (1988) : This important Supreme Court case holds that evidence offered under Rule 404(b) is to be assessed under Rule 104(b), the conditional relevance rule. The Court noted that the defendant was to be protected against undue prejudice by Rule 403, not by the Trial Judge's application of a preponderance or clear and convincing standard under Rule 104. The case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 404.02[18].

United States v. Gilan, 967 F.2d 776 (2d Cir. 1992) : The Court reversed a conviction for conspiring to steal a shipment of shoes, holding it was error to admit evidence of an earlier similar theft because there was no evidence linking the defendant to the earlier theft.

United States v. Kenny, 973 F.2d 339 (4th Cir. 1992) : In a prosecution for obstructing a grand jury investigation, the Court held that testimony that a significant piece of paper had been taken in a burglary of a witness' apartment shortly after she appeared before the grand jury was not admissible under the Rule, as there was no evidence connecting the defendant to the break-in. The testimony was relevant and admissible, however, to explain the absence of the piece of paper at the trial. The Court also held it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless) to admit evidence that the defendant possessed checks made out to another, as there was no showing in the record that the checks were stolen or that the defendant was not authorized to endorse them.

United States v. Floyd, 343 F.3d 363 (5th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed a conviction for insurance fraud in a scheme involving staged automobile accidents, finding no abuse of discretion when evidence was admitted that the defendant participated in uncharged staged auto accidents, since there was sufficient proof that she committed the other offenses, which were relevant to her intent and knowledge. In United States v. Anderson, 933 F.2d 1261 (5th Cir. 1991) , a conviction for arson of a furniture warehouse was reversed because the Trial Judge made no ruling that jurors could find by a preponderance that each of four previous fires in the defendant's furniture factory had been acts of arson and that the defendant was involved. In United States v. Fortenberry, n125 the Court reversed convictions for offenses allegedly committed when the defendant placed a small explosive device on a car belonging to his ex-wife's father. It concluded that evidence of a series of attacks against the ex-wife, her attorney, her father, and others was improperly admitted because, inter alia, the government had no evidence that the defendant committed the acts and there was not even evidence that all were committed by the same person.

United States v. Burke, 425 F.3d 400 (7th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a conviction for perjury before a grand jury investigating a prisoner's escape from custody. It found no error in the admission, as proof of motive and method, of evidence that the defendant had offered to sell a handcuff key to another prisoner, finding that the Judge properly used a preponderance standard in determining whether the defendant had made the offer. It rejected the argument that Huddleston did not apply where the government proffers evidence that neither a Judge nor a jury had previously determined was committed and that proof beyond a reasonable doubt was required. The Court suggested, however, that proof beyond a reasonable doubt might be required if the fact to be proved was a substantive offense rather than just an offer as in this case. In United States v. DeGeratto, n126 a conviction for transporting and receiving stolen truckloads of food products was reversed because the Trial Judge permitted the defendant to be cross-examined at length regarding a prostitution ring about which he denied any knowledge and in which there was no showing he had any involvement. In United States v. Meeker, n127 the Court reversed a conviction for failing to report income, holding that the prosecutor's questions, which suggested prior misconduct on the part of the defendant and that the defendant was guilty of engaging in the very conduct for which he was being tried, were unsupported by evidence and required reversal.

United States v. Worthon, 315 F.3d 980 (8th Cir. 2003) : Affirming a Postal Service employee's conviction for mail theft, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to admit evidence of previous thefts and disappearances of items from the post office. The government had not shown a connection between the defendant and those other acts by clear and convincing evidence. In United States v. Adediran, 26 F.3d 61 (8th Cir. 1994) , a prosecution for using false Social Security numbers in St. Louis as part of a check-kiting scheme, the Court held there was sufficient evidence connecting the defendant with uncharged crimes in Rockford, Ill., as checks issued in St. Louis were deposited in Rockford, false SSNs used at different banks in the two cities all began with the same first five digits, and there were similarities in identifications and in handwriting.

United States v. Dickerson, 248 F.3d 1036 (10th Cir. 2001) : Affirming drug convictions, the Court held that evidence of post-conspiracy drug activity was properly admitted to prove intent. The Court stated that "the uncorroborated word of an accomplice provides a sufficient basis for concluding that the defendant committed extrinsic acts admissible under Rule 404(b)."

[x] Rule 404(b) -- Identity

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Generally

[A] Rule 404(b) -- Circumstances Insufficiently Probative

United States v. Pisari, 636 F.2d 855 (1st Cir. 1981) : The Court reversed a conviction for committing a robbery with a knife because the government introduced a statement made by the defendant to a government agent admitting a prior robbery in which such a knife was used. There was no showing of identifying characteristics that would have tended to prove identity: there was no evidence of the kind of knives used, no proof of the timing of the other crime, and no similarity of motive. "The single fact that in committing a robbery, one invokes the threat of using a knife falls far short of a sufficient signature or trademark upon which to posit an inference of identity."

United States v. Sampson, 385 F.3d 183 (2d Cir. 2004) : The Court vacated convictions for drug possession offenses that took place in 1998 because evidence of drug trafficking and firearms offenses in 2000 was improperly admitted at a joint trial on all the charges. The 1998 charges arose from an officer's testimony that he saw a man in a yellow jacket making a drug transaction; when the defendant was arrested a short while later, he was not wearing a yellow jacket, but the yellow jacket (with marijuana and cocaine in the pockets) was found in an area where the defendant had been observed. The 2000 charges arose from a drug sale (recorded on videotape) by the defendant to an undercover officer. The Court held that evidence of the defendant's being a drug dealer in 2000 had no tendency, except through the impermissible propensity inference, to prove that the defendant was the man in the yellow jacket in 1998. In United States v. Edwards, 342 F.3d 168 (2d Cir. 2003) , the Court affirmed a conviction for conspiring to import a substance containing cocaine, holding that evidence of a cocaine-cutting recipe found in the defendant's car when he was arrested was properly admitted to prove knowledge and intent, but not to prove identity. The Court reasoned that the defendant admitted that he used the name Darnell Johnson, so the fact that the note was found among papers containing that name did not tend to make a witness's identification of the defendant more accurate. The Court explained that for a rational juror to conclude that the recipe supported the identification, the juror would have had to reason first that the defendant was a cocaine dealer and second that a cocaine dealer was more likely to participate in the charged scheme than a person not involved in the cocaine trade; "[s]uch reasoning, of course, calls for the very propensity inference prohibited under Rule 404(b)," and "[t]hus, the recipe was not properly received as proof of defendant's identity." In United States v. Neary, n128 the Court overturned a defendant's convictions for destroying his restaurant in 1981 with an explosive, finding that the Trial Judge improperly admitted evidence concerning two fires (in 1976 and 1977) at a tenement house he owned and another fire (in 1980) that destroyed his dry cleaning business. The issue in the case was the identity of the person who set fire to the building, and the Court reiterated that prior acts used to prove identity must be more similar than acts offered for other purposes. Since the government had no evidence that the prior fires were incendiary in origin, the Court concluded that the acts were improperly used. The fact that the defendant might have collected insurance from the prior fires was not relevant to the question of identity; it is common knowledge that an insured can collect on a fire insurance policy covering property.

United States v. Murray, 103 F.3d 310 (3d Cir. 1997) : The Court reversed a conviction for intentional killing in furtherance of a continuing criminal enterprise because of error in admitting, inter alia, evidence that the defendant had previously committed another murder. The prosecutor had only said that the evidence "wasn't just [offered for] identity. Role in the organization, common scheme, plan, a number of different reasons," and the Trial Judge's most complete explanation (in the jury charge) why it was admitted was "for the very limited purpose to show identity, role in the conspiracy, a common scheme or plan." However, the similarities between the two killings were not sufficient to be relevant on the identity issue. Even if the evidence had some slight probative value, it would be substantially outweighed by the prejudicial effect of showing the defendant's murderous propensity.

United States v. Brown, 71 F.3d 1158 (5th Cir. 1995) : The Court reversed a conviction for possession with intent to distribute crack cocaine, finding error when the prosecution elicited the defendant's prior cocaine conviction in cross-examining the sole defense witness about her knowledge of the defendant. The Court concluded that the only way the cross-examination "could help identify Mr. Brown was through the inference that because Mr. Brown committed the crime of possession with intent to distribute before, he had done so again." In United States v. Carrillo, 981 F.2d 772 (5th Cir. 1993) , the Court reversed a defendant's drug convictions, finding it was error to admit two other sales of controlled substances. The sales did not involve the kind of "signature" that would prove identity.

United States v. Wright, 901 F.2d 68 (7th Cir. 1990) : The Court reversed a conviction for cocaine distribution because a tape-recorded telephone conversation in which the defendant claimed to be a wholesale drug dealer did not tend to show the identity of a perpetrator charged with a retail cocaine sale.

United States v. Vavages, 151 F.3d 1185 (9th Cir. 1998) : The defendant was convicted of a marijuana offense, the government's allegation being that he fled from a car full of marijuana. Reversing the conviction on other grounds, the Court expressed concern over the admission of the defendant's prior conviction for possession with intent to distribute marijuana. The government argued that the uncharged misconduct was probative of identity, since in both instances the defendant fled a vehicle containing a large amount of marijuana. However, the Court concluded that this conduct was not unique enough to constitute "a personal signature." In United States v. Luna, 21 F.3d 874 (9th Cir. 1994) , the Court reversed bank robbery convictions, finding it was error to admit evidence of two subsequent bank robberies attributable to two of the defendants. The Court found that "the common features in this case were largely generic," since they involved use of guns, masks, gloves, and bags in a typical "takeover robbery," in which people are intimidated by loud entry, profanity, and abuse of bank employees. Differences in personnel among the robberies undermined the supposed distinctiveness of the crimes.

United States v. Jones, 28 F.3d 1574 (11th Cir. 1994) , modified, 74 F.3d 275 (11th Cir. 1996) : In a prosecution for drug trafficking offenses, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit evidence of the defendant's prior convictions for gambling offenses to prove that he occupied an apartment in which slips that evidenced illegal commercial gambling were found. There was no showing of a distinctive modus operandi connecting the prior offenses and the slips in the apartment, and the evidence, which had low probative value, had a great potential to prejudice the defendant.

[B] RULE 404(b) -- Identity -- Generally -- Circumstances Sufficiently Probative

United States v. Pindell, 336 F.3d 1049 (D.C. Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed a police officer's conviction for civil rights violations and armed robbery of prostitutes and their customers, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by two of the prostitutes that the defendant had previously paid them to engage in sexual acts. The evidence showed the prostitutes' familiarity with the defendant, thus supporting their ability to identify him, and its probative value on the contested identity issue was not substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice.

United States v. Trenkler, 61 F.3d 45 (1st Cir. 1995) : The Court affirmed a conviction on various charges resulting from a bomb explosion, finding no error in the admission of evidence that the defendant had built another bomb five years earlier. There was extensive evidence showing both similarities and significant differences between the bombings; given the number of comparable factors, it was proper to admit the evidence and let the discrepancies go to its weight. In United States v. Ingraham, n129 the Court upheld the admission of evidence of prior threatening phone calls to prove identity in a prosecution for threatening to kidnap or injure. In United States v. Andiarena, n130 the Court affirmed a drug conviction, holding that evidence of the defendant's prior involvement in a network was admissible to prove that he was the source of cocaine.

United States v. Muniz, 60 F.3d 65 (2d Cir. 1995) , amended on other grounds on reh'g, 71 F.3d 93 (2d Cir. 1995) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possession of heroin with intent to distribute. Police found the heroin in a mailbox, to which both the defendant and his mother had access; they also found a large number of empty glassine envelopes in the bedroom where the defendant was arrested. Concluding there was no error in admitting the empty glassines, the Court reasoned that the defendant's possession of the tools of the heroin trade at the time heroin was found in his mailbox "increases the likelihood that it was he, rather than another person having possible access, who in fact controlled the drugs in the mailbox." In United States v. Cruz, n131 evidence that a defendant had 13 vials of cocaine on the day after a sale was held properly admitted to prove that the defendant was the person who made the sale of similar vials. In United States v. Gubelman, n132 the Court held that evidence from others who had given the defendant bribes tended to make the defense argument of mistaken identity less likely.

United States v. Bailey, 111 F.3d 1229 (5th Cir. 1997) : Affirming a defendant's convictions for aggravated sexual abuse, burglaries, and a firearms offense, the Court held that evidence of another break-in was properly admitted to prove identity as to the two charged break-ins, since all three events took place in the homes of single women living in the same area, all occurred during pre-dawn hours, and each victim was physically touched in some way without consent. In United States v. Evans, n133 the Court held that evidence that a firearm defendant had a gun, glasses, a wig, and false identification when she was arrested was properly admitted to prove, in connection with similar evidence found in an apartment, that the defendant was the person who illegally obtained firearms. The Court reasoned that there are proper ways to prove identity other than by proving a modus operandi, and that the similarity of the evidence in the instant case was probative of identity. In United States v. Torres-Flores, n134 the Court reversed a conviction for assaulting a Border Patrol agent because of the improper use of mug shots, but it held that evidence that shortly after the assault the defendant had been apprehended at a point known for its high volume of illegal alien traffic was admissible. The evidence was probative of identity because it showed the defendant's connection with the location where the charged act occurred.

United States v. Lattner, 385 F.3d 947 (6th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed a cocaine conviction, finding no abuse of discretion when evidence was admitted that certain heroin packets bearing a particular stamp were seized from the defendant on two prior occasions. The evidence was probative of identity, intent, and a common plan or scheme, because it connected the defendant to the charged drug transactions, where a similar stamp was found. In United States v. Monsour, 893 F.2d 126 (6th Cir. 1990) (per curiam), a bank security guard was permitted to testify at the defendant's trial for bank robbery that the person in the robbery surveillance films was the same person whose car license number he secured eight days earlier after seeing him acting suspiciously at another nearby branch of the bank that was robbed. The Court held there was no error, stating that this was admissible because it was part of the investigative linkage that led the FBI to the defendant.

United States v. White, 368 F.3d 911 (7th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, holding that evidence of numerous customer invoice forms from the newspaper where the defendant had worked, which were seized from the defendant's residence and tended to prove identity theft, was properly admitted to prove that the defendant kept his belongings in the dresser where the guns were found. The Court noted that the evidence was "highly probative of White's identity" and that the bad act of identity theft "was not of the type which typically arouses strong passions in jurors." In United States v. Joseph, 310 F.3d 975 (7th Cir. 2002) , the defendant was convicted of bank fraud after he opened accounts under his aliases, stole checks, made them out to his aliases, and then deposited and withdrew funds from the fraudulent accounts. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the defendant had stolen a check mailed to one Donnell Cooper, since that tended to identify him as the person who had used that name as an alias in establishing one of the accounts. In United States v. Chong

Won Tai, n135 the Court affirmed a conviction for extortion, holding that evidence of the defendant's uncharged actions was relevant to prove identity and to prove that he intended to threaten by using the words he chose. This was not a case in which identity was proved by similar conduct, but rather by showing the defendant's connection with certain other individuals who were involved in the uncharged actions. In United States v. Townsend, n136 the prosecution offered evidence that one defendant sold cocaine to an undercover agent before the charged conspiracy began. The Court held that the evidence was properly admitted as proof of identity because it demonstrated the defendant responded to a beeper number paged by another defendant during the conspiracy. In United States v. Covelli, n137 the Court affirmed convictions for crimes arising out of the robbery of a shop and the disposition of stolen goods, upholding the admission of testimony that one of the defendants had previously been in possession of a small caliber pistol. It said that "evidence of prior possession of a weapon can be used to prove opportunity and identification even where it cannot be directly identified as the weapon used in the crime."

United States v. Jackson, 714 F.2d 809 (8th Cir. 1983) : The Court approved the use of irregularities in invoices and time sheets to prove identity and lack of mistake in a prosecution for making false statements in federal invoices.

United States v. Shumway, 112 F.3d 1413 (10th Cir. 1997) : In a prosecution for unauthorized excavation of a prehistoric grave site, the Court held there was no error in admitting evidence that the defendant had illegally excavated at the site seven years earlier. The Court concluded that the evidence was admissible to prove identity, reasoning that "the remoteness of the location, the difficulty of access, and the varying concentration of artifacts, all suggest the person who committed both the prior act and the charged acts was one possessing distinctive, unique and unusual skills necessary to locate and excavate the artifacts."

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Identity -- Modus Operandi

[A] Rule 404(b) -- Bank Robbery

United States v. Lawson, 410 F.3d 735 (D.C.Cir. 2005) : Affirming a conviction for bank robbery, the Court found no error in the admission, as proof of identity, of evidence regarding a bank robbery the day following the charged robbery. The two robberies "shared sufficient characteristics to permit an inference of identity. Both were executed by a taller man wielding a distinctive silver-hammered handgun and a shorter man who collected money from the tellers, and the taller individual appeared to wear the same clothes during both crimes."

United States v. Myers, 550 F.2d 1036 (5th Cir. 1977) : A conviction for bank robbery was reversed because, inter alia, evidence of a subsequent bank robbery in another state was improperly admitted. The Court said that to prove modus operandi, the charged and other crimes need not be identical, but they must possess common features, and the more distinctive each of the common features is, the fewer required for the probative value of the evidence to be significant. The Court also said "a much greater degree of similarity between the charged crime and the uncharged crime is required when the evidence of the other crime is introduced to prove identity than when it is introduced to prove a state of mind."

United States v. Mack, 258 F.3d 548 (6th Cir. 2001) : In a bank robbery trial, evidence was admitted of an uncharged bank robbery committed by the defendant. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion, since identity was in issue and the defendant did not dispute committing the other robbery involving the same "signature" characteristics -- the combination of wearing a ski mask and a hooded sweatshirt, bursting into the bank and leaping over the teller counter, and then leaping over the counter again to leave -- together with similarities in the location of the robberies, the descriptions of the robbers, the commands used, the methods of escape, and the days and times of the robberies. However, the Court also held it was error (but harmless) to admit evidence that the uncharged robbery was followed by a high-speed chase involving seven or eight police cars.

United States v. Rollins, 301 F.3d 511 (7th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed bank robbery convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in denying a motion to sever, since evidence of the other robberies, and a robbery to which the defendant had separately pleaded guilty, were admissible to establish identity or modus operandi. Common to most, if not all, of the robberies was: (1) donning thick, dark-framed glasses; (2) wearing a beige, three-quarter-length down coat; (3) the ruse of asking seemingly innocuous customer questions before and during the robbery; and (4) using a black and grey handgun placed calmly on the teller counter. Moreover, the witnesses to those robberies gave similar descriptions of the perpetrator. In a bank robbery prosecution, United States v. Robinson, 161 F.3d 463 (7th Cir. 1998) , the Court held it was not an abuse of discretion to admit evidence of an uncharged bank robbery. The similarities between the two robberies made them "clearly distinctive from the thousands of other bank robberies committed each year." In both cases, the robber wore an orange ski mask prior to entering the bank, entered the bank carrying a distinctive Louis Vuitton duffel bag in one hand and a gun in the other, vaulted over the teller counter, and emptied the drawers himself after placing the gun down. The getaway vehicle in each case was a blue Chevrolet Cavalier. Finally, the crimes were committed within ten days of each other, and the banks were within 25 miles of each other. In United States v. Moore, n138 the Court affirmed convictions for robbing two financial institutions, holding that evidence of the defendant's prior bank robbery conviction was properly admitted. The Court found a number of significant similarities: two men of the same race and height committed the crimes within a few months of each other, in the morning, by emptying cash drawers largely by themselves, stuffing money into their pants, using hoods or masks and dark clothing, targeting small savings institutions in residential neighborhoods with no drive-up window, and casing the institutions by having the defendant enter a half hour to an hour before the robbery to politely ask for directions or a job application. In United States v. Smith, n139 the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in a bank robbery case in admitting evidence of another bank robbery, where both were committed by slender young white males, the robbers were both driven to the bank by another person, both brandished knives (an atypical holdup weapon), both moved around the counter to help themselves rather than demanding money from the teller, both targeted small branches, and the robberies were close in time and location.

United States v. Almendares, 397 F.3d 653 (8th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a bank robbery conviction, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the defendant had committed a robbery seven months earlier at a variety store in a town 15 miles away. In both cases the robber wore a black ski mask, a gray sweatshirt, and white gloves, "spoke very few words, used a handgun aggressively to direct the victims, and pushed his gun into their shoulders." In a bank robbery prosecution, United States v. Carroll, 207 F.3d 465 (8th Cir. 2000) , the Court held that it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to admit evidence that the defendant had committed a bank robbery ten years previously. In both the prior and the charged crimes the perpetrator wore a nylon stocking mask, carried a gun, and vaulted over the counter to put the bank's money in a bag. However, those characteristics are too common to form a modus operandi uniquely identifying the defendant as the perpetrator.

United States v. Luna, 21 F.3d 874 (9th Cir. 1994) : The Court reversed bank robbery convictions, finding it was error to admit evidence of two subsequent bank robberies attributable to two of the defendants. The "common features in this case were largely generic," since they involved use of guns, masks, gloves, and bags in a typical "takeover robbery," in which people are intimidated by loud entry, profanity, and abuse of bank employees. Differences in personnel among the robberies undermined the supposed distinctiveness of the crimes. In United States v. Johnson, n140 the Court affirmed convictions for two bank robberies, holding that evidence of a third bank robbery was properly admitted to prove identity by showing a modus operandi, i.e., orally asking for change and then demanding money.

United States v. Oberle, 136 F.3d 1414 (10th Cir. 1998) : In a bank robbery case the prosecution introduced the defendant's acknowledgment to an FBI agent that "the robberies were his MO." The Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the statement, since information that the defendant had committed bank robberies in a similar manner was relevant to the identity of the robber in this case, where identity was a main issue. Affirming a bank robbery conviction in United States v. McGuire, 27 F.3d 457 (10th Cir. 1994) , the Court held there was no error in admitting evidence that the defendant, with one or both of the government's principal witnesses, had committed seven other robberies. Evidence that each involved traveling in a van to a medium-sized Midwest city, staying a day or two to purchase an inexpensive car and find a small bank with few employees close to a shopping area and interstate highway access, and committing the robbery when no customers were in the bank tended to show that the defendant was involved and that the charged robbery was part of a larger plan. A dissenting Judge agreed with the Rule 404(b) ruling, but believed the jury should have been cautioned about accepting uncorroborated accomplice testimony regarding the modus operandi. In United States v. Gutierrez, n141 the Court affirmed bank robbery convictions, finding no error in admitting evidence of a second bank robbery involving the two defendants. The crime charged and the other crime possessed "signature quality" and were therefore proper evidence, even though one of the defendants had been acquitted on the other charge.

United States v. Lail, 846 F.2d 1299 (11th Cir. 1988) : The Court reversed a bank robbery conviction because evidence of an uncharged bank robbery was improperly admitted. Despite some similarities between the robberies -- a lone gunman, use of a handgun, lack of disguise, proximity in time of occurrence -- the Court concluded that the dissimilarities were so great that it was an abuse of discretion to admit the evidence.

[B] Rule 404(b) -- Identity -- Modus Operandi -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Medina, 761 F.2d 12 (1st Cir. 1985) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to commit extortion and actual extortion based upon a kidnapping, holding that evidence of a prior kidnapping involving the defendant was admissible to prove modus operandi.

United States v. Allen, 76 F.3d 1348 (5th Cir. 1996) : In a bank fraud prosecution, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting forged letters of credit. They were issued from the same bank, bore the forged signature of the same bank officer, and went to the benefit of the same person as documents in issue, so they were so similar as to evince a signature quality marking the documents as the handiwork of the accused. In United States v. Sanchez, 988 F.2d 1384 (5th Cir. 1993) , the Court stated, "It is well-settled that extraneous acts evidence offered to prove identity is admissible in the Fifth Circuit only if the circumstances of the extraneous act were so similar to the offense in question that they evince a signature quality," and concluded that evidence that the defendant acted with a second man in selling heroin in pink balloons was "not very compelling." However, evidence that the charged and uncharged transactions took place in the identical location and in the presence of the same car with the same license plate was "of signature quality." In an arson prosecution, United States v. Scott, n142 the Court affirmed the admission of evidence of other acts of arson because the devices used to commit the acts established a "signature" that was identical to the devices used to commit the arson for which the defendants were charged.

United States v. Connelly, 874 F.2d 412 (7th Cir. 1989) : The Court affirmed convictions relating to stolen goods, finding that evidence of a prior break-in to a home was properly admitted to prove modus operandi and to establish the identity of the defendant in the case.

United States v. LeCompte, 99 F.3d 274 (8th Cir. 1996) : The Court reversed a conviction for abusive sexual contact with a minor, finding that the Trial Judge erred in admitting the defendant's prior acts of sex abuse with minors as evidence of modus operandi. The Court assumed that modus operandi evidence could be offered to prove that the defendant committed a crime even where identity was not seriously contested. However, the bad act evidence admitted by the Trial Judge did not rise to the level of modus operandi evidence. The government argued that the defendant exhibited a pattern of playing games with minors to win their trust, then sexually assaulting them. However, the Court found this conduct "common to all too many child molesters." In Durns v. United States, n143 the Court affirmed a kidnapping conviction, upholding as proper identity proof the introduction of evidence that the defendant unsuccessfully attempted to abduct another person in a similar manner.

United States v. Andrini, 685 F.2d 1094 (9th Cir. 1982) : In a prosecution for malicious destruction of a building, the Court upheld the introduction of testimony that during a camping trip the defendant had demonstrated his familiarity with techniques for starting fires. The demonstration bore sufficient similarity to the method of starting the fire that destroyed the building that it was admissible to prove the identity of the arsonist. In United States v. Powell, n144 the Court reversed a marijuana conspiracy conviction, in part because the Trial Judge admitted prior marijuana offenses against the defendant. The evidence was not admissible to show identity because the other offenses were not sufficiently distinctive.

United States v. Patterson, 20 F.3d 809 (10th Cir. 1994) : The Court affirmed a conviction for aircraft piracy arising out of the hijacking of a small plane, holding that evidence of a similar hijacking by the defendant n145 was probative of identity where that issue was contested.

United States v. Miller, 959 F.2d 1535 (11th Cir. 1992) (en banc): The panel had reversed the defendant's conviction for cocaine trafficking on the ground that evidence of a second transaction was not sufficiently similar and distinctive to prove identity. n146 The Court en banc affirmed the defendant's conviction, holding that the similarity of the two offenses, including the same supplier and same location, was sufficient to mark them as the handiwork of the accused. See also United States v. Stubbins n147(in a prosecution for distributing crack cocaine, evidence of a prior crack offense was properly admitted on the issue of identity, where both offenses occurred at the same address and the defense had argued mistaken identity and had made much of the fact that the DEA agent's report had a different address from the one given in his testimony). In United States v. Morano, n148 the government claimed that Morano and another man burned the building containing Morano's business. The Court found no unfair prejudice to Morano in the admission of the other man's prior arson, as the prior arson was so similar to the one charged as to mark them as the work of the same individual.

[iii] RULE 404(b) -- Identity -- Names

United States v. Garcia-Rosa, 876 F.2d 209 (1st Cir. 1989) , vacated on other grounds, 498 U.S. 954 (1990) : In this prosecution of a drug-importation conspiracy, the prosecutor and the witnesses referred to one of the defendants as "Guillo el Perro" and "Checo el Perro." After the defendant's witness testified the defendant was known by the former name, but he had a brother known by the latter, a prosecution witness testified that he had sold five kilos of cocaine to the defendant, whom he called "Checo el Perro." The Court reversed the defendant's conviction, holding that this evidence lacked the "highly distinctive quality" necessary when introducing other bad acts to show identity.

United States v. Edwards, 342 F.3d 168 (2d Cir. 2003) : Affirming a conviction for conspiring to import a substance containing cocaine, the Court held that evidence of a cocaine-cutting recipe found in the defendant's car when he was arrested was properly admitted to prove knowledge and intent, but that it could not be admitted to prove identity. The defendant admitted that he used the name Darnell Johnson, so the fact that the recipe was found among papers containing that name did not tend to make a witness's identification of the defendant more accurate. The Court explained that for a rational juror to conclude that the recipe supported the identification, the juror would have had to reason first that the defendant was a cocaine dealer and second that a cocaine dealer was more likely to participate in the charged scheme than a person not involved in the cocaine trade; "[s]uch reasoning, of course, calls for the very propensity inference prohibited under Rule 404(b)."

United States v. Morsley, 64 F.3d 907 (4th Cir. 1995) : A witness in a drug and firearms prosecution testified that, on the day Morsley was arrested, the witness was talking with "Raleek" when the police arrived; "Raleek" panicked, handed the witness her pocketbook, and asked her to leave; outside, the witness was stopped by the police, who discovered a bag of cocaine in her pocketbook. The Court held that the evidence might have been probative of motive and intent in connection with the charged acts, but it was hardly necessary because the charged conduct alone made the perpetrator's intent abundantly clear. However, the evidence did tend to rebut the defense contention that Morsley and "Raleek" were not the same person, so it was properly admitted.

United States v. Aguirre Aguirre, 716 F.2d 293 (5th Cir. 1983) : In a drug prosecution, an issue arose as to whether a codefendant was referring to the defendant when he used the name "Compadre" in conversations with an undercover agent. The codefendant said that he and Compadre had been arrested in Chicago together. The Court found that the government was properly permitted to prove that the defendant was arrested with the codefendant in Chicago in order to show that the defendant was Compadre.

United States v. Bowman, 798 F.2d 333 (8th Cir. 1986) : Affirming a conviction arising out of the robbery of a pharmacist, the Court held that evidence that the defendant had documents in someone else's name was admissible to prove that he was the person identified by witnesses as having several different names.

[y] Rule 404(b) -- Illegally Obtained Evidence of Other Acts

United States v. Hill, 60 F.3d 672 (10th Cir. 1995) : The Court held that evidence of the defendant's prior drug activity, even though admissible to prove intent and knowledge, would have to be excluded if the evidence were illegally obtained. Rejecting the government's contention that the Fourth Amendment exclusionary rule applies only if evidence is offered in a trial on the very crime being investigated by the offending officer, the Court concluded that "the exclusionary rule does apply where, as here, the alleged unlawfully obtained evidence is being used to prove an essential element of a charged offense -- at least where there is some nexus between the initial search and seizure and the subsequent charged offense." However, any error was harmless.

[z] Rule 404(b) -- "Inadvertent" Disclosure of Other Acts

United States v. Terry, 729 F.2d 1063 (6th Cir. 1984) : Although it affirmed conspiracy convictions arising out of involvement with stolen vehicles, the Court expressed concern about law enforcement officers making "inadvertent" remarks about a defendant's criminal history. It opined that "if the government took appropriate caution to instruct its witnesses before trial, these types of remarks would occur with less frequency."

United States v. Gray, 730 F.2d 733 (11th Cir. 1984) : The Court held that reversal was not required where a prosecutor, relying on a ruling in a prior trial of the case, mentioned in an opening statement that the defendant had a motive for robbery because he was behind on payments to a probation officer; the Trial Judge subsequently decided not to admit any evidence regarding the probation officer.

[aa] Rule 404(b) -- Insanity Defense

United States v. Bradshaw, 935 F.2d 295 (D.C. Cir. 1991) : Affirming a bank robbery conviction, the Court noted that admission of prior convictions where sanity is the only issue presents different considerations from the usual case. Probativeness is generally unquestionable, since the insanity defense directly puts state of mind in issue, and a prior criminal record is highly relevant to the defendant's appreciation of the unacceptability of his conduct; there is no risk of primary prejudicial effect, since the defendant does not deny commission of the act; and there is a possibility that the evidence will prove not to the government's advantage, by permitting the inference that the defendant is insane, since he continues to commit the same easily-detectable crime. Although the Trial Judge's ruling was terse, it appeared from the record as a whole that the relevant factors were considered.

United States v. Emery, 682 F.2d 493 (5th Cir. 1982) : The defendant in a bank robbery case conceded the robbery, but claimed he was insane at the time. The Court upheld the introduction of evidence that he had robbed another bank a month previously, on the ground that the evidence helped to explain a psychiatrist's diagnosis that the defendant had the capacity to conform his conduct to legal requirements.

United States v. Brown, 785 F.2d 587 (7th Cir. 1986) : Affirming a conviction for failure to appear at sentencing, the Court upheld admission of evidence of the defendant's fraud upon two trucking companies after the date of the sentencing hearing. The evidence was properly admitted to respond to the defendant's insanity defense.

United States v. Ruster, 712 F.2d 409 (9th Cir. 1983) : The Court upheld the introduction of evidence, offered to rebut an insanity defense, that the defendant, who was charged with filing false and fraudulent Social Security claims, had previously submitted false claims and engaged in break-ins. The Court found that the evidence shed light on his mental state.

[bb] Rule 404(b) -- Intent

[i] RULE 404(b) -- Assault, Homicide, Abuse, etc., Cases

United States v. Cortijo-Diaz, 875 F.2d 13 (1st Cir. 1989) : The Court vacated a conviction for interfering with a flight attendant because evidence that the defendant had been convicted of attempted robbery and sentenced as a predicate violent felon had been erroneously admitted. It was not relevant, other than to show propensity, to the defendant's argument that he did not intend to interfere. The Court criticized the Trial Judge's rote restatement of the Rule 404(b) exceptions and once again stated that the Rule excludes other acts relevant only to show criminal propensity.

United States v. Van Metre, 150 F.3d 339 (4th Cir. 1998) : The defendant, charged with kidnapping a young woman, asserted that his victim traveled across state lines consensually with him, and then he killed her after a sexual disagreement. The Court found no error in the admission of a prior kidnapping and sexual assault of a different victim, since it tended to show that the defendant abducted his victim with the intent to sexually assault her. The uncharged misconduct was similar enough to the crime charged (e.g., similar victims and modus operandi) and close enough in time (eleven days) to raise a strong inference of intent. While the evidence of a prior sexual assault and rape was undoubtedly prejudicial, this prejudice was lessened by a limiting instruction and by the fact that the defendant himself admitted to killing the victim. In United States v. Sanders, 964 F.2d 295 (4th Cir. 1992) , the Court reversed a conviction for assault with a dangerous weapon in a prison, holding it was error to admit evidence of the defendant's prior convictions for inmate assault and contraband possession. As the defendant admitted the stabbing and claimed only self-defense, the only issue was whether that was the reason for the admitted act; the prior offenses had no probative value on his intent and could show only his general criminal disposition. The dissenting Judge thought that the defendant's admission did not eliminate the need for determining whether self-defense provided the motive, as the defendant claimed, or the stabbing was accompanied by assaultive intent, as the government claimed.

United States v. Levario Quiroz, 854 F.2d 69 (5th Cir. 1988) : The Court held that admission of evidence of a separate and unrelated shooting was plain error in a prosecution for assault of a federal officer with a deadly weapon that turned on the credibility of the defendant and a Border Patrol Agent.

United States v. Romero, 189 F.3d 576 (7th Cir. 1999) : The defendant was charged with kidnapping and transporting a minor with intent to engage in criminal sexual activity after developing a relationship with a 12-year-old boy over the Internet. The Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting tape recordings of six conversations the defendant had with other boys at about the same time, in which he expressed his desire to have sex with the boys and used many of the same seduction techniques he used with the victim in this case. The conversations were highly probative of his intent with the victim. One of the conversations, in which the defendant recounted a brutal rape, might have been unduly prejudicial, but any error was harmless. In United States v. Pirovolos, n149 the Court held that evidence that the defendant had guns on other occasions was admissible to show intent, after the defendant claimed self-defense. See also United States v. Shoffner n150(evidence that the defendant had made one threat against his wife to discourage her testimony was admissible to disprove his claim that a second threat was a joke).

United States v. Haukaas, 172 F.3d 542 (8th Cir. 1999) : In a prosecution for stabbing two people in a car after a long night of drinking, the defendant's girlfriend testified that two years prior to the event at issue, the defendant had ripped a phone off the wall and attacked her by brandishing a knife, holding it to her throat, and threatening to kill her. The Court affirmed, holding that the testimony was properly admitted to prove the defendant's intent; it noted that the defendant testified at trial that he was holding the knife stationary when the victims thrust themselves on it. A dissenting Judge argued that evidence of an unrelated act of domestic violence, two years earlier, was nothing more than proof of the defendant's propensity toward violence. In United States v. Sumner, 119 F.3d 658 (8th Cir. 1997) , the Court reversed a conviction for sexual abuse because evidence that the defendant had previously sexually assaulted two young girls was erroneously admitted under Rule 404(b). The evidence had been admitted as relevant to intent, but in this case intent was not at issue because the accused had clearly and unequivocally defended only on the ground that the alleged acts never occurred. The Court declined to consider whether the evidence might have been admitted under Rule 414, believing that the Trial Judge should have the first opportunity to consider the admissibility of the evidence over a Rule 403 objection should the government offer the evidence at a retrial. In United States v. Burk, n151 the Court affirmed a conviction for assaulting an IRS officer, holding that evidence the defendant had been convicted in 1982 of threatening to assault a police officer was properly admitted, after the defendant's counsel said in his opening statement that the defendant had no intention of hurting the officer. See also United States v. Engleman n152(in a prosecution for a plot to kill a man in order to collect insurance proceeds, there was no error in admitting evidence concerning another killing in which one defendant was involved some 13 years earlier that also involved an attempt to obtain insurance money).

United States v. Dhingra, 371 F.3d 557 (9th Cir. 2004) : The defendant was convicted of using the Internet to solicit sexual activity from a minor, after he used instant messaging to arrange a meeting with a 14-year-old girl, whom he fondled and forced into having sexual intercourse. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant had three years earlier used instant messaging to meet a 17-year-old girl and have a sexual encounter with her, as the evidence tended, because of the similarity, to show his intent and modus operandi with respect to the act charged. In People of Terr. of Guam v. Shymanovitz, 157 F.3d 1154 (9th Cir. 1998) , the Court reversed a conviction for unlawful sexual activity with minors, because of the improper admission of testimony regarding the contents of sexually explicit gay adult magazines found in the defendant's house. While the magazines could possibly have been relevant to whether the defendant had the purpose of being sexually aroused, or was actually sexually aroused, by the charged improper touching of underage boys, the statute under which he was prosecuted applied only an objective test, which made the character of the touching, not the purpose of the toucher, at issue. Furthermore, possession of the magazines was not probative of whether the conduct with which the defendant was charged was intentional. Even if the evidence were somehow relevant, its suggestion of the defendant's sexual orientation, and implication of sexual deviancy, was highly prejudicial and substantially outweighed any probative value. In United States v. Boise, n153 the Court affirmed a conviction for murder of a six-week-old child, holding that evidence of the victim's prior injuries when the defendant was the primary caretaker and of the victim's suffering from battered-child syndrome was properly admitted as evidence of intent and of the absence of accident. See also United States v. Bettencourt n154(error to admit evidence that an attorney charged with interfering with a federal officer was arrested for interfering with local officers 21 months earlier, because it proved only propensity, especially since there was no proof of his intent on the prior occasion).

United States v. Wooten, 377 F.3d 1134 (10th Cir. 2004) : Affirming the defendant's conviction for assaulting and kidnapping his ex-wife, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of another violent attack the defendant made on the victim a few weeks before the charged incident, as it tended to prove his intent, the victim's lack of consent (relevant to the kidnapping charge), "and the long-standing personal animosities between" them, and thus was admitted not merely to show the defendant's conformity to the prior bad acts. In United States v. Segien, 114 F.3d 1014 (10th Cir. 1997) , the defendant testified in his assault trial for spitting upon and physically injuring a corrections officer in a federal penitentiary that he did not assault the officer and that any spitting or other physical injury he caused was an unintentional byproduct of a verbal argument. In rebuttal, the prosecution introduced previous incidents in which the defendant beat and spit upon prison officers. The Court found that these incidents were properly admitted to prove intent and absence of mistake. In United States v. Soundingsides, n155 the Court reversed a murder conviction, finding that it was error to admit testimony by the defendant's former girlfriend that he frequently beat her and had caused her to lose her baby. The testimony involved five-year-old events, and the Court concluded that the evidence was of little probative value. There was no real dispute that whoever killed the victim in the instant case did so with malice, and the prior act evidence was extremely prejudicial.

United States v. Utter, 97 F.3d 509 (11th Cir. 1996) : The Court reversed a conviction arising from an alleged arson of the defendant's restaurant in which two firefighters were killed. The government introduced evidence that, two years after the alleged arson, the defendant threatened to burn the residence that another individual rented from the defendant if she did not vacate the residence voluntarily. Although the government argued that the threat to the renter "demonstrate[s] how the defendant reacts to financial stress," the Court found that the statement did not relate, as did the charged crime, to a threat to use arson to collect insurance. Therefore it was not properly offered to prove intent, and was nothing more than inadmissible character evidence. In United States v. Church, 955 F.2d 688 (11th Cir. 1992) , a RICO prosecution for acts, including conspiracy to murder, committed in 1983 and 1984, the Court held it was harmless error to admit a tape recording of a 1979 conversation discussing a defendant's plan to kill a prosecutor. Any probative value the evidence might have had on the defendant's intent was diminished by the remoteness of the conversation and was substantially outweighed by the likelihood that the jury would draw prejudicially impermissible inferences about the defendant's character. In United States v. Williams, n156 the Court affirmed a conviction for assault with a dangerous weapon, holding that evidence of two prior rapes was properly admitted to prove the defendant's intent, since the facts surrounding the rapes were "strikingly similar" to those surrounding the assaults and the possibility of prejudice was not too great to permit the evidence to be introduced. The Court stated that "[t]he rule in this circuit is that extrinsic evidence of similar acts will possess great probative value if the defendant's intent is in issue and if the government lacks other strong evidence of defendant's intent."

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Civil Cases

Sparks v. Gilley Trucking Co., 992 F.2d 50 (4th Cir. 1993) : The defendant in a personal injury action arising out of a car-truck collision introduced evidence of the plaintiff's prior speeding convictions "to show intent, preparation, plan or motive to race or speed on the day in question." The Court reversed a judgment for the defendant, holding that intent was not relevant to the contributory negligence defense being asserted and that there was no foundation for any theory of "plan," "motive," or "preparation." The dissenting Judge considered intent relevant to the defendant's attempt to prove the plaintiff had been racing.

Fox Valley Constr. Workers Fringe Benefit Funds v. Pride of Fox Masonry & Expert Restorations, 140 F.3d 661 (7th Cir. 1998) : A lawyer appealed from sanctions imposed for his efforts in preventing a party from collecting lawful debts owed by his client, including evasion of service of process, baseless appeals, and transferring assets to another corporation. Upholding the sanctions, the Court found no error in the admission of evidence of the lawyer's similar sharp practices during his representation of one of the client's earlier corporations. The similar conduct showed the lawyer's "intent to delay the proceedings as he had successfully done in the prior suit five years ago." The effect of the evidence was, of course, prejudicial to the lawyer, "but not unduly or unfairly."

Sanjuan v. IBP, Inc., 160 F.3d 1291 (10th Cir. 1998) : In an action by a former employee who alleged that he had been discharged in retaliation for making a worker's compensation claim, the plaintiff introduced testimony by the defendant's supervisors that they had heard complaints by injured employees to the effect that they were harassed following injuries or medical benefit claims. The Court held that the evidence was not barred by Rule 404(b), because it was circumstantial evidence of the defendant's retaliatory motive or intent regarding employees with work-related injuries. However, the evidence was inadmissible hearsay.

[iii] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Civil Rights and Employment Discrimination Cases

United States v. Bradley, 390 F.3d 145 (1st Cir. 2004) : The defendants were convicted for forced labor offenses after they lured Jamaican laborers to New Hampshire through fraud, mistreated them during their employ, and coerced them to stay. Most of the charges related to workers during the 2001 season. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence relating to the defendants' treatment of Jamaican laborers brought in during the 2000 season. Evidence that one of the earlier workers fled and was pursued by threats and that his compatriot's passport was then seized gave "a malign motive for, and provide[d] the context of," the seizure of the victims' passports in 2001 and of threats made to them based on a defendant's supposed intention to "destroy" a former worker. The Court noted that evidence of the abusive treatment of the 2000 season workers -- including isolation from medical care and efforts to intimidate them and minimize their outside contact -- was "closer to the margin" but arguably probative of the defendants' intent. Its probative value was minimized because there was similar evidence that the 2001 workers were abused, and the customary limiting instruction was given. In an employment discrimination action brought after the plaintiff was denied tenure, Brown v. Trustees of Boston Univ., n157 the Court held that remarks derogatory to women made by the University's president were properly admitted as evidence of a discriminatory animus in making the tenure decision.

United States v. Dise, 763 F.2d 586 (3d Cir. 1985) : In a civil rights prosecution of a hospital aide, the Court held that evidence of other instances in which he abused inmates was properly admitted to show willfulness and intent.

Barnes v. City of Cincinnati, 401 F.3d 729 (6th Cir. 2005) : In a Title VII action by a preoperative transsexual police officer who alleged that he was demoted because he failed to conform to gender stereotypes, the Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff, holding that a supervisor's derogatory statements about lesbians and use of the word "fag" were properly admitted as evidence of the supervisor's intent to ensure that the plaintiff was demoted.

[iv] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Conspiracy

United States v. Jackson, 339 F.3d 349 (5th Cir. 2003) : Reversing a conviction for transporting stolen goods from a jewelry store burglary, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to admit evidence that the defendant had a previous felony conviction for stealing watches. While prior conviction evidence has a tendency to prove the difficult intent element in conspiracy cases, that the defendant knowingly joined a plan to further an unlawful objective, in this case, where there was other evidence going to intent and only the identification issue was contested, the evidence had very little probative value. Moreover, it had a substantial potential to cause unfair prejudice, because of the great danger that the jury would decide that he was involved in the conspiracy because of his prior criminal conduct. In United States v. Prati, 861 F.2d 82 (5th Cir. 1988) , the Court said that "in a conspiracy case the mere entry of a not guilty plea raises the issue of intent sufficiently to justify the admissibility of extrinsic offense evidence."

[v] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Drug Cases

[A] Rule 404(b) -- Evidence of Different Drugs

United States v. Garza, 42 F.3d 251 (5th Cir. 1994) : The Court held in a money-laundering prosecution that it was not an abuse of discretion to admit evidence that a defendant heavily used cocaine. Although the evidence was prejudicial where the government's theory was that the money was the proceeds of trafficking in marijuana, it tended to show that the defendant had an impressive source of income despite a lack of wage-earning employment and was therefore relevant to his intent. Without endorsing the government's questionable judgment in introducing such highly prejudicial evidence where the evidence of guilt was so overwhelming that there was no need for its introduction, the Court held there was no reversible error.

United States v. Macedo, 406 F.3d 778 (7th Cir. 2005) : Affirming drug convictions, the Court found no abuse of discretion when evidence of two cocaine sales by one defendant nine years before the charged offenses was admitted. It rejected the defendant's argument that the prior acts were not sufficiently similar because they involved cocaine while the current conviction involved methamphetamine, noting that "[t]he similarity inquiry focuses on the purpose for which evidence is offered." The Court ultimately held that the government needed the evidence to prove specific intent and to rebut the defendant's claim that he lacked the intent to enter into a conspiracy and was simply present at the airport when the drugs were found by accident. In United States v. Hernandez, 84 F.3d 931 (7th Cir. 1996) , the Court affirmed a conviction for possession of cocaine and heroin with intent to distribute, finding no error in the admission of evidence that the defendant was once arrested with 43 pounds of marijuana in his car. Possession of a distribution amount of an illegal drug was probative of the defendant's specific intent to distribute the drugs in this case.

United States v. Mehrmanesh, 689 F.2d 822 (9th Cir. 1982) : The Court affirmed a conviction for importing heroin and possessing it with intent to distribute, holding that the defendant's conviction for smuggling hashish five years earlier was admissible on the issue of intent to distribute, and that evidence that large quantities of other drugs were seized at the defendant's residence was properly admitted to demonstrate an intent to distribute.

United States v. Pollock, 926 F.2d 1044 (11th Cir. 1991) : The Court upheld admission of the defendant's prior conviction for conspiracy to import marijuana in a cocaine conspiracy prosecution, noting that if the government can do without other crimes evidence in proving intent, it should, but if the evidence is essential to obtain a conviction, it may come in. "This may seem like a 'heads I win; tails you lose' proposition, but it is presently the law." In this case, because of the limited evidence of conspiratorial intent, the prior convictions were that much more probative.

[B] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Drug Cases -- Evidence of Different Quantities

United States v. Thomas, 398 F.3d 1058 (8th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possessing 57.8 grams of crack cocaine with intent to distribute, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant had pleaded guilty to possessing 2.2 grams of crack in 1994 and 0.25 grams of crack in 1998. The evidence was relevant to his intent to distribute and the time lapse was not unreasonable given the similarities in locale and acts charged between the prior convictions and the charged offense. In United States v. Arias, 252 F.3d 973 (8th Cir. 2001) , the Court affirmed drug-related convictions, finding no error in the admission of evidence that the defendant pleaded no contest in 1997 to possession of methamphetamine, the drug involved in this case. The prior conviction was relevant to proving intent to join a conspiracy, even if the methamphetamine involved in the 1997 conviction was a personal use amount. In United States v. Hardy, 224 F.3d 752 (8th Cir. 2000) , the Court affirmed a conviction for intent to distribute more than 400 grams of cocaine base, finding no error in the admission of evidence of the defendant's two prior cocaine convictions, which involved much smaller quantities of cocaine (less than ten grams). The Court stated that "evidence of prior possession of drugs, even in an amount consistent with only personal use, is admissible to show such things as knowledge and intent of a defendant charged with a crime in which intent to distribute drugs is an element."

[C] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Drug Cases -- Evidence of Possession Where Distribution Is Charged

United States v. Logan, 121 F.3d 1172 (8th Cir. 1997) : The Court affirmed a conviction for distribution of more than one kilo each of heroin and methamphetamine and held there was no error in the admission of evidence that the defendant had previously been stopped with "a personal amount" of methamphetamine. In the Court's view, evidence of prior possession of drugs, even in an amount consistent only with personal use, is admissible to show such things as knowledge and intent of a defendant charged with a crime involving intent to distribute drugs, and this is so even if the defendant has not raised a defense based on lack of knowledge or lack of intent.

United States v. Ramirez-Robles, 386 F.3d 1234 (9th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed convictions for distribution and conspiracy to distribute methamphetamine, but it found an abuse of discretion when evidence of the defendant's prior conviction for simple possession of methamphetamine was admitted, because "[t]he rule of this circuit is that evidence of prior drug use is not ordinarily relevant under Rule 404(b) to prove conspiracy and possession with intent to distribute narcotics."

United States v. Butler, 102 F.3d 1191 (11th Cir. 1997) : A defendant charged with conspiracy to possess cocaine with intent to distribute objected to admission of his prior conviction for cocaine possession. The Court concluded that evidence of prior personal drug use is relevant to prove intent in a subsequent prosecution for conspiracy to distribute narcotics.

[D] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Drug Cases -- Evidence of Similar Drugs

United States v. Foskey, 636 F.2d 517 (D.C. Cir. 1980) : The Court reversed a drug conviction after the government introduced evidence that two years previously the defendant was arrested for possession of similar drugs. After noting that the only purpose for which the evidence might have been offered permissibly was to show intent, the Court found that there was insufficient similarity between the two events to justify admission of the evidence and that even if it were relevant, the evidence should have been excluded under Rule 403.

United States v. Hernandez, 975 F.2d 1035 (4th Cir. 1992) : The Court reversed a conviction for participation in a cocaine distribution conspiracy because a cooperating witness was permitted to testify during the government's direct case that the defendant had told him she had a special recipe for cooking crack because she "used to do that, sell that in New York." The relevance of the evidence to show intent was at best slight. The evidence was not necessary to show the context of the crime, and it was barely reliable. The Court held that, in any event, the balance of probative value and prejudicial effect was so one-sided that admission of the evidence was error. See also United States v. Davis n158(in a case charging conspiracy to distribute heroin it was error to admit evidence that the defendant was involved in selling heroin six years earlier; the evidence did not tend to prove intent and was not part of a common plan or scheme, but the error was harmless).

United States v. Peters, 283 F.3d 300 (5th Cir. 2002) : Affirming convictions for crack cocaine offenses, the Court held that evidence that a defendant operated a crack house and sold cocaine 10 years earlier was admissible to prove knowledge and experience with cocaine and his continuing intent to sell crack cocaine. In United States v. Leal, 74 F.3d 600 (5th Cir. 1996) , the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that one defendant, charged with driving a truck in a marijuana distribution conspiracy, had previously been convicted of transporting marijuana. The similarity and proximity of the charged and uncharged incidents would help the jury decide whether his conduct was innocent or intentional.

United States v. Lattner, 385 F.3d 947 (6th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed a cocaine conviction, finding no abuse of discretion when evidence that certain heroin packets bearing a particular stamp were seized from the defendant on two prior occasions was admitted. The evidence was probative of identity, intent, and a common plan or scheme, because it connected the defendant to the drug transactions at issue in the case, in which a similar stamp was found. In United States v. Elkins, n159 the Court upheld admission of prior cocaine transactions to prove intent in a cocaine prosecution.

United States v. Puckett, 405 F.3d 589 (7th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possession of powder cocaine with intent to distribute, finding no error when evidence of the defendant's conviction for trafficking in crack cocaine was admitted. The difference between powder and crack cocaine did not render the previous conviction inadmissible, since both crimes involved the possession with intent to distribute a chemical composition of cocaine. The Court concluded that "[d]ifferences in the form of the drug involved in a prior crime or even type or category of narcotics is irrelevant to the admissibility of that evidence when both incidents concerned distribution amounts of drugs." See also United States v. Toro, 359 F.3d 879 (7th Cir. 2004) (evidence of the defendant's prior possession of PCP with intent to distribute, and another act of possession of the drug, properly admitted to prove intent to distribute PCP). In United States v. Kramer, 955 F.2d 479 (7th Cir. 1992) , the Court affirmed convictions for conspiring to distribute marijuana as part of a continuing criminal enterprise that imported marijuana, holding that the Trial Judge exercised principled discretion in admitting evidence that one of the defendants had imported 15 tons of marijuana in 1981. The evidence showed specific intent, it was not too remote to be relevant, and its prejudicial effect, if any, did not substantially outweigh its probative value.

United States v. Mejia-Uribe, 75 F.3d 395 (8th Cir. 1996) : Affirming cocaine-related convictions, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit the defendant's 15-year-old conviction for another cocaine offense. The Court reasoned that the prior conviction was not admissible to prove intent, both because it was too remote in time and because it involved a single sale, while the instant case involved a large-scale, ongoing operation. See also United States v. Nichols n160(it was error, but harmless, to admit evidence of prior unrelated cocaine transactions in a prosecution for cocaine distribution).

United States v. Johnson, 734 F.2d 503 (10th Cir. 1984) : The Court held that a witness' testimony about the defendant's prior cocaine transactions and the amounts thereof was admissible to prove intent to distribute.

[E] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Drug Cases -- Firearms Evidence

United States v. Payne, 805 F.2d 1062 (D.C. Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possession of marijuana with intent to distribute, finding that evidence of guns found in the defendant's apartment was properly admitted to prove intent to distribute.

United States v. Johnson, 137 F.3d 970 (7th Cir. 1998) : Affirming a drug distribution conviction, the Court held that a prior drug offense was properly admitted against the defendant to prove intent. However, it was an abuse of discretion to admit two details surrounding the prior offense, i.e., that the defendant had been in possession of an illegal firearm and had scuffled with police. The prior gun possession and fight with the police "did not help the jury to analyze Johnson's intent to possess drugs" on a later date, but the error in admitting the evidence was harmless.

United States v. Bracy, 67 F.3d 1421 (9th Cir. 1995) : In a prosecution for drug trafficking, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit evidence of unrelated incidents in which a defendant had used or possessed firearms. Although as a general matter firearms are relevant to prove involvement in the drug trade and intent to distribute, in this case the prosecutor essentially argued that the evidence showed the defendant's predisposition and propensity to violence.

[F] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Drug Cases -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Spinner, 152 F.3d 950 (D.C. Cir. 1998) : In support of his argument that drugs and a weapon seized from his mother's house when he was arrested there were not his, but rather belonged to a cousin living in the house, the defendant claimed that he had "turned his life around" after his brother died the previous year. On cross-examination of the defendant's girlfriend, the prosecutor asked about a letter she had sent to the defendant while he was jailed on unrelated charges. In the letter she indicated she was upset that the defendant was letting his cousin use his mother's house "to do this s_____." Reversing, the Court held that the letter was not probative of the defendant's intent to possess crack cocaine with intent to distribute, because it was not clear that the letter referred to drug selling or just drug use, to crack cocaine, or even to narcotics at all.

United States v. Rubio-Estrada, 857 F.2d 845 (1st Cir. 1988) : A majority held that evidence of a prior drug conviction was admissible to prove knowledge and intent in a prosecution for possession of cocaine with intent to distribute. A dissenting Judge argued that the prior conviction was improperly admitted, constituted character evidence, and was more prejudicial than probative. See also United States v. Molinares Charris n161(the defendant's prior smuggling was admissible to prove intent to transport marijuana).

United States v. Garcia, 291 F.3d 127 (2d Cir. 2002) : The Court reversed convictions for cocaine distribution offenses because the defendant's 12-year-old conviction for selling two grams of cocaine was improperly admitted. The principal prosecution witness was an informant who had been arrested for heroin offenses and, while cooperating with the government, had completed an asbestos trade program and began working in the asbestos industry, where he sought to involve a co-worker in drugs. The informant testified that the co-worker connected him with the defendant, and that a transcript of a conversation between the accomplice and the defendant in which they discussed a potential asbestos project involved the use of code words to arrange a drug trade. The defendant denied any intention of being involved in a drug deal, and police searches uncovered no drugs, paraphernalia, or substantial amount of money. The prior conviction was offered ostensibly to show that the defendant knew that the conversation was a coded discussion of a drug deal. The Court concluded that, although knowledge and intent were disputed, the government did not establish any similarity or connection making the convictions relevant on those issues: "Nothing in the record explains how Garcia's participation in a minor drug sale twelve years earlier is any more than marginally probative of the fact that Garcia must have known that drug dealers speak in code and must have known that the July 10, 2000, conversation was a coded conversation about a drug deal."

United States v. Morsley, 64 F.3d 907 (4th Cir. 1995) : A witness in a drug and firearms prosecution testified that, on the day Morsley was arrested, the witness was talking with "Raleek" when the police arrived; "Raleek" panicked, handed the witness her pocketbook, and asked her to leave; outside, the witness was stopped by the police, who discovered a bag of cocaine in her pocketbook. The Court held that the evidence might have been probative of motive and intent in connection with the charged acts, but it was hardly necessary because the charged conduct alone made the perpetrator's intent abundantly clear. However, the evidence did tend to rebut the defense contention that Morsley and "Raleek" were not the same person. See also United States v. Tedder n162(prior drug transactions with a codefendant were admissible to prove knowledge and intent in a marijuana prosecution).

United States v. Saucedo-Munoz, 307 F.3d 344 (5th Cir. 2002) : Affirming a conviction for drug and immigration crimes, the Court held that evidence of the defendant's prior conviction for smuggling cocaine in the wheel well of a pickup truck was admissible to prove that he knew that drugs were concealed in the gas tank of a vehicle and that he intended to transport drugs in a hidden spot. In a prosecution for using the mails to facilitate drug trafficking, United States v. Williams, 900 F.2d 823 (5th Cir. 1990) , the Court reversed for error in granting the defendant's motion in limine to exclude evidence of 19 prior similar mailings from fictitious Los Angeles addresses. The evidence, which was connected to the defendant, tended to show knowledge and intent, even if the packages did not contain drugs, because they might have been used as test deliveries; so long as it is not suggested to the jury that there were 20 deliveries of cocaine, there would be little danger that the probative value of the evidence on knowledge and intent would cause unfair prejudice or confusion.

United States v. Spiller, 261 F.3d 683 (7th Cir. 2001) : Affirming a conviction for distributing crack cocaine, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting handwritten ledgers. They were "tools of the trade" relevant to the defendant's intent to operate a crack house. In United States v. Wash, 231 F.3d 366 (7th Cir. 2000) , the Court affirmed convictions for possession of cocaine base with intent to distribute and possession of a firearm in relation to a drug trafficking offense, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the defendant's prior possession of cocaine base. The charged crimes involved a crack house containing firearms. The defendant argued that the prior acts were distinguishable because (1) they happened at different locations with different people; (2) one involved a stop-and-frisk on the street and the other a search after arrest that revealed drugs in his anus; and (3) neither took place in a dwelling. Further, he argued that they were too remote in time, having occurred at least two or three years before the charged conspiracy. The Court held, however, that the prior incidents implicated the defendant in possessing distribution amounts of drugs, and thus were probative of his intent to distribute on the charged occasion. In United States v. Heath, n163 the Court reversed drug and firearm convictions, finding error in the admission of evidence that, in an unrelated incident, the defendant's companion was arrested on drug charges and the defendant was arrested on firearms charges. The charges related to a stop of the defendant's truck in which the police found two handguns and a bottle of pills on the defendant. At trial, the defendant claimed he was a drug user and buyer, not a seller, and that he lacked the intent to distribute. The Court found there was no evidence that the defendant intended to aid his companion in the prior incident or knew what the companion was doing with respect to drugs. It concluded that the prior incident failed to demonstrate that the defendant was knowingly in the company of a large-scale drug distributor or intentionally sought to protect such a distributor, so the prior incident was not relevant to proving intent with respect to the charged offense.

United States v. Ruiz-Estrada, 312 F.3d 398 (8th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to distribute drugs, holding it was not an abuse of discretion to admit evidence of the defendant's 1998 conviction for possession of 20 grams of cocaine. The defense contended at trial that the defendant was merely present at the apartment where large amounts of cocaine as well as scales and money were found. The Court found that the prior conviction demonstrated knowledge of drugs and intent to commit drug offenses and rebutted the "mere presence" defense. In United States v. Jones, 255 F.3d 916 (8th Cir. 2001) , the Court found no error in admitting evidence that the defendant sold cocaine base in the past and knew what it looked like, as the evidence tended to prove the defendant's intent to distribute cocaine base. In United States v. Logan, n164 the Court affirmed a conviction for distribution of more than one kilo each of heroin and methamphetamine and held there was no error in the admission of evidence that the defendant had previously been stopped with "a personal amount" of methamphetamine. In the Court's view, evidence of prior possession of drugs, even in an amount consistent only with personal use, is admissible to show such things as knowledge and intent of a defendant charged with a crime involving intent to distribute drugs, and this is so even if the defendant has not raised a defense based on lack of knowledge or lack of intent.

United States v. Romero, 282 F.3d 683 (9th Cir. 2002) : Affirming a conviction for cocaine conspiracy, the Court held that evidence of the defendant's previous drug activities was properly admitted to show that, as a result of his prior relationship to a government informant, the defendant was aware of the informant's distribution methods. The evidence was relevant to refute the defendant's claim that he intended to steal money rather than distribute cocaine. In United States v. Adrian, 978 F.2d 486 (9th Cir. 1992) , the Court held, on an interlocutory appeal of an in limine ruling to exclude evidence of prior narcotics convictions in a drug case on the ground they were not probative of anything but propensity, that prior possession and sale of narcotics may be probative of intent to distribute. The case was remanded to allow the government to develop the record and to permit the Judge an opportunity to weigh the danger of unfair prejudice against the probative force of the evidence.

United States v. Becker, 230 F.3d 1224 (10th Cir. 2000) : Affirming convictions for manufacturing methamphetamine, the Court found it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to admit, as proof of motive and intent, evidence that the defendant was previously convicted of drug offenses and evidence that drug-related items were found in a prior raid on his home. The prior acts were removed in time and involved possession and distribution only, not manufacturing. In Fitzgerald v. United States, n165 the Court held that evidence of drugs belonging to one defendant was properly admitted against another defendant where there was concerted action and the evidence was probative of intent to distribute.

[G] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Drug Cases -- Whether Intent at Issue

United States v. Sampson, 385 F.3d 183 (2d Cir. 2004) : The Court vacated convictions for drug possession offenses that took place in 1998 because evidence of drug trafficking and firearms offenses in 2000 was improperly admitted at a joint trial on all the charges. The 1998 charges arose from an officer's testimony that he saw a man in a yellow jacket making a drug transaction; when the defendant was arrested a short while later, he was not wearing a yellow jacket, but the yellow jacket (with marijuana and cocaine in the pockets) was found in an area where the defendant had been observed. The 2000 charges arose from a drug sale (recorded on videotape) by the defendant to an undercover officer. The Court held that evidence of the defendant's being a drug dealer in 2000 was not admissible to prove his intent in 1998, since in the Second Circuit " '[w]hen a defendant unequivocally relies on [a defense that he did not do the charged act at all], evidence of other acts is not admissible for the purpose of proving intent.' " Not severing the trials practically precluded the defendant from "ensur[ing] that evidence of the 2000 acts would not be admitted for the purpose of proving intent to commit the 1998 acts by stipulating to intent and challenging only identity -- which was the linchpin of his defense."

United States v. Gadison, 8 F.3d 186 (5th Cir. 1993) : Affirming convictions for conspiracy to distribute cocaine base, the Court held there was no error in admitting a defendant's prior conviction for cocaine possession because he put his intent in issue by entering a not guilty plea to the conspiracy charge.

United States v. Johnson, 27 F.3d 1186 (6th Cir. 1994) : In a prosecution for possession of cocaine with intent to distribute, the defendant denied possession of cocaine altogether. The Court held, following thorough consideration of the issue, that evidence of prior similar acts was admissible to prove intent, subject only to the balancing of probative value and prejudicial effect. In this case the Trial Judge did not make an explicit finding on the balance of prejudicial effect and probative value and erroneously gave instructions that the evidence was admissible to show motive, "method of operations," knowledge, preparation, and plan. However, the Court affirmed the defendant's conviction because an instruction including reference to the proper purpose of intent was ultimately given and the evidence of guilt was overwhelming.

United States v. Foster, 344 F.3d 799 (8th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possession of cocaine base with intent to distribute, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of the defendant's 1993 conviction for selling crack cocaine on the same city block. The defendant argued that neither his knowledge nor his intent was at issue, since he denied both possessing the bag in which the drugs were found near him and engaging in an illegal drug transaction. However, the Court considered this a general-denial or a "mere presence" defense, both of which have "long been recognized as placing intent or state of mind into question and allowing the admission of prior criminal convictions to prove both knowledge and intent." The prior conviction was relevant to his intent to control the crack in the paper bag and to distribute it. In United States v. Norton, n166 the Court rejected a defendant's claim that it was improper to admit his prior cocaine transactions to prove intent in a drug prosecution, since he asserted only a coercion defense. The Court stated that "the government is not limited in its proof of its case by a defendant's representations of what his defense will be after the government rests," and that intent was an element that the government was required to prove.

United States v. Jones, 982 F.2d 380 (9th Cir. 1992) , amended (9th Cir. 1993): In a prosecution for conspiring to import marijuana, the Court held that evidence of the defendant's involvement in prior marijuana smuggling operations was not made irrelevant by the defendant's complete denial of participation in the crime. Intent is an element of the charged crimes, and the fact that he did not contest those particular elements did not relieve the government of its burden of proving them beyond a reasonable doubt, which it was entitled to do by probative evidence.

United States v. Matthews, 411 F.3d 1210 (11th Cir. 2005) , vacated, 431 F.3d 1296 (11th Cir. 2005) : The Court reversed the defendant's conviction for a major cocaine distribution conspiracy because evidence of his 1991 conviction for street-level drug selling was improperly admitted. The Court considered the suggestion "preposterous" that the jurors would believe the witnesses' descriptions of large cocaine sales by the defendant over two years and yet doubt that he did in fact intend to involve himself in a conspiracy to distribute cocaine. The Court reasoned:

> What the Government really means is that it "needed the extrinsic evidence to satisfy its heavy burden" because it feared that the jurors would not believe its witnesses at all. The Government wanted the jury to infer that Matthews was dealing drugs [in] 1991 and was still dealing drugs in 1999, 2000, and 2001. [...] This is precisely the inference the law does not allow.

The Court concluded that "if the conduct charged is not open to a plausible innocent explanation, then extrinsic offense evidence is not admissible to show intent."

[vi] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Extortion Cases

United States v. Zeuli, 725 F.2d 813 (1st Cir. 1984) : Another extortion transaction was held properly admitted to prove intent in a prosecution for conspiracy to extort.

United States v. Himelwright, 42 F.3d 777 (3d Cir. 1994) : The Court reversed a postal worker's conviction for interstate threats and extortionate demands, which arose from the defendant's failed attempt to get a transfer to a post office near his children, because evidence of his purchase and possession of firearms was improperly admitted at his trial. The firearms evidence could not be used as proof of intent on the interstate threat charge, since "the statute requires proof of a defendant's general intent to threaten injury, but does not require proof of a specific intent to injure another or the present ability to carry out his threat." While the defendant's possession of firearms was perhaps probative of his intent to carry out his threat, it was not probative of whether he intended to make a threat, which is the proof that the statute requires. As to the extortion charge, the Court recognized that the defendant's capability of carrying out the threats "might be relevant to his intent to extort a job transfer." However, the probative value was minimal and was substantially outweighed by the prejudicial effect of the firearms evidence.

United States v. Wilkes, 685 F.2d 135 (5th Cir. 1982) : In a prosecution for extortion against a justice of the peace who used his official stationery to threaten arrest of those who did not respond to his letters, the Court upheld the introduction of proof of prior unlawful collection practices. Even though the defendant offered to stipulate that the letters were sent with the intent to collect payment of debts, the Court found that the issue of intent to extort remained in the case, and that the evidence was appropriately received on that issue.

United States v. Benton, 852 F.2d 1456 (6th Cir. 1988) : The Court upheld the admission of evidence that a defendant previously received kickbacks for ignoring bootlegging violations to establish his intent with respect to receipt of money from cocaine dealers. The defendant had claimed that he was investigating the dealers, and the prior act evidence tended to establish a plan of extortion. See also United States v. Davis n167(testimony by a witness that he was coerced into performing work at a sheriff's residence was properly admitted in the sheriff's RICO and Hobbs Act trial to show the sheriff's intent to extort similar labor from his deputies).

United States v. Schweihs, 971 F.2d 1302 (7th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed extortion convictions, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting other act evidence during the government's case-in-chief where there was ample reason to believe that the defendant would raise intent or knowledge as an issue, even though the Hobbs Act does not necessarily involve specific intent.

United States v. Haskins, 737 F.2d 844 (10th Cir. 1984) : The Court held that evidence of kickbacks outside the period covered by the indictment was admissible to prove intent in an extortion prosecution.

[vii] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Firearms Cases

United States v. Cassell, 292 F.3d 788 (D.C. Cir. 2002) : Affirming convictions for possession of guns by a felon and during drug trafficking, the Court held that prior instances of firearm possession were relevant to show the defendant's knowledge and intent to possess the firearms found in a bedroom he occupied in his uncle's house: "A prior history of intentionally possessing guns, or for that matter chattels of any sort, is certainly relevant to the determination of whether a person in proximity to such a chattel on the occasion under litigation knew what he was possessing and intended to do so."

United States v. Swiatek, 819 F.2d 721 (7th Cir. 1987) : The Court found harmless error in the admission of a defendant's willingness to deal in stolen property and cars in a prosecution for firearms offenses.

United States v. Hooton, 662 F.2d 628 (9th Cir. 1981) : The Court held it was proper for the government to use other acts to show the defendant's intent to engage in a business of dealing in firearms as opposed an intent to enhance his gun collection.

United States v. Mittleider, 835 F.2d 769 (10th Cir. 1987) : Evidence of the defendant's subsequent conversation with an undercover agent concerning a gun purchase was admissible to show intent and absence of mistake in a prosecution for firearms violations.

[viii] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Fraud, Forgery, Counterfeiting, False Statements, etc., Cases

United States v. Bowie, 232 F.3d 923 (D.C. Cir. 2000) : In a prosecution for possession of counterfeit obligations discovered in May, the government offered evidence that the defendant was arrested a month earlier and counterfeit bills with the same serial numbers as the May bills were found. Rejecting the notion that this evidence was "intextricably intertwined" with the charged offense so that it did not fall within Rule 404(b), the Court found that the evidence was admissible to prove intent and knowledge. Affirming a conviction for bank fraud arising from a check-kiting scheme in United States v. Pless, 79 F.3d 1217 (D.C. Cir. 1996) , the Court held that evidence of the defendant's failure to pay taxes during the period of the check-kiting was properly admitted. The evidence was offered to rebut the defendant's contention that he believed that the bank had consented to his transactions. The Court stated: "Although the issue is close, we think the government's argument that it is more likely that the defendant intended to defraud [the bank] if at the same time he was failing to pay other corporate liabilities, is plausible. And the prosecutor's carefully constrained use of the evidence, in conjunction with the judge's limiting instruction, renders any potential for prejudice minor." In United States v. Nicely, n168 the Court reversed the defendants' convictions because a conspiracy involving a scheme to defraud a seller of computers into offering money to secure contracts and a separate conspiracy to launder money were improperly joined. The misjoinder was prejudicial because evidence of one scheme would be inadmissible in proving the other; it was not probative of intent and could not have survived a Rule 403 balancing.

United States v. Oppon, 863 F.2d 141 (1st Cir. 1988) : The Court held that evidence of other occasions when defendant falsely represented his citizenship was admissible to prove intent in the instant case. See also United States v. McNeill n169(evidence that the defendant in a mail fraud case gave a false address to the city retirement board from whom he sought disability benefits was admissible to show intent to defraud); United States v. Cardillo n170(the defendant's efforts to sell counterfeit coins were held admissible in a prosecution for possession of counterfeit coins with intent to defraud).

United States v. Inserra, 34 F.3d 83 (2d Cir. 1994) : The Court held that evidence of the defendant's prior conviction for making a false statement to a labor investigator was admissible in his trial for making a false statement to his probation officer, where the defense opening statement indicated there was an innocent explanation for his conduct and his intent was in issue. One Judge believed that the difference in circumstances was so great that the prior conviction had little if any probative value. In United States v. Caputo, n171 the Court held evidence of previous credit card schemes admissible to prove intent in a prosecution for possession of an unauthorized credit card. See also United States v. Smith n172(similar act evidence could be used to prove intent to commit fraud in a securities and wire fraud case, especially since the defendant claimed that he was the victim of other brokers and of market forces).

United States v. Whaley, 786 F.2d 1229 (4th Cir. 1986) : Affirming a conviction for making false statements on a loan application, the Court held that evidence concerning a similar transaction (in which the defendant used his status as a retired FBI agent to obtain special treatment from a car rental agency) three months after the application as well as evidence of conduct prior to the application was admissible to prove intent. See also United States v. Bice-Bey n173(upholding a conviction for credit card fraud involving a telephone order for electronic equipment, and finding that evidence of earlier calls was admissible to prove intent).

United States v. Sanders, 343 F.3d 511 (5th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed convictions for bank fraud and making a false statement to the SBA, holding that evidence that the defendant and his wife did not disclose certain payments and reimbursements in a corporate bankruptcy petition was properly admitted to prove the defendant's intent to do the acts charged in the indictment. The Court also found no error in the admission of extrinsic evidence that the defendant was doing manual labor at a job during the period when he submitted a claim to his employer stating that he was unable to work. The defendant's fraudulent claim was related to his failure to disclose his known debt on his bank loan application and tended to prove intent. In United States v. Riddle, 103 F.3d 423 (5th Cir. 1997) , the Court reversed a bank chairman's conviction for fraud in connection with loans in which he was interested, finding error in the admission of evidence concerning four other loan transactions. The evidence may have suggested that the defendant took improper advantage of his position to encourage the bank to extend credit unwisely and for the benefit of his non-banking endeavors, but it did not establish that he had intentionally kept the bank board in the dark on his personal interest in having the bank extend credit.

United States v. Brown, 147 F.3d 477 (6th Cir. 1998) : The Court affirmed a conviction for fraud in connection with a telemarketing scheme, holding there was no error in admitting evidence of the defendant's activities at other telemarketing agencies. The evidence tended to show the defendant's specific intent to defraud and its probative value was not substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect. In United States v. Campbell, n174 the Court held that evidence regarding the billing of other patients was admissible to prove an intent to defraud Medicare. See also United States v. Crachy n175(evidence of prior acts relating to counterfeit bills was admissible to prove intent); United States v. Hamilton n176(in a prosecution for uttering altered obligations of the United States, evidence of previously passing a $2 bill altered to look like a $20 bill was properly admitted to prove intent and identity).

United States v. Ryan, 213 F.3d 347 (7th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed a conviction for bank fraud, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant failed to report $136,000 received as kickbacks and commissions for his part in the scheme on his tax returns. The evidence was of a cover-up "intricately related" to the acts charged and tended to prove the defendant's required specific intent to defraud, as well as to cast doubt on his defense of being ignorant of the fraudulent aspects of the transactions. In United States v. Gellene, 182 F.3d 578 (7th Cir. 1999) , the prosecution of an attorney for making false statements regarding conflicts of interest in a bankruptcy proceeding, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant had misrepresented his status as a member of the bar on numerous occasions and had made misrepresentations regarding billing and discovery matters in this and another bankruptcy case. The evidence of his intentional deception on those other occasions was relevant to whether his false statements in this case were intentional, as the government charged, or only trivial or a matter of neglect, as the defendant maintained. In United States v. Macey, n177 the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit evidence in a fraud trial that the defendant had previously changed an employee's records in an attempt to avoid paying compensation owed. The evidence did not so much show the defendant's intent as his willingness to break the law in a pinch, which is exactly what the Rule prohibits. In United States v. Draiman, n178 the Court affirmed a mail fraud conviction arising from the defendant's filing false insurance claims after a burglary.

Upholding the admission of evidence of prior fraudulent claims, it reasoned that mail fraud requires proof of specific intent and that a defendant cannot unilaterally remove intent as an element. The Court cautioned, however, that the government should not be permitted to "flood the courtroom" with other crimes evidence merely because specific intent must be proved. See also United States v. Chaimson n179(admission of prior bribe payments to a county assessor was upheld in a mail fraud prosecution involving bribery of officials as part of a scheme to fraudulently reduce real estate assessments).

United States v. Mora, 81 F.3d 781 (8th Cir. 1996) : In the trial of a defendant charged with insurance fraud in relation to claims made after her house was burned, the government offered evidence that the fire was caused by arson, and that the defendant had foreknowledge of the arson. The Court held that the evidence was properly admitted because "[i]f Mora knew that the fire was to take place, her misrepresentations to Safeco were more likely intentional and part of a coordinated plan, rather than inadvertent, isolated misstatements." In United States v. Fitterer, n180 the Court held that evidence of an earlier insurance fraud was probative of intent in a mail fraud case. See also United States v. Hardrich n181(evidence of a prior conviction for uttering a forged instrument was properly admitted to show intent in a prosecution for uttering forged treasury checks).

United States v. Faust, 850 F.2d 575 (9th Cir. 1988) : Evidence that the defendant forged a letter was held admissible to prove an intent to forge checks.

United States v. Cook, 745 F.2d 1311 (10th Cir. 1984) : The defendant's false identification and attempts to evade identification were admitted to show knowledge and intent in a prosecution for making false representations in a currency transaction report.

United States v. Mills, 138 F.3d 928 (11th Cir. 1998) : The Court affirmed the convictions of a husband and wife for Medicare fraud, but held that it was error (albeit harmless) to admit evidence that the wife concealed a jewelry purchase from Customs inspectors when returning to the United States from Europe. The Customs incident was only relevant to show that the wife was disposed to lie and the differences between the falsification of the Customs declaration and the falsification alleged against her in the instant case were too great. In United States v. Simon, n182 the Court held that evidence that salespersons charged with fraud worked at other companies and that some were instrumental in accomplishing a fraud was admissible to prove intent. See also United States v. Jackson n183(in a prosecution of a physician for using the mails to effectuate a scheme to defraud insurance companies, evidence that the defendant had accepted money for providing fraudulent medical excuses for employees to document absences was admissible to prove fraudulent intent); United States v. Scott n184(instances in which the defendant used a name other than his own to obtain credit were admissible to demonstrate intent in making false statements to banks and misusing the mails).

[ix] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- General Principles

United States v. O'Connor, 580 F.2d 38 (2d Cir. 1978) : The Court reversed a conviction of a government inspector for taking money from meatpacking companies in connection with his official duties, finding that evidence of other bribes allegedly received by the defendant was improperly received as evidence of intent, since there really was no issue of intent in the case. In dealing with Rule 404(b) problems, the Court stated that, although other crimes evidence may be admitted, "caution and judgment are called for, and a Trial Judge faced with an other crimes evidence problem should require the Government to explain why the evidence is relevant and necessary."

United States v. Beechum, 582 F.2d 898 (5th Cir. 1978) (en banc): In this leading case, the central issue at trial was whether the defendant took a silver dollar from the mail with the intent to keep it or whether he was planning to turn the coin in to postal authorities. To prove intent, the government offered evidence that the defendant had two credit cards in his pocket which were not issued to him and which were unsigned. Holding the evidence properly admitted, the en banc Court stated that Rule 404(b) requires a two-part analysis: first, whether the evidence is relevant to an issue other than the defendant's character, and second, whether it possesses probative value that is not substantially outweighed by its undue prejudice and otherwise satisfies Rule 403. Similarity is an important consideration in the first step, and it varies depending on the theory of admissibility put forward. At the second step, the Court cautioned that the risks of prejudice are particularly great when the extrinsic activity was not the subject of a conviction. Abjuring mechanical solutions, the Court called "for a commonsense assessment of all the circumstances surrounding the extrinsic offense." Five dissenters argued that the majority's approach tended to admit propensity evidence despite the first sentence of subdivision (b), that its approach was inconsistent with the restrictions found in Rules 608 and 609, and that other Circuits utilized tests that were more protective of criminal defendants and more likely to produce fairer trials. However, the principal difference was that on the issue of intent, the dissenters favored an objective test of similarity of the elements of both offenses, while the majority did not require the extrinsic offense to include the same essential physical elements as the charged offense; it was enough that the government's evidence was sufficient to convince a jury that the defendant had the same state of mind when committing both offenses.

United States v. Jones, 389 F.3d 753 (7th Cir. 2004) , vacated on other grounds, 545 U.S. 1125 (2005) : At the defendant's trial for possession of cocaine with intent to distribute, the government introduced his prior convictions for possession of marijuana with intent to distribute and for attempted delivery of a controlled substance, to prove intent. Noting that there is only "a fine line" between evidence of intent and evidence of propensity, the Court found that the evidence showed nothing more than that the defendant had a propensity to commit drug crimes (but the error was harmless). In a careful opinion (discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 404.02[10]), the Court explained that to tell the difference between the illegitimate use of a prior conviction to show propensity and the proper use to prove intent, > the government must affirmatively show why a particular prior conviction tends to show the more forward-looking fact of purpose, design, or volition to commit the new crime. A prior conviction may be relevant to show intent if the defendant concedes that he possessed the drugs but denies that he planned to distribute them, or if he denies knowing that the substance was contraband. Merely introducing prior convictions without more, however, can prove nothing but propensity, which is not enough to take the evidence out of the exclusionary principle established by Rule 404(b).

United States v. Pollock, 926 F.2d 1044 (11th Cir. 1991) : The Court upheld admission of the defendant's prior conviction for conspiracy to import marijuana in a cocaine conspiracy prosecution, noting that if the government can do without other crimes evidence in proving intent, it should, but if the evidence is essential to obtain a conviction, it may come in. "This may seem like a 'heads I win; tails you lose' proposition, but it is presently the law." In this case, because of the limited evidence of conspiratorial intent, the prior convictions were that much more probative.

[x] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Long, 328 F.3d 655 (D.C. Cir. 2003) : Affirming convictions for sexual offenses involving minors, the Court upheld the admission of testimony by two witnesses that the defendant had engaged in similar patterns of conduct with them, which tended to rebut defense allegations that the six victims fabricated the story of sexual abuse. The Court also upheld the admission of 250 photos showing the minor victims and other young males in sexually explicit positions, noting that the Trial Judge had painstakingly reviewed the photos in camera and had carefully explained the reason for admitting each photo. The photos were relevant because Long denied possession of the child pornography alleged in two counts of the indictment, and his possession of other similar photos demonstrated intent to possess such photographs. The Judge had instructed the jury that it could not consider the photos as evidence of bad character.

United States v. Gray, 405 F.3d 227 (4th Cir. 2005) : The defendant was convicted of insurance fraud, resulting from her murdering her second husband, and later her lover, and collecting the life insurance proceeds after each murder. The Court found no error in the admission of evidence that she had also murdered her first husband and had collected the insurance proceeds, offered to prove intent. In United States v. Blount, n185 the defendant was convicted of obstruction of justice arising from his behavior during the courtroom sentencing of his mother. The Court found no error in admitting evidence that the defendant was forcibly escorted from the building after an encounter with the court clerk in the clerk's office before the mother's scheduled trial, as well as evidence of the plea agreement entered into by the mother. This evidence was properly admitted to show the defendant's intent and motive in disrupting the court during the sentencing. In United States v. Mohr, n186 the defendant was convicted of unlawfully releasing a police dog on an arrestee, who was allegedly not resisting or attempting to flee. The Court found no error in the admission of evidence that the defendant had released the dog on other suspects who presented no danger. The evidence was strongly probative of intent and willfulness, and this probative value for a purpose other than character was not substantially outweighed by any prejudice arising from the events.

United States v. Rubio, 834 F.2d 442 (5th Cir. 1987) : The Court held that evidence of prior child pornography was admissible in a child pornography prosecution to prove the defendant's intent to receive items through the mail. See also United States v. Westmoreland n187(testimony concerning the defendant's financial records in a prior term as judge were admissible to prove intent with respect to receipt of money while serving as county supervisor); United States v. Wilson n188(extraneous acts of terrorism were properly admitted to show intent where the defendant denied intent and claimed he was working for the CIA); and United States v. Roberts n189(the defendant's prior conviction for a gambling offense was properly admitted to prove that he intended to join a conspiracy).

United States v. Shearer, 379 F.3d 453 (7th Cir. 2004) : The defendant, charged with dealing in display fireworks without a license, claimed that he was keeping the fireworks for his personal use. Affirming, the Court held that evidence that the defendant sold display fireworks both before and after the time set out in the indictment "was properly directed towards proving Shearer's intent to deal by demonstrating that Shearer engaged in regular and repeated transactions involving display fireworks with a consistent group of buyers." In United States v. Saunders, 166 F.3d 907 (7th Cir. 1999) , the defendant sent a threatening letter, and later an explosive device, to a federal Judge. The Trial Judge refused to redact prejudicial and offensive language from the letter, including the defendant's admission that he had already stabbed a correctional officer. The Court found no error, noting that "the derogatory language and the reference to the stabbing incident were probative of Mr. Saunders' intent to instill fear in his victim." Limiting instructions were sufficient to protect the defendant against undue prejudice. In United States v. Arnold, n190 the Court held that a taped conversation discussing a prior unsuccessful attempt to bribe a witness was admissible to prove specific intent to obstruct a grand jury investigation. See also United States v. Radseck n191(prior acts of the defendant in soliciting kickbacks in return for insurance business were admissible to prove intent).

United States v. Hambrick, 299 F.3d 911 (8th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed a conviction for escape, finding no error in the admission of evidence that the defendant previously escaped from a halfway house in 1998 and was returned to prison as a result. The evidence was relevant to prove intent. The Court also held that evidence that the defendant tested positive for cocaine after his escape from the halfway house was properly admitted, since evidence that the defendant knowingly violated a condition of his weekend pass was probative of intent to commit a knowing escape.

United States v. Johnson, 132 F.3d 1279 (9th Cir. 1997) : The defendant was charged with transporting a minor boy from Norway with intent to engage in criminal sexual activity. The Court found no error in the admission of testimony from two witnesses concerning sexual contact in which the defendant had engaged them 13 years earlier, when each witness was in his teens. The testimony was properly admitted to prove intent, even though the conduct was not identical to the conduct charged. The testimony indicated that the defendant had obtained the trust of the victims in order to engage in sexual contact with them, and in that sense was sufficiently similar to the conduct charged to be probative of intent. In United States v. Miller, n192 the Court held that evidence that the defendant, an FBI agent, had previously sold information to an FBI informant was not sufficiently similar to the charged espionage conspiracy to be admissible as proof of intent.

United States v. Viefhaus, 168 F.3d 392 (10th Cir. 1999) : The defendant was convicted of conspiracy to use and use of a telephone to transmit a bomb threat, after a message on his hotline (which espoused White Supremacist propaganda) stated that 15 cities would be bombed on a certain day. The Court held that racially inflammatory materials that were seized by the police in a search of his home were properly admitted as probative of the defendant's intent, because they helped to prove that he was serious when he made his statement on the hotline, and showed that the threat "represented the culmination of considerable planning for a racial holy war."

United States v. Hurley, 755 F.2d 788 (11th Cir. 1985) : The Court held that evidence that the defendant was with her husband after his escape was admissible to prove her intent to help him escape.

[xi] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Tax Cases

United States v. Johnson, 893 F.2d 451 (1st Cir. 1990) : The Court held that evidence of filing blatantly false tax exemption claims and failing to file an income tax return in 1987 was admissible to negate the defendant's defense to charged tax evasion in 1982-86 that he had relied in good faith on the advice of others in filing false returns for those years.

United States v. Bok, 156 F.3d 157 (2d Cir. 1998) : Affirming convictions for attempted tax evasion and filing false statements on income tax returns, the Court found that evidence of the defendant's failure to file tax returns in other years was properly admitted. The government had to prove that the defendant acted "willfully," and the uncharged misconduct was admissible to prove willfulness circumstantially. In United States v. Tarricone, 996 F.2d 1414 (2d Cir. 1993) , the Court affirmed a defendant's convictions arising from participation in a scheme to evade gasoline excise taxes, holding there was no error in admitting, as proof of intent, evidence that the defendant controlled New York City's bootleg gas operations. In a prosecution for tax evasion, United States v. Collorafi, n193 the Court reversed in limine orders excluding memorandum decisions dismissing the defendant's earlier civil challenges to the income tax laws as meritless and frivolous, holding they were admissible on the issue of the defendant's knowledge and wrongful intent and their probative value was not substantially outweighed by any dangers of prejudice or confusion.

United States v. Gricco, 277 F.3d 339 (3d Cir. 2002) : Affirming convictions for tax fraud arising from a scheme to skim airport parking lot revenues, the Court expressed its doubts as to the admissibility of evidence of one defendant's role in an earlier, separate scheme to embezzle money from the airport: "While the evidence of the prior thefts may have been relevant to show an intent to commit further thefts, it is questionable whether this evidence was relevant to show an intent to commit the tax offenses," and it was likewise questionable whether evidence of the earlier scheme was "particularly relevant to show Gricco's opportunity to carry out his tax offenses or the knowledge needed to do so."

United States v. McClain, 934 F.2d 822 (7th Cir. 1991) : In a public corruption case, the Court held that any error was harmless when the government introduced evidence of illegal taps on gas lines as probative of intent to evade taxes. See also United States v. Micke n194(evidence that the defendant offered to backdate documents to support fraudulent tax claims was admissible to prove intent with respect to other taxpayers); United States v. Birkenstock n195(upholding admission of evidence regarding the defendant's earlier tax returns as bearing upon his intent in a willful failure to file prosecution).

United States v. Richards, 723 F.2d 646 (8th Cir. 1983) : The defendant's communications with the IRS concerning 1983 taxes were admissible to prove intent in a prosecution involving his 1981 return.

United States v. Rothbart, 723 F.2d 752 (10th Cir. 1983) : Evidence that the defendant previously filed late personal tax returns was held admissible to show intent in a prosecution for failure to file timely quarterly employer's returns.

United States v. Dixon, 698 F.2d 445 (11th Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed, using evidence that tax liability was understated in 1977 as evidence of an intent to evade taxes in 1975 and 1976.

[xii] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Theft, Robbery, and Stolen Property Offenses

United States v. Jackson, 339 F.3d 349 (5th Cir. 2003) : Reversing a conviction for transporting stolen goods from a jewelry store burglary, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to admit evidence that the defendant had a previous felony conviction for stealing watches. Prior conviction evidence has a tendency to prove the difficult intent element in conspiracy cases, that the defendant knowingly joined a plan to further an unlawful objective. In this case, however, where there was other evidence going to intent and only the identification issue was contested, the evidence had very little probative value. Moreover, it had a substantial potential to cause unfair prejudice, because of the great danger that the jury would decide that he was involved in the conspiracy because of his prior criminal conduct. In United States v. Beechum, 582 F.2d 898 (5th Cir. 1978) (en banc), the crucial question at trial was whether the appellant took a silver dollar from the mail with the intent to keep it, or whether he was planning to turn the coin in to postal authorities. The Court held there was no error when the government offered evidence on the intent issue that the defendant had two Sears credit cards in his pocket which were not issued to him and which were unsigned.

United States v. Owens, 424 F.3d 649 (7th Cir. 2005) : Reversing a conviction for bank robbery, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to admit evidence that the defendant robbed the same bank seven years earlier (a robbery for which he was never charged). The evidence was inadmissible to prove intent, since bank robbery is a general intent crime and the defendant offered an alibi defense and did not place his intent in issue.

United States v. Mothershed, 859 F.2d 585 (8th Cir. 1988) : The Court reversed a conviction for aiding and abetting a bank robbery, because the Trial Judge admitted evidence of a previous conviction for possession of stolen bank money. The prior act was not relevant with respect to intent, since there was no showing that the defendant intended at the time of his earlier crime that a bank be robbed. In United States v. Krapp, n196 the Court held that evidence of other violations of postal regulations was relevant to prove an intent to defraud or mislead on the part of a postmaster who claimed that she was not properly instructed on the correct procedures for reporting shortages. See also United States v. Burkett n197(evidence of unrelated burglaries was properly admitted to prove intent in a prosecution for a break-in at a post office, even though the defendant had indicated he intended to rely solely on alibi).

United States v. McCollum, 732 F.2d 1419 (9th Cir. 1984) : The Court upheld a defendant's conviction for attempting a 1982 bank robbery, finding that a 1970 conviction for armed robbery, admitted under Rule 609, was admissible under Rule 404(b) to prove intent, where the defendant claimed that he committed the instant crime under the influence of hypnosis. A dissenting Judge argued that it was inappropriate to sustain admission of evidence on a theory never argued below and that the prejudicial effect of the evidence outweighed its probative value. In United States v. Albuquerque, n198 a prosecution for interstate transportation of a vehicle knowing it to be stolen, the Court concluded that "hotwiring" tools, admitted on the theory that they demonstrated the defendants' intent, were not relevant to any element in the case; they did not demonstrate the defendants' knowledge that the automobile was, in fact, stolen.

United States v. Cummings, 798 F.2d 413 (10th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed a conviction for selling a stolen cab portion of a tractor-trailer, finding that evidence that the defendant was involved in a pattern or practice of dealing in stolen trucks and parts was admissible to prove intent and the absence of mistake.

[cc] RULE 404(b) -- Joint Defendants

United States v. Hernandez, 780 F.2d 113 (D.C. Cir. 1986) : The Court held that evidence that one of two defendants was involved in a fight hours before being arrested for possession of a firearm was relevant to prove motive. It also found, however, that there was insufficient evidence to conclude that the other defendant was involved in the fight. Thus, the admission of the evidence against him was prejudicial error.

United States v. David, 940 F.2d 722 (1st Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed convictions in connection with a drug conspiracy, holding that evidence of violence by one member of the conspiracy was properly admitted. The Rule 404(b) objection by the defendant was properly rejected, because the challenged evidence was independently admissible as proof that he ran a continuing criminal enterprise and thus was not "other crimes" evidence. Other defendants lacked standing to raise Rule 404(b) objections to evidence of conduct not attributable to them, and the evidence did not have a prejudicial spillover effect.

United States v. Danzey, 594 F.2d 905 (2d Cir. 1979) : One of two defendants convicted of bank robbery confessed to 15 bank robberies, and the evidence "was so plainly relevant as to be classic similar act evidence admissible under the rule ... to show a modus operandi." The Court concluded, however, that an inadequately redacted form, which included the word "Blank" as a substitute for the name of the accomplice identified by the defendant who confessed, required reversal as to the codefendant, because of possible spillover effects. Compare United States v. Rosenwasser, n199 where the appellant was not permitted to cross-examine an FBI agent who testified that he had arrested the codefendant for a similar offense three weeks after the charged hijacking. The jury was instructed that the other crimes evidence was admissible only against the codefendant and not against the appellant. Because the other crime involved a building in which the defendant conducted his business, however, the case presented "a close question," but the Court concluded that the limiting instruction was sufficiently strong to protect the appellant. One Judge dissented.

United States v. Johnson, 610 F.2d 194 (4th Cir. 1979) : One defendant's cross-examination of a government witness brought out inadmissible other crimes evidence about a codefendant. The Court held (2-1) that, since the evidence did not carry the imprimatur of the government and was the subject of a cautionary instruction, its admission was not prejudicial error. See also United States v. Smith Grading & Paving, Inc. n200(in a prosecution for conspiracy to rig bids, introduction of one defendant's previous bidrigging to prove knowledge and intent to enter a conspiracy was more probative than it was prejudicial to other defendants).

United States v. Salomon, 609 F.2d 1172 (5th Cir. 1980) : The Court found it was error not to grant a severance when a codefendant testified about other crimes involving the defendant.

United States v. Phillips, 599 F.2d 134 (6th Cir. 1979) : The Court reversed a bank robbery conviction because an unindicted accomplice was permitted to testify that the defendant was involved in three other bank robberies. The Court recognized that it might be probative on the issue of identity that a defendant committed three other crimes with the same person, if this person were also charged with the fourth crime, but it found no "necessariness of association" in the instant case.

United States v. Kramer, 955 F.2d 479 (7th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed convictions for conspiring to distribute marijuana as part of a 1983-87 continuing criminal enterprise that imported marijuana, holding that the Trial Judge exercised principled discretion in admitting evidence that one of the defendants had imported 15 tons of marijuana in 1981, as the evidence showed specific intent and was not too remote to be relevant, and its prejudicial effect, if any, did not substantially outweigh its probative value.

United States v. Cardall, 885 F.2d 656 (10th Cir. 1989) : In reversing one defendant's fraud conviction, the Court held that there was insufficient evidence the defendant was actually involved in bad acts of codefendants that the government offered against him and the others. In United States v. Warledo, n201 convictions for conspiracy to set fire to a railroad bridge were reversed because the government was improperly permitted to ask one of the defendants whether he possessed a rifle found in his automobile and to introduce the rifle together with a clip and bullets to rebut his denial of possession. The Court rejected the government's opening of the door for this dangerous form of impeachment on an irrelevant matter, and it reversed all the appellants' convictions because the conspiracy charges made it likely that the evidence would have affected each of them.

United States v. Bovain, 708 F.2d 606 (11th Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed heroin convictions, finding no spillover prejudice in the admission of evidence offered by one defendant that he had been convicted of another offense and was serving time during the early part of the conspiracy alleged by the government. The Court emphasized that the Trial Judge took "great pains" to advise the jury as to the proper use of the prior conviction.

[dd] RULE 404(b) -- Jury Instructions

See also the annotations in § 404.03[2][pp], "Purposes for Admission To Be Specified."

United States v. Bradley, 390 F.3d 145 (1st Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed convictions for forced labor offenses, finding the probative value of other act evidence was not substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect. Noting that "the customary limiting instruction" had been given, the Court commented: "Without being naive about the effect of such instructions, they are still worth something--especially where, as here, the fairly debatable evidence had at least some relevance and was not dramatically prejudicial." In United States v. Randazzo, 80 F.3d 623 (1st Cir. 1996) , the defendant, convicted of misbranded and adulterated food and tax fraud offenses, did not challenge the admission of similar prior uncharged offenses, but claimed that a requested standard jury instruction -- that evidence of uncharged crimes may not be considered as evidence of the defendant's propensity to commit crimes -- should have been given. The Court recognized that under its case law a limiting instruction was not required where the uncharged crimes were closely entangled with the events constituting the charged offense, since the permitted inference may effectively submerge the forbidden propensity inference. When, as in this case, there may be doubt as to whether some of the other crimes are distinct enough to call for an instruction, the safer course may be to give a closing general instruction that bad character is not a permissible inference; however, omission of the limiting instruction was at worst harmless error in this case.

United States v. Everett, 270 F.3d 986 (6th Cir. 2001) : Affirming an accountant's conviction for bank fraud arising from a scheme to sign checks on a client's account without authorization, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit evidence that she had also improperly received the proceeds from checks signed by an authorized signatory, since the Trial Judge told the jury only that "certain testimony and certain exhibits [had been admitted during the trial] for a limited purpose," without making a specific statement as to what the jury could use the evidence at issue for, or even what evidence was restricted to a specific purpose. In a drug case, United States v. Spikes, 158 F.3d 913 (6th Cir. 1998) , the Court held it was error (but harmless) when the Trial Judge's instruction accompanying the admission of Rule 404(b) evidence only informed the jury on what it could not use the evidence for ("guilt of the crimes charged") and did not tell them what specific purpose would be proper. The Judge also erred in another instruction, which explained that other acts evidence was admitted for purposes "including" "opportunity, intent, or knowledge." "Opportunity" was never at issue, and use of the word "including" invited the jury to use the evidence for purposes other than those the Judge identified, which poses the same problems as providing the jury with no specific purpose at all for considering the evidence. In United States v. Jobson, n202 the Court held that evidence of the defendant's membership in a gang could be properly admitted in a felon firearm possession trial to show opportunity. Nonetheless, the conviction was reversed because the instruction to the jury at the close of the case, that they could not consider "acts other than the ones charged in the indictment ... as evidence that the defendant committed the crime that he is on trial for now. Instead, you can consider it in deciding for the purposes stated to you," was "inadequate to safeguard against the impermissible use of the gang evidence because they do not inform the jury of the proper purpose for which the gang evidence could be considered." Moreover, no limiting instruction was given at the time the evidence was offered. In United States v. Steele, n203 a narcotics case in which a government witness stated that one of the defendants had previously spent time in a South American jail and the Trial Judge immediately instructed the jury to disregard the statement, the Court found that the defendant's rights were protected and that no mistrial was required.

United States v. Lane, 323 F.3d 568 (7th Cir. 2003) : In a prosecution for making false statements in loan applications by not disclosing a large outstanding debt, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of other debts the defendant owed at the same time, but even if some of the evidence was improperly admitted, it was harmless error because any prejudicial effect was mitigated by a limiting instruction stating: "You have heard the evidence of acts of the defendant other than those charged in the indictment. You may consider this evidence only on the question of the defendant's motive, intent, knowledge, and absence of mistake or accident. You should consider this evidence only for this limited purpose."

United States v. Brown, 327 F.3d 867 (9th Cir. 2003) : In a trial for wire fraud committed by overcharging a wood chip client by two percent, the government introduced evidence of uncharged misconduct, including the defendant's manipulation of chip measurements, underpaying of truckers, and other instances of manipulation. In closing argument, the prosecutor argued: "And my question to you is, if a man is willing to cheat a little bit over there, wouldn't he be willing to cheat just a little bit over here?" The Court reversed because the Judge "did not instruct the jury to disregard the prosecutor's statements insofar as they suggested that Brown had a criminal propensity." A dissenting Judge argued that the prosecutor's statement did not require reversal, because the Judge adequately cautioned the jury by telling it to "consider only the charges in this case in reaching its decision, the 28 counts in the indictment."

United States v. Gonzalez, 975 F.2d 1514 (11th Cir. 1992) : The defendant was charged with conspiring to conduct money laundering and with money laundering on or about July 27. The Court reversed the defendant's conviction on the latter count because the Trial Judge had erroneously refused to give an instruction that limited the use of evidence of money laundering in May and June to showing the defendant's intent and guilty knowledge.

[ee] RULE 404(b) -- Knowledge

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Assault, Homicide, Abuse, etc., Cases

United States v. Sanders, 964 F.2d 295 (4th Cir. 1992) : Reversing a conviction for assault with a dangerous weapon in a prison, the Court held it was error to admit evidence of the defendant's prior convictions for inmate assault and contraband possession. As assault is not the kind of crime in which knowledge is even implicitly in issue, the evidence was not probative of anything except criminal propensity. In United States v. Fleming, 739 F.2d 945 (4th Cir. 1984) , the Court affirmed a murder conviction arising from an automobile collision, finding that evidence of the defendant's previous convictions for driving while intoxicated was properly admitted to show "that defendant had grounds to be aware of the risk his drinking and driving while intoxicated presented to others."

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Knowledge -- Civil Rights Cases

United States v. White, 788 F.2d 390 (6th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiring and aiding and abetting in violating the housing rights of a black family, holding that evidence of a fire at a codefendant's home prior to the burning of the victimized family's house was relevant to the defendant's knowledge of his codefendant's propensity to engage in arson and was admissible to prove why the defendant went to the codefendant for help. The Court also held that evidence of a subsequent arson by the codefendant should not have been admitted even if the defendant learned of it, since later knowledge did not prove what the defendant knew at the time of the relevant acts.

[iii] Rule 404(b) -- Knowledge -- Conspiracy Cases

United States v. Rodriguez, 215 F.3d 110 (1st Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed drug conspiracy convictions and held that evidence of the prior drug importation activities of the defendants was properly admitted to show their knowing participation in the conspiracy charged. The Court observed that in a conspiracy prosecution, "it is essential for the government to prove the defendant's knowledge of and voluntary participation in the conspiracy. In particular, the government's evidence must overcome the possibility that a particular defendant's association with criminal co-conspirators was wholly innocent or that, if he was with them at the scene of criminal activity, he was 'merely present' without guilty knowledge or intent." In this case, the prior drug activities among the defendants permitted the jury to view skeptically the defendants' claims that they were simply innocent bystanders.

[iv] Rule 404(b) -- Knowledge -- Drug Cases

[A] Rule 404(b) -- Different Amounts

United States v. Williams, 340 F.3d 563 (8th Cir. 2003) : The defendant, convicted for aiding and abetting the distribution of cocaine base, argued that a prior conviction for delivery of cocaine base should have been excluded because it involved sales of small quantities for personal use, as opposed to the large quantities at issue in the current case, and because it was too remote to be probative. Affirming, the Court held that the "discrepancy in quantity between Williams' prior conviction and the present prosecution does not change the prior conviction's probative value as to Williams's knowledge and intent," and that the 5 1/2-year-old conviction was sufficiently probative: "We believe he could recognize cocaine base with the same accuracy in 2001 as he did in 1996." In United States v. Logan, 121 F.3d 1172 (8th Cir. 1997) , the Court affirmed a conviction for distribution of more than one kilo each of heroin and methamphetamine, holding there was no error in the admission of evidence that the defendant had previously been stopped with "a personal amount" of methamphetamine. In the Court's view, evidence of prior possession of drugs, even in an amount consistent only with personal use, is admissible to show such things as knowledge and intent of a defendant charged with a crime involving intent to distribute drugs, and this is so even if the defendant has not raised a defense based on lack of knowledge or lack of intent.

United States v. Ramirez-Robles, 386 F.3d 1234 (9th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed convictions for a methamphetamine distribution conspiracy, holding that the defendant's prior conviction for possession of methamphetamine for sale was properly admitted to prove specialized knowledge. Because the defendant was in the house during the transaction, his prior conviction tended to establish that he would be able to identify a drug deal taking place in his own house. The evidence also tended to support a witness' claim that the defendant was the mastermind of the operation because it showed that he had the knowledge necessary to sell large quantities of methamphetamine and would have known of business practices common in that field, such as "fronting" the methamphetamine.

[B] Rule 404(b) -- Knowledge -- Drug Cases -- Different Drugs

United States v. Givan, 320 F.3d 452 (3d Cir. 2003) : The defendant was charged with a drug distribution conspiracy after the car in which he was riding was found to contain more than 100 grams of heroin. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of the defendant's prior conviction for transporting cocaine, as it indicated his knowledge of drugs and drug distribution, making more probable his knowledge of the heroin's presence in the car and less "likely that he was simply in the wrong place at the wrong time." Limiting instructions minimized any prejudicial effect. One Judge dissented, arguing that the logical connection "would be tenuous at best even if the prior conviction involved heroin," and that Rule 404(b) precludes an inference that "one who has previously been convicted of dealing drugs is more likely to have something to do with drugs hidden in his vicinity than someone with no prior drug involvement[,] ... absent some other proper relationship" between the prior conviction and the charged crime.

United States v. Gonzalez, 328 F.3d 755 (5th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possession of cocaine with intent to distribute, finding no error in the admission of the defendant's earlier conviction for possession of marijuana with intent to distribute. The transportation in the earlier case was similar to the instant case, so the prior conviction was relevant to prove knowledge. Some differences between the earlier facts and those here did not negate the relevance of the earlier conviction, because both offenses involved the concealment of drugs in hidden compartments of cars. In United States v. McDonald, 905 F.2d 871 (5th Cir. 1990) , the Court held it was error (but harmless) to cross-examine a defendant charged with importing marijuana about his prior use of speed and cocaine, as that would not lead to an inference that he knew his car contained marijuana when he was arrested and would only be probative of his character as a drug user.

United States v. Martinez, 182 F.3d 1107 (9th Cir. 1999) : The defendant was charged with smuggling amphetamine, after he picked up a friend at the airport who was carrying large quantities of the drug on her person. The Court found no error in the admission of the defendant's prior conviction for heroin importation, since it was probative of his knowledge that drug smuggling was taking place: the conviction tended to prove "knowledge of how drugs are imported, a specialized sort of knowledge most people lack." The Court rejected the argument that the heroin conviction should not have been admitted because it involved the smuggling of a different drug, since "there must be a lot of knowledge of smuggling that would carry over from one compact, relatively odorless, extremely expensive, illegal powder to another." In United States v. Garcia-Orozco, n204 the Court reversed convictions for importing and possessing marijuana, holding that evidence of the defendant's prior arrest for possession with intent to distribute heroin, which arose from an incident when he was riding as a passenger in a car that contained drugs, was irrelevant. Although the defendant was arrested while driving a car in the instant case, the Court reasoned that there was no logical basis to infer that he knew that drugs were in his vehicle simply because previously drugs were found in a car in which he was a passenger, especially where the defendant was convicted on the earlier occasion only of resisting arrest, and there was no demonstrated connection between the defendant and the drugs. In United States v. Bibo-Rodriguez, n205 the Court affirmed the defendant's conviction for importing cocaine, holding there was no error in admitting evidence he imported marijuana in a similar manner nine weeks later to prove that the charged importation was knowing. In United States v. Lopez-Martinez, n206 the Court reversed a conviction for importing heroin on other grounds, but ruled that evidence that the appellant was arrested in 1974 for possessing 600 pounds of marijuana and that he stated at the time that he was being paid $1,000 to haul the marijuana was admissible to rebut his claim that in the instant case he thought he was carrying marijuana rather than heroin. Since he received $1,000 for bringing a package weighing one and one-half pounds into the country, it was reasonable to infer that he knew he was carrying something worth more than marijuana.

[C] Rule 404(b) -- Knowledge -- Drug Cases -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Arias-Montoya, 967 F.2d 708 (1st Cir. 1992) : The Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit the defendant's ten-year-old conviction for cocaine possession to negate his assertion that he had no knowledge of the cocaine packaged for distribution that was found in the trunk of the car he was driving, as the evidence had no probative value for that purpose. One Judge concurred in the result, on the ground that the Rule bars other crimes evidence to show action in conformity with character, but not to prove intent and knowledge. In United States v. Garcia-Rosa, n207 the Court reversed a conviction for offenses in connection with a drug-importation conspiracy, holding that evidence of drugs found in the defendant's home at the time of his arrest, 16 months after the events in issue, was not admissible because he had never put his knowledge of drugs at issue, so it could not be used to rebut implications that he "knew nothing about drugs"; it was not probative to imply his knowledge that a loan given at the earlier time was to be used for an illegal drug-related purpose; and the prejudicial effect of the evidence far exceeded any probative value it might have. In United States v. Moccia, n208 a prosecution for possession of marijuana and diethylpropion with intent to distribute, the Court upheld the admission of evidence of a State Court conviction to prove knowledge. The drugs were found buried under some dog food in the freezer room of a farmhouse where the defendant lived. The Court said that the prior conviction might have helped the jury because a prior marijuana user might have been more likely to spot marijuana and more likely to associate with those who use it.

United States v. Gordon, 987 F.2d 902 (2d Cir. 1993) : The Court reversed a conviction for cocaine offenses arising out of the defendant's arrival at an airport to pick up a person who was carrying cocaine and marijuana, holding that his arrest a year earlier while in possession of crack cocaine did virtually nothing to prove what he knew at the airport and that the evidence was clearly prejudicial. The dissenting Judge thought there was sufficient similarity to show knowledge of drug dealing activity and it was unnecessary to show specific knowledge of importation. See also United States v. Arango-Correa n209(records obtained in searches of the defendant's car and apartment were admissible to prove knowledge of contents of a shipment); United States v. Da Silva n210(evidence of similar importation of drugs were admissible to show knowledge).

United States v. Mendoza-Medina, 346 F.3d 121 (5th Cir. 2003) : The defendant truck driver, charged with possession of marijuana with intent to distribute, claimed that it was his first time smuggling drugs for his employer, Ramirez, who had a history of narcotics trafficking. At trial, a DEA agent testified that agents seized $368,000 in cash from Ramirez after a trip hauling freight that he and the defendant had made two months before the charged incident. The agent opined that the money was drug related and reported Ramirez's statements to him that, when they arrived at the end of the trip, he got out of the cab to open the gate while defendant parked the truck and unhitched the trailer. Ramirez claimed that he found the money in boxes by the road, that he took the boxes and left in his car, and that defendant was not aware that he had found the cash. The agent also opined that Remirez had lied about finding the cash. The Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting this testimony as conspirator statements in furtherance of the conspiracy, and (under Rule 404(b)) to prove the defendant probably knew of the drugs on the charged occasion, since the fact the coconspirator Ramirez had been found with a large amount of cash immediately following a trip with the defendant suggested that the defendant had been involved with drug trafficking before. In United States v. Garcia-Flores, 246 F.3d 451 (5th Cir. 2001) , where the driver of a tractor-trailer disclaimed knowledge of 343 pounds of marijuana found in the trailer, the Court held that evidence he had forged bills of lading relating to his cargo was probative of his knowledge of the drugs. See also United States v. Nichols n211(evidence of previous importation of marijuana was admissible in a cocaine conspiracy prosecution to rebut the defendant's claim of lack of knowledge of illicit drug trade and denial of any previous trafficking); United States v. Contreras n212(evidence of the defendant's drug use subsequent to the charged events was admissible to show knowledge at the relevant time).

United States v. Jenkins, 345 F.3d 928 (6th Cir. 2003) : The defendant was charged with possessing crack cocaine with intent to distribute, after express mail packages containing crack were delivered to her. She claimed that she did not know what was in the packages, but that she only received them and turned them over (unopened) to a long-time acquaintance for $50 each time. The prosecution introduced evidence that she was a current user of crack cocaine, but not that she obtained her crack from someone other than the acquaintance. Reversing, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to admit the other crime evidence, since her admission to smoking crack was not probative of her knowledge of the contents of the packages and tended only to establish a propensity to commit the charged offense. Furthermore, the probative value of the evidence was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, given the tendency of drug use evidence to elicit jury opprobrium, the weakness of the other evidence regarding the defendant's knowledge, and the inability of the Judge's limiting instruction to minimize the prejudice. In United States v. Hitow, n213 the Court held that evidence a defendant had previously purchased several thousand pounds of marijuana was relevant to show his knowledgeable participation in the charged conspiracy to possess more than 1,000 pounds of marijuana with intent to distribute.

United States v. Davis, 838 F.2d 909 (7th Cir. 1988) : The Court held that other drug transactions were admissible to prove knowledge of a conspiracy.

United States v. Eggleston, 165 F.3d 624 (8th Cir. 1999) : In a prosecution for possession of crack cocaine with intent to distribute, the government introduced evidence that the defendant had been arrested previously with wrapped packages of cocaine and a scale in his car. The Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit the evidence to prove knowledge, since he was denying knowledge that cocaine packages were in the trunk of the car in which he was riding, not knowledge that the packages contained cocaine. In United States v. O'Connell, n214 the Court held that uncharged drug activity was admissible in a drug prosecution to prove a knowing contribution to the conspiracy.

United States v. Plancarte-Alvarez, 366 F.3d 1058 (9th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed marijuana convictions, holding that a prior incident in which the defendant imported marijuana and claimed duress was admissible in this case to prove absence of mistake. The defendant claimed that he was unaware that drugs were in his newly purchased car. In United States v. Murillo, 255 F.3d 1169 (9th Cir. 2001) , the Court affirmed a conviction for possessing drugs with intent to deliver, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the defendant had taken several long road trips (between the same areas) in a short time frame in a rental car. The evidence was relevant to show the defendant's knowledge that drugs were secreted in the rental car in which he was arrested and to rebut his defense that he was driving a long distance in a short time period to pick up his mother. In a trial for possession of a listed chemical knowing it was to be used to manufacture methamphetamine, United States v. Vizcarra-Martinez, n215 the Court held it was reversible error to admit evidence that the defendant was carrying a small amount of methamphetamine on his person when he was arrested. The majority rejected the government's contention that possession of the drug tended to prove the defendant's knowledge that the chemicals in his possession would be used to manufacture methamphetamine, reasoning that most people who use drugs "do so without having the faintest idea as to how the substance is produced or what ingredients are required to manufacture it." The dissenting Judge argued that evidence of knowledge of how a drug is manufactured could be inferred from possession of that very drug. In United States v. Mayans, n216 the Court reversed cocaine convictions, finding, inter alia, that it was error to admit evidence of an earlier drug deal to show the defendant's knowledge, without requiring the government to demonstrate a logical connection between involvement in the prior acts and the knowledge alleged in the instant case.

United States v. Lazcano-Villalobos, 175 F.3d 838 (10th Cir. 1999) : The defendant was convicted for possession of cocaine with intent to distribute, after drugs were found in a secret compartment behind the dash of a car he was driving. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant had been arrested 19 months previously driving a car carrying marijuana in secret compartments in the rear bumper. The evidence was probative of the defendant's knowledge of the hidden compartment containing the cocaine because the prior conduct was close in time and similar to the activity charged, and the probative value was not substantially outweighed by the potential for unfair prejudice. In United States v. Wilson, 107 F.3d 774 (10th Cir. 1997) , the Court affirmed convictions for felon firearm possession and cocaine possession, but held it was error (albeit harmless) to admit evidence of a prior conviction for cocaine possession. The similarity between the situations had at most slight probative value on the issue of the defendant's knowledge of cocaine's presence on the premises, but it would be highly prejudicial. In United States v. Kendall, n217 the Court held that uncharged drug activity was properly used to show knowledge and absence of mistake in a drug prosecution.

United States v. Edwards, 696 F.2d 1277 (11th Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed convictions arising out of a drug importation conspiracy. It found that one defendant's statements concerning his involvement in prior drug smuggling were admissible to prove knowledge of importation and distribution.

[v] Rule 404(b) -- Knowledge -- Firearms Cases

United States v. Linares, 367 F.3d 941 (D.C. Cir. 2004) : Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit testimony from a police officer that four-and-a-half years before the charged events she had arrested the defendant after seeing him drop a loaded handgun onto the ground. Because there was eyewitness testimony that the defendant was holding a gun in his hand and firing it, no reasonable argument could be made that his possession was unknowing or accidental, so the officer's testimony served only as impermissible propensity evidence. In United States v. Cassell, 292 F.3d 788 (D.C. Cir. 2002) , the Court affirmed convictions for possession of guns by a felon and during drug trafficking, and held that prior instances of firearm possession were relevant to show the defendant's knowledge and intent to possess firearms that were found in a bedroom he occupied in his uncle's house: "A prior history of intentionally possessing guns, or for that matter chattels of any sort, is certainly relevant to the determination of whether a person in proximity to such a chattel on the occasion under litigation knew what he was possessing and intended to do so." In United States v. Moore, n218 the Court upheld denial of a motion to sever the defendant's trial on possession of a sawed-off rifle from a charge for possessing a semi-automatic rifle the previous night. It held that evidence of the latter possession tended to negate his defense, that he thought the sawed-off rifle was a BB gun, by showing his knowledge of guns.

United States v. Flores Perez, 849 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1988) : The Court reversed a conviction for aiding and abetting a firearms transaction, finding that evidence of the defendant's pending firearm charges in Puerto Rico was erroneously admitted. There was no evidence, aside from the fact that charges were brought, that the Puerto Rico case involved an unlicensed or stolen weapon, so it was questionable whether the other charges were relevant to a case in which the firearms offense involved an obliterated serial number.

United States v. Mitchell, 328 F.3d 77 (2d Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed a conviction for dealing in firearms without a license, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant had been arrested in 1991 for possession of a firearm. The evidence tended to rebut the defendant's contention that he was unaware that purchasing and selling firearms without a license was illegal and to show that he knew that the laws of New York, where the firearms were ordered and delivered, were very strict.

United States v. Teague, 737 F.2d 378 (4th Cir. 1984) : The Court held that the defendant's prior offer to sell a gun was admissible to prove knowledge and intent in a case in which he denied knowing that a pistol was in his car.

United States v. Carney, 387 F.3d 436 (6th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed convictions for falsifying paperwork in connection with the sales of firearms, holding that evidence of uncharged firearms transactions was properly admitted to prove that the defendants actually knew the true purchaser of the firearms that they sold in the transactions at issue in the case. In United States v. Murphy, 107 F.3d 1199 (6th Cir. 1997) , the Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no error in the admission of evidence that a handmade ski mask was found in the car in which the defendant was driving when he was arrested. The presence of the ski mask (which was found on the front seat) tended to prove that the defendant was aware of the presence of the gun (which was concealed in the back of the car), because it suggested that he had an intent to use the gun. In United States v. Chesney, n219 the Court held that evidence that the defendant had earlier committed an armed robbery was relevant in his trial for felon firearm possession to prove that he knowingly possessed a similar firearm found in the trunk of the car in which he was arrested.

United States v. Whitlow, 381 F.3d 679 (7th Cir. 2004) : The defendant was charged with possessing automatic weapons in 2001, some of which were found only after they had been stolen from his storage unit. He objected to evidence that he had assembled machineguns in 1996 and 1997, but the Court held that the evidence was probative of his knowledge how to convert semiautomatic weapons into automatic weapons and of his knowledge that the weapons in his possession were machineguns. Any prejudicial effect of the evidence was minimized by an instruction limiting its use to establish the defendant's knowledge and lack of mistake, so admission of the evidence was no abuse of discretion. In United States v. Poole, 207 F.3d 893 (7th Cir. 2000) , the Court affirmed convictions for making false statements in connection with firearms purchases and upheld a ruling admitting evidence of the defendant's attempt to purchase firearms within a few months of the charged conduct. The evidence tended to show that the defendant knew what he was doing when he gave false statements.

United States v. Johnson, 562 F.2d 515 (8th Cir. 1977) : The Court upheld using the defendant's previous possession of weapons to show knowledge on a firearms charge.

United States v. Carrasco, 257 F.3d 1045 (9th Cir. 2001) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of drugs and drug trafficking paraphernalia found in the car the defendant was driving when arrested. The evidence of drug trafficking was relevant to show that the defendant's possession of the firearm and ammunition found in the car was knowing. In United States v. Kindred, 931 F.2d 609 (9th Cir. 1991) , the Court reversed a conviction for possession of an unregistered firearm, an inoperable World War I German machine gun, holding it was an abuse of discretion to admit evidence of an 11-year-old misdemeanor conviction for failing to register a handgun. General knowledge of a requirement that firearms must be registered was not a material element of the offense charged, which required the defendant's specific knowledge that he possessed a dangerous device of a type that would alert one to the likelihood of regulation.

United States v. Shomo, 786 F.2d 981 (10th Cir. 1986) : The Court reversed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding that evidence that a rifle had been confiscated within two weeks of the crime charged in this case was improperly admitted to show the defendant's knowledge that it was illegal for him to possess a firearm, since knowledge was not an element of the offense.

United States v. Jernigan, 341 F.3d 1273 (11th Cir. 2003) : Affirming convictions for felon firearm possession, the Court found no plain error in the admission of evidence that one defendant had been convicted of aggravated assault and being a felon in possession of a firearm, where both offenses involved the knowing possession of a firearm in a car. The Court added that the Judge gave the jury two separate limiting instructions regarding the impermissibility of considering the prior convictions as propensity evidence. In United States v. Pearson, n220 evidence of the large number of guns found in the defendant's residence was admitted to prove that the defendant, charged with violating a firearms statute, must have known that the weapons were on the premises.

[vi] Rule 404(b) -- Knowledge -- Fraud, Forgery, Counterfeiting, False Statements, etc., Cases

United States v. Bowie, 232 F.3d 923 (D.C. Cir. 2000) : In a prosecution for possession of counterfeit obligations discovered in May, the government offered evidence that the defendant was arrested a month earlier and counterfeit bills with the same serial numbers as the May bills were found. Rejecting the notion that this evidence was "intextricably intertwined" with the charged offense so that it did not fall within Rule 404(b), the Court found that the evidence was admissible to prove intent and knowledge. In United States v. Rhodes, n221 the Court reversed a conviction for bank fraud and forgery, holding it was plain error to admit evidence of other fraudulent activity. Because the activity was not sufficiently connected with defendant, it did not undermine his defense that he did not know that the check he presented was bad.

United States v. Crocker, 788 F.2d 802 (1st Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to commit bank theft, holding that the fact that a defendant had previously been arrested while riding in a car with a codefendant and counterfeit checks was highly probative of the defendant's knowledge in a prosecution arising out of the transportation of the codefendant to a bank to cash the counterfeit checks.

United States v. Zedner, 401 F.3d 36 (2d Cir. 2005) , rev'd on other grounds, 126 S. Ct. 1976 (2006) : Affirming convictions for attempting to defraud a financial institution, the Court held that evidence that the defendant defrauded two individuals to obtain title to their homes was properly admitted to prove his financial sophistication and to rebut his claim that he did not know bonds were counterfeit. In United States v. Downing, 297 F.3d 52 (2d Cir. 2002) , the Court affirmed convictions for conspiracy to commit wire fraud and securities fraud, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that one defendant-accountant had previously prepared a false audit report for a similar securities fraud scheme. The probative value of the evidence was high to rebut the defendant's claim that he did not understand the nature of the scheme for which he was prosecuted and to demonstrate why his coconspirators trusted him to prepare the false audit reports. In a prosecution of a scheme to defraud potential distributors of home security and energy saving devices, United States v. Wiley, n222 the Court held that it was error, but harmless, to admit a document that indicated that a State Court had enjoined the mastermind of the scheme (who testified for the government) and one of the defendants from doing business because of their false statements in the course of selling other distributorships. Even a cautionary instruction could not remove the risk that the jury would treat the evidence as proof of a propensity. See also

United States v. Nemes n223(similar transactions after the charged events were properly introduced to show knowledge and intent in a prosecution for Medicare and Medicaid fraud).

United States v. Morley, 199 F.3d 129 (3d Cir. 1999) : At the defendant's trial for fraud and conspiracy arising from his attestation to a forged signature on a fake will, the prosecution introduced evidence that 14 months earlier the defendant had asked his parents (both notaries) to notarize signatures on more than a hundred U.S. Savings Bonds that had been signed out of their presence. Although the government did not offer evidence that the defendant knew the signatures were forgeries, it argued that the fact the defendant was working with the same person concerning the savings bonds and the will tended to show he knew that his attestation on the will was criminal. The Court vacated the conviction, finding an abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence, since it tended to show guilt only because the defendant had previously engaged in a "similar" impropriety, the very evil Rule 404(b) seeks to prevent.

United States v. Brainard, 745 F.2d 320 (4th Cir. 1984) : The Court held that evidence of a prior investment scheme was admissible to rebut the defendant's claim that he had been serving his client's interests in good faith.

United States v. York, 888 F.2d 1050 (5th Cir. 1989) : In a complex fraud prosecution, the defendant suggested that he was unaware of the details of certain transactions and that another man was really the key player and decisionmaker. The Court held that evidence the defendant received a million-dollar check from the other man was admissible to show the defendant's knowledge of the transactions and to rebut the suggestion he was merely a pawn in the scheme.

United States v. Studley, 892 F.2d 518 (7th Cir. 1989) : In a prosecution for knowingly disposing of farm equipment pledged by another farmer to the Farmers Home Administration, the Trial Judge denied a motion in limine to exclude evidence that the defendant had previously sold grain through a third person in order to bypass the requirement of obtaining an FHA endorsement on the check received for sale of the grain. The Court held that the other acts were sufficiently similar to the crime charged to be probative on the defendant's knowledge of the practice of selling property through third parties to avoid having to get FHA releases and of how to dispose of pledged property without detection. In a fraud prosecution, United States v. Weisman, n224 the Court found that the defendant's entry of a guilty plea on behalf of a corporation in 1980, the transcript of the plea proceeding, and other evidence concerning past investigations of the corporation and statements by the defendant regarding his fear of an FTC investigation were properly admitted to respond to the defendant's claim that he had no personal knowledge of any fraud committed by the corporation's employees.

United States v. Anderson, 879 F.2d 369 (8th Cir. 1989) : In a public-contract fraud prosecution, evidence that the defendants had previously confessed to state antitrust charges of collusive and noncompetitive bidding for public construction projects was properly admitted to show the defendants had knowledge of each other's activities and had acted in accordance with each other's actions. In United States v. Popow, n225 the Court held that a prior deportation was admissible to prove knowledge in a prosecution for making false representations to the INS and for misrepresenting identity at the border. See also United States v. Hutchings n226(it was permissible to present evidence in a fraud case of the defendant's previous acts showing that he had knowledge of proper procedure regarding disclosure to an insurance premium finance company of fees charged).

United States v. Blitz, 151 F.3d 1002 (9th Cir. 1998) : Affirming a conviction for fraud in a telemarketing scheme, the Court held that evidence of the defendant's prior employment by another telemarketing firm was properly admitted as probative of his knowledge that the scheme was fraudulent. It also held that there was no abuse of discretion in the finding that the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by any prejudicial effect.

[vii] Rule 404(b) -- Knowledge -- Illegal Aliens Cases

United States v. Rubio-Gonzalez, 674 F.2d 1067 (5th Cir. 1982) : The Court held that records of the appellant's prior illegal entries into the country were properly admitted to show his knowledge and state of mind, and were more probative than prejudicial. See also United States v. Ortega-Chavez n227(evidence that the defendant, charged with involvement in smuggling aliens into United States, went to Mexico on other occasions for smuggling purposes was admissible to show knowledge and intent).

United States v. Fujii, 301 F.3d 535 (7th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed convictions for smuggling aliens, noting that the defendant's prior plea of guilty to a similar crime giving an identical explanation for his acts tended to establish that he knew that his acts were in violation of the law.

United States v. Eufracio-Torres, 890 F.2d 266 (10th Cir. 1989) : The Court affirmed a conviction for transporting illegal aliens, holding that evidence of the defendant's prior conviction of illegally entering the United States was probative of his requisite knowledge that the aliens he transported were in this country illegally and that the prejudicial effect of the evidence was minimal, since the jury was already aware that he had entered the country illegally from his presentation of evidence regarding participation in the amnesty program.

United States v. Saldivar, 710 F.2d 699 (11th Cir. 1983) : The Court held that evidence that a father and son charged with aiding and abetting transportation of illegal aliens repeatedly paid for transportation knowing their illegal status was admissible as probative of knowledge.

[viii] Rule 404(b) -- Knowledge -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Sutton, 801 F.2d 1346 (D.C. Cir. 1986) : In a prosecution arising out of a conspiracy to bribe federal officials, the Court reasoned that convictions for obstruction of justice and conspiracy to obstruct justice that involved events that took place 18 months before the charged conspiracy were relevant to prove the defendant's knowledge that transfers of money he had authorized were used to bribe federal officials.

United States v. Frankhauser, 80 F.3d 641 (1st Cir. 1996) : The Court affirmed in part a conviction for persuading a witness to destroy evidence shortly before it was subpoenaed by a grand jury, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the defendant had been convicted in 1987 for obstruction of justice. Although the remoteness in time may have lessened the overall probative value of the evidence, the great similarity between the conduct charged in 1987 and that in 1994 tended to show that the defendant knew his later conduct was illegal and that he therefore acted corruptly with the specific intent to violate the law in 1994. Although one Judge thought that the use of the evidence went beyond what was necessary, raising a threat of confusion and undue prejudice, all agreed that there was no prejudicial error.

United States v. Perez, 325 F.3d 115 (2d Cir. 2003) : The defendant was convicted for violating currency reporting requirements after money was found secreted in aerosol cans in his luggage as he began a flight to the Dominican Republic. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that another man had engaged in a virtually identical scheme, since the other man was a client of the lawyer for whom the defendant was working as a paralegal. Moreover, the defendant had some role in assisting the lawyer on the other man's case, so the evidence was relevant to the defendant's knowledge of a means to smuggle currency and of the probability that the five aerosol cans in his luggage contained reportable currency. In Howard Opera House Assocs. v. Urban Outfitters, Inc., 322 F.3d 125 (2d Cir. 2003) , the building landlord and a fellow tenant sued a retail chain because excessively loud music was being played at its store. The Court held that evidence of excessive noise problems at other stores in the chain was relevant to prove that the defendant "had intentionally breached the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, because it tended to show that Urban Outfitters knew that its music had a disruptive effect and insisted on playing it at excessive levels despite that knowledge."

United States v. Walters, 351 F.3d 159 (5th Cir. 2003) : Affirming a conviction for sending an explosive package to an Air Force officer, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting portions of a book, The Anarchist's Cookbook, including a title page with the defendant's name written on it and a chapter detailing the making of a device similar to that sent to the officer. The evidence was relevant to prove knowledge and ability to make the type of device at issue in the case. In United States v. Walker, n228 the Court upheld a conviction for conspiracy to intimidate a grand jury witness, holding that evidence of the defendant's boasts to a fellow conspirator concerning prior violent acts was admissible to show his knowledge of the purposes of the conspiracy and that the probative value of the evidence exceeded any prejudicial effects.

United States v. Owens, 424 F.3d 649 (7th Cir. 2005) : Reversing a conviction for bank robbery, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to admit evidence that the defendant robbed the same bank seven years earlier (a robbery for which he was never charged). The prior robbery was not admissible to prove knowledge of the robbed bank, because knowledge was not at issue either as an element of the crime or in rebuttal to a defense, and a witness could testify that the defendant expressed knowledge of the bank.

United States v. Koski, 424 F.3d 812 (8th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed convictions for mailing threatening communications, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant had been convicted in 1996 for mailing threatening communications. The essential issue under the statute, 18 U.S.C. § 876, is whether a reasonable recipient, familiar with the context of the communication, would interpret it as a threat. The defendant testified that his letters were merely a "cry for help," and not threats, but the prior conviction demonstrated that he was aware that his previous correspondence had been found threatening. In United States v. Marshall, n229 the Court approved a ruling that two reports by Department of Agriculture employees concerning visits to the defendant's grocery store in 1976 and 1978, which suggested that he might have been violating federal law concerning redemption of food stamps, could be used in a prosecution for food stamp improprieties that took place in 1981. The dissenting Judge found that the reports did not establish clearly enough that any violations had occurred in the earlier years and that they were unduly prejudicial. In our view, the preferable procedure would have been to redact the reports, admitting only those portions indicating that the defendant had been informed of certain requirements of federal law. Reference to past violations was not needed to prove knowledge.

United States v. Fuchs, 218 F.3d 957 (9th Cir. 2000) : The defendants were convicted of conspiring to commit offenses against the laws of the United States, based on their participation in a program in which government airplanes were transferred to a private entity. The defendants contended that they did not know that such transfers were illegal. The Court held that evidence that one of the defendants did not report the income he received from the transfers on his tax returns was properly admitted to prove that he knew the transactions were illegal. In United States v. Thomas, 893 F.2d 1066 (9th Cir. 1990) , the Court held that previous convictions for molesting young girls were properly admitted to show that a defendant charged with child pornography knew that the girl pictured with him performing sex acts was a minor.

United States v. Simpson, 152 F.3d 1241 (10th Cir. 1998) : In a trial for receiving child pornography over the Internet, the government introduced other images of child pornography on the defendant's computer at the time of his arrest besides those for which he was charged. The Court found no abuse of discretion, since the evidence tended to show that his possession of pornographic images was not an accident or mistake and that he had knowledge of the nature of the material he was receiving. In United States v. Bornfield, 145 F.3d 1123 (10th Cir. 1998) , the defendant, a CPA, was charged with money laundering after he issued a check in exchange for $13,000 in cash received from the wife of a couple who had been engaged in drug trafficking with a third person. The Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit evidence that the defendant had used cocaine with the husband on 30 to 40 occasions, since it was unclear how the evidence could establish, directly or circumstantially, the defendant's knowledge that cash received from the wife on behalf of the third person was criminally derived property. In any event, the defendant's knowledge of the third person's participation in drug trafficking was sufficiently shown by the third person's testimony that the defendant had discussed the trafficking with him and the husband.

[ix] Rule 404(b) -- Knowledge -- Tax Cases

United States v. Middleton, 246 F.3d 825 (6th Cir. 2001) : Affirming a conviction for failing to file tax returns for five years, the Court held that evidence of a tax return filed by the defendant 20 years earlier and of the contents of the return were admissible to prove his awareness of income tax forms and instructions that made clear his obligation to file returns. The defendant was not, contrary to his claim, barred from testifying as to how his beliefs changed over twenty years; any failure to explain was a result of the his "own narrative and unresponsive answers to the questions of his attorney."

United States v. Verkuilen, 690 F.2d 648 (7th Cir. 1982) : The Court affirmed convictions for failing to file income tax returns for 1976 and 1977, upholding the admission of evidence that in 1974 the appellant had filed a form indicating the correct number of withholding allowances, but that in 1976 his withholding form claimed more allowances than he was entitled to. The Court found that the evidence tended to show knowledge of what was required and supported the government's claim that the failures to file were willful. See also United States v. Serlin, 707 F.2d 953 (7th Cir. 1983) (the defendant's failure to file a 1979 tax return was admissible in a prosecution for willful failure to file returns in 1976 and 1977).

[x] Rule 404(b) -- Knowledge -- Theft and Stolen Property Offenses

United States v. Pascarella, 84 F.3d 61 (2d Cir. 1996) : The Court held, in a fraud prosecution based on a stolen check scheme, that there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that two stolen checks (not part of the charged scheme) had been deposited in a defendant's bank account. The evidence was probative of the defendant's knowledge and tended to rebut his argument that he had been duped by a codefendant, who was his business partner.

United States v. Hadaway, 681 F.2d 214 (4th Cir. 1982) : The Court, in a prosecution for aiding and abetting theft from an interstate shipment, upheld the admission of testimony about other occasions when the defendant was involved in similar situations, as it tended to establish that the defendant knew he was dealing with stolen goods. The evidence was admissible even though it involved acts that occurred eighteen months after the crime charged. A dissent charged that the evidence was unnecessary and that it was little more than propensity evidence.

United States v. Falco, 727 F.2d 659 (7th Cir. 1984) : The Court, although it recognized the closeness of the question, upheld a ruling that four prior interstate theft convictions (two in 1952, one in 1962, and one in 1978) could be used to prove knowledge in a prosecution for a similar offense. The Trial Judge was not clearly wrong in reasoning that a person involved in prior similar offenses would have recognized a shipment of stolen goods. The Court observed that the defendant could have brought out at an in limine hearing any differences between the prior events and the crime charged, and agreed with the Trial Judge that the pattern of conduct, rather than the age of the convictions, was significant. One Judge dissented, arguing that the balance between probative value and unfair prejudice was "so lop-sided in the direction of unfair prejudice" that reversal was required. See also United States v. Hyman n230(evidence that the defendant had discussed ways of manipulating paperwork to make purchases of stolen steel look legitimate was admissible to prove knowledge).

United States v. Daly, 716 F.2d 1499 (9th Cir. 1983) : Evidence that the defendant sold a stolen car, although not charged in the indictment, was admissible to show the defendant's knowledge in a prosecution alleging a car theft scheme. In United States v. Albuquerque, n231 a prosecution for interstate transportation of a vehicle knowing it to be stolen, the Court concluded that "hotwiring" tools, admitted on the theory that they demonstrated the defendants' intent, were not relevant to any element in the case; they did not demonstrate the defendants' knowledge that the automobile was in fact stolen.

United States v. Robinson, 687 F.2d 359 (11th Cir. 1982) : The Court held that testimony of two convicted silver burglars concerning their use of the appellant as a "fence" was properly admitted to prove knowledge, intent, and modus operandi in a prosecution for transporting stolen goods.

[ff] Rule 404(b) -- Malice

United States v. Tan, 254 F.3d 1204 (10th Cir. 2001) : On interlocutory appeal in a prosecution for alcohol-related vehicular homicide, the Court reversed an in limine ruling that excluded the defendant's prior convictions for drunk driving. Although the Trial Judge reasoned that the convictions were not offered for any proper purpose under Rule 404(b), the Court concluded that a jury could infer from the prior convictions that the defendant was "especially aware of the problems and risks associated with drunk driving" and that "he knows better than most that his conduct is not only illegal, but entails a substantial risk of harm to himself and others." Thus, the convictions were highly probative of malice and were not being offered for the sole purpose of proving that the defendant had a propensity to drive while drunk.

[gg] Rule 404(b) -- Modus Operandi

United States v. Williams, 985 F.2d 634 (1st Cir. 1993) : After arguing at sidebar that the evidence showed "how bad [defendant and a coconspirator] are," the government introduced evidence that the defendant had told a witness that "he had killed a couple of people." On appeal of convictions for cocaine distribution offenses, the government argued that the evidence showed the defendant's modus operandi of intimidation. Concluding that the impermissible propensity ground first asserted was the only justification supported in the record, the Court found admission of the evidence error (but harmless). Modus operandi evidence is admissible to prove identity, but identity was not disputed; moreover, the evidence was not placed into any context, other than temporal, related to the development or operation of the conspiracy. One Judge, concurring, wrote separately "simply to express my exasperation at the repeated abuse of Rule 404(b) by government prosecutors."

United States v. Anifowoshe, 307 F.3d 643 (7th Cir. 2002) : Affirming a conviction for bank and mail fraud, which arose from a scheme that involved depositing stolen and forged credit card access checks into fictitious bank accounts, the Court held that the defendant's state fraud conviction was properly admitted to show a modus operandi, even though the act at issue there occurred subsequent to the acts giving rise to the federal prosecution. The perpetrator used the same address to open fraudulent accounts in both the federal and state schemes, two checks deposited in the state account displayed an address identical to an address used to open the federal accounts, and both schemes involved the same methods. In United States v. Vaughn, 267 F.3d 653 (7th Cir. 2001) , after the defendant lost his driving privileges, he used his girlfriend to make cocaine sales for him. Testifying against him, she recounted his instructions regarding the procedures to be followed, particularly his direction to conduct sales only when she was alone with the customer. The Court affirmed his conviction for conspiracy to distribute crack, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of cocaine sales the defendant had previously made to an undercover officer, since the evidence was relevant inter alia to prove modus operandi because it demonstrated four distinctive characteristics of the defendant's trafficking: "(1) Vaughn's method of arranging a drug transaction; (2) Vaughn's desire to avoid suspicious transactions; (3) Vaughn's customers; and (4) Vaughn's preferred location for completing the drug transactions." In a § 1983 action against a police officer for malicious prosecution of a complaint that the plaintiff threatened the officer, Treece v. Hochstetler, n232 the plaintiff argued that the officer solicited a bribe on the occasion in question and attempted to show a pattern of soliciting bribes and falsely charging individuals with crimes when the bribes were not paid. Affirming a judgment for the officer, the Court found no abuse of discretion in exclusion of the evidence, since the alleged incidents were not sufficiently idiosyncratic to permit an inference of pattern and did not bear a singular strong resemblance to the pattern of the offense charged. In United States v. Montoya, n233 a defendant was charged in a drug conspiracy after he and another had been stopped in a car in which $44,000 was discovered hidden in the trunk. To rebut his claim that he had no knowledge of the money, and thus lacked requisite intent to be a participant in the conspiracy, the government offered evidence that the two men had earlier been arrested traveling together and heroin had been found hidden in the other man's shoes. The Court held that the similarities between the events established a modus operandi for transporting contraband and proceeds from the sale thereof, and that limiting instructions mitigated the unfair prejudicial effect, if any, of the evidence.

United States v. McDowell, 250 F.3d 1354 (11th Cir. 2001) : Customs agents intercepted a shipping container containing cocaine, removed the drugs and resealed the container, and placed the container in the seaport delivery yard. The defendants were arrested after they entered the yard in a transport company truck, having given a false driver number to access the containers, and examined the resealed container. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of a similar incident two weeks earlier when a driver using false identification used the same company's truck to gain access to another container from the same shipper and the high security seals on the container were subsequently found missing. Although the defendants were not positively identified as involved on the prior occasion, circumstantial evidence supported that inference, and the prior acts showed a modus operandi probative of the defendants' knowledge and intent in the charged incident.

[hh] Rule 404(b) -- Motive

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Arson

United States v. Varoudakis, 233 F.3d 113 (1st Cir. 2000) : The Court reversed a defendant's convictions for arson and conspiracy to commit arson arising from the burning of his restaurant, finding error in the admission, to prove motive, of evidence that the defendant burned a leased car 16 months earlier. In this case, the argument that the car fire testimony was probative of a motive to burn the restaurant impermissibly "involve[d] an inference of propensity as 'a necessary link in the inferential chain.' "

Underwood v. Colonial Penn Ins. Co., 888 F.2d 588 (8th Cir. 1989) : The Court held in an action on a fire insurance policy that a sheriff was properly permitted to testify that the insured refused to take a polygraph test in connection with a claim that personal property had been stolen, as the sheriff's suspicions implicit in the request may have provided a motive for arson and the evidence impeached the insured's testimony that he had cooperated and had no reason not to cooperate in the theft investigation.

United States v. Buchanan, 787 F.2d 477 (10th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed a conviction for unregistered firearm possession and conspiracy, finding that evidence of the defendant's prior hostility toward the victim of an arson was relevant to prove motive.

Glados, Inc. v. Reliance Ins. Co., 888 F.2d 1309 (11th Cir. 1987) , modified (11th Cir. 1989): In an action by a restaurant owner on a fire insurance policy, the plaintiff attempted to rebut an arson defense by evidence that the prior owner had retained an interest as an insured party and by showing similar fires at two other restaurants in which the prior owner had also retained a similar interest. The Court held that this evidence was properly admitted as relevant to whether the third party had a motive to set the fire. In Aetna Cas. & Sur. Co. v. Gosdin, n234 the Court reversed a judgment for the insurer in a dispute with its insured concerning the cause of a fire. Although it upheld the introduction of motive evidence that the insured had been charged with burglary and needed money to mount a defense, the Court held that evidence of pimping, pandering, and drug charges was unduly prejudicial. In United States v. Kerr, n235 the Court affirmed fraud convictions arising out of a scheme to burn two businesses to collect insurance. It found that evidence that one defendant, a pharmacist, engaged in irregular activities in the dispensing of drugs was admissible to prove a motive for the scheme. A strong dissent argued that the other act evidence was probative only of character and should have been excluded.

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Motive -- Assault, Homicide, Kidnapping, etc.

United States v. Wilson, 160 F.3d 732 (D.C. Cir. 1998) : James Wilson was charged with a postal robbery on the basis of information from a witness who had worn a wire while imprisoned with James. The government turned the tape and a transcript over to James' attorney, who improperly disclosed at least parts to James' wife and his brother Ralph. The tape revealed that the key witness was Leroy Copeland; Ralph and another brother began looking for Copeland, and when they found him, murdered him. On trial for murdering a government witness, the brothers objected that it was improper to admit the whole tape, which, inter alia, described the Wilson family as a "family-run organized gang," because the tape was unduly prejudicial in disclosing other crimes. The Court found that by identifying Copeland for the brothers, the tape was relevant to motive, and although it did convey an unsavory impression of the family, the portions that Ralph might not have heard did not substantially magnify the unfavorable light cast by the portions proved to have been played for him.

United States v. Bufalino, 683 F.2d 639 (2d Cir. 1982) : The Court upheld a conviction for conspiracy to violate civil rights, finding that the Trial Judge properly admitted a tape recording of an extortion attempt for which the defendant had previously been convicted, where the victim was the person whose civil rights the defendant was charged with conspiring to violate and the tape tended to show a motive for the conspiracy.

United States v. Sriyuth, 98 F.3d 739 (3d Cir. 1996) : The Court held, in a kidnapping prosecution arising out of a purported arranged marriage between Laotians, that evidence the defendant had raped the victim was probative of the defendant's motive for the kidnapping and of the victim's lack of consent. The probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice.

United States v. Higgs, 353 F.3d 281 (4th Cir. 2003) : The Court affirmed a conviction for murder and related offenses, holding that evidence of a bank fraud scheme involving the defendant was properly admitted to prove motive, since there was evidence that the defendant was concerned about the possibility that the murder victims might implicate him in the scheme. In United States v. Russell, 971 F.2d 1098 (4th Cir. 1992) , the Court affirmed a murder conviction in a case in which no body or murder weapon was ever found, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the defendant's less-than-honorable discharge from the Marine Corps and of his extramarital affairs, as the defendant may have seen the victim, his ex-wife and a Marine officer, as a symbol of an institution he had come to resent. In United States v. Lewis, n236 the Court affirmed a hospital patient's conviction for assaulting a fellow patient, holding that evidence of a prior altercation between the two patients was admissible as motive evidence. In Roshan v. Fard, n237 the Court reversed a judgment for a plaintiff suing for injuries suffered in a fight. The defendant's evidence establishing that he had been an informant for the government and had supplied information that led to the conviction of the plaintiff should have been admitted to show a motive for the plaintiff to attack him, since it could not be said that the prejudicial effect of the evidence substantially outweighed its probative value.

United States v. Benton, 637 F.2d 1052 (5th Cir. 1981) : In a prosecution charging the defendant with involvement in killing a fellow prison inmate, the Court upheld the admission of evidence that the defendant was involved in several murders of which the victim allegedly had knowledge.

United States v. Garcia-Meza, 403 F.3d 364 (6th Cir. 2005) : The Court held that evidence that the defendant had five months earlier assaulted his wife because of jealousy when she had talked to a former boyfriend was properly admitted as probative of motive in his trial for murdering his wife. In United States v. Vance, n238 the Court held that prior bad acts by the defendant were admissible to show a motive to assist the wife of a convicted drug dealer in the murder of a state prosecutor.

United States v. Bogan, 267 F.3d 614 (7th Cir. 2001) : The Court affirmed convictions of inmates for assaulting a corrections officer, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the officer had seized intoxicants from their cell before the beating. The evidence that the officer had disrupted their illegal wine-making activities tended to prove a motive for the assault. In a prosecution for arson resulting in the deaths of the defendant's two children, United States v. Menzer, 29 F.3d 1223 (7th Cir. 1994) , the Court held that evidence that the defendant was on probation for a 1986 conviction for sexual exploitation of a child was "intricately related" to the charged offense because it was the government's theory that the defendant burned down the house where his wife and children were sleeping in order to prevent their reporting his sexual abuse of the children, which would result in revocation of his probation. In our view, this was other crime evidence admissible under the Rule to prove motive, and the Court's characterization of it as "intricately related" (and therefore outside the Rule) is unnecessarily confusing, especially given the Court's conclusion that there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence "because it was intricately related to the arson prosecution as probative evidence of Menzer's intent (motive)." In United States v. Hattaway, n239 the Court, upholding kidnapping convictions, found that evidence of the murder of the victim's boyfriend was properly admitted to show a motive for the abduction.

Cerro Gordo Charity v. Fireman's Fund Am. Life Ins. Co., 819 F.2d 1471 (8th Cir. 1987) : In an action to recover the proceeds of life insurance policies, the company defended on the theory that the insured's brother killed him after arranging the policies on his life. The Court affirmed the admission of evidence of numerous other life insurance policies covering the insured, as tending to show a motive for murder. In United States v. Turpin, n240 the Court affirmed a conviction for attempting to make railroad facilities hazardous. It found that evidence that the defendant had killed a man was properly admitted, since the government alleged that the defendant placed the man's body in a car at a railroad crossing in the hope that the car would be demolished and the cause of the man's death hidden. See also United States v. Wagoner n241(evidence of involvement in an auto theft ring was properly admitted to show a motive for participation in a scheme to bomb a state trooper's car); United States v. Gomez n242(proof that the defendant, convicted of aiding and abetting a kidnapping, asked the kidnapper to commit another violent act was admissible as evidence of the defendant's motive to gain custody of his son from his estranged wife).

United States v. Santiago, 46 F.3d 885 (9th Cir. 1995) : Affirming a conviction for murder of a fellow prisoner, the Court held that evidence of the defendant's affiliation with the Mexican Mafia, a prison gang, was properly admitted, where the evidence showed that the defendant committed the murder in order to gain entry into the gang. The gang-related evidence "was necessary to explain the reason that Santiago would kill a stranger -- to be accepted into the gang -- and to show how and why other inmates assisted him in obtaining the weapon." In United States v. Brown, n243 the Court reversed murder and firearm convictions, finding that evidence of the defendant's attempt seven years earlier to recover his property at gunpoint and his shooting into a home was inadmissible in a prosecution for shooting a mail carrier as she delivered mail to his parents' home. The government had said the evidence showed that the motive behind the killing was the defendant's desire to obtain the thrill he received from creating violence. In United States v. Bowman, n244 the Court sustained a conviction for assault, finding that evidence of the defendant's earlier assault conviction was properly admitted to show his motive for attacking the victim in this case. The government contended that the defendant believed that the victim was responsible for his earlier conviction. See also United States v. Bradshaw n245(upholding a kidnapping conviction, and finding that evidence as to the defendant's sexual activity with the kidnapped child was relevant to show a motive for the kidnapping).

United States v. Morris, 287 F.3d 985 (10th Cir. 2002) : Affirming convictions for assaulting an FBI undercover agent and attempted escape, the Court held that the defendant's statement to the FBI in which he said that a friend told him that the FBI was looking for him in connection with a murder and that he decided not to turn himself in because he had been incarcerated before and did not want to return to prison was admissible to prove motive to flee arrest and to use deadly force. In United States v. Buchanan, n246 the Court affirmed a conviction for unregistered firearm possession and conspiracy, finding that evidence of the defendant's prior hostility toward the victim of an arson was relevant to prove motive. In United States v. Franklin, n247 the Court affirmed a conviction for killing two black men for using a public facility, holding that a prior racial incident involving the defendant was properly admitted to prove a racial motive for the killings.

United States v. Abraham, 386 F.3d 1033 (11th Cir. 2004) (per curiam): The defendant was convicted for kidnapping a postal worker as a means to secure entry into his girlfriend's home. Affirming, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting that the defendant had previously assaulted his girlfriend and had threatened her mother and sister with a gun in an attempt to gain entry to her home. The evidence was admissible not to prove the defendant's character, "but his motive, intent, or lack of mistake."

[iii] Rule 404(b) -- Motive -- Civil Rights Cases

United States v. Bradley, 390 F.3d 145 (1st Cir. 2004) : The defendants were convicted for forced labor offenses after they lured Jamaican laborers to New Hampshire through fraud, mistreated them during their employ, and coerced them to stay. Most of the charges related to workers during the 2001 season. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence relating to the defendants' treatment of Jamaican laborers brought in during the 2000 season. Evidence that one of the earlier workers fled and was pursued by threats and that his compatriot's passport was then seized gave "a malign motive for, and provide[d] the context of," the seizure of the victims' passports in 2001 and of threats made to them based on a defendant's supposed intention to "destroy" a former worker. In Bowden v. McKenna, n248 the Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiffs in a civil rights action arising out of an incident in which two policemen fatally shot a robbery suspect, holding that the defendants should have been permitted to offer identification testimony to establish that the suspect committed the robbery, as this might have established the suspect's motive to resist and thus might have corroborated the officers' story.

United States v. Bufalino, 683 F.2d 639 (2d Cir. 1982) : The Court upheld a conviction for conspiracy to violate civil rights, finding that the Trial Judge properly admitted a tape recording of an extortion attempt for which the defendant had previously been convicted, where the victim was the person whose civil rights the defendant was charged with conspiring to violate and the tape tended to show a motive for the conspiracy.

Hitt v. Connell, 301 F.3d 240 (5th Cir. 2002) : In a civil rights action by a deputy constable who was discharged for his union activity, an associational right protected by the First Amendment, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the constable took disciplinary action against other deputies for their union activities. The evidence was admissible as proof of the constable's motive in firing the plaintiff and to impeach the constable's statements that he was "a union man" and had no animus against the union.

Hernandez v. Cepeda, 860 F.2d 260 (7th Cir. 1988) : In an arrestee's civil rights action against police officers, the Court held that evidence that the arrest was for rape and aggravated kidnapping was admissible to prove the plaintiff's motive to resist arrest.

United States v. Franklin, 704 F.2d 1183 (10th Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed a conviction for killing two black men for using a public facility, holding that a prior racial incident involving the defendant was properly admitted to prove a racial motive for the killings.

[iv] Rule 404(b) -- Motive -- Drug Activity

United States v. Masse, 816 F.2d 805 (1st Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed a cocaine distribution conviction, holding that evidence that the defendant was in possession of cocaine while on bail for the charges on which he was convicted in this case was properly admitted to prove a drug habit and to establish a motive for distributing drugs. See also United States v. Kadouh, 768 F.2d 20 (1st Cir. 1985) (the defendant's use of cocaine was admissible to show a motive for him to become involved in drug activity).

United States v. Cruz, 326 F.3d 392 (3d Cir. 2003) : Affirming a conviction for distributing cocaine base, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant was on parole at the time, since his parole status was relevant to explain why he used codefendants to perform the hand-to-hand street transactions.

United States v. Baptiste, 264 F.3d 578 (5th Cir. 2001) , modified on other grounds, 309 F.3d 274 (5th Cir. 2002) : Upholding the convictions of defendants for a drug trafficking conspiracy and weapons offenses, the Court held that evidence of uncharged murders and attempted murders of rival gang members was relevant to prove that defendants were trying to protect their drug conspiracy.

United States v. Cunningham, 103 F.3d 553 (7th Cir. 1996) : A nurse was convicted for tampering with syringes by replacing Demerol with a saline solution. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the nurse's license had four years earlier been suspended as a result of Demerol addiction and her theft of Demerol from another hospital. The addiction provided a motive for the charged tampering, and the suspension provided essential context for evidence that she had previously falsified drug test results, which had permitted her to continue to work as a nurse, with access to Demerol. In United States v. Troop, n249 to show the defendant's motive to participate in the charged conspiracy to sell cocaine, the Court held there was no error in admitting evidence that he previously worked at a drug house where he skimmed cocaine for his personal use off large amounts of the drug before they were sold.

United States v. Galyen, 798 F.2d 331 (8th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed a conviction for obtaining a controlled substance by misrepresentation and for possession with intent to distribute, holding that evidence suggesting that the defendant was involved in drug dealing was admissible to prove a motive for using misrepresentations to obtain controlled substances.

United States v. Palmer, 3 F.3d 300 (9th Cir. 1993) : Affirming a conviction for manufacturing marijuana plants, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit the defendant's postarraignment statement to law enforcement officials that "I don't want any deals. I have been through this before. I just want to get it behind me." The Court rejected the government's argument that the statement, which tended to prove prior acts, was admissible to prove motive, since motive did not establish a material element of any offense charged. In United States v. Saniti, n250 the Court held that evidence that a bank robbery defendant had a $250 a day drug habit was properly admitted to show his motive for robbery.

United States v. Becker, 230 F.3d 1224 (10th Cir. 2000) : Although the Court affirmed convictions for manufacturing metamphetamine, it found error in the admission, to prove motive and intent, of evidence that the defendant was previously convicted of drug offenses and that evidence of drug-related items were found in a prior raid on his home. The prior acts were removed in time (his convictions were six years old and the raid was four years old) and involved possession and distribution only, not manufacturing, so it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to admit the evidence.

United States v. Harrell, 737 F.2d 971 (11th Cir. 1984) : The Court found that evidence concerning a motorcycle club's way of life was admissible to prove the motive and object of a drug-trafficking conspiracy.

[v] Rule 404(b) -- Motive -- Firearms Offenses

United States v. Weems, 322 F.3d 18 (1st Cir. 2003) : In a prosecution for felon firearm possession in which a principal issue was whether the defendant possessed a firearm found in the house where was arrested, the Court held that testimony suggesting the house was used for drug dealing was relevant, since the drug dealing would give the defendant a motive to have the gun on him. In United States v. Smith, 292 F.3d 90 (1st Cir. 2002) , the Court affirmed a conviction for being a felon in possession of a firearm and ammunition. It held that evidence of the defendant's drug dealing in his apartment was probative of his constructive possession of the firearm, because it provided a motive for his possession. The Court distinguished its decision in United States v. Currier, 821 F.2d 52 (1st Cir. 1987) , which found error in admission of statements by the defendant regarding Valium when the defendant did not argue that the gun belonged to someone else in the apartment and narcotics evidence was therefore only "marginally relevant" on issues of possession.

United States v. Pelusio, 725 F.2d 161 (2d Cir. 1983) : In a prosecution for unlawful receipt of firearms, the Court found that the government properly cross-examined a defendant about whether the defendant's brother had been shot by someone connected with organized crime, whether the defendant had been involved in gambling, and whether he had heard there was a contract out on him. The questions were relevant to proving a motive for receiving a firearm.

United States v. Hatfield, 815 F.2d 1068 (6th Cir. 1987) : The Court upheld the admission of evidence of burglary paraphernalia seized from a defendant charged with being a felon in possession of a firearm. The defendant had denied knowledge of the presence of the gun, and the Court found that the burglary evidence was relevant to show that the defendant had a motive to possess a gun.

United States v. Joy, 192 F.3d 761 (7th Cir. 1999) : In a felon firearm possession case, the Court held that a tape of a 911 call made by the defendant's brother, indicating that the defendant was brandishing a gun and had just committed some burglaries, was properly admitted. That evidence was relevant to prove that he had a motive for possessing a gun. In a prosecution for possession of an unregistered machine gun and silencer, United States v. Taylor, n251 the Court found that other evidence discovered in a search of the appellant's residence -- cocaine, other weapons, stereo and video equipment without serial numbers, and fur and leather jackets without labels -- was properly admitted to show a motive for possession of the machine gun and silencer.

United States v. Conrad, 320 F.3d 851 (8th Cir. 2003) : The Court reversed a conviction for possession of an unregistered firearm, but held that it was not an abuse of discretion to admit evidence of the defendant's drug use, after the defendant testified that he did not have exclusive control over the residence where the gun was found and that the gun did not belong to him. The Court stated that it had "serious reservations about whether the possession of drug paraphernalia without evidence of drug trafficking is admissible to show possession of an illegal weapon," but found itself bound by United States v. Fuller, 887 F.2d 144 (8th Cir. 1989) , which concluded that evidence of drug paraphernalia was admissible to prove motive to possess a firearm. See also United States v. Claybourne, 415 F.3d 790 (8th Cir. 2005) (evidence of drug paraphernalia admissible in felon firearm possession case to show motive to possess a firearm). In United States v. Jordan, n252 the Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, holding that there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the defendant possessed $3,900 at the time of his arrest, as it was probative of motive for possession of a weapon, which the government had to prove. In United States v. Moore, n253 the Court noted that it was improper for the prosecutor to argue in closing that a defendant, charged with illegal possession of firearms, had shotguns in his possession because he was involved with drugs. "The fact that the defendant possessed drugs does not necessarily make it likely that the guns found during the raid were his."

United States v. Collins, 90 F.3d 1420 (9th Cir. 1996) : The Court affirmed a firearm conviction, holding that evidence that the defendant was acting as a lookout for a burglary was properly admitted to show why he would want a gun, and to rebut the defendant's evidence that he was in the neighborhood for dancing.

[vi] Rule 404(b) -- Motive -- Fraud, False Statements, etc.

United States v. Sebaggala, 256 F.3d 59 (1st Cir. 2001) : Affirming a Ugandan national's conviction for making false statements to Customs regarding monetary instruments he was carrying, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the mass of checks that the defendant was carrying. The fact that the checks were stolen or altered was probative of the defendant's motive for trying to conceal his possession from the authorities and thus of his scienter.

United States v. Birney, 686 F.2d 102 (2d Cir. 1982) : The Court upheld a conviction for making false entries in bank records, finding that evidence that the defendant had embezzled money was properly admitted to show a motive for the falsification. See also United States v. Sliker n254(evidence of the defendant's loansharking was admissible to show a motive for defrauding a bank).

United States v. Aramony, 88 F.3d 1369 (4th Cir. 1996) : The Court affirmed in part the fraud conviction of the former CEO of United Way of America, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the defendant's sexual advances toward female employees. The evidence was relevant to motive, as it tended to prove that he defrauded UWA in order to seek sexual pleasure at no financial cost to himself, and it presented no risk of unfair prejudice, particularly since the Trial Judge excluded the "gory details" and gave a cautionary instruction.

United States v. Cordell, 912 F.2d 769 (5th Cir. 1990) : The Court held that evidence that the defendant bank official had previously violated lending limits was properly admitted in a prosecution for making false entries in bank records to show his motivation for concealing the lending violations involved in the case.

United States v. Mullins, 22 F.3d 1365 (6th Cir. 1994) : In a prosecution for obstruction of justice arising from the alteration of logbooks for police aircraft that had been subpoenaed by the grand jury, the Court held that evidence of kickbacks and unauthorized use of the airplanes was relevant to the defendant's motive to suppress information. In United States v. Tager, n255 the Court affirmed fraud convictions arising out of securities transactions, holding that evidence of an unpaid tax judgment against the defendant exceeding $500,000 was properly admitted to prove motive.

United States v. Kosth, 257 F.3d 712 (7th Cir. 2001) : Affirming convictions for making false statements in connection with Small Business Administration loans, the Court held that it was proper to admit evidence of the defendant's prior conviction and the terms of his supervised release to show his motive for establishing a sham ownership arrangement with his wife and for lying on his SBA loan application. In United States v. O'Brien, 119 F.3d 523 (7th Cir. 1997) , the Court affirmed a fraud conviction, holding that testimony concerning the defendant's diversion of insurance proceeds from business to personal use was properly admitted to prove motive, not to prove a propensity to defraud. In United States v. Shriver, n256 a prosecution for making false statements to a bank, the Court held that evidence that the defendant defaulted on a franchise agreement was properly admitted to prove a motive for making the false statements. The Court noted that "similarity is not an appropriate requirement" for other acts used to prove motive.

United States v. Sandow, 78 F.3d 388 (8th Cir. 1996) : The defendant, an insurance agent and broker, was tried on two fraud charges, one arising out of his inducing a customer in 1990 to pledge an annuity and the other arising out of a 1991-93 scheme to collect premiums without providing insurance. The Court held that evidence of judgments outstanding against the defendant in 1990 was relevant to motive in the annuity pledge case; in the insurance fraud case, admission of the evidence was error, but harmless. In United States v. Conners, n257 the Court affirmed convictions for bank fraud and embezzlement, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of frauds against another bank, as the circumstances were probative of motive because they showed the defendant's need for a large amount of money. In United States v. Galyen, n258 the Court affirmed a conviction for obtaining a controlled substance by misrepresentation and for possession with intent to distribute, holding that evidence suggesting that the defendant was involved in drug dealing was admissible to prove a motive for using misrepresentations to obtain controlled substances. See also United States v. Poston n259(evidence of a "check kite" scheme was admissible in a prosecution for misapplication of federally insured funds as tending to prove motive; the misapplication would have covered the amount of the "kited" check).

United States v. Wales, 977 F.2d 1323 (9th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed the defendant's conviction for making a false declaration to Customs about the amount of currency he was carrying, holding that evidence he attempted after his arrest to clean out his safe deposit box before the government could examine its contents was clearly an attempt to conceal the $150,000 in gold coins there, which was consistent with the government's theory that he had as a motive for submitting a false declaration concealing his assets and avoiding an explanation of their source. See also United States v. Conners n260(in a prosecution for currency violations, the defendant's cocaine activities tended to supply a motive for concealing money). In United States v. Brown, n261 a bank fraud prosecution, the Court held that evidence that the recipient of funds illegally channeled through a defendant shortly thereafter served as a similar illegal conduit of funds to the defendant was properly admitted as tending to show why the defendant participated in the charged transaction.

United States v. Key, 76 F.3d 350 (11th Cir. 1996) : The Court held that evidence of outstanding judgments was admissible in a fraud prosecution as demonstrating the defendant's motive to lie about his identity in making a loan application; people against whom large and still enforceable judgments are outstanding are unlikely to be extended credit. In United States v. Kerr, n262 the Court affirmed fraud convictions arising out of a scheme to burn two businesses to collect insurance. It found that evidence that one defendant, a pharmacist, engaged in irregular activities in the dispensing of drugs was admissible to prove a motive for the scheme. A strong dissent argued that the other act evidence was probative only of character and should have been excluded.

[vii] Rule 404(b) -- Motive -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Lamberty, 778 F.2d 59 (1st Cir. 1985) : The Court reversed a postmaster's conviction for opening another person's package, finding that the government improperly elicited testimony that the postmaster was suspected of taking packages from the post office. The motive of the investigators was not relevant to the prosecution's case.

United States v. Fakhoury, 819 F.2d 1415 (7th Cir. 1987) : The Court found a prosecutor's closing argument to have been "reprehensible" (but not plain error) in its prejudicial and inflammatory use of other act evidence that had been admitted to prove motive. Rather than arguing simply about motive, the prosecutor made broadside attacks on the defendant's character.

United States v. Palmer, 3 F.3d 300 (9th Cir. 1993) : Affirming a conviction for manufacturing marijuana plants, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit the defendant's postarraignment statement to law enforcement officials that "I don't want any deals. I have been through this before. I just want to get it behind me." The Court rejected the government's argument that the statement, which tended to prove prior acts, was admissible to prove motive, since motive did not establish a material element of any offense charged.

United States v. Martinez, 890 F.2d 1088 (10th Cir. 1989) : The Court held, in a prosecution for knowingly failing to surrender for service of sentence, that evidence of the defendant's prior conviction and subsequent indictment for cocaine trafficking was relevant to his motive to commit the offense and that an instruction to consider it only for that purpose meant that the potential prejudice did not substantially outweigh the probative value of the evidence.

[viii] Rule 404(b) -- Motive -- Obstruction of Justice and Perjury

United States v. Freeman, 208 F.3d 332 (1st Cir. 2000) : In the trial of a police officer on charges of witness tampering and of conspiring to take bribes from the owner of a striptease club, the prosecution introduced evidence of the defendant's "bad acts" at the club, including excessive drinking, invading the dancers' dressing room, and erupting in fits of violence. The Court held that the evidence was relevant to the witness-tampering charge because it showed the defendant was aware of the illegality of the conspiracy or extortion in which he was engaged at the club, and thus had a motive for witness tampering.

United States v. Willoughby, 860 F.2d 15 (2d Cir. 1988) : Affirming convictions for conspiracy to obstruct justice and witness tampering, the Court held that evidence of a robbery by the defendants demonstrated a motive to prevent witnesses from testifying at the robbery trial. In United States v. Bufalino, n263 the Court upheld a conviction for conspiracy to violate civil rights, finding that the Trial Judge properly admitted a tape recording of an extortion attempt for which the defendant had previously been convicted, where the victim was the person whose civil rights the defendant was charged with conspiring to violate and the tape tended to show a motive for the conspiracy.

United States v. Ruhbayan, 406 F.3d 292 (4th Cir. 2005) : The defendant was charged with obstruction of justice after he induced his girlfriend to testify falsely in his drug trial that she, and not he, possessed a pistol found in his van. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the defendant's physical abuse of women, since it was probative of the girlfriend's motive for being willing to testify falsely at the drug trial. In United States v. Blount, 364 F.3d 173 (4th Cir. 2004) , the Court affirmed a conviction for obstruction of justice arising from the defendant's behavior during the courtroom sentencing of his mother. It found no error in admitting evidence that the defendant was forcibly escorted from the building after an encounter with the court clerk before the mother's scheduled trial, as well as evidence of the plea agreement entered into by the mother, to show the defendant's intent and motive in disrupting the court during the sentencing. In United States v. Boone, n264 the Court held that evidence of other crimes was admissible to prove the motive for the defendant's perjury.

United States v. Maggitt, 784 F.2d 590 (5th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed witness-tampering convictions as it found that one defendant's prior incarceration was admissible to prove a motive to threaten a witness. See also United States v. Chagra n265(charges of conspiracy to obstruct justice and to possess marijuana with intent to distribute were properly joined with charges involving the murder of a Federal Judge, since they related to the defendant's motive to kill the Judge and efforts to finance a jail break following the murder); United States v. Barron n266(evidence of a tax evasion scheme was admissible as proof of the motive behind the charged perjury).

United States v. Vance, 871 F.2d 572 (6th Cir. 1989) : The Court held that prior bad acts by the defendant were admissible to show a motive to assist the wife of a convicted drug dealer in the murder of a state prosecutor.

United States v. Wagoner, 713 F.2d 1371 (8th Cir. 1983) : The Court held that evidence of the defendant's involvement in an auto theft ring was properly admitted to show a motive for participating in the charged scheme to bomb a state trooper's car.

[ix] Rule 404(b) -- Motive -- Terrorism Cases

United States v. Yousef, 327 F.3d 56 (2d Cir. 2003) : In a prosecution for a conspiracy to bomb United States commercial airliners in southeast Asia and for crimes relating to the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center, the Court held that a letter found in one defendant's apartment that contained evidence of uncharged and unrelated crimes and threats against other countries was strong evidence of motive.

[x] Rule 404(b) -- Motive -- Theft, Robbery, and Stolen Property Offenses

United States v. LaFlam, 369 F.3d 153 (2d Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed convictions for bank robbery and witness tampering, holding that evidence of the defendant's drug use and drug debts was properly introduced to prove motive: "LaFlam concedes that because the identity of the bank robber was in dispute, evidence establishing that he had a motive to commit those robberies was material and relevant."

United States v. Madden, 38 F.3d 747 (4th Cir. 1994) : The Court reversed a conviction for bank robbery because the prosecution was erroneously allowed to call a witness to testify to the defendant's use of cocaine. Although the government conceded that the defendant and his wife were gainfully employed, it argued that the defendant's cocaine use was probative of motive because it tended to establish his financial need. The Court responded that "it is not drug use per se that supports the underlying inference of financial need that makes the evidence relevant . . ., but rather a demonstration by the government both that the accused has a significant drug habit or addiction and that he did not have the financial means to support it that makes such evidence of drug use relevant to establish a motive." Here, the government had introduced "highly imprecise evidence of drug usage with no corresponding evidence of financial need."

United States v. Smith, 605 F.2d 839 (5th Cir. 1979) : The Court held that evidence of prior convictions and an impending prison sentence were properly introduced to show a defendant's motive in dealing with cars with the intent not to pay for them.

United States v. Swan, 250 F.3d 495 (7th Cir. 2001) : In a case involving financial crimes, the Court found it error (but harmless) to admit evidence of the defendant's gambling activity as proof of motive. "[T]he fact that Swan gambled did little to explain why he wanted to steal money. Most people want money for a variety of reasons, and the government did not attempt to show any special circumstances such as a large gambling debt hanging over Swan's head that would have provided him with a particularly weighty motive to steal." In United States v. Brooks, 125 F.3d 484 (7th Cir. 1997) , the Court affirmed convictions for bank robbery, finding no error in the admission of evidence that the defendants used crack cocaine and that their desire to obtain more crack motivated the bank robbery. The Court held that the evidence was probative of motive, and that there was no abuse of discretion in determining that the prejudicial effect of the evidence did not substantially outweigh its probative value. In United States v. Cunningham, n267 a nurse was convicted for tampering with syringes in a hospital by replacing Demerol with a saline solution. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the nurse's license had four years earlier been suspended as a result of Demerol addiction and her theft of Demerol from another hospital. The addiction provided a motive for the charged tampering, and the suspension provided essential context for evidence that she had previously falsified drug test results, which had permitted her to continue to work as a nurse, with access to Demerol. In United States v. Holt, n268 the Court affirmed a defendant's convictions for masterminding a bank robbery. It found that evidence of his thefts of checks was admissible to prove financial problems that provided a motive for the robbery. In United States v. Cyphers, n269 a bank robbery case, the Court held it was proper to admit testimony that a defendant asked a government informer to purchase $1,000 worth of heroin for him shortly after a robbery occurred, since the testimony was offered to show the defendant's motive for the robbery.

United States v. Sutton, 41 F.3d 1257 (8th Cir. 1994) : In a bank robbery prosecution, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit evidence of the defendant's prior drug use, dismissing the probative value of the evidence to prove motive because "it could hardly come as a surprise to the jury that Mr. Sutton was robbing a bank because he needed money for some reason." In United States v. Mays, n270 the Court upheld the introduction in a bank robbery case of evidence of another bank robbery as part of proving a motive for the crime charged. It also held, however, that it was error (but harmless) to admit evidence of a subsequent breaking and entering.

United States v. Mitchell, 172 F.3d 1104 (9th Cir. 1999) : The Court reversed a bank robbery conviction because the prosecution erroneously introduced evidence that the defendant was in very poor financial condition and unemployed at the time of the robbery. The evidence was offered under Rule 404(b) as proof of motive, but the Court found the Rule inapplicable because "[b]eing poor is not a crime, wrong, or act" within the Rule. The poverty evidence in this case was not only of negligible probative value -- "almost everyone, poor or not, has a motive to get more money[, a]nd most people, rich or poor, do not steal to get it" -- but it also produced a high danger of unfair prejudice when the prosecutor effectively portrayed the defendant as both poor and feckless, not supporting his wife and children. In United States v. Labansat, 94 F.3d 527 (9th Cir. 1996) , the Court held it was error (but not plain error) to admit evidence of drugs found in the defendant's possession when arrested, as evidence of his motive for committing bank robberies. In the absence of a showing that he was addicted to or habitually used drugs, the evidence by itself was insufficient to support an inference of financial need creating a motive to rob a bank. In United States v. Feldman, n271 the Court, affirming a bank robbery conviction, upheld the admission of testimony offered to prove motive that a defendant was living beyond his means and owed money.

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Multiple Permissible Uses

United States v. Stevens, 303 F.3d 711 (6th Cir. 2002) : Affirming convictions for arson and related offenses, the Court held that there was no plain error in the admission of evidence of the defendant's involvement in two prior arsons or in an instruction to the jury that the evidence was admitted to assist them "in deciding the defendant's intent, motive, knowledge, and whether the fire was an accident." The defendant claimed on appeal that the evidence was only relevant to prove intent, so admission for other reasons was error. The Court concluded that "[w]here a single, legitimate purpose supports the admission of the evidence under Rule 404(b), a trial court's admission of that evidence for additional reasons allowed under the rule does not constitute plain error."

[jj] Rule 404(b) -- Notice of Intention To Introduce Evidence

United States v. Watson, 409 F.3d 458 (D.C. Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed weapons and drug convictions, finding no abuse of discretion when the government was permitted to offer evidence concerning the defendant's prior acts. A week before trial, the government warned in a status conference that it would offer the testimony of a cooperating witness, but it did not state the witness's name or the facts and circumstances of the testimony. Following voir dire (48 hours before the witness was scheduled to testify), the prosecutor turned over a large amount of information about the witness to defense counsel. The Court noted that Rule 404(b) requires only that the prosecutor provide notice as to the "general nature" of the bad act evidence, and it held that the defendant had not shown any prejudice from the notice given.

United States v. Tuesta-Toro, 29 F.3d 771 (1st Cir. 1994) : The Court affirmed a drug trafficking conviction, holding that the defendant had not made a cognizable Rule 404(b) request with a motion calling for "confessions, admissions and statements ... that in any way exculpate, inculpate or refer to the defendant." At a minimum the defense must present a timely request sufficiently clear and particular to fairly alert the prosecution that the defense is invoking its specific right to pretrial notification of the general nature of all Rule 404(b) evidence the prosecution intends to introduce.

United States v. Tomblin, 46 F.3d 1369 (5th Cir. 1995) : The Court held, in a prosecution for bribery and extortion, that the government was not required to comply with the notice requirement of Rule 404(b) when it cross-examined the defendant about alleged acts of fraud, bribery, and embezzlement, as the acts were probative of his character for truthfulness and the questions were permissible under Rule 608(b).

United States v. Holmes, 111 F.3d 463 (6th Cir. 1997) : Affirming a fraud conviction, the Court found no violation of the Rule 404(b) notice requirement where the government informed the defense of its intent to offer Rule 404(b) evidence during the trial. The government made a reasonable argument that the evidence concerned acts intrinsic to the crime charged, so it was unclear whether Rule 404(b) was even applicable; furthermore, the witness presenting the evidence had been mentioned by the prosecution during voir dire, and the Trial Judge had postponed the witness' testimony for five days to give the defense time to prepare. In United States v. Barnes, 49 F.3d 1144 (6th Cir. 1995) , the Court affirmed drug and firearms convictions, finding it "questionable" whether the defendant's request for a list of government witnesses and their anticipated testimony was sufficiently specific to trigger the notice requirement with respect to a witness who was discovered during the course of the trial. While not insisting on a request that specifically cites Rule 404(b), the Court declared that it is "prudent for defense counsel to include a reference to Rule 404(b) in the boiler-plate request for discovery under Fed. R. Crim. P. 16." If the defense has made a proper request at the outset, the government has a continuing obligation to provide notice of Rule 404(b) evidence. In United States v. French, n272 the Court, affirming convictions for marijuana offenses, found timely notice of other crimes evidence where counsel was told a week before trial, giving ample opportunity to prepare for the damaging consequences of the evidence. Furthermore, there had been no motion to continue.

United States v. Smith, 383 F.3d 700 (8th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed a drug conviction, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting rebuttal testimony about other drug transactions with the defendant. The Court found good cause for the failure to give pretrial notice of the evidence, which had been obtained in a separate investigation, because the government did not become aware the evidence was relevant until testimony was offered regarding an alias used by the defendant. At that point the government immediately notified defense counsel and provided an opportunity to question the witness. In a drug case, United States v. Green, 275 F.3d 694 (8th Cir. 2001) , the Court held that the defendant received reasonable pretrial notice regarding the intended use of an arrest. The government provided a printout of the defendant's criminal record that included the arrest four months prior to trial; a week before trial it supplemented the printout with information about the disposition of the arrest that had just become available and notified counsel of its intent to introduce the arrest under Rule 404(b). We note that generally the mere fact of an arrest is not sufficient to warrant admission of other act evidence. Affirming cocaine convictions in United States v. Robinson, n273 the Court held that the government had given adequate Rule 404(b) notice when it disclosed that it would offer evidence that the defendant was in possession of cocaine base on two specific dates but did not indicate the details that would be elicited. In a bank fraud case, United States v. Swinton, n274 the Court held that the government had not given proper notice when, in response to a request for disclosure of Rule 404(b) material, it responded that its files were open and the Rule 404(b) evidence could be found in those files. The Court stated that "making available mountains of documents without specifying which will likely be submitted has elements of unfairness causing needless expense to the defendant." The error was harmless, however. In United States v. Sutton, n275 the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excusing the government's late notification of its intent to offer evidence of the defendant's prior narcotics use in a prosecution for bank robbery. Although the defendant received this notice only two days before trial, the government had discovered the evidence only five days before trial, on a Friday. Also, the government had given a month's notice of its intent to introduce evidence regarding a narcotics transaction on the day of the robbery, so "the defendant was on notice that his involvement with drugs would be an issue at the trial and had adequate time to prepare for this type of evidence." In United States v. Kern, n276 the Court affirmed bank robbery convictions, holding there was adequate notice of a prior robbery where the government informed the defendants at a hearing before the Magistrate Judge more than two weeks before the trial that it might use evidence from some local robberies and provided the defendants with state reports concerning these robberies approximately a week before trial.

United States v. Ramirez-Lopez, 315 F.3d 1143 (9th Cir. 2003) : In a trial for alien smuggling, the government elicited from a prosecution witness that just before he began to testify, the defendant made a threatening gesture by moving his finger back and forth, indicating that the witness was not to say anything. Holding it was error (but not plain error) when the government failed to give notice as required under Rule 404(b) of its intent to elicit the threat evidence, the Court rejected the argument that the threat was not Rule 404(b) evidence because it was "inextricably intertwined," since a threat at trial cannot be viewed as inextricably intertwined with the charged offense of alien smuggling.

United States v. Kravchuk, 335 F.3d 1147 (10th Cir. 2003) : In a prosecution for theft from an ATM machine, the government's evidence showed that the defendant and others had removed an ATM machine from a mall and had attempted to remove another from a convenience store before they committed the charged crime. The Court held that there was no violation of Rule 404(b)'s notice requirement when one of the co-participants unexpectedly testified that the defendant threatened to kill them if they ever spoke of the crimes they committed with him. Because the government did not intend to offer this evidence and did not know about it, it could not give notice. In United States v. Lopez-Gutierrez, 83 F.3d 1235 (10th Cir. 1996) , the Court affirmed a drug conviction, holding that the government was properly permitted to offer evidence about an uncharged marijuana transaction, even though the defendant did not receive notice of this evidence until after the start of the trial. The required good cause for excusing pretrial notice was that the government was not made aware of the evidence until an interview with one of its witnesses the night before trial. The defendant was notified the next day, and the witness was made available to the defense before the evidence was put before the jury.

United States v. Carrasco, 381 F.3d 1237 (11th Cir. 2004) : Reversing a cocaine-related conviction on the ground that the government's failure to give notice of its intent to rely upon prior acts of drug dealing was prejudicial, the Court interpreted Rule 404(b) as requiring the government to provide notice of all prior act evidence it intended to use, even in rebuttal. The defendant testified that he had gone to meet with a codefendant because he was concerned that the codefendant had a drug problem and he wanted to help; the government responded with evidence that the codefendant had past dealings with the defendant and had "fronted" drugs to him for distribution. This evidence "went to the heart of Carrasco's defense, his intent," and "[t]he Government's failure to provide the required Rule 404(b) notice therefore prejudiced Carrasco's ability to defend himself." Affirming drug convictions in United States v. Lampley, 68 F.3d 1296 (11th Cir. 1995) , the Court held that under Rule 404(b) the government need only give notice of the "general nature" of prior bad acts, and that the notice requirement is not violated simply because a witness' testimony adds or changes certain details. In United States v. Perez-Tosta, n277 the Court affirmed drug convictions, holding that notice of prior bad acts given to a defendant just before voir dire was timely, where the prosecution did not learn of the evidence until the preceding business day, and the defense had six days after the notice until the evidence was offered and could point to no specific actions that might have been taken with more preparation time, and the evidence was significant to the government's case.

[kk] Rule 404(b) -- Opportunity To Rebut Likely Jury Speculation

United States v. Bailey, 319 F.3d 514 (D.C. Cir. 2003) : In a prosecution for conspiring to distribute cocaine, the government offered evidence of the defendant's uncharged drug deals, including two specific episodes in New York. The Court held that it was error (but harmless) to preclude the defendant from eliciting testimony that he had not yet been tried for the New York offenses. The defendant argued that because the government elicited testimony from the arresting officers in New York, the jury would infer that he had been convicted. The Court noted that it "can find no case directly holding that evidence is relevant solely to refute a likely mistaken jury inference," but cited some cases "where that appears to be the dominant purpose." Ultimately, it wrote, "[w]e think that if the jury inference is plausible, evidence to rebut that inference is relevant."

[ll] Rule 404(b) -- Plain Error To Admit

United States v. Moore, 375 F.3d 259 (3d Cir. 2004) : Reversing arson and firearm convictions, the Court made a rare finding of plain error, after the prosecution had offered evidence that the defendant was physically violent with his ex-girlfriend and punched, kicked, and choked her 13-year-old daughter after she refused to sell drugs for him, and had emphasized the evidence and called the defendant a "terrorist" in closing argument. The Court was clearly concerned that "[i]nadmissible evidence and highly inflammatory statements came rolling in unimpeded at Moore's trial, without any hesitation by the prosecutor, complaint by defense counsel, or correction by the District Court."

[mm] Rule 404(b) -- Predisposition

United States v. Armendariz-Mata, 949 F.2d 151 (5th Cir. 1991) : Where a defendant charged with cocaine possession claimed entrapment, the Court held that evidence of his association with a drug trafficker was properly admitted to prove his predisposition.

United States v. Nolan, 910 F.2d 1553 (7th Cir. 1990) : The Court held it was error, but harmless in the circumstances, to instruct that evidence of a bank robbery defendant's prior bank robberies could be considered on his "predisposition," as well as on identity and intent. Mention of that purpose in the pattern jury instruction is proper only when the defendant puts the matter in issue, as in an entrapment defense.

United States v. LaChapelle, 969 F.2d 632 (8th Cir. 1992) : The defendant, charged with receiving child pornography through the mail, asserted an entrapment defense and the government introduced a pornographic videotape seized from the defendant's home to show his knowledge of and intent to order child pornography. The Court held admission of the evidence was error (but harmless) because the possession was legal when the defendant first possessed the videotape. Evidence of predisposition to do what was once lawful is not very probative of whether there is a predisposition to do what is now illegal; the Court concluded that the slight probative value of the evidence was outweighed by its prejudicial effect.

United States v. Simtob, 901 F.2d 799 (9th Cir. 1990) : The defendant's conviction for distribution of cocaine was affirmed, the Court finding no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of a 1973 conviction for LSD distribution and a 1974 conviction for marijuana distribution to show predisposition rebutting an entrapment defense.

[nn] Rule 404(b) -- Preparation

United States v. Sliker, 751 F.2d 477 (2d Cir. 1984) : The Court held in a bank fraud prosecution that testimony about a similar attempt to defraud explained the defendant's ability to get phony checks in preparation for the charged fraud.

United States v. McCarty, 36 F.3d 1349 (5th Cir. 1994) : The Court affirmed a bank robbery conviction, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of a prior house burglary by the defendant, as weapons taken in the burglary were used in the robbery and the evidence corroborated admissions the defendant made to a fellow inmate while awaiting trial.

United States v. Gano, 560 F.2d 990 (10th Cir. 1977) : The defendant, employed as a social worker at a Veterans Hospital, had sexual relations with the wife of a patient and subsequently with her daughter. In a prosecution for having carnal knowledge of a female under the age of 16, the Court upheld admission of evidence that the defendant sold marijuana to the mother and gave it to the child himself, as the evidence showed preparation for the crime -- i.e., lowering the child's resistance. The Court also commented that evidence of the defendant's sexual relations with the mother was admissible because of its close connection with the criminal conduct involving the child.

[oo] Rule 404(b) -- Propensity Evidence

United States v. Williams, 985 F.2d 634 (1st Cir. 1993) : After arguing at sidebar that the evidence showed "how bad [the defendant and a coconspirator] are," the government introduced evidence that the defendant had told a witness that "he had killed a couple of people." On appeal of convictions for cocaine distribution offenses, the government argued that the evidence showed the defendant's modus operandi of intimidation. Concluding that the impermissible propensity ground first asserted was the only justification supported in the record, the Court found admission of the evidence error (but harmless). Modus operandi evidence is admissible to prove identity, but identity was not disputed; moreover, the evidence was not placed into any context, other than temporal, related to the development or operation of the conspiracy. One Judge, concurring, wrote separately "simply to express my exasperation at the repeated abuse of Rule 404(b) by government prosecutors." In United States v. Cortijo-Diaz, n278 the Court vacated a conviction for interfering with a flight attendant because evidence that the defendant had been convicted of attempted robbery and sentenced as a predicate violent felon had been erroneously admitted. It was not relevant, other than to show propensity, to the defendant's argument that he did not intend to interfere. The Court criticized the Trial Judge's rote restatement of the Rule 404(b) exceptions and once again stated that the Rule excludes other acts relevant only to show criminal propensity.

J & R Ice Cream Corp. v. California Smoothie Licensing Corp., 31 F.3d 1259 (3d Cir. 1994) : In a franchisee's action against a franchiser for fraud and negligence in making representations about the financial prospects of a restaurant franchise, other franchisees testified that the defendant had made similar representations to them. Reversing a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court held it was error to admit the testimony as evidence of a common plan or scheme. "Common plan" acts may be part of a single series of events -- thus tending to show a motive which will establish the commission of a disputed act, the identity of the actor, or his intention -- or they may be sufficiently similar and distinctive as to constitute signature evidence of identity. Since neither motive, intent, nor identity was in dispute, the evidence served only the impermissible purpose of showing the defendant's propensity to commit the charged act.

United States v. Brown, 71 F.3d 1158 (5th Cir. 1995) : The Court reversed a conviction for possession with intent to distribute crack cocaine, finding error when cross-examination of the sole defense witness about her knowledge of the defendant elicited testimony about the defendant's prior cocaine conviction. The Court concluded that the only way the cross-examination "could help identify Mr. Brown was through the inference that because Mr. Brown committed the crime of possession with intent to distribute before, he had done so again." The error was not harmless, since the jury had been instructed that it could consider the prior conviction "as evidence of character or as a propensity to commit a crime."

United States v. Jones, 389 F.3d 753 (7th Cir. 2004) , vacated on other grounds, 545 U.S. 1125 (2005) : At the defendant's trial for possession of cocaine with intent to distribute, the government introduced his prior convictions for possession of marijuana with intent to distribute and for attempted delivery of a controlled substance, to prove intent. Noting that there is only "a fine line" between evidence of intent and evidence of propensity, the Court found that the evidence showed nothing more than that the defendant had a propensity to commit drug crimes (but the error was harmless). In a careful opinion (discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 404.02[10]), the Court explained that to tell the difference between the illegitimate use of a prior conviction to show propensity and the proper use to prove intent, > the government must affirmatively show why a particular prior conviction tends to show the more forward-looking fact of purpose, design, or volition to commit the new crime. A prior conviction may be relevant to show intent if the defendant concedes that he possessed the drugs but denies that he planned to distribute them, or if he denies knowing that the substance was contraband. Merely introducing prior convictions without more, however, can prove nothing but propensity, which is not enough to take the evidence out of the exclusionary principle established by Rule 404(b).

United States v. Falls, 117 F.3d 1075 (8th Cir. 1997) : In a trial for taking part in a large-scale drug distribution network, the Court found it was error (but harmless) when evidence that the defendant took part in an unrelated drug conspiracy was admitted on the ground that it was "relevant" to the issue of whether the defendant was a member of the drug conspiracy charged in the indictment. The question was not whether the evidence was probative, but whether it had a tendency to "distract[] the trier of fact from the main question of what actually happened on a particular occasion and create[] instead a reliance on the probability that the defendant acted in accordance with his or her general character or previous criminal behavior." In United States v. LeCompte, n279 the Court reversed a conviction for abusive sexual contact with a minor, holding it was error to admit evidence of the defendant's prior acts of sex abuse with minors. The Trial Judge admitted the bad acts as evidence of "plan," but the Court noted that "the victims were different, and the events were far apart in time." Absent more specific linkage, the bad act evidence was relevant to "plan" "only insofar as it tends to prove a propensity to commit crimes, which Rule 404(b) prohibits."

United States v. Bracy, 67 F.3d 1421 (9th Cir. 1995) : In a prosecution for drug trafficking, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit evidence of unrelated incidents in which a defendant had used or possessed firearms. Although as a general matter firearms are relevant to prove involvement in the drug trade and intent to distribute, in this case the prosecutor essentially argued that the evidence showed the defendant's predisposition and propensity to violence.

[pp] Rule 404(b) -- Purposes for Admission To Be Specified

United States v. Cortijo-Diaz, 875 F.2d 13 (1st Cir. 1989) : The Court reversed a conviction for assault on a flight attendant, finding that evidence of the defendant's earlier robbery conviction was likely to be used as propensity evidence and was not properly admitted under Rule 404(b). It added that the laundry-list instruction given to the jury by the Trial Judge was undecipherable, and that the supplementary instructions were worse.

Becker v. ARCO Chem. Co., 207 F.3d 176 (3d Cir. 2000) : The Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff, who alleged age discrimination in his termination, because the plaintiff had erroneously been permitted to testify regarding the "manner" in which the defendant allegedly had earlier terminated another employee. At trial the plaintiff's mere citation to Rule 404(b) fell woefully short of the proponent's obligation when offering evidence purportedly for a non-character purpose. The Trial Judge's instruction to the jury, admitting the evidence as proof of "motive, intent, preparation, plan or knowledge," increased the likelihood that the evidence would be used for an improper purpose, i.e., to find the defendant liable based on an impermissible inference concerning the defendant's "character" and its propensity to fabricate or trump up problems with its employees. In United States v. Murray, 103 F.3d 310 (3d Cir. 1997) , the Court reversed a conviction for intentional killing in furtherance of a continuing criminal enterprise because of error in admitting evidence that the defendant had previously committed another murder. The prosecutor had only said that the evidence "wasn't just [offered for] identity. Role in the organization, common scheme, plan, a number of different reasons," and the Trial Judge's most complete explanation (in the jury charge) why it was admitted was "for the very limited purpose to show identity, role in the conspiracy, a common scheme or plan." However, there was no showing that the uncharged murder was connected to the charged CCE or that the two killings were planned together or involved a common design, nor were the similarities between the two sufficient to be relevant on the identity issue. In United States v. Sampson, n280 the Court reversed a conviction for marijuana possession because evidence of prior drug crimes had been admitted without the government articulating, and without the Trial Judge putting into the record and instructing the jury as to, the permissible inferences. Where the government has not clearly stated reasons why the evidence is relevant to any legitimate purpose, there is no basis to believe the jury will cull the proper inferences from the evidence, and by simply repeating the entire litany of permissible theories under the Rule, the Judge's instruction gave the jury inadequate guidance.

Sparks v. Gilley Trucking Co., 992 F.2d 50 (4th Cir. 1993) : The defendant in a personal injury action arising out of a car-truck collision introduced evidence of the plaintiff's prior speeding convictions "to show intent, preparation, plan or motive to race or speed on the day in question." The Court reversed a judgment for the defendant, holding that intent was not relevant to the contributory negligence defense being asserted and that there was no foundation for any theory of "plan," "motive," or "preparation." The dissenting Judge considered intent relevant to the defendant's attempt to prove the plaintiff had been racing.

United States v. Hernandez-Guevara, 162 F.3d 863 (5th Cir. 1998) : Affirming convictions for smuggling aliens into the country, the Court held there was no plain error in an instruction to the jury that it could only use the defendant's prior smuggling convictions for the purposes set out in Rule 404(b). After noting that it had found no plain error when a Trial Judge gave no limiting instruction, n281 the Court reasoned that "[i]f a district court does not commit plain error by neglecting to give a limiting instruction, we do not see how it does so by reciting the permissible uses of extrinsic evidence as laid out in Rule 404(b)." The Court observed that it had implied in United States v. Anderson, 933 F.2d 1261, 1272-1273 (5th Cir. 1991) , that an instruction listing all of the permissible purposes was too broad, but it found that case distinguishable.

United States v. Merriweather, 78 F.3d 1070 (6th Cir. 1996) : The Court reversed cocaine convictions for the erroneous admission of taped telephone conversations relating to another conspiracy for which the defendant was separately indicted. Noting that in United States v. Johnson, 27 F.3d 1186 (6th Cir. 1994) , it had explained that prior act evidence should not be admitted to prove something that is not in dispute, the Court stated that "[t]his case requires that we explain, once again, the close and careful analysis trial courts should undertake before ruling on the admissibility of 'other crimes, wrongs or acts' under Federal Rule of Evidence 404(b)." The Court reiterated that: (1) upon objection, the proponent of Rule 404(b) evidence "should be required to identify the specific purpose or purposes" for offering the evidence (emphasis in original); (2) the Judge must determine whether the identified purpose is in issue; and (3) if it is in issue, the Judge must engage in a Rule 403 balancing test; and (4) the Judge must explain to the jury the specific purpose for which it may use the evidence. The Court criticized the government's "unhelpful recitation ... of the shifting purposes" for offering the taped conversation, and the Trial Judge's recitation of "seven of the nine purposes named in Rule 404(b) in the precise order as they appear in the text of that rule." It found that opportunity, preparation, plan, knowledge, and absence of mistake were all improper grounds for admitting the evidence, since none of these issues were in dispute. While intent and identity were disputed by the defendant, the Court concluded that the taped conversation concerning other drug deals was substantially more prejudicial than probative on these issues, and the prejudice was exacerbated by the Trial Judge's "all purpose" instruction, which did not limit consideration of the bad acts evidence to the particular purposes in issue.

United States v. Kern, 12 F.3d 122 (8th Cir. 1993) : Affirming bank robbery convictions, the Court held that evidence of a prior robbery was properly admitted on the issue of intent to conspire, but noted that it "[did] not countenance the district court's use of this virtual laundry list of permissible Rule 404(b) purposes." In United States v. Harvey, n282 the Court reversed a conviction for avoiding payment of taxes relating to the sale of an airplane because the government introduced evidence that ten years earlier the defendant made large sums of money from drug transactions. The Court criticized the Trial Judge's "laundry list" approach to admissibility, "which merely restates the components of the rule," and stated that "the district court should specify which components of the rule form the basis of its ruling and why." In United States v. Mothershed, n283 the Court observed that "[w]e have not been aided in our review of the relevancy issue in this case by the 'laundry list' approach taken at trial."

United States v. Hardwell, 80 F.3d 1471 (10th Cir. 1996) : The Court held that limiting instructions given in a drug trafficking case were deficient because they were overbroad, giving the "laundry list" of permitted purposes under the Rule rather than being tailored to the purposes properly in issue, and because they did not expressly advise the jury that it could not consider prior misconduct as proof of criminal disposition or propensity. The error was harmless, however. See also United States v. Doran n284("laundry list" not the best way to proceed, but the defendant did not object and the instruction was not plain error). In United States v. Morales-Quinones, n285 the Court affirmed a conviction for transporting illegal aliens, observing that before admitting evidence of other criminal acts, "the trial court must specifically identify the purpose for which such evidence is offered; a broad statement merely invoking or restating Rule 404(b) will not suffice." Although the Judge's ruling in this case was somewhat general, the Court found that the defendant's prior acts were admissible to prove the absence of mistake or accident.

[qq] Rule 404(b) -- Rebuttal Evidence

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Bias

United States v. Balsam, 203 F.3d 72 (1st Cir. 2000) : At a trial for multiple bank robberies, one defendant made a motion in limine announcing his intention to offer, as proof that the principal cooperating witness was biased against him, evidence that after his arrest the witness attempted to have the defendant murdered. The defendant sought to exclude any evidence that the basis for the witness' animus was a mistaken belief that the defendant had implicated the witness in the robbery scheme in order to obtain favorable treatment in an unrelated extortion case then pending against the defendant. The Court found no abuse of discretion when the government was permitted to rebut the defendant's evidence that the witness was biased against him with evidence that the defendant was then faced with a criminal case on unspecified charges. Absent an explanation, the jury might have been misled to conclude that the witness' feelings were irrational or arbitrary.

United States v. Powell, 124 F.3d 655 (5th Cir. 1997) : Affirming a conviction for evading fuel excise taxes, the Court held that evidence of the defendant's participation in a scam involving tickets to entertainment events was relevant to the alleged bias of a prosecution witness. The fact that the witness had lost money in the scam could have been a ground for the defense to impeach his testimony, so it was proper for the government to bring out the nature of the relationship to the defendant on direct examination of the witness.

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Rebuttal Evidence -- Contradiction

[A] Rule 404(b) -- Assault, etc., Cases

United States v. Hogue, 827 F.2d 660 (10th Cir. 1987) : The Court reversed a conviction for voluntary manslaughter, holding that the defendant's assaults upon his girlfriend and her children prior to and after the stabbing of the victim were not admissible to rebut the claim that the stabbing was accidental, but were impermissible propensity evidence. See also United States v. Naranjo n286(the defendant's previous batteries of the murder victim were admissible to rebut his testimony that the shooting was an accident, even though a gun had not been used in the previous batteries); United States v. Dysart n287(evidence of previous threats were properly admitted to rebut a claim that the defendant lacked the capacity to have an intent to commit the offense of threatening the President); United States v. Harris n288(when a defendant charged with murdering his child claimed the death was accidental, it was permissible to admit evidence of injuries suffered by the child on other occasions).

[B] Rule 404(b) -- Rebuttal Evidence -- Contradiction -- Civil Cases

Croce v. Bromley Corp., 623 F.2d 1084 (5th Cir. 1980) : In a wrongful death action arising out of an airline crash, the Court held it was proper to allow the plaintiffs to offer evidence of the pilot's past conduct to rebut the defendant's various efforts to paint the pilot as a careful and safe operator.

Williams v. Mensey, 785 F.2d 631 (8th Cir. 1986) : Affirming a judgment against a prisoner who claimed he was assaulted in jail, the Court held that evidence that the plaintiff was involved in other fights was properly admitted to show his problems with other inmates before one of the defendants allegedly labeled him a "snitch."

[C] Rule 404(b) -- Rebuttal Evidence -- Contradiction -- Drug Cases

United States v. Spinner, 152 F.3d 950 (D.C. Cir. 1998) : In support of his argument that drugs and a weapon seized from his mother's house when he was arrested there were not his, but rather belonged to a cousin living in the house, the defendant claimed that he had "turned his life around" after his brother died the previous year. On cross-examination of the defendant's girlfriend, the prosecutor asked about a letter she had sent two months before his arrest to the defendant while he was jailed on unrelated charges. In the letter she indicated she was upset that the defendant was letting his cousin use his mother's house in connection with drugs. Reversing, the Court held that using the letter to show that the defendant remained a criminal after his brother died was exactly the sort of purpose forbidden by Rule 404(b). Further, the letter did not serve to impeach the witness, who did not deny before the letter was introduced that she had been upset with the use of the mother's house. In a drug trafficking case, United States v. Johnson, 46 F.3d 1166 (D.C. Cir. 1995) , the prosecution introduced evidence that the defendant, in an apparent attempt to explain his ability to acquire an expensive car, a gun, and various items of jewelry, had stated during booking that he was employed at a sporting goods store. The Court held there was no error in admitting evidence that the statement about his employment was false, as it suggested he was concealing the actual source of his income. In United States v. Johnson, n289 the Court affirmed a cocaine conviction, finding that a defendant opened the door to other crime rebuttal evidence when he presented evidence that he ran a legitimate business.

United States v. Rhodes, 779 F.2d 1019 (4th Cir. 1985) : The Court found that a defendant charged with drug offenses opened the door to evidence about prior convictions as a result of an opening statement and examination of witnesses that suggested that he was only a gambler, not a person involved with drugs. The convictions were used to support the government's claim of criminal intent.

United States v. Carter, 953 F.2d 1449 (5th Cir. 1992) : Affirming convictions for drug offenses, the Court held it was not error to introduce evidence that a defendant had been in prison for a misdemeanor, as the evidence was used to contradict his testimony that he had been continuously employed during that period. See also United States v. Nichols n290(evidence of a previous importation of marijuana was admissible in cocaine conspiracy prosecution to rebut the defendant's claim of lack of knowledge of illicit drug trade and denial of any previous trafficking); United States v. Mortazavi n291(after the defendant testified that he had no intent to deliver drugs and had never been involved with drugs, evidence of a drug transaction nine years earlier was properly admitted).

United States v. Acosta-Cazares, 878 F.2d 945 (6th Cir. 1989) : The Court held in a cocaine conspiracy prosecution that the defendant's counsel, by stating in his opening statement that his client was not involved in any conspiracy to distribute cocaine but was merely a "victim of circumstance," had opened the door to evidence during the prosecution's direct case of defendant's prior drug transactions.

United States v. Poole, 207 F.3d 893 (7th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed convictions for making false statements in connection with firearms purchases and upheld a ruling permitting the prosecution to question the defendant regarding a 1996 arrest which led to a guilty plea for felony possession of marijuana. On direct examination, the defendant testified that he did not know anything about guns. To impeach this testimony, the prosecutor asked the defendant whether the police found five guns in his apartment at the time of his 1996 arrest. The Court noted that this evidence was unlikely to be unduly prejudicial, since the charged offenses alleged that the defendant was a "straw purchaser," so that any earlier evidence of personal possession of guns by the defendant was unlikely to be misused by the jury. In United States v. Laughlin, n292 the Court held that photographs of the defendant in the presence of cash and marijuana plants were properly admitted to rebut a defense theory that he was a recreational user, but photos of the defendant using marijuana should have been excluded since they were consistent with the defense. See also United States v. Gaertner n293(a claim on direct examination by a defendant charged with possession of cocaine with intent to distribute that he was not into "the drug thing" opened the door to rebuttal evidence of his prior convictions involving marijuana and tax evasion).

United States v. Thomas, 58 F.3d 1318 (8th Cir. 1995) : The Court held that evidence of the defendant's prior narcotics activity was properly admitted in a narcotics case because the defendant offered a "mere presence" defense, which had left in controversy issues with respect to his intent and knowledge, and evidence of prior narcotics activity was responsive to those issues. See also United States v. Vitale n294(where the defendant in a drug case testified, his version of the facts was subject to rebuttal, even though the rebuttal might involve mention of possession of a stolen weapon); United States v. Koessel n295(permitting cross-examination of the defendant concerning an earlier cocaine conviction to rebut a defense of a frame-up).

United States v. Lopez-Martinez, 725 F.2d 471 (9th Cir. 1984) : Reversing a conviction for importing heroin on other grounds, the Court ruled that evidence that the appellant was arrested in 1974 for possessing 600 pounds of marijuana and that he stated at the time that he was being paid $1,000 to haul the marijuana was admissible to rebut his claim that in the instant case he thought he was carrying marijuana rather than heroin. Since he received $1,000 for bringing a package weighing one and one-half pounds into the country, the Court reasoned that a jury could infer that he must have known he was carrying something worth more than marijuana. See also United States v. Spetz n296(evidence that the defendant had written a book describing drug dealing and had shown it to his father was properly admitted to rebut the father's testimony that he had no knowledge that his son knew about such dealing).

United States v. Harris, 903 F.2d 770 (10th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed a conviction for marijuana trafficking, holding that failure to file reports of large cash transactions with the IRS was properly admitted to rebut the defendant's argument that the cash was derived from legitimate coin sales. See also United States v. Lewis n297(in a marijuana importation case, evidence that the defendant had been involved in a similar, prior smuggling incident was properly admitted to refute his claim that he had no prior experience in importing or selling drugs); United States v. Pilling n298(it was permissible for the government to ask the defendant, who testified that his sole interest in transactions leading to the prosecution was innocent, whether he had smoked marijuana and sniffed cocaine).

[D] Rule 404(b) -- Rebuttal Evidence -- Contradiction -- Firearms Cases

United States v. Powell, 50 F.3d 94 (1st Cir. 1995) : The defendant, charged with felon firearm possession during a shooting incident, offered testimony that he had come into possession of the weapon as a matter of necessity during the incident. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of contemporaneous constructive possession of other firearms to rebut the defense and show he was armed at the time the shooting began.

United States v. Beverly, 5 F.3d 633 (2d Cir. 1993) : A defendant charged with crack cocaine and firearms offenses testified that he had never possessed a gun in Albany, N.Y., had only very limited familiarity with guns, and was not in Albany on specified dates. Affirming, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting rebuttal evidence that he had committed two shootings on specified dates in Albany, although it noted "with distress" that the government overreached by including in its impeachment evidence the facts that the defendant had fired guns in Albany into a house, at a woman, and into the leg of a man. In United States v. Pelusio, n299 a prosecution for unlawful receipt of firearms, the Court found that the government properly cross-examined a defendant about prior instances in which he had been present in an auto with a shotgun, after he testified on direct examination that he was unaware of the presence of a gun in a car and would not have gotten in had he been aware.

United States v. Tate, 715 F.2d 864 (4th Cir. 1983) : The Court reversed a conviction for receipt of a firearm by a convicted felon. The defendant, who was stopped by police while driving his wife's car, testified at trial that he did not know that two guns were in the trunk of the car. In rebuttal, the government offered evidence that the defendant had been seen in possession of some other gun at some earlier time. The Court found that the earlier possession could have shed no light on the state of the defendant's knowledge on the day he was stopped.

United States v. Conley, 291 F.3d 464 (7th Cir. 2002) : Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court held that, after the defendant presented testimony that he had studiously avoided handling firearms or weapons around his home, two photographs depicting defendant in actual possession of firearms were properly admitted. The photographs were relevant to whether the defendant was in constructive possession of firearms while they were in his home or on his property.

United States v. Lego, 855 F.2d 542 (8th Cir. 1988) : The Court held that evidence that the defendant had previously been in possession of a firearm was admissible to negate his claim that he was carrying the weapon on the day charged only because of government inducements.

[E] Rule 404(b) -- Rebuttal Evidence -- Contradiction -- Fraud Cases

United States v. Bilzerian, 926 F.2d 1285 (2d Cir. 1991) : In a securities fraud prosecution centering on the defendant's characterization of funds used to purchase stock, the government elicited from an accountant who had prepared the defendant's tax returns that the defendant had stated the source was personal funds. On cross-examination, the defense sought to establish that the source was irrelevant for tax purposes and the tax returns were correct. The Court held that, although the deficiency was not relevant to the charges, there was no error in permitting the government to elicit on redirect that the defendant had underreported his income from the transaction by approximately $4 million, as the door had been opened to correct a false impression.

United States v. Brainard, 745 F.2d 320 (4th Cir. 1984) : The Court held that evidence of a prior investment scheme was admissible to rebut the defendant's claim that he had been serving his client's interests in good faith.

United States v. Dunn, 805 F.2d 1275 (6th Cir. 1986) : The Court held (2-1) that it was error to admit evidence that the defendant, a contract egg producer charged with mail fraud involving insurance claims made following a fire, had previously stolen eggs. The evidence was irrelevant to rebut his claim that an egg wholesaler had a motive to burn his buildings; in fact, it tended to support the claim. Moreover, the Court found that the prosecutor argued to the jury that the evidence was character evidence.

United States v. O'Brien, 119 F.3d 523 (7th Cir. 1997) : In a prosecution for fraud in connection with disposition of a business, the Court held that the defendant's testimony regarding how much she expected to realize from the sale of a building opened the door to evidence that she had solicited arson of the property, as it tended to show that she did not actually expect to realize that value, which showed a motive to commit fraud. In United States v. Weisman, n300 a fraud prosecution, the Court held that the defendant's entry of a guilty plea on behalf of a corporation in 1980, the transcript of the plea proceeding, and other evidence concerning past investigations of the corporation and statements by the defendant regarding his fear of an FTC investigation were properly admitted to respond to the defendant's claim that he had no personal knowledge of any fraud committed by the corporation's employees.

United States v. Gustafson, 728 F.2d 1078 (8th Cir. 1984) : The Court held that a bank examiner's 1975 letter to the board of directors of a bank was properly admitted in a prosecution for a fraudulent check floating scheme that involved the bank in 1977 and 1978, since the letter put various defendants on notice of the problems with handling checks in certain ways and tended to rebut their defense that any improprieties were attributable to subordinates.

United States v. Gering, 716 F.2d 615 (9th Cir. 1983) : Where the defendant took the stand and attempted to create a defense in a mail fraud prosecution, the Court held that testimony could be offered to rebut the defense even though it might involve other acts. See also United States v. Riggins n301(evidence of a fingerprint on other forged money orders was admissible to rebut a defense of a frame-up).

United States v. Flanagan, 34 F.3d 949 (10th Cir. 1994) : Affirming a conviction for fraud and money laundering arising out of a scheme involving a sham medical supply company, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit evidence of the defendant's involvement in a 1980 scam after a witness described him as a "salesman's salesman." The description referred only to the defendant's success in his occupation and had no connotations as to his truthfulness, and so did not put his good character in issue. In United States v. Lara, 956 F.2d 994 (10th Cir. 1992) , the Court held there was no error in bringing out on cross-examination that the defendant in a construction fraud case was being prosecuted for an offense arising out of another construction project, as the defendant had opened the door by denying on direct examination that he had ever been prosecuted in any other case.

United States v. Plotke, 725 F.2d 1303 (11th Cir. 1984) : The Court found that when a defendant in a mail fraud and conspiracy case testified that he never had anything to do with burning his house or houses of others, the door had been opened to cross-examination asking the defendant whether he had been scarred at a fire at another person's house.

[F] Rule 404(b) -- Rebuttal Evidence -- Contradiction -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Fortes, 619 F.2d 108 (1st Cir. 1980) : The defendant opened the door to other crimes evidence by claiming an innocent relationship with a codefendant.

United States v. Bari, 750 F.2d 1169 (2d Cir. 1984) : The Court held that a defendant charged with escape opened the door for evidence of previous and subsequent escape attempts by claiming that he was physically unable to make an escape attempt.

United States v. Dornhofer, 859 F.2d 1195 (4th Cir. 1988) : The Court held that evidence of child pornography in the defendant's apartment was relevant to rebut his claim that material received in the mail was received by mistake. In United States v. Johnson, n302 a doctor charged with tax evasion offered character evidence in her behalf, after which the government responded with evidence that her Medicaid billings reported four times as many services per patient as other Virginia doctors. A majority of the Court held that where a defendant has attempted to portray her character as being "completely at odds with the possession of a state of mind requisite to guilt," the government should be entitled to rebut this portrayal.

United States v. Johnson, 542 F.2d 230 (5th Cir. 1976) : The Court affirmed an escape conviction, holding that evidence of a previous felony conviction and the existence of an arrest warrant at the time of the offense was properly admitted to impeach the defendant's testimony that the only reason he should not have been carrying a gun at the time was that he was not a law enforcement agent.

United States v. Czarnecki, 552 F.2d 698 (6th Cir. 1977) : A government witness was asked whether he was paid by the defendant for efforts not involving collections. The Court upheld the question on the ground that the defendant had opened the door to proof of the employment relationship by claiming that someone else had hired the witness to extort payments.

United States v. Mobley, 193 F.3d 492 (7th Cir. 1999) : A village mayor and her husband, the village's street superintendent, were charged with theft from the village. Reversing on an interlocutory appeal an in limine ruling excluding evidence that the mayor had caused the village not to remit its payroll taxes, the Court found an abuse of discretion. The government did not intend to offer the evidence during its case-in-chief, but only in rebuttal, if the defendant argued that the excess she received was compensation earned during earlier periods that she had deferred accepting pending improvement in the village's financial standing. The evidence would tend to show that the village's financial standing had not improved, and the unconditional ruling excluding the evidence would preclude its use for this proper purpose. In United States v. Fountain, n303 the Court held that a defendant who made an issue of his purpose in having a knife in prison opened the door to evidence concerning his previous use of the knife. See also United States v. Stump n304(evidence of improper prescriptions issued by the defendant prior to the date of the crimes charged was admissible to show a continuing scheme and to rebut his claim that he never intended to act unlawfully).

United States v. Burkett, 821 F.2d 1306 (8th Cir. 1987) : The Court held that after a defendant in a break-in testified that he had solved other burglaries for authorities, he opened the door to cross-examination concerning his involvement in other burglaries. See also United States v. Bartley n305(evidence of the defendant's prior activity was admissible to rebut his claim that he did not know two people who identified him).

United States v. Wales, 977 F.2d 1323 (9th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed the defendant's conviction for making a false declaration to Customs about the amount of currency he was carrying, holding there was no error in admitting evidence that the defendant was carrying false drivers' licenses after he had offered evidence his passport and other documents were legitimate. One Judge concurred in the judgment on this point, but noted there is no authority in the Rules for this "opening the door" doctrine, and that the doctrine as announced provides neither a clear rule nor a basis for extrapolating a rule by analogy.

United States v. Boon San Chong, 829 F.2d 1572 (11th Cir. 1987) : The Court held in an extortion case that evidence that the defendant had previously invaded a home while armed to demand money was admissible to rebut the defendant's claim that he acted under duress in the instant case. See also United States v. Bent n306(the defendant, who testified on direct examination that his previous voyages to the United States were for legitimate reasons, could be asked on cross-examination about prior involvement in a drug smuggling scheme); United States v. Killingsworth n307(in a prosecution for conspiracy to defraud the government, evidence that employees whom the defendant was to train were actually conducting training in another program was properly admitted to rebut the defendant's claim of unawareness of the training requirement as a condition of government funding).

[iii] Rule 404(b) -- Rebuttal Evidence -- Cross-Examination by Accused Opening the Door to Rebuttal

United States v. Balthazard, 360 F.3d 309 (1st Cir. 2004) : Affirming convictions for a conspiracy to grow marijuana plants, the Court found that a defendant had opened the door to questioning of an agent on redirect regarding the defendant's nolo contendere plea to a charge of stealing electricity. On cross-examination of the witness, defense counsel suggested to the witness that the only investigative report linking the defendant to unrelated criminal activity was a report concerning stolen auto parts, thereby creating an impression with the jurors that the defendant had had only limited prior contacts with law enforcement.

Government of Virgin Islands v. Martinez, 847 F.2d 125 (3d Cir. 1988) : Although the Court affirmed a conviction for cocaine trafficking, it held that the defendant did not open the door to an inquiry into his prior drug transactions with an informant simply by cross-examining the informant regarding the informant's own drug dealing.

United States v. Senffner, 280 F.3d 755 (7th Cir. 2002) : The defendant, charged with criminal contempt and obstruction of an SEC proceeding arising out of a fraud scheme, had previously been found in civil contempt for failing to return certain monies as ordered by the SEC. On cross-examination of a government witness, defense counsel asked whether the monies had been returned. The Court held that the defendant thereby opened the door to mention in the witness' answer and in the redirect examination that the repayment had been made only after the finding of civil contempt. In United States v. Draiman, n308 the Court affirmed a conviction arising from filing fraudulent insurance claims following a burglary. It upheld the admission of evidence concerning the defendant's possession of "hot" or "pirated" tapes because of the manner in which defense counsel cross-examined a government witness. The Court observed that " '[o]pening the door' is a risk even a skilled defense counsel, as in this case, assumed when a calculated effort is made to tiptoe over thin ice to gain some evidentiary advantage." In United States v. Peco, n309 the Court affirmed convictions of drug-related offenses, concluding that the Trial Judge carefully and properly ruled that the government could introduce evidence concerning death threats to an agent, since the defendant opened the door to the evidence by inquiring on cross-examination into the agent's promise of immunity to an informant and the evidence tended to explain the agent's reasons for promising. In United States v. Wynn, n310 the Court held that a postal employee charged with embezzlement opened the door to questioning about other allegations made against him when he attempted to impeach a witness by questioning his motive for investigating the defendant. See also United States v. Weston n311(defendants, who were convicted of involvement with stolen property taken from a couple who were murdered, opened the door to mention of the murders by cross-examining a government witness to demonstrate that she did not tell the FBI everything she knew immediately after the murders and robbery).

United States v. Womochil, 778 F.2d 1311 (8th Cir. 1985) : The Court affirmed cocaine convictions, finding that the government was properly permitted to elicit on redirect examination of an agent testimony concerning other information that had been obtained relating to the defendant's activities, since the defendant's cross-examination had left the misleading impression that the defendant had never been under suspicion. See also United States v. Large n312(the government's reference to money found in the defendant's suitcase as the fruit of a prior drug transaction was permissible where defense counsel brought out the prior transaction in cross-examining a government witness).

United States v. Johnson, 730 F.2d 683 (11th Cir. 1984) : The Court held that defense cross-examination of a government witness opened the door to extrinsic evidence, since the cross-examination might have created a false impression of one defendant's relationship to another.

[iv] Rule 404(b) -- Rebuttal Evidence -- Government or Civil Party Opening the Door to Rebuttal

United States v. Simpson, 992 F.2d 1224 (D.C. Cir. 1993) : The Court held it was plain error to permit "impeachment" of the defendant's denial on cross-examination that he knew how Dilaudid was packaged with evidence of his prior arrest for possession of Dilaudid, as the only issue in the present case was his possession of Dilaudid and neither his knowledge of how it was packaged nor his prior possession was relevant to that issue.

Bonilla v. Yamaha Motors Corp., 955 F.2d 150 (1st Cir. 1992) : Reversing a judgment for the defendant in a product liability action arising out of a motorcycle accident, the Court held that it was error to cross-examine the plaintiff about speeding violations inadmissible under Rule 404(b) simply in the hope that he would deny them, thus opening up the "red herring" for impeachment. See also United States v. Ruiz-Batista, 956 F.2d 351 (1st Cir. 1992) (strongly condemning government procedure of asking defendant whether he had possessed cocaine on other occasions and, after receiving a denial, seeking to show such occasions for purpose of impeachment).

United States v. Warledo, 557 F.2d 721 (10th Cir. 1977) : Convictions for conspiracy to set fire to a railroad bridge, conspiracy to obstruct interstate commerce, and possession of an incendiary bomb were reversed because the government was improperly permitted to ask one of the defendants whether he possessed a rifle found in his automobile and to introduce the rifle together with a clip and bullets to rebut his denial of possession. The Court refused to permit the government to open the door for this dangerous form of impeachment on an irrelevant matter, and it reversed all the defendants' convictions because the conspiracy charges made it likely that the evidence would have affected all of them.

[v] Rule 404(b) -- Rebuttal Evidence -- Specific Acts To Impeach

United States v. Copelin, 996 F.2d 379 (D.C. Cir. 1993) : The Court held that the prosecution was properly permitted to ask a defendant charged with cocaine distribution about testing positive on drug tests in order to impeach his statements that he had only seen drugs advertised on television. In United States v. Simpson, 992 F.2d 1224 (D.C. Cir. 1993) , the Court held it was plain error to permit "impeachment" of the defendant's denial that he knew how Dilaudid was packaged with evidence of his prior arrest for possession of Dilaudid, as the only issue in the present case was his possession of Dilaudid and neither his knowledge of how it was packaged nor his prior possession was relevant to that issue. In United States v. Eaton, n313 testimony by a defendant that he lacked knowledge of or familiarity with drugs opened the door to cross-examination as to the defendant's prior conviction and drug use.

Hitt v. Connell, 301 F.3d 240 (5th Cir. 2002) : In a civil rights action by a deputy constable who was discharged for his union activity, an associational right protected by the First Amendment, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the constable took disciplinary action against other deputies for their union activities. The evidence was admissible as proof of the constable's motive in firing the plaintiff and to impeach the constable's statements that he was "a union man" and had no animus against the union.

United States v. McFadyen-Snider, 552 F.2d 1178 (6th Cir. 1977) : The Court reversed bank fraud convictions, holding that the prosecutor improperly attempted to impeach the appellant with proof of her sexual conduct, which the Court said was irrelevant, "especially ... where the conduct does not involve a substantive issue of the case."

United States v. Pacione, 950 F.2d 1348 (7th Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed a conviction for threatening a revenue officer, holding there was no abuse of discretion in permitting rebuttal witnesses to testify about the defendant's reputation for untruthfulness and their opinions of his untruthfulness. Although he had been convicted in connection with the business out of which their knowledge arose, it was defense counsel who brought out his prior bad acts.

[rr] Rule 404(b) -- Relationship to Other Rules

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Miscellaneous Rules

United States v. Brown, 31 F.3d 484 (7th Cir. 1994) : In the prosecution of a scheme to defraud banks by third-party processing of telemarketing charges, testimony regarding three persons' statements that they had furthered the scheme was admitted over a hearsay objection on the government's assurance that it would show they were unindicted coconspirators. When the government failed to make this showing, however, the Trial Judge let the testimony stand, on the ground it was "other bad acts" evidence admissible to show the defendants' knowledge and intent. The Court held that this was error (but harmless), since the government's Rule 404(b) argument was a concession that there was no showing a conspiracy existed, as required for Rule 801(d)(2)(E), and even "other acts" evidence is inadmissible if it is also hearsay.

United States v. Cordoba, 104 F.3d 225 (9th Cir. 1997) : In the course of remanding a drug conviction on other grounds, the Court announced that it would not entertain a challenge to the admission of bad acts evidence under Rule 404(b) where that evidence had been properly admitted to impeach the defendant under Rule 609. The Court reasoned that when a conviction is properly admitted under Rule 609, any error in admitting the conviction under Rule 404(b) is automatically harmless.

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Relationship to Other Rules -- Rules 413-415

United States v. Meacham, 115 F.3d 1488 (10th Cir. 1997) : Affirming a conviction for transporting a minor for sexual activity, the Court held that the Trial Judge properly admitted evidence that the defendant had committed a previous sexual act on the victim several years earlier, as well as evidence that he molested his two step-daughters when they were young girls more than 30 years earlier. The evidence was admitted under both Rule 404(b) and Rule 414 because of some uncertainty about the effective date of the latter Rule. In affirming, the Court indicated that a Rule 403 balancing is required under both Rules and that in this case the evidence was properly admitted on the issue of intent and to show plan and preparation. It observed that the Trial Judge instructed the jury not to use the evidence for propensity to molest, which would be allowed under Rule 414.

[ss] Rule 404(b) -- Remoteness

United States v. DeFiore, 720 F.2d 757 (2d Cir. 1983) : In a prosecution charging a scheme to defraud city and state tax officials, the Court rejected a defendant's claim that evidence of other acts should not have been used to prove intent because the acts were outside the five-year limitations period for the offenses charged.

United States v. Arnold, 890 F.2d 825 (6th Cir. 1989) : Affirming a conviction for conspiracy to distribute marijuana, the Court held that although it was a close question, there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the defendant's alibi witness to be asked about a minor marijuana transaction with the defendant 18 years previously, as it was unlikely the witness or the defendant was seriously or unfairly prejudiced, especially considering the government's strong evidence of the defendant's involvement in the charged offense.

United States v. Gometz, 879 F.2d 256 (7th Cir. 1989) : Evidence that the defendant in this prosecution for assault and possessing dangerous weapons in prison had been convicted of abetting the murder of a prison guard in 1983 was too remote in time, and there was no showing the acts were similar, to be admissible on defendant's intent in this case. The error was harmless, however.

United States v. Love, 419 F.3d 825 (8th Cir. 2005) : In a cocaine base distribution case, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of the defendant's three prior convictions for selling cocaine base. Although two of the convictions occurred in 1991 and 1994, the offenses were very similar, so they were probative of his knowledge and intent, and were not overly remote. In United States v. Strong, 415 F.3d 902 (8th Cir. 2005) , the Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of the defendant's 1987 conviction for robbery and felon firearm possession. The evidence was relevant to rebut a claim of "mere presence" and it was not too remote, given "the facts of this case" and that his "history of firearms convictions directly bears on his knowledge of, and intent to[,] possess a firearm at the time of the charged offense." In United States v. Adams, 401 F.3d 886 (8th Cir. 2005) , the Court held that evidence of the defendant's 1986 conviction for possession of heroin with intent to distribute was properly admitted in his trial for conspiring to distribute heroin in 2001. Since the defendant had been incarcerated from 1986 to 1997, the effective four-year interval was "well within the bounds of admission." In a medical malpractice case, King v. Ahrens, n314 the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that the defendant's medical license had been suspended eight years earlier, as any probative value the evidence had on the absence of mistake in failing to note critical information on the medical chart and on the doctor's credibility was substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect, given the remoteness in time and the dissimilarity between the incidents. In United States v. Johnson, n315 the Court held that evidence that the defendant in this murder prosecution had previously threatened his aunt with a knife could be relevant to his awareness of the risk his actions posed to the victim, thus tending to show the required element of malice, but the threat six years previously was too remote from the defendant's state of mind at the time of the offense. The error was harmless, however.

United States v. Simtob, 901 F.2d 799 (9th Cir. 1990) : The defendant's conviction for distribution of cocaine was affirmed, the Court finding no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of a 1973 conviction for LSD distribution and a 1974 conviction for marijuana distribution to show predisposition rebutting an entrapment defense. In United States v. Spillone, 879 F.2d 514 (9th Cir. 1989) , there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the defendant's 1971 conviction of a similar crime to show intent in a loansharking prosecution. Rejecting an inflexible rule with respect to the remoteness of other acts, the Court held that given the similarity of the offenses, the prior conviction was not so remote as to require its exclusion.

United States v. Hernandez, 896 F.2d 513 (11th Cir. 1990) : The Court held that evidence of a six-year-old conviction otherwise admissible under the Rule might carry far less probative weight due to its temporal remoteness were it not for the fact the defendant spent much of the interim period in prison and was still on probation when arrested.

[tt] Rule 404(b) -- Stipulations -- Criminal Cases

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Generally

Old Chief v. United States, 519 U.S. 172 (1997) : The Court held that a defendant must be permitted, under Rule 403, to stipulate to the felony element in a felon firearm possession prosecution, and thereby keep out evidence of the judgment of conviction. However, the Court emphasized that the government is generally allowed to prove its case through evidence rather than by forced stipulation: "If there were a justification for receiving evidence of the nature of prior acts on some issue other than status (i.e., to prove 'motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident,' Fed. Rule Evid. 404(b)), Rule 404(b) guarantees the opportunity to seek its admission." (Emphasis added.) Therefore, it is unlikely after Old Chief that a defendant can force the prosecution to stipulate to the intent element (as opposed to the status element) of a crime. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comments, §§ 403.02[6]-[11], 404.02[16].

United States v. Clark, 184 F.3d 858 (D.C. Cir. 1999) : In a prosecution for felon firearm possession and bribery, a stipulation was entered that Clark had been convicted of a felony; the nature of the conviction was not mentioned. Clark argued that the Trial Judge was required to "bifurcate" the trial, so that the jury would first hear only the evidence bearing on bribery and possession of the firearm and then, if the jury found these charges established, it would be informed of his felon status. Finding no abuse of discretion in rejecting this bifurcation remedy, the Court noted that the proposal went beyond anything required by Old Chief. The Judge had done exactly what Old Chief required, keep from the jury the name and nature of Clark's felony. The Court also noted that the bifurcation alternative might prejudice the prosecution, because it would "keep from the jury the fact that the reason it was unlawful for Clark to possess a gun was that he was an ex-felon." In United States v. Crowder, 141 F.3d 1202 (D.C. Cir. 1998) (en banc), two defendants had been convicted in separate prosecutions for possession of drugs with intent to distribute. In each case, the defendant objected to evidence of other drug crimes on the ground that he had offered to stipulate to knowledge and intent elements and was defending only on the ground of, in one case, a police frame-up or, in the other, mistaken identity. On a first appeal (Crowder I), n316 the en banc Court reversed and remanded. The decision was vacated by the Supreme Court in light of its decision in Old Chief v. United States. On remand, the Court of Appeals observed (citing this Manual) that the theory of its earlier decision failed when tested against Old Chief. Crowder I was premised on the defendant's stipulation to an element making other evidence on the element irrelevant. However, Old Chief explicitly rejected that view. Thus, the Rule 404(b) evidence could not be excluded because it was irrelevant, although it could be excluded if its probative value were substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect or other countervailing factors under Rule 403. Affirming the convictions, the Court held that the other crimes evidence had probative value that was not substantially outweighed by the "ambiguous, conditional, and tentative" stipulations that were offered. Four Judges dissented, arguing that Crowder I had not held that a defendant's concession renders bad acts irrelevant under Rule 402, but rather that it makes the evidence inadmissible under Rule 404(b) because it would serve only to show propensity, once the defendant concedes the purpose for which the government seeks to introduce the evidence.

United States v. Hebeka, 25 F.3d 287 (6th Cir. 1994) : A grocer was charged with food stamp fraud. He had been previously convicted for food stamp fraud, and banned for life from participating as a grocer in the food stamp program. To prove that the defendant's sale of his grocery store after his first conviction was a sham, the government introduced his prior food stamp conviction, as relevant to his motivation, intent, and plan in setting up a sham transfer of the grocery store. The defendant offered to stipulate that he had been disqualified from the food stamp program, arguing that this made the actual conviction irrelevant, but the Court stated that "the defendant has no right to selectively stipulate to particular elements of the offense." Accordingly, the prior conviction was relevant to motive and was properly admitted.

United States v. Jefferson, 215 F.3d 820 (8th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed gang-related convictions involving murder and drug trafficking, holding that evidence of one defendant's felony conviction for witness tampering and another defendant's juvenile conviction for assault were properly admitted as background evidence. The Court held that the government was not required to accept the defendants' proffered stipulations as to their felony convictions, since Old Chief applied only where the purpose of the government's evidence is to prove the element of prior conviction in a felon firearm possession charge.

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Stipulations -- Criminal Cases -- Intent

United States v. Queen, 132 F.3d 991 (4th Cir. 1997) : In a trial for witness tampering, the defendant admitted meeting with the witness, but denied threatening her. The Court held that evidence that the defendant had threatened and intimidated witnesses nine years earlier in an unrelated case was properly admitted to show intent, and it rejected the argument that the uncharged misconduct evidence was irrelevant because the defendant had offered to stipulate intent if the jury found the witness' testimony that she had been threatened to be true, and held that the government was not required to accept the stipulation. The conditional stipulation could become a source of jury confusion and it would interfere with the prosecution's freedom to decide how to discharge its burden of proving every element of the crime charged. "It could well have believed that prior-act evidence was necessary, in view of attacks on witness credibility, to bolster its proof of intent."

United States v. Bilderbeck, 163 F.3d 971 (6th Cir. 1999) : The defendant was charged with attempted possession of cocaine with intent to distribute, after negotiations with an informant for a drug deal fell through. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of prior drug deals between the defendant and the informant, even though the defendant was willing to stipulate that he intended to attempt to possess the cocaine, since the evidence was probative of his intent and was not unfairly prejudicial.

United States v. Hill, 249 F.3d 707 (8th Cir. 2001) : The Court held that there was no error in admitting, in a prosecution of cocaine possession with intent to distribute, evidence of the defendant's prior drug conviction, despite the defense assertion that "[w]e intend to limit the scope of our defense so as not to raise any issue concerning mental state." The Court concluded that its precedents beginning with United States v. Jenkins, 7 F.3d 803 (8th Cir. 1993) , which permitted a defendant to preclude Rule 404(b) rebuttal evidence by testimony or stipulation removing a mental element as an issue in the case, had been "overruled, or at least substantially limited," by Old Chief v. United States. In this case, where the defendant was essentially claiming that his presence at the crime scene was fortuitous, the government was entitled to prove his intent to possess for distribution, and the prejudicial effect of the evidence did not substantially outweigh its probative value. In a prosecution for aiding and abetting firearms sales to a convicted felon, United States v. Crouch, n317 the Court held that evidence of the defendant's previous gun sales to convicted felons was properly admitted in the government's case-in-chief to prove intent. It held that uncharged misconduct can be admissible to prove intent during the government's case-in-chief, "even if the defendant plans to present a general denial defense."

[iii] Rule 404(b) -- Stipulations -- Criminal Cases -- Predicate Convictions

Old Chief v. United States, 519 U.S. 172 (1997) : In a felon firearm prosecution, the Court held that where the defendant had offered to stipulate to the felony element of the crime, it was an abuse of discretion under Rule 403 to permit the government to offer the judgment of conviction to prove the defendant's prior felony. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comments, §§ 403.02[6]-[11], 404.02[16].

[uu] Rule 404(b) -- Subsequent Acts

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Association

United States v. Procopio, 88 F.3d 21 (1st Cir. 1996) : The Court found there was no abuse of discretion in an armed robbery case in admitting evidence of armed robberies committed by the defendants two years after the robbery that was the subject of the trial. The evidence showed a criminal association between the defendants. Noting that "the inference goes somewhat beyond the mere implication that either man was of bad character," the Court said that the decision to admit the evidence was, however, a close one under Rule 403. The "need to reason backward from 1993 to 1991" weakened the probative value of the evidence as to criminal association in the charged crime. "And here, as is often the case with Rule 404(b) evidence, the permissible inference (criminal association) overlapped with, and went only a small step beyond, the forbidden one (criminal character)."

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Subsequent Acts -- Intent

United States v. Latney, 108 F.3d 1446 (D.C. Cir. 1997) : The Court held there was no error in admitting evidence of the defendant's drug activity eight months after the drug crimes charged. There is no special rule governing the admissibility of acts occurring after, as opposed to before, uncharged misconduct; the question in every case is "whether the bad acts evidence is relevant to something provable other than the defendant's character." Here, the subsequent activity was probative of the defendant's knowledge and intent. In United States v. Brown, 16 F.3d 423 (D.C. Cir. 1994) , the Court rejected the defendant's argument that it was error to join counts related to drug and firearms possession in November 1990 with counts related to similar possession in February 1991, holding that a pager and firearms seized in February were relevant to show intent, knowledge, or absence of mistake with respect to the November offenses. One Judge dissented on the ground that there was insufficient temporal nexus between the two events for the latter to shed significant light on the defendant's intent at the earlier time and there were no circumstances suggesting the subsequent acts were materially connected with the prior event.

United States v. Germosen, 139 F.3d 120 (2d Cir. 1998) : In a prosecution for conspiracy to commit fraud arising from travel agency defaults, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the defendant's travel agency defaulted after he was arrested. Although the default occurred after the conspiracy ended, it was probative of the defendant's intent in other travel agency defaults with which he was connected.

United States v. Boyd, 595 F.2d 120 (3d Cir. 1978) : The Court reversed convictions on conspiracy and substantive drug counts, holding it was error to admit proof of postconspiracy actions by two defendants. The Court found that the later actions shed no light on the defendants' intent at an earlier time.

United States v. Whaley, 786 F.2d 1229 (4th Cir. 1986) : Affirming a conviction for making false statements on a loan application, the Court held that evidence concerning a similar transaction (in which the defendant used his status as a retired FBI agent to obtain special treatment from a car rental agency) three months after the application, as well as evidence of conduct prior to the application, was admissible to prove intent.

United States v. Peterson, 244 F.3d 385 (5th Cir. 2001) : The Court affirmed fraud convictions arising out of a telemarketing scheme, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that after the scheme was shut down, one of the defendants was engaged in training other telemarketers to make misrepresentations. The evidence would not have been admissible to prove the defendant's conduct in the charged scheme. However, once the jury concluded that he committed the conduct at issue, "they could consider evidence of similar subsequent conduct (relatively closely linked in time), and evidence of his intent on that subsequent occasion, to draw inferences" about his intent in the charged scheme.

United States v. Haywood, 280 F.3d 715 (6th Cir. 2002) : The Court reversed a conviction for possession of crack cocaine with intent to distribute because the defendant's conviction for possession of crack four months later was erroneously admitted. The latter offense involved 1.3 grams of crack, while the charged offense was for 18 grams. The Court held that possession of the smaller amount, which was consistent with personal use, shed no light on the defendant's intent to distribute, so its only value would be the impermissible one of showing a propensity toward illegal drug possession. The dissenting Judge found no abuse of discretion, since possession of a drug "suggests a degree of involvement in the trade that tends to support an inference of intent to distribute that drug at another time," and, in his view, it also tended to show that possession on the earlier (charged) occasion was knowing.

United States v. Radtke, 415 F.3d 826 (8th Cir. 2005) : Affirming tax fraud convictions, the Court found no abuse of discretion when a defendant was precluded from introducing an amended tax return as proof of his good faith when filing the original return. Particularly when, as here, the amended return is filed post-indictment, it has minimal probative value on the defendant's state of mind at the time of the offense and it presents a substantial danger of confusing the issues and misleading the jury. Affirming the conviction of an antiabortion protester for interfering with a Deputy U.S. Marshal in United States v. Shedlock, 62 F.3d 214 (8th Cir. 1995) , the Court held there was no error in admitting evidence of the defendant's vociferous conduct at a clinic protest 29 days later, as it tended to show his intent during the earlier confrontation. In United States v. Johnson, n318 the Court affirmed convictions for aiding and abetting in heroin distribution, holding that evidence of the defendant's participation in subsequent drug transactions was admissible to prove his prior knowledge and intent.

United States v. Rodriguez, 45 F.3d 302 (9th Cir. 1995) : The Court reversed, on nonevidentiary grounds, a conviction for possession of a prohibited object in prison. It indicated that on retrial the Trial Judge should exclude evidence that the defendant was involved in a fight with another inmate more than a month after the object in question was taken from him. The Court stated that "there is no support for the conclusion that evidence of a fight one month after the confiscation of the item could prove, other than by impermissible use of character evidence, Rodriguez's intent in possessing the object." In United States v. Ayers, 924 F.2d 1468 (9th Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed convictions for a 1985 tax evasion conspiracy, holding that evidence one defendant submitted a Customs declaration in 1987 falsely denying possession of more than $10,000 in currency was highly probative of his intent to defraud the government.

United States v. Zamora, 222 F.3d 756 (10th Cir. 2000) : Affirming a conviction for aiding and abetting an armed robbery of a credit union, the Court found no error in the admission of evidence that the defendant robbed a restaurant two hours after the unsuccessful attempt to rob the credit union. The robbery was probative of the defendant's intent to rob the credit union, even though the robbery was subsequent to the crime charged. The Court noted that the closeness in time between the charged crime and the subsequent uncharged misconduct was "highly significant," because it was reasonable "to infer that within such a short span of time Zamora's state of mind remained the same." In United States v. Olivo, 69 F.3d 1057 (10th Cir. 1995) , supplemented, 80 F.3d 1466 (10th Cir. 1996) , the Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute 1000 kilograms or more of marijuana, finding no error in the admission of 185 pounds of marijuana seized from the defendant's car more than a year after the charged conspiracy was terminated. Stating that "Rule 404(b) does not specifically exclude acts subsequent to the incident or incidents giving rise to the indictment," the Court considered the admissibility question "close" given the long time between the charged offense and the uncharged misconduct, but it relied on other cases in which "extrinsic evidence separated by more than a year from the charged conduct has been found probative of intent." In United States v. Mittleider, n319 evidence of the defendant's subsequent conversation with an undercover agent concerning a gun purchase was admissible to show intent and absence of mistake in a prosecution for firearms violations.

[iii] Rule 404(b) -- Subsequent Acts -- Knowledge

United States v. Garcia-Rosa, 876 F.2d 209 (1st Cir. 1989) , vacated on other grounds, 498 U.S. 954 (1990) : The Court held, in reversing a conviction for offenses in connection with a drug-importation conspiracy, that evidence of drugs found in the defendant's home at the time of his arrest, 16 months after the events in issue, was not admissible because he had never put his knowledge of drugs at issue, so it could not be used to rebut implications that he "knew nothing about drugs"; it was not probative to imply his knowledge that a loan given at the earlier time was to be used for an illegal drug-related purpose; and the prejudicial effect of the evidence far exceeded any probative value it might have.

United States v. Ramirez, 894 F.2d 565 (2d Cir. 1990) : In affirming a conviction for cocaine offenses, the Court rejected any per se rule that subsequent similar act evidence inherently lacks relevancy and held that evidence of the defendant's participation in a cocaine sale in September 1988 was relevant to establish his knowledge and mental state at the time of the charged offense in December 1987.

United States v. Hadaway, 681 F.2d 214 (4th Cir. 1982) : The Court, in a prosecution for aiding and abetting theft from an interstate shipment, upheld the admission of testimony about other occasions when the defendant was involved in similar situations as tending to establish that the defendant knew he was dealing with stolen goods. The evidence was admissible even though it involved acts that occurred 18 months after the crime charged.

United States v. Contreras, 602 F.2d 1237 (5th Cir. 1979) : The Court held that evidence of the defendant's drug use subsequent to the charged events was admissible to show knowledge at the relevant time.

United States v. White, 788 F.2d 390 (6th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiring and aiding and abetting in violating the housing rights of a black family, holding that evidence of a subsequent arson by the codefendant should not have been admitted even if the defendant learned of it, since later knowledge did not prove what the defendant knew at the time of the relevant acts.

United States v. Johnson, 934 F.2d 936 (8th Cir. 1991) : The Court affirmed convictions for aiding and abetting in heroin distribution, holding that evidence of the defendant's participation in subsequent drug transactions was admissible to prove his prior knowledge and intent.

United States v. Hinostroza, 297 F.3d 924 (9th Cir. 2002) : Affirming convictions for making false statements on a firearms application, the Court held that false statements on two firearms applications made after those charged in the indictment were properly admitted to prove "the defendant's knowledge that his earlier attempts were based on false statements as well." In United States v. DeSalvo, n320 as part of an investigation into fraud in connection with Medicare billing, the government induced the defendant to make a promotional videotape in which she described her business and her knowledge and proficiency in performing "lost charge audits." The Court held there was no error in introducing the videotape to prove the defendant's knowledge that prior Medicare claims were fraudulent. In United States v. Corona, n321 the Court held that drug customer lists found in the defendant's wallet 11 months after the charged crime were admissible to prove knowledge inconsistent with his defense that he was an innocent bystander to a drug transaction. In United States v. Bibo-Rodriguez, n322 the Court affirmed the defendant's conviction for importing cocaine, holding there was no error in admitting evidence that he imported marijuana in a similar manner nine weeks later to prove that the charged importation was knowing.

[iv] Rule 404(b) -- Subsequent Acts -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Watson, 894 F.2d 1345 (D.C. Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed a conviction for cocaine possession, holding that evidence that the defendant participated in a cocaine transaction three months after the charged offense was relevant to his knowledge and intent on the occasion in question. The Court rejected the argument that Rule 404(b) automatically barred evidence of subsequent acts, but noted that the temporal (as well as the logical) relationship between a later act and a defendant's earlier state of mind attenuates the relevance of such proof.

United States v. Echeverri, 854 F.2d 638 (3d Cir. 1988) : The Court held that evidence of cocaine in the defendant's apartment 18 months after the termination of the alleged conspiracy was not probative, but its admission was harmless error.

United States v. Morsley, 64 F.3d 907 (4th Cir. 1995) : A witness in a drug and firearms prosecution testified that, on the day Morsley was arrested, the witness was talking with "Raleek" when the police arrived; "Raleek" panicked, handed the witness her pocketbook, and asked her to leave; outside, the witness was stopped by the police, who discovered a bag of cocaine in her pocketbook. The Court held that the evidence might have been probative of motive and intent in connection with the charged acts occurring previously, but it was hardly necessary because the charged conduct alone made the perpetrator's intent abundantly clear. However, the evidence did tend to rebut the defense contention that Morsley and "Raleek" were not the same person.

United States v. Bakke, 942 F.2d 977 (6th Cir. 1991) : The Court reversed a defendant's conviction for participation in a drug conspiracy ending in October 1987 because evidence had been admitted that he pleaded guilty to possessing drugs in April 1988, and there was no showing of any relationship between the charged conspiracy and subsequent drug transactions. The government's argument that he must have "learned the ropes" of the marijuana trade by participating in the earlier conspiracy would be mere speculation.

United States v. Betts, 16 F.3d 748 (7th Cir. 1994) : The Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit evidence of 16 pounds of marijuana and related paraphernalia seized at the defendants' home 18 months after the end of the charged marijuana distribution conspiracy, since it had little or no probative worth in establishing knowledge or intent regarding the conspiracy. The concurring Judge suggested the evidence may have shown the defendants were in the drug business on a continuing basis and thus were more likely to have participated in the charged conspiracy, but the majority rejected a distinction between proof of a propensity to commit drug offenses (clearly inadmissible under the Rule) and proof that drug trafficking was a person's occupation. We note that proof of a continuing business may be probative in showing knowledge or intent, but that in this case acts 18 months apart with nothing to connect them would not be probative of a continuing business.

United States v. Fischel, 693 F.2d 800 (8th Cir. 1982) : In a prosecution for possession of methamphetamine with intent to distribute and for conspiracy, the Court upheld the introduction of evidence showing that the defendant provided the drug at a party two months after the conspiracy ended. The evidence was used to rebut a suggestion that another person was the real drug dealer, not the defendant.

United States v. Hodges, 770 F.2d 1475 (9th Cir. 1985) : The Court reversed a conviction for conspiracy to defraud lending institutions, finding error in the admission of testimony that approximately five months after the last alleged act of the conspiracy the defendant attempted to extort money from an alleged coconspirator to paint a favorable picture of her involvement. The Court reasoned that the defendant's state of mind five months later was not highly probative of his state of mind at the time of the alleged conspiracy.

Hill v. Bache Halsey Stuart Shields Inc., 790 F.2d 817 (10th Cir. 1986) : Reversing a judgment for a customer against a commodities futures broker, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to exclude evidence of the plaintiff's trading five months after he closed his account with the defendant. The trading was similar to that done with the defendant, and the Court found that it was highly probative on the issue of whether the plaintiff authorized trades by the defendant.

United States v. Miller, 959 F.2d 1535 (11th Cir. 1992) (en banc): The panel had reversed the defendant's conviction for cocaine trafficking on the ground that evidence of a second transaction nine months later was not sufficiently similar and distinctive to prove identity. n323 The Court en banc affirmed the conviction, holding that the similarity of the two offenses, including the same supplier and same location, was sufficient to mark them as the handiwork of the accused. In United States v. Terebecki, n324 the Court affirmed a conviction for aiding and abetting wire fraud, finding no error in the admission of evidence concerning a questionable transaction that occurred some 15 months after the charged fraud.

[v] Rule 404(b) -- Subsequent Acts -- Modus Operandi

United States v. Anifowoshe, 307 F.3d 643 (7th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed a fraud conviction arising from a scheme that involved depositing stolen and forged credit card access checks into fictitious bank accounts. The Court held that the defendant's state fraud conviction was properly admitted to show a modus operandi, even though the act at issue there occurred subsequent to the acts giving rise to the federal prosecution. The perpetrator used the same address to open fraudulent accounts in both the federal and state schemes, two checks deposited in the state account displayed an address identical to an address used to open the federal accounts, and both schemes involved the same methods.

[vv] Rule 404(b) -- Tax Returns

United States v. Layne, 192 F.3d 556 (6th Cir. 1999) : In a narcotics prosecution, the Court found no error under Rule 404(b) in the introduction of the defendant's tax information, indicating that he failed to file tax returns for a number of years and reported only $1442 in income for another year. Although the Court "frowns on the admission of income tax returns in narcotics cases where the government has not charged the defendant with both narcotics and tax law violations," tax information is admissible "(1) where the government has charged the defendant with operating a continuing criminal enterprise, or (2) in narcotics cases where the defendant engaged in extravagant spending or possessed massive unreported wealth." In this case, the tax information was probative to show that the defendant had "great unreported wealth."

[ww] Rule 404(b) -- Threats

United States v. Runnels, 93 F.3d 390 (7th Cir. 1996) : Police officers were convicted of various offenses resulting from terrorizing and robbing citizens. Affirming these convictions, the Court held that evidence of a threat made by one of the officers to one of the victims was properly admitted under Rule 404(b). After unrelated charges against the victim had been dropped, one of the defendants encountered the victim outside the courtroom and said "I'm still gonna get you, punk." This threat was probative of motive, and also tended to prove "a plan or an intent to avenge the dismissal of the charges" against the victim.

United States v. Ramirez-Lopez, 315 F.3d 1143 (9th Cir. 2003) : In a trial for alien smuggling, the government elicited from a prosecution witness that just before he began to testify, the defendant made a threatening gesture by moving his finger back and forth, indicating that the witness was not to say anything. Holding it was error (but not plain error) when the government failed to give notice as required by Rule 404(b) of its intent to elicit the threat evidence, the Court rejected the argument that the threat was not Rule 404(b) evidence because it was "inextricably intertwined," since a threat at trial cannot be viewed as inextricably intertwined with the charged offense of alien smuggling.

United States v. Nichols, 374 F.3d 959 (10th Cir. 2004) : In a prosecution for drug possession, evidence was admitted of a threat the defendant made against an officer at the time of his arrest. The Court noted that threats against witnesses imply an intention to destroy evidence and are thus an implicit acknowledgment of guilt, but this threat against an arresting officer did not indicate a similar intent. It might, nevertheless, be admissible under Rule 404(b), but the Court declined to determine whether one of the listed purposes was satisfied, since even if admission of the evidence was an abuse of discretion, any error was harmless.

[xx] Rule 404(b) -- Timing for Introduction

United States v. Colon, 880 F.2d 650 (2d Cir. 1989) : In reversing a defendant's conviction of aiding a heroin sale for improper admission of prior sales after the defendant had in effect stipulated intent out of the case, the Court noted that the prosecutor should have waited until it was clear what theory the defense was asserting before introducing the other acts evidence. In United States v. Benedetto, n325 the Court indicated that it favored an "inclusionary" approach toward other crimes evidence, but noted the dangers of accepting such evidence. Referring to its past decisions, the Court wrote that "we have emphasized that admission of such strongly prejudicial evidence should normally await the conclusion of the defendant's case, since the court will then be in the best position to balance the probative worth of, and the Government's need for, such testimony against the prejudice to the defendant." We question whether Colon and Benedetto can be reconciled with Old Chief v. United States (see the Editorial Explanatory Comments, §§ 403.02[6]-[11], 404.02[16]).

United States v. Smith Grading & Paving, Inc., 760 F.2d 527 (4th Cir. 1985) : In a prosecution for a conspiracy to rig bids, the Court upheld the introduction of one defendant's previous bidrigging to prove knowledge and intent to enter a conspiracy. It held that extrinsic evidence may be properly admitted under Rule 404(b) even though it could not be used under Rule 608(b), but it suggested that "the better practice is for the prosecutor to introduce this type of evidence in his or her case in chief" rather than on rebuttal in an effort "to have the last say through evidence of a defendant's prior misconduct."

United States v. Schweihs, 971 F.2d 1302 (7th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed extortion convictions, holding there was no abuse of discretion in admitting other act evidence during the government's case-in-chief where there was ample reason to believe that the defendant would raise intent or knowledge as an issue, even though the Hobbs Act does not necessarily involve specific intent.

United States v. Southwest Bus Sales, Inc., 20 F.3d 1449 (8th Cir. 1994) : In a prosecution for conspiring to suppress competition in school bus sales and mail fraud, the Trial Judge excluded evidence of an earlier Sherman Act conspiracy and false bid bonds during the government's case-in-chief and admitted it only during the government's rebuttal, on the ground that the defendants' testimony had put in issue the questions of intent to conspire, motive and opportunity, lack of mistake, and knowledge. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion, but noted that the government should have been allowed to introduce the other acts in its case-in-chief, since intent was an element of the charges and thus an issue relevant to the government's burden of proving its case. In United States v. Olsen, n326 the Court held that because counsel's opening statement raised lack of knowledge as a defense, the government could offer Rule 404(b) evidence in its case-in-chief.

United States v. Hearst, 563 F.2d 1331 (9th Cir. 1977) : The Court affirmed admission of other crimes evidence to show intent, observing that the government justified its introduction of the evidence as part of its case-in-chief on the ground that it was clear from the outset of the trial that the accused would raise a duress defense, and there was no basis for assuming any undue prejudice from the timing of the government's proof. We note that any implication that the defendant would have to raise the intent issue first, before the government is permitted to offer bad act evidence, is questionable after Old Chief.

United States v. Chirinos, 112 F.3d 1089 (11th Cir. 1997) : In a trial on firearms charges, the defendants moved in limine to exclude uncharged misconduct evidence and to prevent the prosecution from referring to that misconduct in opening argument. The Trial Judge deferred a ruling and informed the prosecution that it would have to "take its chances on opening statement." The prosecution referred to the uncharged misconduct on opening statement, and the Trial Judge eventually ruled to exclude the evidence at trial. Although the Court observed that the better course of action would have been to rule on the admissibility of the Rule 404(b) evidence prior to allowing the government to mention the incident in its opening argument, it concluded, in light of the Judge's numerous cautionary instructions, that there was no abuse of discretion in allowing mention of the evidence.

[yy] Rule 404(b) -- Unfair Use

United States v. Sauseda, 24 F.3d 97 (10th Cir. 1994) : In a prosecution for possession of marijuana with intent to distribute and for using a firearm during a drug transaction, the government introduced the fact that the defendant was carrying a small amount of cocaine when he was arrested. The Trial Judge admitted the cocaine into evidence on the ground that "whatever he's got on him when he's arrested, the Government can go into that." In an opinion by Retired Supreme Court Justice White, sitting by designation, the Court of Appeals held that reasoning "inadequate." Justice White stated that Rule 404(b) nowhere suggests that evidence of uncharged crimes is admissible "solely because that evidence is found on the body of the person when arrested." However, the Court found any error to be harmless, and accordingly refused to consider whether the evidence might have been admissible on grounds consistent with Rule 404(b).

United States v. Crutchfield, 26 F.3d 1098 (11th Cir. 1994) : In a prosecution of a married couple for illegal importation of Figi banded iguanas, the Court held that pervasive prosecutorial misconduct required reversal of the conviction. The Court mentioned, as one of the most egregious acts of misconduct, the questioning of a prosecution witness about the fact that the female defendant "was pregnant with another man's child" before she married the male defendant: "The prosecutor's decision to place the 'sexual character' of Penny Crutchfield before the jury in a case involving the importation of iguanas is simply inexcusable." In United States v. Philibert, 947 F.2d 1467 (11th Cir. 1991) , the Court held that the defendant, charged with making a threatening telephone call, had been deprived of a fair trial by the admission of evidence that he had purchased certain firearms two months before the call, as the weapons were entirely unrelated to the call. Although the purchases may have been additional evidence of his paranoid schizophrenia, such use is barred by the Rule; the error was exacerbated because the only weapon displayed was the one he never had in his possession.

[zz] Rule 404(b) -- Use by Accused

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Accused's Bad Acts

United States v. Wiman, 77 F.3d 981 (7th Cir. 1996) : In a felon firearm possession case, the prosecution gave notice of intent to offer evidence that at the time the defendant was found with the firearm, he was carrying burglary tools and was attempting to burglarize a gas station. The Court found no plain error in excluding the evidence, noting that the ruling below barred only the government from introducing the burglary-related evidence; the defendant remained free to present the evidence, and had made no attempt to do so at trial.

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Use by Accused -- Bad Acts by Prosecution Witness

United States v. Sampol, 636 F.2d 621 (D.C. Cir. 1980) : The Court reversed convictions for assassinating a former Chilean Ambassador to the United States on another ground, but held it was proper to exclude modus operandi evidence offered to show that the key government witness, a participant in the assassination, had carried out other acts working alone. The Court noted that modus operandi evidence can be offered by the defense, but observed that the link between the government witness and other acts was tenuous, the other acts were not done in the same manner, and the witness had not yet met the defendants when the other acts took place.

United States v. Reeves, 892 F.2d 1223 (5th Cir. 1990) : In affirming a conviction for extortion, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence, offered on an entrapment defense, of a government witness' remote and unrelated contact with state officials, as it was not pertinent to the defendants' predisposition to commit the crimes charged, nor was it evidence of the sort of "systematic campaign of threats and intimidation" held admissible in United States v. McClure. n327 In McClure, the Court reversed convictions for selling heroin for erroneous exclusion of evidence that the same government informant who allegedly coerced the defendant into making the sales of heroin resulting in his prosecution subsequently coerced three other individuals into making narcotics sales. Noting that Rule 404(b) is generally used by the government to introduce evidence, the Court in McClure indicated that the defendant should have been able to take advantage of the Rule and to have introduced evidence of the informant's scheme because "a jury could not properly convict him absent the opportunity to hear the proffered testimony bearing upon his theory of defense and weigh its credibility along with the other evidence in the case."

United States v. Perez, 870 F.2d 1222 (7th Cir. 1989) : The Court upheld exclusion of defense evidence concerning an arrest of a government witness, since the defendant did not make a showing that the witness was the source of narcotics on the earlier occasion and did not support an argument that she was the "head" of the drug operation.

United States v. Cruz-Garcia, 344 F.3d 951 (9th Cir. 2003) : The Court reversed a drug conviction because the defendant was not permitted to introduce evidence of the facts underlying a cooperating witness' prior convictions. In his plea allocution the witness had not mentioned the defendant, but at trial he testified that the defendant was the drug dealer and he was just along for the ride; the prosecutor argued that the witness was "dumb as a box of rocks" and would have needed the defendant's help to pull off the crime. The Court held that the underlying facts were not offered to show the witness' propensity to commit the charged crime but to show his ability to commit the crime on his own, which the prosecutor had made the central issue. Proving the underlying facts could only have prejudiced the government's case by undermining its theory that the witness was too dumb to act on his own, and that would not be unfair prejudice.

United States v. Montelongo, 420 F.3d 1169 (10th Cir. 2005) : Officers at a border checkpoint stopped a truck co-driven by the defendants and found marijuana packed in duffle bags beneath the mattress in the sleeping compartment. The defendants, charged with possession, obtained an in limine ruling excluding evidence that a few months before they were arrested, a truck owned by the same owner had been stopped and marijuana packed in duffle bags was found hidden in the sleeping compartment. The co-drivers in that case claimed that they had found the marijuana by the side of the road and had hidden it themselves; the owner was not charged in the case. At trial in this case the owner testified for the government that he had inspected the truck just before the defendant picked it up and had found no marijuana in it. The defendants sought to cross-examine the owner about the prior incident, as evidence that he was operating a drug ring of which they were unaware, but the Judge ruled that the cross-examination was not permissible under Rules 404(b) and 608(b). Reversing, the Court held that the cross-examination should have been permitted as "reverse-404(b)" evidence: the similarities between the two crimes, and the possibility that the jury might have disbelieved the "somewhat incredible" story of the drivers in the first incident and have concluded that the owner himself packed it in the truck, tended to make it less probable that the defendants knowingly possessed the marijuana, while concerns about prejudice were less than when other-acts evidence is offered against a defendant and there was no substantial risk of confusing the jury or wasting time.

United States v. Cohen, 888 F.2d 770 (11th Cir. 1989) : The Court reversed convictions for fraud and tax evasion because the defendants were not permitted to show that the government's primary witness, who pleaded guilty in connection with the scheme, had previously participated in a similar scheme, which would have shown his ability to concoct and conduct such a scheme without aid from the defendants. In United States v. Rodriguez, n328 the Court affirmed convictions for drug-related offenses, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence offered by the defendants in support of an entrapment defense that government agents and an informant in the undercover operation had "hounded" another man into smuggling marijuana on another occasion. The defendants provided no specifics; moreover, the other man had pleaded guilty and denied any enticements had been offered by the agents.

[iii] Rule 404(b) -- Use by Accused -- Bad Acts by Third Party

United States v. Wright, 783 F.2d 1091 (D.C. Cir. 1986) : In a kidnapping case, the Court held that one defendant was properly precluded from cross-examining another concerning his pulling a gun on a business partner. Although the Court referred to this as character evidence, it appears that the defendant who sought to cross-examine was doing so in support of a duress defense. Knowledge of the codefendant's previous act with a gun might have been relevant to prove the reasonableness of fear on the part of the cross-examining defendant. It does not appear, however, that this theory was advanced in the case.

United States v. Aboumoussallem, 726 F.2d 906 (2d Cir. 1984) : To support a defense that he had been unwittingly duped by relatives into carrying heroin from Lebanon into the United States, the defendant offered testimony concerning another instance in which his relatives smuggled hashish oil into an innocent woman's suitcase. The Court stated that "the standard of admissibility when a criminal defendant offers similar acts evidence as a shield need not be as restrictive as when a prosecutor uses such evidence as a sword," since "risks of prejudice are normally absent when the defendant offers similar acts evidence of a third party to prove some fact pertinent to the defense." However, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the ruling that the probative value of evidence about the other incident was insufficient in light of the confusion and delay that would result were the evidence admitted.

United States v. Stevens, 935 F.2d 1380 (3d Cir. 1991) : A defendant charged with robbery and sexual assault tried to introduce testimony by the victim of a similar crime three days later that the defendant was not the assailant. The two crimes took place within a few hundred yards of one another and were otherwise so similar that the investigators initially believed that the same person had committed both crimes. Moreover, the fruits of both robberies, which occurred in New Jersey, surfaced near Ft. Meade, Maryland. Reversing, the Court held that it was error to exclude this "reverse 404(b)" evidence, as its probative value was not substantially outweighed by the prospect of undue delay or confusion of the issues.

United States v. Lucas, 357 F.3d 599 (6th Cir. 2004) : The defendant, charged with possession of cocaine found in her car, claimed that the drugs were placed there when an acquaintance, Presley, had borrowed and used the car a few hours before. The defendant sought to introduce evidence of Presley's prior conviction (arising from another incident) for cocaine possession and distribution, but the Court found no abuse of discretion in exclusion of the evidence. Any propensity inference, even against a third party, is precluded by Rule 404(b); Presley's knowledge of cocaine and intent to sell were not at issue; and any probative value would have been outweighed by the prejudicial effect of leading the jury to decide on the improper basis that Presley's propensity to possess cocaine to sell made it less likely that the defendant was guilty. The concurring Judge believed that the propensity bar of Rule 404(b) does not apply to the acts of third parties; rather, the admissibility of third parties' acts is governed only by the relevance/prejudice analysis of Rules 401 and 403. The Judge noted that a majority of Circuits take that view rather than the "plain language" approach of the majority. In United States v. Hart, 70 F.3d 854 (6th Cir. 1995) , the Court affirmed embezzlement and income tax convictions, holding there was no error in excluding evidence offered by the defendant, the former Chief of Police in Detroit, that another participant in the scheme, a former Deputy Chief, had misled government agents previously. The Court concluded that the evidence could not be used to show propensity on the part of the Deputy Chief and that the alleged prior deception was irrelevant to the present case.

United States v. Seals, 419 F.3d 600 (7th Cir. 2005) : The defendants in a bank robbery case unsuccessfully sought to introduce evidence of another bank robbery two weeks later and 31 miles from the charged crime. Affirming, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to hold the defense offering "reverse-404(b)" evidence to the same standard of similarity applied to the prosecution offering other crimes evidence, but the error was harmless because the evidence was irrelevant. The similarities between the robberies were only generic; there were differences in the number of robbers involved, the disguises worn, the guns used, and the modus operandi (the robbers vaulted over the teller counter in one case and waited on the customer side in the other). One Judge, concurring, disputed the characterization of the evidence as "irrelevant," and would have objected to its exclusion under Rule 403, but agreed that exclusion was harmless error. In United States v. Wilson, 307 F.3d 596 (7th Cir. 2002) : the Court affirmed convictions for wire fraud, finding no error when testimony of an SEC agent regarding the consent and stipulation of a third party was excluded. The Court noted that "[u]nder what has come to be known as 'reverse 404(b) evidence,' a defendant can introduce evidence of someone else's conduct if it tends to negate the defendant's guilt," but added that this evidence may still be excluded under Rule 403. Here, the evidence "would not have played a major role in disproving his [the defendant's] guilt." In United States v. Reed, n329 the Court affirmed a conviction for manufacturing methamphetamine, finding no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence proffered by the defendant that his brother manufactured the drug on multiple occasions. Although the defendant argued that the evidence supported his theory that the brother owned the manufacturing equipment found in the defendant's house, the defendant testified that he had not seen his brother for months and a chemist testified that the residue contained in coffee filters and inside the house indicated that the drug had been recently manufactured.

United States v. Bowman, 215 F.3d 951 (9th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed bank robbery convictions and upheld the exclusion of evidence that other parties were convicted of two bank robberies for which the defendant and his partner were suspects. The persons convicted of those robberies were in custody when four of the five robberies charged in this case were committed, so the other defendants could not have committed those charged crimes. The Court found no abuse of discretion "as the proffered evidence lacked probative value and would have been confusing and diverting to the jury." See also United States v. James, 169 F.3d 1210 (9th Cir. 1999) (en banc), discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 404.02[14] and United States v. Saenz, n330 where the Court noted that "Rule 404(b) does not apply when a defendant seeks to introduce evidence that he knew of a victim's other acts to show the defendant's state of mind," and reversed the defendant's conviction because exclusion of evidence of his knowledge of the victim's prior acts of violence prevented him from supporting his claim of self-defense. In United States v. Spencer, n331 the defendant was charged with felon firearm possession after a gun was found in a search of a car in which he was a passenger. When Miller, the owner of the car, was arrested five days later, a gun was found in the car he was driving. Pursuing a theory that the gun charged to him belonged to Miller, the defendant offered police reports of Miller's arrest to show that Miller possessed a gun similar to the one attributed to the defendant. A divided Court held there was no error in excluding the police reports under Rule 403. The majority conceded in its amended opinion that defendants could use Rule 404(b), but said that because hiding a gun under a car seat is not a distinctive crime, the evidence would not be probative on the issue of identity and would otherwise be time-wasting and confusing. The dissenting Judge argued that the reports clearly were probative of mistaken identity and that there was no reason to believe that evidence relating to Miller would have wasted time, confused the issues, or prejudiced the government, and that the Court was perpetuating "an increasingly common double-standard in criminal cases -- a standard that allows prosecutors inordinate leeway with respect to the introduction of evidence harmful to the defendant while precluding defendants from introducing evidence that would tend to establish their innocence."

United States v. Serrata, 425 F.3d 886 (10th Cir. 2005) : The defendant corrections officers were convicted of civil rights violations for assaulting an inmate. They claimed that he resisted being handcuffed, and introduced evidence that he had previously refused to be handcuffed when arrested. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the defendants were precluded from offering evidence of two other occasions when the inmate resisted being handcuffed. It agreed with the government that it was "not at all clear" that his intent was even relevant to the charges, so the evidence would be used only to establish a propensity, and in any event exclusion was a proper balancing of prejudicial effect and probative value. Affirming convictions arising out of a scheme to defraud banks in United States

v. Puckett, n332 the Court held there was no error in excluding testimony that a codefendant had conned others, which was offered by one defendant to bolster a claim that the codefendant conned the defendant into taking certain actions. The Court found that the excluded testimony concerned acts that were unrelated and dissimilar to the crimes charged.

United States v. Stephens, 365 F.3d 967 (11th Cir. 2004) : Reversing drug convictions, the Court found an abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence that a drug dealer, who claimed that the defendant sold him his drugs, had access to drugs from sources other than the defendant, and was involved in the drug trade even while cooperating with a state investigative bureau. The Court held that Rule 404(b) did not bar this evidence, because it was not offered to show the dealer's propensity. Rather, the evidence was offered to show that the dealer "could have obtained the metamphetamine he turned over to the Government from a source other than Stephens."

[iv] Rule 404(b) -- Use by Accused -- Good Acts by Accused

United States v. Reifsteck, 841 F.2d 701 (6th Cir. 1988) : Affirming a conviction for conspiring to unlawfully use electronic devices, the Court recognized that a defendant might be able to offer evidence of good conduct under Rule 404(b) to rebut an allegation of illicit intent, but it found that the exclusion of other act evidence offered by the defense was not reversible error because it was cumulative of evidence that was admitted.

United States v. Burke, 781 F.2d 1234 (7th Cir. 1985) : The Court affirmed extortion convictions relating to a defendant's scheme to get victims to pay him money that he claimed he would give to the FBI, which was investigating the victims. The defendant offered not only character evidence, but also his own testimony that he had planned to squeal on his clients and that he had given tips and leads to law enforcement officers in the past. Since the defendant's intent was in dispute and the government asked him about whether he had ever misled law enforcement officers, the Court was troubled by the exclusion of the evidence but found no abuse of discretion. In our view, the evidence should have been admitted to negate the intent alleged, pursuant to Rule 404(b). In United States v. Payne, n333 defense evidence that the defendant had bought cars in Detroit below "redbook value" was deemed properly excluded in a prosecution for conspiracy to transport stolen motor vehicles, as having only dubious relevance to prices of cars coming to Indiana from Kentucky and as having a tendency to confuse the issues.

United States v. Radtke, 415 F.3d 826 (8th Cir. 2005) : Affirming tax fraud convictions, the Court found no abuse of discretion when a defendant was precluded from introducing an amended tax return as proof of his good faith when filing the original return. Particularly when, as here, the amended return is filed post-indictment, it has minimal probative value on the defendant's state of mind at the time of the offense and it presents a substantial danger of confusing the issues and misleading the jury. In United States v. Garvin, n334 a conviction for mail fraud was reversed in part because the Court concluded that the appellant was unfairly denied an opportunity to introduce evidence of truthful responses to questions on insurance applications to rebut the government's theory that his false answers on some applications represented a scheme to defraud.

United States v. Thomas, 134 F.3d 975 (9th Cir. 1998) : The defendant claimed that he was entrapped into participation in the charged sale of three pounds of methamphetamine. The government offered as proof of his predisposition that he was a methamphetamine user and that he had at some point in the past sold another participant a couple of single $20 doses of methamphetamine. However, the defendant was not permitted to testify that he had no prior arrest or conviction record and certainly no record of any past criminal behavior suggesting in any way that he might be predisposed to engage in large-scale drug trafficking. Reversing, the Court held that evidence was relevant to the defendant's intent, especially since a government informant had initiated the transaction, determined the type and volume of drugs involved, and arranged the meeting with the "buyer." It was also important to counter any prejudicial effect of the evidence of prior small sales. Because the defendant's character is an essential element of the entrapment defense, exclusion of the evidence was an abuse of discretion. One Judge dissented, arguing that an absence of arrests or criminal record is not relevant on the question of predisposition, because it may simply mean he has never been caught.

[v] Rule 404(b) -- Use by Accused -- Unsolved Other Crimes

United States v. Walton, 217 F.3d 443 (7th Cir. 2000) : Affirming convictions for theft from an ATM machine, the Court found no error in the exclusion of evidence proffered by the defendant of an unsolved ATM theft from the same bank that occurred four months before the charged offense. Although evidence of someone else's crimes is sometimes admissible to negate the defendant's guilt, here the earlier theft was irrelevant "because it was unsolved and occurred four months prior to the instant theft and neither tended to prove nor disprove the defendants' involvement in the charged offense." The Court also noted that "the evidence might conceivably be interpreted as prejudicial to the defendants because it might have suggested to some that the defendants committed the unsolved ATM theft."

[aaa] Rule 404(b) -- Witness' Credibility

United States v. Miller, 895 F.2d 1431 (D.C. Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed a conviction for bank fraud, holding that evidence that a witness who participated in the defendant's check-forging scheme knew of his prior robbery conviction was admitted not to show his propensity but to lend credence to the witness' claim that she feared for her safety if she did not comply with his demands, a state of mind relevant to her credibility.

United States v. Everett, 825 F.2d 658 (2d Cir. 1987) : Although the Court affirmed bank robbery convictions and the admission of testimony concerning a prior robbery, it indicated that when other crimes evidence is admitted for corroborative purposes, the corroboration must be "direct" and the matter corroborated must be "significant."

United States v. Scarfo, 850 F.2d 1015 (3d Cir. 1988) : The Court affirmed an extortion and conspiracy conviction, holding it was proper to admit evidence of the defendant's involvement in various murders. Two cooperating witnesses had been granted immunity from prosecution with respect to these murders, and evidence of the defendant's involvement was important for fair jury consideration of their credibility. See also United States v. Hans, 738 F.2d 88 (3d Cir. 1984) (evidence seized from one codefendant was admissible against another where the evidence corroborated a government witness' testimony about how a bank robbery occurred).

United States v. Bratton, 875 F.2d 439 (5th Cir. 1989) : The Court held, in affirming a conviction for aiding and abetting commission of wire fraud and possession of stolen property, that it was not an abuse of discretion to allow the government to cross-examine the defendant's wife regarding past physical abuse by him against her, because that tended to show a motivation to falsify or fabricate her testimony. The Trial Judge gave a limiting instruction that the evidence could be considered only in assessing the witness' credibility.

United States v. Serlin, 538 F.2d 737 (7th Cir. 1976) : The Court concluded that testimony regarding other acts by the defendant was necessary to prepare the jury for the witness' very damaging testimony that he acted as a "set-up man" for the defendant in luring new customers into the fraudulent scheme.

United States v. Crenshaw, 359 F.3d 977 (8th Cir. 2004) : The Court affirmed convictions for murder in aid of racketeering, but found it was error to admit evidence of a defendant's 1995 conviction for shooting another man. The evidence was not admissible to attack the credibility of an alibi witness, who was in a romantic relationship with the defendant at the time of the crimes: her references to the defendant's interaction with her family in describing the events she witnessed did not turn her into a character witness, and the conviction was irrelevant to any bias she might have, as they were not romantically involved in 1995.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. United States v. Blackwell, 853 F.2d 86 (2d Cir. 1988) .

(n2)Footnote 2. United States v. Angelini, 678 F.2d 380 (1st Cir. 1982) .

(n3)Footnote 3. United States v. Hewitt, 634 F.2d 277 (5th Cir. 1981) .

(n4)Footnote 4. United States v. Jackson, 588 F.2d 1046 (5th Cir. 1979) .

(n5)Footnote 5. United States v. Andrea, 538 F.2d 1255 (6th Cir. 1976) .

(n6)Footnote 6. Palmerin v. Riverside, 794 F.2d 1409 (9th Cir. 1986) .

(n7)Footnote 7. Cohn v. Papke, 655 F.2d 191 (9th Cir. 1981) .

(n8)Footnote 8. United States v. Barrett, 539 F.2d 244 (1st Cir. 1976) .

(n9)Footnote 9. United States v. Sliker, 751 F.2d 477 (2d Cir. 1984) .

(n10)Footnote 10. United States v. Covelli, 738 F.2d 847 (7th Cir. 1984) .

(n11)Footnote 11. United States v. Greenwood, 796 F.2d 49 (4th Cir. 1986) .

(n12)Footnote 12. United States v. Wormick, 709 F.2d 454 (7th Cir. 1983) .

(n13)Footnote 13. United States v. Shannon, 836 F.2d 1125 (8th Cir. 1988) .

(n14)Footnote 14. People of Terr. of Guam v. Camacho, 103 F.3d 863 (9th Cir. 1996) .

(n15)Footnote 15. United States v. Boise, 916 F.2d 497 (9th Cir. 1990) .

(n16)Footnote 16. United States v. Cummings, 798 F.2d 413 (10th Cir. 1986) .

(n17)Footnote 17. United States v. Levy, 731 F.2d 997 (2d Cir. 1984) .

(n18)Footnote 18. United States v. Adams, 759 F.2d 1099 (3d Cir. 1985) .

(n19)Footnote 19. United States v. Torres, 685 F.2d 921 (5th Cir. 1982) .

(n20)Footnote 20. United States v. Vizcarra-Martinez, 66 F.3d 1006 (9th Cir. 1995) .

(n21)Footnote 21. United States v. Leavitt, 878 F.2d 1329 (11th Cir. 1989) .

(n22)Footnote 22. United States v. Martin, 794 F.2d 1531 (11th Cir. 1986) .

(n23)Footnote 23. United States v. Cole, 755 F.2d 748 (11th Cir. 1985) .

(n24)Footnote 24. United States v. Roberts, 933 F.2d 517 (7th Cir. 1991) .

(n25)Footnote 25. United States v. Tate, 821 F.2d 1328 (8th Cir. 1987) .

(n26)Footnote 26. United States v. Forcelle, 86 F.3d 838 (8th Cir. 1996) .

(n27)Footnote 27. United States v. Stovall, 825 F.2d 817 , modified, 833 F.2d 526 (5th Cir. 1987) .

(n28)Footnote 28. United States v. Reynolds, 762 F.2d 489 (6th Cir. 1985) .

(n29)Footnote 29. United States v. Ryan, 213 F.3d 347 (7th Cir. 2000) .

(n30)Footnote 30. United States v. Lahey, 55 F.3d 1289 (7th Cir. 1995) .

(n31)Footnote 31. United States v. Menzer, 29 F.3d 1223 (7th Cir. 1994) .

(n32)Footnote 32. United States v. Shackleford, 738 F.2d 776, 779 (7th Cir. 1984) .

(n33)Footnote 33. United States v. McGuire, 45 F.3d 1177 (8th Cir. 1995) .

(n34)Footnote 34. United States v. Kallin, 50 F.3d 689 (9th Cir. 1995) .

(n35)Footnote 35. United States v. Warren, 25 F.3d 890 (9th Cir. 1994) .

(n36)Footnote 36. United States v. Veltmann, 6 F.3d 1483 (11th Cir. 1993) .

(n37)Footnote 37. United States v. Moosey, 735 F.2d 633 (1st Cir. 1984) .

(n38)Footnote 38. United States v. Thai, 29 F.3d 785 (2d Cir. 1994) .

(n39)Footnote 39. United States v. Wooten, 688 F.2d 941 (4th Cir. 1982) .

(n40)Footnote 40. United States v. Silva, 748 F.2d 262 (5th Cir. 1984) .

(n41)Footnote 41. United States v. O'Dell, 204 F.3d 829 (8th Cir. 2000) .

(n42)Footnote 42. United States v. Dierling, 131 F.3d 722 (8th Cir. 1997) .

(n43)Footnote 43. United States v. Tran, 122 F.3d 670 (8th Cir. 1997) .

(n44)Footnote 44. United States v. Patterson, 819 F.2d 1495 (9th Cir. 1987) .

(n45)Footnote 45. United States v. Vaccaro, 816 F.2d 443 (9th Cir. 1987) .

(n46)Footnote 46. United States v. DeVincent, 546 F.2d 452 (1st Cir. 1976) .

(n47)Footnote 47. United States v. Blackwood, 768 F.2d 131 (7th Cir. 1985) .

(n48)Footnote 48. United States v. Percy, 765 F.2d 1199 (4th Cir. 1985) .

(n49)Footnote 49. United States v. Martin, 773 F.2d 579 (4th Cir. 1985) .

(n50)Footnote 50. United States v. Shaw, 714 F.2d 544 (5th Cir. 1983) .

(n51)Footnote 51. United States v. Tafoya, 757 F.2d 1522 (5th Cir. 1985) .

(n52)Footnote 52. United States v. Jordan, 722 F.2d 353 (7th Cir. 1983) .

(n53)Footnote 53. United States v. Forcelle, 86 F.3d 838 (8th Cir. 1996) .

(n54)Footnote 54. United States v. O'Connor, 737 F.2d 814 (9th Cir. 1984) .

(n55)Footnote 55. United States v. Nadler, 698 F.2d 995 (9th Cir. 1983) .

(n56)Footnote 56. United States v. Harenberg, 732 F.2d 1507 (10th Cir. 1984) .

(n57)Footnote 57. United States v. Williford, 764 F.2d 1493 (11th Cir. 1985) .

(n58)Footnote 58. United States v. Balthazard, 360 F.3d 309 (1st Cir. 2004) .

(n59)Footnote 59. United States v. Santana, 342 F.3d 60 (1st Cir. 2003) .

(n60)Footnote 60. United States v. Perrotta, 289 F.3d 155 (1st Cir. 2002) .

(n61)Footnote 61. United States v. Morris, 700 F.2d 427 (1st Cir. 1983) .

(n62)Footnote 62. United States v. Brennan, 798 F.2d 581 (2d Cir. 1986) .

(n63)Footnote 63. United States v. Bufalino, 683 F.2d 639 (2d Cir. 1982) .

(n64)Footnote 64. United States v. Palma-Ruedas, 121 F.3d 841 (3d Cir. 1997) .

(n65)Footnote 65. United States v. Fraser, 709 F.2d 1556 (6th Cir. 1983) .

(n66)Footnote 66. United States v. Ismail, 756 F.2d 1253 (6th Cir. 1985) .

(n67)Footnote 67. United States v. McKinney, 954 F.2d 471 (7th Cir. 1992) .

(n68)Footnote 68. United States v. Potts, 840 F.2d 368 (7th Cir. 1987) .

(n69)Footnote 69. United States v. Horvath, 731 F.2d 557 (8th Cir. 1984) .

(n70)Footnote 70. United States v. DeLuna, 763 F.2d 897 (8th Cir. 1985) .

(n71)Footnote 71. United States v. Normandeau, 800 F.2d 953 (9th Cir. 1986) .

(n72)Footnote 72. United States v. McKoy, 771 F.2d 1207 (9th Cir. 1985) .

(n73)Footnote 73. United States v. Alonso, 740 F.2d 862 (11th Cir. 1984) .

(n74)Footnote 74. United States v. Chaverra-Cardona, 879 F.2d 1551 (7th Cir. 1989) .

(n75)Footnote 75. United States v. Terebecki, 692 F.2d 1345 (11th Cir. 1982) .

(n76)Footnote 76. United States v. Messersmith, 692 F.2d 1315 (11th Cir. 1982) .

(n77)Footnote 77. United States v. Shavers, 615 F.2d 266 (5th Cir. 1980) .

(n78)Footnote 78. United States v. Hays, 872 F.2d 582 (5th Cir. 1989) .

(n79)Footnote 79. United States v. Robertson, 15 F.3d 862 (9th Cir. 1994) , rev'd on other grounds, 514 U.S. 669 (1995) , reinstated in pertinent part, 73 F.3d 249 (9th Cir. 1996) .

(n80)Footnote 80. United States v. Soundingsides, 820 F.2d 1232, 825 F.2d 1468 (10th Cir. 1987) .

(n81)Footnote 81. United States v. Melia, 691 F.2d 672 (4th Cir. 1982) .

(n82)Footnote 82. United States v. Hodges, 770 F.2d 1475 (9th Cir. 1985) .

(n83)Footnote 83. United States v. Currier, 821 F.2d 52 (1st Cir. 1987) .

(n84)Footnote 84. United States v. Ebens, 800 F.2d 1422 (6th Cir. 1986) .

(n85)Footnote 85. United States v. Zabaneh, 837 F.2d 1249 (5th Cir. 1988) .

(n86)Footnote 86. United States v. Archer, 843 F.2d 1019 (7th Cir. 1988) .

(N87)Footnote 87. United States v. Hudson, 843 F.2d 1062 (7th Cir. 1988) .

(n88)Footnote 88. Monger v. Cessna Aircraft Co., 812 F.2d 402 (8th Cir. 1987) .

(n89)Footnote 89. Brown v. Miller, 631 F.2d 408 (5th Cir. 1980) .

(n90)Footnote 90. Wilson v. City of Chicago, 6 F.3d 1233 (7th Cir. 1993) .

(n91)Footnote 91. Parrish v. Luckie, 963 F.2d 201 (8th Cir. 1992) .

(n92)Footnote 92. Tyler v. White, 811 F.2d 1204 (8th Cir. 1987) .

(n93)Footnote 93. Pittsley v. Warish, 927 F.2d 3 (1st Cir. 1991) .

(n94)Footnote 94. Wierstak v. Heffernan, 789 F.2d 968 (1st Cir. 1986) .

(n95)Footnote 95. Lataille v. Ponte, 754 F.2d 33 (1st Cir. 1985) .

(n96)Footnote 96. Harris v. Davis, 874 F.2d 461 (7th Cir. 1989) .

(n97)Footnote 97. Kelly v. Boeing Petroleum Servs., Inc., 61 F.3d 350 (5th Cir. 1995) .

(n98)Footnote 98. Gastineau v. Fleet Mtge. Corp., 137 F.3d 490 (7th Cir. 1998) .

(n99)Footnote 99. Hunter v. Allis-Chalmers Corp., 797 F.2d 1417 (7th Cir. 1986) .

(n100)Footnote 100. Hogan v. American Tel. & Tel. Co., 812 F.2d 409 (8th Cir. 1987) .

(n101)Footnote 101. Sanjuan v. IBP, Inc., 160 F.3d 1291 (10th Cir. 1998) .

(n102)Footnote 102. Spulak v. K Mart Corp., 894 F.2d 1150 (10th Cir. 1990) .

(n103)Footnote 103. Phillips v. Smalley Maint. Servs., 711 F.2d 1524 (11th Cir. 1983) .

(n104)Footnote 104. Faison v. Nationwide Mtg. Corp., 839 F.2d 680 (D.C. Cir. 1987) .

(n105)Footnote 105. Austin v. Loftsgaarden, 675 F.2d 168 (8th Cir. 1982) .

(n106)Footnote 106. Chicago Coll. of Osteopathic Medicine v. George A. Fuller Co., 719 F.2d 1335 (7th Cir. 1983) .

(n107)Footnote 107. Bradbury v. Phillips Petroleum Co., 815 F.2d 1356 (10th Cir. 1987) .

(n108)Footnote 108. United States v. Lau, 828 F.2d 871 (1st Cir. 1987) .

(n109)Footnote 109. United States v. Cepulonis, 530 F.2d 238 (1st Cir. 1976) .

(n110)Footnote 110. United States v. Anderson, 809 F.2d 1281 (7th Cir. 1987) .

(n111)Footnote 111. United States v. Miller, 725 F.2d 462 (8th Cir. 1984) .

(n112)Footnote 112. United States v. Winters, 729 F.2d 602 (9th Cir. 1984) .

(n113)Footnote 113. United States v. Primrose, 718 F.2d 1484 (10th Cir. 1983) .

(n114)Footnote 114. United States v. Himelwright, 42 F.3d 777 (3d Cir. 1994) .

(n115)Footnote 115. United States v. Walters, 904 F.2d 765 (1st Cir. 1990) .

(n116)Footnote 116. United States v. D'Alora, 585 F.2d 16 (1st Cir. 1978) .

(n117)Footnote 117. United States v. Calhoun, 604 F.2d 1216 (9th Cir. 1979) .

(n118)Footnote 118. United States v. Boyle, 675 F.2d 430 (1st Cir. 1982) .

(n119)Footnote 119. United States v. Kibler, 667 F.2d 452 (4th Cir. 1982) .

(n120)Footnote 120. United States v. Echeverri, 854 F.2d 638 (3d Cir. 1988) .

(n121)Footnote 121. United States v. Orr, 864 F.2d 1505 (10th Cir. 1988) .

(n122)Footnote 122. United States v. Moore, 732 F.2d 983 (D.C. Cir. 1984) .

(n123)Footnote 123. United States v. Bronco, 597 F.2d 1300 (9th Cir. 1979) .

(n124)Footnote 124. United States v. Williams, 577 F.2d 188 (2d Cir. 1978) .

(n125)Footnote 125. United States v. Fortenberry, 860 F.2d 628 (5th Cir. 1988) .

(n126)Footnote 126. United States v. DeGeratto, 876 F.2d 576 (7th Cir. 1988) .

(n127)Footnote 127. United States v. Meeker, 558 F.2d 387 (7th Cir. 1977) .

(n128)Footnote 128. United States v. Neary, 733 F.2d 210 (2d Cir. 1984) .

(n129)Footnote 129. United States v. Ingraham, 832 F.2d 229 (1st Cir. 1987) .

(n130)Footnote 130. United States v. Andiarena, 823 F.2d 673 (1st Cir. 1987) .

(n131)Footnote 131. United States v. Cruz, 797 F.2d 90 (2d Cir. 1986) .

(n132)Footnote 132. United States v. Gubelman, 571 F.2d 1252 (2d Cir. 1978) .

(n133)Footnote 133. United States v. Evans, 848 F.2d 1352 (5th Cir. 1988) , modified on other grounds, 854 F.2d 56 (5th Cir. 1988) .

(n134)Footnote 134. United States v. Torres-Flores, 827 F.2d 1031 (5th Cir. 1987) .

(n135)Footnote 135. United States v. Chong Won Tai, 994 F.2d 1204 (7th Cir. 1993) .

(n136)Footnote 136. United States v. Townsend, 924 F.2d 1385 (7th Cir. 1991) .

(n137)Footnote 137. United States v. Covelli, 738 F.2d 847 (7th Cir. 1984) .

(n138)Footnote 138. United States v. Moore, 115 F.3d 1348 (7th Cir. 1997) .

(n139)Footnote 139. United States v. Smith, 103 F.3d 600 (7th Cir. 1996) .

(n140)Footnote 140. United States v. Johnson, 820 F.2d 1065 (9th Cir. 1987) .

(n141)Footnote 141. United States v. Gutierrez, 696 F.2d 753 (10th Cir. 1982) .

(n142)Footnote 142. United States v. Scott, 795 F.2d 1245 (5th Cir. 1986) .

(n143)Footnote 143. Durns v. United States, 562 F.2d 542 (8th Cir. 1977) .

(n144)Footnote 144. United States v. Powell, 587 F.2d 443 (9th Cir. 1978) .

(n145)Footnote 145. See United States v. Patterson, 20 F.3d 801 (8th Cir. 1994) .

(n146)Footnote 146. United States v. Miller, 883 F.2d 1540 (11th Cir. 1989) .

(n147)Footnote 147. United States v. Stubbins, 877 F.2d 42 (11th Cir. 1989) .

(n148)Footnote 148. United States v. Morano, 697 F.2d 923 (11th Cir. 1983) .

(n149)Footnote 149. United States v. Pirovolos, 844 F.2d 415 (7th Cir. 1988) .

(n150)Footnote 150. United States v. Shoffner, 826 F.2d 619 (7th Cir. 1987) .

(n151)Footnote 151. United States v. Burk, 912 F.2d 225 (8th Cir. 1990) .

(n152)Footnote 152. United States v. Engleman, 648 F.2d 473 (8th Cir. 1981) .

(n153)Footnote 153. United States v. Boise, 916 F.2d 497 (9th Cir. 1990) .

(n154)Footnote 154. United States v. Bettencourt, 614 F.2d 214 (9th Cir. 1980) .

(n155)Footnote 155. United States v. Soundingsides, 820 F.2d 1232 (10th Cir. 1987) .

(n156)Footnote 156. United States v. Williams, 816 F.2d 1527 (11th Cir. 1987) .

(n157)Footnote 157. Brown v. Trustees of Boston Univ., 891 F.2d 337 (1st Cir. 1989) .

(n158)Footnote 158. United States v. Davis, 657 F.2d 637 (4th Cir. 1981) .

(n159)Footnote 159. United States v. Elkins, 732 F.2d 1280 (6th Cir. 1984) .

(n160)Footnote 160. United States v. Nichols, 808 F.2d 660 (8th Cir. 1987) .

(n161)Footnote 161. United States v. Molinares Charris, 822 F.2d 1213 (1st Cir. 1987) .

(n162)Footnote 162. United States v. Tedder, 801 F.2d 1437 (4th Cir. 1986) .

(n163)Footnote 163. United States v. Heath, 188 F.3d 916 (7th Cir. 1999) .

(n164)Footnote 164. United States v. Logan, 121 F.3d 1172 (8th Cir. 1997) .

(n165)Footnote 165. Fitzgerald v. United States, 719 F.2d 1069 (10th Cir. 1983) .

(n166)Footnote 166. United States v. Norton, 846 F.2d 521 (8th Cir. 1988) .

(n167)Footnote 167. United States v. Davis, 707 F.2d 880 (6th Cir. 1983) .

(n168)Footnote 168. United States v. Nicely, 922 F.2d 850 (D.C. Cir. 1991) .

(n169)Footnote 169. United States v. McNeill, 728 F.2d 5 (1st Cir. 1984) .

(n170)Footnote 170. United States v. Cardillo, 708 F.2d 29 (1st Cir. 1983) .

(n171)Footnote 171. United States v. Caputo, 808 F.2d 963 (2d Cir. 1987) .

(n172)Footnote 172. United States v. Smith, 727 F.2d 214 (2d Cir. 1984) .

(n173)Footnote 173. United States v. Bice-Bey, 701 F.2d 1086 (4th Cir. 1983) .

(n174)Footnote 174. United States v. Campbell, 845 F.2d 1374 (6th Cir. 1988) .

(n175)Footnote 175. United States v. Crachy, 800 F.2d 83 (6th Cir. 1986) .

(n176)Footnote 176. United States v. Hamilton, 684 F.2d 380 (6th Cir. 1982) .

(n177)Footnote 177. United States v. Macey, 8 F.3d 462 (7th Cir. 1993) .

(n178)Footnote 178. United States v. Draiman, 784 F.2d 248 (7th Cir. 1986) .

(n179)Footnote 179. United States v. Chaimson, 760 F.2d 798 (7th Cir. 1985) .

(n180)Footnote 180. United States v. Fitterer, 710 F.2d 1328 (8th Cir. 1983) .

(n181)Footnote 181. United States v. Hardrich, 707 F.2d 992 (8th Cir. 1983) .

(n182)Footnote 182. United States v. Simon, 839 F.2d 1461 (11th Cir. 1988) .

(n183)Footnote 183. United States v. Jackson, 761 F.2d 1541 (11th Cir. 1985) .

(n184)Footnote 184. United States v. Scott, 701 F.2d 1340 (11th Cir. 1983) .

(n185)Footnote 185. United States v. Blount, 364 F.3d 173 (4th Cir. 2004) .

(n186)Footnote 186. United States v. Mohr, 318 F.3d 613 (4th Cir. 2003) .

(n187)Footnote 187. United States v. Westmoreland, 841 F.2d 572 (5th Cir. 1988) .

(n188)Footnote 188. United States v. Wilson, 732 F.2d 404 (5th Cir. 1984) .

(n189)Footnote 189. United States v. Roberts, 619 F.2d 379 (5th Cir. 1980) .

(n190)Footnote 190. United States v. Arnold, 773 F.2d 823 (7th Cir. 1985) .

(n191)Footnote 191. United States v. Radseck, 718 F.2d 233 (7th Cir. 1983) .

(n192)Footnote 192. United States v. Miller, 874 F.2d 1255 (9th Cir. 1989) .

(n193)Footnote 193. United States v. Collorafi, 876 F.2d 303 (2d Cir. 1989) .

(n194)Footnote 194. United States v. Micke, 859 F.2d 473 (7th Cir. 1988) .

(n195)Footnote 195. United States v. Birkenstock, 823 F.2d 1026 (7th Cir. 1987) .

(n196)Footnote 196. United States v. Krapp, 815 F.2d 1183 (8th Cir. 1987) .

(n197)Footnote 197. United States v. Burkett, 821 F.2d 1306 (8th Cir. 1987) .

(n198)Footnote 198. United States v. Albuquerque, 538 F.2d 277 (9th Cir. 1976) .

(n199)Footnote 199. United States v. Rosenwasser, 550 F.2d 806 (2d Cir. 1977) .

(n200)Footnote 200. United States v. Smith Grading & Paving, Inc., 760 F.2d 527 (4th Cir. 1985) .

(n201)Footnote 201. United States v. Warledo, 557 F.2d 721 (10th Cir. 1977) .

(n202)Footnote 202. United States v. Jobson, 102 F.3d 214 (6th Cir. 1996) .

(n203)Footnote 203. United States v. Steele, 727 F.2d 580 (6th Cir. 1984) .

(n204)Footnote 204. United States v. Garcia-Orozco, 997 F.2d 1302 (9th Cir. 1993) .

(n205)Footnote 205. United States v. Bibo-Rodriguez, 922 F.2d 1398 (9th Cir. 1991) .

(n206)Footnote 206. United States v. Lopez-Martinez, 725 F.2d 471 (9th Cir. 1984) .

(n207)Footnote 207. United States v. Garcia-Rosa, 876 F.2d 209 (1st Cir. 1989) , vacated on other grounds, 498 U.S. 954 (1990) .

(n208)Footnote 208. United States v. Moccia, 681 F.2d 61 (1st Cir. 1982) .

(n209)Footnote 209. United States v. Arango-Correa, 851 F.2d 54 (2d Cir. 1988) .

(n210)Footnote 210. United States v. Da Silva, 725 F.2d 828 (2d Cir. 1983) .

(n211)Footnote 211. United States v. Nichols, 750 F.2d 1260 (5th Cir. 1985) .

(n212)Footnote 212. United States v. Contreras, 602 F.2d 1237 (5th Cir. 1979) .

(n213)Footnote 213. United States v. Hitow, 889 F.2d 1573 (6th Cir. 1989) .

(n214)Footnote 214. United States v. O'Connell, 841 F.2d 1408 (8th Cir. 1988) .

(n215)Footnote 215. United States v. Vizcarra-Martinez, 66 F.3d 1006 (9th Cir. 1995) .

(n216)Footnote 216. United States v. Mayans, 17 F.3d 1174 (9th Cir. 1994) .

(n217)Footnote 217. United States v. Kendall, 766 F.2d 1426 (10th Cir. 1985) .

(n218)Footnote 218. United States v. Moore, 97 F.3d 561 (D.C. Cir. 1996) .

(n219)Footnote 219. United States v. Chesney, 86 F.3d 564 (6th Cir. 1996) .

(n220)Footnote 220. United States v. Pearson, 746 F.2d 787 (11th Cir. 1984) .

(n221)Footnote 221. United States v. Rhodes, 886 F.2d 375 (D.C. Cir. 1989) .

(n222)Footnote 222. United States v. Wiley, 846 F.2d 150 (2d Cir. 1988) .

(n223)Footnote 223. United States v. Nemes, 555 F.2d 51 (2d Cir. 1977) .

(n224)Footnote 224. United States v. Weisman, 736 F.2d 421 (7th Cir. 1984) .

(n225)Footnote 225. United States v. Popow, 821 F.2d 483 (8th Cir. 1987) .

(n226)Footnote 226. United States v. Hutchings, 751 F.2d 230 (8th Cir. 1984) .

(n227)Footnote 227. United States v. Ortega-Chavez, 682 F.2d 1086 (5th Cir. 1982) .

(n228)Footnote 228. United States v. Walker, 710 F.2d 1062 (5th Cir. 1983) .

(n229)Footnote 229. United States v. Marshall, 683 F.2d 1212 (8th Cir. 1982) .

(n230)Footnote 230. United States v. Hyman, 741 F.2d 906 (7th Cir. 1984) .

(n231)Footnote 231. United States v. Albuquerque, 538 F.2d 277 (9th Cir. 1976) .

(n232)Footnote 232. Treece v. Hochstetler, 213 F.3d 360 (7th Cir. 2000) .

(n233)Footnote 233. United States v. Montoya, 891 F.2d 1273 (7th Cir. 1989) .

(n234)Footnote 234. Aetna Cas. & Sur. Co. v. Gosdin, 803 F.2d 1153 (11th Cir. 1986) .

(n235)Footnote 235. United States v. Kerr, 778 F.2d 690 (11th Cir. 1985) .

(n236)Footnote 236. United States v. Lewis, 780 F.2d 1140 (4th Cir. 1986) .

(n237)Footnote 237. Roshan v. Fard, 705 F.2d 102 (4th Cir. 1983) .

(n238)Footnote 238. United States v. Vance, 871 F.2d 572 (6th Cir. 1989) .

(n239)Footnote 239. United States v. Hattaway, 740 F.2d 1419 (7th Cir. 1984) .

(n240)Footnote 240. United States v. Turpin, 707 F.2d 332 (8th Cir. 1983) .

(n241)Footnote 241. United States v. Wagoner, 713 F.2d 1371 (8th Cir. 1983) .

(n242)Footnote 242. United States v. Gomez, 733 F.2d 69 (8th Cir. 1984) .

(n243)Footnote 243. United States v. Brown, 880 F.2d 1012 (9th Cir. 1989) .

(n244)Footnote 244. United States v. Bowman, 720 F.2d 1103 (9th Cir. 1983) .

(n245)Footnote 245. United States v. Bradshaw, 690 F.2d 704 (9th Cir. 1982) .

(n246)Footnote 246. United States v. Buchanan, 787 F.2d 477 (10th Cir. 1986) .

(n247)Footnote 247. United States v. Franklin, 704 F.2d 1183 (10th Cir. 1983) .

(n248)Footnote 248. Bowden v. McKenna, 600 F.2d 282 (1st Cir. 1979) .

(n249)Footnote 249. United States v. Troop, 890 F.2d 1393 (7th Cir. 1989) .

(n250)Footnote 250. United States v. Saniti, 604 F.2d 603 (9th Cir. 1979) .

(n251)Footnote 251. United States v. Taylor, 728 F.2d 864 (7th Cir. 1984) .

(n252)Footnote 252. United States v. Jordan, 893 F.2d 182 (8th Cir. 1990) , vacated on other grounds, 496 U.S. 902 , reaff'd on reconsideration, 913 F.2d 1286 (8th Cir. 1990) .

(n253)Footnote 253. United States v. Moore, 735 F.2d 289 (8th Cir. 1984) .

(n254)Footnote 254. United States v. Sliker, 751 F.2d 477 (2d Cir. 1984) .

(n255)Footnote 255. United States v. Tager, 788 F.2d 349 (6th Cir. 1986) .

(n256)Footnote 256. United States v. Shriver, 842 F.2d 968 (7th Cir. 1988) .

(n257)Footnote 257. United States v. Conners, 894 F.2d 987 (8th Cir. 1990) .

(n258)Footnote 258. United States v. Galyen, 798 F.2d 331 (8th Cir. 1986) .

(n259)Footnote 259. United States v. Poston, 727 F.2d 734 (8th Cir. 1984) .

(n260)Footnote 260. United States v. Conners, 825 F.2d 1384 (9th Cir. 1987) .

(n261)Footnote 261. United States v. Brown, 912 F.2d 1040 (9th Cir. 1990) .

(n262)Footnote 262. United States v. Kerr, 778 F.2d 690 (11th Cir. 1985) .

(n263)Footnote 263. United States v. Bufalino, 683 F.2d 639 (2d Cir. 1982) .

(n264)Footnote 264. United States v. Boone, 759 F.2d 345 (4th Cir. 1985) .

(n265)Footnote 265. United States v. Chagra, 754 F.2d 1186 (5th Cir. 1985) .

(n266)Footnote 266. United States v. Barron, 707 F.2d 125 (5th Cir. 1983) .

(n267)Footnote 267. United States v. Cunningham, 103 F.3d 553 (7th Cir. 1996) .

(n268)Footnote 268. United States v. Holt, 817 F.2d 1264 (7th Cir. 1987) .

(n269)Footnote 269. United States v. Cyphers, 553 F.2d 1064 (7th Cir. 1977) .

(n270)Footnote 270. United States v. Mays, 822 F.2d 793 (8th Cir. 1987) .

(n271)Footnote 271. United States v. Feldman, 788 F.2d 544 (9th Cir. 1986) .

(n272)Footnote 272. United States v. French, 974 F.2d 687 (6th Cir. 1992) .

(n273)Footnote 273. United States v. Robinson, 110 F.3d 1320 (8th Cir. 1997) .

(n274)Footnote 274. United States v. Swinton, 75 F.3d 374 (8th Cir. 1996) .

(n275)Footnote 275. United States v. Sutton, 41 F.3d 1257 (8th Cir. 1994) .

(n276)Footnote 276. United States v. Kern, 12 F.3d 122 (8th Cir. 1993) .

(n277)Footnote 277. United States v. Perez-Tosta, 36 F.3d 1552 (11th Cir. 1994) .

(n278)Footnote 278. United States v. Cortijo-Diaz, 875 F.2d 13 (1st Cir. 1989) .

(n279)Footnote 279. United States v. LeCompte, 99 F.3d 274 (8th Cir. 1996) .

(n280)Footnote 280. United States v. Sampson, 980 F.2d 883 (3d Cir. 1992) .

(n281)Footnote 281. United States v. Prati, 861 F.2d 82 (5th Cir. 1988) .

(n282)Footnote 282. United States v. Harvey, 845 F.2d 760 (8th Cir. 1988) .

(n283)Footnote 283. United States v. Mothershed, 859 F.2d 585 (8th Cir. 1988) .

(n284)Footnote 284. United States v. Doran, 882 F.2d 1511 (10th Cir. 1989) .

(n285)Footnote 285. United States v. Morales-Quinones, 812 F.2d 604 (10th Cir. 1987) .

(n286)Footnote 286. United States v. Naranjo, 710 F.2d 1465 (10th Cir. 1983) .

(n287)Footnote 287. United States v. Dysart, 705 F.2d 1247 (10th Cir. 1983) .

(n288)Footnote 288. United States v. Harris, 661 F.2d 138 (10th Cir. 1981) .

(n289)Footnote 289. United States v. Johnson, 802 F.2d 1459 (D.C. Cir. 1986) .

(n290)Footnote 290. United States v. Nichols, 750 F.2d 1260 (5th Cir. 1985) .

(n291)Footnote 291. United States v. Mortazavi, 702 F.2d 526 (5th Cir. 1983) .

(n292)Footnote 292. United States v. Laughlin, 772 F.2d 1382 (7th Cir. 1985) .

(n293)Footnote 293. United States v. Gaertner, 705 F.2d 210 (7th Cir. 1983) .

(n294)Footnote 294. United States v. Vitale, 728 F.2d 1090 (8th Cir. 1984) .

(n295)Footnote 295. United States v. Koessel, 706 F.2d 271 (8th Cir. 1983) .

(n296)Footnote 296. United States v. Spetz, 721 F.2d 1457 (9th Cir. 1983) .

(n297)Footnote 297. United States v. Lewis, 700 F.2d 1328 (10th Cir. 1983) .

(n298)Footnote 298. United States v. Pilling, 721 F.2d 286 (10th Cir. 1983) .

(n299)Footnote 299. United States v. Pelusio, 725 F.2d 161 (2d Cir. 1983) .

(n300)Footnote 300. United States v. Weisman, 736 F.2d 421 (7th Cir. 1984) .

(n301)Footnote 301. United States v. Riggins, 539 F.2d 682 (9th Cir. 1976) .

(n302)Footnote 302. United States v. Johnson, 634 F.2d 735 (4th Cir. 1980) .

(n303)Footnote 303. United States v. Fountain, 768 F.2d 790 (7th Cir. 1985) .

(n304)Footnote 304. United States v. Stump, 735 F.2d 273 (7th Cir. 1984) .

(n305)Footnote 305. United States v. Bartley, 855 F.2d 547 (8th Cir. 1988) .

(n306)Footnote 306. United States v. Bent, 707 F.2d 1190 (11th Cir. 1983) .

(n307)Footnote 307. United States v. Killingsworth, 719 F.2d 1130 (11th Cir. 1983) .

(n308)Footnote 308. United States v. Draiman, 784 F.2d 248 (7th Cir. 1986) .

(n309)Footnote 309. United States v. Peco, 784 F.2d 798 (7th Cir. 1986) .

(n310)Footnote 310. United States v. Wynn, 845 F.2d 1439 (7th Cir. 1988) .

(n311)Footnote 311. United States v. Weston, 708 F.2d 302 (7th Cir. 1983) .

(n312)Footnote 312. United States v. Large, 729 F.2d 636 (8th Cir. 1984) .

(n313)Footnote 313. United States v. Eaton, 808 F.2d 72 (D.C. Cir. 1987) .

(n314)Footnote 314. King v. Ahrens, 16 F.3d 265 (8th Cir. 1994) .

(n315)Footnote 315. United States v. Johnson, 879 F.2d 331 (8th Cir. 1989) .

(n316)Footnote 316. United States v. Crowder, 87 F.3d 1405 (D.C. Cir. 1996) .

(n317)Footnote 317. United States v. Crouch, 46 F.3d 871 (8th Cir. 1995) .

(n318)Footnote 318. United States v. Johnson, 934 F.2d 936 (8th Cir. 1991) .

(n319)Footnote 319. United States v. Mittleider, 835 F.2d 769 (10th Cir. 1987) .

(n320)Footnote 320. United States v. DeSalvo, 41 F.3d 505 (9th Cir. 1994) .

(n321)Footnote 321. United States v. Corona, 34 F.3d 876 (9th Cir. 1994) .

(n322)Footnote 322. United States v. Bibo-Rodriguez, 922 F.2d 1398 (9th Cir. 1991) .

(n323)Footnote 323. United States v. Miller, 883 F.2d 1540 (11th Cir. 1989) .

(n324)Footnote 324. United States v. Terebecki, 692 F.2d 1345 (11th Cir. 1982) .

(n325)Footnote 325. United States v. Benedetto, 571 F.2d 1246, 1248-1250 (2d Cir. 1978) .

(n326)Footnote 326. United States v. Olsen, 589 F.2d 351 (8th Cir. 1978) .

(n327)Footnote 327. United States v. McClure, 546 F.2d 670 (5th Cir. 1977) .

(n328)Footnote 328. United States v. Rodriguez, 917 F.2d 1286 (11th Cir. 1990) (per curiam), vacated in part on other grounds, 935 F.2d 194 (11th Cir. 1991) (per curiam).

(n329)Footnote 329. United States v. Reed, 259 F.3d 631 (7th Cir. 2001) .

(n330)Footnote 330. United States v. Saenz, 179 F.3d 686 (9th Cir. 1999) .

(n331)Footnote 331. United States v. Spencer, 1 F.3d 742 (9th Cir. 1992) , amended (9th Cir. 1993).

(n332)Footnote 332. United States v. Puckett, 692 F.2d 663 (10th Cir. 1982) .

(n333)Footnote 333. United States v. Payne, 635 F.2d 643 (7th Cir. 1980) .

(n334)Footnote 334. United States v. Garvin, 565 F.2d 519 (8th Cir. 1977) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 404 RULE 404

1-404 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 404.04

404.04 Legislative History

[Go To Supp]

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Advisory Committee's Note

Subdivision (a). This subdivision deals with the basic question whether character evidence should be admitted. Once the admissibility of character evidence in some form is established under this rule, reference must then be made to Rule 405, which follows, in order to determine the appropriate method of proof. If the character is that of a witness, see Rules 608 and 610 [Editor's Note: The correct reference is to Rules 608 and 609] for methods of proof.

Character questions arise in two fundamentally different ways. (1) Character may itself be an element of a crime, claim, or defense. A situation of this kind is commonly referred to as "character in issue." Illustrations are: the chastity of the victim under a statute specifying her chastity as an element of the crime of seduction, or the competency of the driver in an action for negligently entrusting a motor vehicle to an incompetent driver. No problem of the general relevancy of character evidence is involved, and the present rule therefore has no provision on the subject. The only question relates to allowable methods of proof, as to which see Rule 405, immediately following. (2) Character evidence is susceptible of being used for the purpose of suggesting an inference that the person acted on the occasion in question consistently with his character. This use of character is often described as "circumstantial." Illustrations are: evidence of a violent disposition to prove that the person was the aggressor in an affray, or evidence of honesty in disproof of a charge of theft. This circumstantial use of character evidence raises questions of relevancy as well as questions of allowable methods of proof.

In most jurisdictions today, the circumstantial use of character is rejected but with important exceptions: (1) an accused may introduce pertinent evidence of good character (often misleadingly described as "putting his character in issue"), in which event the prosecution may rebut with evidence of bad character; (2) an accused may introduce pertinent evidence of the character of the victim, as in support of a claim of self-defense to a charge of homicide or consent in a case of rape, [Editor's Note: The Rules on attacking the character of a rape victim have been changed by Rule 412] and the prosecution may introduce similar evidence in rebuttal of the character evidence, or, in a homicide case, to rebut a claim that deceased was the first aggressor, however proved; and (3) the character of a witness may be gone into as bearing on his credibility. McCormick §§ 155-161. This pattern is incorporated in the rule. While its basis lies more in history and experience than in logic, an underlying justification can fairly be found in terms of the relative presence and absence of prejudice in the various situations. Falknor, Extrinsic Policies Affecting Admissibility, 10 Rutgers L. Rev. 574, 584 (1956); McCormick § 157. In any event, the criminal rule is so deeply imbedded in our jurisprudence as to assume almost constitutional proportions and to override doubts of the basic relevancy of the evidence.

The limitation to pertinent traits of character, rather than character generally, in paragraphs (1) and (2) is in accordance with the prevailing view. McCormick § 158, p. 334. A similar provision in Rule 608, to which reference is made in paragraph (3), limits character evidence respecting witnesses to the trait of truthfulness or untruthfulness.

The argument is made that circumstantial use of character ought to be allowed in civil cases to the same extent as in criminal cases, i.e., evidence of good (nonprejudicial) character would be admissible in the first instance, subject to rebuttal by evidence of bad character. Falknor, Extrinsic Policies Affecting Admissibility, 10 Rutgers L. Rev. 574, 581-583 (1956); Tentative Recommendation and a Study Relating to the Uniform Rules of Evidence (Art. VI. Extrinsic Policies Affecting Admissibility), Cal. Law Revision Comm'n, Rep., Rec. & Studies, 657-658 (1964). Uniform Rule 47 goes farther, in that it assumes that character evidence in general satisfies the conditions of relevancy, except as provided in Uniform Rule 48. The difficulty with expanding the use of character evidence in civil cases is set forth by the California Law Revision Commission in its ultimate rejection of Uniform Rule 47, id., 615:

Character evidence is of slight probative value and may be very prejudicial. It tends to distract the trier of fact from the main question of what actually happened on the particular occasion. It subtly permits the trier of fact to reward the good man and to punish the bad man because of their respective characters despite what the evidence in the case shows actually happened.

Much of the force of the position of those favoring greater use of character evidence in civil cases is dissipated by their support of Uniform Rule 48 which excludes the evidence in negligence cases, where it could be expected to achieve its maximum usefulness. Moreover, expanding concepts of "character," which seem of necessity to extend into such areas as psychiatric evaluation and psychological testing, coupled with expanded admissibility, would open up such vistas of mental examinations as caused the Court concern in Schlagenhauf v. Holder, 379 U.S. 104, 85 S. Ct. 234, 13 L. Ed. 2d 152 (1964) . It is believed that those espousing change have not met the burden of persuasion.

Subdivision (b) deals with a specialized but important application of the general rule excluding circumstantial use of character evidence. Consistently with that rule, evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove character as a basis for suggesting the inference that conduct on a particular occasion was in conformity with it. However, the evidence may be offered for another purpose, such as proof of motive, opportunity, and so on, which does not fall within the prohibition. In this situation the rule does not require that the evidence be excluded. No mechanical solution is offered. The determination must be made whether the danger of undue prejudice outweighs the probative value of the evidence, in view of the availability of other means of proof and other factors appropriate for making decisions of this kind under Rule 403. Slough and Knightly, Other Vices, Other Crimes, 41 Iowa L. Rev. 325 (1956).

[2] 1987 Amendment Committee Note

1987 Amendment Committee Note

The entire Advisory Committee Note accompanying the gender-neutralizing changes effective October 1, 1987 is as follows: "The amendments are technical. No substantive change is intended."

[3] 1991 Amendment Committee Note

1991 Amendment Committee Note

Rule 404(b) has emerged as one of the most cited Rules in the Rules of Evidence. In many criminal cases evidence of an accused's extrinsic acts is viewed as an important asset in the prosecution's case against an accused. Although there are a few reported decisions on use of such evidence by the defense, see, e.g., United States v. McClure, 546 F.2d 670 (5th Cir. 1977) (acts of informant offered in entrapment defense), the overwhelming number of cases involve introduction of that evidence by the prosecution.

The amendment to Rule 404(b) adds a pretrial notice requirement in criminal cases and is intended to reduce surprise and promote early resolution of the issue of admissibility. The notice requirement thus places Rule 404(b) in the mainstream with notice and disclosure provisions in other rules of evidence. See, e.g., Rule 412 (written notice of intent to offer evidence under rule), Rule 609 (written notice of intent to offer conviction older than 10 years), Rule 803(24) and 804(b)(5) (notice of intent to use residual hearsay exceptions).

The Rule expects that counsel for both the defense and the prosecution will submit the necessary request and information in a reasonable and timely fashion. Other than requiring pretrial notice, no specific time limits are stated in recognition that what constitutes a reasonable request or disclosure will depend largely on the circumstances of each case. Compare Fla.Stat.Ann. § 90.404(2)(b) (notice must be given at least 10 days before trial) with Tex.R.Evid. 404(b) (no time limit).

Likewise, no specific form of notice is required. The Committee considered and rejected a requirement that the notice satisfy the particularity requirements normally required of language used in a charging instrument. Cf. Fla.Stat.Ann. § 90.404(2)(b) (written disclosure must describe uncharged misconduct with particularity required of an indictment or information). Instead, the Committee opted for a generalized notice provision which requires the prosecution to apprise the defense of the general nature of the evidence of extrinsic acts. The Committee does not intend that the amendment will supersede other rules of admissibility or disclosure, such as the Jencks Act, 18 U.S.C. § 3500, et. seq. nor require the prosecution to disclose directly or indirectly the names and addresses of its witnesses, something it is currently not required to do under Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 16.

The amendment requires the prosecution to provide notice, regardless of how it intends to use the extrinsic act evidence at trial, i.e., during its case-in-chief, for impeachment, or for possible rebuttal. The court in its discretion may, under the facts, decide that the particular request or notice was not reasonable, either because of the lack of timeliness or completeness. Because the notice requirement serves as condition precedent to admissibility of 404(b) evidence, the offered evidence is inadmissible if the court decides that the notice requirement has not been met.

Nothing in the amendment precludes the court from requiring the government to provide it with an opportunity to rule in limine on 404(b) evidence before it is offered or even mentioned during trial. When ruling in limine, the court may require the government to disclose to it the specifics of such evidence which the court must consider in determining admissibility.

The amendment does not extend to evidence of acts which are "intrinsic" to the charged offense, see United States v. Williams, 900 F.2d 823 (5th Cir. 1990) (noting distinction between 404(b) evidence and intrinsic offense evidence). Nor is the amendment intended to redefine what evidence would otherwise be admissible under Rule 404(b). Finally, the Committee does not intend through the amendment to affect the role of the court and the jury in considering such evidence. See United States v. Huddleston, 485 U.S. 681, 108 S. Ct. 1496 (1988) .

[4] 2000 Amendment Committee Note

2000 Amendment Committee Note

Rule 404(a)(1) has been amended to provide that when the accused attacks the character of an alleged victim under subdivision (a)(2) of this Rule, the door is opened to an attack on the same character trait of the accused. Current law does not allow the government to introduce negative character evidence as to the accused unless the accused introduces evidence of good character. See, e.g., United States v. Fountain, 768 F.2d 790 (7th Cir. 1985) (when the accused offers proof of self-defense, this permits proof of the alleged victim's character trait for peacefulness, but it does not permit proof of the accused's character trait for violence).

The amendment makes clear that the accused cannot attack the alleged victim's character and yet remain shielded from the disclosure of equally relevant evidence concerning the same character trait of the accused. For example, in a murder case with a claim of self-defense, the accused, to bolster this defense, might offer evidence of the alleged victim's violent disposition. If the government has evidence that the accused has a violent character, but is not allowed to offer this evidence as part of its rebuttal, the jury has only part of the information it needs for an informed assessment of the probabilities as to who was the initial aggressor. This may be the case even if evidence of the accused's prior violent acts is admitted under Rule 404(b), because such evidence can be admitted only for limited purposes and not to show action in conformity with the accused's character on a specific occasion. Thus, the amendment is designed to permit a more balanced presentation of character evidence when an accused chooses to attack the character of the alleged victim.

The amendment does not affect the admissibility of evidence of specific acts of uncharged misconduct offered for a purpose other than proving character under Rule 404(b). Nor does it affect the standards for proof of character by evidence of other sexual behavior or sexual offenses under Rules 412-415. By its placement in Rule 404(a)(1), the amendment covers only proof of character by way of reputation or opinion.

The amendment does not permit proof of the accused's character if the accused merely uses character evidence for a purpose other than to prove the alleged victim's propensity to act in a certain way. See United States v. Burks, 470 F.2d 432, 434-435 (D.C. Cir. 1972) (evidence of the alleged victim's violent character, when known by the accused, was admissible "on the issue of whether or not the defendant reasonably feared he was in danger of imminent great bodily harm"). Finally, the amendment does not permit proof of the accused's character when the accused attacks the alleged victim's character as a witness under Rule 608 or 609.

The term "alleged" is inserted before each reference to "victim" in the Rule, in order to provide consistency with Evidence Rule 412.

[5] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

In the March 1971 draft the second sentence of (b) began "It may, however, be admissible for other purposes ... ." The Subcommittee preferred the 1971 formulation as placing greater emphasis on admissibility than did the final Court version.

[6] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

The second sentence of Rule 404(b) as submitted to the Congress began with the words. "This subdivision does not exclude the evidence when offered." The Committee amended this language to read. "It may, however, be admissible," the words used in the 1971 Advisory Committee draft, on the ground that this formulation properly placed greater emphasis on admissibility than did the final Court version.

[7] Report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary

This rule provides that evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove character but may be admissible for other specified purposes such as proof of motive.

Although your committee sees no necessity in amending the rule itself, it anticipates that the use of the discretionary word "may" with respect to the admissibility of evidence of crimes, wrongs, or acts is not intended to confer any arbitrary discretion on the trial judge. Rather, it is anticipated that with respect to permissible uses for such evidence, the trial judge may exclude it only on the basis of those considerations set forth in Rule 403, i.e., prejudice, confusion or waste of time.

[8] Citations to Hearings and Debates

Letter from Edward W. Cleary to Herbert E. Hoffman, April 13, 1973, in Supp. to Hearings on Proposed Rules of Evidence Before the Subcomm. on Criminal Justice of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 1st Sess., at 21-22 (1973).

Letter from W. Vincent Rakestraw to Hon. James O. Eastland, June 14, 1974, in Hearings on H.R. 5463 (Federal Rules of Evidence) Before the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 2d Sess., at 121, 123, 126 (1974).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
Supp. To CHAPTER 404 RULE 404

1-404 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 404, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 404. Character Evidence Not Admissible to Prove Conduct; Exceptions;	Rule 404. Character Evidence; Crimes or Other Acts

Other Crimes

(a) Character evidence generally. Evidence of a person's character or a trait of character is not admissible for the purpose of proving action in conformity there with on a particular occasion, except:

(a) Character Evidence.

(1) Character of accused. In a criminal case, evidence of a pertinent trait of character offered by an accused, or by the prosecution to rebut the same, or if evidence of a trait of

(1) Prohibited Uses. Evidence of a person's character or character trait is not admissible to prove that on a particular occasion the person acted in accordance with the character character of the alleged victim of the crime is offered by an accused and admitted under Rule 404(a)(2), evidence of the same trait of character of the accused offered by the prosecution or trait.

secution;

(2) Character of alleged victim. In a criminal case, and subject to the limitations imposed by Rule 412, evidence of a pertinent trait of character of the alleged victim of the crime offer

(2) Exceptions for a Defendant or Victim in a Criminal Case. The following exceptions apply in a criminal case:

ed by an accused, or by the prosecution to rebut the same, or evidence of a character trait of peacefulness of the alleged victim offered by the prosecution in a homicide case to rebut evidence that the alleged victim was the first aggressor;

(A) a defendant may offer evidence of the defendant's pertinent trait, and if the evidence is admitted, the prosecutor may offer evidence to rebut it;

(B) subject to the limitations in Rule 412, a defendant may offer evidence of an alleged victim's pertinent trait, and if the evidence is admitted, the prosecutor may:

- (i) offer evidence to rebut it; and
- (ii) offer evidence of the defendant's same trait; and

(C) in a hom icide case, the pro-secu tor may offer evid ence

of
the allege
d victim's trait
of peac efulness to rebut evid ence
that the victim was the first aggres
sor.

(3) Ch arac ter of wit- ness . Evid ence of the char

(3) Ex- cep- tion s for a Wit- ness

	acter of a witness, as provided in Rules 607, 608, and 609.		. Evidence of a witness's character may be admitted under Rules 607, 608, and 609.
(b)	Other crimes, wrongs, or acts. Evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the char	(b)	Crimes, Wrongs, or Other Acts.

acter of a person in order to show action in conformity therewith. It may, however, be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, kno wledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident, provided that upon request by the accused, the prosecution in a criminal case shall provide reasonable notice in advance of trial, or during trial if the court excuses pretrial notice on good cause shown, of the general nature of any such evidence it intends to introduce at trial.

(1) Prohibited Uses. Evidence of a crime, wrong, or other act is not admissible to prove a person's character in order to show that on a particular occasion the person acted in accordance with the character.

(2) Permitted Uses; Notice in a Crimin- al Case. This evidence may be admissible for another purpose, such as proving motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, absence of mistake, or lack of accident.

On request by a defendant in a criminal case, the prosecutor must:

(A) provide reasonable notice of the general nature of any such evidence that the prosecutor intends to offer at trial; and

(B) do so before trial -- or during trial if the court, for good cause, excuses lack of pretrial notice.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 404 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
Supp. To CHAPTER 404 RULE 404

1-404 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 404.01

Supp. to § 404.01 Official Text

[Go To Main]

Rule 404(a) has been amended, effective December 1, 2006. The amendment is discussed in the Main Volume at § 404.02[3]. The amendment clarifies that the circumstantial use of character evidence is prohibited in civil cases. The Committee Note is set forth infra at § 404.04[4.1]. Following is the text of the amended Rule 404(a):

Rule 404. Character Evidence Not Admissible to Prove Conduct; Exceptions; Other Crimes

(a) Character evidence generally. -- Evidence of a person's character or a trait of character is not admissible for the purpose of proving action in conformity therewith on a particular occasion, except:

(1) Character of accused. -- The material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [Evidence] In a criminal case, evidence of a pertinent trait of character offered by an accused, or by the prosecution to rebut the same, or if evidence of a trait of character of the alleged victim of the crime is offered by an accused and admitted under Rule 404(a)(2), evidence of the same trait of character of the accused offered by the prosecution;

(2) Character of alleged victim. -- The material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [Evidence] In a criminal case, and subject to the limitations imposed by Rule 412, evidence of a pertinent trait of character of the alleged victim of the crime offered by an accused, or by the prosecution to rebut the same, or evidence of a character trait of peacefulness of the alleged victim offered by the prosecution in a homicide case to rebut evidence that the alleged victim was the first aggressor;

(3) Character of witness. -- Evidence of the character of a witness, as provided in Rules 607, 608, and 609.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
Supp. To CHAPTER 404 RULE 404

1-404 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 404.03

Supp. to § 404.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[1] Rule 404(a) -- Character Evidence Generally [Go To Main]

[c] Rule 404(a) -- Character of Accused

[iii] Rule 404(a) -- Character of Accused -- Defense Evidence

United States v. Taylor, 604 F.3d 1011 (7th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for armed robbery, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony by a pastor that the defendant had a good reputation for truthfulness. The charged crime did not involve the trait of truthfulness, and the evidence was irrelevant to the defendant's truthfulness as a witness, since he did not testify.

United States v. Yarbrough, 527 F.3d 1092 (10th Cir. 2008) : The Court reversed the conviction of a police officer for obstructing justice by leaking information to the target of an investigation, because the defendant was not permitted to introduce character evidence of his "integrity and status as a law-abiding, trusted police officer." The Judge had excluded the evidence because the underlying facts were not in dispute and the only issue was whether the defendant acted with a prohibited mind set, but the Court held that where the defendant " 'defends solely on the lack of wilful intent, the character of the defendant is an important element,' " evidence of which is made admissible under Rule 404(a)(1).

[iv] Rule 404(a) -- Character of Accused -- Demeanor Evidence

United States v. Harris, 491 F.3d 440 (D.C. Cir. 2007) : Affirming a conviction for possession with intent to distribute cocaine base, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the defendant's mother and girlfriend were not permitted to testify about his family and that on the night in question he lacked the demeanor of a man about to sell drugs The defendant's attempt to portray himself as a dedicated family man was not evidence of a pertinent character trait. The Court questioned whether there was such a thing as the demeanor of a man about to sell drugs, and found that the Trial Judge properly focused on the excessively prejudicial nature of the proposed testimony. Further, there was no error in precluding the defendant from eliciting testimony as to his character for truthfulness and for law abidingness, as his truthfulness was not pertinent to his propensity to commit a drug crime, and the defense never mentioned law abidingness, so the Judge never had a chance to consider whether character testimony addressing this trait should be admitted.

[v] Rule 404(a) -- Character of Accused -- Prosecution Evidence

United States v. Farmer, 583 F.3d 131 (2d Cir. 2009) : In a prosecution for various offenses arising from a murder and an attempted murder, the Court affirmed the convictions arising from the murder and reversed the convictions arising from the attempted murder because "the prosecutors, in their addresses to the jury, invited prejudice by repeatedly emphasizing Farmer's nickname [Murder] in a manner designed to suggest that he was known by his associates as a murderer and that he acted in accordance with that propensity in carrying out the acts charged in the indictment." This was an "abuse of Farmer's nickname."

United States v. Steele, 550 F.3d 693 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for assault on a federal officer and assault with a dangerous weapon, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant had previously been convicted for assault with a dangerous weapon and had previously resisted arrest. The Court held that the evidence was relevant to whether the officer used lawful force to arrest the defendant, and whether the defendant was acting reasonably in self-defense, as he claimed, and that it could affirm the decision to admit the evidence on this ground "even if the government did not fully develop such a theory at trial."

[d] Rule 404(a) -- Character of Victim

[ii] Rule 404(a) -- Character of Victim -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Bordeaux, 570 F.3d 1041 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for assault with a dangerous weapon, finding no abuse of discretion when the defendant was permitted to testify in support of a claim of self-defense about numerous acts by a victim of which he was aware, because these acts were not admitted to prove the victim's character. The defendant was also properly precluded from testifying to other acts by the victims of which he was unaware, because those acts were offered to prove the victim's violent character and therefore were barred by Rule 405(b), which prohibits using specific acts to prove character when character is not in issue.

[e] Rule 404(a) -- Civil Cases

Kebede v. Hilton, 580 F.3d 714 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in an action for alienation of affections, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence that the defendant had conducted extramarital affairs with two men other than the plaintiff's ex-husband. The evidence was inadmissible under Rule 404(a) to show the defendant's "propensities for this type of activity," and in the absence of evidence that the defendant either alienated the affections of the other men or was aware that their affections had been alienated, it was inadmissible to prove intent under Rule 404(b).

[g] Rule 404(a) -- Pertinent Traits

United States v. Harris, 491 F.3d 440 (D.C. Cir. 2007) : Affirming a conviction for possession with intent to distribute cocaine base, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the defendant's mother and girlfriend were not permitted to testify about his family and that on the night in question he lacked the demeanor of a man about to sell drugs The defendant's attempt to portray himself as a dedicated family man was not evidence of a pertinent character trait. The Court questioned whether there was such a thing as the demeanor of a man about to sell drugs, and found that the Trial Judge properly focused on the excessively prejudicial nature of the proposed testimony. Further, there was no error in precluding the defendant from eliciting testimony as to his character for truthfulness and for law abidingness, as his truthfulness was not pertinent to his propensity to commit a drug crime, and the defense never mentioned law abidingness, so the Judge never had a chance to consider whether character testimony addressing this trait should be admitted.

[2] Rule 404(b) -- Other Crimes, Wrongs, or Acts [Go To Main]

[a] Rule 404(b) -- Ability or Opportunity

United States v. Canady, 578 F.3d 665 (7th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no plain error in the admission of evidence regarding a violent home invasion shortly before the defendant was found by an officer in an overturned vehicle. The defendant challenged the officer's testimony about finding the gun, and the home invasion tended to prove that the defendant possessed the gun, because he had it during the home invasion. In United States v. Orozco, 576 F.3d 745 (7th Cir. 2009) , the Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting an agent's testimony about a prior incident that gave rise to the defendant's conviction for unlawful possession of a firearm. Because in that incident the defendant, who was left-handed, had handled his gun with his right hand, the evidence was probative to show that the gun discovered in the search of the defendant's home belonged to him, even though its holster was set up for a right-handed shooter. Any prejudicial effect was minimized by an instruction to consider the evidence only on the question of whether the defendant used his right hand to handle guns.

Boyd v. City & County of San Francisco, 576 F.3d 938 (9th Cir. 2009) : In a § 1983 excessive force action arising from an incident in which the plaintiff's decedent was fatally shot at the end of a high-speed chase when he reached into his vehicle rather than obeying an instruction to get down on the ground, the defendants argued that the victim had been attempting to commit "suicide by cop." Affirming a judgment for the defendants, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding a similar high-speed chase three days earlier, since the victim's promptly getting down on the ground when instructed in that case tended to rebut the plaintiffs' argument that he had hesitated in obeying police commands because of a lack of mobility caused by prosthetic legs.

[b] Rule 404(b) -- Accident or Mistake

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Accident or Mistake -- Criminal Cases

United States v. Cooper, 482 F.3d 658 (4th Cir. 2007) : In a prosecution for violation of the Clean Water Act by discharging pollutants, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the defendant had a history of discharging pollutants and had been subject to state regulatory actions regarding those discharges. The evidence was not extrinsic to the crime being charged, because it established the context for the charged crimes and explained how he came to be without permission to discharge. Even if the evidence came within the ambit of Rule 404(b), it would be admissible to prove the defendant's knowledge of the discharges and the absence of mistake or accident.

United States v. Caldwell, 586 F.3d 338 (5th Cir. 2009) : In a prosecution for knowing possession of child pornography, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the government showed short clips of videos seized from the defendant showing adult bestiality. Clips from videos being downloaded when agents entered the defendant's home were relevant to the defendant's knowledge (which he denied) that the program he was accessing provided pornography. A clip downloaded several weeks previously and last viewed three days before the defendant's arrest was "more troubling," but it tended to rebut any argument of accident or mistake regarding the videos viewed the day of the arrest.

United States v. Bell, 516 F.3d 432 (6th Cir. 2008) : In the defendant's trial for possession of marijuana and cocaine with intent to distribute, residents of the house where the drugs were found testified that he lived there most of the time, while the defendant's fiancee testified that he stayed with her "[b]asically every night." His conviction was reversed because prior convictions for possession of marijuana and cocaine base with intent to distribute were improperly admitted as evidence of intent and of absence of mistake or accident. The Court held (2-1) that the convictions were not probative of intent to possess and distribute because they were neither part of the same scheme nor involved a similar modus operandi as the present offense. And the defendant had not asserted a defense based on some type of mistake or accident, so that purpose for admitting the convictions was not material or "in issue." In any event, the probative value of the convictions several years prior to the instant offense was slight, the government had ample available means to prove the defendant's specific intent to possess and distribute the drugs, and the prejudicial effect was significant. In United States v. Abboud, 438 F.3d 554 (6th Cir. 2006) , the Court affirmed convictions for income tax offenses in connection with a check kiting scheme, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendants paid employees "under the table." The evidence of failure to pay employment taxes tended to rebut the good-faith defense claiming that the employer's failure to file income tax returns and underreporting were caused by sloppy bookkeeping and the illness of an employee.

United States v. Zahursky, 580 F.3d 515 (7th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for attempting to entice a minor to engage in sexual activity, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the defendant's prior Internet chat room conversations with minor girls to prove his knowledge and absence of mistake as to the victim's age. In United States v. Webb, 548 F.3d 547 (7th Cir. 2008) , officers, executing a search warrant for drugs at a house, found the defendant, wearing workout clothes, in the driveway. In the basement of the house they found exercise gear, along with drugs in plain view, and they also found drug packaging equipment through the house. At his trial for possession of drugs with intent to distribute, the defendant claimed he was only at the house by chance; in response the prosecution introduced his prior conviction for distributing cocaine, to show intent and absence of mistake. The Court affirmed, but held it was error (albeit harmless) to admit the other crimes evidence, as the defendant was denying not intent but possession for any purpose, and it tended to show absence of mistake only via the prohibited inference that someone who distributes drugs once is likely to do it again. In United States v. Perkins, 548 F.3d 510 (7th Cir. 2008) , a parolee was charged with possession of crack cocaine and marijuana with intent to distribute after drugs were found at his residence during a compliance check search. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of an arrest and prior convictions for cocaine-related offenses. The evidence tended to prove his knowledge of crack cocaine and its value, and the absence of any mistake or accident in its presence in his residence. In United States v. Wheeler, 540 F.3d 683 (7th Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed a conviction for embezzling withheld employee health insurance and pension contributions, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant had been involved in the nonpayment of withheld health insurance premiums at another company he controlled. The evidence was relevant to show his knowledge of how insurance premium withholdings must be handled and to show the absence of mistake or accident.

United States v. Littlewind, 595 F.3d 876 (8th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for assault with a dangerous weapon, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the defendant's prior convictions for assault and battery, domestic abuse, and public intoxication, where the convictions involved intoxication and physical abuse with respect to the same victim as the crimes charged. The defense presented some evidence suggesting that the victim's injuries resulted from a drunken fall, and the prior convictions tended to rebut this defense. In United States v. Myers, 503 F.3d 676 (8th Cir. 2007) , the Court affirmed a prisoner's conviction for mailing threatening communications, finding no error in the admission of evidence that the defendant mailed new threatening letters during the litigation, a year later. The evidence was probative to rebut the contention that the charged letters had been mailed by prison officials without the defendant's consent. In United States v. Johnson, 463 F.3d 803 (8th Cir. 2006) , a social services worker who submitted false records, which resulted in payments of public benefits to individuals who then kicked back some of the money to the defendant, was convicted of mail fraud for submitting the false records. Affirming, the Court found no error in the admission of evidence of uncharged fraudulent overpayments and kickbacks in which the defendant was involved, as the evidence tended to rebut the defendant's claim that she made an innocent mistake.

United States v. Lamons, 532 F.3d 1251 (11th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed the convictions of a former flight attendant for making a threatening telephone call regarding a bomb on one occasion and setting fire to the lavatory of a plane on another occasion. The charges had been severed and the defendant was convicted for making the threatening phone call before he was tried for setting the fire. In the latter trial, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the conviction, because the evidence was relevant to both intent and the absence of mistake or accident.

[d] Rule 404(b) -- Acts Charged

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Acts Charged -- Acts Inextricably Interwoven, Intrinsic, or Part of a Single Criminal Episode

[A] Rule 404(b) -- Drug Cases

United States v. Chavis, 429 F.3d 662 (7th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a crack cocaine conviction, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the defendant's prior dealings with a cooperating coconspirator. The evidence completed the story for the jury and explained not only how the defendant and the coconspirator knew each other, but also how they ended up together in the parking lot where they were arrested.

[B] Rule 404(b) -- Acts Charged -- Acts Inextricably Interwoven, Intrinsic, or Part of a Single Criminal Episode -- Firearms Cases

United States v. Samuels, 521 F.3d 804 (7th Cir. 2008) : Affirming a conviction for aiding and abetting a felon in possession of a firearm, the Court held that evidence that the defendant had loaned a gun to his cousin who did not return it, and that the defendant and his brothers beat up the cousin in an effort to obtain return of the gun, was inextricably intertwined with the charge because it explained how the defendant gave a gun to one brother who was a convicted felon. In United States v. Strong, 485 F.3d 985 (7th Cir. 2007) , the court affirmed a conviction for being a felon in possession of ammunition, holding that evidence of the defendant's involvement in drug trafficking in the house in which he was arrested was properly admitted. It stated that "[w]hen a defendant has been charged with possession of a firearm by a felon, we repeatedly have held that evidence of contemporaneous uncharged drug trafficking is admissible under the 'inextricably intertwined' doctrine because such evidence tends to prove 'knowing possession' of the firearm." In United States v. Lott, 442 F.3d 981 (7th Cir. 2006) , when the defendant's car was stopped by police, a pistol was found hidden on top of a package of white powder, which was later established to be a crushed allergy medicine. Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the bag of white powder and testimony regarding the defendant's practice of selling "dummy drugs," as the evidence was inextricably intertwined with the evidence of gun possession and tended to connect the gun with the defendant by explaining that he needed a gun because his business practices "made people mad."

[C] Rule 404(b) -- Acts Charged -- Acts Inextricably Interwoven, Intrinsic, or Part of a Single Criminal Episode -- Fraud and False Statement Cases

United States v. Kaiser, 609 F.3d 556 (2d Cir. 2010) : In a securities fraud case, the Court held that there was no error in admitting evidence of uncharged frauds without prior Rule 404(b) notice, because the prior frauds were inextricably intertwined with the charged fraud. The prior frauds had continuing effect on the charged crime, and "it would have been impossible to intelligently present a case about much of what went on [during the time covered by the charges] without starting at the beginning." Thus, the prior frauds were not "other crimes" subject to the Rule 404(b) notice requirement.

United States v. Hoffecker, 530 F.3d 137 (3d Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed convictions for mail and wire fraud in connection with a scheme telemarketing purported interests in physical commodities, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the FTC had obtained a civil injunction against the defendant "forever enjoin[ing] and restrain[ing him] from telemarketing precious metals." The evidence was intrinsic to the charge that he had intentionally concealed and failed to disclose to investors that he was subject to the civil injunction. Furthermore, it was probative of his intent to misrepresent his commodities program and to explain why he had structured the program as he had.

United States v. Stephens, 571 F.3d 401 (5th Cir. 2009) : In a prosecution for wire fraud and identity theft arising from a fake website soliciting donations for the Salvation Army following Hurricane Katrina, the Court held that evidence of the defendants' creating a fake website soliciting donations to the Red Cross was not inextricably intertwined with evidence of the Salvation Army website, nor was it part of a single criminal episode or a necessary preliminary step in the Salvation Army website scheme. However, the Court found no plain error in admission of the evidence, as it helped establish the defendants' intent, planning, preparation, and knowledge, and its probative value for those purposes was not so substantially outweighed by any prejudicial effect as to constitute plain error.

United States v. Hagerman, 555 F.3d 553 (7th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions of a corporation and its president for making materially false statements in Clean Water Act reports. It held that when a defendant commits two criminal acts simultaneously but is charged only with one, the other cannot be disentangled from the charged crime, so evidence of the uncharged act is admissible without having to find a non-character purpose under Rule 404(b). In United States v. Heath, 447 F.3d 535 (7th Cir. 2006) , the Court affirmed a conviction for fraud arising from a scheme to use counterfeit checks to pay for cars, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of counterfeit checks and a note seized in the defendant's brother's home. An accomplice had written an almost identical note at the defendant's direction. The checks were made from the same template as those taken from the defendant and the accomplice. The Court concluded that the evidence was inextricably intertwined with the crimes charged. In this case, we suggest that the evidence was of the crimes charged and that there was no need for an inextricably intertwined analysis.

United States v. Hall, 604 F.3d 539 (8th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed fraud convictions in connection with a real estate trust, holding that evidence of the defendant's involvement with another trust was inextricably intertwined with the charges, given that the two trusts "were integral parts of the same fraudulent scheme." The two trusts had been created in Texas at the same time, and evidence regarding operation of the other trust explained why the charged trust lay dormant for three years and its operations had been moved to Missouri. In United States v. Johnson, 463 F.3d 803 (8th Cir. 2006) , a social services worker who submitted false records, which resulted in payments of public benefits to individuals who then kicked back some of the money to the defendant, was convicted of mail fraud for submitting the false records. Affirming, the Court found no error in the admission of evidence that she had received the kickbacks, although she was only charged with submitting the false records, as the evidence concerning kickbacks was an "inextricable part of the government's case" because it provided an explanation for why the defendant submitted the false records.

[D] Rule 404(b) -- Acts Charged -- Acts Inextricably Interwoven, Intrinsic, or Part of a Single Criminal Episode -- Limitations on the Doctrine

United States v. Conner, 583 F.3d 1011 (7th Cir. 2009) : Affirming a conviction for distributing crack cocaine, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to admit evidence of the defendant's prior and subsequent drug dealing with codefendants as "inextricably intertwined" or "intricately related" to the crime charged. No conspiracy was charged; the government had no need to show that the defendant had a relationship with the codefendants in order to prove that he distributed drugs on the specific occasion charged; and the uncharged transactions were not necessary to "complete the story" of the charged crime. The " 'complete the story' theory of the 'intricately related' doctrine was not meant to be used, as it was in this case, to circumvent Rule 404(b) and allow the government to use evidence of other acts to show propensity." Rather, an act admissible to "complete the story" must be "intrinsic to the charged crime." In this case, separate transactions that took place at separate times had been admitted. In United States v. Taylor, 522 F.3d 731 (7th Cir. 2008) , the Court, affirming narcotics trafficking convictions, held it was error (but harmless) for the arresting officer to testify that he recognized the defendant as a result of having known him "throughout [the officer's] career as a police officer and as a drug and gang officer." The arrestee's identity was not in doubt, and the legitimacy of the arrest was not questioned, so the evidence was irrelevant and damaging. The Court rejected a government argument that this and other bad act evidence was "inextricably intertwined" with admissible evidence and so admissible without regard to the specific exceptions of Rule 404(b). The Court said that the "inextricably intertwined" formula is "unhelpfully vague" in most situations, except when "a defendant commits two criminal acts at the same time and is charged with only one, [and] the evidence of the charged crime may unavoidably reveal the uncharged one."

[E] Rule 404(b) -- Acts Charged -- Acts Inextricably Interwoven, Intrinsic, or Part of a Single Criminal Episode -- Other Cases

United States v. Siegel, 536 F.3d 306 (4th Cir. 2008) : The defendant had a 20-year history of identity theft and fraud that culminated in her defrauding a widower 30 years her senior and murdering him to prevent the reporting of her crimes. Shortly before trial on charges of defrauding and murdering the widower (and defrauding the United States by cashing his Social Security checks), the defendant moved in limine to exclude evidence of her other crimes. The motion was granted and the government brought an interlocutory appeal. Reversing, the Court held that evidence that she had been convicted for stealing three wallets and using the information contained therein to drain funds from the wallet owners' bank accounts was intrinsic to the charged crimes, since she was still on probation for those offenses and "her personal freedom depended on her ability to extricate herself from the relationship with [the widower] without his discovering and reporting her crimes." Evidence of her other frauds, which could lead to a lengthy prison term if she were caught, tended to establish her motive for murdering the widower "for the purpose of preventing him or anyone else from providing law enforcement with information about the federal crimes she had committed," which was an element of the offense charged. The evidence likewise tended to show her modus operandi in committing frauds. One Judge dissented, on the ground that the majority erroneously failed to apply the "abuse of discretion" level of review.

United States v. Skelton, 514 F.3d 433 (5th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed an extortion conviction, holding that the defendant was adequately permitted to explore the potential bias of the alleged victim of the extortion. The Court rejected the defendant's argument that the fact that victim may have stolen money and lied to the IRS was "intrinsic" to the crime charged, since the extortion charge related to the defendant's conduct, not the victim's. In United States v. Simmons, 470 F.3d 1115 (5th Cir. 2006) , the court affirmed a conviction for sexual assault under color of law, holding that the defendant police officer's failure to log marijuana seized during a traffic stop of an automobile containing the victim and her boyfriend was admissible to explain the events and support the victim's version of what happened. The marijuana seizure was "integral to the events leading to [the plaintiff's] sexual assault."

United States v. Wantuch, 525 F.3d 505 (7th Cir. 2008) : Affirming convictions for conspiracy to defraud the United States, bribery, fraudulent receipt of temporary alien registration stamps, and making false statements, the Court held that evidence of the defendant's sale of contraband cigarettes to a cooperating witness was properly admitted, because it tended to show how the defendant's relationship with the witness began and how it blossomed into the charged conspiracy. The Court found that the evidence was "intricately related to the acts charged in the indictment" because it "complete[d] the story of the crime on trial." As such it was not other acts evidence covered by Rule 404(b). In United States v. Griffin, 493 F.3d 856 (7th Cir. 2007) , the Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to commit armed robberies, finding no error in the admission of evidence that the defendant was on a day-reporting status with the Cook Country Department of Corrections during the time that the conspiracy was operating. It reasoned that this evidence was inextricably intertwined with the charged offense because it explained why the defendant was not able to participate in several robberies with his coconspirators. The Court declared that evidence is inextricably intertwined with the crime charged, and thus not subject to Rule 404(b), "if it helps complete the story of the crime on trial, if its absence would create a conceptual or chronological void in the story of the crime on trial, or if it is so blended or connected that it incidentally involves, explains the circumstances surrounding, or tends to prove an element of the charged crime." We believe that this definition of "inextricably intertwined" is far too broad, as it would appear to encompass virtually any act of uncharged misconduct that is relevant to the prosecution's case. For example, it would cover evidence of uncharged conduct offered to prove intent, as intent is an element of the crime; but evidence offered to prove intent is clearly subject to Rule 404(b).

United States v. US Infrastructure, Inc., 576 F.3d 1195 (11th Cir. 2009) : In the prosecution of a corporation and its officers for bribery arising from a scheme in which they made payments to a public official who had awarded them no-bid contracts, the Court found no abuse of discretion when a witness testified that after having done work for free on the official's private business premises using plans provided by the defendants, the official arranged a no-bid contract project for him. The Court held that the evidence was inextricably intertwined with and relevant to the chain of events surrounding the charged crimes, showing the appellant's knowledge of the official's willingness to exchange his influence for things of value as well as the opportunity to take advantage of that willingness.

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Acts Charged -- Conspiracy

United States v. Becton, 601 F.3d 588 (D.C. Cir. 2010) : Affirming drug convictions, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony regarding the defendant's activities while incarcerated from 2003 to 2005 on an unrelated charge, because the evidence showed that the defendant managed the charged drug conspiracy while in jail and thus the evidence was not Rule 404(b) "other crimes" evidence.

United States v. Mangual-Santiago, 562 F.3d 411 (1st Cir. 2009) : Affirming convictions for drug and money laundering conspiracies, the Court held that evidence of a gun, drugs, a scale, and cash found in an apartment along with the defendant was evidence of the crime charged and was therefore admissible. It also noted that evidence of bank account activity could be considered within the scope of the charged money-laundering conspiracy given that the indictment listed only an approximate date when the conspiracy ended.

United States v. Brown, 553 F.3d 768 (5th Cir. 2008) : Two pharmacists were convicted of conspiring with physicians to distribute large quantities of pain medications under cover of false prescriptions written by the physicians. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendants filled illegitimate prescriptions from physicians who were not named as coconspirators. The evidence could be seen as intrinsic to the charged conspiracy with a named physician and "others known and unknown," and although the physicians were in a sense competitors, "their activities were mutually advantageous, as the behavior of each doctor expanded operations for all by encouraging more dealers and pharmacists to get into the business." It could also be seen as probative of the defendants' knowledge that the named physician's prescriptions were illegitimate, as their "experience in filling piles of similar false prescriptions from a different doctor would speak directly to that issue."

United States v. Gallardo, 497 F.3d 727 (7th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed convictions for drug distribution offenses, holding that evidence of one defendant's giving false identity information at a traffic stop was properly admitted as relevant to a charge that the conspirators had used "means to avoid detection and apprehension by law enforcement authorities." In United States v. Gougis, 432 F.3d 735 (7th Cir. 2005) , the Court affirmed drug and theft convictions of law enforcement officers who were targeted in a sting operation set up by the government with the help of a confidential informant. It found no abuse of discretion in admitting a tape recording of a conversation in which one defendant and the informant discussed a gold watch that the defendant stole while executing a search warrant five years earlier. The taped conversation was "intricately related" to the charged crimes, because it tended to explain the defendant's participation in the conspiracy and his relationship with two of his three coconspirators. The evidence was not "too tenuously connected to the present charges," since the defendant was recruited as a potential coconspirator because of his previous participation with two others in an on-duty theft while a member of the Chicago Housing Authority police.

United States v. Parker, 553 F.3d 1309 (10th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for a conspiracy to sell defective airplane engines with false documentation, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding uncharged sales both during and outside the conspiracy period. The sales during the conspiracy period, although not specified in the indictment, were intrinsic acts substantiating the charged conspiracy and not within Rule 404(b). The sales outside the conspiracy time-frame tended to show the defendant's intent and knowledge regarding the charged offenses. In United States v. Smith, 534 F.3d 1211 (10th Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed convictions on charges related to a drug conspiracy, finding no error in admitting evidence of two murders ordered by the defendant. This was not "bad act" evidence covered by Rule 404(b): "Because the evidence supported the conclusion that the double murder occurred during the life of the conspiracy and was part of it, ... the district court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the evidence, finding that Rule 404(b) did not apply." In United States v. Portillo-Quezada, 469 F.3d 1345 (10th Cir. 2006) , the Court affirmed a defendant's convictions arising from his leadership role in a methamphetamine distribution ring. It held that evidence of a murder was properly admitted, as it was committed in furtherance of the conspiracy charged in the case. In a conspiracy prosecution, "conduct which occurs during the life of the conspiracy and is a part of the same is direct evidence of the conspiracy and therefore not subject to Rule 404(b)."

[vi] Rule 404(b) -- Acts Charged -- Other Cases

United States v. Martinez-Rodriguez, 472 F.3d 1087 (9th Cir. 2007) : Affirming a conviction for re-entering the United States after removal, the Court held that proof that the defendant had twice been deported was admissible to prove the charged offense without regard to Rule 404(b). Because evidence of each deportation was dissimilar, the Court reasoned that the government was entitled to prove both to hedge the risk that the jury would reject the offered proof as to one deportation but not the other.

[vii] Rule 404(b) -- Acts Charged -- Predicate Offenses

United States v. Cruz-Escoto, 476 F.3d 1081 (9th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a conviction for being a deported alien found in the United States, finding no error in the admission of evidence that the defendant had previously entered the United States illegally and had been removed. As a necessary element of the crime charged, the evidence was not propensity evidence barred by Rule 404(b). The use of multiple prior deportations was not error, although proof of only one was required.

[d.1] Rule 404(b) -- Acts Legal Where Performed

United States v. Kapordelis, 569 F.3d 1291 (11th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for producing, receiving, and possessing child pornography, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant solicited sex from boys in exchange for money while in Prague. He argued that his actions were legal under the law of the Czech Republic, but the Court held that the Rule's specification of "other crimes, wrongs, or acts" means that it is not limited to criminal acts. It held that the evidence was probative of his knowledge, intent, and identity when he traveled with boys and sexually explicit images of the boys were created, and any prejudicial effect of the evidence did not outweigh its probative value.

[f] Rule 404(b) -- Acts Relevant to Another's State of Mind

United States v. York, 600 F.3d 347 (5th Cir. 2010) : In a prosecution for arson offenses, the defendant's former girlfriend testified that he had told her he had tried to bomb a courthouse with a Molotov cocktail. When asked on cross-examination why she had not used those words in her statement to police, she testified that he had previously assaulted her. Affirming, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the testimony about the assault, since it was relevant to explain the omissions in the police statement and was unlikely to cause confusion or unfair prejudice.

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Appellate Review

United States v. Cook, 454 F.3d 938 (8th Cir. 2006) : The Trial Judge in a cocaine distribution case granted the defendant's motion in limine to exclude evidence of four prior drug convictions. The Court affirmed the ruling on interlocutory appeal, using an abuse of discretion standard. It rejected "the government's unsupported suggestion that de novo review is appropriate because this is an interlocutory appeal," reasoning that "[w]e see no good reason why our standard of review should differ because the evidentiary ruling was made and appealed before trial."

[k] Rule 404(b) -- Background

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Background -- Context Events

United States v. Cooper, 482 F.3d 658 (4th Cir. 2007) : In a prosecution for violation of the Clean Water Act by discharging pollutants, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the defendant had a history of discharging pollutants and had been subject to state regulatory actions regarding those discharges. The evidence was not extrinsic to the crime being charged, because it established the context for the charged crimes and explained how he came to be without permission to discharge. Even if the evidence came within the ambit of Rule 404(b), it would be admissible to prove the defendant's knowledge of the discharges and the absence of mistake or accident.

United States v. Rice, 607 F.3d 133 (5th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed two defendants' convictions for carjacking, finding no abuse of discretion when evidence of other attempted robberies shortly before the carjacking was admitted. It reasoned that "evidence of those offenses helped to explain how the conspiracy came together, placed the charged crimes in context, and completed the story behind the criminal activity." In United States v. Yi, 460 F.3d 623 (5th Cir. 2006) , the Court affirmed a conviction for trafficking in counterfeit goods, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant was an illegal alien. The evidence explained why the arresting officer in a counterfeiting case was an immigration enforcement agent: at the time of the arrest no warrant had been issued for the defendant in connection with the counterfeiting charges, and he was initially taken into custody on the immigration violation.

United States v. Algee, 599 F.3d 506 (6th Cir. 2010) : In the prosecution of a postal employee for theft from the post office, the defendant objected to admission of evidence regarding a sting operation directed specifically against him, on the ground that "the government would try to buttress the theft counts by implying to the jury that Algee, the only person with access to a vending machine that had indisputably experienced cash shortages in the past, had actually succeeded in stealing cash in the past, thus prompting the integrity test aimed at Algee." Affirming, the Court found no error in admission of the evidence, since "[i]f there had been no context as to why the investigators were there with marked currency and undercover surveillance, the jury would likely have been confused."

[iii] Rule 404(b) -- Background -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Morena, 547 F.3d 191 (3d Cir. 2008) : The Court reversed a conviction for felon firearm possession and possession of a sawed-off shotgun because "the government's repeated injection of prejudicial drug evidence into the trial testimony constituted prosecutorial misconduct resulting in a denial of due process." Although the defendant was never charged with any drug offenses, the government contended that some discussion of drugs was necessary for background and it would show the shotgun was possessed to protect a drug dealing enterprise. However, the prosecution repeatedly went beyond that purpose to inject inadmissible drug evidence, such as evidence of heroin dealing not connected with the defendant and evidence of the defendant's drug use problem, even though the Judge declared at least five times that the evidence was "too prejudicial." "Nevertheless, the District Court ultimately failed to prevent the rampant injection of inadmissible evidence into the trial and its single limiting instruction to the jury was inadequate to cure the prejudice."

United States v. Basham, 561 F.3d 302 (4th Cir. 2009) : The Court upheld the convictions and death sentence of a defendant charged with carjacking and kidnapping resulting in death. It found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding the defendant's use of alcohol and drugs, as well as of consensual sex with others than the victims. This evidence helped to complete the story of the crime and explain the relationship of the parties in the case.

United States v. Morris, 498 F.3d 634 (7th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed drug convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony that a police officer stopped the defendant's van because he knew that there was an active bench warrant for the defendant's arrest. The testimony established the reason that the officer stopped the van and a motive for the defendant to give drugs to a cousin who was with him in the van and to tell the cousin to flee.

United States v. Spoerke, 568 F.3d 1236 (11th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions relating to destructive devices, holding that evidence regarding the search of the vehicle in which the defendant was riding at the time of his arrest was not other crime evidence under Rule 404(b). The Court declared that "[t]he government was permitted to refer to the chain of events, including the search of the vehicle and the arrest of Spoerke, that was an integral part of the account of the crime, completed the story for the jury, and supported a finding that the devices found in the vehicle were designed as weapons." In United States v. Richardson, 532 F.3d 1279 (11th Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to distribute cocaine, holding that there was no material variance between the single conspiracy charged in the indictment and the evidence proved at trial, but added that even if there was such a variance it was not prejudicial since the evidence that was outside the charged conspiracy would have been admissible under Rule 404(b) as background evidence to show how the defendant developed into a major drug dealer in Atlanta.

[iv] Rule 404(b) -- Background -- Relationship of Participants

United States v. Mercado, 573 F.3d 138 (2d Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for drug offenses, finding no abuse of discretion when evidence of the defendant's prior firearm crimes was admitted to show the background of the relationship between the defendant and a coconspirator and to prove the basis for trust between them. One Judge dissented, on the grounds that the long and strong relationship and friendship between the conspirators was undisputed, and that unrelated prior participation in gun sales had no bearing on the disputed issue of the defendant's role in, and intent to enter into, the charged drug conspiracy. In United States v. Guang, 511 F.3d 110 (2d Cir. 2007) , the Court affirmed two defendants' convictions for extortion, holding it was not an abuse of discretion to admit evidence of uncharged misconduct involving one defendant, because it tended to prove the existence of the illegal relationship between the defendants and also to describe how the relationship between the two defendants developed.

United States v. Maldonado, 472 F.3d 388 (5th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for conspiracy to distribute marijuana, the Court held that the defendant opened the door to evidence concerning another incident in which he and a coconspirator were found driving behind a truck that contained marijuana and a two-way radio that bore the same serial number as the one in the defendant's car. The defendant claimed on direct examination, with respect to the instant case, that he never suspected that the coconspirator would store marijuana in his trailer and that he did not know who put the marijuana in the trailer. The Court held that this opened the door to testimony concerning the prior relationship of the defendant and the coconspirator.

United States v. Johnson, 584 F.3d 731 (7th Cir. 2009) : Affirming a defendant's convictions for a continuing criminal enterprise and drug crimes, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding the defendant's gang and drug activity prior to the period of the charged conduct. The evidence explained how the defendant gained control of at least five other people and why the lower-ranking gang members were willing to take direction from him. In United States v. Gilmer, 534 F.3d 696 (7th Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed convictions for conspiracy and drug possession, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by one conspirator regarding prior drug deals with a defendant. The evidence, admitted as "intricately related" to the charged crimes and thus subject only to the limitations of Rule 403 and not to Rule 404(b), helped to explain the development of the relationship between the two men that led to their roles in the conspiracy. In United States v. Ortiz, 474 F.3d 976 (7th Cir. 2007) , the Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, but held it was an abuse of discretion (albeit harmless error) to admit evidence that the defendant and an informant had robbed a drug dealer six years before the charged offense. The government argued that the prior robbery was probative of whether the defendant and the informant might have had a code they used in conversations. The Court found no evidence that any code was used and added that, even assuming that code or slang was used six years earlier, it requires "another leap" to conclude that the defendant would pick up on the same terminology six years later. In United States v. Holt, 460 F.3d 934 (7th Cir. 2006) , a defendant in a methamphetamine case was also charged with intimidation of a witness, based on his having driven his long-time girlfriend to where the grand jury was meeting, despite an order of protection barring contact with her. He was acquitted of the intimidation charge, and the Court affirmed the conviction on the other charges, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the defendant had begun an abusive sexual relationship with his girlfriend when she was just 14 years old and he was in his mid-thirties, that he had helped make her a methamphetamine addict, and that he had beaten her within weeks of her grand jury appearance. The evidence could help explain the defendant's hold over a woman more than 20 years his junior and suggest why giving a ride to the grand jury proceeding might not be innocuous as it first appears. Even if some of the evidence, such as the origins of the relationship and of her addiction, were excessively prejudicial, any error was harmless, as the jury acquitted on the intimidation count and the evidence was not likely to have affected their evaluation of the drug count, given the strength of the government's case. In United States v. McLee, 436 F.3d 751 (7th Cir. 2006) , the court affirmed convictions for drug trafficking, finding no error in the admission of evidence of pre-conspiracy criminal conduct involving a defendant and the leader of the conspiracy. The evidence was "intricately related" to the charged conspiracy, in that it showed the origins of the relationship between the conspirators and helped explain the defendant's role as a most trusted coconspirator. The Court found that the evidence "filled what otherwise would have been a chronological and conceptual void in the jury's understanding of the genesis and nature of their relationship."

United States v. Aldridge, 561 F.3d 759 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions of a husband and wife for aiding and abetting the filing of false tax returns, holding that evidence of an affair between the husband and his secretary was admissible to demonstrate that the secretary perjured herself before the grand jury at the husband's request and to explain how she obtained detailed knowledge of the husband's business and a trust he controlled. In United States v. Gettel, 474 F.3d 1081 (8th Cir. 2007) , the Court affirmed convictions for firearms offenses, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant and a third party jointly possessed a stolen rifle weeks after possessing a stolen handgun. The evidence tended to show a connection between the defendant and the third party near the time of the charged crime and to rebut the defendant's contention that the third party was not credible.

United States v. Sanchez, 586 F.3d 918 (11th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed two defendants' convictions for conspiracy to possess marijuana with the intent to distribute, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding the defendants' prior convictions for committing a burglary together. The prior convictions rebutted the defendants' post-arrest statements that they did not know each other and that their riding together in a truck containing items that could be used as burglary tools was innocent behavior.

[l] Rule 404(b) -- Balancing

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Discretion To Admit

United States v. Hicks, 575 F.3d 130 (1st Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed cocaine-related convictions, finding no error in the admission of three prior cocaine-related convictions, since all the convictions were relevant to rebut the defense in the current case that the defendant was innocently in a home babysitting children when the officers searched it and found cocaine. A person with previous experience with cocaine-trafficking "would have been more likely to recognize the drug trade paraphernalia that was scattered about the home, such as baking powder, plastic baggies, digital scales, and cash." The Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting all three prior convictions under Rule 403, though the author of the opinion expressed concern about "the 'piling on' of multiple criminal convictions when a lesser number might suffice to establish the proposition of concern to the government." In United States v. Pagan-Santini, 451 F.3d 258 (1st Cir. 2006) , the defendant was charged with obstruction of justice after he, inter alia, assisted in preparing a witness at another trial to give false testimony. Evidence was introduced at the obstruction trial that the defendant had gotten drunk and on multiple occasions sexually harassed the witness he was preparing. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence. It was probative to show how important to the conspiracy was the defendant's continued involvement as the best available coach with the detailed knowledge to get the witness prepared. And although the evidence had a capacity to prejudice the defense, the Trial Judge gave the usual cautionary instruction not to misuse the testimony after carefully limiting it so that it "probably could not have been stripped down further and remained useful."

United States v. Adair, 436 F.3d 520 (5th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiring to commit money laundering, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding a prior similar scheme to commit money laundering, as the evidence was highly probative to rebut the defendant's claim that he was merely trying to set up a drug transaction for the DEA, and it had little opportunity to create unfair prejudice.

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Balancing -- Error To Admit

[A] Rule 404(b) -- Doubts About Other Act

United States v. Sumlin, 489 F.3d 683 (5th Cir. 2007) : The defendant was stopped by an officer on drug interdiction duty, but searches recovered only a loaded pistol and a partially-smoked marijuana cigarette. The Court reversed the defendant's conviction for felon firearm possession because the officer had been permitted to detail his unproven suspicions that the defendant had been transporting narcotics, including that: the body of the car had several loose or worn screws (and that traffickers frequently hide drugs in the bodies of their vehicles); he had spent some time trying to remove the speakers to see if anything was hidden beneath them; he had questioned the defendant about a friend called to retrieve the car because drug couriers frequently travel in pairs; he had followed the car to the impound lot and contacted the district attorney to assist in drafting a search warrant; a canine unit came to the lot and the dog alerted on the vehicle; and he had questioned the defendant about drugs when he was brought from the jail to the impound lot. The Court concluded that the testimony implied extrinsic uncharged crimes, which were irrelevant to prove any issue aside from the defendant's character, as it was insufficient to prove the other crimes.

[B] Rule 404(b) -- Balancing -- Error To Admit -- Inflammatory Evidence

United States v. Morena, 547 F.3d 191 (3d Cir. 2008) : The Court reversed a conviction for felon firearm possession and possession of a sawed-off shotgun because "the government's repeated injection of prejudicial drug evidence into the trial testimony constituted prosecutorial misconduct resulting in a denial of due process." Although the defendant was never charged with any drug offenses, the government contended that some discussion of drugs was necessary for background and it would show the shotgun was possessed to protect a drug dealing enterprise. However, the prosecution repeatedly went beyond that purpose to inject inadmissible drug evidence, such as evidence of heroin dealing not connected with the defendant and evidence of the defendant's drug use problem, even though the Judge declared at least five times that the evidence was "too prejudicial." "Nevertheless, the District Court ultimately failed to prevent the rampant injection of inadmissible evidence into the trial and its single limiting instruction to the jury was inadequate to cure the prejudice."

United States v. Stout, 509 F.3d 796 (6th Cir. 2007) : On interlocutory appeal in a prosecution for possession of child pornography, the Court (2-1) affirmed an in limine ruling precluding the government from introducing evidence that the defendant had previously been convicted for installing a hidden camera in the home of family friends and videotaping their 14-year-old daughter in the shower. While the prior act evidence might have some probative value on the question whether the defendant knew that the images he was charged with possessing were of children, that probative value was slight. The government's need for the evidence to prove intent and knowledge to possess child pornography was likewise slight, since it had other means of proof, such as testimony by the defendant's ex-wife that she had discovered on his computer that he had been searching for child pornography. On the other hand, in the words of the Trial Judge, "[t]he prior bad acts evidence is prejudicial because it is both inflammatory and distracting. It is more lurid and frankly more interesting than the evidence surrounding the actual charges. Any jury will be more alarmed and disgusted by the prior acts than the actual charged conduct. As a consequence, the jury is likely to pay undue attention to it... . [T]here is a strong possibility that the jury will be improperly distracted from the primary evidence at hand."

United States v. Curtin, 489 F.3d 935 (9th Cir. 2007) (en banc): The defendant engaged in sexually explicit conversation in an Internet chat room with an agent posing as a 14-year-old girl. When he was arrested after traveling to another state to meet her, his personal digital assistant was found to contain over 140 stories about adults having sex with children. Five of the stories (all of which involved incest) were introduced at his trial for interstate travel to engage in sex with a minor. A panel of the Court had reversed the conviction on the ground that the evidence was inadmissible under Rule 404(b) to prove intent, 443 F.3d 1084 (9th Cir. 2006) ; guided by People of Terr. of Guam v. Shymanovitz, 157 F.3d 1154, 1159 (9th Cir. 1998) (Manual § 404.03[2][l][ii][B]), the panel concluded, " 'Possession of lawful reading material is simply not the type of conduct contemplated by Rule 404(b).' " On en banc review, the Court held that the some of the stories in the defendant's possession were relevant to rebut his contention that he was intending to meet a 30- to 40-year-old woman who liked to pretend that she was an inexperienced teenage girl, and could thus be admitted under Rule 404(b). However, it was an abuse of discretion under Rule 403 for the Judge to admit all five of the stories without reading them through completely, as they contained portions with graphic descriptions of sexual conduct bearing no relation at all to the scenarios presented by the parties. As to one story, the Court commented: "Had the district court read Exhibit 7C, the court would no doubt have spotted this excrescence and required that it be edited out of the exhibit as both irrelevant and dangerously prejudicial." Five Judges concurred, but argued that "what people read or fantasize should not be used to prove what they intend to do," and thus would not overrule Shymanovitz; in any event, they would find evidence of a person's fantasies prejudicial.

[D] Rule 404(b) -- Balancing -- Error To Admit -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. McCallum 584 F.3d 471 (2d Cir. 2009) : Affirming a conviction for crack cocaine offenses, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to admit evidence of the defendant's two prior convictions for cocaine offenses. The Court observed: "The convictions were offered for the ostensible purpose of proving knowledge and intent. Even though those issues were not conceded, we are unable to discern from the record why the District Court thought the issues were seriously in dispute or why the prior convictions were appropriate proof. ... Given all [the] evidence, we are at a loss to understand how the court or the government could believe that the prior convictions were necessary to prove McCallum's intent and knowledge and that they passed muster under Rule 403."

[iii] Rule 404(b) -- Balancing -- Generally

United States v. Cook, 454 F.3d 938 (8th Cir. 2006) : The Trial Judge in a cocaine distribution case granted the defendant's motion in limine to exclude evidence of four prior drug convictions. The Court affirmed the ruling on interlocutory appeal. One conviction, for marijuana possession, was functionally dissimilar to the charged offense and six years remote, so there was no abuse of discretion in concluding that its "very minimal probative value was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice." The other convictions, for distribution offenses, were relevant to material issues such as knowledge and intent, and not so remote as to be inadmissible on that ground. However, the government wanted to introduce police reports and testimony related to those convictions in order to bolster testimony regarding "hand-to-hand transactions" that led to issuance of the search warrant in this case. Thus, the evidence "presented the prospect of mini-trials over the events underlying three prior convictions for five relatively remote drug transactions, all for the purpose of bolstering background evidence in this case." The Court concluded that "[t]his posed a substantial risk of distracting the jury from its central task of determining whether it was Cook who possessed the distribution quantity of crack cocaine found on the night stand," so exclusion was not an abuse of discretion, especially when the government moved for admission of the four prior convictions on an "all or nothing" basis.

[iv] Rule 404(b) -- Balancing -- Inclusionary Approach

United States v. Douglas, 482 F.3d 591 (D.C. Cir. 2007) : Affirming a conviction for possession of crack cocaine with intent to distribute, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding the defendant's arrest for the same offense a year earlier. Applying the approach that "the balance should generally be struck in favor of admission when the evidence indicates a close relation to the event charged," the Court concluded that the government's "other evidence ... was not without holes" and the prejudicial effect was minimized by careful and repeated limiting instructions.

[n] Rule 404(b) -- Civil Cases

[iii] Rule 404(b) -- Civil Cases -- Civil Rights Cases

[C] Rule 404(b) -- Civil Cases -- Prisoners' and Arrestees' Conduct

Boyd v. City & County of San Francisco, 576 F.3d 938 (9th Cir. 2009) : In a § 1983 excessive force action arising from an incident in which the plaintiff's decedent was fatally shot at the end of a high-speed chase when he reached into his vehicle rather than obeying an instruction to get down on the ground, the defendants argued that the victim had been attempting to commit "suicide by cop." Affirming a judgment for the defendants, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding a similar high-speed chase three days earlier, since the victim's promptly getting down on the ground when instructed in that case tended to rebut the plaintiffs' argument that he had hesitated in obeying police commands because of a lack of mobility caused by prosthetic legs. The Court also found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence concerning: a 1993 high-speed chase that ended with the victim's losing both legs; two kidnapping attempts by the victim on the day he was shot and killed; the victim's statement to police to "kill me" during a arrest three days prior to the shooting; drugs in his system at the time he was shot; and prior lawsuits filed by the victim or his mother against law enforcement agencies. The evidence tended to make the defendants' claim of the victim's resistance and provocation and the "suicide by cop" theory of defense more probable. However, the Court found that admission of evidence that the suspect wrote rap lyrics praising the murder of police officers and advocated prostitution was error (but harmless).

[v] Rule 404(b) -- Civil Cases -- Employment Discrimination Cases

Buckley v. Mukasey, 538 F.3d 306 (4th Cir. 2008) : The Court reversed a judgment for the defendant and granted a new trial to a DEA agent who brought a Title VII race and gender discrimination and retaliation suit. The plaintiff had not been permitted to introduce evidence regarding her participation in a long-running race discrimination class action against the DEA, on the ground that it tended only to show propensity. The Court held that by precluding the plaintiff from showing the pendency of the class litigation and the long history of its burden on the DEA, she was prevented from demonstrating why her participation in that litigation so rankled the relevant DEA decisionmakers that they were provoked to retaliate against her.

Alaniz v. Zamora-Quezada, 591 F.3d 761 (5th Cir. 2009) : In an action by four female employees against a doctor and his clinics for sex discrimination and retaliation, the Court concluded that the testimony by the individual plaintiffs and by two non-party employees was admissible to establish a modus operandi of an intimidating boss making sexual overtures to female subordinates.

Batiste-Davis v. Lincare, Inc., 526 F.3d 377 (8th Cir. 2008) : In a Title VII action by an employee alleging that she was discharged because of her race, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to admit evidence that the plaintiff had filed a pro se Title VII and ADA suit, which she subsequently voluntarily dismissed, against a former employer six years earlier. Since there was no indication that the prior lawsuit was fraudulently filed, any probative value of the evidence was substantially outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice.

[ix] Rule 404(b) -- Civil Cases -- Miscellaneous Cases

Kebede v. Hilton, 580 F.3d 714 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in an action for alienation of affections, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence that the defendant had conducted extramarital affairs with two men other than the plaintiff's ex-husband. The evidence was inadmissible under Rule 404(a) to show the defendant's "propensities for this type of activity," and in the absence of evidence that the defendant either alienated the affections of the other men or was aware that their affections had been alienated, it was inadmissible to prove intent under Rule 404(b).

[x] Rule 404(b) -- Civil Cases -- Securities Actions

SEC v. DiBella, 587 F.3d 553 (2d Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the SEC in an enforcement action against a former state Senator and his business for aiding and abetting violations of federal securities laws by the state Treasurer. It found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the Treasurer's prior bad acts, as the evidence tended to rebut any claim of absence of mistake and to prove that the Treasurer knew how to take advantage of his position for personal gain.

[o] Rule 404(b) -- Common Plan or Scheme

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Evidence Admissible

United States v. Edwards, 581 F.3d 604 (7th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a crack cocaine conviction, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony by the government's principal witness as to the procedures used by the defendant when he sold drugs to the witness on previous occasions and on the occasion leading to prosecution. The past practices tended to show a pattern between the buyer and seller in this case. And the fact that the pattern was followed provided an answer to the assertion that the witness had fabricated a drug sale in order to curry favor with the government.

United States v. Gipson, 446 F.3d 828 (8th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for possession with intent to distribute cocaine base, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the defendant's two other arrests for drug offenses at the same apartment complex involved in the charged offense. The evidence tended to prove knowledge and intent, and to demonstrate a common plan or scheme to sell cocaine base from that apartment complex.

United States v. Padron, 527 F.3d 1156 (11th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a mail fraud conviction arising from a scheme to stage auto accidents and make false insurance claims. It found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding an uncharged staged accident two months prior to the charged staged accidents, as the evidence tended to show the defendant's plan and intent.

[q] Rule 404(b) -- Consciousness of Guilt

United States v. Kemp, 500 F.3d 257 (3d Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed convictions in a public corruption case, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence disproving claims of great wealth that the defendant had made in grand jury testimony. The defendant's claims had been made to support an argument that he would not deign to involve himself in the paltry corruption alleged in the case, and the Court held that the falsity of the claims tended to show his consciousness of guilt of the underlying charges. The high probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by any prejudicial effect.

United States v. Yi, 460 F.3d 623 (5th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a conviction for trafficking in counterfeit goods, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant offered a bribe to an arresting officer. The evidence tended to show consciousness of guilt and was highly probative of intent, knowledge, and absence of mistake.

[t] Rule 404(b) -- Duress Defense

United States v. Dunkin, 438 F.3d 778 (7th Cir. 2006) : The defendant claimed that he had been coerced into committing a charged bank robbery by a gang holding his mother hostage. Affirming his conviction, the Court found no error in the admission of evidence that the defendant had committed an unsolved bank robbery five years previously, which he also claimed (likewise without confirming evidence) was done under coercion by the gang.

United States v. Ceballos, 605 F.3d 468 (8th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed the defendant's conviction for aiding and abetting the distribution of methamphetamine, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony concerning prior drug sales in which the defendant translated for her boyfriend and others. The evidence tended to rebut her defense that she was coerced into translating for her boyfriend because she feared he would harm her or her children, since participation in multiple sales over time rendered less credible her claim to have acted only because of threats of force ... Moreover, even if participation in earlier transactions had been coerced, the evidence tended to show she had reasonable opportunity to extricate herself before participating in the charged offenses.

[u] Rule 404(b) -- Entrapment Defense

United States v. Santiago, 566 F.3d 65 (1st Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possessing crack cocaine with intent to distribute, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of the defendant's 1997 conviction for possession of powder cocaine to rebut his entrapment defense.

United States v. Brand, 467 F.3d 179 (2d Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a conviction for interstate travel to engage in illegal sexual conduct, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of child pornography found on the defendant's computer. Because of the relationship between child pornography and abnormal sexual attraction to children, the evidence was probative of his intent when he went to meet what he thought was an under-age girl. The evidence was also relevant, by showing propensity, to rebut his entrapment defense.

United States v. Emerson, 501 F.3d 804 (7th Cir. 2007) : Two defendants were convicted of offenses arising from a conspiracy to commit "licks" (robbing drug dealers of their drugs). A detective, called by one defendant to support his entrapment defense, testified on cross-examination about a murder case arising from a drug lick in which both defendants (who were not named in the testimony) had been charged. Affirming, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence against the defendant asserting entrapment, as his predisposition had been put in issue and the evidence was probative on that point. As to the other defendant, the evidence was inadmissible under Rule 404(b), but the error was harmless.

United States v. Abumayyaleh, 530 F.3d 641 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant had previously been convicted for receiving a stolen firearm and for possession of a firearm as a felon and removing the identification numbers. The evidence was highly probative of the defendant's predisposition to possess a firearm when legally prohibited from doing so, and thus to rebut his entrapment defense.

United States v. Duran, 596 F.3d 1283 (11th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for acting in the United States as a foreign government's agent without prior notification to the Attorney General, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant had paid illegal kickbacks to various Venezuelan government officials. It held that the evidence was probative to establish the relationship between the defendant and the Venezuelan government, and thus was properly admitted to show his intent and motive to act as a government agent and to rebut his entrapment defense by showing his predisposition to act as a foreign government agent.

[v] Rule 404(b) -- Explaining Conduct

United States v. Banks, 514 F.3d 959 (9th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed convictions for use of a firearm in a crime of violence and felon firearm possession, finding no plain error in the admission of the facts regarding the defendant's prior felony conviction for a retaliatory stabbing. It reasoned that the evidence was probative of the defendant's commitment to maintaining his gang status even if he had to engage in violence to do so.

[w] Rule 404(b) -- Foundation for Other Acts

United States v. Cooks, 589 F.3d 173 (5th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed fraud and money laundering convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the defendant engineered five fraudulent real estate schemes that were substantially similar to those charged in the indictment and so were probative of intent as well as other proper purposes. The Court noted that the defense argument that the government was required to show that the defendant personally submitted fraudulent documents to lenders before the other act evidence could be admitted "overstates the Government's burden"; "it is sufficient to show that Cooks was knowingly involved in those deals."

United States v. Zahursky, 580 F.3d 515 (7th Cir. 2009) : The defendant was convicted for attempting to entice a minor to engage in sexual activity, following an exchange of messages with an agent posing as a 14-year-old on an Internet chat room. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence of other chats between underage girls and the computer at the defendant's home. Although there were others with access to the computer, circumstantial evidence was sufficient that the defendant had conducted the chats. In United States v. Reyes, 542 F.3d 588 (7th Cir. 2008) , the defendant, though absent from the charged bank robbery, was a former employee of the bank who provided key details about the functioning of the bank to the actual perpetrators. Affirming convictions for bank robbery and conspiracy, the Court found it was error (but harmless) to admit testimony from two coconspirators that they had previously participated in robberies with the defendant, when they could not recall the exact geographic location of the robberies or when they were committed and no corroborating evidence was submitted to support their vague allegations. The Court observed that evidence admitted under Rule 404(b) must be "sufficient to support a jury finding" that the defendant committed the alleged prior act, and held that the government had not met that standard.

United States v. Edelmann, 458 F.3d 791 (8th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a fraud conviction, finding no error in the admission of evidence that the defendant had forged a court order to have her husband's truck released by a creditor. The government met its burden of proving by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant had committed the "other bad act."

United States v. Estrada, 453 F.3d 1208 (9th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a methamphetamine-related conviction, finding no error in admission of evidence that on a previous occasion the defendant's fingerprint was found on a type of flask that is used in manufacturing methamphetamine. The flask was found during a search of a storage locker that contained materials used for making methamphetamine. Although the fingerprint was insufficient "to conclusively show" that the defendant committed the uncharged misconduct, "the standard for admissibility is only that the evidence is sufficient to support a finding that the defendant committed the other act." The Court also held that the evidence was properly admitted for the non-character purpose of showing that the defendant knew which materials are used to make methamphetamine.

[x] Rule 404(b) -- Identity

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Generally

[A] Rule 404(b) -- Circumstances Insufficiently Probative

United States v. Simpson, 479 F.3d 492 (7th Cir. 2007) : The Court reversed a conviction for a single delivery of crack cocaine because the Judge had allowed evidence of prior unrelated crack cocaine transactions and had permitted the prosecutor to argue in closing that the defendant had admitted to officers that he had done so many cocaine transactions that he didn't even remember doing the one for which he was charged. The evidence and argument "improperly appealed to Simpson's propensity to deal drugs." The Court rejected the argument that the uncharged cocaine transactions were admissible to prove identity, because there was not a "singularly strong resemblance" between the uncharged transactions and the transaction charged; evidence of uncharged misconduct does not become admissible to prove identity simply because the defendant disputes identity.

United States v. Phaknikone, 605 F.3d 1099 (11th Cir. 2010) : Affirming a conviction for seven armed bank robberies, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to admit evidence from the profile page, subscriber report, and photographs from the defendant's MySpace.com account to prove that he committed a string of bank robberies "like a gangster." The Court observed that "evidence offered to prove identity must satisfy a 'particularly stringent' analysis"; "[t]he physical similarity must be such that it marks the offenses as the handiwork of the accused"; and although a "photograph may portray a 'gangster-type personality,' the photograph does not evidence the modus operandi of a bank robber who commits his crimes with a singular trait." The Court concluded that "[t]he MySpace evidence is classic evidence of bad character."

[B] Rule 404(b) -- Identity -- Generally -- Circumstances Sufficiently Probative

United States v. Gallo-Moreno, 584 F.3d 751 (7th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a drug conspiracy conviction, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding another drug transaction involving the defendant. Statements he made during that transaction connected him to the charged transaction and to the confidential informant who participated in both and who provided a voice identification.

United States v. Brandon, 521 F.3d 1019 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court upheld the convictions of two defendants on drug and firearms charges. The guns were found in the car in which one defendant was a passenger, after a police chase. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of a post-arrest statement by one defendant that he wished he would have caught an unmarked police car alone and would have unloaded on it. The Court explained that the jury "could conceivably have doubts about whether the weapons belonged to Phillip Ellis, the driver of the Nissan. To resolve those doubts, the jury could interpret Johnson's statements as an admission he had a gun. Thus, the statements were relevant and admissible to identify Johnson as the possessor of a firearm."

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Identity -- Modus Operandi

[A] Rule 404(b) -- Bank Robbery

United States v. Perry, 438 F.3d 642 (6th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for armed bank robbery, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the defendant subsequently robbed a bank, having similarly entered carrying a gun in a bookbag, seeking change for $50, seeking to purchase money orders, and only then displaying the gun. The evidence was sufficiently distinctive to show the perpetrator of the charged crime and it was not sufficiently prejudicial to render it inadmissible.

United States v. Stenger, 605 F.3d 492 (8th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed bank robbery and firearms convictions of two defendants who were tried separately. In both trials evidence of two similar, uncharged bank robberies was offered, and the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence to prove identity. All the robberies targeted relatively small banks with several teller windows and a small drive-up window; all involved a tall Caucasion male conducting a takeover-style robbery, wearing a mask and hooded sweatshirt, and carrying a black powder pistol, which was a highly unusual weapon. In addition, in one of the uncharged robberies and in the charged robbery, the perpetrator threatened to "cap" anyone who did not cooperate with his orders.

[B] Rule 404(b) -- Identity -- Modus Operandi -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Fanfan, 468 F.3d 7 (1st Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for conspiracy to distribute cocaine, the Court assumed that the conspiracy had been terminated by the arrest of most of its members, but held that even so a post-conspiracy transaction in which the defendant attempted to distribute cocaine was admissible to prove modus operandi and identity. The arrested conspirator had paged the defendant, the government recorded the call, the arrested conspirator ordered cocaine and met the defendant by prearrangement, and the defendant had cocaine and cocaine base in his car. This evidence was especially important because only one witness could identify the defendant as the man who supplied drugs and this witness had a plea deal with the government.

[y.1] Rule 404(b) -- Improper Joinder of Charges

United States v. Shellef, 507 F.3d 82 (2d Cir. 2007) : In the prosecution of two defendants, the Court vacated and remanded the convictions on the ground that wire fraud, money laundering, and conspiracy charges leveled against both defendants were improperly joined with unrelated charges of income tax evasion and filing false tax returns against one of them. The Court reasoned that, if the non-tax counts had been tried separately, the evidence of the unrelated tax charges would have been excluded under Rule 403 as unduly prejudicial, and their improper joinder in this case was similarly unduly prejudicial.

[z.1] Rule 404(b) -- Inanimate Objects

Brazos R. Auth. v. GE Ionics, Inc., 469 F.3d 416 (5th Cir. 2006) : The plaintiff sued for breach of warranty after a retrofitted desalinization plant supplied by the defendants suffered several fires. At trial, evidence of fires at similar plants was excluded on the ground that it was barred by Rule 404(b). Vacating a judgment for the defendants, the Court held that Rule 404(b) does not apply to the propensities of inanimate objects, as it specifically bars only the use of acts to show "the character of a person" (emphasis added). The Court also found that the evidence should not have been excluded under Rule 403 and that the error was not harmless.

[aa] Rule 404(b) -- Insanity Defense

United States v. Diekhoff, 535 F.3d 611 (7th Cir. 2008) : The defendant, who kidnapped a woman for whom he had romantic feelings after she began dating another man, pleaded insanity. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant had previously been convicted for kidnapping a former girlfriend. The defendant argued that because he stipulated to the kidnapping, the prior conviction showed only propensity. But the Court disagreed, noting that the only issue in the case was whether the defendant appreciated the wrongfulness of his conduct, and the conviction for the prior kidnapping tended to show that the defendant would be aware of the wrongfulness of his behavior. In addition, the prior conviction showed that he was mentally capable of planning a complicated criminal act, which tended to belie his insanity defense. The Court also noted that the danger of unfair prejudice "is lessened somewhat in a case where the only issue is the defendant's sanity." It explained that "the prejudice from a showing of prior criminality would not likely interfere with the jury's assessment of the proof in the case before it. The question is whether the defendant knew right from wrong. And the evidence of the defendant's prior criminal acts is not likely to unfairly tilt the jury towards a conclusion that he did," since "prior criminal acts could just as easily show the defendant's insanity" as show that he understood the wrongful nature of his acts. Thus, given the high probative value and the low risk of prejudice, there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence.

[bb] Rule 404(b) -- Intent

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Assault, Homicide, Abuse, etc., Cases

United States v. Rodriguez-Berrios, 573 F.3d 55 (1st Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed the defendant's conviction for the fatal carjacking of his ex-wife, finding no error in the admission of evidence regarding his prior abuse and stalking of the victim. "The evidence of [his] intentional physical harm of the victim in the past had 'special relevance' [citation], because it was probative of his intent to cause her harm at the time he seized her car." "[T]he evidence of appellant's stalking had special relevance because it demonstrated [his] motive to commit the crime -- his intense jealousy."

United States v. Brand, 467 F.3d 179 (2d Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a conviction for interstate travel to engage in illegal sexual conduct, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of child pornography found on the defendant's computer. Because of the relationship between child pornography and abnormal sexual attraction to children, the evidence was probative of his intent when he went to meet what he thought was an under-age girl. The evidence was also relevant, by showing propensity, to rebut his entrapment defense.

United States v. Burt, 495 F.3d 733 (7th Cir. 2007) : In a trial for child pornography offenses, one child witness testified about molestation that was recorded on a video that was the basis for one of the counts against the defendant, but another testified to molestation that was not documented in any of the photos giving rise to the charges. The defendant objected that the latter witness' testimony lacked probative value and was likely to unfairly prejudice the jury. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the testimony, as the fact that the molestation occurred behind locked doors, in the same rooms of the house where the defendant's photography sessions had been conducted, was directly relevant to the question whether the defendant was a "professional photographer; taking pictures for a legitimate 'non-pornographic website,' " as the defense contended, "or whether he took pictures of naked children because they 'elicit a sexual response' in him or his online partners." In United States v. Hale, 448 F.3d 971 (7th Cir. 2006) (per curiam), the Court affirmed a conviction for obstructing justice and soliciting a crime of violence in connection with a plot to have a federal District Judge murdered. It found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the defendant's positive comments about a follower of the defendant's white supremacist organization who went on a shooting rampage that left two people dead and nine others wounded. The Court concluded that, in a solicitation case, evidence about how the defendant expected his followers to act was probative of the defendant's intent in dealing with a cooperating witness (i.e., whether he intended to solicit the witness to arrange for the killing of the judge). The Court recognized that the potential prejudice of the evidence was "significant," concluding, "We find it to be a close question but cannot quarrel with the district court's deliberative decision to admit the challenged evidence."

United States v. Erickson, 610 F.3d 1049 (8th Cir. 2010) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in denying a motion to sever charges arising from separate incidents in which the defendant allegedly committed knife assaults, since "[e]vidence of other recent knife assaults sharing a number of common characteristics would likely have been admissible in a separate trial." In United States v. Jourdain, 433 F.3d 652 (8th Cir. 2006) , the Court affirmed a conviction for aiding and abetting an assault that resulted in serious bodily injury, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that earlier on the day of the incident the defendant and his friends had solicited a companion to kill another man. The evidence tended to rebut the defendant's argument that the was merely present at the charged incident, as it was relevant to establish whether the defendant and his friends had a joint criminal purpose, whether the defendant had knowledge of the violence potential of his friends, and whether the charged shooting (after the defendant confronted the victim) could have been a mistake or accident.

[iv] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Conspiracy

United States v. Ross, 510 F.3d 702 (7th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed convictions on conspiracy and related charges arising from the robbery of a postal truck docked at a post office annex, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony that one defendant conspired to rob the post office on two occasions five and six years earlier. The Court reasoned that "[b]ecause conspiracy is a specific intent crime, whether Wilson intended to conspire to rob the post office was automatically in issue." Moreover, the bad acts were similar enough to the charged crime to "be relevant to the matter in issue." Specifically, "the prior conspiracies are also sufficiently similar to, and close in time with the charged offenses," and "[a]ll of the robberies targeted the same post office, occurred on the same day of the week, required the use of scissors, and involved two of the same participants."

[v] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Drug Cases

[A] Rule 404(b) -- Evidence of Different Drugs

United States v. Benitez, 531 F.3d 711 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed convictions for possessing methamphetamine with intent to distribute methamphetamine, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the defendant's prior conviction for possession of cocaine. The fact that the prior conviction was for a different drug than the one charged and did not involve the substantial amount of drugs involved in the instant case did not require exclusion of the evidence: "[E]vidence of prior possession of even personal-use quantities of drugs is admissible as evidence of knowledge and intent in a drug distribution prosecution."

[B] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Drug Cases -- Evidence of Different Quantities

United States v. Benitez, 531 F.3d 711 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed convictions for possessing methamphetamine with intent to distribute methamphetamine, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the defendant's prior conviction for possession of cocaine. The fact that the prior conviction was for a different drug than the one charged and did not involve the substantial amount of drugs involved in the instant case did not require exclusion of the evidence: "[E]vidence of prior possession of even personal-use quantities of drugs is admissible as evidence of knowledge and intent in a drug distribution prosecution."

[C] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Drug Cases -- Evidence of Possession Where Distribution Is Charged

United States v. Benitez, 531 F.3d 711 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed convictions for possessing methamphetamine with intent to distribute methamphetamine, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the defendant's prior conviction for possession of cocaine. The fact that the prior conviction was for a different drug than the one charged and did not involve the substantial amount of drugs involved in the instant case did not require exclusion of the evidence: "[E]vidence of prior possession of even personal-use quantities of drugs is admissible as evidence of knowledge and intent in a drug distribution prosecution."

[D] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Drug Cases -- Evidence of Similar Drugs

United States v. Hawkins, 548 F.3d 1143 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for distributing cocaine base within 1000 feet of a school, finding no error in the admission of prior convictions for drug distribution. The Court found that the prior convictions were not barred simply because they involved different (though similar) drugs, and noted that "[p]rior felony drug convictions are relevant to show intent and knowledge in a drug prosecution when a defendant makes a general denial defense, which necessarily places the defendant's state of mind at issue."

[F] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Drug Cases -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Yearwood, 518 F.3d 220 (4th Cir. 2008) : Affirming a conviction for conspiring to distribute and possess with intent to distribute 50 grams or more of cocaine base, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the defendant's prior conviction for possession with intent to distribute cocaine and conspiracy to distribute cocaine, because the defendant put his knowledge and intent in issue by contending he was selling music instead of drugs.

United States v. Cockrell, 587 F.3d 674 (5th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to possess heroin with intent to distribute, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the defendant's prior conviction for using a telephone to conduct narcotics transactions, as the prior offense involved the same intent required to prove the charged offense. Evidence that the defendant was caught conducting a drug transaction on his cell phone while at a police station on an unrelated charge was likewise properly admitted, as this too was probative of intent. The Court emphasized that entry of a not guilty plea in a conspiracy case sufficiently raises the issue of intent to warrant introduction of Rule 404(b) evidence.

United States v. Bell, 516 F.3d 432 (6th Cir. 2008) : In the defendant's trial for possession of marijuana and cocaine with intent to distribute, residents of the house where the drugs were found testified that he lived there most of the time, while the defendant's fiancee testified that he stayed with her "[b]asically every night." His conviction was reversed because prior convictions for possession of marijuana and cocaine base with intent to distribute were improperly admitted as evidence of intent and of absence of mistake or accident. The Court held (2-1) that the convictions were not probative of intent to possess and distribute because they were neither part of the same scheme nor involved a similar modus operandi as the present offense. And the defendant had not asserted a defense based on some type of mistake or accident, so that purpose for admitting the convictions was not material or "in issue." In any event, the probative value of the convictions several years prior to the instant offense was slight, the government had ample available means to prove the defendant's specific intent to possess and distribute the drugs, and the prejudicial effect was significant. In United States v. Matthews, 440 F.3d 818 (6th Cir. 2006) , the court affirmed drug and firearm convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence regarding earlier drug sales by the defendant. The earlier sales were probative of whether the defendant knew that the clear plastic bag in his possession contained cocaine and whether he intended to distribute the drug.

United States v. Harris, 587 F.3d 861 (7th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed drug and firearm convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony by the defendant's girlfriend about prior drug sales to prove intent and to rebut the defendant's claims that he was only holding drugs for another person. In United States v. Vargas, 552 F.3d 550 (7th Cir. 2008) , when the defendant's refrigerated semi-trailer truck was stopped while he was hauling produce, 282 kilograms of cocaine were found concealed in a hidden compartment. Affirming a conviction for possession of the cocaine with intent to distribute, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant had on prior occasions transported drugs hidden under loads of produce in refrigerated semi-trailers. His prior involvement in drug trafficking was probative of his possession being knowing, and the similarity between the incidents was sufficient to produce an inference of criminal intent. In United States v. Moore, 531 F.3d 496 (7th Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed convictions for drug and firearm offenses, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the defendant's prior drug dealing and flight from the police. The evidence related to an event that occurred just two weeks before the charged offense and tended to prove the defendant's intent to control the drugs he later threw from a car, as he admitted at the time of the prior offense to throwing crack cocaine from his car while attempting to evade police. In United States v. Hurn, 496 F.3d 784 (7th Cir. 2007) , the court affirmed a conviction for possession of cocaine with intent to distribute, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the defendant's 10-year-old cocaine distribution conviction to prove intent. The defendant claimed that he only occasionally stayed in the home where the drugs were found, thus raising an issue of intent, and the Court found that the previous conviction was very similar to the conduct charged and was not too remote.

United States v. Jongewaard, 567 F.3d 336 (8th Cir. 2009) : Affirming a conviction for transmitting in interstate commerce a communication containing a threat to injure, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the defendant had two years previously confronted the same person and remarked, "[I] might commit a double murder tonight." The defendant had made his intent a material issue by claiming intoxication affected his specific intent to commit the crime, and the evidence of the prior threat was probative of his intent. In United States v. James, 564 F.3d 960 (8th Cir. 2009) , the Court affirmed cocaine convictions, holding that evidence of the defendant's prior conviction for delivery of cocaine was admissible to prove intent and knowledge where the defendant claimed to be merely present at the scene of the crime and to have obtained marked currency by panhandling. In United States v. Ironi, 525 F.3d 683 (8th Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed a conviction for aiding and abetting the possession with intent to distribute cocaine, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting the defendant's two prior cocaine possession convictions to rebut his claim that he lacked intent to participate in the charged cocaine dealings and to prove that he had knowledge about cocaine and the types of materials and objects typically found in the presence of cocaine. The Court declared that "a prior conviction for distributing drugs, and even the possession of user-quantities of a controlled substance, are relevant under Rule 404(b) to show knowledge and intent to commit a current charge of conspiracy to distribute drugs." In United States v. Lucas, 521 F.3d 861 (8th Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed methamphetamine and firearms convictions, finding that the defendant's previous methamphetamine conviction, possession of a handgun, and manufacture of methamphetamine were "highly probative of [his] unmistakable knowledge and intent to manufacture methamphetamine and possess a firearm in the instant case."

United States v. Cardinas Garcia, 596 F.3d 788 (10th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possession of methamphetamine with intent to distribute, holding that an officer's testimony to seeing the defendant sell cocaine and methamphetamine a month before the charged crime was properly admitted to prove his intent to distribute.

United States v. Brown, 587 F.3d 1082 (11th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed drug and firearm convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting a defendant's prior convictions for cocaine offenses to prove intent. It noted that "[p]rior convictions for drug trafficking are considered highly probative of intent to commit current drug trafficking offenses."

[G] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Drug Cases -- Whether Intent at Issue

United States v. Pettiford, 517 F.3d 584 (D.C. Cir. 2008) : Affirming a conviction for possession of cocaine base with intent to distribute, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that three weeks before the defendant's arrest in his car where the drugs were found the defendant also possessed crack cocaine with intent to distribute. The Court held that the evidence was admissible to prove that the defendant knowingly and intentionally possessed the cocaine with the intent to distribute, and noted that "[t]he fact that the government produced probative evidence of Pettiford's knowledge and intent does not preclude it from offering additional evidence to establish those elements beyond a reasonable doubt." It distinguished United States v. Linares, 367 F.3d 941 (D.C. Cir. 2004) (Manual § 404.03[2][ee][v]), a case in which eyewitness testimony that the defendant had a gun in his hand and fired it made it virtually certain that the jury, if it believed the testimony, would find that the defendant knowingly possessed the gun, from the instant case, which "is not a case in which the jury had to either believe the witnesses and conclude that the defendant knowingly possessed the crack with intent to distribute it, or disbelieve them and find that he did not possess the crack at all." In United States v. Douglas, 482 F.3d 591 (D.C. Cir. 2007) , the court affirmed a conviction for possession of crack cocaine with intent to distribute, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding the defendant's arrest for the same offense a year earlier. That the defendant was not disputing the elements of intent and knowledge did not make the evidence irrelevant, since the government has the burden of proving every element of the offense beyond a reasonable doubt and may prove its case by evidence of its choice.

United States v. McCall, 553 F.3d 821 (5th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed in part a conviction for selling crack cocaine, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of previous cocaine sales by the defendant. The Court noted that the plea of not guilty made evidence of the defendant's general intent relevant, absent "enforceable pre-trial assurances that he intend[ed] not to dispute criminal intent," but that extrinsic act evidence showing absence of mistake is not relevant unless the defendant raises the issue, since "[u]nlike intent, absence of mistake or accident need not be proved by the government unless raised by the defense." However, when other crimes evidence is relevant only to the issue of general intent, special attention should be given to concerns of prejudice, for "there will almost always be other evidence."

United States v. Webb, 548 F.3d 547 (7th Cir. 2008) : Executing a search warrant for drugs at a house, officers found the defendant, wearing workout clothes, in the driveway. In the basement of the house they found exercise gear, along with drugs in plain view, and they also found drug packaging equipment through the house. At his trial for possession of drugs with intent to distribute, the defendant claimed he was only at the house by chance; in response the prosecution introduced his prior conviction for distributing cocaine, to show intent and absence of mistake. The Court affirmed, but held it was error (albeit harmless) to admit the other crimes evidence, as the defendant was denying not intent but possession for any purpose, and it tended to show absence of mistake only via the prohibited inference that someone who distributes drugs once is likely to do it again. In United States v. Jones, 455 F.3d 800 (7th Cir. 2006) , the Court affirmed a conviction for possession with intent to distribute cocaine base, finding no abuse of abuse discretion in admitting, as evidence of intent, the defendant's prior conviction for unlawful delivery of a controlled substance. It noted that "the district court's consideration of the matter does not appear to reflect the sort of critical evaluation of the issue that we believe ought to be undertaken in determining whether, in an exercise of discretion, such evidence ought to be admitted on the issue of intent," since "the court recited the governing principles from our case law, but otherwise revealed little in the way of critical analysis as to how those principles ought to apply to the facts of this particular case." The Court suggested that it might share the blame for the state of the record: "This lapse well may be attributable, in part at least, to our own treatment of such matters on occasion; our cases have not always reflected a critical application of the principles reflected in the case law to the facts of the individual case." It observed that "[t]he most obvious justifiable situation in which prior convictions are admissible in drug prosecutions on the issue of intent are in those situations in which the defendant, while admitting possession of the substance, denies the intent to distribute it," and "[o]ur case law also has recognized that evidence of earlier drug trafficking convictions also can be relevant and probative when the defendant flatly contests all elements of the charge of possession with intent to distribute." The Court was persuaded by the government's argument on appeal that because the defendant claimed that only a small amount of the drugs were his and they were for personal use, his intent to distribute the greater amount was in dispute. The concurring Judge stated, "I have grave doubts about the prosecution's theory of relevance in this prosecution," explaining:

> Jones argued that he did not own the distribution-size cache of drugs that investigators found; he admitted only to the personal-use-size cache that was in a different location. According to the prosecutor Jones's conviction shows that he had learned to separate stocks of drugs in order to throw the hounds off the scent. Yet how does the conviction show this? Is it that every drug dealer knows this trick of the trade? Of that there is no evidence, and it is not something that a jury could find without proof. Is it that Jones's conviction shows that his former strategy had flopped, so he hit upon this as something new? Of that there is no evidence either; we don't know the facts underlying the 1994 conviction. Thus the prosecutor's theory boils down to a belief that a drug conviction always is relevant in any later drug prosecution, and [United States v. Beasley, 809 F.2d 1273 (7th Cir. 1987)] disapproves that perspective.

The concurring Judge concluded: "Allowing a prosecutor routinely to introduce drug convictions in the case in chief without demonstrating relevance to some concrete dispute between the litigants creates needless risk that a conviction will rest on the forbidden propensity inference." Thus, it is prudent to exclude prior convictions "under Rule 403 unless in opening argument the defendant's lawyer makes an argument (such as the defendant's supposed inability to recognize a white powder as cocaine) that highlights intent, knowledge, or some other appropriate use of bad acts. If the evidence is excluded during the opening presentation, and something unexpected comes up during the defense case, the prosecutor can wheel out the conviction during rebuttal; by then its relevance (or irrelevance) should be apparent." In United States v. Chavis, 429 F.3d 662 (7th Cir. 2005) , the Court affirmed crack cocaine convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the defendant's 1997 conviction for possession of crack cocaine with intent to distribute. It noted that the defendant claimed he was in the wrong place at the wrong time, which made evidence of intent especially probative.

United States v. Matthews, 431 F.3d 1296 (11th Cir. 2005) : This opinion supersedes the one annotated in the Main Volume of the Manual. On rehearing the Court affirmed the conviction, holding that under Circuit precedent there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the defendant's 1991 conviction for street-level drug selling as evidence of his intent in a major cocaine distribution conspiracy. The Court noted that "circuit precedent regards virtually any prior drug offense as probative of the intent to engage in a drug conspiracy," that an appellant bears a heavy burden of demonstrating abuse of discretion in determinations of remoteness, and that, despite the defendant's argument that the government otherwise present a strong case on the issue of intent, "the jury may have concluded that Matthews engaged in all of the substantive drug offenses about which the witnesses testified without believing that Matthews intended to join a conspiracy." One Judge concurred specially, arguing that the evidence "was admitted for no purpose other than to show propensity to engage in criminal activity," yet affirming on the ground that its admission was a correct application of the Circuit's precedent in conspiracy cases, which "has evolved into one that undermines Rule 404(b) itself and represents a perversion of the origins of the circuit's doctrine in this context."

[vii] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Firearms Cases

United States v. Jones, 484 F.3d 783 (5th Cir. 2007) : The Court reversed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding an abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant had previously been convicted for the same crime, committed under circumstances virtually identical to those alleged in the instant case -- in both cases an eyewitness testified that he saw the defendant take a gun from his waistband and throw it under a house. The evidence had been admitted to show knowledge and intent, but because the case was one of actual rather than constructive possession, intent was not an element, and "once the government has shown that the defendant had a firearm under his immediate control, any contention that he did not know the nature of what he possessed is effectively precluded."

United States v. Dennis, 497 F.3d 765 (7th Cir. 2007) : The defendant was convicted of conspiring to violate firearms laws after he agreed to travel with another who was buying illegal guns. Affirming, the Court held that once the defense argued that the purpose of the trip was to defraud the alleged seller, evidence that he had previously traveled with the coconspirator on a gun-trafficking trip was relevant to his intent on the charged occasion.

[viii] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Fraud, Forgery, Counterfeiting, False Statements, etc., Cases

United States v. Brown, 597 F.3d 399 (D.C. Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for bank fraud and passing fictitious financial instruments, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant had previously been warned by a detective from the Secret Service that financial instruments he attempted to use in purchasing autos and real estate were bogus and that it was unlawful to use them. The uncharged conduct bore "a close relation to the offense charged" and was relevant to intent because it "tended to rebut Brown's claim that he acted in good faith in twice attempting to deposit a 'bill of exchange' at the credit union."

United States v. Kelley, 551 F.3d 171 (2d Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions for securities and wire fraud, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of bogus account statements sent by the defendant stock broker to his clients two to four years after the purchase of the related securities. Although the statements did not themselves constitute securities violations, they were relevant to prove an intent to defraud by showing that the defendant continued efforts to avoid detection by deceiving clients as to the value of their investments.

United States v. Kellogg, 510 F.3d 188 (3d Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a mail fraud conviction against the owner of an environmental laboratory who falsely certified that certain tests had been conducted, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the lab had been decertified for drinking water testing a few years earlier. The fact that the defendant had represented that deficiencies had been corrected when they had not was probative of his intent to defraud. The Court also found that evidence of false statements the defendant made to the state Department of Environmental Protection regarding the lab's quality control officer was properly admitted as evidence of fraudulent intent.

United States v. Crawley. 533 F.3d 349 (5th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a defendant's convictions relating to voter fraud in connection with his being elected president of a union local. It found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the defendant had committed acts of voter fraud in a prior election, since the jury could rationally conclude that because the defendant had unlawful intent in the extrinsic offense, it was less likely that he had lawful intent in the present offense. In United States v. Nguyen, 504 F.3d 561 (5th Cir. 2007) , the court affirmed convictions arising from a fraudulent home buying scheme, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the conspirators used the same scheme in connection with two unrelated properties, as the other incidents demonstrated how the operation worked and established knowledge and intent.

United States v. Fraser, 448 F.3d 833 (6th Cir. 2006) : As evidence of the defendant's intent in a check fraud scheme, the prosecution introduced excerpts from a book he had written that detailed a virtually identical scheme. Affirming, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in the admission of the evidence, as the defendant's description of the scam as the "sweetest hustle in the world" tended to rebut his claim of being an innocent dupe, and the Judge had taken great care to avoid argumentation or admission of any parts likely to cause unfair prejudice.

United States v. Sparkman, 500 F.3d 678 (8th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a defendant's convictions arising from a scheme to defraud his business' insurer by burning an office building and two vehicles. The defendant attempted to defend the charges by placing the blame for the fire on Smith, an employee of another business the defendant owned. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of testimony by Smith that the defendant told him that he had run an unsold truck into a pond and reported it stolen to collect on the insurance a couple of months before the arson giving rise to the instant case, as the evidence was admissible to prove intent.

United States v. Caldwell, 560 F.3d 1214 (10th Cir. 2009) : The defendant was convicted of wire fraud in a scheme that enabled people with weak credit to obtain loans that covered the entire purchase price of their homes and gave them money back. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding two uncharged transactions, one involving the defendant's own home and the other involving a loan in which a company owned by the defendant's wife lent the down payment and received a large check in return. The Court reasoned that the evidence was probative of the defendant's intent to defraud.

United States v. Padron, 527 F.3d 1156 (11st Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a mail fraud conviction arising from a scheme to stage auto accidents and make false insurance claims. It found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding an uncharged staged accident two months prior to the charged staged accidents, as the evidence tended to show the defendant's plan and intent. In United States v. Ellisor, 522 F.3d 1255 (11th Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed a mail fraud conviction arising from the defendant's soliciting funds for a Christmas extravaganza in Miami that never occurred. It found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that four years earlier the defendant had sold tickets for a Utah show that was canceled and that he was fined by the State for failing to pay refunds within 30 days and for committing a deceptive act. There was a high degree of similarity between the Utah event and the charged conduct.

[x] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Hensley, 574 F.3d 384 (7th Cir. 2009) : The defendant was charged with attempting to solicit a minor for sex after a sting operation in which he established multiple online relationships with a fictitious 13-year-old girl. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding his prior online relationship with a 13-year-old girl, as the defendant made his intent a central issue at trial by persistently claiming that he believed the chats forming the basis for the charge were with an 18-year-old.

United States v. Cvijanovich, 556 F.3d 857 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for making threats against the President, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant previously was armed with a gun in a parking lot of a venue where the President was speaking, as well as of journal entries that the defendant wrote while incarcerated referring to that prior conduct. The evidence was relevant to prove intent and the seriousness of the threats.

United States v. Cherer, 513 F.3d 1150 (9th Cir. 2008) : The defendant, charged with attempting to entice a minor to engage in sexual acts with him, claimed that he did not believe that the person he was chatting with online was underage. Affirming, the Court held that evidence of the defendant's prior conviction for lewdness with a child under 14, as well as evidence of complaints by chat room users that a person with the defendant's screen name had been using inappropriate sexual language, was properly admitted to show intent to have sex with a minor. It noted that the facts underlying the prior conviction were "strikingly similar to those of his current conviction" and that the language he used in the chat room closely resembled the language he used in the communications with his target in the instant case. In United States v. Curtin, 489 F.3d 935 (9th Cir. 2007) (en banc), the defendant engaged in sexually explicit conversation in an Internet chat room with an agent posing as a 14-year-old girl. When he was arrested after traveling to another state to meet her, his personal digital assistant was found to contain over 140 stories about adults having sex with children. Five of the stories (all of which involved incest) were introduced at his trial for interstate travel to engage in sex with a minor. A panel of the Court had reversed the conviction on the ground that the evidence was inadmissible under Rule 404(b) to prove intent, 443 F.3d 1084 (9th Cir. 2006) ; guided by People of Terr. of Guam v. Shymanovitz, 157 F.3d 1154, 1159 (9th Cir. 1998) (Manual § 403.03[77][c]), the panel concluded, " 'Possession of lawful reading material is simply not the type of conduct contemplated by Rule 404(b).' " On en banc review, the Court held that the some of the stories in the defendant's possession were relevant to rebut his contention that he was intending to meet a 30- to 40-year-old woman who liked to pretend that she was an inexperienced teenage girl, and could thus be admitted under Rule 404(b). However, it was an abuse of discretion under Rule 403 for the Judge to admit all five of the stories without reading them through completely, as they contained portions with graphic descriptions of sexual conduct bearing no relation at all to the scenarios presented by the parties. As to one story, the Court commented: "Had the district court read Exhibit 7C, the court would no doubt have spotted this excrescence and required that it be edited out of the exhibit as both irrelevant and dangerously prejudicial." Five Judges concurred, but argued that "what people read or fantasize should not be used to prove what they intend to do," and thus would not overrule Shymanovitz; in any event, they would find evidence of a person's fantasies prejudicial. On remand, only one carefully redacted story, which explicitly described prurient sexual activity between an adult and a child, was admitted. The defense brought out on cross-examination that the defendant's PDA contained other stories pertaining to innocent subjects that did not involve sex with juveniles or children. The agent then testified on redirect that the total number of child/sex stories in the PDA was 140. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion. United States v. Curtin, 588 F.3d 993 (9th Cir. 2009) . The Judge had faithfully followed the en banc opinion in admitting the story, and the redirect examination was more relevant than prejudicial in countering the inference the defendant attempted to create that the story introduced was only a small, insignificant part of the PDA's total content.

United States v. Schene, 543 F.3d 627 (10th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a child pornography conviction, finding no abuse of discretion when images not linked to a specific count in the indictment were admitted to prove knowledge and intent.

United States v. Brannan, 562 F.3d 1300 (11th Cir. 2009) : In a prosecution for indecent exposure and public lewdness in a federal wildlife refuge, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant had previously engaged in sexual acts at the wildlife refuge. The evidence tended to rebut the defendant's testimony that he only exposed himself at an undercover agent's repeated request and that he would not otherwise have engaged in the offenses. In United States v. Perez, 443 F.3d 772 (11th Cir. 2006) , the Court affirmed a conviction for smuggling aliens, finding no error in the admission of the defendant's prior conviction for alien smuggling. The defendant's not guilty plea made intent a material issue in the case: "In fact, by his theory of defense -- that he did not know the aliens' illegal status -- he expressly made his knowledge and intent a focal point of the case, making the evidence of his prior conviction admissible for non-propensity purposes."

[xi] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Tax Cases

United States v. Griffin, 524 F.3d 71 (1st Cir. 2008) : Affirming a conviction for filing a false tax return, the Court held there was no error in the admission of evidence that the defendant sold audio-tapes that instructed listeners how to avoid paying taxes, as this evidence was "probative of her state of mind when reporting her income."

United States v. Daraio, 445 F.3d 253 (3d Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a tax evasion conviction, finding no abuse of discretion when evidence of the defendant's prior tax evasion was admitted to rebut the contention that documents prepared by the defendant's daughter were prepared "in error without fraudulent intent."

United States v. Miller, 520 F.3d 504 (5th Cir. 2008) : Affirming a conviction for evading taxes in 2000, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that in 1997 the defendant opened a bank account under a false name and with fraudulent identification. The Court found the earlier act probative of intent because the financial planner upon whom the defendant said he relied in 2000 had advised him not to do the 1997 transaction. The past act was not too remote in time, since it occurred shortly before the defendant began the course of conduct that led to the evasion charges, and "there were common actors ... involved in both schemes."

United States v. Abboud, 438 F.3d 554 (6th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed convictions for income tax offenses in connection with a check kiting scheme, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendants paid employees "under the table." The evidence of failure to pay employment taxes tended to show that the defendants also acted willfully in failing to file returns for and pay income taxes, and the testimony regarding the violations "was sufficiently succinct so as to minimize prejudice."

United States v. Ellis, 548 F.3d 539 (7th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for failure to remit employment taxes, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant failed to pay individual and corporate taxes before and during the charged period. The evidence tended to negate a defense of willfulness and to show that the defendant acted willfully, in that she was aware of her duties to pay taxes and disregarded those duties.

[xii] Rule 404(b) -- Intent -- Theft, Robbery, and Stolen Property Offenses

United States v. Bradshaw, 580 F.3d 1129 (10th Cir. 2009) : The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in a bank robbery case when the Judge admitted a BB gun, which was found underneath the defendant's backpack along his escape route and proved to have been purchased by the defendant a week or two before the robbery. Although the gun was never displayed during the robbery, it was relevant to prove the defendant's intent to intimidate during the robbery.

[dd] Rule 404(b) -- Jury Instructions

United States v. Hemphill, 514 F.3d 1350 (D.C. Cir. 2008) : In a prosecution for various crimes arising from the theft of millions of dollars from the Washington Teachers Union, the government charged six specific acts of embezzlement as well as a conspiracy to embezzle to commit fraud, and offered evidence of thousands of transactions in which one defendant took money from the union. All of these transactions, except the six charged, were relevant to prove the conspiracy but were Rule 404(b) evidence as to the six embezzlement charges. Therefore, the Court concluded that it was error (but harmless) to decline to give a limiting instruction as to the use of the other transactions in proving the six embezzlements. The Court noted that when the prosecution "introduces evidence of prior bad acts and the defendant requests a limiting instruction, a trial court must immediately provide one."

United States v. Garcia, 567 F.3d 721 (5th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed marijuana trafficking and conspiracy convictions, finding no plain error in the admission of evidence regarding one defendant's cocaine trafficking and use, as it was relevant to issues of intent and knowledge. The Court also found no plain error in the Judge's failure to instruct the jury on the limited purpose for which the evidence was admitted, commenting that "[f]or trials to function effectively, parties themselves must play an active role in creating the jury charge; the inclusion of Rule 404(b) instructions is no exception."

United States v. Davis, 547 F.3d 520 (6th Cir. 2008) : The Court reversed crack cocaine convictions, holding it was error to admit evidence of an uncharged drug transaction, and to instruct the jury to consider the evidence in deciding whether the transaction was committed in preparation for the instant offense, where preparation was not at issue in the case. Additionally, the Court found the jury instruction flawed because it instructed the jury that the prior drug transaction was "part of the pattern of related conduct." Pattern evidence is admissible only as "a way of demonstrating one of the purposes permissible under 404(b)," such as identity, and is not itself a basis for admissibility. The prior act evidence could have been admissible for intent but an intent basis for admission was not adequately conveyed to the jury; "[u]sing pattern to show intent is different from using it to show propensity, but it is close enough that it increases the importance of a clear instruction." In United States v. Newsom, 452 F.3d 593 (6th Cir. 2006) , a felon firearm possession case, the Court took issue with the Trial Judge's Rule 404(b) instruction, which allowed consideration of uncharged misconduct "for other limited purposes such as proof of motive, intent, identity, or absence of mistake." No explanation was given on what acts the instruction was referring to, nor did the instruction inform the jury why any of the designated uses were relevant to the issues in the case. The Court found that "three of the four permissible uses for uncharged misconduct that were enumerated by the district court were not at issue in this case. One use listed by the jury instructions [intent] was actually at issue, however, compelling the conclusion that the district court did not commit plain error." The Court expressed concern with the state of the law on Rule 404(b) instructions, noting that some existing Circuit precedent warns "district courts about how carefully they must instruct juries regarding Rule 404(b) evidence," while other cases have held that "so long as the district court includes in its instructions at least one permissible use, reversal is not warranted, at least where the plain-error standard of review applies." It noted that so long as the latter cases "continue to embody the law of this circuit, the district courts will have little incentive to heed the warnings" about careful Rule 404(b) instructions: "The district courts might attempt to protect their judgments from reversal under such circumstances simply by including the entire list from Rule 404(b), hoping that this scattershot approach will hit the mark with at least one relevant use for the evidence. A resolution of this tension, however, is beyond the power of the present panel."

United States v. Sparkman, 500 F.3d 678 (8th Cir. 2007) : The Court, affirming convictions arising from the defendant's scheme to defraud his business's insurer by burning an office building and two vehicles, found no abuse of discretion in admitting testimony that the defendant had admitted to previously running an unsold truck into a pond and reporting it stolen to collect on the insurance, as the evidence was probative of fraudulent intent. The Court found no plain error in the limiting instruction given to the jury, which did not follow the model in the Eighth Circuit Manual of Model Jury Instructions. The Model Instruction tells the jury to refrain from considering "other acts" evidence unless and until it has determined that the defendant has committed the acts charged in the indictment. The Court explained that the "evident purpose of such an instruction is to ensure that the jury does not use uncharged acts improperly as propensity evidence to conclude that the defendant committed the charged acts." But, "the model instruction is not the only permissible means to convey that message to the jury." In this case, the jury was told that the "other acts" evidence was admitted to show the defendant's "scheme, pattern, or plan" and that "the mere fact that the defendant may have committed a similar act in the past is not evidence that he committed such acts in this case." This instruction was "adequate to inform the jury of the limited permissible use of the evidence of prior bad acts." The Court also held that the Trial Judge need not give a specific instruction on the preponderance standard of proof for other act evidence so long as the jury understands that it must find that the defendant did commit the other act before giving it any weight.

[ee] Rule 404(b) -- Knowledge

[iv] Rule 404(b) -- Knowledge -- Drug Cases

[B] Rule 404(b) -- Knowledge -- Drug Cases -- Different Drugs

United States v. Hawkins, 548 F.3d 1143 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for distributing cocaine base within 1000 feet of a school, finding no error in the admission of prior convictions for drug distribution. The Court found that the prior convictions were not barred simply because they involved different (though similar) drugs, and noted that "[p]rior felony drug convictions are relevant to show intent and knowledge in a drug prosecution when a defendant makes a general denial defense, which necessarily places the defendant's state of mind at issue." In United States v. Marquez-Alvarado, 501 F.3d 971 (8th Cir. 2007) , the Court affirmed a conviction for conspiring to distribute marijuana, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding the defendant's involvement in prior cocaine transactions. The evidence demonstrated that the defendant knew and had relationships with out-of-state drug dealers and that he had familiarity with techniques for the clandestine transportation of drug-related contraband between states.

[C] Rule 404(b) -- Knowledge -- Drug Cases -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Pettiford, 517 F.3d 584 (D.C. Cir. 2008) : Affirming a conviction for possession of cocaine base with intent to distribute, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that three weeks before the defendant's arrest in his car where the drugs were found the defendant also possessed crack cocaine with intent to distribute. The Court held that the evidence was admissible to prove that the defendant knowingly and intentionally possessed the cocaine with the intent to distribute, and noted that "[t]he fact that the government produced probative evidence of Pettiford's knowledge and intent does not preclude it from offering additional evidence to establish those elements beyond a reasonable doubt." It distinguished United States v. Linares, 367 F.3d 941 (D.C. Cir. 2004) (Manual § 404.03[2][ee][v]), a case in which eyewitness testimony that the defendant had a gun in his hand and fired it made it virtually certain that the jury, if it believed the testimony, would find that the defendant knowingly possessed the gun, from the instant case, which "is not a case in which the jury had to either believe the witnesses and conclude that the defendant knowingly possessed the crack with intent to distribute it, or disbelieve them and find that he did not possess the crack at all." In United States v. Douglas, 482 F.3d 591 (D.C. Cir. 2007) , the court affirmed a conviction for possession of crack cocaine with intent to distribute, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence regarding the defendant's arrest for the same offense a year earlier. That the defendant was not disputing the elements of intent and knowledge did not make the evidence irrelevant, since the government has the burden of proving every element of the offense beyond a reasonable doubt and may prove its case by evidence of its choice.

United States v. Hicks, 575 F.3d 130 (1st Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed cocaine-related convictions, finding no error in the admission of three prior cocaine-related convictions and of a telephone call that the defendant placed from jail in which he instructed his girlfriend how to package and sell cocaine, since the evidence was relevant to rebut the defense in the current case that the defendant was innocently in a home babysitting children when the officers searched it and found cocaine. A person with previous experience with cocaine-trafficking "would have been more likely to recognize the drug trade paraphernalia that was scattered about the home, such as baking powder, plastic baggies, digital scales, and cash." The telephone conversation was also relevant to the defendant's "knowledge of the accouterments of the drug trade in the home and his intent to exercise control over the drugs." The Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting all three prior convictions under Rule 403, though the author of the opinion expressed concern about "the 'piling on' of multiple criminal convictions when a lesser number might suffice to establish the proposition of concern to the government."

United States v. Paulino, 445 F.3d 211 (2d Cir. 2006) : A search of the defendant's father's house uncovered drugs; the defendant was in the house at the time of the search, but claimed that he did not know that drugs were present. Affirming a conviction for possession of cocaine with intent to distribute, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the defendant's 2000 state conviction for a drug sale was admitted as proof of knowledge and intent. The Court noted that defense counsel emphasized that the defendant's fingerprints were not on the ziploc bag in which the drugs were kept and that the defendant did not remove the issue of knowledge from the case. Even had the defendant had sought to remove knowledge and intent as issues, the charge against the defendant involved constructive possession, which "necessarily raised questions as to his knowledge and intent."

United States v. Yearwood, 518 F.3d 220 (4th Cir. 2008) : Affirming a conviction for conspiring to distribute and possess with intent to distribute 50 grams or more of cocaine base, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the defendant's prior conviction for possession with intent to distribute cocaine and conspiracy to distribute cocaine, because the defendant put his knowledge and intent in issue by contending he was selling music instead of drugs.

United States v. Jenkins, 593 F.3d 480 (6th Cir. 2010) : Police searched a house and found drugs all through the house in open view. The defendant was arrested outside the house, which was owned by his father. The contested issue at trial was whether the defendant (as opposed to someone else) constructively possessed the drugs in the house. Reversing, the Court held it was error to admit evidence of a prior conviction for marijuana distribution as probative of the defendant's knowledge, as knowledge was not "at issue in any meaningful sense. Whoever possessed all these drugs laying [sic] in plain view throughout the house obviously did not do so inadvertently. Thus, as a practical matter, the issue of knowledge was subsumed by that of possession. Knowledge did not stand on its own bottom as an issue in Jenkins's trial; and thus admission of his prior conviction cannot be bottomed on it either." In United States v. Matthews, 440 F.3d 818 (6th Cir. 2006) , the Court affirmed drug and firearm convictions, finding no abuse of discretion when earlier drug sales by the defendant were admitted. The earlier sales were probative of whether the defendant knew that the clear plastic bag in his possession contained cocaine and whether he intended to distribute the drug.

United States v. Vargas, 552 F.3d 550 (7th Cir. 2008) : When the defendant's refrigerated semi-trailer truck was stopped while he was hauling produce, 282 kilograms of cocaine were found concealed in a hidden compartment. Affirming a conviction for possession of the cocaine with intent to distribute, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant had on prior occasions transported drugs hidden under loads of produce in refrigerated semi-trailers. His prior involvement in drug trafficking was probative of his possession being knowing, and the similarity between the incidents was sufficient to produce an inference of criminal intent. In United States v. Perkins, 548 F.3d 510 (7th Cir. 2008) , a parolee was charged with possession of crack cocaine and marijuana with intent to distribute after drugs were found at his residence during a compliance check search. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of an arrest and of prior convictions for cocaine-related offenses. The evidence tended to prove his knowledge of crack cocaine and its value and the absence of any mistake or accident in its presence in his residence.

United States v. Turner, 583 F.3d 1062 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions for methamphetamine offenses, upholding the admission of testimony by a police officer about the defendant's presence at a fire she investigated that was associated with manufacture of methamphetamine, as well as testimony by a witness about the defendant's prior manufacture for her of methamphetamine on a weekly basis. The evidence was relevant to prove knowledge and intent and to rebut the defendant's claim that he was "merely present" in the residence for five minutes before detectives arrived and had no awareness of the manufacture of methamphetamine or the conspiracy. In United States v. Voegtlin, 437 F.3d 741 (8th Cir. 2006) , the Court affirmed a conviction for conspiring to possess a listed chemical used to manufacture methamphetamine, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that, before entering into the charged conspiracy, the defendant supplied ingredients to a codefendant who used them to cook methamphetamine that the defendant sold. The evidence was probative of the defendant's knowledge, because the prior agreement was virtually identical to the charged conduct and the prior acts occurred the year before the beginning of the charged conspiracy.

[v] Rule 404(b) -- Knowledge -- Firearms Cases

United States v. McCarson, 527 F.3d 170 (D.C. Cir. 2008) : The defendant, charged with drug possession and felon firearm possession after a gun and drugs were found in a dresser in an apartment he occupied, argued that prior convictions for possessing firearms and selling crack cocaine should not have been admitted to prove intent and knowledge because the only issue was his possession. Affirming, the Court explained that proving constructive possession involves not only a physical element of dominion and control but also a mental element of "knowing" possession. In United States v. Johnson, 519 F.3d 478 (D.C. Cir. 2008) , the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit in a firearms prosecution evidence of the defendant's previous firearms conviction on the ground that it tended to prove that he knowingly possessed the gun in the instant case. Since government witnesses had testified that they saw the defendant with the handgun in his waistband, the Court did "not understand how [the defendant's] previous possession makes it more likely that he knowingly possessed a gun this time." The Court reasoned that if the jury believed the eyewitnesses, then the defendant possessed the gun knowingly; if it did not, "then it should have acquitted based on the government's failure to prove possession rather than its failure to prove knowledge."

United States v. Uzenski, 434 F.3d 690 (4th Cir. 2006) : After evidence connected the defendant to two pipe bombs, he was convicted for manufacturing and possessing unregistered firearms. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting his prior statements that he had attempted to make pipe bombs as a teenager, as the evidence tended to show his knowledge in making the devices, and its probative value was not substantially outweighed by its prejudicial nature.

United States v. Jones, 484 F.3d 783 (5th Cir. 2007) : The Court reversed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding an abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant had previously been convicted for the same crime, committed under circumstances virtually identical to those alleged in the instant case -- in both cases an eyewitness testified that he saw the defendant take a gun from his waistband and throw it under a house. The evidence had been admitted to show knowledge and intent, but because the case was one of actual rather than constructive possession, intent was not an element, and "once the government has shown that the defendant had a firearm under his immediate control, any contention that he did not know the nature of what he possessed is effectively precluded."

United States v. Rendon-Duarte, 490 F.3d 1142 (9th Cir. 2007) : After the defendant's arrest, two loaded handguns were recovered from under the floor carpet of the vehicle in which he was riding. Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit evidence of prior incidents in which weapons were found in the cars he drove or rode in. Absent any indication he knew of the presence of those weapons, the evidence had no tendency to suggest that his possession on this occasion was intentional and knowing.

United States v. Moran, 503 F.3d 1135 (10th Cir. 2007) : Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court acknowledged that using the defendant's prior conviction of the same offense to prove that he knowingly possessed the firearm in this case involved a kind of propensity inference. However, "the inference is specific and does not require a jury to first draw the forbidden general inference of bad character or criminal disposition; rather it rests on a logic of improbability that recognizes that a prior act involving the same knowledge decreases the likelihood that the defendant lacked the requisite knowledge in committing the charged offense."

[vi] Rule 404(b) -- Knowledge -- Fraud, Forgery, Counterfeiting, False Statements, etc., Cases

United States v. Whitney, 524 F.3d 134 (1st Cir. 2008) : Affirming a conviction for making a false statement to a firearms dealer while attempting to purchase a firearm, the Court found no plain error in the admission of evidence that the defendant was arrested for violating the protective order that resulted in the charge (since defendant signed a form stating that he was not under any protective order). The evidence was probative of the defendant's awareness of the order when he signed the form.

United States v. Rutkoske, 506 F.3d 170 (2d Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed convictions for securities fraud, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting the defendant's statement to an associate, four years after the charged conspiracy, about his desire to push up the stock price in a company that he owned. The Court concluded that the charged scheme and the later statement displayed efforts to manipulate a thinly traded stock in a certain manner and that the defendant's understanding of the later scheme made it more likely that he understood aspects of the charged scheme.

United States v. Nguyen, 504 F.3d 561 (5th Cir. 2007) : Affirming convictions arising from a fraudulent home buying scheme, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the conspirators used the same scheme in connection with two unrelated properties, as the other incidents demonstrated how the operation worked and established knowledge and intent.

United States v. Wheeler, 540 F.3d 683 (7th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for embezzling withheld employee health insurance and pension contributions, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant had been involved in the nonpayment of withheld health insurance premiums at another company he controlled. The evidence was relevant to show his knowledge of how insurance premium withholding must be handled and to show the absence of mistake or accident.

[viii] Rule 404(b) -- Knowledge -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Brown, 553 F.3d 768 (5th Cir. 2008) : Two pharmacists were convicted of conspiring with physicians to distribute large quantities of pain medications under cover of false prescriptions written by the physicians. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendants filled illegitimate prescriptions from physicians who were not named as coconspirators. The evidence could be seen as intrinsic to the charged conspiracy with a named physician and "others known and unknown," and although the physicians were in a sense competitors, "their activities were mutually advantageous, as the behavior of each doctor expanded operations for all by encouraging more dealers and pharmacists to get into the business." It could also be seen as probative of the defendants' knowledge that the named physician's prescriptions were illegitimate, as their "experience in filling piles of similar false prescriptions from a different doctor would speak directly to that issue."

United States v. Lee, 558 F.3d 638 (7th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions for conspiracy to commit money laundering, arising as the defendants separately became involved with "spas" that were fronts for prostitution businesses. It found no abuse of discretion in the admission of one defendant's prior operation of a "spa," which was offered to prove knowledge and rebut the defense that the defendant was unaware of the prostitution at the spa giving rise to the charges against her. Although the Court observed that testimony regarding "forced sex" at the prior spa was arguably more prejudicial than evidence of prostitution generally, it declined to find that admission of this aspect of the evidence was plain error.

United States v. Walker, 470 F.3d 1271 (8th Cir 2006) : Affirming a conviction for felon firearm possession, the Court found no error when the defendant's prior armed robbery conviction was admitted to prove knowledge and intent to possess the firearm in issue. Although the defendant argued that his defense was that he was not present when the gun was found, the Court reasoned that by pleading not guilty he placed his knowledge of the firearm's presence at issue.

United States v. Hubenka, 438 F.3d 1026 (10th Cir. 2006) : The defendant was convicted for violating the Clean Water Act by building dikes in a river. Affirming, the Court held that evidence he had previously attempted to divert the river's flow and had been required by the Corps of Engineers to remove the debris was admissible as tending to show that his violation of the CWA on this occasion was done knowingly.

[viii.1] Rule 404(b) -- Knowledge -- Pornography Cases

United States v. Caldwell, 586 F.3d 338 (5th Cir. 2009) : In a prosecution for knowing possession of child pornography, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the government showed short clips of videos seized from the defendant showing adult bestiality. Clips from videos being downloaded when agents entered the defendants home were relevant to the defendant's knowledge (which he denied) that the program he was accessing provided pornography. A clip downloaded several weeks previously and last viewed three days before the defendant's arrest was "more troubling," but it tended to rebut any argument of accident or mistake regarding the videos viewed the day of the arrest.

United States v. Stout, 509 F.3d 796 (6th Cir. 2007) : On interlocutory appeal in a prosecution for possession of child pornography, the Court (2-1) affirmed an in limine ruling precluding the government from introducing evidence that the defendant had previously been convicted for installing a hidden camera in the home of family friends and videotaping their 14-year-old daughter in the shower. While the prior act evidence might have some probative value on the question whether the defendant knew that the images he was charged with possessing were of children, that probative value was slight. The government's need for the evidence to prove intent and knowledge to possess child pornography was likewise slight, since it had other means of proof, such as testimony by the defendant's ex-wife that she had discovered on his computer that he had been searching for child pornography. On the other hand, in the words of the Trial Judge, "[t]he prior bad acts evidence is prejudicial because it is both inflammatory and distracting. It is more lurid and frankly more interesting than the evidence surrounding the actual charges. Any jury will be more alarmed and disgusted by the prior acts than the actual charged conduct. As a consequence, the jury is likely to pay undue attention to it... . [T]here is a strong possibility that the jury will be improperly distracted from the primary evidence at hand."

United States v. Burgess, 576 F.3d 1078 (10th Cir. 2009) : A computer and two hard drives seized when the defendant was arrested on drug charges contained thousands of images of child pornography. At the trial for possession and transportation of child pornography, the defense stipulated to the admission of four images appearing on both hard drives (the four images on the Maxtor drive were specifically named in the indictment). To prove the defendant's knowledge that the defendant knew the drives contained pornography, the government introduced images from the Seagate drive, including some that showed the 14-year-old ward of the defendant's friend. The images were sexually suggestive or borderline pornographic, and some had lewd text superimposed. Affirming, the Court rejected the argument that the images were inadmissible because they were not "vital" to the government's case, there being ample other evidence connecting the hard drives with the defendant. "Although it may be a factor, the test is not necessarily whether the evidence is vital to the government's case. Vitality is often a matter of perspective. Within limits delineated in the Federal Rules of Evidence the government is entitled to introduce all relevant, probative evidence at its disposal." As to 12 images of the ward with superimposed lewd text, the Court noted that they were not admitted until the defendant's friend had testified that the defendant had no opportunity to take the pictures and other witnesses had testified they had never seen him behave inappropriately with children. Although the Court suggested that it might have concluded that fewer than 12 of the images might have been sufficient for impeachment, it found no abuse of discretion. In United States v. Schene, 543 F.3d 627 (10th Cir. 2008) , the Court affirmed a child pornography conviction, finding no abuse of discretion when images not linked to a specific count in the indictment were admitted to prove knowledge and intent. In United States v. Shaffer, 472 F.3d 1219 (10th Cir. 2007) , the defendant was convicted for possessing and distributing child pornography when he obtained pornography on the Internet and made it available to other users through a file-sharing application. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of a written narrative found on the defendant's computer which involved a story about adult sex with children. The story was relevant to rebut the defense that the defendant did not knowingly possess or distribute child pornography.

[gg] Rule 404(b) -- Modus Operandi

United States v. Fanfan, 468 F.3d 7 (1st Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for conspiracy to distribute cocaine, the Court assumed that the conspiracy had been terminated by the arrest of most of its members, but held that even so a post-conspiracy transaction in which the defendant attempted to distribute cocaine was admissible to prove modus operandi and identity. The arrested conspirator had paged the defendant, the government recorded the call, the arrested conspirator ordered cocaine and met the defendant by prearrangement, and the defendant had cocaine and cocaine base in his car. This evidence was especially important because only one witness could identify the defendant as the man who supplied drugs and this witness had a plea deal with the government.

United States v. Siegel, 536 F.3d 306 (4th Cir. 2008) : The defendant had a 20-year history of identity theft and fraud that culminated in her defrauding a widower 30 years her senior and murdering him to prevent the reporting of her crimes. Shortly before trial on charges of defrauding and murdering the widower (and defrauding the United States by cashing his Social Security checks), the defendant moved in limine to exclude evidence of her other crimes. The motion was granted and the government brought an interlocutory appeal. Reversing, the Court held that evidence that she had been convicted for stealing three wallets and using the information contained therein to drain funds from the wallet owners' bank accounts was intrinsic to the charged crimes, since she was still on probation for those offenses and "her personal freedom depended on her ability to extricate herself from the relationship with [the widower] without his discovering and reporting her crimes." Evidence of her other frauds, which could lead to a lengthy prison term if she were caught, tended to establish her motive for murdering the widower "for the purpose of preventing him or anyone else from providing law enforcement with information about the federal crimes she had committed," which was an element of the offense charged. The evidence likewise tended to show her modus operandi in committing frauds. One Judge dissented, on the ground that the majority erroneously failed to apply the "abuse of discretion" level of review.

United States v. Fraser, 448 F.3d 833 (6th Cir. 2006) : As evidence of the defendant's intent in a check fraud scheme, the prosecution introduced excerpts from a book he had written that detailed a virtually identical scheme. Affirming, the Court noted that it was not relying on the Trial Judge's reasoning that the book was evidence of the defendant's modus operandi: "Proof of 'modus operandi' is generally used to demonstrate identity, and Kahari's identity was not at issue in this case."

United States v. Price, 516 F.3d 597 (7th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for bank robbery, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence, offered as modus operandi, that the defendant had subsequently committed another bank robbery five months later. Although some of the similarities between the offenses (disguise, gun, and a bag for the loot) were generic for bank robberies, and there were some differences in the crimes (the later was a solo job from which the defendant escaped on foot, while the charged crime involved four robbers communicating with walkie-talkies who escaped in a getaway vehicle), the Court focused on the distinctive commonalities: each was an early weekday morning ambush of an employee opening a bank for business, and in each the robber(s) forced the employee(s) at gunpoint to enter the bank, turn off the alarm, access the vault, and hit the ground before the robber(s) made their escape. Furthermore, the banks were located only 5.4 miles apart.

United States v. Howe, 538 F.3d 842 (8th Cir. 2008) , overruled in part on other grounds, 562 F.3d 892 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession arising from a kidnapping, robbery, and murder conspiracy in which the victim was forced to strip naked. It found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant had previously been involved in the robbery of people who had stolen his drugs and the victims had been forced to strip naked, as "the prior robbery was unusual and distinctive enough as to be like a signature, and Howe provides no support for his assertion that this method of stripping and robbing a person is common among drug dealers."

United States v. Gonzalez, 533 F.3d 1057 (9th Cir. 2008) : At the trial of a sheriff's officer for acting under color of law to deprive three women of their right to bodily integrity by committing sexual assaults upon them, the prosecution introduced evidence of two similar attacks on other women. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the uncharged crimes evidence, as the commonalities of the modus operandi were probative of the perpetrator's identity, which was contested.

[hh] Rule 404(b) -- Motive

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Arson

United States v. Rayborn, 495 F.3d 328 (6th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed the arson and mail fraud convictions of a church pastor charged with setting his church on fire and attempting to collect money from the church's insurance company after the fire. It found no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the pastor's use of church funds to create a lavish pastoral facility and his use of the church's tax-exempt status for personal purposes, as the evidence tended to show the pastor's access to and control over church finances, which helped to explain a motive for the pastor's arson and attempt to obtain the insurance proceeds.

United States v. Farish, 535 F.3d 815 (8th Cir. 2008) : The defendant was convicted for arson committed against the property of a woman whom he believed had scratched his car with a key. Affirming the conviction, the Court found there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the defendant had committed domestic abuse against his girlfriend, as the fact the arson victim had given the girlfriend refuge on that occasion tended to explain what motivated the defendant to suspect the victim had keyed his car and to retaliate against her. One Judge, concurring in the judgment, concluded that the link between the domestic abuse evidence and the defendant's "motive" was "extremely tenuous and that any probative value is substantially outweighed by its unfair prejudicial effect."

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Motive -- Assault, Homicide, Kidnapping, etc.

United States v. Rodriguez-Berrios, 573 F.3d 55 (1st Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed the defendant's conviction for the fatal carjacking of his ex-wife, finding no error in the admission of evidence regarding his prior abuse and stalking of the victim. "The evidence of [his] intentional physical harm of the victim in the past had 'special relevance' [citation], because it was probative of his intent to cause her harm at the time he seized her car." "[T]he evidence of appellant's stalking had special relevance because it demonstrated [his] motive to commit the crime -- his intense jealousy."

United States v. Siegel, 536 F.3d 306 (4th Cir. 2008) : The defendant had a 20-year history of identity theft and fraud that culminated in her defrauding a widower 30 years her senior and murdering him to prevent the reporting of her crimes. Shortly before trial on charges of defrauding and murdering the widower (and defrauding the United States by cashing his Social Security checks), the defendant moved in limine to exclude evidence of her other crimes. The motion was granted and the government brought an interlocutory appeal. Reversing, the Court held that evidence that she had been convicted for stealing three wallets and using the information contained therein to drain funds from the wallet owners' bank accounts was intrinsic to the charged crimes, since she was still on probation for those offenses and "her personal freedom depended on her ability to extricate herself from the relationship with [the widower] without his discovering and reporting her crimes." Evidence of her other frauds, which could lead to a lengthy prison term if she were caught, tended to establish her motive for murdering the widower "for the purpose of preventing him or anyone else from providing law enforcement with information about the federal crimes she had committed," which was an element of the offense charged. The evidence likewise tended to show her modus operandi in committing frauds. One Judge dissented, on the ground that the majority erroneously failed to apply the "abuse of discretion" level of review.

United States v. Covington, 565 F.3d 1336 (11th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed the defendant's conviction for conspiring to murder for hire his ex-girlfriend, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting her testimony describing how he beat her, the handgun with which he threatened her, and his jailhouse correspondence concerning the assault. The evidence tended to show that the motive for the intended murder for hire was to silence her with respect to the assault, including showing that he was aware that her testimony against him would likely lead to a long prison sentence. The jury was properly instructed about the limited purpose for which the evidence was admitted.

[iv] Rule 404(b) -- Motive -- Drug Activity

United States v. Morena, 547 F.3d 191 (3d Cir. 2008) : The Court reversed a conviction for felon firearm possession and possession of a sawed-off shotgun because "the government's repeated injection of prejudicial drug evidence into the trial testimony constituted prosecutorial misconduct resulting in a denial of due process." Although the defendant was never charged with any drug offenses, the government contended that some discussion of drugs was necessary for background and it would show the shotgun was possessed to protect a drug dealing enterprise. However, the prosecution repeatedly went beyond that purpose to inject inadmissible drug evidence, such as evidence of heroin dealing not connected with the defendant and evidence of the defendant's drug use problem, even though the Judge declared at least five times that the evidence was "too prejudicial." "Nevertheless, the District Court ultimately failed to prevent the rampant injection of inadmissible evidence into the trial and its single limiting instruction to the jury was inadequate to cure the prejudice."

United States v. Finley, 477 F.3d 250 (5th Cir. 2007) : The defendant was charged with aiding and abetting possession with intent to distribute a controlled substance, after he drove a friend to a meeting where the friend sold methamphetamine. Affirming, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of the defendant's recent use of methamphetamine bought or received from the friend, as it tended to show he agreed to drive in exchange for extra methamphetamine.

[iv.1] Rule 404(b) -- Motive -- Financial Distress

United States v. Kuzlik, 468 F.3d 972 (7th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for mail fraud, the Court rejected the defendant's argument that evidence pertaining to his financial distress before the crime should not have been admitted because the "jury was unable to appreciate the extremely fine distinction between propensity and motive," and "as a result, the jury was confused and misled by the evidence of his financial condition." The Court held that "[t]he sorry state of Kuzlik's finances, his debts, default judgments, and bank overdrafts, was offered as evidence of his motive to embezzle the $44,246.44, not as evidence that Kuzlik had a taste or compulsion for financial fraud." Any even remote potential for unfair prejudice was cured by an instruction that the financial condition evidence was to be considered "only for the purpose of establishing his motive."

[v] Rule 404(b) -- Motive -- Firearms Offenses

United States v. Robinson, 473 F.3d 387 (1st Cir. 2007) : Affirming drug and firearms convictions, the Court held that the government's cross-examination of the defendant about his history in dealing and using drugs was proper, because the questions were intended to demonstrate why the defendant would bring a firearm to a drug deal.

United States v. Till, 434 F.3d 880 (6th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that drugs were found in the car in which the defendant was riding when arrested and in which the gun was found. In addition to being part of the background completing the story of the charged offense, the drugs provided a motive for possession of the weapon, and the probative value of the evidence was not substantially outweighed by any prejudicial effect.

United States v. Butler, 594 F.3d 955 (8th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a felon firearm possession conviction, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant possessed drug paraphernalia to show motive to possess a firearm.

[vii] Rule 404(b) -- Motive -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Brown, 597 F.3d 399 (D.C. Cir. 2010) : Affirming a conviction for bank fraud and passing fictitious financial instruments, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to admit evidence that the defendant failed to pay a $700 home inspection fee. "The government's suggestion that this bad acts evidence establishes Brown's motive 'to get money' ... is too far removed from the charged offenses" and "showed only his bad character in 'stiffing' the agent for the fee."

United States v. DeCicco, 439 F.3d 36 (1st Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a mail fraud conviction arising from an arson and submission of fraudulent insurance claims, finding no error in the admission of testimony from the defendant's accountant that the defendant failed to supply him with documentation supporting expense deductions that he claimed for income tax purposes. The evidence related to the defendant's motive to commit arson or mail fraud (i.e., to pay for tax liabilities) and to show that the defendant's net income was less than necessary to pay what he owed.

Buckley v. Mukasey, 538 F.3d 306 (4th Cir. 2008) : The Court reversed a judgment for the defendant and granted a new trial to a DEA agent who brought a Title VII race and gender discrimination and retaliation suit. The plaintiff had not been permitted to introduce evidence regarding her participation in a long-running race discrimination class action against the DEA, on the ground that it tended only to show propensity. The Court held that by precluding the plaintiff from showing the pendency of the class litigation and the long history of its burden on the DEA, she was prevented from demonstrating why her participation in that litigation so rankled the relevant DEA decisionmakers that they were provoked to retaliate against her.

United States v. Morris, 498 F.3d 634 (7th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed drug convictions, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of a police officer's testimony that he stopped the defendant's van because he knew that there was an outstanding warrant for the defendant's arrest. The testimony established the reason that the officer stopped the van and a motive for the defendant to give drugs to a cousin who was with him in the van and to tell the cousin to flee. In United States v. Sebolt, 460 F.3d 910 (7th Cir. 2006) , a prosecution for advertising and transporting child pornography online, the Court found no error in admitting evidence that the defendant had molested a young male relative. The defendant's sexual interest in children provided a motive for committing a charged offense involving sexual exploitation of children, and while the motive to molest children does not completely overlap with the propensity to deal in child pornography, the conceptual gap between the offenses is not so wide as to induce the jury to decide the case on an improper basis rather than on the evidence. The prosecution had also introduced a pair of young boy's Pokemon underwear that the defendant had stated he put on his face when masturbating. The Court found that introducing the underwear into evidence was unfairly prejudicial -- the defendant's use was well established and unrebutted, so "there was no probative value for admitting the physical evidence of his motive" -- but the error was harmless.

[jj] Rule 404(b) -- Notice of Intention To Introduce Evidence

United States v. Mahdi, 598 F.3d 883 (D.C. Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed drug trafficking convictions, finding no error in the prosecution's failure to give notice of intent to introduce evidence of certain offenses. Because the acts were intrinsic (i.e., part of crimes charged), no notice was required under Rule 404(b).

United States v. Gonzalez, 501 F.3d 630 (6th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possession with intent to distribute cocaine, holding that the government's failure to give notice of other acts committed by the defendant did not require exclusion of the other acts because they were part of "a continuing pattern of illegal activity that is intrinsic to the charged offense and thus not subject to Rule 404(b)." The Court added that, even if the prior acts were extrinsic and subject to Rule 404(b), the government's failure to give notice was not prejudicial. In United States v. Franco, 484 F.3d 347 (6th Cir. 2007) , a prosecution for cocaine possession, the Court noted that when the defendant raised an entrapment defense he placed his character in issue, making specific instances of his conduct admissible. Because evidence of his prior drug trafficking crimes was thus admissible under Rules 404(a) and 405(b) rather than Rule 404(b), the government was not required to provide notice of its intention to introduce the evidence.

United States v. Blount, 502 F.3d 674 (7th Cir. 2007) : In a prosecution for firearm possession in furtherance of a drug crime, the government gave notice a week before trial that it would introduce prior bad acts involving drug activity, but there was no reference to gun possession. However, when the witness testified, he stated that the defendant carried a gun at all the drug transactions. Affirming, the Court held that the notice was timely, and, although it implied that the notice was insufficient because it did not fairly describe the extent of the prior bad acts evidence, it held that any error was not plain error.

United States v. Faust, 456 F.3d 1342 (11th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a cocaine conviction, finding that the government's notice seven months before trial of an intent to rely on Rule 404(b) evidence "was certainly sufficient."

[kk.1] Rule 404(b) -- Permissible Purposes

United States v. Taylor, 522 F.3d 731 (7th Cir. 2008) : Affirming a drug trafficking conviction, the Court found no error when a witness, who testified that she was with the defendant on their way to "hit a lick" when they were stopped, explained that meant he was going to sell drugs, which she knew because she had been with the defendant on previous "licks." The government argued that the reference to other crimes was permissible because they were "inextricably intertwined" and the testimony filled a "conceptual void" and "form[ed] an integral part of the witness's account of the circumstances surrounding the offenses of which the defendant was indicted," but the Court commented that "[t]hese windy formulas do no work." The justification for asking the witness how she knew what the term meant was to avoid a challenge to the accuracy of her definition of the term. The Court noted that "[t]he list of permissible uses of bad-acts evidence in Rule 404(b) is introduced by 'such as,' and so is not exhaustive. ... The aim of the rule is simply to keep from the jury evidence that the defendant is prone to commit crimes or is otherwise a bad person ... No other use of prior crimes or other bad acts is forbidden by the rule, and the draftsmen did not try to list every possible other use."

[nn] Rule 404(b) -- Preparation

United States v. Jimenez, 507 F.3d 13 (1st Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a conviction for misappropriating the identities of two people long dead, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence found in the defendant's home, including birth and death certificates and high school transcripts of other people, lists of names with biographical data, and electronic documents detailing how to establish a false identity, how to search the Social Security death database, and related topics. The evidence showed preparation and plan, and there was no unfair prejudice in its presentation.

United States v. Street, 531 F.3d 703 (8th Cir. 2008) : Affirming convictions for sexual exploitation of a minor and possession of visual depictions of a minor engaging in sexually explicit conduct, the Court held that evidence that the defendant took sexually explicit photographs of another minor was admissible to show opportunity and plan and to disprove the defendant's claim that he produced the photographs to show a mutual and loving relationship.

[oo] Rule 404(b) -- Propensity Evidence

Hudson v. Dist. of Columbia, 558 F.3d 526 (D.C. Cir. 2009) : Reversing a judgment for an arrestee who sued for excessive force, the Court found it was error to admit evidence that the arresting officer had previously been disciplined for misconduct involving arrestees and then to allow the plaintiff's counsel to argue to the jury that the misconduct showed that the officer was a "bad cop" and would always be a bad cop. The Court concluded that "[t]he cumulative effect of the inadmissible evidence and the inflammatory argument based on it is precisely what Rule 404(b) prohibits: exhorting a jury to find against a defendant because he acted 'in conformity' with his bad acts -- here, a purported history of physical violence, improper use of force and filing false reports."

United States v. Williams, 585 F.3d 703 (2d Cir. 2009) : The Court reversed a conviction for felon firearm possession, holding it was an abuse of discretion to admit, as background evidence, the firearms, other weapons, drugs, and cash found in an apartment the day after the defendant's arrest. The Court reasoned that the government's case was "simple and complete": police responded to a 911 reported shooting, the defendant fled, an officer saw a gun in the defendant's pocket, and an officer found a gun near where the defendant had fled. The Court concluded that "the evidence more likely confused the jury than assisted its understanding of the case." It also rejected the argument that the evidence was relevant to prove opportunity and motive, as opportunity and motive were not put in issue at trial. Thus, the evidence tended only to prove the defendant's propensity to commit crime.

United States v. Ricardo, 472 F.3d 277 (5th Cir. 2006) : Affirming marijuana-related convictions, the Court held it was plain error (but no violation of substantial rights) to admit a video recording of the traffic stop of two defendants, which recorded the statements of a dispatch officer telling the officers who stopped the vehicle that each defendant had prior criminal charges. The evidence of prior criminal charges was relevant only to the defendants' character.

United States v. Newsom, 452 F.3d 593 (6th Cir. 2006) : In a felon firearm possession prosecution, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to admit evidence of the defendant's firearm-related tattoos. The government argued that the evidence was properly admitted for the non-character purpose of challenging a witness's testimony that she had never seen the defendant with a firearm. But the Court noted that the witness's knowledge of pictures of firearms on the defendant "presents a completely different issue than whether Craig had ever seen Newsom possess an actual firearm. Even if Newsom had a pistol tattooed on his forehead and Craig admitted that she had seen it, that does not make Craig's testimony that she had never seen Newsom with a firearm more or less believable." Thus, the tattoo evidence was nothing more than proof that the defendant had a propensity to possess firearms.

United States v. Simpson, 479 F.3d 492 (7th Cir. 2007) : The Court reversed a conviction for a single delivery of crack cocaine because the Judge had allowed evidence of prior unrelated crack cocaine transactions and had permitted the prosecutor to argue in closing that the defendant had admitted to officers that he had done so many cocaine transactions that he didn't even remember doing the one for which he was charged. The evidence and argument "improperly appealed to Simpson's propensity to deal drugs." The Court rejected the argument that the uncharged cocaine transactions were admissible to prove identity, because there was not a "singularly strong resemblance" between the uncharged transactions and the transaction charged; evidence of uncharged misconduct does not become admissible to prove identity simply because the defendant disputes identity.

United States v. Johnson, 439 F.3d 884 (8th Cir. 2006) : The Court reversed a conviction for possession of child pornography because evidence that the defendant possessed printed stories about rapes of young girls was erroneously admitted. The evidence that he had a particular "type of interest" simply showed he had a propensity, "predisposition," or "inherent tendency" (as the Trial Judge had said) to possess child pornography and to commit the crimes charged, which is impermissible under Rule 404(b). The evidence had no tendency to show that he knew that the computer files he downloaded contained prohibited material or any tendency to rebut his contention that he inadvertently downloaded the images while searching for legitimate online material.

United States v. Commanche, 577 F.3d 1261 (10th Cir. 2009) : The Court reversed a conviction for assault with intent to do bodily harm arising from a fight in which the defendant, who claimed self-defense, used a box cutter. The Court held it was error to admit evidence that the defendant had twice been convicted of aggravated battery after altercations in which he brandished sharp cutting instruments, concluding that this case was one in which "bad act evidence bears on a permissible purpose only if a jury first concludes that the defendant likely acted in conformity with a particular character trait," because "a prior assault or battery conviction is immaterial to a self defense claim in a separate incident except to suggest conformity" and "the details of Commanche's prior aggravated battery convictions demonstrate nothing about his intent; they simply show that he is violent."

[pp] Rule 404(b) -- Purposes for Admission To Be Specified

United States v. Fraser, 448 F.3d 833 (6th Cir. 2006) : In the prosecution of a check fraud scheme, the government introduced excerpts from a book the defendant had written that detailed a virtually identical scheme. Affirming, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence as proof of the defendant's intent. However, it was plain error to give a limiting instruction that the evidence could be used to prove "motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity or absence of mistake or accident," because there was no issue concerning motive, opportunity, or identity. The error was harmless, however, because the other listed purposes overlapped with intent, there was no showing that consideration of the book permitted any unfair inferences concerning identity, motive, or opportunity, and the instruction carefully addressed avoiding the propensity inference.

United States v. Edwards, 540 F.3d 1156 (10th Cir. 2008) : Affirming a conviction for possession of various drugs with intent to distribute, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion (but harmless error) to admit evidence that the defendant had previously been convicted after small, personal-user amounts of drugs were discovered in his vehicle during traffic stops. The government had argued only that the evidence was admissible to prove the purposes specified in Rule 404(b), the Judge had not required the prosecutor to clarify how the evidence was relevant for these purported purposes, and on appeal the government had "again assert[ed] with little explanation that the evidence was obviously relevant for all of these purposes." Reviewing each of the purposes, the Court concluded that the defendant's prior drug possession was not relevant in this distribution case. In United States v. Avalos, 506 F.3d 972 (10th Cir. 2007) , vacated for reconsideration of sentencing, 129 S. Ct. 993 (2009) , a prosecution for methamphetamine offenses, the Trial Judge admitted the defendant's statement to a DEA agent that he had sold drugs on another occasion but could not remember the specific deal, but the Judge did not indicate, and the government did not articulate, the reason for admitting the evidence of uncharged misconduct. The Court rejected the government's argument that no Rule 404(b) analysis is required when the defendant admits a prior act: "To the contrary, an admission that falls within the scope of Rule 404(b) must be separately analyzed under that rule." The error was harmless, however.

[qq] Rule 404(b) -- Rebuttal Evidence

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Rebuttal Evidence -- Contradiction

[A] Rule 404(b) -- Assault, etc., Cases

United States v. Steele, 550 F.3d 693 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for assault on a federal officer and assault with a dangerous weapon, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant had previously been convicted for assault with a dangerous weapon and had previously resisted arrest. The Court held that the evidence was relevant to whether the officer used lawful force to arrest the defendant, and whether the defendant was acting reasonably in self-defense, as he claimed, and that it could affirm the decision to admit the evidence on this ground "even if the government did not fully develop such a theory at trial."

[C] Rule 404(b) -- Rebuttal Evidence -- Contradiction -- Drug Cases

United States v. Mejia, 600 F.3d 12 (1st Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to distribute cocaine, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of drug ledgers apparently in the defendant's handwriting, as the evidence tended to rebut his central defense that he was "merely present" at a drug deal and otherwise uninvolved in the charged conspiracy.

[F] Rule 404(b) -- Rebuttal Evidence -- Contradiction -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Lombardozzi, 491 F.3d 61 (2d Cir. 2007) : Affirming a loansharking conviction, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the testimony of two witnesses as to prior extortionate loans. The defendant attempted to distance himself from a coconspirator and claim that he was not involved in the loans to the victim in the instant case, and the testimony regarding prior loans rebutted his claim by demonstrating the defendant's connection to the coconspirator.

United States v. Cox, 577 F.3d 833 (7th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions for prostitution offenses, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence of credit card fraud offenses to which the defendant pled guilty. Since Cox's theory of the defense was that he had little money, "which he apparently thought indicated that he could not be a pimp," evidence of credit card fraud "was essential for the Government both to rebut Cox's defense and to buttress its theory that Cox was a pimp who hosted hotel 'parties' for the purpose of prostitution."

United States v. Pierson, 544 F.3d 933 (8th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for attempted production of child pornography and attempting to induce a child to engage in criminal sexual activity, finding no abuse of discretion when the government was permitted to cross-examine the defendant as to his 20-year-old prior conviction for indecent contact with a child. It found that the defendant opened the door to the cross-examination by testifying on direct examination that he had never acted on sexual attraction to young girls.

[iii] Rule 404(b) -- Rebuttal Evidence -- Cross-Examination by Accused Opening the Door to Rebuttal

United States v. Eagle Bear, 507 F.3d 688 (8th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed convictions for burglary, assault with a dangerous weapon, and assault by striking, beating, or wounding. The assault with a dangerous weapon count arose from an incident involving the defendant's girlfriend that occurred in South Dakota. The defendant had assaulted her six days later in California and pleaded guilty to the assault there. The Trial Judge originally ruled that the California incident was more prejudicial than probative, but when the girlfriend testified defense counsel asked why she had waited several days to report the South Dakota beating. Testimony regarding the California beating was then admitted so that the girlfriend could explain that the second beating prompted her to reveal the earlier beating. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in allowing the government to rehabilitate the girlfriend's credibility with the evidence.

[rr] Rule 404(b) -- Relationship to Other Rules

[i] Rule 404(b) -- Miscellaneous Rules

United States v. Morgan, 505 F.3d 332 (5th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a conviction for Medicare fraud, finding no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the defendant had violated conditions of her pretrial release by opening a bank account in her daughter's name. The Court noted that the evidence of dishonest conduct was sufficient to impeach the defendant's testimony, but that Rule 608(b) does not permit extrinsic evidence of specific instance of misconduct solely to impeach. However, here the evidence was also probative of the defendant's intent and knowledge in committing the charged fraud, so the evidence was admissible under Rule 404(b).

[rr.1] Rule 404(b) -- Relevant to Sentencing

United States v. Whorley, 550 F.3d 326 (4th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a conviction for knowingly receiving material depicting minors engaging in sexually explicit conduct and knowingly sending or receiving obscene e-mails. It held that evidence of the defendant's prior conviction for child pornography and the terms of his probation, which prohibited him from possessing pornography, was admissible to establish that he received the charged images knowingly and not by mistake, and also to prove that he was previously convicted and subject to enhanced sentences.

[ss] Rule 404(b) -- Remoteness

United States v. Arnold, 467 F.3d 880 (5th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed convictions for drug and firearm offenses, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence of the defendant's nine-year-old conviction for drug possession. The conviction was relevant to show the defendant's knowledge and intent and to prove constructive possession of the drugs and weapon found at a residence rented to him. Stating that "the amount of time that has passed since the previous conviction is not determinative," the Court noted that it had "upheld the admission of Rule 404(b) evidence where the time period in between was as long as 15 and 18 years."

United States v. Millbrook, 553 F.3d 1057 (7th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for possession of crack with intent to distribute, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of the defendant's 12-year-old conviction for delivery of a controlled substance. The evidence was relevant to the issue of the defendant's intent and, although the temporal gap diminished the probative value of the prior sale, it was not fatal to admissibility when the defendant had spent much of the intervening time incarcerated.

United States v. Trogdon, 575 F.3d 762 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of an 11-year-old conviction for virtually identical drug activity to prove knowledge and intent. In United States v. Myers, 503 F.3d 676 (8th Cir. 2007) , the Court affirmed a prisoner's conviction for mailing threatening communications, finding no error in the admission of evidence that the defendant mailed new threatening letters during the litigation, a year later. The evidence tended to rebut the contention that the charged letters had been mailed by prison officials without the defendant's consent and the one-year gap did not destroy its probative value. In United States v. Edelmann, 458 F.3d 791 (8th Cir. 2006) , the Court affirmed a fraud conviction, finding no error in the admission of evidence that the defendant had previously been convicted of fraud. Although the three prior convictions were approximately 15 years old, they were not too remote in time because they involved conduct similar to the crime charged. In United States v. Cook, 454 F.3d 938 (8th Cir. 2006) , cocaine distribution case, the Trial Judge granted the defendant's motion in limine to exclude evidence of four prior drug convictions. The Court affirmed the ruling on interlocutory appeal. One conviction, for marijuana possession, was functionally dissimilar to the charged offense and six years remote, so there was no abuse of discretion in concluding that its "very minimal probative value was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice." The other convictions, for distribution offenses, were relevant to material issues such as knowledge and intent and not so remote as to be inadmissible on that ground. However, the government wanted to introduce police reports and testimony related to those convictions in order to bolster testimony regarding "hand-to-hand transactions" that led to issuance of the search warrant in this case. Thus, the evidence "presented the prospect of mini-trials over the events underlying three prior convictions for five relatively remote drug transactions, all for the purpose of bolstering background evidence in this case." The Court concluded that "[t]his posed a substantial risk of distracting the jury from its central task of determining whether it was Cook who possessed the distribution quantity of crack cocaine found on the night stand," so exclusion was not an abuse of discretion, especially when the government moved for admission of the four prior convictions on an "all or nothing" basis.

United States v. LeCroy, 441 F.3d 914 (11th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a conviction for aggravated carjacking, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence from a 1991 car stop and 1991 burglaries. The evidence tended to show an intent to murder as well as rob, and it was not too remote, particularly because the defendant was incarcerated most of the ten-year period between the prior and charged crimes and because the charged crime was committed approximately six weeks after his release from prison.

[tt] Rule 404(b) -- Stipulations -- Criminal Cases

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Stipulations -- Criminal Cases -- Intent

United States v. Dorsey, 523 F.3d 878 (8th Cir. 2008) : Affirming a conviction for possession with intent to distribute heroin, the Court noted that the defendant claimed that drugs were planted on him, and found no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that the defendant had been convicted of possession of heroin and other drugs. Although the defendant offered to stipulate to intent if the jury found that he possessed heroin, the Court found that the evidence was probative of whether the drugs had been planted and the defendant knew and intended to possess them. In United States v. Walker, 428 F.3d 1165 (8th Cir. 2005) , the court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession and possession of an unregistered firearm arising out of an arson incident, and held that there was no error in admitting evidence of the defendant's 1994 felony conviction for making terrorist threats against the same victim, despite his offer to stipulate to the conviction. While the stipulation would have been sufficient on the felon firearm possession count, the conviction also had probative value as to the defendant's intent and was not unduly prejudicial on the other count, even though he did not actively contest motive or intent.

[ii.1] Rule 404(b) -- Stipulations -- Criminal Cases -- Knowledge

United States v. Phillippi, 442 F.3d 1061 (7th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a conviction for making false statements in a firearms application, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence of multiple felony charges pending against the defendant. Although the defendant offered to stipulate to one pending charge, the government was entitled to produce all its evidence that tended to prove not simply the defendant's status but also his knowledge that made his statements in the application knowingly false.

[uu] Rule 404(b) -- Subsequent Acts

[iii] Rule 404(b) -- Subsequent Acts -- Knowledge

United States v. Rutkoske, 506 F.3d 170 (2d Cir. 2007) : Affirming convictions for securities fraud, the Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the defendant's statement to an associate, four years after the charged conspiracy, about his desire to push up the stock price in a company that he owned. The Court concluded that the charged scheme and the later statement displayed efforts to manipulate a thinly traded stock in a certain manner and that the defendant's understanding of the later scheme made it more likely that he understood aspects of the charged scheme.

United States v. Thomas, 593 F.3d 752 (8th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed crack cocaine convictions, finding no error in admitting evidence of the defendant's participation in crack cocaine transactions four years after the charged crimes. The later transactions were extremely similar to those charged and were probative of knowledge and intent. The Court noted that "[t]he terms of Rule 404(b) draw no distinction between prior and subsequent acts that would support different analyses, nor have we applied different analyses to evaluate the admission of prior and subsequent acts."

United States v. Mares, 441 F.3d 1152 (10th Cir. 2006) : The defendant was found with marijuana hidden in her gas tank at a Border Patrol checkpoint. Affirming her conviction, the Court found no error in admitting evidence that, while awaiting trial on the charges, she was once again found with marijuana stashed in her gas tank at a different Border Patrol checkpoint. The subsequent act rebutted her defense of lack of knowledge, "because it shows conduct bearing the same hallmarks of the earlier border crossing: the drugs were smuggled in the same secretive way, in both cases she claimed to be borrowing a car for which no registration was available, she had a prepared cover story regarding her plans in the United States, and finally in both cases she claimed Alejandro Dominguez was the mastermind." As such, the evidence was properly admitted for a purpose other than character, and its probative value was not substantially outweighed by the risk of the jury drawing a propensity inference.

[iv] Rule 404(b) -- Subsequent Acts -- Miscellaneous Cases

United States v. Savage, 505 F.3d 754 (7th Cir. 2007) : The defendant, charged with crack cocaine distribution, sought to offer threatening letters sent to him by his codefendant after the date of the drug purchase as evidence that he had been coerced into committing the offense. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding the letters. "The threats occurred well after the drug deal, which, though not a dispositive factor, lessens the probative value of the letters." More importantly, because the threats were made at a time when the defendant was cooperating with the government against his codefendant, the jury may have been confused whether the codefendant was coercing the defendant to do the drug deal or to end the cooperation. In United States v. James, 464 F.3d 699 (7th Cir. 2006) , a prosecution for drug and firearm offenses, evidence of other acts was admitted on the government's mistaken representation that they occurred only a few days after the charged crimes and were "intricately related" thereto. In fact, the other acts took place a month later, but the defendant did not object to the admission of the evidence on Rule 404(b) grounds until the appeal. Affirming, the Court held that it was error to admit the evidence, since the story of the crime was complete on the date of its occurrence, the subsequent acts did nothing to explain the circumstances of the charged offenses nor to prove any element of the charged conduct, and the only link between the later acts and the charged offenses was propensity. However, the error was not "plain error," as required when no timely objection was made, because the defendant could not demonstrate that the outcome probably would have been different without the error.

[v] Rule 404(b) -- Subsequent Acts -- Modus Operandi

United States v. Perry, 438 F.3d 642 (6th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for armed bank robbery, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting evidence that the defendant subsequently robbed a bank, having similarly entered carrying a gun in a bookbag, seeking change for $50, seeking to purchase money orders, and only then displaying the gun. The evidence was sufficiently distinctive to show the perpetrator of the charged crime and it was not sufficiently prejudicial to render it inadmissible.

[zz] Rule 404(b) -- Use by Accused

[i.1] Rule 404(b) -- Use by Accused -- Bad Acts by Codefendant

United States v. Bistrup, 449 F.3d 873 (8th Cir. 2006) : A husband and wife were convicted of a fraud scheme. The wife's defense was that she was an unwitting participant, and she sought to introduce evidence of her husband's extramarital affair, in support of her defense that her husband had concealed information from her concerning the fraudulent nature of the transactions. But the Court found no error, reasoning that the wife was asking for a propensity inference: because the husband concealed his affair, he also concealed information about the fraud.

[ii] Rule 404(b) -- Use by Accused -- Bad Acts by Prosecution Witness

United States v. Myers, 589 F.3d 117 (4th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed cocaine convictions, finding no error in the exclusion of "reverse 404(b) evidence" that a drug informant had a number of drug sources and so could readily have purchased cocaine from someone other than the defendant. The Court noted that the jury had already received evidence that the informant was a convicted drug felon and had access to drugs in the area where the charged transaction occurred.

United States v. Lynch, 437 F.3d 902 (9th Cir. 2006) : Affirming Hobbs Act and related convictions, the Court found no error in excluding evidence that a cooperating government witness had committed prior acts of threats and violence. This evidence was offered solely to prove propensity. The Court noted that the acts at issue were not known to the defendant, and therefore were not probative to show that the defendant was fearful of the witness and so stayed with him after a murder.

[iii] Rule 404(b) -- Use by Accused -- Bad Acts by Third Party

United States v. Williams, 458 F.3d 312 (3d Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, finding no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that another person present when a weapon was found near the defendant had recently been convicted for felon firearm possession. Here, the evidence had no tendency to show anything except the other person's propensity, which is not allowed.

United States v. Savage, 505 F.3d 754 (7th Cir. 2007) : The defendant, charged with crack cocaine distribution, sought to offer threatening letters sent to him by his codefendant after the date of the drug purchase as evidence that he had been coerced into committing the offense. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding the letters. "The threats occurred well after the drug deal, which, though not a dispositive factor, lessens the probative value of the letters." More importantly, because the threats were made at a time when the defendant was cooperating with the government against his codefendant, the jury may have been confused whether the codefendant was coercing the defendant to do the drug deal or to end the cooperation. In United States v. Murray, 474 F.3d 938 (7th Cir. 2007) , a prosecution for participating in a drug conspiracy in which a gun was used and a death resulted from that use, the defendant contended that a coconspirator actually fired the fatal shot, and offered proof that on another occasion that coconspirator killed a person who stole drugs. Affirming, the Court found that this evidence of the prior killing was properly excluded, because fatal violence was not a distinctive method of resolving drug disputes, and the manner of and reasons for the two killings were different. The Court noted that "unless the other crime and the present crime are sufficiently alike to make it likely that the same person committed both crimes, so that if the defendant did not commit the other crime he probably did not commit this one, the evidence will flunk Rule 403's test."

United States v. Mock, 523 F.3d 1299 (11th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed convictions for arson, finding no abuse of discretion when evidence of two unrelated fires, which the defendant sought to offer to prove that someone else committed the charged crimes, was excluded. Neither of the other fires was set in the stairwell of an occupied building, which was a common feature of the charged crimes. Thus, the Court found that the Trial Judge could have properly found the evidence to be "irrelevant." We note that the evidence was probably relevant under the definition of Rule 401, because it at least tended to prove that someone else might have committed the crime charged; a better ruling would be that the evidence was properly excluded under Rule 403.

[zz.1] Rule 404(b) -- Voice Identification

United States v. Eckhardt, 466 F.3d 938 (11th Cir. 2006) : Affirming a conviction for making annoying, abusive, harassing, or threatening telephone calls in violation of the Communications Decency Act, the Court found no error in the admission of tape recordings of telephone calls that the defendant made during a period not relevant to the crime charged. The recordings of the uncharged telephone calls to the same victim were properly admitted under Rule 404(b) because the defendant denied making the charged calls, and the recorded calls were relevant "in identifying his voice."

[aaa] Rule 404(b) -- Witness' Credibility

United States v. Gilmore, 553 F.3d 266 (3d Cir. 2009) : Affirming crack cocaine convictions, the Court found no error in the admission of prior conviction evidence to impeach the defendant's testimony that he "never" sold drugs. While Rule 404(b) prohibits evidence of prior crimes to prove character, it does not "bar the use of such evidence for other purposes," including impeachment. The Court noted that there was a risk of unfair prejudice under Rule 403 but found that the Judge limited this risk by allowing the government to enter the certified convictions only if the defendant denied the prior convictions and by instructing the jury that the conviction could only be considered for credibility purposes.

United States v. Culver, 598 F.3d 740 (11th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for producing child pornography, finding no abuse of discretion in the admission of evidence that on another occasion the defendant had drugged and attempted to drug the victim with Valium, Xanax, and Ambien and when she awakened from the shock of a stun gun on her upper back the defendant was in her bed. The evidence was relevant to overcoming any doubt generated by the victim's inability to remember the events in question and because of the overall similarity between the evidence and acts depicted in one of the items of pornography.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
Supp. To CHAPTER 404 RULE 404

1-404 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 404.04

Supp. to § 404.04 Legislative History

[Go To Main]

[4.1] 2006 Amendment Committee Note [Go To Main]

The Rule has been amended to clarify that in a civil case evidence of a person's character is never admissible to prove that the person acted in conformity with the character trait. The amendment resolves the dispute in the case law over whether the exceptions in subdivisions (a)(1) and (2) permit the circumstantial use of character evidence in civil cases. Compare Carson v. Polley, 689 F.2d 562, 576 (5th Cir. 1982) ("when a central issue in a case is close to one of a criminal nature, the exceptions to the Rule 404(a) ban on character evidence may be invoked"), with SEC v. Towers Financial Corp., 966 F.Supp. 203 (S.D.N.Y. 1997) (relying on the terms "accused" and "prosecution" in Rule 404(a) to conclude that the exceptions in subdivisions (a)(1) and (2) are inapplicable in civil cases). The amendment is consistent with the original intent of the Rule, which was to prohibit the circumstantial use of character evidence in civil cases, even where closely related to criminal charges. See Ginter v. Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co., 576 F.Supp. 627, 629-30 (D. Ky.1984) ("It seems beyond peradventure of doubt that the drafters of F.R.Evi. 404(a) explicitly intended that all character evidence, except where 'character is at issue' was to be excluded" in civil cases).

The circumstantial use of character evidence is generally discouraged because it carries serious risks of prejudice, confusion and delay. See Michelson v. United States, 335 U.S. 469, 476 (1948) ("The overriding policy of excluding such evidence, despite its admitted probative value, is the practical experience that its disallowance tends to prevent confusion of issues, unfair surprise and undue prejudice."). In criminal cases, the so-called "mercy rule" permits a criminal defendant to introduce evidence of pertinent character traits of the defendant and the victim. But that is because the accused, whose liberty is at stake, may need "a counterweight against the strong investigative and prosecutorial resources of the government." C. Mueller & L. Kirkpatrick, Evidence: Practice Under the Rules, pp. 264-5 (2d ed. 1999). See also Richard Uviller, Evidence of Character to Prove Conduct: Illusion, Illogic, and Injustice in the Courtroom, 130 U.Pa.L.Rev. 845, 855 (1982) (the rule prohibiting circumstantial use of character evidence "was relaxed to allow the criminal defendant with so much at stake and so little available in the way of conventional proof to have special dispensation to tell the factfinder just what sort of person he really is"). Those concerns do not apply to parties in civil cases.

The amendment also clarifies that evidence otherwise admissible under Rule 404(a)(2) may nonetheless be excluded in a criminal case involving sexual misconduct. In such a case, the admissibility of evidence of the victim's sexual behavior and predisposition is governed by the more stringent provisions of Rule 412.

Nothing in the amendment is intended to affect the scope of Rule 404(b). While Rule 404(b) refers to the "accused," the "prosecution" and a "criminal case," it does so only in the context of a notice requirement. The admissibility standards of Rule 404(b) remain fully applicable to both civil and criminal cases.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 405 RULE 405

2-405 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 405.syn

§ 405.syn Synopsis to Chapter 405: RULE 405

405.01 Official Text

405.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Different Uses of Character Evidence

[2] Reputation Evidence

[3] Opinion Evidence

[4] Specific Acts Evidence

[5] Good Faith Proof of Specific Acts

[6] Specific Acts Must Be Relevant To Test the Character Witness

[7] Permissible Form of Questions on Cross-Examination

[8] Relationship to Rule 607

[9] Character in Issue

[10] Jury Instructions

[11] Relationship to Rule 403

[12] Guilt-assuming Questions

[13] Relationship to Rule 412

405.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Rule 405(a) -- Reputation or Opinion

[a] Rule 405(a) -- Basis for Opinion

[b] Rule 405(a) -- Certificate of Good Conduct

[c] Rule 405(a) -- Cross-Examination

[i] Rule 405(a) -- Generally

[ii] Rule 405(a) -- Cross-Examination -- Good Faith Basis

[iii] Rule 405(a) -- Cross-Examination -- Guilt-Assuming Hypotheticals

[iv] Rule 405(a) -- Cross-Examination -- Remote Specific Acts

[v] Rule 405(a) -- Cross-Examination -- Reputation and Opinion Witnesses Distinguished

[d] Rule 405(a) -- Expert Testimony

[e] Rule 405(a) -- Extrinsic Specific Act Evidence To Rebut Character Testimony

[f] Rule 405(a) -- Jury Instructions

[g] Rule 405(a) -- Relevant Community

[h] Rule 405(a) -- Religious Beliefs

[i] Rule 405(a) -- Specific Good Acts

[j] Rule 405(a) -- Testimony of Accused

[k] Rule 405(a) -- Victim's Character

[2] Rule 405(b) -- Specific Instances of Conduct

[a] Rule 405(b) -- Competence of Employee

[b] Rule 405(b) -- Defamation

[c] Rule 405(b) -- Entrapment

[d] Rule 405(b) -- Self-defense -- Victim's Character for Violence

405.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

[2] 1987 Amendment Committee Note

[3] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

[4] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

[5] Report of the House and Senate Conferees

[6] Citations to Hearings and Debates

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 405 RULE 405

2-405 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 405.01

405.01 Official Text

Rule 405. Methods of Proving Character

(a) Reputation or opinion. -- In all cases in which evidence of character or a trait of character of a person is admissible, proof may be made by testimony as to reputation or by testimony in the form of an opinion. On cross-examination, inquiry is allowable into relevant specific instances of conduct.

(b) Specific instances of conduct. -- In cases in which character or a trait of character of a person is an essential element of a charge, claim, or defense, proof may also be made of specific instances of that person's conduct.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 405 RULE 405

2-405 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 405.02

405.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Different Uses of Character Evidence

The Editorial Explanatory Comment accompanying Rule 404 discussed two different uses of character evidence. In some cases, character is itself in issue, in the sense that a person's character is an element of a claim, charge, or defense; in these cases, character evidence is necessary if an issue is to be correctly decided. In other cases, a proponent seeks to introduce character evidence as circumstantial proof of conduct on a particular occasion; this use of character evidence is generally barred. An exception to this rule of exclusion is that the defendant is given the right to open an inquiry into character in a criminal action. Also, special provision is made in cases of sexual abuse (see Rules 412-415), and character evidence may be used to impeach or support the credibility of a witness (a matter governed by Rules 607, 608, and 609). Rule 404 deals only with the circumstantial use of character evidence, while Rule 405 is not so limited. Rule 405 deals with the proper form of character evidence, assuming that it is admissible.

[2] Reputation Evidence

The Rule provides that when evidence of a character trait is admissible, reputation evidence is one permissible means of proof. Reputation evidence is usually presented by calling a witness to the stand who is familiar with the reputation of the person whose character is to be proved, and asking the witness to state what the reputation is in the person's community. The foundation for such testimony comes in the form of establishing that the witness has sufficient familiarity with the people in the community so that the witness can make a valid attempt at assessing reputation. n1

Courts have permitted testimony as to the person's reputation where that person works or commonly associates, as well as where the person lives. The Federal Rule does not indicate the scope of reputation evidence, nor does it define "community." Generally, Courts have developed the law of reputation testimony much as they were doing prior to the adoption of the Rules. n2 Common-law requirements as to requisite experience in the community and knowledge of community talk have been carried forward. Hearsay exceptions found in Rule 803(19) and (21) suggest that associates in a community are qualified to give reputation evidence.

[3] Opinion Evidence

The provision of Rule 405(a) permitting opinion evidence spawned great controversy. Opinion evidence was generally not permitted in common-law jurisdictions, and the House Committee on the Judiciary deleted the language about the admissibility of opinion evidence of character in its proposed draft of the Rules. The Committee indicated its concern that opinion testimony might turn a trial into a swearing contest between conflicting character witnesses. However, during House debate the Advisory Committee's language was reinstated, and the Senate concurred in the reinstatement. The Rule now permits the use of opinion evidence to prove character. As with reputation witnesses, a foundation must be laid for opinion witnesses; the proponent must establish that the witness is sufficiently familiar with the person whose character is being proved. n3

Most commentators applaud the inclusion of opinion as a proper means of proving character. We are less sanguine about the benefits of this expansion of the common law, because we fear that many people who harbor grudges against litigants may too freely express negative opinions as to character. Cross-examination demonstrating bias may be some protection, but is it sufficient? There is no way to know for sure. We are also a little concerned about the ability of some influential citizens to command "popular" character witnesses to offer favorable opinions that will be perhaps unduly influential with a jury. The common-law rule may have been a little bit wooden and a rather imperfect screen against opinion, n4 but it did symbolize a general distrust of character evidence and a specific distrust of personalized character evidence that we may well seek to reconsider in the future.

Another cause for concern exists: Is it wise to expand the scope of opinion evidence to cover psychiatric opinion and other expert opinion, as the last two sentences of the Advisory Committee's Note state that this Rule does? Arguably, the answer is "yes," because such evidence is more meaningful than lay opinion evidence. On the other hand, character evidence is suspect because it threatens to turn trials away from an inquiry into the facts and toward an inquiry into the moral worth of individuals. Expert character testimony seems likely to accentuate that threat. Nonetheless, the Rule contemplates the use of experts as character witnesses, and some Courts have so applied the Rule. n5 Of course, the proffered expert testimony must satisfy the standards for expert witnesses set forth in Rules 702 through 704, n6 as well as the standards of Rule 403. n7

[4] Specific Acts Evidence

Where character is "in issue," it may be proved by specific acts indicating the character trait. However, if evidence of character is offered circumstantially to prove propensity, it may be directly proved only through reputation or opinion. Proof by way of specific acts is not permitted. n8 Thus, in a fraud case, a character witness can testify that the witness knows the defendant to be an honest person, and that the defendant has a reputation in the community for honesty. But the witness cannot testify that the defendant returned a wallet full of money to a person who had dropped it on the street. Specific acts are admissible to prove character only when character is an element of the claim, charge, or defense. n9

In some sense it is odd that a character trait can be proven by reputation or opinion and not by specific acts. Most people would probably say that what a person actually did is a better indication of that person's character trait than what other people think of the person. However, the Advisory Committee was concerned, and properly so, that proof of specific acts would be very time-consuming, might inflame the jury in some circumstances, and might distract the jury from the issues in dispute. n10

It must be noted, however, that counsel can inquire into relevant specific acts while cross-examining character witnesses. The Rule permits inquiry into specific acts in order to test the knowledge and, thus, the qualification and credibility of the character witness. n11 For example, a character witness who testifies to the defendant's good reputation for peaceableness may be asked: "Have you heard that the defendant committed a murder three years ago?" If the witness has not heard of it, then an implication is created that the witness is not sufficiently qualified to attest to the defendant's reputation in the community. If the witness has heard about the specific act, and still testifies to the defendant's good reputation in the community, then an implication is created that the community itself is suspect, or that the witness is lying about the good reputation. n12 Similarly, if the witness expresses the opinion that the defendant is a peaceloving person, the witness can be asked whether the witness knows about a previous murder committed by the defendant. If the witness did not know about it, then the basis for the opinion is suspect. If the witness did know about it, and yet still had a favorable opinion about the defendant, then the witness is suspect. n13

While ostensibly the Rule permits the use of specific acts only to test character witnesses, the cross-examination permitted by the Rule can be a powerful prosecution weapon in a criminal case, allowing the jury to consider specific bad acts that might not otherwise have been admissible. n14

Defense counsel may wish to note, however, that sometimes the damage done on cross-examination may be repaired on redirect. For example, if a reputation witness is asked whether the witness had heard "that the defendant had previously been charged with an assault," defense counsel may, if the facts support it, ask the character witness: "Have you also heard that charges were dropped against the defendant for lack of evidence?" n15

[5] Good Faith Proof of Specific Acts

While a party may cross-examine a character witness with relevant specific acts, the party may not offer proof that these acts occurred, if the only purpose is to test the character witness. Subdivision (a) of the Rule provides that "inquiry is allowable" into relevant specific instances of conduct. This language does not permit extrinsic proof of the conduct. The rationale is that the probative value of proof of such a collateral matter is substantially outweighed by the risk of prejudice, confusion, and delay. After all, the bad act is only probative in these circumstances to test the character witness. It is not worth it, under the circumstances, to prove to the jury that the act really occurred.

Nonetheless, counsel must have some proof in hand that the act occurred, before the act can be used to test the witness on cross-examination. There would be an obvious risk of abuse if a party were permitted to inquire about specific acts with no proof at all that the acts even occurred. Consequently, Courts have required that the "alleged bad act must have a good faith basis in fact." n16 Upon request by the opposing party, the Trial Judge should require the cross-examiner to lay a foundation out of the presence of the jury before asking the character witness about specific acts. n17

The "good faith basis" test is not a strenuous one; it does not require that proof of the specific act be admissible under the rules of evidence, for the obvious reason that the act is not being admitted as a fact. Consequently, the good faith basis test has often been met through hearsay statements of law enforcement officers implicating the defendant in criminal activity. n18 Still, it is clear that such questions cannot be asked if there is no proof at all that the act occurred. n19

[6] Specific Acts Must Be Relevant To Test the Character Witness

The Court in United States v. Monteleone, 77 F.3d 1086 (8th Cir. 1996) , encountered an interesting problem in the operation of Rule 405: a bad act offered to test the witness that was not relevant for that purpose. Monteleone was convicted for disposing of a firearm to a convicted felon. At the trial, the defendant called a character witness who testified that Monteleone had a good reputation in the community for truthfulness and lawfulness. During cross-examination, over defense objections, the prosecutor asked whether the witness had heard that Monteleone had lied under oath when testifying before a federal grand jury twenty-five years earlier.

The Court of Appeals held it was reversible error to permit this question to be asked. The government in Monteleone argued that there was good faith proof that Monteleone perjured himself, and his act of perjury was obviously relevant to the character trait of truthfulness attested to by the witness. However, the Court found a fundamental flaw in the government's argument. The only legitimate reason for inquiring into specific acts on cross-examination of a character witness is to test the knowledge and credibility of the witness. Therefore, the prosecution must not only have a good faith belief that the specific acts occurred. It must also have a good faith belief that the specific acts are of the type that the witness should have known about (if the witness is an opinion witness) or that the community should have known about (if the witness is a reputation witness). Thus, if the specific acts are essentially private in nature, they "cannot possibly be intended to test the accuracy, reliability, or credibility" of the character witness.

Applying these principles to Monteleone's perjury before the grand jury, the Court held that the prosecution lacked a good faith basis for believing that the act was of such a type as to be known by the witness or by the community. The Court noted that grand jury testimony is protected by an obligation of secrecy, and that the only person who could have disclosed the perjury legitimately would have been Monteleone himself. The Court doubted that Monteleone would "blazon his own prevarication." Obviously, the result in the case would have been different if Monteleone had been convicted of perjuring himself before the grand jury, because the conviction would be a public matter that the character witness could be expected to know about.

[7] Permissible Form of Questions on Cross-Examination

Ostensibly, a witness who gives an opinion, rather than testimony as to the person's reputation, is testifying to what he knows about the person, rather than what he has heard. However, it is not as clear as the Advisory Committee suggests that the "have you heard" question is inappropriate for opinion character witnesses. What a witness has heard about the defendant (or the victim) is probably relevant to the witness' opinion. Thus, the questioner should in most cases be permitted to ask an opinion witness either a "do you know" or a "have you heard" question, or both. n20 Likewise, since testimony as to reputation is often thinly disguised opinion testimony, and since one's knowledge of reputation may be affected by specific acts that one has heard about, the Trial Court should be flexible in permitting the use of "do you know" questions on cross-examination of reputation witnesses. n21

[8] Relationship to Rule 607

One of the confusing aspects of the Rules is their loose use of the words "impeachment" and "cross-examination." Rule 607 provides that any party can attack the credibility of any witness. However, Rules 405(a) and 608(b)(2) only provide for an inquiry into specific instances of conduct on the cross-examination of a character witness -- i.e., a witness testifying as to the character of a defendant or a victim. It is sensible to distinguish between the impeachment needs on direct and cross-examination of character witnesses. The cross-examiner needs to and is entitled to probe the knowledge of the witness by asking about specific events. In contrast, the direct examiner is barred from such an inquiry lest "impeachment" of one's own witness becomes an excuse for using specific acts instead of the required reputation or opinion evidence to prove character. Because the direct examiner usually has a choice of character witnesses, this form of "testing" the witness is seldom if ever necessary during direct examination.

[9] Character in Issue

When a character trait is an essential element of one party's case, greater freedom to inquire into specific instances of conduct is permitted by subdivision (b). n22 The rationale is that substantive law has recognized the trait as important and the most probative evidence should be utilized. In some rare instances, proof of specific acts may not merely be permitted, but it may even be required -- e.g., to prove the incompetence of an employee in a negligent entrustment case. Special proof requirements find their roots in the underlying substantive law.

A complicated question of whether character is "in issue" arises when a criminal defendant puts forth an entrapment defense. An entrapment defense puts the defendant's predisposition "in issue," and so the question is whether "predisposition" is interchangeable with "character." Most authorities treat "predisposition" and "character" as equivalent terms. n23 But assuming this equivalence, an entrapment defense may or may not present an issue of whether the defendant possessed a certain kind of character: If the government seeks to rebut the defense by showing the defendant's predisposition (i.e., character), the parties should be able to offer specific act evidence under Rule 405. On the other hand, if the government only denies that the allegedly entrapping events took place, predisposition is not in dispute and specific act evidence should be inadmissible on simple grounds of relevance. Probably, a judicious use of Rule 403 will be necessary to balance the government's right to prove predisposition when the defendant claims entrapment against the danger of prejudice that accounts for Rule 404(b). n24

[10] Jury Instructions

The Supreme Court recognized in Michelson v. United States, 335 U.S. 469 (1948) , that the evidence rules on character testimony are not as logical as one might wish them to be. It is reasonable for juries to wonder why they hear about reputation and opinion, but not about details to back up the more general testimony. Rarely are juries told the reason for the absence of specific evidence.

More troublesome is the occasional failure to give a jury instruction concerning the proper use of questions put on cross-examination to a character witness. If a cross-examiner asks a "have you heard" or "do you know" question and the witness answers "yes," there is not much to worry about. The "yes" answer will either be explained or the witness' testimony will be weakened by the force of the cross-examination. However, if the witness answers "no," what is the jury to do with the answer? The cross-examiner is not allowed to prove that the act asked about actually occurred. And if the witness denies hearing or knowing about it, how can the jury conclude that the witness' answer weakens testimony unless it knows that the act actually happened? Now, if some character witnesses answer "yes," while others answer "no," this may be helpful in assessing the credibility of those who respond in the negative. Still, a problem of prejudice and confusion remains when all of the witnesses answer "no" or where there is only one character witness. n25 Perhaps the demeanor of the witnesses in answering will be important, but it is also true that the question is not evidence.

To help jurors understand the character rules, the following instruction has been proposed for use in Alaska:

> Do not be surprised that these witnesses limit their testimony to reputation and opinion and do not describe the specific acts of the person that they know or have heard about. The law does not allow them to testify about the specific past actions of a person. It would take too long for us to consider all the good and bad things that a person may ever have done.
>
> However, a person who testifies about another's reputation or who gives his opinion about a witness' may be asked whether he has heard or knows specific things about the witness. If he answers "yes," he may be asked to explain how these things have affected the reputation or his opinion of the witness. If he answers "no," you may consider how this answer bears on what he has said, remembering that what is stated in a question is not evidence and should not be assumed to be true.

n26

[11] Relationship to Rule 403

Trial Judges must keep in mind that Rule 403 governs the impeachment of character witnesses by introducing bad acts of the accused. There is no more reason to allow one party to obtain an unfair advantage through cross-examination than through direct examination.

An example of the need for Rule 403 balancing is United States v. Dawson, 556 F. Supp. 418 (E.D. Pa. 1982) , where the Court held that the government properly asked one defendant's character witness whether he knew that the defendant had been convicted of murder, even though the conviction had been reversed on appeal. The Court reasoned that the witness could have been asked about bad acts resulting in an arrest not followed by a conviction, so therefore the witness also could be asked about a conviction that had been overturned. This reasoning fails to consider the prejudice that might arise from the mention of a conviction. One would expect character witnesses for the defendant to answer questions about the conviction by saying that it had little or no effect on reputation or opinion because it had been declared invalid. Such answers would suggest that the conviction has little probative value when used to impeach the character witnesses. Its prejudicial effect on a jury might well be great however, since the jury may assume, no matter what instructions the Judge gives, that the defendant is a murderer who escaped on a technicality. The admissibility question is close. Defense counsel should seek an in limine ruling on the scope of cross-examination before offering character witnesses to testify on behalf of a defendant whose conviction has been reversed on appeal.

[12] Guilt-assuming Questions

The qualification and credibility of a witness who testifies to the defendant's good character can be tested by inquiring into the defendant's relevant specific acts. A more difficult question is whether the witness can be tested by an assumption of the defendant's guilt as to the crime charged. For example, in United States v. Wilson, 983 F.2d 221 (11th Cir. 1993) , the defendant was convicted of bank fraud and possessing and selling unauthorized credit card numbers. At trial, he admitted the sale of the numbers, but denied fraudulent intent. He called character witnesses who testified to their good opinion of his honesty and integrity. On cross-examination, the witnesses were asked whether their opinion would change if they knew that Wilson had sold credit card numbers to an undercover agent, which was the very offense for which he was being prosecuted. The Court found that these questions were proper.

Most Courts have found it to be impermissible to ask guilt-assuming hypothetical questions of any witnesses who have testified about the defendant's good character. n27 The rationale is that "[s]ince character evidence is admitted only as bearing upon guilt or innocence, an opinion based upon the assumption that the defendant is guilty cannot have any probative value in deciding that issue." n28 And, of course, the defendant is likely to suffer prejudice if guilt is assumed, albeit hypothetically, by the prosecution and by the defense witness. n29

In our view, the cross-examiner already has sufficient ways to examine character witnesses concerning things they have heard or know about the defendant. There is no reason to allow hypothetical questions to be based on the facts of the case being tried. Such a hypothetical is contrary to the presumption of innocence. n30

However, the limitation on guilt-assuming hypotheticals is only triggered if the question put to the character witness actually presumes guilt. The Court in Wilson held that the questions put by the prosecutor did not assume guilt because "the witnesses were asked about nothing more than Wilson already had admitted during his time on the stand: he sold credit card numbers to an undercover Secret Service agent." The question did not assume the issue that was in dispute, i.e., whether Wilson sold the credit cards with fraudulent intent. n31

[13] Relationship to Rule 412

It must be remembered that proof of sexual activity on the part of a rape victim is covered by Rule 412, and not by this Rule. Rule 412 imposes far stricter limitations on proof of character than are imposed by Rules 404 and 405. See the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 412, § 412.02[2].

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. See, e.g., United States v. Perry, 643 F.2d 38 (2d Cir. 1981) (it was no error to exclude testimony by a private investigator as to the defendant's good reputation in the community, where the witness was "merely going to testify as to a few conversations he had with one of Perry's coworkers at the barbershop, with the minister of Perry's church, and with a laundry proprietor"; a character witness "must be able to demonstrate his own familiarity with the defendant's reputation and his competence to speak for the community").

(n2)Footnote 2. See, e.g., United States v. Oliver, 492 F.2d 943, 946 (8th Cir. 1974) ("courts have readily extended the concept of community to include the community in which one works, as well as where one lives").

(n3)Footnote 3. See, e.g., United States v. Gil, 204 F.3d 1347 (11th Cir. 2000) (no error in excluding the defendant's character witness; the witness knew the defendant's family, but he did not know the witness, and therefore he did not have an adequate basis for expressing an opinion about the defendant's character).

(n4)Footnote 4. See Government of the Virgin Islands v. Petersen, 553 F.2d 324, 328 (3d Cir. 1977) (Rule 405 "reflects the reality that reputation evidence has been largely opinion in disguise").

(n5)Footnote 5. See, e.g., United States v. Roberts, 887 F.2d 534 (5th Cir. 1989) (Trial Court erred in excluding expert testimony that the defendant's naive and autocratic personality traits were consistent with his claimed activity as a self-appointed vigilante).

(n6)Footnote 6. See, e.g., United States v. Webb, 625 F.2d 709 (5th Cir. 1980) (expert testimony that the defendant was nonviolent was properly excluded as unhelpful, since such a character trait is a proper subject of lay, rather than expert, testimony).

(n7)Footnote 7. See, e.g., United States v. MacDonald, 688 F.2d 224 (4th Cir. 1982) (Trial Court did not commit error in excluding proffered expert testimony that the defendant had a "personality configuration inconsistent with the outrageous and senseless murders of his family"; the testimony was properly excluded under Rule 403, since because it would be confusing to the jury, it was cumulative of testimony from lay witnesses, and it would foster a battle of the experts).

(n8)Footnote 8. See, e.g., United States v. Talamante, 981 F.2d 1153 (10th Cir. 1992) (in a self-defense case, the defendant could not offer specific acts to prove the victim's character trait for aggressiveness; the victim's character was not "in issue" as it was not an element of the crime or defense, and where character is not in issue, it can only be proved through reputation and opinion evidence)); United States v. Camejo, 929 F.2d 610 (11th Cir. 1991) (specific acts of good conduct cannot be introduced by positive character witnesses); United States v. Hill, 40 F.3d 164 (3d Cir. 1994) ("[a]ssuming law abidingness was a pertinent character trait ... the proper method of proof would have been by reputation or opinion testimony").

(n9)Footnote 9. See, e.g., United States v. Keiser, 57 F.3d 847 (9th Cir. 1995) (Trial Judge properly excluded specific act evidence of the victim's character, offered by the defendant to show that he was responding to an attack by the victim; the victim's character is not an "essential element" of a self-defense claim and therefore evidence of the victim's character must be limited in such cases to reputation and opinion testimony).

(n10)Footnote 10. See United States v. Piche, 981 F.2d 706 (4th Cir. 1992) (when character evidence can be introduced to prove propensity, it cannot take the form of specific acts; specific acts are the most probative evidence of character, but proof of specific acts is also the most likely to arouse prejudice, confuse the jury, and consume time).

(n11)Footnote 11. See, e.g., United States v. Holt, 170 F.3d 698 (7th Cir. 1999) (where the defendant called a witness to testify to his honest and law-abiding character, the government could properly ask whether the witness knew that the defendant was behind on child support payments and had committed sexual harassment at his workplace; these questions were relevant to determine "the extent of the witness' familiarity" with the defendant's character); United States v. Glass, 709 F.2d 669 (11th Cir. 1983) (the defendant in a drug case was a sheriff, who called favorable character witnesses; it was proper to question these witnesses as to whether they were aware that the defendant had accepted a bribe to dispose of a pending drug case: "In bringing forth character witnesses, Glass initiated the subject of his character and good name; government counsel merely attempted to test the credibility of the witnesses by asking them about specific instances of misconduct going to the nature of their character testimony.").

(n12)Footnote 12. See United States v. Boone, 279 F.3d 163 (3d Cir. 2002) (after a character witness testified that the defendant had a reputation for being law-abiding, the prosecution was properly permitted to ask whether the witness was aware of the defendant's prior drug conviction, as this was a proper way to test the qualifications of the witness).

(n13)Footnote 13. See, e.g., United States v. West, 58 F.3d 133 (5th Cir. 1995) (the government was properly permitted to cross-examine the defendant's character witnesses by asking them whether they knew about the defendant's indictment for tax evasion; the witnesses had given their favorable opinion as to the defendant's veracity, and the specific act was a proper test of the witnesses' qualifications and credibility).

(n14)Footnote 14. See, e.g., United States v. Apfelbaum, 621 F.2d 62 (3d Cir. 1980) (character witnesses were not called because of threatened impeachment with defendant's bad acts); United States v. Davenport, 753 F.2d 1460, 1463 (9th Cir. 1985) ("The danger in such a situation is that the prosecution will use the question to waft an unwarranted innuendo into the jury box.").

(n15)Footnote 15. See generally Note, Have You Heard? Cross-Examination of a Criminal Defendant's Good Character Witness: A Proposal for Reform, 9 U.C. DAVIS L. REV. 365 (1976). The Note makes a useful suggestion that Trial Judges should feel free to exercise the discretionary authority to exclude evidence provided by Rule 403 in dealing with cross-examination of character witnesses.

(n16)Footnote 16. United States v. Nixon, 777 F.2d 958, 970 (5th Cir. 1985) . See also United States v. Adair, 951 F.2d 316, 319 (11th Cir. 1992) (reputation witness may be asked on cross-examination whether he has heard about relevant bad conduct by the defendant, but "the government must have a good faith factual basis for the incidents").

(n17)Footnote 17. See, e.g., United States v. Bruguier, 161 F.3d 1145 (8th Cir. 1998) :

> When this sort of "did you know" question is asked, and the fact inquired about would be injurious to defendant's character and is not otherwise in evidence, preliminary proceedings outside the presence of the jury should be conducted first. At these proceedings, either in camera or at the bench, the government could privately state its evidence that a finding of neglect had been made, defense counsel could argue with the evidence or attempt to rebut it in some way, and the Court could satisfy itself that the government had a reasonable, good-faith basis for asking its question.

See also United States v. Davenport, 753 F.2d 1460, 1464 (9th Cir. 1985) (the government must have "a good faith belief in the misconduct of the defendant which was the subject of the question. If mistrial is to be avoided, this good faith must be established to the satisfaction of the court, outside the presence of the jury, before the question is asked."); United States v. Reese, 568 F.2d 1246 (6th Cir. 1977) (the better practice is for the Trial Judge to conduct voir dire to determine good faith basis exists as to alleged bad acts, before allowing the prosecutor to cross-examine defense witnesses).

(n18)Footnote 18. See, e.g., United States v. Nixon, 777 F.2d 958 (5th Cir. 1985) (good faith basis found where the prosecutor relied on hearsay statements of police officers, implicating the defendant in drug activity); United States v. Bright, 588 F.2d 504 (5th Cir. 1979) (government's proffer of a letter of reprimand for stipulation, and its willingness to reopen the case in order to prove the fact of the defendant's reprimand by a Judge, demonstrated the necessary good faith factual basis for cross-examination of a defense witness concerning the reprimand).

(n19)Footnote 19. See, e.g., United States v. Davenport, 753 F.2d 1460, 1464 (9th Cir. 1985) (abuse of discretion where the prosecutor was permitted to inquire about a bad act without establishing any basis in fact that the act occurred).

(n20)Footnote 20. See, e.g., United States v. Collins, 779 F.2d 1520 (11th Cir. 1986) (opinion witness could be asked whether he had heard of defendant's arrests and convictions).

(n21)Footnote 21. See SEC v. Peters, 978 F.2d 1162, 1172 (10th Cir. 1992) (Rule 405 "dismantled the distinction" between reputation and opinion testimony, and therefore opinion and reputation witnesses should be treated similarly on cross-examination).

(n22)Footnote 22. See, e.g., Meiners v. Moriarity, 563 F.2d 343 (7th Cir. 1977) (specific acts are admissible where relevant to the plaintiff's character in an action for defamation).

(n23)Footnote 23. See, e.g., United States v. Thomas, 134 F.3d 975 (9th Cir. 1998) (specific acts admissible to prove defendant's predisposition, or lack of it, in an entrapment case, because defendant's character is in issue in such a case); United States v. Mazza, 792 F.2d 1210 (1st Cir. 1986) (probative specific acts can be offered to rebut an entrapment defense because such a defense puts the defendant's character "in issue").

(n24)Footnote 24. See, e.g., United States v. Washington, 106 F.3d 983 (D.C. Cir. 1997) (a police officer, claiming entrapment in a drug conspiracy case, proffered several commendations he had received for his work on the police force; these commendations were not admissible evidence of character, because the defendant's dedication and bravery were neither pertinent to nor an essential element of his lack of predisposition to engage in the corrupt activity with which he was charged).

(n25)Footnote 25. See, e.g., United States v. Davenport, 753 F.2d 1460, 1463 (9th Cir. 1985) (witness' denial leaves "uncontroverted the insinuation that the defendant had planned to engage in additional bank robberies. The prejudice to the defendant was, thus, created by the question itself rather than by the testimony given in response.").

(n26)Footnote 26. See also United States v. Birney, 686 F.2d 102, 108 (2d Cir. 1982) (cross-examination of character witnesses, by asking about bad acts committed by the defendant, was proper where the jury was instructed that the cross-examination was directed solely at the weight that should be given to the testimony of the character witness, and not to prove that the defendant was a bad person or that the acts really occurred).

The Federal Judicial Center has approved the following instruction (Instruction #52) for such occasions:

> After (the witness) testified about [e.g., the defendant's reputation for honesty; his opinion of the defendant's honesty], _____, the government attorney, asked (the witness) some questions about whether (the witness) [knew; heard] that (the defendant) had been [e.g., convicted of fraud on an earlier occasion]. These questions were asked of (the witness) only to help you decide if he really knew about the defendant's [e.g.: reputation for honesty; honesty].
>
> The possibility that the defendant may have [e.g.: committed other crimes] is not evidence that he committed the crime of _____. I remind you that the government must prove that the defendant committed this crime, and must prove it beyond a reasonable doubt.

(n27)Footnote 27. See, e.g., United States v. Shwayder, 312 F.3d 1109 (9th Cir. 2002) (the Court followed the lead of "almost every other circuit that has addressed the question" and held "that the use of guilt assuming hypotheticals undermines the presumption of innocence and thus violates a defendant's right to due process."); United States v. Mason, 993 F.2d 406 (4th Cir. 1993) (hypothetical questions to character witnesses assuming the defendant's guilt are impermissible).

(n28)Footnote 28. United States v. Morgan, 554 F.2d 31 (2d Cir. 1977) (Mansfield, J., concurring).

(n29)Footnote 29. One Circuit has distinguished between opinion witnesses, where guilt-assuming questions may be permissible, and reputation witnesses, where they are not. See United States v. White, 887 F.2d 267 (D.C. Cir. 1989) . The rationale for such a distinction is obscure. Compare United States v. Guzman, 167 F.3d 1350 (11th Cir. 1999) (guilt-assuming hypotheticals prohibited, finding it irrelevant that the witness was an opinion rather than reputation witness, because "these questions are equally inappropriate when asked of opinion witnesses").

(n30)Footnote 30. See United States v. Candelaria-Gonzalez, 547 F.2d 291 (5th Cir. 1977) (guilt-assuming hypotheticals are improper because they strike at the very heart of the presumption of innocence).

(n31)Footnote 31. See also United States v. Smith-Bowman, 76 F.3d 634 (5th Cir. 1996) (Trial Judge did not err in permitting the prosecutor to ask a defense character witness whether he had heard that the defendant took her employer's credit card and used it for personal reasons; the defendant did not contest the fact that she used the credit cards; her defense was that the use was authorized); United States v. Velasquez, 980 F.2d 1275 (9th Cir. 1992) (in a prosecution for bank robbery, it was proper to ask character witnesses whether their opinion would change if it were established that the defendant had taken a grenade into a bank and inquired about money; the defendant admitted this act, and merely denied that he had the intent to rob the bank).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 405 RULE 405

2-405 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 405.03

405.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Rule 405(a) -- Reputation or Opinion

[a] Rule 405(a) -- Basis for Opinion

United States v. Gil, 204 F.3d 1347 (11th Cir. 2000) : Affirming a narcotics conviction, the Court found no error in the exclusion of the testimony of a witness proffered as a character witness by the defendant. The witness knew the defendant's family, but he did not know the defendant. Therefore, the witness did not have an adequate basis for expressing an opinion as to the defendant's character.

[b] Rule 405(a) -- Certificate of Good Conduct

United States v. Candelaria-Silva, 166 F.3d 19 (1st Cir. 1999) : Affirming drug trafficking convictions, the Court held there was no error in excluding a "certificate of good conduct" certified by the Puerto Rico Police regarding a defendant, since the certificate was neither reputation nor opinion evidence.

[c] Rule 405(a) -- Cross-Examination

[i] Rule 405(a) -- Generally

United States v. Martorano, 557 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1977) : In a prosecution for loansharking, the Court upheld a ruling that precluded the defense from asking a witness who testified to the defendant's reputation for collection practices the names of the persons who were his sources of information. The Court was especially concerned about the risk of reprisal, and noted that the defendant had alternative traditionally accepted devices available to cast doubt on the reputation testimony, e.g., asking the witness to specify the rumors that he had heard and the number of people from whom he had heard them.

United States v. Boone, 279 F.3d 163 (3d Cir. 2002) : Affirming convictions of drug conspiracy, the Court held that, after the defendant called a character witness to testify that the defendant had a reputation for being law-abiding and truthful, the prosecutor was properly permitted to ask whether the witness was aware of the defendant's prior drug conviction and that his nightclub had been searched by narcotics agents. The Court noted that a Trial Judge has broad discretion regarding cross-examination of character witnesses. In United States v. Beros, n1 the Court held that the government was properly permitted to cross-examine defense character witnesses in a prosecution for conversion of union funds concerning their knowledge of the defendant's false swearing on a marriage license application.

United States v. Moore, 27 F.3d 969 (4th Cir. 1994) : The defendant, charged with several fraudulent schemes to obtain real estate loans, called several witnesses who described him as honest and trustworthy in his personal and business dealings. The Court held there was no error in permitting one of the witnesses to be cross-examined about the defendant's declaring bankruptcy and defaulting on loans totaling hundreds of thousands of dollars.

United States v. West, 58 F.3d 133 (5th Cir. 1995) : Affirming convictions for conspiracy to avoid gasoline excise taxes, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting character witnesses to be asked whether they had heard of a defendant's indictment on state charges similar to those for which he was on trial. The government had a good faith factual basis for its questions, and evasion of state taxes is relevant to honesty, the character trait as to which the witnesses were testifying. In United States v. Ochoa, n2 a defendant's conviction on a heroin charge was reversed because the government had been permitted to cross-examine her about the prior bad conduct of her relatives. The Court noted that although the defendant had offered two character witnesses, the government should have been restricted to rebutting their testimony about her character.

United States v. Holt, 170 F.3d 698 (7th Cir. 1999) : The defendant, charged with conspiring to illegally transfer an automatic weapon, called character witnesses who testified to his reputation as an honest and law-abiding individual. The Court found no error in cross-examining those witnesses as to their familiarity with allegations that the defendant was behind on child support payments and allegations of sexual harassment at his workplace, since the questions were relevant to determining the extent of the witnesses' familiarity with his reputation and character. However, it was improper (but harmless error) to question the witnesses about books explaining how to convert semi-automatic weapons into automatics and how to make explosives that were sold in the defendant's gun shop. The evidence had no relevance either to the character witnesses' credibility or to the defendant's knowledge regarding semi-automatic and fully automatic weapons. In a prosecution for aggravated battery, United States v. Jordan, n3 the Court found it was proper for the government to ask a witness, who testified that the defendant's character for law-abidingness was good, whether he had heard of the defendant's prior arrest.

United States v. Bruguier, 161 F.3d 1145 (8th Cir. 1998) : Witnesses testified on behalf of a defendant charged with child abuse that he was a good father. The Court held there was no error when the witnesses were asked on cross-examination whether they were aware that the family had been supervised for two years by Child Protective Services, as the question was relevant to determining the credibility of the witnesses' opinions. However, the government should have established its good faith basis for asking the question outside the presence of the jury. The Court held it was improper (but harmless error) when another character witness, the defendant's wife, was asked on cross-examination whether she thought "it is a good father to be arrested 36 times," since arrests do not show that a crime was committed or even that there is reasonable cause to believe one was.

United States v. Bush, 58 F.3d 482 (9th Cir. 1995) : After a witness in a fraud prosecution said that he had never known the defendant union official to have any problems, the government asked whether he was aware that civil RICO charges accusing the defendant of financial misconduct had been filed. Although the prosecutor appeared to be referring to a separate incident, in fact the civil charges arose out of the same situation as the criminal charges. The Court held it was error (but harmless) under Rule 403 to permit the question: the evidence lacked probative value because the witness' knowledge of the civil RICO charges was entirely consistent with his original testimony that he had never known the defendant to be in trouble before, and it was prejudicial because it falsely suggested that the RICO charges represented a separate incident of misconduct somewhere in the defendant's past.

United States v. McHorse, 179 F.3d 889 (10th Cir. 1999) : The defendant, charged with child sexual abuse, called his adult son, who testified that he knew his father "couldn't" do anything bad to anybody and "would not do anything like that." Affirming, the Court found no error in asking the son on cross-examination whether he was aware that his sister and half-sister had said the defendant had abused them from a young age. Regardless of the purpose for which the son was called as a witness, he became a witness to his father's good character, so the government was entitled under Rule 405(a) to demonstrate that he was not fully informed as to his father's character by inquiring into the son's knowledge of specific instances of the father's conduct. Furthermore, the evidence was admissible to rebut any misleading impression from the son's direct testimony that his father had never taken any inappropriate sexual actions with him or his brother.

United States v. Adair, 951 F.2d 316 (11th Cir. 1992) : In a Hobbs Act prosecution of a former police chief for protecting cocaine and illegal liquor sales, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in an in limine ruling permitting character witnesses to be cross-examined about their knowledge of the defendant's prior conviction for hindering the apprehension of a felon. The prosecution had a good faith basis for the questions, they would have tested the witnesses' knowledge of the defendant's reputation, and they were relevant to the character traits raised at trial. See also United States v. Glass n4(the prosecutor was properly permitted to ask defense character witnesses in drug case whether they knew that the defendant, a sheriff, had accepted money to dispose of a pending drug case and whether they knew about his ticket fixing).

[ii] Rule 405(a) -- Cross-Examination -- Good Faith Basis

United States v. Wallach, 935 F.2d 445 (2d Cir. 1991) : The prosecutor asked character witnesses for a defendant charged with racketeering about an incident in which a State Judge, whom the defendant was promoting for appointment to the federal bench, had approved a 60 percent legal fee for him in the settlement of a personal injury case. Reversing the convictions on other grounds, the Court noted that the government had a good faith basis for inquiring into the matter to challenge the basis for the character witnesses' opinions, but that the prosecutor argued the evidence to the jury in a manner well beyond the bounds of propriety and relevance. In United States v. Bermudez, n5 the Court affirmed convictions for conspiracy to distribute cocaine, holding that it was proper to permit cross-examination of character witnesses for a defendant by asking them whether they had heard that he was arrested on a marijuana charge in 1974. Before cross-examining the witnesses, the prosecutor had informed the Judge of the proposed line of inquiry and supplied documentary proof of the arrest.

United States v. Luffred, 911 F.2d 1011 (5th Cir. 1990) : In reversing the defendant's bank fraud convictions on other grounds, the Court noted that error was also committed when the government was permitted to impeach character witnesses by questions referring to other crimes for which no factual basis had been laid.

United States v. Reese, 568 F.2d 1246 (6th Cir. 1977) : The Court, affirming a conviction for receiving stolen property, suggested that before character witnesses who testify as to a defendant's reputation are asked about community rumors, the Trial Judge should have "a voir dire examination to determine whether there were actually such rumors before permitting the cross-examination. This would have avoided any random shots to the prejudice of the appellant."

United States v. Finley, 934 F.2d 837 (7th Cir. 1991) : In the RICO and Hobbs Act prosecution of a State Court clerk, a government witness testified on cross-examination to his opinion that the defendant was an honest and dedicated public servant. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion when the witness was asked on redirect whether he had previously said the defendant lost his position on an election ticket because of an extortion incident. Because the prosecutor asked what the witness had said, not what the witness had heard, the question had a factual basis, even if the extortion incident was only unsubstantiated rumor. In United States v. Alvarez, n6 a narcotics prosecution, the Court upheld cross-examination of two defense character witnesses about certain events, since the defendant had spoken about these events to the witnesses and the government had a good faith basis for its questions.

United States v. Monteleone, 77 F.3d 1086 (8th Cir. 1996) : The Court reversed a firefighter's conviction for disposing of a firearm to a convicted felon, finding that the government asked an improper question during cross-examination of a fellow firefighter who testified to the defendant's reputation for truthfulness and lawfulness over a 20-year period. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 405.02[6].

[iii] Rule 405(a) -- Cross-Examination -- Guilt-Assuming Hypotheticals

United States v. White, 887 F.2d 267 (D.C. Cir. 1989) : Although the Court reversed a bribery conviction, it held there had been no error in permitting cross-examination of a character witness with hypotheticals that assumed the defendant was guilty of the crimes for which he was on trial. The Court asserted that it may be improper to cross-examine a witness testifying only to community reputation with hypotheticals, but that is not true for witnesses expressing their own opinion of the defendant's character.

United States v. Oshatz, 912 F.2d 534 (2d Cir. 1990) : After the defendant in a tax fraud case elicited favorable opinion testimony regarding his character, the prosecutor asked the witnesses whether their opinions would change if they knew the defendant had committed the charged crimes. The Court reaffirmed the prohibition of United States v. Morgan, n7 on guilt-assuming hypothetical questions of lay character witnesses, noting that any probative value is greatly outweighed by the risk of impairing the presumption of innocence. The error was harmless, however. One Judge, concurring in the result, disagreed on the grounds that such questions are extremely helpful in probing the witness' bias and standards and that the risks of prejudice cited by the majority are nonexistent or overstated.

United States v. Curtis, 644 F.2d 263 (3d Cir. 1981) : When a defendant charged with narcotics offenses claimed entrapment and offered reputation evidence through character witnesses, the prosecution responded by asking the witnesses how their opinions of the defendant's character would be affected by an admission by the defendant of participation in the narcotics activity. The Court held it was error to permit the government's examination because a reputation witness should be impeached only on matters relating to reputation.

United States v. Mason, 993 F.2d 406 (4th Cir. 1993) : The Court reversed convictions for cocaine offenses, finding that the prosecutor improperly questioned defense character witnesses by asking them whether their opinion of the defendant would change if they believed he distributed drugs. The Court reasoned that "an opinion elicited by a question that assumes that the defendant is guilty can have only negligible probative value as it bears on the central issue of guilt," and that "adherence to a basic concept of our justice system, the presumption of innocence, is not served by this line of questioning."

United States v. Smith-Bowman, 76 F.3d 634 (5th Cir. 1996) : The Court affirmed a conviction for mail fraud resulting from unauthorized use of credit cards, holding there was no error in permitting a defense character witness to be asked whether he had heard that the defendant took her employer's credit card and used it for personal reasons. The Court reasoned that the questions did not ask the witness to assume that the defendant was guilty or that she would be convicted, but tested whether the witness had heard of some of the defendant's alleged misbehavior. In United States v. Candelaria-Gonzalez, n8 the Court reversed convictions for narcotics violations, holding that character witnesses who testified on behalf of one defendant were improperly impeached. Although the Trial Judge did not permit asking whether the indictment would affect the witness' opinion of the defendant, the government was permitted to ask whether the defendant's reputation would be affected if he were convicted of trafficking in narcotics. The Court concluded that the "hypothetical questions struck at the very heart of the presumption of innocence which is fundamental to Anglo-Saxon concepts of fair trial." The Court also held that it was improper to ask a character witness whether it would be inconsistent with his knowledge of the defendant if a DEA agent testified that the defendant was known as a major narcotics trafficker.

United States v. McGuire, 744 F.2d 1197 (6th Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed convictions for offenses involving false entries in bank records, holding that after character witnesses gave their opinions of one defendant and his reputation, they were properly asked whether they knew of a pending civil suit against him charging that he and others had engaged in unfair trade practices. The Court observed, however, that "it would be error to allow the prosecution to ask the character witness to assume defendant's guilt of the offenses for which he is then on trial."

United States v. Williams, 738 F.2d 172 (7th Cir. 1984) : The Court found error (harmless, however) in the government's cross-examining defense character witnesses by asking them whether their opinions would change if it were shown the defendant were guilty.

United States v. Pirani, 406 F.3d 543 (8th Cir. 2005) (en banc): The Court affirmed a conviction for making false statements to federal investigators, holding that there was no plain error when a defense character witness was asked on cross-examination whether her opinion of the defendant's reputation for truthfulness would change if she knew that he had made the false statement he was alleged to have made to the investigators. The Court noted that "[a] number of courts have condemned prosecutor questions that assume the defendant's guilt of the offense being tried as contrary to the accused's presumption of innocence," and that "we do not endorse the practice, and suspect that a timely objection to this question would have been sustained." In United States v. Barta, n9 the Court held it was error, but harmless, to ask a witness who testified in a tax evasion case to the defendant's reputation for high character and trustworthiness whether his opinion of that reputation would change if the defendant had acted as charged; such a question undermined the presumption of innocence.

United States v. Shwayder, 312 F.3d 1109 (9th Cir. 2002) : Affirming a conviction for racketeering and other offenses, the Court held it was error (but not plain error) to permit cross-examination of two defense character witnesses by asking each "whether his opinion would change if Shwayder had committed certain acts alleged in the indictment." The Court followed the lead of "almost every other circuit that has addressed the question" and held "that the use of guilt assuming hypotheticals undermines the presumption of innocence and thus violates a defendant's right to due process."

United States v. James, 728 F.2d 465 (10th Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed convictions for fraud and extortion, but found error in the prosecution's redirect examination of a witness who had been asked on cross-examination by the defense about the defendant's reputation. The prosecutor asked whether the reputation would be as good if its charges were true, and the Court said that it was improper to have asked the witness to assume the guilt of the defendant. See also United States v. Primrose n10(a guilt-assuming hypothetical on cross-examination of a reputation witness was harmless error); United States v. Polsinelli n11(drug convictions were reversed because the prosecutor improperly asked defense character witnesses what their opinions would be if they assumed the defendant was guilty of the acts charged by the government).

United States v. Guzman, 167 F.3d 1350 (11th Cir. 1999) : The defendant, charged with conspiracy to import large quantities of cocaine, called a witness who testified to his opinion that the defendant was a law-abiding person. On cross-examination, the witness was asked whether his opinion would change if he learned that the defendant was involved in transporting multikilogram quantities of cocaine. The Court found that it was error (but harmless) to permit this question, because the government may not "pose hypothetical questions that assume the guilt of the accused in the very case at bar." The Court found it irrelevant that the witness was an opinion rather than reputation witness, since "these questions are equally inappropriate when asked of opinion character witnesses."

[iv] Rule 405(a) -- Cross-Examination -- Remote Specific Acts

United States v. Edwards, 549 F.2d 362 (5th Cir. 1977) : The Court noted that a cross-examiner attempting to test whether the character witness is credible can ask the witness about events that are more than ten years old, because the ten-year limitation of Rule 609(b) has no application to such questioning.

United States v. Alvarez, 860 F.2d 801 (7th Cir. 1988) , adhered to on reh'g, 868 F.2d 201 (7th Cir. 1989) : In a narcotics prosecution, the Court upheld cross-examination of two defense character witnesses about events occurring in and before 1973. It observed that the government allegations of continuing violations of the immigration laws included the earlier time period.

[v] Rule 405(a) -- Cross-Examination -- Reputation and Opinion Witnesses Distinguished

United States v. Curtis, 644 F.2d 263 (3d Cir. 1981) : When a defendant charged with narcotics offenses claimed entrapment and offered reputation evidence through character witnesses, the prosecution responded by asking the witnesses how their opinions of the defendant's character would be affected by an admission by the defendant of participation in the narcotics activity. The Court held it was error to permit the government's examination because a reputation witness should be impeached only on matters relating to reputation.

United States v. Frost, 914 F.2d 756 (6th Cir. 1990) : The Court affirmed convictions for banking offenses, holding there was no abuse of discretion in permitting character witnesses, who testified to the defendants' community reputations, to be asked on cross-examination whether their opinions of those reputations would change if they had heard of specific acts of conduct. Describing the situation as a textbook application of the Rule, the Court rejected the defendants' argument that, because only reputation evidence had been elicited, cross-examination could mention only acts likely to have been known in the community.

United States v. Manos, 848 F.2d 1427 (7th Cir. 1988) : The Court affirmed a defendant's racketeering and extortion convictions, as it found that defense character witnesses were properly cross-examined about specific instances of conduct. It concluded that both reputation and opinion witnesses may be cross-examined about specific instances.

SEC v. Peters, 978 F.2d 1162 (10th Cir. 1992) : The Court reversed a judgment for the defendant in a civil action for insider trading violations, holding the SEC had been improperly precluded from asking the defendant's opinion character witnesses whether they had heard of other securities law claims made against him. "Have you heard" questions are as relevant to opinion as to reputation character testimony, and it is clear that the Rule intends to treat the two types similarly.

[d] Rule 405(a) -- Expert Testimony

United States v. Gonzalez-Maldonado, 115 F.3d 9 (1st Cir. 1997) : In a money laundering and cocaine prosecution, the government's case depended heavily on taped conversations involving a conspirator who had been found mentally incompetent to stand trial and to testify. The Court held it was error to exclude testimony from an appointed psychiatrist that the conspirator had a mental illness that led to verbosity, "grandeza," and exaggeration, since an untrained layperson would not be qualified to determine intelligently, and to the best degree, the weight to place on the recorded statements without enlightenment from the expert.

United States v. Oshatz, 912 F.2d 534 (2d Cir. 1990) : In ruling that guilt-assuming hypothetical questions of lay character witnesses are improper, the Court left open the possibility that they might be asked on cross-examination of expert character witnesses. One Judge, concurring only in the judgment, said that expert character testimony is one of those ideas whose time has not yet come, and with common sense and a modicum of luck never will.

United States v. Hill, 655 F.2d 512 (3d Cir. 1981) : The Court reversed drug convictions because the Trial Judge excluded a psychologist's expert testimony, offered to support an entrapment defense, that the defendant was uniquely susceptible to government inducements. Citing its prior decision in United States v. Curtis, n12 the Court said that Rule 405(a) permits "two kinds of character evidence, now allowing testimony by an expert witness on traits of character which may be substantively relevant."

United States v. Webb, 625 F.2d 709 (5th Cir. 1980) : The Court held, in a prosecution for shooting at a flying helicopter, that there was no error in excluding expert testimony that the defendant lacked "propensity to commit a violent act," as that was a character trait plainly within the ken of lay jurors.

[e] Rule 405(a) -- Extrinsic Specific Act Evidence To Rebut Character Testimony

United States v. Benedetto, 571 F.2d 1246 (2d Cir. 1978) : Citing Rule 405, the Court observed in dictum that the fact "[t]hat the defense improperly attempted to establish defendant's good character by reference to specific good acts did not justify the prosecution's use of testimony [extrinsic evidence] concerning bad acts either in its direct case or in rebuttal."

United States v. Reed, 700 F.2d 638 (11th Cir. 1983) : The Court reversed convictions for embezzlement because the defendant was asked on cross-examination whether he recalled being in possession of marijuana at the time of arrest and making a statement regarding marijuana use, and the prosecutor then presented testimony to contradict the defendant's answers. The government claimed that the defendant opened the door to negative character evidence by offering character witnesses who testified as to his general reputation and his reputation for truth and veracity. The Court noted that the government could have offered evidence that would have rebutted the evidence of good character for honesty and truthfulness, but that possession of marijuana was not such evidence. We note also that the government may respond to defense character evidence by asking the character witnesses if they have heard or know of specific acts of bad character, but it may not introduce extrinsic evidence to prove the acts.

[f] Rule 405(a) -- Jury Instructions

United States v. Benally, 756 F.2d 773 (10th Cir. 1985) : Reversing a conviction for vehicular homicide, the Court held it was error to give an instruction on other crimes evidence when the only mention of prior arrests and convictions came in the prosecution's cross-examination of a defense character witness. Since the jury was not to assume that the facts stated in questions were true, the instruction, which stated that testimony of other acts, wrongs, or crimes had been introduced, was incorrect.

[g] Rule 405(a) -- Relevant Community

United States v. Mandel, 591 F.2d 1347 (4th Cir. 1979) , vacated, 602 F.2d 653 (4th Cir. 1979) (en banc): Although it overturned mail fraud and racketeering convictions on other grounds, the Court of Appeals panel cited this Manual and indicated to Trial Judges that character evidence offered to impeach a witness (or to respond to impeachment evidence) could take the form of reputation or opinion based in the locality where a witness worked as well as the locality where the witness lives. An equally divided en banc Court reinstated the convictions, but did not comment on this point.

[h] Rule 405(a) -- Religious Beliefs

Government of Virgin Islands v. Petersen, 553 F.2d 324 (3d Cir. 1977) : Affirming a murder conviction, the Court held there was no error in prohibiting the defendant from introducing testimony regarding his religious affiliation to demonstrate that he rejected violence. The Court recognized that the defendant's religious beliefs rejecting violence would "be logically probative of the proposition that defendant acted in conformity with his belief on the night of the homicide," but observed that a person "may or may not act in accordance with a professed belief; it is the observation of the defendant's behavior over a length of time which is the recognized basis for both reputation and opinion testimony." Because Rule 405(a) "reflects an accommodation between logical relevance on the one hand and the desire to avoid prejudice, confusion, surprise and consumption of trial time on the other," the Court held "that the appropriate means to elicit opinion testimony under the rule is to inquire directly as to the witness' opinion concerning the relevant character trait of the accused."

[i] Rule 405(a) -- Specific Good Acts

United States v. Hill, 40 F.3d 164 (3d Cir. 1994) : Affirming a conviction for stealing and cashing a check, the Court held there was no error in excluding evidence that the defendant did not steal three "test letters" several months after the charged embezzlement. The Court noted that "the proper method of proof would have been by reputation or opinion testimony."

United States v. Barry, 814 F.2d 1400 (9th Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed convictions for unauthorized sale of government property. It found no error in the exclusion of defense evidence of an FBI rap sheet showing only one prior arrest, which ended in dismissal of charges, and two commendation letters written twelve years prior to the unauthorized sales. The Court cited Government of Virgin Islands v. Grant, 775 F.2d 508 (3d Cir. 1985) , for the proposition that testimony of multiple instances of good conduct appears to violate a strict reading of Rule 405 and is generally less probative than reputation or opinion evidence. The Court left open the question of whether specific acts of good conduct might be admissible under Rule 404(b) to support an entrapment defense.

United States v. Russell, 703 F.2d 1243 (11th Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed convictions in a marijuana conspiracy case, finding that evidence of specific good acts offered on behalf of a defendant was properly excluded, since evidence of other noncriminal conduct is generally not probative of whether a defendant committed the acts charged.

[j] Rule 405(a) -- Testimony of Accused

United States v. Cudlitz, 72 F.3d 992 (1st Cir. 1996) : In an arson and insurance fraud case, the Court held that the government was properly permitted to ask the defendant on cross-examination about his prior attempt to solicit arson of a different property. The defendant had testified on direct that, when previously faced with an unprofitable business venture, he had duly paid his debts, had never had a fire connected with any other enterprise, and had never made a claim for fire damage on any of his other properties. The Court concluded that the defendant was offering evidence of good character, which opened the door to prior acts of soliciting arson. Although the defendant's character evidence was "improper in form since the rules limit the proponent to offering an opinion or reputation witness," this did not affect the use of bad acts on cross-examination, since "the detail simply made Cudlitz' testimony more effective for him."

United States v. Solomon, 686 F.2d 863 (11th Cir. 1982) : The Court affirmed convictions for a truck hijacking conspiracy, holding that the Trial Judge properly sustained objections to defense attempts to have a defendant answer questions about the composition of his family and his service in the military. The answers would not have amounted to reputation or opinion evidence, which is the exclusive means of proving good character.

[k] Rule 405(a) -- Victim's Character

United States v. Piche, 981 F.2d 706 (4th Cir. 1992) : In a prosecution for conspiring to violate civil rights of Asian-Americans, the Court held that, even though evidence of two victims' character was admissible to prove that they were predisposed to participate in violent acts, character was not in dispute and only reputation or opinion evidence could have been admitted.

United States v. Smith, 230 F.3d 300 (7th Cir. 2000) : The defendant was charged with retaliating against a witness who had given evidence against him in another proceeding by pushing the witness during a barroom encounter. At trial, the defense was precluded from offering evidence of the witness' prior misdemeanor conviction for domestic battery. Affirming, the Court held that the conviction was probative of the witness' character for violence, thus satisfying Rule 404(a)(2), but that it was evidence of a specific act, rather than reputation or opinion as required by Rule 405(a). The Court held that the victim's character for violence is not an essential element of a self-defense claim, so specific acts evidence is not admissible under Rule 405(b).

United States v. Cournoyer, 118 F.3d 1279 (8th Cir. 1997) : Affirming a conviction for aggravated sexual abuse, the Court found no error in the exclusion of testimony that the complainant "always accuses guys of that," since the testimony lacked the foundation required under Rule 405(a) for reputation or opinion character evidence or was inadmissible specific conduct character evidence. In United States v. Kills Ree, n13 the Court upheld a conviction for involuntary manslaughter, finding that the Trial Judge properly excluded evidence concerning specific instances in which one victim allegedly beat another. This was not reputation or opinion evidence.

United States v. Keiser, 57 F.3d 847 (9th Cir. 1995) : The Court affirmed an assault conviction, finding it was proper to exclude specific act evidence of the victim's character, which had been offered by the defendant to prove that he was acting in response to an attack by the victim. The defendant had the right under Rule 404(a)(2) to offer evidence to show that the alleged victim was a violent and angry person, but the victim's character is not an essential element of a self-defense claim; therefore, under the terms of Rule 405, character evidence of the victim must be limited to reputation and opinion testimony.

United States v. Yazzie, 188 F.3d 1178 (10th Cir. 1999) : Although the Court reversed murder convictions, it held that the Trial Judge properly excluded testimony that the deceased routinely got into fights in a bar, used drugs, carried a knife, and kept the woman with whom he lived for a year in a "hostage relationship" as inadmissible specific act character evidence. The Judge permitted the defense to introduce evidence of the deceased's reputation for violence and permitted the woman with whom he lived to testify that the deceased routinely picked fights, manipulated and intimidated people, and carried a gun. In United States v. Bautista, 145 F.3d 1140 (10th Cir. 1998) , the Court affirmed a conviction for murder, holding there was no abuse of discretion in excluding defense evidence that the victim had made a homosexual pass at a friend of the defendant. The defendant was properly permitted to testify that he feared the victim's aggressive sexual advances, but evidence of the victim's pertinent traits of character could only be proved through reputation or opinion evidence. In United States v. Talamante, n14 the Court upheld an assault conviction, finding no error in the exclusion of specific acts offered by the defense to prove that the victim was the first aggressor. Since the defendant was attempting to prove the victim's character, which was not in issue, the defendant was limited to reputation and opinion evidence.

[2] Rule 405(b) -- Specific Instances of Conduct

[a] Rule 405(b) -- Competence of Employee

Webb v. City of Chester, 813 F.2d 824 (7th Cir. 1987) : Affirming a plaintiff's judgment in a sex discrimination suit arising out of her discharge from a police department, the Court upheld exclusion of evidence that two years after her discharge the plaintiff demonstrated incompetence while employed as a part-time officer in another city. Although the plaintiff's competence was an issue in the case, the Court concluded that the Trial Judge did not err in finding that the evidence was too remote in time and too prejudicial.

In re Aircrash, 684 F.2d 1301 (9th Cir. 1982) : In a suit by survivors of passengers killed in an airplane crash, the Court held that training records of a pilot were admissible to prove that he was incompetent to fly and that the airline was on notice of this before the accident. Once the competence of an employee is in issue, specific instances of conduct are permissible to prove incompetence; indeed, it may be the only proof available.

[b] Rule 405(b) -- Defamation

Schafer v. Time, Inc., 142 F.3d 1361 (11th Cir. 1998) : A picture of the plaintiff was erroneously misidentified in a magazine article as being that of a person involved in the Pan Am 103 bombing. Reversing a judgment for the defendant on other grounds, the Court held there was no error in permitting cross-examination of the plaintiff about a felony conviction, a possible parole violation, and other bad acts. Because under the applicable libel law an assertion of damage to reputation makes the plaintiff's character an issue, evidence of specific acts reflecting on the plaintiff's character was admissible under Rule 405(b).

[c] Rule 405(b) -- Entrapment

United States v. Washington, 106 F.3d 983 (D.C. Cir. 1997) : The defendant, a police officer, was charged with furthering a drug conspiracy. He claimed entrapment; the government introduced evidence of his previous drug activity under Rule 404(b). His proffer in rebuttal of several commendations he had received for his work on the police force was excluded. Affirming the conviction, the Court held that the commendations were not admissible evidence of character, since the defendant's dedication and bravery were neither pertinent to nor an essential element of his lack of predisposition to engage in the corrupt activity with which he was charged.

United States v. Mazza, 792 F.2d 1210 (1st Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed cocaine convictions, finding that evidence of one defendant's prior cocaine purchases was admissible to rebut an entrapment defense.

United States v. Toner, 728 F.2d 115 (2d Cir. 1984) : Affirming convictions for firearms offenses, the Court found there was no error in excluding evidence, offered to support an entrapment defense, that a defendant had twice rejected an informant's proposals to engage in firearms transactions. Since the defendant's evidence showed only that he lacked funds necessary to pursue the informant's proposals, the Court found that it was not probative of a predisposition not to commit firearms offenses. In United States v. Williams, n15 the corruption prosecution of a former United States Senator, the Court held that the Trial Judge properly permitted the government to respond to an entrapment defense with evidence that the Senator used his influence on behalf of himself and his wife even when no government agent asked him to. This evidence tended to establish his predisposition.

United States v. Manzella, 782 F.2d 533 (5th Cir. 1986) : Affirming racketeering convictions, the Court found that extrinsic evidence of a defendant's prior crimes was admissible to show predisposition in response to an entrapment defense. In United States v. Parrish, n16 the Court held that evidence of a prior drug offense conviction was admissible in a drug prosecution to prove predisposition once a defendant raised an entrapment defense.

United States v. Roper, 135 F.3d 430 (6th Cir. 1998) : In a trial for crack distribution, the government provided direct evidence of the charges on its case-in-chief and the defendant argued entrapment in his direct testimony. On his cross-examination and in its rebuttal case, the government introduced evidence of the defendant's prior drug activity. The defendant's motion for a mistrial on ground of prosecutorial misconduct in failing to give notice of his other crimes despite a pretrial request was denied. Affirming, the Court held that the notice requirement of Rule 404(b) does not apply when the other crimes are admissible evidence for character traits in issue, as here, where the defendant put his character in issue by asserting an entrapment defense.

United States v. Swiatek, 819 F.2d 721 (7th Cir. 1987) : The Court held that it was error (but harmless) to introduce evidence that the defendant was willing to deal in stolen jewelry and cars to rebut an entrapment defense in a prosecution for firearms offenses. Such evidence was only minimally relevant to a predisposition to sell firearms. In United States v. Moschiano, n17 the Court affirmed convictions for drug-related offenses, holding that evidence of subsequent similar acts could be admitted to prove predisposition in response to an entrapment claim. Here, the Court found that one defendant's attempt to purchase large amounts of Preludin three months after the events leading to heroin charges was relevant to the entrapment defense offered against those charges.

United States v. Thomas, 134 F.3d 975 (9th Cir. 1998) : The defendant claimed that he was entrapped into participation in the charged sale of three pounds of methamphetamine. The government offered as proof of his predisposition that he was a methamphetamine user and that he had at some point in the past sold another participant a couple of single $20 doses of methamphetamine. However, the defendant was not permitted to testify that he had no prior arrest or conviction record and no record of any past criminal behavior suggesting a predisposition to engage in large-scale drug trafficking. Reversing, the Court held that the excluded evidence was relevant to the defendant's intent and was important to counter any prejudicial effect of the evidence of prior small sales. Because the defendant's character is an essential element of the entrapment defense, exclusion of the evidence was an abuse of discretion. One Judge dissented, arguing that an absence of arrests or criminal record is not relevant on the question of predisposition, because it may simply mean he has never been caught. In United States v. Barry, n18 the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence offered in support of an entrapment defense, since even if the evidence could properly be admitted as specific good act evidence, it was hearsay and remote.

United States v. Badolato, 710 F.2d 1509 (11th Cir. 1983) : Where a defendant charged with involvement in cocaine trafficking urged in his opening statement that he was entrapped by government agents, the Court found that a videotape of a meeting between the defendant and government agents in which marijuana was discussed was admissible to show predisposition. See also United States v. Roper n19(other crimes evidence was admissible to rebut an entrapment defense).

[d] Rule 405(b) -- Self-defense -- Victim's Character for Violence

United States v. Smith, 230 F.3d 300 (7th Cir. 2000) : The defendant was charged with retaliating against a witness who had given evidence against him in another proceeding by pushing the witness during a barroom encounter. At trial, the defense was precluded from offering evidence of the witness' prior misdemeanor conviction for domestic battery. Affirming, the Court held that the conviction was probative of the witness' character for violence, thus satisfying Rule 404(a)(2), but that it was evidence of a specific act, rather than reputation or opinion as required by Rule 405(a). The Court held that the victim's character for violence is not an essential element of a self-defense claim, so specific acts evidence is not admissible under Rule 405(b).

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. United States v. Beros, 833 F.2d 455 (3d Cir. 1987) .

(n2)Footnote 2. United States v. Ochoa, 609 F.2d 198 (5th Cir. 1980) .

(n3)Footnote 3. United States v. Jordan, 722 F.2d 353 (7th Cir. 1983) .

(n4)Footnote 4. United States v. Glass, 709 F.2d 669 (11th Cir. 1983) .

(n5)Footnote 5. United States v. Bermudez, 526 F.2d 89 (2d Cir. 1975) .

(n6)Footnote 6. United States v. Alvarez, 860 F.2d 801 (7th Cir. 1988) , adhered to on reh'g, 868 F.2d 201 (7th Cir. 1989) .

(n7)Footnote 7. United States v. Morgan, 554 F.2d 31 (2d Cir. 1977) (see the Editorial Explanatory Comment, § 405.02[12]).

(n8)Footnote 8. United States v. Candelaria-Gonzalez, 547 F.2d 291 (5th Cir. 1977) .

(n9)Footnote 9. United States v. Barta, 888 F.2d 1220 (8th Cir. 1989) .

(n10)Footnote 10. United States v. Primrose, 718 F.2d 1484 (10th Cir. 1983) .

(n11)Footnote 11. United States v. Polsinelli, 649 F.2d 793 (10th Cir. 1981) .

(n12)Footnote 12. United States v. Curtis, 644 F.2d 263 (3d Cir. 1981) .

(n13)Footnote 13. United States v. Kills Ree, 691 F.2d 412 (8th Cir. 1982) .

(n14)Footnote 14. United States v. Talamante, 981 F.2d 1153 (10th Cir. 1992) .

(n15)Footnote 15. United States v. Williams, 705 F.2d 603 (2d Cir. 1983) .

(n16)Footnote 16. United States v. Parrish, 736 F.2d 152 (5th Cir. 1984) .

(n17)Footnote 17. United States v. Moschiano, 695 F.2d 236 (7th Cir. 1982) .

(n18)Footnote 18. United States v. Barry, 814 F.2d 1400 (9th Cir. 1987) .

(n19)Footnote 19. United States v. Roper, 874 F.2d 782 (11th Cir. 1989) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 405 RULE 405

2-405 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 405.04

405.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Advisory Committee's Note

The rule deals only with allowable methods of proving character, not with the admissibility of character evidence, which is covered in Rule 404.

Of the three methods of proving character provided by the rule, evidence of specific instances of conduct is the most convincing. At the same time it possesses the greatest capacity to arouse prejudice, to confuse, to surprise, and to consume time. Consequently the rule confines the use of evidence of this kind to cases in which character is, in the strict sense, in issue and hence deserving of a searching inquiry. When character is used circumstantially and hence occupies a lesser status in the case, proof may be only by reputation and opinion. These latter methods are also available when character is in issue. This treatment is, with respect to specific instances of conduct and reputation, conventional contemporary common law doctrine. McCormick § 153.

In recognizing opinion as a means of proving character, the rule departs from usual contemporary practice in favor of that of an earlier day. See 7 Wigmore § 1986, pointing out that the earlier practice permitted opinion and arguing strongly for evidence based on personal knowledge and belief as contrasted with "the secondhand, irresponsible product of multiplied guesses and gossip which we term 'reputation.' " It seems likely that the persistence of reputation evidence is due to its largely being opinion in disguise. Traditionally character has been regarded primarily in moral overtones of good and bad: chaste, peaceable, truthful, honest. Nevertheless, on occasion nonmoral considerations crop up, as in the case of the incompetent driver, and this seems bound to happen increasingly. If character is defined as the kind of person one is, then account must be taken of varying ways of arriving at the estimate. These may range from the opinion of the employer who has found the man honest to the opinion of the psychiatrist based upon examination and testing. No effective dividing line exists between character and mental capacity, and the latter traditionally has been provable by opinion.

According to the great majority of cases, on cross-examination inquiry is allowable as to whether the reputation witness has heard of particular instances of conduct pertinent to the trait in question. Michelson v. United States, 335 U.S. 469, 69 S. Ct. 213, 93 L. Ed. 168 (1948) ; Annot., 47 A.L.R.2d 1258 . The theory is that, since the reputation witness relates what he has heard, the inquiry tends to shed light on the accuracy of his hearing and reporting. Accordingly, the opinion witness would be asked whether he knew, as well as whether he had heard. The fact is, of course, that these distinctions are of slight if any practical significance, and the second sentence of subdivision (a) eliminates them as a factor in formulating questions. This recognition of the propriety of inquiring into specific instances of conduct does not circumscribe inquiry otherwise into the bases of opinion and reputation testimony.

The express allowance of inquiry into specific instances of conduct on cross-examination in subdivision (a) and the express allowance of it as part of a case-in-chief when character is actually in issue in subdivision (b) contemplate that testimony of specific instances is not generally permissible on the direct examination of an ordinary opinion witness to character. Similarly as to witnesses to the character of witnesses under Rule 608(b). Opinion testimony on direct in these situations ought in general to correspond to reputation testimony as now given, i.e., be confined to the nature and extent of observation and acquaintance upon which the opinion is based. See Rule 701.

[2] 1987 Amendment Committee Note

1987 Amendment Committee Note

[The entire Advisory Committee Note accompanying the gender-neutralizing changes effective October 1, 1987 is as follows: "The amendment is technical. No substantive change is intended."]

[3] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

June 28, 1973

The Subcommittee approved subdivision (b) as proposed by the Court, with the specific understanding that the Rule applies only in those relatively rare situations where character is truly an issue in the case.

October 10, 1973

The Court's version of subdivision (a) had proposed to change existing law by allowing evidence of character in the form of opinion as well as reputation testimony. Predicated in part on the view that wholesale allowance of opinion testimony might tend to turn a trial into a swearing contest between conflicting character witnesses the Subcommittee decided to delete from this Rule, as well as from Rule 608, reference to opinion testimony.

[Editor's Note: This deletion was subsequently reinstated in the Rule as ultimately passed].

[4] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

Rule 405(a) as submitted proposed to change existing law by allowing evidence of character in the form of opinion as well as reputation testimony. Fearing, among other reasons, that wholesale allowance of opinion testimony might tend to turn a trial into a swearing contest between conflicting character witnesses, the Committee decided to delete from this Rule, as well as from Rule 608(a) which involves a related problem, reference to opinion testimony. [Editor's Note: This deletion was subsequently reinstated in the Rule as ultimately passed].

[5] Report of the House and Senate Conferees

The Senate makes two language changes in the nature of conforming amendments. The Conference adopts the Senate amendments.

[6] Citations to Hearings and Debates

Letter from Edward W. Cleary to Herbert E. Hoffman, April 13, 1973, in Supp. to Hearings on Proposed Rules of Evidence Before the Subcomm. on Criminal Justice of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 1st Sess., at 21-22 (1973).

Letter from Edward W. Cleary to Herbert E. Hoffman, April 17, 1973, and accompanying material, in Supp. to Hearings on Proposed Rules of Evidence Before the Subcomm. on Criminal Justice of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 1st Sess., at 40-41 (1973).

Debate in the House of Representatives, 120 Cong. Rec. H546--H549 (daily ed. February 6, 1974).

Letter from W. Vincent Rakestraw to Hon. James O. Eastland, June 14, 1974, in Hearings on H.R. 5463 (Federal Rules of Evidence) Before the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 2d Sess., at 121, 123-24, 126 (1974).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
Supp. To CHAPTER 405 RULE 405

2-405 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 405, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 405. Methods of Proving Character	Rule 405. Methods of Proving Character
(a) Reputation or opinion. In all cases in which	(a) By Reputation or Opinion. When evidence evidence of character or a trait of character of a person is admissible, proof may be made by testimony as to reputation or by testimony in the form of an opinion. On cross-examination, inquir of a person's character or character trait is admissible, it may be proved by testimony about the person's reputation or by testimony in the form of an opinion. On cross-examination of the char

	y is allowable into relevant specific instances of conduct.		acter witness, the court may allow an inquiry into relevant specific instances of the person's conduct.
(b)	Specific instances of conduct. In cases in which character or a trait of character of a per-	(b)	By Specific Instances of Conduct. When a person's character or character trait is an es-son is an es-sen-tial ele-men t of a char ge, clai m, or de-fens e, proo f may also be mad e of spe-cific in-stan ces of that per-son's con-duct.	sen-tial ele-men t of a char ge, clai m, or de-fens e, the char acter or trait may also be prov ed by rel-evan t spe-cific in-stan ces of the per-son's con-duct.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 405 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
Supp. To CHAPTER 405 RULE 405

2-405 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 405.03

Supp. to § 405.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[1] Rule 405(a) -- Reputation or Opinion [Go To Main]

[c] Rule 405(a) -- Cross-Examination

[i] Rule 405(a) -- Generally

United States v. Bah, 574 F.3d 106 (2d Cir. 2009) : In a prosecution for operating an unlicensed money transmitting business, a witness, who had testified to the defendant's reputation for truthfulness in the community, was asked about a letter in which a former customer had accused the defendant of fraud. The witness responded that he was unaware of the accusation and that it did not impact his view of the defendant or his reputation. Although it reversed the conviction for improper jury instructions, the Court held that the cross-examination of the character witness was not an abuse of discretion, given "the 'substantial latitude' afforded the government to rebut character witness testimony offered by the defense."

United States v. Kellogg, 510 F.3d 188 (3d Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a mail fraud conviction against the owner of an environmental laboratory who falsely certified that certain tests had been conducted. It found no abuse of discretion when a defense character witness was asked whether he had any knowledge about the way the defendant ran his lab, as the question simply allowed the prosecution to test the foundation for the witness' opinion that the defendant was a law-abiding citizen.

United States v. Ndiaye, 434 F.3d 1270 (11th Cir. 2006) : In a prosecution for immigration offenses and Social Security fraud, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to allow cross-examination of a defendant's character witnesses regarding a letter that the defendant sent to a female neighbor requesting a "get-together" while their respective spouses were at work. Some of the circumstances surrounding the letter were unknown and, while the letter did perhaps suggest that the defendant was not being entirely candid with his wife, it did not directly relate to his truthfulness and honesty.

[ii] Rule 405(a) -- Cross-Examination -- Good Faith Basis

United States v. Matthews, 440 F.3d 818 (6th Cir. 2006): Affirming drug and firearm convictions, the Court found no error when the government was permitted to ask a character witness whether she was aware of the defendant's drug activities in 1995 and 1997. There was no need for the Trial Judge to conduct an independent voir dire as to whether the prior sales occurred, because the issue of the defendant's drug activity had been fully explored in pretrial proceedings relating to Rule 404(b) issues.

[iii] Rule 405(a) -- Cross-Examination -- Guilt-Assuming Hypotheticals

United States v. Kellogg, 510 F.3d 188 (3d Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a mail fraud conviction against the owner of an environmental laboratory who falsely certified that certain tests had been conducted. It found no abuse of discretion when a defense character witness was asked whether his opinion that the defendant was a law-abiding citizen would different if he knew that lab reports misstated the analytical tests used. The Court noted that a guilt-assuming hypothetical is irrelevant in testing a character witness' reputation testimony, but for opinion testimony "[s]uch evidence may aid in the jury's ultimate credibility determinations and in deciding how much weight to give to a defendant's character evidence." While such a question "may prove problematic if it arises in circumstances that implicate the presumption of innocence or otherwise undermine due process, ... there is nothing inherent in guilt-assuming hypotheticals, in the abstract, that makes them unfairly prejudicial, let alone so prejudicial as to constitute a per se violation of due process." One Judge thought that the particular question asked was not sufficiently hypothetical.

United States v. Parker, 553 F.3d 1309 (10th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to sell unsafe airplane engines with false documentation, finding no abuse of discretion when a defense character witness was asked on cross-examination if it would change his opinion of the defendant "if you found out he had been selling aircraft engines ... that were unairworthy," since the questions "did not assume Parker was 'convicted of the crimes alleged in his case.' "

[v] Rule 405(a) -- Cross-Examination -- Reputation and Opinion Witnesses Distinguished

United States v. Reich, 479 F.3d 179 (2d Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed convictions for obstruction of justice and related offenses, finding no abuse of discretion when the prosecution was permitted to ask the defendant's character witness if his opinion would change if the defendant changed the beneficiary of a life insurance policy in violation of a partnership agreement. The Court rejected the defense argument that this question was improper because the change to the insurance policy was a private matter and it would be unlikely that any character witness would know about it, reasoning that the witness testified both to opinion and reputation, and "because the question to which Reich objects was directed at least in part to his opinion testimony, it was proper regardless of whether it was generally known in the community."

[e.1] Rule 405(a) -- Fact Witness Treated as Character Witness

United States v. Matthews, 440 F.3d 818 (6th Cir. 2006) : Affirming drug and firearm convictions, the Court found no error when the defendant's first witness was treated as a character witness, after she testified on direct examination that "he's a good person, and ... I've never known him to anything to get in trouble or anything like that or to do any illegal activities," and "I don't believe the charges that are against him."

[k] Rule 405(a) -- Victim's Character

United States v. Jackson, 549 F.3d 963 (5th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed the conviction and death sentence of a federal prisoner charged with killing a fellow inmate, finding no abuse of discretion when evidence of the victim's prison disciplinary records, proffered in support of a self-defense claim, were excluded. The specific acts could not be admitted to prove that the victim was the first aggressor, because to do so would violate the ban on specific acts to prove character. There was extensive testimony as to the victim's reputation for violence in the prison community, but specific act testimony was properly excluded in the absence of a showing that the acts were known by the defendant and therefore admissible for the non-character purpose of proving the reasonableness of the defendant's belief that the victim was a violent person.

United States v. Seymour, 468 F.3d 378 (6th Cir. 2006) : The defendant was convicted for sexual abuse of his sister-in-law and his niece. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony by the defendant's friend that he had seen the adult victim and the defendant hugging and kissing two years after the alleged sexual assault. The defendant argued that the testimony was admissible under Rule 405, but the Court found that it was specific act evidence in a case in which the victim's character was not an essential element of a charge or defense.

United States v. Visinaiz, 428 F.3d 1300 (10th Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a conviction for murder, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence, offered to prove the victim was the first aggressor, that the victim had a history of driving under the influence and had a high blood alcohol content when involved in an automobile accident. This was improper character evidence in the form of specific instances of conduct, instead of permissible reputation or opinion evidence.

[2] Rule 405(b) -- Specific Instances of Conduct [Go To Main]

[b] Rule 405(b) -- Defamation

World Wide Ass'n of Specialty Programs v. PURE, 450 F.3d 1132 (10th Cir. 2006) : An association of treatment programs for troubled teenagers sued a rival organization and other individuals for sending defamatory e-mails to potential customers. Affirming a judgment for the defendants, the Court found no error in the admission of various media reports that were critical of the plaintiff and that related horror stories from teenagers who had been mistreated while attending programs sponsored by the plaintiff. The plaintiff argued that this was inadmissible evidence of "specific instances of conduct," but the Court reasoned that character is an essential element of the claim in a defamation action, and Rule 405 permits the admission of specific acts when character is an essential element of the case.

[c] Rule 405(b) -- Entrapment

United States v. Franco, 484 F.3d 347 (6th Cir. 2007) : Affirming a conviction for cocaine possession, the Court noted that when the defendant raised an entrapment defense he placed his character in issue, making specific instances of his conduct admissible. Because evidence of his prior drug trafficking crimes was thus admissible under Rules 404(a) and 405(b) rather than Rule 404(b), the government was not required to provide notice of its intention to introduce the evidence.

[d] Rule 405(b) -- Self-defense -- Victim's Character for Violence

United States v. Bordeaux, 570 F.3d 1041 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for assault with a dangerous weapon, finding no abuse of discretion when the defendant was permitted to testify in support of a claim of self-defense about numerous acts by a victim of which he was aware, because these acts were not admitted to prove the victim's character. The defendant was also properly precluded from testifying to other acts by the victim of which he was unaware, because those acts were offered to prove the victim's violent character and therefore were barred by Rule 405(b), which prohibits using specific acts to prove character when character is not in issue. In United States v. Gregg, 451 F.3d 930 (8th Cir. 2006) , the Court affirmed convictions arising from a murder on an Indian reservation, finding no error in the exclusion of evidence of specific acts of violence committed by the victim on other occasions, which the defendant sought to admit to prove the victim's propensity for violence. A victim's character trait for violence "is not an essential element of a claim of self-defense," and where character evidence is used only circumstantially, Rule 405 prohibits proof through specific acts.

[i] Rule 405(b) -- Specific Good Acts

United States v. Ellisor, 522 F.3d 1255 (11th Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed a mail fraud conviction arising from the defendant's soliciting funds for a Christmas extravaganza in Miami that never occurred. It found no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence offered by the defendant that he had produced other shows over a ten-year period. The evidence of good conduct on other occasions did not bear on his intent with respect to the charged incident, and was inadmissible even though the government had introduced bad acts evidence in proving his fraudulent intent.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 406 RULE 406

2-406 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 406.syn

§ 406.syn Synopsis to Chapter 406: RULE 406

406.01 Official Text

406.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Rule and Rationale

[2] Character Distinguished

[3] Routine Organizational Practice

[4] Eyewitnesses and Corroboration

[5] Proof of Habit

[6] Relationship to Other Rules

406.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Custom or Practice of a Particular Organization

[2] Customs of an Industry or Business

[3] Distinction Between Habit and Character Evidence

[4] Habits of Individuals

[a] Drinking

[b] Habits of Individuals -- Financial Matters

[c] Habits of Individuals -- Seatbelt Use

[d] Habits of Individuals -- Similarity To Conduct At Issue

[e] Habits of Individuals -- Use of Force or Coercion

[5] Proof of Habit

[a] Miscellaneous Cases

[b] Proof of Habit -- Sufficient Number of Instances

[c] Proof of Habit -- Uniform Response

406.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

[2] Excerpt from "Advisory Committee Notes to the Federal Rules of Evidence That May Require Clarification," by Daniel Capra, 182 F.R.D. 268, 274 (1999)

[3] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

[4] Citations to Hearing and Debates

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 406 RULE 406

2-406 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 406.01

406.01 Official Text

Rule 406. Habit; Routine Practice

Evidence of the habit of a person or of the routine practice of an organization, whether corroborated or not and regardless of the presence of eyewitnesses, is relevant to prove that the conduct of the person or organization on a particular occasion was in conformity with the habit or routine practice.

116 of 184 DOCUMENTS

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 406 RULE 406

2-406 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 406.02

406.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Rule and Rationale

As discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment to Rule 404, § 404.02[2], character evidence is ordinarily inadmissible when offered to prove the conduct of a person on a particular occasion. In contrast, Rule 406 provides that evidence of a habit of a person is ordinarily admissible to prove that the conduct of the person on a particular occasion was in conformity with the habit. The Rule also provides admissibility for "organizational" practice: evidence of the routine practice of a business organization is admissible to show that the organization acted on a particular occasion in conformity with its routine practice. n1

Habit evidence is treated differently from character evidence because of its greater probative value. It is not always, or even often, the case that a person acts in accordance with a character trait. Violent people, for example, do not act violently on every conceivable occasion. In contrast, a habit by definition is conduct that is consistent, automatic, and specific. If a person acts habitually in a certain specific situation, and the question in the case is how that person acted in the specific situation, there is a pretty high likelihood that that person acted in that situation as he always did. n2 If a person has a habit of wearing a seatbelt, for example, this is much more probative evidence of the person wearing a seatbelt on a certain occasion than is evidence that the person is generally a safety-oriented person. n3

[2] Character Distinguished

Courts have generally proceeded cautiously in permitting the admission of a pattern of conduct as habit, "because it necessarily engenders the very real possibility that such evidence will be used to establish a party's propensity to act in conformity with its general character, thereby thwarting Rule 404's prohibition against the use of character evidence except for narrowly prescribed purposes." n4 That is, Courts are concerned that the rule admitting evidence as habit will swallow the rule that excludes character evidence. n5

Although it is difficult to delineate the difference between character and habit, n6 generally it may be said that the more particular and the more regular the performance of an act, the more likely it is to be regarded as habit. In other words, the easier it is to describe with particularity what it is that someone does and the more routine the action, the more likely a Court is to hold the activity to be a habit. Another factor is the degree of volition required for the activity; the more thought and planning required for the act, the less likely it will be found to be a habit; the more reflexive and automatic the conduct, the more likely it will be found to be habit. n7

One Court has stated the test for habit as follows: "To offer evidence of a habit, a party must at least demonstrate a regular practice of meeting a particular kind of situation with a specific type of response." n8 Another Court has added that "habit refers to the type of non-volitional activity that occurs with invariable regularity. It is the non-volitional character of habit evidence that makes it probative." n9 Thus, activity that is extremely complicated is unlikely to be considered habit, since such activity would ordinarily be dependent on a significant thought process, and a number of contingencies, and all of this is inconsistent with the notion of habit as reflexive and automatic. n10 Also, activity that is dependent on cooperation from other individuals, or that is dependent on a number of instrumentalities, is unlikely to be considered as habit, because the circumstances will ordinarily be subject to too much variation. n11

[3] Routine Organizational Practice

With respect to a business or other type of organization, greater emphasis is placed on the routine nature of the activity than on its particularity. The problem of drawing a line between general and specific qualities that arises with natural persons is not present when it comes to structured organizations. Because the line between habit and character is not so problematic with respect to organizations, Courts admit routine organizational practice more liberally, noting that there is significant probative value in the routinized aspects of organizational activity. n12 However, in order to invoke the more liberal admissibility requirements attendant to organizational activity, the proponent must at least show that the activity is that of a structured organization; a loose-knit, ad hoc alliance of individuals does not give rise to the same inference of consistent, routinized activity. n13

[4] Eyewitnesses and Corroboration

Note that habit evidence is admissible even though there may be eyewitnesses to the event sought to be proved. So for example, if the question is whether the defendant was negligent in a car accident for failing to signal a turn, evidence that the defendant had a habit of using a turn signal is admissible even if there are eyewitnesses to the accident. This reflects the drafters' view that habit can indeed be highly probative evidence, and that it is not some second-rate or last alternative means of proving conduct. In fact, since habit evidence need not be corroborated, the Rule recognizes that in some cases it may be decisive. n14

[5] Proof of Habit

The draft of Rule 406 prepared by the Advisory Committee and approved by the Supreme Court provided that habit or routine practice could be proved by testimony in the form of an opinion or by specific instances of conduct sufficient in number to warrant a finding that a habit existed or that a practice was routine. This provision was, however, deleted in the Congress. Apparently, Congress wished to allow Courts to develop and consider methods of proof on a case-by-case basis. One would suspect that the best proof of a habit is that someone acted in a particular way at specific and frequent instances, and also that the person did not act otherwise at other similar instances. n15 Probably the best testimony will be by a witness who has personal knowledge of the conduct of the relevant actor on numerous separate occasions.

Whatever the mode of proof, the touchstone of admissibility is to provide an "adequacy of sampling and uniformity of response" in specific circumstances. n16 The burden of proving that conduct is a habit is placed on the proponent of the evidence. n17 So if only a few instances are shown, and the conduct has occurred over the course of a long period of time, it is unlikely that sufficient evidence of habit will be found; and this is especially so if the instances of conduct are not exactly identical in detail. n18 Conversely, habit is more likely to be found if the proponent can provide multiple instances of specific, identical conduct over a relatively short period of time.

[6] Relationship to Other Rules

Because character evidence is generally excluded when offered to prove conduct, and habit evidence is admitted, Judges will probably want to ensure that they are indeed dealing with a habit and not general character before permitting any evidence to be introduced. It is likely, therefore, that a Judge will look to Rule 104 and decide to make a preliminary determination that a habit exists before permitting the evidence to be introduced.

Rule 403 should be kept in mind by the conscientious Trial Judge when evaluating habit evidence. n19 When the habit to be proved is likely to be used by a jury as an indication of moral worth, the Judge may exclude proof of habit if its value in the case is substantially outweighed by its potential to distort the jury's factfinding function. In drawing the line between character and habit, it may be wise for the Judge to make the difficult, but useful, attempt to establish a sliding scale for conduct evidence, with totally neutral evidence at one end and highly charged evidence at the other. Evidence falling close to the former may be deemed habit in close cases, and evidence falling close to the latter should be treated as character evidence in close cases.

In attempting to authenticate evidence, the careful lawyer will notice the relationship that potentially exists between Rule 406 and Rule 901(b)(4). One of the ways that evidence can be authenticated is to show that a particular person or organization habitually produces similar evidence. For example, in a case in which a particular document inadvertently has been removed from its place in an organization's records, authentication might be accomplished by showing that the business routinely records certain information, that the information usually recorded is of the same type that appears in the questioned document, and that the record that would usually exist is missing. The routine practice evidence might be enough to get the document before the trier of fact.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. See, e.g., Hall v. Arthur, 141 F.3d 844 (8th Cir. 1998) (action against a doctor and hospital alleging improperly performed operation; evidence that other patients did not receive warnings concerning the danger of the operation was properly admitted as the routine practice of the organization); Mobil Exploration & Producing U.S., Inc. v. Cajun Constr. Servs., 45 F.3d 96 (5th Cir. 1995) (complaint about short-loading of limestone; where the plaintiff provided invoices of over 3400 loads of limestone shipped by the supplier, and demonstrated that "Cajun invariably loaded its trucks in the same manner and to the same level when Cajun obtained limestone from a third-party supplier," this was sufficient evidence of routine organizational practice to be admitted under Rule 406).

(n2)Footnote 2. See Jones v. Southern Pac. R.R., 962 F.2d 447, 449 (5th Cir. 1992) ("Habit evidence is superior to character evidence because the uniformity of one's response to habit is far greater than the consistency with which one's conduct conforms to character.").

(n3)Footnote 3. See Babcock v. General Motors Corp., 299 F.3d 60 (1st Cir. 2002) (evidence that a decedent always wore his seatbelt was properly admitted as habit evidence to prove that the decedent was wearing a seatbelt at the time of the accident in question).

(n4)Footnote 4. Simplex, Inc. v. Diversified Energy Sys., 847 F.2d 1290, 1293 (7th Cir. 1988) .

(n5)Footnote 5. See, e.g., United States v. Mascio, 774 F.2d 219 (7th Cir. 1985) (there is no such thing as a habit of committing insurance fraud, because evidence of such "habits" "would be identical to the kind of evidence that is the target of the general rule against character evidence").

(n6)Footnote 6. See, e.g., Perrin v. Anderson, 784 F.2d 1040 (10th Cir. 1986) ("Character and habit are closely akin."). In Perrin, the Court held there was no error in a finding that the plaintiff's previously violent encounters with police officers evidenced a habit, rather than a character trait for violence.

(n7)Footnote 7. See United States v. Angwin, 271 F.3d 786 (9th Cir. 2001) (proof that the defendant routinely took the least confrontational course in dangerous situations "was not sufficiently reflexive and specific to constitute habit evidence"); Becker v. ARCO Chem. Co., 207 F.3d 176 (3d Cir. 2000) (the fabrication of reasons to justify the dismissal of employees is not the sort of automatic, non-volitional, situation-specific conduct admitted as habit under Rule 406).

(n8)Footnote 8. Jones v. Southern Pac. R.R., 962 F.2d 447, 449 (5th Cir. 1992) .

(n9)Footnote 9. Weil v. Seltzer, 873 F.2d 1453, 1460 (D.C. Cir. 1989) . See also United States v. Rangel-Arreola, 991 F.2d 1519 (10th Cir. 1993) (the defendant was a trucker; a large amount of marijuana was found in his fuel tank; he objected to exclusion of evidence that it was common practice for truck drivers to accept jobs without checking the fuel tanks; the Court holds that the common practice did not constitute habit, because the behavior of truck drivers upon the acceptance of a job is volitional and "not of the reflexive nature or consistency required" to constitute habit).

(n10)Footnote 10. See, e.g., United States v. Troutman, 814 F.2d 1428 (10th Cir. 1987) (evidence of past official conduct was not admissible as habit because "extortion or refraining from extortion is not a semi-automatic act and does not constitute habit"); Weil v. Seltzer, 873 F.2d 1453 (D.C. Cir. 1989) (testimony that the defendant doctor had prescribed steroids to other patients held not admissible as habit because it is "not of the non-volitional, habitual type that ensures its probative value").

(n11)Footnote 11. See, e.g., Halloran v. Virginia Chemicals Inc., 41 N.Y.2d 386, 393 N.Y.S.2d 341 (1977) ("On no view ... can conduct involving not only oneself but particularly other persons or independently controlled instrumentalities produce a regular usage because of the likely variation of the circumstances in which such conduct will be indulged."). In Halloran, the plaintiff, a car mechanic, was injured when a can of freon exploded while he was servicing an automobile's air conditioning unit. The Court in Halloran held that evidence of the plaintiff's "usual practice" of using an immersion coil to heat the water in which he then placed the freon was admissible as habit evidence, to show that the plaintiff followed this (dangerous) practice on the day he was injured. The Court noted that the plaintiff was in "complete control" of the circumstances attendant to the act.

(n12)Footnote 12. See, e.g., Rosenburg v. Lincoln Am. Life Ins. Co., 883 F.2d 1328 (7th Cir. 1989) (evidence that an insurance company waived certain standard conditions when issuing a policy was admissible as evidence of routine practice); Garvey v. Dickinson College, 763 F. Supp. 799 (M.D. Pa. 1991) (in a Title VII action, evidence of a college's routine procedures for screening faculty applicants, processing applications, and reviewing candidates for tenure were was admissible under Rule 406).

(n13)Footnote 13. See, e.g., United States v. Rangel-Arreola, 991 F.2d 1519 (10th Cir. 1993) (defendant was a trucker who was found with a large amount of marijuana in the fuel tank of the truck he was driving; he objected to exclusion of evidence that it was common practice for truck drivers to accept jobs without checking the fuel tanks; the Court holds that Rule 406 was not applicable because a loose-knit group such as freelance truck drivers did not form a cohesive organization with a structure and routinized practice).

(n14)Footnote 14. See, e.g., Loughan v. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., 749 F.2d 1519, 1523 (11th Cir. 1985) ("Evidence of habit or routine is to be weighed and considered by the trier of fact in the same manner as any other type of direct or circumstantial evidence.").

(n15)Footnote 15. See, e.g., Simplex, Inc. v. Diversified Energy Sys., 847 F.2d 1290, 1294 (7th Cir. 1988) (the Rule 406 inquiry "necessitates some comparison of the number of instances in which any such conduct occurs with the number in which no such conduct took place"; evidence of late performance of contracts was not admissible under Rule 406 where the proponent made no attempt at "a comparison of the number of late and defectively performed contracts relative to those without such inadequacies"). See also Thompson v. Boggs, 33 F.3d 847 (7th Cir. 1994) (the plaintiff was properly precluded from offering evidence that the defendant had a habit of using excessive force while making arrests; the plaintiff was prepared to show that the defendant acted excessively on a number of occasions, but offered no evidence of the total number of arrests that the defendant had performed; thus, the plaintiff "failed to establish that the requisite regularity is tested by the ratio of reaction to situations"; there was insufficient evidence to prove that "the behavior at issue occurred with sufficient regularity making it more probable than not that it would be carried out in every instance or in most instances").

(n16)Footnote 16. McWhorter v. City of Birmingham, 906 F.2d 674, 679 (11th Cir. 1990) (evidence of harassment did not constitute habit where only a few instances were shown).

(n17)Footnote 17. See, e.g., Weil v. Seltzer, 873 F.2d 1453 (D.C. Cir. 1989) (the fact that evidence of specific instances was uncontradicted was held not dispositive, because "the admissibility of habit evidence under Rule 406 does not hinge on the ability of the party seeking exclusion of the evidence to disprove the habitual character of the evidence. Rather, the burden of establishing the habitual nature of the evidence rests on the proponent of the evidence.").

(n18)Footnote 18. See, e.g., Jones v. Southern Pac. R.R., 962 F.2d 447 (5th Cir. 1992) (in a negligence action arising out of a train accident, the plaintiff offered evidence of prior safety infractions of the conductor; these were not admissible as habit evidence because the plaintiff had not demonstrated a regular practice of meeting a particular kind of situation with a specific type of conduct; the conductor was cited for nine safety infractions over a twenty-nine-year period, and the infractions arose from differing circumstances).

(n19)Footnote 19. See, e.g., United States v. Brechtel, 997 F.2d 1108 (5th Cir. 1993) (evidence of routine business practice properly excluded under Rule 403, where the habit practice was of "tenuous relevance" to the issues, and where "the chain of analogies required to ground relevance of this evidence might well have rendered it confusing to the jury").

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 406 RULE 406

2-406 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 406.03

406.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Custom or Practice of a Particular Organization

Weil v. Seltzer, 873 F.2d 1453 (D.C. Cir. 1989) : Vacating a judgment for the plaintiff in a malpractice suit, the Court held that the plaintiff failed to justify as habit evidence proof that the defendant had prescribed steroids to five other allergy patients while representing the drugs to be something else. The evidence was not of the "nonvolitional, habitual type that assures its probative value."

United States Football League v. National Football League, 842 F.2d 1335 (2d Cir. 1988) : Affirming a judgment awarding $1 to the plaintiff in this antitrust action, the Court held that evidence of three or four antitrust judgments against a defendant over a 20-year period was not admissible as habit evidence. In United States v. Angelilli, n1 the Court discussed the relationship among Rule 404(b) evidence offered to prove a continuing scheme, evidence offered as conspiratorial acts, and habit evidence offered to show conformity to a habit. The Court counseled some caution in jumping from the fact that someone has done similar acts to the conclusion that the person has a habit of doing such acts and concluded that special care is needed to prevent evidence of past practice of some members of an organization from being used to show how others acted at different times. In United States v. General Foods Corp., n2 the FDA brought an action alleging that adulterated food was introduced into interstate commerce by the defendants. The Court held that to refute the allegations the defendants could introduce evidence of routine business practices involving cleanup, sanitation, and maintenance.

Pasack Valley Hospital, Inc. v. Local 464A UFCW Welfare Reimb. Plan, 388 F.3d 393 (3d Cir. 2004): Remanding a removed action to State Court, the Court found that the plaintiff failed to show that a benefits claim had been assigned. A certification by the defendant's director of medical benefits that the defendant had consistently followed the claims and claim review procedures contained in a Summary Plan Description failed to demonstrate that the defendant routinely received assignments prior to payment of claims. Because the certification failed to mention the execution of assignments by plan participants or beneficiaries, there was no proof of a business custom regarding assignments.

Wilson v. Volkswagen of Am., Inc., 561 F.2d 494 (4th Cir. 1977) : Reversing a default judgment that was granted for willful failure to comply with a discovery order, the Court was critical of the Judge's finding that the defendants demonstrated a habit or pattern of conduct designed to avoid discovery. The Court stated that "habit or pattern of conduct is never to be lightly established, and evidence of examples, for purpose of establishing such habit, is to be carefully scrutinized before admission." It also noted that in evaluating the frequency and the number of actions that are alleged to constitute a habit, the Judge must keep in mind that the key criteria are adequacy of sampling and uniformity of response.

United States v. Wilson, 322 F.3d 353 (5th Cir. 2003) : The Court reversed a conviction for money laundering because of insufficient evidence that the Justice Department's Office of International Affairs actually sent an official request for assistance to the Commonwealth of the Bahamas, thereby tolling the statute of limitations. The Court held that the presumption of mailing and receipt upon proof of an office's routine correspondence practices was not satisfied because there was no evidence of consistent procedures or practices at that time. Reversing a judgment for a supplier sued for allegedly "short-loading" deliveries of limestone in Mobil Exploration & Producing U.S., Inc. v. Cajun Constr. Servs., 45 F.3d 96 (5th Cir. 1995) , the Court held it was error to exclude evidence of the supplier's routine practice in loading its trucks. The Trial Judge had reasoned that routine practice evidence must be limited to evidence of practice between the defendant and the plaintiff, but the Court held that the evidence need only establish "regularity over substantially all occasions or with substantially all other parties with whom the defendant has had similar business transactions." In United States v. West, n3 a bankruptcy fraud prosecution, the Court found no error in the exclusion of evidence that in the 1980s it was the routine practice of the FDIC to sell notes held by a failed institution at a discount and that the FDIC routinely allowed parties to purchase their own discounted notes through "straw" purchasers. The evidence proffered to prove the routine practice fell "far short of the adequacy of sampling and uniformity of response which are the controlling considerations governing admissibility" under Rule 406. The Court also held that evidence of FDIC policies, as distinct from routine practice, could not be introduced under Rule 406.

Simplex, Inc. v. Diversified Energy Sys., 847 F.2d 1290 (7th Cir. 1988) : Affirming a judgment for a supplier who sued a purchaser for breach of contract, the Court held that evidence of the supplier's conduct with respect to other contracts was not admissible to prove a routine practice of late deliveries and defective performance. Not only did the Court doubt whether the evidence "approaches the level of specificity to be considered semi-automatic conduct," but it also reasoned that the defendant failed to compare the number of late or defective contract performances with the number of adequate performances. In Rosenburg v. Lincoln Am. Life Ins. Co., n4 the defendant disputed coverage under a group life insurance policy on the ground that 40 percent of the group had not enrolled. The Court held that evidence that defendant's agents had a habit of selling conditional insurance, waiving such conditions, and later asserting them as defenses was admissible as routine practice evidence relevant to whether defendant had waived the conditions.

Hall v. Arthur, 141 F.3d 844 (8th Cir. 1998) : In a suit alleging that a back operation was improperly performed, the Court held that evidence that other patients did not receive warnings concerning the danger of the surgery was admissible as the routine practice of an organization.

Vining v. Enterprise Fin. Group, Inc., 148 F.3d 1206 (10th Cir. 1998) : When the surviving spouse of the insured under a credit life insurance policy made a claim after the insured died of a sudden heart attack, the insurer refused to pay on the ground that the insured's health condition had been misstated. Affirming a judgment for compensatory and punitive damages against the insurer for breach of contract, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting a report prepared by staff of the state insurance department regarding the defendant's business practices. Offered to prove that the defendant engaged in a pervasive, consistent pattern of abusive rescissions, the Court said the report was clearly relevant under Rule 406 on the question of how the defendant acted in this case.

United States v. Sheffield, 992 F.2d 1164 (11th Cir. 1993) : Reversing a conviction for embezzling Air Force property, the Court held that the defendant was wrongly denied his right to introduce evidence that it was the custom of the air base to produce authorized retirement gifts for high-ranking employees. Evidence of the custom was relevant to the defendant's state of mind in ordering the production of certain items. In G.M. Brod & Co. v. U.S. Home Corp., n5 an action by a management company against a condominium developer, the Court held that it was error (but harmless) to admit testimony on behalf of the management company concerning an alleged practice of breaching contracts with small businesses. It found that the number of specific instances, when compared with the thousands of contractual dealings of the developer with small businesses, failed to establish a habit.

[2] Customs of an Industry or Business

United States v. Seelig, 622 F.2d 207 (6th Cir. 1980) : One ground given for reversing pharmacists' convictions for improperly dispensing controlled drugs was that the defendants were erroneously denied an opportunity to offer expert testimony "as to the custom of pharmacists regarding the sales of over-the-counter exempt drugs."

Anderson v. Malloy, 700 F.2d 1208 (8th Cir. 1983) : A rape victim sued the owners and operators of a motel claiming they did not take adequate measures to protect motel guests. The Court reversed a judgment for the defendants, partly because the Trial Judge erred in excluding evidence of the custom and practice of other area hotels and motels.

United States v. Rangel-Arreola, 991 F.2d 1519 (10th Cir. 1993) : The defendant, charged with importing marijuana after it was found in his truck's fuel tanks, sought to support his defense that he had no knowledge of the marijuana by offering evidence that it was common practice for truck drivers to accept jobs without checking the fuel tanks. The Court held the evidence was not admissible under the Rule because it neither showed the defendant's conduct nor that of an organization from which consistent conduct might be inferred. Furthermore, the defendant was not offering to show a regular practice of meeting a particular situation with essentially reflexive behavior.

[3] Distinction Between Habit and Character Evidence

United States v. Yazzie, 188 F.3d 1178 (10th Cir. 1999) : Although the Court reversed murder convictions, it held that the Trial Judge properly excluded testimony that the deceased routinely got into fights in a bar, used drugs, carried a knife, and kept the woman with whom he lived for a year in a "hostage relationship" as inadmissible specific act character evidence. The Judge permitted the defense to introduce evidence of the deceased's reputation for violence and permitted the woman with whom he lived to testify that the deceased routinely picked fights, manipulated and intimidated people, and carried a gun. The Court held that the Judge properly exercised discretion in admitting habit evidence while excluding evidence that did not amount to routine conduct.

[4] Habits of Individuals

[a] Drinking

Reyes v. Missouri P. R. Co., 589 F.2d 791 (5th Cir. 1979) : Reversing a judgment for the defendant in a diversity action for damages suffered by a plaintiff run over by a train, the Court found "that four prior convictions for public intoxication spanning a three and one-half year period are of insufficient regularity to rise to the level of 'habit'

evidence."

Keltner v. Ford Motor Co., 748 F.2d 1265 (8th Cir. 1984) : In an action by a motorist alleging enhancement of injuries following an accident as a result of the doors of his van jamming, the Court sustained a judgment for the manufacturer. It found no error in the admission of testimony concerning the plaintiff's drinking habit -- i.e., he regularly drank a six-pack of beer four nights a week -- especially in view of the fact that there was evidence that the plaintiff smelled of alcohol after the accident and the plaintiff testified that he could not remember if he had been drinking on the night of the accident.

United States v. Pinto, 755 F.2d 150 (10th Cir. 1985) : The Court affirmed a defendant's convictions for burglary and assault with intent to rape. It held that the Trial Judge did not err in excluding evidence concerning four instances of conduct over an eight-year period in which the defendant entered premises uninvited on the ground that it was insufficient to establish a habit of wandering into wrong houses while intoxicated.

Loughan v. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., 749 F.2d 1519 (11th Cir. 1985) : Affirming a manufacturer's judgment in a product liability action brought by a tire mechanic injured when parts of a rim-wheel assembly separated while being remounted, the Court upheld the admission of testimony concerning the mechanic's routine practice of drinking. There was no direct testimony that he had been drinking on the day of the accident, but the Court reasoned that proof of habit may be presented through indirect evidence. The Court stressed that habit and pattern evidence is never to be lightly established and admitted, and that the key criteria are "adequacy of sampling and uniformity of response or ratio of reactions to situations."

[b] Habits of Individuals -- Financial Matters

Utility Control Corp. v. Prince William Constr. Co., 558 F.2d 716 (4th Cir. 1977) : The Court reversed a judgment against a defendant held liable as a guarantor of a contract, on the ground that it was improper to admit evidence that on a previous occasion the person acted as a guarantor for the defendant company.

[c] Habits of Individuals -- Seatbelt Use

Babcock v. General Motors Corp., 299 F.3d 60 (1st Cir. 2002) : The plaintiff's decedent was thrown from a pickup truck in a collision, allegedly because of a defect in the locking mechanism of his seatbelt that permitted it to become unbuckled as soon as pressure was exerted upon it. To prove that the decedent was wearing his seatbelt immediately prior to the impact, the plaintiff presented three witnesses, who all testified that he always wore his seatbelt, regardless of whether he was the driver or a passenger and regardless of the length of the trip. One witness also testified that the decedent always put on his seat belt before the vehicle in which he was riding started. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court found no error in the admission of this habit evidence to prove seatbelt use.

[d] Habits of Individuals -- Similarity To Conduct At Issue

United States v. Angwin, 271 F.3d 786 (9th Cir. 2001) : In a prosecution for transporting illegal aliens, the defendant contended that he acted under duress, transporting the aliens only after they stormed into his motorhome when he had pulled over to walk his dog. The Court held there was no error in excluding evidence regarding the defendant's training in the Coast Guard Auxiliary, which was proffered to show his consistent reaction to taking the least confrontational course in dangerous situations. Indicating that the ruling on habit evidence is highly fact-specific, the Court observed that the Judge had ruled that the training was not sufficiently similar to the conduct on the day of the crime and that the "proffered evidence of his [the defendant's] training was not sufficiently reflexive and specific to constitute habit evidence."

[e] Habits of Individuals -- Use of Force or Coercion

United States v. Callahan, 551 F.2d 733 (6th Cir. 1977) : In a Hobbs Act prosecution charging extortion by a union official from a construction contractor, the defendant was not permitted to cross-examine the government's principal witness about past confrontations with union representatives. The Court reversed the convictions on the ground that the evidence might have established under Rule 406 a routine practice of paying off local unions for the sake of expediency and might have established that there was no fear involved.

United States v. Serrata, 425 F.3d 886 (10th Cir. 2005) : The defendant corrections officers were convicted of civil rights violations for assaulting an inmate. They claimed that he resisted being handcuffed, and offered evidence that he had previously refused to be handcuffed when arrested. Affirming, the Court held that evidence of the inmate's resistance to being handcuffed on three occasions when being arrested was not admissible as habit evidence because it was not a "semi-automatic act" and the number of instances was insufficient to establish the existence of a habit. In Perrin v. Anderson, n6 the Court affirmed a judgment for police officers sued by the estate of a man killed when the officers attempted to obtain information about a traffic accident. It held that testimony by four officers concerning five violent acts by the deceased against police officers was admissible, even though five events would ordinarily not establish a habit. The defendants had made an offer of proof that eight officers would testify as to numerous incidents, and the Trial Judge limited the proof to four witnesses in order to avoid undue prejudice. In United States v. Troutman, n7 the Court affirmed a conviction for conspiracy to commit extortion, finding no error in exclusion of evidence that the defendant had not previously conditioned an award of state business upon the making of political contributions. The Court reasoned that "[e]xtortion or refraining from extortion is not a semi-automatic act and does not constitute habit."

United States v. Holman, 680 F.2d 1340 (11th Cir. 1982) : In a prosecution arising out of marijuana smuggling, one of the defendants testified that his son, a government witness, coerced him into participating. The Court held that the Trial Judge properly excluded evidence that on another occasion the son, while serving as a crew member on a ship, tried to persuade his captain to take marijuana aboard. According to the Court, this was not evidence sufficient to establish a habit on the part of the son to force people to smuggle drugs.

[5] Proof of Habit

[a] Miscellaneous Cases

Thompson v. Boggs, 33 F.3d 847 (7th Cir. 1994) : In an action for damages for use of excessive force, the Court held that the plaintiff was properly precluded from offering evidence that the defendant had a habit of using excessive force while making arrests. The plaintiff had offered affidavits from five other people who had been arrested by the defendant, but three were conclusory as to the use of excessive force, and two concerned factual circumstances different from those involved in the instant case. The proof of habit also failed because the plaintiff offered no evidence of the total number of arrests that the defendant had performed. Thus, the plaintiff "failed to establish that the requisite regularity is tested by the ratio of reaction to situations." The Court concluded that there was insufficient evidence to prove that "the behavior at issue occurred with sufficient regularity making it more probable than not that it would be carried out in every instance or in most instances."

Camfield v. City of Oklahoma City, 248 F.3d 1214 (10th Cir. 2001) : In an action under § 1983 and the Video Privacy Protection Act by a video store customer whose copy of a video was seized by officers conducting a raid to enforce state pornography laws, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding testimony, offered by the plaintiff as habit evidence to bolster his claim that he did not voluntarily surrender his copy of the movie, by five video store clerks and one customer that an officer had told them he was there to seize their copies because a Judge had ruled it contained either obscenity or child pornography. "Announcing the seizure of child pornography upon walking into a video rental store is not a semi-automatic act and could not serve as a basis for habit evidence." Further, it was not clear whether each witness would testify to a separate event, and five incidents is not ordinarily sufficient to establish the existence of a habit.

[b] Proof of Habit -- Sufficient Number of Instances

United States v. Newman, 982 F.2d 665 (1st Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed a conviction of a correctional officer for violating the civil rights of an inmate, holding that the Trial Judge had properly excluded the testimony of another correctional officer concerning how prisoners were handcuffed to cell bars. Although the witness would have testified that he had seen between 75 and 100 inmates handcuffed to certain cell bars, there was no indication as to the total number of instances in which handcuffing took place. Thus, there was no way for the Judge to determine whether the witness was testifying to a virtually invariable practice.

Utility Control Corp. v. Prince William Constr. Co., 558 F.2d 716 (4th Cir. 1977) : The Court reversed a judgment against a defendant held liable as a guarantor of a contract on the ground that it was improper to admit evidence that on a previous occasion the person acted as a guarantor for the defendant company. The Court noted that "[p]roof of something done in [sic] a single occasion is hardly proof of a habit. Particularly is this so when proof is lacking that the occasion on which the habit was supposedly formed and the occasion on which it is claimed that the habit was followed are related or even similar."

Reyes v. Missouri P. R. Co., 589 F.2d 791 (5th Cir. 1979) : Reversing a judgment for the defendant in a diversity action for damages suffered by a plaintiff run over by a train, the Court found "that four prior convictions for public intoxication spanning a three and one-half year period are of insufficient regularity to rise to the level of 'habit' evidence."

Perrin v. Anderson, 784 F.2d 1040 (10th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed a judgment for police officers sued by the estate of a man killed when the officers attempted to obtain information about a traffic accident. It held that testimony by four officers concerning five violent acts by the deceased against police officers was admissible, even though five events would ordinarily not establish a habit. The defendants had made an offer of proof that eight officers would testify as to numerous incidents, and the Trial Judge limited the proof to four witnesses in order to avoid undue prejudice. In United States v. Pinto, n8 the Court affirmed a conviction for burglary and assault with intent to rape. It held that the Trial Judge did not err in excluding evidence concerning four instances of conduct over an eight-year period in which the defendant entered premises uninvited on the ground that it was insufficient to establish a habit of wandering into wrong houses while intoxicated.

G.M. Brod & Co. v. U.S. Home Corp., 759 F.2d 1526 (11th Cir. 1985) : In an action by a management company against a condominium developer, the Court held that it was error (but harmless) to admit testimony on behalf of the management company concerning an alleged practice of breaching contracts with small businesses. It found that the number of specific instances, when compared with the thousands of contractual dealings of the developer with small businesses, failed to establish a habit.

[c] Proof of Habit -- Uniform Response

Becker v. ARCO Chem. Co., 207 F.3d 176 (3d Cir. 2000) : The Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff, who alleged age discrimination in his termination, because the plaintiff had erroneously been permitted to testify regarding the "manner" in which the defendant allegedly had earlier terminated another employee. This testimony could not be admitted as habit evidence. The fabrication of reasons to justify employees' dismissals is not the sort of semi-automatic, situation-specific conduct admitted under Rule 406, and the one other instance was insufficient proof that the defendant's behavior was repetitive.

Jones v. Southern Pac. R.R., 962 F.2d 447 (5th Cir. 1992) : The Court held there was no error in excluding evidence of the defendant's engineer's prior safety infractions in a personal injury action arising out of a truck-train collision, as the evidence, of several incidents over a long career, could hardly be characterized as a habit.

United States v. Angwin, 271 F.3d 786 (9th Cir. 2001) : A defendant charged with smuggling aliens found in his motorhome claimed that they had approached him at a rest stop by the road and that he only picked them up to deliver them to a Border Patrol checkpoint. The defendant offered as habit evidence testimony regarding his training and experience in the Coast Guard Auxiliary, where he was taught to take the least confrontational course of action in potentially dangerous situations. The Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding the evidence, first, because the difference from rescuing distressed boats at sea made his training irrelevant to the context at issue, and second, because the defendant's training was not sufficiently reflexive and specific to constitute habit evidence deciding what to do when approached by a group of men involves a volitional calculation and a deliberate assessment.

Loughan v. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., 749 F.2d 1519 (11th Cir. 1985) : Affirming a manufacturer's judgment in a product liability action brought by a tire mechanic injured when parts of a rim-wheel assembly separated while being remounted, the Court upheld the admission of testimony concerning the mechanic's routine practice of drinking. There was no direct testimony that he had been drinking on the day of the accident, but the Court reasoned that proof of habit may be presented through indirect evidence. The Court stressed that habit and pattern evidence is never to be lightly established and admitted, and that the key criteria are "adequacy of sampling and uniformity of response or ratio of reactions to situations."

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. United States v. Angelilli, 660 F.2d 23 (2d Cir. 1981) .

(n2)Footnote 2. United States v. General Foods Corp., 446 F. Supp. 740 (N.D.N.Y. 1978), aff'd, 491 F.2d 1332 (2d Cir. 1978) .

(n3)Footnote 3. United States v. West, 22 F.3d 586 (5th Cir. 1994) .

(n4)Footnote 4. Rosenburg v. Lincoln Am. Life Ins. Co., 883 F.2d 1328 (7th Cir. 1989) .

(n5)Footnote 5. G.M. Brod & Co. v. U.S. Home Corp., 759 F.2d 1526 (11th Cir. 1985) .

(n6)Footnote 6. Perrin v. Anderson, 784 F.2d 1040 (10th Cir. 1986) .

(n7)Footnote 7. United States v. Troutman, 814 F.2d 1428 (10th Cir. 1987) .

(n8)Footnote 8. United States v. Pinto, 755 F.2d 150 (10th Cir. 1985) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 406 RULE 406

2-406 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 406.04

406.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Advisory Committee's Note

Subdivision (a). [Editor's Note: As proposed by the Advisory Committee, Rule 406 contained two subdivisions; subdivision (b) was deleted by Congress.] An oft-quoted paragraph, McCormick § 162, p. 340, describes habit in terms effectively contrasting it with character.

> Character and habit are close akin. Character is a generalized description of one's disposition, or of one's disposition in respect to a general trait, such as honesty, temperance, or peacefulness. "Habit," in modern usage, both lay and psychological, is more specific. It describes one's regular response to a repeated specific situation. If we speak of character for care, we think of the person's tendency to act prudently in all the varying situations of life, in business, family life, in handling automobiles and in walking across the street. A habit, on the other hand, is the person's regular practice of meeting a particular kind of situation with a specific type of conduct, such as the habit of going down a particular stairway two stairs at a time, or of giving the hand-signal for a left turn, or of alighting from railway cars while they are moving. The doing of the habitual acts may become semi-automatic.

Equivalent behavior on the part of a group is designated "routine practice of an organization" in the rule.

Agreement is general that habit evidence is highly persuasive as proof of conduct on a particular occasion. Again quoting McCormick § 162, p. 341:

> Character may be thought of as the sum of one's habits though doubtless it is more than this. However, unquestionably the uniformity of one's response to habit is far greater than the consistency with which one's conduct conforms to character or disposition. Even though character comes in only exceptionally as evidence of an act, surely any sensible man in investigating whether X did a particular act would be greatly helped in his inquiry by evidence as to whether he was in the habit of doing it.

When disagreement has appeared, its focus has been upon the question what constitutes habit, and the reason for this is readily apparent. The extent to which instances must be multiplied and consistency of behavior maintained in order to rise to the status of habit inevitably gives rise to differences of opinion. Lewan, Rationale of Habit Evidence, 16 Syracuse L. Rev. 39, 49 (1964). While adequacy of sampling and uniformity of response are key factors, precise standards for measuring their sufficiency for evidence purposes cannot be formulated.

The rule is consistent with prevailing views. Much evidence is excluded simply because of failure to achieve the status of habit. Thus, evidence of intemperate "habits" is generally excluded when offered as proof of drunkenness in accident cases, Annot., 46 A.L.R.2d 103 , and evidence of other assaults is inadmissible to prove the instant one in a civil assault action, Annot., 66 A.L.R.2d 806 . In Levin v. United States, 338 F.2d 265, 119 U.S. App. D.C. 156 (1964) , testimony as to the religious "habits" of the accused, offered as tending to prove that he was at home observing the Sabbath rather than out obtaining money through larceny by trick, was held properly excluded:

> It seems apparent to us that an individual's religious practices would not be the type of activities which would lend themselves to the characterization of "invariable regularity." [1 Wigmore 520.] Certainly the very volitional basis of the activity raises serious questions as to its invariable nature and hence its probative value.

Id. at 272 .

These rulings are not inconsistent with the trend towards admitting evidence of business transactions between one of the parties and a third person as tending to prove that he made the same bargain or proposal in the litigated situation. Slough, Relevancy Unraveled, 6 Kan. L. Rev. 38-41 (1957). Nor are they inconsistent with such cases as Whittemore v. Lockheed Aircraft Corp., 65 Cal. App. 2d 737, 151 P.2d 670 (1944) , upholding the admission of evidence that plaintiff's intestate had on four other occasions flown planes from defendant's factory for delivery to his employer airline, offered to prove that he was piloting rather than a guest on a plane which crashed and killed all on board while en route for delivery.

A considerable body of authority has required that evidence of the routine practice of an organization be corroborated as a condition precedent to its admission in evidence. Slough, Relevancy Unraveled, 5 Kan. L. Rev. 404-449 (1957). This requirement is specifically rejected by the rule on the ground that it relates to the sufficiency of the evidence rather than admissibility. A similar position is taken in New Jersey Rule 49. The rule also rejects the requirement of the absence of eyewitnesses, sometimes encountered with respect to admitting habit evidence to prove freedom from contributory negligence in wrongful death cases. For comment critical of the requirements see Frank, J., in Cereste v. New York, N.H. & H.R. Co., 231 F.2d 50 (2d Cir. 1956) , cert. denied, 351 U.S. 951, 76 S. Ct. 848, 100 L. Ed. 1475 , 10 Vand. L. Rev. 447 (1957); McCormick § 162, p. 342. The omission of the requirement from the California Evidence Code is said to have effected its elimination. Comment, California Evidence Code § 1105.

Subdivision (b). [Editor's Note: This subdivision was deleted by Congress.] Permissible methods of proving habit or routine conduct include opinion and specific instances sufficient in number to warrant a finding that the habit or routine practice in fact existed. Opinion evidence must be "rationally based on the perception of the witness" and helpful, under the provisions of Rule 701. Proof by specific instances may be controlled by the overriding provisions of Rule 403 for exclusion on grounds of prejudice, confusion, misleading the jury, or waste of time. Thus the illustrations following A.L.I. Model Code of Evidence Rule 307 suggest the possibility of admitting testimony by W that on numerous occasions he had been with X when X crossed a railroad track and that on each occasion X had first stopped and looked in both directions, but discretion to exclude offers of 10 witnesses, each testifying to a different occasion.

Similar provisions for proof by opinion or specific instances are found in Uniform Rule 50 and Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60-450. New Jersey Rule 50 provides for proof by specific instances but is silent as to opinion. The California Evidence Code is silent as to methods of proving habit, presumably proceeding on the theory that any method is relevant and all relevant evidence is admissible unless otherwise provided. Tentative Recommendation and a Study Relating to the Uniform Rules of Evidence (Art. VI. Extrinsic Policies Affecting Admissibility), Rep., Rec. &

Study, Cal. Law Rev. Comm'n, 620 (1964).

[2] Excerpt from "Advisory Committee Notes to the Federal Rules of Evidence That May Require Clarification," by Daniel Capra, 182 F.R.D. 268, 274 (1999)

Rule 406 -- Habit

Rule 406 provides that evidence of habit is admissible to prove conduct in accordance with the habit. The Advisory Committee Note to Rule 406 refers to a subdivision (b) of the rule governing the permissible methods of proving habit. The note states that habit can be proven only through opinion evidence or by proof of specific instances of conduct.

The problem is that there is no subdivision (b) to Rule 406. Congress believed that the method of proof of habit should be left to the courts on a case-by-case basis. So the Advisory Committee Note should not be relied on as a correct statement of the only possible means of proving habit. For example, habit could potentially be proven through reputation evidence.

[3] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

Rule 406 as submitted to Congress contained a subdivision (b) providing that the method of proof of habit or routine practice could be "in the form of an opinion or by specific instances of conduct sufficient in number to warrant a finding that the habit existed or that the practice was routine." The Committee deleted this subdivision believing that the method of proof of habit and routine practice should be left to the courts to deal with on a case-by-case basis. At the same time, the Committee does not intend that its action be construed as sanctioning a general authorization of opinion evidence in this area.

[4] Citations to Hearing and Debates

Letter from Edward W. Cleary to Herbert E. Hoffman, May 18, 1973, and accompanying material, in Supp. to Hearings on Proposed Rules of Evidence Before the Subcomm. on Criminal Justice of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 1st Sess., at 84-87 (1973).

Letter from Edward W. Cleary to Herbert E. Hoffman, May 29, 1973, in Supp. to Hearings on Proposed Rules of Evidence Before the Subcomm. on Criminal Justice of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 1st Sess., at 96-97 (1973).

Letter from James F. Schaeffer to Hon. William L. Hungate, June 5, 1973, and accompanying material, in Supp. to Hearings on Proposed Rules of Evidence Before the Subcomm. on Criminal Justice of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 1st Sess., at 100-104 (1973).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
Supp. To CHAPTER 406 RULE 406

2-406 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 406, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 406. Habit; Routine Practice	Rule 406. Habit; Routine Practice
Evidence of the habit of a person or of the routine pract	Evidence of a person's habit or an organization's routi ice of an organization, whether corroborated or not and regardless of the presence of eyewitnesses, is relevant to prove that the conduct of the person or organization on a particular ne practice may be admitted to prove that on a particular occasion the person or organization acted in accordance with the habit or routine practice. The court may admit this evidence occasion was in conformity with the habit or routine practice. regardless of whether it is corroborated or whether there was an eyewitness.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 406 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
Supp. To CHAPTER 406 RULE 406

2-406 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 406.03

Supp. to § 406.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[1] Custom or Practice of a Particular Organization [Go To Main]

United States v. Warner, 498 F.3d 666 (7th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed the racketeering conviction of a former Illinois Governor, which arose from his earlier service as Secretary of State and alleged improprieties in awarding leases and contracts for his office. The Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence of rate hikes on leases by other Secretaries of State. It did not amount to routine practice evidence because it was not a regular response to a repeated specific situation.

United States v. Oldbear, 568 F.3d 814 (10th Cir. 2009) : Affirming the conviction of an administrative assistant in tribal offices for embezzling from a tribal emergency assistance program, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony from three witnesses that they also received emergency assistance funds for similar expenses. The witnesses had no personal knowledge whether it was a routine practice of the tribe, as opposed to an improper deviation from tribal policy, to approve such expenditures. By the same token, the three instances known to the witnesses would not be sufficient to demonstrate a habitual pattern.

[4] Habits of Individuals [Go To Main]

[c] Habits of Individuals -- Seatbelt Use

Sims v. Great Am. Life Ins. Co., 469 F.3d 870 (2006) : In an action against a life insurer who refused to pay on the ground that the insured committed suicide, the insurer attempted to prove the decedent's state of mind by showing that he was not wearing a seatbelt (although he habitually did) at the time of his one-car accident. Affirming in part a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to exclude the habit evidence. Because "the very nature of habit evidence is that it is done reflexively," the evidence would be probative on the question whether he failed to buckle up because he was suicidal or because he was intoxicated.

[5] Proof of Habit [Go To Main]

[a] Miscellaneous Cases

Leonard v. Nationwide Mut. Ins. Co., 499 F.3d 419 (5th Cir. 2007) : The Trial Judge ruled in a bench trial that insureds who sued their homeowners' insurer to recover for damage to their residence caused by wind and storm surge from Hurricane Katrina had coverage for some losses, but not others. Although the Court affirmed, it said that "to do so we must work through some erroneous reasoning." It found a clear abuse of discretion in admitting statements made by an insurance agent to five policy holders about the need for additional flood coverage, to prove that the same advice was given to other policyholders. The agent had 1500 customers, so statements made to five of them over the course of a decade "do not remotely qualify or quantify as a habit within the meaning of Rule 406."

[b] Proof of Habit -- Sufficient Number of Instances

United States v. Oldbear, 568 F.3d 814 (10th Cir. 2009) : Affirming the conviction of an administrative assistant in tribal offices for embezzling from a tribal emergency assistance program, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony from three witnesses that they also received emergency assistance funds for similar expenses. The witnesses had no personal knowledge whether it was a routine practice of the tribe, as opposed to an improper deviation from tribal policy, to approve such expenditures. By the same token, the three instances known to the witnesses would not be sufficient to demonstrate a habitual pattern.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 407 RULE 407

2-407 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 407.syn

§ 407.syn Synopsis to Chapter 407: RULE 407

407.01 Official Text

407.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Subsequent Repairs and Remedial Measures

[2] The Social Policy Basis of the Rule

[3] The Relevance Basis of the Rule

[4] Permissible Uses of Evidence of Subsequent Remedial Measures

[5] Issues in Controversy

[6] Product Liability Cases

[7] Permissible Purposes -- Feasibility

[8] Permissible Purposes -- Impeachment

[9] Measures Taken By Parties Not Responsible For the Harm

[10] Pre-accident Remedial Measures

[11] Relationship to Rule 403

[12] Erie Concerns

407.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Admiralty Cases

[2] Antitrust Cases

[3] Control

[4] Disciplinary Proceedings

[5] Discontinued Practice

[6] Employment Discrimination Case

[7] Evidence Not Identified by Date

[8] Feasibility

[9] Impeachment or Rebuttal

[a] Contributory or Comparative Negligence

[b] Impeachment or Rebuttal -- Evidence Admissible or Required To Be Admitted

[c] Impeachment or Rebuttal -- Evidence Excludable or Required To Be Excluded

[d] Impeachment or Rebuttal -- Product Liability Cases

[10] Libel Case

[11] Product Liability Cases

[12] Reference to State Law

[13] Relationship to Rule 403

[14] Remedial Measures Before Accident

[15] Remedial Measures by Plaintiff

[16] Remedial Measures by Third Party

[17] Remedial Measures Ordered Before Accident

[18] Remedial Measures Required by Law

[19] "Remedial Measures" Under the Rule

[20] Safety Policy

407.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

[2] 1997 Amendment Advisory Committee's Note

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 407 RULE 407

2-407 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 407.01

407.01 Official Text

Rule 407. Subsequent Remedial Measures

When, after an injury or harm allegedly caused by an event, measures are taken that, if taken previously, would have made the injury or harm less likely to occur, evidence of the subsequent measures is not admissible to prove negligence, culpable conduct, a defect in a product, a defect in a product's design, or a need for a warning or instruction. This rule does not require the exclusion of evidence of subsequent measures when offered for another purpose, such as proving ownership, control, or feasibility of precautionary measures, if controverted, or impeachment.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 407 RULE 407

2-407 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 407.02

407.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Subsequent Repairs and Remedial Measures

Judges and lawyers are perhaps most familiar with this Rule when it is expressed in the following terms: If someone makes repairs after an accident, those repairs are not admissible against the person making them to prove that person was negligent prior to or at the time of the accident. Rule 407 is written more broadly, however. It provides that any measures that are taken after an injury or harm, which if they had been taken previously would have made the injury or harm less likely to occur, cannot be introduced as evidence to prove negligence or culpable conduct, defective product or design, or failure to warn. This expansion beyond evidence of subsequent repairs covers such evidence as subsequent installation of safety devices, a change in company rules, and discharge of employees. n1 And the Rule obviously covers more than negligence cases.

However, in order to qualify for exclusion under Rule 407, the action taken by the defendant must at least have been a "measure." For example, in Prentiss & Carlisle v. Koehring-Waterous, 972 F.2d 6 (1st Cir. 1992) , the plaintiff was injured when a product manufactured by the defendant caught fire. The defendant sent employees to the site of the accident to investigate. These investigations resulted in reports concerning the cause of the fire. The Court held that the reports were not subject to exclusion under Rule 407, because they did not constitute remedial measures. According to the Court, it "would strain the spirit of the remedial measure prohibition in Rule 407 to extend its shield to evidence contained in post-event tests or reports." A product analysis or postaccident report might lead to the taking of remedial measures; but that does not mean that the report or analysis itself is excluded under the Rule. n2

[2] The Social Policy Basis of the Rule

The principal argument made in favor of the Rule is based in social policy: that without the Rule, remedial measures would not be taken after an injury or harm, for fear that such measures could be used as an admission of fault, culpability, defective design, etc., on the part of the defendant. The conclusion is that the absence of a rule such as Rule 407 would put the public safety at risk. As Judge Posner has put it: "A major purpose of Rule 407 is to promote safety by removing the disincentive to make repairs (or take other safety measures) after an accident that would exist if the accident victim could use those measures as evidence of the defendant's liability." n3 Thus, the Rule is a response to the negative social consequences that would allegedly arise in the absence of an exclusionary rule.

We believe that the articulated social policy does not justify the Rule. First, the policy argument presumes that a person or organization would know that there is no exclusionary rule for subsequent remedial measures in the relevant jurisdiction, and would also know that in the absence of such a rule, a subsequent remedial measure could constitute an admission that could be used at a trial that has not yet begun. Second, even if the informed defendant assumption is correct, a defendant with that kind of knowledge of the rules of evidence would also know that the failure to correct a situation in which an injury occurred could be admissible if another injury were to occur, with far more serious consequences to the defendant. That is, if a remedial action is not undertaken, and another accident occurs, the well-informed defendant would know that there would be a strong case of gross negligence or recklessness, and the possibility of punitive damages. The defendant would balance the relatively contained cost of remedying the condition (use of that evidence against the defendant in the case arising from the past accident) against the potentially dramatic cost of not remedying the condition (use of that evidence against the defendant in all cases arising from future accidents). So a well-informed defendant, even in the absence of a rule such as Rule 407, would be very likely to take corrective measures in order to avoid more serious liability for future accidents. Since the defendant is highly likely to take corrective measures even in the absence of Rule 407, it follows that the social policy argument behind Rule 407 is flawed. If the policy of promoting safety were the only basis for the Rule, then Rule 407 would be nothing more than a windfall for defendants, who would probably take corrective action even in the absence of any exclusionary Rule.

Judge Posner disagrees with this analysis. He argues as follows:

> One might think it not only immoral but reckless for an injurer, having been alerted by the accident to the existence of danger, not to take steps to correct the danger. However, accidents are low-probability events. The probability of another accident may be much smaller than the probability that the victim of the accident that has already occurred will sue the injurer and, if permitted, will make devastating use at trial of any measures that the injurer may have taken since the accident to reduce the danger. n4

We think that most defendants, having become aware of a dangerous condition after an accident, would not be as easily persuaded as Judge Posner that a future accident is a low-probability event. More importantly, even if a future accident is considered unlikely, we think that most defendants would conclude that the risk of substantially higher liability resulting from an uncorrected condition would be too great to bear, should the low-probability event ever come to pass. The defendant must factor in not only the likelihood of injury but the amount of liability should an injury occur. And if the defendant is aware of a dangerous condition but does nothing to correct it, the amount of liability for future injuries is bound to be high. We believe that most defendants would correct a dangerous condition after an injury even if Rule 407 did not exist.

Despite the weakness of the social policy argument, both the Advisory Committee comments and the subsequent cases rely on social policy as the principal rationale for the Rule. This is important to remember, because a subsequent remedial measure may then be admissible in situations where the "no disincentive to repair" rationale is clearly inapplicable. See the discussion of permissible purposes in §§ 407.02[7]-[8].

[3] The Relevance Basis of the Rule

The more persuasive basis for the Rule is that subsequent remedial measures are of marginal relevance in assessing the defendant's liability, and that this marginal relevance is almost always substantially outweighed by the risk of jury confusion created by the introduction of a subsequent remedial measure. n5 The balance so often favors exclusion that it probably makes sense to impose a generalized rule of exclusion rather than to rely initially on a case-by-case approach under Rule 403.

We believe that to understand Rule 407 it is imperative to focus on why a lawyer would want to offer subsequent remedial measures following an event in order to argue that this evidence proves negligence, product defect, defective design, or failure to warn. The only reason is to make an argument something like the following one (in the context of a negligence case):

> Ladies and gentlemen of the jury, you have heard that the defendant in this case actually repaired his (insert property) following the accident. Now what does this mean to you? It must mean that the defendant thought the (insert property) was inadequate in the condition it was in at the time of the accident. Now, I ask you, if it was in need of repair after the accident, what about at the time of the accident? If this defendant indicated by making the repair after the accident that repair was needed, have you any doubt that it was also needed before the accident took place? Well, no repair was made at that time. And I tell you that you are therefore justified in finding the failure to make the repair that was made later before this tragedy occurred to be negligence.

The problem with this argument is that negligence is properly assessed according to what the defendant knew or should have known prior to the accident, not what the defendant knew as a result of the accident. However, it is likely to be difficult for a jury to draw this distinction. The very fact of an accident is likely to influence the jury to think that the repair should have been made earlier. What Rule 407 does is to keep the jury's attention on the defendant's information and conduct at the relevant time -- i.e., prior to the accident. n6

[4] Permissible Uses of Evidence of Subsequent Remedial Measures

The second sentence of the Rule specifically provides that evidence of remedial measures need not be excluded if it is offered for some purpose other than showing negligence, culpability, product defect, design defect, or failure to warn. Permissible purposes include proof of ownership or control, or the feasibility of precautionary measures, where those issues are controverted by the defendant. If, for example, D is driving a vehicle that collides with the car of P, and P brings an action for damages against D, to determine whether evidence of subsequent remedial measures will be admitted it is necessary to look to the purpose for which the evidence is offered. Assume that P contends that D was driving a car with unsafe brakes. If P wants to introduce the fact that after the accident D had the brakes repaired, and the purpose for offering the evidence is to show that prior to the accident D failed to exercise reasonable care to inspect the brakes, the evidence will be excluded. If, however, D defends against P and urges that D had no duty because the car belonged to someone else, P may very well be able to introduce the fact that after the accident it was D who had the brakes repaired in order to show that D had control of the vehicle. If the evidence is admitted, the defendant is entitled upon request to a limiting instruction as to the proper use of the evidence. n7

[5] Issues in Controversy

In cases where a party wants to introduce evidence of subsequent remedial measures ostensibly for a purpose other than those precluded by the Rule, the Judge should make certain that the evidence is offered to prove a point that is actually in controversy. If, for example, control is not controverted, there is no reason to allow evidence to come in on that issue; it is not relevant, because it is cumulative in proving control, and at best its probative value in proving control is substantially outweighed by the risk that the jury will use the evidence impermissibly. n8 Because evidence of subsequent remedial measures might be used by a jury as an admission of liability no matter what sort of limiting instruction the Trial Judge gives, the Judge should attempt to ensure that the purpose for which such evidence is offered is a valid one. This is what the Rule means when it sets forth permissible purposes for evidence of subsequent remedial measures, but only "if controverted." On the other hand, if an issue such as control is truly placed in controversy, then the jury can profit from knowing that repairs were made by the defendant after an accident. There is little danger that the jury will misuse the evidence by focusing on the wrong time period when these issues are raised by the defendant. Moreover, if the defendant places an issue such as control in controversy, it is only fair to allow the plaintiff to respond with whatever relevant evidence is available.

[6] Product Liability Cases

The concept of "product liability" includes many different kinds of actions. It becomes clearer all the time that proving that a design was defective is not much different in many jurisdictions from proving negligence and that design changes made years after a product is sold are not very probative on the state of the earlier art.

Up until 1997, Courts had been divided on whether Rule 407 was applicable to product liability cases. The original Rule 407 prohibited evidence of subsequent remedial measures only if offered to prove "negligence or culpable conduct." Despite the language of the Rule, however, most Courts had held that Rule 407 excluded subsequent remedial measures when offered to prove defective manufacture, defective design, or failure to warn in product liability cases.

Some of these Courts reasoned that the social policy basis of the Rule is as applicable to defendants in product liability cases as it is in negligence cases. Other Courts reasoned that the relevance-based aspects of the Rule are equally applicable to strict liability cases and negligence cases. As the Fifth Circuit stated:

> The real question is whether the product or design was defective at the time the product was sold. The jury's attention should be directed to whether the product was reasonably safe at the time it was manufactured. ... The introduction of evidence about subsequent changes in the product or its design threatens to confuse the jury by diverting its attention from whether the product was defective at the relevant time to what was done later. n9

In a product liability case, if the issue in dispute concerns the design of a product, and if liability is to be measured on the basis of the state of the art when the product was made, there is a danger that introduction of subsequent design changes will confuse the jury with respect to the knowledge they are to require of the defendant, in much the same way that a jury might be confused by subsequent repair evidence in a negligence case. It seems to us that a jury would have difficulty in understanding that what a defendant learned as a result of an accident or from new information in an industry is not probative of whether a product was defective in design when it was made.

In 1997, Rule 407 was amended to specify that subsequent remedial measures are not admissible to prove "a defect in a product, a defect in a product's design, or a need for a warning or instruction."

[7] Permissible Purposes -- Feasibility

Rule 407 by its terms is not applicable if the feasibility of making a suggested change to a product or condition is controverted by the defendant. For example, assume that the plaintiff has been injured by a product and claims that it was defectively designed. Ordinarily, to prove defective design, the plaintiff will have to suggest some alternative design that would have made the product less dangerous. If the defendant claims that the alternative suggested was not feasible -- either because it would have been prohibitively expensive, or that it was not within the state of the art at the time of manufacture -- then feasibility is controverted and the Rule does not prevent the admission of subsequent changes to the product or condition made by the defendant, offered solely to prove feasibility. Of course, the defendant is entitled to a limiting instruction as to the permissible use of the evidence; and in rare cases, the probative value of the subsequent remedial measure as proof of feasibility might be substantially outweighed by the risk of prejudice and confusion, so that the evidence could still be excluded under Rule 403. n10

The feasibility "exception" to Rule 407 is rarely applicable, however, because feasibility is a weak defense if the defendant has in fact made a change to the product or condition after the plaintiff's injury. It is difficult, if not foolhardy, to argue that a suggested change was prohibitively expensive or beyond the state of the art when the change was in fact made after the injury. Consequently, most defendants concede feasibility when subsequent remedial measures have been taken. n11 Such a concession prevents the plaintiff from arguing that feasibility is in controversy, and therefore precludes the use of subsequent remedial measures on that point. n12 The defendant remains free to defend on the ground that the suggested change, while feasible, would not have made the condition significantly safer, or would have resulted in other disadvantages such that the defendant's original conduct was reasonable. As one Court has put it,

"[W]here a defendant argues about the trade-offs involved in taking precautionary measures, it is not placing feasibility in issue." n13

[8] Permissible Purposes -- Impeachment

Impeachment of witnesses is specifically listed as a permissible purpose for admitting subsequent remedial measures. Presumably, the mode of impeachment contemplated is that of contradiction -- the subsequent remedial measure may be relevant to contradict testimony from the defendant's witness, thus making that witness less credible before the jury.

The problem is that almost any testimony given by defense witnesses could be contradicted at least in some minimal way by a subsequent remedial measure. If the defendant's expert testifies that the product was safe, a subsequent remedial measure could be seen as contradicting that testimony. If the defendant is asked on cross-examination whether the defendant thinks that all reasonable safety precautions had been taken at the time of the accident, and answers in the affirmative, then a subsequent remedial measure can be seen as contradicting that testimony.

If "impeachment" means simple contradiction, then the impeachment exception to Rule 407 would threaten to swallow the Rule itself. n14 Accordingly, most Courts have held that a subsequent remedial measure is not admissible for impeachment if it is offered for simple contradiction of a defense witness' testimony. n15 Essentially, the limited probative value of the evidence for impeachment is substantially outweighed by the risk of prejudice and confusion resulting from the possible misuse of the subsequent remedial measure by the jury. If the defense witness simply testifies that a product was safe, a subsequent remedial measure does contradict that testimony, but not very much so -- there could be many reasons, other than a recognition of safety concerns, for the decision to change a product or condition after an accident.

On the other hand, if the defendant's witnesses testify in superlatives -- e.g., "this is the safest product on the market" -- then the evidence of a subsequent remedial measure provides more than simple contradiction. It shows that the witness puffed and exaggerated while on the stand. As such, the remedial measure provides a more direct and probative form of impeachment, which justifies a limited exception to the Rule. n16 Likewise, if defense witnesses testify that the product or condition has not been changed since the accident, then evidence of subsequent remedial measures provides a more direct and probative, and hence a permissible, form of impeachment through contradiction. n17

[9] Measures Taken By Parties Not Responsible For the Harm

Is a subsequent remedial measure excluded by Rule 407 if the action is taken by someone other than the defendant? For example, in Dixon v. International Harvester Co., 754 F.2d 573 (5th Cir. 1985) , the plaintiff was injured while working on a tractor, after an object entered the tractor cab through an open area between the support bar and the dashboard. After the accident, the owner of the tractor added screening and a metal plate to close off this open area of the tractor cab. The plaintiff sued International Harvester, alleging defective design. Harvester sought to exclude the tractor owner's remedial measure, but the Court held that Rule 407 was inapplicable. The Court relied on the policy basis for the Rule, which is "to avoid discouraging defendants from making necessary repairs or changes to products or dangerous conditions." It concluded that since the remedial measure "was made by a non-defendant, Rule 407 does not bar the evidence."

The reasoning of Dixon is questionable insofar as it is based on policy arguments -- because Rule 407 itself is questionable on policy grounds. Even on relevance grounds there is a strong argument can be made that Dixon is wrongly decided. If the probative value of a defendant's own remedial change is generally substantially outweighed by the risk of jury confusion, then this should a fortiori be true with respect to a change by someone who is not responsible for the accident. Also, there is nothing in the language of Rule 407 that distinguishes between measures taken by defendants and nondefendants. The Rule excludes any measure which, if taken, would have made the event less likely to occur, if offered to show negligence, culpability, product defect, defective design, or failure to warn.

Despite these arguments, the Courts have usually held that Rule 407 is inapplicable to changes made by parties who are not responsible for the injury or harm. n18

[10] Pre-accident Remedial Measures

Suppose the plaintiff bought a snowblower in January 2005. Then in November 2005 the defendant changed the design of the snowblower. Then in January 2006 the plaintiff was injured when using the (unmodified) snowblower. The modification would have made the accident less likely to occur. Is the modification excluded under Rule 407 if offered to prove that the initial product was defectively designed?

Before the 1997 amendment to the Rule, the Courts were in dispute as to whether a defendant's pre-injury design change was excluded by Rule 407. The pre-1997 Rule applied to measures taken "after an event" that would have made the event less likely to occur. This created confusion as to whether the relevant "event" was the sale or creation of a product, or rather the accident or injury. Most Courts refused to exclude pre-injury remedial measures under the Rule, arguing that the social policy basis of the Rule was inapplicable to safety measures taken before an injury occurred. The reasoning was that a manufacturer will not be deterred from making safety improvements before an injury has even occurred: if the defendant is concerned about the use of a remedial measure in some hypothetical future case, then it could "limit its liability by recalling the unimproved product."

The 1997 amendment to the Rule limits exclusion to measures taken "after an injury or harm." This clarifies that the Rule applies only to changes made after the occurrence that produced the damages giving rise to the action. Evidence of measures taken by the defendant prior to the "event" causing the plaintiff's "injury or harm" do not fall within the exclusionary scope of Rule 407 even if they occurred after the manufacture or design of the product.

This amendment creates a possible inequity between similarly situated plaintiffs. Suppose that Bill and Ted each buy a lawnmower. Both suffer identical injuries. Bill is injured on June 15, while Ted is injured on June 20. Suppose further that the design of the lawnmower was changed on June 18. According to the Rule as amended, Ted can admit the design change as evidence of defective design, failure to warn, etc., because it precedes his injury, while Bill cannot. This seems inequitable, because the litigation position of Bill and Ted is basically the same. The design change was simply a happenstance unrelated to either accident. Certainly it cannot be argued that the defendant put out a hasty design change in response to Bill's accident; it is unlikely that the defendant even knew about an accident so recent. The probative value of the remedial measure, or the lack thereof, is the same for both litigants.

We realize that the Rule as amended differentiates between pre- and post-injury design changes. We note, however, a Court has the discretion to exclude pre-injury design changes under Rule 403 when they are not probative of defective design or failure to warn; and this should often be the case where the design change is unresponsive to any indication of a problem with the product, or any other indication that the original design is unsafe. n19

[11] Relationship to Rule 403

The Rule does not say that when evidence is offered for a purpose not prohibited by the Rule, it must be admitted. Rather, it says that exclusion is not required if the evidence is offered for a purpose that is not prohibited. In deciding whether or not to admit evidence of remedial measures taken after an injury or harm, the Trial Judge must weigh the probative value of the evidence on the issue for which it is offered against the possibility that the jury will misuse the evidence as an implicit admission of culpability, defective design, etc. n20 As the Advisory Committee note to the 1997 amendment states: "Evidence of subsequent remedial measures that is not barred by Rule 407 may still be subject to exclusion on Rule 403 grounds when the dangers of prejudice or confusion substantially outweigh the probative value of the evidence." n21

It is important for the Trial Court first to assure itself that the issue on which the subsequent remedial evidence is offered is actually in dispute; then it must make a Rule 403 balancing judgment, keeping in mind that the Rule 403 balancing test establishes a strong presumption in favor of admitting probative evidence. As discussed in § 403.02[21], the Trial Court in conducting its balance must consider the prejudicial effect remaining after a limiting instruction is given. In the context of remedial measures, the Court must consider the risk that the jury will use the evidence as proof of negligence, defective design, etc., even though it is instructed not to do so.

[12] Erie Concerns

Most cases in which Rule 407 is applicable are personal injury cases that are brought in Federal Court under the diversity jurisdiction. However, not all states have a rule identical to Rule 407. For example, Hawaii Rule 407 permits subsequent remedial measures in product liability cases. n22 Where the State and Federal rules on subsequent remedial measures are in conflict, which rule should apply?

Whether Rule 407 presents an Erie problem depends to some extent on the basis of the Rule. If the Rule is based on the social policy of not discouraging repairs, then an argument can be made that it is "substantive" under Erie because the Rule would be designed to control primary conduct (the decision whether to improve a product or condition) rather than courtroom procedure. Thus, one Circuit has held that state law should govern in a conflict with Rule 407, on the ground that the Rule is based "on policy considerations rather than relevancy or truthseeking," and that these policy considerations are a fundamental part of the state law of tort liability. n23

As discussed above, however, the social policy basis of the Rule is questionable, and the Rule is more properly justified on relevance grounds. If the Rule is actually relevance-based, then it is undoubtedly procedural in Erie terms. As one Court put it: "Congress's judgment that juries are apt to give too much weight to [subsequent remedial measures] evidence is a procedural judgment, that is, a judgment concerning procedures designed to enhance accuracy or reduce expense in the adjudicative process." n24

Remember that the Federal Rules are "presumptively procedural" after Hanna v. Plumer, 380 U.S. 460, 472 (1965) (finding no Erie violation as to Federal Rules covering "matters which, though falling within the uncertain area between substance and procedure, are rationally capable of classification as either"). At a minimum, there is a sufficient relevancy basis in the Rule to justify it as "procedural" after Hanna. Consequently, most Courts see no Erie violation in applying Rule 407 where a state rule is in conflict. n25 And this is so, for the most part, even in those Courts that remain enamored of the social policy basis for the Rule. Even if the social policy basis is predominant, the relevance basis for the Rule is at least a subsidiary purpose, sufficient to qualify the Rule as procedural after Hanna. n26

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. See, e.g., In re Air Crash Disaster, 86 F.3d 498 (6th Cir. 1996) (memorandum dated two months after a plane crash, recommending to buyers of certain planes that they should perform a takeoff warning system check prior to takeoff, was inadmissible under Rule 407; a "change in policy is a subsequent remedial measure within the meaning of Rule 407"); Specht v. Jensen, 863 F.2d 700 (10th Cir. 1988) (civil rights action for damages resulting from allegedly illegal search; a city press release announcing that disciplinary action would be taken against the offending officer was held properly excluded as evidence of a subsequent remedial measure).

(n2)Footnote 2. See also Dow Chem. Corp. v. Weevil-Cide Co., 897 F.2d 481 (10th Cir. 1990) (internal memorandum of the defendant, concluding that the defendant should remain in a line of business without conducting further product research, could not be excluded as evidence of a subsequent remedial measure, because the report did nothing that would have made the harm less likely to occur: "Remedial measures are those actions taken to remedy any flaws or failures."); Rocky Mt. Helicopters v. Bell Helicopters, 805 F.2d 907 (10th Cir. 1986) :

> It would strain the spirit of the remedial measure prohibition in Rule 407 to extend its shield to > evidence contained in post-event tests or reports. ... [S]uch tests are usually conducted for the purpose of investigating the occurrence to discover what might have gone wrong or right. Remedial measures are those actions taken to remedy any flaws or failures indicated by the test.

(n3)Footnote 3. Flaminio v. Honda Motor Co., 733 F.2d 463, 467 (7th Cir. 1984) .

(n4)Footnote 4. Flaminio v. Honda Motor Co., 733 F.2d at 470 .

(n5)Footnote 5. See, e.g., In re Air Crash Disaster, 86 F.3d 498, 529 (6th Cir. 1996) ("Independent of its effect on safety upgrades by alleged torfeasors, the rule bars a class of evidence that is very poor proof of negligence or defectiveness."); Grenada Steel Indus. v. Alabama Oxygen Co., 695 F.2d 883 (5th Cir. 1983) (in a product liability case, the Court reasoned that "evidence of subsequent repair or change has little relevance to whether the product in question was defective at some previous time," and that such evidence "threatens to confuse the jury by diverting its attention from whether the product was defective at the relevant time to what was done later").

(n6)Footnote 6. See, e.g., Cook v. McDonough Power Equip., Inc., 720 F.2d 829 (5th Cir. 1983) (function of Rule 407 is to "focus the evidence to that most relevant" to proving liability at the time of the accident).

(n7)Footnote 7. See, e.g., Clausen v. SEA-3, Inc., 21 F.3d 1181 (1st Cir. 1994) (subsequent remedial measure was properly admitted because it was probative of which defendant controlled the premises, and the Trial Court instructed the jury as to the limited purpose which the evidence was admitted). See also Pitasi v. Stratton Corp., 968 F.2d 1558 (2d Cir. 1992) (subsequent remedial measures were admissible when offered to rebut the defendant's charges that the plaintiff was contributorily negligent for failing to recognize an open and obvious condition on a ski slope).

(n8)Footnote 8. See, e.g., Hull v. Chevron U.S.A., Inc., 812 F.2d 584 (10th Cir. 1987) (subsequent remedial measure was not admissible to prove the defendant controlled a forklift, where the defendant "acknowledged not only that its employees operated the forklift, but also its responsibility for hiring and firing" the employees who worked the forklift; thus, the proffered evidence "would be either cumulative or trespass inferentially into the Rule 407 prohibited terrain of proof of culpable conduct.").

(n9)Footnote 9. Grenada Steel Indus. v. Alabama Oxygen Co., 695 F.2d 883, 888 (5th Cir. 1983) .

(n10)Footnote 10. Exclusion under Rule 403 in this scenario would be rare because the defendant is affirmatively contesting feasibility, and the plaintiff is simply providing a fair response.

(n11)Footnote 11. See, e.g., Cameron v. Otto Bock Orthopedic Indus. Inc., 43 F.3d 14 (1st Cir. 1994) ("Dear Customer" letters sent out after the plaintiff's accident were properly excluded; the defendant offered to stipulate to the feasibility of providing the information set forth in the letters, so the letters were not admissible to prove feasibility).

(n12)Footnote 12. See, e.g., Mills v. Beech Aircraft Corp., 886 F.2d 758, 764 (5th Cir. 1989) (revised manual, offered to show the feasibility of providing a better installation instruction, held properly excluded under Rule 407: "The feasibility exception to Rule 407 does not apply when feasibility is not in controversy. The defendants in the present case did not contest the feasibility of a better installation instruction, but rather maintained that the instructions in the [original] manual were acceptable."); Middleton v. Harris Press & Shear, Inc., 796 F.2d 747 (5th Cir. 1986) (in a product liability suit where the plaintiff claimed that the product was defectively designed by failing to include a circuit interrupt device, a design change by the defendant to include such a device was not admissible to prove feasibility: "Though Harris contended that circuit interrupt devices were unreliable and not a safety device of first choice, the feasibility of installing them was not called into dispute," since the defendant stipulated that the change was feasible "in the sense of being physically possible"); Probus v. K-Mart, Inc., 794 F.2d 1207, 1210 (7th Cir. 1986) (subsequent remedial measures were properly held not admissible to prove feasibility where "the plaintiff does not contend that the defendants testified that the material used in the end cap was either the best material available or that the use of another material would not have been feasible").

(n13)Footnote 13. Gauthier v. AMF, Inc., 788 F.2d 634, 638 (9th Cir. 1986) , amended, 805 F.2d 337 (9th Cir. 1986) :

> In this case, AMF conceded that the safety devices were technologically and economically feasible but then argued that they concluded that the safety problem was not great enough to warrant the trade-off of consumer frustration, increased complexity of the product, and risk of consumer efforts to disconnect the safety device.

See also Fish v. Georgia-Pacific Corp., 779 F.2d 836, 840 (2d Cir. 1985) :

> Nor was the evidence of the warning admissible on the limited issue of the feasibility of providing a warning in 1977. Georgia-Pacific states that it was willing to admit the feasibility of providing a warning in 1977; it simply contended that it did not have a legal duty to do so.

(n14)Footnote 14. See, e.g., Harrison v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 981 F.2d 25 (1st Cir. 1992) ("Rule 407's impeachment exception must not be used as a subterfuge to prove negligence or culpability"; a desire merely to undercut an expert's qualifications cannot be sufficient to trigger the impeachment exception, or else the exception could swallow the rule of exclusion).

(n15)Footnote 15. See, e.g., Kelly v. Crown Equip. Co., 970 F.2d 1273 (3d Cir. 1992) (the impeachment exception does not apply merely because the expert testified that the product was of an excellent and proper design; if the impeachment exception applied to simple contradiction, the exception would swallow the rule); Flaminio v. Honda Motor Co., 733 F.2d 463 (7th Cir. 1984) (no impeachment with subsequent remedial measures was permissible where defense witnesses merely testified to the safety of the product under normal circumstances).

(n16)Footnote 16. See, e.g., Wood v. Morbark Indus., 70 F.3d 1201 (11th Cir. 1995) (post-accident change to the design of a woodchipper was admissible for impeachment where the president of the corporate defendant testified that the woodchipper contained "the safest length chute you could possibly put on the machine"); Muzyka v. Remington Arms Co., 774 F.2d 1309 (5th Cir. 1985) (subsequent remedial measures, offered for impeachment purposes, were erroneously excluded where defense witnesses testified that the product "embodied the ultimate in gun safety" and that it was "the best and the safest rifle of its kind on the market"; the jury was improperly denied "evidence in impeachment of the experts who spoke in those superlatives").

(n17)Footnote 17. See, e.g., Stevens v. Bangor & A. R.R., 97 F.3d 594 (1st Cir. 1996) (statements made during a post-accident safety meeting were properly admitted as impeachment evidence, after a witness testified that he remembered that the rails found in a certain railroad car were arranged neatly before the accident, and he had never stated otherwise; the statements directly contradicted this testimony); Harrison v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 981 F.2d 25, 31 (1st Cir. 1992) ("A more direct impeachment use of subsequent remedial measure evidence would exist if Appellees' witness stated that he did not change the product after the alleged accident was brought to his employer's attention.").

(n18)Footnote 18. See, e.g., Diehl v. Blaw-Knox, 360 F.3d 426 (3d Cir. 2004) (following authority in other circuits allowing evidence of third-party measures, reasoning that this was not prohibited by the policy of the rule, which is to prevent remedial measures from being used as an admission against the defendant; a party's fault cannot be "admitted" by a third party); TLT-Babcock, Inc. v. Emerson Elec. Co., 33 F.3d 397 (4th Cir. 1994) (in an action arising from the installation of a defective ventilation system in a city construction project, the defendant objected to the introduction of a subsequent design change in the ventilation system; the change was properly admitted because it was made by the city, not by the defendant who originally designed the system; a third party "will not be inhibited from taking remedial measures if such actions are allowed into evidence against a defendant").

(n19)Footnote 19. See Trull v. Volkswagen of Am., Inc., 187 F.3d 88 (1st Cir. 1999) (pre-accident design change was properly excluded; while measures taken before the plaintiff's accident do not fall within the prohibition of Rule 407, the Trial Court properly exercised its discretion to exclude the evidence under Rule 403; there was no indication that the alternative design was employed to remedy any defects in the model in which the plaintiff was injured).

(n20)Footnote 20. See, e.g., Middleton v. Harris Press & Shear, Inc., 796 F.2d 747 (5th Cir. 1986) (remedial measure was not excluded under Rule 407 because it was made by someone other than the defendant; however, exclusion of the evidence was proper under Rule 403 due to its tendency to divert the jury's attention away from the defendant's conduct at the time of manufacture).

(n21)Footnote 21. See also In re Air Crash Disaster, 86 F.3d 498 (6th Cir. 1996) , where the airline sought to introduce evidence of remedial changes made to a flight director after the product was designed, but before the plane accident. The Court found that Rule 407 does not bar such evidence. It affirmed the Trial Judge's exclusion of the evidence, however, as unduly confusing under Rule 403, because the remedial measure related to a different model of flight director than that employed in the plane that crashed.

(n22)Footnote 22. On the state versions of Rule 407, see generally G. Joseph & S. Saltzburg, Evidence in America, ch. 17.

(n23)Footnote 23. Moe v. Avions Marcel Dassault-Breguet Aviation, 727 F.2d 917 (10th Cir. 1984) .

(n24)Footnote 24. Flaminio v. Honda Motor Co., 733 F.2d 463, 471 (7th Cir. 1984) .

(n25)Footnote 25. See, e.g., Kelly v. Crown Equip. Co., 970 F.2d 1273 (3d Cir. 1992) (Rule 407 is "arguably procedural" because it "operates on the presumption that undue prejudice is likely in certain situations, expressing a distrust of a jury's ability to draw the proper inferences from the evidence").

(n26)Footnote 26. See Flaminio v. Honda Motor Co., 733 F.2d 463, 472 (7th Cir. 1984) :

> Rule 407 is not based on substantive considerations only. An important though not the primary reason for the rules was distrust of juries' ability to draw correct inferences from evidence of subsequent remedial measures. Although it was a mild distrust, as shown by the exceptions built into the rule, it is enough to establish the rule's constitutionality in diversity cases.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 407 RULE 407

2-407 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 407.03

407.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Admiralty Cases

Hall v. American Steamship Co., 688 F.2d 1062 (6th Cir. 1982) : In a personal injury action by a seaman claiming unseaworthiness as a result of being injured when he was not told to leave the deck in rough weather, evidence was admitted concerning changes in the procedures that he was undertaking at the time he was injured. Reversing a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court found that "[s]ince there was no dispute as to the physical and weather conditions at the time Hall was injured, even if the change of policy were relevant as proof of these prior conditions, the policy change could not, under the terms of Rule 407, be admitted for such purpose." The Court reasoned that the evidence had been offered to prove culpable conduct, something not permitted by the Rule.

[2] Antitrust Cases

Noble v. McClatchy Newspapers, 533 F.2d 1081 (9th Cir. 1975) , vacated on other grounds, 433 U.S. 904 (1977) : One of the issues raised by the plaintiffs was whether certain provisions in distributorship contracts violated the antitrust laws. The District Court refused to admit evidence that after the termination of the plaintiffs' distributorship the defendants deleted the provisions in the lease that were objected to by the plaintiffs. Citing Rule 407, the Court approved this ruling, saying that "it is well settled that evidence of subsequent remedial measures is not admissible to prove culpability of prior conduct."

[3] Control

Clausen v. Sea-3, Inc., 21 F.3d 1181 (1st Cir. 1994) : In an employee's action for personal injuries caused by a fall on a ramp, the Court found no plain error in admission of evidence that a defendant had replaced the ramp with steps three years later. The evidence was probative on the issue of which defendant controlled the premises, and the cautionary instruction sufficiently informed the jury as to the limited purpose for which it was admitted.

Hull v. Chevron U.S.A., Inc., 812 F.2d 584 (10th Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed a judgment for a drilling company employee injured in a forklift accident. It held that evidence that after the accident the drilling company discharged the employee who had operated the forklift and changed its operating procedures was inadmissible against the company as a subsequent remedial measure. Although another defendant offered the evidence ostensibly to prove that the company had the right to control the forklift, the Court held that this was an undisputed fact so that the evidence was not needed to prove control.

[4] Disciplinary Proceedings

Maddox v. City of Los Angeles, 792 F.2d 1408 (9th Cir. 1986) : In a civil rights suit against police officers and the City growing out of the death of an arrestee, the Court held there was no error in excluding evidence that a defendant officer admitted during a disciplinary proceeding that he violated City policy with respect to a choke hold. The Court reasoned that the disciplinary proceeding was a subsequent remedial measure by the City, and that the evidence would have been unduly prejudicial if offered against the officer since the jury might have inferred that the officer was guilty of wrongdoing simply because there was a proceeding. Evidence of the City policy was admitted for the jury's consideration.

Specht v. Jensen, 863 F.2d 700 (10th Cir. 1988) : In a civil rights suit arising out of searches of the plaintiff's home and office, the Court held that the Trial Judge properly excluded a press release issued by city officials which stated that officers exercised poor judgment in failing to read a "writ of assistance" thoroughly and that disciplinary action would be taken.

[5] Discontinued Practice

Hickman v. Gem Ins. Co., 299 F.3d 1208 (10th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed summary judgment for an insurer in a class action by insureds under ERISA to recover unreimbursed hospitalization charges. It held that evidence that the insurer at one point decided to discontinue its practice of limiting payment of hospital room and board charges was inadmissible as a subsequent remedial measure and was not relevant to prove whether the earlier practice was an abuse of discretion.

[6] Employment Discrimination Case

Lust v. Sealy, Inc., 383 F.3d 580 (7th Cir. 2004) : In an action by an employee who claimed that she had been denied a promotion because of gender discrimination, the defendant claimed it was because she lacked interpersonal skills. To prove that the reason was pretextual, the plaintiff introduced evidence that an account was reclassified as a key account in order to make her a Key Account Manager after she accused the company of discrimination and seemed about to sue. The Court observed that the evidence probably violated Rule 407, but that the defendant had not invoked it, so any objection on that basis was waived.

[7] Evidence Not Identified by Date

Stevens v. Bangor & Aroostook R.R., 97 F.3d 594 (1st Cir. 1996) : Affirming a judgment for an employee in a FELA case, the Court held that a post-accident photograph was properly admitted. The photograph was used to illustrate the plaintiff's testimony, and the jury was not told when it was taken.

[8] Feasibility

Cameron v. Otto Bock Orthopedic Indus., Inc., 43 F.3d 14 (1st Cir. 1994) : Affirming a judgment for a manufacturer of a prosthetic leg, the Court held that "Dear Customer" letters sent out after the plaintiff's accident were properly excluded. The defense offered to stipulate to the feasibility of providing the information set forth in the letters, and the Court found that neither feasibility nor control was disputed in this case.

In re Joint E.D. & S.D. Asbestos Litig., 995 F.2d 343 (2d Cir. 1993) : The Court held that, since feasibility was not contested, it was error to admit evidence that a manufacturer placed warnings on its product after a worker's last exposure to asbestos. " 'Feasibility' is not an open sesame whose mere invocation parts Rule 407 and ushers in evidence of subsequent repairs and remedies."

Whitehead v. St. Joe Lead Co., 729 F.2d 238 (3d Cir. 1984) : Reversing a summary judgment for the defendant in a product liability action, the Court observed that warnings to users of products containing lead, which were included with products manufactured after the plaintiff was exposed to lead during her employment, could be considered on the question of whether warnings were feasible at a reasonable cost.

Albrecht v. Baltimore & O. R.R., 808 F.2d 329 (4th Cir. 1987) : The Court reversed a judgment for an employee in a FELA case, holding it was error to admit evidence that after the accident that injured the plaintiff the railroad made improvements to the area in which the accident occurred. It concluded that the feasibility of repairs was stipulated by the railroad, and that the plaintiff was the one who attempted to make it appear that feasibility was disputed while examining a railroad employee. In Werner v. Upjohn Co., n1 the Court reversed a plaintiff's judgment in an action against an ophthalmologist and drug manufacturer, holding it was error to admit evidence of a revised warning issued by the manufacturer the year after the plaintiff visited the defendant doctor. Feasibility, said the Court, was not a disputed issue.

Reese v. Mercury Marine Div., 793 F.2d 1416 (5th Cir. 1986) : Affirming a judgment for the plaintiffs in a wrongful death action against the manufacturer of an outboard motor, the Court held that a manual containing warnings about the absence of a switch, published a year after the accident giving rise to the suit, was admissible to prove feasibility. The manufacturer had offered evidence that only a retailer could properly instruct the consumer with respect to such a switch. In Middleton v. Harris Press & Shear, Inc., n2 the Court affirmed a judgment for a manufacturer in a product liability case, finding that evidence of remedial modifications to a machine was properly excluded where feasibility was not disputed. See also Grenada Steel Indus. v. Alabama Oxygen Co. n3(where feasibility was not controverted in a product liability case, evidence of subsequent repairs was properly excluded). In Gardner v. Chevron U.S.A., Inc., n4 the Court affirmed an employer's judgment in a wrongful death action, concluding it was not error to exclude evidence that a broken pipe was replaced with a heavier grade of pipe following the accident that gave rise to the litigation, even though the employer's foreman testified that he would have used the original size of pipe if he were constructing a well like the one involved in this case. The Court said that because the employer never contested that a larger sized pipe could feasibly have been used, the evidence was inadmissible to controvert feasibility.

Probus v. K-Mart, Inc., 794 F.2d 1207 (7th Cir. 1986) : In a suit by a plaintiff who fell from a ladder, the Court held it was proper to exclude evidence that after the accident the manufacturer strengthened a cap on the ladder. Although the manufacturer claimed that the cap used on the plaintiff's ladder was adequate, the evidence was not admissible to controvert that claim, since the manufacturer was not contending that a stronger cap would not have been feasible.

Anderson v. Malloy, 700 F.2d 1208 (8th Cir. 1983) : Reversing a judgment in an action by a rape victim against the owners and operators of a motel, the Court held that the defendants disputed the feasibility of installing "peep hole and safety chains" and that the plaintiff should have been permitted to show that they were installed after she was raped. A dissenting Judge argued that the defendant had questioned only the necessity of further precautions, not their feasibility.

Gauthier v. AMF, Inc., 788 F.2d 634 (9th Cir. 1986) , amended, 805 F.2d 337 (9th Cir. 1986) : The Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff in a product liability action against the manufacturer of a snow thrower. It held that admitting evidence of design changes by the defendant and by the industry after the accident was prejudicial error. The defendant conceded that safety devices were feasible, but argued that the safety problem was not great enough to warrant the trade-off of consumer frustration, increased complexity of the product, and risk of consumer efforts to disconnect the safety device. The Court held that this was not an attack on feasibility, but was an argument that the design was reasonable at the time. In its opinion denying rehearing, the Court added that the evidence should have been excluded under Rule 403. In Transgo, Inc. v. Ajac Transmission Parts Corp., n5 the Court affirmed a trademark and copyright infringement judgment for the plaintiff, finding that the plaintiff properly introduced evidence of revised instruction sheets distributed by the defendant in connection with a kit. The evidence rebutted the defendant's claim that it was not feasible to produce instructions that differed from the plaintiff's.

Meller v. Heil Co., 745 F.2d 1297 (10th Cir. 1984) : The Court held that evidence of subsequent design changes in a dump bed assembly for a dump truck was properly admitted to show feasibility of alternative designs and that the evidence, accompanied by a limiting instruction, was not unduly prejudicial.

Wood v. Morbark Indus., Inc., 70 F.3d 1201 (11th Cir. 1995) : In a product liability action arising out of a fatal wood chipper accident, the Court held that testimony by the chipper's designer that it was the "safest" possible design did not put feasibility in issue, but did open the door to impeachment of the witness by evidence of subsequent changes.

[9] Impeachment or Rebuttal

[a] Contributory or Comparative Negligence

Pitasi v. Stratton Corp., 968 F.2d 1558 (2d Cir. 1992) : In a personal injury action against a ski resort, the plaintiff alleged the defendant had been negligent in failing to rope off the side entrances to a closed trail. The Court held it was error to exclude evidence that the defendant closed off the side entrance after the plaintiff's accident, as it tended to rebut the defense that the plaintiff had been contributorily negligent in entering an area where the dangerous conditions were so obvious that warnings or ropes were unnecessary. This decision illustrates the thin line separating inadmissible subsequent remedial measure evidence from admissible impeachment evidence. In our view, had the resort limited its evidence to testimony that the risks were sufficiently obvious that no warning devices were needed, the subsequent remedial measures would not have been admissible, since there really would be no "impeachment"; in reality, the evidence would have served no purpose other than to suggest that the defendant's denial of negligence was inconsistent with taking subsequent remedial measures, which the Rule prohibits. However, in asserting that the plaintiff was so careless that no reasonable person would have failed to appreciate the risk, the defendant opened the door to impeachment.

Rimkus v. Northwest Colorado Ski Corp., 706 F.2d 1060 (10th Cir. 1983) : An injured skier, claiming that a ski resort was negligent in failing to mark an outcropping of rock onto which he fell, introduced evidence (including photos) showing that the resort set up bamboo poles above the outcropping after the accident. The jury was instructed that it could not consider the evidence on the question of negligence. The Court affirmed, reasoning that although "[t]he trial judge might well have excluded the evidence," it was not an abuse of discretion to admit it to undermine the testimony of a defense witness who claimed that the plaintiff, an experienced instructor, was contributorily negligent in not seeing the rocks, which were visible.

[b] Impeachment or Rebuttal -- Evidence Admissible or Required To Be Admitted

Stevens v. Bangor & A. R.R., 97 F.3d 594 (1st Cir. 1996) : Affirming a judgment for an employee in a FELA case, the Court held that statements made during a post-accident safety meeting were properly admitted. The statements were admitted as impeachment evidence, after a witness testified that he remembered that the rails found in a certain railroad car were arranged neatly and he had never stated otherwise. The proffered statements directly contradicted this testimony.

Kenny v. Southeastern Pa. Transp. Auth., 581 F.2d 351 (3d Cir. 1978) : The Court set aside a j.n.o.v. for the defendant in an action alleging negligence on the part of a transit system when the plaintiff was raped in a station. Citing this Manual, the Court held that there was no error in allowing testimony that new lighting had been installed on the platform a few days after the attack against the plaintiff, because the defendant had opened up the issue by claiming that all reasonable care was being exercised at the time. This is another reminder that simply claiming that the conduct of a defendant was reasonable under the circumstances does not open the door to subsequent repair evidence, while claiming that all reasonable care was being taken opens the door to such evidence.

Jones v. Benefit Trust Life Ins. Co., 800 F.2d 1397 (5th Cir. 1986) : In an action by an insured alleging tortious breach of a disability insurance contract, the Court held that evidence of the defendant's policy with a different insured was properly admitted to impeach the claim of the defendant's witnesses that the plaintiff's policy was ambiguous. In Bickerstaff v. South Cent. Bell Tel. Co., n6 a personal injury action by a telephone customer who sued the company for failing to give warnings against the use of a telephone during an electrical storm, the plaintiff argued that evidence that the defendant put a warning in its monthly note to subscribers should have been admitted to impeach two witnesses who said that a warning was not advisable and that it was unnecessary since everyone was aware of the danger. Although the Court observed that the impeachment exception to Rule 407, if applied broadly, may swallow up the basic limitation on the use of subsequent repair evidence found in the Rule, it concluded that the impeachment probably should have been permitted. The error was harmless, however.

Patrick v. South Cent. Bell Tel. Co., 641 F.2d 1192 (6th Cir. 1980) : The Court held that postaccident repairs could be offered to rebut a claim that there was no need for improvement in the situation.

Jaeger v. Henningson, Durham & Richardson, Inc., 714 F.2d 773 (8th Cir. 1983) : Affirming a plaintiff's judgment in a personal injury action against an architectural firm resulting from a construction site accident, the Court upheld the introduction of photographs of a portion of a stairway that was involved in the accident. Although the photographs showed that the portion involved in the accident had been replaced, the Court reasoned that they were properly used to impeach defense witnesses who testified concerning the specifications for the stairway.

Transgo, Inc. v. Ajac Transmission Parts Corp., 768 F.2d 1001 (9th Cir. 1985) : In a trademark and copyright infringement action, the Court held that the evidence of the defendant's changed instruction sheet was properly admitted to impeach or rebut its claim that it could not have modified its sheet to make it look different from the plaintiff's.

[c] Impeachment or Rebuttal -- Evidence Excludable or Required To Be Excluded

Complaint of Consolidation Coal Co., 123 F.3d 126 (3d Cir. 1997) : Following a seaman's accident, the employer issued a safety memorandum stating that an employee fell after a line broke (apparently referring to the accident in question) and cautioning all employees to inspect ropes carefully before using them. The Court held, with one Judge dissenting, that there was no error in excluding the memorandum, or even just the part dealing with the investigation of the accident, as a subsequent remedial measure. The memorandum was not admissible to impeach a foreman's testimony that the line "appeared ... to have been cut by an ax," since that testimony was not directly contradicted by the memorandum's statement that the line "broke."

Reddin v. Robinson Property Group Ltd., 239 F.3d 756 (5th Cir. 2001) : In a slip-and-fall case, the defendant elicited testimony that guards crawled through the entire floor and found no defect. The plaintiff argued that evidence that the defendant's employees taped off the area where the accident occurred would impeach that testimony because no scanning of the area could have occurred if the area were taped off. The Court held that while the evidence "may have touched tangentially on the credibility of testimony that security guards traversed the area, such does not establish that its exclusion by the trial judge constituted an abuse of discretion." The plaintiff failed to establish the time at which the tape was put up around the area, and the security guards might have checked the area before the tape was put up. In a Jones Act case, Kerr-McGee Corp. v. Ma-Ju Marine Servs., n7 the plaintiff elicited testimony from a supervisor called as an adverse witness that a handrail was not necessary to make the deck safe and then sought to impeach the witness with evidence that a handrail was added to the deck after the plaintiff's accident. The Court upheld exclusion of the evidence, as there was no showing that the supervisor had ordered the addition of the rail, and the risk of confusion and prejudice might well have substantially outweighed its probative value.

Cooper v. Carl A. Nelson & Co., 211 F.3d 1008 (7th Cir. 2000) : A worker was injured when he fell while traversing a drainage ditch at a construction site. It was unclear whether he slipped on planks that were across the ditch or on a muddy incline leading to the planks. The defendant presented testimony by the plaintiff's supervisor that on the day of the fall the ditch was spanned by a man bridge, not planks. The Trial Judge excluded, on the ground it was subsequent remedial measure evidence, the deposition testimony of a plaintiff's witness who would have contradicted the supervisor and said that the man bridge was built after the fall. The Court upheld this ruling, reasoning that the plaintiff's counsel could have asked the witness simply to describe the condition of the ditch at the time of the accident and did not need to inquire into when the bridge was built. Thus, evidence of the subsequent remedial measure was not necessary for contradicting the supervisor or attacking his credibility.

Wilkinson v. Carnival Cruise Lines, Inc., 920 F.2d 1560 (11th Cir. 1991) : The Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff in an action brought for injuries suffered when an automatic sliding glass door ran over her foot. Evidence the door was left open for the remainder of the cruise was improperly admitted, as it did not impeach testimony that the door was in normal operating condition at the time of the accident. Citing this Manual, the Court noted that the witness had not asserted that the defendants had exercised "all reasonable care" in maintaining the door, nor had he represented that it was in the "safest" or "best" condition.

[d] Impeachment or Rebuttal -- Product Liability Cases

Harrison v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 981 F.2d 25 (1st Cir. 1992) : In a suit involving a carpentry tool, the defendant's expert testified that the accident described by the plaintiff could not have occurred as alleged and that there had never been a similar complaint made to the manufacturer. The Court held there was no error in excluding evidence, including the expert's statement that he had worked on design changes for the tool, offered to impeach him, since the danger that the jury would misuse the evidence as proof of negligence outweighed the impeachment value of the evidence.

Stecyk v. Bell Helicopter Textron, Inc., 295 F.3d 408 (3d Cir. 2002) : The plaintiffs, suing for wrongful death in a military helicopter crash, alleged that a shaft seal was installed backwards and leaked flammable fluid, which was ingested by an engine as the craft was attempting to land. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence that a seal that could not be installed backwards was used in that model helicopter following the crash. Although the defendants argued that the seal used was reasonable and the later type of seal more difficult to install and "not suited for the military environment," the Court concluded that the plaintiffs had sufficient other opportunities to impeach the defense witnesses' testimony regarding the reasonableness of the design at issue, "without resort to prejudicial post-incident evidence."

Muzyka v. Remington Arms Co., 774 F.2d 1309 (5th Cir. 1985) : The Court held it was error to exclude evidence of a design change in a rifle several months after an accident, since the manufacturer claimed that the design was the best and safest at the time of the accident. In Dollar v. Long Mfg., N.C., Inc., n8 a defense witness testified that the instrument used by the deceased was safe to operate. Reversing, the Court held that the plaintiff should have been permitted to impeach with a letter sent by the witness to dealers selling the instrument, warning them about its "death-dealing propensities" when used in the fashion it was used by the deceased.

Wood v. Morbark Indus., Inc., 70 F.3d 1201 (11th Cir. 1995) : In an action arising out of a fatal wood chipper accident, the Court held that testimony by the chipper's designer that it was the "safest" possible design did not put feasibility in issue, but did open the door to impeachment of the witness by evidence of subsequent changes.

[10] Libel Case

World Boxing Council v. Cosell, 715 F. Supp. 1259 (S.D.N.Y. 1989) : In this libel action, the Court held that evidence that language in the contested passage had been altered in a subsequent paperback edition of the book was inadmissible under the policy of the Rule, because elimination of defamatory language in a subsequent edition limits the extent of damage to an individual's reputation by keeping injurious material from the eyes of new readers.

[11] Product Liability Cases

McFarlane v. Caterpillar, Inc., 974 F.2d 176 (D.C. Cir. 1992) : In a product liability action arising out of the alleged brake failure of a bulldozer, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to exclude as a subsequent remedial measure a postaccident service report containing a statement that indicated a spool in the hydraulic system did not meet manufacturing specifications, as that portion of the report reflected only the unaltered state of the spool at the time it was inspected.

Fish v. Georgia-Pacific Corp., 779 F.2d 836 (2d Cir. 1985) : The Court reversed a judgment for homeowners who sued a manufacturer of particle board, alleging that it failed to warn them of hazards associated with a floor used to build their home. The Court concluded it was error to admit evidence that the defendant issued warnings six or seven years after the plaintiffs built their home.

Diehl v. Blaw-Knox, 360 F.3d 426 (3d Cir. 2004) : A road construction worker sued the manufacturer of a road widener machine that backed over his legs. The Court reversed a judgment for the defendant, holding it was error to exclude evidence that the plaintiff's employer modified the machine after the accident. The Judge had excluded the evidence on the ground that the text of Rule 407 makes no exception for subsequent remedial measures taken by a nonparty. The Court held, however, that the consistent authority admitting evidence of third-party repairs was supported by the policy of the Rule, which is to prevent repairs from being used as proof of an admission of fault -- and a party's fault cannot be "admitted" by a third party.

Benedi v. McNeil-P.P.C., Inc., 66 F.3d 1378 (4th Cir. 1995) : In a consumer's product liability action for severe liver damage caused by the combination of alcohol and acetaminophen, the plaintiff introduced evidence that prior to the plaintiff's injury the defendant had discussions with the FDA about providing warnings of the dangers of a similar product. The Court held that any error in a reference to the fact that the defendant changed the warning on the product taken by the plaintiff after his injury was harmless, since the evidence of the prior discussions was proper and far more damaging.

Stahl v. Novartis Pharms. Corp., 283 F.3d 254 (5th Cir. 2002) : Affirming summary judgment for the defendant in an action alleging inadequate warnings on a prescription drug, the Court held there was no error in refusing to consider, as evidence that the warnings were inadequate, the current version of the drug's package insert. Changes in the warnings made after the plaintiff's injury are inadmissible to show a defect, under Rule 407.

Kloepfer v. Honda Motor Co., 898 F.2d 1452 (10th Cir. 1990) : In an action arising out of the death of a passenger on an all-terrain vehicle (ATV), the Court held that a consent decree relating to ATV safety entered between the United States and major ATV manufacturers (including the defendant) two years after the accident in question was properly excluded as irrelevant to the case.

[12] Reference to State Law

Kelly v. Crown Equip. Co., 970 F.2d 1273 (3d Cir. 1992) : In a diversity action arising out of a worker's injuries on a forklift, the Court held that evidence of subsequent changes was inadmissible, regardless of allegedly conflicting state law, as the Rule is "arguably procedural" and therefore governs.

Flaminio v. Honda Motor Co., 733 F.2d 463 (7th Cir. 1984) : The Court decided that Rule 407 properly was applied in a product liability action arising under Wisconsin law, even though Wisconsin State Courts might have admitted subsequent remedial measure evidence. Although the Court recognized that there is a substantive aspect to the Rule, it concluded that substantive and procedural concerns both support exclusion of subsequent remedial measure evidence and that "[a]n important -- reason for the rule was distrust of juries' ability to draw correct inferences from evidence of subsequent remedial measures."

Monger v. Cessna Aircraft Co., 812 F.2d 402 (8th Cir. 1987) : In the course of affirming a judgment for an aircraft manufacturer in a wrongful death case, the Court observed that it is unclear whether federal or state law should govern the admissibility of subsequent remedial measures in a diversity case. It found that any error in the admission of such evidence was harmless in the instant case.

Moe v. Avions Marcel Dassault-Breguet Aviation, 727 F.2d 917 (10th Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed judgments for defendants in a wrongful death action arising out of a plane crash, but it disagreed with the analysis used by the Trial Judge in ruling that a circular published by the airplane's manufacturer following the crash was inadmissible under Rule 407. The Court held, however, that in a diversity case when there is a conflict between Rule 407 and state law, state law should govern "because Rule 407 is based primarily on policy considerations rather than relevancy or truth seeking," and the policy considerations are a fundamental part of the state's law of liability. Nonetheless, there was no error in excluding the circular, since negligence and product liability theories were both involved in the case, and state law permitted use of the evidence only on the latter theory. Thus, Rule 403 would have permitted exclusion, especially since the plaintiffs were permitted to paraphrase the circular in cross-examining the defendants' pilot-experts. The decision relies heavily on the idea that Rule 407 and similar state rules are intended to promote repairs; we suggest, however, that they rest mostly on relevance grounds, which calls the Court's reasoning into question. See also Wheeler v. John Deere Co. n9(reiterating that in diversity strict liability cases the admissibility of subsequent remedial measures is governed by state law).

Wood v. Morbark Indus., Inc., 70 F.3d 1201 (11th Cir. 1995) : The Court held that Rule 407 applied to a product liability action because the Federal Rules apply to procedural matters, including the admissibility of evidence. The Court rejected the Tenth Circuit's view (supra) that conflicting state law should apply in a diversity case because Rule 407 is based primarily on policy considerations.

[13] Relationship to Rule 403

Trull v. Volkswagen of Am., Inc., 187 F.3d 88 (1st Cir. 1999) : In a product liability action arising out of a crash that occurred when the plaintiffs' vehicle slid on ice, the Court found no error in the exclusion of evidence concerning a Volkswagen auto manufactured for sale in Europe before the time of the accident. Although the Court recognized that "measures that take place before the accident at issue do not fall within the prohibition" of Rule 407, it found a proper exercise of discretion in excluding the evidence under Rule 403. There was no dispute in this case that an alternative design was feasible and no evidence that Volkswagen specifically designed the European car to remedy any known problems in the American version. In Bogosian v. Mercedes-Benz of N. Am., Inc., 104 F.3d 472 (1st Cir. 1997) , the Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in a product liability action arising from an alleged defect in a car's gear selection lever. The Trial Judge had excluded evidence of a design change made by the manufacturer after the car was sold but before the date of the accident. The Court held that although Rule 407 applies only to post-accident repairs, there was no abuse of discretion. Because a strict liability claim centers on the product's condition at the time it leaves the seller's hands, evidence of post-manufacture, pre-accident design modifications may be prejudicial to the defendant and misleading to the jury, and thus is excludable under Rule 403. In United States Fid. & Guar. Co. v. Baker Material Handling Corp., n10 a product liability action arising out of a fatal accident involving a forklift, the Court held that Rule 407 did not bar evidence of a design change made after manufacture of the forklift but before the accident. However, there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the evidence under Rule 403, because the dissimilarities between the redesigned forklift and the model involved in the accident could have been misleading to the jury and unfairly prejudicial to the defendant.

Lindsay v. Ortho Pharmaceutical Corp., 637 F.2d 87 (2d Cir. 1980) : The Court reversed a judgment against a manufacturer of oral contraceptives, concluding that changes on warning labels to patients should not have been admitted against the manufacturer when the changes were largely attributable to FDA requirements. The Court appeared to favor the manufacturer's analogy to Rule 407 when it concluded that under Rule 403 the evidence was too prejudicial to have been admitted.

Diehl v. Blaw-Knox, 360 F.3d 426 (3d Cir. 2004) : A road construction worker sued the manufacturer of a road widener machine that backed over his legs. The Court reversed a judgment for the defendant, holding it was error to exclude evidence that the plaintiff's employer modified the machine after the accident, since Rule 407 does not bar evidence of subsequent remedial measures by a third party. The alternative ground for exclusion proffered by the District Judge, Rule 403, did not apply because the evidence presented no potential for confusion. The precautions taken by the employer were clearly available to the defendant at the time of manufacture, so there was no temporal distinction that the jury might overlook, and there was no dispute that the redesign was done in direct response to the plaintiff's accident and for the sole purpose of preventing the same kind of accident.

Roberts v. Harnischfeger Corp., 901 F.2d 42 (5th Cir. 1989) : The Court affirmed a plaintiff's judgment against the manufacturer of a hydraulic crane, noting that Rule 407 would not exclude evidence that subsequent to manufacturing the crane involved, but before the plaintiff was injured, the defendant had made a protective device standard equipment on that type of crane. The evidence was held irrelevant under Rules 402 and 403 to the reasonableness of the design at the time of manufacture, however.

In re Air Crash Disaster, 86 F.3d 498 (6th Cir. 1996) : In a suit between the airline and the aircraft manufacturer for contribution and reimbursement for settlements arising from the crash of an airplane on takeoff, the Court held that Rule 407 did not bar evidence of remedial changes made to a flight director after the product was designed, but before the accident. However, the evidence was properly excluded under Rule 403 as unduly confusing, since it related to a different model of flight directors.

Gauthier v. AMF, Inc., 788 F.2d 634 (9th Cir. 1986) , amended, 805 F.2d 337 (9th Cir. 1986) : The Court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff in a product liability action against the manufacturer of a snow thrower. It held that admitting evidence of design changes by the defendant and by the industry after the accident was prejudicial error. The defendant conceded that safety devices were feasible, but argued that the safety problem was not great enough to warrant the trade-off of consumer frustration, increased complexity of the product, and risk of consumer efforts to disconnect the safety device. The Court held that this was not an attack on feasibility, but was an argument that the design was reasonable at the time. In its opinion denying rehearing, the Court added that the evidence should have been excluded under Rule 403.

Rockwood Ins. Co. v. Clark Equip. Co., 713 F.2d 577 (10th Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed a judgment for an insurer against the bailee of a logging machine for the amount paid to its insured for the loss of the machine by fire. An expert for the insurance company originally concluded that the design of the machine was not defective. He changed his opinion, however, when he received a letter from the manufacturer after the fire suggesting certain design modifications. The manufacturer succeeded in excluding the evidence and it was dismissed as a defendant. The Court reasoned that there was no evidence concerning the manufacturer's motivation in sending the letter or the exact date when the letter was sent. It upheld the exclusion of the evidence under Rule 403, since the evidence against the bailee was strong.

Stallworth v. Illinois Cent. G. R.R., 690 F.2d 858 (11th Cir. 1982) : Although the Court reversed a judgment for the railroad in an action brought by a motorist injured at a crossing at night, it upheld a ruling excluding evidence that the railroad placed flares at the crossing immediately following the collision. The Court said that even though the plaintiff urged that the evidence tended to show feasibility of repair and to impeach, the Trial Judge "has broad discretion under Rule 403."

[14] Remedial Measures Before Accident

Bogosian v. Mercedes-Benz of N. Am., Inc., 104 F.3d 472 (1st Cir. 1997) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in a product liability action arising from an alleged defect in a car's gear selection lever. The Trial Judge had excluded evidence of a design change made by the manufacturer after the car was sold but before the date of the accident. The Court held that although Rule 407 applies only to post-accident repairs, there was no abuse of discretion. Because a strict liability claim centers on the product's condition at the time it leaves the seller's hands, evidence of post-manufacture, pre-accident design modifications may be prejudicial to the defendant and misleading to the jury, and thus excludable under Rule 403. In United States Fid. & Guar. Co. v. Baker Material Handling Corp., 62 F.3d 24 (1st Cir. 1995) , a product liability action arising out of a fatal accident involving a forklift, the Court held that Rule 407 did not bar evidence of a design change made after manufacture of the forklift but before the accident. However, there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the evidence under Rule 403, because the dissimilarities between the redesigned forklift and the model involved in the accident could have been misleading to the jury and unfairly prejudicial to the defendant.

City of Richmond v. Madison Mgt. Group, Inc., 918 F.2d 438 (4th Cir. 1990) : In an action for fraud and breach of contract brought by the City against the successor to the manufacturer of a concrete water pipe that burst, the Court held that a change made after the sale in the kind of reinforcing wire used in that type of pipe was properly admitted, as the relevant event for purposes of the Rule was the bursting of the pipe, not its sale to the City.

Cates v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 928 F.2d 679 (5th Cir. 1991) : In a product liability action by a consumer injured while operating a radial arm saw, the plaintiff offered evidence that changes in warning labels on that model were authorized before, but implemented after, he bought the saw. The Court held that exclusion of the evidence was error (but harmless) because, although the focus of a product liability case is on the dangers inherent in the product as it leaves the manufacturer, the relevant time under the Rule is the accident, which occurred after implementation. In Roberts v. Harnischfeger Corp., n11 the Court affirmed a plaintiff's judgment against the manufacturer of a hydraulic crane, noting that Rule 407 would not exclude evidence that subsequent to manufacturing the crane involved, but before the plaintiff was injured, the defendant had made a protective device standard equipment on that type of crane. The evidence was held irrelevant under Rules 402 and 403 to the reasonableness of the design at the time of manufacture, however.

In re Air Crash Disaster, 86 F.3d 498 (6th Cir. 1996) : In a suit between the airline and the aircraft manufacturer for contribution and reimbursement for settlements arising from the crash of an airplane on takeoff, the Court held that Rule 407 did not bar evidence of remedial changes made to a flight director after the product was designed, but before the accident. However, the evidence was properly excluded under Rule 403 as unduly confusing, since it related to a different model of flight directors.

Burke v. Deere & Co., 6 F.3d 497 (8th Cir. 1993) : The Court reversed (2-1) a judgment for the plaintiff, whose hand had been injured by an auger when he reached into a clean-out door on farm equipment manufactured by the defendant. Post-sale, pre-accident evidence that the defendant had installed warning decals and modified similar equipment was admissible to prove the existence of a dangerous defect in the product, but in this case the evidence was impermissibly admitted as ostensibly relevant to punitive damages.

[15] Remedial Measures by Plaintiff

In re Air Crash Disaster, 86 F.3d 498 (6th Cir. 1996) : In a contribution action between the airline and the aircraft manufacturer following an airplane crash, the airline sought to introduce evidence that after the accident it rewired all aircraft of the type that crashed, as proof of its claim that the wiring had been unsafe. Affirming exclusion of the evidence under Rule 407, the Court reasoned that "[t]here is nothing that makes evidence of a subsequent remedial measure by a plaintiff (or someone in the position of a plaintiff, like Northwest) better proof of culpable conduct than evidence of a remedial measure by a defendant. Indeed, measures taken by a plaintiff -- especially one contemplating litigation -- strike us as more dubious because of the possibility that the plaintiff is only 'repairing' an item in order to create helpful evidence." The Court also indicated it would have affirmed exclusion under Rule 403.

Public Serv. Co. v. Bath Iron Works Corp., 773 F.2d 783 (7th Cir. 1985) : Reversing a judgment for plaintiffs who sued a manufacturer for damages resulting from the failure of a device purchased from the manufacturer in 1979, the Court found error in the exclusion of evidence of the plaintiffs' 1983 plans for the device. Observing that it is unclear whether the exclusionary policy of Rule 407 applies when a plaintiff's remedial measures are offered to refute allegations that a defendant was negligent, since a "party who is not in danger of being sued may be less likely to be deterred from making subsequent improvements by the possibility that the improvements will be used against it," the Court did not reach the question because the subsequent improvements in the instant case were admissible to impeach the plaintiffs' claim that the directions to the defendant in 1979 were adequate.

[16] Remedial Measures by Third Party

Espeaignnette v. Gene Tierney Co., 43 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 1994) : The Court reversed a judgment for the defendant manufacturer in a product liability action brought after the plaintiff's arm was severed in a lumber company's saw. The lumber company had modified the saw after the accident to provide a guard over the opening. The Court held that, because the repair was made by a third party, it was not excludable under Rule 407 and that it did not pose any risk of unfair prejudice. In Raymond v. Raymond Corp., 938 F.2d 1518 (1st Cir. 1991) , a strict product liability action against the manufacturer arising out of a fatal accident involving a sideloader, the Court held that subsequent repairs undertaken by the defendant's employer were not excluded by the Rule, but there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the evidence under Rule 403.

Diehl v. Blaw-Knox, 360 F.3d 426 (3d Cir. 2004) : A road construction worker sued the manufacturer of a road widener machine that backed over his legs. The Court reversed a judgment for the defendant, holding it was error to exclude evidence that the plaintiff's employer modified the machine after the accident. The Judge had excluded the evidence on the ground that the text of Rule 407 makes no exception for subsequent remedial measures taken by a nonparty. The Court held, however, that the consistent authority admitting evidence of third-party repairs was supported by the policy of the Rule, which is to prevent repairs from being used as proof of an admission of fault -- and a party's fault cannot be "admitted" by a third party.

TLT-Babcock, Inc. v. Emerson Elec. Co., 33 F.3d 397 (4th Cir. 1994) : In an action arising from the installation of a defective ventilation system in a city construction project, the defendant objected to the introduction of a subsequent design change in the ventilation system. The Court held that the evidence was properly admitted, because the design change was made by the city, not by the defendant who originally designed the system. The Court reasoned that a third party "will not be inhibited from taking remedial measures if such actions are allowed into evidence against a defendant."

Herrington v. Hiller, 883 F.2d 411 (5th Cir. 1989) : In an action for birth injuries allegedly caused by the defendant hospital's failure to provide 24-hour anesthesia services, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion under Rule 403 to exclude evidence that the third-party provider of anesthesia services had refused to provide such services because of hospital policy regarding nurses administering anesthesia, but that 24-hour services were provided two years after the accident. Furthermore, the evidence was not barred by Rule 407, because the changes were made by the third party. In Myers v. Pennzoil Co., n12 the Court held there was no error in excluding evidence offered by the defendant of postaccident remedial measures by the plaintiff's employer. Although Rule 407 does not apply to measures by nonparties, the ruling was not an abuse of discretion because under the applicable law the employer was immune from tort liability, so the employer's fault was immaterial to the determination of liability. In Dixon v. International Harvester Co., n13 the Court overturned a judgment n.o.v. for the manufacturer of a "crawler tractor" in a suit for damages occurring when a pine sapling entered the cab of the tractor. The Court held that changes in the tractor made after the accident by the employer, rather than the manufacturer, were not excluded by Rule 407.

Pau v. Yosemite Park & Curry Co., 928 F.2d 880 (9th Cir. 1991) : The Court reversed a judgment for the defendant bicycle rental company in a wrongful death action arising out of an accident in a national park, holding it was error to exclude evidence that the Park Service erected warning signs at the site after the accident. The Rule does not bar evidence of remedial measures by third parties, and the evidence was relevant to express warranty claims against the defendant. In In re Aircrash in Bali, Indonesia, n14 the Court held that an FAA report after an accident was not a subsequent remedial measure, since it was not a repair by the defendant airline.

Mehojah v. Drummond, 56 F.3d 1213 (10th Cir. 1995) : In a personal injury action against the owner of cattle whose straying led to a collision with the plaintiffs' automobile, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to exclude evidence that the nonparty owner of the property on which the cattle had been grazing repaired the fence surrounding the property on the day after the accident. The majority relied on the proposition that Rule 407 does not exclude subsequent remedial measures made by someone other than the defendant, but the dissenting Judge believed that because the property owner was a potential defendant at the time he made the repairs, the Rule's policy of encouraging repairs should also apply to him. However, the dissenter would also have found that the defendant contested the issues of control and feasibility.

[17] Remedial Measures Ordered Before Accident

Raymond v. Raymond Corp., 938 F.2d 1518 (1st Cir. 1991) : In a strict product liability action arising out of a fatal accident involving a sideloader, the Court held that the design changes offered in evidence were not excludable under Rule 407 because they had been ordered before the accident. However, the Court found there was no abuse of discretion in excluding them under Rule 403.

Kaczmarek v. Allied Chem. Corp., 836 F.2d 1055 (7th Cir. 1987) : In an action by a truck driver who was doused while unloading sulfuric acid, the Court declined to create an exception to Rule 407 for remedial measures ordered before but implemented following an accident.

Kociemba v. G.D. Searle & Co., 683 F. Supp. 1579 (D. Minn. 1988) : In an action for injuries from an intrauterine device received in June 1977, the defendants moved in limine to exclude mention of a November 1977 warning issued pursuant to the Food & Drug Administration's May 1977 regulation. The motion was denied, both because the defendant knew in May that a warning would be required and the policy of the Rule "is inapplicable when the determination to make the change is made prior to a plaintiff's injury," and because the policy is inapplicable when the remedial measure is mandated rather than voluntary.

[18] Remedial Measures Required by Law

Villari v. Terminix Int'l, Inc., 692 F. Supp. 568 (E.D. Pa. 1988) : In a homeowner's action against an exterminator alleging that the defendant contaminated a house, the Court held that evidence that the defendant discontinued use of termiticides was inadmissible. The discontinuation took place at the same time the EPA was negotiating with the primary manufacturer to discontinue their sale. Although the plaintiff argued that the discontinuance was involuntary and that exclusion of evidence of involuntary measures cannot promote safety measures, the Judge observed that the strong policy justification for Rule 407 counseled against exceptions that might deter efforts to remove potential hazards and concluded that voluntariness of a measure should be presumed absent a clear showing of coercion. In this case, the defendant stopped using the products at a time when they could lawfully be used. Thus, the discontinuance was a voluntary subsequent remedial measure.

Chase v. General Motors Corp., 856 F.2d 17 (4th Cir. 1988) : The Court reversed a judgment in a product liability case, finding, inter alia, that evidence of a recall following an accident should not have been admitted.

Rozier v. Ford Motor Co., 573 F.2d 1332 (5th Cir. 1978) : In a wrongful death action alleging the defendant's negligent design of a fuel tank, the Court reversed a judgment for the defendant because the defendant had withheld an engineer's report that should have been disclosed in discovery. The Court said that the report, which discussed alternative fuel tank designs in an apparent effort to anticipate a revised National Highway Traffic Safety Administration standard, would not have been excluded by Rule 407 and that to invoke the exclusionary rule "here is particularly inappropriate since the estimate was prepared not out of a sense of social responsibility but because the remedial measure was to be required in any event by a superior authority."

Kociemba v. G.D. Searle & Co., 683 F. Supp. 1579 (D. Minn. 1988) : In an action for injuries from an intrauterine device received in June 1977, the defendants moved in limine to exclude mention of a November 1977 warning issued pursuant to the Food & Drug Administration's May 1977 regulation. The motion was denied, because the policy of the Rule is inapplicable when the remedial measure is mandated rather than voluntary.

[19] "Remedial Measures" Under the Rule

Prentiss & Carlisle Co. v. Koehring-Waterous Div., 972 F.2d 6 (1st Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the purchaser of a timber harvesting machine that caught fire, holding there was no error in admitting an interoffice memo from the defendant analyzing the cause of the accident, since even though remedial measures followed, the analysis itself was not a remedial measure of the sort excluded by the Rule.

Dow Chem. Corp. v. Weevil-Cide Co., 897 F.2d 481 (10th Cir. 1990) : In an equitable subrogation action brought by the manufacturer of a grain fumigant against the marketer after settlement of product liability claims, the Court held that an internal report on the question whether the manufacturer should withdraw from the market should not have been excluded as evidence of subsequent remedial measures, because the conclusion of the report was that the company should remain in the business, and thus there was nothing in the report to make the harm less likely to occur. In Rocky Mt. Helicopters, Inc. v. Bell Helicopters Textron, n15 the Court affirmed a judgment in a suit by a helicopter buyer and its insurer against a manufacturer that was based upon a jury verdict finding that the buyer and the seller were each negligent. It found that evidence that the manufacturer had conducted a stress study after the accident giving rise to the suit was properly admitted, since Rule 407 "does not read so broadly as to exclude post-accident tests or reports" and "[i]t would strain the spirit of the remedial measure prohibition in Rule 407 to extend its shield to evidence contained in post-event tests or reports."

[20] Safety Policy

In re Air Crash Disaster, 86 F.3d 498 (6th Cir. 1996) : In a suit between the airline and the aircraft manufacturer for contribution and reimbursement for settlements arising from the crash of an airplane on takeoff, the Court held that an internal memorandum dated two months after the crash in which the manufacturer recommended to buyers that they should perform a certain warning system check prior to takeoff was properly excluded under Rule 407. "[A] change in policy is a subsequent remedial measure within the meaning of Rule 407."

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. Werner v. Upjohn Co., 628 F.2d 848 (4th Cir. 1980) .

(n2)Footnote 2. Middleton v. Harris Press & Shear, Inc., 796 F.2d 747 (5th Cir. 1986) .

(n3)Footnote 3. Grenada Steel Indus. v. Alabama Oxygen Co., 695 F.2d 883 (5th Cir. 1983) .

(n4)Footnote 4. Gardner v. Chevron U.S.A., Inc., 675 F.2d 658 (5th Cir. 1982) .

(n5)Footnote 5. Transgo, Inc. v. Ajac Transmission Parts Corp., 768 F.2d 1001 (9th Cir. 1985) .

(n6)Footnote 6. Bickerstaff v. South Cent. Bell Tel. Co., 676 F.2d 163 (5th Cir. 1982) .

(n7)Footnote 7. Kerr-McGee Corp. v. Ma-Ju Marine Servs., 830 F.2d 1332 (5th Cir. 1987) .

(n8)Footnote 8. Dollar v. Long Mfg., N.C., Inc., 561 F.2d 613 (5th Cir. 1977) .

(n9)Footnote 9. Wheeler v. John Deere Co., 862 F.2d 1404 (10th Cir. 1988) .

(n10)Footnote 10. United States Fid. & Guar. Co. v. Baker Material Handling Corp., 62 F.3d 24 (1st Cir. 1995) .

(n11)Footnote 11. Roberts v. Harnischfeger Corp., 901 F.2d 42 (5th Cir. 1989) .

(n12)Footnote 12. Myers v. Pennzoil Co., 889 F.2d 1457 (5th Cir. 1989) .

(n13)Footnote 13. Dixon v. International Harvester Co., 754 F.2d 573 (5th Cir. 1985) .

(n14)Footnote 14. In re Aircrash in Bali, Indonesia, 871 F.2d 812 (9th Cir. 1989) .

(n15)Footnote 15. Rocky Mt. Helicopters, Inc. v. Bell Helicopters Textron, 805 F.2d 907 (10th Cir. 1986) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 407 RULE 407

2-407 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 407.04

407.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Advisory Committee's Note

The rule incorporates conventional doctrine which excludes evidence of subsequent remedial measures as proof of an admission of fault. The rule rests on two grounds. (1) The conduct is not in fact an admission, since the conduct is equally consistent with injury by mere accident or through contributory negligence. Or, as Baron Bramwell put it, the rule rejects the notion that "because the world gets wiser as it gets older, therefore it was foolish before." Hart v. Lancashire & Yorkshire Ry. Co., 21 L.T.R.N.S. 261, 263 (1869). Under a liberal theory of relevancy this ground alone would not support exclusion as the inference is still a possible one. (2) The other, and more impressive, ground for exclusion rests on a social policy of encouraging people to take, or at least not discouraging them from taking, steps in furtherance of added safety. The courts have applied this principle to exclude evidence of subsequent repairs, installation of safety devices, changes in company rules, and discharge of employees, and the language of the present rule is broad enough to encompass all of them. See Falknor, Extrinsic Policies Affecting Admissibility, 10 Rutgers L. Rev. 574, 590 (1956).

The second sentence of the rule directs attention to the limitations of the rule. Exclusion is called for only when the evidence of subsequent remedial measures is offered as proof of negligence or culpable conduct. In effect it rejects the suggested inference that fault is admitted. Other purposes are, however, allowable, including ownership or control, existence of duty, and feasibility of precautionary measures, if controverted, and impeachment. 2 Wigmore § 283; Annot., 64 A.L.R.2d 1296 . Two recent federal cases are illustrative. Boeing Airplane Co. v. Brown, 291 F.2d 310 (9th Cir. 1961) , an action against an airplane manufacturer for using an allegedly defectively designed alternator shaft which caused a plane crash, upheld the admission of evidence of subsequent design modification for the purpose of showing that design changes and safeguards were feasible. And Powers v. J. B. Michael & Co., 329 F.2d 674 (6th Cir. 1964) , an action against a road contractor for negligent failure to put out warning signs, sustained the admission of evidence that defendant subsequently put out signs to show that the portion of the road in question was under defendant's control. The requirement that the other purpose be controverted calls for automatic exclusion unless a genuine issue be present and allows the opposing party to lay the groundwork for exclusion by making an admission. Otherwise the factors of undue prejudice, confusion of issues, misleading the jury, and waste of time remain for consideration under Rule 403.

For comparable rules, see Uniform Rule 51; California Evidence Code § 1151; Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60-451; New Jersey Evidence Rule 51.

[2] 1997 Amendment Advisory Committee's Note

1997 Amendment Advisory Committee's Note

The amendment to Rule 407 makes two changes in the rule. First, the words "an injury or harm allegedly caused by" were added to clarify that the rule applies only to changes made after the occurrence that produced the damages giving rise to the action. Evidence of measures taken by the defendant prior to the "event" causing "injury or harm" do not fall within the exclusionary scope of Rule 407 even if they occurred after the manufacture or design of the product. See Chase v. General Motors Corp., 856 F.2d 17, 21-22 (4th Cir. 1988) .

Second, Rule 407 has been amended to provide that evidence of subsequent remedial measures may not be used to prove "a defect in a product or its design, or that a warning or instruction should have accompanied a product." This amendment adopts the view of the majority of the circuits that have interpreted Rule 407 to apply to products liability cases. See Raymond v. Raymond Corp., 938 F.2d 1518, 1522 (1st Cir. 1991) ; In re Joint Eastern District and Southern District Asbestos Litigation v. Armstrong World Industries, Inc., 995 F.2d 343 (2d Cir. 1993) ; Cann v. Ford Motor Co., 658 F.2d 54, 60 (2d Cir. 1981) , cert. denied, 456 U.S. 960 (1982) ; Kelly v. Crown Equipment Co., 970 F.2d 1273, 1275 (3d Cir. 1992) ; Werner v. Upjohn Co., 628 F.2d 848 (4th Cir. 1980) , cert. denied, 449 U.S. 1080 (1981) ; Grenada Steel Industries, Inc., v. Alabama Oxygen Co., Inc., 695 F.2d 883 (5th Cir. 1983) ; Bauman v. Volkswagenwerk Aktiengesellschaft, 621 F.2d 230, 232 (6th Cir. 1980) ; Flaminio v. Honda Motor Company, Ltd., 733 F.2d 463, 469 (7th Cir. 1984) ; Gauthier v. AMF, Inc., 788 F.2d 634, 636-637 (9th Cir. 1986) .

Although this amendment adopts a uniform federal rule, it should be noted that evidence of subsequent remedial measures may be admissible pursuant to the second sentence of Rule 407. Evidence of subsequent remedial measures that is not barred by Rule 407 may still be subject to exclusion on Rule 403 grounds when the dangers of prejudice or confusion substantially outweigh the probative value of the evidence.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
Supp. To CHAPTER 407 RULE 407

2-407 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 407, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 407. Subsequent Remedial Measures	Rule 407. Subsequent Remedial Measures
When, after an injury or harmful-	When measures are taken that would lege dly caus ed by an even t, mea sure s are take n that, if take n pre- vi- ousl y, wou ld have mad e the in- jury or har m less likel y to oc- cur, evid ence of the sub- se- quen t mea sure s is not ad- miss have mad e an earli er in- jury or har m less likel y to oc- cur, evid ence of the sub- se- quen t mea sure s is not ad- miss ible to prov e:

ible to prove negligence, culpable conduct, a defect in a product, a defect in a product's design, or a need for a warning or instruction. This rule does not require the exclusion of evidence of subsequen t mea sure s whe n offer ed for an-other purpose

,
such as prov ing own ership, control, or feasibil-ity
of precaution-ary mea sure s, if controv er-ted,
or impeac hme nt.

- negligenc
e;

- culpable conduct;
- a defect in a product or its design; or
- a need for a warning or instruction.

But the court may admit this evidence for another purpose, such as impeachment or -- if dispute

d -- prov ing own ership,
control,
or
the feasibil-ity
of precaution-ary mea sure
s.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 407 has been amended as part of the general restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Rule 407 previously provided that evidence was not excluded if offered for a purpose not explicitly prohibited by the Rule. To improve the language of the Rule, it now provides that the court may admit evidence if offered for a permissible purpose. There is no intent to change the process for admitting evidence covered by the Rule. It remains the case that if offered for an impermissible purpose, it must be excluded, and if offered for a purpose not barred by the Rule, its admissibility remains governed by the general principles of Rules 402, 403, 801, etc.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
Supp. To CHAPTER 407 RULE 407

2-407 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 407.03

Supp. to § 407.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[2.1] Contract Action [Go To Main]

Brazos R. Auth. v. GE Ionics, Inc., 469 F.3d 416 (5th Cir. 2006) : The plaintiff sued for breach of warranty after a retrofitted desalinization plant supplied by the defendants suffered several fires. Vacating a judgment for the defendants, the Court held that it was error to exclude, on Rule 407 grounds, evidence of a defendant's documents showing its investigations of and recognition of the problems with the plant components at issue. First, Rule 407 is directed at safety-related harms, not the failure of a product to perform as promised, which was involved in this case. Second, Rule 407 bars only evidence of remedial measures to prove culpability, and this evidence would have been relevant to rebut a defense contention that the fires were caused by the plaintiff's poor maintenance. Finally, the Rule bars only evidence of "remedial measures," and the excluded documents detailed investigations, which by themselves to not make the accident less likely to occur.

Pastor v. State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 487 F.3d 1042 (7th Cir. 2007) : A dispute arose in this class action over the meaning of the term "day" in an insurance contract. The plaintiff's interpretation relied on a subsequent version of the clause in which State Farm made explicit that "day" means 24 hours. The plaintiff contended that this change amounted to a "confession" that her interpretation of the original clause was correct. The Court rejected the argument, reasoning that the change was "[o]bviously ... not a confession," and "to use at a trial a revision in a contract to argue the meaning of the original version would violate Rule 407 of the Federal Rules of Evidence, the subsequent-repairs rule, by discouraging efforts to clarify contractual obligations, thus perpetuating any confusion caused by unclarified language in the contract. Rule 407 is not limited to 'repair' in the literal sense." The problem with the Court's analysis is that Rule 407 applies to actions taken after "an injury or harm allegedly caused by an event." This language does not appear applicable to a breach of contract action in which the dispute is over the meaning of a contractual provision.

[3.1] Discharging Responsible Employee [Go To Main]

Nolan v. Memphis City Schools, 589 F.3d 257 (6th Cir. 2009) : Affirming judgment for the defendants in an action by a high school basketball player and his father who alleged excessive use of corporal punishment against the player, the Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence that the high school principal and a coach were no longer employed at the high school: "Evidence that an employer subsequently discharged an employee accused of causing a plaintiff's injury may be properly excluded under Rule 407."

[8] Feasibility [Go To Main]

Baker v. Canadian Nat'l/Ill. Cent. R.R., 536 F.3d 357 (5th Cir. 2008) : Affirming judgment for the defendant in an action brought by a workman injured in a grade-crossing collision with a train, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence that the defendant installed lights and gates at the crossing two years after the accident. The plaintiff argued that the door was opened to the evidence by a locomotive engineer's testimony that "gates are probably not as safe as just a stop sign and crossbuck" and that any crossing design expert who believes otherwise "could come ride that train with me and they will see I'm right." The Court, however, "decline[d] to analogize the analysis of ... numerous experts [in another case] to the lone opinion of Illinois Central's locomotive engineer, a lay witness." It also noted that "when the decision to admit or exclude evidence of a design change is a close call, a district court's decision to exclude the evidence is within its discretion."

[9] Impeachment or Rebuttal [Go To Main]

[c] Impeachment or Rebuttal -- Evidence Excludable or Required To Be Excluded

Henning v. Union Pac. R.R., 530 F.3d 1206 (10th Cir. 2008) : In a suit by the estate of a motorist whose car collided with the defendant's train, the Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant on claims relating to the adequacy of warning devices based on federal preemption. It held that evidence that the railroad installed lights and gates after the accident was properly excluded. The negligence claim as to the warning devices was preempted, so whether another type of warning device would be safer was irrelevant, and the railroad did not controvert control or feasibility. The Court agreed that the estate's attempt to offer the evidence as impeachment evidence was "nothing more than an attempt to circumvent the preempted claim challenging the adequacy of warning devices at the grade crossing."

[d] Impeachment or Rebuttal -- Product Liability Cases

Minter v. Prime Equip. Co., 451 F.3d 1196 (10th Cir. 2006) : In a product liability action for injuries incurred in a fall from a scissor lift, the plaintiff offered evidence that after the accident the defendant modified the lift in a way that would have prevented the accident. The Court affirmed exclusion of this evidence under Rule 407, and rejected the plaintiff's argument that the impeachment exception applied. The Court noted that the impeachment exception "must be read narrowly, lest it swallow the rule. Applied loosely, any evidence of subsequent remedial measures might be thought to contradict and so in a sense impeach a party's testimony." Thus, it is "confined to evidence of subsequent remedial measures that is necessary to prevent the jury from being misled." Here, the defendant's witness testified that the condition of the scissor lift at the time of the accident was "basically equivalent" to the modification subsequently implemented by the defendant; the witness did not testify that such a modification would have been unsafe or would not have prevented the accident, so the exception did not apply.

[10.1] Misrepresentation or Concealment of Negligence [Go To Main]

Trans-Spec Truck Serv., Inc. v. Caterpillar Inc., 524 F.3d 315 (1st Cir. 2008) : A buyer of custom-built trucks sued the engine manufacturer after the engines proved defective. Breach of warranty claims were dismissed as time-barred and summary judgment was granted for the defendant on a negligence claim because the warranty for the engines disclaimed liability for negligence. The plaintiff argued that the exclusionary clause was void as unconscionable because the defendant had misrepresented the quality of its engines or concealed their negligent design. To prove the design was negligent, the plaintiff offered evidence that the defendant subsequently obtained a patent for an improved version of the part at issue. Affirming, the Court upheld rejection of the evidence, noting that the defendant's "effort to improve on a piece of equipment can not be viewed as evidence that unimproved equipment was negligently designed or manufactured."

[11] Product Liability Cases [Go To Main]

Chlopek v. Federal Ins. Co., 499 F.3d 692 (7th Cir. 2007) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendants in a product liability action arising from injuries allegedly caused by a device that delivers cooling therapy to postoperative patients. It found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence that the manufacturer changed the warning label some time after the plaintiff's injury: Although the plaintiff argued that the change was not prompted by safety concerns, the Court noted that Rule 407 does not speak to the motive for the change but only whether it "would have made the injury or harm less likely to occur."

[16] Remedial Measures by Third Party [Go To Main]

Millennium Partners, L.P. v. Colmar Storage, LLC, 494 F.3d 1293 (11th Cir. 2007) : Affirming a judgment for coffee traders on a bailment claim against a warehouseman for damage to bags of coffee beans, the Court held there was no error in allowing the tenant who leased the warehouse after the defendant vacated the premises to testify that he required the landlord to install new basins, pumps, and drains, as "Rule 407 does not apply to a remedial measure that was taken without the voluntary participation of the defendant."

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 408 RULE 408

2-408 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 408.syn

§ 408.syn Synopsis to Chapter 408: RULE 408

408.01 Official Text

408.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Rationale for the Rule

[2] The 2006 Amendment to Rule 408

[3] Scope of the Rule

[4] Evaluative Reports

[5] Relationship to Other Rules and Statutes

[6] Use By Party Making Settlement Offer

[7] Applicability to Criminal Cases

408.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Ambiguity of "Settlement"

[2] Appellate Review

[3] Bad Faith Insurance Denial

[4] Bias and Impeachment Evidence

[5] Consent Decrees

[6] Criminal Cases

[7] Damage Issues

[8] "Dispute"

[9] Foreign Law

[10] Instructions Concerning Missing Parties

[11] Internal Documents

[12] Mitigation of Damages

[13] Notice and Knowledge

[14] Offer Made Before Claim Disputed

[15] Offers To Settle

[a] By Defendant

[b] Offers To Settle -- By Plaintiff

[c] Offers To Settle -- Required by Law

[16] Relationship to Rule 403

[17] Settlement by Nonparty

[18] Settlement -- Exclusion Required or Permitted

[a] Inadmissible to Prove Invalidity of Claim

[b] Settlement -- Exclusion Required or Permitted -- Inadmissible to Prove Liability

[19] Special Circumstances of Admissibility

[a] Miscellaneous

[b] Special Circumstances of Admissibility -- Negotiations as Basis for Estoppel

[c] Special Circumstances of Admissibility -- Settlement Agreement in Issue

[d] Special Circumstances of Admissibility -- State Law

[20] Statements and Materials in Settlement Negotiations

[21] Statute of Frauds Defense

[22] Statute of Limitations Defense

[23] Undisputed Claims

408.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

[2] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

[3] Report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary

[4] Report of the House and Senate Conferees

[5] Citations to Hearings and Debates

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 408 RULE 408

2-408 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 408.01

408.01 Official Text

[Go To Supp]

Rule 408. Compromise and Offers to Compromise

Evidence of (1) furnishing or offering or promising to furnish, or (2) accepting or offering or promising to accept, a valuable consideration in compromising or attempting to compromise a claim which was disputed as to either validity or amount, is not admissible to prove liability for or invalidity of the claim or its amount. Evidence of conduct or statements made in compromise negotiations is likewise not admissible. This rule does not require the exclusion of any evidence otherwise discoverable merely because it is presented in the course of compromise negotiations. This rule also does not require exclusion when the evidence is offered for another purpose, such as proving bias or prejudice of a witness, negativing a contention of undue delay, or proving an effort to obstruct a criminal investigation or prosecution.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 408 RULE 408

2-408 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 408.02

408.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Rationale for the Rule

It has long been the policy of the law to promote settlements. Rule 408 effectuates this policy by providing that in most cases an offer of settlement (and statements made during settlement negotiations) will be excluded from trial when offered to show the validity or amount of a claim. The Federal Rule also recognizes, as a subsidiary rationale, that compromise evidence often has little or no probative value when used to prove the validity or amount of a claim. An offer to compromise may well represent a desire to buy peace rather than an admission of liability. n1

At common law, a line was drawn between offers to settle and admissions of fact made during settlement negotiations. Factual admissions could be introduced against the party making the admissions unless they were inextricably bound up with offers to settle. As a result, negotiations were often couched in hypothetical form, purely to avoid factual admissions. This created a trap for the unwary. It also impeded the free-flowing, informal discussion that is often necessary for effective settlement negotiations. The Federal Rule avoids these problems by excluding statements made in settlement negotiations when offered to prove the validity or amount of a claim. An amendment to Rule 408, discussed below, restores at least a part of the common-law distinction when a statement in civil compromise negotiations is offered as an admission of guilt at a subsequent criminal trial.

[2] The 2006 Amendment to Rule 408

The Advisory Committee has proposed an extensive amendment to Rule 408. The amendment reorganizes the Rule and solves various disputes in the Courts about its meaning and scope. The amendment will become law on December 1, 2006. The amendment was made necessary because Federal Courts have long been divided on three important questions concerning the scope of Rule 408:

(1) Some courts hold that evidence of compromise is admissible against the settling party in subsequent criminal litigation while others hold that compromise evidence is excluded in subsequent criminal litigation when offered as an admission of guilt.

(2) Some courts hold that statements in compromise can be admitted to impeach by way of contradiction or prior inconsistent statement. Other courts disagree, noting that if statements in compromise could be admitted for contradiction or prior inconsistent statement, this would chill settlement negotiations, in violation of the policy behind the Rule.

(3) Some courts hold that offers in compromise can be admitted in favor of the party who made the offer; these courts reason that the policy of the rule, to encourage settlements, is not at stake where the party who makes the statement or offer is the one who wants to admit it at trial. Other courts hold that settlement statements and offers are never admissible to prove the validity or the amount of the claim, regardless of who offers the evidence. These courts reason that the text of the Rule does not provide an exception based on identity of the proffering party, and that admitting compromise evidence would raise the risk that lawyers would have to testify about the settlement negotiations, thus risking disqualification.

Over a number of meetings, the Advisory Committee unanimously agreed that Rule 408 should be amended to (1) limit the impeachment exception to use for bias, and (2) exclude compromise evidence even if offered by the party who made an offer of settlement. The reason for the former amendment is that a broader impeachment exception is likely to chill settlement negotiations, as the parties may fear that anything they say could somehow be found inconsistent with a later statement at trial. The reason for the latter amendment is that a rule permitting a party to admit its own statements and offers in compromise could result in the strategic manufacturing of evidence, and also could lead to attorneys having to testify about just what statements and offers were made in alleged compromise.

The remaining issue -- whether compromise evidence should be admissible in subsequent criminal cases -- was the subject of extensive discussion at Evidence Rules Committee meetings over a number of years. At all of these meetings, the Justice Department representative expressed concern that some statements made in civil compromise (e.g., to tax investigators) could be critical evidence needed in a criminal case to prove that the defendant had committed a crime. But other Committee members argued that any rule permitting compromise evidence to be admitted in a criminal case would deter the settlement of civil cases.

Eventually a compromise was reached that distinguished between statements made in settlement negotiations (admissible in a subsequent criminal case) and the offer or acceptance of the settlement itself (inadmissible in a subsequent criminal case if offered to prove the validity or amount of the claim). It was noted -- from the personal experience of several lawyers -- that a defendant may decide to settle a civil case even though it strenuously denies wrongdoing. In such cases the settlement itself should not be admissible in criminal cases because the settlement is more a recognition of reality than an admission of criminality. Moreover, if the settlement itself could be admitted as evidence of guilt, defendants may choose not to settle, and this could delay needed compensation to those allegedly injured by the defendant's activities. So the Committee voted to release a proposed amendment to Rule 408 that would exclude offers and acceptances of settlement in criminal cases, but that would admit in such cases conduct and statements made in the course of settlement negotiations. The Standing Committee approved the proposal for release for public comment.

The public comment on the proposed amendment to Rule 408 was negative. Criticisms included: (1) the rule would deter settlement discussions; (2) it would create a trap for the poorly counseled and the otherwise unwary, who might not know that statements of fault made in a settlement of a civil case might later be used against them in a criminal case; (3) it would allow private parties to abuse the rule by threatening to give over to the government alleged statements of fault made during private settlement negotiations; (4) it would result in attorneys having to become witnesses against their civil clients in a subsequent criminal case, as a lawyer may be called to testify about a statement that either the lawyer or the client made in a settlement negotiation; and (5) it would raise a problematic distinction between protected offers and unprotected statements and conduct -- a distinction that was rejected as unworkable when Rule 408 was originally enacted. The public comment supported a rule providing that statements as well as offers and acceptances made during compromise negotiations are never admissible in a subsequent criminal case when offered to prove the validity or amount of the claim.

In reviewing this public comment, most of the Evidence Rules Committee members expressed significant concern over and sympathy with the negative public comment. But the DOJ representative argued at length that the public comment was misguided. He made the following points: (1) the comment overstates the protection of the existing rule, which prohibits compromise evidence in criminal cases only when it is offered to prove the validity or amount of the claim; (2) the comment fails to note that several circuits already employ a rule that admits compromise evidence in criminal cases even when offered as an admission of guilt; (3) the comment fails to take account of the fact that many statements made to government enforcement officials in an arguable effort to settle a civil regulatory matter are essential for proving the defendant's guilt in a subsequent criminal case -- the primary example being a statement to a revenue agent that is later critical evidence against the defendant in a criminal tax prosecution; and (4) the rule preferred by the public comment would allow a defendant to make a statement in compromise and later testify in a criminal case inconsistently with that statement, free from impeachment.

Extensive discussion ensued in response to the DOJ representative's presentation in favor of the proposed amendment as issued for public comment. Several committee members were sympathetic to the government's position that statements of fault made to government regulators would provide critical evidence of guilt in a subsequent criminal prosecution. They noted, however, that the government's concerns did not apply to statements made in compromise between private parties. The practicing lawyers on the Committee noted that it was often necessary for a client to apologize to a private adversary in order to obtain a favorable settlement. If that apology could later be referred to the government and used as an admission of guilt, it is highly likely that such an apology would never be made, and many cases could not be settled. In light of this concern, a compromise provision was proposed that would permit statements in compromise to be admitted as evidence of guilt, but only when made in an action brought by a government regulatory agency.

The reworked amendment was approved by the Advisory Committee, the Standing Committee, the Judicial Conference, and the Supreme Court. The amendment and the accompanying Committee Note, to be effective December 1, 2006, provides as follows:

Rule 408. Compromise and Offers to Compromise

(a) Prohibited uses. -- Evidence of the following is not admissible on behalf of any party, when offered to prove liability for, invalidity of, or amount of a claim that was disputed as to validity or amount, or to impeach through a prior inconsistent statement or contradiction:

(1) furnishing or offering or promising to furnishThe material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [,] --or The material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [(2)] accepting or offering or promising to acceptThe material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [,] --a valuable consideration in compromising or attempting to compromise The material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [a] the claim The material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [which was disputed as to either validity or amount]; and, The material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [is not admissible to prove liability for or invalidity of the claim or its amount. Evidence of]

(2) conduct or statements made in compromise negotiations The material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [is likewise not admissible] regarding the claim, except when offered in a criminal case and the negotiations related to a claim by a public office or agency in the exercise of regulatory, investigative, or enforcement authority.

The material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [This rule does not require the exclusion of any evidence otherwise discoverable merely because it is presented in the course of compromise negotiations.]

(b) Permitted uses. -- This rule The material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [also] does not require exclusion The material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [when] if the evidence is offered for The material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [another purpose, such as] purposes not prohibited by subdivision (a). Examples of permissible purposes include provinga witness's bias or prejudice The material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [of a witness,] ; The material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [negativing] negating a contention of undue delayThe material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [,] ; The material within the following brackets is overstruck in the original. [or] and proving an effort to obstruct a criminal investigation or prosecution.

Committee Note

Rule 408 has been amended to settle some questions in the courts about the scope of the Rule, and to make it easier to read and apply. First, the amendment provides that Rule 408 does not prohibit the introduction in a criminal case of statements or conduct during compromise negotiations regarding a civil dispute by a government regulatory, investigative, or enforcement agency. See, e.g., United States v. Prewitt, 34 F.3d 436, 439 (7th Cir. 1994) (admissions of fault made in compromise of a civil securities enforcement action were admissible against the accused in a subsequent criminal action for mail fraud). Where an individual makes a statement in the presence of government agents, its subsequent admission in a criminal case should not be unexpected. The individual can seek to protect against subsequent disclosure through negotiation and agreement with the civil regulator, or an attorney for the government.

Statements made in compromise negotiations of a claim by a government agency may be excluded in criminal cases where the circumstances so warrant under Rule 403. For example, if an individual was unrepresented at the time the statement was made in a civil enforcement proceeding, its probative value in a subsequent criminal case may be minimal. But there is no absolute exclusion imposed by Rule 408.

In contrast, statements made during compromise negotiations of other disputed claims are not admissible in subsequent criminal litigation, when offered to prove liability for, invalidity of, or amount of those claims. When private parties enter into compromise negotiations they cannot protect against the subsequent use of statements in criminal cases by way of private ordering. The inability to guarantee protection against subsequent use could lead to parties refusing to admit fault, even if by doing so they could favorably settle private matters. Such a chill on settlement negotiations would be contrary to the policy of Rule 408.

The amendment distinguishes statements and conduct (such as a direct admission of fault) made in compromise negotiations of a civil claim by a government agency from an offer or acceptance of a compromise of such a claim. An offer or acceptance of a compromise of a civil claim is excluded under the Rule if offered against the defendant as an admission of fault. In that case, the predicate for the evidence would be that the defendant, by compromising with the government agency, has admitted the validity and amount of the civil claim, and that this admission has sufficient probative value to be considered as proof of guilt. But unlike a direct statement of fault, an offer or acceptance of a compromise is not very probative of the defendant's guilt. Moreover, admitting such an offer or acceptance could deter defendants from settling a civil regulatory action, for fear of evidentiary use in a subsequent criminal action. See, e.g., Fishman, Jones on Evidence, Civil and Criminal, § 22:16 at 199, n.83 (7th ed. 2000) ("A target of a potential criminal investigation may be unwilling to settle civil claims against him if by doing so he increases the risk of prosecution and conviction.").

The amendment retains the language of the original rule that bars compromise evidence only when offered as evidence of the "validity", "invalidity", or "amount" of the disputed claim. The intent is to retain the extensive case law finding Rule 408 inapplicable when compromise evidence is offered for a purpose other than to prove the validity, invalidity, or amount of a disputed claim. See, e.g., Athey v. Farmers Ins. Exchange, 234 F.3d 357 (8th Cir. 2000) (evidence of settlement offer by insurer was properly admitted to prove insurer's bad faith); Coakley & Williams v. Structural Concrete Equip., 973 F.2d 349 (4th Cir. 1992) (evidence of settlement is not precluded by Rule 408 where offered to prove a party's intent with respect to the scope of a release); Cates v. Morgan Portable Bldg. Corp., 780 F.2d 683 (7th Cir. 1985) (Rule 408 does not bar evidence of a settlement when offered to prove a breach of the settlement agreement, as the purpose of the evidence is to prove the fact of settlement as opposed to the validity or amount of the underlying claim); Uforma/Shelby Bus. Forms, Inc. v. NLRB, 111 F.3d 1284 (6th Cir. 1997) (threats made in settlement negotiations were admissible; Rule 408 is inapplicable when the claim is based upon a wrong that is committed during the course of settlement negotiations). So for example, Rule 408 is inapplicable if offered to show that a party made fraudulent statements in order to settle a litigation.

The amendment does not affect the case law providing that Rule 408 is inapplicable when evidence of the compromise is offered to prove notice. See, e.g., United States v. Austin, 54 F.3d 394 (7th Cir. 1995) (no error to admit evidence of the defendant's settlement with the FTC, because it was offered to prove that the defendant was on notice that subsequent similar conduct was wrongful); Spell v. McDaniel, 824 F.2d 1380 (4th Cir. 1987) (in a civil rights action alleging that an officer used excessive force, a prior settlement by the City of another brutality claim was properly admitted to prove that the City was on notice of aggressive behavior by police officers).

The amendment prohibits the use of statements made in settlement negotiations when offered to impeach by prior inconsistent statement or through contradiction. Such broad impeachment would tend to swallow the exclusionary rule and would impair the public policy of promoting settlements. See McCormick on Evidence at 186 (5th ed. 1999) ("Use of statements made in compromise negotiations to impeach the testimony of a party, which is not specifically treated in Rule 408, is fraught with danger of misuse of the statements to prove liability, threatens frank interchange of information during negotiations, and generally should not be permitted."). See also EEOC v. Gear Petroleum, Inc., 948 F.2d 1542 (10th Cir. 1991) (letter sent as part of settlement negotiation cannot be used to impeach defense witnesses by way of contradiction or prior inconsistent statement; such broad impeachment would undermine the policy of encouraging uninhibited settlement negotiations).

The amendment makes clear that Rule 408 excludes compromise evidence even when a party seeks to admit its own settlement offer or statements made in settlement negotiations. If a party were to reveal its own statement or offer, this could itself reveal the fact that the adversary entered into settlement negotiations. The protections of Rule 408 cannot be waived unilaterally because the Rule, by definition, protects both parties from having the fact of negotiation disclosed to the jury. Moreover, proof of statements and offers made in settlement would often have to be made through the testimony of attorneys, leading to the risks and costs of disqualification. See generally Pierce v. F.R. Tripler & Co., 955 F.2d 820, 828 (2d Cir. 1992) (settlement offers are excluded under Rule 408 even if it is the offeror who seeks to admit them; noting that the "widespread admissibility of the substance of settlement offers could bring with it a rash of motions for disqualification of a party's chosen counsel who would likely become a witness at trial").

The sentence of the Rule referring to evidence "otherwise discoverable" has been deleted as superfluous. See, e.g., Advisory Committee Note to Maine Rule of Evidence 408 (refusing to include the sentence in the Maine version of Rule 408 and noting that the sentence "seems to state what the law would be if it were omitted"); Advisory Committee Note to Wyoming Rule of Evidence 408 (refusing to include the sentence in Wyoming Rule 408 on the ground that it was "superfluous"). The intent of the sentence was to prevent a party from trying to immunize admissible information, such as a pre-existing document, through the pretense of disclosing it during compromise negotiations. See Ramada Development Co. v. Rauch, 644 F.2d 1097 (5th Cir. 1981) . But even without the sentence, the Rule cannot be read to protect pre-existing information simply because it was presented to the adversary in compromise negotiations.

CHANGES MADE AFTER PUBLICATION AND COMMENTS

In response to public comment, the proposed amendment was changed to provide that statements and conduct during settlement negotiations are to be admissible in subsequent criminal litigation only when made during settlement discussions of a claim brought by a government regulatory agency. Stylistic changes were made in accordance with suggestions from the Style Subcommittee of the Standing Committee. The Committee Note was altered to accord with the change in the text, and also to clarify that fraudulent statements made during settlement negotiations are not protected by the Rule.

"Clean Copy" of the Amendment to Rule 408

What follows is a "clean copy" of the amended rule as it will exist on December 1, 2006:

> (a) Prohibited uses. -- Evidence of the following is not admissible on behalf of any party, when offered to prove liability for, invalidity of, or amount of a claim that was disputed as to validity or amount, or to impeach through a prior inconsistent statement or contradiction:
>
> (1) furnishing or offering or promising to furnish -- or accepting or offering or promising to accept -- a valuable consideration in compromising or attempting to compromise the claim; and
>
> (2) conduct or statements made in compromise negotiations regarding the claim, except when offered in a criminal case and the negotiations related to a claim by a public office or agency in the exercise of regulatory, investigative, or enforcement authority.
>
> (b) Permitted uses. -- This rule does not require exclusion if the evidence is offered for purposes not prohibited by subdivision (a). Examples of permissible purposes include proving a witness's bias or prejudice; negating a contention of undue delay; and proving an effort to obstruct a criminal investigation or prosecution.

[3] Scope of the Rule

Six general points can be made about the scope of the Rule:

(1) Compromise evidence is inadmissible only when offered to prove liability for or invalidity of a claim or its amount. It is not inadmissible under the Rule when offered for some other purpose, such as proving the bias or prejudice of a witness, n2 or some separate wrong. n3 Of course, the evidence still might be excludable under Rule 403. See the discussion of relationship to other Rules, at § 408.02[5].

(2) If the "other purpose" is really an issue that bears ultimately on an element of liability, then the rule of exclusion will apply. For example, in Trebor Sportswear Co. v. The Limited Stores, Inc., 865 F.2d 506 (2d Cir. 1989) , the defendant interposed a statute of frauds defense to the plaintiffs' breach of contract claim. In response, the plaintiffs offered a proposed draft agreement written by the defendant after the dispute between the parties had already arisen. The draft agreement was sent to "resolve the current issues and allow us to go forward with our business relationship," and legal action was threatened if the plaintiffs did not sign the agreement. The plaintiffs argued that the draft agreement was admissible despite Rule 408, since it was offered not to prove the validity of the claim, but only in order to meet the statute of frauds defense. But the Court rejected this argument, on the ground that "satisfying the statute of frauds was the first step to proving, ultimately, the validity of [the] claims of breach of contract." The Court concluded that "since the two questions were so closely intertwined, admission of the documents even initially for the purpose of meeting the statute of frauds requirement would, under the circumstances of this case, militate against the public policy considerations which favor settlement negotiations and which underlie Rule 408."

(3) Statements are excluded under the Rule only when they relate to a "claim which was disputed" as to either validity or amount at the time the statements were made. For example, where a debtor admits the validity and amount of a debt, and simply tries to negotiate debt relief or a payment plan, the statements made pursuant to such negotiations are not protected by the Rule. n4 See the fourth paragraph of the original Advisory Committee's Note, at § 408.04[1]. Similarly, statements or conduct occurring before a controversy has even arisen are not excluded by the Rule. n5 The Courts appear to agree on the following propositions in construing the term "claim which was disputed" in Rule 408: (a) communications and offers can be protected even though litigation has not yet been filed; (b) business negotiations, occurring before any clear disagreement between the parties, are not protected; and (c) communications are protected if made after a clear difference of opinion has been expressed by both parties.

The case that best summarizes the case law on "claim which was disputed" is Affiliated Manufacturers, Inc. v. Aluminum Co. of America, 56 F.3d 521, 527 (3rd Cir. 1995) . This was an action for payment of certain invoices. The plaintiff sought to exclude portions of correspondence, memoranda, and deposition testimony referring to compromises. The defendant argued that these were just business communications and that the discussions between the parties "had not crystallized to the point of threatened litigation." But the Court noted that Rule 408 requires only "an apparent difference of view between the parties concerning the validity or amount of a claim." The Court concluded that "the Rule 408 exclusion applies where an actual dispute or a difference of opinion exists, rather than when discussions crystallize to the point of threatened litigation" and that the Rule is triggered when there is "a clear difference of opinion between the parties." n6

(4) Rule 408 applies even if the settlement is between a party to the litigation and a nonparty. A party's settlement with another is not admissible to prove the validity or amount of the claim currently before the Court. The Rule is drafted to provide every incentive for compromise, and without such a broad rule of exclusion, litigants would be deterred from free-flowing settlement negotiations where multiple suits have been or might be brought. n7 Similarly, when the parties to a suit have engaged in settlement negotiations in previous related litigation between themselves, the compromise evidence is excluded when offered to prove the validity or amount of the claim currently before the Court. n8

(5) Offers to furnish or to accept valuable consideration are protected, not other offers. But the term "valuable consideration" should be construed broadly to effectuate the Rule's policy of encouraging uninhibited settlement negotiations. For example, offers to apologize, or admit liability without payment of damages, should be considered valuable considerations, because such offers can be legitimate bases for settling a case.

(6) Unconditional offers (i.e., offers made without any condition that a claim be released or defense terminated) are not considered settlement offers, and therefore are not covered by the Rule. n9

[4] Evaluative Reports

In some cases, parties in the course of settlement negotiations mutually retain the services of a consultant, who is commissioned to prepare an independent evaluative report designed to facilitate the settlement process. For example, in a suit arising from a complex securities transaction, the parties might commission an independent accountant to determine whether generally accepted accounting methods were used in the preparation of an important financial statement. The purpose would be to determine the strength of the plaintiff's claim that improper accounting methods were used. In these circumstances, the resulting report should be as protected under Rule 408 as is any statement made by the parties in settlement negotiations. This is because such a report is used by all parties to determine the appropriate settlement, if any. As one Court put it, such a report is "intended to be part of the negotiations toward compromise." n10

[5] Relationship to Other Rules and Statutes

The mere fact that compromise evidence is offered for a "not-for-validity-or-amount of-the-claim" purpose (such as bias) does not mean that it is automatically admissible. The Trial Court still has discretion to exclude compromise evidence under Rule 403 if its probative value for the permissible purpose is substantially outweighed by the risk that the jury will use the compromise evidence as proof of the validity or amount of the claim, even though instructed not to do so. n11

It should be noted that some statutes bar disclosure of settlement-type evidence. These statutes may be more protective than Rule 408, since they may control discovery as well as trial use of evidence. One such statute, 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5(b) (covering EEOC conciliation efforts), is discussed in Branch v. Phillips Petroleum Co., 638 F.2d 873 (5th Cir. 1981) . n12

[6] Use By Party Making Settlement Offer

The policy behind Rule 408 is to assure that statements and offers made in settlement negotiations do not come back to haunt the party who made them. But what if the party who makes a settlement offer wants to use it as evidence at trial? This problem was encountered by the Second Circuit in Pierce v. F.R. Tripler & Co., 955 F.2d 820 (2d Cir. 1992) . Pierce was an employment discrimination suit arising out of the elimination of the plaintiff's position. The employer contended that the plaintiff was the victim of a realignment, not discrimination. The employer sought to introduce the fact that it had offered to settle the case by giving the plaintiff a job in a different subsidiary. The purpose for introducing the offer was to prove the employer's lack of intent to discriminate, and to show that the plaintiff, who rejected the offer, had failed to mitigate damages. The employer argued that the exclusion mandated by Rule 408 was inapplicable because it was designed to protect those who made offers of settlement, not those who received them. In effect the defendant was trying to waive the protection of Rule 408.

Rejecting the defendant's policy argument, the Pierce Court held that settlement offers are subject to Rule 408 even if it is the offeror who seeks to admit them. The Court noted that settlement negotiations are almost always conducted between and among opposing attorneys, and that these attorneys are likely to have different interpretations of the seriousness of offers and negotiations, and are also likely to disagree on what terms were set forth in any proposed settlement. These disputes of fact would have to be resolved by the factfinder, probably through testimony of the attorneys themselves. The Court was thus concerned that the "widespread admissibility of the substance of settlement offers could bring with it a rash of motions for disqualification of a party's chosen counsel who would likely become a witness at trial." The Court concluded that "we prefer to apply Rule 408 as written and exclude evidence of settlement offers to prove liability for or the amount of a claim regardless of which party attempts to offer the evidence."

The 2006 amendment to Rule 408 codifies the result in Pierce and clearly prohibits a party from introducing its own settlement offers and statements made in compromise, when this evidence is offered to prove the validity or amount of a claim.

[7] Applicability to Criminal Cases

A number of cases have held that compromise evidence can be admitted in related criminal litigation. For example, in United States v. Prewitt, 34 F.3d 436 (7th Cir. 1994) , the defendant's securities activity subjected him to a civil investigation by a state securities office and to a criminal investigation for mail fraud. In an attempt to settle the civil suit, the defendant admitted certain conduct; these statements were used against him in the subsequent criminal trial. The Court found no error, holding that Rule 408 does not prevent admissions and statements made in a civil settlement conference from being used in a criminal case. As discussed above, the 2006 amendment to Rule 408 provides that settlement evidence is generally inadmissible in subsequent criminal litigation, with one exception: where the accused previously made a statement admitting criminal liability in the course of settlement discussions with a government regulator, that statement can be offered as an addmission of guilt in the criminal case. But offers to compromise made in the course of civil litigation with a regulator, as well as both statements and offers in compromise of private civil litigation, are not admissible under the amended rule when offered as a recognition of the validity or amount of the civil claim (and therefore as evidence of the validity of the criminal charge).

Of course, compromise negotiations in a civil case might be properly admitted in a criminal case when offered for a purpose other than to show the validity of the civil claim. For example, in United States v. Austin, 54 F.3d 394 (7th Cir. 1995) , the defendant was charged with knowingly buying and selling counterfeit works of art. At an earlier point he had entered into a consent decree with the FTC, under which he admitted to selling forged artwork and promised not to do so in the future; yet he thereafter sold more forgeries. The Court held that the Trial Court did not err in admitting extensive evidence of the FTC settlement, including the terms of the consent decree and the defendant's stipulation admitting to the allegations of the FTC's complaint. Rule 408 did not preclude admission of this evidence because it was offered for purposes other than proving the validity of the FTC's (and hence the government's) claim. Rather, it showed that Austin was on notice that his conduct was wrong when he subsequently sold forged artwork, and it provided important background for the facts alleged in the indictment. n13 Austin is cited favorably in the Committee Note to the 2006 amendment to Rule 408.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. See Martin, Offers of Settlement, N.Y.L.J. Aug. 14, 1992, at 3, col. 1.

(n2)Footnote 2. See, e.g., Bituminous Constr., Inc. v. Rucker Enters., 816 F.2d 965 (4th Cir. 1987) (letters containing settlement offers were properly admitted to show the defendant's understanding of its obligations under a joint check agreement); Reichenbach v. Smith, 528 F.2d 1072 (5th Cir. 1976) (evidence of "Mary Carter" settlement agreements between the plaintiff and other defendants should have been admitted to show the bias of the witness). See also Martin, Offers of Settlement, N.Y.L.J. Aug. 14, 1992, p. 3, col. 1 ("[W]hile FRE 408 may appear at first to be a stringent prohibition on admissibility, in truth it bars evidence only when offered for relatively narrow purposes and otherwise leaves the door open for a trial judge to admit relevant evidence at his or her discretion.").

(n3)Footnote 3. See Carney v. American Univ., 151 F.3d 1090 (D.C. Cir. 1998) (in an action for race discrimination and retaliation, it was error to exclude settlement letters sent by the defendant to the plaintiff; the letters were offered not to prove that the defendant discriminated against the plaintiff, but rather to prove that the defendant committed an entirely separate wrong by conditioning the plaintiff's benefits on a waiver of her constitutional rights).

(n4)Footnote 4. See, e.g., In re B.D. Int'l Discount Corp., 701 F.2d 1071 (2d Cir. 1983) (statements made before bankruptcy, by which the bankrupt sought to arrive at a mutually satisfactory schedule of repayments, were not excluded under Rule 408, since at the time the statements were made the bankrupt did not dispute the debts, but "was simply endeavoring to get more time in which to pay").

(n5)Footnote 5. See, e.g., Deere & Co. v. International Harvester Co., 710 F.2d 1551 (Fed. Cir. 1983) ("Rule 408, on its face, is limited to actual disputes over existing claims and, accordingly, cannot be applicable to an offer, albeit one ultimately rejected, to license an, as yet, uncontested patent."). Compare Affiliated Mfrs., Inc. v. Aluminum Co. of Am., 56 F.3d 521 (3d Cir. 1995) ("the meaning of 'dispute' as employed in the rule includes both litigation and less formal stages of a dispute"; the Trial Court properly "interpreted the scope of the term 'dispute' to include a clear difference of opinion between the parties here concerning payment of two invoices").

(n6)Footnote 6. See also Johnson v. Land O'Lakes, Inc., 181 F.R.D. 388, 392 (N.D. Iowa 1998) , where the Court reviewed the case law and found that while there is a difference in language used by some Courts, the cases can be reconciled by the following standard:

> Thus, the "trigger" for application of Rule 408, the existence of an actual dispute as to existing claims, appears to be whether the parties have rejected each other's claims for performance, or, to put it another way, whether the parties have reached a clear difference of opinion as to what performance is required. When this point is reached depends upon the circumstances, and thus a determination of whether Rule 408 bars admission of discussions cannot be made without hearing evidence as to the context of the challenged discussions.

(n7)Footnote 7. See, e.g., Branch v. Fidelity & Cas. Co., 783 F.2d 1289, 1294 (5th Cir. 1986) ("The spectre of a subsequent use to prejudice a separate and discrete claim is a disincentive which Rule 408 seeks to prevent."); United States v. Contra Costa County Water Dist., 678 F.2d 90 (9th Cir. 1982) (settlement by the plaintiff with another defendant, of a closely related but separate claim, held inadmissible under Rule 408).

(n8)Footnote 8. See, e.g., Fiberglass Insulators, Inc. v. Dupuy, 856 F.2d 652 (4th Cir. 1988) (prior settlement negotiations in related litigation between the parties held inadmissible under Rule 408 in current litigation).

(n9)Footnote 9. See, e.g., Lightfoot v. Union Carbide Corp., 110 F.3d 898 (2d Cir. 1997) (in an employment case, the defendant's unconditional offer to reinstate the plaintiff was admissible, because it could not be considered an offer of settlement or compromise).

(n10)Footnote 10. Blu-J, Inc., v. Kemper C.P.A. Group, 916 F.2d 637, 639 (11th Cir. 1990) (report by an independent accountant concerning an important financial statement was protected by Rule 408, since the parties, while engaged in settlement negotiations, commissioned the accountant to prepare the report in order to determine whether the plaintiff "had a case").

(n11)Footnote 11. See, e.g., Hose v. Chicago Northwestern Transp. Co., 70 F.3d 968 (8th Cir. 1995) (settlement between the plaintiff and two other defendants was properly excluded; although the amounts of the settlements were probative to rebut the plaintiff's claim that certain treatment was not obtained because of its cost, there was no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of the evidence as unduly prejudicial under Rule 403); Myers v. Pennzoil Co., 889 F.2d 1457 (5th Cir. 1989) (Trial Judge did not abuse his discretion in excluding compromise evidence offered to impeach witnesses for bias, where the Trial Judge determined that the probative value of the evidence as to bias was substantially outweighed by the risk of prejudice and confusion); Williams v. Chevron U.S.A., Inc., 875 F.2d 501 (5th Cir. 1989) (no error to exclude the plaintiff's settlement with a third party, even where it was offered to impeach the plaintiff's testimony that he lacked financial means to pay for a surgical procedure; the jury might have "confused" this purpose with the one prohibited by Rule 408, and this risk of confusion justified exclusion under Rule 403).

(n12)Footnote 12. See also 42 U.S.C. § 3610(a) (in connection with disputes under the Fair Housing Act, statements made in informal resolution proceedings are not admissible in subsequent proceedings, without written consent of the parties).

(n13)Footnote 13. See also United States v. Hauert, 40 F.3d 197 (7th Cir. 1994) (in a tax evasion prosecution, the Trial Judge properly admitted evidence that the defendant signed settlement documents with the IRS relating to earlier years in which he abandoned a contention that his wages or salary were not taxable; this was properly admitted to show knowledge on the part of the defendant that his earnings were taxable, not to prove civil tax liability or the amount of such liability).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 408 RULE 408

2-408 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 408.03

408.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Ambiguity of "Settlement"

Winchester Packaging, Inc. v. Mobil Chem. Co., 14 F.3d 316 (7th Cir. 1994) : Where use of the term "settlement" in correspondence between parties to a contract dispute was ambiguous between "to pay a bill" and "to compromise a legal dispute," the Court held there was no abuse of discretion under the circumstances in excluding the correspondence.

[2] Appellate Review

Trans Union Credit Information Co. v. Associated Credit Servs., 805 F.2d 188 (6th Cir. 1986) : In a suit by a computer service company seeking specific performance of an agreement with a credit bureau, the Court, applying the clearly erroneous standard, upheld exclusion of evidence concerning an alleged oral repudiation of the agreement as settlement negotiations.

[3] Bad Faith Insurance Denial

Athey v. Farmers Ins. Exchange, 234 F.3d 357 (8th Cir. 2000) : In an action brought against an insurer for breach of contract and bad faith, the Court affirmed a judgment for the insured. At trial, evidence was submitted that the insurer offered a settlement of the breach of contract claim on the condition that the insured release the bad faith claim. The Court found that Rule 408 did not preclude this evidence. Under the applicable state law, "an insurer's attempt to condition the settlement of a breach of contract claim on the release of a bad faith claim may be used as evidence of bad faith."

Lampliter Dinner Theater v. Liberty Mut. Ins. Co., 792 F.2d 1036 (11th Cir. 1986) : Affirming dismissal of a claim by an insured that the defendant acted in bad faith in denying coverage in two suits against the insured, the Court held that evidence could not be admitted that the defendant ultimately settled the two suits, since such evidence was barred by Rule 408. Moreover, the Court concluded that "an eventual settlement does not indicate that an initial denial of coverage was in bad faith."

[4] Bias and Impeachment Evidence

John McShain, Inc. v. Cessna Aircraft Co., 563 F.2d 632 (3d Cir. 1977) : In an action arising out of two accidents involving a plane purchased by the plaintiff from the defendant, the Court held there was no error in admitting evidence of the plaintiff's entering into a compromise with a company that repaired the plane. The settlement evidence properly showed the bias of an expert witness called by the plaintiff, since a sister corporation of the witness' employer entered into the settlement in exchange for the expert testimony.

Myers v. Pennzoil Co., 889 F.2d 1457 (5th Cir. 1989) : The defendant in this product liability action sought to impeach witnesses called by the plaintiff by showing they had originally been named as defendants and had settled with the plaintiff. The Court held there was no error in excluding the evidence, as it could have led to jury confusion and the defendant was otherwise given wide latitude in bringing out the witnesses' possible bias. In United States Aviation Underwriters, Inc. v. Olympia Wings, Inc., n1 a declaratory judgment action by an insurer to determine whether coverage applied to an accident involving its insured's aircraft, the Court held that evidence the insurer had settled fraud claims against the insured's mechanic was admissible to show that the mechanic, whose testimony had been impeached on cross-examination by showing inconsistencies with his previous deposition, was at trial a more neutral, unbiased witness. In Williams v. Chevron U.S.A., Inc., n2 the Court held that evidence of an employee's settlement with a contractor could be excluded on grounds of likely jury confusion in a suit by the employee against the owner of the platform, even though the evidence was offered to rebut testimony by the employee that he did not have the financial means to pay for a recommended surgical procedure.

Fort v. C. W. Keller Trucking, Inc., 330 F.3d 1006 (7th Cir. 2003) : The plaintiff in a wrongful death action arising from a truck accident had received $2.25 million under a loan receipt agreement with the contractor for which the truck was operating. The agreement released all defendants except the trucking company and provided that the plaintiff would pay the contractor one-third of money recovered from the trucking company or its insurer. At trial the defendant sought to introduce the agreement to impeach a manager for the contractor. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the evidence, since (1) the witness had no personal knowledge of the agreement, (2) the defendant had ample opportunity otherwise to expose the witness' bias resulting from his employer's potential liability, and (3) "the jury might have been unable to limit its consideration of the loan receipt agreement to the issue of bias, and instead inferred that the plaintiff had already been fully compensated for her loss through the loan receipt agreement." In an action by a taxicab passenger against the driver of an auto that struck the cab, Bachenski v. Malnati, 11 F.3d 1371 (7th Cir. 1993) , the Court affirmed exclusion of evidence that the driver and taxicab company had settled a third-party claim against the company with an agreement that the company would pay 90 percent of any judgment rendered against the driver. The driver was not told of the settlement, thus making it of little value to show bias, and the potential prejudice from the evidence was enormous.

Swan v. Interstate Brands Corp., 333 F.3d 863 (8th Cir. 2003) : A terminated employee suing for age discrimination sought to introduce a severance agreement and release that he had signed, ostensibly only to impeach the testimony of a witness for the defendant regarding the date of the termination decision. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the evidence because the timing of the decision was collateral to whether the defendant discriminated on the basis of age. Without a valid exception, such as impeachment, the agreement was inadmissible evidence of discrimination under Rule 408; and the evidence was unduly prejudicial to the defendant.

Hudspeth v. Commissioner, 914 F.2d 1207 (9th Cir. 1990) : Reversing an income tax deficiency finding, the Court held that evidence the Commissioner's expert had given significantly different values to similar timber in a case that was settled was inadmissible on the proper value of the timber in this case but was admissible to show bias on the part of the expert.

[5] Consent Decrees

Johnson v. Hugo's Skateway, 974 F.2d 1408 (4th Cir. 1992) (en banc): The plaintiff in a civil rights action, alleging that he had been intimidated on racial grounds at a roller skating rink, introduced a prior consent decree in which the rink agreed to post signs of a nondiscriminatory policy and to instruct employees not to discriminate, as well as evidence that the rink had not complied with the decree. The Court held the consent decree was not inadmissible evidence of a compromise, as it was not offered to prove that the rink had previously discriminated but to show, through the evidence of noncompliance, the rink's motive or intent on the present occasion.

United States v. Cohen, 946 F.2d 430 (6th Cir. 1991) : In a prosecution for making and selling pirated videotapes, the Court held there was no error in admitting a consent judgment from the companion civil copyright infringement suit. The judgment was the defendant's personal admission agreeing to be enjoined permanently from infringing the plaintiffs' copyrights. The dissenting Judge noted that the consent judgment did not contain an admission of liability or wrongdoing and would have characterized it as a settlement agreement offered only to prove liability and therefore inadmissible under Rule 408.

United States v. Austin, 54 F.3d 394 (7th Cir. 1995) : The defendant was convicted for knowingly buying and selling counterfeit works of art. He had entered into a consent decree with the FTC, under which he admitted to selling forged artwork and promised not to do so in the future; yet he thereafter sold more forgeries. The Court held it was not error to admit extensive evidence of the FTC settlement, including the terms of the consent decree and the defendant's stipulation admitting to the allegations of the FTC's complaint. Rule 408 did not preclude admission of this evidence, because it was offered not to prove liability, but to show that Austin was on notice when he subsequently sold forged artwork, to provided background for the indictment, and to lay the evidentiary foundation for many of the government's exhibits.

Kerr v. First Commodity Corp., 735 F.2d 281 (8th Cir. 1984) : Affirming the plaintiff's judgment in an action alleging fraud in the sale of commodities, the Court found that a consent decree that the defendant had entered into with the Commodity Futures Trading Commission in 1976 was properly admitted to show knowledge and intent to commit fraud in 1977 and 1978.

Kloepfer v. Honda Motor Co., 898 F.2d 1452 (10th Cir. 1990) : In a product liability action arising out of the death of a passenger on an all-terrain vehicle (ATV), the Court held that a consent decree relating to ATV safety entered between the United States and major ATV manufacturers (including the defendant) two years after the accident in question was properly excluded as irrelevant to the case. In Wegerer v. First Commodity Corp., n3 a successful fraud action by investors against a commodity option brokerage firm and its principals, the Court upheld the admission of a 1976 consent decree between the defendants and the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, which was used to show the defendants' knowledge and intent to defraud.

Reynolds v. Roberts, 202 F.3d 1303 (11th Cir. 2000) : The Court held that statements admitting liability made by defense attorneys during negotiations could not be used as evidence to interpret the meaning of the terms of a consent decree that the plaintiffs claimed admitted liability for discrimination. The Court stated that "while normally a court may use as evidence statements made during negotiations to interpret ambiguous gaps in consent decrees, Rule 408 precludes such evidence to prove liability for or invalidity of a claim or its amount."

[6] Criminal Cases

United States v. Peed, 714 F.2d 7 (4th Cir. 1983) : The Court affirmed convictions for mail fraud and making false statements to the government, finding that recorded statements in which the defendant attempted to get a complainant to drop charges against her were not part of an offer to settle a disputed claim, but were part of an effort to obstruct a criminal investigation and were admissible.

United States v. Hays, 872 F.2d 582 (5th Cir. 1989) : The Court held that the erroneous admission of evidence regarding a settlement between defendants charged with conspiracy and misapplication of funds and their savings and loan association was prejudicial. It concluded that the government's offer of the evidence to assist the jury in understanding the breadth of the alleged conspiracy "stands at direct odds with the clear mandates of Rule 408."

United States v. Hauert, 40 F.3d 197 (7th Cir. 1994) : Affirming convictions for tax evasion and failure to file returns, the Court held that it was proper to admit evidence that the defendant signed settlement documents with the IRS relating to earlier years in which he abandoned a contention that his wages or salary were not taxable. The Court held that the evidence was properly admitted to show knowledge on the part of the defendant that his earnings were taxable, not to prove civil tax liability or the amount of such liability.

[7] Damage Issues

Branch v. Fidelity & Cas. Co., 783 F.2d 1289 (5th Cir. 1986) : In litigation arising from an offshore platform accident, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit evidence of a settlement agreement between the families of workers who were killed and one of the parties to an indemnity agreement. In Belton v. Fibreboard Corp., n4 the Court reversed a plaintiffs' judgment in a products liability suit because the Trial Judge told the jury when it returned its verdict that the amount awarded was less than the amount of the settlement with other defendants, so that the plaintiffs would receive nothing as a result of the verdict, and then permitted the jury to deliberate further and return another verdict. The Judge violated Rule 408 by permitting the jury to consider the plaintiffs' settlements with other defendants as part of the proof of the amount of the claim. In McHann v. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., n5 the Court reversed a judgment for a tire manufacturer in a personal injury action, holding it was error to admit evidence of a settlement between the plaintiff and the service station where he was injured, since the jury might have erroneously concluded that the service station would not have settled unless it was at fault in the accident. Rather than admit the settlement, the Court suggested that the Trial Judge should deduct the amount of the settlement from any recovery the plaintiff might obtain.

United States v. Contra Costa County Water Dist., 678 F.2d 90 (9th Cir. 1982) : The United States supplied the water needs of the District. After an adjoining landowner did work on his land that imperiled a canal system, the United States sued him and the District for the cost of repair. Ultimately, the landowner settled with the government. The settlement took the following form: The landowner paid $30,000 and received an offset in the amount of $45,000 for the diminution in the value of his property. The District claimed that the total of $75,000 should be a credit in its dispute with the government, whereas the government only permitted a credit of $30,000. The Court held that Rule 408 barred evidence of settlement negotiations. In our view, this is a misreading of the Rule. The only question in the case was a legal one: What portion, if any, of the amount paid by the landowner ought to be credited to the District? The settlement with the landowner was a fact. If the District was entitled to a credit, it should have been entitled to show that fact as evidence of the proper amount of the credit.

[8] "Dispute"

Affiliated Mfrs., Inc. v. Aluminum Co. of Am., 56 F.3d 521 (3d Cir. 1995) : The Court held in a contract action that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding certain documents under Rule 408, since there was evidence that at the time they were made there was an actual dispute or difference of opinion between the parties concerning the validity of a claim, even though the dispute had not crystallized to the point of threatened litigation. According to the Court, "[T]he meaning of 'dispute' as employed in the rule includes both litigation and less formal stages of a dispute," and "[t]he district court clearly interpreted the scope of the term 'dispute' to include a clear difference of opinion between the parties here concerning payment of two invoices."

[9] Foreign Law

Morris v. LTV Corp., 725 F.2d 1024 (5th Cir. 1984) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant in an action by a real estate broker to recover a commission on the sale of a hotel located in Mexico. It upheld the exclusion of a letter from the corporation to the plaintiff offering a settlement, finding that federal evidence law, not Mexican law, governed the admissibility ruling.

[10] Instructions Concerning Missing Parties

Kennon v. Slipstreamer, Inc., 794 F.2d 1067 (5th Cir. 1986) : The Court reversed a judgment for a moped rider against a windshield manufacturer, finding that the Trial Judge erred in telling the jury that the plaintiff had settled with other defendants for the nominal sum of ten dollars. The Court reasoned that "[i]n a case such as this one, where the absence of defendants previously in court might confuse the jury, the district court may, in its discretion, inform the jury of the settlement in order to avoid confusion." But it found that "disclosing the amount of the settlement serves no such purpose," and that it might have prejudiced the remaining defendant by suggesting that the others were not liable and that the plaintiff would receive compensation, if any, only from the remaining defendant.

Arhart v. Micro Switch Mfg. Co., 798 F.2d 291 (8th Cir. 1986) : In a product liability suit, various defendants sought indemnity and contribution under state law. The Court described various approaches used in State Courts in dealing with settling and nonsettling tortfeasors. It upheld the Trial Judge's telling the jury that various defendants who had started the case had settled, so that the jury would understand their absence.

[11] Internal Documents

Affiliated Mfrs., Inc. v. Aluminum Co. of Am., 56 F.3d 521 (3d Cir. 1995) : After determining that the Trial Judge properly found that a dispute had arisen between the parties that triggered application of Rule 408 as of a specific date, the Court held that the exclusionary rule applied to internal documents that were used as the basis for compromise negotiations.

[12] Mitigation of Damages

Pierce v. F.R. Tripler & Co., 955 F.2d 820 (2d Cir. 1992) : To show a failure to mitigate damages in an age discrimination action, the defendant proffered evidence that the plaintiff had been offered another job after he was denied a promotion. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court held the evidence was properly excluded as it went to the amount of the claim and the job offer was an attempt to compromise the claim. In the Court's view, to admit such settlement offers, even at the instance of the offeror, could inhibit settlement discussions and interfere with the effective administration of justice by often necessitating that counsel become witnesses at trial. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, at § 408.02[6].

[13] Notice and Knowledge

Spell v. McDaniel, 824 F.2d 1380 (4th Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed a jury's verdict finding both an officer and the City liable for use of excessive force in making an arrest. It held that evidence of a prior settlement by the City of another brutality claim brought by a different plaintiff, and of arrest quotas, was properly admitted to prove that the City was aware of a practice and that it fostered an atmosphere of aggressive and lawless behavior.

Breuer Elec. Mfg. Co. v. Toronado Sys., 687 F.2d 182 (7th Cir. 1982) : The Court upheld the entry of a default judgment, finding that evidence of settlement negotiations was properly admitted to show that the defendants were on notice of the nature of the issues of which the plaintiff complained.

Bradbury v. Phillips Petroleum Co., 815 F.2d 1356 (10th Cir. 1987) : Affirming judgments for plaintiffs who sued a mineral exploration company for trespass, the Court held that evidence that the defendant had settled with other landowners who had complained concerning trespass or destruction of property was properly admitted. The Court reasoned that the evidence tended to show that the defendant was notified of a problem with its conduct and that the conduct was reckless. In our view, however, evidence of the complaints would have established recklessness, so the settlement evidence was unnecessary.

[14] Offer Made Before Claim Disputed

S. Leo Harmonay v. Binks Mfg. Co., 597 F. Supp. 1014 (S.D.N.Y. 1984), aff'd, 762 F.2d 990 (2d Cir. 1985) : In a breach of contract action by a subcontractor against a general contractor, the Court held that a letter from the defendant's counsel to the plaintiff's informing him that the defendant was contemplating a lawsuit against a third party and inquiring whether the plaintiff wished to join was not barred by Rule 408. The Court found that there was no dispute between the plaintiff and the defendant at the time the letter was written and that it was not an attempt to compromise. Regarding another letter, written by the plaintiff's attorney to the defendant's and offering, "[i]n accordance with our prior discussions and without prejudice to our clients' respective legal positions," a summary of damages suffered by the plaintiff, the Court recognized that the "magic" phrase "without prejudice" is not dispositive of whether a statement was an offer to compromise, but reasoned that "its use may still be evidence of the intent of the speaker which we may rely upon to determine whether the statement was made 'in compromise.' "

S.A. Healy Co. v. Milwaukee Metro. Sewerage Dist., 50 F.3d 476 (7th Cir. 1995) : The construction contract at issue contained a disputes clause providing that the contractor should submit all claims to the District's engineer, who would issue a determination subject to review by the agency's executive director. The Court held there was no error in admitting evidence of a statement by the engineer that the contractor's claim "probably had merit," as there was no dispute for purposes of Rule 408 until the agency had rejected the claim at some level.

Cassino v. Reichhold Chem., 817 F.2d 1338 (9th Cir. 1987) : Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff in an age discrimination case, the Court upheld admission of a settlement agreement and release that the employer offered to the plaintiff at the time of termination. The Court approved the finding that there was no disputed claim at the time the agreement was offered and added that "[w]here, as here, the employer tries to condition severance pay upon the release of potential claims, the policy behind Rule 408 does not come into play." Cassino was distinguished in Mundy v. Household Fin. Corp., n6 another age discrimination case, where the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in a finding that a proposed release agreement sought in exchange of $25,000 for "outplacement services" was part of a settlement offer, since the plaintiff had already received severance pay and other benefits upon his discharge and, although he had not yet filed any claims, had already retained legal counsel.

Deere & Co. v. International Harvester Co., 710 F.2d 1551 (Fed. Cir. 1983) : In a patent infringement action the Trial Judge excluded evidence offered by Harvester as to a licensing arrangement between Deere and a third party, as well as royalty offers that Deere made to Harvester concerning a license for the patented equipment. The Court held that although Deere and Harvester might have been involved in dealings that could have led to litigation, no actual dispute arose between them until the instant litigation, so it was error to exclude the evidence under Rule 408. However, there was no error in excluding the evidence, because it was of little probative value.

[15] Offers To Settle

[a] By Defendant

North Am. Biologicals Inc. v. Illinois Employers Ins., 931 F.2d 839 (11th Cir. 1991) , amended, 938 F.2d 1265 (11th Cir. 1991) : In a suit seeking indemnification from an insurer for legal fees incurred in defending a class action, the Court held that the insurer's letter after dismissal of the class action offering to pay one-tenth of the fees and to consider the action as one claim subject to a single deductible was properly excluded as an offer of settlement.

[b] Offers To Settle -- By Plaintiff

Ward v. Allegheny Ludlum Steel Corp., 560 F.2d 579 (3d Cir. 1977) : Remanding a Title VII employment discrimination case for reconsideration of a claim of religious discrimination, the Court cited Rule 408 and noted that the District Judge should not consider a settlement offer made by the plaintiff one week before the trial on the issue of liability. We note that the problem in this case was that the offer came several years after the employee requested the religious accommodation, so it was not relevant to the question of what the burden was on the employer at the time the employee made the request.

[c] Offers To Settle -- Required by Law

Reeder v. American Economy Ins. Co., 88 F.3d 892 (10th Cir. 1996) : After a car accident involving an insured, the insurer brought a declaratory action to determine whether the insured was entitled to recover uninsured motorist benefits. The jury awarded the insured $612,000 on the question of liability, but the insured appealed on the ground that this figure was too low, arguing that it was error to exclude the insurer's offer to pay $1,000,000 on the liability claim. She contended that this offer was mandated under a state law requiring insurers to evaluate a claim and make prompt payment under certain conditions. The Court held that the offer was properly excluded, since "Rule 408 does not distinguish between settlement offers made pursuant to a company's statutory or public policy responsibilities and offers made for other purposes. Both types of offers advance the policy behind Rule 408, namely, to promote the out-of-court settlement of claims."

[16] Relationship to Rule 403

Myers v. Pennzoil Co., 889 F.2d 1457 (5th Cir. 1989) : The defendant in this product liability action sought to impeach witnesses called by the plaintiff by showing they had originally been named as defendants and had settled with the plaintiff. The Court held there was no error in excluding the evidence, as it could have led to jury confusion and the defendant was otherwise given wide latitude in bringing out the witnesses' possible bias. In Williams v. Chevron U.S.A., Inc., n7 the Court held that evidence of an employee's settlement with a contractor could be excluded on grounds of likely jury confusion in a suit by the employee against the owner of the platform, even though the evidence was offered to rebut testimony by the employee that he did not have the financial means to pay for a recommended surgical procedure. In Reichenbach v. Smith, n8 a pre-Rules case citing Rule 408 as persuasive authority, the Court held that the Rule would not bar use of a "Mary Carter" settlement for impeachment purposes, but emphasized that the Trial Judge had discretion to determine whether the probative value was substantially outweighed by the prejudicial effect.

Bachenski v. Malnati, 11 F.3d 1371 (7th Cir. 1993) : In an action by a taxicab passenger against the driver of an auto that struck the cab, the Court held inadmissible evidence that the driver and taxicab company had settled a third-party claim against the company with an agreement that the company would pay 90 percent of any judgment rendered against the driver. The driver was not told of the settlement, thus making it of little value to show bias, and the Trial Judge reasoned that the potential prejudice from the evidence was enormous.

Wood v. Minnesota Mining & Mfg. Co., 112 F.3d 306 (8th Cir. 1997) : Following a collision between a truck driven by the plaintiff and the defendant's train, the plaintiff's employer paid the defendant for damages to the train. In the plaintiff's personal injury action, the Court held there was no error in excluding evidence of the employer's settlement. It was not relevant because it was not binding in any way on the plaintiff's legal action, and even if relevant, the risk that the jury would be unfairly swayed made its prejudicial effect substantially outweigh its probative value. Since the evidence was properly excluded, it was not necessary to decide whether the Trial Judge had properly excluded it under Rule 408 although no litigation was even threatened at the time. In an FELA action, Hose v. Chicago N.W. Transp. Co., 70 F.3d 968 (8th Cir. 1995) , the Court affirmed a judgment for an employee who alleged that his employer was liable for his suffering from manganese encephalopathy, and upheld the exclusion of the plaintiff's settlement with two other defendants who manufactured the employer's welding equipment. Although the employer contended that the ultimate amounts of the settlements were admissible to rebut the plaintiff's claim that certain treatment was not obtained because of its cost, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of the evidence as unduly prejudicial.

Breeden v. ABF Freight Sys., Inc., 115 F.3d 749 (10th Cir. 1997) : A jury found that the defendant's truck driver was ten percent negligent in causing an accident while a third party was 90 percent negligent. The plaintiffs had settled with the third party before trial. The defendant argued that it was error to exclude evidence of the settlement after the plaintiffs testified that they did not seek additional medical treatment in part because of financial inability. Although the Court recognized that Rule 408 did not require exclusion of the settlement evidence, it mentioned that plaintiffs had settled for only $17,000 and found no error in the conclusion that the prejudicial effect of the evidence would far outweigh its probative value. In Weir v. Federal Ins. Co., n9 the Court reversed a judgment for a fire insurer in a subrogation suit against a dryer manufacturer. Reviewing the exclusion of evidence concerning a settlement between the insurer and the insureds, which was offered to prove that part of the settlement involved a "voluntary" payment that could not be recovered, the Court observed that Rule 408 does not prohibit evidence of the circumstances of a settlement to prove voluntariness, but added that "many of the same concerns about prejudice and deterrence to settlements exist regardless of the purpose for which the evidence is offered." It suggested that on remand the Trial Judge should engage in an analysis of the evidence under Rule 403.

Deere & Co. v. International Harvester Co., 710 F.2d 1551 (Fed. Cir. 1983) : In a patent infringement action the Trial Judge excluded evidence offered by Harvester as to a licensing arrangement between Deere and a third party and royalty offers that Deere made to Harvester concerning a license for the patented equipment. The Court held that although Deere and Harvester might have been involved in dealings that could have led to litigation, no actual dispute arose between them until the instant litigation, so it was error to exclude the evidence under Rule 408. However, there was no error in excluding the evidence, because it was of little probative value.

[17] Settlement by Nonparty

Alexander v. City of Evansville, Ind., 120 F.3d 723 (7th Cir. 1997) : In a long-running dispute over the City's liability for overtime pay under the Fair Labor Standards Act, the plaintiffs offered evidence of settlement agreements with other firefighters ostensibly to show the City's own interpretation of the relevant collective bargaining agreement. The Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the evidence, since the purpose of showing the City's interpretation was to show that it was liable for the overtime hours, which was precisely the liability issue in the case.

Breeden v. ABF Freight Sys., Inc., 115 F.3d 749 (10th Cir. 1997) : A jury found that the defendant's truck driver was ten percent negligent in causing an accident while a third party was 90 percent negligent. The plaintiffs had settled with the third party before trial. The defendant argued that it was error to exclude evidence of the settlement after the plaintiffs testified that they did not seek additional medical treatment in part because of financial inability. Although the Court recognized that Rule 408 did not require exclusion of the settlement evidence, it mentioned that the plaintiffs had settled for only $17,000 and found no error in the conclusion that the prejudicial effect of the evidence would far outweigh its probative value. In Towerridge, Inc. v. T.A.O., Inc., 111 F.3d 758 (10th Cir. 1997) , a Miller Act suit by a subcontractor against a prime contractor and its surety for sums owed under a subcontract, the Court held that Rule 408 did not bar admission of evidence that the prime contractor submitted claims to the government for damages caused by government delay and disruption of a construction project and that the government paid the prime contractor an undisclosed sum of money in settlement of those claims. "Rule 408 does not require the exclusion of evidence regarding the settlement of a claim different from the one litigated, ... though admission of such evidence may nonetheless implicate the same concerns of prejudice and deterrence of settlements which underlie Rule 408." In this case, the evidence was not admitted to prove liability for or the amount of the plaintiff's claim, but was admitted to show that the plaintiff was not at fault for any delay and that the prime contractor acted in bad faith in so contending.

[18] Settlement -- Exclusion Required or Permitted

[a] Inadmissible to Prove Invalidity of Claim

McInnis v. A.M.F., Inc., 765 F.2d 240 (1st Cir. 1985) : The Court reversed a judgment for a motorcycle manufacturer in an action by a motorcyclist injured in a collision with a car, finding error in the admission of evidence that the plaintiff had released the driver of the car from liability prior to suing the defendant. Although under Rule 408 the settlement could not be used as proof that the car, rather than the defendant's cycle, caused the plaintiff's injuries, the amount of the settlement could be deducted from any award that the jury might return.

Quad/Graphics, Inc. v. Fass, 724 F.2d 1230 (7th Cir. 1983) : The plaintiff brought a breach of contract suit against several corporations and two individual defendants, but one of the individual defendants settled with the plaintiff before trial. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court upheld exclusion of the settlement evidence, since it was offered to show the invalidity of the plaintiff's claim and the settling defendant was not called to testify at trial.

[b] Settlement -- Exclusion Required or Permitted -- Inadmissible to Prove Liability

Wyatt v. Security Inn Food & Beverage, Inc., 819 F.2d 69 (4th Cir. 1987) : The Court found in a discrimination action that the Trial Judge did not err in excluding evidence concerning the settlement of two prior discrimination suits involving the defendant. See also Fiberglass Insulators, Inc. v. Dupuy n10 (statements made by attorneys in the course of settling a prior related litigation between the parties were held properly excluded).

Richards v. City of Topeka, 173 F.3d 1247 (10th Cir. 1999) : When a female firefighter became pregnant, she was immediately placed on light duty pursuant to the collective bargaining agreement between her union and the City. She filed a grievance and ultimately sued the City for violation of her rights under the Pregnancy Discrimination Act. At trial she sought to rebut the City's bona fide occupational qualification defense by introducing the subsequent collective bargaining agreement, which did not make pregnancy grounds for an immediate light duty assignment. Affirming a judgment for the City, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding the contract or evidence of the negotiations leading up to it, since it was the result of settlement negotiations between the City and female firefighters arising out of the grievance process initiated by the plaintiff.

[19] Special Circumstances of Admissibility

[a] Miscellaneous

Carney v. American Univ., 151 F.3d 1090 (D.C. Cir. 1998) : A former university administrator alleged race discrimination and retaliation by her former employer. Reversing a grant of summary judgment for the defendant on the retaliation claim, the Court held that it was error to exclude settlement letters sent by the defendant to the plaintiff. The correspondence was offered not to prove that the defendant discriminated against the plaintiff, but rather to show that the defendant committed an entirely separate wrong by conditioning the plaintiff's benefits on a waiver of her constitutional rights.

Sage Realty Corp. v. Insurance Co. of N. Am., 34 F.3d 124 (2d Cir. 1994) : During a dispute over rent due on a commercial lease, the tenant's lawyer sent a letter setting forth the tenant's understanding of how electric costs (a factor in the rent) should be calculated. The Court held that the letter was not inadmissible under Rule 408, as it was not proffered to show an offer of compromise or an admission made in compromise negotiations; rather, it was used to show that the tenant had access to all documents it needed to compute the electric costs.

Bituminous Constr., Inc. v. Rucker Enters., 816 F.2d 965 (4th Cir. 1987) : The Court affirmed a judgment for a subcontractor who sued the owner of parking lots for paving work. It held that evidence of settlement negotiations was properly admitted to show that the subcontractor had made a demand for payment and to prove that the owner understood that checks were to be made jointly payable to the general contractor and to the subcontractor. In United States v. Peed, n11 the Court affirmed convictions for mail fraud and making false statements to the government, finding that recorded statements in which the defendant attempted to get a complainant to drop charges against her were not part of an offer to settle a disputed claim, but were part of an effort to obstruct a criminal investigation and were admissible.

Uforma/Shelby Bus. Forms, Inc. v. NLRB, 111 F.3d 1284 (6th Cir. 1997) : An employer was charged with unfair labor practices by, inter alia, threatening to terminate its third shift if the union pursued a grievance. The Court held that the alleged threatening statements were admissible, although they were made during negotiations intended to resolve the grievance, because the Rule is inapplicable when the claim is based upon a wrong that is committed in the course of settlement negotiations. Here, the threats were not offered to prove the validity of the grievance but were themselves the basis for the NLRB's claim.

Zurich Am. Ins. Co. v. Watts Indus., Inc., 417 F.3d 682 (7th Cir. 2005) : In an action by an insurer against its insured to compel arbitration of a dispute between them, the insurer introduced a letter from the insured written to settle a related coverage action in State Court as evidence that the instant dispute was within the scope of the arbitration agreement because the insured had "anticipatorily repudiated" part of the insurance contract. Affirming a judgment for the insurer, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the letter since it was not being used to prove the validity or invalidity, but only the scope, of the claim under negotiation. In Bankcard Am., Inc. v. Universal Bancard Sys., Inc., 203 F.3d 477 (7th Cir. 2000) , two companies that secured merchants for a credit card processing bank had a contract that provided that, in case of its termination, the defendant was prohibited for a year from steering merchants it had signed up to competitors of the plaintiff. The contract was terminated in a dispute between the parties; they attempted to negotiate a settlement, but it fell through, and an action was brought with reciprocal breach of contract claims. At trial the defendant explained that it had steered merchants during the one-year period because it believed, based on discussions between the parties' attorneys, that there was an understanding permitting the practice. The Court found no error in the admission of the evidence regarding the anticipated settlement, since it would be an abuse of Rule 408 to allow a party to lead his opponent in negotiations to believe he would not enforce applicable limitations and then object when the opponent attempts to prove waiver; similarly, it would be unfair to let the plaintiff lull the defendant into breaching the contract and then prevent the defendant from explaining its actions because the lulling took place around the settlement table. In Board of Trustees of Knox County Hosp. v. Shalala, n12 a proceeding to review a determination by the Secretary of Health and Human Services regarding a hospital's Medicare reimbursement, the Court found that evidence of an arrangement between the Secretary and another hospital was not excludable under Rule 408, because it was admitted only on the issue of whether the Secretary administered the program even-handedly, not to prove that a claim was valid or what its amount was. In Raybestos Prods. Co. v. Younger, n13 a defamation and RICO action in which the plaintiff alleged that the defendants conditioned their not issuing defamatory statements about the plaintiff's products on the plaintiff's agreeing to pay the defendants money and hire a defendant as a consultant, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in admitting a letter from the defendants containing a plan that the defendants contended would obviate the need for litigation. The contents of the letter, the timing of its delivery, and the context in which it was sent supported the conclusion that it was not a settlement proposal but evidence of the defendants' continued efforts to intimidate and extort the plaintiff. In Kritikos v. Palmer Johnson, Inc., n14 the Court found it was error (but harmless) to rely upon letters written by the plaintiff's representative during settlement negotiations as substantive evidence that the plaintiff was primarily the cause of the delay in the completion of a yacht. The letters had been admitted for other purposes, and the Court held that they should not have been used as substantive proof of liability.

Hose v. Chicago N.W. Transp. Co., 70 F.3d 968 (8th Cir. 1995) : Affirming a judgment for an employee who brought a FELA action alleging that his employer was liable for his suffering from manganese encephalopathy, the Court upheld the exclusion of the plaintiff's settlement with two other defendants who manufactured the employer's welding equipment. Although the employer contended that the ultimate amounts of the settlements were admissible to rebut the plaintiff's claim that certain treatment was not obtained because of its cost, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of the evidence as unduly prejudicial. In Freidus v. First Nat'l Bank, 928 F.2d 793 (8th Cir. 1991) , an action against a bank for allegedly refusing unreasonably to consent to the sale of the plaintiff's farmland, the Court held there was no error in admitting letters exchanged during settlement negotiations to rebut testimony for the plaintiff that the bank never gave any reason for the conditions it imposed for consenting to the sale; the evidence also negatived a contention that the bank unduly delayed in acceding to the plaintiff's request. In County of Hennepin v. AFG Indus., n15 the County sued a manufacturer alleging defects in insulated glass windows placed in a public building and also sued its insurance carrier, claiming that a storm damaged the building. After the County and the carrier reached a settlement, the manufacturer was permitted to introduce evidence of the settlement to show that the County was alleging that the storm contributed to the problems with the windows. The Court upheld admission of the settlement evidence, finding it was relevant to impeaching the County's claim that the manufacturer caused the damage to the building. We believe that the fact that the County alleged in another suit that the storm caused damage was plainly admissible under Rule 801(d)(2)(A), but admitting additional evidence concerning the settlement posed a risk of confusing the jury as to exactly what damages the settlement covered. In Vulcan Hart Corp. v. NLRB, n16 an appeal from an NLRB order, the Court found no error in the admission of evidence that the company sought to make an employee's reinstatement conditional on his resignation from union office. The evidence was not offered to show a wrongful discharge, which would have been impermissible under the Rule. Rather, it was proof that the company attempted to coerce the employee into restricting his participation in organizational activities in violation of the labor statute.

Broadcort Capital Corp. v. Summa Med. Corp., 972 F.2d 1183 (10th Cir. 1992) : In an action by a securities clearing firm against a corporation for refusing to transfer and register a stock certificate, the Court held there was no error in admitting evidence of settlement discussions, where they related to an entirely different claim and were not admitted to prove the validity or amount of the claim under negotiation. In Eisenberg v. University of New Mexico, 936 F.2d 1131 (10th Cir. 1991) , the Court affirmed the imposition of Rule 11 sanctions against an attorney, holding that the attorney's statements at a settlement conference on the show cause order were not excluded by the Rule, because they were "evidence offered for another purpose." In Weir v. Federal Ins. Co., n17 the Court reversed a judgment for a fire insurer in a subrogation suit against a dryer manufacturer. Reviewing the exclusion of evidence concerning a settlement between the insurer and the insureds, which was offered to prove that part of the settlement involved a "voluntary" payment that could not be recovered, the Court observed that Rule 408 does not prohibit evidence of the circumstances of a settlement to prove voluntariness, but added that "many of the same concerns about prejudice and deterrence to settlements exist regardless of the purpose for which the evidence is offered." It suggested that on remand the Trial Judge should engage in an analysis of the evidence under Rule 403.

[b] Special Circumstances of Admissibility -- Negotiations as Basis for Estoppel

Starter Corp. v. Converse, Inc., 170 F.3d 286 (2d Cir. 1999) : In Starter's declaratory judgment action to establish its right to use a "star" trademark on athletic footwear, Converse asserted that Starter was contractually and equitably estopped by virtue of a 1990 agreement that settled a prior trademark dispute between them. At trial, Converse introduced evidence of the 1990 agreement and the negotiations leading to it. The Court found no abuse of discretion in admission of the evidence: although it would have been inadmissible to prove the validity or invalidity of a claim of trademark infringement, the issues of material misrepresentation, reliance, and damage involved in the estoppel claims were quite different. Introducing the evidence on those issues would not discourage future negotiations; in fact, exclusion on Rule 408 grounds in this case would flout the policy of promoting compromises.

[c] Special Circumstances of Admissibility -- Settlement Agreement in Issue

Catullo v. Metzner, 834 F.2d 1075 (1st Cir. 1987) : The Court held that testimony concerning the terms of a settlement agreement was properly admitted in a suit alleging breach of fiduciary duty in contravention of the court-approved settlement.

Coakley & Williams Constr., Inc. v. Structural Concrete Equip., Inc., 973 F.2d 349 (4th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed a summary judgment granted on ground of a previous release in a construction dispute, holding that a settlement offer was properly considered as evidence of the parties' intent when the release was given.

Basha v. Mitsubishi Motor Credit of Am., Inc., 336 F.3d 451 (5th Cir. 2003) : In interpreting a Rule 68 offer of judgment accepted by the plaintiff that settled claims against three defendants, the Trial Judge considered two letters sent by one defendant to the plaintiff's lawyer a week before and several days after the offer was accepted. The Court found no error, since the letters were not used to establish liability but to interpret the parties' settlement agreement.

Cates v. Morgan Portable Bldg. Corp., 780 F.2d 683 (7th Cir. 1985) : In a breach of contract case, the Court reasoned that "a settlement agreement is admissible to prove the parties' undertakings in the agreement, should it be argued that a party broke the agreement." In Central Soya Co. v. Epstein Fisheries, Inc., n18 the Court indicated that where a settlement has been reached and a suit claims breach of the settlement agreement, nothing in Rule 408 bars admission of the agreement.

Westchester Specialty Ins. Servs., Inc. v. U.S. Fire Ins. Co., 119 F.3d 1505 (11th Cir. 1997) : In an action by an insured against its insurance broker, the Court found no error in the admission of settlement agreements that the insured entered into with other insurers. Because the broker was entitled to offset an appropriate amount of the settlements against any recovery awarded by the jury against the broker, the settlement agreements were admitted for the permissible purpose of resolving a factual dispute about the meaning of the settlement agreements' terms. In a footnote the Court observed that bifurcating the trial may be useful in such cases to avoid prejudice.

[d] Special Circumstances of Admissibility -- State Law

Carota v. Johns Manville Corp., 893 F.2d 448 (1st Cir. 1990) : The defendant in an asbestosis wrongful death action concluded its case by introducing evidence that the plaintiff had received a $98,471 settlement with other defendants. The Court affirmed a judgment for the defendant, holding that the Federal Court was bound to follow the governing state law, which made settlement with a joint tortfeasor admissible for consideration when assessing damages.

[20] Statements and Materials in Settlement Negotiations

Affiliated Mfrs., Inc. v. Aluminum Co. of Am., 56 F.3d 521 (3d Cir. 1995) : The Court held in a contract action that there was no abuse of discretion in excluding certain internal memoranda under Rule 408, since they had been made in the course of an effort to compromise and served as a basis for calculation of compromise figures, even though they had not been communicated to the other side.

Fiberglass Insulators, Inc. v. Dupuy, 856 F.2d 652 (4th Cir. 1988) : In an antitrust suit, the Court held that statements made by attorneys in the course of settling prior related litigation between the parties were inadmissible. The prior litigation and the current case were closely related, and the Court emphasized the strong public policy favoring exclusion of settlement negotiations between the same parties litigating against each other.

Ramada Dev. Co. v. Rauch, 644 F.2d 1097 (5th Cir. 1981) : One of the parties to a construction contract hired an architect to prepare a report alleging certain construction defects to be used in settlement negotiations. The Court held that the report was not admissible against the party commissioning it since the report would not have existed but for the settlement negotiations. The report was thus excluded by Rule 408, whether or not there was a pretrial understanding or agreement among the parties as to its nature.

Russell v. PPG Indus., 953 F.2d 326 (7th Cir. 1992) : Affirming summary judgment for the defendant in an employee's personal injury action, the Court noted that it was improper for the plaintiff to reveal the results of a summary jury trial on appeal. Regardless of the desirability of the procedure, any potential it might have as a settlement tool would be undermined if participating parties do not adhere to the basic stricture that the results be kept confidential. In an antitrust case, General Leaseways, Inc. v. National Truck Leasing Ass'n, n19 the Court held that a telephone call was properly admitted pursuant to a finding that it was not made as a part of settlement negotiations, even though a subsequent letter offering a settlement referred to the call.

EEOC v. Gear Petroleum, Inc., 948 F.2d 1542 (10th Cir. 1991) : Affirming a judgment for the defendant in an age discrimination action, the Court held that letters from the defendant to the EEOC indicating a discriminatory basis for its decision were properly excluded under the Rule because the parties were engaged in the conciliation process, even though the EEOC was still conducting an investigation at the time. Citing this Manual, the Court also rejected the argument that the letters were admissible for impeachment purposes.

Blu-J, Inc. v. Kemper C.P.A. Group, 916 F.2d 637 (11th Cir. 1990) : In an action by an investor against an accounting firm for issuing allegedly erroneous and fraudulent financial statements, the Court held that materials relating to an evaluation, conducted by independent accountants pursuant to a mutual agreement of the parties as part of settlement negotiations, of whether the defendants had followed generally accepted accounting methods were properly excluded under the Rule.

[21] Statute of Frauds Defense

Trebor Sportswear Co. v. The Limited Stores, Inc., 865 F.2d 506 (2d Cir. 1989) : In a breach of contract action, the Court affirmed a ruling that excluded settlement documents that were offered to meet a statute of frauds defense. The Court concluded that admission of the documents for the limited purpose would undermine the policies favoring settlements. A dissenting Judge argued that the exclusionary rule should not be applied, since the documents were not offered to prove the validity or amount of a claim, but to demonstrate compliance with the statute of frauds.

[22] Statute of Limitations Defense

Michals v. Baxter Healthcare Corp., 289 F.3d 402 (6th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed an order of summary judgment, granted for failure to comply with the statute of limitations, against a plaintiff who claimed injury from silicone breast implants. The plaintiff argued that the defendant had waived the limitations defense by including the plaintiff in settlement negotiations and extending an offer to her after the limitations period had run out. But the Court declared that this was tantamount to using compromise evidence to prove liability, which is prohibited by Rule 408.

[23] Undisputed Claims

In re B.D. Int'l Discount Corp., 701 F.2d 1071 (2d Cir. 1983) : Affirming a bankruptcy decision granting a creditor relief, the Court observed that the debtor's financial statements containing an entry "Payable to Bank $7,269,052" were not rendered inadmissible by Rule 408, since the entry was not made as part of settlement negotiations. Moreover, at the time of negotiations there was no dispute as to the validity or amount of the bank's claim. The debtor was simply endeavoring to get more time in which to pay.

Dallis v. Aetna Life Ins. Co., 768 F.2d 1303 (11th Cir. 1985) : Affirming a widower's judgment in an action to recover the costs of his wife's cancer treatment at a Bahamian clinic, the Court held that evidence that the defendant had reimbursed another insured for similar treatment was properly admitted, since the reimbursement did not involve a settlement of a disputed claim.

FOOTNOTES:
(n1)Footnote 1. United States Aviation Underwriters, Inc. v. Olympia Wings, Inc., 896 F.2d 949 (5th Cir. 1990) .

(n2)Footnote 2. Williams v. Chevron U.S.A., Inc., 875 F.2d 501 (5th Cir. 1989) .

(n3)Footnote 3. Wegerer v. First Commodity Corp., 744 F.2d 719 (10th Cir. 1984) .

(n4)Footnote 4. Belton v. Fibreboard Corp., 724 F.2d 500 (5th Cir. 1984) .

(n5)Footnote 5. McHann v. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., 713 F.2d 161 (5th Cir. 1983) .

(n6)Footnote 6. Mundy v. Household Fin. Corp., 885 F.2d 542 (9th Cir. 1989) .

(n7)Footnote 7. Williams v. Chevron U.S.A., Inc., 875 F.2d 501 (5th Cir. 1989) .

(n8)Footnote 8. Reichenbach v. Smith, 528 F.2d 1072 (5th Cir. 1976) .

(n9)Footnote 9. Weir v. Federal Ins. Co., 811 F.2d 1387 (10th Cir. 1987) .

(n10)Footnote 10. Fiberglass Insulators, Inc. v. Dupuy, 856 F.2d 652 (4th Cir. 1988) .

(n11)Footnote 11. United States v. Peed, 714 F.2d 7 (4th Cir. 1983) .

(n12)Footnote 12. Board of Trustees of Knox County Hosp. v. Shalala, 135 F.3d 493 (7th Cir. 1998) .

(n13)Footnote 13. Raybestos Prods. Co. v. Younger, 54 F.3d 1234 (7th Cir. 1995) .

(n14)Footnote 14. Kritikos v. Palmer Johnson, Inc., 821 F.2d 418 (7th Cir. 1987) .

(n15)Footnote 15. County of Hennepin v. AFG Indus., 726 F.2d 149 (8th Cir. 1984)

(n16)Footnote 16. Vulcan Hart Corp. v. NLRB, 718 F.2d 269 (8th Cir. 1983) .

(n17)Footnote 17. Weir v. Federal Ins. Co., 811 F.2d 1387 (10th Cir. 1987) .

(n18)Footnote 18. Central Soya Co. v. Epstein Fisheries, Inc., 676 F.2d 939 (7th Cir. 1982) .

(n19)Footnote 19. General Leaseways, Inc. v. National Truck Leasing Ass'n, 830 F.2d 716 (7th Cir. 1987) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 408 RULE 408

2-408 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 408.04

408.04 Legislative History

[Go To Supp]

[1] Advisory Committee's Note

Advisory Committee's Note

As a matter of general agreement, evidence of an offer to compromise a claim is not receivable in evidence as an admission of, as the case may be, the validity or invalidity of the claim. As with evidence of subsequent remedial measures, dealt with in Rule 407, exclusion may be based on two grounds. (1) The evidence is irrelevant, since the offer may be motivated by a desire for peace rather than from any concession of weakness of position. The validity of this position will vary as the amount of the offer varies in relation to the size of the claim and may also be influenced by other circumstances. (2) A more consistently impressive ground is promotion of the public policy favoring the compromise and settlement of disputes. McCormick §§ 76, 251. While the rule is ordinarily phrased in terms of offers of compromise, it is apparent that a similar attitude must be taken with respect to completed compromises when offered against a party thereto. This latter situation will not, of course, ordinarily occur except when a party to the present litigation has compromised with a third person.

The same policy underlies the provision of Rule 68 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure that evidence of an unaccepted offer of judgment is not admissible except in a proceeding to determine costs.

The practical value of the common law rule has been greatly diminished by its inapplicability to admissions of fact, even though made in the course of compromise negotiations, unless hypothetical, stated to be "without prejudice," or so connected with the offer as to be inseparable from it. McCormick § 251, pp. 540-41. An inevitable effect is to inhibit freedom of communication with respect to compromise, even among lawyers. Another effect is the generation of controversy over whether a given statement falls within or without the protected area. These considerations account for the expansion of the rule herewith to include evidence of conduct or statements made in compromise negotiations, as well as the offer or completed compromise itself. For similar provisions see California Evidence Code §§ 1152, 1154.

The policy considerations which underlie the rule do not come into play when the effort is to induce a creditor to settle an admittedly due amount for a lesser sum. McCormick § 251, p. 540. Hence the rule requires that the claim be disputed as to either validity or amount.

The final sentence of the rule serves to point out some limitations upon its applicability. Since the rule excludes only when the purpose is proving the validity or invalidity of the claim or its amount, an offer for another purpose is not within the rule. The illustrative situations mentioned in the rule are supported by the authorities. As to proving bias or prejudice of a witness, see Annot., 161 A.L.R. 395 , contra, Fenberg v. Rosenthal, 348 Ill. App. 510, 109 N.E.2d 402 (1952) , and negativing a contention of lack of due diligence in presenting a claim, 4 Wigmore § 1061. An effort to "buy off" the prosecution or a prosecuting witness in a criminal case is not within the policy of the rule of exclusion. McCormick § 251, p. 542.

For other rules of similar import, see Uniform Rules 52 and 53; California Evidence Code §§ 1152, 1154; Kansas Code of Civil Procedure §§ 60-452, 60-453; New Jersey Evidence Rules 52 and 53.

[2] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

Under existing federal law evidence of conduct and statements made in compromise negotiations is admissible in subsequent litigation between the parties. The second sentence of Rule 408 as submitted by the Supreme Court proposed to reverse that doctrine in the interest of further promoting non-judicial settlement of disputes. Some agencies of government expressed the view that the Court formulation was likely to impede rather than assist efforts to achieve settlement of disputes. For one thing, it is not always easy to tell when compromise negotiations begin, and informal dealings end. Also, parties dealing with government agencies would be reluctant to furnish factual information at preliminary meetings; they would wait until "compromise negotiations" began and thus hopefully effect an immunity for themselves with respect to the evidence supplied. In light of these considerations, the Committee recast the Rule so that admissions of liability or opinions given during compromise negotiations continue inadmissible, but evidence of unqualified factual assertions is admissible. The latter aspect of the Rule is drafted, however, so as to preserve other possible objections to the introduction of such evidence. The Committee intends no modification of current law whereby a party may protect himself from future use of his statements by couching them in hypothetical conditional form.

[3] Report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary

This rule as reported makes evidence of settlement or attempted settlement of a disputed claim inadmissible when offered as an admission of liability or the amount of liability. The purpose of this rule is to encourage settlements which would be discouraged if such evidence were admissible.

Under present law, in most jurisdictions, statements of fact made during settlement negotiations, however, are excepted from this ban and are admissible. The only escape from admissibility of statements of fact made in a settlement negotiation is if the declarant or his representative expressly states that the statement is hypothetical in nature or is made without prejudice. Rule 408 as submitted by the Court reversed the traditional rule. It would have brought statements of fact within the ban and made them, as well as an offer of settlement, inadmissible.

The House amended the rule and would continue to make evidence of facts disclosed during compromise negotiations admissible. It thus reverted to the traditional rule. The House committee report states that the committee intends to preserve current law under which a party may protect himself by couching his statements in hypothetical form. The real impact of this amendment, however, is to deprive the rule of much of its salutary effect. The exception for factual admissions was believed by the Advisory Committee to hamper free communication between parties and thus to constitute an unjustifiable restraint upon efforts to negotiate settlements -- the encouragement of which is the purpose of the rule. Further, by protecting hypothetically phrased statements, it constituted a preference for the sophisticated, and a trap for the unwary.

...

For these reasons, the committee has deleted the House amendment and restored the rule to the version submitted by the Supreme Court with one additional amendment. This amendment adds a sentence to insure that evidence, such as documents, is not rendered inadmissible merely because it is presented in the course of compromise negotiations if the evidence is otherwise discoverable. A party should not be able to immunize from admissibility documents otherwise discoverable merely by offering them in a compromise negotiation.

[4] Report of the House and Senate Conferees

The House bill provides that evidence of admissions of liability or opinions given during compromise negotiations is not admissible, but that evidence of facts disclosed during compromise negotiations is not inadmissible by virtue of having been first disclosed in the compromise negotiations. The Senate amendment provides that evidence of conduct or statements made in compromise negotiations is not admissible. The Senate amendment also provides that the rule does not require the exclusion of any evidence otherwise discoverable merely because it is presented in the course of compromise negotiations.

The House bill was drafted to meet the objection of executive agencies that under the rule as proposed by the Supreme Court, a party could present a fact during compromise negotiations and thereby prevent an opposing party from offering evidence of that fact at trial even though such evidence was obtained from independent sources. The Senate amendment expressly precludes this result.

The Conference adopts the Senate amendment.

[5] Citations to Hearings and Debates

Letter from William A. Carey to Hon. William Hungate, August 7, 1973, in Supp. to Hearings on Proposed Rules of Evidence Before the Subcomm. on Criminal Justice of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 1st Sess., at 311-12 (1973).

Testimony of Paul F. Rothstein, June 5, 1974, Hearings on H.R. 5463 (Federal Rules of Evidence) Before the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 2d Sess., at 269-70 (1974).

Letter from Hon. Roszel C. Thomsen to Hon. James O. Eastland, May 22, 1974, and accompanying material, in Hearings on H.R. 5463 (Federal Rules of Evidence) Before the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 2d Sess., at 53-54, 58-60 (1974).

Testimony of Edward W. Cleary, June 4, 1974, Hearings on H.R. 5463 (Federal Rules of Evidence) Before the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 2d Sess., at 49 (1974).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
Supp. To CHAPTER 408 RULE 408

2-408 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 408, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 408. Compromise and Offers to Compromise	Rule 408. Compromise Offers and Negotiations
(a) Prohibited uses. Evidence of	(a) Prohibited Uses. Evidence of the following is not admissible on behalf of any party, when offered to prove liability for, invalidity of, or amount of a claim that was disputed as to validity or amount, or to impeach the following is not admissible -- on behalf of any party -- either to prove or disprove the validity or amount of a disputed claim or to impeach by a prior inconsistent statement or a contra-through a prior inconsistent statement or contradiction:

through a prior inconsistent statement or contradiction:

(1) furnishing or offering or promising to furnish -- or accepting or offering or promising to accept -- a valuable consideration

(1) furnishing, promising, or offering -- or accepting, promising to accept, or offering to accept -- a valuable consideration in order to compromise the claim; and tion in compromising or attempting to compromise the claim; and

(2) conduct or statements made in compromise negotiations regarding the claim, except when offered in a criminal case

(2) conduct or a statement made during compromise negotiations about the claim -- except when offered in a criminal case and when the negotiations related to a claim by a public office in the exercise of its regulatory, investigative, or enforcement authority.

and the negotiations related to a claim by a public office or agency in the exercise of regulatory, investigative, or enforcement authority.

(b) Permitted uses. This rule does not require

(b) Exceptions. The court may admit this e exclusion if the evidence is offered for purposes not prohibited by subdivision (a). Examples of permissible purposes include proving a witness's bias or prejudice; negating a contention of evidence for another purpose, such as proving a witness's bias or prejudice, negating a contention of undue delay, or proving an effort to obstruct a criminal investigation or prosecution.

undue delay; and proving an effort to obstruct a criminal investigation or prosecution.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 408 has been amended as part of the general restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Rule 408 previously provided that evidence was not excluded if offered for a purpose not explicitly prohibited by the Rule. To improve the language of the Rule, it now provides that the court may admit evidence if offered for a permissible purpose. There is no intent to change the process for admitting evidence covered by the Rule. It remains the case that if offered for an impermissible purpose, it must be excluded, and if offered for a purpose not barred by the Rule, its admissibility remains governed by the general principles of Rules 402, 403, 801, etc.

The Committee deleted the reference to "liability" on the ground that the deletion makes the Rule flow better and easier to read, and because "liability" is covered by the broader term "validity." Courts have not made substantive decisions on the basis of any distinction between validity and liability. No change in current practice or in the coverage of the Rule is intended.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
Supp. To CHAPTER 408 RULE 408

2-408 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 408.01

Supp. to § 408.01 Official Text

[Go To Main]

Rule 408 has been amended, effective December 1, 2006. The issues giving rise to the amendment are discussed in the Main Volume at § 408.02[2]. The Committee Note is set forth infra at § 408.04[1.1]. Following is the text of the Rule as amended:

Rule 408. Compromise and Offers to Compromise

(a) Prohibited uses. -- Evidence of the following is not admissible on behalf of any party, when offered to prove liability for, invalidity of, or amount of a claim that was disputed as to validity or amount, or to impeach through a prior inconsistent statement or contradiction:

(1) furnishing or offering or promising to furnish -- or accepting or offering or promising to accept -- a valuable consideration in compromising or attempting to compromise the claim; and

(2) conduct or statements made in compromise negotiations regarding the claim, except when offered in a criminal case and the negotiations related to a claim by a public office or agency in the exercise of regulatory, investigative, or enforcement authority.

(b) Permitted uses. -- This rule does not require exclusion if the evidence is offered for purposes not prohibited by subdivision (a). Examples of permissible purposes include proving a witness's bias or prejudice; negating a contention of undue delay; and proving an effort to obstruct a criminal investigation or prosecution.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
Supp. To CHAPTER 408 RULE 408

2-408 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 408.03

Supp. to § 408.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[2.1] Attorneys' Fee Disputes [Go To Main]

Rein v. Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, 568 F.3d 345 (2d Cir. 2009) : Vacating an order that one law firm involved in the Lockerbie bombing case pay a portion of its negotiated contingency fee to a plaintiff's committee appointed by the Judge to oversee the plaintiff's side of the litigation, the Court held that a letter from the firm to the Judge during settlement negotiations was erroneously admitted. The Court reasoned that "[t]he fact that [the firm] notified the court of its settlement position did not justify the court's use of the information in a manner forbidden by law"; it emphasized that it was not relying on Rule 408 because of questions whether the Rule is applicable to attorneys' fees disputes, but "the rule forbidding ... use of settlement negotiations is a matter of fundamental policy."

Lohman v. Duryea Borough, 574 F.3d 163 (3d Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed an attorney fee award in a wrongful discharge case, finding no abuse of discretion when the Judge considered a settlement offer that was larger than the judgment obtained after trial in reducing the lodestar amount for limited success. The materials in the settlement negotiations were not being used to determine the validity of the plaintiff's claims, which would be off limits under the Rule, and, in the Court's view, "the thought that settlement discussions will not now occur because an attorney could be penalized if he or she achieves less than was demanded makes little sense."

[4] Bias and Impeachment Evidence [Go To Main]

Croskey v. BMW of No. Am., Inc., 532 F.3d 511 (6th Cir. 2008) : The plaintiff, who was injured by scalding fluid when the plastic neck on a car's radiator failed, brought product liability claims alleging both that the design of the radiator was defective and that the defendant manufacturer failed to provide warnings after becoming aware that the plastic radiator neck might fail. When the plaintiff offered evidence of other incidents in which the neck failed on the failure to warn claim, the defendant offered evidence "the reason [witnesses in three of those cases] are coming forward to testify is because they are unhappy with the settlement. They wanted more." Reversing a judgment for the defendant on other grounds, the Court held that evidence of the disposition of the three similar cases was properly admitted to show evidence of the witnesses' bias. The settlement evidence was not offered as a defense to the plaintiff's negligence claims, but to show the state of mind of the witnesses, and thus not barred by Rule 408.

[6] Criminal Cases [Go To Main]

United States v. Davis, 596 F.3d 852 (D.C. Cir. 2010) : The national treasurer of a fraternity was charged with writing checks to cash and depositing them into his personal bank account. When confronted with evidence of his embezzlement by his successor and told that he needed to repay whatever he took, the defendant asked "what if I split the $29,000?," and when told that the missing money was more than $100,000, he responded, "Oh, I can't pay that much." Vacating the conviction, the Court held that the evidence of this exchange should not have been admitted, since under Rule 408 the defendant was offering to compromise a disputed claim, and the proposed compromise was not with a government agency or for the purpose of obstructing a criminal investigation.

United States v. Roti, 484 F.3d 934 (7th Cir. 2007) : The defendant, charged with bankruptcy fraud and concealing assets from a bankruptcy trustee, claimed that his lawyer put him up to the scheme. The Trial Judge excluded, under Rule 408, evidence that the defendant had sued the lawyer and the lawyer settled that litigation. Applying plain error review, the Court held that the Judge's failure to follow Circuit precedent holding that Rule 408 does not apply to criminal cases did not seriously affect the fairness of the proceeding because, for one thing, the Circuit law had been abrogated by the 2006 amendment to Rule 408, under which a civil settlement is inadmissible in a subsequent criminal case.

United States v. Arias, 431 F.3d 1327 (11th Cir. 2005) : In a prosecution for Medicare fraud, the Court held it was error (but harmless) to admit evidence that one of the defendants, a pharmacist, had settled a state administrative complaint brought by the Department of Health by admitting as true allegations of drug alterations and permitting the Department to enter a fine and final order, in order to avoid more formal administrative proceedings and the potential penalties arising therefrom. The Court joined Circuits holding Rule 408 applicable to criminal proceedings based on the structure of the Rules, especially Rule 1101(b), on the reference in the last sentence of the Rule to the admission of settlement evidence in criminal proceedings, and on the policies behind the Rule of excluding irrelevant evidence and encouraging settlements. We note that under the 2006 amendment (see Manual § 408.02[2]), Rule 408 would not bar admission of statements made in the settlement negotiations in this case, since they "related to a claim by a public office or agency in the exercise of regulatory, investigative, or enforcement authority."

[8] "Dispute" [Go To Main]

Wall Data Inc. v. Los Angeles County Sheriff's Dep't, 447 F.3d 769 (9th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a judgment of copyright infringement against a software customer that installed the program on more computers than it had licenses for. The Court found no abuse of discretion in the admission of a memorandum in which an employee of the defendant admitted that he did not know how to tell on which computers the program was used. The memo recounted a meeting between the parties' employees to discuss possible over-use of the licenses, and was prepared a week before settlement discussions between the parties began.

[9.1] Grievance Proceedings [Go To Main]

Josephs v. Pacific Bell, 443 F.3d 1050 (9th Cir. 2006) : The plaintiff claimed that he had been terminated and denied reinstatement after his employer learned that he had 15 years earlier been found not guilty of murder by reason of insanity and treated in a mental hospital. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff in his ADA action, the Court held there was no error in admitting statements made by the employer in a grievance proceeding, as the plaintiff had not yet filed a discrimination claim at the time of the proceeding.

[11.1] Mistake [Go To Main]

Orr v. City of Albuquerque, 531 F.3d 1210 (10th Cir. 2008) : In an action by two female police officers claiming discrimination in the application of pregnancy leave policies, the City asserted as a legitimate, non-discriminatory reason for the adverse employment action suffered by the plaintiffs that its personnel director had mistakenly but honestly believed that she was following the applicable policies in the plaintiffs' cases. Reversing summary judgment granted for the defendants, because there was evidence the defendants' explanation was pretextual, the Court held it was error to exclude testimony of another officer indicating the personnel director had previously treated others just as she had the plaintiffs. The Judge had ruled the evidence inadmissible under Rule 408 because it implicated compromise discussions with the City in the other officer's case. However, the Court noted that "by its terms Rule 408 and our case law permit the use of [compromise] evidence to show not liability per se but the absence of mistake."

[15] Offers To Settle [Go To Main]

[a] By Defendant

Bridgeport Music, Inc. v. Justin Combs Publishing, 507 F.3d 470 (6th Cir. 2007) : In an infringement action brought against publishers of a rap song containing an unlicensed sample of a copyrighted song, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in excluding evidence offered by the defendants during the liability phase of their post-litigation settlement offers. The defendants argued that the evidence showed that the infringement had not been committed willfully, but the Court held that the evidence did nothing to rebut the plaintiffs' evidence of willfulness and therefore did not come within the "another purpose" exception to Rule 408. By contrast, the "plaintiffs' evidence of its pre-litigation settlement offers was probative of the fact that defendants had knowledge of, but disregarded, the infringement." In any event, the defendants were permitted "to offer their evidence of settlement offers during the punitive phase of the trial, where that evidence actually might have been relevant."

[16] Relationship to Rule 403 [Go To Main]

United States v. Roti, 484 F.3d 934 (7th Cir. 2007) : The defendant, charged with bankruptcy fraud and concealing assets from a bankruptcy trustee, claimed that his lawyer put him up to the scheme. The Trial Judge excluded, under Rule 408, evidence that the defendant had sued the lawyer and the lawyer settled that litigation, but also indicated that the evidence would have been excluded under Rule 403. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the Rule 403 analysis; it doubted that the evidence was even relevant, because the defendant was not arguing that he was duped by the lawyer into believing that his course of conduct was legal. "The problem is not only that Werth's culpability would not excuse Roti's but also that the settlement of a civil claim does not say anything helpful about Roti's state of mind."

McCabe v. Parker, 608 F.3d 1068 (8th Cir. 2010) : In a civil rights action arising from arrests and searches following a political demonstration, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the plaintiffs were not permitted to refer to their settlement with two arresting officers who testified as adverse witnesses. While settlement evidence may be admitted as evidence of a witness' bias, it was within the Judge's discretion not to change an in limine ruling for the plaintiffs that excluded any evidence of settlement negotiations, even when the plaintiffs subsequently settled with the witnesses. Here, counsel was permitted to ask other questions related to the witnesses' alleged bias.

Millenkamp v. Davisco Foods Int'l, Inc., 562 F.3d 971 (9th Cir. 2009) : In a breach of warranty action for a defective product, the Court held it was error to admit the seller's letter responding to the buyers' pre-suit request for a $500,000 settlement. The letter "was not relevant for any admissible purpose and should not have been admitted." Rejecting the buyers' argument that the letter had probative value as to the seller's knowledge of the buyers' intended use of the product at the time of sale, the Court cited Rule 403 and noted that the letter was unduly prejudicial because it contained language threatening that the seller would "aggressively pursue remedies" against the buyers if they sued.

[19] Special Circumstances of Admissibility [Go To Main]

[a] Miscellaneous

PRL USA Holdings, Inc., v. U.S. Polo Ass'n, 520 F.3d 109 (2d Cir. 2008) : In a trademark dispute involving the Ralph Lauren Polo logo, owned by the plaintiff, the defendant had marketed a logo with two horsemen rather than one. A few years before this litigation, the parties appeared to resolve their dispute, and the plaintiff gave the defendant a release, permitting the defendant to market the two-horsemen logo. Subsequently, however, the plaintiff brought this action, alleging infringement. At trial the defendant was permitted to admit the release signed by the plaintiff, in order to prove an affirmative defense of estoppel. The plaintiff claimed on appeal that Rule 408 barred the evidence because it was a settlement that was being offered to prove the invalidity of the plaintiff's claim, since establishing the estoppel defense would invalidate the infringement claim. The Court responded that the problem with this "clever argument is that it would deprive Rule 408's exception of all meaning" because "all evidence offered seeks either to prove liability for or invalidity of a claim or its amount." Distinguishing between the elements of a claim and an affirmative defense, the Court noted that Rule 408 bars compromise evidence to prove the former but not the latter. Finally, the Court observed that the defendant was entitled to protection against "spillover prejudice" -- that the jury might misuse the compromise evidence as proof of that the plaintiff was admitting, by signing the release, that the two-horsemen mark was not infringing -- which could be alleviated by a limiting instruction or by bifurcating the trial.

Rising-Moore v. Red Roof Inns, Inc., 435 F.3d 813 (7th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a summary judgment for a motel sued by a customer for a slip and fall injury. On appeal, the question arose whether there was a sufficient amount in controversy to support federal jurisdiction. The complaint did not claim a specific amount of damages, but the plaintiff's lawyer estimated that the damages were between $180,000 and $200,000 before making a settlement demand of $160,000. The Court concluded that the Trial Judge could consider the estimate and the offer in determining whether a jury could value the claim at more than $75,000. Rule 408 did not prohibit the use of the offer and estimate to prove jurisdiction, because the settlement evidence was not used to show either liability for or invalidity of the claim. The Court also found that the fact that the plaintiff offered to settle for $60,000 after removal to federal court supported a conclusion that the "controversy" exceeded $75,000.

Rhoades v. Avon Prods., Inc., 504 F.3d 1151 (9th Cir. 2007) : The Court held that Rule 408 does not apply to compromise evidence when offered to prove the jurisdictional requirements of an action for declaratory relief, as the evidence is not offered to prove the validity or amount of a claim.

[20] Statements and Materials in Settlement Negotiations [Go To Main]

Rein v. Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, 568 F.3d 345 (2d Cir. 2009) : Vacating an order that one law firm involved in the Lockerbie bombing case pay a portion of its negotiated contingency fee to a plaintiff's committee appointed by the Judge to oversee the plaintiff's side of the litigation, the Court held that a letter from the firm to the Judge during settlement negotiations was erroneously admitted. The Court reasoned that "[t]he fact that [the firm] notified the court of its settlement position did not justify the court's use of the information in a manner forbidden by law"; it emphasized that it was not relying on Rule 408 because of questions whether the Rule is applicable to attorneys' fees disputes, but "the rule forbidding ... use of settlement negotiations is a matter of fundamental policy."

Lohman v. Duryea Borough, 574 F.3d 163 (3d Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed an attorney fee award in a wrongful discharge case, finding no abuse of discretion when the Judge considered a settlement offer that was larger than the judgment obtained after trial in reducing the lodestar amount for limited success. The materials in the settlement negotiations were not being used to determine the validity of the plaintiff's claims, which would be off limits under the Rule, and, in the Court's view, "the thought that settlement discussions will not now occur because an attorney could be penalized if he or she achieves less than was demanded makes little sense."

Lyondell Chem. Co. v. Occidental Chem. Corp., 608 F.3d 284 (5th Cir. 2010) : In a CERCLA apportionment and contribution action, it was necessary to calculate disposal volumes for each liable company based on uncertain input data, so minimum, intermediate, and maximum input values were established from evidence in the case. One source included reports prepared during negotiations among companies involved in this case to allocate and settle claims among them regarding another site. Noting that "Courts vary widely in their understanding of the term ['claim'], and thus in their understanding of when evidence is introduced to prove liability for, invalidity of, or the amount of the claim subject to compromise," the Court rejected any strict "transaction" test in favor of an application of Rule 408 that "remains fact-specific, and tethered to the rationales underlying the rule." Because the disputes for which the reports were created and for which the evidence was being offered, although separated by time and location, arose from the same events, the same relevant parties, the same waste-generating facilities, the same waste hauler, and the same intended disposal site, the Court had no difficulty concluding that they were created for use in negotiations regarding the "claim" now being litigated. Thus, admission of the report was an abuse of discretion.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
Supp. To CHAPTER 408 RULE 408

2-408 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 408.04

Supp. to § 408.04 Legislative History

[Go To Main]

[1.1] 2006 Amendment Committee Note [Go To Main]

Rule 408 has been amended to settle some questions in the courts about the scope of the Rule, and to make it easier to read and apply. First, the amendment provides that Rule 408 does not prohibit the introduction in a criminal case of statements or conduct during compromise negotiations regarding a civil dispute by a government regulatory, investigative, or enforcement agency. See, e.g., United States v. Prewitt, 34 F.3d 436, 439 (7th Cir. 1994) (admissions of fault made in compromise of a civil securities enforcement action were admissible against the accused in a subsequent criminal action for mail fraud). Where an individual makes a statement in the presence of government agents, its subsequent admission in a criminal case should not be unexpected. The individual can seek to protect against subsequent disclosure through negotiation and agreement with the civil regulator, or an attorney for the government.

Statements made in compromise negotiations of a claim by a government agency may be excluded in criminal cases where the circumstances so warrant under Rule 403. For example, if an individual was unrepresented at the time the statement was made in a civil enforcement proceeding, its probative value in a subsequent criminal case may be minimal. But there is no absolute exclusion imposed by Rule 408.

In contrast, statements made during compromise negotiations of other disputed claims are not admissible in subsequent criminal litigation, when offered to prove liability for, invalidity of, or amount of those claims. When private parties enter into compromise negotiations they cannot protect against the subsequent use of statements in criminal cases by way of private ordering. The inability to guarantee protection against subsequent use could lead to parties refusing to admit fault, even if by doing so they could favorably settle private matters. Such a chill on settlement negotiations would be contrary to the policy of Rule 408.

The amendment distinguishes statements and conduct (such as a direct admission of fault) made in compromise negotiations of a civil claim by a government agency from an offer or acceptance of a compromise of such a claim. An offer or acceptance of a compromise of a civil claim is excluded under the Rule if offered against the defendant as an admission of fault. In that case, the predicate for the evidence would be that the defendant, by compromising with the government agency, has admitted the validity and amount of the civil claim, and that this admission has sufficient probative value to be considered as proof of guilt. But unlike a direct statement of fault, an offer or acceptance of a compromise is not very probative of the defendant's guilt. Moreover, admitting such an offer or acceptance could deter defendants from settling a civil regulatory action, for fear of evidentiary use in a subsequent criminal action. See, e.g., Fishman, Jones on Evidence, Civil and Criminal, § 22:16 at 199, n.83 (7th ed. 2000) ("A target of a potential criminal investigation may be unwilling to settle civil claims against him if by doing so he increases the risk of prosecution and conviction.").

The amendment retains the language of the original rule that bars compromise evidence only when offered as evidence of the "validity," "invalidity," or "amount" of the disputed claim. The intent is to retain the extensive case law finding Rule 408 inapplicable when compromise evidence is offered for a purpose other than to prove the validity, invalidity, or amount of a disputed claim. See, e.g., Athey v. Farmers Ins. Exchange, 234 F.3d 357 (8th Cir. 2000) (evidence of settlement offer by insurer was properly admitted to prove insurer's bad faith); Coakley & Williams v. Structural Concrete Equip., 973 F.2d 349 (4th Cir. 1992) (evidence of settlement is not precluded by Rule 408 where offered to prove a party's intent with respect to the scope of a release); Cates v. Morgan Portable Bldg. Corp., 780 F.2d 683 (7th Cir. 1985) (Rule 408 does not bar evidence of a settlement when offered to prove a breach of the settlement agreement, as the purpose of the evidence is to prove the fact of settlement as opposed to the validity or amount of the underlying claim); Uforma/Shelby Bus. Forms, Inc. v. NLRB, 111 F.3d 1284 (6th Cir. 1997) (threats made in settlement negotiations were admissible; Rule 408 is inapplicable when the claim is based upon a wrong that is committed during the course of settlement negotiations). So for example, Rule 408 is inapplicable if offered to show that a party made fraudulent statements in order to settle a litigation.

The amendment does not affect the case law providing that Rule 408 is inapplicable when evidence of the compromise is offered to prove notice. See, e.g., United States v. Austin, 54 F.3d 394 (7th Cir. 1995) (no error to admit evidence of the defendant's settlement with the FTC, because it was offered to prove that the defendant was on notice that subsequent similar conduct was wrongful); Spell v. McDaniel, 824 F.2d 1380 (4th Cir. 1987) (in a civil rights action alleging that an officer used excessive force, a prior settlement by the City of another brutality claim was properly admitted to prove that the City was on notice of aggressive behavior by police officers).

The amendment prohibits the use of statements made in settlement negotiations when offered to impeach by prior inconsistent statement or through contradiction. Such broad impeachment would tend to swallow the exclusionary rule and would impair the public policy of promoting settlements. See McCormick on Evidence at 186 (5th ed. 1999) ("Use of statements made in compromise negotiations to impeach the testimony of a party, which is not specifically treated in Rule 408, is fraught with danger of misuse of the statements to prove liability, threatens frank interchange of information during negotiations, and generally should not be permitted."). See also EEOC v. Gear Petroleum, Inc., 948 F.2d 1542 (10th Cir. 1991) (letter sent as part of settlement negotiation cannot be used to impeach defense witnesses by way of contradiction or prior inconsistent statement; such broad impeachment would undermine the policy of encouraging uninhibited settlement negotiations).

The amendment makes clear that Rule 408 excludes compromise evidence even when a party seeks to admit its own settlement offer or statements made in settlement negotiations. If a party were to reveal its own statement or offer, this could itself reveal the fact that the adversary entered into settlement negotiations. The protections of Rule 408 cannot be waived unilaterally because the Rule, by definition, protects both parties from having the fact of negotiation disclosed to the jury. Moreover, proof of statements and offers made in settlement would often have to be made through the testimony of attorneys, leading to the risks and costs of disqualification. See generally Pierce v. F.R. Tripler & Co., 955 F.2d 820, 828 (2d Cir. 1992) (settlement offers are excluded under Rule 408 even if it is the offeror who seeks to admit them; noting that the "widespread admissibility of the substance of settlement offers could bring with it a rash of motions for disqualification of a party's chosen counsel who would likely become a witness at trial").

The sentence of the Rule referring to evidence "otherwise discoverable" has been deleted as superfluous. See, e.g., Advisory Committee Note to Maine Rule of Evidence 408 (refusing to include the sentence in the Maine version of Rule 408 and noting that the sentence "seems to state what the law would be if it were omitted"); Advisory Committee Note to Wyoming Rule of Evidence 408 (refusing to include the sentence in Wyoming Rule 408 on the ground that it was "superfluous"). The intent of the sentence was to prevent a party from trying to immunize admissible information, such as a pre-existing document, through the pretense of disclosing it during compromise negotiations. See Ramada Development Co. v. Rauch, 644 F.2d 1097 (5th Cir. 1981) . But even without the sentence, the Rule cannot be read to protect pre-existing information simply because it was presented to the adversary in compromise negotiations.

137 of 184 DOCUMENTS

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 409 RULE 409

2-409 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 409.syn

§ 409.syn Synopsis to Chapter 409: RULE 409

409.01 Official Text

409.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Distinguished from Rule 408

[2] Statements of Remorse

[3] Other Purposes

409.03 Annotated Cases

409.04 Legislative History

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 409 RULE 409

2-409 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 409.01

409.01 Official Text

Rule 409. Payment of Medical and Similar Expenses

Evidence of furnishing or offering or promising to pay medical, hospital, or similar expenses occasioned by an injury is not admissible to prove liability for the injury.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 409 RULE 409

2-409 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 409.02

409.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Distinguished from Rule 408

Under this Rule, evidence that a party paid or offered to pay medical, hospital, or similar expenses occasioned by an injury is not admissible to prove that party's liability for the injury. This is much like the exclusion of offers to compromise. The reason usually provided for this Rule is that without it, people would be reluctant to make the humane gesture of paying or offering to pay an injured person's medical expenses. It is important to note, however, that unlike Rule 408, this Rule does not exclude opinions or admissions of liability when made in connection with an offer to pay hospital or other expenses covered by this Rule. It is only the offer and the payment itself that are protected. The Advisory Committee and the Congress apparently felt that exclusion of statements beyond the offer or payment itself was not necessary, because any further statements need not be made in connection with the kind of offer or action covered by this Rule. They are not necessary in the same way that factual statements are necessary for the negotiations covered by Rule 408.

It would seem, however, that if offers of payment covered by this Rule are made as part of a settlement offer, Rule 408 should govern, and statements made in connection with the offers should be excluded as well. Also, statements that are "a part of the act" covered by the Rule may be protected, according to the second paragraph of the Advisory Committee's Note. In deciding what is part of an act, Courts may have to fall back on cases involving offers to compromise that protected, prior to enactment of Rule 408, statements inextricably bound up with settlement offers.

Unlike Rule 408, Rule 409 is not limited to offers or promises related to a disputed claim. Any offer, promise, or actual payment is inadmissible whether or not a dispute over obligation to pay had arisen at the time of the humane gesture.

[2] Statements of Remorse

It should be noted that neither Rule 408 nor Rule 409 specifically excludes statements of remorse made by someone who is involved in an accident. For example, testimony that one driver in an automobile accident states to another injured driver, "I am terribly sorry that you are injured," is not barred by any specific Rule. It is not an offer of compromise; nor is it an offer to pay medical expenses. However, in most jurisdictions, such a statement is deemed to be of very low relevance and is excluded as the kind of statement that a good Samaritan would make and one for which no one should be penalized. We would urge that the same policies that underlie Rule 409 would support exclusion of such a statement on the ground that, although it might be slightly probative of consciousness of fault, the statement's probative value is substantially outweighed by the unfairness of using such evidence against a citizen who expresses the kind of concern that a society expects of its best citizens. We recognize that Rule 409 allows into evidence statements made in connection with payment of or offers to pay medical expenses. But we view the simple statement of remorse as having close to no probative value -- saying "I am sorry that you are injured" is not the same thing as saying "I am sorry that my careless conduct injured you." A statement of remorse is of such little probative value that the danger that the jury could misinterpret it and misuse it justifies exclusion.

[3] Other Purposes

Like Rules 408 and 407, the Rule 409 exclusionary principle applies only if the evidence is offered for a specified purpose. If it is offered to prove anything other than liability, the Rule is inapplicable and the opponent of the evidence is left to argue for exclusion under Rule 403. For example, if the defendant in a personal injury case offers its own payment of the plaintiff's medical expenses as proof of mitigation of damages, the proof will not be excluded under Rule 409.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 409 RULE 409

2-409 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 409.03

409.03 Annotated Cases

Savoie v. Otto Candies, Inc., 692 F.2d 363 (5th Cir. 1982) : In a Jones Act case the crucial issue was whether the plaintiff was a seaman on the date of his injury. To show that the defendant regarded the plaintiff as a seaman, the plaintiff introduced letters sent by the defendant's attorney and insurance carrier revealing that the defendant had paid the plaintiff maintenance after the injury. Affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, the Court found that this evidence did not violate Rule 409, since the "maintenance" payments were not shown to be medical expense payments of any kind and the evidence was not offered to show liability for the injury. The evidence might not have been admissible were the only issue entitlement to medical or hospital or similar expenses. Although careful instructions on the proper use of the evidence would have been desirable, none were requested. The Court declined to find that the evidence should have been excluded under Rule 403.

Williams v. Missouri Pac. R.R., 11 F.3d 132 (10th Cir. 1993) : Remanding a FELA case, the Court noted that the jury should be advised that past medical expenses had been paid. Although evidence of paying past medical expenses is inadmissible to prove liability, there would be no question of liability on the retrial of damages issues only.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 409 RULE 409

2-409 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 409.04

409.04 Legislative History

Advisory Committee's Note

The considerations underlying this rule parallel those underlying Rules 407 and 408, which deal respectively with subsequent remedial measures and offers of compromise. As stated in Annot., 20 A.L.R.2d 291, 293 :

> [G]enerally, evidence of payment of medical, hospital, or similar expenses of an injured party by the opposing party, is not admissible, the reason often given being that such payment or offer is usually made from humane impulses and not from an admission of liability, and that to hold otherwise would tend to discourage assistance to the injured person.

Contrary to Rule 408, dealing with offers of compromise, the present rule does not extend to conduct or statements not a part of the act of furnishing or offering or promising to pay. This difference in treatment arises from fundamental differences in nature. Communication is essential if compromises are to be effected, and consequently broad protection of statements is needed. This is not so in cases of payments or offers or promises to pay medical expenses, where factual statements may be expected to be incidental in nature.

For rules on the same subject, but phrased in terms of "humanitarian motives," see Uniform Rule 52; California Evidence Code § 1152; Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60-452; New Jersey Evidence Rule 52.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
Supp. To CHAPTER 409 RULE 409

2-409 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 409, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 409. Payment of Medical and Similar Expenses	Rule 409. Offers to Pay Medical and Similar Expenses
Evidence of furnishing or of-	Evidence of furnishing, promis-

fer-	ing
ing	to or	pay,
pro	or mis-	of-
ing	fer-
to	ing
pay	to med	pay ical,	med
hos-	ical,
pit-	hos-
al,	pit-
or	al,
sim-	or
ilar	sim-
ex-	ilar
pens	ex-
es	pens
oc-	es
ca-	res-
sion	ult-
ed	ing
by	from an	an
in-	injury	jury
is	is not	not ad-	ad-
miss	miss
ible	ible
to	to prov	prov e li-	e li-abil-	ability	ity
for	for the	the
in-	injury.	jury.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 409 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 410 RULE 410

2-410 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 410.syn

§ 410.syn Synopsis to Chapter 410: RULE 410

410.01 Official Text

410.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Scope of the Rule

[2] State Proceedings

[3] Waiver of Rule 410 Protections

410.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Administrative Proceeding

[2] Breach of Agreement by Accused

[3] Collateral Estoppel in Civil Cases

[4] Convictions

[5] "Fruits" of Plea Discussions

[6] Impeachment

[7] Joint Defendants

[8] Nolo Contendere Pleas

[9] Plea Bargaining Distinguished from Volunteered Offers of Cooperation and Other Discussions

[10] Plea Bargaining Offered Against the Government

[11] Plea Bargaining with Foreign Authorities

[12] Post-Conviction Bargaining

[13] Relationship to Other Rules

[a] Rule 404(b)

[b] Relationship to Other Rules -- Rule 408

[14] Sentencing Proceedings

[15] Statements Made After Plea Agreement Is Reached

[16] Statements to Investigators

[17] Statements to Presentence Officer

[18] Voice Identification Based on Plea Negotiations

[19] Waiver

410.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Notes

[2] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

[3] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

[4] Report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary

[5] Report of the House and Senate Conferees

[6] Citations to Hearings and Debates

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 410 RULE 410

2-410 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 410.01

410.01 Official Text

Rule 410. Inadmissibility of Plea Discussions, and Related Statements

Except as otherwise provided in this rule, evidence of the following is not, in any civil or criminal proceeding, admissible against the defendant who made the plea or was a participant in the plea discussions:

(1) a plea of guilty which was later withdrawn;

(2) a plea of nolo contendere;

(3) any statement made in the course of any proceedings under Rule 11 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure or comparable state procedure regarding either of the foregoing pleas; or

(4) any statement made in the course of plea discussions with an attorney for the prosecuting authority which do not result in a plea of guilty or which result in a plea of guilty later withdrawn.However, such a statement is admissible (i) in any proceeding wherein another statement made in the course of the same plea or plea discussions has been introduced and the statement ought in fairness to be considered contemporaneously with it, or (ii) in a criminal proceeding for perjury or false statement if the statement was made by the defendant under oath, on the record and in the presence of counsel.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 410 RULE 410

2-410 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 410.02

410.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Scope of the Rule

Rule 410 is the criminal counterpart to Rule 408, designed to protect guilty plea negotiations in the way that Rule 408 is designed to protect compromise negotiations in civil cases. Rule 410 covers withdrawn pleas, nolo contendere pleas, and statements made in connection with the pleas covered by the Rule. The Rule does not cover pleas that have been accepted and not subsequently withdrawn; n1 nor does it cover statements made in the course of negotiations which lead to binding plea agreements. n2 If the defendant accepts an offer and pleads guilty, this fact is admissible as an admission, assuming that it passes the threshold of Rule 403. n3 Moreover, the Rule does not cover statements made after bargaining has been completed -- even if the guilty plea is later withdrawn. Post-bargaining statements are not made "in the course of plea discussions." n4

The Rule makes clear that the bargaining that is covered is that done with an attorney for the government, thus generally excluding statements to police officers from the reach of the Rule. n5 It does not matter that the police officer promises to recommend leniency, or suggests that charges may be dropped. While the police officer's statements concerning cooperation may have some bearing on the voluntariness of the confession, they have nothing to do with Rule 410, since the defendant cannot reasonably view such statements as part of an authorized plea offer. n6 On the other hand, if law enforcement officials have actually been delegated the authority to engage in plea bargaining, then Rule 410 should apply to the same extent as if the defendant were communicating directly with the prosecutor. n7

Rule 410 provides for only two limited exceptions. n8 First, a statement that would otherwise be excluded can be admitted if other evidence of pleas or plea discussions is introduced and the statement should in fairness be considered together with the evidence that has been introduced. This is a principle similar to that found in Rule 106. Second, a statement made under oath, on the record, and in the presence of counsel may be introduced in a subsequent perjury-type prosecution.

Nine additional points can be made concerning the scope of the Rule:

(1) The Rule clearly covers both extrajudicial and in-court statements by defendants and their counsel.

(2) The Rule, as interpreted, provides two-way protection for statements made in plea negotiations where an agreement is not reached or a plea is withdrawn. Thus, statements or offers made by the prosecutor during plea negotiations are inadmissible against the government if an agreement is not reached or the plea withdrawn. The policy of the Rule is to encourage the free-flow of communication and compromise from both sides. n9 Also, a plea offer from the government may signal a desire for an efficient resolution rather than a recognition of a weak case, and is therefore thought to have minimal probative value. n10

(3) The Rule does not speak of pleas that are set aside on appeal or on collateral attack. Nor does it explicitly cover pleas that are rejected by the Court under Fed.R.Crim.P. 11. Presumably, pleas that are rejected or vacated for one reason or another should be treated as "withdrawn" pleas, and thus statements and offers made in the course of negotiating such pleas should be inadmissible under Rule 410.

(4) The Rule protects not only the person who utters certain words during plea bargaining or an attempt to enter a plea; it also covers anyone else who was a participant in the plea discussions at the time that the relevant statement or offer was made.

(5) The Rule protects only those who are, at the time the evidence is proffered, parties to a criminal or civil case. n11 Thus, nonparty witnesses can be impeached with evidence of an attempted plea, an offer to plead, or statements made during plea bargaining, unless the impeachment evidence would be offered in the case of a coparticipant in the plea negotiations whom the Rule protects. n12

(6) Unlike Rule 408, Rule 410 contains no exception for impeachment of party-witnesses. Thus, statements made by defendants during plea discussions cannot be used to impeach their subsequent inconsistent trial testimony (subject to waiver of Rule 410 protections, as discussed below). n13

(7) The Rule applies not only in an ensuing criminal prosecution, but also in any subsequent civil case in which the defendant is a party. So, for example, if a defendant enters into plea negotiations concerning a charge of vehicular homicide, and no agreement is reached or a plea is withdrawn, the evidence of compromise is not admissible in a subsequent personal injury action against the defendant arising out of the accident. Again, however, completed guilty pleas are admissible in civil litigation where relevant.

(8) Because the Federal Rules of Evidence are inapplicable to sentencing proceedings (see Rule 1101), admissions made in plea negotiations can be used against the defendant at sentencing. n14 Admission of such statements at sentencing undermines the policy of Rule 410, of course; and that is especially so under the Federal Sentencing Guidelines, where sentences can be increased dramatically for obstruction of justice and other conduct that was not within the indictment. n15 Defense counsel must therefore approach plea negotiations cautiously. It is certainly in the client's interest to get an agreement from the government that statements during the plea negotiations will not be proffered at a sentencing hearing. Whether the government will make such an agreement is a question for the plea bargaining marketplace.

(9) It has been held that the protections of Rule 410 are not applicable to plea bargaining with foreign authorities. n16

[2] State Proceedings

Can statements made by a defendant in the course of negotiating a plea with federal officials be used against the defendant in state Courts? If the Federal Rule is to work, presumably the accused must feel confident that nothing said in the course of bargaining will later be used against them at any trial. The possibility of a state proceeding in which statements could be used might threaten the proper application of the Rule. Under the Supremacy Clause, Congress could bar state Courts from admitting against defendants statements that are covered by the Rule. Whether Congress intended this result in Rule 410 is open to question. One way of avoiding the problem is for federal prosecutors and investigators to protect against disclosure of statements made during negotiations. If information is to be shared in a case of joint federal-state investigative procedures, the federal government should seek to ensure that state Courts will not use information falling under Rule 410 that has been shared by the federal government against those whom the Rule is drafted to protect. One must hope that state officials, who should themselves be aware of the importance of plea bargaining in the criminal justice system as it now exists, will never force the issue.

It should be noted that many states have a Rule that is substantively identical to Rule 410, so that the evidence subject to the Rule would be inadmissible even if the plea proceedings occurred in a federal jurisdiction. n17 The conflict referred to in the preceding paragraph does not arise in these states. Similarly, the language of Federal Rule 410 referring to "comparable state procedure" means that the protections of Rule 410 are applicable to federal litigation occurring after guilty plea negotiations in state proceedings.

[3] Waiver of Rule 410 Protections

In United States v. Mezzanatto, 513 U.S. 196 (1995) , the Court held that an agreement to waive the protections of Rule 410 (and the substantively identical Fed. R. Crim. P. 11(e)(6)) n18 is valid and enforceable absent some affirmative indication that the defendant entered the agreement unknowingly or involuntarily.

Mezzanatto was charged with a drug offense and, at his request, the government held a plea bargaining meeting with him. Before the discussions began, Mezzanatto was warned that negotiations were contingent on his agreement that any statements he made would be used to impeach him at a subsequent trial on the drug charges, should the case ever go that far. Mezzanatto conferred with his counsel and agreed to this arrangement; discussions began, but were fruitless. At trial, Mezzanatto testified inconsistently with statements he made during the plea negotiations. Over Mezzanatto's objection, he was impeached with those prior statements, and was subsequently convicted.

Justice Thomas, writing for the majority, rejected the defendant's argument that waiver was not permitted because not expressly provided for in the Rule. He concluded that Rule 410 was enacted "against a background presumption that legal rights generally, and evidentiary provisions specifically, are subject to waiver by voluntary agreement of the parties."

The defendant in Mezzanatto sought to overcome the presumption of waivability by a policy argument: he argued that if the protections of Rule 410 were waivable, defendants would be less likely to bargain. But Justice Thomas reasoned, correctly we believe, that the power to waive the protections of Rule 410 can in fact benefit defendants. It gives them another chip to use in the bargaining process. If prosecutors were precluded from securing waiver agreements, they might refuse to enter into plea discussions at all -- especially if they are concerned that the defendant might be less than forthcoming in those discussions. Essentially, waiver agreements tell prosecutors that defendants are willing to put their money where their mouth is, so that prosecutors will not just be wasting their time. As Justice Thomas stated, the way to encourage settlement "is to permit the interested parties to enter into knowing and voluntary negotiations without any arbitrary limits on their bargaining chips." n19

The Court in Mezzanatto stressed that a waiver of Rule 410 protections would not be recognized unless the prosecution can establish that the defendant made a knowing and voluntary waiver. This was no problem for the prosecution under the facts of Mezzanatto, where the defendant initiated discussions with the government, and conferred with an attorney before agreeing to waive the protections of Rule 410.

Mezzanatto's agreement with the government waived the protections of Rule 410 only insofar as the statements could be offered to impeach him at trial. This leaves open the question whether defendants have the power to agree that their statements during plea negotiations can be used against them as substantive evidence should the case go to trial. The majority in Mezzanatto found it unnecessary to address this question. Justice Ginsburg, in a concurring opinion, expressed the view that if such a waiver were enforceable, it would "severely undermine a defendant's incentive to negotiate, and thereby inhibit plea bargaining." Justice Souter, in dissent, pointed out that the free market rationale of the majority opinion in Mezzanatto extended to permitting the defendant to agree to the substantive use of plea negotiation statements at trial. We agree with Justice Souter's take on the majority's decision: if the plea process is to be left to the market, the defendant should be able to waive the protections of Rule 410 in toto. The appropriate regulation of the plea process is not in some arbitrary rule preventing waiver, but rather in assuring that waivers are upheld only if they are knowing and voluntary.

Several Courts after Mezzanatto have upheld agreements by in which the defendant waived his right to exclude substantive evidence under Rule 410. For example, the Court in United States v. Burch, 156 F.3d 1315 (D.C. Cir. 1998) , reasoned that the holding in Mezzanatto logically extended to agreements to use the defendant's statements as substantive evidence:

> On reflection, ... we cannot discern any acceptable rationale for not extending the majority opinion in Mezzanatto to this case. Justice Thomas' opinion rests on three principles. First, it finds that in the absence of an affirmative indication that Congress intended to preclude or to limit the waiver of statutory protections, including evidentiary rules, voluntary agreements to waive these protections are presumptively enforceable. Second, the opinion rejects the argument that [the Rule expresses] congressional disfavor towards waivability. Finally, the opinion stresses that in weighing whether to override a presumption of waivability, a court should assess the public policy justifications, if any, which counsel in favor of departing from that norm. Cumulatively, we believe these principles do not countenance drawing any distinction in this case between permitting waivers for purposes of impeachment or rebuttal and permitting waivers for the prosecution's case-in-chief. n20

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. See, e.g., Brewer v. City of Napa, 210 F.3d 1093 (9th Cir. 2000) (plaintiff in a civil rights action was properly impeached with convictions based on pleas; Rule 410 "by its terms prohibits only evidence of pleas" and Rule 609 "permits admission for impeachment purposes of evidence of convictions").

(n2)Footnote 2. See, e.g., United States v. Paden, 908 F.2d 1229 (5th Cir. 1990) (Rule 410 does "not prohibit statements made during plea negotiations that lead to" an unrevoked guilty plea).

(n3)Footnote 3. See United States v. Benson, 640 F.2d 136 (8th Cir. 1981) (Rule 410 does not apply where the guilty plea is accepted and not withdrawn).

(n4)Footnote 4. See, e.g., United States v. Lloyd, 43 F.3d 1183 (8th Cir. 1994) (the protections of Rule 410 are not applicable to statements made pursuant to the terms of an agreement that has already been reached: where the defendant entered into an agreement, then made statements implicating himself and others, then withdrew from the agreement, his later statements could be used against him at trial).

(n5)Footnote 5. See, e.g., United States v. Mangine, 302 F.3d 819 (8th Cir. 2002) (statements to a police officer made with the request that the officer help the defendant out were not excluded by Rule 410 because they were not made in negotiation with an attorney for the government and there was no indication that the officer had authority to conduct plea negotiations); United States v. Greene, 995 F.2d 793 (8th Cir. 1993) (statements made to DEA agent were not covered by Rule 410, where the agent had no express or apparent authority to plea bargain with the defendant).

(n6)Footnote 6. See, e.g., United States v. Posey, 611 F.2d 1389 (5th Cir. 1980) (DEA agent's statement that he would bring the defendant's cooperation to the attention of the prosecutor did not trigger the protections of Rule 410, since the defendant could not reasonably believe that the agent had the authority to bargain on the prosecutor's behalf). For a discussion of the constitutional regulation of involuntary confessions, see S. Saltzburg & D. Capra, American Criminal Procedure 672-86 (7th ed. 2004).

(n7)Footnote 7. See, e.g., United States v. Sitton, 968 F.2d 947 (9th Cir. 1992) (stating that conversations between the accused and police officers can constitute plea bargaining where the police obtain authority from the government attorney to negotiate; no such showing on the facts of this case); Rachlin v. United States, 723 F.2d 1373 (8th Cir. 1983) (recognizing the principle that Rule 410 applies if agents have authority to bargain, but finding it inapplicable to the facts).

(n8)Footnote 8. See United States v. Sayakhom, 186 F.3d 928 (9th Cir. 1999) (error to admit statement made in plea negotiations to establish notice but not guilt; Rule 410 contains only two limited exceptions, and "notice" or "issues other than guilt" are not among them).

(n9)Footnote 9. See, e.g., United States v. Verdoorn, 528 F.2d 103 (8th Cir. 1976) (criminal defendant could not introduce evidence of plea bargaining by the Government to show consciousness of a weak case). See also United States v. Sayakhom, 186 F.3d 928 (9th Cir. 1999) (prosecuting attorney's statement to defendant during plea negotiations cannot be admitted to prove notice).

(n10)Footnote 10. See, e.g., United States v. Delgado, 903 F.2d 1495 (11th Cir. 1990) (plea agreement and statements by the prosecutor cannot be offered as an admission by the government, since the deal may have been struck for reasons other than the government's belief in the innocence of the accused; relying upon Rule 403). Cf. United States v. Biaggi, 909 F.2d 662 (2d Cir. 1990) , where the defendant sought to prove his own "consciousness of innocence" by the fact that he rejected a grant of complete immunity and refused to testify because he knew nothing about the charged wrongdoing. The Court noted that a rejection of immunity under these circumstances was far more probative of an innocent state of mind than a rejection of a plea offer made by the government. The Court found it unnecessary to determine whether a plea offer by the government would be excluded under Rule 410.

(n11)Footnote 11. See, e.g., United States v. Sonny Mitchell Center, 934 F.2d 77 (5th Cir. 1991) (under Rule 609, a nonparty witness may be impeached with a felony conviction based on a plea of nolo contendere).

(n12)Footnote 12. See United States v. Mathis, 550 F.2d 180 (4th Cir. 1976) (Rule 410 does not apply to impeachment of a nonparty witness, because the plea negotiations are not offered "against" the witness in this circumstance).

(n13)Footnote 13. See, e.g., United States v. Acosta-Ballardo, 8 F.3d 1532 (10th Cir. 1993) (impeachment use of defendant's plea negotiations is contrary to the text and the legislative history of Rule 410).

(n14)Footnote 14. See, e.g., United States v. Simmons, 164 F.3d 76 (2d Cir. 1998) (District Judge did not err in enhancing the defendant's sentence on the basis of admissions made by the defendant during a guilty plea hearing where the plea was later withdrawn; the Federal Rules of Evidence do not apply to sentencing proceedings); United States v. Medina-Estrada, 81 F.3d 981 (10th Cir. 1996) (Rule 410 does not apply at sentencing proceedings, since Rule 1101(d)(3) expressly states that the rules of evidence are not applicable in such proceedings).

(n15)Footnote 15. See, e.g., United States v. Upton, 91 F.3d 677 (5th Cir. 1996) (Rule 410 does not preclude statements made during plea negotiations from being considered during sentencing; therefore it was permissible to increase the defendant's offense level for obstruction of justice, where he admitted during plea negotiations that he had lied to the grand jury).

(n16)Footnote 16. United States v. Orlandez-Gamboa, 320 F.3d 328 (2d Cir. 2003) (reasoning that language in the Rule limits protection to guilty pleas in state and federal prosecutions).

(n17)Footnote 17. See G. Joseph & S. Saltzburg, Evidence in America § 20.1.

(n18)Footnote 18. At the time Mezzanatto was decided, Criminal Rule 11(e)(6) was a detailed rule that was substantially similar to, but not identical to Rule 410. Subsequently, the Criminal Rule was amended to delete the substantive provisions; now it simply incorporates Rule 410 by reference.

(n19)Footnote 19. In United States v. Krilich, 159 F.3d 1020, 1024 (7th Cir. 1998) , Judge Easterbrook explained why it was important to permit the defendant to waive the protections of Rule 410:

> By authorizing the prosecutor to use his statements if he should contradict himself, Krilich made his representations more credible and thus strengthened his hand in negotiations. A prosecutor may be reluctant to negotiate; what has the defendant to offer? A statement that shows how the defendant's aid could assist the prosecutor in other cases (or lead to the appropriate sentence in this one) may get negotiations under way and set the stage for a favorable bargain. But a prosecutor needs assurance that the defendant is being candid. A conditional waiver of the kind Krilich signed tends to keep the defendant honest, which makes the proffer device more useful to both sides. For this strategy to work, the conditional waiver must be enforceable; its effect depends on making deceit costly.

(n20)Footnote 20. See also United States v. Barrow, 400 F.3d 109 (2d Cir. 2005) (upholding an agreement that provided for substantive use of the defendant's statements made in plea bargaining, and noting that such a ruling provided assurances that the defendant was being truthful by making deceit costly, and therefore the rule promoted plea bargaining.).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 410 RULE 410

2-410 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 410.03

410.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Administrative Proceeding

Myers v. Secretary of Health & Human Servs., 893 F.2d 840 (6th Cir. 1990) : In reviewing an administrative determination excluding the appellants from participation in the Medicare program, the Court held that the Rule did not bar evidence that they had previously been convicted on a plea of nolo contendere of Medicare fraud, because it does not apply to use of a conviction, nor does it prohibit use of a nolo plea in an administrative proceeding.

[2] Breach of Agreement by Accused

United States v. Stirling, 571 F.2d 708 (2d Cir. 1978) : One defendant in a securities law case had agreed to a plea bargain in which he promised to "at all times give complete, truthful and accurate information and testimony," and which provided that if he breached, he could be prosecuted and any information he provided could be used against him. The defendant testified before a grand jury pursuant to the agreement, but subsequently withdrew from the bargain and went to trial, where his grand jury testimony was admitted against him. The Court concluded that, although a literal reading of the Rule (and its counterpart, Fed. R. Crim. P. 11(e)(6)) might bar use of the grand jury testimony, the policy of free and open negotiations upon which the Rule is premised did not require exclusion of statements made by a person who agreed to the use of the statements against him in the event of a breach of the plea bargain agreement.

United States v. Swick, 262 F.3d 684 (8th Cir. 2001) : In a prosecution for tampering with consumer products, the Court reversed an order that suppressed inculpatory statements made by the defendant in a plea agreement and a plea colloquy. The defendant signed an agreement providing that if he breached the plea agreement, all testimony and other information he provided to the government "may and will be used against him in any prosecution or proceeding." The Trial Judge granted the defendant's motion to withdraw his plea before sentencing. The Court found that a knowing and voluntary waiver permits the government to use the defendant's statements in the government's case-in-chief, and indicated that it was "not persuaded by Swick's assertion that because he was under pressure to accept the plea agreement or be forced to go to trial and face severe consequences, his plea was involuntary." In United States v. Young

, 223 F.3d 905 (8th Cir. 2000) , a defendant charged with drug trafficking had entered into a plea agreement but then absconded before his guilty plea hearing. When he was later apprehended, the government declared a breach of the agreement and chose to try him for the original crime. The Trial Judge excluded the statements that the defendant made at the guilty plea hearing, on the ground that the defendant was never specifically informed of his right under Rule 410 to exclude the statements he was making should the parties not agree and the case go to trial. On interlocutory appeal, the Court reversed, finding that the defendant had waived his protections under Rule 410 by breaching the agreement, which specifically stated that if the defendant breached its terms he could be tried and all of the statements that he had made to the authorities would be admissible against him.

[3] Collateral Estoppel in Civil Cases

Walker v. Schaeffer, 854 F.2d 138 (6th Cir. 1988) : The Court held that Rule 410 did not bar a Court from holding that a plea of nolo contendere estopped a defendant from bringing a civil suit based upon a claim that the officers who arrested him lacked probable cause.

[4] Convictions

Myers v. Secretary of Health & Human Servs., 893 F.2d 840 (6th Cir. 1990) : In reviewing an administrative determination excluding the appellants from participation in the Medicare program, the Court held that the Rule did not bar evidence that they had previously been convicted on a plea of nolo contendere of Medicare fraud, because it does not apply to use of a conviction, nor does it prohibit use of a nolo plea in an administrative proceeding.

[5] "Fruits" of Plea Discussions

United States v. Ware, 890 F.2d 1008 (8th Cir. 1989) : Affirming drug offense convictions, the Court noted that proof that a defendant identified a potential witness to the government during plea discussions is not within the bar of Rule 410.

[6] Impeachment

United States v. Wood, 879 F.2d 927 (D.C. Cir. 1989) : In a prosecution of a drug trafficking conspiracy, the Court held that statements made during plea bargaining negotiations were inadmissible to impeach a defendant who testified. The Court vacated the defendant's conspiracy conviction, on which a concurrent sentence was imposed, without deciding whether she waived her objection by signing a letter from the prosecutor warning her that statements in the bargaining process could be used at trial to cross-examine her.

United States v. Lawson, 683 F.2d 688 (2d Cir. 1982) : Reversing a bank robbery conviction, the Court held that statements falling within Rule 410 could not be used for impeachment purposes. It commented that the legislative history on the point was "unusually clear." One Judge dissented on the ground that the statements had not been made in plea discussions.

United States v. Acosta-Ballardo, 8 F.3d 1532 (10th Cir. 1993) : The defendant's conviction for possessing cocaine with intent to distribute was reversed because statements he made during plea discussions were introduced to impeach his inconsistent testimony at trial. Impeachment use of plea negotiations is contrary to the text and the legislative history of the Rule.

[7] Joint Defendants

United States v. Rosario, 111 F.3d 293 (2d Cir. 1997) : In a multiple defendant narcotics prosecution, Basciano sought to admit a statement by Bottone made during Bottone's plea negotiations. Bottone had stated that he and Basciano were involved in the gambling business, not the drug business. Bottone argued that the admission of this statement violated Rule 410, but the Court found no error. The statement was offered in favor of Basciano rather than against Bottone; because it did nothing to implicate Bottone in narcotics activity, Rule 410 did not apply. In United States v. Serna, n1 the Court held that a codefendant's statement that the defendant was the wrong man was inadmissible in a joint trial of the two defendants for drug smuggling, since it was made in the course of plea negotiations. No limiting instruction would have been adequate to protect the codefendant. The Court also held that it was not required that the government attorney be present when a statement is made as long as the attorney is participating in the plea bargaining.

[8] Nolo Contendere Pleas

Olsen v. Correiro, 189 F.3d 52 (1st Cir. 1999) : The plaintiff had been convicted of murder, but the conviction was reversed because the prosecution failed to disclose exculpatory evidence. Rather than go through another trial, he pleaded nolo contendere to a charge of manslaughter, and was sentenced to time served. He then brought a civil rights action, arguing that he was unconstitutionally subjected to imprisonment on murder charges. The defendants proffered the nolo contendere plea as evidence that the plaintiff would have been incarcerated anyway. Affirming a finding that the nolo plea to the lesser charge precluded damages for imprisonment on the murder charge, the Court noted that the Rule 410 limitation on the admissibility of nolo pleas was inapplicable, because the evidence was not offered to show underlying culpability but only that he was incarcerated for something other than the murder conviction.

United States v. Adedoyin, 369 F.3d 337 (3d Cir. 2004) : Affirming convictions for mail fraud and improper entry into the United States by an alien, the Court held that evidence of the defendant's 1981 California felony conviction was properly admitted to prove that the defendant lied on his visa application when he denied he had any criminal convictions. The defendant argued that the conviction was inadmissible because it was based on a nolo contendere plea, but the Court reasoned that while Rule 410 precludes admission of a nolo contendere plea, it does not operate to exclude the conviction that results from such a plea, since "a plea of nolo contendere has the same legal consequences as a plea of guilty and results in a conviction."

Myers v. Secretary of Health & Human Servs., 893 F.2d 840 (6th Cir. 1990) : In reviewing an administrative determination excluding the appellants from participation in the Medicare program, the Court held that the Rule did not bar evidence that they had previously been convicted on a plea of nolo contendere of Medicare fraud, because it does not apply to use of a conviction, nor does it prohibit use of a nolo plea in an administrative proceeding.

Brewer v. City of Napa, 210 F.3d 1093 (9th Cir. 2000) : The Court held that the plaintiff in a civil rights action was properly impeached with convictions based on nolo contendere pleas. The Court reasoned that Rule 410 did not preclude such impeachment, because that Rule "by its terms prohibits only evidence of pleas" while Rule 609 "permits admission for impeachment purposes of evidence of convictions." The Court also noted that the Advisory Committee considered an exception to Rule 609 for nolo convictions and ultimately rejected it.

Rose v. Uniroyal Goodrich Tire Co., 219 F.3d 1216 (10th Cir. 2000) : The plaintiff was terminated for violation of his employer's Drug-Free Workplace Policy after he pleaded nolo contendere to a misdemeanor charge of marijuana possession. The termination was upheld as justified by the employer's Fair Treatment Panel procedure. Affirming summary judgment for the employer on a wrongful discharge complaint, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in denying the plaintiff's motion in limine to exclude evidence of the plea. Rule 410 does not apply to the personnel decisions of private companies, so the plea could properly be used as a basis for the termination decision, and it would be unjust to preclude the employer from introducing the very evidence it relied upon in deciding to discharge the plaintiff.

[9] Plea Bargaining Distinguished from Volunteered Offers of Cooperation and Other Discussions

United States v. Penta, 898 F.2d 815 (1st Cir. 1990) : The Court held that Fed. R. Crim. P. 11(e)(6) (the counterpart to Rule 410) did not exclude the defendant's statements to a government attorney and an investigator, with whom he had a number of conferences in which the prosecutor was openly trying to build a case against the defendant's associates and (in the prosecutor's unexpressed belief) the defendant was trying to avoid prosecution or a long jail sentence. Because the defendant made no such request and the attorney made no offer, there were no plea discussions within the meaning of the Rule.

United States v. Biaggi, 909 F.2d 662 (2d Cir. 1990) : Reversing a defendant's convictions in a political corruption case on the ground that evidence was erroneously excluded that he "rejected" immunity, by denying knowledge of others' wrongdoing at a time when admitting such knowledge would have secured him immunity, the Court noted that the evidence was far more evidence of an innocent state of mind than it was a rejected plea bargain, the admissibility of which it was unnecessary to decide. In United States v. Cunningham, n2 the Court upheld a conviction for making false statements to the IRS and members of the United States Attorney's office. It found that statements made by the defendant after he stipulated that anything he said could be used against him were not part of a plea agreement, but were an effort to convince the government that he was not guilty of a crime and should not be prosecuted.

United States v. Conaway, 11 F.3d 40 (5th Cir. 1994) : The Court held that the defendant had not been engaged in plea negotiations when he turned over records to a grand jury investigating currency transaction structuring, so the records were not thereby made inadmissible. The prosecutor had given the defendant an opportunity to corroborate grand jury testimony that he had not evaded taxes by furnishing the records and had several times reminded him that they could be used against him.

United States v. Hare, 49 F.3d 447 (8th Cir. 1995) : The Court affirmed an attorney's conviction for fraud, holding there was no error in admitting statements made to agents and an Assistant U.S. Attorney. Knowing that the offenses with which he could be charged were serious, the defendant offered the statements unconditionally in an effort to cooperate at a time when no plea bargain was offered or even contemplated by the government.

United States v. Guerrero, 847 F.2d 1363 (9th Cir. 1988) : The Court concluded that statements made by a defendant to the FBI and to a federal prosecutor were admissible, since they were made when the defendant admitted paying kickbacks and offered to cooperate in exchange for the prosecutor's promise to consider such cooperation in the handling of any future cases. The Court reasoned that "[a] statement was made in the course of plea discussions if: (1) the suspect exhibited an actual subjective expectation that he was negotiating a plea at the time of the discussion; and (2) the suspect's expectation was reasonable given the totality of the circumstances." It found that neither part of the test was met in this case.

[10] Plea Bargaining Offered Against the Government

United States v. Biaggi, 909 F.2d 662 (2d Cir. 1990) : Reversing a defendant's convictions in a political corruption case on the ground that evidence was erroneously excluded that he "rejected" immunity, by denying knowledge of others' wrongdoing at a time when admitting such knowledge would have secured him immunity, the Court noted that the evidence was far more evidence of an innocent state of mind than it was a rejected plea bargain, the admissibility of which it was unnecessary to decide.

United States v. Verdoorn, 528 F.2d 103 (8th Cir. 1976) : Affirming convictions for conspiracy and various substantive offenses arising out of a theft of an interstate shipment of beef, the Court cited Rule 408 and Fed. R. Crim. P. 11(e)(6) for the proposition that criminal defendants cannot introduce evidence of plea bargaining by the government to show consciousness of a weak case.

[11] Plea Bargaining with Foreign Authorities

United States v. Orlandez-Gamboa, 320 F.3d 328 (2d Cir. 2003) : On interlocutory appeal in a drug case, the Court reversed a ruling that suppressed statements that the defendant had made to Colombian prosecutors in a procedure that the Trial Judge found was a form of plea bargaining. Reasoning that subdivision (4) of Rule 410 could be no broader than subdivision (3), which specifically refers only to federal and state proceedings, the Court held that the Rule did not extend to statements made in plea bargaining with foreign authorities.

[12] Post-Conviction Bargaining

United States v. Graham, 91 F.3d 213 (D.C. Cir. 1996) : Affirming drug-related convictions, the Court held that testimony by an Assistant U.S. Attorney that, even after the defendant was sentenced to life imprisonment, he rejected the government's offer of a possible sentence reduction in exchange for his cooperation, was properly admitted in a § 2255 hearing at which the defendant challenged the effectiveness of his counsel. The Court stated that Rule 410 applies only to "plea" negotiations, not to every offer of cooperation or post-conviction bargaining.

[13] Relationship to Other Rules

[a] Rule 404(b)

United States v. Wyatt, 762 F.2d 908 (11th Cir. 1985) : The Court affirmed a defendant's drug convictions, holding that evidence of other crimes was properly admitted under Rule 404(b). Although the defendant had pleaded nolo contendere to the other crimes, Rule 410 bars only use of the plea, but not other evidence of the underlying acts.

[b] Relationship to Other Rules -- Rule 408

United States v. Sayakhom, 186 F.3d 928 (9th Cir. 1999) : The Trial Judge in a mail fraud and money laundering case excluded evidence of all statements made in plea negotiations except the AUSA's warning that the defendant's insurance sales were illegal. Analogizing to Rule 408, which permits use of statements in compromise on issues other than liability, the Judge limited use of the warnings to establish notice but not guilt. The Court held this was error (but harmless), since Rule 410 bars any use of plea negotiation statements, with only two specific exceptions inapplicable in this case.

[14] Sentencing Proceedings

United States v. Simmons, 164 F.3d 76 (2d Cir. 1998) : The Court found no error when the defendant's sentence for possession of a firearm was enhanced on the basis of his statements made during his guilty plea hearing. The guilty plea was later withdrawn, and Rule 410 would preclude the admission of such statements at trial. But the Court held that under Rule 1101(d)(3), Rule 410 is not applicable in sentencing proceedings. The Court also relied on 18 U.S.C. § 3661, which provides that "[n]o limitation shall be placed on the information concerning the background, character, and conduct of a person convicted of an offense which a court of the United States may receive and consider for the purpose of imposing an appropriate sentence."

United States v. Paden, 908 F.2d 1229 (5th Cir. 1990) : The Court held that statements made in plea negotiations that were unilaterally broken off by the government eight months before the defendant's ultimate guilty plea were admissible in sentencing on that plea, as the Rule looks only to the end result of the process, which is often not smooth and unbroken.

United States v. Medina-Estrada, 81 F.3d 981 (10th Cir. 1996) : Affirming a conviction for possession of methamphetamine with intent to distribute, the Court held that Rule 410 does not apply at sentencing proceedings, since Rule 1101(d)(3) expressly states that the Rules of Evidence are not applicable in such proceedings. In United States v. Ruminer, n3 the Court affirmed drug convictions, holding that the Trial Judge properly considered in sentencing the fact that defendants supplied false leads to the government during plea discussions. The Court, citing Rule 1101(d)(3), observed that Rule 410 did not override the general principle that a defendant's conduct could be considered in sentencing.

[15] Statements Made After Plea Agreement Is Reached

United States v. Ventura-Cruel, 356 F.3d 55 (1st Cir. 2003) : The defendant in a cocaine smuggling case entered a guilty plea pursuant to a plea bargain, but a year later the Judge withdrew the guilty plea during sentencing procedures. At trial, the government introduced a letter accepting responsibility that the defendant had written to his probation officer as part of the pre-sentencing process under the plea bargain. Vacating the conviction, the Court held it was unfair to deprive the defendant of the benefit of his plea bargain but allow use of incriminating statements that the plea agreement had encouraged him to make in order to receive a shorter sentence. In the absence of any provision in the agreement permitting use of admissions if the plea was subsequently overturned or one of the parties withdrew from the agreement, both sides should have been returned to their positions before the Judge initially accepted the guilty plea.

United States v. Lloyd, 43 F.3d 1183 (8th Cir. 1994) : Affirming drug convictions, the Court held that the protections of Rule 410 are not applicable to statements made pursuant to the terms of an agreement that has already been reached. Such statements are not made "in the course of plea discussions." Accordingly, where the defendant entered into a plea agreement, then made statements implicating himself and others, then repudiated the agreement, his statements could be used against him at trial.

[16] Statements to Investigators

United States v. Aponte-Suarez, 905 F.2d 483 (1st Cir. 1990) : In affirming drug-importation conspiracy convictions, the Court held that statements to government investigators were properly admitted, as they were not made in the course of plea negotiations nor were they made to an attorney for the prosecuting authority.

United States v. Sebetich, 776 F.2d 412 (3d Cir. 1985) : The Court found that statements made by a defendant to an FBI agent could not have been within the Rule, since there was no intention of bargaining during the meeting and the defendant could not have believed the agent had any authority to bargain.

United States v. Mangine, 302 F.3d 819 (8th Cir. 2002) : The Court affirmed a conviction for felon firearm possession, holding there was no error in admitting testimony from a sheriff's lieutenant regarding statements the defendant made while in custody. Although the defendant prefaced the statements with requests that the lieutenant "help him out," the statements were not plea negotiations inadmissible under Rule 410 because they were not made in negotiations with an attorney for the government and there was no suggestion that the lieutenant had any authority to engage in plea negotiations. In a drug prosecution, United States v. Kummer, 15 F.3d 1455 (8th Cir. 1994) , the Court held that detectives' statements that they could "put in a good word for" the defendant could neither be reasonably construed to mean that their discussions were plea negotiations nor that they had express authority to enter into such negotiations, so the defendant's inculpatory statements to them were properly admitted. In United States v. Greene, n4 the Court affirmed convictions for drug offenses, holding there was no error in denying the defendant's motion to suppress statements made to a DEA agent, allegedly in plea bargaining, as the agent had no express or apparent authority from the prosecuting attorney to plea bargain with the defendant. In Rachlin v. United States, n5 the Court affirmed a conviction for passing a counterfeit note, finding that statements made by the defendant to Secret Service agents were not barred by the Rule, since the defendant was never told that the agents had authority to plea bargain and they never offered any "deal."

United States v. Sitton, 968 F.2d 947 (9th Cir. 1992) : The Court affirmed convictions for drug charges, holding that a defendant's statements to deputy sheriffs in which he offered "a trade" were properly admitted, as the deputies were not attorneys for the prosecuting authority and the defendant did not exhibit a subjective belief, reasonable under the circumstances, that he was negotiating a plea. In United States v. Karr, n6 the Court held that a defendant's statements to an officer were not covered by the Rule, where the defendant never offered to plead guilty and never inquired into whether the officer had authority to bargain.

United States v. Ceballos, 706 F.2d 1198 (11th Cir. 1983) : Affirming convictions for marijuana offenses, the Court held there was no error in admitting a letter, which one defendant gave to a Marshal for delivery to the agent in charge of the case, that expressed awareness of the details of a major smuggling operation and offered to cooperate with the government. No plea discussions were underway and the letter was not sent to an attorney for the government.

[17] Statements to Presentence Officer

United States v. Perez-Franco, 873 F.2d 455 (1st Cir. 1989) : In examining sentencing guidelines, the Court held that Rule 410 does not protect statements made to a presentence officer preparing a presentence report.

[18] Voice Identification Based on Plea Negotiations

United States v. Oriakhi, 57 F.3d 1290 (4th Cir. 1995) : The Court held there was no error in admitting incriminating audio tapes in a drug prosecution. The defendant objected that one witness had gained his knowledge of the defendant's voice during plea negotiations, but the Court held that the Rules limit admissibility of statements, not just sounds, in plea bargaining.

[19] Waiver

United States v. Mezzanatto, 513 U.S. 196 (1995) : The Court in a 7-2 decision held that the protections of Rule 410 can be knowingly and voluntarily waived by the defendant. Accordingly, statements made in plea negotiations were properly used to impeach the defendant at trial, where he, with the assistance of counsel, signed a written agreement allowing such use before beginning the plea bargaining process. The Court did not decide whether an agreement to admit plea negotiation statements in the case-in-chief would be enforceable. Justice Souter, joined by Justice Stevens, dissented. This case is discussed in the Editorial Explanatory Comment, at § 410.02[3].

United States v. Burch, 156 F.3d 1315 (D.C. Cir. 1998) : The defendant entered a guilty plea to one count of a multiple count indictment, and agreed to waive his right to exclude evidence under Rule 410. The Trial Judge granted the defendant's subsequent motion to withdraw his guilty plea, but held the defendant to his waiver of Rule 410 protections. The Court held there was no error in admitting the defendant's statements made at his plea hearing and at a subsequent debriefing during the prosecution's case-in-chief. It noted that the Supreme Court had upheld a waiver of Rule 410 protections in United States v. Mezzanatto, supra , at least insofar as the defendant's statements were offered for impeachment. The Court could not discern any "acceptable rationale" for limiting the Mezzanatto rule to impeachment; it specifically found that the defendant's waiver of Rule 410 protections was both knowing and voluntary.

United States v. Barrow, 400 F.3d 109 (2d Cir. 2005) : The Court affirmed a conviction for distribution of cocaine, finding no abuse of discretion when statements made by the defendant pursuant to a proffer agreement were admitted against him. The Court held that the waiver provision in the agreement, which permitted use of his statements "to rebut any evidence offered or elicited, or factual assertions made, by or on behalf of" the defendant, had been triggered by defense counsel's opening statement and by cross-examination of an undercover officer that implied he had fabricated his testimony regarding some of the relevant events. Once counsel triggered the waiver provision, the Judge enjoyed the broad discretion to admit the proffer statements. In United States v. Velez, 354 F.3d 190 (2d Cir. 2004) , a felon firearm possession case, the defendant agreed at a proffer session that the government could use any statements made at the session to rebut arguments or evidence offered by the defendant at trial. Affirming, the Court held that the waiver provision was effective, despite not being limited to situations in which the defendant himself testified. The Court rejected arguments that the waiver provision prevented any sort of meaningful defense and exploited a disparity of bargaining power between the government and the defendant, noting rather that it provided assurances that the defendant was being truthful in the proffer by making deceit costly and promoted the plea bargaining and cooperation policies noted in Mezzanatto.

United States v. Krilich, 159 F.3d 1020 (7th Cir. 1998) : The defendant in a RICO fraud case had made a proffer subject to a conditional waiver agreement, which permitted the government to use his statements if he should subsequently testify contrary to the substance of the proffer "or otherwise present a position inconsistent with the proffer." Affirming, the Court found no error in admission of statements from the proffer after the defense had elicited inconsistent testimony from prosecution witnesses on cross-examination. The Court concluded that the waiver become operative whenever the testimony advanced a position that could not be true if the proffer was; it rejected both the defense view, which would limit the clause to evidence presented by defense witnesses, and the prosecutor's position, which would allow the government to introduce the proffer if the defendant presented or elicited any evidence regarding the facts of the case.

United States v. Millard, 139 F.3d 1200 (8th Cir. 1998) : The Court affirmed convictions for conspiracy to distribute methamphetamine, holding it was error (but not plain error) to admit evidence of statements made during plea discussions with a government attorney. The defendant's attorney had not "invited the error" by mentioning the plea discussions in his opening statement, since the prosecution's opening statement had prompted defense counsel's mention of the subject.

United States v. Rebbe, 314 F.3d 402 (9th Cir. 2002) : The defendant in a prosecution for filing false tax returns had executed a waiver permitting statements in a proffer made during plea negotiations to be used "should [he] testify, or to rebut any evidence, argument or representations offered" by him or on his behalf. The defendant did not testify but did call four witnesses in support of his case. The Court found no error in admission of the statements, since they were offered in the government's rebuttal case and the waiver had been agreed to voluntarily and with the advice of counsel.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. United States v. Serna, 799 F.2d 842 (2d Cir. 1986) .

(n2)Footnote 2. United States v. Cunningham, 723 F.2d 217 (2d Cir. 1983) .

(n3)Footnote 3. United States v. Ruminer, 786 F.2d 381 (10th Cir. 1986) .

(n4)Footnote 4. United States v. Greene, 995 F.2d 793 (8th Cir. 1993) .

(n5)Footnote 5. Rachlin v. United States, 723 F.2d 1373 (8th Cir. 1983) .

(n6)Footnote 6. United States v. Karr, 742 F.2d 493 (9th Cir. 1984) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 410 RULE 410

2-410 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 410.04

410.04 Legislative History

[1] Advisory Committee's Notes

[The following material is the Note accompanying the Committee's draft of the latest versions of the Rule. The Rule was changed slightly after the Note was written.]

The major objective of the amendment to rule [Fed. R. Crim. P.] 11(e)(6) [virtually identical to Rule 410] is to describe more precisely, consistent with the original purpose of the provision, what evidence relating to pleas or plea discussions is inadmissible. The present language is susceptible to interpretation which would make it applicable to a wide variety of statements made under various circumstances other than within the context of those plea discussions authorized by rule 11(e) and intended to be protected by subdivision (e)(6) of the rule. See United States v. Herman, 544 F.2d 791 (5th Cir. 1977) , discussed herein.

Fed. R. Ev. 410, as originally adopted by Pub. L. 93-595, provided in part that 'evidence of a plea of guilty, later withdrawn, or a plea of nolo contendere or an offer to plead guilty or nolo contendere to the crime charged or any other crime, or of statements made in connection with any of the foregoing pleas or offers, is not admissible in any civil or criminal action, case, or proceeding against the person who made the plea or offer.' (This rule was adopted with the proviso that it 'shall be superseded by any amendment to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure which is inconsistent with this rule.') As the Advisory Committee Note explained: 'Exclusion of offers to plead guilty or nolo has as its purpose the promotion of disposition of criminal cases by compromise.' The amendment of Fed. R. Crim. P. 11, transmitted to Congress by the Supreme Court in April 1974, contained a subdivision (e)(6) essentially identical to the rule 410 language quoted above, as a part of a substantial revision of rule 11. The most significant feature of this revision was the express recognition given to the fact that the 'attorney for the government and the attorney for the defendant or the defendant when acting pro se may engage in discussions with a view toward reaching' a plea agreement. Subdivision (e)(6) was intended to encourage such discussions. As noted in H.R. Rep. No. 94-247, 94th Cong., 1st Sess. 7 (1975), the purpose of subdivision (e)(6) is to not 'discourage defendants from being completely candid and open during plea negotiations.' Similarly, H.R. Rep. No. 94-414, 94th Cong., 1st Sess. 10 (1975), states that 'Rule 11(e)(6) deals with the use of statements made in connection with plea agreements.' (Rule 11(e)(6) was thereafter enacted, with the addition of the proviso allowing use of statements for purposes of impeachment and in a prosecution for perjury, and with the qualification that the inadmissible statements must also be 'relevant to' the inadmissible pleas or offers. Pub. L. 94-64; Fed. R. Ev. 410 was then amended to conform. Pub. L. 94-149.) [Note the mistake here regarding impeachment. Ed.]

While this history shows that the purpose of Fed. R. Ev. 410 and Fed. R. Crim. P. 11(e)(6) is to permit the unrestrained candor which produces effective plea discussions between the 'attorney for the government and the attorney for the defendant or the defendant when acting pro se,' given visibility and sanction in rule 11(e), a literal reading of the language of these two rules could reasonably lead to the conclusion that a broader rule of inadmissibility obtains. That is, because 'statements' are generally inadmissible if 'made in connection with, and relevant to' an 'offer to plead guilty,' it might be thought that an otherwise voluntary admission to law enforcement officials is rendered inadmissible merely because it was made in the hope of obtaining leniency by a plea. Some decisions interpreting rule 11(e)(6) point in this direction. See United States v. Herman, 544 F.2d 791 (5th Cir. 1977) (defendant in custody of two postal inspectors during continuance of removal hearing instigated conversation with them and at some point said he would plead guilty to armed robbery if the murder charge was dropped; one inspector stated they were not 'in position' to make any deals in this regard; held, defendant's statement inadmissible under rule 11(e)(6) because the defendant 'made the statements during the course of a conversation in which he sought concessions from the government in return for a guilty plea'); United States v. Brooks, 536 F.2d 1137 (6th Cir. 1976) (defendant telephoned postal inspector and offered to plead guilty if he got 2-year maximum; statement inadmissible).

The amendment makes inadmissible statements made 'in the course of or as a consequence of' a later withdrawn guilty plea, a plea of nolo contendere,' or 'plea discussions with the attorney for the government' which do not result in a plea of guilty or which result in a plea of guilty later withdrawn. It thus fully protects the plea discussion process authorized by Rule 11 without attempting to deal with confrontations between suspects and law enforcement agents, which involve problems of quite different dimensions. See, e.g., ALI Model Code of Pre-Arraignment Procedure art. 140 and § 150.2(8) (Proposed Official Draft, 1975) (latter section requires exclusion if 'a law enforcement officer induces any person to make a statement by promising leniency'). This change, it must be emphasized, does not compel the conclusion that statements made to law enforcement agents, especially when the agents purport to have authority to bargain, are inevitably admissible. Rather, the point is that such cases are not covered by the per se rule 11(e)(6) and thus must be resolved by that body of law dealing with police interrogations.

This amendment is fully consistent with all recent and major law reform efforts on this subject. ALI Model Code of Pre-Arraignment Procedure § 350.7 (Proposed Official Draft, 1975), and ABA Standards Relating to Pleas of Guilty § 3.4 (Approved Draft, 1968) both provide:

> Unless the defendant subsequently enters a plea of guilty or nolo contendere which is not withdrawn, the fact that the defendant or his counsel and the prosecuting attorney engaged in plea discussions or made a plea agreement should not be received in evidence against or in favor of the defendant in any criminal or civil action or administrative proceedings.

The Commentary to the latter states:

> The above standard is limited to discussions and agreements with the prosecuting attorney. Sometimes defendants will indicate to the police their willingness to bargain, and in such instances these statements are sometimes admitted in court against the defendant. State v. Christian, 245 S.W.2d 895 (Mo. 1952) . If the police initiate this kind of discussion, this may have some bearing on the admissibility of the defendant's statement. However, the policy considerations relevant to this issue are better dealt with in the context of standards governing in-custody interrogation by the police.

Similarly, Unif. R. Crim. P. 441(d) (Approved Draft, 1974), provides that except under limited circumstances 'no discussion between the parties or statement by the defendant or his lawyer under this Rule,' i.e., the rule providing 'the parties may meet to discuss the possibility of pretrial diversion ... or of a plea agreement,' are admissible. The amendment is likewise consistent with the typical state provision on this subject; see, e.g., Ill. S. Ct. Rule 402(f).

The 'in the course of or as a consequence of such pleas or plea discussions' language of the amendment identifies with more precision than the present language the necessary relationship between the statements and the plea or discussion. See the dispute between the majority and concurring opinion in United States v. Herman, 544 F.2d 791 (5th Cir. 1977) , concerning the meanings and effect of the phrases 'connection to' and 'relevant to' in the present rule. Moreover, by relating the statements to 'plea discussions' rather than 'an offer to plead,' the amendment ensures 'that even an attempt to open plea bargaining [is] covered under the same rule of inadmissibility.' United States v. Brooks, 536 F.2d 1137 (6th Cir. 1976) .

"The last sentence of Rule 11(e)(6) is amended to provide a second exception to the general rule of nonadmissibility of the described statements. Under the amendment, such a statement is also admissible 'in any proceeding wherein statements made in the course of or as a consequence of the same plea or plea discussions have been introduced.' This change is necessary so that, when evidence of statements made in the course of or as a consequence of a certain plea or plea discussions are introduced under circumstances not prohibited by this rule (e.g., not 'against' the person who made the plea), other statements relating to the same plea or plea discussions may also be admitted when relevant to the matter at issue. For example, if a defendant upon a motion to dismiss a prosecution on some ground were able to admit certain statements made in aborted plea discussions in his favor, then other relevant statements made in the same plea discussions should be admissible against the defendant in the interest of determining the truth of the matter at issue. This change conforms to the general rule that a privilege terminates when the holder by his own act destroys the confidentiality with which it is endowed. 8 J. Wigmore, Evidence §§ 2242, 2327-2329, 2374, 2389-2390 (McNaughton rev. 1961).

The phrase 'in any civil or criminal proceeding' has been moved from its present position, following the word 'against,' for purposes of clarity. An ambiguity presently exists because the word 'against' may be read as referring either to the kind of proceeding in which the evidence is offered or the purpose for which it is offered. The change makes it clear that the later construction is correct.

Unlike ABA Standards Relating to Pleas of Guilty § 3.4 (Approved Draft, 1968), and ALI Model Code of Pre-Arraignment Procedure § 350.7 (Proposed Official Draft, 1975), rule 11(e)(6) does not also provide that the described evidence is inadmissible 'in favor of' the defendant. This is not intended to suggest, however, that such evidence will inevitably be admissible in the defendant's favor. Specifically, no disapproval is intended of such decisions as United States v. Verdoorn, 528 F.2d 103 (8th Cir. 1976) , holding that the trial judge properly refused to permit the defendants to put into evidence at their trial the fact the prosecution had attempted to plea bargain with them, as "meaningful dialogue between the parties would, as a practical matter, be impossible if either party had to assume the risk that plea offers would be admissible in evidence."

[What follows next is the Advisory Committee's Note on the original version of Rule 410.]

Withdrawn pleas of guilty were held inadmissible in federal prosecutions in Kercheval v. United States, 274 U.S. 220, 47 S. Ct. 582, 71 L. Ed. 1009 (1927) . The Court pointed out that to admit the withdrawn plea would effectively set at naught the allowance of withdrawal and place the accused in a dilemma utterly inconsistent with the decision to award him a trial. The New York Court of Appeals, in People v. Spitaleri, 9 N.Y.2d 168, 212 N.Y.S.2d 53, 173 N.E.2d 35 (1961) , reexamined and overturned its earlier decisions which had allowed admission. In addition to the reasons set forth in Kercheval, which was quoted at length, the court pointed out that the effect of admitting the plea was to compel defendant to take the stand by way of explanation and to open the way for the prosecution to call the lawyer who had represented him at the time of entering the plea. State court decisions for and against admissibility are collected in Annot., 86 A.L.R.2d 326 .

Pleas of nolo contendere are recognized by Rule 11 of the Rules of Criminal Procedure, although the law of numerous

States is to the contrary. The present rule gives effect to the principal traditional characteristic of the nolo plea, i.e., avoiding the admission of guilt which is inherent in pleas of guilty. This position is consistent with the construction of Section 5 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 16(a), recognizing the inconclusive and compromise nature of judgments based on nolo pleas. General Electric Co. v. City of San Antonio, 334 F.2d 480 (5th Cir. 1964) ; Commonwealth Edison Co. v. Allis-Chalmers Mfg. Co., 323 F.2d 412 (7th Cir. 1963) , cert. denied, 376 U.S. 939, 84 S. Ct. 794, 11 L. Ed. 2d 659 ; Armco Steel Corp. v. North Dakota, 376 F.2d 206 (8th Cir. 1967) ; City of Burbank v. General Electric Co., 329 F.2d 825 (9th Cir. 1964) . See also state court decisions in Annot., 18 A.L.R.2d 1287, 1314 .

Exclusion of offers to plead guilty or nolo has as its purpose the promotion of disposition of criminal cases by compromise. As pointed out in McCormick § 251, p. 543, "Effective criminal law administration in many localities would hardly be possible if a large proportion of the charges were not disposed of by such compromises." See also People v. Hamilton, 60 Cal. 2d 105, 32 Cal. Rptr. 4, 383 P.2d 412 (1963) , discussing legislation designed to achieve this result. As with compromise offers generally, Rule 408, free communication is needed, and security against having an offer of compromise or related statement admitted in evidence effectively encourages it.

Limiting the exclusionary rule to use against the accused is consistent with the purpose of the rule, since the possibility of use for or against other persons will not impair the effectiveness of withdrawing pleas or the freedom of discussion which the rule is designed to foster. See A.B.A. Standards Relating to Pleas of Guilty § 2.2 (1968). See also the narrower provisions of New Jersey Evidence Rule 52(2) and the unlimited exclusion provided in California Evidence Code § 1153.

[2] House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice Notes

October 10, 1973

The Subcommittee added the phrase "Except as otherwise provided by Act of Congress" after being advised of the existence of a specific statute in the antitrust field permitting the introduction into evidence of a nolo contendere plea in certain circumstances. The Subcommittee did not believe that it should be the intent of the Rules to alter any such particular congressional policy judgment.

[There was no note regarding the June 28, 1973 draft.]

[3] Report of the House Committee on the Judiciary

[This is the Report on the original Rule.]

The Committee added the phrase "Except as otherwise provided by Act of Congress" to Rule 410 as submitted by the Court in order to preserve particular congressional policy judgments as to the effect of a plea of guilty or of nolo contendere. See 15 U.S.C. § 16(a). The Committee intends that its amendment refers to both present statutes and statutes subsequently enacted.

[The House Report, No. 94-247, 94th Cong., 1st Sess., at 7, on Criminal Procedure Rule 11(e)(6), which superseded Rule 410 until it was amended, is very similar to the Conference Report on the procedure rule quoted infra.]

[4] Report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary

[This is the Report on the original Rule.]

As adopted by the House, Rule 410 would make inadmissible pleas of guilty or nolo contendere subsequently withdrawn as well as offers to make such pleas. Such a rule is clearly justified as a means of encouraging pleading. However, the House rule would then go on to render inadmissible for any purpose statements made in connection with these pleas or offers as well.

The committee finds this aspect of the House rule unjustified. Of course, in certain circumstances such statements should be excluded. If, for example, a plea is vitiated because of coercion, statements made in connection with the plea may also have been coerced and should be inadmissible on that basis. In other cases, however, voluntary statements of an accused made in court on the record, in connection with a plea, and determined by a court to be reliable should be admissible even though the plea is subsequently withdrawn. This is particularly true in those cases where, if the House rule were in effect, a defendant would be able to contradict his previous statements and thereby lie with impunity. To prevent such an injustice, the rule has been modified to permit the use of such statements for the limited purposes of impeachment and in subsequent perjury or false statement prosecutions. [Footnote deleted.]

[The Senate Report, No. 94-336, 94th Cong., 1st Sess., at 10, on Criminal Procedure Rule 11(e)(6), which superseded Rule 410 until it was amended, includes the same two paragraphs as the Conference Report on the procedure rule, quoted infra.]

[5] Report of the House and Senate Conferees

[This is the Report on the original Rule.]

The House bill provides that evidence of a guilty or nolo contendere plea, of an offer of either plea, or of statements made in connection with such pleas or offers of such pleas, is inadmissible in any civil or criminal action, case or proceeding against the person making such plea or offer. The Senate amendment makes the rule inapplicable to a voluntary and reliable statement made in court on the record where the statement is offered in a subsequent prosecution of the declarant for perjury or false statement.

The issues raised by Rule 410 are also raised by proposed Rule 11(e)(6) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure presently pending before Congress. This proposed rule, which deals with the admissibility of pleas of guilty or nolo contendere, offers to make such pleas, and statements made in connection with such pleas, was promulgated by the Supreme Court on April 22, 1974, and in the absence of congressional action will become effective on August 1, 1975. The conferees intend to make no change in the presently-existing case law until that date, leaving the courts free to develop rules in this area on a case-by-case basis.

The Conferees further determined that the issues presented by the use of guilty and nolo contendere pleas, offers of such pleas, and statements made in connection with such pleas or offers, can be explored in greater detail during Congressional consideration of Rule 11(e)(6) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. The Conferees believe, therefore, that it is best to defer its effective date until August 1, 1975. The Conferees intend that Rule 410 would be superseded by any subsequent Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure or Act of Congress with which it is inconsistent, if the Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure or Act of Congress takes effect or becomes law after the date of the enactment of the act establishing the rules of evidence.

The conference adopts the Senate amendment with an amendment that expresses the above intentions.

[As explained in our Editorial Explanatory Comment, at § 410.02[1], Rule 410 was superseded by Criminal Procedure Rule 11(e)(6), until it was amended on December 12, 1975. The Conference Report on the Criminal Procedure Rule, No. 94-414, 94th Cong., 1st Sess., at page 10, contains a joint explanatory statement of the Committee of Conference, part of which is set forth below.]

Rule 11(e)(6) deals with the use of statements made in connection with plea agreements. The House version permits a limited use of pleas of guilty, later withdrawn, or nolo contendere, offers of such pleas, and statements made in connection with such pleas or offers. Such evidence can be used in a perjury or false statement prosecution if the plea, offer, or related statement was made under oath, on the record, and in the presence of counsel. The Senate version permits evidence of voluntary and reliable statements made in court on the record to be used for the purpose of impeaching the credibility of the declarant or in a perjury or false statement prosecution.

The Conference adopts the House version with changes. The Conference agrees that neither a plea nor the offer of a plea ought to be admissible for any purpose. The Conference-adopted provision, therefore, like the Senate provision, permits only the use of statements made in connection with a plea of guilty, later withdrawn, or a plea of nolo contendere, or in connection with an offer of a guilty or nolo contendere plea.

[6] Citations to Hearings and Debates

Prepared Statement of W. Vincent Rakestraw, June 5, 1974, in Hearings on H.R. 5463 (Federal Rules of Evidence) Before the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 93rd Cong., 2d Sess., at 109, 112 (1974).

Debate in the House of Representatives, 120 Cong. Rec. H12253 (daily ed. December 18, 1974).

[For debates on the amendments to the Rule see the citations that follow.]

Debate in the House of Representatives, 121 Cong. Rec. H7859-H7860, H7863-H7864 (daily ed. July 30, 1975).

Debate in the Senate, 121 Cong. Rec. S12875 (daily ed. July 17, 1975), and 121 Cong. Rec. S14031 (daily ed. July 30, 1975).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
Supp. To CHAPTER 410 RULE 410

2-410 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 410, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 410. Inadmissibility of Pleas, Plea Discussions, and Related Statements	Rule 410. Pleas, Plea Discussions, and Related Statements

Except as otherwise provided in this rule, evidence of the following is not, in any civil or criminal proceeding, admissible against the defendant who made the plea or was a participant in the

(a) Prohibited Uses. In a civil or criminal case, evidence of the following is not admissible against the defendant who made the plea or participated in the plea discussions:

plea dis-cus-sion s:

(1)	a plea of guilty which was later with drawn;	(1)	a guilty plea that was later with drawn;
(2)	a plea of nolo con-tend ere;	(2)	a nolo con-tend ere plea;
(3)	any state men t mad e in the cour se of any pro-ceed ings un-der Rule 11 of the Fed-eral Rule s of Cri min-	(3)	a state men t mad e dur-ing a pro-ceed ing on eithe r of thos e plea s un-der Fed-eral Rule of Cri min-

	al Pro-ced-ure or com par-able state pro-ced-ure re-gard ing eithe r of the fore-go-ing plea s; or		al Pro-ced-ure 11 or a com par-able state pro-ced-ure; or
(4)	any state men t mad e in the cour se of plea dis-cus-sion s with an at-tor-ney for the pro-secu ting au-thor-ity	(4)	a state men t mad e dur-ing plea dis-cus-sion s with an at-tor-ney for the pro-secu ting au-thor-ity if the

	which do not result in a plea of guilty or which result in a plea of guilty later withdrawn.	discussions did not result in a guilty plea or they resulted in a later-withdrawn guilty plea.
However, such a statement is admissible (i) in any proceeding wherein another statement made in	(b) Exceptions. The court may admit a statement described in Rule 410(a)(3) or (4):

the course of the same plea or plea discussions has been introduced and the statement ought in fairness be considered contemporaneously with it, or (ii) in a criminal proceeding for perjury or false statement if the statement was made by the defendant under oath, on the record and in the presence of counsel.

(1) in any proceeding in which another statement made during the sam e plea or plea dis- cus- sion s has been in- tro- duce d, if in fair- ness the state men ts oug ht to be con- sider ed to- geth er; or

(2) in a crim inal pro- ceed ing for per- jury or false state men t, if the de- fend ant mad e the state men t under oath, on the record

, and with coun sel pres ent.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 410 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
Supp. To CHAPTER 410 RULE 410

2-410 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 410.03

Supp. to § 410.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[8] Nolo Contendere Pleas [Go To Main]

United States v. Nguyen, 465 F.3d 1128 (9th Cir. 2006) : The defendant was convicted of violating an order of supervision requiring that he not "commit any crimes," based on pleas of nolo contendere to two State misdemeanors. Reversing, the Court held that Rule 410 prohibits the admission of nolo pleas and the convictions resulting from them as proof that the pleader actually committed the underlying crimes charged. " Rule 410's exclusion of a nolo contendere plea would be meaningless if all it took to prove that the defendant committed the crime charged was a certified copy of the inevitable judgment of conviction resulting from the plea." The evidence was also not admissible under Rule 803(22), which "allows judgments of felony convictions resulting from guilty pleas to be admitted into evidence but not convictions resulting from nolo contendere pleas and not misdemeanor convictions."

[9] Plea Bargaining Distinguished from Volunteered Offers of Cooperation and Other Discussions [Go To Main]

United States v. Edelmann, 458 F.3d 791 (8th Cir. 2006) : The Court affirmed a fraud conviction, finding no error in the admission of statements made in discussions with an AUSA and investigators. The defendant's attorney had voluntarily contacted the prosecutor; even if the attorney had mentioned a § 5K1.1 motion, there was at most a general discussion of the Guidelines and there was no in-depth discussion of the defendant's Guidelines range; the defendant was not seeking to plead but to avoid an indictment altogether; and no specific deal was offered, no deadline to plead was ever imposed by the government, and no deal was ever reduced to writing, "which undermines the idea that formal plea negotiations occurred."

[15] Statements Made After Plea Agreement Is Reached [Go To Main]

United States v. Jones, 469 F.3d 563 (6th Cir. 2006) : A defendant charged with cocaine offenses entered into a conditional plea agreement and, pursuant thereto, provided a detailed statement of his criminal activities in an FBI interview. After his conviction was reversed for denial of his suppression motion, he withdrew his guilty plea and went to trial. Affirming his conviction, the Court held there was no error in his statement to the FBI at the trial, as it was made after the plea agreement and not "in the course of plea discussions."

[16] Statements to Investigators [Go To Main]

United States v. Olson, 450 F.3d 655 (7th Cir. 2006) : Affirming convictions for racketeering, the Court held that a defendant's statements to police officials at a meeting were not covered by Rule 410 and were properly admitted at trial. The defendant argued that he had a subjective belief that he was engaging in plea discussions, because one agent led him to believe that a plea bargain might be discussed at the meeting. But the Court noted that the agent "was not an attorney for a prosecuting authority and did not purport to be speaking on behalf of the United States Attorney. To the contrary, Agent Craft made clear that he could, at most recommend a plea agreement." Thus, nothing the agent did or said could have led the defendant "to reasonably believe" that the meeting was a plea discussion.

[19] Waiver [Go To Main]

United States v. Newbert, 504 F.3d 180 (1st Cir. 2007) : The defendant entered a plea agreement with the government under which he agreed to waive all of his rights under Rule 410 if he was allowed to withdraw his guilty plea "under circumstances constituting a breach of this agreement." Subsequently the defendant was granted permission to withdraw his guilty plea based on new plausible evidence of innocence. A government motion in limine for a ruling that it would be able to admit the statements the defendant made during plea negotiations, as well as the guilty plea itself, was denied on the ground that the defendant had not breached the plea agreement by moving for leave to withdraw the plea. Affirming on interlocutory appeal, the Court construed the language of the plea agreement against the government, and found that moving for leave to withdraw on the basis of new evidence of innocence was not a breach of the plea agreement, so there was no waiver of rights under Rule 410.

United States v. Oluwanisola, 605 F.3d 124 (2d Cir. 2010) : The defendant, charged with heroin-related offenses, had entered into a proffer agreement permitting the government to "use any statements made by [the defendant] as substantive evidence to rebut directly or indirectly, any evidence offered or elicited, or factual assertions made, by or on behalf of [the defendant] at any state of a criminal prosecution " The Court vacated the conviction, holding that defense counsel should not have been as limited as he was by the Trial Judge's approach to "opening the door" while making the opening statement, but "should have been permitted during his opening statement to reference certain elements of the crime and argue that the government would be unable to sustain its burden of proof as to those elements." The Court also emphasized that the defense should have been free to attack the testimony of government witnesses on cross-examination without opening the door to the proffer statements as long as the attack did not implicitly assert facts that were inconsistent with those statements.

United States v. Hardwick, 544 F.3d 565 (3d Cir. 2008) : The Court affirmed conspiracy, drug, and firearms convictions. It held that the waiver clause in the defendant's proffer agreement, which permitted the government to offer the proffer statement in its case-in-chief to rebut any evidence offered or arguments made by the defense, was enforceable.

United States v. Sylvester, 583 F.3d 285 (5th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed convictions for murder and a cocaine conspiracy, holding that statements made by the defendant during plea negotiations were admissible in the government's case-in-chief, since the defendant knowingly and voluntarily waived all rights to object to such use. The Court found no material difference between a "case-in-chief waiver" and the waiver permitting impeachment use that was upheld by the Supreme Court in United States v. Mezzanatto (Manual § 410.02[3]).

United States v. Quiroga, 554 F.3d 1150 (8th Cir. 2009) : The defendant pleaded guilty to methamphetamine distribution but later was permitted to withdraw his plea. His motion in limine to exclude incriminating statements in the initial plea agreement was denied on the ground that he had waived his rights under Rule 410 in that agreement. On appeal, the defendant argued that there was an inconsistency between the Judge's ruling that his plea was not knowing and voluntary, and thus could be withdrawn, and the ruling that the waiver of Rule 410 rights was knowing and voluntary. Affirming, the Court found no error, noting that the former ruling could not be appealed by the government and thus was not the law of the case to which the latter ruling must conform.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 411 RULE 411

2-411 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 411.syn

§ 411.syn Synopsis to Chapter 411: RULE 411

411.01 Official Text

411.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] The Basic Rule

[2] Distinction Between Prejudicial and Harmless Error

[3] Discovery

411.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Admissible for Other Purposes

[a] Bias of Witness

[b] Admissible for Other Purposes -- Generally

[c] Admissible for Other Purposes -- Intention To Be Bound by Contract

[d] Admissible for Other Purposes -- Knowledge of Trade Usage

[e] Admissible for Other Purposes -- Punitive Damages

[f] Admissible for Other Purposes -- Rebuttal

[2] Amount of Insurance

[3] Fidelity Bond

[4] Foundation for Offer of Evidence

[5] Intercompany Discussions

[6] State Law

411.04 Legislative History

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 411 RULE 411

2-411 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 411.01

411.01 Official Text

Rule 411. Liability Insurance

Evidence that a person was or was not insured against liability is not admissible upon the issue whether the person acted negligently or otherwise wrongfully. This rule does not require the exclusion of evidence of insurance against liability when offered for another purpose, such as proof of agency, ownership, or control, or bias or prejudice of a witness.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 411 RULE 411

2-411 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 411.02

411.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] The Basic Rule

Evidence that a person carried or failed to carry liability insurance is not admissible on the issue of whether the person acted negligently or wrongfully on a particular occasion. This Rule bars the evidence, for example, when it is offered by a plaintiff against the defendant on the theory that because the defendant was insured the defendant was probably careless. Evidence is likewise excluded when offered by the defendant to show that the defendant lacked adequate insurance and therefore had every incentive to be careful. No matter who offers the evidence of the presence or absence of insurance, if it is offered on the issue of negligence it is excluded. If it is offered for some other purpose, however, it may be admitted -- subject to the Rule 403 balancing process. n1 For instance, if insurance investigators take the stand to testify at trial, it is permissible to bring out the fact that they may be interested witnesses because of their interest in pleasing their employer -- at least where the probative value as to credibility is not substantially outweighed by the risk of prejudice and confusion. n2

Rule 411 is based on two independent grounds. First, evidence of insurance, or the lack of it, is of minimal relevance in determining whether a person acted carelessly on a certain occasion. For instance, most people certainly do not view the fact that they have insurance as a license to act carelessly. More importantly, there is the concern that if the jurors hear about insurance coverage, or the lack of it, they may decide the case on the basis of the deepest pocket, rather than on the facts. n3 This is the risk of prejudice and confusion that must be taken into account by the Trial Court when evidence of insurance is offered for a purpose other than proving negligence or wrongful conduct. n4

[2] Distinction Between Prejudicial and Harmless Error

Assuming that counsel manages to find a way improperly to introduce evidence of insurance, should Appellate Courts adopt a general rule that such an error is harmless on the ground that the jury is likely to assume the existence of insurance even without the evidence?

The answer obviously must be "no." If the Rule is to mean anything, it must have some teeth. There is no point in a rule excluding evidence of insurance if it makes no difference in any case. In essence, there is no reason to treat erroneous admission of evidence of insurance differently from any other evidentiary error. See Rule 103 for a discussion of harmless error. n5 In assessing whether the error is harmless, it is of course relevant that the jury might have assumed the existence of insurance, even if not told about it directly. This would be especially true where the defendant is a large corporation, or some other person or entity that is highly likely to carry insurance (e.g., a doctor or a lawyer). But the question of harmlessness should be decided on a case-by-case basis.

[3] Discovery

In order to encourage pretrial settlement, Fed. R. Civ. P. 26 provides that a party shall produce for inspection and copying any insurance or indemnity agreement that may be pertinent to payment of a resulting judgment. This provision is intended to give the parties important information for settlement and litigation strategy. But the procedural rule does not make insurance information admissible at trial. If discovery of insurance takes place, it may be wise during any pretrial conference, or off the record at the outset of a trial, for the insured party to request that the Trial Judge remind counsel of Rule 411 and to indicate that violation of the Rule will not be tolerated. This will help to prevent any "slips of the tongue" that reveal insurance information to the jury.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. See, e.g., Palmer v. Krueger, 897 F.2d 1529 (10th Cir. 1990) (in an intrafamily suit arising out of an airplane crash that killed the father and mother, the Trial Court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the fact that the family members were squabbling over insurance proceeds; this was a "collateral issue," and the Trial Judge did not err in finding that the risk of prejudice, confusion, and delay substantially outweighed the probative value of the evidence).

(n2)Footnote 2. See, e.g., Charter v. Chleborad, 551 F.2d 246 (8th Cir. 1977) (where a defense witness testified that the plaintiff's expert had a bad reputation for truth and veracity, it was reversible error to prevent the plaintiff from showing that the defense witness was employed by the liability carrier that represented the defendant in the action; the fact of employment was "clearly admissible to show possible bias" of the defense witness under Rule 411); Pinkham v. Burgess, 933 F.2d 1066 (1st Cir. 1991) (in a legal malpractice suit, the Trial Court properly admitted evidence that the defendant-lawyer had discussed insurance issues with the plaintiff's husband; the evidence was offered not to prove wrongful conduct, but rather to prove the extent to which the defendant had become involved in the husband's business dealings).

(n3)Footnote 3. See, e.g., Ouachita Nat'l Bank v. Tosco Corp., 616 F.2d 485 (8th Cir. 1982) ("[I]t is generally thought that the jury's knowledge that a plaintiff is receiving insurance benefits, or that a defendant is carrying liability insurance, might serve to decrease or increase, respectively, the amount of damages awarded by the jury.").

(n4)Footnote 4. See, e.g., Granberry v. O'Barr, 866 F.2d 112 (5th Cir. 1988) (no error to exclude evidence of insurance where it was only minimally probative to show bias of a witness; the witness was employed by a life insurance company, which was a separate entity from the liability carrier; any judgment against the liability carrier would not directly impact the witness' company; and the witness had given an identical account of the accident at the scene, before he could have known whether the defendant had insurance coverage or who provided it).

(n5)Footnote 5. See, e.g., Reed v. General Motors Corp., 773 F.2d 660 (5th Cir. 1985) (applying Rule 103, the Court finds it was reversible error to admit evidence that a defendant had coverage in the amount of only $5,000 per person and $10,000 per accident; the jury could not otherwise have known of these coverage limits).

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 411 RULE 411

2-411 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 411.03

411.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Admissible for Other Purposes

[a] Bias of Witness

Conde v. Starlight I, Inc., 103 F.3d 210 (1st Cir. 1997) : Affirming a plaintiff's judgment in a seaman's injury case, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in permitting repeated references to one of the defendant's witnesses as an "adjuster." The witness had taken a statement from the plaintiff on behalf of the defendant's insurer. It was not clear that the jurors inferred that the witness was an insurance adjuster; even if they did, it would be proper under the Rule to show the connection to an insurer, as it would be relevant to the bias of the witness, whose credibility regarding the statement was a central issue in the case.

Varlack v. SWC Caribbean, Inc., 550 F.2d 171 (3d Cir. 1977) : The Court approved the mention of insurance coverage as part of laying a foundation to impeach a witness who had given a statement to an insurance investigator. Interestingly, the Court stated that "[w]e assume without deciding that the rule is applicable when the judge is the trier of fact." In our view, the policy underlying the Rule of avoiding prejudice with evidence of low probative value does not apply in a bench trial. The Trial Judge can be expected to exclude prejudice from her mind.

Ouachita Nat'l Bank v. Tosco Corp., 686 F.2d 1291 (8th Cir. 1982) , adhered to on reh'g en banc, 716 F.2d 485 (8th Cir. 1983) : Although it vacated a judgment in an automobile accident case, the Court indicated that it was either permissible or harmless error for a party planning to call an insurance adjuster as a witness to indicate to the jury that the adjuster was employed by its insurance company. This was viewed as bias evidence, and although the Court did not mention the point, it would appear that the party was attempting to bring out the impeaching fact before it was elicited by an opponent. In Charter v. Chleborad, n1 a medical malpractice action, one of the plaintiff's trial witnesses was an orthopedic surgeon who was impeached by means of character testimony from an attorney who resided in the same city as the surgeon. Reversing a judgment for the defendant, the Court held it was error to preclude the plaintiff from showing the possible bias of the attorney by bringing out the fact that he was employed by the liability carrier representing the defendant in this case.

[b] Admissible for Other Purposes -- Generally

Pinkham v. Burgess, 933 F.2d 1066 (1st Cir. 1991) : Affirming a judgment for the client in an attorney malpractice action, the Court held there was no abuse of discretion in refusing to grant a mistrial after the plaintiff mentioned that the attorney had discussed liability and other insurance for lawyers with her husband, as the reference was unlikely to have been perceived by the jury as indicating there was insurance coverage in this case and it was in any event relevant to issues in the case other than negligence.

[c] Admissible for Other Purposes -- Intention To Be Bound by Contract

B.H. Morton v. Zidell Explorations, Inc., 695 F.2d 347 (9th Cir. 1982) : Tugboat owners sued a shipyard for negligence after their ship was almost completely destroyed by fire while being converted into a fish-processing vessel. The defendant relied on an exculpatory clause in its agreement with the owners that provided the defendant was to be exculpated from all risks of loss or damage. The Court held that the shipyard was properly permitted to show that the owners took out insurance on their vessel before the fire as evidence proving that the owners considered that the agreement with the exculpatory clause was intended to be binding upon them.

[d] Admissible for Other Purposes -- Knowledge of Trade Usage

Posttape Assocs. v. Eastman Kodak Co., 537 F.2d 751 (3d Cir. 1976) : The Court remanded a breach of warranty and negligence action arising out of the plaintiff's purchase of motion picture film for a new trial on the issues of limitation of liability and of damages, because the Trial Judge erroneously excluded evidence that one of the owners of the plaintiff corporation had purchased insurance indemnifying the corporation against defective film. Citing Rule 411, the Court stated that the evidence was relevant to the knowledge of the defendant of the trade usage of the words used to limit liability, and that in this action between commercial entities, "exclusion of this relevant evidence was far more prejudicial to the defense than its admission would have been to the plaintiffs."

[e] Admissible for Other Purposes -- Punitive Damages

Perrin v. Anderson, 784 F.2d 1040 (10th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed a judgment for police officers sued by the estate of a man killed when the officers attempted to obtain information about a traffic accident. Defense counsel had commented in closing argument that any judgment would be paid by the officers and not by the State or anybody else. The Court held the comments were not an impermissible mention of lack of insurance because the plaintiff requested punitive damages, so the ultimate source of payment was relevant.

[f] Admissible for Other Purposes -- Rebuttal

Lawson v. Trowbridge, 153 F.3d 368 (7th Cir. 1998) : In an arrestee's civil rights action against a sheriff and a jailer, the defendants devoted almost all their direct testimony to documenting their limited net worth. Because any judgment against them would be paid by their employer so long as they had been acting within the scope of their employment, the testimony was inadmissible. The plaintiff did not object, but did seek to introduce the indemnification statute in rebuttal. Reversing nominal damages judgments against the defendants, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion not to admit the statute once the defendants' direct testimony opened the door, since the rationale for excluding the evidence -- fear that damages will be inflated when the government, rather than the individual, is paying -- had dissolved.

[2] Amount of Insurance

Reed v. General Motors Corp., 773 F.2d 660 (5th Cir. 1985) : The Court reversed a judgment against a driver and his insurer in a personal injury case because the Trial Judge erroneously admitted evidence of the amounts of insurance carried by the defendant. The fact that the insurer was named as a defendant did not mean that the amount of insurance was relevant, and the Court found that the error was not cured by a jury instruction not to consider the amount of the insurance in deciding the negligence of the defendant.

[3] Fidelity Bond

Garnac Grain Co. v. Blackley, 932 F.2d 1563 (8th Cir. 1991) : In an action against an accounting firm for malpractice arising out of an employee's embezzlement, the Court held it was an abuse of discretion to deny the plaintiff's motion in limine to exclude evidence that the plaintiff received payment under a two-million-dollar fidelity bond. The Trial Judge concluded that receipt of the proceeds was admissible on whether the plaintiff maintained adequate internal controls, but the Court held that although the bond is not technically "insurance against liability," it is insurance that might lead the jury improperly to reduce the plaintiff's damages, the kind of prejudice the Rule was intended to eliminate.

[4] Foundation for Offer of Evidence

Hunziker v. Scheidemantle, 543 F.2d 489 (3d Cir. 1976) : Reversing and remanding a wrongful death action, the Court noted that Rule 411 is not a total bar to evidence of insurance, but suggested that the Trial Judge should require the necessary foundation to be established outside the presence of the jury so that it might determine the admissibility of the evidence without prejudice to the rights of the parties.

[5] Intercompany Discussions

American Ins. Co. v. North American Co., 697 F.2d 79 (2d Cir. 1982) : In an action by a primary insurer against a reinsurer for reimbursement of portions of a settlement, the Court found that evidence of the reinsurer's discussions with another company over commutation was inadmissible.

[6] State Law

Blanke v. Alexander, 152 F.3d 1224 (10th Cir. 1998) : The Court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiffs in a diversity action brought for injuries received in a car-truck collision against the driver, owner, and excess liability insurer of the truck. The Court found no error when the plaintiffs were permitted to make references to the insurer, as that was consistent with the governing state law authorizing direct actions, and with state precedent that identification of the insurer in such actions is not prejudicial. Although admissibility of evidence in diversity cases is generally governed by federal law, Congress did not intend to pre-empt "substantive" state rules of evidence, according to the Court.

FOOTNOTES:
(n1)Footnote 1. Charter v. Chleborad, 551 F.2d 246 (8th Cir. 1977) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 411 RULE 411

2-411 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 411.04

411.04 Legislative History

Advisory Committee's Note

The courts have with substantial unanimity rejected evidence of liability insurance for the purpose of proving fault, and absence of liability insurance as proof of lack of fault. At best the inference of fault from the fact of insurance coverage is a tenuous one, as is its converse. More important, no doubt, has been the feeling that knowledge of the presence or absence of liability insurance would induce juries to decide cases on improper grounds. McCormick § 168; Annot., 4 A.L.R.2d 761 . The rule is drafted in broad terms so as to include contributory negligence or other fault of a plaintiff as well as fault of a defendant.

The second sentence points out the limits of the rule, using well established illustrations. Id.

For similar rules see Uniform Rule 54; California Evidence Code § 1155; Kansas Code of Civil Procedure § 60-454; New Jersey Evidence Rule 54.

[The entire Advisory Committee Note accompanying the gender-neutralizing changes effective October 1, 1987 is as follows: "The amendment is technical. No substantive change is intended."]

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
Supp. To CHAPTER 411 RULE 411

2-411 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 411, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 411. Liability Insurance	Rule 411. Liability Insurance
Evidence that a person was or was not insured agai	Evidence that a person was or was not insured agai nst liab- ility is not ad- miss ible upo n the is- sue whet her the per- son ac- ted neg- li- gent ly or oth- er- wise wro ng- fully . This rule does not re- quir e the ex- clu- sion of evid ence of in- sur- ance agai nst liab- nst liab- ility is not ad- miss ible to prov e whet her the per- son ac- ted neg- li- gent ly or oth- er- wise wro ng- fully . But the cour t may ad- mit this evid ence for an- oth- er pur- pose , such as prov ing a wit-ility when offered for another purpose, such as proof of agency, ownership, or control, or bias or prejudice of a witness.

ness's bias or prejudice or proving agency, ownership, or control.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 411 has been amended as part of the general restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Rule 411 previously provided that evidence was not excluded if offered for a purpose not explicitly prohibited by the Rule. To improve the language of the Rule, it now provides that the court may admit evidence if offered for a permissible purpose. There is no intent to change the process for admitting evidence covered by the Rule. It remains the case that if offered for an impermissible purpose, it must be excluded, and if offered for a purpose not barred by the Rule, its admissibility remains governed by the general principles of Rules 402, 403, 801, etc.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
Supp. To CHAPTER 411 RULE 411

2-411 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 411.03

Supp. to § 411.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[4.1] Indemnification [Go To Main]

In re Hanford Nuclear Reservation Litig., 534 F.3d 986, 1014 (9th Cir. 2008) : Reviewing the trial of claims by bellwether plaintiffs alleging that radioiodine emissions by plutonium producers at a nuclear facility caused cancers and other life-threatening diseases, the Court held there was no error in a ruling that precluded the plaintiffs from telling the jury that the federal government would indemnify the defendants for any liability imposed. While the evidence might have been admissible to show bias of a witness, the only evidence to which a question of government bias might have arisen was a report to whose accuracy the plaintiffs had stipulated before trial.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 412 RULE 412

2-412 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 412.syn

§ 412.syn Synopsis to Chapter 412: RULE 412

412.01 Official Text

412.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Background to the Rule

[2] The Exclusionary Principle and its Exceptions

[3] Constitutional Problems in Criminal Cases

[4] "Sexual Behavior" and False Allegations of Rape

[5] Notice Requirement

[6] In Camera Hearing

412.03 Annotated Cases

[1] Civil Cases

[2] Constitutionally Required Evidence

[3] Jury Instructions

[4] Motion and Record To Be Under Seal

[5] Notice

[6] Prior Accusations by the Victim

[7] Prior Virginity

[8] Psychiatric Examinations

[9] Relationship to Other Rules

[10] Scope of the Rule

[11] Sexual Activity with Others

[12] Source of Semen or Injury

[13] Standard of Proof

[14] Waiver of Protections

412.04 Legislative History

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 412 RULE 412

2-412 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 412.01

412.01 Official Text

Rule 412. Sex Offense Cases; Relevance of Alleged Victim's Past Sexual Behavior or Alleged Sexual Predisposition

(a) Evidence generally inadmissible -- The following evidence is not admissible in any civil or criminal proceeding involving alleged sexual misconduct except as provided in subdivisions (b) and (c):

(1) Evidence offered to prove that any alleged victim engaged in other sexual behavior.

(2) Evidence offered to prove any alleged victim's sexual predisposition.

(b) Exceptions --

(1) In a criminal case, the following evidence is admissible, if otherwise admissible under these rules:

(A) evidence of specific instances of sexual behavior by the alleged victim offered to prove that a person other than the accused was the source of semen, injury or other physical evidence;

(B) evidence of specific instances of sexual behavior by the alleged victim with respect to the person accused of the sexual misconduct offered by the accused to prove consent or by the prosecution; and

(C) evidence the exclusion of which would violate the constitutional rights of the defendant.

(2) In a civil case, evidence offered to prove the sexual behavior or sexual predisposition of any alleged victim is admissible if it is otherwise admissible under these rules and its probative value substantially outweighs the danger of harm to any victim and of unfair prejudice to any party. Evidence of an alleged victim's reputation is admissible only if it has been placed in controversy by the alleged victim.

(c) Procedure to determine admissibility --

(1) A party intending to offer evidence under subdivision (b) must --

(A) file a written motion at least 14 days before trial specifically describing the evidence and stating the purpose for which it is offered unless the court, for good cause requires a different time for filing or permits filing during trial; and

(B) serve the motion on all parties and notify the alleged victim or, when appropriate, the alleged victim's guardian or representative.

(2) Before admitting evidence under this rule the court must conduct a hearing in camera and afford the victim and parties a right to attend and be heard. The motion, related papers, and the record of the hearing must be sealed and remain under seal unless the court orders otherwise.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 412 RULE 412

2-412 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 412.02

412.02 Editorial Explanatory Comment

[1] Background to the Rule

Rule 412 was originally enacted as part of the Privacy Protection for Rape Victims Act of 1978, Public Law 95-540. Most recently, it was amended by Congress as part of the Violent Crime Control and Enforcement Act of 1994. That amendment took effect on December 1, 1994. The Rule is consistent with a point that we try to make in our Comment accompanying Rule 102: The quest for fair and just procedures is not necessarily served by the admission of all evidence that is offered by parties to litigation, even though the evidence is tangentially relevant to the issues being tried.

Rule 412 follows the lead of the states that have enacted statutes or rules of Court to protect the privacy of rape victims when they testify in Court. n1 It is a rule of great symbolic value, as well as one of practical significance. n2 It represents a departure from a 200-year-old view typified by Lord Chief Justice Hale, who said that rape was "an accusation easily to be made and hard to be proved, and harder to be defended by the party accused, though ever so innocent." 1 M. Hale, The History of the Pleas of the Crown at 635 (1778).

The Rule represents a Congressional judgment that it is necessary for Federal Courts to indicate clearly to sex offense victims that their self-esteem will not be unnecessarily impaired in judicial proceedings and that their privacy will be respected to the extent that such respect does not denigrate the constitutional rights of accused defendants. n3 As one Court has put it, the purposes of the Rule are "to protect rape victims from the degrading and embarrassing disclosure of intimate details about their private lives, to encourage reporting of sexual assaults, and to prevent wasting time on distractive collateral and irrelevant matters." n4

As amended by Congress in 1994, Rule 412 applies in all civil and criminal cases "involving alleged sexual misconduct." n5 This term is left undefined. Clearly it applies to cases alleging rape and sexual abuse, whether civil or criminal. But the breadth of the term "involving alleged sexual misconduct" seems also to cover such claims as for sexual harassment in employment. n6 As such, the amended Rule is far broader that the original Rule, which was limited to criminal cases in which a sex crime was charged.

[2] The Exclusionary Principle and its Exceptions

Rule 412(a) states that, in any case involving alleged sexual misconduct, evidence concerning the past "sexual behavior" or "sexual predisposition" of an alleged victim must be excluded, with certain limited exceptions. For criminal cases, subdivision (b)(1) provides exceptions for specific acts offered to prove the "source of the semen" or other physical evidence, and for specific sexual activity between the defendant and the victim when offered by the defendant to prove consent, or by the prosecution. Sexual activity between the victim and persons other than the defendant cannot be admitted to prove that the alleged victim consented to sexual activity with the defendant. n7 There is also a "residual" exception covering evidence of the sexual behavior or predisposition of the victim which is required by the constitution to be admitted. n8

For civil cases, subdivision (b)(2) provides an exception for evidence of the victim's sexual behavior or predisposition, but only so long as the probative value of the evidence substantially outweighs the danger of harm to any victim and the danger of prejudice to any party. Subdivision (b)(2) mandates a "reverse 403" test, similar to that provided in Rule 609(b), but with one important variation: the danger of harm to the victim (such as the danger the victim will be humiliated) is specifically weighed together with prejudice to a party on the exclusionary side of the scale. The balancing test set forth in subdivision (b)(2) consequently provides for a strong presumption of exclusion. This is in contrast to Rule 403, which provides for a strong presumption of admissibility. Furthermore, evidence of the victim's reputation concerning sexual behavior is never admissible in a civil case unless the victim has placed that reputation "in controversy."

Interestingly, in a criminal case, if a specific act is offered for one of the two limited purposes provided, the act is admissible so long as it also satisfies Rule 403. n9 That is, there is no heightened exclusionary balancing test applied. This makes sense, because if the evidence is narrow enough and important enough to fit one of the limited exceptions to subdivision (b)(1), there is little reason to filter it further through a strict exclusionary balancing test.

If not for Rule 412(a), the governing rule as to the form of proof admissible would be Rule 405(a). Rule 405(a) would have provided that when character evidence is used circumstantially, only reputation or opinion evidence could be admitted, not specific acts. Rule 412 takes a different approach, at least in criminal cases; it admits only evidence of specific instances of conduct and limits the circumstances in which even that evidence may be received.

[3] Constitutional Problems in Criminal Cases

We must note that there are problems with the evidentiary limitations imposed by the Rule in criminal cases. In some instances, the Rule will undeniably restrict the defendant from bringing in highly probative evidence, particularly where the defense is one of consent. n10

Consider the following example. In a sex offense case, the government must allege that the defendant acted intentionally. To challenge the proof on intent, the defendant wants to offer evidence that the victim's reputation was brought to his attention prior to a sexual encounter, in order to support a claim that he either acted without knowingly using force or that he acted under a reasonable mistake of fact concerning the attitude of the victim toward the sexual encounter. In such a case, a serious constitutional question would be presented if the defendant were denied an opportunity to present a defense that, based on what he knew about the victim, he interpreted her behavior in a reasonable way.

Similarly, if the defendant was made aware of a particular act or acts between the victim and others prior to a sexual encounter, he may wish to argue that these prior acts affected his interpretation of the victim's behavior. Yet this specific act evidence is excluded under the Rule, because it would not be offered to show the source of semen or injury as to the incident charged, nor would it be a specific act between the defendant and the victim, offered to prove consent.

The constitutional problems with the Rule arise because the Supreme Court has held that a criminal defendant has a constitutional right to "a meaningful opportunity to present a complete defense." n11 The Court has on occasion invalidated per se rules of exclusion that prohibit a criminal defendant from introducing an entire line of essential evidence, without regard to how probative and reliable the evidence may be. n12

On the other hand, the constitutional right to an effective defense does not guarantee that defendants can introduce whatever evidence they might desire. n13 The state clearly has an interest in excluding evidence that is not sufficiently probative or reliable enough to justify the costs of admitting the evidence -- including, in the rape shield context, the costs to the victim and to the state's interest in having sex crimes reported and prosecuted. n14

We suggest that the proper balance in a criminal case is as follows: Evidence concerning the victim's prior sexual activity (whether by way of opinion, reputation, or specific act) must be admitted when the defendant shows that the evidence has substantial probative value on the issue of consent or identity of the perpetrator, and where alternative evidence to prove the point is not reasonably available. n15 This proposal would protect the victim from an undifferentiated "blame the victim" defense. n16 It would also prohibit the defendant from trying to draw the unjustifiable inference that the claimant was sexually promiscuous and, thus, more likely to have consensual sex with the defendant. n17 Finally, the requirement of proof through a "less onerous alternative" would prevent unnecessary humiliation and harassment of the victim. At the same time, this balancing test would allow limited use of reputation, opinion, and specific act evidence of sexual behavior where necessary and critical to the defendant's defense. n18

Even when evidence of the victim's sexual behavior is highly probative and necessary, the Trial Judge has discretion under Rule 412 to redact the evidence "to a sanitized version ... sufficient to support the purpose for which it was offered." n19 For example, in United States v. Payne, 944 F.2d 1458, 1469 (9th Cir. 1991) , Payne was charged with sexually abusing his foster child. Payne proffered evidence that the child had engaged in sexual activity with another person. He argued that the evidence was probative of bias, because Payne had disciplined the child for engaging in the sexual activity. The Trial Court permitted Payne's counsel to conduct a "sanitized cross-examination" of the child, which apprised the jury of the fact that the child had been disciplined by Payne, but did not reveal the nature of the incident that was the basis of the discipline. The Court found no error, reasoning that the "underlying facts of the incident simply were not relevant to [the victim's] purported motivation to fabricate the charges."

Of course, a sanitized version of the victim's sexual activity will not solve the constitutional problem if the version is so sanitized as to substantially diminish probative value. The redaction must not be disproportionate to the purposes it is designed to serve. n20

The Trial Court should also consider whether the evidence of sexual behavior, if required to be admitted, can be proved in some way other than through the victim's own testimony, so long as the alternate sources for the evidence are sufficient to get the defendant's point across. For example, in United States v. Bear Stops, 997 F.2d 451 (8th Cir. 1993) , the defendant offered evidence that the child-victim had been sexually attacked by three boys. The purpose was to provide an alternative explanation for the victim's having exhibited signs of sexual abuse. The Trial Court restricted the evidence to such an extent that the jury was never made aware of the time and place of the attack, nor the age and sex of the perpetrators, nor the type of sexual assault that occurred. Only a few general references to the attack were made by three witnesses at trial; one witness, an expert, only considered the attack as a hypothetical. The Court found that the restriction of the evidence violated the defendant's constitutional right to an effective defense. The Court reasoned as follows:

> The district court's concerns regarding the admission of the evidence were valid. Restricting the testimony regarding the sexual assault by the three boys to only the references volunteered by the grandmother and Dr. Peterson, and the hypotheticals asked of Dr. Bean was, however, disproportionate to those concerns. Because the evidence of the incident with the three older boys was uncontroverted, the potential for jury confusion and for a distracting "mini-trial" about the event was minimal. To avoid the intrusion on [the victim's] privacy, testimony about the basic facts of the incident could have been > introduced through [the victim's] mother who discovered the sexual assault by the three older boys and stopped it, or through any other witness other than [the victim] who had knowledge about it. Because of both its relevance and its uncontroverted nature, the evidence would also be a likely candidate for stipulation.

There is clearly a legitimate interest in protecting the victim from the trauma of having to relate or address prior sexual activity on the stand. But that interest is diminished, at least somewhat, if the evidence can be presented in a less invasive manner, and if this can be accomplished there is a stronger case for admitting probative evidence of the victim's sexual behavior.

[4] "Sexual Behavior" and False Allegations of Rape

Suppose the victim has made previous allegations of rape that turned out to be false. It is conceivable that the Constitution would require that such evidence be admitted in some cases -- e.g., where the previous claim was demonstrably false, the victim's credibility is critical and the defendant has no alternative evidence with which to contest the victim's account. n21

But assuming that the Constitution does not require its admission, does the rape shield law exclude evidence of prior false allegations of rape?

This depends in part on whether a false allegation of rape is "sexual behavior" within the meaning of the Rule. The Advisory Committee Note to the amended Rule states flatly that "[e]vidence offered to prove allegedly false prior claims by the victim is not barred by Rule 412," though it might be barred by Rules 404 and 403. Yet the Advisory Committee Note also describes the sexual behavior excluded by the Rule quite broadly. It states that the word "behavior" "should be construed to include activities of the mind, such as fantasies or dreams." It could certainly be argued that false allegations are related to activities of the mind of a sexual nature, and so are covered by the exclusionary language of Rule 412. There is something to the government's argument in United States v. Cournoyer, 118 F.3d 1279 (8th Cir. 1997) , that evidence of prior false rape allegations is "inseparable from evidence of the victim's past sexual behavior, which Rule 412 was designed to exclude."

In the end, however, we believe that prior false rape allegations are sufficiently distinguishable from sexual activity that they should not be covered by Rule 412. Evidence of a false rape allegation does not intrude into the zone of private and personal activity that the Rule is trying to protect. Moreover, such evidence clearly goes to an important matter of credibility, independent of its sexual content. It is one thing to argue that a rape complainant is not credible because she has engaged in sexual activity -- this is clearly prohibited by the Rule. But it is another thing to argue that she is not credible because she has falsely accused someone of a crime. Professor Clifford Fishman, in Consent, Credibility, and the Constitution: Evidence Relating to a Sex Offense Complainant's Past Sexual Behavior, 44 Cath. L. Rev. 711, 770 (1995), puts the argument this way:

> Rape shield legislation should not exclude evidence that the complainant previously made false sex offense accusations. ... Rape shield legislation is designed to protect a complainant from exposure of her prior sexual conduct. A prior false accusation is not "sexual conduct," thus the statute should not protect the complainant from exposure of prior lies or falsehoods. ... It is appropriate for the law to protect a woman's decision to have sex with other men from unnecessary exposure because, among other reasons, it has only minimal probative value as to whether or not she consented with the defendant. A false accusation of rape, by contrast, reveals flaws in character -- a ruthless disregard of the truth and a willingness to use sexual allegations unjustly -- which are highly relevant as to whether she has falsely accused the defendant. Such conduct deserves exposure, not protection. n22

The Cournoyer Court ultimately found it unnecessary to decide whether prior false rape allegations "must survive the rigors of Rule 412 scrutiny." It reasoned that even if Rule 412 did not apply, the evidence of false allegations would have to pass muster under Rules 404 and 403. In Cournoyer, the evidence of false allegations was to be brought in through an opinion witness, but the defense made no effort to establish a foundation for the witness' testimony. Given "defense counsel's failure to follow up, for example, with foundation testimony to support an opinion as to reputation, or with an offer of proof to show relevant, specific prior conduct," the evidence was properly excluded. Other Courts, without mentioning the Advisory Committee Note to Rule 412, have held that the Rule excludes false accusations of rape. n23

While a false allegation of rape should not be considered "sexual behavior" within the meaning of the Rule, the term "sexual behavior" is clearly intended to mean more than actual participation in sexual activity. A good example of the proper breadth of the term "sexual behavior" is found in Wolak v. Spucci, 217 F.3d 157 (2d Cir. 2000) . The plaintiff, a female police officer, alleged a hostile work environment. The plaintiff claimed among other things that fellow officers placed pornography throughout the police station -- often just before she came to work. A jury found that there was a hostile work environment but that it did not injure the plaintiff. The Trial Court had permitted the defendants to introduce the fact that the plaintiff had watched sex acts and pornographic videos at several parties. The articulated purpose was to show that the plaintiff could not have been as upset about the pornography in the workplace as she claimed. The defendants argued that Rule 412 did not apply, because the plaintiff's viewing of sex acts did not constitute "sexual behavior" within the meaning of the Rule. But the Court rejected this argument, noting that the Advisory Committee Note to the amendment explains that the term "sexual behavior" encompasses "activities of the mind, such as fantasies," and concluding that because "viewing pornography falls within Rule 412's broad definition of behavior, defendants' extensive questions were subject to the Rule." In the context of a civil case, this meant that the special exclusionary balancing test applied to the evidence. The Court held that the Trial Court abused its discretion in admitting the evidence, because its probative value did not substantially outweigh the risk of prejudice and harm to the victim.

[5] Notice Requirement

Before evidence is admitted under Rule 412, the offering party must make a written motion indicating an intent to offer the evidence. The motion must describe the evidence with specificity and must state the purpose for which the evidence is offered. n24 The motion cannot be made later than fourteen days before the date on which the trial is scheduled to begin, unless the Court permits a "tardy" motion either before or during trial for "good cause." Any motion made prior to trial by the offering party must be served on all the other parties in the case, and the offering party must also notify the victim of the intended use.

The constitutionality of rape shield notice provisions as applied against criminal defendants was discussed by the Supreme Court in Michigan v. Lucas, 500 U.S. 145 (1991) . The Court rejected a constitutional attack on the notice provision of a state rape shield law. The Michigan rape shield statute required that the defense give notice to the prosecution within ten days of the arraignment of the intent to present evidence of past sexual conduct with the victim. The defendant did not comply with that requirement, and the Trial Court excluded the evidence of past sexual conduct because of the violation of the notice requirement. The Supreme Court treated the case as presenting a limited question: whether the lower State Court had erred in adopting a per se rule that it is always unconstitutional to exclude evidence for the defendant's failure to comply with the notice requirement of a rape shield law. The Court held that such a per se rule of unconstitutionality was overbroad. It reasoned that a notice requirement in a rape shield law serves a legitimate state purpose, and that a defendant's violation of a notice requirement could in some cases be so egregious as to warrant the sanction of preclusion.

But the Court in Lucas took pains to note that it was not deciding the circumstances under which the sanction of preclusion might be "arbitrary or disproportionate" to the violation of a notice requirement. Thus, the Court left room for a federal defendant to argue that a minimal violation of the Rule 412 notice requirement should result in some remedy short of preclusion of the evidence (e.g., a continuance) and that a rigid rule of preclusion as applied against an accused might be unconstitutional. n25 In light of Lucas and as a matter of policy, we think that the "good cause" provision of the Rule 412 notice requirement should be applied flexibly in the manner of the notice requirements found in Rules 404(b) and 807.

[6] In Camera Hearing

Subdivision (c)(2) indicates that, in connection with the motion to admit evidence under Rule 412, the Court must order an in camera hearing, at which time the parties may call witnesses and offer other relevant evidence. The victim has a right to be heard at the in camera hearing. In order to protect the victim's privacy interest, the Rule provides that the record of the hearing must be sealed and remain under seal unless the Court orders otherwise.

The 1994 amendment to the Rule deleted the provision in the old Rule which addressed the problem of conditional facts, i.e., where the relevance of the evidence proffered by the defendant depends upon the fulfillment of a condition of fact. The old Rule directed the Trial Judge at the in camera hearing to exclude the proffered evidence unless all necessary conditional facts were proven to the Judge's satisfaction. The Advisory Committee recognized that the previous language impinged on the defendant's right to a jury trial, because that language apparently authorized the Trial Judge to exclude evidence of past sexual conduct between an alleged victim and accused simply because the Trial Judge did not believe that the acts occurred. The amended Rule 412 makes no reference to conditional facts, thus leaving the matter to standard principles of Judge and jury allocation set forth in Rule 104. Thus, conditional facts are to be admitted if there is evidence sufficient to support a finding that the condition has been met.

The decision in United States v. Platero, 72 F.3d 806 (10th Cir. 1995) , represents a proper application of the factfinding responsibilities under Rule 412. The defendant contended that the alleged victim was having a sexual relationship with one Laughlin, and therefore that she had a motive to claim falsely that her sexual contact with the defendant was coerced. The probative value of this evidence was conditioned on the existence of a sexual relationship between Laughlin and the victim. To prove the condition at the in camera hearing, the defendant proffered testimony from Laughlin's former girlfriend; the prosecution called Laughlin and the victim, who both denied the existence of an affair. The Trial Judge found that proffered testimony of Laughlin's former girlfriend was not credible and that the testimony by Laughlin and the alleged victim was credible. On the basis of this finding, the Judge precluded the defendant from cross-examining either Laughlin or the alleged victim at trial about their sexual relationship. The Court of Appeals, reversing the conviction, relied upon the Advisory Committee's Note concerning the amendment to subdivision (c) of Rule 412 that eliminated language permitting the Trial Judge to exclude defense evidence because the Judge did not believe it was credible. It also relied extensively on this Manual. The Court concluded that the question for the Trial Judge is whether there is sufficient evidence for a jury to find the fact upon which the defendant relies. If so, and if the evidence of the victim's sexual activity falls into any of the exceptions to exclusion provided in Rule 412(b)(1), the evidence must be admitted: "If instead the trial judge proceeds to decide the preliminary relevancy-conditioned-on-fact issue against the proponent where the jury could reasonably find the fact to exist, the judge has violated the proponent's right to a jury trial, contrary to clear precedent from the Supreme Court and our court applying the rules of evidence."

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. For a discussion of state rape-shield laws, see G. Joseph & S. Saltzburg, Evidence in America ch. 22.

(n2)Footnote 2. For an interesting discussion on whether the rape shield laws are effective in protecting the victim, see Althouse, Thelma and Louise and the Law: Do Rape Shield Rules Matter?, 25 Loyola L.A. L. Rev. 757 (1992).

(n3)Footnote 3. As Representative Holtzman stated in the discussion of the proposed Rule 412:

> Too often in this country victims of rape are humiliated and harassed when they report and prosecute the rape. Bullied and cross-examined about their prior sexual experiences, many find the trial almost as degrading as the rape itself. Since rape trials become inquisitions into the victim's morality, not trials of the defendant's innocence or guilt, it is not surprising that it is the least reported crime.

124 Cong. Rec. H11945 (daily ed. Oct. 10, 1978).

(n4)Footnote 4. United States v. Torres, 937 F.2d 1469, 1472 (9th Cir. 1991) .

(n5)Footnote 5. Extension of the rape shield law to civil cases has been criticized by some Courts. See, e.g., Barnes v. Barnes, 603 N.E.2d 1337 (Ind. 1992) (noting that a civil plaintiff is a "voluntary participant" and declaring it unfair that "one party may seek recovery from another based on evidence it selects while precluding opposing relevant evidence").

The Advisory Committee proposal to extend the Rule 412 protection to civil cases was originally rejected by the Supreme Court. Several Justices believed that the amendment would violate the Enabling Act because it could render evidence on accepted substantive defenses to sexual harassment completely inadmissible, thus making the defenses impossible to prove. See letter from Chief Justice Rehnquist to the Chair of the Judicial Conference, H.R. Doc. No. 103-250 (1994). Congress thereafter enacted an amendment identical to that originally proposed by the Advisory Committee, as part of the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994, Pub. L. 103-322.

(n6)Footnote 6. See, e.g, Excel Corp. v. Bosley, 165 F.3d 635 (8th Cir. 1999) (in a Title VII action for sexual harassment arising from a hostile work environment, the Trial Court properly applied Rule 412 to exclude evidence that the plaintiff had consensual sex with her alleged harasser outside the workplace); Rodriguez-Hernandez v. Miranda-Velez, 132 F.3d 848 (1st Cir. 1998) (in a Title VII action for sexual harassment, the Trial Court properly applied Rule 412 to exclude evidence of the plaintiff's sexual affairs and sexual diseases).

(n7)Footnote 7. See, e.g., United States v. Johns, 15 F.3d 740 (8th Cir. 1994) (victim's sexual history is admissible to prove consent only where the sexual activity was with the defendant).

(n8)Footnote 8. There is an anomaly in this "constitutional rights" exception. Rule 412(b)(1) provides three exceptions for evidence to which the rape shield law does not apply. Those exceptions are (A) proof of source of semen or injury, (B) proof of prior sexual activity between the defendant and the victim where pertinent to consent, and (C) where the Constitution requires admission. When the Advisory Committee crafted the first two exceptions, it was concerned that a Court might think it was required to admit evidence falling under these two exceptions, even if the evidence would be excluded under some other rule (such as the hearsay rule or Rule 403). So the Committee added a qualifying clause at the beginning of subdivision (b)(1): the evidence is admissible "if otherwise admissible under these rules." But that language creates an anomaly when applied to subpart (C), the exception for evidence constitutionally required to be admitted. It seems to say that evidence, if not admissible under other rules, must be excluded even if its exclusion would violate the constitutional rights of the defendant. This anomaly could be solved by placing the qualifier "if otherwise admissible under these rules" directly into subparts (A) and (B) only. In 2002 the Advisory Committee considered proposing what amounts to a technical change to rectify the anomaly. But it found that the textual anomaly has not created a problem for litigants or in the case law. No Court has relied on Rule 412 to exclude evidence that is constitutionally required to be admitted -- nor could a Court do so. Consequently the Committee determined that resolving a technical anomaly in the Rule did not justify the cost of an amendment.

(n9)Footnote 9. See, e.g., United States v. One Feather, 702 F.2d 736 (8th Cir. 1983) (evidence that fits one of the Rule 412 exceptions can nonetheless be excluded if the probative value is substantially outweighed by the prejudicial effect: "The policy of Rule 412, to guard against unwarranted intrusion into the victim's private life, may be taken into account in determining the amount of unfair prejudice under Rule 403.").

(n10)Footnote 10. See Sandoval v. Acevedo, 996 F.2d 145 (7th Cir. 1993) (noting that "a rape shield statute cannot constitutionally be employed to deny the defendant an opportunity to introduce vital evidence").

(n11)Footnote 11. California v. Trombetta, 467 U.S. 479 (1984) (noting that several clauses of the Constitution work together to provide what might be loosely called a right to an effective defense); Faretta v. California, 422 U.S. 806 (1975) (stating that the Sixth Amendment "*constitution*alizes the right in an adversary criminal trial to make a defense as we know it").

(n12)Footnote 12. See, e.g., Rock v. Arkansas, 483 U.S. 44 (1987) (per se rule excluding hypnotically refreshed testimony violates the defendant's constitutional rights: "Restrictions on a criminal defendant's rights to confront adverse witnesses and to present evidence may not be arbitrary or disproportionate to the purposes they are designed to serve"). For an incisive discussion of Rock and the right to an effective defense, see Stacy, The Search for Truth in Constitutional Criminal Procedure, 91 Colum. L. Rev. 1369 (1991).

(n13)Footnote 13. See Rock v. Arkansas, 483 U.S. 44, 55 (1987) (noting that the right to an effective defense "may, in appropriate cases, bow to accommodate other legitimate interests in the criminal justice system").

(n14)Footnote 14. See, e.g., Michigan v. Lucas, 500 U.S. 145 (1991) (noting that rape shield laws represent "a valid legislative determination that rape victims deserve heightened protection against surprise, harassment, and unnecessary invasions of privacy").

(n15)Footnote 15. See, e.g., United States v. Bear Stops, 997 F.2d 451 (8th Cir. 1993) (constitutional error to exclude evidence relating to the victim's sexual assault by other parties; this evidence was highly probative to establish an alternative explanation for why the victim exhibited behavioral manifestations of a sexually abused child; there was no other evidence reasonably available). Compare United States v. Torres, 937 F.2d 1469, 1474 (9th Cir. 1991) (evidence of the child-victim's past sexual conduct was not admissible to prove an alternative source of the child's sexual sophistication; the evidence was not sufficiently probative because the victim's testimony did not demonstrate any unusual knowledge of sexual techniques or nomenclature). See also Galvin, Shielding Rape Victims in the State and Federal Courts: A Proposal for the Second Decade, 70 Minn. L. Rev. 763 (1986), for a discussion of the balancing of interests required when a criminal defendant in a rape case proffers evidence of the victim's sexual history.

(n16)Footnote 16. See, e.g., United States v. Powers, 59 F.3d 1460 (4th Cir. 1995) (evidence of the minor-victim's sexual relations with her boyfriend was properly excluded, because the victim's sexual relations with her boyfriend occurred long after the acts of abuse for which the defendant was tried; the evidence was "irrelevant because it did not provide a reasonable alternative explanation" to the defendant's guilt); United States v. Duran, 886 F.2d 167 (8th Cir. 1989) (the fact that the victim gave birth to a child out of wedlock was properly excluded where the birth took place six months before the charged incident; the defendant simply wished to reveal that the victim had been a participant in past sexual relations with another, and this was not probative for any permissible purpose).

(n17)Footnote 17. See, e.g., Wood v. Alaska, 957 F.2d 1544 (9th Cir. 1992) (constitutional right to an effective defense does not require admission of evidence of the victim's prior sexual activity when offered only to show a propensity to have sex with the defendant; such evidence is rejected as "reflecting outdated views of women and sexuality"; the evidence "only tends to show that she was willing to have sex, not that she was willing to have sex with this particular man at this particular time").

(n18)Footnote 18. See, e.g., Olden v. Kentucky, 488 U.S. 227 (1988) (finding a Sixth Amendment violation where the Trial Court excluded evidence of a rape complainant's sexual relationship with another man; the complainant was a crucial prosecution witness, and evidence of the relationship would have provided strong evidence of a motive to lie about being raped; the Court noted that there was no alternative evidence that would have established the motive to lie). Compare Wood v. Alaska, 957 F.2d 1544 (9th Cir. 1992) (holding that evidence of the victim's sexual activity was properly excluded as being more prejudicial than probative, but noting that the result might have been different if the evidence "were the only evidence Wood could present to establish a prior sexual relationship such that he would be effectively precluded from presenting his whole theory to the jury").

(n19)Footnote 19. United States v. Bear Stops, 997 F.2d 451, 455 (8th Cir. 1993) .

(n20)Footnote 20. United States v. Bear Stops, supra, 997 F.2d at 455 (finding constitutional error because the evidence of the victim's prior sexual abuse "was so sanitized that it was insufficient to support the purpose for which it was offered").

(n21)Footnote 21. It appears that only one reported Federal case has held that the Constitution would be violated if evidence of a false claim was excluded under Rule 412. In United States v. Stamper, 766 F.Supp. 1396, 1400 (W.D.N.C.1991) , the defendant moved for permission to show that prior false accusations revealed the accuser's motive to move her residence from the home of one parent to another; the defendant argued that the complainant had a similar motive with respect to the accusation at issue in the instant case. The Trial Court assumed that evidence of false claims was prohibited by the pre-1994 Rule 412. But because the defendant was entitled "to set before the jury the proffered evidence of ulterior motives of the complainant," the Trial Court held that the Sixth Amendment required the evidence of false claims to be admitted. The Stamper Court emphasized that Stamper did not wage a general credibility attack aimed to show a "propensity to fabricate," but instead sought to develop evidence of ulterior motive.

The Stamper Court also relied on the fact that there was no doubt that the prior claims were false -- the complainant admitted in writing that she had lied when she accused three others of sexually assaulting her, and she admitted her motive for doing so as well.

(n22)Footnote 22. See also Christopher Bopst, Rape Shield Laws and Prior False Accusations of Rape: The Need for Meaningful Legislative Reform, 24 J. Legis. 125, 145 (1998) (arguing that "prior false rape accusations represent evidence of lies, not sex, and do not fall within the protections of the rape shield statutes"); Hon. Denise Johnson, Prior False Allegations of Rape: Falsus in Uno, Falsus in Omnibus? 7 Yale J. L. and Feminism 243 (1995) (arguing that false claims of rape should be treated the same as any other false claim when offered for impeachment)

(n23)Footnote 23. See, e.g., United States v. Withorn, 204 F.3d 790 (8th Cir. 2000) ("In the absence of an applicable exception, Rule 412 specifically bars admission of evidence of the past sexual behavior of an alleged victim."). Note that the quoted language in Withorn assumes that a false allegation is sexual behavior. It is clear that there is no explicit exception in the Rule for false allegations. But if a false allegation is not sexual behavior, the Rule does not apply at all.

(n24)Footnote 24. See United States v. Shaw, 824 F.2d 601 (8th Cir. 1987) (notice describing proof related to one sexual injury does not permit the defendant to introduce proof of another sexual injury at trial).

(n25)Footnote 25. See United States v. Ramone, 218 F.3d 1229 (10th Cir. 2000) (Rule 412 notice requirement found constitutional as applied; preclusion of the evidence was not disproportionate, because the defendant was permitted to testify about his prior consensual relationship of the victim -- preclusion of the details did not disable the defense; the Court notes that the notice requirement "is not arbitrary" because it protects "both the victim and the prosecution against surprise and prejudice due to late disclosure of evidence").

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 412 RULE 412

2-412 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 412.03

412.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Supp]

[1] Civil Cases

Rodriguez-Hernandez v. Miranda-Velez, 132 F.3d 848 (1st Cir. 1998) : In a Title VII action based on allegations that the plaintiff was fired after complaining about sexual harassment by a customer, the Court affirmed a judgment against the employer, finding no error in the exclusion of evidence that the plaintiff engaged in multiple affairs with married men, carried on a lesbian relationship, and had contracted a sexually transmitted disease, although evidence of the plaintiff's flirtatious behavior toward the customer was admitted. The Court held that the Trial Judge "struck an acceptable balance between the danger of undue prejudice and the need to present the jury with relevant evidence, particularly in light of Rule 412's special standard of admissibility."

Wolak v. Spucci, 217 F.3d 157 (2d Cir. 2000) : In a gender discrimination action by a female police officer who alleged a hostile work environment when fellow officers placed pornography throughout the police station, the Court found it was error (but harmless) to permit the defendants to question the plaintiff about two parties she attended where pornographic videos were shown and about two or three other occasions when she watched sexual acts as they were performed.

Warren v. Prejean, 301 F.3d 893 (8th Cir. 2002) : Affirming a judgment for a female employee alleging sex discrimination in her termination as a youth specialist at a social services facility, the Court found that the plaintiff's testimony that she had not sexually harassed a male contract specialist was not "sexual behavior" within the meaning of the Rule, and therefore was admissible to rebut the defendant's evidence purporting to establish a relationship between the plaintiff and the other specialist. In Jaros v. LodgeNet Entertainment Corp., 294 F.3d 960 (8th Cir. 2002) , the Court affirmed a judgment for a former employee who alleged that she was sexually harassed by a supervisor and constructively discharged. It upheld exclusion of evidence that the plaintiff used swear words, wore suggestive clothing, and once said that she liked to pick up men in bars for sex, noting that the plaintiff's language was not shown to be an inducement to harassment, the comment about meeting men in bars was not known to the supervisor, and the defendant never admonished the plaintiff about her dress. Moreover, evidence concerning the plaintiff's dress was inadmissible under Rule 412 and could also have been excluded under Rule 403.

B.K.B. v. Maui Police Dep't, 276 F.3d 1091 (9th Cir. 2002) : A female former police officer sued for sexual harassment by a deputy chief who eventually raped her. To prove that the deputy chief's advances were not unwelcome, the defense offered testimony by another officer that the plaintiff had once after a party described her use of a female sexual device, said she had had an orgasm at work while using the device and thinking of him, and said that she thought he would be "fun in bed" and that she wanted to "teach him things" and "hurt" him. Reversing a judgment against the plaintiff, the Court held it was error under Rule 412 to admit the testimony. The plaintiff's alleged statements regarding her sexual habits or fantasies were not probative as to the welcomeness of any harassing conduct by coworkers, so their probative value certainly could not substantially outweigh the prejudice to her.

Davis v. DeKalb County School Dist., 233 F.3d 1367 (11th Cir. 2000) : The Court affirmed summary judgments for the District and a principal in a sexual harassment/discrimination suit arising from the acts of a physical education teacher, but noted that the Trial Judge committed error in commenting on a plaintiff's sexual history. The prejudicial effect substantially outweighed any possible probative value, especially since the plaintiff was a minor who lacked legal capacity to consent to sexual abuse. In Judd v. Rodman, 105 F.3d 1339 (11th Cir. 1997) , the plaintiff, suing for contracting genital herpes from the defendant, objected to introduction of evidence regarding her sexual history. Affirming a judgment for the defendant, the Court held that because the herpes virus can be dormant for a long time and an infected person can be asymptomatic, evidence of prior sexual relationships and the type of protection used during intercourse was highly relevant to liability. Thus, the balancing test of Rule 412(b)(2) was satisfied and there was no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence.

[2] Constitutionally Required Evidence

United States v. Saunders, 943 F.2d 388 (4th Cir. 1991) : Affirming the defendant's conviction for aggravated sexual abuse, the Court held there was no error in excluding evidence of prior sexual relations between the victim and the defendant's friend. Leaving open the question whether its decision in Doe v. United States, 666 F.2d 43 (4th Cir. 1981) , holding that evidence of the victim's reputation could be admitted when offered solely to show the accused's state of mind, was correct, the Court held it could discern no constitutional basis requiring admission of evidence about a three-day relationship between the victim and some third person. In this case, even evidence that the defendant had sexual relations with the victim was of marginal relevance, because consent was not the basis of his defense.

United States v. Bear Stops, 997 F.2d 451 (8th Cir. 1993) : The Court affirmed a defendant's conviction for sexual abuse of one victim, but reversed as to another victim. The Constitution required admission of evidence that the second victim was sexually assaulted by three boys during the approximate time period of the defendant's alleged abuse, which the defendant offered as an alternative explanation for the victim's behaviors that the government had relied upon to prove that abuse had occurred. The Court distinguished the constitutional basis for its decision in this case from the decision in United States v. Shaw, 824 F.2d 601 (8th Cir. 1987) , where it had held that a defendant may not offer evidence of a victim's sexual past to prove emotional injuries generally.

United States v. Payne, 944 F.2d 1458 (9th Cir. 1991) : Affirming a conviction for carnal knowledge of a female under age 16, the Court held it was no violation of confrontation rights to exclude evidence of the victim's prior sexual conduct that was irrelevant or only tenuously probative of the claims asserted by the defendant.

United States v. Platero, 72 F.3d 806 (10th Cir. 1995) : In order to show that the victim had a motive to fabricate rape allegations, the defendant sought to introduce evidence of her romantic relationship with a third party at the time. The Trial Judge determined that witnesses to the alleged relationship were not credible, and precluded the defendant from cross-examining on the relationship. Citing the Advisory Committee's Note to the 1994 amendments and its reliance on commentary in this Manual, the Court reversed. Under the amended Rule 412, the Trial Judge does not determine whether sexual conduct evidence offered by the defense is true, but only whether its admission would be constitutionally required if there is evidence sufficient to support a finding that it is true.

[3] Jury Instructions

B.K.B. v. Maui Police Dep't, 276 F.3d 1091 (9th Cir. 2002) : A female former police officer sued for sexual harassment by a deputy chief who eventually raped her. To prove that the deputy chief's advances were not unwelcome, the defense offered testimony by another officer that the plaintiff had once after a party described her use of a female sexual device, said she had had an orgasm at work while using the device and thinking of him, and said that she thought he would be "fun in bed" and that she wanted to "teach him things" and "hurt" him. Reversing a judgment against the plaintiff, the Court held it was error under Rule 412 to admit the testimony. Even though the Trial Judge granted a motion to strike the testimony on the day after it was given, the Court concluded that the curative instruction given "was neither as forceful nor as comprehensive as warranted under the circumstances"; in any event, "no matter what the instruction, it was impossible to dispel the effect of [the witness'] lurid and prejudicial testimony," so it was error to deny a mistrial motion.

[4] Motion and Record To Be Under Seal

S.M. v. J.K., 262 F.3d 914 (9th Cir. 2001) : Affirming a judgment for a housekeeper who charged her former employer with attempted sexual assault, the Court upheld the exclusion of evidence of the housekeeper's prior sexual history as a sanction for the defendant's failure to file his motion to introduce the evidence under seal. The Court agreed with the Magistrate Judge that the failure to file under seal was a flagrant violation and that "[e]ven though the evidence was ultimately excluded, Plaintiff may have suffered prejudice from the public airing of the allegation of the extramarital affair."

[5] Notice

United States v. Eagle, 137 F.3d 1011 (8th Cir. 1998) : The Court affirmed a conviction for aggravated sexual abuse of a minor, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence of the victim's prior sexual activity. The defendant gave the government notice of his intent to use the evidence only six days before trial, and failed to notify the victim of his intent. While the Trial Judge gave the defendant the opportunity to show cause for the late notice, the defendant made no attempt to show why he should be able to introduce the evidence, and never moved for a continuance to allow compliance with the notice requirements. In United States v. Rouse, 111 F.3d 561 (8th Cir. 1997) , the Court affirmed convictions for sexual abuse of children, and held that the Trial Judge properly excluded evidence of the victims' past sexual activity because the defendants had not given 14 days' notice prior to trial. The Court observed that the defendants were aware of the evidence three months before trial and made no showing of cause for not giving timely notice. Affirming a rape conviction in United States v. Eagle Thunder, n1 the Court held that evidence of a nonrecent tear in the victim's hymenal ring was properly excluded, as the defendant failed to file a written notice of intent to offer the evidence and, in any event, it was not relevant to the source of tears that were hours old or to impeach the victim's credibility.

United States v. Ramone, 218 F.3d 1229 (10th Cir. 2000) : In a rape prosecution, the Court found no violation of the defendant's right to an effective defense when evidence of prior sexual activity between the defendant and the victim was excluded on the ground that the defendant had not given timely notice of his intent to proffer the evidence. The Court noted that the notice requirement "is not arbitrary" because it protects "both the victim and the prosecution against surprise and prejudice due to late disclosure of evidence." Nor was preclusion of the evidence disproportionate: the defendant was permitted to testify in general about his prior consensual sexual relationship with the victim; preclusion of the details did not disable his defense.

B.K.B. v. Maui Police Dep't, 276 F.3d 1091 (9th Cir. 2002) : A female former police officer sued for sexual harassment by a deputy chief who eventually raped her. To prove that the deputy chief's advances were not unwelcome, the defense offered testimony by another officer that the plaintiff had once after a party described her use of a female sexual device, said she had had an orgasm at work while using the device and thinking of him, and said that she thought he would be "fun in bed" and that she wanted to "teach him things" and "hurt" him. Reversing a judgment against the plaintiff, the Court noted that the defense "flouted [the] procedural guidelines [for notice]. Having failed in two previous motions to obtain the court's approval to introduce Rule 412 material, [they] instead simply sprang the offending testimony upon the court and then misrepresented the nature of [the] testimony to the trial judge in response to plaintiff's objections that the defense intended to violate Rule 412."

[6] Prior Accusations by the Victim

United States v. Cardinal, 782 F.2d 34 (6th Cir. 1986) : The Court affirmed a defendant's conviction for the rape of his 13-year-old niece, finding there was no abuse of discretion in exclusion of other instances in which the victim reported sexual assaults by family members and withdrew the charges. Assuming that the evidence was directed at credibility, not prior sexual behavior, the Court found that the basic policy of Rule 412 supported exclusion. On the facts of the case, exclusion would appear to have been warranted in light of evidence that the charges were true and were withdrawn because of fear of retaliation from the victim's mother.

United States v. Withorn, 204 F.3d 790 (8th Cir. 2000) : In a prosecution for forcible rape of a 12-year-old, the defendant sought to introduce evidence of a sexual assault accusation by the victim made several years earlier against a teenage friend of the defendant. The friend had committed suicide before the accusation could be adjudicated. The Court found no abuse of discretion in excluding the evidence, since a conclusion that the unadjudicated accusation was untrue "would have required the jury to rely on sheer speculation." Further, in the Court's view, impeaching the victim's truthfulness and showing her capability to fabricate a story are not recognized exceptions to Rule 412. Affirming a conviction for aggravated sexual abuse in United States v. Cournoyer, 118 F.3d 1279 (8th Cir. 1997) , the Court assumed, without deciding, that its 1989 decision in United States v. Provost, n2 holding that evidence of prior false rape allegations is barred by Rule 412, had been overruled by the 1994 amendments to the Rule. In any event, the Court found no error in the exclusion of testimony that the complainant "always accuses guys of that," since the testimony lacked the foundation required under Rule 405(a) for reputation or opinion character evidence or was inadmissible specific conduct character evidence. In United States v. Bartlett, n3 the Court affirmed a conviction of assault with intent to commit rape, concluding that it was proper to exclude evidence of a prior false accusation of rape by the victim, because the circumstances were very different from this case and the evidence of a single bad act was of marginal relevance to the victim's credibility.

[7] Prior Virginity

United States v. Blue Bird, 372 F.3d 989 (8th Cir. 2004) : Reversing a conviction for sexual abuse of a minor, the Court held that the victim's testimony that she was a virgin when she had sexual intercourse with the defendant was irrelevant to the case and unduly prejudicial. Furthermore, the testimony was inadmissible under Rule 412 because it did not fit into any of the narrowly defined circumstances specified in the Rule. The Court noted that "[i]f the defendant ... is prohibited from playing on the potential prejudices of a jury by introducing evidence of the alleged victim's promiscuity, the government should also be forbidden to play on potential prejudices by introducing evidence of the alleged victim's chastity."

United States v. Duncan, 855 F.2d 1528 (11th Cir. 1988) : Affirming a conviction for kidnapping, the Court held that testimony by the victim regarding her conversation with the defendant following an uncharged rape in which she referred to her prior virginity was properly admitted as part of a chronological reconstruction of the evening and to respond to a defense argument about her failure to escape.

[8] Psychiatric Examinations

Government of Virgin Islands v. Scuito, 623 F.2d 869 (3d Cir. 1980) : The Court cited the spirit of Rule 412 as authority for upholding the Trial Judge's decision denying a rape defendant's motion for a psychiatric examination of the victim.

[9] Relationship to Other Rules

United States v. One Feather, 702 F.2d 736 (8th Cir. 1983) : The Court upheld a rape conviction, finding no error in precluding the defendant from asking the victim, who testified on direct examination that she was divorced and had an infant son, where her marriage and divorce took place. The defendant had been unable to find applicable records and believed that the witness had lied. Citing Rule 412 as persuasive authority, the Court found that the Trial Judge properly relied on Rule 403 to bar the questioning, since it would have suggested that the victim had an illegitimate child, which might be unfairly prejudicial against her.

[10] Scope of the Rule

United States v. Yazzie, 59 F.3d 807 (9th Cir. 1995) : In a child sexual abuse case, evidence offered by the defendant that another person had committed the assaults was excluded for failure to comply with the notice requirements of Rule 412. The Court held that exclusion was error (but harmless), as the evidence was not of sexual behavior "other than" the offense charged.

[11] Sexual Activity with Others

United States v. Powers, 59 F.3d 1460 (4th Cir. 1995) : Affirming a conviction for aggravated sexual abuse of a minor, the Court held that evidence of the minor's sexual relations with her boyfriend was properly excluded. Since the victim's sexual relations with her boyfriend occurred long after the acts of abuse for which the defendant was tried, the evidence was "irrelevant because it did not provide a reasonable alternative explanation" to the defendant's guilt.

United States v. Blue Horse, 856 F.2d 1037 (8th Cir. 1988) : The Court upheld the exclusion of a sexual abuse victim's medical records. A physician testified about the nature of the victim's injuries, and the report contained prejudicial information concerning the victim's last sexual intercourse.

[12] Source of Semen or Injury

United States v. Richards, 118 F.3d 622 (8th Cir. 1997) : In a prosecution for aggravated sexual abuse, the defense rather than the government brought out that semen was found inside the complainant; the parties stipulated that the source of the semen was indeterminable. The Court held there was no error in excluding evidence that the complainant had had intercourse with several others the same evening. To permit a defendant to initiate the introduction of semen evidence and then offer evidence of other sources would permit him to evade the restrictions of Rule 412 by bootstrapping himself into the exceptions in subdivision (b)(1). In United States v. White Buffalo, 84 F.3d 1052 (8th Cir. 1996) , the Court affirmed two brothers' convictions for sexual abuse. Although the victim told a hospital doctor that she had not engaged in consensual sexual intercourse within 72 hours of the rape she reported, test results showed otherwise. The Trial Judge excluded evidence of the victim's statement and test results, holding that the test results were not relevant to show that a person other than the accused was the source of semen. The government had not offered evidence of semen as part of its case, and the evidence was therefore irrelevant for rebuttal purposes. The Court also concluded that admission of the evidence was not necessary to assure a fair trial for the defendants, since "the victim's statement about unrelated consensual sexual intercourse was of little or no probative value on the question whether she falsely accused Ernest [one defendant] of rape." In United States v. Azure, n4 the Court held that evidence that a 13-year-old boy had had sexual relations with the ten-year-old victim was properly excluded as irrelevant to the source of a laceration on the victim's vaginal wall, since the victim did not express discomfort at the time of the prior sexual activity and physicians testified that the laceration would have been inflicted by force and have been painful.

United States v. Torres, 937 F.2d 1469 (9th Cir. 1991) : The Court, in affirming a conviction for aggravated sexual abuse, held that the Rule includes sexual behavior of the victim after the alleged incident, but that evidence of an incident involving the victim six months later was not relevant in the cross-examination of the victim or in determining the source of semen found in the victim's panties. In United States v. Begay, 937 F.2d 515 (10th Cir. 1991) , the Court reversed a conviction for sexual abuse of a child because the defendant had been precluded from cross-examining the witness about prior sexual contacts. Particularly where there was physical evidence that the victim's conditions could have resulted from earlier conduct with another person, examination regarding the prior incidents was relevant and probative on the central issue of whether the victim's memory was clear and accurate on critical details about the charged incident as contrasted with the earlier incidents.

[13] Standard of Proof

United States v. Platero, 72 F.3d 806 (10th Cir. 1995) : In order to show that the victim had a motive to fabricate rape allegations, the defendant sought to introduce evidence of her romantic relationship with a third party at the time. The Trial Judge determined that witnesses to the alleged relationship were not credible, and precluded the defendant from cross-examining on the relationship. Citing the Advisory Committee's Note to the 1994 amendments and its reliance on commentary in this Manual, the Court reversed. Under the amended Rule 412, the Trial Judge does not determine whether sexual conduct evidence offered by the defense is true, but only whether its admission would be constitutionally required if there is evidence sufficient to support a finding that it is true.

[14] Waiver of Protections

S.M. v. J.K., 262 F.3d 914 (9th Cir. 2001) : Affirming a judgment for a housekeeper who charged her former employer with attempted sexual assault, the Court upheld the exclusion of evidence of the housekeeper's prior sexual history as a sanction for the defendant's failure to file his motion to introduce the evidence under seal. The Court observed that a sanctions ruling should be reconsidered if the plaintiff "opens the door" at trial, and that the Magistrate Judge did reconsider the ruling. Because the plaintiff offered evidence of prior instances of sexual assault, the Court reasoned that the defendant would have been able to offer "further related evidence" but that the door was not opened to evidence of an extramarital affair.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. United States v. Eagle Thunder, 893 F.2d 950 (8th Cir. 1990) .

(n2)Footnote 2. United States v. Provost, 875 F.2d 172 (8th Cir. 1989) .

(n3)Footnote 3. United States v. Bartlett, 856 F.2d 1071 (8th Cir. 1988) .

(n4)Footnote 4. United States v. Azure, 845 F.2d 1503 (8th Cir. 1988) .

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
CHAPTER 412 RULE 412

2-412 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 412.04

412.04 Legislative History

[Editor's Note: There is no legislative history to the original Rule 412. The amendment to Rule 412 was passed as part of the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994. Congress in that Act adopted verbatim the version of Rule 412 that had been recommended by the Advisory Committee but rejected by the Supreme Court. The Advisory Committee proposal had been rejected by the Supreme Court in favor of a slightly different version, but Congress chose the Advisory Committee's version over that adopted by the Supreme Court. House Conference Report 103-711 notes that the "Conferees intend that the Advisory Committee Note on Rule 412, as transmitted by the Judicial Conference of the United States to the Supreme Court on October 25, 1993, applies to Rule 412 as enacted by this section." Thus, the Advisory Committee Note to the amendment is the legislative history of the version of Rule 412 directly enacted by Congress in 1994. That Advisory Committee Note is produced below.]

Advisory Committee's Note to 1994 Amendment to Rule 412

Rule 412 has been revised to diminish some of the confusion engendered by the original rule and to expand the protection afforded alleged victims of sexual misconduct. Rule 412 applies to both civil and criminal proceedings. The rule aims to safeguard the alleged victim against the invasion of privacy, potential embarrassment and sexual stereotyping that is associated with public disclosure of intimate sexual details and the infusion of sexual innuendo into the factfinding process. By affording victims protection in most instances, the rule also encourages victims of sexual misconduct to institute and to participate in legal proceedings against alleged offenders.

Rule 412 seeks to achieve these objectives by barring evidence relating to the alleged victim's sexual behavior or alleged sexual predisposition, whether offered as substantive evidence or for impeachment, except in designated circumstances in which the probative value of the evidence significantly outweighs possible harm to the victim.

The revised rule applies in all cases involving sexual misconduct without regard to whether the alleged victim or person accused is a party to the litigation. Rule 412 extends to "pattern" witnesses in both criminal and civil cases whose testimony about other instances of sexual misconduct by the person accused is otherwise admissible. When the case does not involve alleged sexual misconduct, evidence relating to a third-party witness' alleged sexual activities is not within the ambit of Rule 412. The witness will, however, be protected by other rules such as Rules 404 and 608, as well as Rule 403.

The terminology "alleged victim" is used because there will frequently be a factual dispute as to whether sexual misconduct occurred. It does not connote any requirement that the misconduct be alleged in the pleadings. Rule 412 does not, however, apply unless the person against whom the evidence is offered can reasonably be characterized as a "victim of alleged sexual misconduct." When this is not the case, as for instance in a defamation action involving statements concerning sexual misconduct in which the evidence is offered to show that the alleged defamatory statements were true or did not damage the plaintiff's reputation, neither Rule 404 nor this rule will operate to bar the evidence; Rule 401 and 403 will continue to control. Rule 412 will, however, apply in a Title VII action in which the plaintiff has alleged sexual harassment.

The reference to a person "accused" is also used in a non-technical sense. There is no requirement that there be a criminal charge pending against the person or even that the misconduct would constitute a criminal offense. Evidence offered to prove allegedly false prior claims by the victim is not barred by Rule 412. However, this evidence is subject to the requirements of Rule 404.

Subdivision (a). As amended, Rule 412 bars evidence offered to prove the victim's sexual behavior and alleged sexual predisposition. Evidence, which might otherwise be admissible under Rules 402, 404(b), 405, 607, 608, 609, or some other evidence rule, must be excluded if Rule 412 so requires. The word "other" is used to suggest some flexibility in admitting evidence "intrinsic" to the alleged sexual misconduct. Cf. Committee Note to 1991 amendment to Rule 404(b).

Past sexual behavior connotes all activities that involve actual physical conduct, i.e. sexual intercourse and sexual contact, or that imply sexual intercourse or sexual contact. See, e.g., United States v. Galloway, 937 F.2d 542 (10th Cir. 1991) , cert. denied, 113 S. Ct. 418 (1992) (use of contraceptives inadmissible since use implies sexual activity); United States v. One Feather, 702 F.2d 736 (8th Cir. 1983) (birth of an illegitimate child inadmissible); State v. Carmichael, 727 P.2d 918, 925 (Kan. 1986) (evidence of venereal disease inadmissible). In addition, the word "behavior" should be construed to include activities of the mind, such as fantasies or dreams. See 23 C. Wright & K. Graham, Jr., Federal Practice and Procedure, § 5384 at p. 548 (1980) ("While there may be some doubt under statutes that require 'conduct,' it would seem that the language of Rule 412 is broad enough to encompass the behavior of the mind.").

The rule has been amended to also exclude all other evidence relating to an alleged victim of sexual misconduct that is offered to prove a sexual predisposition. This amendment is designed to exclude evidence that does not directly refer to sexual activities or thoughts but that the proponent believes may have a sexual connotation for the factfinder. Admission of such evidence would contravene Rule 412's objectives of shielding the alleged victim from potential embarrassment and safeguarding the victim against stereotypical thinking. Consequently, unless the (b)(2) exception is satisfied, evidence such as that relating to the alleged victim's mode of dress, speech, or life-style will not be admissible.

The introductory phrase in subdivision (a) was deleted because it lacked clarity and contained no explicit reference to the other provisions of law that were intended to be overridden. The conditional clause, "except as provided in subdivisions (b) and (c)" is intended to make clear that evidence of the types described in subdivision (a) is admissible only under the strictures of those sections.

The reason for extending the rule to all criminal cases is obvious. The strong social policy of protecting a victim's privacy and encouraging victims to come forward to report criminal acts is not confined to cases that involve a charge of sexual assault. The need to protect the victim is equally great when a defendant is charged with kidnapping, and evidence is offered, either to prove motive or as background, that the defendant sexually assaulted the victim.

The reason for extending Rule 412 to civil cases is equally obvious. The need to protect alleged victims against invasions of privacy, potential embarrassment, and unwarranted sexual stereotyping, and the wish to encourage victims to come forward when they have been sexually molested do not disappear because the context has shifted from a criminal prosecution to a claim for damages or injunctive relief. There is a strong social policy in not only punishing those who engage in sexual misconduct, but in also providing relief to the victim. Thus, Rule 412 applies in any civil case in which a person claims to be the victim of sexual misconduct, such as actions for sexual battery or sexual harassment.

Subdivision (b). Subdivision (b) spells out the specific circumstances in which some evidence may be admissible that would otherwise be barred by the general rule expressed in subdivision (a). As amended, Rule 412 will be virtually unchanged in criminal cases, but will provide protection to any person alleged to be a victim of sexual misconduct regardless of the charge actually brought against an accused. A new exception has been added for civil cases.

In a criminal case, evidence may be admitted under subdivision (b)(1) pursuant to three possible exceptions, provided the evidence also satisfies other requirements for admissibility specified in the Federal Rules of Evidence, including Rule 403. Subdivisions (b)(1)(A) and (b)(1)(B) require proof in the form of specific instances of sexual behavior in recognition of the limited probative value and dubious reliability of evidence of reputation or evidence in the form of an opinion.

Under subdivision (b)(1)(A), evidence of specific instances of sexual behavior with persons other than the person whose sexual misconduct is alleged may be admissible if it is offered to prove that another person was the source of semen, injury or other physical evidence. Where the prosecution has directly or indirectly asserted that the physical evidence originated with the accused, the defendant must be afforded an opportunity to prove that another person was responsible. See United States v. Begay, 937 F.2d 515, 523 n. 10 (10th Cir. 1991) . Evidence offered for the specific purpose identified in this subdivision may still be excluded if it does not satisfy Rules 401 or 403. See, e.g., United States v. Azure, 845 F.2d 1503, 1505-06 (8th Cir. 1988) (10 year old victim's injuries indicated recent use of force; court excluded evidence of consensual sexual activities with witness who testified at in camera hearing that he had never hurt victim and failed to establish recent activities).

Under the exception in subdivision (b)(1)(B), evidence of specific instances of sexual behavior with respect to the person whose sexual misconduct is alleged is admissible if offered to prove consent, or offered by the prosecution. Admissible pursuant to this exception might be evidence of prior instances of sexual activities between the alleged victim and the accused, as well as statements in which the alleged victim expressed an intent to engage in sexual intercourse with accused, or voiced sexual fantasies involving the specific accused. In a prosecution for child sexual abuse, for example, evidence of uncharged sexual activity between the accused and the alleged victim offered by the prosecution may be admissible pursuant to Rule 404(b) to show a pattern of behavior. Evidence relating to the victim's alleged sexual predisposition is not admissible pursuant to this exception.

Under subdivision (b)(1)(C), evidence of specific instances of conduct may not be excluded if the result would be to deny a criminal defendant the protections afforded by the Constitution. For example, statements in which the victim has expressed an intent to have sex with the first person encountered on a particular occasion might not be excluded without violating the due process right of a rape defendant seeking to prove consent. Recognition of this basic principle was expressed in subdivision (b)(1) of the original rule. The United States Supreme Court has recognized that in various circumstances a defendant may have a right to introduce evidence otherwise precluded by an evidence rule under the Confrontation Clause. See, e.g., Olden v. Kentucky, 488 U.S. 227 (1988) (defendant in rape cases had right to inquire into alleged victim's cohabitation with another man to show bias).

Subdivision (b)(2) governs the admissibility of otherwise proscribed evidence in civil cases. It employs a balancing test rather than the specific exceptions stated in subdivision (b)(1) in recognition of the difficulty of foreseeing future developments in the law. Greater flexibility is needed to accommodate evolving causes of action such as claims for sexual harassment.

The balancing test requires the proponent of the evidence, whether plaintiff or defendant, to convince the court that the probative value of the proffered evidence "substantially outweighs the danger of harm to any victim and of unfair prejudice of any party." This test for admitting evidence offered to prove sexual behavior or sexual propensity in civil cases differs in three respects from the general rule governing admissibility set forth in Rule 403. First, it reverses the usual procedure spelled out in Rule 403 by shifting the burden to the proponent to demonstrate admissibility rather than making the opponent justify exclusion of the evidence. Second, the standard expressed in subdivision (b)(2) is more stringent than in the original rule; it raises the threshold for admission by requiring that the probative value of the evidence substantially outweigh the specified dangers. Finally, the Rule 412 test puts "harm to the victim" on the scale in addition to prejudice to the parties.

Evidence of reputation may be received in a civil case only if the alleged victim has put his or her reputation into controversy. The victim may do so without making a specific allegation in a pleading. Cf. Fed. R. Civ. P. 35(a).

Subdivision (c). Amended subdivision (c) is more concise and understandable than the subdivision it replaces. The requirement of a motion before trial is continued in the amended rule, as is the provision that a late motion may be permitted for good cause shown. In deciding whether to permit late filing, the court may take into account the conditions previously included in the rule: namely whether the evidence is newly discovered and could not have been obtained earlier through the existence of due diligence, and whether the issue to which such evidence relates has newly arisen in the case. The Rule recognizes that in some instances the circumstances that justify an application to introduce evidence otherwise barred by Rule 412 will not become apparent until trial.

The amended rule provides that before admitting evidence that falls within the prohibition of Rule 412(a), the court must hold a hearing in camera at which the alleged victim and any party must be afforded the right to be present and an opportunity to be heard. All papers connected with the motion and any record of a hearing on the motion must be kept and remain under seal during the course of trial and appellate proceedings unless otherwise ordered. This is to assure that the privacy of the alleged victim is preserved in all cases in which the court rules that proffered evidence is not admissible, and in which the hearing refers to matters that are not received, or are received in another form.

The procedures set forth in subdivision (c) do not apply to discovery of a victim's past sexual conduct or predisposition in civil cases, which will be continued to be governed by Fed. R. Civ. P. 26. In order not to undermine the rationale of Rule 412, however, courts should enter appropriate orders pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(c) to protect the victim against unwarranted inquiries and to ensure confidentiality. Courts should presumptively issue protective orders barring discovery unless the party seeking discovery makes a showing that the evidence sought to be discovered would be relevant under the facts and theories of the particular case, and cannot be obtained except through discovery. In an action for sexual harassment, for instance, while some evidence of the alleged victim's sexual behavior and/or predisposition in the workplace may perhaps be relevant, non-work place conduct will usually be irrelevant. Cf. Burns v. McGregor Electronic Industries, Inc., 989 F.2d 959, 962-63 (8th Cir. 1993) (posing for a nude magazine outside work hours is irrelevant to issue of unwelcomeness of sexual advances at work). Confidentiality orders should be presumptively granted as well.

One substantive change made in subdivision (c) is the elimination of the following sentence: "Notwithstanding subdivision (b) of Rule 104, if the relevancy of the evidence which the accused seeks to offer in the trial depends upon the fulfillment of a condition of fact, the court, at the hearing in chambers or at a subsequent hearing in chambers scheduled for such purpose, shall accept evidence on the issue of whether such condition of fact is fulfilled and shall determine such issue." On its face, this language would appear to authorize a trial judge to exclude evidence of past sexual conduct between an alleged victim and an accused or a defendant in a civil case based upon the judge's belief that such past acts did not occur. Such an authorization raises questions of invasion of the right to a jury trial under the Sixth and Seventh Amendments. See 1 S. Saltzburg & M. Martin, Federal Rules Of Evidence Manual, 396-97 (5th ed.

1990).

The Advisory Committee concluded that the amended rule provided adequate protection for all persons claiming to be the victims of sexual misconduct, and that it was inadvisable to continue to include a provision in the rule that has been confusing and that raises substantial constitutional issues.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
Supp. To CHAPTER 412 RULE 412

2-412 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Scope

Scope

The chart below shows the proposed style amendments for Rule 412, with the current version of the rule in the left column and the proposed new version of the rule in the right column. The style amendments are designed to make the Evidence Rules more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. The changes are intended to be stylistic only, and there is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility. At press time (December 2010), it is anticipated that the style amendments will take effect on December 1, 2011.

Rule 412. Sex Offense Cases; Relevance of Alleged Victim's Past Sexual Be-	Rule 412. Sex-Offense Cases: The Victim's Sexual Behavior or Predisposition

havior or Alleged Sexual Predisposition

(a) Evidence Generally Inadmissible. The following evidence is not admissible in any civil or criminal proceeding involving alleged sexual

(a) Prohibited Uses. The following evidence is not admissible in a civil or criminal proceeding involving alleged sexual misconduct:

misconduct except as provided in subdivisions (b) and (c):

(1)	Evidence offered to prove that any alleged victim engaged in other sexual behavior.	(1)	evidence offered to prove that a victim engaged in other sexual behavior; or
(2)	Evidence offered to prove any alleged vic-	(2)	evidence offered to prove a victim's sexual predisposition.

tim's sexual predisposition.

(b) Exceptions.

(b) Exceptions.

(1) In a criminal case, the following evidence is admissible, if otherwise admissible under these rules:

(1) Criminal Cases. The court may admit the following evidence in a criminal case:

(A) evidence of specific instances of sexu

(A) evidence of specific instances of a vic-

	al behavior by the alleged victim offered to prove that a person other than the accused was the source of semen, injury or other physical evidence;		tim's sexual behavior, if offered to prove that someone other than the defendant was the source of semen, injury, or other physical evidence;
(B)	evidence of specific instances	(B)	evidence of specific instances of sexual behavior by the alleged victim with respect to the person accused of the sexual misconduct offered by the accused to prove consent or by the prosecution; and of a victim's sexual behavior with respect to the person accused of the sexual misconduct, if offered by the defendant to prove consent or if offered by the prosecutor; and

(C) evidence the

(C) evidence who exclusion of which would violate the constitutional rights of the defendant.

(2) In a civil case, evidence offered to prove the sexual behavior or sexual predisposition of any alleged victim

(2) Civil Cases. In a civil case, the court may admit evidence offered to prove a victim's sexual behavior or sexu se exclusion would violate the defendant's constitutional rights.

is admissible if it is otherwise admissible under these rules and its probative value substantially outweighs the danger of harm to any victim and of unfair prejudice to any party.

al prejudicial disposition if its probative value substantially outweighs the danger of harm to any victim and of unfair prejudice to any party. The court may admit evidence of a victim's reputa-

		Evidence of an alleged victim's reputation is admissible only if it has been placed in controversy by the alleged victim.			tion only if the victim has placed it in controversy.
(c)	Procedure To Determine Admissibility.	(c)	Procedure to Determine Admissibility.
	(1)	A party intending	(1)	Motion. If a party into offer evidence under subdivision (b) must -- tends to offer evidence under Rule 412(b), the party must:

(A) file a written motion at least 14 days before trial specifically describing the evidence and stating the purpose for which it is offered under

(A) file a motion that specifically describes the evidence and states the purpose for which it is to be offered;

less the court, for good cause requires a different time for filing or permits filing during trial; and

(B) do so at least 14 days before trial unless the court, for good cause, sets a different time;

(B) serve the motion on all parties and notify the alleged victim or, when appropriate, the alleged victim's guardian or representative.

(C) serve the motion on all parties; and

(D) notify the victim or, when appropriate, the victim's guardian or representative.

(2) Before admitting evidence under this rule the court must conduct a hearing in camera and afford the victim and parties a right to attend and be hear

(2) Hearing. Before admitting evidence under this rule, the court must conduct an in camera hearing and give the victim and parties a right to attend and be hear

d. The motion, related papers, and the record of the hearing must be sealed and remain under seal unless the court orders otherwise.

d. Unless the court orders otherwise, the motion, related materials, and the record of the hearing must be and remain sealed.

(d) Definition of "Victim." " In this rule, "victim" includ es

an allege
d victim.

Committee Note

The language of Rule 412 has been amended as part of the restyling of the Evidence Rules to make them more easily understood and to make style and terminology consistent throughout the rules. These changes are intended to be stylistic only. There is no intent to change any result in any ruling on evidence admissibility.

Federal Rules of Evidence Manual

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

PART TWO: THE RULES THEMSELVES
Article IV. Relevancy and its Limits
Supp. To CHAPTER 412 RULE 412

2-412 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual Supp. to § 412.03

Supp. to § 412.03 Annotated Cases

[Go To Main]

[2] Constitutionally Required Evidence [Go To Main]

United States v. Hitt, 473 F.3d 146 (5th Cir. 2006) : In a Mann Act prosecution for sexual abuse of a teenage boy, the defendants argued that they were constitutionally entitled to cross-examine the victim regarding sexual abuse that had been perpetrated on him by another man. The evidence was offered to impeach the victim by pointing out inconsistencies in his statements regarding the type of abuse the defendants perpetrated and to impeach his testimony that he did not come forward sooner because he feared reporting the abuse. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion when the cross-examination was precluded, as some of the assumptions of the intended cross-examination were factually inaccurate, the evidence was only marginally probative on the victim's credibility, its reception would have required time-consuming and confusing inquiries, and it would have been prejudicial toward the victim. The Court found that the defendants had ample opportunity to impeach the witness through cross-examination regarding inconsistencies in his statements and his motives to lie.

United States v. Elbert, 561 F.3d 771 (8th Cir. 2009) : The Court affirmed a conviction for sex trafficking of a child, finding no error in the exclusion of evidence that the victims had engaged in prostitution before and after the charged offense. Exclusion of the evidence did not implicate the defendant's Fifth Amendment right to present a defense, as it would not have provided a defense to charges that did not require proof of fraud, force, or coercion but only proof that the defendant knew the minor would be caused to engage in commercial sex acts. Furthermore, the defendant's Sixth Amendment right to confrontation was not implicated, as the evidence was not probative on the crimes charged or on the victims' credibility and would, in any event, have prejudicial effect substantially outweighing any probative value.

United States v. Culver, 598 F.3d 740 (11th Cir. 2010) : The Court affirmed a conviction for producing child pornography, finding no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence regarding the victim's sexual history, which the defendant argued would rebut prosecution evidence that he was responsible for condoms and a broken abstinence card found in the victim's room. Whether the defendant was the source of the items was not relevant, since the key issue in the case was the identity of the female portrayed, and admission of the evidence would have confused the jury and harassed the victim. Furthermore, the defendant was permitted to cross-examine the victim on every issue concerning her sexual history that was potentially relevant to the charged conduct (e.g., when and why she shaved her pubic region, where the female portrayed had a shaved pubic region). In United States v. Sarras, 575 F.3d 1191 (11th Cir. 2009) , the Court affirmed a defendant's conviction for inducing his minor step-daughter to engage in sexually explicit conduct for the purpose of producing photos of the conduct. It found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of evidence of the step-daughter's post-abuse sexual relationship with her boyfriend. Her testimony that she was traumatized by the defendant's sexual abuse did not open the door to questions about her sexual history, since "victims of sexual abuse can be traumatized whether or not they have had other sexual relations" and the victim's relationship with her boyfriend was irrelevant because "[t]he only issue is the identity of the male in the photos." The defendant had been permitted a constitutionally adequate opportunity to explore the step-daughter's possible motives for framing him.

[5] Notice [Go To Main]

United States v. Seymour, 468 F.3d 378 (6th Cir. 2006) : The defendant was convicted for sexual abuse of his sister-in-law and his niece. Affirming, the Court found no abuse of discretion in the exclusion of testimony by the defendant's friend that he had seen the adult victim and the defendant hugging and kissing two years after the alleged sexual assault. The testimony was not admissible to prove consent under Rule 412(b)(2), since the defendant failed to give 14 days pretrial notice of his intent to rely upon such evidence.

[6] Prior Accusations by the Victim [Go To Main]

