Release 91 May 2011

HIGHLIGHTS

Recent Rule Amendments. The publication has been updated to include important amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and Appellate Procedure (effective 12/1/10). The publication has also been updated to cover extensive amendments to the Multidistrict Litigation Rules (effective 10/4/10).

Recent Case Law Developments. The publication has been updated with recent case law developments.

FEDERAL RULES AMENDMENTS

Civil Rule 8(c)(1). Under amended Rule 8(c)(1), discharge in bankruptcy is no longer an enumerated affirmative defense that must be included in a responsive pleading (see § 11.50[1]).

Civil Rule 26(a)(2)(B). Rule 26(a)(2)(B) is amended to specify that expert disclosure is only required regarding "facts or data" considered by the expert witness, instead of "data or other information" under the previous version of the Rule (see Ch. 15, Discovery).

Civil Rule 26(a)(2)(C). For those expert witnesses who do not need to provide an expert report, the party (not the expert witness) must disclose the subject matter of the expected expert testimony and a summary of the expected facts and opinions (see Ch. 15, Discovery).

Civil Rules 26(b)(4)(B) & (C). The work-product protections of Rule 26(b)(3)(A) & (B) are expanded to limit discovery of drafts of expert disclosure statements or reports and, with three exceptions, of communications between expert witnesses and counsel regardless of form (oral, written, electronic, or otherwise). The exceptions are for those parts of the attorney-expert communications regarding compensation, identifying facts or data considered by the expert in forming the opinions, and identifying assumptions relied on by the expert in forming the opinions (see Ch. 15, Discovery).

Civil Rule 56. Rule 56 is revised to improve the procedures for presenting and deciding summary judgment motions, and to make the procedures more consistent with those already used in many courts. The procedural changes do not affect the standard for granting summary judgment. Subsections of the Rule have been renumbered, and new sections have been added for clarification purposes (see Ch. 17, Summary Judgment, completely revised).

Appellate Rule 29. The appellate rule on amicus briefs contains new disclosure requirements concerning authorship and funding (see Ch. 28, Appeal to Court of Appeals).

Multidistrict Rules. The Multidistrict Rules have been reorganized and revised extensively (see Ch. 2, Concurrent and Conflicting Jurisdiction).

RECENT CASE LAW DEVELOPMENTS

The publication has been updated with recent case law developments, including Philip Morris USA Inc. v. Scott, ___ U.S. ___, 131 S. Ct. 1, 177 L. Ed. 2d 1040, 1042 (2010) where the Supreme Court provided guidance as to when it will stay execution of a lower court judgment, such as an appellate mandate (see Ch. 29, Appeal to Supreme Court), and Ortiz v. Jordan, ___ U.S. ___, 131 S. Ct. 884, 178 L. Ed. 2d 703, 709 (2011) where the Court resolved a circuit split on the issue of whether the denial of a summary judgment motion is reviewable after a full trial on the merits (see Ch. 17, Summary Judgment).

PART I Judicial Powers; Law Applied; Evidence
CHAPTER 1 FEDERAL COURTS
PART I. COMPOSITION AND ORGANIZATION OF FEDERAL JUDICIAL SYSTEM

1-1 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 1.01

§ 1.01 Limited Jurisdiction of Federal Courtsn*

A federal court may not hear or review the decision in a case unless the court has subject matter jurisdiction. Unlike state courts, n1 federal courts are courts of limited jurisdiction. n2 This means that a federal court may exercise judicial power only to the extent permitted by the Constitution--and, therefore, to the extent specified by Congress. n3 For example, a federal court may not adjudicate a matter that does not qualify as an actual "case or controversy" (as opposed to a hypothetical situation) under Article III of the Constitution. n4 Also, under Article III of the Constitution, Congress has created the federal district courts and granted them exclusive jurisdiction in matters involving admiralty, bankruptcy, patents, copyrights and trademarks, n5 and concurrent jurisdiction with the state courts in federal question and diversity of citizenship cases. n6

Outside of their limited jurisdiction as specified by the Constitution and Congress, the federal courts do not have authority to consider matters, even if the parties concede federal jurisdiction or do not consider the jurisdiction issue. n7 Furthermore, Rule 82 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure is intended to make clear that the federal rules may not in any way affect the federal courts' subject matter jurisdiction. n8 Rather, the exclusive purpose of the federal rules is to govern the fair and efficient administration of justice in the federal courts. n9

As a result of the limited jurisdiction of federal courts and the existence of concurrent state-court jurisdiction over most federal claims, it frequently occurs that a parallel proceeding is pending in another forum and that resolution of the controversy in that forum will moot the issues presented in the federal action. n9.1 This may be true whether the parallel forum is a state court lawsuit, n10 or an administrative proceeding. n11 The relationship between the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal courts and the concurrent jurisdiction of both the federal and the state courts creates many overlaps of legal rights and remedies and also conflicts between the jurisdiction of federal and state courts. These issues are discussed in Ch. 2, Concurrent and Conflicting Jurisdiction.

CHAPTER 1 FEDERAL COURTS
PART I. COMPOSITION AND ORGANIZATION OF FEDERAL JUDICIAL SYSTEM

§ 1.02 Source of Authority of Federal Courtsn*

Article III of the United States Constitution establishes a single Supreme Court of the United States and authorizes, but does not require, Congress to create inferior federal courts. n1 Only Congress may create lower federal courts, and only Congress may precisely specify the subject matter jurisdiction of any of the courts it creates. n1.1 Congress has exercised this express constitutional authority by creating a structure of trial courts referred to as "District Courts," n2 and intermediate courts of appeals known as "United States Circuit Courts of Appeal." n3 These courts are collectively referred to as "Article III" courts, or "constitutional courts." n4 Thus, "constitutional courts" (or "Article III courts") are those that have been created under the provision of the Constitution specifically providing for the creation of courts, including the Supreme Court and the district courts and court of appeals established by Congress. Separate and apart from these Article III or constitutional courts, Congress has also created limited purpose or specialty courts under congress's general legislative powers under Article I of the Constitution, n5 such as, the court known as the United States Tax Court. n5.1 These courts are collectively referred to as "Article I courts" or "legislative courts," because they are not established by the court creation article of the Constitution but under the legislative enabling article of the Constitution. n6

PART I Judicial Powers; Law Applied; Evidence
CHAPTER 1 FEDERAL COURTS
PART I. COMPOSITION AND ORGANIZATION OF FEDERAL JUDICIAL SYSTEM

1-1 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 1.03

§ 1.03 Jurisdictional Authority of Federal Courtsn*

[1] Constitutional Courts

Although the federal Constitution is the underlying basis for the judicial power of all federal courts, n1 the expression "constitutional court" is a term of art generally used to describe any court created under the express provisions of Article III of the Constitution, including the Supreme Court and the district courts and appellate courts created by Congress. n2 Thus, the primary current Article III courts include the United States Supreme Court n3 and the following courts created by Congress:

1. The trial courts referred to as "District Courts." n4

2. The trial court known as the "Court of International Trade." n5

3. The intermediate courts of appeals n6 known as the United States Courts of Appeals for the circuit in which the court sits. n7

Because Congress has created these lower constitutional courts, it may impose jurisdictional prerequisites on particular types of relief in the courts. n8 Congress also has the power to establish specific procedures that a party must follow in order to obtain judicial relief. In this regard, the fact that Congress requires parties to proceed in a particular manner does not violate due process. However, those procedures must not be so oppressive or inadequate as to deprive a party of a meaningful judicial remedy, especially when state courts are unavailable. n9

[2] Legislative Courts

The Constitution makes no reference to "legislative courts," but the term gets its significance from judicial decisions n0.1 that make the distinction between constitutional courts, n1 in which the judicial power conferred by the Constitution is placed, and legislative courts, which are created to carry out the legislative functions of Congress. n2 Congress has used these legislative powers to create territorial courts, and certain other special tribunals to perform essential or helpful functions of government, although many legislative courts no longer exist, such as the Court of Private Land Claims and the Consular Courts. Current legislative courts, according to classification by statute or by the Supreme Court, include the following:

1. United States Tax Court. n3

2. United States Court of Federal Claims. n4

3. Superior Court of the District of Columbia, n5 and the District of Columbia Court of Appeals, n6 which is not to be confused with the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit.

4. Territorial Courts. n7

[3] Significance of Status of Court as Either Constitutional or Legislative

The most important difference between Article III courts (constitutional courts) and Article I courts (legislative courts) is that the judicial power of the United States is vested in the former. n.01 Thus, the judges have life tenure and their compensation is guaranteed, and they are insulated from legislative or executive pressures and their independence is protected. n.02 Legislative courts, on the other hand, such as military courts and regulatory agency tribunals do not share these attributes of independence, and are under legislative control. For this reason, it has been held that legislative courts may not be entrusted with parties' Seventh Amendment rights to a jury trial, and therefore when a case or controversy gives rise to a Seventh Amendment right to a jury trial, Congress may not give jurisdiction to a legislative court. n1 In addition, a territorial District Court judge does not qualify as a United States District Court judge and is not entitled to sit by assignment on the United States Circuit Court of Appeals under the statute that authorizes the circuit court to assign one or more district judges within a circuit to sit on the court of appeals "whenever the business of [the circuit court] so requires." n1.1

Another important significance of the Article III court is that separation-of-powers concerns require that an Article III court be given jurisdiction to inquire de novo into certain factual findings in order to ensure that the Constitution has not been violated. The findings that fall within this category are described as "constitutional facts," which are issues that if resolved one way would render the rulings constitutional, and if resolved another way would render them unconstitutional. n2

The distinction between constitutional courts and legislative courts also arises regarding the adjudication of public versus and private rights. "Public rights" are those arising between the government and persons subject to its authority in connection with the performance of the constitutional functions of the executive or legislative departments. n3 The adjudication of a public right is not "inherently judicial"; therefore, public rights may be adjudicated by an Article III court, if Congress so specifies, but need not be. n3.1"Inherently judicial" cases, on the other hand, are disputes between private parties over private rights. These cases lie at the core of the historically recognized judicial power, and must, therefore, be heard by an Article III court. n4

A final distinction, which has lost some of its historical significance, is that although the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure are applicable to all proceedings adjudicated by Article III district courts, they are not necessarily applicable to all legislative court proceedings. n5

PART I. COMPOSITION AND ORGANIZATION OF FEDERAL JUDICIAL SYSTEM

1-1 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 1.04

§ 1.04 Levels of Federal Courtsn*

[1] District Courts

[a] District Court System

The primary Article III federal trial courts are the federal district courts, which sit in all the states, the District of Columbia, and Puerto Rico. n1 Congress has over time created new federal district courts to accommodate the increasing population, and currently the United States has 94 federal districts. n2 Some large states have more than one federal district court, n3 while many states have only one federal judicial district. n4 Additionally, some federal districts have been subdivided into more than one "division" within the single district. n5

[b] Subject Matter Jurisdiction of District Court

The district courts have three basic types of subject matter jurisdiction, the court's statutory or constitutional power to adjudicate the case: n6

First, the district courts have original "federal question" jurisdiction, which is jurisdiction over actions arising under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States. n7 General federal question jurisdiction is not exclusive; state courts also have jurisdiction to hear these types of actions regarding federal issues. n8 In addition to the general grant of federal question jurisdiction, particular federal statutes expressly provide that district courts have original jurisdiction over any claims involving or "arising under" those statutes. n9 One example of this statutory form of federal question jurisdiction is the district court's jurisdiction over bankruptcy cases. n10

Statutory federal question jurisdiction may be exclusive in the federal district court, or may be concurrent with state courts, depending on the intent of Congress based on the language used in the particular statute in question. n11 For example, district court jurisdiction over cases arising under the Bankruptcy Code is exclusively in the federal district courts; state courts may not hear such cases. n12 Another example of exclusive federal court jurisdiction is for any claim under the Federal Tort Claims Act. n13 On the other hand, for example, state courts have concurrent original jurisdiction with the federal courts over claims based on antidiscrimination statutes such as the Age Discrimination in Employment Act (ADEA). n14 The Supreme Court has held that there is a presumption of concurrent jurisdiction for federal question cases that is so strong that the presumption is defeated only in two narrowly defined circumstances: first, when Congress expressly ousts state courts of jurisdiction, and second, when a state court refuses jurisdiction because of a neutral state rule regarding the administration of the courts. n15

Second, the district courts have original "diversity jurisdiction" which is the district court's jurisdiction over certain civil actions that do not arise under federal law but that involve citizens of different states or citizens of the United States and aliens or foreign subjects. The district court has jurisdiction over any civil action in which the amount in controversy exceeds $75,000 and the action is between (a) citizens of different states; (b) citizens of a state and citizens or subjects of a foreign state; (c) citizens of different states, with foreign citizens or subjects as additional parties; or (d) a foreign state as plaintiff and citizens of a state or of different states as defendants. n16 Parties invoking the district court's diversity jurisdiction must be "completely diverse," which means that none of the defendants may be a citizen of the same state as any of the plaintiffs. If one plaintiff and one defendant are citizens of the same state (even a state other than the one in which the lawsuit is initiated), there is incomplete diversity and the federal court lacks jurisdiction. n17 However, federal district courts will not adjudicate several types of state-based claims, even though the opposing parties are from different states and technically are able to satisfy the standards for valid federal diversity jurisdiction. These judicially created exceptions are neither constitutionally nor statutorily mandated but are based on the policy consideration that certain areas of the law are exclusively within the purview of state control. Thus, the U.S. Supreme Court has stated that diversity jurisdiction is not available for suits seeking the issuance or modification of domestic relations decrees, such as divorce, alimony, or child custody, n18 and also that probate cases are outside the scope of federal diversity jurisdiction. n19

Third, a federal district court that has original jurisdiction over a civil action under federal diversity jurisdiction also may exercise "supplemental jurisdiction" of all other claims that are a part of the same case or controversy under Article III of the Constitution, including claims that involve the joinder or intervention of additional parties. n20 However, a district court's exercise of supplemental jurisdiction is discretionary, and the court may decline to exercise supplemental jurisdiction, for example, if the state-law claim raises a novel or complex issue of state law. n21

[c] Three-Judge District Court

While a district court ordinarily consists of a single judge sitting as a district judge, in certain cases, a statute requires that a district court be composed of three judges, one of whom must be a circuit judge. n22 A three-judge district court is required in cases challenging the constitutionality of state or federal legislative apportionment and in cases in which the convening of a three-judge court is otherwise authorized by congressional act. n23 Most of the statutes currently applicable involve some aspect of civil rights. Several of these statutes authorizing the convening of a three-judge court expressly require that a request must be filed before the court may be convened. Three-judge courts authorized under the Civil Rights Act of 1964, in the areas of public accommodations n24 and equal employment n25 are available only on request of the Attorney General. Another area of law providing for the use of three judge district courts is the law of elections, such as the Voting Rights Act of 1965. n26 These three-judge district court provisions are designed to protect important voting rights of the people. n27 When a request for a three-judge court is presented to the district judge, he or she must determine whether the case is one requiring the convening of such a court under the relevant statutory provisions. When the judge determines that a three-judge court is required, the judge must notify the chief judge of the circuit, who must then designate two additional judges; at least one must be a circuit judge. The two designees plus the district judge to whom the request was made make up the three-judge court. n28 Failure to appoint to the three-judge court the judge to whom the request was originally made has been held not to constitute a jurisdictional defect. n29

The Presidential Election Campaign Fund Act of 1971 contains two provisions authorizing the use of a specially constituted three-judge court. The first provision empowers the Federal Election Commission to institute actions for declaratory or injunctive relief concerning any civil matter covered by provisions of the Act which permit a taxpayer to designate a payment to the Presidential Election Campaign Fund. n30 Such actions are required to be heard by a three-judge court only on application of the Commission. The second provision calls for a specially constituted three-judge court to hear actions brought to implement or construe any provision of the Act. n31

Appeals from a three-judge court must be taken directly to the Supreme Court when the three-judge court makes an order granting or denying an injunction in a proceeding within its exclusive jurisdiction. n32 In addition, appeals from final judgments lie to the Supreme Court in three-judge proceedings authorized by the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the Voting Rights Act of 1965, and the Presidential Election Campaign Fund Act of 1971. n33

If the trial court has refused to convene a three-judge court, or a three-judge court is dissolved after it has been convened, review must be taken to the appropriate court of appeals and not to the Supreme Court. n34 If, under these circumstances, an appeal has been taken to the Supreme Court and the time has lapsed within which to file an appeal in the appropriate court of appeals, the Supreme Court may vacate the trial court judgment so that a timely appeal from the new judgment may be taken to the proper court. n35

[2] Courts of Appeal

[a] Appellate Court System

The intermediate level Article III federal appellate courts are the "United States Circuit Courts of Appeal." n1 There are currently thirteen circuits: the First through Eleventh Circuits, the District of Columbia Circuit, and the Federal Circuit. Decisions of the district, bankruptcy, and territorial courts are appealed to the court of appeals for the circuit embracing the district in which the judgment is entered. n2 The Federal Circuit was created to provide uniformity throughout the country and to develop technical expertise in the interpretation and application of patent laws and other intellectual property fields. n3

[b] Subject Matter Jurisdiction of Appellate Court System

[i] Appellate Jurisdiction of Circuit Courts

The jurisdiction of the circuit courts of appeal is limited to review of trial court decisions, primarily the decisions of the district courts within the circuit. A circuit court may review a decision or order of a trial court by only two methods: either when a statute or rule provides for a direct appeal, n4 or by extraordinary writ, when no statute or rule provides for direct appeal. n5 Because an extraordinary writ requires the existence of exceptional circumstances, n6 the most common method of review is by direct appeal. n7

For further discussion of the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of appeal, see Ch. 28, Appeal to Court of Appeals.

[ii] Jurisdiction of Federal Circuit Court

The Federal Circuit was created to provide uniformity throughout the United States and to develop technical expertise in the interpretation and application of intellectual property laws, including patent, trademark, and copyright; consequently, it has exclusive jurisdiction over specific categories of cases as set forth in the Judiciary Act. n8 For example, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit reviews decisions of the Court of International Trade n9 in the same manner as the Fourth Circuit would review a district court decision located in that circuit. n10 The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit has jurisdiction over any appeal from a final decision of any district court if the jurisdiction of that court was based in whole or in part on federal patent law, except in a case involving a claim arising under any act of Congress relating to copyrights or trademarks. n11 The Federal Circuit holds that the decisions of its predecessor courts, the United States Court of Claims and the United States Court of Customs and Patent Appeals, are binding precedent. n12

[iii] Jurisdiction of Distict of Columbia Circuit Court

The District of Columbia Circuit may hear appeals from the District Court of the District of Columbia and may also review federal agency decisions in addition to whichever circuit court has personal and subject matter jurisdiction over the matter. n13 It also has exclusive jurisdiction by statute in some areas. For example, one statute confers on the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit exclusive jurisdiction to review licensing decisions of the Federal Communications Commission. n14 When the District of Columbia Circuit Court has statutory, exclusive jurisdiction to hear a particular kind of proceeding, no other circuit court or district court may hear such a proceeding. n15 On the other hand, some statutes provide that the District of Columbia Circuit has jurisdiction over a specified type of proceeding that is concurrent with other circuit courts, such as the statute providing for review of Federal Aviation Administration orders. In such cases the appellant has the option to take the case to the District of Columbia Circuit or to the circuit in which the person resides or has its principal place of business. n16

For further discussion of the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of appeal, see Ch. 28, Appeal to Court of Appeals.

[3] United States Supreme Court

Article III of the United States Constitution provides that the United States Supreme Court both original and appellate jurisdiction. The Supreme Court has original, nonexclusive jurisdiction in cases in which one or both of the parties are states. n1 Original jurisdiction is the power of a court to hear and decide a claim for relief and any defenses before any other court has heard the claim. On the other hand, appellate jurisdiction means the authority of a court to review a decision on a claim previously made by another court. n2 Thus, original jurisdiction is that exercised by a court acting as a "trial court," n3 and appellate jurisdiction is that exercised by a court acting as a "court of appeals." n4 In the exercise of its original jurisdiction, the Supreme Court is not subject to the control of Congress, and it may proceed as it determines appropriate, for example, through the use of a special master appointed by the court. n5

The United States Supreme Court generally has appellate jurisdiction over all cases subject to federal judicial power. n6 However, Congress may regulate and make exceptions to the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction. n7 In this regard, Congress has provided for the exercise of most of the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction by means of writ of "certiorari." n8 Certiorari jurisdiction is discretionary with the Court, and an appeal will not be heard unless at least four justices vote to grant a writ of certiorari. n9

For further discussion of the original and appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, see Ch. 29, Appeal to Supreme Court.

[4] Other Courts

The Court of Federal Claims is mainly a trial level court for the trial of monetary claims (including tax refund claims) against the United States. n1 However, its jurisdiction over these claims is not exclusive, and, therefore, claims against the United States need not be brought in the Court of Federal Claims. n2 Furthermore, if a person has filed a claim in another court, the Court of Federal Claims is prohibited from exercising jurisdiction if the claim is based on substantially the same operative facts as the claim filed in the Court of Federal Claims, even if the two claims are based on different legal theories. n3

As with other federal courts, the Court of International Trade is a court of limited jurisdiction, and must initially determine whether the claim brought before it is within that jurisdiction specified by statute. For example, the court has jurisdiction over civil actions that arise out of import transactions. n4 Outside of the Court of International Trade's original jurisdiction, the district courts have exclusive original jurisdiction over actions or proceedings to recover or enforce any fine, penalty, or forfeiture incurred under any federal statute. n5 Because the Court of International Trade has jurisdiction that is limited to its special subject matter, it must obey the decisions of the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit and the Supreme Court but does not owe obedience to the decisions of the district courts or the geographic regional circuit courts of appeal. n6

The United States Tax Court, formerly an independent agency in the Executive Branch, has been designated by Congress as a court of record. The Tax Court is an example of a "legislative" or "Article I" court, n7 based on the Supreme Court's analysis of the tax court's functions to define its constitutional status and its role in the constitutional scheme. Thus, the Court noted that the Tax Court's decisions are not subject to review by either Congress or the President. The Tax Court exercises its judicial power in much the same way as the federal district courts and its function and role in the federal judicial scheme closely resemble those of the federal district courts. Also, Congress has not made Tax Court decisions subject to review in the federal district courts. Rather, like the judgments of the district courts, the decisions of the Tax Court are appealable only to the regional United States courts of appeals, n8 with ultimate review in the Supreme Court. Furthermore, the courts of appeals review those decisions in the same manner and to the same extent as decisions of the district courts in civil actions tried without a jury. n9

Other legislative courts include the territorial courts. There are territorial courts for Guam n10 and the Virgin Islands. n11 In Puerto Rico, in addition to the United States District Court for Puerto Rico, n12 there are local territorial courts that are analogous to state courts. n13

PART II. USE OF RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE IN FEDERAL COURT

1-1 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 1.20

§ 1.20 Promulgation of Federal Rules of Civil Proceduren*

[1] Power of Congress to Promulgate Procedural Rules

Congress has the power to make procedural rules for the lower federal courts, n1 based on two constitutional provisions: the first authorizes Congress to establish federal courts inferior to the U.S. Supreme Court, n2 and the second authorizes Congress to make all laws necessary and proper to establish those courts. n3 Furthermore, even though federal courts are required to follow state substantive law in diversity actions, federal courts must apply federal procedural law in all cases, both in diversity cases and in federal question cases. n4

Despite the Rules Enabling Act, Congress has retained the power to adopt procedural rules directly and has on occasion enacted rules of procedure or rules of evidence directly. For example, Congress made direct changes to the Federal Rules of Evidence. n5 However, in the usual course of rulemaking the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure are issued by the Supreme Court under rulemaking powers delegated by Congress, and proposed rules may be rejected by Congress; they are not generally affirmatively adopted by the legislature, as all statutes must be. n6

[2] Delegation of Rulemaking by Congress to Supreme Court

Pursuant to its constitutional authority, Congress has delegated its rulemaking power to the Supreme Court to make rules to specify the procedures that must be used in the federal courts n1 and has stated that all laws in conflict with the rules specified by the Supreme Court are of no force or effect. n2 This delegation has been challenged as a violation of the constitutional principle of separation of powers, but the Supreme Court has rejected this argument on the reasoning that Congress has the power to obtain assistance from the other governmental branches to adopt specific systems to implement the federal law. The Supreme Court has upheld this delegation because Congress has provided a safeguard that Congress approve any rules adopted prior to when they take effect. n3

The process specifies that the Supreme court transmit to the Congress the court's proposed rules, which take effect unless rejected by Congress. n4 However, any proposed rules affecting evidentiary privileges must be affirmatively approved by Congress. n5 The delegation provides that the rules must govern practice and procedure in the lower federal courts, n6 but expressly prohibits the rules from abridging, enlarging, or modifying substantive rights. n7

[3] Supreme Court Adoption of Rules With Approval by Congress

The Supreme Court has exercised its statutory rulemaking authority by adopting the "Federal Rules of Civil Procedure." Thus, the Supreme Court has promulgated a comprehensive civil procedure code that governs the entire litigation process. n1 The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure specify the practice and procedure to be followed from commencement of an action through entry of temporary and final remedies to initiation of appeals. Since its enactment by Congress, the Rules Enabling Act has been amended in various details, but the authority of the Supreme Court to prescribe rules of practice, procedure, and evidence for the lower federal courts remains in effect. n2

Congress has retained power to review any proposed uniform federal rules of practice and procedure, n3 and this power is essential to maintaining the constitutional system of checks and balances among the branches of government. Under the adoption process, the Supreme Court must transmit a proposed rule of practice and procedure to Congress by May 1 of the year in which the rule is to take effect. Congress may object to the proposed rule and may pass legislation to suspend its operation or to alter it. Unless Congress prescribes a different date, the proposed rule takes effect no earlier than December 1 of the year of its transmission to Congress. n4 In effect, if a proposed rule of practice and procedure is transmitted in compliance with the statute, affirmative action by Congress is not required for the rule to go into force, n5 with the exception of any rule that creates, abolishes, or modifies an evidentiary privilege. n6 In practice, Congress has only rarely exercised its power to amend a proposed rule of practice and procedure or to suspend its operation.

Pursuant to its rulemaking authority, Congress has officially placed the responsibility for reviewing, developing, and proposing federal court rules on the Judicial Conference, n7 which consists of the Chief Justice, the Chief Judge of each Circuit, the Chief Judge of the Court of International Trade, and one district judge from each judicial circuit. The Conference has the continuing responsibility of studying and analyzing the operation and effect of the procedural rules prescribed by the Supreme Court for the other federal courts. The Conference also has the duty to recommend to the Supreme Court changes in and additions to the procedural rules that the Conference determines will promote simplicity in procedure, fairness in administration, the just determination of litigation, and the elimination of unjustifiable expense and delay. n8 The Supreme Court will then consider such recommendations for their adoption, modification, or rejection. n9 To assist it in its task of evaluating and proposing procedural rules for adoption, the conference has discretion to appoint additional committees. n

[4] Validity and Effect of Federal Rules of Civil Procedure

Any rules promulgated by the Supreme Court are presumed to be valid. n1 The rationale behind this presumption is that the Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure studies and reports on each proposed rule change, and the Judicial Conference and the Supreme Court approve each rule before its adoption. Furthermore, a rule is submitted to Congress before it becomes effective to ensure that the rule does not violate legislative policies. Otherwise, Congress would presumably legislate against it. The fact that Congress takes no adverse action indicates that Congress has found no violation of its current policies. n2

Rules that are adopted by the Supreme Court, and not rejected by Congress, n3 have the full effect of statutes, and, therefore, courts interpret the rules using principles of statutory construction. n4 Another result of the adoption of a rule is that all laws in conflict with the rule no longer have any force or effect. n5 Conversely, if Congress adopts a statute that is inconsistent with an existing rule after the effective date of the rule the statute takes precedence and has the effect of superseding or modifying the conflicting rule, provided that the congressional intent is clear. If the intent to supersede the prior rule is not clear, the courts must attempt to construe the statute as compatible with the rule to the extent possible. n6

[5] Adopted Rules Construed As Statute

Once a rule has been promulgated by the Supreme Court and adopted by Congress, the rule has the force of a statute, n1 and it must be construed by application of the same principles as those used in interpreting statutes. n2 Therefore, the courts apply the following standards of construction:

1. Each of the rules must be construed as a whole, n3 and must be considered in relation to each other rule with a similar subject. n4

2. A rule must be given its plain meaning, n5 and the text must be interpreted as it is written, without adding text to improve its meaning. n6

3. If the plain meaning of the words is clear, that meaning is conclusive. n7

4. If the words are unclear or ambiguous, the court may determine its meaning by analysis of the prior case decisions, n8 legislative history, n9 and committee notes. n10

[6] Lower Courts Retain Power to Promulgate Local Rules

Although the Supreme Court has inherent supervisory powers and primary responsibility for ensuring that federal court rules are consistent with the principles of justice, n1 the lower courts have historically had the inherent power to make their own local rules. n2 Federal law now expressly authorizes the district courts to adopt rules to govern their own particular procedures, provided the local rules are consistent with the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and federal statutes. n3 This requirement of consistency for local rules allows overall uniformity to be maintained in the federal court procedural system, while at the same time permitting local district courts the option to control procedures not governed by the national rules and to address local issues not suitable to be dealt with on a national level. n4 For a further discussion of local rulemaking authority and resolution of conflicts between local and federal rules and laws, see § 1.23.

PART I Judicial Powers; Law Applied; Evidence
CHAPTER 1 FEDERAL COURTS
PART II. USE OF RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE IN FEDERAL COURT

1-1 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 1.21

§ 1.21 Purposes of Federal Rules of Civil Proceduren*

[1] Just and Expeditious Determination of Litigation

The primary purposes of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, and the fundamental policy that the district courts must follow in applying any of the federal rules in civil actions, is to provide a just, speedy, and inexpensive determination of the case and to promote a fair and effective trial. n1 For example, the liberal policy of Rule 15 allowing a claimant to file an amended pleading in order to state a claim for relief n2 must be weighed with the underlying purposes of the federal rules as stated in Rule 1. n3

The federal rules reject the approach that pleading is a game of skill in which one misstep by counsel may be decisive to the outcome and accept the principle that the purpose of pleading is to facilitate a proper decision on the merits. n4 Thus, courts routinely grant leave to parties to amend their pleadings under Rule 15(a) to set forth transactions, occurrences, or events that could have been included in the original pleading but were omitted for one reason or another. n5 For another example, the summary judgment procedure under Rule 56 should not be regarded as a disfavored procedural shortcut but rather as an integral part of the federal rules as a whole, designed to secure the just, speedy, and inexpensive determination of every action. n6

[2] Promotion of Uniform Procedures

The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure have been designed to create a uniform system of procedure in the federal district courts. A primary purpose of the civil rules is to establish an independent and uniform system of efficient procedure, applicable in every district court, thus eliminating unnecessary differences in the administration of legal proceedings that result from the use of local practice rules. n1 The courts have adopted the policy goal that attorneys throughout the United States should not be restrained by duplicative, unnecessary, or confusing local rules when practicing before federal courts. n2 For a discussion of local rule issues, see § 1.23.

[3] Preference for Decisions on Merits

Another important purpose of the Federal Rules is to enable a proper decision on the merits of a claim, rather than have the determination made on procedural technicalities. n1 The rules are not intended to set technical traps and pitfalls for unwary parties and attorneys but, rather, to secure speedy and inexpensive justice in a uniform, well-ordered manner. The basic purpose of the federal rules is to administer justice through fair trials, not through summary dismissals, even though that may be necessary on occasion. The rules were designed to avoid some of the old procedural booby traps that common-law pleaders could set to prevent unsophisticated parties from ever having an adjudication on the merits. n2

In this regard, it has been noted that the civil rules are intended to discourage what is commonly referred to as "the sporting theory of justice": the use of the adversarial system as a game of skill in which a single error can be the decisive factor between success and failure. n3 A common example has been the use of surprise or similar tactics by one party, intended to cause the other party to lose merely because of an inability to anticipate and to prepare adequately to counter the opponent's tactics. These tactics may lead to unjust determinations in violation of Rule 1, and, therefore, the courts will construe the civil rules to prevent parties from gaining such an advantage by unfair tactics. n4

The resolution of a claim on the merits promotes the policies stated in Rule 1 by solving a controversy with justice, speed, and less expense, while the refusal to reach a decision because of a procedural technicality often results in injustice and prolongs the controversy. Therefore, courts should liberally construe the civil rules so that they do not foreclose a decision on the merits merely because of a technicality, unless the result would be prejudicial to the other party. n5

However, even though a court may overlook a party's failure to meet every procedural technicality of a rule, the court must nevertheless require substantial compliance. The court must exercise its discretion to ensure that liberal construction of the rules to allow a judgment on the merits does not in fact cause an injustice to a party. n6 Furthermore, ignorance of the rules is not a sufficient defense to failure to comply with them. All attorneys practicing in federal courts are presumed to be familiar with the rules, and the parties are therefore charged with knowledge of the rule requirements. n7 The court may sanction a willful failure by an attorney or party to comply with the civil rules. If a party's noncompliance frustrates the primary goal to ensure a just, speedy, and inexpensive proceeding, the court has discretion to impose sanctions including dismissal with prejudice, an award of court expenses and attorney's fees that resulted from the violation, or both. n8

CHAPTER 1 FEDERAL COURTS
PART II. USE OF RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE IN FEDERAL COURT

1-1 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 1.22

§ 1.22 Applicability of Federal Rules of Civil Proceduren*

[1] Scope of Rules

The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure apply in all suits of a civil nature brought in federal court, whether at law or in equity or in admiralty, with the exceptions stated in Rule 81, n1 and absent a direct expression by Congress of contrary intent. n2 Thus, when read together the clear intent of Rules 1 and 81 is to have the civil rules apply to all "district court" civil proceedings, in the absence of the express exceptions. n3 Courts have also stated that the rules apply in all "civil actions" absent a direct expression of congressional intent to the contrary. n4

[2] District Court Proceedings Subject to Federal Civil Rules

The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure control procedure in United States district courts. n1 The phrase "United States district court" has not been expressly defined for purposes of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure in either the rules themselves or in any statutes. However, the courts have not used a narrow interpretation of this phrase, but rather apply the federal rules expansively to all courts that Congress from time to time designates as district courts. n2 At the least, Rule 1 encompasses within its scope all of the district courts that Congress has created in the various states pursuant to its constitutional powers. n3 This means that the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure are applicable to all proceedings adjudicated by constitutional, "Article III" district courts. n4 The federal rules are applicable to legislative, "Article I" trial courts n5 only when made applicable by Congress, and, therefore, they are not necessarily applicable to all legislative court proceedings. n6

The federal rules do apply to most proceedings in the United States district court for the District of Columbia, even though the rules do not explicitly state that they apply in that court. The Congressional intent that the rules should govern proceedings in the District Court for the District of Columbia is implied when the phrase "United States district courts" used in Rule 1 is read in conjunction with the statute that provides that the District of Columbia is a judicial district, its district court is the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, and the court personnel are district judges. n7 Additionally, the United States District Court for the District of Columbia has consistently applied the Federal Rules to all proceedings in that court. n8

[3] Nature of Civil Actions Which Are Governed by Federal Civil Rules

The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure apply and control procedure in all civil actions and proceedings in the United States District Courts, except as expressly limited by Congress and unless the proceedings are covered by other rules of practice and procedure as stated in Rule 81. n1 The courts have generally held that the rules apply only if a proceeding is adversarial in nature and has been initiated to obtain some remedy under a claim for relief. n2 The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure expressly provide for one form of lawsuit, the "civil action," and have eliminated the previous practice of separating actions at law from proceedings in equity. n3 Thus, a civil action retains its nature regardless of whether it is tried by a jury or by the court, n4 or is referred to a master, n5 or magistrate. n6 The civil rules apply in all federal district court proceedings n7 except for criminal and quasi-criminal actions, n8 and actions that are otherwise specifically designated as beyond the scope of the civil rules, as expressed by Rule 81. n9

Based on these principles, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure are applicable to the following types of actions: proceedings for injunctive relief, n10 actions seeking declaratory judgments, n11 class actions, n12 shareholder derivative actions, n13 suits involving intellectual property such as patents n14 and copyrights, n15 actions related to estate receiverships, n16 property condemnation proceedings, n17 suits by and against a state or the United States government, n18 and suits removed from state court. n19

[4] Limitations on Applicability of Rules to Particular Types of Actions

[a] Civil Rules Contain Explicit Limitations and Exceptions Regarding Applicability

The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure govern the procedure in the United States district courts n1 in all suits of a civil nature n2 except for in the circumstances stated in Rule 81. n3 Most of these exceptions provide for limited or partial application of the civil rules. n4 Only a few of the exceptions make the rules completely inapplicable to particular situations. Thus, for example, the federal rules are completely inapplicable to prize proceedings in admiralty. n5

For a discussion of the limited applicability of the federal rules, see [b] through [h], below.

[b] Admiralty

The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure do not control prize proceedings in admiralty. n6 Prize proceedings involve the forfeiture of property based on violation of United States laws. They are governed by statute and the supplemental admiralty rules, which set forth in detail the procedures to be followed in such actions. Use of the prize statute is extremely rare because it applies only to the seizure of vessels during wartime under the authority of the United States or adopted and ratified by the President. n7

Other than prize proceedings, the Federal Rules control in cases of admiralty and maritime cases, except to the extent that they conflict with the Supplemental Rules for Admiralty and Maritime Claims. In cases involving both admiralty and nonadmiralty, for example, when a seaman is hurt aboard ship, the pleading may designate that the claim is to come within the admiralty or maritime jurisdiction for procedural purposes. n8 If such a claim does not receive a designation in the pleading, it will be treated as within nonadmiralty jurisdiction. When there is no basis for federal jurisdiction on a claim other than admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, the claim must be treated as an admiralty or maritime claim, even if no Rule 9(h) allegation is made in the pleading. n9 The purpose of Rule 9(h)(1) is to allow the claimant to elect that certain special admiralty and maritime procedures and rules apply. Rule 9(h)(1) also clarifies the applicability of these admiralty and maritime rules and procedures in a case when more than one basis for subject matter jurisdiction has been asserted. n10 See Ch. 9, Pleadings and Motions in General, for further discussion of commencing an action involving admiralty jurisdiction.

In a suit in an "Admiralty Act" case, the United States Supreme Court has indicated a strong preference for a uniform procedure in admiralty to be governed by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. The Suits in Admiralty Act is a waiver of the federal government's sovereign immunity when a civil action is commenced by a seaman injured aboard a vessel owned by the United States. n11 The Act instructs that service of process in such cases must be made "forthwith." On the other hand, Rule 4 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure sets an extendable 120-day period for service of process. The Supreme Court has held that the Act's "forthwith" instruction has been superseded by Rule 4's 120-day extendable time limit. n12

[c] Arbitration

The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure apply to proceedings under the Federal Arbitration Act n13 but only to the extent that matters of procedure are not provided for in the Act. n14 It has been held that this means that it is only the judicial proceedings under the Arbitration Act that are subject to the federal rules. The federal rules do not govern the procedure in the hearings before the arbitrators. n15 Furthermore, when the Arbitration Act covers a procedure, the civil rules do not apply. For example, section 4 of the Act provides that courts must compel arbitration according to the terms of the parties' agreement. n16

The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure govern procedure in admission to citizenship and cancellation of citizenship cases, to the extent that it is not otherwise provided by statute. n17 Procedures related to naturalization or cancellation of certificates of citizenship are significantly governed by statute. n17.1

The rules also apply to immigration proceedings before the Immigration and Naturalization Service, which include administrative and judicial review of administrative decisions. Many of those proceedings are governed by statute or federal regulation. n18 However, to the extent that they do not conflict with the statutory and regulatory scheme, the rules apply to immigration and naturalization proceedings. n19 For example, a district court may grant a new trial or amend a judgment in accordance with Rule 59, n20 or may grant relief from judgment pursuant to Rule 60. Furthermore, de novo immigration proceedings pursuant to the naturalization statutes n21 are governed by the federal civil rules, because of the broad statement set forth in Rule 1, as well as the specific reference in Rule 81(a)(2). Consequently, the civil rules are applicable in de novo citizenship proceedings, including Rule 12 regarding motions to dismiss and Rule 56 regarding summary judgment. n22

Bankruptcy proceedings are governed by the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure, and not by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, except when a particular Civil Rule has expressly been incorporated by a particular Bankruptcy Rule. Numerous Bankruptcy Rules make such an explicit incorporation of the Civil Rules for adversary bankruptcy proceedings. n23 For example, Bankruptcy Rule 7003 expressly makes Civil Rule 3, which requires the filing of a complaint to commence an action, applicable to adversary bankruptcy proceedings. n24 In another example, Bankruptcy Rule 9015(a) expressly makes Civil Rules 38, 39, 47, 48, 51, and 81(c) applicable to jury trials in bankruptcy cases and proceedings. n25 On the other hand, even though Bankruptcy Rule 9006 is modeled on and very similar to Civil Rule 6, Civil Rule 6 is clearly not incorporated into the Bankruptcy Rules, in that Bankruptcy Rule 9006 expressly provides a different method for the computation of time. Consequently, Civil Rule 6 is not applicable to the bankruptcy proceeding. n26

In addition to those parties making a claim for relief, numerous Bankruptcy Rules have explicitly incorporated the Civil Rules for defending parties. n27 For example, a motion to dismiss in a bankruptcy adversary proceeding is determined according to the provisions of Civil Rule 12(b). n28

When a Federal Rule of Civil Procedure has been incorporated by reference and made applicable to the Bankruptcy Rules, the Civil Rule that becomes applicable in a bankruptcy proceeding is the version in effect on the effective date of the incorporating Bankruptcy Rule, and as the Civil Rule is thereafter amended, unless otherwise provided by such amendment or by the Bankruptcy Rules. n29 Once a Civil Rule has been incorporated, a bankruptcy court follows case law precedent for interpretation of the incorporated Civil Rule just as it would for a case law interpretation of a Bankruptcy Rule. n30

The Bankruptcy Rules do adapt many of the rules and much of the procedural scheme of the Civil Rules. The purpose of these similarities in Bankruptcy Rules and Civil Rules is to retain the same basic practice in the bankruptcy and district courts to the extent possible. However, distinctions remain between the Bankruptcy Rules and Civil Rules when necessary to accommodate the inherent differences between bankruptcy and civil litigation. n31 When there are similarities, a court may use the Civil Rule by analogy to interpret the similar Bankruptcy Rule, n32 even if no express provision of a Bankruptcy Rule has made the analogous Civil Rule applicable. n33

[f] Intellectual Property Cases

The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure now apply to copyright proceedings to the same extent as any other civil proceeding because the former Copyright Rules have been abrogated. n34

A provision has also been added specifically making the civil rules governing injunctions applicable to copyright impoundment proceedings. n35 This provision acknowledges that courts have for some time turned to Rule 65 in response to the apparent inconsistency of the former copyright rules and because of concerns that the former copyright rules did not satisfy contemporary requirements of due process. n36 Copyright proceedings are otherwise governed by the copyright statutes. n37

The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure also apply to other intellectual property cases, including patent infringement actions n38 and trademark actions. n39

[g] Habeas Corpus

A "habeas corpus" proceeding is one in which the petitioner requests the court to order a person in custody to be released from custody n40 or to be transferred. n41 In the federal district courts, habeas corpus proceedings are generally governed by statute, n42 and procedural rules particularly applicable to those statutes. n43 However, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure are applicable to habeas corpus proceedings to the extent that a particular practice is not set forth in a federal statute or in the rules peculiar to federal habeas statutes, to the extent that the Rules are not inconsistent with habeas corpus rules n44 and to the extent that the particular procedure has in the past conformed to the practice in civil actions generally. n45

If a Federal Rule of Civil Procedure provision cannot be reconciled with the application of the habeas corpus rules, the Federal Civil Rule is not applicable, and the Habeas Corpus Rules alone apply. For example, although in ordinary civil proceedings Civil Rule 8 requires only a short and plain statement of the claim, n46 the habeas rules require a more detailed statement; the petitioner must specify all the grounds for relief available and state the facts supporting each ground. n47 Furthermore, even though habeas corpus is generally considered a civil action, the federal civil rules regarding venue do not apply to the peculiar action of habeas corpus. n48 In another example, it has been held that the federal civil procedure rules governing discovery are generally inapplicable to habeas proceedings, and the district court may fashion appropriate alternate procedures. n49

The civil rules have abolished the peculiar procedures in proceedings which request a writ of mandamus or a writ of scire facias (writ of execution). n50 However, the writ of mandamus, which is a command order from a higher court to a lower court, is now codified under the All Writs Act. n51 The All Writs Act provides that the United States Supreme Court and all higher courts established by Act of Congress may issue all writs necessary or appropriate in aid of their respective jurisdictions. n52 The writ of mandamus has been abolished in the district court. Relief previously available through the writ must now be obtained by appropriate petition or motion under the Federal Civil Rules, such as a motion for the issuance of an injunction. n53 Such a motion may also essentially move the court to revisit and change its previous decision, such as a motion under Rule 59(e) to alter or amend a judgment. n54

[h] Administrative Subpoenas and Review Proceedings

The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure apply in proceedings to compel the giving of testimony or production of documents in accordance with a subpoena issued by an officer or agency of the United States under any statute of the United States, except as otherwise provided by statute or by rules of the district court or by order of the court in the proceedings. n55 The Supreme Court has approved the principle that the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure are generally applicable to the enforcement of administrative subpoenas. n56 For example, if a particular statute is silent on the matter of attorney's fees and costs with respect to a motion to enforce a subpoena, the federal rules are applicable to procedures for obtaining fees and costs pursuant to Rule 81(a)(5). n57 However, the adjudicator has discretion to limit the application of the federal rules when their literal application would delay and complicate the proceeding. n58

The adoption of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure did not alter the statutory method for initiating administrative review proceedings, including the following:

1. A proceeding in a United States district court for the review of orders of the Secretary of Agriculture. n59 However, the procedure in these proceedings in the district court must comply with the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure to the extent applicable. n60

2. A proceeding to review an order of the Secretary of the Interior. However, these proceedings in the district court must conform to the rules to the extent applicable. n61 These orders of the Secretary of the Interior relate to monopolies in restraint of trade. n62

3. A proceeding in the district court to enforce orders of the National Labor Relations Board n63 is not altered by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. The civil rules do apply, however, to the extent that those statutes do not govern procedures and to the extent the procedures under the civil rules are applicable. n64

[i] Removed Actions

[i] Applicable Rules Depend on Completion of Removal

State procedural rules generally govern state lawsuits until they are removed to federal court. n65 The method and authorization for removal to federal court is governed by federal statute, not the federal rules. n66 After removal to the United States district court from the state court has occurred, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure govern procedure for the remainder of the action. n67 However, prior to removal, state law controls all procedural issues such as sufficiency of service, n68 the time at which an action is considered commenced, n69 the appearance of parties in the action, n70 and the form, filing, and service of pleadings. n71 State law also governs the applicability of any sanctions for conduct such as filing a frivolous complaint in state courts prior to removal. n72 Furthermore, there is no continuing duty to amend the complaint to be consistent with Rule 11 once a copy of the original complaint is filed in federal court after removal. n73

After an action has been removed, the federal rules govern the procedure to be followed before the district court as if the case had been originally commenced in the federal court. n74 Thus, if not completed until after removal, service must be made in accordance with the federal rules. n75 Any further papers filed in the removed action must conform to the federal rules, n76 and after removal amendments to papers originally filed in state court before removal must comply with the federal rules. n77 Additionally, removed actions that are covered by federal rules providing for special requirements, such as class actions or shareholder derivative actions, must be in compliance with those rules. n78

[ii] Answer by Defendant

When the defendant has not filed an answer prior to removal, Rule 81(c) controls the time in which the defendant must answer after the case has been removed, n79 rather than Rule 4 and Rule 12, which specify the general time requirements for filing an answer in federal district court. n80 If the defendant has properly answered the complaint before removal of the case, the defendant need not refile the answer. n81 However, in the more usual situation, when the defendant has not filed an answer before removal, the defendant must answer or present other defenses or objections under the Civil Rules within the longest of the following applicable periods: n82

- 21 days after receiving a copy of the initial pleading stating the claim for relief; n83
- 21 days after being served with the summons for an initial pleading on file at the time of service; n84

or

- 7 days after the notice of removal is filed. n85

The appropriate time period from the list above may be extended under Rule 6(b). For example, even if the time period has already expired, the district court may extend the time for good cause if the party failed to act because of excusable neglect. n86

[iii] Demand for Jury Trial

If all the pleadings have been served, the general rule for demanding a jury trial in federal court after removal requires that a party who is entitled to a jury trial make a timely demand in the federal court. Under Rule 81(c), a jury trial demand is timely in either of the following situations within 14 days after either of the following events:

- the party files a notice of removal; n87 or
- the party is served with a notice of removal filed by another party. n88

Two exceptions are allowed to the general rule stated above for jury trial demands pursuant to Rule 81(c). First, a party who has made a proper demand for a jury trial under state law before removal of the action need not repeat that demand. n89 Whether the party made a proper demand in state court prior to removal is determined by state law. For example, when state law provided that a demand for jury by the defendant in the state proceeding perfected the right for all parties, the plaintiff was not required to make a new demand following removal. n90

The second exception in Rule 81(c) provides that if state law does not require a party to make an express demand for trial by jury in the initial pleadings, the party need not do so immediately after removal unless the court directs that the party do so. n91 This principle also applies when a state law allows a demand to be filed at any time, even at advanced stages of the proceedings. In this situation the court may allow a jury trial even if demanded later than 14 days after removal depending on whether: (1) the claims are traditionally triable by jury, (2) the parties were assuming that the trial would be a bench trial, and (3) the party opposing the jury demand consented in some manner to a jury trial or whether allowing a jury trial will be unduly prejudicial. n92 A local court rule requiring an express demand for trial by jury constitutes a directive by the district court for purposes of Rule 81(c), and a failure to comply with this local rule will result in a waiver of jury trial. n93 However, despite these rules, a court may exercise its discretion under Rule 39(b) to grant a motion for a jury trial when a demand is untimely after removal if the demand would have been granted if it had been made in a timely manner. n94

CHAPTER 1 FEDERAL COURTS
PART II. USE OF RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE IN FEDERAL COURT

1-1 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 1.23

§ 1.23 Use of Local Rules in Federal Systemn*

[1] Promulgation of Local Rules

After giving appropriate public notice and an opportunity for comment, each district court has the authority on a vote by a majority of its district judges to make and amend rules governing procedures in the court. Any such local rule must be consistent with, but not duplicative of, any Federal Rule of Civil Procedure. Any local rule must also conform to any uniform numbering system prescribed by the Judicial Conference of the United States. n1 The district court may adopt local rules for efficient and expedient execution of justice, after considering any pertinent federal rules prior to the local rule adoption. n2 On promulgation of local rules, copies of the rules or amendments must be furnished to the judicial council and the Administrative Office of the United States Courts and must be made available to the public. n3

[2] Consistency With Federal Statutes and National Rules

A local rule must be consistent with federal statutes and the federal rules of civil procedure, evidence, and bankruptcy adopted under the Judiciary Code, n1 but may not duplicate those federal rules. n2 In this regard, "consistent with" means that the provisions of the local rule may not conflict with the national rule, and if they do so, any conflicting provision of the local rule is invalid. n3 For example, a local district court rule was declared invalid when the local rule required the plaintiff to plead a claim with greater specificity than Rule 8 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. n4 In another example, it was held that a local practice could not extend strict jurisdictional deadlines mandated by a federal rule. n5 Local rules that remove a court's discretion have also been declared invalid as inconsistent with national rules. n6 Furthermore, a local rule on trial settings is invalid if it conflicts with Rule 40 or any other rule. n7 Finally, if a judge enacts a "standing order" that conflicts with a local rule, the order may be stricken because the enactment of a standing order that conflicts with a local rule also violates Rule 83. n8

On the other hand, local district court rules may elaborate on national rules by adding operational details without being inconsistent with the national rules. n9 For example, a local court rule that highlighted the requirements for pleading a RICO claim would not be inconsistent with the federal rules. n10

Furthermore, when expressly provided in a national rule itself, a local rule may permit a standard different from the one specified in the national rule. n11 For example, Rule 54(d)(2)(B) states that unless otherwise provided by statute or order of the court, a motion for attorney's fees must be filed no later than 14 days after entry of judgment. n12 Also, Rule 83 authorizes the district courts to adopt local rules governing practice and procedure, including rules establishing timeliness standards for the filing of claims for attorney's fees. n13 Therefore, it was proper for a court to adopt a local rule providing that "a motion for award of attorney's fees must be filed within the time specified in a scheduling order." n14

[3] Prohibition Against Duplication of Statutes or National Rules

Local rules may not duplicate either the federal rules or any act of Congress. n1 Such repetition is superfluous and counterproductive because the judiciary bench and bar already have access to existing federal rules and statutes through the published United States Code. Documentation that would restate existing law merely results in more paperwork and accompanying costs. Furthermore, if the law is restated only partially or is restated incorrectly, the public or practitioners may be mislead about the law which actually applies. n2

[4] Effect of Local Rules of Court

Local rules of the district courts have the force of law and are binding on the parties and court. n1 Therefore, they are subject to review by an appellate court. n2 Once promulgated, a local rule remains in effect until amended by the court or abrogated by the judicial council of the circuit. n3

The federal rules put limitations on the scope of local rules. Thus, a local rule which imposes a requirement of form must not be enforced in a way that causes a party to lose any right because of a failure to comply unless the failure is willful. n4 For example, a local rule requiring a party to make specific citations to the record for factual arguments is a matter regarding form rather than substance. Therefore, because nothing in the federal statutes or rules requires a party to make specific citations to the record, a party may not be sanctioned under such a local rule, unless the local rule or a court order provides actual notice of the requirement. n5 If a substantive penalty were allowed for a non-willful violation of a local rule on form, such a penalty would contradict the purpose and the intent of other federal rules and existing case law to promote justice. n6 However, a court may impose sanctions for a violation of a local rule when the violation concerns substance rather than form, for example, if it prejudices the outcome of the proceeding, n7 or if the violation is willful. The sanction may be either monetary or the loss of a substantive right. n8

[5] Court's Discretion in Absence of Controlling Law

In the absence of controlling law, the district court may regulate practice consistent with the federal rules, federal statutes, and the district court's local rules. n1 Any such regulation by the judge, however, does not supersede any applicable national rules. n2 In exercising this inherent power, the court may impose sanctions that do not directly conflict with federal and local law and rules. In an appropriate case, the court may even impose dismissal, or default. However, the imposition of such extreme sanctions is limited to cases involving bad faith, fraud, or undue delay by one of the parties. n3

When there is no local rule or standing district court order regarding a particular matter, the court may regulate its practice in such a manner as will facilitate the just determination of a particular action. n4 For example, in the absence of a local rule, a district court could require that the parties make specific citations to the record in their moving papers. However, under Rule 83(b), the court may not grant summary judgment on the ground that the nonmovant's papers failed to cite to the record, unless the parties were given actual notice of the requirement. n4.1 In another example, the court has the discretionary power to require security for costs on good cause shown, n5 or to refuse to require security when not warranted by the circumstances of the case. n6 However, a judge may not impose a sanction for noncompliance with any security requirement not in a federal statute, federal rule, or local district rule unless the alleged violator has been furnished in the particular case with actual notice of the requirement. n7

CHAPTER 1 FEDERAL COURTS
PART III. FEDERAL COURT'S DECISION WHETHER TO ADJUDICATE CASE

1-1 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 1.40

§ 1.40 Case or Controversy Requirementn*

[1] Constitutional Basis

Before a claim falls within the jurisdiction of the federal court, a plaintiff must demonstrate that the claim involves an actual case or controversy, as opposed to a hypothetical question. n1 The requirement of a "case or controversy" limits the power of federal courts to hear those questions that are presented in an adversary context n2 and in a form historically viewed as capable of resolution through the judicial process, as opposed to those presenting purely hypothetical or abstract issues. Therefore, a case or controversy is the threshold necessity for a federal court to have subject-matter jurisdiction. Because Article III is a limit on judicial power, a court will not have subject matter jurisdiction over an action absent the requisite case or controversy. n3 For a complete discussion of the nature and requirements of federal jurisdiction in general, see Ch. 5, Original Jurisdiction Over the Subject Matter.

The case or controversy requirement does not bar the court from considering all legal theories relevant to resolving the dispute before it. Once an issue or claim is properly before the court in an adversarial context, the court is not limited to the particular legal theories advanced by the parties, but rather retains the independent power to identify and apply the proper construction of governing law. Thus, the Constitution does not force the court to accept the law as stated by the parties. n4 However, if the dispute before the court has been resolved, the court may not purport to resolve issues that are no longer in dispute between any of the parties. n5

[2] Prohibition Against Advisory Opinions

It is unconstitutional for a court to render an advisory opinion by deciding a case in which no injury has occurred, because such a situation does not present a case or controversy. n1 However, the distinction between an actual controversy and an advisory opinion is one of degree; and it is difficult or impossible to fashion a precise test whether an opinion is advisory. n2 Basically, a failure to identify the injury constitutes an advisory opinion. n3

For example, if the facts comprising the alleged injury are uncertain and the party is asking the court to make a legal ruling based on the possibility that certain facts will be found to exist at some point in the future, then a decision would necessarily constitute an advisory opinion based on a hypothetical situation. This is the type of judicial intervention that is prohibited, under the rationale that there is no actual dispute currently before the court, the facts may never develop consistent with the hypothetical situation, and therefore the court's opinion would have no legal effect. n4 On the other hand, if a situation presents an actual dispute between adverse, noncollusive parties, and there is a substantial likelihood that a federal court decision would actually have some tangible effect on the relationship between the parties, it is not an advisory opinion. n5

[3] Requirement is Continuous

The Constitution requires that a plaintiff's claim exist not just when the action is initiated but throughout the litigation, including while the case is on appeal. n1 For example, a plaintiff would not be qualified to represent a class in a class action after the case had become moot with respect to the plaintiff. n2 In this regard, the various doctrines of justiciability each have a particular time focus. Standing and ripeness (see §§ 1.142, 1.143) focus on aspects of justiciability at the time the action is initiated. The mootness doctrine requires that the case or controversy exist throughout the pendency of the action. n3

§ 1.41 Justiciability of Casen*

Justiciability is a general and relatively imprecise term n1 that is used to describe the two components required for federal court adjudication: n1.1 (1) the requirement of a Constitution Article III "case and controversy"; and (2) the prudential considerations for the federal exercise of jurisdiction. Its basic rationale is to prevent the courts, through avoidance of premature adjudication, from participating in abstract or hypothetical disagreements. It requires that before a federal court may consider a claim or issue, there must exist a real, substantial controversy between parties having adverse legal interests, a controversy that is definite and concrete and not hypothetical or abstract. It prevents parties from simply submitting questions of general interest or curiosity to the federal courts. n2

The justiciability doctrine considers both whether a federal court has the constitutional power to entertain a particular dispute n3 and whether it is wise to do so, which is referred to as the "prudential" determination. n3.1 With respect to their power, justiciability means a court's examination of whether the parties are presented with an actual case or controversy. With respect to prudential considerations, justiciability doctrines are self-imposed limitations on federal court jurisdiction. Thus, "justiciability" refers to principles that limit federal court review when it would be inappropriate or not prudent to exercise jurisdiction and decide a case or controversy. These doctrines are also anchored in the Article III case and controversy requirement. n4

Although a federal court may have valid jurisdiction, it may determine that a particular litigation presents a "nonjusticiable" case or controversy and, therefore, prudentially decline to exercise its valid jurisdiction. n5 The most significant and common justiciability doctrines are standing, n6 ripeness, n7 mootness, n8 and political questions. n9

The justiciability doctrines are based on the "private rights" theory of adjudication, which states that the only function of the federal judiciary is to adjudicate live disputes, and any judicial pronouncements of law must come as an incident to performance of that adjudicatory function. Therefore, there must be a tangible dispute that is capable of resolution in a manner that will have a concrete impact on the parties to the dispute. n10

PART III. FEDERAL COURT'S DECISION WHETHER TO ADJUDICATE CASE

1-1 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 1.42

§ 1.42 Standingn*

[1] Description of Standing Doctrine

The standing doctrine determines whether a particular party is the proper person to initiate a particular claim for federal court adjudication. n1 Standing is based on the principle that federal courts should grant relief only to a real party in interest to particular claims. n2 Thus, standing is focused on whether the party invoking federal court jurisdiction had the requisite stake in the outcome when the suit was filed, throughout maintenance of the claim, and during any appeal. A person's standing is not based on an entire case. Rather, a claimant must demonstrate standing for each claim he or she seeks to adjudicate and for each form of relief that is sought. n2.1 The Supreme Court has stated that of the several doctrines that courts have recognized as comprising the "case or controversy" requirement, the element of standing is perhaps the most important. n3 Furthermore, although it is usually considered a prudential concept that is a matter of sound judicial policy, the Court has stated that at its basis, standing is a constitutional question. n4

In considering the standing requirement, the Supreme Court has identified two components: n5 the first consists of the existence of constitutional requirements that are necessary prerequisites to standing in all cases. These constitutional requirements n6 are not mere pleading requirements. Rather, they are an indispensable part of the claimant's case and, accordingly, must be supported at each stage of litigation in the same manner as any other essential element of the case. n6.1 The second component of standing is "prudential standing." Prudential considerations under this component are considerations made by the judiciary to determine in a particular case whether it would be inappropriate or prudent for a federal court to use its resources to exercise jurisdiction and decide a case or controversy. Thus, although it may have valid jurisdiction the court may nevertheless determine that a particular litigation presents a nonjusticiable case or controversy and prudentially decline to exercise jurisdiction. n7

Under the first component, the constitutional aspects of standing, the plaintiff has the burden of alleging and establishing facts that demonstrate three elements: n8 (1) an injury in fact--an invasion of a legally protected interest that is concrete and particularized and actual or imminent, not conjectural or hypothetical; n9 (2) a causal connection between the injury and the conduct complained of; n10 and (3) the likelihood that the injury will be redressed by a favorable decision. n11 These three constitutional requirements are not mere pleading requirements. Rather, they are an indispensable part of any claim for relief and must be supported at each stage of litigation in the same manner as any other essential element of the case. Note that at the summary judgment stage of a case, the plaintiffs need not establish that they in fact have standing but only that there is a genuine question of material fact as to the required standing elements, which is the summary judgment standard for all motions. n12

Even after a claimant has met these three threshold constitutional requirements, the claimant has to qualify for standing under the "prudential standing" evaluation. Using the three prudential standing considerations, n13 the court decides whether it is prudentially unwise to exercise jurisdiction. This component is discussed in [5], below.

[2] Injury to Party Making Claim for Relief

[a] Requirement of Injury in Fact

A claimant seeking federal court adjudication must have in fact incurred a completed or imminent threat of injury. n1 In other words, the party must have a "personal stake" in the subject matter of the adjudication. n1.1 Article III of the Constitution requires the party who invokes the court's authority to show that he or she personally has suffered some actual or threatened injury as a result of the asserted wrongful conduct of the defendant. n2 Therefore, the exercise of judicial power, which may profoundly affect the lives and property of those to whom it extends, is restricted to parties who can show injury in fact resulting from the action which they seek to have the court adjudicate. n3

"Injury in fact" does not necessarily mean that some physical damage n3.1 or financial loss n3.2 has already occurred at the time of the filing of a claim for relief. The Supreme Court has explicitly recognized that threatened injury, rather than actual injury, may satisfy the constitutional standing requirement of injury in fact. A party subject to prospective injury has standing to sue provided that the threatened injury is real, imminent, and direct. n3.3

[b] Concrete Injury

The standing doctrine requires that the person invoking jurisdiction have incurred, or imminently will occur, n4 an actual injury that is concrete and particularized to the party asserting the claim. n5 For example, a federal contractor suffered no injury when the contractor sought review of a federal agency order reopening contract bidding because of the contractor's misrepresentations when, before petitioning for review, the contractor was allowed to participate in a new bidding process and won an even more lucrative contract. The court found no evidence that the agency's misrepresentation findings had present or future consequences for the contractor, in that it did not cast any shadow over the contractor's business activities and that the second contract award suggested the improbability of any such injury to the contractor's business. n6

The injury in fact required for standing must be concrete, that is, the plaintiff must allege an injury that is distinct and palpable, n7 as opposed to merely abstract. n8 An injury does not suffice if it is merely conjectural, speculative, or hypothetical. n9 A mere ideological interest in or concern about a situation is also not sufficient injury, no matter how strongly felt or how important the issue. Rather, the plaintiff must have suffered a harm that is real and concrete. n10 Similarly, standing is not measured by the intensity of the party's interest. Therefore, a person's genuine motivation to sue does not by itself amount to a personalized injury in fact, n11 nor does a person's high degree of willingness to litigate or fervent advocacy. n12

However, stigmatization caused by racial discrimination is sufficient standing to authorize a demand for legal remedy; because a badge of inequality and stigmatization is an actual harm to the stigmatized person in relation to other persons and does not merely exist in the mind of the wronged person. n13 A stigmatizing injury accords a basis for standing only to those persons who are personally denied equal treatment by the challenged discriminatory conduct. n14

[c] Economic Injury Not Required

To assert standing, a plaintiff must demonstrate that its alleged injury constitutes an injury in fact. A pecuniary injury clearly provides a sufficient basis for standing. Thus, any reduction in monetary interest or injury to person or property is sufficient. n15 For example, a person whose property is diminished by a payment of money wrongfully induced is injured by a deprivation of his or her property rights. n16

However, even though economic injury is sufficient injury for standing purposes, it is not necessary. The injury aspect of standing may be based on noneconomic as well as economic injury. Thus, a plaintiff's alleged injury may be an injury to aesthetic, conservational, and recreational values. n17 In housing discrimination cases, for example, a deprivation of the social and professional advantages of living in an integrated community constitutes sufficient injury. n18

Although the injury in fact requirement typically involves a substantive harm, federal courts also recognize procedural injuries as sufficient for standing. For example, a plaintiff has standing to challenge the defendant's removal to federal court, because the plaintiff can assert that it lost the right to sue in the forum of its choice. n19 Procedural injury is most typically used as a grounds for standing on appeal. Thus, when a deprivation of procedural rights was caused by a dismissal order and the appellate court may remedy that deprivation by reversing the dismissal order, the defendant has standing to appeal the order. n20

[d] Present or Imminent Injury Required

In general, a plaintiff must have suffered either a past or present injury. If a plaintiff has not yet suffered an actual injury at the time suit is filed, the plaintiff must be able to establish that such an injury is likely to occur imminently. Therefore, the injury must be a harm that has already occurred or a sufficiently probable threatened injury. n21 Thus, the possibility of future injury is sufficient to confer standing on a plaintiff, and threatened injury constitutes injury in fact for purposes of satisfying the constitutional standing requirements when there has been a credible threat of imminent harm. n21.1 The fact that the imminent injury would be the result of a series or chain of events need not destroy the standing claim. n22

In contrast to the situation when there a threatened injury is imminently probable, n23 allegations asserting nothing more than the mere possibility of future injury do not satisfy the standing requirements of Article III. A threatened injury must be "certainly impending" to constitute an injury in fact. An assertion of an injury that is no more than speculative is insufficient to afford standing. n24 A party may not allege future injury based solely on the defendant's past wrongful conduct; to do so the plaintiff must also show that the wrongdoer will likely engage in the wrongful activity and that it will likely be directed at the plaintiff. n25

The question of whether a future injury constitutes a sufficient actual injury for purposes of standing may also be considered in the context of the doctrine of ripeness. n26 For a detailed discussion of the doctrine of ripeness, see § 1.43.

[3] Injury Caused by Defendant

The second element of the constitutional standing doctrine is a "causation" element. A party must satisfy this causation element by showing that the injury fairly can be traced to the defendant's challenged action. Thus, standing requires that there be a causal connection between plaintiff's asserted injury and the defendant's action. n1 However, although there must be a causal connection the injury may be indirect, n2 provided that the complaint establishes that the injury is fairly traceable to the defendant's acts or omissions. n3 However, in order to establish the link between the injury and the defendant's conduct, the plaintiff need not establish the technical requirements for "proximate cause." n4

The causal chain may be broken if an injury is self-inflicted or is due to the plaintiff's own fault. n5 For example, one court of appeals held that plaintiffs who voluntarily resigned their employment positions to take advantage of a severance package after being reassigned to unpleasant work lacked standing to sue their former employer for reinstatement because the plaintiffs' injury was not traceable to the defendant's conduct. The plaintiffs' voluntary departure precluded a claim that the employer deprived them of their employment, even if the employer's prior treatment was actionable. n6

[4] Injury Must be Subject to Remedy

The third and last required element of the constitutional standing doctrine is that the plaintiff's injury likely can be redressed by a favorable decision in the action. n1 This requirement has been described as the "redressability" element of Article III. n2 Redressability examines whether the relief sought by the party is likely to alleviate the injury alleged. n3 To demonstrate redressability, a plaintiff need not show beyond doubt that a favorable judgment would redress plaintiff's injury. A probable benefit resulting from a winning suit is sufficient. n4

For example, the Supreme Court has held that the plaintiffs met their burden of alleging that their injury, lack of irrigation water, would be redressed if a Fish and Wildlife Service biological opinion were set aside because another federal agency would be unlikely to impose minimum water restrictions in the absence of the biological opinion. n5 However, a party may not show redressability based on the assumption that a nonparty to the action will act in a certain way in response to a ruling in the plaintiff's favor, and that such action would ultimately redress plaintiff's injury. n6

[5] Prudential Considerations Regarding Standing

[a] Three Prudential Considerations

As noted in [1], above, the standing requirement is composed of two separate components; the constitutional component, discussed in [2]-[4] above, and the "prudential" component, which consists exclusively of judiciary-made limitations on standing designed to foster effectiveness and judicial restraint. These prudential limitations, unlike the constitutionally dictated standing rules, may be modified or revoked by Congress. n1 Thus, a federal statute may afford a plaintiff the express right to bring a suit, extending the plaintiff's standing to the limits permitted by the Constitution and relieving the plaintiff of the judicially created prudential standing requirements. n2

In deciding whether standing exists, a court must consider the following three prudential factors: n2.1

1. Whether the alleged injury to the plaintiff falls within the "zone of interests" protected by the statute or constitutional provision at issue. n3

2. Whether the complaint raises only generalized grievances (or abstract questions) that are more appropriately resolved by the legislative and executive branches. n4

3. Whether the plaintiff is asserting the plaintiff's own legal rights and interests, rather than those of third parties. n5

[b] Zone of Interests

Prudential standing requires that a plaintiff's claim fall within the zone of interests protected by the law invoked by the plaintiff. n5.1 Thus, a party bringing a claim for relief must demonstrate that the party has incurred, or likely is in imminent danger of incurring, some direct and personal injury resulting from the violation of an asserted constitutional or statutory right designed to protect the party. In other words, the only parties who may sue to enforce a law are individuals who belong to the class that the law was designed to protect. n6 Because the zone of interests protected by the statute is not a constitutional requirement but is a judicially imposed limitation on the concept of standing, the scope of the zone of interests varies according to the provisions of the law in issue. n7 Because the concept is not mandated by the Constitution, Congress may decrease or increase the scope of the zone of interests; Congress may even increase the zone until it is coextensive with the constitutional standing requirements, in effect abrogating the zone of interests requirement. n8

[c] Generalized Grievances

The second prudential standing factor is a rule barring adjudication of generalized grievances that would more appropriately be addressed in the representative branches of government. n8.1 This factor is based on the principle that the exercise of federal jurisdiction is not justified if the harm asserted is merely a generalized grievance that is shared equally by a large class of citizens. n9 A claim of generalized or amorphous harm does not constitute an injury sufficient to provide standing. n10 For example, the Supreme Court has held that an assertion by a teachers' association that they had a special interest in the quality of education in the state did not alone confer federal standing. Such an argument, the Court reasoned, fails to distinguish the members of a teachers' association from students, their parents, or any other citizens. n11 It should also be noted that the presence of a disagreement is insufficient by itself to meet standing requirements, however severe and acrimonious the disagreement may be. n12

[d] Third-Party Standing

A party generally must assert the party's own legal arguments and interests and may not rely on the legal rights or interests of third parties to assert a claim for relief. n13 This rule is based on the prudential consideration that a third party is the best advocate of its own assertions, and the plaintiff may place a slightly different, self-interested viewpoint on its own presentation. n14 Another reason for the rule is that courts should not adjudicate rights unnecessarily. n15

However, there is an exception to this prudential standing rule, referred to as "third party standing." n15.1 Under the doctrine of third-party standing, plaintiffs may assert the rights of others not before the court if they can demonstrate three factual elements: n15.2

1. The plaintiff has suffered an injury in fact, thus giving the plaintiff a concrete interest in the outcome of the litigation. n16 The injury in fact requirement is one of the constitutional requirements for standing n16.1 and is discussed in § 1.42[2].

2. There is a close relationship between the plaintiff and the third party. n17 The purpose of the close relationship requirement is to ensure that the plaintiff will act as an effective advocate for the third party. n18 If the third-party right holder is unable to raise its own rights, and its relationship with the plaintiff suggests an identity of interests, courts may be certain that the litigation is necessary and the issues will be framed clearly and effectively. n19 The requisite close relationship is not satisfied if it is a future relationship or a hypothetical relationship. n19.1

3. There is some impediment to the third-party's ability to protect its own interests. n20 Any legal or physical inability to bring suit qualifies as such an obstacle. n21 The third party need not face insurmountable hurdles nor need there be an absolute impossibility of suit in order to fall within the impediment exception. A concrete, practical disincentive to sue is a sufficient impediment. n21.1

Unless the three criteria are met, the rule against third-party standing applies even if the same allegedly illegal act that affects the third party also affects the party. n22 Thus, even if the plaintiff has suffered palpable injury because some third party has been denied legal rights, the plaintiff may not generally assert the third party's rights as the basis of its claim. n23

[6] Procedural Considerations Related to Standing

[a] Court or Party May Initiate Standing Contest

Standing is an element of subject matter jurisdiction. Consequently, the issue of standing may be raised by a party by a motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction over the subject matter, or by means of a motion for summary judgment. n1

Because the question of whether a party has standing to pursue a claim is jurisdictional, standing may not be waived and may be undertaken at any point in the proceedings. n2 Furthermore, the absence of standing may be raised for the first time on appeal. n3 Additionally, because federal courts have an independent obligation to examine their own jurisdiction n4 and standing is an important jurisdictional doctrine, the federal trial courts and appellate courts have an independent obligation on their own initiative to ensure that litigants have standing under Article III, at both the trial and appellate stages, n5 even if the parties fail to raise the question. n5.1

Standing must be determined as of the time the suit is filed. n5.2 Whether a plaintiff has standing at the time of trial implicates the related doctrine of mootness, which is discussed in § 1.44. n6 In this regard, the Supreme Court has characterized the doctrine of "mootness" as being the doctrine of standing set in a time frame. n7

[b] Burden to Establish Standing

The party invoking federal jurisdiction has the burden of establishing the elements of standing. n8 To meet this burden, the party must clearly state facts sufficient to satisfy the Article III standing requirements. n9 However, it should be noted that the burden on the party asserting standing is ultimately more than a requirement of pleading. Rather, it is an essential part of the case and each element must be supported with evidence in the same manner as any other matter on which that party bears the burden of proof. The burden is even greater when the plaintiff is asserting third-party rights. n10 When the district court raises the issue of standing on its own initiative, and disputed factual questions or credibility findings essential to standing are required, the court must hold an evidentiary hearing to allow the party with the burden to establish standing and may not resolve the issue solely based on the record. n11

[c] Appeal of Ruling on Standing

A determination of standing is generally not considered a final order. Therefore, it is not subject to immediate appellate review in and of itself. Also, the issue of standing does not fit within the collateral order doctrine because a motion to dismiss on justiciability grounds is not effectively unreviewable on appeal from the final judgment. n11.1 However, the standing determination is immediately reviewable if the standing issue is inextricably intertwined with an otherwise appealable order, or the determination of standing is essential to the resolution of the appealable order. n12

As a practical matter, a determination that a party lacks standing to pursue a claim effectively ends the case for that party and, therefore, is typically part of a final judgment disposing of the matter. In such a situation, a determination that the plaintiff lacks standing is immediately appealable. n12.1 Standing is an issue of law, and therefore a district court's ruling on the issue is reviewed de novo by the court of appeals. n13 However, courts of appeals will review for clear error the factual determinations underlying the district court's decision on standing. n14

CHAPTER 1 FEDERAL COURTS
PART III. FEDERAL COURT'S DECISION WHETHER TO ADJUDICATE CASE

1-1 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 1.43

§ 1.43 Ripenessn*

[1] Character of Ripeness Doctrine

The doctrine of ripeness is a requirement designed to avoid premature decision making. n1 Thus, the ripeness doctrine concerns the timing of a civil action. n2 The doctrine considers whether a case has been brought at a point that is too early for adjudication, in that it is not yet clear whether a real dispute to be resolved exists between the parties. n3 The ripeness requirement promotes the interests of judicial restraint by avoiding possible judicial interference with the other branches of government that would ultimately prove unnecessary if a live dispute were never to develop. Furthermore, unless a case is ripe for adjudication, a court cannot be sure that the facts have been sufficiently developed and the matter is sufficiently concrete for the court to render a decision that will resolve the dispute and affect the conduct of the parties. Therefore, the ripeness doctrine prevents the courts from becoming involved in purely abstract or theoretical disagreements. n4

The ripeness determination affects whether the district court has subject matter jurisdiction n5 and on the appellate level, is an independent requirement for judicial review. n6 However, like the parallel doctrines of standing and mootness, the ripeness doctrine represents a combination of both constitutional and lesser, "prudential" elements. n7 In other words, the ripeness doctrine is drawn both from Article III limitations on the judicial power of the court to decide a controversy at a particular time and from prudential considerations, which concern whether it would be advisable for the court to exercise jurisdiction at a particular time. n8 While ripeness addresses when the suit should be brought, standing addresses who may bring the suit. n9 In comparison with the mootness doctrine, the ripeness inquiry asks whether there is a present need for the court to act. Mootness, on the other hand, determines if there are any actual issues left for the court to adjudicate. n10

[2] Principles of Ripeness

[a] Fitness for Judicial Review

An issue constitutes an actual case or controversy under the ripeness doctrine only if the issue involved is "fit" for adjudication. n1 Fitness for adjudication requires certainty. n2 The crucial question concerning fitness for adjudication is whether the claim assumes the occurrence of uncertain and contingent events that may not occur as anticipated or may not occur at all. Included in the fitness inquiry are sub-issues concerning determinations such as the finality of the issue presented for review, the definiteness of the threat of harm, n2.1 and the extent to which resolution of the matter depends on facts not yet developed. n3 Courts are particularly careful to ensure that cases are ripe when constitutional questions are in issue, n4 except that the doctrine of ripeness is more liberally applied in the First Amendment context, because of the possible chilling effect of potentially unconstitutional burdens on free speech. n5

When considering the fitness aspect of ripeness, courts must consider the degree of factual development in the controversy. The more factual development that has occurred, the greater the probability is that the court will determine that the case is ripe for adjudication. n6 Furthermore, a court will more likely find that the fitness requirement for ripeness is satisfied if the issues presented are purely legal ones that do not require additional factual development. n7

When a case involves the action of an administrative agency, the first requirement for fitness is that the agency action must be final, which means that the agency need not complete any more steps regarding the subject matter and will not be further modifying its action. However, finality is not the only requirement for fitness (i.e., when the agency has issued a final regulation). An agency regulation is not ordinarily considered the type of agency action that is "ripe" for judicial review unless the factual scope of the controversy has been reduced to manageable proportions and its factual components developed by some concrete action applying the regulation to the claimant's situation in a way that harms, or threatens to harm, the claimant. The exceptions to this general rule are (1) a statutory provision providing for immediate judicial review of the regulation, or (2) when the regulation constitutes a substantive rule that, as a practical matter, requires the claimant to adjust his or her conduct immediately. n8

[b] Hardship to Parties if Adjudication is Declined

In its ripeness determination, the court must consider whether the claimant has demonstrated that deferring judicial review will result in a real hardship to the claimant. Furthermore, the hardship must be based on adverse effects of a strictly legal kind. n9 Thus, a hardship examination requires the court to determine whether the subject matter of the claim presents a true hardship for the parties, n10 or whether the parties' course of action would be unlikely to be altered regardless of any decision that the court could render. n11 The primary attribute of hardship is direct and immediate harm. n12

The greater the anticipated harm, the more likely the court will consider the matter ripe for resolution. A matter that is likely to cause extreme hardship for the parties may be found to be ripe even if some factual issues remain unresolved. Even though both the fitness test n13 and the hardship test must be met for the ripeness requirement to be satisfied, there are no exact standards, and a particularly strong showing in one area may offset a marginal showing in the other area. n14 Some courts have indicated that a claim may be ripe and, therefore, justiciable despite a total lack of fitness when the challenged action creates a direct, immediate, and severe hardship. n15

[c] Remedy Ordered Must Have Conclusive Effect

An issue is not ripe for adjudication unless the court will be able to grant relief or fashion a remedy in a manner that would have a conclusive effect on the issue in dispute. If the dispute concerns events that have not yet occurred, the plaintiff must show that the probability of the future event occurring is of "sufficient immediacy and reality" to have a current effect on the actions of the parties and to provide a concrete set of circumstances on which the court can base a ruling. n16 Cases that are mostly legal in nature do not require significant factual development and are particularly ripe if additional facts would not further affect the framing of the issue or the type of relief to be obtained. n17 However, even in cases involving purely legal questions, the issue will not be considered concrete enough to pass the ripeness test if the anticipated events and injury are too remote to justify a current adjudication. n18

[d] Remedy Ordered Must Have Practical Utility

Many courts analyze ripeness in terms of the relief that is requested and its utility to the parties. An issue is not ripe unless the anticipated remedy either allows the status quo to be preserved n19 or guides the parties in directing their future actions. Therefore, if the issue involved or the decision that could be rendered is too contingent to know the extent to which the parties will be affected, then the decision would not serve a useful purpose. A decision would not be of practical utility if it would not affect the parties' future actions or would not be of practical help in resolving the underlying controversy. n20

[3] Initiating Challenge to Ripeness

When a party files a complaint or other claim for relief, the claimant has the affirmative burden to allege facts which demonstrate ripeness, that is, the appropriateness of invoking a judicial resolution of the claim. When the defending party challenges that the claim is ripe, the proper procedure for the challenge is to file a motion to dismiss. n1 Although the proper method to challenge a claim based on the lack of ripeness is a motion to dismiss, an appellate court may uphold a grant of summary judgment for lack of ripeness when the district court properly concluded that the claim will never ripen. n3 Additionally, the court may consider the jurisdiction question of ripeness on its own initiative. n4

CHAPTER 1 FEDERAL COURTS
PART III. FEDERAL COURT'S DECISION WHETHER TO ADJUDICATE CASE

1-1 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 1.44

§ 1.44 Mootnessn*

[1] Nature of Mootness Doctrine

The essence of the mootness doctrine is that even though there may be an actual and justiciable "case or controversy" at the time the litigation is commenced, if that case or controversy ceases to exist, the federal court must dismiss the action for want of jurisdiction. n1 Mootness requires federal courts to avoid ruling on controversies that have been resolved by the passage of time or by intervening events. n2 The constitutional case or controversy requirement of Article III, n3 as well as the prudential considerations underlying justiciability, n4 are related to the mootness doctrine because each of these concepts requires that any case or dispute that is presented to a federal court be definite, concrete, and amenable to specific relief. n5

A controversy becomes moot if it ceases to be real or definite because the issues presented are no longer "live," n6 or the parties lack a legally cognizable interest in the outcome. n7 Thus, if the controversy initially presented to the court has been resolved during the pendency of the action, if either of the parties experiences a change in the party's legal status while the case is pending, or if the dispute loses its adverse character for any other reason, the court will not be able to grant effective relief, n8 unless it appears that the precise conditions of the case are likely to recur. n9

The purpose of the mootness doctrine is to require a court to dismiss a case because federal courts are without power to decide questions that cannot affect the rights of parties. n10 If a case is moot, the plaintiff can no longer have a "personal stake" in the outcome. n11 Thus, the mootness doctrine reflects the assumptions of the "private rights" model of adjudication, under which the court's function is confined to the resolution of concrete private controversies. n12 Legal pronouncements by the judiciary that are untied to the resolution of a live controversy constitute an intrusion into the legislative lawmaking power and thus are a violation of the separation of powers doctrine. n13

[2] Circumstances Triggering Mootness

[a] Cessation of Live Controversy

The mootness doctrine generally requires a court to dismiss a claim when the claim ceases to present a "live controversy" at any time during the course of an action, including on appeal. Thus, a trial or appellate court, including the Supreme Court in its appellate capacity, may refuse to exercise jurisdiction because the appealed claim has ceased to exist as a live controversy. n1

A claim will be considered moot because it ceases to present a live controversy, and therefore the court is no longer able to grant effective relief, because of any of the following reasons:

1. The passage of time has made the claim stale and it is unlikely that the precise conditions of the case will ever recur. The most common example of a case in which the passage of time may render a claim moot is when the claim arises out of a transitory event or condition. For example, when the plaintiff commenced a lawsuit alleging that a ban against press coverage of a military operation violated the First Amendment and, during the pendency of the action, the operation was ended and the military troops were withdrawn, there was no longer a "live" controversy. Because the military action was not likely to recur, the plaintiff's claims were moot. n1.1 However, the transitory event or condition will not render a claim moot unless the event or condition is directly related to the claim. For example, the expiration of a nonsolicitation covenant in a contract did not moot the appeal of a district court's denial of a motion for preliminary injunction to enforce during the trial all nonsolicitation and nondisclosure covenants, because injunctions are equitable in nature and the district court could impose an injunction that lasted beyond the contract provision's expiration date. n1.2

2. An intervening factual event may render a case moot if the plaintiff, as a result of the event, has lost a present right to secure relief in the action or no longer has a stake or interest in the outcome of the litigation. n2 The intervening event renders the case moot only if the plaintiff is completely divested of all personal interest in the outcome of the controversy or if the event completely eliminates the effect of the alleged violation n2.1 and there is no reason to believe that the alleged violation will recur. n2.2 If, however, the plaintiff retains some personal stake in the controversy and there are some outstanding issues that are amenable to judicial resolution, those claims may proceed for review even though an intervening event might render other issues moot. n3

3. If pending litigation involves a legal issue that is later disposed of in another forum, the resolution of the issue or claim renders the pending lawsuit moot, provided the resolution of the claim in the other forum is conclusive. This principle applies regardless of whether the resolution of the issue occurred by means of subsequently enacted legislation or by the entry of a judgment or order that affects either the underlying issue or the precise claim in dispute. n4

4. If the parties voluntarily agree to enter into a settlement, pending litigation concerning the controversy is rendered moot because an effective resolution has been reached and further court action is unnecessary. n5 However, a defendant's promise to refrain from further allegedly wrongful conduct does not necessarily render the pending litigation moot if the promise has not been fully executed n6 or there is a reasonable probability that the defendant will resume the wrongful conduct. n7 Furthermore, the settlement moots only those claims and defenses that are directly encompassed by the settlement. n7.1

[b] Parties Lose Legal Interest or Stake in Outcome

Under the mootness doctrine, the required personal interest by the plaintiff that must exist in the outcome of the litigation at the time the action is commenced must continue throughout the pendency of the action, and if it does not, the case becomes moot. n7.2 This may occur for any of the following reasons:

1. A change in the personal status or condition of a party to the litigation when that status forms the basis of a claim or defense in the litigation. For example, the Supreme Court has held that an action by students at a state operated military college against the superintendent of the college became moot because the students lost their status by graduation and the superintendent lost his status by retirement. n8 However, if the issue is one that is subject to repetition, yet evades review because it is based on short term conditions, the court may nevertheless review the case as an exception to the mootness doctrine. n9

2. A lawsuit may be rendered moot if an intervening event affects, resolves, or terminates the subject matter of the controversy, and as a result, the plaintiff is divested of all interest, stake, or claim in the subject of the dispute. n10

3. If the complaint names a certain individual or official as the defendant, but the named defendant loses responsibility for the challenged conduct during the pendency of the action, n10.1 the case is rendered moot unless a proper substitution of defendants is made. In these situations, mootness occurs either because the plaintiff is no longer exposed to harm by that particular defendant, or because the defendant can no longer comply with the remedy that may be ordered by the court. n11 However, a case is not rendered moot if the plaintiff seeks relief from alleged past unconstitutional discrimination, rather than relief designed to prevent future discriminatory practices. n12

[c] Court Becomes Unable to Grant Requested Relief

A court may declare the case or the issue moot on the grounds that it no longer has the capability to grant relief affecting the legal rights of the parties on the claim. n12.1 For example, a case becomes moot when the defending party has permanently ceased committing the allegedly wrongful conduct, or when the plaintiff has lost the required legal interest to maintain the claim. n13 Before it dismisses a case on mootness grounds because of the defendant's decision to cease the conduct or activity that is challenged, the court must ensure that the defendant will not resume the activity once the threat of litigation has been removed. n14

[d] Decision on Claim is Rendered by Another Court

Proceedings parallel to the federal civil action in question are commonly pending, due to the limited jurisdiction of federal courts, and the existence of concurrent state court jurisdiction over most federal claims. Thus, resolution of the controversy in the state forum may moot the issues presented in the federal action. n15 When a binding decision is rendered by a tribunal that is exercising proper jurisdiction over the claim, the parties have been provided a hearing for their arguments. Therefore, assuming the presence of a full and fair opportunity to litigate before the other tribunal, the mooting of the federal action is proper because it does not divest the parties of their due process right to be heard. n16

[e] Change in Legislation, Statute, or Regulation

If a statute, regulation, or other type of legislation is passed or amended while litigation is pending, and the new legislation corrects or cures the condition that is the subject of the suit, the underlying claim is rendered moot because there is no longer an actual controversy for the court to address and a judicial remedy is no longer needed. n17 This principle also applies to cases in which legislation is challenged by means of a court action, but the legislation has been repealed or has expired before a judicial declaration as to its validity. n18 However, statutory changes will not moot an action challenging the validity of legislation in two situations. The first situation occurs when there is a reasonable expectation that the challenged law will be reenacted; n19 the second situation is when the new legislation does not resolve all of the issues that the parties sought to address in the litigation. n20

[3] Exceptions to Mootness Doctrine

[a] Issues That Are Capable of Repetition and Will Evade Review

The mootness doctrine does not apply if the defendant's conduct is capable of repetition, yet will evade judicial review. The exception applies if the following two conditions exist: n1

1. The challenged conduct is inherently too short in its duration to be completely litigated prior to cessation or expiration; and

2. There is a reasonable expectation that the same complaining party will be subject to the same conduct.

> This second prong of the exception requires a reasonable expectation or a demonstrated probability that the same controversy will recur involving the same complaining party. The same controversy is sufficiently likely to recur when a party has a reasonable expectation that it will again be subjected to the alleged illegal conduct. n1.1

The "capable of repetition, yet evading review" exception to mootness is narrow, applying only in exceptional situations when both factors are simultaneously present. n2 Furthermore, the Supreme Court has made it clear that the exception applies only if the claim of the very same party will evade review. It is not sufficient that other, similarly situated parties would face the same issue under similar time constraints. n3 The exception also does not apply when a party fails to take advantage of existing means to challenge the order in issue, such as by filing an immediate appeal and seeking a stay pending that appeal. n4

[b] Voluntary Cessation of Conduct by Defendant Merely to Avoid Adjudication

The voluntary cessation of challenged conduct by a defendant does not render the underlying controversy moot unless there is no reasonable possibility that the challenged conduct will resume. n5 Whether the voluntary cessation of activity by a defendant is justification for dismissing a case on mootness grounds depends on two key questions: (1) whether the defendant would be free to return to its allegedly wrongful conduct, n6 and (2) whether it is probable that the defendant will do so. n7 In the consideration of these two factors, the court should evaluate the history, pattern, and length of the conduct engaged in by the defendant. The court should also make an assessment of the enforceability of a defendant's promise or representation that it will not resume the allegedly wrongful conduct; this test is a stringent one. n8 In order to obtain a dismissal of the case on mootness grounds, the defendant bears the burden of establishing that its voluntary cessation of objectionable conduct is permanent in nature. n9 Furthermore the voluntary cessation doctrine will not save a suit from mootness unless the defendant shows that the cessation of the conduct did not result merely from the litigation. n10

[c] Past Acts Which Have Present, Future, or Collateral Consequences

Even though a change in circumstances, an intervening event, an amendment to legislation, or a revision in policy may moot a claim, n11 the doctrine of mootness does not apply if those past acts have present, future, or collateral consequences. n12 Examples of future disabilities that constitute collateral consequences precluding mootness include the deprivation of the right to vote, to hold office, to serve on a jury, or to engage in certain businesses and restrictions on the procurement of licenses and permits. n13 The "collateral or future consequences" exception to the mootness doctrine also applies in cases in which the underlying claim has significant constitutional ramifications or in cases that present an issue of public importance. n14 These types of cases are exceptions to the mootness doctrine because the plaintiff will not only challenge specific or isolated actions taken by a defendant but also the ongoing policy that prompted the action. n15

[4] Procedural Considerations Regarding Mootness

[a] Initiation of Challenge Based on Mootness

Any party may initiate a challenge on the grounds of mootness at any time because the issue is jurisdictional. n1 The condition of mootness is not a defense that could be waived by a party but rather is a condition that deprives the court of subject matter jurisdiction. n2 Additionally, the court has an obligation to raise and decide the issue of mootness on its own initiative if facts come to its attention suggesting mootness, even if the parties have not raised the issue, because resolution of the question is essential if federal courts are to function within their constitutional sphere of authority. n3

[b] Burden to Establish Mootness

Any party raising the issue of mootness has the burden of establishing the circumstances of mootness. n4 Thus, for example, a party asserting mootness has the burden of establishing that because of the change in circumstances, no effective relief remains for the court to provide. n5 The burden of showing mootness is a considerable burden, n6 because the party must establish that it is absolutely clear that alleged wrongdoing could not reasonably be expected to recur under the "capable of repetition" exception. n7 For example, in one case, the defendants failed to meet the heavy burden of showing mootness. By failing to state their intention to abide by an injunction, they failed to make absolutely clear that violations could not be reasonably expected to recur. n8

[c] Use of Class Action

If a large number of individuals are affected by the conduct or activity of a defendant, the doctrine of mootness is applied in a very flexible manner. In particular, if the claims of the named plaintiffs in a class action become moot after the class is certified, mootness has no effect on the suit or on the named plaintiffs' status as class representatives. n9 On the other hand, if the claims of the named plaintiffs become moot before the class is certified, the claims of the entire class become moot as well. There is a qualification to this principle. If the nature of the claims are inherently transitory, the termination of the representative's claim does not render moot the claims of the unnamed members of the class, even if certification of the class has not occurred until after the claims of the individual class members are no longer viable. n10 In such circumstances, the courts deem that the certification relates back to the filing of the complaint because, when a claim is of such a transitory nature, the court cannot be expected to rule on the class certification motion before the claim expires. This relation back doctrine avoids the mooting of the entire controversy. n11

[d] Mootness Applicable Only to Some Issues in Case

If a case involves several claims for relief in different forms, the fact that some of the claims have been rendered moot does not divest the court of jurisdiction to entertain any claims that remain live and on which effective judicial relief may still be granted. This type of situation usually arises when a plaintiff makes a request for declaratory or injunctive relief, and includes a claim for monetary damages arising from the plaintiff's past exposure to the illegal conduct. In these circumstances, the mere fact that an intervening event or a change in circumstances may have obviated the need for a declaration or injunction will not automatically moot the plaintiff's request for compensatory or punitive damages. n12

In a similar manner, even though the trial court should refuse to consider the merits of a moot issue, there may remain issues that are still viable. If these remaining issues independently present a justiciable question, the court may properly adjudicate the issues. On the other hand, if the basis for the mootness has effectively divested the plaintiff of all personal stake in the outcome of the controversy, the mootness doctrine demands that the entire case be dismissed for lack of any justiciable controversy. n13

The political question doctrine prevents the federal courts from reviewing matters that another branch of government may more appropriately resolve. n1 The political question doctrine presents issues of justiciability distinct from those implicated by the concepts of standing, mootness, and ripeness. In broad terms, the doctrine requires federal courts to abstain from the review of constitutional claims that are more amenable to resolution by other branches of the federal government instead of rendering a judgment on the merits. n2 However, the precise nature of the political question doctrine is difficult to define, and its application requires a case-by-case analysis in order to determine whether the doctrine's broad criteria have been met. n3

Reviewing the cases in which it had been held that issues were "political" the following guidelines are apparent: (1) the doctrine is primarily a function of separation of powers; (2) an understanding of the limits of the doctrine requires a case-by-case analysis, despite sweeping statements in some of the opinions; and (3) on the surface of any case held to involve a political question, one of the following factors is evident: a demonstrable constitutional commitment of an issue to a coordinate political department; a lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards for resolving it; the impossibility of deciding without an initial policy determination of a kind clearly for nonjudicial discretion; the impossibility of a court's undertaking independent resolution without expressing lack of the respect due coordinate branches of government; an unusual need for unquestioning adherence to a political decision already made; or the potentiality of embarrassment from several pronouncements by various departments on one issue. n4

CHAPTER 1 FEDERAL COURTS
PART IV. ONLY ONE FORM OF CIVIL ACTION ADJUDICATED IN FEDERAL COURT

1-1 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 1.60

§ 1.60 Nature of Single Form of Civil Actionn*

[1] Combination of Common-Law Procedures

There is only one form of action in cases in federal court subject to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, the form known as the "civil action." n1 Thus, in accordance with Rules 2 and 81(c) the words "civil action" have replaced the words "case," "cause," "suit," "lawsuit" and other similar expressions. The term "civil action" encompasses an entire civil case, including claims filed by plaintiffs, claims by defendants, claims filed by third-party defendants, and the responses to all of those claims. n2

Rule 2 establishes that all of these claims and responses are not separate actions within a larger case, but simply "part and parcel" of the existing action. n3 Even more significantly, Rule 2 and the rest of the federal civil rules combine into a single, simple form of action all of the many formal common-law causes of action, each of which was rigidly defined with respect to requirements of proof, appropriate defenses, available remedies, and specific forms of pleading. The civil rules were designed to avoid some of the old procedural booby traps that common-law pleaders could set to prevent unsophisticated parties from ever having an adjudication on the merits. n4

[2] Merger of Law, Equity, and Admiralty

The creation of a single form of action has brought about the merger of the systems of law and equity. The merger of law and equity eliminates the practice that existed in federal courts prior to promulgation of the civil rules: separate sides for adjudicating claims at law or in equity, each of which had its own procedures depending on the nature of the claim asserted. n1 Thus, the merger destroyed purely procedural impediments to the presentation of any issue by any party based on the difference between law and equity. n2 The merger of law and equity also eliminated the fiction that a single federal official was both a "chancellor" in equitable suits and a "judge" in legal actions. n3

The rules also include admiralty claims within their scope, resulting in a similar merger of the civil and admiralty procedures. n4 Actions based on admiralty jurisdiction are no longer assigned to a separate admiralty docket but, rather, are assigned to the same civil docket as legal and equitable actions and are governed principally by the same rules. n5

The merger of law and equity allows the court to resolve claims that have both legal and equitable aspects and to preserve the right to trial by jury on the legal aspects of the claim. n6 Prior to the merger, a court of equity had the power to adjudicate claims with legal aspects on the grounds that a court of equity was required to provide full relief between the parties and that it could not do so without resolving legal issues. The party generally lost the right to trial by jury on such claims, however. n7 The use of a single form of action generally precludes a federal court's use of any form of action other than a civil action to resolve disputes within the scope of the rules. Therefore, the court may not generally adjudicate disputes without the full procedural protections of the civil rules, and summary proceedings, which are defined as proceedings that may be conducted without formal pleadings, on short notice, or without formal trial procedures, are prohibited in federal court. n8

[3] Elimination of Most Procedural Differences Based on Legal or Equitable Nature of Claim

Under the federal rules, an action is not an equitable action or a legal action, but simply a civil action governed by the same procedural rules. Because it requires a single form of action, Rule 2 eliminates most procedural distinctions based on whether a plaintiff's claims are legal or equitable. n1 This is because, in general, procedure should not depend on the labels of law and equity unless justified by a rational and coherent policy. n2 The distinction between law and equity continues to have relevance in determining whether a party is entitled to a jury trial because the constitutional right to a trial by jury is protected only for legal issues and by the civil rules themselves. n3

The distinction between law and equity also continues to be relevant in determining applicable statutes of limitation in diversity cases. Because the merged practice of the civil rules does not affect substantive law, the statute of limitation applicable to a particular claim in a diversity case is not generally affected by the merger of law and equity actions. n4 Statutes of limitation are considered substantive for purposes of the Erie doctrine, which states that state law controls substantive issues in diversity actions, while federal law controls procedural issues. n5 As a result, if determination of the applicable statute of limitation under state law depends on the nature of the complaint asserted, the nature of the complaint will determine the governing statute of limitation in federal court. n6

By requiring a single form of action, Rule 2 eliminates most procedural distinctions based on whether a plaintiff asserts admiralty or non-admiralty claims, or both. n7 Therefore, in most circumstances the procedure that will apply does not depend on whether the plaintiff's claims are based in admiralty. Indeed, the rules generally apply even if they are inconsistent with pre-merger admiralty practice. n8 However, despite the unification of admiralty and general federal civil practice, it is sometimes necessary to determine whether a claim may be heard in admiralty. In the most common example, which occurs at the initiation of a civil action, the district court's subject-matter jurisdiction may depend on whether a claim is properly characterized as an admiralty claim. n9

[4] Elimination of Most Pleading Formalities

By combining all forms of action into one, Rule 2 enables the court to grant full relief among the parties without regard to whether a claim or defense accurately describes the legal theory that is the basis for the claim or defense. The court interprets the pleadings based on the facts alleged and remedy sought, and not the "form of action" asserted by the pleader. n1 Thus, the court must determine the true nature of a claim, such as, whether in contract or in tort, in law or in equity, n2 or corresponding to some specific common-law form of action from the facts alleged, rather than from assertion of a particular legal theory. n3

Rule 2 does not eliminate substantive rules that may depend on the nature of a claim. n4 It merely provides that the nature of the action does not depend on the form of action or legal theory designated by the pleader in the pleading itself. n5 On the other hand, a pleading is not inadequate solely because it inaccurately describes a contract claim as a tort claim or an equitable claim as a legal claim, provided that it adequately describes the facts that entitle the pleader to relief. n6 Indeed, even if the complaint alleges one theory of relief, the action may in appropriate cases properly be tried and plaintiff may recover on a different theory. n7 However, a complaint may still be dismissed under Rule 8(a) if it does not contain a short and plain statement of the claim or if the statement is so unintelligible that the meaning cannot be determined. n8

PART IV. ONLY ONE FORM OF CIVIL ACTION ADJUDICATED IN FEDERAL COURT

1-1 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 1.61

§ 1.61 Claims for Relief May Be Legal, Equitable, and in Admiraltyn*

[1] Court May Adjudicate All Types of Claims Supported by Facts

The effect of the use of a single form of action for all actions within the scope of the rules is that the court may combine all legal, equitable, and admiralty claims in a single action. Thus, a party need not bring legal claims in one legal action and equitable claims in a separate equitable suit. n1 Furthermore, once all of the claims are joined together, they may also all be tried together. n2 Permitting all claims to be joined in a single action promotes the efficient resolution of disputes. The traditional practice, that a court of equity could not take jurisdiction over an action that included claims recognized only at law created considerable inconvenience, because it necessitated two separate trials of the same case whenever that case contained both legal and equitable claims. n3

[2] Adequate Legal Remedy

The merger of law and equity under the rules allows a federal court to exercise both legal and equitable jurisdiction concurrently. Consequently, the court's jurisdiction over an equitable claim does not generally depend on the lack of an adequate legal remedy, unless the court lacks subject-matter jurisdiction over the legal claim. n1 This means that in diversity cases a state law rule requiring a plaintiff to elect between legal and equitable remedies at the commencement of an action or suit does not apply if those rules exist because the state's procedure maintains separate law and equity courts. n2 However, while a complaint may seek both legal and equitable relief without a prior showing of an inadequate legal remedy, the court may still not grant equitable relief unless it first determines that the party seeking equitable relief has no adequate legal remedy. n3

There is now only one form of action which is known as the civil action. n1 The merger of legal and equitable jurisdiction is complete, and a court now may determine all claims, defenses and issues in a single civil action. n1.1 The merger of law and equity eliminates any procedural barrier to the assertion of defenses based on one form of action to claims arising out of another form of action or complaint. For example, there is no procedural barrier to the assertion of equitable defenses to legal claims. n2 Whether a particular defense may be applied to a particular claim depends on the applicable substantive law, which in a diversity case will be state law. n3

§ 1.63 Right to Jury Trial Preserved for Legal Issuesn*

Rule 38 expressly preserves the right to jury trial to the extent granted by the United States Constitution or by federal statute but also provides that the rules do not create a right to jury trial of admiralty issues. n1 Thus, despite the procedural provision for a single form of action under Rule 2, the question of whether a party has a right to jury trial depends on the substantive nature of each issue. n2 Under the merged procedure of Rule 2, in which both jury and non-jury issues may be joined in a single action, the existence of a right to trial by jury is examined for each issue separately, not for the action as a whole. n3 Thus, the right to trial by jury of legal issues is not lost by joinder with equitable issues. n4

The form of an action is generally dispositive as to whether the parties may claim a right to trial by jury. n5 The existence of a right to trial by jury depends on whether an action is more similar in form historically to cases that were tried in courts of law or more similar to suits that were tried in courts of equity or admiralty. n6 For a complete discussion of the applicability of the right to a jury trial, see Ch. 22, Trial by Jury.

PART I Judicial Powers; Law Applied; Evidence
CHAPTER 2 CONCURRENT AND CONFLICTING JURISDICTION
PART I. PRINCIPLES CONTROLLING EXERCISE OF CONCURRENT AND EXCLUSIVE JURISDICTION

1-2 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 2.01

§ 2.01 Nature of Concurrent Jurisdictionn*

[1] Description of Concurrent Jurisdiction

The term "concurrent jurisdiction" means the power of two or more courts to hear a particular dispute at any given time. n1 The term may be used to describe simultaneous jurisdiction by courts within the same court system, for example, when two federal courts have the power to hear a dispute, n2 but usually venue is proper in only one of these courts. n3 However, the term is usually used in the context of simultaneous jurisdiction by state and federal courts, n4 and that is the manner in which the term is generally used in this chapter. For a discussion of "concurrent jurisdiction" as applied to the simultaneous exercise of jurisdiction by more than one federal district court, see § 2.07. For a discussion of "concurrent jurisdiction" as applied to simultaneous jurisdiction among federal courts at different levels, see Ch. 1, Federal Courts.

The concept of concurrent jurisdiction forms the primary basis for removal of a case from state to federal court. Thus, when federal and state courts have concurrent jurisdiction over a suit, a plaintiff has the initial option to select a state or federal forum for the suit. n5 If the plaintiff files in state court, the defendant may be entitled by federal statute to remove the case to federal court. In general, only cases that could have originally been brought in federal court are subject to removal. n6

The relationship between the exclusive or removal jurisdiction of the federal courts and the concurrent jurisdiction of both the federal and the state courts creates many facets of legal rights and remedies within which the jurisdiction of federal and state courts may conflict. Such conflicts must be resolved according to the applicable statutes, if any, the rules developed by the courts themselves, and the general principles of comity, n7 as discussed in part II. n8

[2] Source of Concurrent Jurisdiction of State and Federal Courts

Federal courts are courts of limited jurisdiction, which means that the courts may exercise their judicial power only to the extent permitted by the Constitution and, therefore, to the extent specified by Congress. n1 On the other hand, state courts are courts of general jurisdiction, which means that a state court may generally hear any types of cases except those cases that have been specifically prohibited, either by federal law or by the state of the particular court. n2

Pursuant to Article III of the Constitution, Congress has created the federal district courts as trial courts and granted them exclusive jurisdiction in matters involving admiralty, bankruptcy, patents, copyrights and trademarks, and concurrent jurisdiction with the state courts in federal question and diversity of citizenship cases. n3 Based on this constitutional and statutory language, the Supreme Court has held that there is a presumption of concurrent jurisdiction, even over federal claims, absent evidence of a congressional intent to vest exclusive jurisdiction over a particular matter in the federal courts. n4 The Supreme Court has also noted that, until Congress in 1875 provided the lower federal courts with general federal question jurisdiction, the state courts provided the only forum for vindicating most important federal claims. n5

[3] Possible Effects of Concurrent Jurisdiction

[a] Repetitive and Reactive Suits

The existence of dual federal/state court systems with concurrent jurisdiction may have the effect of encouraging the filing of repetitive suits in the federal and state courts. A "repetitive suit" occurs when a plaintiff files multiple actions based on similar or identical causes of action against the same defendant in different forums. n1 A plaintiff may file a repetitive suit, for example, to try to ensure that the court will have personal jurisdiction over the defendant, n2 to "shop" for the most favorable forum, such as the forum with favorable applicable law, jury selection, and possible remedies or damage awards, n3 or to obtain the fastest adjudication possible, when one forum's courts are subject to possible delays, docket congestion, or a backlog of cases. n4

A "reactive suit" is similar to a repetitive suit in that it is a new suit filed by the defendant in the first suit in another court system, seeking relief against the plaintiff in the first suit, based on the same transaction or occurrence that is the subject matter of the first suit. n5 One of the most common types of reactive suits is a federal declaratory judgment action, which a state court defendant typically initiates in federal court, seeking a declaration that the state court defendant is not liable for the state claim. The rationale for this action is that if the federal court issues a favorable declaratory judgment prior to the state court's resolution of the issue, the federal declaratory judgment may preclude relitigation of the issue in state court. n6

[b] Race to Judgment and Court's Attempts to Control Dual Litigation

Neither federal nor state courts have the power to simply ignore the preclusive effects of judgments that have been rendered; thus, a litigant may not file a repetitive or reactive suit if the suit is merely an attempt to relitigate a suit that has already come to judgment, n7 or if the suit is an "unreasonable" and "vexatious" multiplication of proceedings, because in such circumstances the party and attorney may both be subjected to sanctions and awards of costs for filing frivolous pleadings or pursuing vexatious litigation. n8 The result of the res judicata effect is that litigants will often initiate a "race to judgment" by filing either repetitive or reactive suits in both state and federal forums in order to be the first to obtain the judgment. n9

The effects of concurrent jurisdiction and preclusion by judgment may in turn result in procedural maneuvering in which the litigant will request that the federal court enjoin the state action. Generally, this has been prohibited by Congress under the Anti-Injunction Act, n10 which imposes a ban on the issuance of a federal injunction against a pending state court action. However, there are several statutory and judicially recognized exceptions to this ban, which are discussed in Part II of this chapter. n11 Another related issue that results from concurrent jurisdiction is that of federal court abstention. Under the doctrine of abstention, the federal court may decline to adjudicate a case, even though all jurisdictional requirements have been met and the dispute is justiciable, on the grounds that sound judicial administration requires the court not to hear the case in the context of duplicative, concurrent federal-state litigation. n12 The ramifications of abstention are discussed in Part III of this chapter. n13

PART I. PRINCIPLES CONTROLLING EXERCISE OF CONCURRENT AND EXCLUSIVE JURISDICTION

1-2 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 2.02

§ 2.02 Nature of Exclusive Jurisdictionn*

[1] Exclusive Jurisdiction in Federal Court

In contrast to cases of concurrent jurisdiction, in which multiple courts have the power to determine a controversy, n1 exclusive jurisdiction means that only a particular level or type of court may determine the claim or controversy. n2 Such jurisdiction usually arises by statute. Under the Federal Tort Claims Act, n3 for example, the federal district courts have exclusive jurisdiction over civil actions against the United States for money damages for injury to, or loss of, property, personal injury, or wrongful death. n3.1 Similarly, The Tucker Act n3.2 gives the United States Court of Federal Claims exclusive jurisdiction over claims for damages exceeding $ 10,000 that are founded on any express or implied contract with the United States. n3.3

However, exclusive jurisdiction does not necessarily mean that a claim under an exclusively federal statute may never be decided in state court. Even if federal courts have exclusive jurisdiction over a cause of action arising under a particular federal statute, a state court may decide federal issues under that statute if the issues arise in the course of a proceeding that is within the state court's jurisdiction. For example, federal district courts have original, exclusive jurisdiction over patent cases. n4 However, if the validity of a patent becomes an issue in a breach of contract action in state court, the state court may decide the validity of the patent for purposes of that action. n5

[2] Exclusive Jurisdiction in State Court

Some federal statutes specifically provide that the jurisdiction to enforce the statute is exclusively in the federal courts or exclusively in the state courts. n1 Otherwise, federal courts generally do not have subject matter jurisdiction unless a case involves a federal question n2 or arises under state law and involves citizens of different states and an amount in controversy exceeding $75,000. n3 All other cases are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the state courts. n4

Under the common law, the Supreme Court has also imposed restrictions on the federal courts' jurisdiction in two areas and established that state courts have exclusive jurisdiction in those areas. These two exceptions to federal diversity jurisdiction recognize that the disposition of these types of cases are appropriate only in state, n5 rather than federal, court: n6

1. Certain domestic relations claims. A federal court may not exercise diversity jurisdiction in a narrow range of domestic relations issues. The federal court may not exercise jurisdiction regarding divorce, alimony, and child custody decrees. However, the Supreme Court has held that the federal courts may take claims alleging the commission of torts. n7

2. Claims in probate proceedings. A federal court may not exercise diversity jurisdiction to probate a will, annul a will, or administer a decedent's estate. Furthermore, it also precludes federal courts from endeavoring to dispose of property that is in the custody of a state probate court. However, this probate exception does not bar federal courts from adjudicating matters such as claims of creditors, legatees, heirs, and other claimants against a decedent's estate provided that the federal court does not interfere with the probate proceedings. n8 For further discussion of federal court jurisdiction based on diversity of citizenship, see Ch. 5, Original Jurisdiction over the Subject Matter.

CHAPTER 2 CONCURRENT AND CONFLICTING JURISDICTION
PART I. PRINCIPLES CONTROLLING EXERCISE OF CONCURRENT AND EXCLUSIVE JURISDICTION

1-2 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 2.03

§ 2.03 Whether Jurisdiction Is Concurrent or Exclusive Is Based on Type of Claimn*

[1] Claims Based on Federal Law

[a] Presumption That Jurisdiction Is Concurrent

Jurisdiction over claims arising from federal law is presumed to be concurrent in both state and federal courts. As a general principle, a state court may assume jurisdiction over cases arising under federal laws in the absence of a provision by Congress to the contrary or disabling incompatibility between the federal claims and state-court adjudication. n1 The presumption is based on the reasoning that the Constitution does not require the creation of any federal courts other than the United States Supreme Court n2 and, therefore, that the drafters of the Constitution intended originally that state courts would serve as trial courts for the adjudication of federal law, along with any federal courts that would be specifically created by Congress. n3

Congress has the power to allocate jurisdiction over federal law claims between federal and state courts but often fails to make an allocation, either intentionally or inadvertently. The omission of a provision stating that federal jurisdiction is exclusive is strong evidence that Congress had no such intent. n4

[b] Rebuttal of Presumption of Concurrent Jurisdiction

The presumption that jurisdiction over a federal claim is concurrent in both state and federal courts may be rebutted by establishing any one of the following three circumstances: n5

1. An explicit statutory directive by Congress that jurisdiction over the claim is exclusive in the federal court. Congress has the constitutional authority to allocate jurisdiction between state and federal courts with regard to claims based on federal law n6 and has frequently specified that only federal courts may adjudicate certain types of claims. For example, Congress has expressly provided that federal district courts have exclusive original jurisdiction over admiralty and maritime cases, except to the extent that the jurisdictional "save to suitors" statute n7 allows plaintiffs to pursue remedies to which they are otherwise entitled in state court. n8

2. An unmistakable implication from the legislative history that Congress intended to create exclusive jurisdiction. For example, the inclusion of clear language restricting jurisdiction to the federal district courts, without any qualifying statements, overcomes the presumption of concurrent jurisdiction, because it demonstrates Congress's intent to restrict jurisdiction to the federal courts. n9

3. A clear incompatibility between state court jurisdiction and federal interests. n10 Several factors may indicate that the exercise of state court jurisdiction would be incompatible with federal interests, such as the desirability of uniform interpretation of federal law, the expertise of federal judges in federal law, and the presumably greater accommodation that federal courts would provide to federal claims. For example, if a federal statute creates a cause of action that incorporates state laws, concurrent state jurisdiction is not incompatible with the statute, because there would be no need for uniform interpretation, and state judges have expertise about and accommodation toward the state laws incorporated in the federal cause of action. n11

It should be noted that, after analysis of the three factors specified above, the court may well conclude that Congress intended that the state courts have exclusive jurisdiction over a particular cause of action. For example, it has been held that state courts have exclusive jurisdiction over private actions filed to obtain an injunction or treble damages under the federal Telephone Consumer Protection Act. n12

[2] Claims Based on State Law

Generally, state courts have exclusive jurisdiction over claims arising from state law. n1 However, federal courts have concurrent jurisdiction over claims arising from state law in the limited circumstances of "diversity jurisdiction" or "supplemental jurisdiction." Diversity jurisdiction is applicable when a case arising under state law involves citizens of different states and the amount in controversy exceeds $75,000. A party invoking a federal court's diversity jurisdiction must be completely diverse, which means that none of the defendants may be a citizen of the same state as any of the plaintiffs. n2

A federal court may exercise supplemental jurisdiction over a state law claim when the federal court already has original jurisdiction of the case based on a federal question or on diversity, and the state law claim is part of the same case or controversy. n3 Without the rule of supplemental jurisdiction, federal courts could not assume jurisdiction over a purely state based claim even if it were intimately related to a federal claim, and if litigants were forced to split their cases up between federal and state forums, the doctrines of res judicata and collateral estoppel might produce unpredictable and unfair results. n4

For further discussion of federal court jurisdiction based on diversity of citizenship, and for further discussion of supplemental jurisdiction, see Ch. 5, Original Jurisdiction over the Subject Matter. For a discussion of the Erie doctrine, and the law that must be applied by federal courts deciding state law issues, see Ch. 3, Law Applied.

§ 2.04 State Court Exercise of Jurisdiction Over Federal Claimn*

The United States Constitution generally requires state trial courts to hear and determine claims that arise under federal law. n1 However, a state court may not adjudicate a federal claim when Congress, under the preemption doctrine, has denied state-court jurisdiction over a particular, federal-law based claim. n1.1 Additionally, a state court has discretion to decline to hear a federal claim when it has a valid reason under some other law. For example, a state court may decline jurisdiction for the following reasons:

1. A state rule of judicial administration, provided that the rule does not discriminate against federal claims and is not preempted by federal law. n2

2. The existence of a more convenient forum is in the federal court, and the state court is an inconvenient forum under the doctrine of forum non conveniens. n3

3. State law provides for discretionary dismissal of both federal and state claims when neither the plaintiff nor the defendant is a resident of the forum state. n4

4. State law limits the state court's subject-matter jurisdiction and the subject matter of the federal suit is outside the court's jurisdiction. n5

§ 2.05 Removal to Federal Court Allowed in Some Cases of Concurrent Jurisdictionn*

"Removal" is a statutory right that may apply when federal and state courts have concurrent jurisdiction over a suit. When jurisdiction is concurrent, the plaintiff has the initial option to select a state or federal forum for the suit. n1 If the plaintiff files in state court, the defendant may be entitled by the federal removal statute to remove the case to federal court. n2 The requirements for removal are beyond the scope of this chapter and are discussed in Ch. 8, Removal From State Courts. However, this section briefly summarizes the removal concepts that are particularly pertinent to the problems of overlapping state and federal jurisdiction.

Generally, any civil action filed in state court may be removed to the federal district court for the district in which the state court is located if the district court could have exercised original jurisdiction over the action. n3 However, it is not necessary that the state court have valid jurisdiction over the case in order for there to be valid removal jurisdiction. n4 A federal court that would have had original jurisdiction over a case may hear and determine any claim removed from state court, even if the state court lacked proper jurisdiction. n5

The federal court must generally rely on either federal question or diversity jurisdiction to support removal. However, Congress has enacted special removal provisions applicable to a variety of actions, including certain civil actions against federal officers. n6 If a state complaint contains multiple claims, including a federal question or a claim supporting diversity jurisdiction, the entire case may be removed to federal court, even if some of the claims thus removed are separate and independent from the claim involving a federal question or diversity jurisdiction and could not be removed by themselves. Once an entire case is removed to federal court, the court then has discretion to adjudicate the entire case or remand to state court any matters that are predominantly governed by state law. n7 Additionally, federal courts may remand actions that were improperly removed to federal court. n8

PART I Judicial Powers; Law Applied; Evidence
CHAPTER 2 CONCURRENT AND CONFLICTING JURISDICTION
PART I. PRINCIPLES CONTROLLING EXERCISE OF CONCURRENT AND EXCLUSIVE JURISDICTION

1-2 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 2.06

§ 2.06 Constitutional Prohibition Against Certain Federal Suits Against State Governmentn*

[1] Eleventh Amendment Immunity for States Against Certain Suits

The Eleventh Amendment grants sovereign immunity to the states against suits in federal court and prevents subjecting a nonconsenting state to the process of judicial tribunals at the initiation of private parties. n1 Thus, the Eleventh Amendment generally prohibits federal courts from exercising original jurisdiction over any suit against a state by citizens of another state or by citizens or subjects of any foreign country. n2 The courts have also interpreted the Eleventh Amendment to prevent federal courts from exercising original jurisdiction in the following types of suits:

1. A suit against a state by one of its own citizens. n3

2. A suit against a state by a foreign sovereign. n4

3. A suit against a state by a Native American tribe. In this regard, Native American tribes are deemed to be sovereigns by the courts. n5 Although the Eleventh Amendment does not expressly preclude suits by sovereigns, as noted in item 2, above, the courts have interpreted the Eleventh Amendment sovereign immunity to extend to suits against states by any sovereign other than the United States government, including Native American tribes. n6

4. A suit against a state official when the state government is actually the real party in interest. If a judgment will operate against the state, litigation against a state officer effectively makes the state a real party in interest. n7

5. A suit against a state agency or state board when such an entity is acting as an arm of the state and when liability of the entity would have the same practical consequences as a judgment against the state itself. n8 For purposes of this rule, the Supreme court has held that a county is not an arm of the state, and therefore, sovereign immunity does not extend to counties. n9

[2] Scope of Eleventh Amendment Immunity

The Supreme Court has not yet decided whether Eleventh Amendment immunity is a matter of federal subject-matter jurisdiction. n1 The Eleventh Amendment is sufficiently in the nature of a jurisdictional requirement that a state may raise the defense at any time, including for the first time on appeal, n2 and the court has discretion to raise the issue sua sponte. n3 Eleventh Amendment immunity is not a jurisdictional requirement because it is not coextensive with the restriction on judicial power set out in Article III of the Constitution. However, unlike subject-matter jurisdiction, a state may waive Eleventh Amendment immunity through its own conduct: by legislation, by removing an action to federal court, or by appearing without objection and defending on the merits. n4

The Supreme Court has held that when a claim is barred by the Eleventh Amendment, the federal court may dismiss or remand the claims, n6 except in the case of removed claims. n7 When a claim that has been removed to federal court is barred by the Eleventh Amendment, the case must be remanded to the state court and may not be dismissed by the federal court. n8

[3] Exceptions to Eleventh Amendment Prohibition of Suit Against State

[a] Exceptions Are Based on Nature of Claim and Parties

The Eleventh Amendment is limited in scope by its language n.01 and by case law interpreting that language. n1 There are five general categories of limitations on the Eleventh Amendment prohibition of suits against a state government. The first exception is for any cases that are not filed in the federal trial courts, such as cases on appeal and cases in state court. n2 Second, the immunity provided by the Eleventh Amendment generally does not apply when particular persons are suing the state. n3 Third, the Eleventh Amendment does not apply when the suit designates a defendant other than a state government. n4 Fourth, a state may waive the immunity that it has under the Eleventh Amendment or otherwise consent to suit in federal court. n5 Fifth, Congress may by statute abrogate the states' Eleventh Amendment immunity in federal court if it makes its intention to abrogate unmistakably clear in the language of the statute and acts pursuant to a valid exercise of its power under Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment to protect an important constitutional interest. n5.1

[b] Amendment Not Applicable to Appeals or Cases in State Court

The Eleventh Amendment applies only to cases involving original jurisdiction in federal court. It does not apply to appellate jurisdiction--therefore, the United States Supreme Court may exercise its appellate jurisdiction to review state court decisions in any suits brought against a state. n6 Additionally, the Eleventh Amendment does not affect state court jurisdiction to adjudicate suits against a state. n7 Also, a state has no sovereign immunity against suits filed in other states' courts. n8

[c] Exception for Certain Plaintiffs

The immunity provided by the Eleventh Amendment generally applies only when particular persons are suing the state. Thus, a state has protection from suit in federal court only when the plaintiff is a citizen of another state, a citizen of a foreign country, or foreign country. n9 Therefore, the Eleventh Amendment does not bar the federal government n10 or other states n11 from suing a state in federal court. n12

[d] Exception When Defendant is Other Than State Government

The Eleventh Amendment applies only to suits that designate a state government as a defendant. Therefore, a state officer who is sued in an individual capacity is not protected under the Amendment, while an individual sued in a official state capacity is protected. n13 Similarly, the Eleventh Amendment does not prevent a party from suing a state political subdivision of a state in federal court unless the political subdivision is actually acting as part of the state government. n14 In the same way, a local government is not protected by the Eleventh Amendment unless it is acting as the state. n15 A number of factors may be considered in making the determination of whether an entity is acting as the state government, such as whether state funds would be used to pay a judgment against the entity, the nature of the entity as created by state law, and whether the entity exercises the state power and is under state control. n16

[e] Waiver or Consent to Suit

A state may waive its Eleventh Amendment immunity from federal court suit with regard to a particular claim, n17 either by express statement n18 or by conduct. n19 A state may waive its Eleventh Amendment immunity to suit in three particular ways: (1) by a clear declaration that it intends to submit itself to the jurisdiction of a federal court or administrative proceeding; (2) by consent to, or participation in, a federal program for which waiver of immunity is an express condition; or (3) by affirmative conduct in litigation. n20 The following are the requirements for each type of waiver:

1. To make an express waiver, a state must, through a person or entity authorized to take state action, explicitly and unequivocally set forth the state's intention to subject itself to suit in federal court with respect to a particular claim or type of claim. n21 A state may not waive Eleventh Amendment immunity by implication, and a waiver may not be constructive. n22 A waiver of immunity may be accomplished by provision of the state constitution or by legislation, provided that the constitutional or statutory provision explicitly specifies the state's intention to subject itself to suit in federal court. n23 A state official may also waive a state's Eleventh Amendment immunity, provided that the official is specifically authorized to do so by that state's constitution, statutes, or court decisions. n24

2. The second type of waiver occurs if a state consents to, or participates in, a federal program that expressly conditions participation in the program on a total or partial waiver of Eleventh Amendment immunity. For example, the federal program may require that the state waive its immunity with respect to awards of prospective equitable relief in a federal forum resulting from grievance procedures applicable to disputes regarding the program. n25 Such a waiver must be specified in unequivocal terms or by such overwhelming implication from the text as will leave no room for any other reasonable construction. n26

3. A state may also waive its immunity under the Eleventh Amendment by direct conduct. n27 Thus, a state may waive its immunity by voluntarily invoking the jurisdiction of the federal courts, n28 such as by voluntarily removing an action to federal court n29 or by defending a case in federal court on the merits. n30 On the other hand, a state does not waive its immunity by appearing in federal court merely to object to federal jurisdiction. n31 The Supreme court has also held that a state essentially waives its Eleventh Amendment immunity when it approves a consent decree based on a federal law directed to protecting federal interests. n32

[f] Explicit Abrogation of Immunity by Congress

The Supreme Court has held that Congress may, by statute, abrogate the states' Eleventh Amendment immunity from suit in federal court, provided that two conditions are met: (1) Congress must make its intention to abrogate unmistakably clear in the language of the statute, and (2) Congress must have acted pursuant to a valid exercise of its constitutional power under Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment. n33 The Supreme Court has established a two-step analysis to determine if these conditions have been met. n34 In the first step, the court determines whether Congress has unequivocally expressed its intent to abrogate the immunity. This intent must be obvious from a clear legislative statement in the language of the statute. n35 For example, the Supreme Court has held that a provision of the Americans with Disabilities Act is precisely the required type of unequivocal expression of intent to abrogate state immunity; n36 it provides that "A State shall not be immune under the eleventh amendment to the Constitution of the United States from an action in Federal or State court of competent jurisdiction for a violation of this Act." n37

If the court finds that Congress clearly intended to abrogate Eleventh Amendment immunity, it then determines whether Congress acted pursuant to a valid exercise of power in promulgating the abrogation. In this step, the Court determines if the statute in question was passed pursuant to a constitutional provision that gives Congress the power to abrogate

Eleventh Amendment immunity, n38 that is, by Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment. n39 An abrogation is not valid unless it is structured to safeguard a constitutionally protected interest, n40 such as, the right to be free from gender-based discrimination pursuant to the Equal Protection Clause. n41 The Supreme Court has also held that Congress has also effectively abrogated the states' Eleventh Amendment immunity with respect to Title II of the Americans With Disabilities Act n42 which states that no qualified individual with a disability may be excluded from participation in or be denied the benefits of the services, programs, or activities of a public entity, including access to the courts. n43

§ 2.07 Concurrent Multidistrict Litigation in Federal Courtsn*

[1] Definition of Multidistrict Litigation

In the federal courts, the expression "multidistrict litigation" is used to denote related actions pending simultaneously in more than one district court. n1 "Multidistrict litigation" means multiple civil actions pending in different districts that involve one or more common questions of fact. The term arises under a statutory scheme allowing for transfer for coordination or consolidation of pretrial proceedings for the convenience of the parties and to promote the just and efficient conduct of multidistrict actions. n2 There are no numerical requirements specifying either the minimum number of actions or the minimum number of districts that must be involved before a transfer may be considered by the Panel on Multidistrict Litigation. As few as two cases may warrant multidistrict litigation pretrial coordination or consolidation. n3 One common type of case that has been consolidated as multidistrict litigation for pretrial proceedings is litigation involving medical products, such as the "bone screw" used to fuse bones together, which may involve thousands of related lawsuits. n4

[2] Purpose of Multidistrict Litigation Statute

If more than one civil action involving one or more common questions of fact is pending in different judicial districts, the multidistrict litigation statute authorizes the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation to consolidate and transfer them to a single district for coordinated or consolidated pretrial proceedings. n1 The purpose of this transfer procedure is to conserve judicial resources n2 and to avoid the delays that would result if all aspects of each action, such as discovery, were conducted separately. n3 However, it must be emphasized that the multidistrict litigation procedure applies only to pretrial proceedings. The statute permits the transferee court to deal with the pretrial proceedings that are common to all of the actions in a single unified setting, but then requires that the actions be remanded to the districts from which they were transferred for trial, if necessary. n4

[3] Function of Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation

Under the multidistrict litigation statute, Congress created a Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation (Panel), and authorized the Panel to: (1) initiate proceedings for transfer of appropriate multidistrict litigation cases and hold hearings on proposed transfers; (2) transfer civil actions for pretrial proceedings; (3) assign a judge to hear and conduct such proceedings; (4) act as deposition judges and designate other judges when appropriate to act as deposition judges in any district; and (5) remand transferred actions to the district from which they were transferred. n1 The Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation consists of seven circuit and district court judges chosen by the Chief Justice of the United States. n2

A case may be transferred under the Multidistrict Litigation Statute only if the prospective transferor court has subject-matter jurisdiction over the action. n3 Once this threshold requirement is met, the Panel may transfer an action to any district; thus, venue objections do not prevent the Panel from transferring a case. n4 The Panel has enacted its own rules of procedure that control the manner in which such a transfer is made. n5 These Multidistrict Rules primarily prescribe how the Panel conducts consolidations and transfers pursuant to the multidistrict statute, but the transferor courts and transferee courts are controlled by the Rules only as explicitly provided, and only in a manner not inconsistent with federal statutes and the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. n6 These rules are discussed in [5], below, and are reproduced verbatim at the end of this chapter in Appendix 2.

The Panel has authority to transfer civil actions involving one or more common questions of fact that are pending in different judicial districts to any federal district court for coordinated or consolidated pretrial proceedings if it determines that the transfer will be for the convenience of the parties and witnesses and will promote the just and efficient conduct of the actions. n7 Civil actions of any kind may be transferred by the Panel. The most frequently consolidated matters are: n8 antitrust cases, n9 products liability suits, n10 securities litigation, patent and trademark cases, n11 and air crash disaster claims. n12

At the conclusion of the transferred pretrial proceedings, each transferred action is to be remanded to the district from which it was transferred, for trial or additional proceedings, unless the action has been terminated in the course of the consolidated pretrial proceedings. Although the essential purpose of the multidistrict litigation statute is to achieve pretrial efficiency, such as by supervising discovery, the transferee judge also has the authority to decide all pretrial motions, including motions that entirely dispose of the case. n13

[4] Grounds for Transfer of Case

[a] Bases for Grant of Transfer

There are three requirements necessary for an order of transfer under the multidistrict litigation statute. The civil actions pending in different districts must involve (1) one or more common questions of fact, (2) the transfer must be for the convenience of parties and witnesses, and (3) the transfer must promote the just and efficient conduct of the actions. n1 The party moving for transfer has the burden of showing that the statutory requirements for transfer are met. n2 When balancing these three individual requirements for transfer, the Panel must consider the overall purpose of the multidistrict litigation statute to achieve efficiencies in the pretrial process. n3 Thus, no individual requirement is determinative. n4

Under the first requirement, a common question of fact among the cases must be sufficient that a transfer under the multidistrict litigation statute would serve the overall convenience of the parties and witnesses and promote the just and efficient conduct of the entire litigation, and if the separate actions could be conducted separately just as efficiently as if consolidated, the transfer should be denied. n5 With respect to the second requirement of the multidistrict litigation statute, the Panel must consider the convenience of the parties and the witnesses as a factor in determining whether a transfer should be ordered. The Panel must look to the overall convenience of all the parties and witnesses rather than looking to the individual convenience of each party and each witness. n6

Under the third requirement for transfer, the Panel must determine whether consolidating and transferring the related civil actions will promote the just and efficient conduct of the actions. n7 This requirement also has been considered the most important, because the requirement essentially implements the purpose of the Multidistrict Litigation Act. n8 The term "efficiency" in the statute means to conserve judicial resources by streamlining pretrial proceedings to avoid conflicting contemporaneous pretrial rulings by coordinating district and appellate courts in multidistrict civil actions involving common questions of fact. n9 For example, efficient judicial administration can be achieved by conducting the pretrial proceedings in the related cases in one forum and avoiding the duplication of discovery that would result from litigating the actions separately. Additionally, one judge may make a single ruling on pretrial matters, thus avoiding repeated rulings on the same issue and the possibility of conflicting rulings issued by several judges. n10

[b] Bases for Denial of Transfer

Several factors may be considered by the Panel that weigh against the consolidation of multidistrict litigation. First, the Panel may deny consolidation by transfer if the pretrial proceedings in a case or group of cases have been completed or are near completion, because a transfer of the actions under the multidistrict litigation statute would not serve any of the purposes of the statute. n11

Second, the Panel may deny transfer if there is insufficient complexity or commonality of factual issues. Therefore, the Panel requires the party moving for a transfer to show that any common questions of fact are so complex, n12 and the accompanying discovery so time-consuming, that the advantages of combining the actions for coordinated or consolidated pretrial proceedings overcomes the inconvenience to some of the litigants and their witnesses in the actions that are being considered for transfer. n13 This factor of complexity is weighed more heavily if only a few actions are involved in the proposed transfer. n14

Third, even though it has the authority to order a group of actions transferred for coordinated or consolidated pretrial proceedings the Panel may consider the strong opposition of the parties to the transfer and any absence of the party's affirmative support for a transfer as a factor (although not determinative) in denying a transfer. n15 The court may also consider offers of voluntary cooperation among parties against a transfer; however, such offers are also not determinative. n16

[5] Procedure for Transfer of Multidistict Litigation

[a] Motions, Filing, and Proof of Service

All requests of the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation to take any action, including an initial Motion to Transfer for Coordinated or Consolidated Pretrial Proceedings n1 must be in the form specified by the multidistrict rules. n2 The Panel uses an "Electronic Case Filing" (ECF) automated system that receives and stores documents filed in electronic form. All attorneys filing pleadings with the Panel must do so using ECF. n3 All pro se individuals are to file as non-ECF users, unless the Panel orders otherwise. n4 The term pleadings as used in the rules refers to all papers, motions, responses, or replies of any kind filed with the Panel, including exhibits attached to such documents, as well as all orders and notices that the Panel issues. n5

Pleadings must be in the following format: n6

> 1. The heading "Before the United States Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation," the identification "MDL No. _____" and the descriptive title designated by the Panel. If the Panel has not yet designated a title, counsel must use an appropriate description. n7
> 2. The last page of each pleading must contain the name, address, telephone number, fax number, and email address of the attorney or party designated to receive service of pleadings in the case, and the name of each party represented. n8
> 3. Each brief submitted with a pleading and any response to it shall not exceed 20 pages, exclusive of exhibits. Each reply shall not exceed 10 pages and shall address arguments raised in the response(s). In exceptional circumstances, the Panel will not grant motions to exceed page limits. n9

4. Each pleading must be typed in size 12 point font (for both text and footnotes), double spaced (text only), in a letter size document (8 1/2 x 11 inch) with sequentially numbered pages. n10

5. Each exhibit must be separately numbered and clearly identified. n11

Motions for consolidation must be filed with the Panel by a party in any action in which transfer for coordinated or consolidated pretrial proceedings under this section may be appropriate. A copy of the motion must also be filed in the district court in which the moving party's action is pending, n12 and in each district court where the motion affects a pending action. n13 Counsel must sign and verify all pleadings electronically in accordance with the Multidistrict Rules and the Panel's Administrative Policies and Procedures for Electronic Case Filing found at www.jpml.uscourts.gov. A pleading filed electronically constitutes a written document for the purpose of the Multidistrict Rules and the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and is deemed the electronically signed original of the pleading. n14 Counsel must also serve the Clerk of the Panel with a courtesy paper copy of most pleadings within one business day of their filing. n15

All pleadings must contain a proof of service on all other parties in all involved actions. The Panel's notice of electronic filing shall constitute service of pleadings. Registration/possession by counsel of an ECF account with any United States federal court will be deemed consent to receive electronic service of all pleadings. n16 The proof of service pertaining to motions for a transfer or remand pursuant to Section 1407(a) must certify that counsel has transmitted a copy of the motion for filing to the clerk of each district court where an affected action is pending. n17

[b] Entities Entitled to Move for Transfer and Consolidation

Either the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation itself, or any party in any action in which coordinated or consolidated pretrial proceedings would be appropriate, may initiate a proceeding to transfer an action under the multidistrict litigation statute. n18 If the proceedings are to be initiated by a party, the initiation process is commenced by the filing of a motion for transfer and a brief in support of the motion. Motions for consolidation must be filed with the Panel. A copy of the motion must also be filed in the district court in which the moving party's action is pending, n19 and in each district court where the motion affects a pending action. n20 If the Panel learns of the pendency of related or similar cases filed in different district courts, the Panel will initiate the transfer proceedings by having the Clerk of the Panel serve a show-cause order on all the parties involved, directing them to show cause why the actions should not be transferred for coordinated or consolidated pretrial proceedings. n21

[c] Hearing on Motions

The Panel must notify the parties in all actions in which transfers for coordinated or consolidated pretrial proceedings are being contemplated, either through a motion to transfer or a show-cause order, and must specify the time and place for a hearing where a determination on whether to order the transfer will be made. n22

The Panel will not consider transfer or remand of any action pending in a federal district court when any party timely opposes such transfer or remand without first holding a hearing session for the presentation of oral argument. The Panel may dispense with oral argument if it determines either that the dispositive issue(s) have been authoritatively decided or that the facts and legal arguments are adequately presented and oral argument would not significantly aid the decisional process. Unless otherwise ordered, the Panel will consider all matters on the basis of the pleadings. n23 Any party affected by a motion may file a separate statement setting forth reasons why oral argument should, or need not, be heard. The parties affected by a motion to transfer may agree to waive oral argument, and the Panel will take this into consideration in determining the need for oral argument. n24

The Chair of the Panel determines the time, place, and agenda for any hearing session, and the Clerk of the Panel must give appropriate notice to counsel for all parties. n25 Absent exceptional circumstances, the Panel will allot a maximum of 20 minutes for oral argument in each matter, the time to be divided among those with varying viewpoints. Counsel for the moving party or parties shall generally be heard first. n26

The Panel must promptly notify counsel of those matters in which oral argument is scheduled, as well as those matters that the Panel will consider on the pleadings. The Clerk of the Panel will require counsel to file and serve notice of their intent to either make or waive oral argument. Failure to do so shall be deemed a waiver of oral argument. If counsel does not attend oral argument, the matter will not be rescheduled and that party's position shall be treated as submitted for decision on the basis of the pleadings filed. n27

Absent Panel approval and good cause shown, only those parties to actions who have filed a motion or written response to a motion or order will be permitted to present oral argument. n28 The Panel will not receive oral testimony except upon notice, motion and an order expressly providing for it. n29

In any action set for oral argument the attorneys must confer separately prior to that argument for the purpose of organizing their arguments and selecting representatives to present all views without duplication. Oral argument is a means for the attorneys to emphasize the key points of their arguments, and to update the Panel on any events occurring after the conclusion of briefing. n30

[d] Determination of Order Granting or Denying Motion to Transfer

After consideration of the motions and the papers submitted in the case, n31 and the record of any hearing, n32 the Panel will issue an order granting or denying a transfer. The court must support its order by findings of fact and conclusions of law, n33 and the order must be based on the factors used to determine the issue. n34 A transfer order and any other orders that the Panel may issue in the matter afterward must be filed with the clerk of the transferee district court and are effective when filed. n35

In its order, the Panel must specify the district court that will be the transferee court for the actions. n36 The transferee court must be the court that will further the convenience of the parties and witnesses and will promote the just and efficient conduct of the actions. n37 The Panel is not restricted by venue and personal jurisdiction considerations in its determination. n38 Rather, provided that the convenience of the parties and witnesses is accommodated and a just and efficient conduct of the actions may be achieved, the Panel may transfer the actions to any district. n39 Thus, the Panel will consider factors such as the district in which the broader-based of the actions, as well as the earliest to be filed, was originally initiated, n40 which district has the most cases pending, n41 which district has pending any related bankruptcy actions involving a party, n42 and a potential transferee forum's docket condition. n43

Finally, the Panel must assign the transferred cases to a particular judge or judges to conduct the actions in the transferee district. n44 Even though the Panel usually assigns the actions to a judge who is a member of the transferee district court, and the presence of a judge in that district may be an important factor in selecting that district as the transferee forum, n45 the judge or judges need not be members of the transferee district court. n46 The Panel generally will favor a judge who is most familiar with the particular facts and legal issues raised by the cases. n47 Especially in the case of particularly complex multidistrict litigation, the Panel will favor assignment to a judge who has already demonstrated an ability to handle such litigation. n48

[e] Conditional Transfer Orders for Tag-Along Actions

A "tag along action" refers to any civil action pending in a district court which involves common questions of fact with either actions on a pending motion to transfer to create an MDL or actions previously transferred to an existing MDL, and which the Panel would consider transferring under Section 1407. n49

If the Clerk of the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation becomes aware of a possible tag-along action pending in a district court other than the transferee district court, the Clerk may enter a conditional transfer order. Such an order provides for the transfer of the tag-along action to the previously designated transferee district court, on the basis of the prior hearing and for the reasons expressed in the previous opinions and orders of the Panel that consolidated and transferred the previous group of related civil actions. n50 However, just as in the multidistrict litigation, the Panel or the district court may deny a motion to transfer a tag-along action unless the requested consolidation would promote the just and efficient conduct of the lawsuit. n51

[f] Termination or Remand

In many cases, an action that had been transferred for consolidated or coordinated pretrial proceedings under the multidistrict litigation statute is disposed of completely in the transferee court. n52 A case that has been completely disposed of need not be remanded to the transferor district by the Panel, but rather is terminated and dismissed by the transferee district court. Even though the essential purpose of the multidistrict litigation statute is to achieve pretrial efficiency, including facilitating speedy discovery, the transferee judge also has the authority to decide pretrial motions that completely dispose of a case, n53 such as motions for judgment approving a settlement, n54 for dismissal, for judgment on the pleadings, and for summary judgment. n55 However, if a transferred action has not been terminated in the transferee district court, the Panel must remand it to the transferor district at the conclusion of the coordinated or consolidated pretrial proceedings. n56 Remand by the panel is mandatory if both (1) the case has not been previously terminated and (2) coordinated or consolidated pretrialproceedings have concluded. In all other cases, remand is discretionary. For remand purposes, pretrial proceedings do not conclude until a final pretrial order is entered and all prior proceedings, such as rulings on motions for summary judgment, have been decided. n57

A request for remand may be initiated by a party, at the suggestion of the transferee district court, or by the Panel itself. Although remand proceedings may be initiated by any of those persons, actions transferred under the multidistrict litigation statute may be actually remanded only by order of the Panel itself. n58 In practice, the Panel will remand on the suggestion of the transferee district court judge, who indicates that the coordinated or consolidated pretrial proceedings assigned to the judge by the Panel have been successfully completed. The transferee court should make such a suggestion when the judge determines that his or her role in the case has been completed. n59 The Panel is reluctant to order remand absent a suggestion of remand from the transferee district court, n60 but if a district court does suggestion remand, the panel gives it considerable weight. n61 However, if there is no suggestion from the transferee court to remand, a party that requests remand must do so by filing a motion with the Panel. A motion for remand must include a copy of the transferee district court's final pretrial order, if that order has been entered, n62 and an affidavit which specifies in detail why a remand is necessary. n63 However, the party seeking remand to the transferor court has the heavy burden of establishing that the remand is required. n64

[g] Appeal of Order Relating to Multidistrict Transfer

A court order denying a motion to transfer an action for consolidated or coordinated pretrial proceedings is not subject to review, either by appeal or any other procedure. n65 On the other hand, a grant of a transfer, or any other order of the multidistrict litigation panel may be reviewed by writ of mandamus issued by a court of appeals. n66 A party appealing a transfer may file a petition for a writ of mandamus only in the court of appeals having jurisdiction over the transferee district. n67 Additionally, even though there are no formal statutory provisions or rules governing motions for reconsideration by the Panel, such motions are recognized in the Panel's Rules of Procedure. n68

[6] Status of Transferred Case in Transferor Court

A transfer is effective under the multidistrict litigation statute when the Panel's order of transfer is filed with the clerk of the transferee court. n1 After that filing, the general rule is that the jurisdiction of the transferor court transfers and ceases with respect to the pretrial matters, n2 and the transferee court assumes complete jurisdiction over all pretrial matters under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. n3 However, the mere pendency of a motion to transfer, of an order to show cause, or of a conditional transfer order before the Panel does not in any way restrict the jurisdiction of the court in which the action is pending. Thus, the pendency of any transfer motions or a conditional transfer order before the Panel does not affect or suspend any orders and pretrial proceedings in the original district court in which the action is pending. n4 During the pendency of a transfer, the transferor court has the option to either continue with ruling on its pretrial proceedings or to stay any rulings pending determination of the pending transfer, based on a consideration of factors such as the likelihood that the transfer will actually occur and whether it would serve judicial economy to have the questions resolved by the transferor court. n5

After the coordinated or consolidated pretrial proceedings have been concluded in the transferee court, an action must be remanded to the district court from which it was transferred. n6 Thus, the case is transferred to the original transferor court's regular docket for further proceedings and trial, and generally, the transferor court has control of the action after the time of remand. n7 However, one of the important rules of multidistrict litigation is that following remand, transferor judges are not allowed to reconsider or modify orders issued by the transferee judges. The rationale for this rule is that to allow the transferor court to reconsider the transferee court's orders would defeat the purposes of the multidistrict litigation statute by leading to inefficiency and piecemeal litigation. n8 Therefore, if a party wants to appeal a final order or move for a rehearing on a decision of the transferee court, the party should appeal or make the motion prior to remand. n9

[7] Status of Transferred Case in Transferee Court

When multidistrict litigation is transferred, the transferee court has complete control of the coordinated or consolidated pretrial proceedings, and thus has all of the pretrial powers over the transferred actions that could have been exercised by the original district court under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. n1 The transferee court has the authority to supervise all pretrial matters, including the exclusion of issues under a pretrial order n2 and to rule on all pretrial motions. n3 Thus, for example, the transferee court has the authority to determine class certification issues. n4 Furthermore, one of the most important duties of the transferee court is to manage discovery, and the multidistrict litigation statute provides the transferee judge with the authority to enforce completion of pretrial depositions and to order that nonparties comply with a subpoena duces tecum issued by another district judge. n5

The transferee court also has the authority to set aside pretrial orders issued by the transferor court n6 and to modify or vacate protective orders entered by the transferor court, n7 because such powers to change pretrial orders are ordinarily accorded to district courts in general. n8

Once pretrial proceedings have been concluded in the transferee court, any transferred action that has not been terminated must then be remanded to the district from which it was transferred. n9 The transferee court, however, does not have the power to remand an action; only the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation has that authority. n10 The transferee court may suggest to the Panel that it issue a remand order for an action or actions, and the Panel generally defers to the transferee court's suggestion. n11

Once it has completed pretrial proceedings, the transferee court has no authority to retain a case for trial, either on its own initiative or on the motion of a party. The Supreme Court decided this issue after some transferee courts had attempted to retain transferred cases or had attempted to invoke the venue statutes n12 to transfer the cases to their own district for trial. n13 However, the Court has not considered whether it would be appropriate for the transferee court to retain the case if all parties consented and the transferee court were a court where the action might have been filed in the first place. n14 Thus, some appellate courts have indicated that the parties should be able to agree that jurisdiction and venue were proper in the transferee court, and that the transferee court could decide the claims and defenses on the merits. n15 Otherwise, it would appear contrary to the purpose of the multidistrict litigation statute to require the parties to return to a transferor court, where they do not want to litigate, to make a motion in the transferor court seeking a transfer back to the transferee court. However, the Supreme Court's literal ruling apparently could require such a procedure. n16

A. APPLICATION OF ANTI-INJUNCTION ACT

1-2 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 2.20

§ 2.20 Function and Purpose of Anti-Injunction Actn*

[1] Federal Injunction Against State Court Proceedings Prohibited

In reaction to the aspect of concurrent jurisdiction that allows simultaneous litigation of a particular matter in both federal and state court, n1 a party will frequently request that the federal court enjoin or stay the proceedings in the state court. Generally, however, the federal Anti-Injunction Act prohibits a federal court from issuing an injunction to stay proceedings that have been initiated in a state court. n2 There are only three statutory exceptions to the general rule, n3 allowing injunctions in the following circumstances: n4

1. When expressly authorized by an act of Congress. n5

2. When necessary in aid of the federal court's jurisdiction. n6

3. If needed to protect or effectuate a judgment of the federal court. n7

These three are the only statutory exceptions to the prohibition against enjoining state court proceedings, and courts have consistently stated that the exceptions are narrow and may not be enlarged by liberal statutory construction. n8 Thus, the Anti-Injunction Act has been interpreted as a broad prohibition on the power of federal courts to enjoin state court proceedings. n9 Furthermore, the Anti-Injunction Act may not create an independent jurisdictional basis when such jurisdiction does not exist. n10

However, there are two important limitations in the Anti-Injunction Act. First, the Anti-Injunction Act is a prohibition against injunctions directed at state court proceedings; it does not prohibit injunctions against state administrative proceedings, n11 or against arbitration proceedings. n11.1 Second, the Act prohibits injunctions only against pending state court proceedings; it does not preclude injunctions against the institution of state court proceedings. This limitation has been held to prohibit a federal court from issuing an injunction against state court proceedings that are commenced after the institution of the federal suit but before the issuance of the injunction. n11.2

It should be noted that the Anti-Injunction Act is not the only limitation on a federal court's power to issue an injunction when the enjoined matter is a state court proceeding. n11.3 A party seeking a federal injunction of pending state proceedings must satisfy the requirements of both the Anti-Injunction Act and those for obtaining equitable relief, as is required of all injunctions generally: that the party would suffer irreparable injury and lacks an adequate remedy at law. n12 Furthermore, even if a federal court may enjoin state proceedings under the Anti-Injunction Act, it is not required to do so. n13 For a complete discussion of these requirements, See Ch. 10A, Injunctions.

[2] Purpose of Act

The purpose of the Anti-Injunction Act is to prevent friction between state and federal courts, and to protect state court proceedings from federal interference. n1 Thus, the Act is based on federalist principles of government, the doctrine of comity, and the need to prevent unnecessary conflict between state and federal courts in cases of concurrent jurisdiction. n2 The doctrines of comity and federalism foster a proper respect by the federal judiciary for state court functions, ensuring that states have the freedom to perform their separate functions in their separate ways. n3

PART II. LIMITATION ON FEDERAL COURT AUTHORITY TO ENJOIN STATE PROCEEDINGS
A. APPLICATION OF ANTI-INJUNCTION ACT

1-2 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 2.21

§ 2.21 Only Federal Courts Controlled by Actn*

The Anti-Injunction Act prohibits only a "court of the United States" from enjoining state proceedings. n1 Therefore, only the following five types of courts are controlled by the prohibition in the Act: n2

1. The United States Supreme Court.

2. The Circuit Courts of Appeals.

3. The District Courts of the United States established by Chapter 5 of Title 28. n3

4. The Court of International Trade.

5. Any court created by Congress whose judges hold office during good behavior.

Because the Act is applicable only to the courts, it does not apply to the United States government apart from the courts. Therefore, the Anti-Injunction Act does not prohibit the United States from obtaining an injunction of state proceedings to prevent threatened irreparable injury to a national interest, because in such circumstances, the United States government is deemed to be using its superseding power. n4 However, the court may not automatically grant an injunction based on the government's request alone, n5 and may do so only after considering principles of comity and equity. n6 In addition to the United States, an injunction of a federal agency, such as the Department of Transportation, is exempt from the impact of the Anti-Injunction Act, n7 if the agency properly can be equated to the United States as sovereign, and the agency asserts a superior federal interest. n8

PART II. LIMITATION ON FEDERAL COURT AUTHORITY TO ENJOIN STATE PROCEEDINGS
A. APPLICATION OF ANTI-INJUNCTION ACT

1-2 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 2.22

§ 2.22 Nature of Injunction Prohibited by Actn*

The Anti-Injunction Act provides that a court of the United States may not grant an injunction to stay proceedings in a state court. Thus, it applies to any type of injunction. It has been held that the Act also covers declaratory judgments and other orders that have essentially the same effect as an injunction. n1 Therefore, the Anti-Injunction Act prohibits any federal court order that, although not technically an injunction enjoining a state proceeding, has the effect of deciding or preempting a pending state proceeding. n2

However, while a federal court declaratory judgment that has the effect of an injunction comes within the Anti-Injunction prohibition, n3 a federal court is not prohibited from issuing a declaratory judgment if a claim turns on a question of federal law more familiar to the federal court and the state court would not normally determine the issue. n4 The purpose of the Federal Declaratory Judgment Act n5 is to provide litigants a means of judicial relief when a dispute is not sufficiently developed to authorize traditional coercive relief. n6 Federal declaratory judgment jurisdiction is discretionary and partially based in equitable principles, and a court may withhold such relief on equitable grounds. n7 In considering whether to grant equitable relief, federal courts must consider whether the parties are involved in pending state court proceedings that may resolve the controversy, and whether there are possible inequities in one action having precedence over the other. n8

The Anti-Injunction Act does not prohibit a federal court from issuing a temporary restraining order to preserve existing conditions while it determines whether it has jurisdiction. n9 This also means that a federal court may stay state proceedings temporarily while it considers whether the Act applies. n10

PART II. LIMITATION ON FEDERAL COURT AUTHORITY TO ENJOIN STATE PROCEEDINGS
A. APPLICATION OF ANTI-INJUNCTION ACT

1-2 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 2.23

§ 2.23 State Proceedings Protected by Actn*

[1] Only Pending State Judicial Proceedings Are Protected

[a] Scope of Judicial Proceedings

The Anti-Injunction Act prohibits the federal courts from issuing an injunction that stays state court proceedings. n1 State court "proceedings" include all steps taken or which may be taken in the state court or by its officers from the initiation of the action to the close of the final process. It applies to appellate as well as to original proceedings and to actions both by the court and by its ministerial officers. The term also applies to an execution issued on a judgment, and to any proceedings supplemental or ancillary taken for the purpose of making the suit or judgment effective. n2

[b] State Administrative Proceedings

The Anti-Injunction Act by its terms refers only to injunctions issued by federal courts to stay proceedings in a state court. While the Supreme Court has expressly declined to address whether the Anti-Injunction Act applies to state administrative proceedings, n3 every circuit that has addressed the question has held that the Act does not generally prohibit injunctions against such proceedings. n4 Furthermore, because the purpose underlying the statute is the prevention of unnecessary friction between state and federal courts, an injunction related to an administrative proceeding does not necessarily impact state courts. Both the text of the statute and its purpose support the conclusion that the Act applies only to state courts and not to state administrative agencies. n5

On the other hand, it has been held that the Anti-Injunction Act is not limited to official state courts in all circumstances but also applies to a state agency proceeding if the agency is performing activities that are judicial in nature. n6 A federal court determines the nature of a state agency by evaluating the character of the agency's proceedings, rather than the entity in which they occur. A judicial body is not a "court" for purposes of the Anti-Injunction Act when it performs only legislative or administrative functions. n7 State activities that have been held to be "judicial" include the activities of a state Industrial Accident Commission n8 and post judgment garnishment proceedings. n9 On the other hand, activities that have been held to be "non judicial," and therefore not protected by the Act, include Agricultural Labor Relations Board proceedings n10 and state civil service commission proceedings. n11

[c] Injunctions Against Future Proceedings Not Prohibited

The prohibition of the Act against enjoining state proceedings applies only to pending proceedings. n12 Therefore, an injunction restraining the prosecution of a state action prior to initiation of the action is not prohibited. n13 However, the Act's prohibition may not be circumvented by a federal court injunction that stays utilization of the results of a completed state proceeding. n14

[2] Arbitration Proceedings

As discussed above, only judicial proceedings are protected from injunction under the Act. Generally, the federal courts have held that an arbitration proceeding is a not a "proceeding in state court" subject to the Act because arbitration is not a judicial proceeding. n1 However, some courts hold that an arbitration proceeding that is ordered by a state court is a proceeding that is protected by the Anti-Injunction Act. n2 On the other hand, most courts hold that an arbitration pursuant to a private agreement is not a judicial proceeding, even though a state court may eventually have the power to confirm, modify, vacate, or enforce the arbitration award. n3

[1] Request for Injunction by Nonparty

The Anti-Injunction Act does not bar one who is not a party to a state proceeding, nor in privity with a party, from seeking a federal injunction against enforcement of the resulting judgment. n1 Some courts refer to this rule as the "strangers to the state court proceeding" exception to the Anti-Injunction Act. "Privity," for purposes of this exception, has the same meaning as for purposes of collateral estoppel. Therefore, one who is not bound directly because of a sufficiently close relationship with a party to a state proceeding is not bound indirectly by the Anti-Injunction Act. n2

[2] Proceedings in Foreign Sovereign

The Anti-Injunction Act does not apply to protect proceedings in any foreign sovereign jurisdictions. n1 However, as a general rule, principles of international comity require restraint regarding extra-territorial interference with international litigation. n2 Federal courts ordinarily will not issue an injunction against a foreign proceeding if the foreign litigation poses no threat to federal court jurisdiction or to any important national public policy. n3

A. APPLICATION OF ANTI-INJUNCTION ACT

1-2 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 2.25

§ 2.25 Coordination With All Writs Statuten*

The Anti-Injunction Act must be read in conjunction with the All Writs Statute, n1 which provides that a federal court may issue any writ necessary or appropriate in aid of its jurisdiction that otherwise comports with the principles of law under the Constitution or by statute. n2 The two statutes are compatible because both are based on equitable considerations. n3 The Anti-Injunction Act does impose additional limitations on federal court power to enjoin state court proceedings, and therefore, the All Writs Statute must be construed in conjunction with those limitations imposed by the Anti-Injunction Act. n4 Even if a federal court may enjoin state proceedings under the Anti-Injunction Act, it is not required to do so. n5 For a complete discussion of these requirements, See Ch. 10A, Injunctions.

Although the Anti-Injunction Act generally imposes limitations on federal court power to issue an injunction when the enjoined matter is a state court proceeding, n6 the All Writs Statute may also be used to effectuate the provisions of the Anti-Injunction Act, for example, when an appellate court issues the extraordinary writ of mandamus under the All Writs Statute to a district court to comply with the Anti-Injunction Act. n7 Additionally, the All Writs Statute may be read in conjunction with exceptions to the Anti-Injunction Act. For example, federal courts have relied on the All Writs Statute in conjunction with the Anti-Injunction Act's "in aid of jurisdiction" exception n8 to justify enjoining duplicative state proceedings. A federal district court may enjoin prosecution of subsequent state court claims under the All Writs Statute to enforce its continuing orders against relitigation and to protect the integrity of its prior rulings over which it has retained jurisdiction. n9 However, the All Writs Statute does not confer jurisdiction on the federal courts, and therefore cannot confer original jurisdiction necessary to support removal. n10

Whether an injunction may issue under the Anti-Injunction Act is a question of law. n1 Thus, the district court's determination of whether an injunction falls within the permissible limits of the Anti-Injunction Act is reviewed de novo. n2 However, after the district court determines that an injunction is permissible, n3 its determination of whether to actually enter an injunction is reviewed for abuse of discretion. A district court abuses its discretion only if its conclusions are based on clearly erroneous factual findings or incorrect legal standards. n4

A. APPLICATION OF ANTI-INJUNCTION ACT

1-2 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 2.27

§ 2.27 Tax Anti-Injunction Actn*

[1] Function of Tax Anti-Injunction Act

The Tax Anti-Injunction Act, similar to the general Anti-Injunction Act, provides that a federal district court may not enjoin, suspend, or restrain the assessment, levy, or collection of any tax under state law when a plain, speedy, and efficient remedy is provided in the courts of the state. n1 The purposes of the Tax Anti-Injunction Act are to promote comity and to afford states broad independence in the administration of their affairs and revenue raising that is consistent with the federal constitution. n2 Thus, the comity doctrine applicable in state taxation cases restrains federal courts from entertaining claims for relief that risk disrupting state tax administration. Comity's constraint is especially strong when the lower federal courts are asked to pass on the constitutionality of state taxation of commercial activity, because taxation is the chief means for states to carry on their respective governments, and it very important to states that the methods adopted to enforce assessments of taxes should be interfered with as little as possible. n3

[2] Application of Tax Anti-Injunction Act

[a] Prohibition Applies Only to Taxes

The Tax Anti-Injunction Act's prohibition of a federal injunction applies only to a state assessment, levy, or collection of a tax. In this regard, a "tax" has been liberally defined by the courts to include any state or local taxes imposed by state law. n1 Because of the congressional noninterference policies underlying the Tax Anti-Injunction Act, n2 the determination of what constitutes a tax is determined by federal and not state law. n3 The primary inquiry in determining whether a charge is a tax examines the purpose of the assessment and the ultimate use of the funds: n4 the characterization of an assessment's purpose usually depends on whether it primarily raises revenue or regulates activity--an assessment is a tax if it primarily raises revenue. n5 Thus, a charge is likely to be classified as a tax if (1) the revenue is allocated to the general fund, (2) the charge is enacted by the legislature in contrast to an administrative agency, (3) the charge is called a "tax" in the statute, and (4) the statute is administered by the tax assessor. n6 On the other hand, a fee is more likely to be used to recoup the expenses of the program to which the fee relates. n7

[b] Absence of Adequate State Remedy

The Tax Anti-Injunction Act's prohibition on a federal injunction applies only when there is a plain, speedy, and efficient remedy available in the courts of the state. n8 This means that a federal injunction related to a state tax is only prohibited when the state provides the taxpayer a full hearing and judicial determination of the controversy. n9 To qualify, a remedy must include the opportunity to appeal to higher courts and may not preclude preservation or consideration of a plaintiff's constitutional and other federal rights. n10 The courts have broadly interpreted what is an adequate remedy; therefore, the Tax Anti-Injunction Act has been widely applied. Thus, it has been held that a remedy provided by the state need not be the best of all remedies, only adequate. For example, the Supreme Court noted that the potential for refund relief alone may constitute a plain, speedy, and efficient remedy. n11 Whether a plain, speedy, and efficient remedy exists in the state court is a question of federal law. n12

[3] Exceptions to Tax Anti-Injunction Act

There are several judicially created exemptions to the Tax Anti-Injunction Act, as follows:

1. Cases involving the original jurisdiction of the United States Supreme Court. The Tax Anti-Injunction Act does not apply when the Supreme Court of the United States has original jurisdiction over a case. Thus, the Act is not applicable when there are disputes between states, because the United States Supreme court has exclusive original jurisdiction over such disputes, n1 and that jurisdiction is superior to the jurisdiction of the courts of either state. n2

2. The United States Government is the plaintiff. The Tax Anti-Injunction Act does not apply when the United States Government challenges as plaintiff a tax enacted or collected by a state. n3 The United States Supreme Court has held that because of the presumption against subjecting the federal government to suit in state courts, the United States must be permitted to sue for injunctions against state imposed taxes. Thus, under this exception to the Act, the United States may initiate actions in federal court to protect itself from an unconstitutional state exaction of taxes. n4

3. When expressly authorized by statute. The Supreme Court has held that some statutes authorize federal district courts to enjoin the assessment or collection of state taxes. n5 However, whenever possible, a court must construe federal statutes as not providing an exception to the Tax Anti-Injunction Act. n6

B. EXCEPTIONS TO ANTI-INJUNCTION ACT

1-2 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 2.40

§ 2.40 Injunctions Expressly Authorized by Congressn*

[1] Scope of Exception

Federal courts may enjoin state court proceedings as expressly authorized by an act of Congress. n1 In other words, there is an exception to the Anti-Injunction Act that authorizes a federal court to issue an injunction to stay state court proceedings if Congress expressly authorizes an injunction under specified circumstances. n2 To qualify as expressly authorizing an injunction, the federal statute need not specifically refer to the Anti-Injunction Act nor refer to an injunction against state court proceedings. Rather, the legislation must create an enforceable federal right or remedy that may be effected only by the stay of conflicting state-court proceedings. This rule has three required elements: (1) the statute must create a uniquely federal right or remedy; (2) the right or remedy must be enforceable in a federal court of equity; and (3) the right or remedy could be frustrated if the federal court was not permitted to enjoin a state court proceeding. n3 For a discussion of the statutes that courts have held within the exception, see [2], below.

It should be noted that a federal court does not have inherent power to ignore the prohibitions of the Anti-Injunction Act and to enjoin state court proceedings merely because those proceedings interfere with a protected federal right or invade an area preempted by federal law, even when the interference is unmistakably clear. n4 Examples of statutes that do not fall within the "expressly authorized" provision include: the antitrust statutes; n5 the Americans with Disabilities Act; n6 ERISA; n7 and the Equal Credit Opportunity Act. n8

[2] Particular Statutes Within Express Authorization Exception

[a] Bankruptcy

The Bankruptcy Code expressly provides for a broad stay of litigation, lien enforcement, and other actions which would affect or interfere with the property of the estate or with the debtor. This statute provides for an automatic stay on the filing of the a bankruptcy petition. n1 Therefore, the "expressly authorized" exception permits a federal court to enjoin state court proceedings in bankruptcy despite the prohibition of the Anti-Injunction Act. n2

[b] Removal

The removal statute specifically provides that after the filing of the notice of removal of a civil action the defendant must give written notice of the removal to all adverse parties and must file a copy of the notice with the clerk of the state court. The filing effects the removal of the case to federal court and prohibits the state court from proceeding further unless and until the case is remanded. n3 It has been held that the language of this statute expressly authorizes a federal court to enjoin all state court proceedings related to the case removed to federal court. n4 Provided that the removal is valid, a federal court may issue an injunction against state proceedings even if the defendant moved for removal solely to avoid the Act's prohibition. n5 Furthermore, the federal court may issue an injunction if the state plaintiff files a second substantially identical state court suit for the purpose of circumventing the removal. n6

The removal exception does not apply when separate state and federal proceedings have common issues. Thus, the removal exception does not permit the federal court to enjoin a state court from deciding an issue in another proceeding filed before the removed case merely because the removed case also raises that same issue. The defendant has the right to have the federal court decide the removed case, but not the right to have every issue in that case decided by the federal court, if the state court has proper jurisdiction to consider the issue in another proceeding. n7 Additionally, the Anti-Injunction exception for removed cases applies only to the extent the federal court maintains removal jurisdiction. Once the federal court remands the case or dismisses it without prejudice, and the plaintiffs institute another suit in state court, the federal court's power to enjoin the state court proceeding ends. n8

[c] Civil Rights

The Supreme Court has held that the Civil Rights Act n9 falls within the "expressly authorized" exception to the Anti-Injunction Act. n10 However, in its decision the Supreme Court did not abandon its previous rule that only in cases of harassment, bad faith prosecutions, or other extraordinary circumstances may a federal court enjoin a pending state criminal prosecution. n11

The Supreme Court found the express exception in the Civil Rights Act because it provides that any aggrieved party may bring a "suit in equity" to redress a deprivation of civil rights under color of state law. n12 The Court reasoned that Congress intended the Civil Rights Act to open federal courts to private citizens to enforce the Fourteenth Amendment against state action and to use the federal courts as guardians of the people's federal rights to be free from unconstitutional action under color of state law, and that an injunction in the proper circumstances n13 would be an appropriate tool to accomplish that goal. n14

[d] Statutory Interpleader

The statute governing interpleader n15 provides that in any civil action of statutory interpleader or in the nature of statutory interpleader, a district court may issue its process for all claimants and enter its order restraining them from instituting or prosecuting any proceeding in any state or United States court affecting the property, instrument or obligation involved in the interpleader action until further order of the court. Furthermore, the district court may hear and determine the case, and may discharge the plaintiff from further liability, make the injunction permanent, and make all appropriate orders to enforce its judgment. n16 The courts have held that this authorization is an "expressly authorized" exception to the Anti-Injunction Act. n17 Thus, if a court has entered an order discharging the liability of an interpleader plaintiff and extinguishing claims against it by any participating claimants, that court may protect its decree by enjoining an action brought in state court by a partly satisfied claimant to recover the balance of a claim. n18 However, the exception does not apply to rule interpleader actions n19 and injunctions in such cases are prohibited by the general provision of the Anti-Injunction Act. n20

[e] Limitation of Shipowner's Liability

It has been held that the Limitation of Liability Act governing shipowner liability n21 falls within the "expressly authorized" exception to the Anti-Injunction Act. n22 The Act provides that after a shipowner (1) deposits with the court, for the benefit of claimants, a sum equal to the amount or value of the interest of the owner in the vessel and freight, or approved security for that value, or (2) transfers the owner's interest in the vessel and freight to a trustee for the benefit of the claimants, all claims and proceedings against the owner with respect to the matter in question cease. n23 This provision operates as an exception under the Anti-Injunction Act and permits a federal court to enjoin state court proceedings prosecuted in violation of the provision. n24 Thus, when a shipowner has made the requisite deposit in court or transfer to a trustee, the court hearing the limitation of liability case may stay all related claims against the shipowner pending in any other forum, may require all of the claimants to assert their claims in the limitation court, may take jurisdiction to entertain those claims without a jury, and must ensure that the shipowner will not be held liable in excess of the amount ultimately fixed in the limitation suit. n25

§ 2.41 Injunctions Necessary to Aid Federal Jurisdictionn*

[1] Function of Exception

The second exception specified in the Anti-Injunction Act permits a federal court to grant an injunction against state court proceedings when the injunction is necessary to aid the federal court's jurisdiction. n1 Despite its broad language, this exception has not been broadly applied and has been used only in limited circumstances. First, it has been used most often when the federal court acquires jurisdiction in concurrent in rem actions. n2 Second, federal courts may issue injunctions to restrain state proceedings that threaten federal court jurisdiction in removed cases. n3 However, federal courts are also authorized to enjoin state proceedings in removed cases under the "expressly authorized" exception, as discussed in § 2.40[2][b]. The Notes to the Anti-Injunction Act provide little guidance in interpreting this exception. n4 The phrase "in aid of its jurisdiction" was added to conform to the All Writs Statute n5 and to make clear the recognized power of the federal courts to stay proceedings in state cases removed to the district courts. n6 The All Writs Statute, which gives a federal court the power to issue all writs necessary in aid of its jurisdiction, is discussed in § 2.25. The only other circumstance encompassed by the second exception appears to be in cases when a state proceeding would interfere with continuing federal jurisdiction and monitoring of a case, such as cases involving desegregation orders. n7

Exclusive federal jurisdiction over a matter is not in itself sufficient to bring a case within the "necessary in aid of jurisdiction" exception to the Anti-Injunction Act's prohibition. Even when a state court invades a field Congress has preempted and the state court is wholly without jurisdiction, the district court may not apply this exception. n8 However, when Congress specifically vests exclusive jurisdiction in a federal agency with express authorization to enforce its orders in federal court, the federal court may properly issue an injunction in aid of jurisdiction to enforce an agency order. n9

[2] In Rem Cases

A federal court may issue an injunction in aid of its jurisdiction if the injunction is necessary to prevent a state court from interfering with a federal court's consideration or disposition of a case to the extent the interference would seriously impair the federal court's flexibility and authority to decide the case. n1 Federal courts have interpreted this standard to permit an injunction when federal and state proceedings involve the same res, or when the federal and state proceedings are both in rem. n2 In deciding whether to issue an injunction against a parallel state court claim, the federal court must consider whether the courts would be required to assume simultaneous jurisdiction over the same res. n3

When a conflict arises between federal and state in rem jurisdiction and the same res is the subject of both actions (which each court must control to provide relief), the court that assumes jurisdiction over the property first must maintain and exercise that jurisdiction to the exclusion of the other. n4 Thus, a federal court may issue an injunction against state proceedings to protect its in rem jurisdiction when the federal court acquires jurisdiction before the state court, and the state court proceedings interfere with the control and disposition of the res. n5 On the other hand, if the state court properly acquires jurisdiction before the federal court, the federal court may not exercise jurisdiction over the same res. n6

The essential inquiry, therefore, is whether the two actions are of such nature that both are essentially in rem, demanding control and disposition of the res. n7 If one action is in personam and may be adjudicated without physically controlling a right in the res, the requisite conflict does not exist. n8 On the other hand, certain actions in rem that also seek to establish personal liability may still be governed by the general rules governing parallel in rem actions. n9 However, a court's prior jurisdiction over a res serves to exclude a subsequent in rem action only if the subsequent action requires control of the res for relief, such as an action for an accounting where results depend on the property being delivered. The doctrine would not apply to a suit alleging fraud and breach of fiduciary duty. n10 Finally, if concurrent in personam actions are between the same parties and involve the same subject matter, they may proceed simultaneously in the courts of the same forum or two or more forums. Concurrent in personam jurisdiction does not satisfy the "necessary in aid of jurisdiction" exception to the Anti-Injunction Act. n11

B. EXCEPTIONS TO ANTI-INJUNCTION ACT

1-2 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 2.42

§ 2.42 Relitigation Exceptionn*

[1] Function of Exception

Although the Anti-Injunction Act generally denies federal courts the power to grant an injunction to stay proceedings in a state court, the third exception specified in the Act provides that a federal court may enjoin state court proceedings to protect or effectuate its judgments. n1 The purpose of this exception, known as the "relitigation exception," n2 is to permit a federal court to prevent state litigation of an issue that previously was presented to and decided by the federal court. The exception, based on the well-recognized concepts of res judicata and collateral estoppel, n3 allows a party with a favorable federal judgment to protect that judgment by having the federal court enjoin repetitive state court proceedings rather than relying on a plea of res judicata or collateral estoppel. n4

Under the exception, a federal court may enjoin any further state proceedings that attempt to relitigate previously adjudged matters or that may impair the prior judgment's effect. n5 The injunction, however, may not exceed the extent of the matters that the federal court determined in the prior proceeding. n6 Additionally, the injunction may not bar claims that arise after the time of the prior judgment. n7

The courts apply a four-part test to determine whether the exception is applicable: n8 (1) the parties in a later action must be identical to, or at least in privity with, the parties in a prior action; n9 (2) the judgment in the prior action must have been rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction; n10 (3) the prior action must have concluded with a final judgment on the merits; n11 and (4) the same claim or cause of action must be involved in both suits. n12

[2] Four Requirements for Exception

[a] Parties or Privies

The first requirement of the relitigation exception is that the parties in a later action must be identical to, or at least in privity with, the parties in a prior action. n1 The basis for this requirement is due process. n2 If the parties are identical, the requirement is satisfied because they had an opportunity to litigate. But even if the parties are not identical, the exception may apply when the party in the enjoined suit had some relationship of privity with the party in the prior suit.

n3 For example, the exception may apply to claims by one spouse that are derivative of injuries of other spouse. n4

[b] Judgment by Court of Competent Jurisdiction

The second requirement of the relitigation exception is that the judgment in the prior action must have been rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction. n5 If the court had no valid basis for subject matter jurisdiction, such as diversity or federal question jurisdiction, any subsequent injunction regarding the matter litigated is also not valid. n6

[c] Entry of Judgment on Merits

The third requirement of the relitigation exception is that the prior action must have concluded with a final judgment on the merits. This means that the relitigation exception permits a federal court to enjoin state proceedings only as to those issues that federal courts have fully and finally decided based on the merits. n7 The relitigation exception does not apply if the earlier federal court decision was based on procedural grounds rather than the merits. n8 For example, a prior federal forum non conveniens dismissal ordinarily is procedural and not an adjudication of the appropriateness of any other particular forum. n9 Consequently, the federal court ordinarily may not enjoin subsequent litigation in a particular state court on the grounds of a forum non conveniens determination in the federal court. n10

[d] Identity of Claim

The fourth requirement of the relitigation exception is that the same claim or cause of action must be involved in both suits. The court must use a transactional test to determine whether the two claims or causes of action are the same. n11 In this test, the critical question is not the relief requested or the theory of law asserted but whether the plaintiff bases the two actions on the same nucleus of operative facts. Thus, in evaluating the res judicata effect of a prior claim on a subsequent one, the transactional test does not inquire whether the same evidence has been presented in support of the two claims but rather asks whether the same key facts are at issue in both of them. n12

§ 2.60 Nature of Abstention Doctrinen*

[1] Abstention Defined

"Abstention" is a federal court doctrine which provides that, in some circumstances, a federal court should either stay or dismiss federal litigation in deference to a parallel state court proceeding. Abstention is a judicially created principle in which a federal court, which otherwise has competent jurisdiction in a case, withholds that jurisdiction based on the principles of either (1) comity or (2) judicial economy. n1 "Comity" means that lower federal courts should resist engagement in certain cases falling within their jurisdiction because of a proper respect for state functions, a recognition of the fact that the entire country is made up of a union of separate state governments, and a recognition that the nation will fare best if the States are left free to perform their separate functions in separate ways. n2 "Judicial economy" means that courts should avoid making duplicate efforts or unnecessarily deciding difficult questions. n3

The doctrine of abstention is one of several related doctrines that govern the timing of federal court decision making, including exhaustion of administrative remedies, finality, and ripeness. n4 Thus, abstention is appropriate only if, at a particular time, a pending state court proceeding should be allowed to proceed without federal court interference. n5 The Supreme Court has stated that abstention is available only in specific and limited circumstances, and that federal courts generally have a virtually unflagging obligation to exercise the jurisdiction that has been given to them. n6

Abstention allows a federal court to decline to exercise jurisdiction even though the dispute satisfies all of the jurisdictional requirements and is currently justiciable. n7 The question of abstention is whether a federal court should refrain from deciding a case within its constitutionally and congressionally conferred jurisdiction in the interests of judicial comity and efficiency. n8 In other words, the abstention doctrine in essence operates to yield proper federal court jurisdiction to a state tribunal when a prudential decision is made that the state tribunal is the more appropriate forum to hear and decide the suit. n9

[2] Types of Abstention

Federal case law has recognized five particular situations in which jurisdiction should be withheld: n1

1. To avoid deciding a federal constitutional question when the case may be disposed of on questions of state law; this is known as Pullman abstention. n2

2. To avoid needless conflict with the administration by a state of its own affairs; this is known as Burford abstention. n3

3. To leave to the states the resolution of unsettled questions of state law, under the doctrine of Thibodaux abstention. n4

4. To avoid duplicative litigation; this is referred to as Colorado River abstention. n5

5. To refrain from hearing constitutional challenges to state action under certain circumstances in which federal action is regarded as an improper intrusion on the right of a state to enforce its own laws in its own courts; this is known as Younger abstention. n6

[3] Abstention Distinguished From Similar Doctrines

The abstention doctrines are similar to justiciability doctrines in that both are self-imposed limitations on a federal court from deciding a case when the court has jurisdiction. The term "justiciability" refers to principles that limit a federal court from deciding a case when it would be inappropriate or not prudent for a federal court to exercise jurisdiction. "Justiciability" is a federal court doctrine which provides that a federal court may not consider a claim or issue unless a real, substantial controversy exists between persons having adverse legal interests, and not merely a hypothetical or abstract dispute. n1 Justiciability prevents parties from simply submitting questions of general interest or curiosity to the federal court. n2 A "justiciable case" or controversy is one that presents an actual dispute between adverse, non-collusive litigants. n3 Abstention may thus be considered the application of a particular type of justiciability, when there is a concurrent state court proceeding involving the same matter that is presented to the federal court. In essence, the federal court is considering whether to hear the case, and whether the state court proceedings would make it more prudent not to hear the case because of comity or judicial economy. n4

Doctrines related to abstention include standing, ripeness, and mootness. "Standing" is a doctrine that inquires whether a court should hear a particular case based on whether the particular party instituting the case is the proper person to do so, and whether the courts could grant relief to that person. Part of the standing doctrine consists of prudential considerations, similar to those in the abstention doctrine, which are considerations made by the judiciary to determine in a particular case whether it is appropriate or prudent for a federal court to use its resources to exercise jurisdiction and decide a case or controversy, based on the person bringing the suit. n5

"Ripeness" is a federal court doctrine which concerns whether a lawsuit has been filed at the correct time. n6 It analyzes whether a claim for relief has been filed too early because there is only a potential for a claim, and not yet an actual controversy that a court can resolve between the parties. n7 Thus, ripeness is another prudential consideration that furthers the interests of judicial economy by avoiding possible judicial interference with the other branches of government that would ultimately prove unnecessary if an actual dispute were never to develop. n8

"Mootness" is also a prudential consideration which provides that, although there may be an actual and justiciable controversy at the time litigation was commenced, once that actual controversy ceases to exist, the federal court should dismiss the action. n9 A controversy ceases to be real or definite under the doctrine when the issues presented are no longer actual, or the parties cease to have a legally cognizable interest in the outcome. n10 See Ch. 1, Federal Courts, for further discussion of justiciability and the related doctrines of standing, ripeness, and mootness. n11

PART III. DOCTRINE OF ABSTENTION BY FEDERAL COURT

1-2 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 2.61

§ 2.61 Abstention to Avoid Unnecessary Federal Constitutional Decisionn*

[1] Statement of Doctrine

A federal court should in the exercise of sound judicial discretion abstain from hearing an action challenging the constitutionality of an unclear state statute or administrative order, if the construction of the pertinent but unclear state law by state courts may obviate the necessity for a decision of a federal constitutional question, even if federal jurisdiction has been properly invoked. This doctrine is known as Pullman abstention, based on the leading case. n1 The Pullman abstention doctrine represents an accommodation of three important principles: (1) federal courts are generally obligated to decide cases properly within their jurisdiction; n2 (2) the decision of constitutional issues should be avoided whenever possible; n3 and (3) conflict between the federal and state systems should be minimized. n4 Therefore, when a litigant challenges a state law action on federal constitutional grounds, the Pullman doctrine directs the federal district courts to avoid possible errors in forecasting how the state courts would decide an unsettled state law question; rather, the court should abstain in order to allow the state court to resolve questions of state law that might dispose of the entire litigation. n5

Pullman abstention involves a three-step process. n6 The court must determine: n7 (1) whether the state law is unclear; n8 (2) if it is, whether state court resolution of the unclear state issue will obviate or modify the federal constitutional issue; n9 and (3) whether the costs of abstention are too great in a particular case or there is some other aspect of the case which weighs in favor of or against abstention. n10

[2] Required Elements

[a] Both Elements Required

A federal court may abstain from deciding a claim that a state law is not valid under the federal Constitution if the claim presents both of two interrelated elements: n1 (1) the meaning of the state law is unclear, and (2) the state law could be construed by the state court in any way that renders it constitutional. The Court has specifically held that abstention is inappropriate in cases involving only unsettled or difficult questions of state law or cases involving only a federal constitutional question. n2 Thus, the discretion to abstain under this doctrine n3 is limited to situations in which both of these circumstances are present. n4

These two requirements are the minimal prerequisites. Some circuits add further requirements. For example, in a three-part test for Pullman abstention, the Ninth Circuit has adopted an additional requirement that the claim must touch a sensitive area of social policy into which the federal courts should not enter unless there is no alternative to adjudication. n5

[b] Unclear State Law

A court may not abstain under Pullman unless there is an unsettled, uncertain, or unresolved state law question that only a state tribunal may construe. n6 By contrast, a federal court should not abstain if state law is certain and unambiguous, and there is nothing for a state court to construe. Furthermore, the Supreme Court has noted that if state law is certain and unambiguous, federal courts should not abstain from deciding constitutional claims. n7 A state law is unresolved or unsettled if state courts have never interpreted it. n8 However, it must be remembered that the fact that a state tribunal has never interpreted a statute is not enough to warrant abstention. Additionally, the state interpretation of the statute must have the potential for rendering a decision on the federal constitutional question unnecessary, or substantially modify the constitutional question. n9

[c] State Construction Will Eliminate Necessity for Federal Constitutional Decision

A federal court may abstain under Pullman only if the state judiciary's resolution of the unsettled question of law n10 may avoid, entirely or partially, the necessity for federal constitutional adjudication, or at least materially alter the nature of the question. n11 A court's construction of a state statute involves analysis of the statute and its legislative history. If that history is such that it allows no reasonable interpretation of the statute that would eliminate or modify the federal constitutional question, then the court should not abstain. n12

Because the primary purpose of Pullman abstention is to avoid unnecessary constitutional decisions, the doctrine does not apply to a case in which the only federal issues are matters of nonconstitutional law. Thus, in a suit involving a nonconstitutional federal question whose resolution depends on an issue of unsettled state law, the federal court will resolve the state law issue without abstaining and sending the parties to state court. n13

[3] Discretionary Abstention Based on Balancing of Costs

Pullman abstention requires the court to exercise discretion based on the federal court's equitable powers. n1 Therefore, abstention is not mandatory even if the two required circumstances exist. n2 If the federal court does abstain, then the state court will resolve the state law claims. However, unless the adversaries submit all issues to the state court, the federal court may allow return of the case to federal court to resolve federal claims. n3 This means that Pullman abstention may require piecemeal adjudication, increasing costs and delay. The Supreme Court has stated that considerations of federalism, which require deference to the state courts for unsettled questions of state law, generally outweigh concerns over the costs and delay of Pullman abstention n4 but that such costs favor the federal court hearing the entire case, especially for First Amendment claims, when delay caused by state court proceedings might chill First Amendment rights. n5

PART III. DOCTRINE OF ABSTENTION BY FEDERAL COURT

1-2 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 2.62

§ 2.62 Abstention to Defer to Complex State Administrative Proceduresn*

[1] Statement of Doctrine

A federal court in equity should decline to interfere with the proceedings or orders of state administrative agencies in cases when timely and adequate state court review is available and there are either difficult questions of state law pertaining to public policy problems or the exercise of federal jurisdiction would be disruptive of state efforts to establish a coherent public policy. Federal abstention is appropriate to defer to comprehensive state administrative procedures in such cases. This abstention doctrine is called "administrative abstention," or Burford abstention, after the leading case on the doctrine. n1

In Burford abstention, as in Pullman abstention, n2 there must be an uncertain state law question. In Pullman abstention, however, that state law question must be susceptible of a construction that will eliminate the need to decide the federal constitutional question or materially alter the way the federal court will view that issue. n3 In Burford abstention, however, state law issues predominate and federal constitutional issues are secondary. When a federal court invokes Pullman abstention, the federal court remands the case to state court for a clarification of the state law. However, a federal court invoking Burford abstention defers to a state administrative agency or state procedures for judicial review of agency action. n4

[2] Required Elements

[a] Adequate State Remedy

The Supreme Court has made a clear statement of the Burford abstention doctrine prerequisites. First, there must be timely and adequate state court review available for the court to abstain. n1 Stated conversely, Burford abstention is not proper if the state's administrative structure fails to provide an adequate remedy. For example, a court may not abstain if a state statutory remedy requires a minimum number or percentage of residents to initiate an administrative procedure and provides for an administrative recommendation that is not binding on any party or tribunal. Such a remedy is not an adequate administrative remedy sufficient to allow Burford abstention. n2

[b] State Administrative Regulation Must be Central to Claim

The second requirement for Burford abstention, assuming an adequate state remedy, is that the federal court should decline to interfere with the proceedings or orders of state administrative agencies only if either of the following is true regarding the issue: (a) there are difficult questions of state law bearing on policy problems of substantial public import whose importance exceeds the result in the case then at bar; or (b) the exercise of federal review of the question in a case and in similar cases would be disruptive of state efforts to establish a coherent policy with respect to a matter of substantial public concern. n3 In other words, the state administrative regulation must be central to the claim involved. n4 Burford abstention is not appropriate if the suit primarily involves only federal questions and does not involve any issues of state law that need to be resolved before the federal issues may be determined. n5

§ 2.63 Abstention Because Important State Law Is Unclear in Diversity Casen*

[1] Statement of Doctrine

Although a federal court has diversity jurisdiction, it should nevertheless abstain if the diversity case raises an issue that is intimately involved with the state's sovereign prerogative, and the adjudication of that issue may be impaired by an unsettled question of state law. n1 This type of abstention is known as Thibodaux abstention, based on the first case applying its principles. n2 The Supreme Court has stated that federal courts may stay proceedings pending a state court determination of a decisive state law, especially if it involves an intricate question of state sovereignty. n3 However, the mere difficulty of interpreting state law does not otherwise justify a federal court's relinquishment of its diversity jurisdiction in favor of state court action. n4 A court should abstain in diversity cases under Thibodaux if there is uncertain state law and an important state interest that is intimately involved with the state government's sovereign prerogative. This type of abstention is appropriate when a diversity case presents difficult questions of state law bearing on policy problems of substantial public import whose importance transcends the result in the case. n5

[2] Nature of State Interest Protected

Both Thibodaux abstention and Pullman abstention n1 involve federal restraint in litigation concerning an unsettled or unclear state law question. Both doctrines permit abstention to allow state courts to address an unsettled issue before the federal court adjudicates the matter. However, although the doctrines are similar, there are some distinctions; Pullman abstention typically involves litigation in which a party raises a federal constitutional challenge to state action, based on an uncertain state law. The state law must be susceptible of a construction that would eliminate the need to decide the federal constitutional question, or that would materially alter the way the federal court views that issue. n2 Thibodaux abstention, however, involves a suit that does not allege federal constitutional issues but only state claims involving public policy issues of substantial import or local concern. The purpose of Thibodaux abstention is thus to give the parties the benefit of the same rule of law that will apply to all other litigants concerned with the issue. n3

PART III. DOCTRINE OF ABSTENTION BY FEDERAL COURT

1-2 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 2.64

§ 2.64 Abstention for Reasons of Sound Judicial Administrationn*

[1] Statement of Doctrine

A federal court may abstain from exercising its jurisdiction over a matter for reasons of sound judicial administration if the federal and state courts have concurrent jurisdiction over duplicative litigation. Abstention to further sound judicial management is called Colorado River abstention, after the case in which the Supreme Court first applied the doctrine. The purpose of abstention for reasons of sound judicial administration is to conserve judicial resources and permit a comprehensive disposition of litigation. Colorado River abstention is permissible even if abstention would not be justified under the other abstention doctrines. n1

[2] Duplicative Litigation

Colorado River abstention typically arises when a party files a federal action that essentially duplicates a simultaneous state lawsuit. Normally, when state and federal courts have concurrent jurisdiction over virtually identical lawsuits, the Anti-Injunction Act prohibits the federal court from enjoining the state proceedings. n1 On the other hand, federal courts generally must exercise their validly conferred jurisdiction n2 and need not dismiss or stay an action because of pending parallel state litigation. However, to avoid the waste of judicial resources and increased costs, the Supreme Court has held that federal courts may abstain from exercising their validly conferred jurisdiction in certain exceptional circumstances n3 of parallel, duplicative litigation. The federal courts may do so in the interests of sound judicial administration and economy. n4

[3] Factors Balanced in Abstention Decision

The Supreme Court has identified five factors a federal court should consider when determining whether the interests of sound judicial administration outweigh a court's duty to exercise its jurisdiction. These factors include: (1) which court first assumed in rem or quasi in rem jurisdiction over property involved in both actions, (2) the relative inconvenience of the federal forum, (3) the desirability of avoiding piecemeal litigation, (4) the order of filing in the state and federal actions and the progress of each action, and (5) whether federal or state law controls the litigation. The Court emphasized that no single factor was determinative, and that there must be specific justification for dismissal of the federal action. n1

In a subsequent case, the Supreme Court stated that under Colorado River, a federal court may abstain from exercising jurisdiction only in exceptional circumstances, and the factors should not be used as a mere checklist. Rather, federal courts should carefully balance all considerations involved and the factors are to be applied in a pragmatic, flexible manner with a view to the realities of the case at bar. n2

1-2 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 2.65

§ 2.65 Abstention To Avoid Interference With Certain Pending State Proceedingsn*

[1] Statement of Doctrine

A federal court should abstain from exercising jurisdiction over a case if (1) state proceedings are pending that involve important state interests, and (2) adequate relief is available in the state proceedings. This doctrine is called Younger abstention, after the case in which the Supreme Court first stated the doctrine. n1 In practical terms, this type of abstention is usually applied regarding state criminal proceedings. A federal court generally should not enjoin such a proceeding, even if the criminal prosecution is based on an unconstitutional statute, unless the state prosecution presents a great and immediate danger of irreparable injury to the accused. n2 Younger abstention is based on equitable principles and federal-state comity, which is the federal respect for state proceedings and the belief that the federal system prospers when the states have the freedom to perform their separate functions in their separate ways. n3

[2] Required Elements

The Younger abstention doctrine holds that an injunction against state court criminal proceedings may be applied only in "extraordinary circumstances," which include a great and immediate danger of irreparable injury to the accused. To constitute a danger of irreparable injury that would justify federal court intervention in a pending state criminal prosecution, there must be a threat to the accused's federally protected rights that cannot be eliminated by the accused's defense. For example, a danger of irreparable injury exists if there is prosecutorial bad faith or repeated prosecutions to harass the accused; in such a case the federal court may enjoin the state proceedings. n1

Absent "extraordinary circumstances," Younger abstention is proper when all of the following three conditions have been met:

1. There are ongoing state judicial proceedings;

2. The proceedings implicate important state interests; and

3. The state proceedings provide the plaintiff with an adequate opportunity to raise the federal claims.

When these three prerequisites are met, Younger abstention may apply to state civil proceedings, n2 including state administrative proceedings. n3

1-2 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 2.66

§ 2.66 Certification by Federal Court as Alternative to Abstentionn*

[1] Use of Certification

The Supreme Court has indicated that certification is usually preferable to abstention whenever certification is available. The Supreme Court has explained that certification today covers territory once dominated by a deferral device called Pullman deferral. Designed to avoid federal-court error in deciding state-law questions antecedent to federal constitutional issues, the Pullman deferral mechanism remitted parties to the state courts for adjudication of the unsettled state-law issues. The certification procedure, in contrast, allows a federal court faced with a novel state-law question to put the question directly to the state's highest court, reducing the delay, cutting the cost, and increasing the assurance of gaining an authoritative response. n1

Most states have established certification procedures that enable a federal court to certify an issue and request an advisory opinion from the state's highest court. n2 Most of the states permit certification by the federal trial and appellate courts, n3 but some authorize certification only by the courts of appeal and the United States Supreme Court. n4 Certification permits federal courts to ask the highest court of a state directly to resolve a question of state law and to do so while the federal suit is pending. Like abstention, certification is appropriate in those circumstances when the state statute is susceptible to an interpretation that would eliminate the asserted constitutional issue and terminate the litigation. n5

Certification means that, if the state court's decision as to state law makes a federal constitutional judgment necessary, the federal issue will be resolved by a federal court. Conversely, abstention leads to the federal question being decided by a state court, which is subject to federal review only through the improbable vehicle of a writ of certiorari to the U.S. Supreme Court. Therefore, by certifying, the federal courts may refer the state law issues to state courts, while retaining the authority to rule on the federal constitutional questions that might come up, rather than ceding that responsibility to the state courts. n6 For a general discussion of certification of questions to determine state law, see Ch. 3, Law Applied.

[2] Factors That Determine Whether Certification Is Appropriate

In determining whether to exercise its discretion in favor of certification, the court should consider many factors. The most important are the closeness of the question and the existence of sufficient sources of state law, including statutes, judicial decisions, and attorney general opinions, to provide a principled rather than conjectural conclusion. Also to be evaluated is the degree to which considerations of comity are relevant in light of the particular issue and case to be decided. Finally, a court must take into account practical limitations of the certification process: significant delay and possible inability to frame the issue so as to produce a helpful response on the part of the state court. n1

Certification is not appropriate when a state law is challenged on federal constitutional grounds, when the highest court of the state has not interpreted the relevant statute, or when a saving construction, which is one that would permit avoidance of the constitutional issue, is possible. n2

§ 2.67 Abstention Proceduresn*

[1] Stay Pending State Court Resolution

When a federal court abstains, the court is not denying federal jurisdiction, but only postponing its exercise. n1 Following a determination to abstain from exercising its jurisdiction, the district court should not dismiss the pending federal action, unless it seeks equitable relief. Rather, when the claim requests monetary damages, the court should order a stay of the federal proceedings during the time the parties are pursuing appropriate state remedies for resolution of the state law issue. n2 However, this principle is flexible, and the abstaining federal court may dismiss the federal suit without prejudice if a dismissal is necessary to enable the plaintiff to invoke state court jurisdiction. n3

When a case is stayed in deference to state court proceedings, a party may restrict the state court suit to the relevant issues of state law. If the state court's adjudication does not eliminate the constitutional conflict, the plaintiff may then return to federal court for adjudication of the constitutional issue. n4 However, a party may choose to litigate all issues, including federal constitutional claims, in state court. A party who chooses this option, however, relinquishes the right to return to federal court. n5

[2] Dismissal

Most types of abstentions defer rather than an abdicate federal jurisdiction. n1 Consequently, abstaining courts are generally required to stay an action rather than dismiss it outright. n2 The primary exception to this rule is for Younger abstention, which forbids federal courts from interfering in certain pending state proceedings. n3 Younger abstention provides for complete dismissal of the federal suit and the presentation of all federal and state claims to the state court. n4

In other types of abstention, the abstaining court generally has the option to either stay or dismiss the federal proceeding. As one court has pointed out, whether the court grants a stay or a dismissal of the federal proceedings is not of crucial importance, because the purpose of the abstention is to obtain a state court decision that will bind the parties and have preclusive effect under the principles of res judicata. However, there may be some situations, when the preclusive effect of the state proceedings will not completely resolve the entire federal litigation, and in these situations a stay is preferable. As the Supreme Court has noted, a stay avoids unnecessary statutes of limitation issues. n5

When a federal court does dismiss a claim based on abstention, it should generally do so without prejudice. n6 For example, if the abstaining federal court dismisses rather than stays the proceeding in order to remove any possible obstacles to state court jurisdiction, the dismissal should be without prejudice so that any remaining federal claim may be raised in a federal forum after the state court has been given the opportunity to address the state-law questions in the case. n7

§ 2.68 Appeals of Decisions Related to Abstentionn*

[1] Appealability of Abstention Decisions

A district court's decision to abstain and stay a proceeding under Pullman abstention is a final decision and immediately appealable n1 for purposes of the final judgment rule. n2 The Supreme Court stated that the abstention order is reviewable because it effectively put the litigants out of federal court. n3 The Supreme Court has also held that a district court's order staying a federal proceeding under Colorado River is a final decision that is immediately appealable because the order put the litigants effectively out of court and surrenders federal jurisdiction to a state court. n4 Similarly, a remand order issued under Burford abstention is immediately appealable. n5 On the other hand, if a federal court denies a motion to abstain, the Supreme Court has stated that the order denying abstention is generally not appealable because it is an inherently tentative order that may be reheard by the ordering court. n6

[2] Standard of Review

The standard of review generally, but not uniformly, applied to a lower court's grant or denial of a motion to abstain is abuse of discretion, n1 except for orders of Younger abstention, which are reviewed de novo. n2 However, some courts have offered a rationale for de novo review of abstention decisions generally reasoning that the theories of state and federal law and the principles of federalism and comity are so intertwined in the decision whether to abstain that such determinations are elevated to a level of importance that requires de novo review. n3 Other courts have pointed out that the type of review is not crucial, and that there is little practical distinction between review for abuse of discretion and review de novo in abstention cases, because the district court's discretion to abstain is narrowed by a federal court's obligation to exercise its jurisdiction in all but the most extraordinary of cases. n4

FEDERAL RULES OF PROCEDURE FOR MULTIDISTRICT LITIGATION AND MULTICIRCUIT REVIEW *
TITLE I. RULES FOR MULTIDISTRICT LITIGATION UNDER 28 U.S.C. § 1407

1-2 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure Rule 1.1

Rule 1.1. Definitions

(a) "Panel" means the members of the United States Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation appointed by the Chief Justice of the United States pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1407.

(b) "Chair" means the Chair of the Panel appointed by the Chief Justice of the United States pursuant to Section 1407, or the member of the Panel properly designated to act as Chair.

(c) "Clerk of the Panel" means the official that the Panel appoints to that position. The Clerk of the Panel shall perform such duties that the Panel or the Panel Executive delegates.

(d) "Electronic Case Filing (ECF)" refers to the Panel's automated system that receives and stores documents filed in electronic form. All attorneys filing pleadings with the Panel must do so using ECF. All pro se individuals are non-ECF users, unless the Panel orders otherwise.

(e) "MDL" means a multidistrict litigation docket which the Panel is either considering or has created by transferring cases to a transferee district for coordinated or consolidated pretrial proceedings pursuant to Section 1407.

(f) "Panel Executive" means the official appointed to act as the Panel's Chief Executive and Legal Officer. The Panel Executive may appoint, with the approval of the Panel, necessary deputies, clerical assistants and other employees to perform or assist in the performance of the duties of the Panel Executive. The Panel Executive, with the approval of the Panel, may make such delegations of authority as are necessary for the Panel's efficient operation.

(g) "Pleadings" means all papers, motions, responses, or replies of any kind filed with the Panel, including exhibits attached thereto, as well as all orders and notices that the Panel issues.

(h) "Tag-along action" refers to a civil action pending in a district court which involves common questions of fact with either (1) actions on a pending motion to transfer to create an MDL or (2) actions previously transferred to an existing MDL, and which the Panel would consider transferring under Section 1407.

(i) "Transferee district" is the federal district court to which the Panel transfers an action pursuant to Section 1407, for inclusion in an MDL.

(j) "Transferor district" is the federal district court where an action was pending prior to its transfer pursuant to Section 1407, for inclusion in an MDL, and where the Panel may remand that action at or before the conclusion of pretrial proceedings.

1-2 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure Rule 2.1

Rule 2.1. Rules and Practice

(a) Customary Practice. The Panel's customary practice shall govern, unless otherwise fixed by statute or these Rules.

(b) Failure to Comply with Rules. When a pleading does not comply with these Rules, the Clerk of the Panel may advise counsel of the deficiencies and set a date for full compliance. If counsel does not fully comply within the established time, the Clerk of the Panel shall file the non-complying pleading, but the Chair may thereafter order it stricken.

(c) Admission to Practice before the Panel. Every member in good standing of the Bar of any district court of the United States is entitled to practice before the Panel, provided, however, that he or she has established and maintains a CM/ECF account with any United States federal court. Any attorney of record in any action transferred under Section 1407 may continue to represent his or her client in any district court of the United States to which such action is transferred. Parties are not required to obtain local counsel.

(d) Pendency of Motion or Conditional Order. The pendency of a motion, order to show cause, conditional transfer order or conditional remand order before the Panel pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1407 does not affect or suspend orders and pretrial proceedings in any pending federal district court action and does not limit the pretrial jurisdiction of that court. An order to transfer or remand pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1407 shall be effective only upon its filing with the clerk of the transferee district court.

(e) Reassignment. If for any reason the transferee judge is unable to continue those responsibilities, the Panel shall make the reassignment of a new transferee judge.

1-2 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure Rule 3.1

Rule 3.1. Electronic Records and Files; Copy Fees

(a) Electronic Record. Effective October 4, 2010, the official Panel record shall be the electronic file maintained on the Panel's servers. This record includes, but is not limited to, Panel pleadings, documents filed in paper and then scanned and made part of the electronic record, and Panel orders and notices filed. The official record also includes any documents or exhibits that may be impractical to scan. These documents and exhibits shall be kept in the Panel offices.

(b) Maintaining Records. Records and files generated prior to October 4, 2010, may be (i) maintained at the Panel offices, (ii) temporarily or permanently removed to such places at such times as the Clerk of the Panel or the Chair shall direct, or (iii) transferred whenever appropriate to the Federal Records Center.

(c) Fees. The Clerk of the Panel may charge fees for duplicating records and files, as prescribed by the Judicial Conference of the United States.

TITLE I. RULES FOR MULTIDISTRICT LITIGATION UNDER 28 U.S.C. § 1407

1-2 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure Rule 3.2

Rule 3.2. ECF Users: Filing Requirements

(a) Form of Pleadings. This Rule applies to pleadings that ECF users file with the Panel.

(i) Each pleading shall bear the heading "Before the United States Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation," the identification "MDL No. _____" and the descriptive title designated by the Panel. If the Panel has not yet designated a title, counsel shall use an appropriate description.

(ii) The final page of each pleading shall contain the name, address, telephone number, fax number and email address of the attorney or party designated to receive service of pleadings in the case, and the name of each party represented.

(iii) Each brief submitted with a motion and any response to it shall not exceed 20 pages, exclusive of exhibits. Each reply shall not exceed 10 pages and shall address arguments raised in the response(s). Absent exceptional circumstances and those set forth in Rule 6.1(d), the Panel will not grant motions to exceed page limits.

(iv) Each pleading shall be typed in size 12 point font (for both text and footnotes), double spaced (text only), in a letter size document (8 1/2 x 11 inch) with sequentially numbered pages.

(v) Each exhibit shall be separately numbered and clearly identified.

(vi) Proposed Panel orders shall not be submitted.

(b) Place of Filing. Counsel shall sign and verify all pleadings electronically in accordance with these Rules and the Panel's Administrative Policies and Procedures for Electronic Case Filing found at www.jpml.uscourts.gov. A pleading filed electronically constitutes a written document for the purpose of these Rules and the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and is deemed the electronically signed original thereof. All pleadings, except by pro se litigants, shall conform with this Rule beginning on October 4, 2010.

(i) Pleadings shall not be transmitted directly to any Panel member.

(c) Attorney Registration. Only attorneys identified, or to be identified, pursuant to Rule 4.1, shall file pleadings. Each of these attorneys must register as a Panel CM/ECF user through www.jpml.uscourts.gov. Registration/possession of a CM/ECF account with any United States federal court shall be deemed consent to receive electronic service of all Panel orders and notices as well as electronic service of pleadings from other parties before the Panel.

(d) Courtesy Copy of Specified Pleadings. Counsel shall serve the Clerk of the Panel with a courtesy paper copy of the following pleadings within 1 business day of their filing: (i) a motion to transfer and its supporting brief, (ii) a response to a show cause order, (iii) a motion to vacate a conditional transfer order or a conditional remand order, (iv) any response or reply related to those pleadings and (v) a corporate disclosure statement. No courtesy copies of any other pleadings are required. The courtesy copy shall include all exhibits, shall be clearly marked "Courtesy Copy-Do Not File," shall contain the CM/ECF pleading number (if known), and shall be mailed or delivered to:

Clerk of the Panel
United States Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation
Thurgood Marshall Federal Judiciary Building
One Columbus Circle, NE, Room G-255, North Lobby
Washington, DC 20002-8041

(e) Privacy Protections. The privacy protections contained in Rule 5.2 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure shall apply to all Panel filings.

* For a complete discussion of Multidistrict Litigation, see 17 Moore's Federal Practice, Ch. 112 (Matthew Bender 3d ed.).

1-2 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure Rule 3.3

Rule 3.3. Non-ECF Users: Filing Requirements

(a) Definition of Non-ECF Users. Non-ECF users are all pro se individuals, unless the Panel orders otherwise. This Rule shall apply to all motions, responses and replies that non-ECF users file with the Panel.

(b) Form of Pleadings. Unless otherwise set forth in this Rule, the provisions of Rule 3.2 shall apply to non-ECF users.

(i) Each pleading shall be flat and unfolded; plainly written or typed in size 12 point font (for both text and footnotes), double spaced (text only), and printed single-sided on letter size (8 1/2 x 11 inch) white paper with sequentially numbered pages; and fastened at the top-left corner without side binding or front or back covers.

(ii) Each exhibit shall be separately numbered and clearly identified. Any exhibits exceeding a cumulative total of 50 pages shall be bound separately.

(c) Place of Filing. File an original and one copy of all pleadings with the Clerk of the Panel by mailing or delivering to:

Clerk of the Panel
United States Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation

Thurgood Marshall Federal Judiciary Building
One Columbus Circle, NE, Room G-255, North Lobby
Washington, DC 20002-8041

(i) Pleadings not exceeding a total of 10 pages, including exhibits, may be faxed to the Panel office.

(ii) The Clerk of the Panel shall endorse the date for filing on all pleadings submitted for filing.

1-2 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure Rule 4.1

Rule 4.1. Service of Pleadings

(a) Proof of Service. The Panel's notice of electronic filing shall constitute service of pleadings. Registration/possession by counsel of a CM/ECF account with any United States federal court shall be deemed consent to receive electronic service of all pleadings. All pleadings shall contain a proof of service on all other parties in all involved actions. The proof of service shall indicate the name and manner of service. If a party is not represented by counsel, the proof of service shall indicate the name of the party and the party's last known address. The proof of service shall indicate why any person named as a party in a constituent complaint was not served with the Section 1407 pleading.

(b) Service Upon Transferor Court. The proof of service pertaining to motions for a transfer or remand pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1407 shall certify that counsel has transmitted a copy of the motion for filing to the clerk of each district court where an affected action is pending.

(c) Notice of Appearance. With 14 days after the filing of (i) notice of the filing of a motion to initiate transfer under Rule 6.2, (ii) the opposition to a CTO under Rule 7.1, (iii) a show cause order under Rules 8.1, (iv) the opposition to a CRO under Rule 10.2, or (v) a motion to remand under Rule 10.3, each party or designated attorney shall file a Notice of Appearance notifying the Clerk of the Panel of the name, address and email address of the attorney designated to file and receive service of all pleadings. Each party shall designate only one attorney. Any party not represented by counsel shall be served by mailing such pleadings to the party's last known address. Except in extraordinary circumstances, the Panel will not grant requests for an extension of time to file the Notice of Appearance.

(d) Liaison Counsel. If the transferee district court appoints liaison counsel, this Rule shall be satisfied by serving each party in each affected action and all liaison counsel. Liaison counsel shall receive copies of all Panel orders concerning their particular litigation and shall be responsible for distribution to the parties for whom he or she serves as liaison counsel.

1-2 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure Rule 5.1

Rule 5.1. Corporate Disclosure Statement

(a) Requirements. Any nongovernmental corporate party shall file a statement listing (i) all its parent, subsidiary, and other affiliate corporations, (ii) any publicly held company that owns 10% or more of the party's stock, and (iii) any publicly owned corporation, not a party to the matter, that has a financial interest in the outcome of the matter (e.g., by reason of insurance, a franchise agreement, or an indemnity agreement) and describing the nature of that interest. A corporation is an affiliate for purposes of this Rule if it controls, is under the control of, or is under common control with a publicly owned corporation.

(b) Deadline. A party shall file the corporate disclosure statement within 14 days after issuance of a notice of the filing of a motion to transfer or remand, an order to show cause, or a motion to vacate a conditional transfer order or a conditional remand order.

(c) Updating. Each party must update its corporate disclosure statement to reflect any change in the information therein (i) until the matter before the Panel is decided, and (ii) within 14 days after issuance of a notice of the filing of any subsequent motion to transfer or remand, order to show cause, or motion to vacate a conditional transfer order or a conditional remand order in that docket.

TITLE I. RULES FOR MULTIDISTRICT LITIGATION UNDER 28 U.S.C. § 1407

1-2 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure Rule 6.1

Rule 6.1. Motion Practice

(a) Application. This Rule governs all motions requesting Panel action generally. More specific provisions may apply to motions to transfer (Rule 6.2), miscellaneous motions (Rule 6.3), conditional transfer orders (Rule 7.1), show cause orders (Rule 8.1), conditional remand orders (Rule 10.2) and motions to remand (Rule 10.3).

(b) Form of Motions. All motions shall briefly describe the action or relief sought and shall include:

(i) a brief which concisely states the background of the litigation and movant's factual and legal contentions;

(ii) a numbered schedule providing

(A) the complete name of each action involved, listing the full name of each party included as such on the district court's docket sheet, not shortened by the use of references such as "et al." or "etc.";

(B) the district court and division where each action is pending;

(C) the civil action number of each action; and

(D) the name of the judge assigned each action, if known;

(iii) a proof of service providing

(A) a service list listing the full name of each party included on the district court's docket sheet and the complaint, including opt-in plaintiffs not listed on the docket sheet; and

(B) in actions where there are 25 or more plaintiffs listed on the docket sheet, list the first named plaintiff with the reference "et al." if all the plaintiffs are represented by the same attorney(s);

(iv) a copy of all complaints and docket sheets for all actions listed on the Schedule; and

(v) exhibits, if any, identified by number or letter and a descriptive title.

(c) Responses and Joinders. Any other party may file a response within 21 days after filing of a motion. Failure to respond to a motion shall be treated as that party's acquiescence to it. A joinder in a motion shall not add any action to that motion.

(d) Replies. The movant may file a reply within 7 days after the lapse of the time period for filing a response. Where a movant is replying to more than one response in opposition, the movant may file a consolidated reply with a limit of 20 pages.

(e) Alteration of Time Periods. The Clerk of the Panel has the discretion to shorten or enlarge the time periods set forth in this Rule as necessary.

(f) Notification of Developments. Counsel shall promptly notify the Clerk of the Panel of any development that would partially or completely moot any Panel matter.

1-2 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure Rule 6.2

Rule 6.2. Motions to Transfer for Coordinated or Consolidated Pretrial Proceedings

(a) Initiation of Transfer. A party to an action may initiate proceedings to transfer under Section 1407 by filing a motion in accordance with these Rules. A copy of the motion shall be filed in each district court where the motion affects a pending action.

(b) Notice of Filing of Motion to Transfer. Upon receipt of a motion, the Clerk of the Panel shall issue a "Notice of Filing of Motion to Transfer" to the service list recipients. The Notice shall contain the following: the filing date of the motion, caption, MDL docket number, briefing schedule and pertinent Panel policies. After a motion is filed, the Clerk of the Panel shall consider any other pleading to be a response unless the pleading adds an action. The Clerk of the Panel may designate such a pleading as a motion, and distribute a briefing schedule applicable to all or some of the parties, as appropriate.

(c) Notice of Appearance. Within 14 days of issuance of a "Notice of the Filing of a Motion to Transfer," each party or designated attorney shall file a Notice of Appearance in accordance with Rule 4.1(c).

(d) Notice of Tag-along Actions. Any party or counsel in a new group of actions under consideration for transfer under Section 1407 shall promptly notify the Clerk of the Panel of any tag-along actions in which that party is also named or in which that counsel appears.

(e) Interested Party Responses. Any party or counsel in one or more tag-along actions as well as amicus curiae may file a response to a pending motion to transfer. Such a pleading shall be deemed an Interested Party Response.

(f) Amendment to a Motion. Before amending a motion to transfer, a party shall first contact the Clerk of the Panel to ascertain whether such amendment is feasible and permissible considering the Panel's hearing schedule. Any such amendment shall be entitled "Amendment to Motion for Transfer," and shall clearly and specifically identify and describe the nature of the amendment.

(i) Where the amended motion includes new civil actions, the amending party shall file a "Schedule of Additional Actions" and a revised Proof of Service.

(ii) The Proof of Service shall state (A) that all new counsel have been served with a copy of the amendment and all previously-filed motion papers, and (B) that all counsel previously served with the original motion have been served with a copy of the amendment.

(iii) The Clerk of the Panel may designate the amendment with a different denomination (e.g., a notice of potential tag-along action(s)) and treatment.

(h) [g] Oral Argument. The Panel shall schedule oral arguments as needed and as set forth in Rule 11.1. [Editor's explanatory note: The bracketed subsection [g] designation has been inserted to indicate the probable intent of the Panel on Multidistrict Litigation.]

Rule 6.3. Motions for Miscellaneous Relief

(a) Definition. Motions for miscellaneous relief include, but are not limited to, requests for extensions of time, exemption from ECF requirements, page limit extensions, or expedited consideration of any motion.

(b) Panel Action. The Panel, through the Clerk, may act upon any motion for miscellaneous relief, at any time, without waiting for a response. A motion for extension of time to file a pleading or perform an act under these Rules must state specifically the revised date sought and must be filed before the deadline for filing the pleading or performing the act. Any party aggrieved by the Clerk of the Panel's action may file objections for consideration. Absent exceptional circumstances, the Panel will not grant any extensions of time to file a notice of opposition to either a conditional transfer order or a conditional remand order.

1-2 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure Rule 7.1

Rule 7.1. Conditional Transfer Orders (CTO) for Tag-Along Actions

(a) Notification of Potential Tag-along. Any party or counsel in actions previously transferred under Section 1407 shall promptly notify the Clerk of the Panel of any potential tag-along actions in which that party is also named or in which that counsel appears. The Panel has several options: (i) filing a CTO under Rule 7.1, (ii) filing a show cause order under Rule 8.1, or (iii) declining to act (Rule 7.1(b)(i)).

(b) Initiation of CTO. Upon learning of the pendency of a potential tag-along action, the Clerk of the Panel may enter a conditional order transferring that action to the previously designated transferee district court for the reasons expressed in the Panel's previous opinions and orders. The Clerk of the Panel shall serve this order on each party to the litigation but shall not send the order to the clerk of the transferee district court until 7 days after its entry.

(i) If the Clerk of the Panel determines that a potential tag-along action is not appropriate for inclusion in an MDL proceeding and does not enter a CTO, an involved party may move for its transfer pursuant to Rule 6.1.

(c) Notice of Opposition to CTO. Any party opposing the transfer shall file a notice of opposition with the Clerk of the Panel within the 7-day period. In such event, the Clerk of the Panel shall not transmit the transfer order to the clerk of the transferee district court, but shall notify the parties of the briefing schedule.

(d) Failure to Respond. Failure to respond to a CTO shall be treated as that party's acquiescence to it.

(e) Notice of Appearance. Within 14 days after the issuance of a CTO, each opposing party or designated attorney shall file a Notice of Appearance in accordance with Rule 4.1(c).

(f) Motion to Vacate CTO. Within 14 days of the filing of its notice of opposition, the party opposing transfer shall file a motion to vacate the CTO and brief in support thereof. The Clerk of the Panel shall set the motion for the next appropriate hearing session. Failure to file and serve a motion and brief shall be treated as withdrawal of the opposition and the Clerk of the Panel shall forthwith transmit the order to the clerk of the transferee district court.

(g) Notification of Developments. Parties to an action subject to a CTO shall notify the Clerk of the Panel if that action is no longer pending in its transferor district court.

(h) Effective Date of CTO. CTOs are effective when filed with the clerk of the transferee district court.

Rule 7.2. Miscellaneous Provisions Concerning Tag-along Actions

(a) Potential Tag-alongs in Transferee Court. Potential tag-along actions filed in the transferee district do not require Panel action. A party should request assignment of such actions to the Section 1407 transferee judge in accordance with applicable local rules.

(b) Failure to Serve. Failure to serve one or more of the defendants in a potential tag-along action with the complaint and summons as required by Rule 4 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure does not preclude transfer of such action under Section 1407. Such failure, however, may constitute grounds for denying the proposed transfer where prejudice can be shown. The inability of the Clerk of the Panel to serve a CTO on all plaintiffs or defendants or their counsel shall not void the transfer but may constitute grounds for remand as to such party where prejudice is shown.

Rule 8.1. Show Cause Orders

(a) Entry of Show Cause Order. When transfer of multidistrict litigation is being considered on the initiative of the Panel pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1407(c)(i), the Clerk of the Panel may enter an order directing the parties to show cause why a certain civil action or actions should not be transferred for coordinated or consolidated pretrial proceedings. Any party shall also promptly notify the Clerk of the Panel whenever they learn of any other federal district court actions which are similar to those which the show cause order encompasses.

(b) Notice of Appearance. Within 14 days of the issuance of an order to show cause, each party or designated attorney shall file a Notice of Appearance in accordance with Rule 4.1(c).

(c) Responses. Unless otherwise provided by order, any party may file a response within 21 days of the filing of the show cause order. Failure to respond to a show cause order shall be treated as that party's acquiescence to the Panel action.

(d) Replies. Within 7 days after the lapse of the time period for filing a response, any party may file a reply.

(e) Notification of Developments. Counsel shall promptly notify the Clerk of the Panel of any development that would partially or completely moot any matter subject to a show cause order.

1-2 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure Rule 9.1

Rule 9.1. Transfer of Files; Notification Requirements

(a) Notice to Transferee Court Clerk. The Clerk of the Panel, via a notice of electronic filing, will notify the clerk of the transferee district whenever a Panel transfer order should be filed in the transferee district court. Upon receipt of an electronically certified copy of a Panel transfer order from the clerk of the transferee district, the clerk of the transferor district shall transmit the record of each transferred action to the transferee district and then, unless Rule 9.1(b) applies, close the transferred action in the transferor district.

(b) Retention of Claims. If the transfer order provides for the separation and simultaneous remand of any claim, cross-claim, counterclaim, or third-party claim, the clerk of the transferor district shall retain jurisdiction over any such claim and shall not close the action.

(c) Notice to Clerk of Panel. The clerk of the transferee district shall promptly provide the Clerk of the Panel with the civil action numbers assigned to all transferred actions and the identity of liaison counsel, if or when designated. The clerk of the transferee district shall also promptly notify the Clerk of the Panel of any dispositive ruling that terminates a transferred action.

1-2 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure Rule 10.1

Rule 10.1. Termination and Remand

(a) Termination. Where the transferee district court terminates an action by valid order, including but not limited to summary judgment, judgment of dismissal and judgment upon stipulation, the transferee district court clerk shall transmit a copy of that order to the Clerk of the Panel. The terminated action shall not be remanded to the transferor court and the transferee court shall retain the original files and records unless the transferee judge or the Panel directs otherwise.

(b) Initiation of Remand. Typically, the transferee judge recommends remand of an action, or a part of it, to the transferor court at any time by filing a suggestion of remand with the Panel. However, the Panel may remand an action or any separable claim, cross-claim, counterclaim or third-party claim within it, upon

(i) the transferee court's suggestion of remand,

(ii) the Panel's own initiative by entry of an order to show cause, a conditional remand order or other appropriate order, or

(iii) motion of any party.

Rule 10.2. Conditional Remand Orders (CRO)

(a) Entering a CRO. Upon the suggestion of the transferee district judge or the Panel's own initiative, the Clerk of the Panel shall enter a conditional order remanding the action or actions to the transferor district court. The Clerk of the Panel shall serve this order on each party to the litigation but shall not send the order to the clerk of the transferee district court for 7-days from the entry thereof.

(i) The Panel may, on its own initiative, also enter an order that the parties show cause why a matter should not be remanded. Rule 8.1 applies to responses and replies with respect to such a show cause order.

(b) Notice of Opposition. Any party opposing the CRO shall file a notice of opposition with the Clerk of the Panel within the 7 day period. In such event, the Clerk of the Panel shall not transmit the remand order to the clerk of the transferee district court and shall notify the parties of the briefing schedule.

(c) Failure to Respond. Failure to respond to a CRO shall be treated as that party's acquiescence to it.

(d) Notice of Appearance. Within 14 days after the issuance of a CRO, each opposing party or designated attorney shall file a Notice of Appearance in accordance with Rule 4.1(c).

(e) Motion to Vacate CRO. Within 14 days of the filing of its notice of opposition, the party opposing remand shall file a motion to vacate the CRO and brief in support thereof. The Clerk of the Panel shall set the motion for the next appropriate Panel hearing session. Failure to file and serve a motion and brief shall be treated as a withdrawal of the opposition and the Clerk of the Panel shall forthwith transmit the order to the clerk of the transferee district court.

(f) Effective Date of CRO. CROs are not effective until filed with the clerk of the transferee district court.

(a) Requirements of the Motion. If the Clerk of the Panel does not enter a CRO, a party may file a motion to remand to the transferor court pursuant to these Rules. Because the Panel is reluctant to order a remand absent the suggestion of the transferee judge, the motion must include:

(i) An affidavit reciting whether the movant has requested a suggestion of remand and the judge's response, whether the parties have completed common discovery and other pretrial proceedings, and whether the parties have complied with all transferee court orders.

(ii) A copy of the transferee district court's final pretrial order, if entered.

(b) Filing Copy of Motion. Counsel shall file a copy of the motion to remand in the affected transferee district court.

(c) Notice of Appearance. Within 14 days of filing of a motion to remand, each party or designated attorney shall file a Notice of Appearance in accordance with Rule 4.1(c).

(b) Transfer of Files. Upon receipt of an order to remand from the Clerk of the Panel, the transferee district shall transmit to the clerk of the transferor district the following concerning each remanded action:

(i) a copy of the individual docket sheet for each action remanded;

(ii) a copy of the master docket sheet, if applicable;

(iii) the entire file for each action remanded, as originally received from the transferor district and augmented as set out in this Rule;

Rule 11.1. Hearing Sessions and Oral Argument

(a) Schedule. The Panel shall schedule sessions for oral argument and consideration of other matters as desirable or necessary. The Chair shall determine the time, place and agenda for each hearing session. The Clerk of the Panel shall give appropriate notice to counsel for all parties. The Panel may continue its consideration of any scheduled matters.

(b) Oral Argument Statement. Any party affected by a motion may file a separate statement setting forth reasons why oral argument should, or need not, be heard. Such statements shall be captioned "Reasons Why Oral Argument Should [Need Not] Be Heard" and shall be limited to 2 pages.

(i) The parties affected by a motion to transfer may agree to waive oral argument. The Panel will take this into consideration in determining the need for oral argument.

(c) Hearing Session. The Panel shall not consider transfer or remand of any action pending in a federal district court when any party timely opposes such transfer or remand without first holding a hearing session for the presentation of oral argument. The Panel may dispense with oral argument if it determines that:

(i) the dispositive issue(s) have been authoritatively decided; or

(ii) the facts and legal arguments are adequately presented and oral argument would not significantly aid the decisional process.

Unless otherwise ordered, the Panel shall consider all other matters, such as a motion for reconsideration, upon the basis of the pleadings.

(d) Notification of Oral Argument. The Panel shall promptly notify counsel of those matters in which oral argument is scheduled, as well as those matters that the Panel will consider on the pleadings. The Clerk of the Panel shall require counsel to file and serve notice of their intent to either make or waive oral argument. Failure to do so shall be deemed a waiver of oral argument. If counsel does not attend oral argument, the matter shall not be rescheduled and that party's position shall be treated as submitted for decision on the basis of the pleadings filed.

(i) Absent Panel approval and for good cause shown, only those parties to actions who have filed a motion or written response to a motion or order shall be permitted to present oral argument.

(ii) The Panel will not receive oral testimony except upon notice, motion and an order expressly providing for it.

(e) Duty to Confer. Counsel in an action set for oral argument shall confer separately prior to that argument for the purpose of organizing their arguments and selecting representatives to present all views without duplication. Oral argument is a means for counsel to emphasize the key points of their arguments, and to update the Panel on any events since the conclusion of briefing.

(f) Time Limit for Oral Argument. Barring exceptional circumstances, the Panel shall allot a maximum of 20 minutes for oral argument in each matter. The time shall be divided among those with varying viewpoints. Counsel for the moving party or parties shall generally be heard first.

(a) Submitting Notice. An affected agency shall submit a notice of multicircuit petitions for review pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2112(a)(3) to the Clerk of the Panel by electronic means in the manner these Rules require and in accordance with the Panel's Administrative Policies and Procedures for Electronic Case Filing, except that the portion of Rule 3.2(d) requiring a courtesy copy is suspended in its entirety.

(b) Accompaniments to Notices. All notices of multicircuit petitions for review shall include:

(i) a copy of each involved petition for review as the petition for review is defined in 28 U.S.C. § 2112(a)(2); and

(ii) a schedule giving

(A) the date of the relevant agency order;

(B) the case name of each petition for review involved;

(C) the circuit court of appeals in which each petition for review is pending;

(D) the appellate docket number of each petition for review;

(E) the date of filing by the court of appeals of each petition for review; and

(F) the date of receipt by the agency of each petition for review.

(c) Scope of Notice. All notices of multicircuit petitions for review shall embrace exclusively petitions for review filed in the courts of appeals within 10-days after issuance of an agency order and received by the affected agency from the petitioners within that 10 day period.

(d) Filing at the Panel. The Clerk of the Panel shall file the notice of multicircuit petitions for review and endorse thereon the date of filing.

(e) Filing with Each Circuit Clerk. The affected agency shall file copies of notices of multicircuit petitions for review with the clerk of each circuit court of appeals in which a petition for review is pending.

(a) Proof of Service. Notices of multicircuit petitions for review shall include proof of service on all other parties in the petitions for review included in the notice. Rule 25 of the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure governs service and proof of service. The proof of service shall state the name, address and email address of each person served and shall indicate the party represented by each and the manner in which service was accomplished on each party. If a party is not represented by counsel, the proof of service shall indicate the name of the party and his or her last known address. The affected party shall submit proof of service for filing with the Clerk of the Panel and shall send copies thereof to each person included within the proof of service.

(b) Service on Clerk of Circuit. The proof of service pertaining to notices of multicircuit petitions for review shall certify the affected party has mailed or delivered copies of the notices to the clerk of each circuit court of appeals in which a petition for review is pending that is included in the notice. The Clerk shall file the notice with the circuit court.

Multiple petitions for review pending in a single circuit shall be allotted only a single entry in the drum. A designated deputy other than the random selector shall witness the random selection. Thereafter, an order on behalf of the Panel shall be issued, signed by the random selector and the witness,

(i) consolidating the petitions for review in the court of appeals for the circuit that was randomly selected; and

(ii) designating that circuit as the one in which the record is to be filed pursuant to Rules 16 and 17 of the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure.

(b) Effective Date. A consolidation of petitions for review shall be effective when the Clerk of the Panel enters the consolidation order.

§ 3.01 Source of Principles Governing Law Applicable in Dual Court Systemn*

The United States Constitution is the ultimate source governing the substantive law to be applied in the dual system of federal and state courts. n1 Article VI of the Constitution, referred to as the "Supremacy Clause", makes the laws of the United States the ultimate law of the land and requires the courts of every state to apply those laws, n2 even if state law is to the contrary. n2.1 This rule is supported by the fact that the drafters of the Constitution intended originally that state courts would serve as trial courts for the adjudication of federal law issues, and state courts would be augmented only by federal courts later specifically designated by Congress. n2.2 Thus, it is Congress and the courts established by Congress that have the authority to specify which federal and state substantive and procedural law is to be applied to federal issues decided in both state and federal courts. n3 The selection of the substantive and procedural law that is to be applied in the federal and state courts represents a balancing of the conflicting interests of federal powers and states' rights. n4

Through its constitutional authority, Congress has enacted a statutory scheme that regulates which law controls in cases involving federal issues. n5 Even though the state courts generally have the authority to decide federal law issues concurrently with federal courts, n6 Congress has the constitutional power to deny state courts jurisdiction over particular federal law issues; for such issues, Congress grants the federal courts exclusive jurisdiction. n7

Alternatively, Congress may provide that a federal law issue may be decided only in a state court. For example, the federal Telephone Consumer Protection Act n8 explicitly gives exclusive jurisdiction to state courts to hear cases based on that federal statute. n9

§ 3.02 Statutes Governing Law Applicable in Federal Courtn*

[1] Rules of Decision Act Governs Applicability of Substantive Law

Under the "Rules of Decision Act," the laws of each of the states operate as the rules of decision in civil actions in the courts of the United States, except when the federal Constitution, federal treaties, or acts of Congress otherwise require or provide. n1 In other words, when the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States are silent regarding substantive law, state laws apply in civil actions in federal courts. n2

One of the primary effects of the Rules of Decision Act is that in a diversity case, which by definition arises under state law, the federal district court must apply state substantive law, including state statutory and common law. n3 However, in the exercise of its authority granted by Congress in the Rules Enabling Act, n4 the Supreme Court has prescribed rules of procedure for federal district court cases. n5 Therefore, in both diversity cases and federal question cases, the federal court must apply federal procedural rules. n6

[2] Rules Enabling Act Governs Applicability of Procedural Law

Under the Rules Enabling Act, the Supreme Court has the power to prescribe general rules of practice and procedure for cases in the United States district courts and courts of appeals. n1 However, such rules may not abridge, enlarge, or modify any substantive right. n1.1 Once rules are promulgated and become effective, all other procedural laws in conflict with the rules have no force or effect. n2 Pursuant to this authority, the Supreme Court has actually prescribedextensive federal rules of procedure for federal district court cases and circuit court of appeals cases. n3

Read together, n4 the Rules of Decision Act n5 and the Rules Enabling Act provide that in a diversity case the federal district court must apply state substantive law and federal procedural rules. n6 In other words, if a particular matter is covered by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, the federal procedural rule on point that does not abridge, enlarge, or modify any substantive right, and is in accordance with the Constitution, applies to the matter despite any contrary state law. n7 Furthermore, because Congress has delegated the power to enact and amend federal rules to the Supreme Court, subject to congressional review, n8 the federal district courts and appellate courts do not have authority to revise them by judicial mandate. n9

§ 3.03 Distinction Between Substantive and Procedural Lawn*

As discussed above, n1 whether state law or federal law applies may depend on whether the matter is categorized as substantive or procedural. Generally, if a law controls the method or the manner of the presentation of a claim, it is procedural rather than substantive. n2 On the other hand, if the law specifies the elements necessary to determine the outcome of the claim, the law is substantive. n3 In practice, the difference between substantive and procedural matters is more difficult to determine in some cases. n4 Therefore, the United States Supreme Court has developed three inquiries to determine whether federal or state law governs a particular issue in a diversity case when there is a conflict between the two and it is difficult to determine if the issue is substantive or procedural: n5

1. If a specific federal procedural rule or statute is applicable to a situation, it must control the issue. n6

2. If no specific law is applicable to a particular situation, the federal law controls when there is a conflict between the state and federal law. n7 However, if there is no conflict, the state law controls if the state law is outcome determinative. n8

3. Even if an applicable state law is outcome-determinative, the federal court may apply a general federal law if on balance it promotes an overriding federal interest. n9

CHAPTER 3 LAW APPLIED
PART I. FUNDAMENTALS CONTROLLING WHETHER STATE OR FEDERAL LAW APPLIES IN PARTICULAR COURT SYSTEM

1-3 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 3.04

§ 3.04 Creation of Federal Common Lawn*

[1] Nature of Federal Common Law

There is no general federal common law that controls substantive determinations, and the federal courts may not apply a uniform federal common law on all issues. n1 The court may not apply a general federal common law even if the court believes that a federal common law would be appropriate to resolve a particular situation. n2 This principle has been announced by the Supreme Court because, under the Erie doctrine, the law applied in federal court must be either the state law of the forum (in diversity cases) or federal statutory or constitutional law (in federal question cases). n3 However, federal courts may create federal common law and displace state created rules in very limited circumstances that require a special federal rule. n4 This may occur when the proponent establishes that the dispute implicates a uniquely federal interest and that state law conflicts with a significant federal policy or interest. n5 For example, the Supreme Court has held that one of the federal common-law "enclaves" concerns the legal principles governing the nation's relationship with other nations in the international community. n6 These areas of federal common law are listed in [2], below.

[2] Areas of Federal Common Law

The Supreme Court has held that the federal courts may create and apply federal common law in certain limited areas to effectuate congressional intent n1 or protect uniquely federal interests. n2 Consequently, federal courts have developed and applied federal common law in the following specific areas:

1. The nation's relationship with other nations. n3 For example, the long-standing federal common-law principle, the "act of state" doctrine, precludes courts from questioning the legality of actions that a foreign government has taken within its own borders. n4

2. Disputes between states. n5 In the absence of a relevant federal statute, the Supreme Court has original, exclusive jurisdiction over suits between states, n6 and it must apply federal common law because it would be unfair to apply either states' laws to resolve the dispute. The most typical example of this type is the federal common law of water rights between bordering states. n7

3. Litigation regarding a federal statute that requires national uniformity of application. n8 Thus, federal courts may create "interstitial federal common law" n9 provided that Congress has enacted a general regulatory scheme and intends that the federal courts create coherent national substantive standards to fill gaps necessary to effectuate the scheme, such as for ERISA litigation. n10

4. Enforcement of an important constitutional right when there is an absence of a constitutional or statutory remedy for violation of the constitutional right. n11

5. Federal proprietary interests, such as debts owed to the United States. n12 Proprietary interests are "uniquely federal interests" so committed by the Constitution and federal statute that the federal law preempts and replaces state law where necessary. n13 Federal proprietary interests requiring the application of federal common law include interests such as: (1) the title the United States holds to property; n14 (2) the right of the United States to bring tort actions; n15 (3) the rights and obligations of the United States under its contracts, especially when the contracts relate directly to federal regulatory programs, n16 and (4) the rights and duties of the United States regarding commercial paper that it issues or holds. n17

6. Disputes based on admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. n18 Because the Constitution grants federal courts jurisdiction over admiralty and maritime cases, regardless of the amount in controversy, diversity of citizenship, or whether the controversy arises under a federal statute, n19 the Supreme Court has held that federal courts have the authority to develop and apply federal common law to admiralty and maritime cases. n20

7. Indian relations and land rights. Under the United States Constitution, Indian relations fall within the exclusive province of federal law, and numerous Supreme Court decisions have recognized that Indians have federal common-law rights in aboriginal lands. n21

[3] Adoption of State Law As Federal Common Law

In certain cases when there are gaps in federal statutory schemes, n1 the federal court may borrow, incorporate, or adopt state law to provide the rule of decision, and thenincorporate that rule into the federal common law. n2 In developing federal common law, federal courts may borrow from state law except in two situations. Courts may not borrow from state common law if: (1) the case involves an area of uniquely federal interest where there is a demonstrated need for a uniform national rule; n3 or (2) there is a significant conflict between state law and some discernible federal policy. n4

On the other hand, borrowing state law is particularly appropriate in those areas in which private parties have entered legal relationships with the expectation that state law would govern their rights and obligations. These are areas of the law in which federal courts have given traditional deference to state law, for example, in litigation regarding the corporate entity n5 and family and domestic relationships. n6

When necessary, federal courts may also borrow rules that control litigation. For example, when Congress has not expressly provided a statute of limitation governing actions based on a federal statute, federal courts may apply the most closely analogous state statute, unless application of the state statute would be inconsistent with underlying federal policies. n7

§ 3.05 Summary of Law Applicable in Federal Courtn*

Ordinarily, federal substantive law would apply at all times in federal court because of the Supremacy Clause, which provides that the Constitution, the statutes and laws enacted by Congress pursuant to the Constitution, and all federal treaties are the supreme law of the land and that the federal and state courts located in every State are bound by the Constitution, statutes, and treaties. n1 However, pursuant to its constitutional authority, Congress has enacted the Rules of Decision Act, which provides that in cases in which the laws of the states apply, a federal court must apply state substantive law as the rule of decision in the courts of the United States, except where the Constitution or treaties of the United States or Acts of Congress otherwise require or provide. n2 Furthermore, Congress explicitly made state law applicable in federal court by providing for diversity jurisdiction, n3 which by definition arises under state law in actions between citizens of different states. n4 The bulk of this Chapter is a discussion in PART II of the various circumstances in diversity cases which require the application of either federal or state law. n5

§ 3.06 Law Applicable in State Courtn*

[1] State Law Claims

The courts of each state have jurisdiction over all claims arising from the law of the state, whether statutory or common law. The applicable law of decision for such claims is the statutes and common law of the state, n1 except when there are "choice of law" issues resulting because more than one state has sufficient "contacts" with the claims or parties. Choice of law analysis determines which state law applies when two or more states are involved. n2

In the dual court system, state courts are not the only courts that have power to decide claims based on state law. Federal courts have concurrent jurisdiction over claims arising from state law in the limited circumstances of "diversity jurisdiction," "supplemental jurisdiction," or "removal jurisdiction," and state law claims may be filed or heard in federal courts in those cases. A federal court has diversity jurisdiction over a claim, even though it arises under state law, if the claim is between citizens of different states and the amount in controversy exceeds $75,000. n5 A federal court has supplemental jurisdiction over a state law claim when the federal court already has original jurisdiction of the case based on a federal question or on diversity, and the state law claim is part of the same case or controversy. n6 It should also be noted that a case based on a state law may be removed to federal court if the federal court would have had jurisdiction over the case originally based on diversity of citizenship. n7 For a discussion of issues of the subject matter jurisdiction in the federal-state dual court system, see Ch. 2, Concurrent and Conflicting Jurisdiction.

[2] Federal Law Claims

[a] Obligation of State Court to Hear Federal Claim

State courts are presumed to have concurrent jurisdiction with federal courts to hearall claims arising under federal law; this means that state courts are competent to adjudicate federal law claims unless the Constitution, federal statutes, or case precedent clearly give exclusive jurisdiction to the federal courts for a particular claim. Furthermore, when a state court does have concurrent or exclusive jurisdiction over a federal claim, the Supremacy Clause of the federal Constitution n1 provides that the state court has the obligation to hear and decide all federal claims. n2

The presumption of concurrent state and federal jurisdiction to hear federal claims is so strong that it is defeated only in two narrowly defined circumstances: first, when Congress expressly ousts state courts of jurisdiction, and second, when a state court refuses jurisdiction because of a neutral state rule regarding the administration of the courts. n3 Consequently, a state court may decline to exercise its jurisdiction over a federal claim for one or more of the following reasons:

1. A state law limits the state court's subject-matter jurisdiction and the subject matter of the federal claim is outside the state court's jurisdiction. n4 However, a state court may not justify its refusal to entertain a federal claim merely because it characterizes a rule as jurisdictional. The state court need not hear the federal claim only if the rule is truly jurisdictional, n5 which means that the rule must affect the court's power over the parties and the court's competence over the subject matter. n6

2. A state rule of judicial administration, such as the state courts' rules of procedure, permits the court to decline to adjudicate a federal claim, provided that the procedural rule does not discriminate against federal claims, n7 and is not preempted by federal law. n8

3. The existence of a more convenient forum in the federal court, provided that the state court also qualifies as an inconvenient forum under the doctrine of forum non conveniens. n9

4. A state law provides for discretionary dismissal of both federal and state claims when neither the plaintiff nor the defendant is a resident of the forum state. n10

Under these exceptions to the requirement that a state court must exercise its jurisdiction to hear federal claims, a State cannot simply refuse to entertain a federal claim based on a policy disagreement. n11

[b] Application of Federal Law in State Court

A state court adjudicating a claim based on federal law must apply federal substantive law, n12 including any federal common law developed in the area, n13 even when the federal claim arises in the course of a lawsuit primarily based on state law. For example, a state court was required to apply federal patent law to decide the the validity of a patent when that issue arose in a case that was otherwise based on a state breach of contract claim. n14

In state court litigation of a federal claim, federal law governs the elements and defenses. Thus, federal law controls the proper measure of damages and the availability of prejudgment interest. n15 A state court may not apply a state law defense to a federal claim that the parties could not raise in federal court, because to do so would alter federal law by denying relief on the merits of the federal claim. n16 In other words, federal rights could be defeated if state courts were permitted to determine what defenses may be raised to claims based on federal statutes. n17 The Supremacy Clause also prohibits state courts from refusing to apply federal law to a federal claim on the grounds that the federal law conflicts with state law. n18

The state court may apply state procedural rules when adjudicating a federal claim, provided that those rules do not have the effect of denying substantial rights under the federal law. n19 For example, if federal law provides for the right to a jury trial, the statecourt may not deny that benefit by applying contrary local procedure permitting disposition of the issues by the court alone. n20

A. NATURE OF APPLICABILITY OF LAW IN DIVERSITY CASES

1-3 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 3.20

§ 3.20 Statement of Applicability of Law in Diversity Casen*

A federal court exercising diversity jurisdiction under the Erie doctrine n1 must determine whether a matter in issue is procedural or substantive. If procedural, then federal law will apply; however, if substantive, the court must apply the law of the forum state, n2 including the forum state's statutory and common law. n3 The requirement of the application of federal procedural law is based on the United States Supreme Court's express promulgation of rules of procedure under the Rules Enabling Act. n4

The Erie doctrine has three general purposes: to promote uniform results in federal and state courts, to discourage forum shopping, and to avoid inequitable administration of the laws. n5 However, for purposes of the Erie doctrine, there is a gray area in which a matter in issue might reasonably be categorized as either procedural or substantive. In such cases, the federal court must generally follow a hierarchy of tests developed by the Supreme Court to determine whether to apply federal or state law. n6 For a discussion of these tests, see § 3.22.

When a federal court sitting in diversity applies state substantive law under the Erie doctrine, the court must apply the law of the forum state, which is the state in which the district court is located; the state's law includes the forum state's choice of law principles. n6.1 Therefore, if a case involves contacts with more than one state, a federal district court may be required to apply the forum state's substantive law or the law of a different state, if the forum state's courts would apply another state's law to the case, under the forum's choice of law principles. n6.2 For a discussion of choice of law principles in diversity cases, see § 3.60 et seq.

The Erie doctrine requirement of the application of state substantive law and federal procedural law in diversity cases was initially developed in the context of federal diversity litigation. However, the doctrine also applies to supplemental state claims that are litigated in the federal courts. n7 For a discussion of supplemental jurisdiction, see Ch. 5, Original Jurisdiction over the Subject Matter.

A. NATURE OF APPLICABILITY OF LAW IN DIVERSITY CASES

1-3 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 3.21

§ 3.21 Purpose of Application of State Substantive Law and Federal Procedural Lawn*

The Rules of Decision Act provides that, except when otherwise provided by the federal constitution, treaty, or statute, state laws must be applied as the laws of decision in civil actions in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply. n1 The Supreme Court in the Erie case found that the purpose of the Rules of Decisions Act is to make certain that, in all matters except those in which some federal law is controlling, the federal courts exercising jurisdiction in diversity cases will apply the laws of a state, as set forth in that state's constitution, statutes, and judicial opinions, including opinions that formulate the state's common law. n2 Federal procedural law is applied in federal courts, rather than state procedural law, because the United States Supreme Court has, under the Rules Enabling Act, expressly adopted the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure for the federal courts. n3

Under the Erie doctrine, federal courts in diversity cases perform the role of state trial courts applying state statutes and state common law. The Erie doctrine is based on the rationale that it would be unfair for the result of litigation to depend on whether the suit is brought in state or federal court. Therefore, the Erie doctrine has three purposes: (1) to assure uniform results in state and federal courts; (2) to discourage forum shopping between the state and federal system; and (3) to avoid inequitable administration of the laws. n4

A. NATURE OF APPLICABILITY OF LAW IN DIVERSITY CASES

1-3 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 3.22

§ 3.22 Determination of Applicable Law When Issue is Not Clearly Substantive or Proceduraln*

[1] Tests to Determine Whether to Apply Either Federal or State Law

As discussed above, n1 a federal court in a diversity case must apply the forum state's law for substantive issues and federal law for procedural issues. As a general rule, if a law controls the method or the manner of the presentation of a claim, the law is procedural. n2 On the other hand, if the law specifies the elements necessary to determine the outcome of a claim, the law is substantive. n3

However, as a practical matter, the distinction between substantive and procedural matters is sometimes difficult to determine. n4 Therefore, the United States Supreme Court has developed three inquiries to help determine whether to apply state law or federal law when it is difficult to ascertain whether a particular issue in a diversity case is substantive or procedural:

1. If a specific federal procedural rule or statute is applicable to the issue, it must control the Issue. n5

2. If no specific procedural rule or statute applies and a state law that does apply would be outcome determinative, the applicable state law generally controls, unless there is an overriding federal interest present. n6

3. Even if an applicable state law is outcome determinative, the federal court may apply a general federal law if on balance it promotes an overriding federal interest. n7

[2] Specific Federal Procedural Rule or Statute Pertinent to Issue

If a federal statute or rule of civil or appellate procedure is specifically pertinent in a situation, then the federal statute or rule controls and a conflicting state law does not apply. n1 Thus, if it is difficult for the federal court to classify an issue as either substantive or procedural, but a federal law directly controls that issue, the federal law applies regardless of contrary state law. n2 Under this test, there are three inquiries: n3

1. Whether the federal law actually applies to the particular matter involved. In this regard, the court must determine whether the federal rule or statute is sufficiently broad to cover the situation in question. n4 When there is merely an apparent conflict, rather than a actual conflict between the federal and state law, the apparent conflict may be resolved by a finding that the federal rule does not actually cover the point at issue. n5

2. Whether the federal law is rationally capable of classification as a procedural law. If not, the law is substantive and the court must apply the state law. n6

3. Whether the federal law is constitutional and is a valid exercise of the Supreme Court's rule-making power. n7 The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure, and the Federal Rules of Evidence are deemed valid because they have been adopted pursuant to the Rules Enabling Act. n8 The only rare exception to this rule is where the Rules Committee, the Supreme Court, and Congress have collectively erred and adopted a federalprocedural rule that is either unconstitutional or should not have been adopted under the Rules Enabling Act process because it is a matter of substantive law. n9

[3] Pertinent State Law Would be Outcome Determinative

If a federal rule or statute is not pertinent to an issue in a diversity case, n1 but a state law would be outcome determinative to the issue, the federal court should generally apply the state law, even if it conflicts with a federal judicially created law. n2 An exception applies, however, if there is an overriding federal interest regarding the issue, in which case the court should apply the federal law. n3 Under this inquiry, when no federal statute or federal rule governs a situation, the federal court sitting in diversity must apply forum state law to the situation if a failure to apply state law would (1) significantly affect the outcome of the litigation and (2) encourage forum shopping or result in inequitable administration of the laws. The court must ask whether application of state law would have so important an effect on the results obtained by the parties that the court's failure to apply state law would unfairly discriminate against forum state citizens, or likely cause a plaintiff to choose the federal court. n4 In the utilization of this test, the court must be guided by the two purposes of the Erie doctrine: to discourage forum shopping and avoid inequitable administration of the laws. n5

The following are examples of state laws that federal courts have held to be outcome determinative and applicable in diversity suites:

1. A state law imposing penalties on the defendant for failure to settle. n6

2. A state statute of limitation. n7

3. A state law requiring certain plaintiffs in shareholders' derivative suits to give security for defendants' litigation expenses. n8

4. A state law denying any recovery on particular claims or to particular kinds of claimants. n9

5. A state law that allocates the burden of proof. n10

[4] Overriding Federal Interest May Require Application of Federal Law

If a federal rule or statute is not pertinent to an issue in a diversity case, n1 and there is an outcome-determinative state law covering the matter, a federal court ordinarily will apply the outcome-determinative state law. n2 However, if there is an overriding federal interest in the particular matter, then a federal court will not apply even an outcome determinative state law. n3 For example, if a state law allows the court to decide certain factual issues rather than a jury, the state law may be considered outcome determinative. n4 But, because there is a strong federal constitutional policy favoring jury decisions of disputed fact questions, contrary state rules are disfavored, n5 and despite the possible outcome determinative nature of the state law, the federal court will apply the federal right-to-jury law to disputed factual issues. n6

§ 3.40 Mechanics of Determining Content of State Law by Federal Courtn*

When state law applies to a particular issue because it is a diversity case in federal court, the federal court must determine the content of the substantive state law. The federal court makes this determination first by considering all applicable state statutes and the decisions of the state's highest court, including decisions construing state statutes and common law. n1 If the decisions of the state's highest court are silent on a particular issue, the federal court must determine how that court would decide the issue, looking to the sources of law that the state's highest court would look to for persuasive authority, including intermediate appellate court decisions of that state. In the absence of precedents from the state's intermediate appellate courts, the federal court may consider the case law of other jurisdictions that have examined similar issues. Finally the court may consider the opinions on that state's law by other federal courts sitting in diversity on the issue. n2

§ 3.41 Time of Determination of State Lawn*

A federal district court must apply the state law as of the time of determination of the issue in the district court, up until the time of judgment. This means that a district court must recognize a change in state law that occurs while trial is in process. n1 In the same way, a federal circuit court of appeals must determine the state law as of the time of appeal, thus giving effect to any intervening state court decisions in the event the substantive law of the state changes between the time of the federal trial and appeal. n2 This means that the federal appellate court must apply a change in state law while the federal appeal is pending, up until the time of the appellate decision. n3 However, there is a strong argument that, rather than automatically adopting any change in law up to the time of its determination, both district and appellate courts should take into consideration the law of the state as to whether the state courts give retroactive effect to changes by applying subsequent changes to prior lower state court decisions. n4

§ 3.42 Decisions of State's Highest Courtn*

A state's highest court determines that state's law for diversity cases, based either on decisions that the highest court has actually made or in the manner that the court would decide if called on to do so. n1 The federal court must generally follow the decision of the state's highest court regarding a particular matter, even if it believes the decision imprudent or incorrect. n2 Thus, in adjudicating a case under state law, the federal court is not free to impose its own view of what state law should be; rather, the federal court must apply existing state law as interpreted by the state's highest court in an effort to predict how that court would decide the precise legal issues before the federal court. n3

However, there are situations in which the federal court need not follow a decision of the state's highest court if there has been a clear and persuasive indication that the state's highest court would modify, limit, or overrule the decision. n4 Such persuasive indications include: the state's subsequent enactment or amendment of a statute that apparently changes the law as stated in the decision; n5 later decisions of the state's highest court that overrule the decision by implication; n6 and dicta from the state's highest court criticizing or casting doubt on the decision. n7

§ 3.43 Decisions of State's Intermediate Courtsn*

When state law provides no definitive answers to a question presented, a federal district court must make an educated prediction as to how the state supreme court would resolve the issue if presented with the question. In making this "Erie guess," the federal court will look for guidance from intermediate state appellate court decisions, unless convinced by other persuasive data that the highest court of the state would decide otherwise, such as the general rule on the issue, decisions from otherjurisdictions, and general policy concerns. n1 n2-3 Thus, the federal court should consider the state intermediate court decision but is not absolutely bound by it. n4 For example, a federal court would not be required to follow an intermediate state court decision that conflicted with otherwise settled law, because the state supreme court would be unlikely to follow that decision. n5 Furthermore, when intermediate state appellate court decisions are in conflict, the federal court must determine which approach the state's highest court would likely adopt. n6

§ 3.44 Determination of Novel State Lawn*

[1] Prediction of How Highest State Court Would Decide Issue

Absent a case on point from the courts of the state, or when state law is unsettled, the federal court must attempt to predict how the state's highest court would rule if confronted with the same issue. This is known as an "Erie guess" of what the highest court of the state would hold on the issue. n1 Thus, in the absence of direct authority the federal court may look to state high court decisions in related or analogous cases for an indication of how the state's highest court is likely to rule. n2

After considering the highest court's previous decisions, the federal court should consider any relevant decisions of the state's intermediate courts, n3 and other federal courts. When a higher federal court has ruled on a particular point of state law, a lower court must ordinarily follow that decision in the absence of an intervening, authoritative state decision. n4 Federal courts also may consider public policy, including the policy underlying a statute, as shown by legislative history. n5 Additionally, federal courts may seek guidance from persuasive case law from other jurisdictions and from learned treatises. n6

[2] Interpretation of State Statutes

When interpreting a statute that has been construed by a state's highest court, a federal court must interpret the statute as though it actually reads precisely as the highest court of the state has interpreted it. n1 However, when a state court has not construed a state statute, the federal court must exercise its independent judgment to interpret the statute, using the same method and approach that the state's highest court would use, n1.1 and following the state's rules of statutory interpretation. n1.2 The federal court should be guided by any analogous decisions and the federal court's own interpretation of the statute's intended policy. The federal court should consider all available resources to predict how the state's highest court would interpret the statute. These resources include the statutory language, legislative history, the statutory scheme set in historical context, how the statute could be harmonized with other state laws including state decisional law, any federal cases that construe the state statute, and scholarly works. n2 The federal court may also consider decisions of any state administrative agencies that are responsible for enforcement and interpretation of a state statute or rule. n3

[3] Possible Alternatives to Determination of Unsettled State Law

The degree of difficulty for a federal court to determine applicable state law does not justify a federal court to dismiss or stay its proceedings until a state court has decided the issue. Absent special circumstances, federal district courts must decide questions involving the application of state law even if they are extraordinarily difficult to resolve. n1 However, when a decision is to be made on the basis of state law the Supreme Court has a strong preference that the controlling interpretation of the relevant statute be given by state, rather than federal, courts. n2

This preference is based on principles of federalism, and because a federal court could create friction with state counterparts if the federal court makes an error when it attempts to construe a novel, complex state law which has not yet been reviewed by the state's highest court. n2.1 Consequently, in exceptional and appropriate circumstances a federal court may avoid premature decisions on questions of federal constitutional law and erroneous rulings with respect to state law. The first of these practices is abstention, n3 which is a judicially created doctrine in which a federal court that otherwise has competent jurisdiction in a case withholds that jurisdiction based on the principles of comity and judicial economy. Absention is discussed in Ch. 2, Concurrent and Conflicting Jurisdiction. The other practice is certification of the question to the state court, which is discussed in § 3.45. n4

§ 3.45 Certification of State Law Question to Highest State Courtn*

[1] Function and Purpose of Certification

The Supreme Court has stated that certification of a question of state law to a state court is a favored procedure. The Supreme Court has explained that certification is designed to avoid federal court error in deciding state law questions, because it allows a federal court to put a novel state-law question directly to the state's highest court, thus reducing delay, cutting cost, and increasing the assurance of making an authoritative determination of the state law. n1

Most states have established certification procedures that permit a federal court to certify an issue and request an advisory opinion from the state's highest court. n2 Whether to use a certification procedure is within the discretion of the federal court, n3 but the procedure itself is within the control of the individual states. While most states permit certification by both federal trial and appellate courts, n4 some authorize certification only by the federal courts of appeal and the United States Supreme Court. n5 directly to resolve a question of state law and to do so while the federal suit is pending. If the state court's decision as to state law makes a federal constitutional judgment necessary, the federal issue will be resolved by a federal court. Therefore, by certifying, the federal courts refer the state law issues to state courts, while retaining the authority to rule on the federal constitutional questions that might come up, rather than ceding that responsibility to the state courts. n6

Certification is a particularly important process for federal courts sitting in diversity because the procedure frees federal courts from having to speculate on how state courts will decide important questions of state law. Essentially, the federal court must be presented with an unsettled question of state law, n7 because the certification procedure may not be used when the law is settled. n8 Certification is discretionary only, n9 for use when the federal court determines it would be more efficient to attempt to obtain a definitive determination directly from that state's highest court, rather than attempting to predict how the state's highest court would have decided an unsettled issue of state law. n10

[2] Factors That Determine Whether Certification is Appropriate

A federal court should not seek certification in a diversity case any time there is any uncertainty with respect to the state law question. Issues of state law cannot be routinely certified to the highest court of a state simply because a certification procedure is available. Because it is the federal court's duty to predict how the forum state's highest court would decide the issues before it, it will not certify questions of law where sufficient precedents exist for it to make this determination. Therefore, certification should be used in those cases where there is a split of authority on the issue, where a statute's plain language does not indicate the answer, or when presented with a complex question of state common law that has no apparent authority. n0.1 In making the determination whether to exercise its discretion in favor of certification, the court should consider many factors.

Factors for consideration include the closeness and complexity of the question, and whether it is unsettled; the existence of sufficient sources of state law bearing on the question, including statutes, judicial decisions, and attorney general opinions, to provide a principled rather than speculative conclusion; the degree to which considerations of comity are relevant in light of the particular issue and case to be decided; and practical limitations of the certification process, such as significant delay or inability to frame the issue in a manner that will produce a helpful response on the part of the state court. n1 Other factors include whether the question is of first impression or likely to recur, n2 and whether the unsettled law is outcome determinative. n3

Certification is not appropriate when the state law is settled; n4 when, challenged on federal constitutional grounds, the highest court of the state has not interpreted the relevant statute; or when a saving construction is possible. A saving construction is one that would permit avoidance of the constitutional issue. n5 If a federal court denies a motion to certify a question to a state's highest court, the denial is reviewed for abuse of discretion. n6

[3] Effect of Certification

When a state court answers a certified question, the parties in the federal case are bound by the answer because it constitutes the law of the case. n1 If the highest court of a state accepts a certified question, the state court willingly undertakes a substantial burden, and the federal court may not disregard the state court's opinion. Thus, once a federal court has certified a question of unsettled law to the state's highest court, the federal court is required to follow state law as declared by the state's highest court. The federal court is bound by the state court's answer except in extreme circumstances. Therefore, a party may not contest the law with respect to the answer to a certified question except when there has been an obvious subterfuge to evade consideration of a federal issue or a violation of federal law that could undercut the state court analysis. n1.1 This requirement protects a state's sovereignty. For example, when a state supreme court's response to a certified question states what types of claims are not valid under state law, those claims should be dismissed with prejudice. n2

§ 3.46 Appeal of District Court Determination of State Lawn*

If a party appeals a district court's determination of state law, the court of appeals must review the determination de novo. n1 De novo review means that the appellate court may substitute its determination of an unsettled state law issue for the district court's when the appellate court would resolve the issue differently. n2 Thus, on appeal the appellate court may make its own determination, interpretation, application, and prediction of state law. n3

Before the Supreme Court decided the issue, many appellate courts reviewed a district court's determination of state law under a deferential abuse of discretion standard, which meant that the appellate court would reverse the district court's state law determination only if it were clearly erroneous. n4 However, the Supreme Court concluded that appellate deference to a district court's determination of state law was inconsistent with the two aims of the Erie doctrine: to discourage forum-shopping and avoid inequitable administration of the laws, in that deferential appellate review invites disparate development of state law among the federal trial courts even within a single state and because the substantive rule applied to a dispute could depend on the choice of forum. n5

§ 3.60 Choice of Law in Diversity Casesn*

[1] Application of Choice of Law of Forum State

Choice of state law questions often arise in applying the Erie doctrine to diversity cases that have contacts with more than one state. n1 Diversity cases often involve choice of law questions because the parties must reside in different states. In addition, the cause of action may have arisen in a state other than the parties' residence. In such cases, a federal court must apply the choice of law rules of the state in which it sits, which is known as the "forum state," n1.1 to determine which state's substantive law applies. n2 For a discussion of the various choice of law tests used by the states, see § 3.61.

[2] Procedure for Choice of Law Questions

A federal court exercising diversity jurisdiction must engage in a two-step inquiry to determine the applicable law. In the first step, the court must determine whether the matter in issue is procedural or substantive for Erie purposes. If procedural, then federal law will apply; however, if substantive, the court must apply the law of the forum state, including its choice of law principles. The two steps are independent of each other, and thus a finding that a matter is substantive or procedural for Erie purposes does not necessarily require the same characterization for choice of law purposes. n1 For example, while a statute of limitation is substantive under the Erie doctrine, n2 it may be procedural under a state's choice of law rules. n3 Thus, when the forum state characterizes a principle as procedural, the forum's procedural law applies, even though the state's choice of law rules would require the federal court to apply another state's substantive law to resolve substantive issues. n4

In the second step, the federal court must apply the forum state's choice of law rules exactly as a state court would apply them. n5 A federal court may not make exceptions or modifications to state conflict rules that may seem appropriate to the federal court, but which have not been adopted by the state in which the federal court sits. n6 The only time a federal court may decline to apply the forum state's choice of law rules is if they violate the Constitution, n7 as discussed in [3], below, or if there is a significant conflict between a federal policy or interest and the use of state law. n7.1

[3] Constitutional Restrictions On Application of Choice of Law Rules

When it applies a state law in deciding a diversity case, a federal court may not apply state choice of law rules that violate either the Due Process or the Full Faith and Credit Clauses of the United States Constitution. n1 The Due Process Clause protects individual parties and prohibits the application of law that is insignificantly related to the litigation. n2 Due process requires fundamental fairness. Application of the forum state's law would be fundamentally unfair if there were no reasonable relationship between the forum and the parties or the cause of action. n3 Thus, a state substantive law may be applied only if the state has a significant contact or significant aggregation of contacts, creating state interests, such that choice of its law is neither arbitrary nor fundamentally unfair. n4 For example, if a plaintiff moves to a particular jurisdiction after the occurrence of the alleged wrong because the plaintiff has a preference for the law of that forum, the move is entitled to little or no significance in the determination of whether the law of that forum should apply. n4.1

The Full Faith and Credit Clause requires the forum to respect the laws and judgments of other states, subject to the forum's own interests in furthering its public policies. Under the Full Faith and Credit Clause, each state must give full faith and credit to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state. n5 However, the Supreme Court has explained that in compliance with Full Faith and Credit Clause a court may lawfully apply either the law of onestate or the contrary law of another. Therefore, a state need not substitute the statutes of other states for its own statutes when the state has competently legislated a law regarding the particular subject matter. n6

PART II. APPLICATION OF STATE SUBSTANTIVE LAW AND FEDERAL PROCEDURE IN DIVERSITY CASES IN FEDERAL COURT
C. DIVERSITY CASE CHOICE OF SUBSTANTIVE LAW FROM TWO OR MORE STATES

1-3 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 3.61

§ 3.61 Choice of Law Tests Utilized by Statesn*

[1] Applicable Law Is Based on Choice of Law Tests

For a diversity action to be properly filed in federal court, each party on one side to the action must generally have a different state of residence from each party on the other side. n1 Consequently, disputes frequently arise regarding which state's substantive law applies to the claims in the action. When a federal court sits in diversity to hear state law claims, the conflicts laws of the forum state determine which state's substantive law applies. n2 In its determination, the federal court will use one or more of the following tests that has been adopted by the forum state: n3 (1) the most significant relationship test of the Restatement (Second) of Conflicts; n4 (2) the balancing test, also known as the governmental interest test; n5 or (3) the vested rights test set out in the First Restatement of Conflicts. n6 These three tests are listed in the order of the total number of states that use each test. State courts have increasingly abandoned the traditional vested rights approach, n7 which involves the application of rigid rules, in favor of the other two, more modern tests. n8 Furthermore, the federal court will apply a "blend" or "hybrid" choice of law test, which combines attributes of more than one test, when such a test has been adopted by the forum state. n9

[2] Most Significant Relationship Test

[a] Factors Considered in Test

The most significant relationship test of the Restatement (Second) of Conflicts provides that a single state's law does not necessarily govern all substantive issues. In determining which state's law applies, the forum focuses on each issue separately and applies the state law that has the most significant relationship to the issue. The forum state determines the state with the most significant relationship to an issue by analyzing seven factors specified in the Restatement (Second) of Conflicts, which is an authoritative source of guidance for the federal courts. n1 The court must consider specific types of contacts with each state, depending on whether the case is based in tort n2 or in contract. n3 In any determination, the court considers the following seven general policy factors: n4

1. The requirements of the interstate systems.

2. The relevant policies of the forum.

3. The relevant policies of other states involved and respective interests in having their policies followed.

4. The protection of justified expectations.

5. The basic policies underlying the particular field of law.

6. The certainty, predictability, and uniformity of result.

7. The ease in determining and applying the law chosen.

As a practical matter, some courts combine the most significant relationship with some factors in the governmental interest test. n5

[b] Relationship to State in Tort Case

In a torts case, the parties' rights and liabilities are determined by the state that has the most significant relationship to the occurrence and the parties under the seven factors stated in [a], above. In its determination, the court should consider the following contacts: n6

1. The place where the injury occurred.

2. The place where the conduct causing the injury occurred.

3. The domicile, residence, nationality, and place of incorporation or place of business, if any, of the parties.

4. The place where the relationship, if any, between the parties is centered.

The court should evaluate these contacts according to their relative importance with respect to the particular issue involved. n7 Thus, when a law's primary purposeis to deter or punish misconduct, the state where the conduct took place may have the most significant relationship. However, if a law's main purpose is victim compensation, the state where the injury occurred may have a greater interest. n8

[c] Relationship to State in Contract Case

If the parties have expressly specified in their contract that the law of a particular state will govern their contractual rights and duties, the general rule is that the courts will enforce that provision. The Restatement (Second) of Conflicts promotes the parties' negotiation of the terms of their contracts, and therefore encourages the parties to state in the contract their choice for the applicable law for the contract. n9

However, the court will not apply the law specified by the parties in either of the following situations: (1) the selected state has no substantial relationship to the parties or the transaction, and there is no other reasonable basis for the parties' choice; or (2) application of the law of the selected state would be contrary to a fundamental policy of a state that has a materially greater interest than the selected state in the determination of the particular issue, and the state with the greater interest would be the state of the applicable law in the absence of a selection of law by the parties. n10

If the parties have not specified an applicable law in their contract, the court will apply the law of the state that has the most significant relationship to the transaction and the parties under the seven factors stated in [a], above. n11 In making that determination, the court should also consider the following contacts: n12

1. The place of contracting.

2. The place where the contract was negotiated.

3. The place of performance.

4. The location of the subject matter of the contract.

5. The domicile, residence, nationality, and any place of incorporation and place of business of the parties.

[3] Governmental Interest Test

The second test is the governmental interest test, also referred to as the balancing of interest test. n1 In the governmental interest test, the forum state uses a three step analysis to determine which state's substantive law applies. First, the court examines the substantive law of each state to determine whether the laws differ as applied to the relevant transaction. Second, if the laws do differ, the court must determine whether a "true conflict" exists in that each of the states has an actual interest in having its law applied. If only one state has a legitimate interest in the application of its rule of decision, there is a "false conflict" and the law of the interested state is applied. On the other hand, if more than one state has a legitimate interest, the court must move to the third step of the analysis, which focuses on the "comparative impairment" of the interested states. Third, the court identifies and applies the law of the state whose interest would be the more impaired if its law were not applied. n2

In other words, when there is a true conflict, the court should make an unbiased assessment of which law is more effective or fair, and not just simply apply the forum law. n3 However, the default is for the court to apply the law of the forum state, and the burden is with the proponent of foreign law to show that the foreign rule of decision will further the interests of that state. n4

[4] Vested Rights Test

The third test is the vested rights test, which provides that a state court (or federal court applying state law) must apply the state law in which the parties' rights vested. Under the test, rights vest in the place where they are created, in the state where the act occurred or the relationship that is the subject of the suit was created. State law in which rights vest governs all substantive issues, whether in tort or in contract. n1 In tort suits, the parties' rights are deemed to vest in the place where the wrong occurred. The place where the wrong occurred is the place where the last event necessary to make the actor liable took place. n2 In contracts suits, the law of the state where the contract is made governs contract validity. n3 Generally, a contract is made where the parties complete the last act necessary to form the contract under forum state law: that is, the place where the parties accept the offer. n4

The vested rights test has fallen from favor in some courts, who have accepted the argument that the test is based on a formalized and impractical fiction that the parties to a dispute have rights that "vest" before a court has resolved their dispute and delineated those rights. n5

C. DIVERSITY CASE CHOICE OF SUBSTANTIVE LAW FROM TWO OR MORE STATES

1-3 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 3.62

§ 3.62 Application of Choice of Law Rules After Transfer of Venuen*

[1] Transfer On Ground of Convenience

When a court transfers a case within the federal system from one venue to another under the convenience transfer statute, n1 the transferee court must apply the choice of law rules of the state in which the transferor court is located. n2 Thus, a transfer for convenience entitles the parties only to a change of courtrooms, not a change of law. This rule applies regardless of which party initiates the transfer, the defendant, n3 or the plaintiff. n4

There are three reasons for the rule. First, a convenience transfer should not deprive parties of state law advantages that would exist absent diversity jurisdiction, and a convenience transfer assumes that the plaintiffs have chosen a proper venue so they should be allowed to retain whatever advantages may flow from the state laws of the forum they have initially selected. n5 Second, a convenience transfer should not increase the likelihood of forum shopping, which could occur if defendants were allowed to use a convenience transfer to obtain a change of law as an advantage from the change of venue. Third, the decision to transfer venue for convenience should depend on the interest of justice and considerations of expediency of the court and parties. If a change in law were allowed to accompany a change in venue, the remedial purpose of a transfer for convenience would be thwarted. n6

[2] Transfer On Ground of Improper Venue

When a case is transferred because of improper venue, n1 as opposed to transfer merely for convenience, n2 the transferee court must apply the choice of law rules of the state in which the transferee court is located. n3 In the absence of this rule, a plaintiff would be encouraged to file in a state with substantive law that favored the plaintiff, even if that forum were improper, because the plaintiff would realize that even if the case were transferred, the plaintiff would still benefit by having the law of the transferor court applied in the action. n4 When it is difficult to determine whether a transfer is for convenience or for improper venue, the transferee court must determine from the facts and circumstances the actual reason the court made the transfer; that determination is not controlled by how the transfer was characterized by the parties or transferor court. n5

[3] Transfer On Ground of Lack of Personal Jurisdiction

When the venue of an action is technically proper, but then the action is transferred because the transferor court actually lacks personal jurisdiction over the defendants, the general rule is that the transferee court must apply the law of the transferee state. n1 Thus, when the plaintiff chooses a venue where the court lacks personal jurisdiction over the defendants, application of the law of the original legally defective forum upon transfer to a legally appropriate forum would be improper. n2 If the transferee court were to apply the law of the transferor court, it would permit a plaintiff to benefit by bringing an action in an impermissible forum, and unfairly obtain the law of the transferor state by filing a federal action, when the state court would have dismissed it for lack of jurisdiction. n3 Therefore, when there is a lack of personal jurisdiction in the transferor court, federal courts will refuse to treat a transfer motion as a motion under Section 1404(a) and instead require the transfer to be effected under Section 1406(a), the improper venue transfer statute, even though venue is technically proper. n4

§ 3.63 Application of Choice of Law Rules After Consolidationn*

When one or more diversity jurisdiction cases have been consolidated, the federal court must determine which state's law applies in the consolidated case, because in the consolidated case only one state's law may govern. n1 When a transferee court presides over several consolidated diversity actions, the transferee court must use choice of law rules of each state in which the transferred actions were originally filed to complete its choice of law analysis and determine the applicable substantive law. n2 If a choice of law analysis of each state would require the court to apply differing state substantive laws, the court must analyze the 'balance of interests" to determine the one state law to apply. Under the balancing of interests test, the court must balance the interests of each state in having its law apply, and then apply the law of the state with the most compelling interests. n3 For a discussion of the balancing of interests test, see § 3.61[3]. For a discussion of the consolidation of cases, see Ch. 20, Trial Practice in General.

PART I Judicial Powers; Law Applied; Evidence
CHAPTER 4 FEDERAL EVIDENCE SUMMARY

1-4 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 4.01

§ 4.01 Functions and Categories of Evidencen*

[1] Purpose of Evidence

Evidence broadly consists of the testimony, writings, and other materials presented to the court because they have a reasonable tendency to prove or disprove a matter promoted by a party. Thus, the primary requirement of evidence is that it must make the existence of a disputed fact more or less probable. n1

[2] Relevant and Irrelevant Evidence

A. Relevant Evidence.

"Relevant evidence" means evidence having a tendency to make the existence of a fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action more probable or less probable than it would be without that evidence. n1

B. Irrelevant Evidence.

"Irrelevant evidence," which is not allowed to be presented in court, is evidence that does not have a tendency to prove or disprove a significant matter in dispute. Relevance does not have anything to do with the weight that should be given to the matter offered for evidence or the sufficiency of proof required to enable a party to persuade the jury on an issue. n2 Rather, relevance is a consideration of whether the matter is even concerned with an issue in the case. n3

[3] Direct and Circumstantial Evidence

A. Direct Evidence.

"Direct evidence" is evidence that, if believed by the trier of fact, will prove the particular fact in issue without the trier of fact having to rely on any additional inference or presumption. n1

B. Circumstantial Evidence.

"Circumstantial evidence" is evidence that requires an inferential step in its proof. n2 Thus, in contrast to direct evidence, circumstantial evidence does not present a particular proposition under consideration but asserts some second proposition from which the trier of fact may either reasonably infer the truth of the first proposition, or at least reasonably infer an increase in the probability that the first proposition is actually true. n3 For example, if the plaintiff presented circumstantial evidence that a property owner left a foreign substance on the floor for an inordinate period of time, the trier of fact could reasonably conclude that the property owner was negligent, even though there is no evidence that the owner had actual knowledge that the substance was on the floor. n4 Generally, circumstantial evidence is treated no differently than direct evidence. n5 However, because it does require an extra inferential step, the courts may impose additional requirements to establish claims based on circumstantial evidence. n6

[4] Admissibility of Evidence

A. Admissible Evidence.

"Admissible evidence" does not have a particular definition. Rather, it is a legal conclusion that either a trial or an appellate court may make, after analysis of all the applicable rules and principles of evidence, that a particular item should be presented to the trier of fact for consideration. n1

B. Inadmissable Evidence.

"Inadmissible evidence" does not have a particular definition. Rather, it is a conclusion that a trial or appellate court may make, after analysis of all the applicable rules and principles of evidence, that a particular item should be excluded from the trier of fact for consideration in a trial. n2

[5] Categories Based on Form of Evidence

A. Testimonial Evidence.

"Testimonial evidence" is evidence that is presented in the conventional way of asking questions of a witness, who then makes assertions in court. The trier of fact then decides the weight to be given those assertions. The classification of evidence as testimonial is important, for example, because some privileges are reserved for testimonial evidence, n1 and in some circumstances, documentary evidence may be admitted rather than testimonial evidence. n2

B. Documentary Evidence.

"Documentary evidence" is evidence in written form that represents an occurrence or status relevant to the factual scenario that is in issue in the case. n3

C. Demonstrative Evidence.

"Demonstrative evidence" may consist of a dramatization or demonstration designed to replicate activity that occurred during the subject matter that is in issue during a case. For example, in a civil rights action alleging injury due to a police officer's excessive force, the officer's demonstration of his wristlock hold on plaintiff was helpful to the jury in deciding whether the tactic contributed to or caused the plaintiff's injuries. n4 Demonstrative evidence may also be a tangible article that is not an actual item in existence during an actual incident in the case but is fabricated for trial to demonstrate some proposition relevant to the case. Demonstrative evidence may also commonly take the form of a summary of other evidence in the case. n5

D. Real Evidence.

"Real evidence" is evidence that actually relates to the occurrence that constitutes the subject matter of the case. An example of real evidence is when a plaintiff shows his or her actual injuries. n6 A party that wants to introduce real evidence must demonstrate its relevancy by showing that, the object is the one claimed, it is linked to an issue in the case, and it is in substantially the same condition as when the event at issue occurred. n7

[2] Extent of Rules Coverage and Exceptions to Rules

A. Courts.

The Federal Rules of Evidence basically apply to all United States district courts, the United States courts of appeals, the United States Claims Court, and to the United States bankruptcy judges and United States magistrate judges. n1

B. Types of Actions.

The Federal Rules of Evidence apply generally to civil actions and proceedings, including admiralty and maritime cases, to criminal cases and proceedings, to contempt proceedings except those in which the court may act summarily, and to proceedings and cases under title 11, United States Code. n2 With respect to the rule of evidence on privileges, the rule applies at all stages of all actions, cases, and proceedings. n3

C. Exceptions in Civil Cases.

1. Preliminary Evidentiary Determinations by Court.

The Evidence Rules do not apply to the determinations of fact that must be decided by the court before evidence is admitted, other than rules of privilege. n4

2. Arbitration.

Arbitration proceedings are not controlled by the Federal Rules of Evidence. n5

3. Administrative Proceedings.

The Federal Rules of Evidence do not apply in administrative hearings. n6

4. Grand Jury.

Federal evidence rules do not control in grand jury inquiries. n7

5. Other Statute or Rule Applicable.

If another statute or a rule adopted by the Supreme Court governs a special type of proceeding, and specifically concerns an evidentiary matter, the FederalRules of Evidence apply only to the extent not inconsistent with the statute or rule.

CHAPTER 4 FEDERAL EVIDENCE SUMMARY

1-4 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 4.03

§ 4.03 Court's Determinations Related to Evidencen*

[1] Objections

A. Party Must Object.

The court will not exclude evidence on its own initiative; the opponent must make an objection to the evidence. n1

B. Timely Objection Required.

The objection must be timely or it will not be considered on appeal. n2 An objection is "timely" if it is made as soon as the opponent of the evidence should become aware that the objection is applicable. n3

C. Specific Objection Required.

The objection must be specific enough that both the trial court and the appeals court will be able to ascertain the basis for the objection. n4

[2] Offer of Proof to Preserve Appeal of Exclusion

If the court rules that evidence is inadmissible, the proponent generally must have made an offer of proof in order to preserve appeal that the evidence should have been admitted. An "offer of proof" is a clear indication by the proponent to the court of what the proposed evidence consists, either by the attorney's explanation or by the context of questions and answers given to the witness outside the jury's presence. n1

[3] Renewal Not Necessary

A party need not renew an objection or offer of proof to preserve a claim of error for appeal after the court has made a definitive ruling on the record admitting or excluding evidence, either at or before trial. n1

[4] Arguments Made Out of Presence of Jury

Whenever practical in jury cases, proceedings to determine the admissibility of evidence must be conducted to prevent inadmissible evidence from being exposed to the jury. n1 Furthermore, because the jury decides matters of weight or credibility, the jury should not be informed of matters of preliminary determination regarding admissibility. n2

[5] Standard for Court's Decision on Admissibility

When making a finding whether to admit evidence, the court is not bound by the rules of evidence except those regarding privileges. n1 The court generally must make such a determination using a preponderance of the evidence standard. n2

[6] Admission of Evidence for Limited Purposes

Evidence may be admissible for one purpose but inadmissible for another. In such circumstances, the court may allow the evidence to be admitted but, on request, must restrict the evidence to its proper scope and instruct the jury accordingly. n1

[7] Conditional Ruling of Relevance

The Federal Rules of Evidence provide for the admission of conditionally relevant evidence, which the court has the discretion to admit when the relevancy of some items of evidence depends on the existence of a particular preliminary fact. The court may admit such offered evidence subject to the introduction of the evidence of the conditional fact. n1 Because the rule allows the court to admit evidence "subject to" a finding of the fulfillment of the condition, the court may submit a question of the existence of a preliminary fact to the jury when appropriate. n2

PART I Judicial Powers; Law Applied; Evidence
CHAPTER 4 FEDERAL EVIDENCE SUMMARY

1-4 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 4.04

§ 4.04 n* Judicial Notice

[1] Function of Judicial Notice

There is a specific provision for "judicial notice" of adjudicative facts in the Federal Rules of Evidence. This provision acknowledges that certain information does not need to be proved by the introduction of evidence at trial, n1 and that by taking judicial notice, the court affirmatively establishes such information without requiring any formal evidentiary proof. n2 A court may take judicial notice of adjudicative facts, n3 legislative facts, n4 and the law. n5 Adjudicative facts are those facts related to a particular case. Legislative facts, on the other hand, are those which have relevance to legal reasoning and the lawmaking process, whether in the formulation of a legal principle or ruling by a judge or court or the enactment of a legislative body. n6

[2] Requirements for Judicial Notice of Adjudicative Fact

To qualify for judicial notice as an adjudicative fact, the fact must be either generally known within the territorial jurisdiction of the trial court or capable of accurate and ready determination by resort to sources whose accuracy cannot reasonably be questioned. n1

[3] Judicial Notice of Legislative Facts

Because the Federal Rules of Evidence specifically apply only for judicial notice of adjudicative facts, federal courts may take judicial notice of legislative facts even when matters are neither indisputable nor easily verifiable. n1 A court may take judicial notice of legislative facts if they are established truths, or if they do not change from case to case but apply universally. n2

[4] Judicial Notice of Law

A federal court may take judicial notice of virtually all types of law, including not only federal statutes and rules n1 but also state law, if relevant. n2 Furthermore, federal courts may take judicial notice of federal regulations n3 and even bills that have been introduced before Congress or a state legislature. n4

[5] Judicial Notice Is Mandatory on Proper Request

A court must take judicial notice if requested by a party and supplied with the necessary information. n1 Otherwise, a court has discretion to take judicial notice even though not requested by a party. n2

[6] Procedural Requirements

A. Opportunity to Contest Judicial Notice.

A party that makes a timely request is entitled to an opportunity to be heard regarding the propriety of taking judicial notice, and the substance of the matter to be noticed. n1

B. Timing of Judicial Notice.

Any court may take judicial notice at any stage of the proceeding, provided that the facts are indisputable. n2 Thus, judicial notice may be taken by an appellate court; appellate courts may even take judicial notice of events that occurred after judgment was entered in the lower court. n3

[7] Effect of Judicial Notice

After the court takes judicial notice of an adjudicative fact, the Federal Rules of Evidence bar contrary evidence in civil cases, and the court must instruct the jury to accept the noticed fact as conclusive. n1

PART I Judicial Powers; Law Applied; Evidence
CHAPTER 4 FEDERAL EVIDENCE SUMMARY

1-4 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 4.05

§ 4.05 Presumptions and Burdensn*

[1] Nature of Presumptions

A. Rebuttable Presumption.

A "presumption" in federal evidence law is an evidentiary relationship between a basic fact and a presumed fact. Under this relationship, the presumed fact is automatically assumed to exist merely based on the existence of the other, basic fact. Thus, for a "rebuttable presumption," once the basic fact is established, the trier of fact must accept that the presumed fact has also been established, even without evidence of the presumed fact, unless the presumption is rebutted. n1 Because a presumption is only a relationship, it is not a form of evidence and does not affect the weight of evidence. n2 Presumptions do effect evidence, n3 however, in that they may shift either type of the burden of proof: (1) the "burden of going forward with the evidence" also known as the "burden of production," and (2) the "burden of persuasion." n4 Many rebuttable presumptions are created by statute. n5

B. Irrebuttable Presumption.

An irrebuttable presumption refers to a presumption that may not be overcome by any degree of evidence. Thus, if a presumption is irrebuttable, once the basic fact is established, the presumed fact must be assumed conclusively and may not be overcome in any event. This type of presumption is generally acknowledged to be a misnomer and recognized to actually constitute a substantive law rather than a rule of procedure or evidence. n6

[2] Nature of Burdens

A. Burden of Production.

The "burden of production," also known as the burden of going forward with evidence, refers to the obligation of one party to initially produce evidence that supports its position in the case. n1 Usually, it is the plaintiff that has the initial obligation to produce evidence and if the plaintiff fails to do so, the result is an adverse finding against the plaintiff. n2 However, the burden of production may initially be placed by statute on the defendent, or may be shifted by a presumption. n3

B. Burden of Persuasion.

In contrast to the burden of production, the burden of persuasion does not merely require the introduction of evidence to support a party's case, but concerns the weight of evidence and requires a party to produce the degree of evidence that entitles the party to prevail on an issue, based on the requisite standard of proof required under the substantive law for the particular issue. n4 Thus, for example, even if a plaintiff has the burden of persuasion in a particular case, n5 the defendant may have the burden of persuasion with regard to affirmative defenses. n6

[3] Effect of Presumption

Unless otherwise provided by statute n1 or rules of evidence, a presumption imposes on the party against whom it is directed, the burden to produce evidence to rebut or meet the presumption but does not shift to that party the burden of persuasion, which remains throughout the trial on the party on whom it was originally cast. n2 Thus, under Rule 301, the effect of a presumption is to shift to the other party the burden of production, which is the burden of going forward with evidence to rebut or meet the presumption. However, Evidence Rule 301 does not shift the burden of persuasion, which is the degree to which a party must prove each element of the case. n3 If the opposing party presents evidence sufficient to rebut the presumption, it disappears form the case. n4

[4] Presumptions in Application of State Law

A federal court must apply state law, rather than federal procedural law, to determine the existence and effect of a presumption concerning a fact that is an element of a claim or defense that is based on state law. n1 Thus, in diversityactions, which are controlled by state substantive law, the federal court must apply the state law of presumptions applicable to the claim or defense. n2 This rule also applies to any issue or claim in a nondiversity case when the issue or claim is based on state law, such as an action under the Federal Tort Claims Act when it is based on a state medical malpractice claim. n3

PART I Judicial Powers; Law Applied; Evidence
CHAPTER 4 FEDERAL EVIDENCE SUMMARY

1-4 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 4.06

§ 4.06 Relevancyn*

[1] Status of Evidence as Relevant

"Relevant evidence" is evidence that has a tendency to make the existence of any fact that is of consequence to the determination of an issue or claim either more probable or less probable than it would be without that evidence. n1 "Irrelevant evidence" is all evidence that is not relevant--in other words, evidence that does not have any tendency to prove or disprove a matter that is significant in the dispute. Thus, relevance is only a consideration of whether evidence has any bearing on an issue in the case. n2

[2] Requirement of Relevancy

Relevancy is an indispensable prerequisite to admissibility in evidence law. Thus, no evidence may be admitted to be considered by the trier of fact unless it is relevant. n1 However, the converse is not necessarily true: the mere fact that it is relevant does not make evidence admissible; it must be admissible under the test of all the other rules of evidence. n2

[3] Court's Discretion to Exclude Evidence

The trial court has discretion whether to exclude relevant evidence, n1 because the trial court is in the most favorable position to determine issues such as probative value, prejudice, delay and confusion. n2 When the trial court excludes evidence under Evidence Rule 403, the court should ensure that a clear statement of the reason is included in the record and should make the ruling outside the jury's hearing if prejudice could result. n3

[4] Particular Circumstances Providing for Exclusion of Relevant Evidence

A. Probative Value Outweighed by Negative Factors.

1. Unfair Prejudice.

The trial court has discretion to exclude relevant evidence if the probative value of the evidence is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. n1 "Unfair prejudice" means an undue tendency to suggest a decision on an improper basis. The most common but not exclusive example of an improper basis is a decision based on emotion.

2. Confusion of Issues or Misleading of Jury.

The court may exclude evidence that is relevant if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of confusion of issues or of misleading the jury. n3 Whether confusion of issues or misleading the jury would result from the admission of evidence turns on the facts in the particular case. n4 With regard to misleading the jury, courts are particularly cautious in admitting statistical evidence, because such evidence is subject to misuse. n5

3. Undue Delay or Waste of Time.

Relevant evidence may be excluded by the court if its probative value is substantially outweighed by considerations of undue delay or waste of time. n6

4. Needless Presentation of Cumulative Evidence.

The trial court has discretion to exclude relevant evidence if its probative value is substantially outweighed by concern that its admission would be a needless presentation of cumulative evidence. n7 "Cumulative evidence" is repetitive evidence which adds very little probative force to the case, so that if it were admitted its contribution to the determination of truth would be outweighed byits contribution to the length of trial. n8 The trial court has considerable discretion to exclude cumulative evidence to further the purpose of conducting the trial efficiently. n8.1 Thus, the court may exclude evidence regarding a particular issue in a case if the evidence would be merely repetitive of, or in addition to, other evidence that has already established the existence of that issue. n9

B. Character.

1. Inadmissible as General Rule.

In a civil case, evidence of a person's character or character trait is not admissible to prove that the person acted in conformity with that character or character trait. n10

2. Exceptions.

a. Character in Issue.

If a person's particular character or trait is a material element of a claim or defense under the substantive law, evidence of such character is admissible. In that case, the evidence is not being offered to prove that the person acted in conformity with that character trait on a particular occasion, n11 but rather because the character trait itself is significant as the element of the claim or defense. For example, in a defamation action or libel action, an essential element of the claim is injury to reputation, and this makes the plaintiff's reputation or character an essential element of the case. n12

b. Character Admissible to Impeach Witness.

Evidence of the character of a witness is admissible for the limited purposes of impeaching a witness. Thus, character of a witness may be admitted to attack the credibility of the witness. n13 However, only evidence that is related to truthfulness or lack of truthfulness is admissible under this exception. n14

c. Other Wrongful Acts Sometimes Admissible.

Although evidence of other particular wrongs, crimes, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show action in conformity with such acts, the court may admit such evidence for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident. n15

3. Methods of Proving Character.

If character evidence is admissible under one of the three exceptions stated in 2, above, proof may be made by: n16 testimony as to reputation, n17 or testimony in the form of an opinion. n18 Generally, evidence of specific instances of conduct is not admissible to show character. However, if character is in issue, as in cases in which character or a trait of character is an essential element of a claim or defense, proof may also be made of specific instances of that person's conduct. n19

C. Habit and Routine.

1. Admissible as General Rule.

Evidence of the habit of a person or of the routine practice of an organization, is relevant to prove that the conduct of the person or organization on a particular occasion was in conformity with the habit or routine practice. Habit and routine practice is admissible whether corroborated or not and regardless of the presence of eyewitnesses. n20

2. Admissible Habit of Individual.

The "habit" of an individual that qualifies under Evidence Rule 406 is a regular, specific response to a repeated, specific behavior or situation. The more regular and repeated the response, the more likely the court is to find a habit. A habit is distinguished from character in that habit is specific and particular, whereas character is a generalized description of an individual's disposition or general trait, such as frugality or honesty. n21

3. Admissible Routine Practice of Organization.

Routine practice is sufficient under Evidence Rule 406 if it is standard operating procedure for an organization. n22 For evidence of routine practice to be admitted, the entity in question must be a cohesive organization characterized by structure and routine. Thus, the practices of an informal group of independent contractors would not qualify as an organization under the rule. n23 Evidence of a routine practice is particularly persuasive in for-profit businesses and corporatecontexts because the incentive for profits necessitates predictability and regularity. n24

D. Subsequent Remedial Measures.

1. Inadmissible as General Rule.

As a general rule, evidence of remedial measures that have been taken by an individual or entity after an injury or harm allegedly caused by an event is inadmissable to prove negligence, culpable conduct, a defect in a product or a product's design, or a need for a warning or instruction. n25 A "remedial measure" that qualifies under Evidence Rule 407 includes any kind of modification, repair, or precaution. n26

2. Admissible to Prove Matter Other Than Culpability.

Evidence of subsequent remedial measures is admissible when offered for a purpose other than showing culpability, such as proving ownership; control; feasibility of precautionary measures, if controverted; or impeachment. n27 Furthermore, if a defendant attempts to use proof of conditions at the time of litigation to prove the conditions were not dangerous, the plaintiff may in rebuttal use evidence of remedial measures to show that conditions have changed in significant respects since the accident's occurrence. n28

E. Compromise.

1. Evidence of Compromise Generally Inadmissible.

a. Evidence of Attempt to Give Consideration in Compromise.

Evidence of an attempt to give or take a valuable consideration in the compromise of a claim is inadmissable to prove liability for, invalidity of, or amount of, the claim that was disputed as to validity or amount, or to impeach through a prior inconsistent statement or contradiction. n29

b. Evidence of Conduct or Statements Made in Compromise Negotiations Generally Inadmissable

Evidence of particular conduct or statements related to an attempt to give or take a valuable consideration in the compromise of a claim is inadmissable to prove liability for, invalidity of, or amount of, a claim that was disputed as to validity or amount. However such conduct or statements are admissible when they relate to a claim by a public office or agency in the exercise of regulatory, investigative, or enforcement authority. n30

2. Evidence of Compromise Admissible to Prove Matter Other Than Liability or Amount of Damages

Evidence need not be excluded under this rule if the evidence is offered for purposes other than to prove liability for, invalidity of, or amount of the claim in issue. Examples of permissible purposes include proving a witness's bias or prejudice; negating a contention of undue delay; and proving an effort to obstruct a criminal investigation or prosecution. n31 n32-34

F. Payment of Medical Expenses. As a general rule, evidence of the furnishing, offering, or promising to pay medical, hospital, or similar expenses resulting from injury is inadmissible if offered to prove liability for the injury. n35

G. Liability Insurance.

1. Inadmissible as General Rule.

As a general rule, evidence of a person's insurance against liability is not admissible to show that the person acted negligently or otherwise wrongfully. n36

2. Admissible to Prove Matter Other Than Neglect or Wrongful Conduct.

Evidence that a person was or was not insured against liability is admissible if offered for a purpose other than whether the person acted negligently or wrongfully, such as proof of agency, ownership, or control, or the bias or prejudice of a witness. n37 This list is exemplary, and insurance evidence is admissible whenever it is for a purpose other than showing negligence or wrongful conduct. n38

PART I Judicial Powers; Law Applied; Evidence
CHAPTER 4 FEDERAL EVIDENCE SUMMARY

1-4 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 4.07

§ 4.07 Privilegesn*

[1] Federal Privilege Law

There is a general duty for witnesses to give testimony, because the public has a right to everyone's evidence. However, the courts recognize common situations in which exceptions to this duty are justified by public policy. The Supreme Court has required that for a privilege to be recognized, it must promote sufficiently important interests to outweigh the need for probative evidence. n1

The Federal Rules of Evidence do not contain detailed privilege rules (which were proposed by the Supreme Court), but contain a flexible standard specified in Evidence Rule 501. This rule requires courts to determine the privilege of a witness by the principles of the common law as they are interpreted by the courts of the United States in the light of reason and experience. n2 Essentially Evidence Rule 501 has provided a method to gradually establish a federal privilege common law. n3

[2] Privilege Law Applicable in Federal Courts

A. Federal Questions.

The federal law of privilege generally applies to federal question claims. n1 Thus, under the rules of evidence, the federal law of privilege n2 applies in federal courts except in civil cases in which state law supplies the rule of decision, and as otherwise required by the Constitution of the United States or provided by Act of Congress or in rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority. n3

B. Diversity Cases.

State privilege law is controlling in diversity cases, except to the extent that the evidence concerns an issue or claim that is governed by federal law. n4 This results from Evidence Rule 501, which provides that the federal law of privilege applies in federal courts except with respect to any element of a claim or defense for which state law supplies the rule of decision. n5

[3] Assertion of Privilege

A privilege is a right of the person whose interest or relationship is intended to be promoted by the particular privilege, and only that person may assert the privilege. For example, the patient is the one protected by the psychotherapist-patient privilege. Consequently, only the patient or someone on the patient's behalf may assert it, and not the psychotherapist, unless the psychotherapist is doing so on behalf of the patient. n1

[4] Supreme Court Standards for Privileges

When the Federal Rules of Evidence were adopted, the Supreme Court also proposed that many "Supreme Court Standards" of privilege be adopted. n1 However, the Supreme Court Standards were not adopted by Congress as Rules of Evidence. Nonetheless, the Supreme Court Standards are deemed persuasive authority for interpretation of Evidence Rule 501, n2 and retain considerable utility as a guide to the federal common law referred to in Evidence Rule 501. n3 The Supreme Court Standards are referred to in this chapter when particularly important.

[5] Recognized Privileges

A. Attorney-Client Privilege.

1. Purpose of Privilege.

The attorney-client privilege was the first privilege for confidential communications recognized by law. Its purposes are to encourage clients to seek legal advice who might otherwise be deterred from seeking it, to promote full disclosure by clients to their attorneys, and to enable attorneys to act more efficiently, justly, and expeditiously. n1

2. Required Elements.

A client holds a privilege to refuse to disclose, and to prevent any other person from disclosing, confidential communications between the client and the client's lawyer when the communications were made to further the performance of professional legal services to the client. n2 Consultations with an attorney not acting in a professional capacity are not privileged. n3

3. Client Holds Privilege.

The client is the holder of the privilege. A "client" is a person or an entity such as a corporation who is rendered professional legal services by an attorney, or a person who is seeking professional legal services from an attorney, even if the attorney ultimately does not perform those legal services. n4 The representative of a client also holds the privilege on behalf of the client. n5

4. Confidential Communication and Waiver of Privilege.

a. Confidential Communications Protected.

The attorney-client privilege applies only to privileged communications, which are any expressions through which a privileged person conveys information to or from the other person, and any document or electronic record that embodies such expressions. n6 A communication is protected only if it is confidential, which means the communicator intended that it not be disclosed in any way to a third person, other than those to whom disclosure is in furtherance of providing professional legal services to the client. n7 Thus, the privilege applies to communications from attorney to client and client to attorney. n8

b. Voluntary Disclosure Generally Waives Protection.

A voluntary disclosure of an attorney-client communication to a third party for purposes inconsistent with maintaining confidentiality generally waives the attorney-client privilege with respect to the disclosed matter. n9 Furthermore, if there is intent to disclose, the presence of a third person at the time of disclosure indicates a lack of confidentiality and therefore the privilege does not apply. n9.1 However, the mere presence of an eavesdropper or third person who inadvertently overhears the communication does not destroy its confidentiality. n9.2

c. Federal Context Disclosures May Retain Protection.

To ensure the predictability of the effects of waiver of attorney-client protection by disclosure, n9.3 Congress has enacted Federal Rule of Evidence 502. n9.4 There are two primary provisions in Rule 502 applicable to disclosures made in a federal proceeding or to a federal office or agency. n9.5 First, if a disclosure and waiver is made of particular material, that waiver does not apply to undisclosed material, even if the undisclosed material concerns the same subject matter. n9.6 Second, the rule provides that protection for material contained in an inadvertent disclosure is not waived, provided that the disclosing party had reasonably attempted to prevent the disclosure, and attempted to correct the mistake. n9.7 For a complete discussion of Rule 502, see [7], below.

5. Exceptions to Privilege.

a. Breach of Duty.

The privilege is inapplicable to communications relevant to an issue of breach of duty by the attorney to the client or by the client to the attorney. n10

b. Fraud or Crime.

Clients do not hold the privilege to protect communications made in contemplation or furtherance of a crime or fraud. n11

c. Joint Clients.

Communications are not privileged if they are relevant to a matter of common interest between joint clients and are offered in an action between any of the clients. n12

d. Deceased Client.

There is a testamentary exception to the attorney-client privilege, n13 which provides that a statement made by a subsequently deceased client to an attorney regarding the execution of a will or other similar documents is not protected by the privilege. n13.1

B. Psychotherapist-Patient Privilege.

1. Function and Purpose of Privilege.

Federal courts recognize the psychotherapist-patient privilege, which protects communications between mental health professionals and their patients. n14 The purpose of the psychotherapist-patient privilege is to promote the public interest by facilitating treatment for individuals suffering the effects of a mental or emotional problem and to provide individuals with confidence and trust in mental health professionals. n15

2. Scope of Privilege.

The privilege extends to confidential communications made to social workers, aswell as to licensed psychologists and psychiatrists. n16 The privilege also extends to confidential communications made to counselors in employee assistance programs, which are programs that assist corporate employees in resolving mental health problems. This is so even if the counselors are not formally licensed in psychology or social work, when the communications are made by employees in the course of diagnosis or treatment. n17

3. Confidential Communications Protected.

To further its purposes, the psychotherapist-patient privilege only protects confidential communications from disclosure. Therefore, if a communication is not confidential between the psychotherapist and the patient, it is not within the protection of the privilege. n18 A communication is confidential if the patient does not intend it to be disclosed to third persons. The crucial element is intent. If a patient makes a communication with the expectation that it could be disclosed, other than to persons reasonably necessary for the patient's diagnosis and treatment under the direction of the mental health provider, the privilege is not confidential nor protected. n19 Furthermore, communications are not confidential or protected if a party places his mental or emotional condition at issue by relying upon the condition as an element of his claim or defense. n19.1

C. Physician-Patient Privilege.

1. Existence of Privilege.

Unlike the psychotherapist-patient privilege, discussed in B, above, federal courts do not absolutely recognize a general federal privilege between a physician and patient, and the Supreme Court has not promulgated a Supreme Court Standard regarding the privilege. Because the necessity for protection is not as strong, federal common law has not historically recognized a privilege between patients and physicians, and the evidentiary privileges that apply to federal-question suits are given not by state law but by federal law, n20 which does not recognize a physician-patient or a hospital-patient privilege. n21 However, many state jurisdictions recognize the privilege. Therefore, in diversity cases in federal court, in which a claim or defense is governed by state law, any asserted privilege pertaining to the state claim or defense is also governed by state law. n21.1 Therefore, a state law physician-patient privilege may be recognized and applied by a federal court to a state law claim or defense but generally not to matters involving federal law. n22

2. Requirements.

The privilege belongs only to the patient and not the doctor. However, it may be invoked by the patient, the court, or the patient's doctor on the patient's behalf. n23 The privilege protects only communications made in confidence, but confidentiality is not destroyed by the presence of third persons necessary to the patient's diagnosis and treatment or close family members. n24 The privilege applies only when the patient consults a doctor for diagnosis or medical treatment. It does not apply, for example, when the patient is examined by the doctor for another purpose, such as preparing for trial or insurance examination. n25

3. Exceptions.

There are numerous exceptions to the privilege, to the extent that the exceptions have eliminated the effectiveness of the privilege. n26 The most common exception is that the privilege does not apply when the patient puts his or her medical condition in issue in litigation. n27 Some states apply this exception or find the privilege waived in any case in which the patient relies on his or her physical condition as an element of a claim or defense. n28

D. Marital Privileges.

1. Two Types of Privileges.

The federal courts recognize two distinct marital privileges, n29 as discussed below: (1) the privilege against adverse testimony and (2) the confidential marital communications privilege. n29.1 The adverse testimony privilege is a privilege that belongs to the testifying spouse only, n30 applies only if the parties are still married at the time of the trial, and applies to statements made before the marriage took place. n31 The confidential communications privilege applies only to statements made during the marriage and applies even if the parties are no longer married by the time of the trial. n32 The adverse testimony privilege is usually allowed only in criminal cases, n33 but the confidential communications privilege is usually available in civil as well as criminal cases. The adverse testimony privilege prevents the non-party spouse from testifying even with respect to acts committed by the spouse but the confidential communications privilege applies only to communications. n34

2. Testimonial Privilege.

The privilege against adverse spousal testimony allows a witness spouse to refuse to testify regarding a defendant spouse in a criminal proceeding. It applies to testimony against a spouse on any subject, including even nonconfidential matters and matters that occurred prior to the marriage. n35 The privilege is held by the witness, who alone decides whether to testify or waive the privilege. n36 The testimonial privilege may not be asserted after the marriage has terminated. n37

3. Communication Privilege.

The confidential marital communications privilege is a bar to one spouse from testifying as to conversations or communications with the other spouse made in confidence during their marriage. n38 The marital communications privilege is held by the non-testifying spouse, applies in both civil and criminal proceedings, and survives the termination of the marital relationship. n39 Like the attorney-client privilege, the spousal communications privilege is waived if the asserting spouse has voluntarily disclosed the confidential communications to a third party. n39.1

E. Privilege for Communications to Clergy.

1. Function and Purpose of Privilege.

The federal courts recognize that a person has a privilege to refuse to disclose and to prevent another from disclosing a confidential communication by the person to a clergyman in his or her professional capacity as spiritual consultant. n40 The privilege is based on the benefit of spiritual freedom that result from protection for communications with spiritual advisors, and this benefit is held to outweigh the systemic costs incurred by excluding the contents of such communications from disclosure in court proceedings. The privilege also is designed as a protection for religious liberty. n41

2. Elements.

The clergy and penitent privilege has three elements: (1) a communication to a member of the clergy, n42 (2) the clergy person acting in a spiritual capacity, n43 and (3) an intent that the communication remain confidential. n44

[6] Developing Privileges

A. Government Information Privilege.

Federal courts recognize that the government may have a privilege not to disclose information that it collects and stores. n1 These privileges protect several types of information: the state secrets privilege protects diplomatic and military information; n2 the official information privilege protects disclosure of certain information within the custody or control of a governmental department or agency; n3 and the executive privilege is a privilege of the President of the United States to decline to disclose confidential communications among senior governmental officials. n4

B. Trade Secret Privilege.

Although not technically categorized as a privilege, in civil litigation, a person has a right to refuse to disclose, and to prevent other persons from disclosing, a trade secret owned by the person, n4.1 provided that the nondisclosure would not conceal fraud or otherwise effect injustice. n5 In the determination of whether to grant a trade secret privilege, the court must balance possible damage to the holder if the trade secret is revealed, the public's interest in promoting fair trials, and the litigant's need for the evidence to adequately prepare and argue the case, and the availability of other means of proof. n6 The court must also be able to provide adequate protective measures for the parties. n7

C. Informer Privilege.

The government has a recognized privilege to refuse to disclose the identity of aperson who has furnished information relating to or assisting in an investigation of a violation of law to a law enforcement officer or member of a legislative committee conducting an investigation. n8 The privilege generally applies only to the identity of the informer; however, if disclosure of the substance of the communication would identify the informer, the scope of the privilege may be extended to the contents of the communication itself, at least to the extent necessary to protect the informer's identity. n9

D. Voter Privilege.

Every person has a privilege to refuse to disclose the substance of his vote at a political election conducted by secret ballot unless the vote was cast illegally. n10

E. Peer Review Privilege.

Many states have by statute protected from discovery medical peer reviews of patient care, and the privilege has been extended to other areas, such as academic peer reviews, railroad accident investigations, product safety assessments, and products liability assessments. The "peer review privilege" n10.1 is also known as the self-analysis privilege, the self-evaluative privilege, or the self-examination privilege. n11 Both federal and state statutes typically provide that the privilege applies to information resulting from critical self analysis by the party seeking protection, and prohibit the disclosure or discovery of information collected by a peer review entity in the course of its business, n11.1 if the public has strong interest in preserving the free flow of the type of information sought, the information is of a type that would be impeded if discovery were allowed, and the document at issue was prepared with the expectation that it would be kept confidential and has in fact been kept confidential. n12

The peer review privilege has not been absolutely acknowledged, and many federal courts have refused to recognize it under federal common law. n12.1 For example, one case has declined to recognize a federal privilege for medical peer review materials, noting that only when state law supplies the rule of decision for such a privilege, as in a diversity case, would the materials be privileged. n13

[7] Limitations on Waiver by Disclosure of Attorney-Client Privilege and Work Product Protection

A. Purpose and Scope of Limitations on Waiver.

1. Purpose.

Congress has enacted Federal Rule of Evidence 502 n1 which has several purposes: (1) to provide a predictable, uniform set of standards under which parties can determine the consequences of a disclosure of information protected by either the attorney-client privilege or the work product doctrine; (2) to resolve court disputes about the effect of inadvertent disclosures and subject matter waiver; and (3) to control exorbitant litigation costs that have been recently brought about by the necessity for litigants to protect against waiver resulting from any disclosure, however innocent or minimal, especially in cases involving electronic discovery. n2

2. Proceedings Subject to Limitations.

a. Federal and State Proceedings.

To ensure the predictability of waiver by disclosure, the rule regulates the waiver consequences of disclosure of protected information at both the federal and state levels. n3 Thus, notwithstanding the other Federal Rules of Evidence, n4 the waiver effect of disclosure of protected material in federal and state courts is governed by Rule 502. n5

b. Claims Based on Diversity of Citizenship.

The waiver effect of Rule 502 also controls even in diversity cases, n6 where state law ordinarily applies the rule of decision. n7

c. Arbitration Proceedings.

Rule 502 applies in all federal court proceedings, including court-annexed and court-ordered arbitrations, n8 without regard to any possible limitations of Rules 101 and 1101. n9

3. Communications and Information Subject to Limitations.

The provisions of Rule 502 apply to disclosure of a communication or information covered by either the attorney-client privilege or work product protection. n10 For purposes of the rule, "attorney-client privilege" means the protection that applicablesubstantive law provides for confidential attorney-client communications; n11 and "work product protection" means the protection that applicable substantive law provides for tangible and intangible material prepared in anticipation of litigation or for trial. n12 Rule 502 does not cover waiver of other types of privilege. Furthermore, the rule only covers waivers by disclosure, and not other methods of waiver, n13 such as when a party relies on attorney advice in either a claim or defense. n14

4. Rule Does Not Control Whether Particular Disclosure or Information Is Protected.

Rule 502 does not in any way alter federal or state law on whether a particular communication or information is protected under the attorney-client privilege or work product immunity as an initial matter; that is determined by the applicable substantive law. Furthermore, while it does establish some exceptions to waiver, the rule does not modify or add to the applicable waiver doctrine generally. n15

B. Federal Context Disclosures Generally Do Not Waive Undisclosed Matters.

1. Disclosure of Matter Does Not Generally Waive Undisclosed Matter.

If a disclosure is made in a federal proceeding or to a federal office or agency, and the disclosure waives the attorney-client privilege or work product protection, that waiver generally does not extend to an undisclosed communication or information in a federal or state proceeding. n16 However, undisclosed matters are waived if all three of the factors in item 2 below, apply.

2. Three Factors Required for Waiver of Undisclosed Matters.

a. Waiver is Intentional.

The first prerequisite to waiver of undisclosed matter is that the original disclosure must be intentional. n17 Inadvertent disclosures do not waive similar, undisclosed information. n18

b. Identical Subject Matter.

The second prerequisite to waiver of undisclosed matter is that the disclosed and undisclosed communications or information must concern the same subject matter. n19

c. Fairness Requirement.

The third prerequisite to waiver of undisclosed matter is that disclosed and undisclosed matters ought in fairness to be considered together. n20 Thus, if a party makes a selective, misleading disclosure that is unfair to the adversary, the disclosing party waives protection of undisclosed information on the same topic, and opens itself to a more complete and accurate presentation. n21

C. Nonwaiver of Inadvertent Disclosures.

1. Disclosures Generally Waived.

A voluntary disclosure of protected matters is generally deemed waived in federal court. n22 However, when made in a federal proceeding or to a federal office or agency, a disclosure is not deemed waived in any federal or state proceeding provided that all three of the factors listed in 2, below, apply. n23

Once the producing party has shown at least minimal compliance with the three factors listed in 2 below, but that "reasonableness" is still in issue, the court may then proceed to the traditional five-factor test regarding inadvertent disclosure. n23.1

2. Three Factors Required for Nonwaiver of Disclosure.

a. Inadvertent Disclosure.

The first prerequisite is that the disclosure is inadvertent. n24 Whether a disclosure is inadvertent depends on the facts of each case. n25

b. Reasonable Steps to Prevent Disclosure.

The second prerequisite to nonwaiver is that the holder of the privilege or protection took reasonable steps to prevent disclosure of the matters not waived. n26 Whether steps are reasonable depends on the circumstances of each case, and include the nature of precautions taken, the scope of discovery, the extent of disclosure, and a consideration of fairness. n27

c. Reasonable Steps to Rectify Erroneous Disclosure.

The third prerequisite to nonwaiver is that the disclosing party promptly took reasonable steps to rectify the error after the disclosure, n28 including complying with any applicable requirements of Civil Rule 26(b)(5)(B), which includes notifying the opposition of the claim of protection and the basis for the claim, and preserving the disclosed information until the claim is resolved. n29 Such reasonable steps to prevent disclosure may include taking legal action to prevent access to the information to more parties, including filing a motion and memorandum of law to intervene in a case. n30

D. Disclosures Made in State Court Proceeding.

If a disclosure is made in a state proceeding and is not the subject of a state court order concerning waiver, the disclosure does not operate as a waiver in a federal proceeding if either of the following is true:

(1) The disclosure would not be a waiver under Rule 502 if it had been made in a federal proceeding; n31

or

(2) The disclosure is not a waiver under the law of the state where the disclosure occurred. n32

Thus, whether a waiver occurs in a state court proceeding depends on an application of that law, state or federal, that is most protective of privilege and work product. n33

E. Controlling Effect of Court Order on Waiver.

1. Federal Court Order.

A Federal court may order that a privilege or protection is not waived by disclosure connected with the litigation pending before the court. Such an order has the effect that the disclosure is also not a waiver in any other federal or state proceeding. n34 Such an order allows the court to tailor its discovery orders to provide for fairness in the case, and to facilitate discovery agreements among the parties. n35

2. State Court Order.

A state court may enter an order concerning waiver of protected material, and if it makes such an order, the court in federal proceedings may give effect to that order. n36 Whether the federal court must give effect to the state court order depends on both statutory law and on the principles of federalism and comity. n37

F. Controlling Effect of Party agreement on Waiver.

If parties have made an agreement on the effect of disclosure in a federal proceeding, that agreement is binding only on the parties to the agreement, unless a court incorporates the agreement into a court order. n38 Therefore, if parties want protection against non-parties from a finding of waiver by disclosure, they must request the court to include the agreement in an order of the court. n39

PART I Judicial Powers; Law Applied; Evidence
CHAPTER 4 FEDERAL EVIDENCE SUMMARY

1-4 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 4.08

§ 4.08 Witnessesn*

[1] Competency

A. Witnesses Assumed Competent Regarding Federal Claims.

With respect to federal claims, every person is deemed competent to be a witness except as provided by the Rules of Evidence. n1 Thus, regarding claims decided by substantive federal law, n2 everyone is competent except: n3 a person who refuses to swear that he or she will testify truthfully, n4 the presiding judge, n5 and any member of the jury hearing the current case. n6

B. State Law of Competence Controls Regarding State Claims.

State law regulations on competency govern in civil cases and proceedings with respect to elements of claims or defenses as to which state law furnishes the rule of decision. n7 This means that in diversity cases and in federal question cases with supplemental state claims, state substantive law determines whether a witness is competent with respect to that issue. n8

C. Competency of Judge to Be Witness.

The judge presiding at the trial is not competent to testify in that trial as a witness. n9 This prohibition is absolute and may not be waived. n10 Thus, no objection need be made by a party to preserve the error of a judge's testimony on appeal. n11 Furthermore, the prohibition applies even if the judge testifies without being called as a witness. n12

D. Competency of Juror to Be Witness.

1. Testimony at Trial.

A juror is prohibited from testifying as a witness before the jury on which the juror is currently serving. n13 If a juror is called at trial, the opposition must be given the opportunity to object out of the presence of the jury. n14

2. Testimony About Validity of Verdict.

If there is an inquiry into the validity of a verdict, a juror may not generally testify as to any matter or statement occurring during the course of the jury's deliberations,to the effect of anything on deliberations or any other juror's mind or emotions as influencing the juror's vote on the verdict, or concerning the juror's mental processes in connection with the verdict. Furthermore, a juror's affidavit or evidence of a juror's statement concerning such matters are also generally prohibited. n15 However, there are three exceptions to the rule prohibiting juror testimony. A juror may testify regarding (1) whether extraneous prejudicial information was improperly brought to the jury's attention; (2) whether someone improperly brought to bear any outside influence on any juror; or (3) whether any juror made a mistake in entering the verdict onto the verdict form. n16 The district court has discretion to evaluate whether any of these exceptions apply, according to the facts and circumstances of each case. n17

E. Competency Not Affected by Religious Belief.

Under the Federal Rules of Evidence, a party may not offer evidence of a witness' religious beliefs or opinions to either impair or to enhance the witness' credibility. n18 Thus, attorneys may not inquire about the witness' religious beliefs or opinions to show that they affect his or her character for truthfulness. n19 This rule does not prohibit evidence that is offered to prove something other than the effect of a witness' religion on his or her credibility. n20 Thus, for example, a plaintiff's testimony about his belief in God and attendance at church did not violate Evidence Rule 610 when he was not attempting to enhance his credibility though statements of religious belief but was merely showing the hardships caused by his medical condition in attending church. n21

[2] Declaration of Truthfulness Required of Witness

A witness may not testify regarding any matter until the witness has declared that he or she will testify truthfully, either by oath or affirmation, administered in a form calculated to pique the witness' conscience and impress on the witness that he or she has a duty to testify truthfully. n1

[3] Personal Knowledge of Witness Required

A lay witness may not testify regarding any matter unless the witness has personal knowledge of the matter and evidence is introduced sufficient to support a finding of that personal knowledge. n1 This requires that the witness' testimony must be based on events perceived by the witness through one of the person's senses. n2 The required personal knowledge may be established either through the witness' own testimony or through extrinsic testimony. n3 Evidence Rule 701, governing opinion testimony by lay witnesses, incorporates the knowledge requirement of Evidence Rule 602. Thus, testimony by a layperson in the form of opinions or inferences is limited to those opinions or inferences which are rationally based on the perception of the witness. n4

[4] Interrogation of Witness

A. Four Typical Stages of Examination.

The typical examination of a witness goes through as many as four stages: (1) direct examination, which is performed by the party calling the witness; (2) cross-examination which is performed by an opposition party; (3) redirect examination which is conducted by the calling party; (4) recross-examination, which is conducted by the cross-examining party. A party is entitled to each successive stage of examination when new matter is introduced by the opposition at a preceding stage. n1 Thus, cross-examination should be limited to the subject matter of the direct examination and matters affecting the credibility of the witness. However, the court has discretion at any stage to permit inquiry into additional matters as if on direct examination, n2 as discussed in B, below.

B. Court's Discretion to Control Examination.

The court must exercise reasonable control over the mode and order of interrogating witnesses and presenting evidence so that the interrogation and presentation of witnesses is effective for the ascertainment of the truth, avoids needless consumption of time, and protects witnesses from harassment or undue embarrassment. n3 This language is broad enough to authorize the trial court to use innovations in the presentation of testimonial evidence, provided that the court ensures that no prejudice results to parties or witnesses. For example, the court may allow written jury questions to be given to witnesses, and examination by jurors may be particularly desirable in complex or lengthy trials. n4 The court has greater discretion regarding the mode of questioning in a bench trial than a jury trial. n5

C. Court's Initiation of Examination of Witness.

1. Court May Call Its Own Witnesses.

The trial court has specific authority under the Federal Rules of Evidence to call witnesses, either on its own initiative or at the suggestion of a party. n6 All parties are entitled to cross-examine witnesses called by the court. n7

2. Interrogation of Witness by Court.

A federal court has specific authority under the Federal Rules of Evidence to interrogate witnesses, whether called by itself or by a party. n8 Such questioning should be in a neutral and impartial manner. n9 Such questioning may be particularly appropriate or even required in extremely complex cases. n10

3. Objections.

Any party may object either to the calling of witnesses by the court, or to the particular interrogation of a witness by the court. The objection must be made at the time of the objectionable act or at the next available opportunity when the jury is not present. n11 If a party fails to make a timely objection, the failure will waive the objection, unless the court's interrogation of witnesses constitutes plain error. n12

D. Leading Questions. A trial court should not permit leading questions on the direct examination of a witness, n13 except as necessary to developthe witness' testimony. n14 On the other hand, the court should ordinarily permit leading questions on cross-examination. The court may also allow interrogation by leading questions when a party calls a hostile witness, an adverse party, or a witness identified with an adverse party. n15

[5] Impeachment of Witness

A. Parties Entitled to Impeach.

Any party may attack the credibility of a witness, including the party calling the witness. n1 Thus, the party may elicit on direct examination matters that are unfavorable to the witness, usually on the rationale that the matter will cause less damage presented on direct examination rather than if brought out on cross-examination. n2

B. Methods of Impeachment.

1. Character of Witness.

The credibility of a witness may be attacked or enhanced by evidence in the form of opinion or reputation. However, the character evidence may refer only to character for truthfulness or untruthfulness, and evidence of truthful character is admissible only after the character of the witness for truthfulness has been attacked by other evidence. n3

2. Conduct of Witness.

For the purpose of attacking or supporting a witness' character for truthfulness, specific instances of the conduct of a witness may not generally be proved by extrinsic evidence. n4 However, the trial court has discretion to admit specific instances of conduct on cross-examination if they concern the witness' character for truthfulness or untruthfulness, or if they concern the character for truthfulness or untruthfulness of another witness as to whose character the current witness has testified. n5 When a witness gives testimony that relates only to character for truthfulness, that testimony does not operate as a waiver of the accused's or the witness' privilege against self-incrimination. n5.1

C. Grounds for Impeachment.

1. Conviction of Crime.

a. Two Types of Crimes Used to Impeach Witness.

A party may use two types of criminal convictions as evidence to attack the character for truthfulness of a witness: (1) that a witness other than an accused has been convicted of a crime if the crime was punishable by death or imprisonment in excess of one year under the law under which the witness was convicted or that an accused has been convicted of such a crime if the court determines that the probative value of admitting this evidence outweighs its prejudicial effect on the accused; n6 and (2) evidence that any witness has been convicted of a crime regardless of the punishment, if it readily can be determined that establishing the elements of the crime required proof or admission of an act of dishonesty or false statement by the witness. n7 Crimes come under category (2) only if the crime required the factfinder to find an act of dishonesty or false statement, such as perjury or embezzlement. n8 The pendency of an appeal from a criminal conviction does not render evidence of that conviction inadmissible. n9

b. Time Limitation.

Evidence of a conviction is generally not admissible for impeachment of a witness if a period of more than 10 years has elapsed since the date of the conviction or of the release of the witness from the confinement imposed for that conviction, whichever is later, unless the trial court determines that in the interests of justice the probative value of the conviction supported by specific facts and circumstances substantially outweighs its prejudicial effect. n10

c. Juvenile Convictions.

Evidence of juvenile adjudications is generally not admissible for impeachment purposes. n11

d. Impeachment Prohibited if Convict Has Been Pardoned or Rehabilitated.

Evidence of a conviction is generally not admissible for impeachment of a witness if the conviction has been the subject of a pardon, annulment, certificate of rehabilitation, or other equivalent procedure based on a finding of the rehabilitation of the person convicted or based on a finding of innocence of the person convicted. n12

2. Prior Statements.

a. Prior Statement Used for Impeachment Only.

A prior statement of the witness may be used to impeach the credibility of the current testimony of the witness. However, such a statement may be introduced only for impeachment to contradict the witness' testimony with a priorstatement; it may not be used as substantive evidence for the underlying issues in the case. n13

b. Foundation for Prior Statement.

When an attorney is examining a witness concerning a prior verbal or written statement made by the witness, the statement need not be revealed or its contents disclosed to the witness at the time of examination, but, on request, the statement must be shown or disclosed to the opposition attorney. n14

c. Prior Inconsistent Statement.

Extrinsic evidence of a prior inconsistent statement by a witness is not admissible unless the witness is given an opportunity to explain or deny the statement and the opposite party is afforded an opportunity to interrogate the witness on the statement, or the interests of justice otherwise require, and unless the statement constitutes an admission of a party opponent as defined in the hearsay rule. n15 Once the witness is given an opportunity to explain the inconsistent statement, the statement itself may be admitted into evidence. n16

3. Bias.

A party may impeach a witness for bias, which is trait of a witness that adversely affects credibility in that a relationship or circumstances impair the witness' impartiality. n17 Bias may be proved by extrinsic evidence of specific instances of conduct. n18 Thus, the existence of bias usually is demonstrated circumstantially by proof of relationships, conduct, or utterances. The issue of hearsay is generally not a problem in this context because the testimony is being used to show the witness' state of mind. n19

4. Mental Capacity.

A witness' credibility may be attacked by showing that his or her mental capacity to observe, remember, or narrate is impaired, either at the time of the occurrence in question or at the time of trial. Because defects of this type reflect on mental capacity for telling the truth, rather than moral capacity, the requirements regarding character evidence under Evidence Rule 608 n20 are not controlling. n21

[6] Interpreters for Witnesses

The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure give the trial court discretion to order the appointment and compensation of interpreters who may assist witnesses in giving testimony. n1 While interpreters themselves are not witnesses, they are subject to the federal evidence rules relating to qualification as an expert n2 and administration of an oath or affirmation n3 to make a true translation. n4 A federal statute, the Court Interpreters Act, n5 also provides for the use of interpreters in federal court. The Act requires an interpreter when the court determines that a witness speaks a foreign language, or a witness suffers from a hearing impairment that restricts his or her comprehension. n6 Interpreters must be qualified as experts in the skill of translation, n7 and must make an oath or affirmation to communicate to the court exactly the intent that the witness conveys by his or her testimony. n8

[7] Exclusion of Witnesses From Hearing Other Testimony

A. Exclusion of Witnesses at Request of Party.

A party has a right to request the exclusion of witnesses from the courtroom, n1 and a court may not deny such a request, n2 unless the witnesses fall into one of the exempt categories listed in C, below.

B. Exclusion of Witnesses On Court's Own Initiative.

The trial court may order the witnesses excluded from the courtroom on the court's own motion. n3 In the absence of a party's request, the trial court has discretion to order exclusion of any particular witness. n4

C. Witnesses Excepted From Exclusion.

1. Parties Who Are Natural Persons.

The trial court may not exclude a witness who is a party and a natural person. n5

2. Natural Persons Who Represent Entity Parties.

The trial court may not exclude a witness who is an officer or employee of a party that is not a natural person and is designated as its representative by its attorney. n6

3. Natural Persons Who Represent Entity Parties.

The trial court may not exclude a witness whose presence is shown by a party to be essential to the presentation of the party's cause. n7

4. Persons Entitled to Be Present by Statute.

The trial court may not exclude a witness authorized by statute to be present. n8 For example, under the Victims' Rights and Restitution Act, crime victims have the right to be present at all public court proceedings related to the offense, unless the trial court determines that testimony by the victim would be materially affected if the victim heard other testimony at trial. n9

PART I Judicial Powers; Law Applied; Evidence
CHAPTER 4 FEDERAL EVIDENCE SUMMARY

1-4 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 4.09

§ 4.09 Opinion Testimonyn*

[1] Opinion Testimony by Lay Witness

A. Three Requirements for Lay Opinion.

A layperson may testify in the form of an opinion or inference n1 if all of three requirements are met: n2 the testimony must be (a) rationally based on the perception of the witness, (b) helpful to a clear understanding of the witness' testimony or the determination of a fact in issue, and (c) not based on scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge.

B. Rationally Related to Witness' Personal Perception.

Lay opinion or inference testimony is admissible only if it is rationally based on the witness' personal perceptions, n3 which means that the opinion or inference must be one that a reasonable layperson would form from what the witness became aware of through the senses. n4

C. Helpful to Finder of Fact.

A lay witness' opinion testimony is admissible only if it is be helpful to the trier of fact in understanding the witness' testimony or in determining a fact in issue. n5 Such an opinion is not helpful if the trier of fact is in as good a position as the witness to draw the opinion or inference. n6

D. Opinion Not Based on Scientific, Technical, or Other Specialized Knowledge.

Lay opinion or inference testimony is not admissible if it requires scientific, technical, or specialized knowledge that would be required by an expert to form such an opinion. n7

[2] Opinion Testimony by Expert Witness

A. Admissibility of Expert Opinion Testimony.

Opinion testimony is admissible when: (1) it is given by a person who qualifies as an expert; (2) the testimony meets certain scientific data requirements; and (3) scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge would assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue. n1 Requirements for expert qualification and expert testimony are set out in § 4.09.

B. Bases of Expert Opinion Testimony.

1. Time of Perception.

An expert may base his or her opinion on facts or data perceived by or made known to the expert n2 either at trial n3 or before the time of trial. n4

2. Bases of Opinion Need Not Be Admissible.

If the facts or data forming the basis of the expert opinion are of a type reasonably relied on by experts in the particular field, the facts need not be admissible in evidence in order for the court to admit the opinion or inference. n5

3. Inadmissible Bases May Not Be Revealed to Jury.

The proponent of expert testimony may not disclose to the jury facts or data that are otherwise inadmissible, even though they are the basis of expert opinion, unless the court determines that their probative value in assisting the jury to evaluate the expert's opinion substantially outweighs their prejudicial effect. n6

4. Disclosure of Bases May Be Required.

An expert may testify in terms of an opinion or inference and give the reasons for such opinion or inference without first testifying to the underlying facts ordata, unless the court requires otherwise. n7 Additionally, the expert may be required to disclose the underlying facts or data on cross-examination. n8

[3] Opinion On Ultimate Issue

A. Admissibility of Ultimate Issue Opinion Testimony.

A layperson or an expert may give testimony in the form of an opinion or inference, even if about an ultimate issue, provided that the testimony is otherwise admissible under the Rules of Evidence. n1 However, if the witness is an expert, the ultimate issue opinion testimony must fall within his or her area of expertise. n2

B. Legal Conclusions Inadmissible.

A witness is generally not allowed to testify in terms of a legal standard or legal conclusion or to testify about the legal implications of evidence. n3 However, if a witness is giving an opinion that is a legal term of art but not exclusively a legal conclusion, it may be admitted if the court can instruct the jury so as to eliminate confusion. n4

PART I Judicial Powers; Law Applied; Evidence
CHAPTER 4 FEDERAL EVIDENCE SUMMARY

1-4 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 4.10

§ 4.10 Expert Witness Qualification and Expert Testimonyn*

[1] Qualification as Expert Witnesses

A witness may not testify as an expert unless qualified as an expert by his or her knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education. The determination of expert qualification is made within the discretion of the trial court, n1 which must make the determination in light the liberal policy of the Federal Rules of Evidence regarding admissibility of expert testimony. n2

[2] Court Appointed Experts

A. Authority and Process for Appointment.

The court may on its own motion or on the motion of any party order appointment of an expert witness, on the consent of the witness and after proposing the appointment under an order to show cause; n1 the court may request that the parties submit nominations. n2 The court appointment process does not limit the right of the parties to call expert witnesses of their own selection. n3

B. Effect of Appointment.

When an expert witness is appointed by the court, the court must specify the witness' duties in writing or at a conference in which the parties have an opportunity to participate. The appointed witness must inform the parties of the witness' findings, if any, and the witness' deposition may be taken by any party. The witness may be called to testify by the court or any party, and the witness is subject to cross-examination by each party, including a party calling the witness. n4 The court has discretion to authorize disclosure to the jury of the fact that the court appointed the expert witness. n5

C. Compensation of Appointed Expert.

Court appointed expert witnesses are entitled to reasonable compensation, which must be set by the court. n6 The compensation must be paid by the parties in the proportion and at the time specified by the court. n7

[3] Admission of Expert Testimony

A. Requirements for Bases of Expert Testimony.

Expert testimony is not admissible unless it meets three requirements: n1 (1) the testimony must be based on sufficient facts or data, (2) the testimony must be the product of reliable principles and methods, and (3) the witness must apply the principles and methods reliably to the facts of the case.

B. Helpfulness to Trier of Fact Required.

Expert testimony is not admissible unless scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge will assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue. n2

CHAPTER 4 FEDERAL EVIDENCE SUMMARY

1-4 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 4.11

§ 4.11 Hearsayn*

[1] Determination Whether Statement Constitutes Hearsay

A. Statements and Declarants That Are Controlled by Hearsay Rule.

1. Purpose of Hearsay Rule to Ensure Reliability of Out of Court Declarants and Statements.

The hearsay rule and its exceptions are designed to protect against the unreliability of out of court statements that are offered in court in another form to prove the truth of the matter asserted in the statement. n1 Consequently, the hearsay rule applies only to declarants and their statements, n2 as described below.

2. Statement.

A "statement" that is subject to the hearsay rule is any of three types of assertions: n3 an oral assertion; a written assertion; or an assertion intended by the nonverbal conduct of a person. An "assertion" is an a verbalization, writing, or act that is performed with the belief that the subject of the verbalization, writing, or act is true. n4

3. Declarant.

A "declarant" under the hearsay rule is a person who makes a statement, as defined in item 2, above. n5 Consequently, because a statement requires an assertion under the hearsay rule, n6 a person's words, writing, or conduct cannot qualify as hearsay unless it is made as an assertion by the person of some truth. n7

B. Statements That Are Defined as Hearsay.

1. Definition of Hearsay.

"Hearsay" is a statement, other than made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence at a trial or hearing to prove the truth of the matter asserted. n8

Hearsay may be included within hearsay. n9 Such "hearsay within hearsay" or "multiple hearsay" occurs when the current declarant attempts to testify that one person stated to the declarant what a second person had stated. n10 It also typically occurs in a writing prepared by one person that reports a statement made by a second person. n11

C. Statements That Do Not Constitute Hearsay.

1. Prior Inconsistent Statement by Witness.

A statement is not hearsay if it is inconsistent with the declarant's testimony and was given under oath subject to the penalty of perjury at a trial, hearing, or other proceeding, or in a deposition, and the declarant testifies as a witness at the trial or hearing and is subject to cross-examination concerning the statement. n12 Such a prior inconsistent statement is admissible as substantive evidence, assuming it is otherwise admissible. n13

2. Prior Consistent Statement by Witness.

A statement is not hearsay if it is consistent with the declarant's testimony and is offered to rebut an express or implied charge against the declarant of recent fabrication or improper influence or motive, and the declarant testifies as a witness at the trial or hearing and is subject to cross-examination concerning the statement. n14

3. Statement of Identification.

A statement is not hearsay if it is one of identification of a person made after perceiving the person. n15 If such an identification statement doesn't violate any other rules of evidence, it is admissible as substantive evidence. n16

4. Admissions by Party Opponent.

a. Party's Own Statement.

A statement is not hearsay if it is offered against a party and is the party's own statement, in either an individual or a representative capacity. n17

b. Party's Adopted Statement.

A statement is not hearsay if it is offered against a party and the party has manifested an adoption or belief in the truth of the statement. n18

c. Statement Made Under Authority of Party.

A statement is not hearsay if it is offered against a party and is made by a person authorized by the party to make a statement concerning the subject. n19 The contents of the statement must be considered, but are not alone sufficient, to establish the declarant's authority. n20

d. Statement by Party's Agent or Employee.

A statement is not hearsay if it is offered against a party and is made by the party's agent or servant concerning a matter within the scope of the agency or employment, made during the existence of that relationship. n21 The contents of the statement must be considered, but are not alone sufficient, to establish the agency or employment relationship. n22

e. Statement Made by Party's Coconspiritor.

A statement is not hearsay if it is offered against a party and is made by a coconspirator of the party during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy. n23 The contents of the statement must be considered, but are not alone sufficient, to establish the conspiracy and the participation in the conspiracy of the declarant and other alleged conspirators. n24

[2] Rule of Inadmissibility of Hearsay

Hearsay is not admissible except as provided by the Federal Rules of Evidence or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority or act of Congress. n1 The trial court has considerable discretion to make hearsay determinations, including whether a statement constitutes hearsay and whether an exception to the rule is applicable. n2 However, if the court finds that an exception is applicable, the statement must generally be admitted.

Hearsay included within hearsay is not excluded under the hearsay rule if each part of the combined statements conforms with an exception to the hearsay rule provided in the Federal Rules of Evidence. n3 The same result could be achieved in the absence of this explicit rule in Evidence Rule 805, but the explicit statement was used by the drafters to focus the attention of the courts on the issue of hearsay within hearsay, which the courts have sometimes failed to analyze adequately. n4

[3] Exceptions to Hearsay Rule

A. Applicability of Exceptions May Depend on Availability of Declarant's Testimony.

1. Exceptions Categorized by Availability of Declarant.

There are many exceptions to the hearsay rule. Some of the exceptions are deemed such powerful indicators of trustworthiness that they are applicable even if the declarant is available. n1 However, some of the exceptions are available only if the declarant is unavailable. n2

2. Circumstances of Unavailability.

A declarant is deemed to be available to testify, except in any of the following listed situations. A declarant is unavailable when the declarant: n3 (1) is exempted by the court's ruling of privilege from testifying concerning the subject matter of the declarant's statement; n4 (2) persists in refusing to testify concerning the subject matter of the declarant's statement, despite court order; n5 (3) testifies to a lack of memory of the subject matter of the declarant's statement; n6 (4) is unable to be present or to testify at the hearing because of death or physical or mental illness or infirmity existing at the time of the hearing; n7 or (5) is absent from the hearing, and the proponent of a statement has been unable to procure the declarant's attendance or testimony by process or other reasonable means. n8

On the other hand a declarant is deemed available as a witness if the exemption, refusal, claim of lack of memory, inability, or absence is due to the procurement or wrongdoing of the proponent of a statement for the purpose of preventing the witness from attending or testifying. n9

B. Exceptions Applicable Even When Declarant is Available.

1. Present Sense Impression.

A statement describing or explaining an event or condition made at the time the declarant was perceiving the event or condition, or immediately after the event or condition. n10

2. Excited Utterance.

A statement relating to a startling event or condition made while the declarant was under the stress of excitement caused by the event or condition. n11

3. Contemporaneous Mental, Emotional, or Physical Condition.

A statement of the declarant's then existing state of mind, emotion, sensation, or physical condition (such as intent, plan, motive, design, mental feeling, pain, and bodily health), but not including a statement of memory or belief to prove the fact remembered or believed unless it relates to the execution, revocation, identification, or terms of declarant's will. n12

4. Statement to Obtain Medical Diagnosis or Treatment.

A statement made for purposes of medical diagnosis or treatment and describing medical history, or past or present symptoms, pain, or sensations, or the inception or general character of the cause or external source of symptoms, pain, or sensations, to the extent reasonably pertinent to diagnosis or treatment. n13

5. Recorded Recollection.

A record concerning a matter about which a witness once had knowledge but now has insufficient recollection to enable the witness to testify fully and accurately, shown to have been made or adopted by the witness when the matter was fresh in the witness' memory and to reflect that knowledge correctly. If admitted, the memorandum or record may be read into evidence but may not itself be received as an exhibit unless offered by an adverse party. n14

6. Records of Regularly Conducted Activity.

Records in any form of acts, events, conditions, opinions, or diagnoses, made at or near the time by a person with knowledge, or from information transmitted by such a person, if kept in the course of a regularly conducted business activity and if it was the regular practice of that business activity to make the record, provided that the record is shown by the testimony of the custodian or other qualified witness, or by appropriate certification, unless the source of information or the method or circumstances of preparation indicate lack of trustworthiness. The term "business" includes a business, institution, association, profession, occupation, and calling of every kind, whether or not conducted for profit. n15

7. Absence of Entry in Records of Regularly Conducted Activity.

Evidence that a matter is not included in the records kept in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 6, above, when used to prove the nonoccurrence or nonexistence of the matter, if the matter was of a kind of which a record was regularly made and preserved, unless the sources of information or other circumstances indicate lack of trustworthiness. n16

8. Public Records and Reports.

Records in any form of public offices or agencies, setting forth (A) the activities of the office or agency, or (B) matters observed pursuant to duty imposed by law as to which matters there was a duty to report or (C) in civil actions and proceedings and against the government in criminal cases, factual findings resulting from an investigation made pursuant to authority granted by law, unless the sources of information or other circumstances indicate lack of trustworthiness. n17

9. Records of Vital Statistics.

Records or data compilations in any form, of births, fetal deaths, deaths, or marriages, if the report of the record was made to a public office pursuant to requirements of law. n18

10. Absence of Public Record or Entry.

To prove the absence of a record in any form, or the nonoccurrence or nonexistence of a matter of which a record in any form, was regularly made and preserved by a public office or agency, evidence in the form of a certification or testimony, that diligent search failed to disclose the record. n19

11. Records of Religious Organizations.

Statements of births, marriages, divorces, deaths, legitimacy, ancestry, relationship by blood or marriage, or other similar facts of personal or family history, contained in a regularly kept record of a religious organization. n20

12. Marriage, Baptismal, and Similar Certificates.

Statements of fact contained in a certificate that the maker performed a marriage or other ceremony or administered a sacrament, made by a clergyman, public official, or other person authorized by the rules or practices of a religious organization or by law to perform the act certified and purporting to have been issued at the time of the act or within a reasonable time after the act. n21

13. Family Records.

Statements of fact concerning personal or family history contained in family books and documents, genealogies, charts, engravings on rings, inscriptions on family portraits, engravings on urns, crypts, or tombstones, or similar items. n22

14. Records of Documents Affecting an Interest in Property.

The record of a document purporting to establish or affect an interest in property, as proof of the content of the original recorded document and its execution and delivery by each person by whom it purports to have been executed, if the record is a record of a public office and an applicable statute authorizes the recording of documents of that kind in that office. n23

15. Statements in Documents Affecting an Interest in Property.

A statement contained in a document purporting to establish or affect an interest in property if the matter stated was relevant to the purpose of the document, unless dealings with the property since the document was made have been inconsistent with the truth of the statement or the purport of the document. n24

16. Statements in Ancient Documents.

Statements in a document in existence twenty years or more, if the authenticity of the document is established. n25

17. Market Reports and Commercial Publications.

Market quotations, tabulations, lists, directories, or other published compilations, generally used and relied on by the public or by persons in particular occupations. n26

18. Learned treatises.

To the extent called to the attention of an expert witness on cross-examination or relied on by the expert witness in direct examination, statements contained in published treatises, periodicals, or pamphlets on a subject of history, medicine, or other science or art, established as a reliable authority by the testimony or admission of the witness or by other expert testimony or by judicial notice. If admitted, the statements may be read into evidence but may not be received as exhibits. n27

19. Reputation Concerning Personal or Family History.

Reputation among members of a person's family by blood, adoption, or marriage, or among a person's associates, or in the community, concerning a person's birth, adoption, marriage, divorce, death, or other similar fact of personal or family history. n28

20. Reputation Concerning Boundaries or General History.

Reputation in a community, arising before the occurrence in the current controversy, regarding boundaries of or customs affecting lands in the community and reputation as to events of general history important to the community, state, or nation in which located. n29

21. Reputation Concerning Character.

Reputation of a person's character among associates or in the community. n30

22. Judgment of Previous Conviction.

Evidence of a final judgment, entered after a trial or on a plea of guilty, adjudging a person guilty of a crime punishable by death or imprisonment in excess of one year, to prove any fact essential to sustain the judgment. The pendency of an appeal may be shown but does not affect admissibility. n31

23. Judgment as to Personal, Family, or General History or Boundaries.

Judgments as proof of matters of personal, family, or general history, or boundaries, essential to the judgment, if the matter would be provable by evidence of reputation. n32

C. Exceptions Applicable Only When Declarant is Unavailable.

1. Former Testimony.

If the declarant is unavailable as a witness, testimony is not excluded under the hearsay rule if the testimony was given by the declarant as a witness at another hearing of the same or a different proceeding, or in a lawful deposition in the course of the same or another proceeding, provided that the party against whom the testimony is now offered, or a predecessor in interest, had an opportunity and similar motive to develop the testimony by direct, cross, or redirect examination. n33

2. Statement Under Belief of Impending Death.

If the declarant is unavailable as a witness, a statement made by a declarant while believing that the declarant's death was imminent is not excluded under the hearsay rule, provided that the statement concerns the cause or circumstances of what the declarant believed to be impending death. n34

3. Statement Against Interest.

If the declarant is unavailable as a witness, a statement is not excluded under the hearsay rule if a reasonable person in the declarant's position would have made the statement only if the person believed it to be true because, when made, the statement was so contrary to the declarant's proprietary or pecuniary interest or had so great a tendency to invalidate the declarant's claim against someone else or to expose the declarant to civil or criminal liability. n35

4. Statements Regarding Personal or Family History.

If the declarant is unavailable as a witness, a statement is not excluded under the hearsay rule if it concerns the declarant's own birth, adoption, marriage, divorce, legitimacy, relationship by blood, adoption, or marriage, ancestry, or other similar fact of personal or family history. This is true even if the declarant had no means of acquiring personal knowledge of the matter stated. n36 If the declarant makes such a statement or also a statement of death of another person, that statement is also not excluded under the hearsay rule, if the declarant was related to the other by blood, adoption, or marriage or was so intimately associated with the other's family as to be likely to have accurate information concerning the matter declared in the statement. n37

5. Forfeiture by Wrongdoing.

If the declarant is unavailable as a witness, a statement by the declarant is not excluded under the hearsay rule if offered against a party that has engaged or acquiesced in wrongdoing that was intended to, and actually did, procure the unavailability of the declarant as a witness. n38

D. Residual Exception.

Even if a statement is not specifically covered by an exception listed in Rule 803 or 804, and even if the declarant is available, a statement is not excluded by the hearsay rule if all of the following are true: n39

1. The statement has circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness equivalent to those in Rule 803 or 804; n40

2. The court determines that the statement is offered as evidence of a material fact; n41

3. The court determines that the statement is more probative on the point for which it is offered than any other evidence which the proponent can procure through reasonable efforts; n42

4. The court determines that the general purposes of the Federal Rules of Evidence and the interests of justice will best be served by admission of the statement into evidence; n43 and

5. The proponent of the statement provides notice to the adverse party sufficiently in advance of the trial or hearing to provide the adverse party with a fair opportunity to prepare to meet the statement. The notice must indicate the proponent's intention to offer the statement in evidence and the particulars of the statement, including the name and address of the declarant. n44

[4] Attacking and Supporting Credibility of Declarant

If the court has admitted in evidence a hearsay statement or any of certain statements of admission offered against a party, n1 the credibility of the declarant may be attacked. n2 If the credibility of the declarant is attacked it may be supported. The declarant's credibility may be attacked or supported by any evidence which would be admissible for those purposes if the declarant had testified as a witness. However, evidence of a statement or conduct by the declarant at any time, inconsistent with the declarant's hearsay statement, is not subject to any requirement that the declarant may have been afforded an opportunity to deny or explain. If the party against whom a hearsay statement has been admitted calls the declarant as a witness, the party is entitled to examine the declarant on the statement as if under cross-examination. n3

CHAPTER 4 FEDERAL EVIDENCE SUMMARY

1-4 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 4.12

§ 4.12 Authentication and Identification of Evidencen*

[1] Requirements for Authentication or Identification

A. Necessity and Method for Authentication or Identification.

At common law, a condition precedent to the admissibility of documents and other types of real evidence was their authentication or identification. n1 TheFederal Rules of Evidence provide that the requirement of authentication or identification as a condition precedent to admissibility is satisfied by evidence sufficient to support a finding that the matter in question is what its proponent claims. n2 By way of illustration only, the Rules provide nonexclusive examples of evidence that is sufficient to support a finding that the matter in question is what its proponent claims. These examples are listed in B, below.

The rules also provide that in specified circumstances an item of real evidence is self authenticating. n3

B. Nonexclusive Illustrations of Authenticating Evidence

1. Testimony of Witness Wth Knowledge.

Real evidence may be authenticated by testimony of a witness with knowledge that the real evidence is what it is claimed to be. n4

2. Nonexpert Opinion on Handwriting.

Handwriting may be authenticated by nonexpert opinion as to its genuineness, provided the opinion is based on familiarity not acquired for purposes of the litigation. n5

3. Comparison by Trier or Expert Witness.

A specimen may be authenticated by comparison by the trier of fact or by expert witnesses with other specimens that have already been authenticated. n6

4. Distinctive Characteristics.

An item of real evidence, including a document, may be authenticated by appearance, contents, substance, internal patterns, or other distinctive characteristics, taken in conjunction with circumstances. n7

5. Voice Identification.

Identification of a voice, whether heard firsthand or through mechanical or electronic transmission or recording, may be made by opinion based on the witness hearing the voice at any time under circumstances connecting it with the asserted speaker. n8

6. Telephone Conversation.

a. Personal Telephone Calls.

A telephone conversation other than a business conversation may be authenticated by evidence that the call was made to the number assigned at that time by the telephone company to a particular person and that circumstances, such as self-identification, show that the person answering the telephone was the person called. n9

b. Business Telephone Calls.

A telephone call made to a business may be authenticated by evidence that the call was made to a place of business and that the conversation related to business reasonably transacted over the telephone. n10

7. Public Records or Reports.

Public records or reports may be authenticated by evidence that a writing was authorized by law to be recorded or filed and in fact was recorded or filed in a public office, or by evidence that a purported public record, report, statement, or data compilation, in any form, is from the public office where items of this nature are kept. n11

8. Ancient Documents or Data Compilation.

A document or data compilation in any form may be authenticated by evidence that the document or compilation is in such condition as to create no suspicion concerning its authenticity, was in a place where it would likely be if authentic, and has been in existence 20 years or more at the time it is offered. n12

9. Process or System.

A process or system used to produce a result may be authenticated by evidence describing the process or system and by evidence which shows that the process or system produces an accurate result. n13

10. Method Provided by Statute or Rule.

Real evidence may be proved by any method of authentication or identification provided by Act of Congress or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority. n14

[2] Self Authentication of Evidence

A. Self Authentication Obviates Necessity of Extrinsic Evidence of Authenticity.

The Federal Rules of Evidence provide that extrinsic evidence of authenticity as a condition precedent to admissibility is not required with respect to specified trustworthy documents, records, and items. n1 Essentially, self authentication means that the requirement of Evidence Rule 901 that the proponent of an item of real evidence must show that the item is what it purports to be is automatically met if the proffered item meets the requirements of any of the categories, n2 as specified in B, below.

B. List of Self Authenticating Documents and Items.

1. Domestic Public Document Under Seal.

A document bearing a seal purporting to be that of the United States, or of any state, district, commonwealth, territory, including also political subdivisions, departments, officers, and agencies of any such governmental agency, and also bearing a signature purporting to be an attestation or execution. n3

2. Domestic Public Document Not Under Seal.

A document purporting to bear the signature in the official capacity of an officer or employee of any governmental entity specified in paragraph 1, above, even if it has no seal, provided the public officer having a seal and having official duties in the district or political subdivision of the officer or employee certifies under seal that the signer has the official capacity and that the signature is genuine. n4

3. Foreign Public Document.

Certain documents purporting to be executed or attested in an official capacity by a person authorized by the laws of a foreign country to make the execution or attestation, when accompanied by a final certification performed by a specified person as to the genuineness of the signature and official position. n5

4. Certified Copy of Public Record.

A certified copy of a public record, which is a copy of any of the following: (1) an official record, (2) an official report, (3) an entry in an official record or report, or (4) a document authorized by law to be recorded or filed and actually recorded or filed in a public office. The certification must comply with the requirements of paragraph 1, 2, or 3, above. n6

5. Official Publication.

Books, pamphlets, or other publications purporting to be issued by public authority. n7

6. Newspapers and Periodicals.

Printed materials purporting to be newspapers or periodicals. n8

7. Trade Inscriptions and Similar Items.

Inscriptions, signs, tags, or labels purporting to have been affixed in the course of business and indicating ownership, control, or origin. n9

8. Acknowledged Documents.

Documents accompanied by a certificate of acknowledgment executed in the manner provided by law by a notary public or other officer authorized by law to take acknowledgments. n10

9. Commercial Paper and Related Documents.

Commercial paper, signatures, and related documents to the extent provided by general commercial law. n11

10. Presumptions Under Acts of Congress.

Any signature, document, or other matter declared by Act of Congress to be presumptively or prima facie genuine or authentic. n12

11. Certified Domestic Records of Regularly Conducted Activity.

The original or a duplicate of a domestic record of a regularly conducted activity that would be admissible under Evidence Rule 803(6), provided it is accompanied by a written declaration of its custodian or other qualified person, in a manner complying with any Act of Congress or rule prescribed by the Supreme Court. The declaration must certify that the record: (A) was made at or near the time of the occurrence of the matters set forth, by, or from information transmitted by, a person with knowledge of those matters; (B) was kept in thecourse of the regularly conducted activity; and (C) was made by the regularly conducted activity as a regular practice. n13

A party intending to offer a record into evidence under this self authentication provision must provide written notice of that intention to all adverse parties, and must make the record and declaration available for inspection sufficiently in advance of the offer to provide the adverse party with a fair opportunity to challenge the record and declaration. n14

12. Certified Foreign Records of Regularly Conducted Activity.

In a civil case, the original or a duplicate of a foreign record of regularly conducted activity that would be admissible under Evidence Rule 803(6), provided it is accompanied by a written declaration of its custodian or other qualified person certifying that the record: (A) was made at or near the time of the occurrence of the matters set forth, by, or from information transmitted by, a person with knowledge of those matters; (B) was kept in the course of the regularly conducted activity; and (C) was made by the regularly conducted activity as a regular practice. The declaration must be signed in a manner that, if falsely made, would subject the maker to criminal penalty under the laws of the country where the declaration is signed. n15

A party intending to offer a foreign record into evidence under this self authentication provision must provide written notice of that intention to all adverse parties and must make the record and declaration available for inspection sufficiently in advance of the offer to provide the adverse party with a fair opportunity to challenge the record and declaration. n16

[3] Testimony of Subscribing Witness Unnecessary

The testimony of a subscribing witness is not necessary to authenticate a writing unless required by the laws of the jurisdiction whose laws govern the validity of the writing. n1 The testimony of a subscribing witness is required in some states under the substantive law of wills and in some states for marriage contracts. The burden of proof is on the party challenging the admission of a writing to show that the originating state requires testimony of the subscribing witness. n2

[1] Definitions Related to Contents of Evidence

A. Writings and Recordings.

"Writings" and "recordings" consist of letters, words, or numbers or their equivalent, set down by handwriting, typewriting, printing, photostating, photographing, magnetic impulse, mechanical or electronic recording, or other form of data compilation. n1 Although "photographs" are defined separately, n2 as stated in B, below, it should be noted that the definition of writings and recordings includes the photographic reproduction of letters, words or numbers. n3 Except for symbols that are used as words in languages, symbols are generally not deemed writings or subject to this definition because they are not the equivalent to letters, words, or numbers or their equivalent. n4

B. Photographs.

The term "photographs" includes still photographs, X-ray films, video tapes, and motion pictures. n5 It should be noted that although Congress has expanded this list to include videotapes, and will probably expand it further as the technology of storage media improves to include items such as CD-ROM and DVD disks, the inclusion on this list is for evidentiary purposes of determining the contents of such items and not for other purposes. Thus, it has recently been held that under a statute allowing an award of costs, n6 there is no provision for the recovery of expenses for videotapes of depositions. n7

C. Originals.

An "original" of a writing or recording is the writing or recording itself or any counterpart intended to have the same effect by a person executing or issuing it. n8 An "original" of a photograph includes the negative or any print from the negative. If data are stored in a computer or similar device, any printout or other output readable by sight is an "original" provided that the proponent shows that the output reflects the data accurately. n9

D. Duplicates.

A "duplicate" is: n10 a counterpart produced by the same impression as the original, n11 or from the same matrix, or by means of photography, including enlargements and miniatures, or by mechanical or electronic rerecording, n12 or by chemical reproduction, or by any other equivalent technique that accurately reproduces the original. n13

[2] Requirement of Original

An original of a writing, recording, or photograph is required to prove the content of a writing, recording, or photograph, except as otherwise provided in the Federal Rules of Evidence or by Act of Congress. n1 This rule is referred to as the "best evidence" rule, which provides that at some time every writing, recording, or photograph consists of a decipherable original. The rule is intended to prevent fraud in proving the contents of documents and recordings. n2 However, the fact that the rules recognize that even a photocopy may constitute an original when so intended indicates that there is a recognition that the theory of the original is sometimes outmoded with respect to modern reproduction technology; the possibility of error is substantially reduced when copies are produced by modern methods. However, in certain respects there is also an increase in the capability for fraud. In any event, there still is a preference for the original except in particular exceptions specified in the rules. n3

[3] Admissibility of Duplicates

A duplicate is admissible to the same extent as an original unless (1) a genuine question is raised as to the authenticity of the original; n1 or (2) in the circumstances it would be unfair to admit the duplicate in lieu of the original. n2 Both the issues of authenticity and fairness are determined on a case by case basis. n3

[4] Admissibility of Other Evidence of Contents

A. Use of Other Evidence to Prove Contents.

The Federal Rules of Evidence list several specific situations in which a proponent may introduce evidence other than the original or a duplicate to prove the contents of a writing, recording, or photograph. n1 These situations allow admission of such "secondary evidence" in cases when the original cannot be produced, provided the failure to produce the original is satisfactorily explained. n2 The specific situations are listed in B, below.

B. Circumstances Permitting Introduction of Other Evidence.

1. Originals Lost or Destroyed.

Secondary evidence is admissible to prove content if all originals are lost or have been destroyed, unless the proponent lost or destroyed them in bad faith. n3

2. Proponent Cannot Obtain Original.

The proponent may introduce secondary evidence of contents if no original can be obtained by any available judicial process or procedure. n4

3. Original in Possession of Opponent.

Secondary evidence is admissible to prove content if, at a time when an original was under the control of the party against whom offered, the proponent put that opponent on notice that the contents would be a subject of proof at the hearing, and the opponent does not produce the original at the hearing. n5

4. Secondary Evidence to Prove Collateral Matters.

Secondary evidence is admissible to prove content if the writing, recording, or photograph is not closely related to a controlling issue. n6

[5] Proof of Contents of Public Records

The proponent may prove the contents of an official record, or of a document authorized to be recorded or filed and actually recorded or filed, including data compilations in any form, by a certified copy that is certified as correct in accordance with Evidence Rule 902 or testified to be correct by a witness who has compared it with the original. If the proponent cannot obtain such a certified copy by the exercise of reasonable diligence, then other evidence of the contents may be given. n1

[6] Proof of Contents of by Summary

The contents of voluminous writings, recordings, or photographs which cannot conveniently be examined in court may be presented in the form of a chart, summary, or calculation. The introducing party must make available the originals or duplicates for examination or copying, or both, by other parties at a reasonable time and place, and the court may order that they be produced in court. n1

[7] Testimony or Written Admission of Party

A party may prove contents of writings, recordings, or photographs by the secondary evidence of the testimony or deposition of an opposition party or by party's written admission, when the evidence is offered against that party. The proponent of the evidence need not account for the nonproduction of the original. n1

[8] Function of Court and Jury Regarding Secondary Evidence

A. Determinations Made by Court.

When the admissibility of other evidence of the contents of writings, recordings, or photographs under these rules depends on the fulfillment of a condition of fact, the court must ordinarily determine the question whether that condition has been satisfied. n1 Thus, for example, whether an original has actually been lost is a question for the court, n2 in contrast to the question of whether a particular item is the original. n3

B. Determinations Made by Trier of Fact.

The trier of fact, rather than the court, must determine the issues of fact whether an asserted writing ever existed, or whether another writing, recording, or photograph produced at the trial is the original, or whether other evidence of contents correctly reflects the contents. n4 Thus, the question of whether a party has offered sufficient secondary evidence to prove the contents of a writing that the court has determined to be lost is a matter for the trier of fact to decide. n5

APPENDIX TO CHAPTER 4: FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE
ARTICLE I. GENERAL PROVISIONS

1-4 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure Rule 103

Rule 103. Rulings on Evidence

(a) Effect of erroneous ruling. --Error may not be predicated upon a ruling which admits or excludes evidence unless a substantial right of the party is affected, and

(1) Objection.--In case the ruling is one admitting evidence, a timely objection or motion to strike appears of record, stating the specific ground of objection, if the specific ground was not apparent from the context; or

(2) Offer of proof.--In case the ruling is one excluding evidence, the substance of the evidence was made known to the court by offer or was apparent from the context within which questions were asked.

Once the court makes a definitive ruling on the record admitting or excluding evidence, either at or before trial, a party need not renew an objection or offer of proof to preserve a claim of error for appeal.

(b) Record of offer and ruling.--The court may add any other or further statement which shows the character of the evidence, the form in which it was offered, the objection made, and the ruling thereon. It may direct the making of an offer in question and answer form.

(c) Hearing of jury.--In jury cases, proceedings shall be conducted, to the extent practicable, so as to prevent inadmissible evidence from being suggested to the jury by any means, such as making statements or offers of proof or asking questions in the hearing of the jury.

(d) Plain error.--Nothing in this rule precludes taking notice of plain errors affecting substantial rights although they were not brought to the attention of the court.

ARTICLE I. GENERAL PROVISIONS

1-4 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure Rule 104

Rule 104. Preliminary Questions

(a) Questions of admissibility generally.--Preliminary questions concerning the qualification of a person to be a witness, the existence of a privilege, or the admissibility of evidence shall be determined by the court, subject to the provisions of subdivision (b). In making its determination it is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges.

(b) Relevancy conditioned on fact.--When the relevancy of evidence depends upon the fulfillment of a condition of fact, the court shall admit it upon, or subject to, the introduction of evidence sufficient to support a finding of the fulfillment of the condition.

(c) Hearing of jury.--Hearings on the admissibility of confessions shall in all cases be conducted out of the hearing of the jury. Hearings on other preliminary matters shall be so conducted when the interests of justice require, or when an accused is a witness and so requests.

(d) Testimony by accused.--The accused does not, by testifying upon a preliminary matter, become subject to cross-examination as to other issues in the case.

(e) Weight and credibility.--This rule does not limit the right of a party to introduce before the jury evidence relevant to weight or credibility.

1-4 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure Rule 201

Rule 201. Judicial Notice of Adjudicative Facts

(a) Scope of rule.--This rule governs only judicial notice of adjudicative facts.

(b) Kinds of facts.--A judicially noticed fact must be one not subject to reasonable dispute in that it is either (1) generally known within the territorial jurisdiction of the trial court or (2) capable of accurate and ready determination by resort to sources whose accuracy cannot reasonably be questioned.

(c) When discretionary.--A court may take judicial notice, whether requested or not.

(d) When mandatory.--A court shall take judicial notice if requested by a party and supplied with the necessary information.

(e) Opportunity to be heard.--A party is entitled upon timely request to an opportunity to be heard as to the propriety of taking judicial notice and the tenor of the matter noticed. In the absence of prior notification, the request may be made after judicial notice has been taken.

(f) Time of taking notice.--Judicial notice may be taken at any stage of the proceeding.

(g) Instructing jury.--In a civil action or proceeding, the court shall instruct the jury to accept as conclusive any fact judicially noticed. In a criminal case, the court shall instruct the jury that it may, but is not required to, accept as conclusive any fact judicially noticed.

Rule 404. Character Evidence Not Admissible To Prove Conduct; Exceptions; Other Crimes

(a) Character evidence generally.--Evidence of a person's character or a trait of character is not admissible for the purpose of proving action in conformity therewith on a particular occasion, except:

(1) Character of accused--In a criminal case, evidence of a pertinent trait of character offered by an accused, or by the prosecution to rebut the same, or if evidence of a trait of character of the alleged victim of the crime is offered by an accused and admitted under Rule 404(a)(2), evidence of the same trait of character of the accused offered by the prosecution;

(2) Character of alleged victim.--In a criminal case, and subject to the limitations imposed by Rule 412, evidence of a pertinent trait of character of the alleged victim of the crime offered by an accused, or by the prosecution to rebut the same, or evidence of a character trait of peacefulness of the alleged victim offered by the prosecution in a homicide case to rebut evidence that the alleged victim was the first aggressor;

(3) Character of witness.--Evidence of the character of a witness, as provided in rules 607, 608, and 609.

(b) Other crimes, wrongs, or acts.--Evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show action in conformity therewith. It may, however, be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident, provided that upon request by the accused, the prosecution in a criminal case shall provide reasonable notice in advance of trial, or during trial if the court excuses pretrial notice on good cause shown, of the general nature of any such evidence it intends to introduce at trial.

Rule 407. Subsequent Remedial Measures

When, after an injury or harm allegedly caused by an event, measures are taken that, if taken previously, would have made the injury or harm less likely to occur, evidence of the subsequent measures is not admissible to prove negligence, culpable conduct, a defect in a product, a defect in a product's design, or a need for a warning or instruction. This rule does not require the exclusion of evidence of subsequent measures when offered for another purpose, such as proving ownership, control, or feasibility of precautionary measures, if controverted, or impeachment.

1-4 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure Rule 408

Rule 408. Compromise and Offers to Compromise

(a) --Prohibited uses.--Evidence of the following is not admissible on behalf of any party, when offered to prove liability for, invalidity of, or amount of a claim that was disputed as to validity or amount, or to impeach through a prior inconsistent statement or contradiction:

(1) --furnishing or offering or promising to furnish--or accepting or offering or promising to accept--a valuable consideration in compromising or attempting to compromise the claim; and

(2) --conduct or statements made in compromise negotiations regarding the claim, except when offered in a criminal case and the negotiations related to a claim by a public office or agency in the exercise of regulatory, investigative, or enforcement authority.

(b) Permitted uses.--This rule does not require exclusion if the evidence is offered for purposes not prohibited by subdivision (a). Examples of permissible purposes include proving a witness's bias or prejudice; negating a contention of undue delay; and proving an effort to obstruct a criminal investigation or prosecution.

Except as otherwise provided in this rule, evidence of the following is not, in any civil or criminal proceeding, admissible against the defendant who made the plea or was a participant in the plea discussions:

(1) a plea of guilty which was later withdrawn;

(2) a plea of nolo contendere;

(3) any statement made in the course of any proceedings under Rule 11 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure or comparable state procedure regarding either of the foregoing pleas; or

(4) any statement made in the course of plea discussions with an attorney for the prosecuting authority which do not result in a plea of guilty or which result in a plea of guilty later withdrawn.

However, such a statement is admissible (i) in any proceeding wherein another statement made in the course of the same plea or plea discussions has been introduced and the statement ought in fairness be considered contemporaneously with it, or (ii) in a criminal proceeding for perjury or false statement if the statement was made by the defendant under oath, on the record and in the presence of counsel.

1-4 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure Rule 412

Rule 412. Sex Offense Cases; Relevance of Alleged Victim's Past Sexual Behavior or Alleged Sexual Predisposition

(a) Evidence generally inadmissible.--The following evidence is not admissible in any civil or criminal proceeding involving alleged sexual misconduct except as provided in subdivisions (b) and (c):

(1) Evidence offered to prove that any alleged victim engaged in other sexual behavior.

(2) Evidence offered to prove any alleged victim's sexual predisposition.

(b) Exceptions.--

(1) In a criminal case, the following evidence is admissible, if otherwise admissible under these rules:

(A) evidence of specific instances of sexual behavior by the alleged victim offered to prove that a person other than the accused was the source of semen, injury, or other physical evidence;

(B) evidence of specific instances of sexual behavior by the alleged victim with respect to the person accused of the sexual misconduct offered by the accused to prove consent or by the prosecution; and

(C) evidence the exclusion of which would violate the constitutional rights of the defendant.

(2) In a civil case, evidence offered to prove the sexual behavior or sexual predisposition of any alleged victim is admissible if it is otherwise admissible under these rules and its probative value substantially outweighs the danger of harm to any victim and of unfair prejudice to any party. Evidence of an alleged victim's reputation is admissible only if it has been placed in controversy by the alleged victim.

(c) Procedure to determine admissibility.--

(1) A party intending to offer evidence under subdivision (b) must--

(A) file a written motion at least 14 days before trial specifically describing the evidence and stating the purpose for which it is offered unless the court, for good cause requires a different time for filing or permits filing during trial; and

(B) serve the motion on all parties and notify the alleged victim or, when appropriate, the alleged victim's guardian or representative.

(2) Before admitting evidence under this rule the court must conduct a hearing in camera and afford the victim and parties a right to attend and be heard. The motion, related papers, and the record of the hearing must be sealed and remain under seal unless the court orders otherwise.

(a) In a criminal case in which the defendant is accused of an offense of sexual assault, evidence of the defendant's commission of another offense or offenses of sexual assault is admissible, and may be considered for its bearing on any matter to which it is relevant.

(b) In a case in which the Government intends to offer evidence under this rule, the attorney for the Government shall disclose the evidence to the defendant, including statements of witnesses or a summary of the substance of any testimony that is expected to be offered, at least fifteen days before the scheduled date of trial or at such later time as the court may allow for good cause.

(c) This rule shall not be construed to limit the admission or consideration of evidence under any other rule.

(d) For purposes of this rule and Rule 415, "offense of sexual assault" means a crime under Federal law or the law of a State (as defined in section 513 of title 18, United States Code) that involved--

(1) any conduct proscribed by chapter 109A of title 18, United States Code;

(2) contact, without consent, between any part of the defendant's body or an object and the genitals or anus of another person;

(3) contact, without consent, between the genitals or anus of the defendant and any part of another person's body;

(4) deriving sexual pleasure or gratification from the infliction of death, bodily injury, or physical pain on another person; or

(5) an attempt or conspiracy to engage in conduct described in paragraphs (1)-(4).

ARTICLE V. PRIVILEGES

1-4 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure Rule 502

Rule 502. Attorney-Client Privilege and Work Product; Limitations on Waiver.

The following provisions apply, in the circumstances set out, to disclosure of a communication or information covered by the attorney-client privilege or work-product protection.

(a) Disclosure Made in a Federal Proceeding or to a Federal Office or Agency; Scope of a Waiver.--When the disclosure is made in a Federal proceeding or to a Federal office or agency and waives the attorney-client privilege or work-product protection, the waiver extends to an undisclosed communication or information in a Federal or State proceeding only if:

(1) the waiver is intentional;

(2) the disclosed and undisclosed communications or information concern the same subject matter; and

(3) they ought in fairness to be considered together.

(b) Inadvertent Disclosure.--When made in a Federal proceeding or to a Federal office or agency, the disclosure does not operate as a waiver in a Federal or State proceeding if:

(1) the disclosure is inadvertent;

(2) the holder of the privilege or protection took reasonable steps to prevent disclosure; and

(3) the holder promptly took reasonable steps to rectify the error, including (if applicable) following Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 26(b)(5)(B).

(c) Disclosure Made in a State Proceeding.--When the disclosure is made in a State proceeding and is not the subject of a State-court order concerning waiver, the disclosure does not operate as a waiver in a Federal proceeding if the disclosure:

(1) would not be a waiver under this rule if it had been made in a Federal proceeding; or

(2) is not a waiver under the law of the State where the disclosure occurred.

(d) Controlling Effect of a Court Order.--A Federal court may order that the privilege or protection is not waived by disclosure connected with the litigation pending before the court--in which event the disclosure is also not a waiver in any other Federal or State proceeding.

(e) Controlling Effect of a Party Agreement.--An agreement on the effect of disclosure in a Federal proceeding is binding only on the parties to the agreement, unless it is incorporated into a court order.

(f) Controlling Effect of This Rule.--Notwithstanding Rules 101 and 1101, this rule applies to State proceedings and to Federal court-annexed and Federal court-mandated arbitration proceedings, in the circumstances set out in the rule.--And notwithstanding Rule 501, this rule applies even if State law provides the rule of decision.

(g) Definitions.--In this rule:

(1) "attorney-client privilege" means the protection that applicable law provides for confidential attorney-client communications; and

(2) "work-product protection" means the protection that applicable law provides for tangible material (or its intangible equivalent) prepared in anticipation of litigation or for trial.

(a) Opinion and reputation evidence of character.--The credibility of a witness may be attacked or supported by evidence in the form of opinion or reputation, but subject to these limitations: (1) the evidence may refer only to character for truthfulness or untruthfulness, and (2) evidence of truthful character is admissible only after the character of the witness for truthfulness has been attacked by opinion or reputation evidence or otherwise.

(b) Specific instances of conduct.--Specific instances of the conduct of a witness, for the purpose of attacking or supporting the witness' credibility, other than conviction of crime as provided in rule 609, may not be proved by extrinsic evidence. They may, however, in the discretion of the court, if probative of truthfulness or untruthfulness, be inquired into on cross-examination of the witness (1) concerning the witness' character for truthfulness or untruthfulness, or (2) concerning the character for truthfulness or untruthfulness of another witness as to which character the witness being cross-examined has testified.

The giving of testimony, whether by an accused or by any other witness, does not operate as a waiver of the accused's or the witness' privilege against self-incrimination when examined with respect to matters which relate only to credibility.

APPENDIX TO CHAPTER 4: FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE
ARTICLE VI. WITNESSES

1-4 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure Rule 609

Rule 609. Impeachment by Evidence of Conviction of Crime

(a) General rule.--For the purpose of attacking the character for truthfulness of a witness,

(1) evidence that a witness other than an accused has been convicted of a crime shall be admitted, subject to Rule 403, if the crime was punishable by death or imprisonment in excess of one year under the law under which the witness was convicted, and evidence that an accused has been convicted of such a crime shall be admitted if the court determines that the probative value of admitting this evidence outweighs its prejudicial effect to the accused; and

(2) evidence that any witness has been convicted of a crime shall be admitted regardless of the punishment, if it readily can be determined that establishing the elements of the crime required proof or admission of an act of dishonesty or false statement by the witness.

(b) Time limit.--Evidence of a conviction under this rule is not admissible if a period of more than ten years has elapsed since the date of the conviction or of the release of the witness from the confinement imposed for that conviction, whichever is the later date, unless the court determines, in the interests of justice, that the probative value of the conviction supported by specific facts and circumstances substantially outweighs its prejudicial effect. However, evidence of a conviction more than 10 years old as calculated herein, is not admissible unless the proponent gives to the adverse party sufficient advance written notice of intent to use such evidence to provide the adverse party with a fair opportunity to contest the use of such evidence.

(c) Effect of pardon, annulment, or certificate of rehabilitation.--Evidence of a conviction is not admissible under this rule if (1) the conviction has been the subject of a pardon, annulment, certificate of rehabilitation, or other equivalent procedure based on a finding of the rehabilitation of the person convicted, and that person has not been convicted of a subsequent crime that was punishable by death or imprisonment in excess of one year, or (2) the conviction has been the subject of a pardon, annulment, or other equivalent procedure based on a finding of innocence.

(d) Juvenile adjudications.--Evidence of juvenile adjudications is generally not admissible under this rule. The court may, however, in a criminal case allow evidence of a juvenile adjudication of a witness other than the accused if conviction of the offense would be admissible to attack the credibility of an adult and the court is satisfied that admission in evidence is necessary for a fair determination of the issue of guilt or innocence.

(e) Pendency of appeal.--The pendency of an appeal therefrom does not render evidence of a conviction inadmissible. Evidence of the pendency of an appeal is admissible.

(b) Scope of cross-examination.--Cross-examination should be limited to the subject matter of the direct examination and matters affecting the credibility of the witness. The court may, in the exercise of discretion, permit inquiry into additional matters as if on direct examination.

(c) Leading questions.--Leading questions should not be used on the direct examination of a witness except as may be necessary to develop the witness' testimony. Ordinarily leading questions should be permitted on cross-examination. When a party calls a hostile witness, an adverse party, or a witness identified with an adverse party, interrogation may be by leading questions.

(1) while testifying, or

(2) before testifying, if the court in its discretion determines it is necessary in the interests of justice, an adverse party is entitled to have the writing produced at the hearing, to inspect it, to cross-examine the witness thereon, and to introduce in evidence those portions which relate to the testimony of the witness. If it is claimed that the writing contains matters not related to the subject matter of the testimony the court shall examine the writing in camera, excise any portions not so related, and order delivery of the remainder to the party entitled thereto. Any portion withheld over objections shall be preserved and made available to the appellate court in the event of an appeal. If a writing is not produced or delivered pursuant to order under this rule, the court shall make any order justice requires, except that in criminal cases when the prosecution elects not to comply, the order shall be one striking the testimony or, if the court in its discretion determines that the interests of justice so require, declaring a mistrial.

Rule 703. Bases of Opinion Testimony by Experts

The facts or data in the particular case upon which an expert bases an opinion or inference may be those perceived by or made known to the expert at or before the hearing. If of a type reasonably relied upon by experts in the particular field in forming opinions or inferences upon the subject, the facts or data need not be admissible in evidence in order for the opinion or inference to be admitted. Facts or data that are otherwise inadmissible shall not be disclosed to the jury by the proponent of the opinion or inference unless the court determines that their probative value in assisting the jury to evaluate the expert's opinion substantially outweighs their prejudicial effect.

Rule 704. Opinion on Ultimate Issue

(a) Except as provided in subdivision (b), testimony in the form of an opinion or inference otherwise admissible is not objectionable because it embraces an ultimate issue to be decided by the trier of fact.

(b) No expert witness testifying with respect to the mental state or condition of a defendant in a criminal case may state an opinion or inference as to whether the defendant did or did not have the mental state or condition constituting an element of the crime charged or of a defense thereto. Such ultimate issues are matters for the trier of fact alone.

Rule 706. Court Appointed Experts

(a) Appointment.--The court may on its own motion or on the motion of any party enter an order to show cause why expert witnesses should not be appointed, and may request the parties to submit nominations. The court may appoint any expert witnesses agreed upon by the parties, and may appoint expert witnesses of its own selection. An expert witness shall not be appointed by the court unless the witness consents to act. A witness so appointed shall be informed of the witness' duties by the court in writing, a copy of which shall be filed with the clerk, or at a conference in which the parties shall have opportunity to participate. A witness so appointed shall advise the parties of the witness' findings, if any; the witness' deposition may be taken by any party; and the witness may be called to testify by the court or any party. The witness shall be subject to cross-examination by each party, including a party calling the witness.

(b) Compensation.--Expert witnesses so appointed are entitled to reasonable compensation in whatever sum the court may allow. The compensation thus fixed is payable from funds which may be provided by law in criminal cases and civil actions and proceedings involving just compensation under the fifth amendment. In other civil actions and proceedings the compensation shall be paid by the parties in such proportion and at such time as the court directs, and thereafter charged in like manner as other costs.

(c) Disclosure of appointment.--In the exercise of its discretion, the court may authorize disclosure to the jury of the fact that the court appointed the expert witness.

(d) Parties' experts of own selection.--Nothing in this rule limits the parties in calling expert witnesses of their own selection.

ARTICLE VIII. HEARSAY

1-4 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure Rule 801

Rule 801. Definitions

The following definitions apply under this article:

(a) Statement.--A "statement" is (1) an oral or written assertion or (2) nonverbal conduct of a person, if it is intended by the person as an assertion.

(b) Declarant.--A "declarant" is a person who makes a statement.

(c) Hearsay.--"Hearsay" is a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted.

(d) Statements which are not hearsay.--A statement is not hearsay if--

(1) Prior statement by witness. The declarant testifies at the trial or hearing and is subject to cross-examination concerning the statement, and the statement is (A) inconsistent with the declarant's testimony, and was given under oath subject to the penalty of perjury at a trial, hearing, or other proceeding, or in a deposition, or (B) consistent with the declarant's testimony and is offered to rebut an express or implied charge against the declarant of recent fabrication or improper influence or motive, or (C) one of identification of a person made after perceiving the person; or

(2) Admission by party-opponent. The statement is offered against a party and is

(A) the party's own statement, in either an individual or a representative capacity or

(B) a statement of which the party has manifested an adoption or belief in its truth, or

(C) a statement by a person authorized by the party to make a statement concerning the subject, or

(D) a statement by the party's agent or servant concerning a matter within the scope of the agency or employment, made during the existence of the relationship, or

(E) a statement by a coconspirator of a party during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy.

The contents of the statement shall be considered but are not alone sufficient to establish the declarant's authority under subdivision (C), the agency or employment relationship and scope thereof under subdivision (D), or the existence of the conspiracy and the participation therein of the declarant and the party against whom the statement is offered under subdivision (E).

ARTICLE VIII. HEARSAY

1-4 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure Rule 803

Rule 803. Hearsay Exceptions; Availability of Declarant Immaterial

The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule, even though the declarant is available as a witness:

(1) Present sense impression.--A statement describing or explaining an event or condition made while the declarant was perceiving the event or condition, or immediately thereafter.

(2) Excited utterance.--A statement relating to a startling event or condition made while the declarant was under the stress of excitement caused by the event or condition.

(3) Then existing mental, emotional, or physical condition.--A statement of the declarant's then existing state of mind, emotion, sensation, or physical condition (such as intent, plan, motive, design, mental feeling, pain, and bodily health), but not including a statement of memory or belief to prove the fact remembered or believed unless it relates to the execution, revocation, identification, or terms of declarant's will.

(4) Statements for purposes of medical diagnosis or treatment.--Statements made for purposes of medical diagnosis or treatment and describing medical history, or past or present symptoms, pain, or sensations, or the inception or general character of the cause or external source thereof insofar as reasonably pertinent to diagnosis or treatment.

(5) Recorded recollection.--A memorandum or record concerning a matter about which a witness once had knowledge but now has insufficient recollection to enable the witness to testify fully and accurately, shown to have been made or adopted by the witness when the matter was fresh in the witness' memory and to reflect that knowledge correctly. If admitted, the memorandum or record may be read into evidence but may not itself be received as an exhibit unless offered by an adverse party.

(6) Records of regularly conducted activity.--A memorandum, report, record, or data compilation, in any form, of acts, events, conditions, opinions, or diagnoses, made at or near the time by, or from information transmitted by, a person with knowledge, if kept in the course of a regularly conducted business activity, and if it was the regular practice of that business activity to make the memorandum, report, record or data compilation, all as shown by the testimony of the custodian or other qualified witness, or by certification that complies with Rule 902(11), Rule 902(12), or a statute permitting certification, unless the source of information or the method or circumstances of preparation indicate lack of trustworthiness. The term "business" as used in this paragraph includes business, institution, association, profession, occupation, and calling of every kind, whether or not conducted for profit.

(7) Absence of entry in records kept in accordance with the provisions of paragraph (6).--Evidence that a matter is not included in the memoranda reports, records, or data compilations, in any form, kept in accordance with the provisions of paragraph (6), to prove the nonoccurrence or nonexistence of the matter, if the matter was of a kind of which a memorandum, report, record, or data compilation was regularly made and preserved, unless the sources of information or other circumstances indicate lack of trustworthiness.

(8) Public records and reports.--Records, reports, statements, or data compilations, in any form, of public offices or agencies, setting forth (A) the activities of the office or agency, or (B) matters observed pursuant to duty imposed by law as to which matters there was a duty to report, excluding, however, in criminal cases matters observed by police officers and other law enforcement personnel, or (C) in civil actions and proceedings and against the Government in criminal cases, factual findings resulting from an investigation made pursuant to authority granted by law, unless the sources of information or other circumstances indicate lack of trustworthiness.

(9) Records of vital statistics.--Records or data compilations, in any form, of births, fetal deaths, deaths, or marriages, if the report thereof was made to a public office pursuant to requirements of law.

(10) Absence of public record or entry.--To prove the absence of a record, report, statement, or data compilation, in any form, or the nonoccurrence or nonexistence of a matter of which a record, report, statement, or data compilation, in any form, was regularly made and preserved by a public office or agency, evidence in the form of a certification in accordance with Rule 902, or testimony, that diligent search failed to disclose the record, report, statement, or data compilation, or entry.

(11) Records of religious organizations.--Statements of births, marriages, divorces, deaths, legitimacy, ancestry, relationship by blood or marriage, or other similar facts of personal or family history, contained in a regularly kept record of a religious organization.

(12) Marriage, baptismal, and similar certificates.--Statements of fact contained in a certificate that the maker performed a marriage or other ceremony or administered a sacrament, made by a clergyman, public official, or other person authorized by the rules or practices of a religious organization or by law to perform the act certified, and purporting to have been issued at the time of the act or within a reasonable time thereafter.

(13) Family records.--Statements of fact concerning personal or family history contained in family Bibles, genealogies, charts, engravings on rings, inscriptions on family portraits, engravings on urns, crypts, or tombstones, or the like.

(14) Records of documents affecting an interest in property.--The record of a document purporting to establish or affect an interest in property, as proof of the content of the original recorded document and its execution and delivery by each person by whom it purports to have been executed, if the record is a record of a public office and an applicable statute authorizes the recording of documents of that kind in that office.

(15) Statements in documents affecting an interest in property.--A statement contained in a document purporting to establish or affect an interest in property if the matter stated was relevant to the purpose of the document, unless dealings with the property since the document was made have been inconsistent with the truth of the statement or the purport of the document.

(16) Statements in ancient documents.--Statements in a document in existence twenty years or more the authenticity of which is established.

(17) Market reports, commercial publications.--Market quotations, tabulations, lists, directories, or other published compilations, generally used and relied upon by the public or by persons in particular occupations.

(18) Learned treatises.--To the extent called to the attention of an expert witness upon cross-examination or relied upon by the expert witness in direct examination, statements contained in published treatises, periodicals, or pamphlets on a subject of history, medicine, or other science or art, established as a reliable authority by the testimony or admission of the witness or by other expert testimony or by judicial notice. If admitted, the statements may be read into evidence but may not be received as exhibits.

(19) Reputation concerning personal or family history.--Reputation among members of a person's family by blood, adoption, or marriage, or among a person's associates, or in the community, concerning a person's birth, adoption, marriage, divorce, death, legitimacy, relationship by blood, adoption, or marriage, ancestry, or other similar fact of personal or family history.

(20) Reputation concerning boundaries or general history.--Reputation in a community, arising before the controversy, as to boundaries of or customs affecting lands in the community, and reputation as to events of general history important to the community or State or nation in which located.

(21) Reputation as to character.--Reputation of a person's character among associates or in the community.

(22) Judgment of previous conviction.--Evidence of a final judgment, entered after a trial or upon a plea of guilty (but not upon a plea of nolo contendere), adjudging a person guilty of a crime punishable by death or imprisonment in excess of one year, to prove any fact essential to sustain the judgment, but not including, when offered by the Government in a criminal prosecution for purposes other than impeachment, judgments against persons other than the accused. The pendency of an appeal may be shown but does not affect admissibility.

(23) Judgment as to personal, family or general history, or boundaries.--Judgments as proof of matters of personal, family or general history, or boundaries, essential to the judgment, if the same would be provable by evidence of reputation.

APPENDIX TO CHAPTER 4: FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE
ARTICLE VIII. HEARSAY

1-4 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure Rule 804

Rule 804. Hearsay Exceptions; Declarant Unavailable

(a) Definition of unavailability.--"Unavailability as a witness" includes situations in which the declarant--

(1) is exempted by ruling of the court on the ground of privilege from testifying concerning the subject matter of the declarant's statement; or

(2) persists in refusing to testify concerning the subject matter of the declarant's statement despite an order of the court to do so; or

(3) testifies to a lack of memory of the subject matter of the declarant's statement; or

(4) is unable to be present or to testify at the hearing because of death or then existing physical or mental illness or infirmity; or

(5) is absent from the hearing and the proponent of a statement has been unable to procure the declarant's attendance (or in the case of a hearsay exception under subdivision (b)(2), (3), or (4), the declarant's attendance or testimony) by process or other reasonable means.

A declarant is not unavailable as a witness if exemption, refusal, claim of lack of memory, inability, or absence is due to the procurement or wrongdoing of the proponent of a statement for the purpose of preventing the witness from attending or testifying.

(b) Hearsay exceptions.--The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule if the declarant is unavailable as a witness:

(1) Former testimony.--Testimony given as a witness at another hearing of the same or a different proceeding, or in a deposition taken in compliance with law in the course of the same or another proceeding, if the party against whom the testimony is now offered, or, in a civil action or proceeding, a predecessor in interest, had an opportunity and similar motive to develop the testimony by direct, cross, or redirect examination.

(2) Statement under belief of impending death.--In a prosecution for homicide or in a civil action or proceeding, a statement made by a declarant while believing that the declarant's death was imminent, concerning the cause or circumstances of what the declarant believed to be impending death.

(3) Statement against interest.--A statement that:

(A) a reasonable person in the declarant's position would have made only if the person believed it to be true because, when made, it was so contrary to the declarant's proprietary or pecuniary interest or had so great a tendency to invalidate the declarant's claim against someone else or to expose the declarant to civil or criminal liability; and

(B) is supported by corroborating circumstances that clearly indicate its trustworthiness, if it is offered in a criminal case as one that tends to expose the declarant to criminal liability.

(4) Statement of personal or family history.--(A) A statement concerning the declarant's own birth, adoption, marriage, divorce, legitimacy, relationship by blood, adoption, or marriage, ancestry, or other similar fact of personal or family history, even though declarant had no means of acquiring personal knowledge of the matter stated; or (B) a statement concerning the foregoing matters, and death also, of another person, if the declarant was related to the other by blood, adoption, or marriage or was so intimately associated with the other's family as to be likely to have accurate information concerning the matter declared.

(5) [Transferred to Rule 807]

(6) Forfeiture by wrongdoing.--A statement offered against a party that has engaged or acquiesced in wrongdoing that was intended to, and did, procure the unavailability of the declarant as a witness.

When a hearsay statement, or a statement defined in Rule 801(d)(2)(C), (D), or (E), has been admitted in evidence, the credibility of the declarant may be attacked, and if attacked may be supported, by any evidence which would be admissible for those purposes if declarant had testified as a witness. Evidence of a statement or conduct by the declarant at any time, inconsistent with the declarant's hearsay statement, is not subject to any requirement that the declarant may have been afforded an opportunity to deny or explain. If the party against whom a hearsay statement has been admitted calls the declarant as a witness, the party is entitled to examine the declarant on the statement as if under cross-examination.

A statement not specifically covered by Rule 803 or 804 but having equivalent circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness, is not excluded by the hearsay rule, if the court determines that (A) the statement is offered as evidence of a material fact; (B) the statement is more probative on the point for which it is offered than any other evidence which the proponent can procure through reasonable efforts; and (C) the general purposes of these rules and the interests of justice will best be served by admission of the statement into evidence. However, a statement may not be admitted under this exception unless the proponent of it makes known to the adverse party sufficiently in advance of the trial or hearing to provide the adverse party with a fair opportunity to prepare to meet it, the proponent's intention to offer the statement and the particulars of it, including the name and address of the declarant.

1-4 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure Rule 901

Rule 901. Requirement of Authentication or Identification

(a) General provision.--The requirement of authentication or identification as a condition precedent to admissibility is satisfied by evidence sufficient to support a finding that the matter in question is what its proponent claims.

(b) Illustrations.--By way of illustration only, and not by way of limitation, the following are examples of authentication or identification conforming with the requirements of this rule:

(1) Testimony of witness with knowledge.--Testimony that a matter is what it is claimed to be.

(2) Nonexpert opinion on handwriting.--Nonexpert opinion as to the genuineness of handwriting, based upon familiarity not acquired for purposes of the litigation.

(3) Comparison by trier or expert witness.--Comparison by the trier of fact or by expert witnesses with specimens which have been authenticated.

(4) Distinctive characteristics and the like.--Appearance, contents, substance, internal patterns, or other distinctive characteristics, taken in conjunction with circumstances.

(5) Voice identification.--Identification of a voice, whether heard firsthand or through mechanical or electronic transmission or recording, by opinion based upon hearing the voice at any time under circumstances connecting it with the alleged speaker.

(6) Telephone conversations.--Telephone conversations, by evidence that a call was made to the number assigned at the time by the telephone company to a particular person or business, if (A) in the case of a person, circumstances, including self-identification, show the person answering to be the one called, or (B) in the case of a business, the call was made to a place of business and the conversation related to business reasonably transacted over the telephone.

(7) Public records or reports.--Evidence that a writing authorized by law to be recorded or filed and in fact recorded or filed in a public office, or a purported public record, report, statement, or data compilation, in any form, is from the public office where items of this nature are kept.

(8) Ancient documents or data compilation.--Evidence that a document or data compilation, in any form, (A) is in such condition as to create no suspicion concerning its authenticity, (B) was in a place where it, if authentic, would likely be, and (C) has been in existence 20 years or more at the time it is offered.

(9) Process or system.--Evidence describing a process or system used to produce a result and showing that the process or system produces an accurate result.

(10) Methods provided by statute or rule.--Any method of authentication or identification provided by Act of Congress or by other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority.

ARTICLE IX. AUTHENTICATION AND IDENTIFICATION

1-4 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure Rule 902

Rule 902. Self-Authentication

Extrinsic evidence of authenticity as a condition precedent to admissibility is not required with respect to the following:

(1) Domestic public documents under seal.--A document bearing a seal purporting to be that of the United States, or of any State, district, Commonwealth, territory, or insular possession thereof, or the Panama Canal Zone, or the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, or of a political subdivision, department, officer, or agency thereof, and a signature purporting to be an attestation or execution.

(2) Domestic public documents not under seal.--A document purporting to bear the signature in the official capacity of an officer or employee of any entity included in paragraph (1) hereof, having no seal, if a public officer having a seal and having official duties in the district or political subdivision of the officer or employee certifies under seal that the signer has the official capacity and that the signature is genuine.

(3) Foreign public documents.--A document purporting to be executed or attested in an official capacity by a person authorized by the laws of a foreign country to make the execution or attestation, and accompanied by a final certification as to the genuineness of the signature and official position (A) of the executing or attesting person, or (B) of any foreign official whose certificate of genuineness of signature and official position relates to the execution or attestation or is in a chain of certificates of genuineness of signature and official position relating to the execution or attestation. A final certification may be made by a secretary of an embassy or legation, consul general, consul, vice consul, or consular agent of the United States, or a diplomatic or consular official of the foreign country assigned or accredited to the United States. If reasonable opportunity has been given to all parties to investigate the authenticity and accuracy of official documents, the court may, for good cause shown, order that they be treated as presumptively authentic without final certification or permit them to be evidenced by an attested summary with or without final certification.

(4) Certified copies of public records.--A copy of an official record or report or entry therein, or of a document authorized by law to be recorded or filed and actually recorded or filed in a public office, including data compilations in any form, certified as correct by the custodian or other person authorized to make the certification, by certificate complying with paragraph (1), (2), or (3) of this rule or complying with any Act of Congress or rule prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority.

(5) Official publications.--Books, pamphlets, or other publications purporting to be issued by public authority.

(6) Newspapers and periodicals.--Printed materials purporting to be newspapers or periodicals.

(7) Trade inscriptions and the like.--Inscriptions, signs, tags, or labels purporting to have been affixed in the course of business and indicating ownership, control, or origin.

(8) Acknowledged documents.--Documents accompanied by a certificate of acknowledgment executed in the manner provided by law by a notary public or other officer authorized by law to take acknowledgments.

(9) Commercial paper and related documents.--Commercial paper, signatures thereon, and documents relating thereto to the extent provided by general commercial law.

(10) Presumptions under Acts of Congress.--Any signature, document, or other matter declared by Act of Congress to be presumptively or prima facie genuine or authentic.

(11) Certified domestic records of regularly conducted activity.--The original or a duplicate of a domestic record of regularly conducted activity that would be admissible under Rule 803(6) if accompanied by a written declaration of its custodian or other qualified person, in a manner complying with any Act of Congress or rule prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority, certifying that the record--

(A) was made at or near the time of the occurrence of the matters set forth by, or from information transmitted by, a person with knowledge of those matters;

(B) was kept in the course of the regularly conducted activity; and

(C) was made by the regularly conducted activity as a regular practice.

A party intending to offer a record into evidence under this paragraph must provide written notice of that intention to all adverse parties, and must make the record and declaration available for inspection sufficiently in advance of their offer into evidence to provide an adverse party with a fair opportunity to challenge them.

(12) Certified foreign records of regularly conducted activity.--In a civil case, the original or a duplicate of a foreign record of regularly conducted activity that would be admissible under Rule 803(6) if accompanied by a written declaration by its custodian or other qualified person certifying that the record--

(A) was made at or near the time of the occurrence of the matters set forth by, or from information transmitted by, a person with knowledge of those matters;

(B) was kept in the course of the regularly conducted activity; and

(C) was made by the regularly conducted activity as a regular practice.

The declaration must be signed in a manner that, if falsely made, would subject the maker to criminal penalty under the laws of the country where the declaration is signed. A party intending to offer a record into evidence under this paragraph must provide written notice of that intention to all adverse parties, and must make the record and declaration available for inspection sufficiently in advance of their offer into evidence to provide an adverse party with a fair opportunity to challenge them.

For purposes of this article the following definitions are applicable:

(1) Writings and recordings.--"Writings" and "recordings" consist of letters, words, or numbers, or their equivalent, set down by handwriting, typewriting, printing, photostating, photographing, magnetic impulse, mechanical or electronic recording, or other form of data compilation.

(2) Photographs.--"Photographs" include still photographs, X-ray films, video tapes, and motion pictures.

(3) Original.--An "original" of a writing or recording is the writing or recording itself or any counterpart intended to have the same effect by a person executing or issuing it. An "original" of a photograph includes the negative or any print therefrom. If data are stored in a computer or similar device, any printout or other output readable by sight, shown to reflect the data accurately, is an "original."

(4) Duplicate.--A "duplicate" is a counterpart produced by the same impression as the original, or from the same matrix, or by means of photography, including enlargements and miniatures, or by mechanical or electronic re-recording, or by chemical reproduction, or by other equivalent techniques which accurately reproduces the original.

Rule 1101. Applicability of Rules

(a) Courts and judges.--These rules apply to the United States district courts, the District Court of Guam, the District Court of the Virgin Islands, the District Court for the Northern Mariana Islands, the United States courts of appeals, the United States Claims Court, and to the United States bankruptcy judges and United States magistrate judges, in the actions, cases, and proceedings and to the extent hereinafter set forth. The terms "judge" and "court" in these rules include United States bankruptcy judges and United States magistrate judges.

(b) Proceedings generally.--These rules apply generally to civil actions and proceedings, including admiralty and maritime cases, to criminal cases and proceedings, to contempt proceedings except those in which the court may act summarily, and to proceedings and cases under title 11, United States Code.

(c) Rule of privilege.--The rule with respect to privileges applies at all stages of all actions, cases, and proceedings.

(d) Rules inapplicable.--The rules (other than with respect to privileges) do not apply in the following situations:

(1) Preliminary questions of fact.--The determination of questions of fact preliminary to admissibility of evidence when the issue is to be determined by the court under rule 104.

(2) Grand jury.--Proceedings before grand juries.

(3) Miscellaneous proceedings.--Proceedings for extradition or rendition; preliminary examinations in criminal cases; sentencing, or granting or revoking probation; issuance of warrants for arrest, criminal summonses, and search warrants; and proceedings with respect to release on bail or otherwise.

(e) Rules applicable in part.--In the following proceedings these rules apply to the extent that matters of evidence are not provided for in the statutes which govern procedure therein or in other rules prescribed by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority: the trial of misdemeanors and other petty offenses before United States magistrate judge; review of agency actions when the facts are subject to trial de novo under section (2)(F) of title 5, United States Code; review of orders of the Secretary of Agriculture under section 2 of the Act entitled "An Act to authorize association of producers of agricultural products" approved February 18, 1922 (7 U.S.C. 292), and under section 6 and 7(c) of the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act, 1930 (7 U.S.C. 499f, 499g(c)); naturalization and revocation of naturalization under sections 310-318 of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1421-1429); prize proceedings in admiralty under sections 7651-7681 of title 10, United States Code; review of orders of the Secretary of the Interior under section 2 of the Act entitled "An Act authorizing associations of producers of aquatic products" approved June 25, 1934 (15 U.S.C. 522); review of orders of petroleum control boards under section 5 of the Act entitled "An act to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in petroleum and its products by prohibiting the shipment in such commerce of petroleum and its products produced in violation of State law, and for other purposes," approved February 22, 1935 (15 U.S.C. 715d); actions for fines, penalties, or forfeitures under part V of title IV of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1581-1624), or under the Anti-Smuggling Act (19 U.S.C. 1701-1711); criminal libel for condemnation, exclusion of imports, or other proceedings under the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act (21 U.S.C. 301-392); disputes between seamen under sections 4079, 4080, and 4081 of the Revised Statutes (22 U.S.C. 256-258); habeas corpus under sections 2241-2254 of title 28, United States Code; motions to vacate, set aside or correct sentence under section 2255 of title 28, United States Code; actions for penalties for refusal to transport destitute seamen under section 4578 of the Revised Statutes (46 U.S.C. 679); actions against the United States under the Act entitled "An Act authorizing suits against the United States in admiralty for damage caused by and salvage service rendered to public vessels belonging to the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1925 (46 U.S.C. 781-790), as implemented by section 7730 of title 10, United States Code.

PART II Jurisdiction; Venue; Removal
CHAPTER 5 ORIGINAL JURISDICTION OVER THE SUBJECT MATTER
PART I. BASICS OF SUBJECT MATTER JURISDICTION IN FEDERAL COURT

1-5 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 5.01

§ 5.01 Nature of Subject Matter Jurisdictionn*

[1] Definition of Subject Matter Jurisdiction

In the federal courts, "subject matter jurisdiction" is a court's statutory or constitutional power to adjudicate a case. n1 Specifically, subject matter jurisdiction is the authority of a federal court to hear a paticular claim for relief. It focuses on the power of the court to take a claim under consideration, rather than the procedure or the manner in which a claim is processed by the court. n2 In other words, subject matter jurisdiction refers to a court's power to hear and determine cases of the general class or category to which the proceedings in question belong; it constitutes the power to deal with the general subject involved in the action. n2.1

It is important to recognize that subject matter jurisdiction generally does not depend on whether the claimant has a valid claim; the claimant need only have an arguable claim of the type that the court has power to hear. Therefore, a federal district court has subject matter jurisdiction if the right of the claimant to recover will be sustained under one construction of the Constitution and laws of the United States and will be defeated under another construction. Only if the claim in the complaint clearly appears to be immaterial and made solely for the purpose of obtaining jurisdiction or if the claim is wholly insubstantial and frivolous will the court not have power to hear the case. n3

In the federal judicial system, the concepts of subject matter jurisdiction, personal jurisdiction, and venue address different aspects of the limitations on the authority of a court to hear a particular claim. Subject matter jurisdiction is concerned with the kinds of cases the federal district courts are authorized to decide, and the court's authority to hear a given type of case. In contrast, personal jurisdiction is a determination whether the court may adjudicate the rights of particular persons. n3.1 Finally, venue is concerned with the relationshipof the defendants and the events to the particular judicial district in which a case is brought. Like personal jurisdiction, venue relates to location and concerns the particular place where judicial authority may be exercised. n4

Another distinction that is important to the federal litigant regarding a court's capacity to act is the distinction between a court's subject matter jurisdiction and its power to grant relief. Thus, a court has "subject matter jurisdiction" when it has authority to hear the particular type of action; conversely, a court lacks subject matter jurisdiction if it does not have any authority to hear a particular claim for relief. On the other hand a court's "power" to grant relief is its authority, usually statutory, to order particular types and scopes of remedies in a proceeding when it already has subject matter jurisdiction. n5

[2] Distinction Between Subject Matter and Personal Jurisdiction

Subject matter jurisdiction and personal jurisdiction are both limitations on whether the court may adjudicate a claim. The requirement of subject matter jurisdiction means the constitutional authority of a federal court to hear a particular category of claim; therefore, a court has the duty on its own initiative to assess the issue of subject matter jurisdiction at every stage of the proceeding. n1

By contrast, "personal jurisdiction" is a determination whether the court may adjudicate the rights of particular persons regarding a particular claim, and may bind the persons by its adjudication, based on the persons' contacts with the forum of the court. n2 Service of process is the corollary requirement that creates the court's personal jurisdiction. In other words, a person amenable to the assertion of jurisdiction will not be subject to exercise of that jurisdiction until the person has been properly served. n3

Both that assertion of authority and the subsequent service must be statutorily and constitutionally permissible. Due process requires certain ties or contacts between a defendant and the forum which asserts jurisdiction. n4 Thus, personal jurisdiction exists to protect parties' constitutional rights, and, because that right is personal to the particular defendant, the right may be waived. n5

[3] Distinction Between Subject Matter Jurisdiction and Required Elements of Claim

Many federal statutes contain conditions that require a party to take some action before filing a claim for relief in court. However such conditions are not automatically jurisdictional prerequisites for the court. Rather, some such conditions are part of the elements of the claim to obtain relief. n1 The Supreme Court has stated a test to distinguish between a subject matter jurisdictional prerequisite and an element of a federal claim for relief. If Congress in a statute has not indicated that a statutory restriction on coverage is jurisdictional, the courts must deem the restriction as nonjurisdictional in character and hold that the restriction constitutes a necessary element of the claim for relief under the statute. A statutory restriction is deemed jurisdictional only if the statute clearly indicates that the restriction on a statute's scope is jurisdictional, otherwise speaks in jurisdictional terms, or specifically refers to the jurisdiction of the court. n2 In its determination of whether a condition is jurisdictional, the court's analysis focuses on the "legal character" of the requirement, which the court determines by looking to the condition's text, context, and relevant historical treatment. n3

There are several important ramifications of the determination whether a condition is a required element of a claim or is a jurisdictional prerequisite. If a statutory requirement is merely an element of the substantive adequacy of a party's statutory claim, rather than a jurisdictional requirement, a failure of that element does not nullify the court's authority to hear the claim. Next, while the court must decide facts necessary to establish jurisdiction, a party may have a right to a jury determination of the facts related to elements of the claim. Additionally, the lack of a required element of a claim may not be raised at any stage, but must be asserted before trial on the merits. Finally, failure to establish a required element may be waived by an opposition party if the party does not raise the issue in a timely manner. n4

CHAPTER 5 ORIGINAL JURISDICTION OVER THE SUBJECT MATTER
PART I. BASICS OF SUBJECT MATTER JURISDICTION IN FEDERAL COURT

1-5 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 5.02

§ 5.02 Subject Matter Jurisdiction is Absolute Requirementn*

[1] Subject Matter Jurisdiction Is Prerequisite to Authority of Court to Hear Case

The subject matter jurisdiction of the court must be established as a threshold matter; this requirement is inflexible and without exception. n1 Subject matterjurisdiction is a critical and necessary element of any action brought in a federal court because federal courts are courts of limited subject matter jurisdiction. n2 Because it is an absolute restriction on the courts power to hear a case, federal subject matter jurisdiction is an issue that may not be waived. Furthermore, all courts have an independent obligation to ensure that they have subject matter jurisdiction at all stages of the proceedings, even at late stages, including after a jury verdict has been reached and after judgment. When a federal court concludes that it lacks subject-matter jurisdiction, the court must dismiss the complaint in its entirety. n3

A party requesting the district court's original jurisdiction has the duty of affirmatively alleging the existence of jurisdiction. n4 If those jurisdictional allegations are properly controverted by an opposing party, the party requesting jurisdiction also has the burden of establishing jurisdiction. n5 If federal subject matter jurisdiction is lacking, jurisdiction may not be created by the consent of the parties, n6 nor through principles of estoppel. n7 The requirement of subject matter jurisdiction is so absolute that even the party who originally requested the federal court's jurisdiction may raise a lack of federal jurisdiction, and even after a trial on the merits. n8 Additionally, nonparties as well as parties to an action have the right to object to the court's jurisdiction.

[2] Court's Determination of Subject Matter Jurisdiction

The district court must generally determine jurisdiction questions first, because they are prerequisites that determine the court's authority to hear the case. n1 Also, the court should decide subject matter jurisdictional issues first before questions of personal jurisdiction. This, however, does not mean that the court need decide the subject matter issue at all, if it is more efficient to dispose of the case on the grounds that it does not have personal jurisdiction. n2 Thus, the district court has discretion to determine personal jurisdiction before subject matter jurisdiction when the personal jurisdiction issue presents no complex question of state law, and the alleged defect in subject matter jurisdiction raises a difficult and novel question. n3

The question of subject matter jurisdiction may be raised either by motion n4 or in a responsive pleading. n5

Furthermore, the issue may be raised at any stage of the litigation, because under Rule 12(h)(3), whenever it appears by suggestion of the parties or otherwise that the court lacks jurisdiction over the subject matter, the court must dismiss the complaint in its entirety. n6 Thus, even the circuit court of appeals may examine the basis for federal jurisdiction and dismiss an action on its own motion. n7

[3] Hypothetical Jurisdiction Invalid

The Supreme Court has rejected the doctrine of "hypothetical jurisdiction," n1 which several courts of appeals had used to proceed immediately to determine the merits of a case, despite constitutional jurisdictional objections, at least when the merits question was more readily resolved than the jurisdictional question and when the prevailing party on the merits would be the same as the prevailing party if jurisdiction were denied. n2 The Court stated that the doctrine of hypothetical jurisdiction carries the courts beyond the bounds of authorized judicial action, and offends fundamental separation-of-powers principles. The doctrine is also contradictory to a long line of cases in which the Supreme Court held that without proper jurisdiction a court may not proceed at all but may only note the jurisdictional defect and dismiss the suit. Furthermore, for a court to interpret a law's meaning or constitutionality when it has no jurisdiction to do so is, by definition, an ultra vires act. n3 Because of the constitutional importance of the requirement of subject matter jurisdiction, the Supreme court rejected the doctrine of hypothetical jurisdiction despite the fact that the lower courts had used the doctrine for laudable purposes, such as, to avoid difficult and sweeping jurisdictional questions when it was clear that the claim was without merit. n4

However, some circuits have held that the Supreme Court decision in Steel Co. still permits a court to use "hypothetical jurisdiction" when the bypassed jurisdictional question is merely statutory jurisdiction, rather than constitutional Article III jurisdiction, and when its use would allow easy resolution of a case against the party relying on subject matter jurisdiction. n5 It should also be noted that the Supreme Court's rejection of the doctrine of hypothetical jurisdiction does not effect the established principle that the lack of subject matter jurisdiction does not nullify a district court's judicial powerto enforce its own rules and conduct of proceedings, and impose sanctions when appropriate. n6

CHAPTER 5 ORIGINAL JURISDICTION OVER THE SUBJECT MATTER
PART I. BASICS OF SUBJECT MATTER JURISDICTION IN FEDERAL COURT

1-5 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 5.03

§ 5.03 Federal Court's Limited Subject Matter Jurisdictionn*

[1] Limited Nature of Federal Court Jurisdiction

Federal courts are courts of limited jurisdiction, rather than general jurisdiction. This means that the jurisdiction of each federal court is only that particular jurisdiction specified in the Constitution or in particular federal statutes. n1 Unlike state courts, which typically have general subject matter jurisdiction, giving each court the authority to adjudicate a broad spectrum of types of cases, n2 n3 Article III of the Constitution, as well as federal statutes, limit federal court jurisdiction to specific applicability. n4

Article III of the Constitution n5 provides for a single Supreme Court n6 and authorizes, but does not require, Congress to create inferior federal courts. n7 Congress has exercised this constitutional authority by creating a system of trial courts known as District Courts n8 and intermediate courts of appeals known as United States Courts of Appeals. n9 These courts are referred to as "Article III" courts, and their jurisdiction as Article III jurisdiction. n10 Many of the more populous states have more than one federal district court, n11 which are divided into geographical regions such as the Southern and Eastern Districts of New York. n12 Additionally, some of the federal district courts have divisions within the district. n13

The original subject matter jurisdiction of federal courts is limited to two types of claims: "federal questions," which are those claims arising under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States, n14 and claims involving an amount in controversy exceeding $75,000 and parties who are not citizens of the same state. n15 These types of jurisdiction are discussed in detail in PART II n16 and Part III of this chapter. n17

In contrast to the federal courts, states courts typically have general subject matter jurisdiction. Thus, state courts have original jurisdiction over actions arising under both the common law and claims created by state statutes, and also have jurisdiction over most kinds of actions arising under federal law. n18 Additionally, state courts are competent to adjudicate federal claims pleaded in a state complaint. n19 Congress, however, has authority to deny state courts jurisdiction over particular, federal question claims, n20 or to allocate jurisdiction between federal and state courts. n21 For a discussion of the jurisdictional issues in the dual federal-state court system--when state courts and federal courts have concurrent subject matter jurisdiction--and when federal courts have exclusive subject matter jurisdiction over claims or causes of action, see Ch. 1, Federal Courts, and Ch. 2, Concurrent and Conflicting Jurisdiction.

[2] Original Subject Matter Jurisdiction of Supreme Court

The Supreme Court has original, exclusive jurisdiction over any controversy between two or more states. n1

Although Congress does not have the power to enlarge or reduce the scope of such original jurisdiction expressly conferred on the Supreme Court by the Constitution, n2 Congress may grant original jurisdiction to inferior courts that is concurrent with that of the Supreme Court. n3 Therefore, the United States Supreme Court has original, but not exclusive, jurisdiction over the following actions: n4

1. An action in which an ambassador, public minister, consul, or vice consul of a foreign country is a party. Federal district courts also have original jurisdiction over such cases but not state courts. n5

2. An action between the United States and a state. Federal district courts have concurrent original jurisdiction over such cases. n6

3. Any action or proceeding by a state against a citizen of another state or against an alien. n7

In contrast to original subject matter jurisdiction, the United States Supreme Court generally has appellate jurisdiction over all cases subject to federal judicial power, subject to exceptions made by Congress. n8 Congress has provided for the exercise of the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction by means of writ of certiorari, n9 which is a discretionary appeal heard by the Supreme Court when at least four justices vote to grant the writ of certiorari. n10

[3] Original Subject Matter Jurisdiction of Lower Federal Courts

[a] Congressional Grant of Subject Matter Jurisdiction

The Constitution gives federal judicial power to the Supreme Court and to whatever inferior courts Congress may establish. n1 Under the federal system, Congress has authority to limit the jurisdiction of whatever inferior federal courts it decides to establish. n2 A federal statute limiting an inferior court's jurisdiction does not conflict with the Constitution unless it attempts to confer powers not granted by the Constitution. n3

In the exercise of its authority, Congress has provided that the federal "district courts" have original federal question jurisdiction and diversity jurisdiction. Federal question jurisdiction is jurisdiction over actions arising under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States. n4 In addition to the general grant of federal question jurisdiction, particular federal statutes expressly provide that district courts have original jurisdiction over any claims involving or arising under those statutes. n5 For example, one express type of federal question jurisdiction is the district court's jurisdiction over bankruptcy cases. n6 The federal question subject matter jurisdiction of federal district courts is discussed in detail in PART II if this Chapter. n7

Congress has also provided that the federal district courts have jurisdiction over certain civil actions that do not arise under federal law, but that involve citizens of different states, or citizens of the United States and aliens or foreign subjects, provided that the amount in controversy exceeds $75,000. n8 For further discussion of diversity jurisdiction and its requirements, see PART III of this Chapter. n9

Finally, Congress has also provided that a federal district court that has original jurisdiction over a civil action also may exercise "supplemental jurisdiction" of all other claims that are part of the same case or controversy under Article III of the Constitution, including claims involving the joinder or intervention of additional parties. n10 A district court's exercise of supplemental jurisdiction is discretionary, and a district court may decline to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over a claim if any one of several reasons applies, n11 such as, if a state-law claim substantially predominates over the claim or claims that are the basis for the federal court's original jurisdiction. n12 For further discussion of supplemental jurisdiction and its requirements, see PART IV of this Chapter. n13

In the exercise of its authority, Congress has also created intermediate courts known as "United States Courts of Appeals." n14 The jurisdiction of these courts is limited to appellate jurisdiction, not original review of district court decisions. n15

[b] Court's Abstention From Subject Matter Jurisdiction

In the event that duplicative litigation has been filed in both state and federal court, the federal court in certain circumstances may decline to exercise its jurisdiction, thus permitting the state court to proceed with the litigation. In this regard, "abstention" refers to a group of doctrines by which a federal court may decline to exercise its otherwise valid jurisdiction, and to either stay or dismiss federal litigation, in deference to duplicative state court proceedings.

In summary, the federal courts have a general obligation to exercise the jurisdiction given the courts by Congress, except under the following five recognized abstention doctrines:

1. A federal court may abstain when the case may be disposed of on an interpretation of unclear state law rather than a federal constitutional issue. n16

2. Abstention is permitted when the district court has diversity jurisdiction over a case that presents a difficult question of unsettled state law that bears on policyproblems of substantial public import and whose importance transcends the result in the case. n17

3. A federal court may abstain from a case that involves unsettled state law when federal adjudication would disrupt a state's efforts to establish a rational administrative policy regarding a matter of substantial public concern. This doctrine is usually refereed to as administrative abstention. n18

4. Abstention is allowed when a federal court has jurisdiction over state criminal proceedings or other proceedings that are pending and that involve important state interests, provided that adequate relief is available in the state proceedings. n19

5. Abstention is permissible when there are concurrent state and federal suits, and abstention would promote sound judicial administration, including the conservation of judicial resources and the avoidance of piecemeal litigation. n20

For a detailed discussion of all of the abstention doctrines, see Ch. 2, Concurrent and Conflicting Jurisdiction.

PART II. SUBJECT MATTER JURISDICTION BASED ON FEDERAL QUESTION

§ 5.10 Nature of Federal Question Jurisdictionn*

[1] Definition of Federal Question Jurisdiction

The federal district courts have original jurisdiction over all civil actions that arise under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States. n1 The Constitution also defines the power of the judiciary; it extends to all cases, in law and equity, arising under the Constitution, the laws of the United States, and any treaties made or to be made in the future, under authority of the United States Constitution or laws. n2 Thus, "federal question jurisdiction" is the original jurisdiction given to the district court by the Constitution and Congress when a federal question is presented on the face of the plaintiff's properly pleaded complaint. n3

[2] Purposes of Federal Question Jurisdiction

There are several purposes for federal question jurisdiction. The primary purpose is to ensure the availability of a forum particularly suited to the vindication of federally created rights and to minimize the danger of hostility toward federally created rights. n1 Additionally, because the selection process for the appointment of federal judges generally ensures a minimum degree of competence, because federal judges are consistently exposed to issues of federal law, and because federal judges may often be more attuned to federal interests than are other judges, it is a widely held view that adjudication of cases arising under federal law is an important aspect of the work of the federal courts. n2

Another purpose of federal question jurisdiction in the dual state-federal system of government is to prevent federal judicial erosion. It allows each system to proceed independently of the other, with ultimate review in the United States Supreme Court of the federal questions raised in either system. The independence of state courts would be compromised if every adverse decision in state court merely "rang the opening bell" for federal litigation on the same issues. n3 A federal forum is also important when substantial federal question of great federal interest are presented, even when raised by a complaint framed in terms of state law, provided that resolution of the federal question is necessary to the resolution of the state-law claim. n4

[3] Federal Question Jurisdiction Not Necessarily Exclusive

Exclusive original federal jurisdiction means that the federal courts alone may hear a case. n1 The mere fact that a court has federal question jurisdiction does not necessarily mean that jurisdiction is exclusively federal. Actually, the situations in which federal jurisdiction is exclusive are relatively rare. n2

In most cases, federal question jurisdiction is designed to provide the litigants with the option to go to federal court for the adjudication and protection of federal rights--for the plaintiff by means of a suit initiating the court's original jurisdiction under Section 1331 and for the defendant through the option of removal. n3 It is therefore generally the case that absent exclusive federal jurisdiction, a federal question case will be heard in state court only if both parties decline to exercise their option to go to federal court; the plaintiff through filing in federal court originally and the defendant through removal. n4

PART II. SUBJECT MATTER JURISDICTION BASED ON FEDERAL QUESTION

1-5 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 5.11

§ 5.11 Sources of Federal Question Jurisdictionn*

Article III of the Constitution provides that the federal courts have judicial power over all cases "arising under" the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States. n1 Congress has provided for original federal court jurisdiction over federal questions in extraordinarily similar language under the current federal question statute, which provides that the district courts shall have original jurisdiction over all civil actions arising under the Constitution, laws or treatiesof the United States. n2 However, despite the similarity between the Constitutional language and the statutory language, courts have consistently held that the general federal question statute is considerably narrower than that of the constitutional provision. n3 Therefore, the fact that Congress has the power to grant original jurisdiction does not mean that it has in fact exercised that power, and that exercise must be shown. Furthermore, it is generally acknowledged that Congress did not intend to exercise its full potential in enacting the general federal question statute. n4

In addition to the general grants of federal question jurisdiction made in the constitution and Section 1331, n5 the United States Code contains a number of statutory provisions that make specific grants of power to the federal courts. For example, the district courts have original jurisdiction over any civil action or proceeding arising under any congressional regulations affecting commerce or protecting trade and commerce against restraints and monopolies. n6

The jurisdiction conferred by these provisions may be referred to as special (rather than general) federal question jurisdiction. An action may be controlled by a special federal question jurisdiction statute in three ways: if (1) the plaintiff has filed a complaint for a remedy expressly granted by the particular federal statute; (2) the plaintiff asserts a claim requiring construction of the statute or, (3) the complaint presents a controversy in which a distinctive policy of a particular statute requires that federal principles control the disposition of the claim. n7 For example, in a copyright case, the court of appeals noted that the district court would have federal question jurisdiction over a copyright case in which the dispute concerned ownership by reason of one's status as a co-author of a joint work. Such jurisdiction arises directly from the terms of the Copyright Act itself, and is exclusively federal, unlike a case in which dispute as to copyright ownership arises under a contractual agreement between the parties--the latter case is controlled by state contract law. n8

PART II. SUBJECT MATTER JURISDICTION BASED ON FEDERAL QUESTION

1-5 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 5.12

§ 5.12 Requirements for Federal Question Jurisdictionn*

[1] Federal Law for Purposes of Federal Question Jurisdiction

[a] Constitutional Issues

The general federal question jurisdiction statute provides that federal district courts have original jurisdiction over civil actions arising under the Constitution of the United States. n1 A facial challenge to the constitutionality of a federal statute, for example, raises a federal question and gives the district court jurisdiction under Section 1331. n2 Similarly, a claim that a defendant's act or omission has violated the plaintiff's constitutional rights is supported by federal question jurisdiction under Section 1331. n3 In another example, when the Compact Clause of the Constitution n4 was used to federalize an interstate compact among state legislatures, it was held that federal question jurisdiction existed in a suit brought under the interstate compact. n5

All of the "provisions" of the Constitution, however, do not necessarily create a cause of action. The Full Faith and Credit Clause of the Constitution, n6 for example, does not give rise to federal-question claims and may not be the basis of federal question jurisdiction. Rather, the clause merely prescribes a rule to instruct the courts in determining what effect to give public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of the states. Therefore, reliance on the rule by a litigant does not establish a federal question arising under the Constitution. n7

[b] Federal Statutes

For purposes of the general federal question jurisdiction statute, "federal laws" include most federal statutes. A statute may create a private right of action that qualifies for federal question jurisdiction under Section 1331 either expressly or by implication. n8

A private cause of action may be implied from a federal statute provided that (1) the plaintiff is a member of the class for whose benefit the statute was enacted,(2) Congress intended to create a private right of action, (3) a private right of action is consistent with the underlying purpose of the legislative scheme, and (4) the matter is not traditionally relegated to state law. n9 Thus, when the statutory language is not explicit, it is presumed that in exercising its regulatory authority, Congress did not intend to shift from the state to the federal courts extensive topics of private litigation; to rebut the presumption, reasonably reliable evidence must be shown that this was the intention of Congress. n10

Congressional intent is the dominant factor and may be inferred from the language of the statute, the statutory structure, or some other source. n11

Not all federal statutes come within the purview of Section 1331. Thus, general federal question jurisdiction under Section 1331 does not extend to cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, because admiralty and maritime issues are a separate category of federal judicial power granted by Article III, n12 and is entirely distinct from "arising under" jurisdiction. n13 In this regard, many statutes provide their own independent source of original federal subject matter jurisdiction. Most of these special grants of jurisdiction n14 are made in United States Code Title 28, governing the judiciary and judicial procedure. These statutes include original district court jurisdiction for the following cases:

1. Any civil case of admiralty or maritime jurisdiction, including any prize brought into the United States and all proceedings for the condemnation of property taken as prize. n15

2. Bankruptcy cases and all civil proceedings that arise in relation to bankruptcy proceedings. n16

3. Any civil action or proceeding arising under any act of Congress regulating commerce or protecting trade and commerce against restraints and monopolies. n17

4. Orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission. n18

5. Actions that relate to the postal service. n19

6. Civil actions arising under the federal copyright and patent laws. n20

7. Certain actions relating to internal revenue taxes. n21

Specific grants of jurisdiction also appear in other titles of the Code, such as the Federal Employers' Liability Act, n22 the Jones Act, n23 the Labor Management Relations Act, n24 the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act, n25 and the Employee Retirement Income Security Act (ERISA). n26 The United States contains many other specific grants of jurisdiction, which are too numerous to list in detail. For further discussion of these special federal question jurisdiction statutes, see Moore's Federal Practice, Ch. 104, Specific Grants of Federal Question Jurisdiction . n27 For a discussion of statutes which grant jurisdiction to the district courts in cases involving the United States as a party, and cases by and against federal officers, n28 see Moore's Federal Practice, Ch. 105, Other Subject Matter Jurisdiction Statutes . n29

[c] Administrative Acts and Regulations

For purposes of federal question jurisdiction, federal law also includes the acts and regulations of administrative agencies, unless Congress has specifically exempted them from judicial review. n30 There is a strong presumption that Congress intended judicial review of administrative actions unless a contrary intent is clear from the statute or legislative history. n31

Specific procedures for private suits challenging federal agency action or inaction were established by the Administrative Procedure Act, which permits challenge to be brought in the district courts if a private party is adversely affected by final agency action claimed to be contrary to law. n32 Note, however, that aparticular claim need not necessarily be covered by the Administrative Procedure Act for a court to have federal question subject matter jurisdiction on the claim under Section 1331. n33

[d] Federal Common Law

Federal common law is considered a "law of the United States" for purposes of Section 1331. n34 Thus, the word "laws" has been construed to include laws created by federal judicial decisions as well as by congressional legislation. n35

The circumstances in which federal question jurisdiction may be premised on federal common law are limited. Unless a claim presents an issue requiring construction of an act of Congress or unless a distinctive policy of an act of Congress requires that federal principles control the disposition of a claim, there is no independent claim for jurisdiction under Section 1331. n36 Subject to the well-pleaded complaint rule, n37 however, federal common law will provide a jurisdictional basis if the plaintiff's claim will require the interpretation of a federal statute, even if the statute does not specifically provide for the cause of action asserted by the plaintiff. n38

Federal common law qualifies for purposes of Section 1331 essentially in two situations: when a federal rule of decision is necessary to protect uniquely federal interests and when Congress has given the courts the power to develop substantive law. n39"Uniquely federal interests" are present if there is an overriding federal interest in the need for a uniform rule of decision or if the controversy touches basic interests of federalism. n40 These unique federal interests are present only with respect to the rights and obligations of the United States, n41 interstate and international disputes implicating the conflicting rights of states, n42 or in relations with foreign nations. n43

[2] Claim Must Arise Under Federal Law

[a] Two Types of Federal Question Jurisdiction

A court does not have federal question jurisdiction over a claim unless the claim is one "arising under" federal law, n1 and the parties may dispute whether this requirement has been met. There are two tests under which an action may present a federal question. A claim arises under federal law within Section 1331 if it is apparent from the face of the complaint either that: n2 (1) a federal law creates the plaintiff's cause of action; n3 or (2) if a state law creates the cause of action, a federal law is a necessary element of the plaintiff's claim. n4 While the vast majority of federal question cases "arise under" either the Constitution, n5 a statute, n6 a treaty, n7 or federal regulations, n8 federal common law may also form the basis for federal question jurisdiction. n9

[b] Cause of Action Created by Federal Law

The first test to determine federal question jurisdiction asks whether federal law creates the cause of action. If federal law creates a cause of action, whether expressly or by implication, n10 federal question jurisdiction exists. n11 Under thistest, the court has federal question jurisdiction if the claim arises under either a federal statute or federal common law. n12 On the other hand, if a federal statute creates no private cause of action for a particular remedy, the federal courts have no subject matter jurisdiction to hear a case based on that statute. For example, because there is no private cause of action in federal court under the Telephone Consumer Protection Act n13 for receipt of an unsolicited facsimile advertisement, state courts have exclusive jurisdiction in such cases because the statute expressly mentions state court jurisdiction and is silent on the matter of federal jurisdiction. In the case, the Ninth Circuit held that the federal district court lacked federal question subject matter jurisdiction even if there is no private action available in a particular state's courts. n14

Note that mere fact that the action has its origin in federal law is not sufficient to create federal question jurisdiction--the cause of action must really and substantially involve a dispute or controversy respecting the validity, construction or effect of the federal law, on the determination of which the result depends. n15

[c] Cause of Action Created by State Law but Involves Significant Federal Right

The second test, used only when state law creates the cause of action, asks whether such a cause of action presents a substantial federal question. n16 This inquiry is more complicated than the creation test discuss in [b], above, n17 and there are several circumstances in which the federal question may arise. For example, if it appears from the plaintiff's pleadings that the right to relief on a state law claim depends on the construction or application of the Constitution or federal law, and that the federal claim is not merely colorable but rests on a reasonable foundation, there is federal question jurisdiction. n18

[3] Federal Question Must Be Substantial

In addition to showing that a suit "arises under" federal law for purposes of the federal question statute, the person invoking federal question jurisdiction must show that the issue of federal is "substantial." This means that the claim of federal law must not be so patently without merit that the allegation could be called insubstantial, implausible, or frivolous. n1 In other words, the suit may be dismissed for lack of federal question jurisdiction if the alleged federal claim clearly appears to be immaterial and made solely for purpose of obtaining jurisdiction, or if it is wholly insubstantial and frivolous. n2 While this requirement has always been deemed a jurisdictional prerequisite, such an inquiry in reality goes to the merits of the allegations in the pleadings. Thus, a dismissal for lack of substantiality is, for all practical purposes, equivalent to a dismissal for failure to state a claim on which relief may be granted. n3

PART II Jurisdiction; Venue; Removal
CHAPTER 5 ORIGINAL JURISDICTION OVER THE SUBJECT MATTER
PART II. SUBJECT MATTER JURISDICTION BASED ON FEDERAL QUESTION

1-5 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 5.13

§ 5.13 Well-Pleaded Complaint Rulen*

[1] Federal Question Must Appear in Plaintiff's Complaint

The presence or absence of federal question jurisdiction is governed by the "well-pleaded complaint" rule, which provides that federal jurisdiction exists only when a federal question is presented on the face of the plaintiff's properly pleaded complaint. n1 Thus, federal question jurisdiction existed when a well-pleaded complaint presented issues as to whether, under an agreement, a party had an obligation to the United States or the United States had certain rights. n2 The well-pleaded complaint rule means that a federal cause of action or question of federal law supporting federal question jurisdiction must be apparent from the face ofthe well-pleaded complaint and not from a defense or anticipated defense. n2.1 The United States Supreme Court has also held that a counterclaim, which appears as part of the defendant's answer and not as part of the plaintiff's complaint, may not serve as the basis for "arising under" federal question jurisdiction. Both of these corollaries of the rule further the longstanding policies underlying the well-pleaded complaint rule to provide the plaintiff the initial choice of forum and to preserve judicial resources. n3

Under the well-pleaded complaint rule, a plaintiff has the choice to initially avoid federal jurisdiction by relying exclusively on state law. However, the "well-pleaded" phrase in the rule provides that a plaintiff may not defeat federal court jurisdiction by intentionally omitting to plead necessary federal questions, because a defendant may remove a case to federal court if the court determines that the plaintiff has "artfully pleaded" n4 claims in an attempt to preclude federal jurisdiction, even though no federal question appears on the face of the plaintiff's complaint. n5

[2] Purpose of Rule

Until the plaintiff has presented a federal issue in a case, the federal court lacks authority even to require a response from the defendant. Thus, for example, federal jurisdiction may not be made to depend on the plaintiff's mere speculation that the defendant will raise a federal defense, because in so doing, the court may be required to expend resources in a case in which it will ultimately lack jurisdiction. n1 Another purpose of the well-pleaded complaint rule is to prevent the defendant from defeating the plaintiff's choice of forum. As the Supreme Court has said, the presence of a federal question in a defensive argument does not overcome the paramount policies embodied in the well-pleaded complaint rule that the plaintiff is the master of the complaint, that a federal question must appear on the face of the complaint, and that the plaintiff may, by forbearing claims based on federal law, choose to have the cause heard in state court. A defendant may not, merely by injecting a federal question into an action that asserts what is plainly a state-law claim, transform the action into one arising under federal law. n2

[3] Exceptions to Rule

[a] Two Exceptions

There are two exceptions to the well-pleaded complaint rule: (1) the complete preemption doctrine, which provides that when a statute preempts an area of state law, any claim purportedly based on that pre-empted state law is considered from its inception to arise under federal law; n1 and (2) the artful pleading doctrine, which provides that a plaintiff may not avoid federal court simply by omitting to plead a necessary federal question in the complaint; in the latter case, the necessary federal question will be deemed to be alleged in the complaint, giving the court federal question jurisdiction. n2

It has been said that the complete preemption doctrine is a specific application of the artful pleading doctrine. Both doctrines require the court to examine whether the complaint actually raises a federal issue even though the complaint does not state any federal claims on its face. n3 Thus, absent the exceptions of complete preemption or artful pleading, the plaintiff in a nondiversity action, as master of the complaint, may avoid federal subject matter jurisdiction by relying exclusively on state law. n4

[b] Complete Preemption Exception

The first exception to the well-pleaded complaint rule is the complete preemption doctrine, which provides that when Congress intends the preemptive force of a statute to be so extraordinary that it completely displaces an area of state law, any claim asserted under that pre-empted state law is considered a federal claim from its inception, and therefore actually arises under federal law. n5 Complete preemption applies only in the extremely limited circumstance that Congress intends in a particular area to supersede both the substantive and remedial provisions of state law and create a federal remedy for violation of the law that is exclusive, even when a claimant attempts to rely entirely on state law in state court. To date, the Supreme Court has found only three federal statutes to have this broad preemptive scope: the Labor Management Relations Act, the Employee Retirement Income and Security Act, and the National Bank Act for claims of usury against national banks. n6

Some courts have noted that the label of this exception is not entirely accurate, because the doctrine is not one of preemption, but rather one of federaljurisdiction. n7 n8 Furthermore, removal and preemption are two distinct concepts, and the fact that a claim may be preempted does not necessarily establish that it is covered by federal question jurisdiction. n9 A better term might be "jurisdictional preemption" n10 because it is a doctrine that not only preempts the substantive state law but also supports federal jurisdiction to address the issue regardless of the procedural context in which the matter is brought before the federal court. It should also be noted that a claim of ordinary preemption, as opposed to complete preemption (jurisdictional preemption), is not a defense to the well-pleaded complaint rule. n11"Ordinary preemption" is an affirmative defense to the allegations in a plaintiff's complaint asserting a state law claim claiming that a state law conflicts with, and is overridden by, a federal law. n11.1 On the other hand, complete preemption does not constitute a defense at all. Rather, it is a narrowly drawn jurisdictional rule for assessing federal removal jurisdiction when a complaint purports to raise only state law claims. n11.2 It looks beyond the complaint to determine if the suit is actually and entirely a matter of federal law, even if the state law would provide a cause of action in the absence of the federal law. Therefore, complete preemption creates the federal question jurisdiction requisite to removal of the claim to federal courts. n11.3

[c] Artful Pleading Exception

The second exception to the well-pleaded complaint rule is the artful pleading exception, in which plaintiff seeks to conceal the true federal nature of his or her claim through "artful pleading" that disguises the federal nature of the claim.

n11.4 Under the artful pleading exception, the plaintiff makes a claim, although ostensibly asserted under state law, that is in fact misrepresented in order to defeat defendant's right to a federal forum. n12 When a plaintiff seeks to conceal the true federal nature of its claim through artful pleading, the court will look beyond the complaint to determine whether a federal question persists which precludes remand to the state court. Otherwise, a plaintiff could artfully plead claims to avoid federal jurisdiction even when state law claims are completely preempted by federal law. n13

It should be noted that, under the artful pleading doctrine, federal courts have subject matter jurisdiction over purported state law claims if the plaintiff failed to plead a federal right or immunity that is an essential element of the plaintiff's cause of action. The doctrine does not apply to claims that are in fact state law claims, n13.1 and the court does not have federal jurisdiction over such claims, n14 unless some other theory is applicable, such as supplemental jurisdiction. n15

§ 5.30 Nature of Diversity Jurisdictionn*

As part of its authority to oversee the jurisdiction of federal courts, Congress has provided a federal forum for disputes between citizens of different states. n1 The purpose of the forum, known as diversity jurisdiction, is to provide a neutral forum for out-of-state parties who believe that they will be subjected to local prejudice if forced to litigate as strangers in a state court. n2 Thus, diversity jurisdiction was established to provide access to a competent and impartial tribunal, free from local prejudice or influence, for the determination of controversies between citizens of different states. n3

There are, however, qualifications to the concept of diversity jurisdiction; the most notable is that the federal court in a diversity case must apply the substantive law of the state in which it sits. n4 State law often involves issues about which federal judges lack expertise and over which they have no ultimate control. It could be argued that decisions in some diversity cases serve little purpose and could actually be counterproductive to the interests of federalism. n5

The federal courts may adjudicate diversity cases only because Article III, Section 2, of the Constitution extends federal judicial power to controversies between citizens of different states and to controversies between citizens of a state and foreign states, citizens, or subjects. n1 Because federal courts are courts of limited jurisdiction, jurisdiction is presumed not to exist absent proof by the party asserting it that it does. n2 Furthermore, diversity of citizenship must be "complete" with respect to the plaintiffs on the one hand and defendants on the other. n3 When challenged, this complete diversity must be proven by the facts as of the date an action is filed and by a preponderance of the evidence. n4

Before a court may exercise diversity jurisdiction two components must exist. First, the citizenship of all of the parties on one side of the lawsuit must be different from the citizenship of all of the parties on the opposite side. n1 This required component is known as diversity of citizenship n2 and is discussed in Part B, below. n3 The second requirement is that there must be a minimum amount in controversy in the suit, which is currently $75,000. n4 This required component is discussed in Part C, below. n5

1-5 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 5.50

§ 5.50 Requirements for Diversity of Citizenshipn*

[1] General Requirements

The state courts have a right to decide their own controversies--thus, the diversity statute must be strictly construed. n1 Any doubts are therefore resolved against finding diversity jurisdiction n2 and when the case has been removed to federal court, in favor of remand to the state court. n3 Because the parties may never waive limits on subject matter jurisdiction, a party does not waive the requirement of diversity jurisdiction by failing to challenge jurisdiction in theproceedings. n4 Similarly, all trial or appellate courts are required to raise lack of subject matter jurisdiction on their own motion. n5 The court must examine the status of the parties and make its own determination on the issue. n6

Because of the strict construction of the diversity statute, n7 the burden of proving all jurisdictional facts is on the party asserting federal court jurisdiction, n8 including the burden of proving that all of the requirements of complete diversity have been met at the time of the filing of the action. Therefore, when the opposition challenges diversity jurisdiction, the party invoking federal court jurisdiction must establish the citizenship of each real party in interest by factual allegations showing a preponderance of the evidence. A party's mere allegation of diversity does not satisfy its burden of establishing the district court's jurisdiction. To determine whether a party has adequately presented facts sufficient to establish federal diversity jurisdiction, the courts must look to the facts alleged in the complaint and ignore mere conclusory allegations of jurisdiction. n9

[2] Complete Diversity

Under the diversity statute, Congress has granted the district courts original jurisdiction for all civil actions in which the matter in controversy exceeds the of $75,000 and which is between the following parties: (1) citizens of different states; n1 (2) citizens of a state and citizens or subjects of a foreign state; n2 (3) citizens of different states and in which citizens or subjects of a foreign state are additional parties; n3 and (4) a foreign state as plaintiff and citizens of a state or different states. n4 For purposes of diversity jurisdiction, the term "states" includes the territories, the District of Columbia, and the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico. n5

Diversity jurisdiction requires complete diversity of citizenship, n6 which means that citizenship must be different between all plaintiffs, on the one hand, and all defendants, on the other hand, n7 as opposed to minimal diversity, which would require that only one plaintiff be a citizen of a different state from that of at least one defendant. n8 Parties may not waive the complete diversity requirement, either by formal waiver or by failing to object to its absence; waiver may not create diversity jurisdiction that is not otherwise present. n9

A complaint that includes some claims that fall within diversity jurisdiction and other claims that do not fall within diversity jurisdiction may not be removed to federal court by the defendant. Diversity is destroyed if any plaintiff has the same citizenship as any defendant. n10 Thus, a plaintiff may prevent removal simply by joining to the suit a defendant sharing the same state citizenship. The plaintiff may not, however, fraudulently join a non-diverse party by filing a frivolous or otherwise illegitimate claim against a nondiverse defendant solely to prevent removal. n11 For a complete discussion of removal, see Ch. 8, Removal From State Court.

[3] Party Requirements

[a] Real Parties Considered to Determine Diversity

Much of the litigation involving diversity jurisdiction relates to the citizenship of parties as individuals and as entities. For a discussion of the citizenship of individuals, see § 5.54. For a discussion of the citizenship of corporations and other entities, see § 5.55. In determining the existence of diversity of citizenship, the district court must disregard nominal n1 and formal parties, n2 and determine jurisdiction only with respect to the citizenship of real parties to the controversy. n3 In other words, a plaintiff must base diversity jurisdiction on the citizenship of real and substantial parties to the controversy. n4 A real party in interest is one who, according to applicable substantive law, has a right or duty sought to be enforced or enjoined. n5 In contrast to a real party in interest, a formal or nominal party is one who, in a genuine legal sense, has neither an interest in the result of the suit, nor an actual interest in or control over the subject matter of the litigation. n6

[b] Alignment of Parties

[i] Courts Duty to Determine Correct Alignment of Parties

Under the requirement of complete diversity, all of the parties on the plaintiff's side of a case must be diverse from all of the parties on the defendant's side. n7 However, the alignment designated by the claim or counterclaim is not binding on the court; the court is itself responsible for aligning the parties according to their actual interests in the litigation. In other words, the court does not merely follow the party designations in a complaint or counterclaim; rather, the court analyzes the facts as alleged to determine the proper alignment. The court has jurisdiction if complete diversity exists when the parties are aligned properly. n8 On the other hand, if there is no longer complete diversity after proper alignment or realignment, the action must be dismissed for lack of diversity subject matter jurisdiction. n8.1

Generally, the federal courts must realign the parties according to their real interests in such a way that parties with conflicting interests are on opposite sides. n9 The court must examine the interests of the parties in order to determine if their positions as plaintiffs and defendants conform to their real interests and must realign the parties, if appropriate. The purpose of realignment of parties is to ensure that there is a bona fide controversy between citizens of different states so that the case qualifies for diversity jurisdiction. n10

Once a court has made a determination of alignment and diversity jurisdiction, subsequent events do not deprive a court of jurisdiction over the parties that it had aligned. n11 Any modification of the parties by addition, substitution, or elimination does not divest the court of diversity jurisdiction, provided that the action remains the same and there is no evidence of fraud or collusion to create jurisdiction. n12

[ii] Determination of Alignment Based on Conflict

A case qualifies for diversity jurisdiction only when there is an actual, substantial controversy between citizens of different states. n13 The Supreme Court has directed the lower courts to examine the realities of the record in order to ascertain the real interests of the parties. n14 Whether the necessary conflict of interests is present between parties aligned as adverse must be ascertained from an assessment of the principal purpose of the suit and the primary and controlling matter in dispute. n15

Although the lower courts adhere to this direction, they have given different labels to the test. Under the test labeled "primary purpose" standard, the parties must be realigned if there is no adversity with regard to the primary issue in dispute. n16 Some courts use the "substantial conflict" standard. Under this standard, realignment of parties is not required if there is any actual and substantial conflict between the parties. Realignment is proper only if the court finds that no actual, substantial controversy exists between a party on one side of the dispute and a named opponent. n17 Some courts label the test as the "collision of interests" standard. Under this label, courts require the existence of an actual, substantial controversy, or a collision of interests, but the conflict may, in some cases, concern an issue other than the "primary issue" in dispute. n18

[iii] Alignment of Parties in Shareholder's Derivative Suit

In a shareholder's derivative action, there are three parties conceptually presented in the case: the shareholders who bring the action on behalf of the corporation, the represented corporation itself (i.e., the corporation on whose behalf the suit is initiated), and the defendant third party that has allegedly injured the corporation. n18.1 For diversity purposes, the represented corporation is generally aligned as a defendant, but the court may realign the corporation as a plaintiff when management is not actually adverse to the shareholders. n18.2 The complaint and answer generally determine whether management is, in reality, in conflict with the shareholders. n19 The court should not realign the corporationas a plaintiff if it is hostile to the action. n20 The corporation's management may refuse to act for a number of reasons in these circumstances but, usually, it simply believes that the course of action that it has approved is the correct one. Thus, the directors may have been acting out of purely proper motives. Whenever the management refuses to take action to rescind a business transaction, or whenever it so strongly approves it that any demand to rescind a transaction would be futile, there is evidence of antagonism. n21

[c] Dropping Party to Preserve Diversity

On motion by any party or of its own initiative, a court by order under Rule 21 may drop a party at any stage of the action and on any terms that are just. n22 Furthermore, if a named party to an action is determined by the court to be not indispensable to the action under Rule 19, the court may use Rule 21 to drop a nondiverse party to preserve diversity jurisdiction. n23 In some cases, the statute of limitation will have passed by the time the nondiverse party is dropped, and it may be argued that in such a case, an amendment to the complaint is barred by the statute of limitation. However, if the presence of a dispensable party will deprive a court of jurisdiction, there is a federal policy to allow relation back of amendments dropping parties in order to uphold subject matter jurisdiction. n24 If a plaintiff insists on retaining a particular defendant, the court will not interfere with that decision but must dismiss the case for lack of federal jurisdiction if the court determines that the defendant is nondiverse. n25

It should be noted that, in addition to the district court, the circuit courts of appeal have the authority to dismiss a dispensable nondiverse party in order to preserve federal jurisdiction. n26 A circuit court must use this authority sparingly, after considering the possible prejudicial impact on any of the parties. n27 If the presence of the nondiverse party produces a tactical or procedural advantage for any of the parties, and a factual dispute results, the court of appeals should remand the case to the district court, which is better suited to determine the existence of prejudice under the facts of the individual case. n28

[d] Diversity of Citizenship Must be Free of Collusion by Parties

By statute, a federal district court lacks jurisdiction over a civil action in which any party has been improperly or collusively made or joined for the purpose of invoking the court's jurisdiction, either by assignment or in some other manner. n29 The expression in this statute "improper or collusive" joinder has been construed to include those joinders that confer jurisdiction not justified by the purposes of diversity. n30

The purpose of Congressional enactment of the statute is to ensure that ordinary contract and tort litigation would not be diverted to federal courts by litigants using collusive or improper devices to create the appearance, but not the substance, of federal diversity jurisdiction. n31 The statute prohibits agreement of the parties to confer federal diversity jurisdiction, n32 because such an agreement is essentially a contrivance designed solely to place the litigation within the federal court system and therefore constitutes a prohibited collusive joinder under Section 1359. n33

If the assignment or transfer of a claim has been feigned or is merely colorable, rather than absolute or genuine, and has been made for the sole purpose of creating diversity jurisdiction, the assignment is improper or collusive and does not create federal diversity jurisdiction. n34 This determination is made according to the facts of each case. According to one test, the factors tending to show a collusive assignment include (1) a partial, rather than total, assignment, (2) lack of consideration paid by the assignee to the assignor, (3) a motive on part of assignor to stay out of state court, (4) a lack of interest in the litigation by theassignee before the assignment, and (5) an assignment made shortly before suit was filed. n35

Other federal courts have adopted a two-pronged test for determining whether an assignment or other transfer is collusive or improper under Section 1359: (1) an objective determination as to whether the assignment is of a type that places the nominal plaintiffs in a position to assert the real interest of another; and, if so, (2) a subjective determination as to whether the transaction was manufactured solely to obtain federal diversity jurisdiction or was made for a bona fide business purpose wholly apart from acquiring federal jurisdiction. n36

Because of the close relationship between parent corporations and their wholly owned subsidiaries, assignments between these business entities are subjected to a heightened scrutiny in determining if the assignment is collusive. n37 Similarly, assignments between a corporation and its corporate officers are also subject to a higher level of scrutiny. n38 There is a presumption that both of these types of assignments are made collusively in order to manufacture federal diversity jurisdiction. n39 To establish diversity, the corporation, its subsidiary, or officer must rebut this presumption of collusion by establishing that the assignment was motivated by a bona fide business reason, not simply to manufacture federal jurisdiction. n40

§ 5.51 Time of Determination of Diversityn*

[1] Diversity Generally Determined at Time of Filing of Suit

Diversity of citizenship jurisdiction of a federal court depends on the circumstances that existed at the time an action is brought by the filing of a complaint. This means that all questions regarding diversity of citizenship jurisdiction are determined by the state of facts that existed at the time of filing--whether the diversity jurisdiction is raised shortly after the filing of the action, during or after the trial, or even for the first time on appeal. n1 For purposes of removal from state to federal court, the diversity criteria must exist both when the complaint is filed and when the petition for removal is filed. n2 When an amendment to the complaint is filed that joins new parties, diversity must exist at the time of the amendment. n3 Because the existence of federal jurisdiction depends on facts that exist when the complaint is filed, n4 a person's domicile at the time of filing controls. n5 Subsequent changes in citizenship do not confer or destroy jurisdiction. n6

Once diversity has been established, the occurrence of subsequent events generally does not divest the court of subject matter jurisdiction. Therefore, diversity jurisdiction is not defeated by subsequent changes in the citizenship of the parties. n7 Similarly, if diversity does not exist at the time of the filing of the complaint, a later change in citizenship does not cure the jurisdictional defect. Furthermore, considerations of finality, efficiency, and economy do not create an exception to the rule. n8 However, a change in the nature of the lawsuit or in the parties may affect diversify jurisdiction, in the limited circumstances described in [2], below.

[2] Exceptions for Change in Nature of Suit or Parties

If the nature of a lawsuit is altered by order of the court or valid amendment of the pleadings, diversity must be reexamined at the time of the amendment. n1 In addition, a change in the identity of the persons who are parties to the lawsuit may trigger a reexamination of diversity. In this regard, the court may drop a dispensable nondiverse party at any time, provided that the party's interests are severable and the court enters a decree without prejudice to the party's rights. For example, if the court discovers that less than complete diversity has subsisted throughout an action, the court may, even after trial, dismiss a dispensable party to achieve complete diversity between the remaining parties to the final judgment. n2

Realignment of the parties is another exception to the general rule that diversity is determined at the time a lawsuit is commenced. If after realignment there isno longer complete diversity, subject matter jurisdiction is lost. n3 Subsequent events, however, do not deprive a court of jurisdiction over parties who were properly aligned in the first instance. n4 Consolidation of a diverse case with a nondiverse case also does not destroy federal jurisdiction in the diverse case; the two cases retain their separate character for jurisdictional purposes. n5

§ 5.52 Amendment Permitted for Defective Allegations of Diversityn*

By statute, a party may generally amend a defective allegation of jurisdiction in either the trial or appellate courts on terms required by the court. n1 Section1653's liberal amendment rule permits a party who has not alleged that diversity exists to amend the pleadings even on appeal. If the amended allegations are not contested and nothing bars jurisdiction, the court will accept jurisdiction as proper, despite the plaintiff's usual burden of alleging and proving jurisdiction at the outset of the case. n2 Despite the liberal allowance under the statute, however, attorneys are cautioned to promptly follow the court's directions regarding the need to establish complete diversity of citizenship--failure will result in dismissal for lack of jurisdiction. n3

Furthermore, although Section 1653 permits a party and the court to remedy inadequate jurisdictional allegations, the statute does not permit the party to fabricate jurisdictional facts. In other words, Section 1653 allows amendment if the plaintiff has made an erroneous statement about jurisdictional facts that actually existed, but it does not apply if there are defects in the jurisdictional facts themselves. n4 If there has been no tendered showing that jurisdiction existed under the original or amended complaint, Section 1653 is not applicable, n5 and the statute may not be used to create jurisdiction retroactively if it did not exist at the time when the complaint was filed. n6 Similarly, if diversity of citizenship did not exist when the action was commenced, it may not be created by a later amendment alleging a change of domicile by one of the parties. n7

§ 5.53 Effect of Consolidation of Cases on Diversity of Citizenshipn*

Consolidation does not change the rights of the parties, make those who are parties to one consolidated suit parties to the other, or merge the suits into a single cause. Therefore, a diverse case retains its diverse character despite consolidation with a nondiverse case. n1 Consolidation does not merge two cases into one case for jurisdictional purposes because each case retains its own separate identity, and therefore jurisdiction for each must be evaluated independently. n2 For example, the consolidation of two cases in federal court, one diverse and one not, does not affect the diversity jurisdiction over the diverse case. n3

PART III. DIVERSITY OF CITIZENSHIP JURISDICTION
B. DIVERSITY OF CITIZENSHIP

1-5 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 5.54

§ 5.54 Determination of Citizenship of United States Individualsn*

[1] Citizenship Described

There is no statutory definition or description of an individual's citizenship for diversity purposes. n1 Under the Constitution, all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, are citizens of the United States and of the state in which they reside. n2 Cases have held that to be a citizen of a state for purposes of the diversity statute, a natural person must be both a citizen of the United States and domiciled within that state. n3 Therefore, citizenship for diversity purposes is a two-part test: whether the person is a citizen of the United States, which is a relatively simple inquiry based on the citizenship statutes, n4 and whether the person is domiciled in a particular state, a far more difficult inquiry. n5

[2] Citizenship Determined at Time of Filing of Complaint

The citizenship of a party is determined as of the time the complaint is filed based on the facts and circumstances as they existed then. n1 Therefore, the court does not consider any facts regarding where citizenship existed at the time the cause of action is alleged to have occurred. n2 Furthermore, the court must disregard facts that are evidence of citizenship if they reflect the situation only before or after the filing of the complaint but not at the time of the filing of the complaint. n3 If diversity jurisdiction is established when the complaint is filed,a subsequent change in citizenship rendering the parties nondiverse does not cause a loss of diversity for purposes of federal jurisdiction. n4 In the same way, if the parties were not diverse at the time of the filing of the complaint, a subsequent change in citizenship does not cure the jurisdictional defect. n5

[3] Court's Determination of Domicile

[a] Domicile Determines Citizenship of a State for Diversity Purposes

Once it is determined that an individual is a citizen of the United states, for purposes of diversity jurisdiction, a natural person is considered to be a citizen of the state in which he or she is domiciled. n1 Therefore, in a diversity context, "citizenship" of a state and "domicile" are synonymous terms. n2 In determining a person's domicile, courts have analyzed the facts in view of the rationale for diversity jurisdiction, that is, protection of nonresidents from the possible prejudice that they might encounter in local courts. n3 Determination of a litigant's state of domicile for purposes of diversity is controlled by federal common law, not by the law of any state. n4 The determination of a person's domicile is a mixed question of law and fact. n5

[b] Domicile Means Actual Residence in State Plus Intent to Remain

A person's domicile is the place where the person has his or her true, fixed home and principal establishment, and to which he or she has the intention of returning whenever absent. n6 Therefore, domicile generally requires two elements: (1) a voluntary physical presence in a state plus (2) an intent to make that state the person's principal home. n7 Domicile therefore has both a physical and a subjective component and is more than an individual's residence, although the two ordinarily coincide. n8

Citizenship is not necessarily lost by protracted absence from one's residence, if the intention to return remains. A mere mental establishment of citizenship, however, without physical presence, is not sufficient to establish domicile and, thus, citizenship. The fact that a person resides in a particular state is not by itself determinative of citizenship for the purpose of federal court jurisdiction, n9 because one may reside in one place but be domiciled in another if the person intends to return to the residence of domicile. n10 One rule that simplifies the process of determination of domicile for a natural person is that a person is deemed to have a domicile at all times, but only one at a time. n11 Thus, for purposes of diversity of citizenship, a citizen has only one domicile, regardless of the number of residences maintained. n12 In determining which of the person's residences is his or her domicile, the court must focus on the intent of the party, which requires an examination of the entire course of a person's conduct. n13 For a discussion of how that one domicile may be changed, see [c], below.

A party who has a change in residence involuntarily or by constraint generally retains the prior domicile; n14 domicile is a voluntary status, and, therefore, a forcible change in a person's state of residence does not alter it. A person may not be said to have acquired a domicile of choice in a place if located there by virtue of physical compulsion. Furthermore, a person may not acquire a domicile of choice by any act done under legal compulsion. n15

[c] Change in Domicile

Every person at birth acquires a domicile determined by the domicile of the person on whom that person is legally dependent, and this domicile is referred to as the "domicile of origin." n16 A person's domicile of origin continues until a new one, a "domicile of choice," is acquired. n16.1 For purposes of diversity, there is a presumption in favor of a person's domicile of origin in the absence of a contrary averment. n17 There is a presumption of continuing domicile that applies every time a person relocates. Once a domicile is established in one state, it is presumed to continue in existence, even if the party leaves that state, until the adoption of a new domicile is established. n18 This presumption addresses theproblem of locating an individual who has clearly abandoned his or her present domicile but either has not arrived at a new one or has arrived without formulating the intent to stay. n19

A person may change domiciles only by taking up residence in a different state either with the intention to remain there indefinitely, n20 or at least without any specific intention to live anywhere else. n21 This requirement has also been described as residence in fact, coupled with the purpose to make the place of residence one's home. n22 The intention and the act must concur to effect the change of domicile. n23 Neither the physical presence nor the intention to change domicile, standing alone, is sufficient to effect the change. n24

A person who is not under a legal restraint, who has reached majority and possesses the requisite mental capacity, may change domiciles at will. n25 An adult may change domiciles by his or her own act; a minor or other dependent individual changes domicile by the act of someone on whom that individual is dependent. n26 Furthermore, there is no durational or minimum period of residence that is required to establish domicile. n27 Once a person has met the requisite elements of physical presence and intent to remain, a new domicile is established immediately. n28

When a person is taken in legal restraint and becomes incarcerated in prison, that occurrence does not change his or her domicile, because domicile is a voluntary status. n28.1

[d] Factors Considered to Determine Domicile

A court must consider the total evidence relevant to several factors to determine a party's domicile. n29 Under this standard, no single factor is conclusive. n30 When a person has made a change in residence, courts generally look to objective indications of intent. n31 The following three factors arise frequently in determination of domicile:

1. Voting registration and voting practices. n32 The place where a person votes carries considerable weight as an indication that the person intends to remain in the location. Several courts have indicated that voter registration raises a presumption of domicile. n33

2. The party's statements of intent, n33.1 including affidavits of intention. n34 A person's own statements concerning his or her intentions are relevant but are given only limited weight if they conflict with other, objective facts that support a finding of a contrary intent. n35

3. Current residence and familial relationships. Although residence alone is not the equivalent of domicile, the place of residence is prima facie evidence of a party's domicile. n36 Some courts have indicated that there is a presumption of domicile on proof of residency. n37 As an indication of intent to remain, courts have considered the nature of a person's residence in a particular state, for example, whether the person owns or rents a residence and the extent of the permanence of the living arrangement. n38 The court may also consider familial relationships such as marriage and whether a person's spouse and children live in the residence. n39

4. Representation by another person. The domicile and citizenship of a fiduciary generally controls that of the beneficiary. n40 The domicile of a minor is generally determined by reference to the domicile of another person. n41 Any change of domicile must therefore be determined by reference to the domicile of that other person or persons. n42

Generally, a minor's domicile is deemed to be that of the minor's parents. n42.1 That domicile continues in effect after majority until the child establishes a newdomicile of choice, which requires a new residence concurrent with the intent to remain there. n43 A minor who is emancipated has the right to select his or her own domicile. n44

The legal representative of the estate of a decedent is deemed to be a citizen only of the same state as the decedent for purposes of diversity. The legal representative of an infant or incompetent is deemed to be a citizen only of the same state as the infant or incompetent. n45 Thus, if a person who has been adjudged incompetent is placed under the care and control of a guardian, the guardian usually has the authority to change the location of the incompetent's domicile if the guardian finds that the change is in the ward's best interests. n46

Other factors given consideration may include the state of issue of the person's driver's license, n47 automobile registration, n48 location of bank accounts; n49 and the payment of taxes. n50 For a further list of factors, see 15 Moore's Federal Practice, § 102.36 and § 102.37 (Matthew Bender 3d ed.).

PART II Jurisdiction; Venue; Removal
CHAPTER 5 ORIGINAL JURISDICTION OVER THE SUBJECT MATTER
PART III. DIVERSITY OF CITIZENSHIP JURISDICTION
B. DIVERSITY OF CITIZENSHIP

1-5 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 5.55

§ 5.55 Determination of Citizenship of Corporationn*

[1] Dual Citizenship of Corporations

For purposes of diversity jurisdiction, a corporation is deemed to be a citizen of both n1 any state by which it has been incorporated and of the state where it has its principal place of business. n2 For complete diversity to exist, therefore, no adversary of a corporation may be a citizen of any state in which the corporation is incorporated or in which it has its principal place of business. n3 The burden of proof to show diversity is on the party invoking federal court jurisdiction. n4 To determine whether a party has adequately presented facts sufficient to establish federal diversity jurisdiction, the court must look to the face of the complaint n5 and ignore mere conclusory allegations of jurisdiction. n6

It is important to note that the diversity statute does not give a plaintiff the option of designating a corporation as a citizen of any state of its incorporation or the state where its principal place of business is located. n7 Rather, the statute states that a corporation is a citizen of all such states, and therefore diversity is destroyed if the plaintiff is also a citizen of any of those states. n8 It should also be noted that a corporation is a citizen of every state in which it is incorporated, meaning that it may have more than one state of citizenship on account of incorporation. n9 In determining a corporation's citizenship for purposes of diversity jurisdiction, the citizenship of the shareholder owners is immaterial. n10

The purpose of the diversity statute is to exclude from the federal diversity jurisdiction cases between a citizen of a state and a corporation whose principal place of business is in the same state, even though it may be incorporated elsewhere. In other words, the "principal place of business" requirement was intended to prevent local businesses from avoiding local trials based solely on foreign incorporation and to reserve diversity jurisdiction for those parties that are sufficiently foreign to have a legitimate fear of local prejudice. n11

[2] State Law Determines Corporate Status

Whether an entity must be regarded as a corporation for diversity purposes must be determined by reference to the law of the state in which it is asserted that the entity is incorporated. n1 For example, when a complaint was filed againstasserted corporate principals in federal court on diversity grounds, the court looked to the law of the state of incorporation for each corporate defendant to determine whether its corporate entity should be disregarded. n2 This rule has been adopted by the courts because a corporation is purely a creation of state law, and therefore subject to the states' regulations and directives. n3 However, because a federally chartered national bank is not incorporated in any particular state, it is deemed a citizen only of its "home state," which is the state where its main office is located. n4

[3] Multiple Incorporation of One Entity

Under Section 1332(c)(1), a corporation is a citizen of any state by which it has been incorporated. n1 This has been interpreted as meaning that a corporation that is incorporated in more than one state is a citizen of every state in which it has been incorporated. n2 The primary purpose of this interpretation is to effectuate the congressional intent to restrict rather than expand diversity jurisdiction of the federal courts. n3

Under a rule that expands diversity jurisdiction, however, the courts have held that involuntary incorporation is disregarded for diversity purposes. Involuntary incorporation occurs when a state compels a corporation incorporated in another state (known as a foreign corporation) to incorporate in the new state as a condition on the right to do business there. However, for diversity purposes, such involuntary incorporation under state law is not considered as actual incorporation. This rule is based on a constitutional limitation on the states that prohibits their destruction of federal court jurisdiction if the Constitution and the Congress have conferred the existence of jurisdiction. n4

[4] Court's Determination of Corporation's Principal Place of Business

In its determination of whether diversity of citizenship exists, the court must make its own independent identification of the "principal place of business" of a corporation; the determination is not controlled by any designation the corporation may have made itself. n1 If the matter is in dispute, the burden of proving a corporation's principal place of business at the time the claim for relief is filed is on the party asserting the existence of diversity jurisdiction. n2

The Supreme Court has adopted the "nerve center" test as the proper method for a court to identify a corporation's "principal place of business;" the court adopted this rule after careful consideration of various tests that circuits had used previously. n3

Under the Supreme Court's test to determine a corporation's "principal place of business," the court should determine the "nerve center," which is the place where the corporation's directors and officers actually direct, control, and coordinate the corporation's activities. In practice, the principal place of business is normally the place where the corporation maintains its headquarters, provided that the headquarters is the actual center of direction, control, and coordination of the corporation, and not merely an office where the corporation holds its board meetings. n4

[5] Citizenship of Alien Corporations

The rule for corporate state citizenship set forth in Section 1332(c) applies to both domestic and "alien" corporations, that is, corporations that are incorporated under the laws of a foreign country. Thus, if a corporation has its principal place of business in one of the United States and is incorporated under the laws of a foreign state has dual citizenship for purposes of diversity jurisdiction. It is both a citizen of a State and a citizen of an foreign state. n1 Diversity does not exist within the meaning of Sections 1332(a)(2) and (a)(3) when on both sides of the dispute the parties are all foreign entities, or where on one side there are citizens and aliens and on the opposite side there are only aliens. n1.1 An alien corporation's worldwide principal place of business and not merely its principal place of business within the United States, is controlling. Therefore, if the alien corporation is merely doing business in the United States, the alien corporation is subject to diversity of citizenship jurisdiction anywhere the opposition's citizenship is located. n2

It should also be noted that the discussion in the preceding paragraph applies to alien corporations. By contrast, when the corporation is a domestic UnitedStates corporation (that is, incorporated in the United States) but happens to have a foreign principal place and a principal place of business in the United states, the corporation, for purposes of diversity analysis, is a citizen of the state of its incorporation and of the state where its domestic principal place of business is located. At least one court has held that when a United States corporation is involved, the contacts that a corporation has with foreign countries are excluded from the statutory definition of citizenship and, therefore, are irrelevant in determining the citizenship of the corporation. n3 Therefore, if a corporation incorporated in the United States has its principal place of business abroad, it is solely a citizen of its state of incorporation for diversity purposes. n4

[6] Citizenship Considerations Regarding Particular Corporate Status

[a] Inactive Corporation

If a corporation is inactive or defunct, the circuits take several approaches to determine its citizenship. Some circuits determine citizenship to be only that of the state of incorporation, reasoning that the corporation no longer has a principal place of business. n1 On the other hand some courts have held that an inactive corporation is a citizen of both the state of incorporation and the location of the corporation's last place of business activity. n2 At least one recent case has concluded that it is the final principal place of business, and not state of incorporation, that is the corporation's state of citizenship for diversity purposes. n3 Finally, one circuit has adopted the approach that, to determine the diversity citizenship of an inactive corporation, the court must analyze the facts and circumstances of each case, as of the date that the action was commenced, to ascertain whether a corporation's business activity was sufficient to make it a citizen of a state for diversity jurisdiction purposes. n4 For a complete discussion of the various approaches used by the different circuits, see 15 Moore's Federal Practice, § 102.56[3] (Matthew Bender 3d ed.).

If a corporation that has failed to maintain good standing in the state of its incorporation, the corporation remains a citizen of that state, provided that the state has not revoked its corporate charter; this rule stems from the rationale that the language of the diversity statute provides that a corporation shall be deemed a citizen of any state by which it "has been incorporated," and not where it "is incorporated." n5

[b] Nonprofit Corporation

The citizenship of a nonprofit corporation depends on the nature of the allegations regarding who has been wronged or who has committed the wrong. For example, if a nonprofit corporation is the plaintiff and it is alleging a wrong committed against the corporation as an entity (rather than against the shareholders or the members directly), the general rule is that the entity must be regarded as a corporation for diversity purposes. If the wrong is to the members directly (rather than merely to the members as a trickle-down effect of the harm to the corporation), the members of the corporation must be regarded as real parties in interest and their individual citizenships must be considered for diversity purposes. n6

[c] Public Corporation

When created by state law, a public corporation is considered to be a citizen of the state that created it. n7 On the other hand, a federally chartered corporation is not subject to diversity jurisdiction if the United States owns more than half of the stock in the corporation; such a corporation is subject to federal question jurisdiction. n8 Even if the United States owns less than half of its capital stock, a corporation that is organized to conduct business or activities in more than one state is deemed to have only national citizenship; thus, diversity jurisdiction is generally precluded. n9 There are two exceptions to this general bar of diversity. First, a federal court may exercise diversity jurisdiction if the corporation's activities are "localized" in a particular state, which means that the corporation's activities are confined to one particular state; n10 only in such a case is the corporation considered a citizen of the state in which the activities occur. n11

[d] Parent and Subsidiary Corporations

For purposes of diversity jurisdiction, a subsidiary generally must be considered as a separate corporation with separate citizenship; thus, it does not adoptthe citizenship of its parent corporation. n12 In a suit involving a subsidiary corporation, the court must consider the states of incorporation and principal place of business of the subsidiary entity, rather than those of the parent corporation. n13 Provided that the corporate separation between a parent and subsidiary is actual and carefully maintained, the separate place of business of the subsidiary is recognized in determining jurisdiction, even if the parent corporation maintains a significant degree of control through ownership or otherwise. On the other hand, the subsidiary is considered the alter ego of the parent, and therefore has the same citizenship as the parent if: the parent's control over the subsidiary is so complete that the subsidiary essentially had no separate business supervision or existence of its own, or if the parent's exercise of control over the subsidiary amounted to fraud or an illegal act. n14

Thus, the question of separation is determined by the facts of each case. n14.1 To determine whether the parent and subsidiary are indeed separate, the court should examine factors such as whether: the subsidiary has adequate capitalization and observed corporate formalities; the parent has held itself out as personally liable for certain subsidiary obligations; the parent has diverted funds or other property of the subsidiary for the parent's use; and there is an absence of corporate records. n14.2

In such a case, the court will view the separation between the two corporations as merely a formality and treat the citizenship of the parent corporation and the subsidiary as the same. n15 The alter ego doctrine, however, may be used to increase the number of states of citizenship for the purpose of reducing the reach of diversity jurisdiction but may not be used to extend jurisdiction. n16

[e] Effect of Merger of Corporations

Generally, when separate corporations merge, they lose their distinct legal identities following the merger. After the merger, the citizenship of the surviving corporation determines diversity. n17 It should also be noted that merger for diversity purposes may be de facto as well as formal. A de facto merger occurs when the statutory conditions of a de facto incorporation have been met. However, one corporation's acquisition of another corporation's principal assets does not per se constitute a complete intermingling of the two entities' affairs for purposes of attributing the citizenship of the selling corporation to that of the purchasing one. n18 Furthermore, the citizenship of the surviving corporation does not matter for cases already pending on the date when the merger occurred. n19

PART III. DIVERSITY OF CITIZENSHIP JURISDICTION
B. DIVERSITY OF CITIZENSHIP

1-5 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 5.56

§ 5.56 Determination of Citizenship of Entities Other Than Corporationsn*

[1] Unincorporated Associations

An unincorporated association carries the citizenship of each of its members. n1 This results because the Supreme Court has consistently held that corporate citizenship in the diversity statute applies only to incorporated entities. n2 Consequently, all other unincorporated entities are treated by analogy in the same manner as partnerships, n3 and the citizenship of each entity is based on the citizenship of each of its members. n4 Because of this rule, it is unlikely that a nationally organized association will be a party to a diversity jurisdiction action because it is likely that some members will share the same citizenship with a person on the opposite side of the action. n5

[2] Partnerships and Joint Ventures

A general partnership as an entity is not a considered a "citizen" of any state within the meaning of the diversity statute because there is no statutory authority that expressly provides diversity citizenship for partnerships as Section 1332(c) does for corporations. n1 Therefore, a partnership carries the citizenship of each of its members. n1.1

Similarly, the rule applies to limited partnerships. In this regard, the Supreme Court has held that the citizenship of all partners in a limited partnership, rather than only the citizenship of the general partners or the state where the partnership is created, governs the determination of citizenship for jurisdictional purposes. n2 The rule also applies with regard to the citizenship of a joint venture. Thus, a joint venture has the citizenship ofeach member regardless of whether the member has an interest in the suit. n3 Finally, the rule has also been applied to complex partnerships as well, even when there are multiple tiers of partnerships, n4 and to limited liability partnerships. n5 A person's status as a partner or joint venturer is determined under the law of the state that governs the partnership or joint venture agreement. n6

[3] Limited Liability Companies

As is the case with a partnership, n1 the citizenship for diversity purposes of a limited liability company is determined by the citizenship of all of its members, rather than from the citizenship of the company as a entity. n1.1 In applying this rule, courts have analogized to limited partnerships and limited liability partnerships n1.2 and relied on the principle that members of associations establish citizenship for diversity purposes unless Congress has provided to the contrary. n2 Thus, diversity exits in a suit involving a limited liability company when none of the members of the company has the same citizenship as any party aligned on the opposing side. n3

[4] State and Agency of State

A state of the United States is not considered a "citizen" for the purpose of determining diversity jurisdiction; nor is a state agency, when acting as an alter ego of the state. A state agency is acting as the alter ego of the state when the agency is suing or being sued under statute and where the interest or rights of the state are directly affected; such an action is in fact an action against the state. n0.1 For example, the Commissioner of Labor of North Carolina, as the executive officer of the North Carolina Department of Labor, was in fact the alter ego of the state when representing the state's interest in a lawsuit. n1 If a state agency is not acting as the alter ego of the state, the agency is considered a citizen of that state for diversity purposes. n2 To determine alter ego status, courts primarily consider two factors: (1) the extent of control exercised over the entity by the state; n2.1 and (2) whether the entity has a role that is completely defined by the state, that is, whether the agency is acting in its capacity as agent for the state. n3

PART III. DIVERSITY OF CITIZENSHIP JURISDICTION
B. DIVERSITY OF CITIZENSHIP

1-5 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 5.57

§ 5.57 Determination of Citizenship In Direct Action Against Insurern*

In any direct action against an insurer who has issued a policy or contract of liability insurance and in which the insured is not joined as a party-defendant, the insurer is deemed to be a citizen of the following states: (1) the state of which the insured is a citizen; (2) any state by which the insurer has been incorporated; and (3) the state where the insurer has its principal place of business. n1 Under this statute, a "direct action" is one in which a party who suffered injuries or damage for which another is legally responsible is entitled to bring suit against the other's liability insurer without joining the insured or first obtaining a judgment against the legally responsible party. Unless the cause of action is one that could be brought against the insured, the action is not a direct action for the purpose of the statute. n2

By its terms, the statute applies only to an action against an insurer, that is, when the insurer is a defendant. Thus, it does not apply to a suit initiated by an insurer, even though the suit is initiated from what appears to be a defensive posture. n3 Additionally, it does not apply to a suit by an insured against his or her own insurer, whether the action is based on denial of coverage n4 or bad-faith insurance practices. n5

§ 5.58 Citizenship of Native American Tribesn*

Generally, courts have determined that a Native American tribe is a stateless personfor diversity purposes, and that because it is a citizen of no state, it does not fall within coverage of the diversity statute. n1 In other words, the presence of a Native American tribe on either side of a legal action generally destroys diversity. n1.1 However, tribes are not "stateless persons" if they have been incorporated, which they may do under the Indian Reorganization Act n2 or their own tribal laws. It has been held that if incorporated, then the rules governing the citizenship of corporations apply to the tribe. n3 Thus, for purposes of diversity jurisdiction, a Native American corporation is a citizen of the state in whose borders the reservation is located. n4

PART III. DIVERSITY OF CITIZENSHIP JURISDICTION
B. DIVERSITY OF CITIZENSHIP

§ 5.59 Diversity Jurisdiction Involving Aliensn*

[1] Nature of Alienage Jurisdiction

"Alienage diversity jurisdiction" is the term that the courts use to refer to diversity jurisdiction involving parties that are either aliens, foreign countries, or citizens or subjects of foreign countries. n1 The federal diversity jurisdiction statute provides the following three types of alienage jurisdiction:

1. Federal district courts have original jurisdiction over all civil actions in which the minimum amount in controversy requirement is met, as discussed in PART C, n2 and the action is between citizens of a state and citizens or subjects of a foreign state. n3

2. Federal district courts have original jurisdiction over all civil actions in which the amount in controversy requirement is met, the action is between citizens of different states, and citizens or subjects of a foreign state are additional parties. n3.1 This provision establishes a requirement of complete diversity between United States citizens, but permits aliens on either or both sides of the dispute as additional parties. However, case law is divided on whether diversity still exists if there is a citizen on only one side of the lawsuit but aliens on both sides. n4 It should also be noted that the alienage diversity statute provides that when an "alien" has been admitted to the United States for permanent residence, that alien must be deemed for diversity purposes a citizen of the state in which the alien is domiciled. n5

3. Federal district courts have diversity jurisdiction over suits between a foreign state, as plaintiff, and citizens of a state or different states. n6

Alienage jurisdiction is properly considered only as a type of diversity jurisdiction and should not be confused with jurisdiction over an action against a foreign state under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act n7 or an action by an alien under the alien tort statute. A court has authority to hear such cases pursuant to federal question jurisdiction, because these actions are within the constitutional "arising under federal law" clause, as discussed in PART II. n8

The purpose of alienage jurisdiction is to provide the federal courts with a form of protective jurisdiction over matters implicating international relations, in which the national interest is paramount. n9 In other words, alienage jurisdiction was intended to rectify the failure of individual states to protect foreign citizens under international treaties and to avoid controversies with other sovereigns that might result from the failure to treat the legal disputes of aliens on a federal level. n10

[2] Parties Subject to Alienage Jurisdiction

The definition of a "foreign state" for purposes of alienage jurisdiction depends on the context in which it is used in the statutory scheme. In the context of the phrase "citizens or subjects of a foreign state" in Subections 1332(a)(2) and (a)(3), n1 a "foreign state" is any foreign country that the United States formally recognizes, and includes subentities of a formally recognized country, such as colonies and territories, that depend on the formally recognized country for the force of the subentity's laws. For example, the citizens or subjects of the British Virgin Islands are citizens or subjects of a foreign state for purposes of alienage jurisdiction because the British Virgin Islands is a subentity of the United Kingdom, which the United States recognizes. In other words, the United Kingdom exercises pervasive authority over the territory of theBritish Virgin Islands. n2 The "citizen or subjects of a foreign state" alienage rules apply equally to natural persons and juridic persons. The United States Supreme Court has held that because the United Kingdom retains and exercises authority over the British Virgin Islands, a corporation organized in the British Virgin Islands is a citizen or subject of the United Kingdom under Subsection 1332(a) for alienage diversity jurisdiction purposes. n3

Under Subsection 1332(a)(4), a "foreign state" that may be a plaintiff under alienage jurisdiction in a suit against one or more citizens of one or more states of the United States is one defined by a statutory provision that is part of the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act. n4 Thus, a foreign state that may initiate suit as a plaintiff is the foreign country itself and any political subdivision of the foreign country or any agency or instrumentality of the foreign country. n5 If the majority ownership of any entity is owned by a foreign state, the entity itself is deemed a "foreign state" under Subsection 1332(a)(4) for purposes of diversity jurisdiction, and therefore is not considered a "citizen" or "subject" of a foreign state for diversity purposes of Subections 1332(a)(2) and 1332(a)(3). n6

If a person is a dual citizen of the United States and a foreign country, the person is not considered a citizen of the foreign state for diversity purposes; in other words, only the United States nationality of a dual national is recognized. Therefore, if the person with dual citizenship is living abroad, the person is considered a stateless person, and therefore the person would destroy diversity on either side of a legal action. n7 However, if a person is a citizen only of a foreign country, the fact that the person may be residing in the United States is immaterial, and the person qualifies for alienage jurisdiction, unless the alien has permanent resident status under United States immigration law. n8 An alien admitted in the United States with permanent residence is deemed a citizen of the state in the United States in which the alien is domiciled, rather than any foreign state. n9

Alienage jurisdictional analysis under the laws of the United States is not ultimately governed by the law of the foreign country, whatever that may be. While it is true that every independent nation has the inherent right to determine for itself what classes of persons shall be entitled to its citizenship, a federal court's jurisdictional concern under 28 U.S.C. § 1332(a)(2) is within the meaning of "citizen" and "subject" as those terms are used in the alienage jurisdiction statute to further the purposes of alienage jurisdiction, as discussed in [1] above. n10

[3] Diversity Citizenship of Permanent Resident Aliens

An alien admitted to the United States for permanent residence is deemed a "citizen," for diversity jurisdiction purposes, of the state in which the alien is domiciled. n1 This provision was added to the diversity statute in 1988 in order to eliminate diversity jurisdiction between United States citizens and permanent resident aliens of the same state, which otherwise existed under Section 1332(a)(2). n2 Under this provision, it is possible that an individual might be a citizen or subject of a foreign state, but nevertheless be deemed a "citizen" for diversity jurisdictional purposes of the state in which the permanent alien is domiciled. n3

An alien litigant's official immigration status determines whether the alien is admitted to the United States for permanent residence. Therefore, the permanent resident alien provision applies only to aliens who have received permission from the INS to remain permanently in this country. n4 It should be noted that because Article III, Section 2, of the United States Constitution extends the judicial power of the United States only to cases between a state, or the citizens of a state, and foreign states, citizens, or subjects, there is no constitutional authority for jurisdiction over suits wholly between aliens. Consequently, the consensus is that any interpretation of the permanent resident alien amendment that would provide diversity jurisdiction for a case solely involving aliens would be unconstitutional, although the Supreme Court has not ruled on the issue. n5

[4] Alien on Each Side of Controversy May Destroy Complete Diversity

When a suit is filed in federal court by alien plaintiffs against alien defendants, the complete diversity requirement is not satisfied, and a federal court generally may nothear the case based on diversity jurisdiction. n1 A statutory exception to this rule exists when there are diverse United States citizens on each side of the suit. n2 Thus, diversity jurisdiction does not exist when an alien plaintiff sues an alien defendant and a citizen of a state. n3 However, diversity may exist when there are diverse United States citizens on each side, and the United States citizens need not be the principal adversaries in the suit, because when diverse United States citizens have a legitimate dispute in a case, they may create diversity jurisdiction in their own right, even when the principal suit involves one or more alien parties. n4 However, diversity may be affected if one or more of the aliens have been admitted to permanent residency in the United States. In such a situation, the permanent resident is deemed a citizen of the state in which the alien is domiciled, n5 and then the citizens and the permanent resident aliens on one side of the action must each have complete diversity from those on the other side of the action. n6 In other words, depending on whether he or she has official immigration status as an admitted permanent resident, each alien is categorized as either a "citizen of a state" or as a "citizen or subject of a foreign state," and then the four rules of Section 1332(a) are applied. n7

[5] Pleading Alienage Jurisdiction

To plead alienage jurisdiction, the party invoking jurisdiction need only allege that the parties are citizens or subjects of a foreign country. n1 It is not necessary to allege specifically that those parties are aliens. n2 Furthermore, the party alleging federal jurisdiction is not required to allege that a defendant who is a foreign citizen is not a permanent resident of any state. Thus, the court may assume that the alien is domiciled outside United States and require a party challenging jurisdiction to allege that the foreign party is a permanent resident alien if the party asserts that such status would destroy diversity. n3

In addition to establishing that the opposing parties have diversity of citizenship, n1 diversity jurisdiction requires that the amount in controversy in exceed the jurisdictional minimum amount established by Congress. The current minimum is the sum or value of $75,000, exclusive of interest and costs. n2 In thischapter, this required minimum amount in controversy be referred to as the "jurisdictional minimum amount" because Congress has raised the amount several times, most recently from $50,000 to $75,000. n3 Congress has consistently raised the jurisdictional minimum amount to prevent further increases in the number of cases litigated in the federal courts. n4 In other words, Congress has decided to impose the jurisdictional minimum in diversity cases so that the federal judiciary does not expend its limited resources on cases of only limited financial value, in addition to promoting federalism by confining federal courts strictly within the limits of their jurisdiction as prescribed by Congress. n5

§ 5.71 Controlling Lawn*

The value of the matter in controversy for purposes of the federal jurisdictional minimum amount is determined by application of federal law, because, in establishing the standards for determining the jurisdictional amount, a court is in actuality interpreting the federal diversity jurisdiction statute. n1 The court, however, must also consult state law to determine the nature and extent of the damages to be awarded, because in a diversity case the substantive questions of what constitutes items of damages are purely matters of state law. Therefore, state law will dictate what elements are financially at stake in the case; federal standards will determine whether those items have a value sufficient to satisfy the statutory requirement.

For example, if a party under the applicable state law may recover on a particular claim for recission, constructive trust, and treble damages, the court must include all of those theories in tabulating the jurisdictional minimum amount; however, federal law controls the standard for determining the value of the claim under each theory. n2

C. MINIMUM AMOUNT IN CONTROVERSY

1-5 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 5.72

§ 5.72 Factors Used in Determination of Amountn*

[1] Amount Claimed By Party Controls Absent Bad Faith

[a] Legal Certainty Standard

In diversity cases, the general rule is that the amount claimed by a plaintiff in the complaint determines the amount in controversy, unless it appears to a legal certainty that the claim is for less than the jurisdictional minimum amount. n1 Under this rule, the amount claimed by the plaintiff controls if the claim is apparently made in good faith. n2 Furthermore, a rebuttable presumption exists that the face of the complaint is a good faith representation of the actual amount in controversy. n3 Thus, to justify dismissal it must appear to a legal certainty that the claim is actually for less than the jurisdictional amount. n4

Under the "legal certainty," test the plaintiff need show only that it does not appear to a legal certainty that the claim is below the jurisdictional minimum. Thus, a court must be confident that a party cannot recover the jurisdictional amount before dismissing the case for want of jurisdiction. n5 On the other hand, a party contesting the amount in controversy is required to support its assertion with "competent proof" and a mere good faith belief on the part of the opponent is not competent proof. The presumption means that a plaintiff is in the best position to know how much the claim is worth; and the plaintiff's request for damages is deemed to have been made in good faith. n6 One court has stated that, under the legal certainty standard, the legal improbability of recovery of the jurisdictional minimum amount must be so certain that it virtually negates the plaintiff's good faith in asserting the claim. Thus, if the right of recovery is uncertain, the doubt should be resolved for jurisdictional purposes in favor of the subjective good faith of the plaintiff. n7

[b] Punitive Damages Are Included in Calculation

A court considers claims of punitive damages in determining whether the amount in controversy exceeds the jurisdictional minimum, n8 and punitive andactual damages may be added together to meet the amount in controversy requirement. n9 The court must make a two-part inquiry when considering punitive damages in order to satisfy the jurisdictional minimum. The first question is whether the claimant may recover punitive damages as a matter of governing substantive law. n10 If so, the court has jurisdiction unless it is clear beyond a legal certainty that the plaintiff would under no circumstances be entitled to recover the jurisdictional amount. In this second step, the plaintiff must present some factual evidence of entitlement to punitive damages. n11

It is a question of law for the court, rather than a question of fact for the jury, to decide whether a plaintiff has established that punitive damages are available. n12 Courts have held that claims for punitive damages are subject to closer scrutiny than claims for actual damages. n13 This is particularly true if the claim for punitive damages comprises the largest portion of the amount in controversy and may have been asserted solely or primarily for the purpose of conferring jurisdiction. Thus, the plaintiff's good faith in seeking punitive damages is an important consideration in determining entitlement under the "legal certainty" test, discussed in [a], above. n14

[c] Probability of Valid Defense Does Not Deprive Court of Jurisdiction

The mere fact that there is likely or even certainly a valid defense to the plaintiff's claim on the merits does not deprive a federal court of jurisdiction on the ground that the requisite amount was never in controversy. n15 Were the rule otherwise, any dismissal of a diversity case would raise a jurisdictional bar based on lack of jurisdictional amount, obscuring the question of whether the dismissal was on the merits, and thus barred by res judicata, or on merely on jurisdictional grounds, which would allow the claim to be brought in state court. n16

[2] Aggregation of Claims

[a] Single Plaintiff May Aggregate All Claims Against Single Defendant

As a general principal under the federal rules, a party asserting a claim for relief as an original claim, counterclaim, crossclaim, or third-party claim, may join as many claims as it has against an opposing party, either as independent or alternative claims. n1 For purposes of calculating the amount in controversy, a single plaintiff may aggregate all claims joined under Rule 18, related and unrelated, against a single defendant. n2 A plaintiff may aggregate otherwise insufficient claims in order to reach the threshold amount in excess of the jurisdictional amount. n3 A single plaintiff may also aggregate claims even if the claims were assigned to the plaintiff by a third party, unless the assignment was made collusively for the purpose of creating federal jurisdiction. n4

[b] Single Plaintiff May Not Aggregate Claims Against Unrelated Defendants

A plaintiff must allege that the amount in controversy is in excess of the jurisdictional amount against each defendant, unless the plaintiff's claims against the defendants are common and undivided to the extent that the defendant's liability is properly characterized as joint and not several. n5 Thus, a plaintiff may not generally aggregate claims against more than one essentially separate and individual defendant to reach the requisite amount in controversy. For example, a person who performed similar services for two companies may not aggregate his or her claims against those defendants if they are essentially separate individual defendants. n6

[c] Multiple Plaintiffs

The federal rules allow plaintiffs to join together if they have claims against a common defendant provided the claims arise from the same transaction or occurrence. n7 Just as the citizenship of each plaintiff must be considered individually, however, each plaintiff must also establish that it satisfies the condition of the diversity statute that requires the minimum amount in controversy. A few courtshave held that the supplemental jurisdiction statute has altered this rule, so that insufficient claims that are joined with at least one sufficient claim are now within the court's supplemental jurisdiction. n8

The Supreme Court has established that claims by multiple plaintiffs may not be aggregated unless the claims are "joint" or "common and undivided." Thus, when two or more plaintiffs, having separate and distinct demands, unite for convenience and economy in a single suit, it is essential that the demand of each be of the requisite jurisdictional amount; however, when several plaintiffs unite to enforce a single title or right, in which they have a common and undivided interest, it is enough if their interests collectively equal the jurisdictional amount. n9 If several plaintiffs assert claims in a single action against a single defendant that are separate and distinct, rather than joint, the amount involved in each claim must meet the requisite amount in order to be within the jurisdiction of the district court. Those amounts may not be aggregated in order to satisfy jurisdictional requirements. n10 For a discussion of class actions, see [d], below. As a practical matter, because very few claims will be considered joint only, multiple plaintiffs will not often be permitted to aggregate their claims. n11

It is sometimes difficult to determine whether plaintiffs are asserting separate rights or a single title or right. Guidelines have been promulgated with respect to certain types of actions. Where, for example, several plaintiffs unite to prosecute claims for damages for personal injuries received in a single accident, the claims are separate and distinct and aggregation for jurisdictional purposes is improper. n12 Also, when several plaintiffs who are joint owners of real estate file suit to quiet title, the right being asserted is a single one and its total value is the amount in controversy. n13

[d] Class Actions

The Supreme Court held many years ago that in class actions, class members may not aggregate their claims in order to reach the requisite amount in controversy unless the rights of the class members are joint. n14 Thus, the rules regarding the aggregation of claims of multiple plaintiffs apply also to claims of persons who compose a class. n15 If a claim is asserted by or against the class jointly, n16 there is but a single right involved, and its value is the one used in computing the amount in controversy. Where the right is held in common or is derivative, n17 the concept of totality is inherent in the claim, and its total value is the value considered for jurisdictional purposes. n18 Where the claims are separate and distinct, however, the aggregation of claims for purposes of jurisdiction is not permitted. n19 The Supreme Court has also extended that holding to prohibit absent class members who individually fail to meet the jurisdictional minimum from attaching their claims to the named plaintiff who does meet the jurisdictional minimum. n20

[3] Consideration of Viewpoint

[a] Description of Viewpoints

The court's determination of whether the amount in controversy exceeds the jurisdictional minimum amount, exclusive of interests and costs, is often a fairly easy task because the amount the plaintiff stands to gain is the same as the amount the defendant stands to lose, as in a claim for damages. However, some cases, such as those involving a request for injunctive or other equitable relief and most class actions, may require a more complex analysis because the amount in controversy may differ depending on the viewpoint from which the matter in controversy is measured. For example, in an action seeking injunctive relief, a plaintiff may not stand to benefit by an amount in excess of the jurisdictional amount; however, the cost of compliance to the defendant might well be in excess of the jurisdictional amount. n1 There is a split among the circuits regarding the viewpoint to take, which also may vary according to the circumstances: (1) the "plaintiff's viewpoint," that is, the amount in controversy as stated in the complaint or the value of the right the plaintiff is asserting; (2) the "defendant's viewpoint," where the complaint seeks injunctive relief, the amount required of the defendant to provide the injunctive relief sought by the plaintiff; (3) the "either party's view" of the value of the controversy or the amount required to provide the relief sought; (4) the entire "viewpoint approach," which utilizes the court's determination of the economic worth of the "object in controversy" or the pecuniaryconsequence to those involved in the litigation. n2 The trial courts must follow the relevant governing precedent for each circuit. n3

A summary of the plaintiff's viewpoint, which is used by the majority of courts is given in [b], below. For a complete discussion of the various approaches used by the different circuits, see 15 Moore's Federal Practice, § 102.109 (Matthew Bender 3d ed.).

[b] Plaintiff's Viewpoint

The majority of federal courts have chosen to use the plaintiff's viewpoint rule. Under this rule, the amount in controversy for jurisdictional purposes should be measured strictly from the plaintiff's perspective, without regard to the amount at stake for any other party. n4 Under this standard, the value of the cause of action or the amount in controversy is determined only on the basis of what the plaintiff will recover or avoid losing if the suit is successful. n5 When this viewpoint is employed, it is generally used regardless of the nature of the action, and therefore it applies both to declaratory and equitable relief actions. n6 Thus, the value of the controversy in injunctive relief actions is determined by reference to the property right that the plaintiff seeks to protect by invocation of an equitable remedy. n7

[4] Interest

The jurisdictional minimum amount in diversity cases is "exclusive of interest and costs." n1 Therefore, by the express words of the statute, interest may not be considered. n2 This language does not mean that no "interest" may be taken into account. The Supreme Court has held that the interest referred to in the statute is "interest as such" and not the interest component used in determining the amount of damages to be awarded on a principal demand when the interest is an integral part of the claimed damages. Thus, interest is includable in computing the jurisdictional amount if the interest is not merely incidental or accessory to the principal amount demanded. n3 Furthermore, if the judgment in an action includes interest, the calculation of the amount in controversy in a suit to enforce the judgment includes the interest. n4

On the other hand, the court may not consider any amount claimed as interest by the plaintiff that is attributable solely to a delay in payment or to a wrongful deprivation of funds. This type of moratory interest, if not an essential ingredient of plaintiff's claim, is interest that has accrued before the filing of the complaint. n5

In deciding whether interest is an integral part of the claim and, therefore, to be included in the amount in controversy, the court should consider whether the interest arose solely because of a delay in payment. n6 Such inclusion would violate the purpose for excluding interest in computing the jurisdictional amount, which is to prevent the plaintiff from intentionally delaying suit until the claim with accrued interest exceeds the statutory minimum. n7

[5] Costs

As a general rule, the jurisdictional minimum amount may not include the amount of costs expended by the party. n1 However, the phrase "exclusive of interest or costs" in the statute refers to interest or costs that could possibly might be awarded in connection with the federal diversity proceedings. Thus, the costs excluded are those that are a reimbursement for some of the expenses imposed by the court for the use of the court's processes. Such costs are excluded from the jurisdictional amount because they must await the outcome of the suit and are uncertain in amount. n2 On the other hand, if a party is making a claim that "costs" were expended as a result of defendant's allegedly wrongful conduct as an element of the damage claim, those costs may be included in determining the amount in controversy. n3 Furthermore, when costs of prior proceedings have been paid and the plaintiff in good faith brings an action to recover them, they are the matter in litigation and their value may be considered in determining the amount in controversy for jurisdictional purposes. n4

[6] Attorney's Fees

Attorney's fees normally may not be included in determining the amount in controversy, because, under American law, the successful party is not as a rule entitled to recover attorney's fees from his or her opponent. n1 However, there are two exceptions to this principle: (1) if the fees are provided for by contract, n2 in which case the attorney fees constitute an element of damages in the request for relief. n3 or (2) if a statute mandates or allows payment of attorney's fees. n4 First, when a plaintiff may in good faith claim a contractual right to recover attorney's fees, even though that right is disputed by the defendant, the amount of the fees may be included in determining the amount in controversy because it is considered a principal part of the relief sought by the plaintiff. n5 Second, the Supreme Court has held that attorney's fees that are allowed by statute may be included in the jurisdictional sum, even though the statute may refer to them in terms of costs or make them taxable as costs, provided the benefit ultimately accrues to the plaintiff. n6 However, potential attorney's fees in a class action may not be aggregated to satisfy the jurisdictional amount requirement. n7

[7] Statutory Enhancements

The court may include penalties and statutory damages imposed by state law in its calculation of the amount in controversy. For example, the possibility of an award of treble damages under an applicable consumer fraud statute should be included in determining amount in controversy for purposes of diversity jurisdiction. n1 In insurance cases, such statutory penalties and awards may include, in addition to the basic policy limit, punitive damages, interest and costs, and attorney's fees. n2 Thus, when state law imposes statutory damages for failure to timely pay an insurance claim, the amount of the penalty may be included when ascertaining the amount in controversy, provided that the statutory exaction is an element of damages and not interest. n3

§ 5.73 Initiation of Determination of Amountn*

The jurisdictional minimum amount is a requirement of federal subject matter jurisdiction and is not subject to waiver by the parties. A lack of the minimum amount in controversy may be raised by either party, or by the court on its own initiative, at any time. n1 Thus, even if the amount in controversy is not raised by a party, the court has its own independent obligation to address questions regarding the amount, and to weigh the evidence to determine whether the jurisdictional minimum amount requirement has been met. n2 In this regard, a court that determines that the jurisdictional minimum amount is questionable may sua sponte issue an order to show cause why the lawsuit should not be dismissed for failure to meet the requirement. n3

PART III. DIVERSITY OF CITIZENSHIP JURISDICTION
C. MINIMUM AMOUNT IN CONTROVERSY

1-5 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 5.74

§ 5.74 Time of Determination of Amountn*

[1] Time of Filing of Complaint

The court must determine the amount in controversy as of the commencement of the action, which means that the court should determine whether the jurisdictional minimum amount requirement is satisfied as of the time the complaint is filed. n1 However, even though the court determines the amount in controversy as of the time of the complaint it is not restricted to consideration of the complaint and may consider other pleadings. Thus, when a defendant asserts a compulsory counterclaim in its answer and alleges an insufficient amount in controversy, the counterclaim must be considered in determining the requisite amount in controversy, even if the defendant did not move to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. n2

[2] Effect of Subsequent Events

Because jurisdiction is determined at the filing of the complaint, subsequent events that reduce the amount below the jurisdictional minimum amount generally will not divest the court of jurisdiction. n1 For example, the mere fact that the plaintiff ultimatelyrecovers a sum less than the jurisdictional amount will not divest the court of jurisdiction. n2

The Supreme Court has held, however, that a distinction must be drawn between subsequent events that change the amount in controversy, and subsequent revelations that the required amount was not in controversy at the commencement of the action. n3 If a discovery later in the case disclosed that the actual, accurate amount was below the minimum required amount, determined as of the time of the filing of the complaint, the court never had effective subject matter jurisdiction and must dismiss the complaint. n4 In other words, failure to satisfy the jurisdictional amount from the outset, although not recognized until later, is not a subsequent change that the court may ignore. n5

Some circuits have held that the court has discretion to dismiss a diversity case entirely for lack of jurisdiction once the dismissal of one or more individual aggregated claims reduces the possibility of recovery below the jurisdictional requisite. n6 In such cases, the court's discretion must be based on the factors of convenience and fairness to both parties, the interests of judicial economy, and whether the amount claimed in the complaint was made in good faith, or whether the plaintiff was consciously relying on specious grounds in order to fabricate federal jurisdiction. n7 Other courts have held that if the court determined it had diversity jurisdiction initially, the dismissal of one or more claims neither ousts the court of jurisdiction nor permits discretionary dismissal. Rather, dismissal requires the defendant to show that the plaintiff filed in bad faith to rebut the presumption that the face of the complaint is a good faith representation of the actual amount in controversy. In other words, it must appear to a legal certainty that the claim is really for less than the jurisdictional minimum at the outset. Legal certainty is analyzed based on what appears on the face of the complaint; subsequent events, such as a valid defense or actual recovery of less than the requisite amount, do not automatically establish bad faith or divest jurisdiction. n8

1-5 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 5.75

§ 5.75 Burden of Proof to Establish Amountn*

[1] Burden When Amount is Contested

If the existence of the jurisdictional amount in controversy is disputed, the person asserting jurisdiction bears the burden of proof on the issue. n1 Therefore, a plaintiff who files in federal court bears the burden, n2 and a defendant who seeks removal to federal court bears the burden. n3 A defendant seeking removal bears a heavy burden in this regard, n4 while a plaintiff's burden is not a heavy one. To meet its burden of showing the amount in controversy requirement has been satisfied, the plaintiff need only show that it was not legally impossible, based on the complaint as a whole, that the plaintiff could be awarded more than the minimum statutory amount in damages. n5 If a defendant or the court challenges the plaintiff's allegations concerning the amount in controversy, the plaintiff need only produce sufficient evidence to meet the requirements of the "legal certainty" test by a preponderance of the evidence n6 supported by competent proof. Courts have held that "competent proof" means proof to a reasonable probability that jurisdiction exists. n7 Absolute certainty in valuation of the rights involved is not required if an amount in controversy exceeding the jurisdictional minimum can be ascertained according to a pragmatic formula. n8

[2] Pleading Amount in Controversy

The court must dismiss a complaint if it fails to contain a proper allegation of the amount in controversy. n1 Additionally, when the applicable jurisdictional grant imposes a jurisdictional minimum, a defendant should allege an amount in controversy in its counterclaim. For example, in one case the court ordered the defendant's counterclaim dismissed because it was not sufficiently related to the plaintiff's claims to warrant supplemental jurisdiction; because the defendant had not alleged an amount in controversy, the court determined that it lacked jurisdiction on diversity grounds as well. However, the dismissal was without prejudice and the defendant could refile thecounterclaim if good faith grounds supported the requisite jurisdictional amount. n2 In when making its determination about the existence of diversity jurisdiction, the court may consider matters outside the pleadings in order to broaden the meaning of the complaint's allegations. n3

Although a court is not divested of jurisdiction if the plaintiff obtains a judgment in an amount less than the jurisdictional minimum amount, n1 the court may impose a penalty on the plaintiff in such a case. The court may, for example, deny costs to the plaintiff or may even award costs to the adversary and impose costs on the plaintiff. n2 The courts have discretion whether to impose the penalty, and a court will generally be more likely to do so if the court has determine that the plaintiff has acted in bad faith. n3

PART IV. SUPPLEMENTAL JURISDICTION

1-5 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 5.90

§ 5.90 Supplemental Jurisdiction Concepts and Termsn*

[1] Scope of Supplemental Jurisdiction

"Supplemental jurisdiction" is a creation of statute n1 which allows a federal court to exercise jurisdiction over claims, even though they are not within the court's original jurisdiction, provided that (1) the claims are related to claims over which the court does have original jurisdiction and (2) the court has made a discretionary determination that the values of judicial economy, convenience, fairness, and comity make it appropriate to exercise jurisdiction over the claims. The purpose of the supplemental jurisdiction statute is to ensure that the court consider and weigh certain factors in each case and, at every stage of the litigation, to determine whether it should continue to exercise supplemental jurisdiction: the circumstances of the particular case, the nature of the state law claims, the character of the governing state law, and the relationship between the state and federal claims. n2 Thus, in any civil action in which a district court has original jurisdiction, the district court also has supplemental jurisdiction over all other claims that are so related to claims within that original jurisdiction that they form part of the same case or controversy; supplemental jurisdiction includes claims that involve the joinder or intervention of additional parties. n3

Prior to the enactment of the supplemental jurisdiction statute, the courts by judicial decision had provided for the exercise of this same type of jurisdiction, although the terms used for this jurisdiction were "pendent jurisdiction" and "ancillary jurisdiction." n4

[2] Former Concepts of Pendent and Ancillary Jurisdiction

The supplemental jurisdiction statute, Section 1367, has codified the court-recognized doctrines formerly labeled "pendent" and "ancillary" jurisdiction. n1 These concepts distinguished between two types of claims: (1) the addition of a nonfederal state law claim (pendent claim) which arose from the same operative fact as a federal question claim, and (2) the addition of a nonfederal claim (ancillary claim) which allowed defending parties to protect their interests in the claim in federal court without regard to jurisdiction, when the claim was related to claims over which the federal court did have original jurisdiction. However, the Supreme Court has stated that the terms of Section 1367 do not acknowledge any distinction between pendent and ancillary jurisdiction. Although they developed separately as a historical matter, the Court now recognizes that the doctrines are two species of the same issue. Furthermore, nothing in Section 1367 indicates a congressional intent to recognize, preserve, or create some meaningful, substantive distinction between these historic jurisdictional categories. n2

CHAPTER 5 ORIGINAL JURISDICTION OVER THE SUBJECT MATTER
PART IV. SUPPLEMENTAL JURISDICTION

1-5 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 5.91

§ 5.91 Controlling Lawn*

[1] Supplemental Jurisdiction Statute

The former principles of pendent and ancillary jurisdiction have been codified in the supplemental jurisdiction statute, n1 which now specifies all of the circumstances in which a federal court's original subject matter jurisdiction carries with it jurisdiction over state law claims that derive from a common nucleus of operative fact as thefederal claim, such that the relationship between the federal claim and the state claim permits the conclusion that the entire action before the court constitutes one case. n2 The supplemental jurisdiction statute also expressly provides that it controls such claims that involve the joinder or intervention of additional parties. n3

Subsection (a) of the supplemental jurisdiction statute contains the broad grant of supplemental jurisdiction, subject only to limited exceptions provided in subsections (b) and (c), or as expressly provided otherwise by federal statute. It provides that in any civil action in which the district court has original jurisdiction, it also has supplemental jurisdiction over all other claims that are so related to claims in the action within original jurisdiction that they form part of the same case or controversy under Article III of the United States Constitution, and that supplemental jurisdiction includes claims that involve the joinder or intervention of additional parties. n4

Subsection (b) of the supplemental jurisdiction statute is an exception to the grant of supplemental jurisdiction and provides that supplemental jurisdiction does not extend to claims in diversity actions under specified joinder procedures. Thus, in any civil action in which the court's original jurisdiction is founded solely on diversity, the court does not have supplemental jurisdiction over claims made under the joinder devices if exercising supplemental jurisdiction over the claim would be inconsistent with the jurisdictional requirements of the diversity statute. n4.1

Subsection (c) is an exception to the grant of supplemental jurisdiction that codifies the discretionary factors that justify a court's refusal to exercise supplemental jurisdiction. The district court may decline to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over a claim under any one of several circumstances. n5

Subsection (d) is a tolling provision that saves certain state law supplemental claims that have been dismissed in federal court, for subsequent assertion in state court. Under this tolling provision, the period of limitation for a supplemental claim asserted under subsection (a), and for other claims in the same action that are voluntarily dismissed at the same time as or after the dismissal of the claim under subsection (a), is tolled while the claim is pending and for a period of 30 days after it is dismissed, unless state law provides for a longer tolling period. n6 However, the Supreme Court has stated that this tolling provision does not apply to claims that are constitutionally infirm. Specifically, the Court has held that § 1367(d) does not toll the limitation period for state law claims asserted against nonconsenting state defendants that were dismissed from the federal court on Eleventh Amendment immunity grounds. n6.1

[2] Applicability of Supplemental Jurisdiction Doctrine

Questions of the applicability of the doctrine of supplemental jurisdiction have been raised in the following areas of substantive law:

1. Maritime and admiralty law. It has been held that the supplemental jurisdiction statute applies to non-admiralty claims in which the primary claim is within the court's admiralty jurisdiction. n1 Therefore, if an admiralty claim is properly before the court, non-admiralty claims against other parties that arise out of a common nucleus of operative facts with the admiralty claim are within the court's statutory supplemental jurisdiction. n2

2. Bankruptcy. Most courts hold that the supplemental jurisdiction applies to bankruptcy claims, provided that the ordinary requirements of the statute are met. n3 However, some courts have questioned whether the supplemental jurisdiction statute applies to the jurisdiction exercisable by bankruptcy courts. n4

3. Domestic Relations. Courts have consistently held that because of the general exception to federal jurisdiction for any domestic-relations issues a federal court may not exercise supplemental jurisdiction over a state domestic relations claim. n5

4. Civil Rights Claims. The supplemental jurisdiction statute specifically authorizes supplemental jurisdiction except as expressly provided otherwise by federal statute. Because there is nothing in Title VII of the Civil Rights Act that expressly prohibits supplemental jurisdiction, a court may exercise supplemental jurisdiction in a Title VII context in the same manner as any other federal question. n6

When a federal court has original jurisdiction over any claim, the supplemental jurisdiction statute gives the court discretion to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over all other claims in the action so related to the claim falling within original jurisdiction that they form part of the same case or controversy under Article III of the United States Constitution. n2 Legislative history indicates that by use of the "same case or controversy" standard in Section 1367, Congress intended to codify the scope of supplemental jurisdiction promulgated by the Supreme Court in United Mine Workers v. Gibbs, which used the phrase "common nucleus of operative facts." n3 Case law indicates that if either of these tests is met the court may exercise supplemental jurisdiction. n4 For a discussion of the same case or controversy standard, see § 5.93. For a discussion of the common nucleus of operative facts standard, see § 5.94.

In any civil action over which the district courts have original jurisdiction, the district courts generally have supplemental jurisdiction over all other claims that are so related to claims in the action within the original jurisdiction that they form part of the same case or controversy under Article III of the United States Constitution. n1 To determine whether a claim satisfies the "same case orcontroversy" test, the court must consider the extent to which the claim involves the same facts, occurrences, witnesses, and evidence as the claim over which the court has original jurisdiction. n2 For example, when the substance of a fourth-party defendant's claims against the original plaintiff were the same as the original defendant's compulsory counterclaims, they were part of same case or controversy, as required to fall within district court's supplemental jurisdiction. n3

CHAPTER 5 ORIGINAL JURISDICTION OVER THE SUBJECT MATTER
PART IV. SUPPLEMENTAL JURISDICTION

1-5 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 5.94

§ 5.94 Common Nucleus Standardn*

A federal court may exercise supplemental jurisdiction over a state claim whenever it is joined with a federal claim and the two claims derive from a common nucleus of operative fact and the plaintiff would ordinarily be expected to try them both in one judicial proceeding. n1 The Supreme Court found the following principles under Gibbs:

1. The federal claim has to be substantial enough to vest the district court with subject matter jurisdiction. If it was not, the district court has to dismiss or remand. n2

2. Assuming the substantiality of the federal claim, the district court has jurisdiction over the state law claim if the relationship between the federal claim and the state claim permits the conclusion that the entire action before the court comprises but one constitutional case. This is so if the claims, federal and state, "derive from a common nucleus of operative fact" and if "considered without regard to their federal or state character, a plaintiff's claims are such as he would ordinarily be expected to try them all in one judicial proceeding." If these jurisdictional requirements are met, the court has the power to try the entire case. n3

3. The Court emphasized the fact that the existence of the power of supplemental jurisdiction does not require it to be used, because pendent jurisdiction is a doctrine of discretion, not of plaintiff's right. The discretion must be exercised by weighing considerations of judicial economy, convenience, and fairness to litigants. The Court noted that in some cases where the state claims were closely tied to federal policy the arguments for exercise of pendent jurisdiction were particularly strong, such as when there was an issue of federal preemption. n4 But the Court cautioned that both principles of comity and the interests of justice dictated that needless decisions of state law be avoided, and it stated that if the federal claims are dismissed before trial even though not insubstantial in a jurisdictional sense, the state claims should be dismissed as well. n5

The lower courts have also developed several principles regarding the common nucleus test developed in Gibbs: n5.1

1. Several courts have stated that it is insufficient for supplemental jurisdiction merely to establish that "but for" one event, the other would not have happened, if there is otherwise no factual commonality between the two claims. n6 Furthermore, the test is not satisfied if proof of each case would involve entirely different presentations and evidence.

2. When the same conduct or inaction violates parallel federal and state laws, the claims clearly satisfy the common nucleus of operative facts test. n8 For example, if an employer violates parallel state and federal statutes prohibiting discrimination based on the same status, such as sex or age, it is a single case or controversy. n9

3. If one act or omission results in two different kinds of injuries to two different persons, it is nevertheless a result of a common nucleus and is a single case or controversy. For example, conduct that causes personal injury to one and loss of consortium to another involves the same case or controversy. n10 On the other hand, two different legal prohibitions reaching similar conduct do not necessarily form part of the same case or controversy. For example, constitutional challenges to two different statutes or regulations, one under the federal First Amendment and the other under the state constitution, do not form part of the same case or controversy merely by the fact that both arguably reach the same conduct. n11

CHAPTER 5 ORIGINAL JURISDICTION OVER THE SUBJECT MATTER
PART IV. SUPPLEMENTAL JURISDICTION

1-5 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 5.95

§ 5.95 Supplemental Jurisdiction and Addition of Partiesn*

[1] Generally No Supplemental Jurisdiction in Diversity Cases

The supplemental jurisdiction statute expressly prohibits the extension of supplemental jurisdiction in diversity cases over claims by plaintiffs against persons made parties under Rules 14, 19, 20, or 24 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, or over claims by persons proposed to be joined as plaintiffs under Rule 19, or seeking to intervene as plaintiffs under Rule 24. n1 This means that even though the supplemental jurisdiction statute expressly applies to joinder of claims that are related to federal question claims it is generally available to join nondiverse plaintiffs and defendants in diversity cases. However, nothing in the statute withholds jurisdiction over claims of plaintiffs permissively joined under Rule 20 or certified as class members under Rule 23. n2

[2] Impleader

Because supplemental jurisdiction is excluded under the statute with respect to Rule 14 impleader cases only if impleader is sought by a plaintiff, n1 claims by defendants against impleaded third-party defendants fall within the grant of supplemental jurisdiction in Section 1367(a). n2 Therefore, the statute continues the pre-Section 1367 practice that a federal district court has supplemental jurisdiction over a defendant's proper Rule 14(a) claim against a third-party defendant without regard to whether an independent basis of jurisdiction exists, provided that the court has jurisdiction over the main claim between the original parties. n3

[3] Compulsory Joinder

Rule 19(a) generally provides for the compulsory joinder of certain parties who are subject to service of process and whose joinder will not deprive the court of subject matter jurisdiction. n1 However, the supplemental jurisdiction statute prohibits the assertion of supplemental jurisdiction over claims in diversity cases both by plaintiffs against persons made defending parties under Rule 19 and by other persons proposed to be joined as plaintiffs under Rule 19, when exercising jurisdiction over the claim would be inconsistent with the diversity jurisdictional requirements. n2 The prohibition on plaintiffs' bringing claims against parties joined under Rule 19 is fully consistent with the legislative intent to deter plaintiffs from resorting to diversity jurisdiction. n3

[4] Permissive Joinder

[a] Federal Question Cases

Rule 20 permissive joinder allows all persons to join in one action as plaintiffs if they assert any right to relief jointly, severally, or in the alternative, in respect of or arising out of the same transaction, occurrence, or series of transactions or occurrences and if any question of law or fact common to all these persons will arise in the action. n1 In contrast to the rule for diversity cases, n2 the supplemental jurisdiction statute permits the exercise of supplemental jurisdiction in a federal question case with respect to plaintiffs joined under Rule 20 permissive joinder. n3 Additionally, the supplemental jurisdiction statute explicitly provides that supplemental jurisdiction includes claims that involve the joinder or intervention of additional parties. n4 Consequently, if the court has federal question jurisdiction over one plaintiff's claim against a defendant, a permissively joined plaintiff's state claim against that defendant is supported by supplemental jurisdiction without regard to the diversity of the parties. n5

[b] Diversity Cases

By its terms, the supplemental jurisdiction statute provides that in cases based on diversity, supplemental jurisdiction does not extend to claims by plaintiffs against persons made defending parties under Rule 20. n6 However, the supplemental jurisdiction statute allows supplemental jurisdiction in cases involving Rule 20 joinder of plaintiffs, provided that the requirements of Section 1367(a) have been met, at least if the need for supplemental jurisdiction derives from the failure of the joined party's claim to meet the jurisdictional minimum provided in the diversity jurisdiction statute. On the other hand, supplemental jurisdiction of persons joined as plaintiffs is not allowed if the reason that the court lacks jurisdiction over the joined party's claim is that joinder would destroy complete diversity, rather than because of the failure to meet the jurisdictional minimum. n7

[5] Intervention

Section 1367(b), which applies only to diversity cases, withholds supplemental jurisdiction over the claims of plaintiffs who seek to intervene pursuant to Rule 24. n1 However, under the supplemental jurisdiction statute, claims against nondiverse parties asserted by persons seeking to intervene as plaintiffs are not supported by supplemental jurisdiction in a diversity action, even if intervention is by right under Rule 24(a). n2 Under the supplemental jurisdiction statute, a person may intervene as a defendant and then assert a counterclaim against a nondiverse plaintiff or a cross claim against a nondiverse party. n3 However, the plaintiff may not respond with a claim against a nondiverse intervenor because it would be a claim made by a plaintiff against a person made a party under Rule 24, a result expressly prohibited by the supplemental jurisdiction statute. n4

PART II Jurisdiction; Venue; Removal
CHAPTER 5 ORIGINAL JURISDICTION OVER THE SUBJECT MATTER
PART IV. SUPPLEMENTAL JURISDICTION

1-5 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 5.96

§ 5.96 Court's Discretion to Exercise Supplemental Jurisdictionn*

[1] Court Generally Required to Exercise Supplemental Jurisdiction

Although supplemental jurisdiction is not mandatory, n1 courts have held that if the grounds exist, n2 the trial court should exercise supplemental jurisdiction unless one of the exceptions stated in the statute applies. n2.1 In other words, because of the dichotomy between a federal court's power to exercise supplemental jurisdiction under Section 1367(a) and its discretion to decline to exercise such jurisdiction under Section 1367(c), once a district court determines that it has power to exercise supplemental jurisdiction under Section 1367(a), then the court should exercise that jurisdiction unless Section 1367(b) n3 or Section 1367(c) applies to limit that exercise. n4 The exceptions are discussed in [2], below.

[2] Exceptions That Allow Court to Refuse to Exercise Supplemental Jurisdiction

[a] Novel or Complex Issue of State Law

A district court has discretion to decline to exercise supplemental jurisdiction it has over a claim if the claim raises a novel or complex issue of state law. n1 This provision is frequently used to decline jurisdiction in cases in which state law in the area is unsettled. n2 It also may be used to avoid construction of a state constitutional provision in federal court. n3

[b] Supplemental Claim Substantially Predominates

A district court may decline to exercise supplemental jurisdiction it has over a claim if the claim substantially predominates over the claim or claims over which the district court has original jurisdiction. n4 This provision is a codification of one of the factors articulated by the Supreme Court, when it stated that if it appears that the pendent state issues substantially predominate, whether in terms of proof, the scope of the issues raised, or the comprehensiveness of the remedy sought, the state claims may be dismissed without prejudice and left for resolution by state tribunals. n5 In answering the question of whether state law predominates, the court should consider the nature of the claims as set forth in the pleading and by determining whether the state law claims are more complex or require more judicial resources to adjudicate or are more pertinent in the case as a whole than the federal law claims. n6 The court should also consider whether there are methods by which the action might be managed in order to prevent the state law claims from predominating, such as by bifurcating the litigation, certifying a limited class action, or utilizing other case management tools. n6.1

[c] Court Has Dismissed Original Jurisdiction Claims

If the court dismisses all of the claims that formed the basis of its original federal subject matter jurisdiction, the effect of the dismissal on supplemental claims depends on the grounds for dismissal. If the federal claim was dismissed for lack of subject matter jurisdiction, a district court has no discretion to retain the supplemental claims for adjudication. Such a dismissal means that there never was a valid claim within the court's original jurisdiction to which the state claims could be supplemental. Consequently, the district court has no discretion to exceed the scope of its Article III power and must dismiss the state law claims without prejudice. n6.2

However, a district court also has discretion to refuse to exercise supplemental jurisdiction if the district court has dismissed all claims over which it has original jurisdiction. n7 This provision is also a codification of one of the factors articulated by the Supreme Court. n8 It should be noted that dismissal of supplemental claims is not required on dismissal of all federal claims. The district court retains the power to hear a supplemental state claim after dismissal of all federal claims if, on balance, the underlying values indicate that it should be heard. n9

To make this determination, the court must reassess its jurisdiction by making a practical reevaluation under the circumstances of the myriad of considerations that control whether to exercise supplemental jurisdiction in the first instance, n10 including judicial economy, convenience, fairness, and comity. n11

[d] Compelling Reasons Under Exceptional Circumstances

A district court has discretion to decline to exercise supplemental jurisdiction if, in exceptional circumstances, there are other compelling reasons to decline jurisdiction. n12 For example, a court may conclude that declining jurisdiction best accommodates the values of economy, convenience, fairness, and comity. n13 Thus, one court declined for this reason to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over claims that were the subject of a pending state court proceeding. n14 Another exceptional circumstance may be a conflict with a state jurisdiction statute. Thus, in one case it was held that a provision of the Tennessee Governmental Tort Liability Act (TGTLA), giving Tennessee circuit courts exclusive jurisdiction over suits brought under the Act, provided an exceptional circumstance justifying the district court's decision to decline to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over a TGTLA claim asserted against a county jail employee in his official capacity in connection with a Section 1983 action arising from an assault of an inmate at a county jail. n15

[3] Standard of Review for Discretionary Exercise of Supplemental Jurisdiction

A district court's decision whether to exercise or decline supplemental jurisdiction over state law claims is reviewed for abuse of discretion. n1 Furthermore, a party's failure to challenge a court's decision to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over state law claims constitutes waiver in the absence of special circumstances. n2

CHAPTER 5 ORIGINAL JURISDICTION OVER THE SUBJECT MATTER
PART IV. SUPPLEMENTAL JURISDICTION

1-5 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 5.97

§ 5.97 Statute of Limitationn*

The supplemental jurisdiction statute has a tolling provision to save supplemental claims that have been dismissed in federal court, so that the party may assert them in state court. Under the provision, the period of limitation for any claim asserted under Section 1367(a), and for any other claim in the same action that is voluntarily dismissed at the same time as or after the dismissal of the claim under subsection Section 1367(a), is tolled while the claim is pending and for a period of 30 days after it is dismissed, unless state law provides for a longer tolling period. n1

However, this tolling provision does not apply to any claim irrespective of the reason for its dismissal. Thus, the Supreme Court has stated that this tolling provision does not apply to preserve state law claims that are constitutionally infirm. Specifically, the Supreme Court has held that § 1367(d) does not toll the limitation period for state law claims asserted against nonconsenting statedefendants, when the federal court dismissed the claim on constitutional, Eleventh Amendment immunity grounds. n1.1

Before enactment of the supplemental jurisdiction statute, courts of appeals frequently considered it an abuse of discretion to fail to retain jurisdiction over a pendent state claim if a state statute of limitation expired before dismissal of the anchor federal claim. n2 The statute allows supplemental state claims to be heard in state court if the jurisdiction-conferring claim is dismissed and provides a brief window of opportunity for the plaintiff to file in state court without giving the opposition a limitation defense. n3

CHAPTER 6 PERSONAL JURISDICTION AND SERVICE OF PROCESS
PART I. PERSONAL JURISDICTION

-6 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 6.01

§ 6.01 Nature of Personal Jurisdictionn*

[1] Definition of Personal Jurisdiction

"Personal jurisdiction" for a federal court is the courts' statutory or constitutional authority to hear a case based on the relationship of a given defendant to the particular geographic area in which a case is brought. Thus, personal jurisdiction refers to the court's ability to assert judicial authority over the parties and bind them by its adjudication. Service of process is the usual method for creating a court's personal jurisdiction. In this regard, a person amenable to an assertion of subject-matter jurisdiction is not subject to exercise of that jurisdiction in a particular case until the person has been properly served. Both the assertion of authority and the subsequent service must be statutorily and constitutionally permissible. Due process requires certain ties or contacts between a defendant and the forum which asserts jurisdiction. n1

Personal jurisdiction is required when the claimant wants to obtain a personal money judgment or an injunction against the defendant. The type of connection or relationship between the defendant and the forum determines the type of jurisdiction a court may exercise and the type of judgment it may render. If the defendant personally has an appropriate connection with the forum, the court may exercise personal jurisdiction over the defendant. n2 Personal jurisdiction is necessary to enable a court to render a judgment in personam. A judgment "in personam" is a judgment that determines whether the defendant must do or refrain from doing some specific act or pay the plaintiff a sum of money. n3

A court usually obtains jurisdiction over the person or the property that is the subject of the suit through the procedure of "service of a summons" pursuant to Rule 4. n4 Note, however, that proper service by itself does not establish personal jurisdiction. The procedure of invoking jurisdiction by service of process is distinct from the requirement of a jurisdictional basis, and a defendant must still have the required contacts with the state. n5 Conversely, even if a proper jurisdictional basis exists, service of process that does not meet due process and statutory requirements will impair jurisdiction. n6 The traditional territorial power theory is likely responsible for any confusion between the basis and the procedure requirements for jurisdiction, because, according to early theory, personal service of process within the forum state was the only adequate basis for personal jurisdiction over a non-consenting nonresident defendant.

There are two categories of personal jurisdiction: specific and general. Specific personal jurisdiction is exercised by the court when the matter before the court arises out of or relates to the nonresident defendant's contacts with the forum. General personal jurisdiction is exercised when the matter is not one arising out of or related to the nonresident defendant's contacts with a particular forum. n7

[2] Categories of Personal Jurisdiction

[a] Specific Personal Jurisdiction

Personal jurisdiction is categorized in two ways: specific and general. A court has specific personal jurisdiction over a matter before the court when the matter arises out of or relates to the nonresident defendant's contacts with the forum. n1 General personal jurisdiction is exercised where the matter is not one arising out of or related to the nonresident defendant's contacts with a particular forum. n2 The primary characteristic of specific personal jurisdiction it that it may be based on less significant contacts, while general personal jurisdiction requires more substantial contacts. n3

To satisfy due process in the exercise of specific personal jurisdiction, the nature and quality of the nonresident defendant's contacts with the forum must be significant in relation to the specific cause of action. This requires a showing that the defendant purposefully directed his or her activities at residents of the forum, and by doing so, availed himself or herself of the privilege of conducting activities in forum, and invoking the benefits and protections of the forum's laws. n4 Thus, even if a nonresident defendant's contacts with the forum state could not be characterized as "substantial, continuous, and systematic" in order to support general jurisdiction, n5 a defendant may still be subject to specific jurisdiction for claims arising from or related to any of its specific activities within the state.

The Ninth Circuit has a three-part test for specific jurisdiction: (1) the defendant must act in way or consummate some transaction amounting to purposeful availment of privilege of conducting activities in forum state; (2) the claim must arise out of or result from defendant's forum-related activities; and (3) exercise of jurisdiction must be reasonable. n6 If the plaintiff is able to make that showing, the defendant will have the burden of showing, from a balance of interest factors, that the state's exercise of specific jurisdiction would be unfair. n7

[b] General Personal Jurisdiction

"General personal jurisdiction" is jurisdiction that the court may exercised even though the matter before the court is not one arising out of or related to the nonresident defendant's contacts with a particular forum. Thus, general personal jurisdiction arises from a defendant's contacts with the forum that are unrelated to particular cause of action being litigated. The due process requirements for general personal jurisdiction are more stringent than for specific personal jurisdiction and require a showing of continuous and systematic general contacts between the defendant and the forum state. n8 Thus, only if a defendant's activities within the forum state are either "continuous and systematic" or are "substantial," will the state have a sufficient relationship with the defendant to assert general jurisdiction. n9 Conversely, if a defendant's forum activities are continuing and systematic, jurisdiction may be proper without a relationship between a defendant's particular act and cause of action. n10

[3] Personal Jurisdiction Contrasted with Jurisdiction Over Property

A federal district court may assert in personam jurisdiction based on state law, n1 and a state has the authority to assert its jurisdictional power over any property within its borders. By virtue of its jurisdiction over property, a court may entertain an action "in rem" or "quasi-in-rem." However, a judgment in an action in rem is effective to determine interests of persons in specific property, but it does not impose any personal obligation on the defendant, unlike a judgment in personam. Although jurisdiction over property is subject to the same constitutional restrictions that govern personal jurisdiction, n2 the only type of judgment a court may render by virtue of its jurisdiction over property is one that affects that particular item alone of the defendant's property. n3 Jurisdiction over property is necessary to enable a court to render a judgment in rem or quasi-in-rem. Personal jurisdiction, by contrast, is necessary to enable a court to render a judgment in personam. n4

[4] Personal Jurisdiction Contrasted With Subject-Matter Jurisdiction

The fact that the word "jurisdiction" has several meanings depending on the context in which it is used is perhaps best illustrated by the differences between subject-matter jurisdiction and personal jurisdiction, both of which are encompassed by a reference to the term "jurisdiction." The requirement of subject-matter jurisdiction is based in the constitutional authority of a federal court to hear a cause of action--therefore the question of subject-matter jurisdiction is always open and courts at every stage of a proceeding are required to consider the issue even though the parties have failed to raise it or have even consented to subject-matter jurisdiction. n1

On the other hand, personal jurisdiction is concerned with the relationship of a given defendant to the particular geographic area in which a case is brought. n2 It refers to the court's ability to assert judicial authority over the particular parties and bind them by its adjudication. Furthermore, a person amenable to the assertion of jurisdiction may not be subject to exercise of that jurisdiction until the person has been properly served. Both that assertion of authority and the subsequent service must be statutorily and constitutionally permissible. n3 Because personal jurisdiction exists to protect parties' constitutional rights only, it is subject to waiver and procedural default. n4

[5] Personal Jurisdiction Contrasted With Venue

Personal jurisdiction is the authority of a court to hear a case regarding a particular defendant; any court within that territory may be able to exercise personal jurisdiction over the defendant. Venue, on the other hand, is the designation of which of those courts is the proper court to hear the particular claim or action. Venue rules generally provide that the action be brought in the county or district where the defendant lives, where the cause of action arose, or where the property is located. n1 Although both venue and personal jurisdiction rules are concerned with the convenience of the parties and witnesses, venue differs from both personal and subject-matter jurisdiction. Venue is concerned with the relationship of the defendants and the events to the particular judicial district in which a case is brought. Like personal jurisdiction, venue relates to location, and concerns the particular place where judicial authority may be exercised. n2

Rules of venue give the defendant a privilege not to be sued in a forum other than one designated as proper; they do not affect the court's power over the particular person or property in question or the court's competence. n3

Like lack of personal jurisdiction, improper venue also may be waived. n4 However, a defendant may challenge personal jurisdiction in a collateral attack but may not raise a venue objection in a separate proceeding. n5

If a case is brought in a court of improper venue, and a timely objection is made by the defendant, the case may be dismissed, or it may be transferred to a court of proper venue. n6 On the other hand, if a court lacks personal jurisdiction, a state court will have to dismiss the case, but a federal court may be able to transfer the case to a court where personal jurisdiction is proper. n7

[6] Personal Jurisdiction Subject to Waiver

A court must always have jurisdiction over the subject matter of an action. The court must also have jurisdiction over the defendant or, if the action is in rem, over the property that is the subject of the action. Thus, even if the court has subject-matter jurisdiction, it may not render a valid decision unless it has jurisdiction over the person or the property that is specified in the claim for relief made to the court. n1 Personal jurisdiction exists primarily to protect parties' constitutional rights, and it is therefore subject to the normal rules of waiver and procedural default; this is in contrast to subject-matter jurisdiction which may not be waived in any case. n2 Because personal jurisdiction represents a restriction on judicial power as a matter of individual liberty, any party may insist that the requirement be observed, or any party may waive that right, effectively consenting to the court's exercise of adjudicatory authority. n3

Unlike subject matter jurisdiction, a party that is named as a defendant in a claim for relief may waive the defense of lack of personal jurisdiction. n4 A person may waive personal jurisdiction either expressly, by consenting to jurisdiction, or impliedly by failing to object in a timely manner or by failing to use the proper procedure. If the defendant gives no indication that it is objecting to lack of personal jurisdiction, the court should not raise it on its own motion, because the defendant's consent is sufficient to give the court jurisdiction over the defendant's person. n5

Once a party has waived the defense of lack of personal jurisdiction, the court may not raise or revive the issue on the court's own initiative. Personal jurisdiction is a defense that is particularly subject to waiver because the court may acquire personal jurisdiction through a party's voluntary appearance. Thus, a party that does not assert the defense in a timely fashion voluntarily appears and confers personal jurisdiction on the court. If a party consents to personal jurisdiction by failing to raise the issue in a timely manner, the district court is not free to nullify that consent. n5.1

[7] Effect of Lack of Personal Jurisdiction

Unless it has been waived, n1 a court without personal jurisdiction or in rem jurisdiction has no authority over the particular person or property before it. If the court proceeds to hear the action, its judgment is not valid. n2 Consequently, the court may not impose personal liability on the defendant or affect the defendant's property rights. n3

If a court lacks personal jurisdiction, it also means that a subsequent federal court or the court of another state is not required to enforce the judgment. If the first court has made an error in exercising personal jurisdiction, the error may be challenged either in the court in which the action is originally brought, or, if no such challenge is made in the first court and the error in jurisdiction is not waived, in a later proceeding in a second court. The former challenge is called a direct attack; the latter is called a collateral attack. The assertion of lack of jurisdiction of the first court as a defense in a subsequent proceeding to enforce the judgment in the second court is a typical example of a collateral attack. n4

PART II Jurisdiction; Venue; Removal
CHAPTER 6 PERSONAL JURISDICTION AND SERVICE OF PROCESS
PART I. PERSONAL JURISDICTION

-6 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 6.02

§ 6.02 Personal Jurisdiction Based on Court's Physical Power Over Defendant or Defendant's Propertyn*

[1] Court's Physical Power Based on Presence, Consent, and Domicile

Traditionally, the constitutional exercise of jurisdiction has consistently been permitted based on the physical power of the court over the defendant because of the presence of the defendant or the defendant's property. In addition to the physical power theory, the Supreme Court later identified two additional bases for personal jurisdiction related to the physical power theory: jurisdiction based on consent or voluntary appearance and jurisdiction based on domicile within the forum. Jurisdiction based on appearance or consent is actually a recognition of the physical presence theory.

If a defendant is physically present in court, the defendant is under the court's power. If the defendant consents to jurisdiction, even though not physically present, he or she has submitted to the court's power. Jurisdiction based on domicile within the state also conforms to the physical power theory. Although a defendant is not always physically present within the state where he or she is domiciled, the defendant has a permanent physical connection with the state and is regularly subject to the power of the courts of the state for many purposes, even while temporarily absent. n1 For a discussion of the application of the physical power personal jurisdictional basis by modern courts, see [2], below.

[2] Application of Physical Power Theory

[a] Presence

The Supreme Court has unanimously upheld the constitutionality of jurisdiction based on personal service of process on a transient nonresident merely because the person was physically present in the state. In this regard, service of process on a person voluntarily in state suffices to confer personal jurisdiction without regard to whether the defendant was only briefly in the state or whether the cause of action was related to his or her activities. n1 The transient presence of property has also been held sufficient to permit the exercise of long-arm jurisdiction over an insurer that insured such transient property against risks in general. n2

[b] Consent

[i] Express Consent

A defendant may expressly consent by agreement to a court's jurisdiction. Courts generally determine that personal jurisdiction is adequate based on such a contractual consent, even in the absence of other contacts with the forum and even if no official steps are taken to notify the defendant other than those specified in the agreement. n3 Generally, contracts executed before an action are valid to effect personal jurisdiction; however, in some states consent to jurisdiction by agreement is effective only if made after the action has been commenced. n4

There are two types of consent agreements that are typically used. Non-exclusive consent to jurisdiction clauses are fairly common in commercial contracts. These normally include a requirement that one or both parties submit to jurisdiction in a designated court for any action arising out of, or attempting to enforce, the contract and may prescribe a method of notice. Non-exclusive clauses may not contain mandatory provisions and usually do not contain venue language. n5

These clauses have generally been upheld as a constitutionally adequate basis for jurisdiction, n6 unless a clause is deemed not to be part of the actual agreement or is deemed to be part of an adhesion contract. Adhesion contracts, however, are not unreasonable per se but only if fundamentally unfair. n7 Therefore, a non-exclusive consent to jurisdiction clause is not necessarily unenforceable because the agreement is part of a form contract even if the contract is prepared by a corporation and requires an individual to submit to jurisdiction. n8

The second type of consent to jurisdiction clauses are "exclusive" jurisdiction clauses, known as a prorogation clauses, which require the parties to submit to the jurisdiction of a designated court, to the exclusion of all other courts, for any action that may arise from a given transaction or relationship. Although common-law courts historically would not enforce such clauses, the Supreme Court has held that prorogation agreements are prima facie valid and should be enforced, unless the agreement is unreasonable or unjust, was procured by fraud or overreaching, violates the forum's strong public policy, or litigation in the designated forum would be seriously inconvenient. n9

There are limitations on prorogation agreements. A prorogation clause generally binds only the parties to the agreement and, therefore is not binding on third parties, even though the action arises out of the contract or transaction to which the clause relates. n10 Also, while some courts hold that prorogation clauses apply to contract related tort claims, as well as contract claims, unless the language of the agreement compels a contrary conclusion, n11 others take the opposite view, holding that a prorogation clause does not apply to tort claims. n12

In addition, the Supreme Court has held that a prorogation clause will not necessarily preclude a venue transfer to a different, more convenient forum pursuant to federal statute. n13 Federal law, rather than state law, governs the enforcement of prorogation clauses in federal courts both for claims arising under federal law and in diversity cases. n14

[ii] Implied Consent by Appearance

If a nonresident defendant makes a general appearance in an action, the defendant is deemed to have consented to the jurisdiction of the court. n15 The term "appearance" designates an overt act by which a person submits himself or herself to a court's jurisdiction. An appearance may be expressly made by formal written or oral declaration, or record entry, or it may be implied from some act done with the intention of appearing and submitting to the court's jurisdiction. n15.1 There are two types of appearances, general or special. In a "general appearance," the person appearing before the court is not making any qualification or limitation on the appearance. n15.2 In a special appearance, the person appearing before the court is making a specific limitation, such as that the appearance is for the sole purpose of raising a lack of jurisdiction. n15.3 The expression "general appearance" is still widely used to describe acts by the defendant sufficient to support jurisdiction, even in discussions of jurisdiction in courts that have adopted the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. n15.4 Under the federal rules, it is no longer necessary to enter a formal "special appearance" to object to a court's exercise of personal jurisdiction; rather, a defendant should object to defects in personal jurisdiction by attacking the validity of service of process pursuant to Rule 12(b). n15.5 On the other hand, a person is deemed to have waived objections to personal jurisdiction if the person requests the court to take some affirmative action on behalf of the party. n15.6 It should be noted that any sort of participation by the defendant or the defendant's alter ego other than merely to contest jurisdiction in the action is constitutionally sufficient as a jurisdictional basis. n16 Furthermore, a plaintiff who commences an action in a state that would not otherwise be able to obtain jurisdiction over the plaintiff's person consents to jurisdiction there for any counterclaim. n17

Many state laws preserve the procedure of the special appearance, which is the right to appear to present a jurisdictional challenge without submitting to the court's jurisdiction for any other purposes; in any event, all states allow some kind of device to challenge personal jurisdiction without submitting to jurisdiction for other purposes. n18 The technical requirements for making a special appearance may vary from state to state, as do the types of acts by the defendant that turn an attempted special appearance into a general appearance that constitutes waiver of defects in personal jurisdiction. n19 State law is relevant in such issues because when federal subject jurisdiction is based on diversity, state law determines adequacy of personal jurisdiction. n20

PART I. PERSONAL JURISDICTION

-6 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 6.03

§ 6.03 Personal Jurisdiction Based on Defendant's Contacts with Forumn*

[1] Development of Personal Jurisdiction Based on Contacts

In International Shoe Co. v. Washington, the Supreme Court ended exclusive reliance on the physical power theory n1 as the basis for jurisdiction and established the basic principles that have guided more recent developments in personal jurisdiction law. Instead, the Court held that personal jurisdiction rules should focus on a defendant's contacts with the forum state. n2 Historically, the jurisdiction of courts to render judgments in personam had been based on their de facto power over the defendant's person. Hence a defendant's presence within the territorial jurisdiction of a court had been a prerequisite to its rendition of personally binding judgment.

In this case, the Court held that the absolute requirement of presence had given way to personal service of summons or other form of notice; and that if the defendant was not present within the territory of the forum, due process required only that the defendant have certain minimum contacts with it such that the maintenance of the suit did not offend "traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice." Thus, whether a state may constitutionally exercise personal jurisdiction over a nonresident defendant now depends on the "quality and nature" of the defendant's forum-related activities. n3 To determine that the maintenance of the suit did not offend traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice, a state court had to make an "estimate of the inconveniences" to the defendant as a result of a trial away from its home. n4

Under contacts analysis, personal jurisdiction may not be defeated simply because a nonresident defendant did not enter the state. Rather, to satisfy due process the nature and quality of the nonresident defendant's contacts with the forum must be significant in relation to the specific cause of action. This requires a showing that the defendant purposefully directed activities at residents of the forum and by doing so availed himself or herself of the privilege of conducting activities in the forum and invoking the benefits and protections of the forum's laws. As a corollary to this "purposeful availment" requirement, courts consider whether the putative nonresident defendant could reasonably have anticipated being haled into court in the forum state. The "contacts" requirement protects a defendant from being subjected to personal jurisdiction as a result of fortuitous, attenuated or random contacts or as a result of the unilateral activity of another party. n5 Thus, the contacts connecting the defendant to the forum state must be the foreseeable result of the defendant's own purposeful conduct and not simply that of the plaintiff or of third parties. n6

[2] Applicable Test Depends on Classification as Whether Personal Jurisdiction is Specific or General

In its latest test to determine whether a court has personal jurisdiction over a nonresident, the Supreme Court has adopted terminology that distinguishes between "specific" and "general" jurisdiction. n1"Specific jurisdiction" is jurisdiction to adjudicate claims that arise only from the defendant's actual contacts with the forum state. n2 Thus, if a defendant does not have ongoing contacts with a state, and is therefore not amenable to general jurisdiction, the state may exercise jurisdiction over the defendant only for claims that arise out of the defendant's forum contacts.

Specific jurisdiction may be available when the defendant has few contacts, or even a single contact, with the forum state when the claim in issue arises directly from the contacts. n3 A typical example is the exercise of specific jurisdiction over a nonresident defendant who has committed a tort within the state. n4

By contrast, "general jurisdiction" refers to jurisdiction to adjudicate claims that do not necessarily arise from the defendant's contacts with the forum state. n5 Thus, if a defendant is amenable to general jurisdiction in a state, the state may exercise jurisdiction over the defendant based on any claim, including claims unrelated to the defendant's contacts with the state. General jurisdiction ordinarily exists only when the defendant's forum connections are continuous, systematic, and substantial. Therefore, the state has general jurisdiction over natural persons who are domiciliaries of the state and corporations that are incorporated in the state, and the state may also assert general jurisdiction over nonresidents if their forum connections are substantial. Note, however, that the general jurisdiction requirement of presence and service in the state is an independent, adequate basis for personal jurisdiction, even if the defendant has no other forum state contacts. n6 For further discussion of the distinction between specific personal jurisdiction and general personal jurisdiction, see § 6.01[2]

[3] Contacts Test for Specific Personal Jurisdiction

[a] Test Described

If claims directly arise from or relate to the alleged activities of the defendant within a particular state, that state may have personal jurisdiction over the defendant even if the nonresident defendant's contacts with the state are not "substantial, continuous and systematic. This personal jurisdiction, known as "specific personal jurisdiction," n1 requires a showing by the plaintiff that: n2 (1) the plaintiff's cause of action arose out of or is related to the defendant's forum contacts n3 and (2) the nonresident defendant has purposefully established significant contact with the forum state, as opposed to a random, fortuitous, or attenuated contact. n4 Once the plaintiff has made such a showing, the defendant has the burden of showing, from the balance of interest factors, that the state's exercise of specific jurisdiction would be unfair. n5

[b] Nature of Required Contacts

For purposes of personal jurisdiction analysis, the term "contacts" means both acts physically performed in the forum state and acts performed outside the forum state that have an effect within the forum. n6 In other words, personal jurisdiction analysis requires the court to determine whether there were "contacts," and, if so, whether those contacts were purposeful on behalf of the defendant. n7 It should be noted that one purposeful act with effects in forum state may create sufficient contact to support specific personal jurisdiction; and it is sufficient for purposes of due process that the suit was based on a contact that had substantial connection with that state. n8

The Supreme Court has made it clear that the contact must be the result of the defendant's purposeful availment. n9 Thus, when the defendant deliberately has engaged in significant activities within a state or has created 'continuing obligations' between itself and residents of the forum, it manifestly has availed itself of the privilege of conducting business there, and because its activities are shielded by the benefits and protections of the forum's laws it is presumptively not unreasonable to require the defendant to submit to the burdens of litigation in that forum as well.

Furthermore, contacts must be significant, and not random, fortuitous, or attenuated. n10

As a general rule, each defendant's contacts with the forum state must be assessed individually. n11 However, general rules of vicarious liability still apply for personal jurisdictional determinations. n12 Only if a person would be vicariously liable for the acts or omissions of another would the person be subject to personal jurisdiction on the basis of the other person being subject to personal jurisdiction. n13

For example, because a corporation is a legal entity, whether a corporation has made contacts justifying the exercise of personal jurisdiction is actually a question of whether the contacts made by its agents and employees are sufficient to justify the exercise of jurisdiction. If so, the acts of the corporation's agents and employees will be attributed to the corporation for jurisdictional purposes, provided they were within the course and scope of the agency or employment. n14 On the other hand, because a parent corporation and a subsidiary are separate legal entities, sufficient contacts with the parent do not necessarily ensure personal jurisdiction over the subsidiary, n15 nor, conversely, do sufficient contacts with the subsidiary ensure personal jurisdiction over the parent. n16 Only when the parent corporation has significant control over the subsidiary, n17 or when the separateness is actually a sham, may the contacts of one be imputed to the other. n17.1

Under the "government contacts" exception to the exercise of personal jurisdiction, if a person's contacts with a state or the District of Columbia are not voluntary, but the person is merely contacting the government in that forum, the contacts may not serve as the basis for personal jurisdiction. n17.2 The purpose of the exception is to protect an individual's right to transact business with a federal agency or other entity without being exposed to specific jurisdiction. n18

[c] Requirement of Purposeful Availment

In addition to the requirement that the cause of action must be related to the contact with the forum state, the plaintiff must also show that the contact is properly attributable to the defendant. Thus, it is essential in obtaining personal jurisdiction to establish that there has been some act by which the defendant purposefully availed itself of the privilege of conducting activities within the forum state, and therefore invoked the benefits and protections of the forum's laws. n19 This "purposeful availment" must be considered first, before it is necessary to consider the interest-balancing test. n20 The purposeful availment requirement ensures that the defendant has had fair warning that its action would render it amenable to suit in the forum state. n21 Note, however, that the defendant's physical entry into or presence in the forum state is not required; the absence of physical contacts with the forum state will not defeat jurisdiction if the defendant has purposefully directed its activities toward forum residents. n22

[d] Consideration of Fairness

Once the plaintiff has shown that the defendant has purposefully established minimum contacts within the forum state giving rise to the claim or claims in the action, n23 the defendant may refute specific personal jurisdiction by showing from the balance of several factors that the state's exercise of specific jurisdiction would be unfair. n24 In this analysis, the court must determine whether the nature and quality of the defendant's purposeful contacts would make it fair play and substantial justice to subject the defendant to jurisdiction there, considering the following factors: (1) the extent of the burden imposed on the defendant; n25 (2) the forum state's interest in adjudicating the dispute; n26 (3) the plaintiff's interest in obtaining effective relief; n27 (4) the interstate interest in obtaining the most efficient resolution of controversies; n28 (5) the shared interest of the several states in furthering fundamental substantive policies; n29 and (6) whether there is an alternative forum. n30 The defendant has the burden of showing that the state's exercise of specific personal jurisdiction is unfair or unreasonable. n31

[4] Contacts Test for General Personal Jurisdiction

The Supreme Court has adopted a test which provides that if a defendant has sufficient contacts with a forum state, personal jurisdiction may exist over the defendant for a claim or cause of action even if the claim or cause of action is unrelated to those contacts; this type of jurisdiction is known as general personal jurisdiction. n1 General jurisdiction arises when a defendant maintains continuous and systematic contacts with the forum state even when the cause of action has no relation to those contacts. n1.1 This test appears to be fairly flexible. It generally requires an analysis of the strength and duration of the contacts and the nature of the litigation to determine whether the contacts are sufficiently "substantial." n2 Even if the defendant is engaged in "continuous and systematic" activities within the forum state, due process requires that the exercise of general jurisdiction be reasonable, which means that it must meet an interest-balancing standard. n3 Courts have stated that because the particular claim need not be related to the defendant's conduct, the due process requirements for general personal jurisdiction are more stringent than for specific personal jurisdiction, and therefore require the showing of continuous and systematic general business contacts between the defendant and the forum state. n4

The Supreme Court has noted that the level of contacts required for general jurisdiction requires a more systematic degree than the level for specific jurisdiction. n5 Consequently, the lower courts must engage in a more rigorous analysis for general jurisdiction and broad constructions of general personal jurisdiction are generally disfavored. n6 For example, a district court has suggested that a court should exercise general jurisdiction when a non-resident defendant's commercial activities are such that the defendant is enough of an "insider" in the forum that the defendant may be safely relegated to the state's political processes. "Insiders" are those individuals and corporations that function within a state as if they were local. n6.1 The general jurisdiction requirement of "continuous and systematic" contacts typically requires that the defendant have an office in the forum state, although less contact with the forum state has been found sufficient for general jurisdiction. n7

§ 6.04 Personal Jurisdiction Based on Internet Contactsn*

[1] Nature of Internet Contacts

The increased use of the Internet has also increased the litigation regarding analysis of personal jurisdictional contacts. An Internet website, requiring a relatively modest expenditure of time or money, is accessible throughout the world, potentially subjecting the person or entity who maintains the website to personal jurisdiction anywhere based on that Internet contact. n0.1 The Supreme Court has recognized that personal jurisdiction need not be based on physical contacts with the forum state; for example, contacts sufficient to support personal jurisdiction may be made through other means of modern communication, such as mail, fax, and telephone. n1

In extending jurisdictional analysis to Internet situations, courts have initially applied traditional principles to determine the nature and quality of commercial activity that an entity conducts over the Internet. n1.1 In this regard, courts have applied a sliding scale to determine whether personal jurisdiction is appropriate. n2 This sliding scale test has almost universally been applied by courts in various forms, when the court is analyzing specific personal jurisdiction in the context of Internet contacts. n3

[2] Sliding Scale Standard

Whether a court may constitutionally exercise personal jurisdiction over a person or entity is directly proportionate to the nature and quality of commercial activity that the person or entity conducts over the Internet. This principal is the basis of the "sliding scale" test that the courts have developed to make a determination of whether an internet operator has contacts with the forum sufficient for the court to exercise personal jurisdiction over the operator. n1 This test establishes three levels of internet contacts on the continuum:

- Operation Engages in Business on Internet Site. At one end of the spectrum are situations where a defendant clearly does business over the Internet. If the defendant enters into contracts with residents of a foreign forum that involve the knowing and repeated transmission of computer files over the Internet, specific personal jurisdiction is proper. n2

- Interactive Internet Sites. In the middle ground, interactive web sites allow an internet user to exchange information with the host computer. In these cases, the exercise of specific personal jurisdiction is determined by analyzing the level of interactivity and commercial nature of the exchange of information that occurs on the web site. n3

- Passive Internet Site. At the other end of the spectrum, a defendant simply posts information on an internet web site which is accessible to users in foreign forum. A passive web site that does little more than make information available to those who are interested in it is not grounds for the exercise of personal jurisdiction. n4

CHAPTER 6 PERSONAL JURISDICTION AND SERVICE OF PROCESS
PART I. PERSONAL JURISDICTION

-6 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 6.05

§ 6.05 Personal Jurisdiction Based on Long Arm Statutesn*

[1] National Long-Arm Statute

The "national long-arm" statute n0.1 provides a basis for personal jurisdiction over a defendant residing outside the United States when the defendant is not subject to personal jurisdiction in the courts of general jurisdiction of any one state. n0.2 The national long-arm statute permits a court to aggregate the nonresident defendant's contacts with the United States as a whole to allow for service of process provided that two conditions are met: (1) the plaintiff's claims must arise under federal law; and (2) the exercise of jurisdiction must be consistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States. n1 Under the second prong, jurisdiction "consistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States" is that which comports with due process, meaning that a non-resident defendant have certain sufficient contacts with the forum so that the exercise of jurisdiction comports with fair play and substantial justice, n2 depending whether the personal jurisdiction sought is specific or general. n3

[2] State Long-Arm Statutes

The purpose of state long-arm statutes is to effectively make in personam service outside the state. n1 In diversity or federal question cases involving a nonresident defendant, a court must first look to the long-arm statute of the forum state; if exercise of jurisdiction is appropriate under that statute, the court must then decide whether such exercise is also in compliance with the federal constitutional requirements of due process. In other words, the exercise of personal jurisdiction is proper only if the defendants have contacts sufficient to satisfy both the state long-arm statute and the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. n2

Thus, personal jurisdiction in federal courts is subject to the requirements of any applicable state long-arm statute and also the constitutional limits on state courts' personal jurisdiction. This rule has been adopted because Rule 4(k)(1)(A) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure provides that service to bring a defendant in federal court will be effective to confer personal jurisdiction only if the defendant could be subjected to jurisdiction in the courts of the state in which the district court is located. n3

Although there are exceptions to this rule, it applies in most cases, particularly diversity cases based on state law. Consequently, although federal process may be, but is not required to be, served in accordance with state procedure and may be served anywhere in the United States, n4 federal courts must look to the state long-arm statutes to determine whether the defendant is amenable to jurisdiction in that state. Federal courts must generally apply the relevant state statute even when the cause of action is purely federal. n5 Thus, federal courts must use state long-arm statutes to determine whether there is an appropriate basis for jurisdiction but are not limited by those statutes for the process of invoking jurisdiction. n6

All state long-arm statutes are subject to Fourteenth Amendment due process limitations on the process of asserting jurisdiction, including the methods prescribed for giving the defendant notice of the litigation and the opportunity to be heard, although this constitutional issue may not arise if service is found to be defective under the state's long-arm statute, which is the initial inquiry. n7

PART II. JURISDICTION OVER PROPERTY

1-6 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 6.20

§ 6.20 Nature of Jurisdiction Over Propertyn*

Courts traditionally have divided jurisdiction over property into "in rem" and "quasi-in-rem" jurisdiction, the latter including attachment and garnishment jurisdiction. In a "true" in rem action, the court determines all claims that anyone, whether named in the action or not, has to the property or thing in question. The proceeding is one against all others in the world. The practical effect of such an action is to establish an absolute title to the property because no one may later claim exemption from the effect of the judgment on the ground that the court lacked jurisdiction. True in rem actions are relatively unusual.

One example of a true in rem jurisdiction is a bankruptcy court's in rem jurisdiction to determine all claims that anyone, whether named in the action or not, has regarding the indebtedness in question. n0.1 Another example is an admiralty libel action. n1 In a quasi-in-rem action, the plaintiff claims a pre-existing interest in the property against particularly identified individuals, and the judgment affects only the defendant's claim to the property, rather than the claims of all the world. Typical examples of quasi in rem actions are actions to remove a cloud on title to real property or actions that seek to quiet title against a particular adversary's claim. n1.1

In practice there is little distinction between jurisdiction in rem and quasi-in-rem, unless the quasi-in-rem action, instead of claiming a pre-existing interest in the property, asserts a claim in contract or tort against the defendant and seeks to establish an interest in the defendant's property as a basis for exercising jurisdiction over the defendant when personal jurisdiction is unavailable. In this type of quasi-in-rem action, the plaintiff claims that the defendant owes the plaintiff money, and the plaintiff seeks attachment or garnishment of the defendant's property to satisfy the plaintiff's claim. n2

In each of the three categories of jurisdiction over property, a court may affect the defendant only by terminating the defendant's interests in the particular piece of property over which it has jurisdiction and awarding the plaintiff either the property or the proceeds from the sale of the property. Consequently, jurisdiction over property is usually the plaintiff's second choice, after personal jurisdiction, because if damages exceed the value of the property, an in rem judgment will provide only partial relief; to obtain complete relief, the plaintiff must sue the defendant again, either by obtaining personal jurisdiction or quasi-in-rem jurisdiction with attachment or garnishment over another article of the defendant's property. n3

PART II. JURISDICTION OVER PROPERTY

1-6 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 6.21

§ 6.21 Jurisdiction Over Property In Remn*

The Supreme Court has extended the minimum "contacts" doctrine n1 to in rem and quasi-in-rem actions. Consequently, it is no longer a sufficient basis for the assertion of jurisdiction over an owner of property merely that the property is located within the state and is by such presence subject to the power of the court. n2 To the extent that the landmark case of Pennoyer v. Neff n3 could be read to authorize the assertion of jurisdiction over an owner solely by reason of the presence of property within the forum state, that case has been overruled. n4 Every case in which service of process is made outside of the forum state must now be tested by the contacts doctrine whether the jurisdiction asserted is characterized as in personam, in rem, or quasi-in-rem. n5

The test for property based jurisdiction is whether there is a constitutionally sufficient relationship among the defendant, the forum, and the litigation. n6 Under the standard, although the mere presence of the defendant's property in the forum state may not by itself constitute a sufficient contact to support jurisdiction over a nonresident defendant on matters unrelated to the property, n7 the property itself is a contact the court must consider in the balancing test to determine the exercise of jurisdiction. n8

In purely in rem actions, the contact of the property by itself may be a sufficient contact in certain actions for the exercise of jurisdiction. n9 Thus, when a claim to the property itself forms the basis of the underlying dispute between the plaintiff and the defendant, the state where the property is located has sufficient contact to support in rem jurisdiction. n9.1

Furthermore, although the Supreme Court has established that the minimum contacts-purposeful availment doctrine must be applied to the exercise of jurisdiction over property, it has not eliminated quasi-in-rem actions entirely. Therefore, the procedure of attaching property as an alternative to personal jurisdiction in quasi-in-rem cases may still be used if the defendant has contacts satisfying the standard. Furthermore, the Supreme Court indicated six circumstances in which the presence of property alone might support in personam jurisdiction consistently with the requirements of due process. These circumstances are discussed in § 6.22, below.

PART II. JURISDICTION OVER PROPERTY

§ 6.22 Presence of Property Used to Support Quasi-In-Rem or In Personam Jurisdictionn*

Ordinarily, the mere presence of property alone will not support personal jurisdiction over a person who owns the property. n0.1 However, the Supreme Court has indicated that the presence of property may support in personam jurisdiction consistent with the requirements of due process if one of the following six factors also exists:

1. The plaintiff's claim arises from ownership of the property. The presence alone of property within the forum state by itself is generally a sufficient basis for jurisdiction for claims to determine interests in that property. n1 Furthermore, the Supreme Court has stated that jurisdiction is proper based only on the presence of property when the defendant's ownership of the property is conceded, provided that the cause of action is otherwise related to the rights and duties growing out of that ownership. Thus, presence of property could support quasi-in-rem or even in personam jurisdiction over a defendant in a suit for damages sustained on real property owned by a nonresident defendant. n2

2. The defendant has minimum contacts with the forum state but the state's long-arm statute does not apply to the claim. Some states have not extended their long-arm statutes to the limits of federal due process. Consequently, quasi-in-rem jurisdiction related to attachment or garnishment survives in cases in which the defendant has minimum contacts with the forum state, but the state's personal jurisdiction long-arm statute may not apply to the claim, even though constitutional due process would permit the exercise of jurisdiction. n3

3. An action to enforce a judgment of another state. The presence of property in the forum state is a sufficient basis for jurisdiction in an action to enforce a judgment in a sister state, even if the defendant does not have other contacts with that state. n4

4. The attachment of the defendant's property in one state as security for a judgment sought in another state. The Supreme Court has suggested that a state in which property is located has jurisdiction to attach that property by use of proper procedures as security for a judgment being sought in a forum, provided that the litigation may be maintained consistently with the minimum contacts standard. n5

5. The attachment of real property. In separate concurring opinions, two justices suggested that quasi-in-rem jurisdiction is appropriate when the attached property is property whose situs is indisputably and permanently located within a state, for example, land. n6

6. No other forum is available. The Supreme Court has left open the possibility that the presence of a defendant's property in the state would be a sufficient basis for quasi-in-rem jurisdiction when no other forum is available to the plaintiff. n7

§ 6.23 Use of In Personam Jurisdiction to Adjudicate Interest in Real Property Outside Forum Staten*

[1] Transfer of Title of Noncompliant Defendant

Many states provide by statute that in an action for specific performance to convey real property, a court may enforce its decree not merely by directing the defendant to comply, or punishing the defendant for contempt, but also by requiring the sheriff to act directly on the real property, by transferring title or interest in land. In such cases, because the court may enforce its decree on real property located within the state by means other than direction to the defendant, its action changes from an action in personam to an action in rem. As a result, any objection to lack of personal jurisdiction is without effect. The court at the situs of the land therefore may base jurisdiction to establish title either on personal jurisdiction over the defendant or quasi-in-rem jurisdiction over the property. n1

[2] In Personam Jurisdiction to Adjudicate Defendant's Interest in Real Property Outside State

A court that has personal jurisdiction over the defendant may adjudicate the defendant's interest in land situated in another state. It may enforce its judgment by ordering the defendant to execute a deed to the foreign land. However, it may not transfer interests in foreign land on the basis of its judgment alone. If it purports to do so, the judgment will not have to be enforced in the state where the land is located. n1 The Supreme Court has stated that the court in the second forum is not required under the Full Faith and Credit Clause n2 to give collateral estoppel effect to the judgment of the court in the first forum on issues relating to title to land in the second forum, even as against parties who were subject to personal jurisdiction in the first forum and who actively litigated the questions in the first forum. n3

Many states, however, give collateral estoppel effect to all issues, including land title issues, litigated in a court that is not the situs of the land, provided that the other court had valid jurisdiction over the person. Whether or not they are constitutionally required to do so, courts in these states have recognized foreign judgments affecting land on the basis of either comity n4 or full faith and credit.

1-6 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 6.40

§ 6.40 Prerequisite of Notice to Defendant Outside Forum Staten*

[1] Requirement of Notice For Valid Exercise of Jurisdiction

Due Process requires not only adequate personal jurisdictional grounds n1 but also adequate notice to the defendant of the action and an opportunity for the defendant to be heard. n2 The requirement of notice is entirely separate and in addition to the requirement of jurisdictional basis. In other words, if a basis for jurisdiction exists a judgment will be invalid if the defendant is not given adequate notice, n3 although some technical defects of service may be disregarded. n4

Because due process requires both adequate notice and opportunity to be heard, notice must be given sufficiently in advance to enable the defendant to properly prepare a defensive pleading. n5 Federal and state statutes typically allow a nonresident defendant at least 20 days after service in which to answer. n6

[2] Compliance With Method of Statutory Service Reasonably Calculated to Provide Notice

A court may exercise personal jurisdiction over a defendant only if there has been substantial compliance with an officially prescribed process for invoking the court's jurisdiction, that is, using the method of service provided by statute or court rule that when followed is reasonably likely to provide actual notice. Therefore, if the statutory procedures are not followed, jurisdiction may not be invoked over a defendant, even if the defendant somehow receives actual notice. n1 Conversely, actual notice is not required to invoke a court's jurisdiction, provided that the statutory requirements have been followed. On the other hand, lack of adequate notice, as required in the statute, may provide grounds for setting aside or vacating a judgment. n2

When there are technical defects in service of process, the controlling state or federal procedural law determines whether jurisdiction is proper in cases in which the defendant has received actual notice. Some states require strict compliance with the prescribed procedure. n3 Other states permit substantial compliance. n4 Federal courts generally permit substantial compliance, n5 and have liberally construed the federal rule pertaining to service to effectuate residence or domicile service when actual notice of the suit has been received by the defendant. n6 Thus, it has been held that failure to strictly comply with the service requirements of the federal rules did not require dismissal when the party to be served received actual notice, no prejudice to the defendant resulted from the defect in service, there was justifiable excuse for failure to serve properly, and the plaintiff would be severely prejudiced if the complaint were dismissed. n7

[3] Sufficiency of Notice

Regarding the sufficiency of notice required, the Supreme Court has held that, constitutionally, there is generally no distinction between in personam and in rem actions. n1 Rather, the issue of sufficiency requires the court to determine whether the chosen form of notification is reasonably certain to inform those affected or, if conditions do not permit such notice, whether the chosen form is as likely as other feasible and customary methods to notify the defendant. n2 The case decided by the court involved the adequacy of notice by publication in an action to determine an accounting of a trustee of a common trust fund. The issue was whether notification of the accounting by publication was sufficient for beneficiaries of the constituent trusts, only some of whose interests, names, and addresses were known to the trustee. The court held that notice by publication was adequate for unknown beneficiaries or contingent beneficiaries whose location did not come to the trustee's attention in the normal course of business, but was inadequate for beneficiaries whose names and addresses were known to the trustee or could be ascertained with reasonable diligence. n3

Sufficiency of notice must meet the standard described above in all varieties of actions. n4 For example, the Supreme Court has rejected notice by publication or by publication and posting in state condemnation proceedings, when the property owner's name and address were known. n5 Similarly, notice by publication was insufficient in bankruptcy proceedings affecting known creditors. n6 On the other hand, mailed notice plus publication may be sufficient to satisfy due process when the defendant cannot be found, and the plaintiff has exercised due diligence in its search, because notice by publication, although not likely to reach the defendant, is no less likely to provide actual notice than any other method. n7

§ 6.41 Due Process Limitations on Attachmentsn*

Rule 4 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure does not specifically provide for the attachment of property in quasi-in-rem actions. However, the court may obtain jurisdiction over the defendant's property located within the federal district if authorized by federal statute, provided that notice to claimants of the property must be given as provided in the statute, or by serving a summons under Rule 4. n1

Alternatively, the court may obtain jurisdiction under the circumstances and in the manner provided by the law of the state in which the district court is located. n2 There are limitations to this procedure based on due process concerns. First, the property itself is not a sufficient basis for jurisdiction for claims unrelated to the property. For claims that are unrelated to the property, due process requires that the defendant have contacts with the forum state sufficient to meet the minimum requirement. n3 Second, due process requires a showing of some exigent circumstance to permit attachment of a defendant's property. n4 Third, in order to seize property under Rule 4(n)(2), the property must be located within the court's jurisdiction. n5 Fourth, seizure is allowed only if the defendant cannot be served with summons in any manner authorized by Rule 4. n6

§ 6.42 Due Process Limitations in Admiralty Casesn*

Personal jurisdiction in admiralty cases n1 may be obtained by service or process in accordance with Rule 4 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, including service pursuant to the law of the state in which the district court sits n2 or pursuant to state a long-arm statute. n3 Unless otherwise provided by special statute or rule, the range of jurisdiction of an admiralty court is coextensive with that of the state courts in the state where the court sits and requires that the defendant have minimum contacts with the state sufficient to satisfy the due process requirements of the Fourteenth Amendment. Thus, the same rules relating to the basis for jurisdiction and process in civil actions generally also apply to admiralty actions. n4

Some courts, however, have held that Shaffer v. Heitner does not apply to maritime attachment suits in admiralty and have, thus, upheld jurisdiction without minimum contacts. n5 Other courts have applied Shaffer v. Heitner, but have concluded that contacts with the United States as a whole, rather than contacts with the forum state, determine the constitutionality of jurisdiction in such cases. n6

Personal jurisdiction and service of process in bankruptcy cases and proceedings, n1 including suits to recover a debt owed to the bankrupt, are governed by Rule 7004 of the Federal Bankruptcy Rules. n2 Rule 7004 incorporates the federal rules pertaining to service of process. n3 Although proceedings related to bankruptcy may be based on state law, courts have consistently held that minimum contacts with the United States as a whole meet the due process requirements if the defendant is served within the United States. n4 A foreign nation defendant that must be served abroad, however, generally must be served in accordance with the long-arm statutes of the state where the federal court sits. n5

Some courts have held that in such a situation the defendant must have minimum contacts with the state where the action is pending and that contacts with the United States as a whole will not satisfy due process. n6 Some courts have held that national contacts will suffice. n7

§ 6.44 Jurisdiction May Not be Based on Fraud or Forcen*

A court may not exercise personal jurisdiction over a defendant if personal service was obtained by fraud or force. n1 Similarly, a court will not exercise jurisdiction in a quasi-in-rem action if the presence of the defendant's property in the forum state is the result of fraud or force. n2 This restriction is less important than it was previously because current long-arm statutes now permit state courts to exercise jurisdiction over nonresident defendants in appropriate circumstances even without service within the forum state.

Note, however, that the Supreme Court's holding that mere transient service is sufficient basis for personal jurisdiction has revived the necessity of a rule that denies jurisdiction when the defendant's presence within the forum state has been obtained by fraud. n3

In some circumstances, a court may find a defendant immune from service of process for policy reasons. For example, if a person has come into a jurisdiction merely for the convenience of a court, the courts of that forum may find the person immune from service of process. n1 The court may also grant a defendant immunity from service on the grounds that the exercise of jurisdiction over the defendant would impede the state's administration of justice. n2

Immunity generally extends only to persons who voluntarily enter the territory for the sole purpose of participating in a trial or a deposition, n3 although, in some states, immunity also extends to persons participating in arbitration or settlement negotiations. n4

Diplomatic representatives from foreign nations generally are generally granted immunity from service of process for reasons of comity. n5

PART III. LIMITATIONS ON PERSONAL JURISDICTION AND JURISDICTION OVER PROPERTY

1-6 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 6.46

§ 6.46 Procedures for Asserting Lack of Personal Jurisdiction On Grounds of Immunityn*

In state courts, defendants statutorily have the right to make a special appearance exclusively for the purpose of litigating the court's jurisdiction over them, without making a general appearance. In such an appearance, the defendant is not consenting to the court's exercise of jurisdiction. n1 The technical requirements for making a special appearance vary from state to state, as do the types of acts by the defendant that turn an attempted special appearance into a general appearance. n2

In federal courts, the need for a special appearance has been eliminated by several procedural devises. Defendants may attack the court's jurisdiction over them by filing a motion to dismiss at the filing of the complaint or by including the jurisdictional objection in the answer. n3 Alternatively, the defendant may decline to appear in the action and allow the plaintiff to obtain the judgment by default and then collaterally attack the default judgment for lack of personal jurisdiction. If challenging the sufficiency of process, a defendant must raise the objection to jurisdiction (either by proper pre-pleading motion or in the initial responsive pleading) in order not to waive the defect. n4

If a defendant in a federal court makes a timely and successful objection to personal jurisdiction, it does not necessarily mean the action will be dismissed. By statute, a federal court that lacks personal jurisdiction may transfer the case to a federal court where venue and personal jurisdiction would be proper. n5

CHAPTER 6 PERSONAL JURISDICTION AND SERVICE OF PROCESS
PART IV. SERVICE OF PROCESS

1-6 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 6.60

§ 6.60 Nature and Purpose of Service of Processn*

Service of process is one method a court uses to obtain in personam jurisdiction, which is the power of a court over a defendant. n1 Service of process is a statutorily recognized method of providing constitutionally adequate notice that an action has begun, n2 and the primary purpose of the federal rules governing service of process is to give adequate notice of the pendency of an action. Another purpose is to force plaintiffs and their attorneys to be diligent in prosecuting their cause of action. n3

There are several ways of giving constitutionally adequate notice. n4 Personal presentation of the notice to the defendant in the forum state is universally recognized as adequate notice. n5 Courts may also deem as adequate: "substituted service of process," which is personal service outside the state on a domiciliary of the state, n6 service on an authorized agent, n7 or service by leaving copies of the summons and complaint at an individual's residence with a resident of suitable age and discretion. n8 Some jurisdictions allow "constructive service" either by certified mail n9 or by publication. Service by publication is constitutionally permissible to obtain personal jurisdiction if a defendant cannot be reached by some other means more likely to provide actual notice. n10

This Part discusses service of process as the primary means by which a court obtains personal jurisdiction over a defendant. For a complete analysis of the constitutional requirements for establishing personal jurisdiction, see PART I. n11 PART II, n12 and Part III of this chapter. n13 A court may formally establish personal jurisdiction over a defendant by effecting service of process pursuant to the provisions of Rule 4. n14 Therefore, if service of process is deemed defective, the issuing court does not obtain personal jurisdiction over the defendant, unless there is some other basis for personal jurisdiction. n15

CHAPTER 6 PERSONAL JURISDICTION AND SERVICE OF PROCESS
PART IV. SERVICE OF PROCESS

1-6 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 6.61

§ 6.61 Overview of Federal Service of Process Proceduresn*

[1] Option for Waiver of Service by Parties

The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure set forth a streamlined process by which the defendant has the option to waive formal service of process on request of the plaintiff, as long as the plaintiff provides notice of the lawsuit. n1 The Rule 4(d) procedure does not purport to create a method of service--rather, it only allows for a request by the plaintiff for waiver of service. n2 Furthermore, requesting a waiver is not mandatory: the rule provides that to avoid costs the plaintiff "may" notify a defendant of the option to waive service. If the plaintiff takes the option to use this procedure, the notice and request must meet the requirements specified in Rule 4(d)(1) n3

If the defendant waives service, no other process is required to invoke the court's jurisdiction; however, waiver of service does not constitute a submission to jurisdiction. The defendant who waives service may still object to the basis for subject matter jurisdiction. n4 Additionally, by waiving service of process, the defendant does not waive the right to object to personal jurisdiction and venue. n5 Because the waiver procedure of Rule 4(d) merely contemplates a request for waiver, n6 it does not obtain personal jurisdiction over the defendant merely on the basis of the plaintiff's mailing. n7 Therefore, receipt of a request for waiver, by itself, does not constitute service on the defendant. Rather, the process element is completed only after the defendant executes the waiver and returns it to the plaintiff. n8 For a further discussion of the waiver provisions, see § 6.62.

[2] Service Procedure Absent Waiver

If the plaintiff requests and the defendant agrees, the parties may dispense with the service of process procedure by complying with Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 4(d) n1. When such a waiver consensus is not reached, however, service of process may be accomplished within the United States by any of the following methods:

1. Service pursuant to the law of the state in which the district court is located. n2

2. Service pursuant to the law of the state where service is performed. n2.1

3. Personal delivery of the summons and complaint to an individual defendant. n2.2

4. Deposit of the process at the dwelling house of an individual defendant, with a person of suitable age and discretion residing there. n2.3

5. Personal delivery of a copy of the summons and complaint to an agent authorized by appointment or by law to receive service of process. n2.4

When the defendant resides in a foreign country and a waiver consensus has not been reached, service of process may be accomplished by any of the following methods: n3

1. Service by an internationally agreed means, typically the Hague Convention. n4

2. If no internationally agreed method exists for the situation, by personal delivery or any form of mail requiring a signed receipt, unless those methods are prohibited by the foreign country's law.

3. If personal delivery or mail is prohibited by the foreign country's law, by any manner prescribed by the foreign country's law or directed by the foreign authority in response to a letter of request.

4. Service directed by the court by any means not prohibited by international agreement.

There is no requirement that a party resort to any of the above methods before using one of the other methods. For example, when the defendant is living in a foreign country, the court has authority to direct service in any means not prohibited by international agreement, as stated in item 4 above, without first requiring service according to the Hague Convention or by personal delivery. n5

For a further discussion of the service of process procedures, see the remaining sections in this Part IV.

[3] Formal Service of Summons and Complaint

Except in the case of a defendant who waives formal service, n1 the plaintiff must ensure that each defendant is served with a copy of both the summons and the complaint. n2 Service of a summons without a complaint renders service of process invalid. n3 Likewise, service of a complaint without a summons constitutes ineffective service of process. n4 The court may permit a summons to be amended. n4.1

If a complaint has properly been amended, service of a summons and only the original complaint is invalid. n5 Service of a summons with both an original complaint and a proposed amendment to that complaint is valid. n6

A summons must be served on each defendant, or a copy of a summons that is addressed to multiple defendants must be served on each of the defendants. n7 Even though the plaintiff must effect service on all defendants named in the action, the plaintiff is not obligated to serve every attorney who appears on behalf of each defendant. It is sufficient for the plaintiff to serve one attorney representing each defendant. n8

[4] Service of Process for Jurisdiction Over Property

[a] Service of Process Regarding Claimants to Property

When a statute of the United States provides that the court may assert jurisdiction over property, notice to the claimants of the property may be sent by the plaintiff in the manner provided by the statute or by service of a summons under Rule 4. n1 The case law and Advisory Committee Notes indicate that this rule was intended to incorporate the provisions of United States Code Title 28, Section 1655. n2 That statute provides that in an action in a district court regarding a lien or cloud on, or title or claim to, real or personal property within the district, when any defendant cannot be served within the state, or does not voluntarily appear, the court may order the absent defendant to appear or plead by a specific date.

Such an order must be served on the absent defendant personally if practicable and also on any person or persons in possession or charge of the property. When personal service is not practicable, the order is to be published as the court may direct. If an absent defendant does not appear or plead within the time allowed, the court may proceed as if the absent defendant had been served with process within the state, but any judgment regarding the absent defendant without appearance may affect only the property that is the subject of the action. Furthermore, any defendant not so personally notified may, at any time within one year after final judgment, enter an appearance, and the court must set aside the judgment and, on payment of such costs as the court deems just, permit the defendant to plead. n3

[b] Court's Jurisdiction Over Assets Belonging to Defendant Not Subject to Personal Jurisdiction

If the plaintiff shows that personal jurisdiction over a defendant cannot be obtained with reasonable efforts by service of summons in any manner authorized by Rule 4 in the district where the action is brought, the court may assert jurisdiction over any of the defendant's assets found within the district by seizing the assets under the circumstances and in the manner provided by the law of the state in which the district court is located. n4 To avail itself of this rule, the plaintiff must establish that personal service was impracticable by showing diligence in attempting to determine the location of the defendants. n5

PART II Jurisdiction; Venue; Removal
CHAPTER 6 PERSONAL JURISDICTION AND SERVICE OF PROCESS
PART IV. SERVICE OF PROCESS

1-6 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 6.62

§ 6.62 Defendant's Waiver of Formal Service of Process on Plaintiff's Requestn*

[1] Plaintiff's Notification of Suit and Request for Waiver

To avoid costs, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure provide for an expedited process by which the plaintiff may request that the defendant waive formal service of process and provides notice and information on the lawsuit. n1 After such a request, the defendant has the option of waiving process, but if the defendant fails to make a waiver without good cause, the defendant will be liable for costs subsequently incurred in the plaintiff's effecting service on the defendant, n2 and the reasonable expenses including attorney's fees of any motion required to collect those service expenses. n2.1 A plaintiff's request for a waiver is not mandatory--the rule provides that to avoid costs the plaintiff "may" notify a defendant of the option to waive service. n3 If he or she decides to use the waiver procedure, the plaintiff must notify the defendant in writing that an action has commenced and request the defendant to waive service of process. n4

If the defendant waives service, no other service of process is required to invoke the court's jurisdiction. However, waiver of service does not constitute a submission to jurisdiction. The waiving defendant may still object to the basis for subject matter jurisdiction. n4.1 Additionally, by waiving service of process, the defendant does not waive the right to object to personal jurisdiction. n5 and venue. n5.1 Furthermore, the mere mailing of the request and notice does not automatically provide personal jurisdiction over the defendant merely on the basis of the plaintiff's mailing. n6 Also, receipt of a request for waiver by itself does not constitute service on the defendant. Service of process is completed only after the defendant executes the waiver and returns it to the plaintiff and the plaintiff files it with the court. n7

While the waiver option is designed as an inexpensive alternative to formal service, nothing in Rule 4 requires a plaintiff to request or a defendant to execute a waiver of service. If a defendant chooses to exercise the right to be formally served with process, the only potential penalty is an assessment against the defendant of the costs of the formal service. n8

[2] Requirements of Notice and Request

To initiate the waiver option, the plaintiff must complete all of the following steps: n1

1. The notice and request for waiver must be in writing. The plaintiff should inform the defendant, using text prescribed in Official Form 5, n2 (Notice of Lawsuit and Request for Waiver of Service of Summons), of the consequences of waiving and not waiving service. This form has been promulgated pursuant to the federal rules. n3 The text of the form is mandatory. n4

2. If the defendant is an individual, the formal notice and request for waiver must be addressed directly to the defendant. If the defendant is a corporation, the notice and request must be addressed to the corporation's managing or general agent or any other agent authorized by appointment or law to accept service of process. n5 A request mailed to a corporation without specifying the identity of a proper agent is improper, and corporations are not obligated to inform the plaintiff of the identity of the person appointed to accept service on behalf of the corporation. n6

3. The plaintiff must deliver the request and notice by first-class mail, n7 or by any other reliable means, such as registered or certified mail. n8 Other reliable means include overnight or express mail, facsimile or other electronic means of communication, and delivery by messenger. n9 The notice and request must state the date that the forms are sent to the defendant. n10

4. The notice and request for waiver must be accompanied by a complaint identifying the court where the action has commenced but need not be accompanied by a summons. n11

5. The notice and request for waiver must inform the defendant of the consequences involved in complying and refusing to comply with the request in the language of Official Form 1A. n12

6. The notice and request for waiver must state a reasonable time for defendant to execute the waiver and return it to the plaintiff. The time must be at least 30 days from the date on which the request is sent, or 60 days from that date if the defendant is addressed outside any judicial district of the United States. n13 The period of time to return the waiver commences when the notice and request is mailed to the defendant and not at the time when the defendant first discovers that an action has been commenced. n14 Additionally, the period of time given to the defendant to respond to plaintiff's request does not affect the 120-day period within which the plaintiff must serve the defendant after commencing an action, even if the defendant fails to return an executed waiver, the plaintiff must formally serve defendant within that 120-day period, subject to the discretion of the court to grant the plaintiff additional time to serve the defendant. n15

7. The notice and request must be accompanied by a copy of the complaint, two copies of a waiver form, Official Form 5 (Waiver of the Service of Summons), and a prepaid means for the defendant to return the form. n16

Failure of the plaintiff to satisfy any of the requirements listed above, such as a failure to mail an additional copy of the notice and request for waiver, does not in itself warrant dismissal of the action. Rather, such a failure only has the effect of the failure of the plaintiff to make a request; thus, the defendant who fails to take a necessary step regarding a waiver must make formal personal service on the defendant. n17

[3] Defendants Subject to Waiver Provisions

The waiver of service of process option specified in Rule 4(d) is applicable only in actions otherwise requiring service pursuant to Rule 4(e), (f), or (h); therefore, it applies only to service on individuals, corporations, or associations. n1 A notice and request may not, for example, be sent to the United States government because service is effected on the United States under Rule 4(i). n2 Also, the waiver option does not apply to foreign, state, or local governments that are served pursuant to Rule 4(j); those entities are not obligated to waive service of process. Employees of such entities, however, are required to make the waiver election, for example, municipal employees who are subject to Rule 4(d)(2) when sued as individuals. n3

Finally, the waiver option may not be sent to minors and incompetent persons who are served pursuant to Rule 4(g).

Due to their inability to comprehend the nature of a notice and request for waiver and the consequences for failing to comply with the request, infants and incompetent persons generally should be served through their fiduciaries. n4

[4] Defendant's Duty to Reasonably Avoid Costs

[a] Duty That Applies to Defendants in United States

A defendant located within the United States that receives a notice of action and request for waiver from a plaintiff located within the United States has an affirmative duty to avoid unnecessary costs involved with service of process. n1 Foreign defendants have no obligation to establish good cause for failing to comply with the request because the shift of costs provision expressly applies only to defendants located within the United States from United States plaintiffs. n2

[b] Costs Imposed on Defendant for Failure to Waive Without Good Cause

The defendant's duty to avoid unnecessary costs by waiver is mandatory on request and may be fulfilled only by executing the waiver and returning it to the plaintiff. A defendant who compels plaintiff to effect formal service of process by refusing to sign and return the waiver without good cause may be compelled by the court to pay plaintiff for the costs incurred in effecting service n3 and the reasonable expenses, including attorney's fees, of any motion required to collect those service expenses. n3.1 Thus, the court will compel the defendant to pay those costs that may have been avoided had the defendant consented to waiving service. n4 To hold the defendant liable for costs, the plaintiff must offer evidence that defendant was formally served and of the costs incurred in effecting service. n5 Mere evidence that the summons was mailed to defendant is insufficient to show that the defendant was formally served with process. n6 Additionally, if the plaintiff sends defendant a defective waiver form, if the request improperly identifies the defendant or is addressed improperly, the court will not compel defendant to pay for the costs of service. n7

The court may compel the defendant to pay the costs subsequently incurred by the plaintiff in effecting formal service and also any costs and reasonable attorney's fees incurred in making a motion required to collect the costs of service. n8 A defendant who fails to execute and return the request for waiver is obligated to pay only those costs arising after the time for returning the waiver has expired. This provision was included to discourage plaintiffs from proceeding with formal service against defendants before the deadline given to the defendant to return the executed waiver has passed. n9

[c] Defendant May Avoid Costs With Demonstration of Good Cause for Failure To Waive

A defendant who fails to agree to a waiver and to execute and return the waiver may avoid paying for the plaintiff's costs for formal service of process by showing good cause for the failure. n10 For example, a defendant that does not receive the notice and request for waiver or has an inability to comprehend the notice and request in English has good cause for failing to comply with the request. n11 In another case, the party established good cause when it showed that it relied on the incorrect Federal Rule of Civil Procedure, and the reliance was reasonable because of the lack of case precedent regarding the provisions of the rules. n12

On the other hand, a conclusory claim that the plaintiff's allegations are unjust or the court lacks adequate jurisdiction does not constitute good cause for failing to comply with the request and the court is required to shift the costs of service to the defendant. n13

[5] Effect of Plaintiff's Filing of Waiver After Return by Defendant

[a] Formal Service Not Required

The mailing of a notice and request for a waiver of service to the defendant by itself does not accomplish the judicial action of service, because the defendant must return the service, n1 and the plaintiff must file the waiver with the court.

After plaintiff files an executed waiver with the court, the action is treated by the court as if the defendant was served formally and proof of service was filed with the court. n2 Furthermore, the filing of an executed waiver supersedes the obligation to file proof of service with the clerk of the court. n3

[b] Time Extended for Defendant to Answer

As an incentive for the defendant to sign and return the waiver, and save the costs of formal service, the waiver rule provides the defendant with additional time within which to appear to answer the complaint. n4 Ordinarily, a defendant is granted 21 days after service of the summons and complaint to serve an answer on plaintiff and file it with the court. n5 If, however, a defendant residing in the United States returns to the plaintiff an executed waiver within 30 days from the date the notice and request for waiver was sent, the defendant has 60 days after the date the notice and request was sent to answer the complaint. n6

Note that if a plaintiff sends a defendant a notice and request for waiver and later properly makes a formal service of process on the defendant pursuant to any other provision of Rule 4 before the defendant executes and returns the waiver, and prior to the expiration of the 30-day period granted to defendant to return the waiver, the 60-day period under Rule 4(d)(3) is superseded by the 21-day period under Rule 12(a)(1)(A)(i). n7

If a foreign defendant executes and timely returns a waiver within 60 days from the date the notice and request for waiver was sent, the foreign defendant is granted up to 90 days to answer the complaint or assert defenses. n8

[c] Waiver of Service Does Not Constitute Consent to Jurisdiction

When the defendant executes a waiver and returns the waiver to the plaintiff, the defendant is merely waiving the right to receive formal service and does not waive the right to object to venue. Furthermore, by waiving service of process, the defendant does not waive the right to object to personal jurisdiction. n9 Additionally, if a person receives a request for a waiver of service of process, the mere receipt of the request does not confer personal jurisdiction over the defendant. Rather, personal jurisdiction is obtained only after the defendant executes the waiver and returns it to the plaintiff and the plaintiff files it with the court. n10

PART II Jurisdiction; Venue; Removal
CHAPTER 6 PERSONAL JURISDICTION AND SERVICE OF PROCESS
PART IV. SERVICE OF PROCESS

1-6 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 6.63

§ 6.63 Summonsn*

[1] Nature of Summons

[a] Function of Summons

A "summons" is the document used to obtain personal jurisdiction over a party. n1 The purpose of service of a summons is to provide notice that the action has been commenced. n2 The summons is also used to instruct the defendant to appear before the issuing court to defend against the claims alleged in the complaint. n3

Even though the purpose of the summons is to provide notice, actual notice to the person served is not required to effect service and establish jurisdiction--all that is necessary is that the plaintiff comply with Rule 4. Conversely, actual notice does not necessarily establish personal jurisdiction, when there has not been compliance with Rule 4. n4 Thus, a defendant's independent knowledge that an action has been commenced is insufficient in the absence of proper service of process. n5 If a defendant is not provided with adequate notice that an action has commenced, the court that issued the summons does not obtain personal jurisdiction over the defendant and may not subsequently render a judgment against the defendant. n6

To comply with the summons content requirements, n7 a plaintiff may draft the summons in conformance with Official Form 3, (Summons) n8 which has been promulgated pursuant to the federal rules. n8.1

[b] Effect of Lack of Proper Service of Summons

If a given defendant is not properly served, any subsequent judicial proceedings with regard to that defendant are invalid unless the defendant has waived a challenge to personal jurisdiction. n9 For example, if service is made of a summons which has not been signed or sealed by the clerk of the court, the service is invalid and inadequate to establish personal jurisdiction over the defendant for the entire duration of the action. n10 However, if the defendant fails to object to defects in the summons in an initial motion to dismiss the complaint, n11 that failure to object may constitute a waiver of personal jurisdiction challenges. n11.1

[c] Court Has Discretion to Disregard Mere Technical Errors in Cases of Substantial Compliance

Under certain circumstances, courts may liberally construe Rule 4 to otherwise recognize service of process, even if the defendant is not served precisely according to the provisions of Rule 4. Courts have discretion to disregard mere technical errors in effecting service. n12 On the other hand, a failure to substantially comply with the requirements of Rule 4 will result in a lack of jurisdiction. For example, in one case, a court held that plaintiff's service of a summons that was not signed, sealed, or issued by the clerk of the court did not constitute substantial compliance with Rule 4 and therefore rendered service invalid. n13

To demonstrate that any defect of service is not merely technical, a plaintiff must establish substantial compliance with the provisions of Rule 4. n14 Service of process that is defective due to mere technical errors may be deemed valid by the court provided that the defendant receives adequate actual notice of the commencement of the action. n15 In other words, a court will not dismiss an action against a defendant who received notice of the action unless the defendant is prejudiced by a defective summons. n16 Thus, a minor defect on the face of the summons, such as a failure to inform defendant of the prescribed time to answer the complaint, does not necessarily deprive the court of personal jurisdiction over defendant. n17

[2] Requirements of Summons

[a] Identification of Court and Parties

The summons must identify the court that will adjudicate the action and the parties to the action. n1 Technical defects in the designation of the names in the summons do not require dismissal of an action if the parties are otherwise identifiable from inclusion of their names in the complaint, if the defendant has failed to demonstrate actual prejudice to a substantial right. n2 A court will not dismiss an action against a defendant unless the defendant demonstrates actual prejudice resulting from the failure of the summons to set forth fundamental information. Thus, when there are numerous defendants, a failure to include the name of each and every defendant does not invalidate the summons, when each name is specified in the complaint. n3 n4

[b] Summons Must Be Directed to Defendant

The summons must be directed to the defendant. n5 If the summons is not directed to a particular person, the court has no jurisdiction over that person. Thus, for example, a foreign corporation could not be bound by a default judgment when the plaintiff failed to direct service against the foreign corporation itself or a domestic corporation that was licensed to do business in the state as agent of the foreign corporation. n6 The "directed to" requirement means that the defendant's name must appear conspicuously on the summons. However, if a summons has a technical defect in that it fails to properly state the defendant's name and thus is not "directed to" the defendant, the summons is not jurisdictionally defective if defendant is not prejudiced by the error. n7

Prejudice does not exist if the defendant receives the summons and therefore has actual notice that an action has commenced, and the plaintiff establishes a justifiable reason for the error--that the error was caused by a technical defect as opposed to a complete failure to effect service of process. n8 However, the plaintiff must subsequently identify the defendant and properly effect service within 120 days after commencement of the action. n9

If the defendant is represented by counsel, the summons must be addressed to the defendant's attorney. If the defendant does not yet have legal representation, the summons must be addressed directly to the defendant. n10

[c] Name of Plaintiff or Plaintiff's Attorney

The summons must state name and address of plaintiff's attorneys, or, if the plaintiff is not represented, the plaintiff's name and address. n11 The primary purpose of this requirement is to inform the defendant of the address to send the defendant's response to the complaint. n12

[d] Time for Defendant to Respond to Summons

The summons must state the time within which the defendant must appear and defend the allegations in the complaint, n13 and notify the defendant that a failure to appear and defend will result in a default judgment against the defendant for the relief demanded in the complaint. n13.1 However, the plaintiff's failure to properly inform the defendant of the prescribed time period to answer the complaint does not necessarily constitute a jurisdictional defect. n14 In determining whether a jurisdictional defect exists, the court will consider whether a technical defect in the summons prejudiced the defendant. n15 The court must determine prejudice on a case-by-case basis, after reviewing the facts of each particular case to assess whether the defect in the summons caused some harm to the defendant that caused an impediment to the defense of the case. n16

For example, in a case in which the summons erroneously informed defendant that an answer to the complaint was required within 20 days, rather than 30 days, the court ruled that service, nevertheless, was valid because defendant received notice of the action and the opportunity to be heard. n17 Additionally, a plaintiff's failure to correctly inform the defendant of the deadline to answer the complaint before the court is not prejudicial if the defendant has filed a motion to dismiss with the court, because filing of a motion to dismiss extends the time within which defendant must answer the complaint. n18

[e] Signature of Clerk of Court and Seal of Court

The summons must be signed by the clerk of the court and bear the seal of the court. n19 A summons that is not signed and sealed by the clerk of the court is invalid and does not confer personal jurisdiction over the defendant, even if properly served. n19.1 If the defendant raises the matter on proper motion or in a responsive pleading, the court should dismiss the suit. n20 An original signature and seal is not required in all instances. Thus, the plaintiff may serve the defendant with a photographic copy of the summons if there is more than one defendant. n21 The summons may not be signed by the plaintiff or plaintiff's attorney. n22

[f] Issuance by Clerk of Court

On or after filing the complaint, the plaintiff may present a summons to the clerk for signature and seal. If the summons is in proper form, the clerk must sign, seal, and issue it to the plaintiff for service on the defendant. A summons, or a copy of the summons if addressed to multiple defendants, must be issued for each defendant that is to be served. n23 If the plaintiff fails to ensure that this requirement is met, the court may order a dismissal with respect to the defendant who receives the defective summons. n24

§ 6.64 Persons and Entities Subject to Servicen*

[1] Individuals Within United States

Service of process may be made on an individual, other than a minor, an incompetent person, or a person who has filed a waiver, in any one of four ways: (1) by following state law for serving a summons in an action brought in a court of general jurisdiction in the state where the district court is located or where service is made; n1 (2) by delivering a copy of the summons and complaint to the individual personally; n2 (3) by leaving a copy of the summons and complaint at the individual's dwelling or usual place of abode with someone of suitable age and discretion who resides there; n2.1 or (4) by delivering a copy of the summons and complaint to an agent authorized by appointment or by law to receive service of process. n2.2 Unless a defendant voluntarily makes an appearance or waives service, a federal court is therefore without jurisdiction to render a personal judgment against the individual unless service of process is made in accordance with the applicable federal or state statutory requirements, notwithstanding any actual notice the individual may have of the legal action against him or her. n3

[2] Individuals in Foreign Nation

[a] Service Pursuant to International Treaty

Service of process outside the United States or made by a foreign plaintiff within the United States may be made pursuant to the provisions of the Hague Convention on the Service Abroad of Judicial and Extrajudicial Documents in Civil and Commercial Matters, n1 provided that the countries where service originates and is sought are signatories. n2 The Hague Convention applies to judicial and extrajudicial documents in a civil or commercial matter commenced in one country and requiring service in a foreign country. n3 Service abroad effected pursuant to the Hague Convention supersedes requirements of Rule 4 and applicable state rules. n4 The United States federal courts have consistently construed the Hague Convention in a liberal manner to promote its purpose of facilitating international service of judicial documents through cooperation by member countries. For example, it has been held that service by mail is permitted under the Convention. n4.1

Under the Hague Convention, each signatory state must designate a "Central Authority," whose purpose is to accept requests for service from other signatory states. n5 Documents that are to be served in a foreign country must be attached to a formal request form (model forms are annexed to the Hague Convention) and must be sent, in duplicate, to the central authority of the country where service is sought. n6 If the documents are completed properly, the central authority will, in turn, serve the documents on the named defendant pursuant to its own internal laws n6.1 or by a method requested by the plaintiff, provided that the latter does not contradict the laws and rules of the recipient state. n7 After service is complete, the central authority of the recipient state must prepare an official certificate form (the form is annexed to the Hague Convention) indicating the method, time, and place of service and to whom the documents were served. If service is not complete, the certificate must indicate an explanation. n8 The Hague Convention requires that all documents to be served be written in English, French, or an official language of the country where service originates. n9

In addition to the Hague Convention, service of process may be effected under the Inter-American Convention on Letters Rogatory. n9.1 The Inter-American Convention applies to civil or commercial matters and provides for service of process by means of letters rogatory, which are essentially formal documents from a domestic court that request action, such as service or discovery, by a foreign court. n9.2 The forms for the letters rogatory must be translated into the official language of the recipient country and accompanied by an authenticated copy of the complaint and accompanying documents. Furthermore, the Inter-American Convention does not preempt other methods of service of process. n10

[b] Alternate International Service

If an international agreement permits additional methods of service or does not apply, service of process may be effected pursuant to the laws of the country where the person seeks service of process. n11 In other words, the United States does not object to permitting service by means other than those set forth by the Hague Convention or by the Inter-American Convention on Letters Rogatory. n11.1 Any means of service permissible pursuant to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure are available to foreign plaintiffs for service on a defendant located within the United States. n12 If the plaintiff fails to abide by the rules of the foreign country, service of process on a defendant in that country will be invalid. n13

When international agreements permit additional methods of service or do not apply in the country where service is to be effected, service of process may be effected pursuant to instructions set forth by the foreign country in response to letters rogatory or a letter of request. n14 Service of process may also be made by personal service of a copy of the summons and complaint on the defendant, n15 or may be effected by mail. n16 Additionally, service on an individual in a foreign country may effected by any other means directed by the court provided the means is not prohibited by international agreement. n17

In general, the 120-day period to effect service specified in Rule 4(m) n18 does not apply to service of process effected outside the United States. n19 However, the plaintiff must actually attempt to effect service in a foreign country in order to benefit from the exemption to the 120-day rule. n20

[3] Corporations

[a] Officers

Unless it has waived formal service, service of process on a domestic or foreign corporation may be effected pursuant to the laws of the state where the court is located or where service is sought, n1 or by personal delivery of the summons and complaint to an officer of the corporation. n2 If a plaintiff makes service of process on a corporate owner who is not an officer of the corporation, the service generally is insufficient to obtain jurisdiction over that corporation. n3

[b] Managing Agent or General Agent

Service of process on a corporation may be effected by personal delivery of the summons and complaint to the managing or general agent of the corporation. n4 Service of process on a domestic or foreign corporation may be made by personal delivery of the summons and complaint on any corporate agent authorized by express or implied appointment to receive service of process. n5 Regardless of whether the appointment is express or implied, the purported agent must have actual authority to behave as an agent for the corporation. n6 Thus, service of process on a corporate employee who lacks authority to accept service on behalf of the corporation renders service invalid. n7

In this regard, even if an employee has a power of attorney to act on behalf of a corporation, that power without more is not sufficient to establish that the person with the power is a managing agent for service. n8 Furthermore, the mere claim by a person receiving service of process that he or she is an authorized agent to accept service does not, without more, confer authority on that person to act as an agent. n9 In making a determination whether a particular person is an agent authorized to accept service for a corporation, a court will consider the level of authority granted to that individual within the corporation. n10

Personal delivery may be made to an agent authorized by statute to accept service of process. If service is made on an authorized agent, plaintiff must mail a copy of the summons and complaint directly to the defendant if required by statute. n11 A parent corporation may be served to effect service on a subsidiary corporation, and vice versa, provided that the parent corporation acts as an agent for its subsidiary and the corporations are not completely separate entities. n12 In determining whether parent and subsidiary corporations are separate entities, a court should consider the degree to which the business affairs of both corporations are intertwined. n13 Additionally, the court may allow such service when an objection is not raised; for example, service on a wholly owned subsidiary of a defendant corporation was permitted because the parent corporation did not raise a jurisdictional objection. n14

[c] Corporation Located Outside United States

If service is to be effected on a domestic or foreign corporation in any place not within any judicial district of the United States, the service may be effected in the same manner as prescribed for individuals located outside the United States, n15 except that such service may not be effected by personal delivery as specified in Rule 4(f)(2)(C)(i) n16 For example, in one case it was held that service of an employment discrimination summons and complaint on an Italian corporate defendant through the mail complied with Rule 4(f)(1), which authorized service by any internationally agreed means reasonably calculated to give notice, such as, means authorized the by Hague Convention on the Service Abroad of Judicial and Extrajudicial Documents, because an article of the Hague Convention, to which Italy was a signatory, allowed the sending of judicial documents by mail directly to persons abroad. n17

[4] Partnership or Unincorporated Association

A plaintiff may serve process on a partnership or other unincorporated association, n1 provided that the partnership or unincorporated association has the capacity to be sued under a common name. n2 The same requirements for service on corporations apply to service an a partnership or other unincorporated association. n3 Therefore, service may be effected pursuant to the laws of the state where the district court is located or where service is sought. n4 In the alternative, service may be effected by delivery of the summons and complaint to an officer, managing or general agent, or any other agent authorized by appointment or law to receive service. n5 If service is effected on an agent authorized by statute to accept service, the plaintiff must mail an additional copy of the summons and complaint to the defendant if also required by statute. n6

[5] Minor or Incompetent

A claimant must make service of process on a minor or incompetent person pursuant to the rules of the state where service is sought to be effected. n1 If the claimant fails to comply with state service requirements, the court does not obtain personal jurisdiction over the minor or incompetent, and a subsequent judgment is invalid. n2

Outside of the United States, a plaintiff must effect service on a minor or incompetent person pursuant to the law of the foreign country in which the action will be adjudicated. n3 Thus, service of process on a minor or incompetent person in a foreign country may be made pursuant to the rules set forth by the foreign country as determined by use of letters rogatory or letters of request. n4 Service of process on a minor or incompetent person in a foreign country may be made pursuant to any method approved by a United State district court. n5

Defects in service of process may be waived by a minor or incompetent if he or she submits to the jurisdiction of a court through the appearance of a representative or through a personal appearance and the appointment by the court of a guardian ad litem. n6

[6] United States as Entity

[a] Service Always Requires Notice to Attorney General

To effect service in any action against the United States, the plaintiff must always send a copy of the summons and of the complaint by registered or certified mail to the Attorney General of the United States at Washington, District of Columbia. n1 Service of process on the Attorney General becomes effective when the summons and complaint are received by the Attorney General, and not when mailed. n2

Ordinarily, failure to serve the Attorney General with a copy of summons and complaint warrants dismissal of the United States from the action. n3 Under certain circumstances, however, the court has discretion to merely quash service of process rather than dismiss. One court has specified a four-prong test to determine whether dismissal is warranted: whether the necessary parties within the United States government have actual notice that an action has commenced; whether a technical defect in the service of the summons prejudices the government; whether the plaintiff asserts a justifiable excuse for defective service; and whether the plaintiff would be prejudiced by dismissal. n4 The plaintiff is obligated to mail a copy of the summons and complaint to the Attorney General even if the Attorney General otherwise receives actual notice of the action. n5

[b] Types of Service

Assuming that the Attorney General has been properly served with a copy of the summons and complaint, n5.1 a plaintiff in a civil action must use one of the three methods listed below to complete service on the United States as an entity. The designated government attorney or official must be served. The fact that the Attorney General has received a copy of the summons and complaint, and that the local attorney or official has actual knowledge of the complaint is not enough. n6

1. By personally delivering a copy of the summons and complaint to the United States Attorney of the district where the action was commenced. n7 If service is properly made on a United States Attorney, failing to properly identify the United States as the defendant by naming instead the organization of the United States government being sued will not invalidate the service. n8

2. By delivery of the summons and complaint to an Assistant United States Attorney or to a clerical assistant who is designated by a United States Attorney to accept service, provided the designation is in writing and is filed with the clerk of court. n9 Failure to properly serve the assistant United States Attorney or clerical assistant may warrant the dismissal against the United States. n10

3. By mailing the summons and complaint by registered or certified mail to the civil process clerk at the office of the United States Attorney. n11 The mail must be addressed specifically to the civil process clerk to assure proper handling. n12

[c] Service in Action Challenging Order of Officer or Agency of United States

If an action is one challenging an order of an officer or agency of the United States, and the officer or agency is not a party to the action, service of process must satisfy requirements of service on the United States generally, as discussed in [b], above, and, in addition, the mailing by certified or registered mail of a copy of the summons and complaint to the officer or agency. n13

[d] Reasonable Time to Cure Any Defects in Service Involving Service of Multiple Government Entities

If the plaintiff attempts but fails to properly effect service on multiple officers, agencies, or corporations of the United States, the court must grant the plaintiff a reasonable time to cure any defects in the service as long as the plaintiff has effected service on either the United States attorney or the Attorney General. n14 For example, after the plaintiff in one case erroneously sent service which was accepted by the Department of Housing and Urban Development, the plaintiff was permitted to cure the defect in service by properly serving the United States Attorney General. n15

[7] Officer, Agency, or Corporation of United States

A claimant may serve process on an officer, agency, or corporation of the United States in the same manner as service may be effected on the United States, as discussed in [6], above, n1 provided that the defendant must deliver an additional copy of the summons and complaint by certified or registered mail to the officer, agency, or corporation named in the action. n2 Failure to serve an officer, agency, or corporation of the United States with a copy of the summons and complaint warrants dismissal of the action against that defendant. n3 An officer or agent of the United States who is sued in that person's individual capacity n4 must be served in accordance with the requirements of Rule 4 involving service on an individual. In such a case, the plaintiff need not serve the government as well as the individual defendants, because the government is not a defendant, and the agents are not sued in their official capacities. n5

[8] Service Related to Foreign States

[a] Foreign State or Political Subdivision of Foreign State

The plaintiff may effect service of process on a foreign state or political subdivision by one of the four following methods, whether the action is filed in federal or state court. n1

1. Service made pursuant to an agreement between the plaintiff and the foreign state defendant, in accordance with a special arrangement.

2. If no special arrangement exists, service of process may be effected pursuant to an international convention or treaty, provided that the United States and the foreign state or political subdivision are signatories to the convention or treaty.

3. If the above two methods are not practicable, service of process may be effected by mailing a copy of the summons and complaint and notice of the action, in English and the official language of the foreign country, to the head of the ministry of foreign affairs of the country where service is sought. To be effective, the mailing must require the recipient to sign for the package on receipt and must be addressed and sent by the clerk of the court.

4. If service of process is not possible under the three methods listed above, and 30 days has lapsed since service of process was attempted by mail, the plaintiff may make service by mailing two copies of the summons and complaint and a notice of suit, in English and the official language of the foreign country, by any form of mail that requires the recipient to sign for the package on receipt. The documents must be addressed and sent by the clerk of the court to the United States Secretary of State in Washington, D.C., specifically to the attention of the Director of Special Consular Services. The Secretary of State will then transmit one copy of the summons, complaint, and notice of suit through diplomatic channels to the foreign state and send to the clerk of the court a certified copy of the diplomatic note, which provides proof that the papers were transmitted. Service of process made by this method is deemed complete as of the date of transmittal set forth on the diplomatic note. n2

[b] Agency or Instrumentality of Foreign State

The plaintiff may effect service of process on a agency or instrumentality of a foreign state by one of the following three methods, whether the action is filed in federal or state court: n3

1. The plaintiff and the foreign state agency or instrumentality may make a special arrangement for the delivery of the summons and complaint.

2. If the parties are unwilling to make a special arrangement, the plaintiff may deliver the summons and complaint to an officer, managing or general agent, or any other agent authorized by appointment or law to accept service of process within the United States. Additionally, service of process may be made pursuant to an international convention or treaty.

3. If service of process is not possible under the above two methods, the plaintiff may deliver a copy of the summons and complaint, in English and in the official language of the foreign state, to either (a) a person specifically authorized in an official response to letters rogatory, (b) the agency or instrumentality by mail requiring a return receipt, addressed and sent by the clerk of the court, or (c) a person, agency, or instrumentality specified in a court order that conforms to the law of the foreign state where service is sought to be effected.

[9] State, Municipal, or Other Governmental Organization

A plaintiff may effect service of process on a state, municipal corporation, or other government organization in one of two ways. n1 First, the plaintiff may deliver a copy of the summons and complaint to the chief executive officer of the organization. n2 The summons and complaint must be personally delivered to the chief executive officer, n3 and if the plaintiff fails to do so, the court may dismiss the action if service of process was not otherwise properly effected. n4 Second, the plaintiff may serve process on a state, municipal corporation, or other governmental organization pursuant to the laws of the state where service is sought. n5 If the plaintiff elects this method, service is ineffective unless all of the state law service requirements are met. n6

PART IV. SERVICE OF PROCESS

1-6 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 6.65

§ 6.65 Persons Immune From Servicen*

Certain persons are granted immunity for at least some periods of time from service of process. The most common example of immunity from service are persons who enter a jurisdiction for the limited purpose of contesting jurisdiction. n1 Persons who enter a jurisdiction for the purpose of appearing before the court for another action are also granted immunity from service of process for the period of time that they are appearing. n2 Also, if the plaintiff lures the defendant into the court's jurisdiction under a false pretense, service of process on the defendant while the defendant is in the jurisdiction is invalid. n3 However, if a party voluntarily enters a jurisdiction to appear before the court for an action that involves the same subject matter as the case in which service is sought, the person does not have service immunity. n4

In addition to potential parties to an action, other persons may be entitled to service immunity. For example, witnesses who appear before a court or for some other judicial proceeding, such as a deposition are immune from service of process, provided that the matter for which they appear is unrelated to the case for which service is sought. n5 In another example, non-resident attorneys who appear before a court or for some other judicial proceeding are granted immunity from service of process provided that the action for which they appear is unrelated to the action for which service is sought. n6

CHAPTER 6 PERSONAL JURISDICTION AND SERVICE OF PROCESS
PART IV. SERVICE OF PROCESS

1-6 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 6.66

§ 6.66 Persons With Authority to Effect Service of Processn*

[1] General Requirements

Service of process may be accomplished by any person at least 18 years of age who is not a party to the action. n1 For purposes of party status, the term "non-party" under Rule 4 includes the plaintiff's attorney, regardless of whether the attorney could be classified as a party's agent or interested person in the case. n2 Age and non-party status are the only requirements for a process server, and even felons and incarcerated persons may serve process. For example, in a civil rights action commenced by a prison inmate, incarcerated prisoners who were over 18 years of age validly effected service of process on prison guards. n3

[2] Court Appointment of Process Server

A plaintiff may request the court to order that service be effected by a United States marshal or Deputy United States marshal, or by some other particular person. n1 Generally, such a request will not be granted by the court unless the plaintiff has first attempted to serve the defendant by some other means. n2 For example, it is a common practice that prisoners proceeding in forma pauperis obtain the assistance of United States marshals in effecting service. n3 In this regard, the court must make such an appointment in two circumstances: n4 when the plaintiff is authorized in the United States Code to proceed in forma pauperis n5 or is authorized to proceed as a seaman. n6 Seamen are permitted to commence civil actions involving wages or enforcement of a statute enacted for their safety without paying court fees and costs. n7 Generally, "seamen" are those persons who engage in work normally associated with work on any ocean vessel. n8

If the court specifically appoints a person to effect service, that person may not use an agent to complete the court's instructions, n9 unless the order signed by district court expressly provides for service by the certain person or by his or her designee. n10 In some district courts, local rules either expressly designate who the specific process server is or provide the clerk with authority to grant motions for appointment of special process servers. The Federal Rules allow the clerk to grant such motions. n11

CHAPTER 6 PERSONAL JURISDICTION AND SERVICE OF PROCESS
PART IV. SERVICE OF PROCESS

1-6 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 6.67

§ 6.67 Time Requirements for Service of Processn*

[1] Deadline for Effecting Service

The plaintiff must effect proper service against the defendant within 120 days of the commencement of the action, which occurs with the filing of the complaint. If the plaintiff fails to do so, the court must either dismiss the action without prejudice as to that defendant or direct that service be effected within a specified time. n1 If the plaintiff files an amended complaint naming additional defendants to the lawsuit, the 120-day period for service on the new defendants begins to run from the date of the filing of the amendment. The time for service on the defendants named in the original complaint is not extended by the amendment. n2

Although some local rules have attempted to encourage practitioners to ensure that service is made sooner than 120 days after filing the complaint as permitted in Rule 4, the Supreme Court has held that Rule 4 prohibits dismissal of a complaint if properly served within 120 days or within such additional time as the court may allow. The Court concluded that the 120-day provision operates not as an outer limit that is subject to reduction, but as an allowance that may be extended but not reduced. n3

[2] Court's Dismissal of Defendant on Plaintiff's Failure to Meet Deadline

[a] Dismissal After Notice to Plaintiff

If the plaintiff fails to properly serve the defendant within 120 days of commencing an action, the court may dismiss the defendant from the action. n1 The court may order dismissal following a motion for dismissal initiated either by the defendant or by the court, provided that the plaintiff receives notice of the motion prior to dismissal. n2 A defense of lack of service of process within the 120-day period may be waived, however, if the defendant does not raise the defense in the first responsive pleading or the first Rule 12(b) motion to dismiss. n3 Courts have consistently held that an order for dismissal against a plaintiff solely for failure to timely effect service under Rule 4(m) must be without prejudice to the plaintiff refiling the claim against the same defendant. n4 However, this rule does not prevent the court from entering a judgment with prejudice against a plaintiff when a Rule 4(m) motion is pending, when the judgment with prejudice is based on another rule, such as Rule 41(b). n4.1

The 120-day period to effect service does not apply to service of process effected outside the United States, because Rule 4(m) does not provide for a limitation period to effect service outside the United States. n5 The plaintiff must actually attempt to effect service in a foreign country, however, in order to benefit from the foreign service exemption to the 120-day rule. n6

[b] Extension of Time for Good Cause

[i] Extension Mandatory On Showing of Good Cause

A court must grant an extension of time for the plaintiff to complete service if the plaintiff demonstrates good cause for failing to serve defendant within the 120-day period. n7 The plaintiff has the burden to prove that the delay in effecting service was based on good cause. n8 If good cause is shown for the failure, the court is required to grant an extension and abuses its discretion if it fails to grant additional time. n9 Furthermore, even without a showing of good cause, courts have discretion to grant additional time to complete service. n10 That is because the courts have held that Rule 4(m) requires two inquiries regarding whether the failure to effect service requires a dismissal. First, the court must determine whether the plaintiff has shown good cause for the failure to timely effect service; if good cause is shown, plaintiff is entitled to a mandatory extension of time; but even if the plaintiff fails to show good cause, the court must still consider whether or not to grant a permissive extension based on excusable neglect. n10.1 At that point, the court may in its discretion either dismiss case without prejudice or extend the time for service. n11

[ii] Determination of Good Cause

Whether good cause exists to justify a mandatory extension of time depends on an examination of all of the circumstances regarding service in the particular case, including any attempts that were made to accomplish service. n11.1 At least one circuit has formulated a good cause test: the court should consider the following factors in its determination of whether there is good cause for a failure to serve within the 120-day time period: (1) whether the party to be served received actual notice of the lawsuit; (2) whether the defendant would suffer prejudice; and (3) whether the plaintiff would be severely prejudiced if the complaint were dismissed. n11.2

Although it may be grounds for a permissive extension of time, n11.3 excusable neglect, such as an inadvertent failure to effect service within the 120 days, does not constitute good cause sufficient to extend the time of service, n12 nor does ignorance of the law. n13 On the other hand, a sincere but technically insufficient attempt by the plaintiff to effect proper service, may suffice as good cause, n14 provided the plaintiff demonstrates some form of diligence in attempting service. n15 For example, a plaintiff's repeated but unsuccessful efforts to determine the defendant's address demonstrates diligence in attempting service sufficient to constitute good cause. n16 On the other hand, the court may determine that an inordinate lapse of time in effecting service after the 120-day period ended may outweigh any good faith attempts to properly and timely effect service. n17

Although it may be one of the factors a court considers in its determination of "good cause," n17.1 the fact that a plaintiff will be barred by the statute of limitation from pursuing a new action if the case is dismissed does not alone establish good cause. The plaintiff must establish good cause for failing to comply with the 120-day requirement. n18

In cases involving pro se plaintiffs, courts have discretion to liberally construe the good cause requirement. n19 For example, a plaintiff's reliance on the advice of the local court's pro se office constituted good cause when such reliance caused delay in the service of process. n20 In addition, courts may liberally enforce the 120-day period in cases involving pro se plaintiffs who cannot otherwise effect service on their own and are required to rely on a United States marshal to effect service. n21

[c] Extension of Time Without Good Cause

Even if a plaintiff is unable to establish good cause for failing to complete service of process within the 120-day time period, n21.1 the court may nevertheless grant an extension of time to the plaintiff to serve the defendant if the plaintiff can show excusable neglect. n21.2 Thus, if the plaintiff fails to show good cause, extension of time to serve is not mandatory, but the court must still consider whether a permissive extension of time should be allowed. At that point, the court may in its discretion either dismiss the case without prejudice or extend the time for service. n22 The determination of whether the court should grant a permissive extension of time depends on the equities of the case. n23 For example, the court may extend the time if the applicable statute of limitation would bar a refiled action, n24 or if the defendant has been evading service or has concealed a defect in attempted service. The court may also allow a pro se plaintiff an extension due to confusion or delay attending the resolution of an in forma pauperis petition. n25

In any event, the decision whether to extend the time period when no good cause has been shown is within the discretion of the district court, and when the district court properly relies on the relevant law and makes no factual findings that are clearly erroneous, an abuse of discretion exists regarding a permissive extension only if its decision was arbitrary or unreasonable. n26

CHAPTER 6 PERSONAL JURISDICTION AND SERVICE OF PROCESS
PART IV. SERVICE OF PROCESS

1-6 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 6.68

§ 6.68 Methods of Service of Processn*

[1] Summary of Methods of Service

A plaintiff has all of the following options to serve process on a defendant located in the United States. n1

1. Service pursuant to the law of the state in which the district court is located. n2

2. Service pursuant to the law of the state where the service is to be effected. n3

3. Personal delivery of the summons and complaint to an individual defendant. n4

4. Personal delivery of the summons and complaint to an agent authorized by the defendant to receive service of process. n5

5. Personal delivery of the summons and complaint to an agent authorized by law to receive service of process. n6

6. Deposit of the process at the dwelling house of an individual defendant, with a person of suitable age and discretion residing there. n7

[2] Service According to State Law

A plaintiff in federal court may serve process pursuant to the law of the state where the service is to be effected n1 or pursuant to the law of the forum state where the action will be adjudicated. n2 For example, when a complaint has been filed in a federal court located in Texas, the plaintiff may serve process pursuant to the Texas long-arm statute and the court will have personal jurisdiction over the defendant even though located in another state. n3 Some districts have local rules that specifically refer to a state law and the procedure under the state law. Attorneys who are unfamiliar with the details of a particular state's practice should refer to such local rules. Even if the plaintiff fails technically to serve a defendant according to the requirements set forth under a state law, substantial compliance with the state requirements may render service valid or may allow the plaintiff to cure the defect. n4

[3] Personal Delivery of Summons and Complaint

The plaintiff may effect service of process by personal delivery of the summons and complaint to the defendant. n1 It should be noted that personal delivery does not necessarily entail placing the summons and complaint in defendant's hand or physical possession. Thus, personal delivery may include acts such as placing the summons and complaint through a slot in a door to a room where the defendant is located, n2 or throwing the papers over the fence onto a lawn after having first tried unsuccessfully to the serve defendant's representatives personally. n3 Personal delivery has generally been viewed as the server placing the documents in the physical proximity of the defendant, as opposed to having them delivered to an address, such as by mailing. n4

[4] Personal Delivery To Agent Authorized by Defendant

The plaintiff may serve process on an agent appointed by the defendant to receive service of process. n1 It should be noted, however, that an agency relationship between parties for one purpose does not necessarily extend to an agency relationship for the purpose of service of process. For example, an attorney representing a defendant in one case is not necessarily the defendant's agent for service of process regarding a different matter. An attorney accepting service on behalf of a defendant, like any other agent, must be specifically appointed for the purpose of accepting service in that case in order for service to be valid. n2 Similarly, for purposes of service of process, a building manager is not necessarily an agent for a landlord. n3

The defendant may have the summons quashed if service of process is made on a purported agent who is not actually authorized by the defendant to accept service. n4

[5] Personal Delivery To Agent Authorized by Law

Service of process may be made to an agent authorized by federal or state law to accept service. n0.1 The plaintiff may serve process on an agent authorized to accept service by a particular federal law. n1 For example, in a patent infringement action commenced in a district where the defendant is not a resident but has a regular and established place of business, service of process on the defendant may be made on the defendant's agent or agents conducting that business. n2

With respect to state law, service of process outside of a state may be effected on defendant's non-resident agent if that agent is authorized to accept such service pursuant to the state laws. n3 It should be noted that an agency relationship in one capacity authorized by state law does not necessarily confer an agency relationship for purposes of service of process. n4

[6] Leaving Summons and Complaint at Defendant's Dwelling House or Usual Place of Abode

[a] Two Criteria for Valid Service

A plaintiff may serve process by leaving a copy of the summons and complaint at the defendant's dwelling house or usual place of abode with a person of suitable age and discretion residing at that dwelling or abode. n1 The court will accept such service as valid only if both of the following elements are satisfied, determined on the circumstances of each case: n2

1. Whether the particular place constitutes a party's "dwelling house or usual place of abode" within the meaning of the rule. n3

2. Whether the particular person the summons and complaint is left with is of "suitable age and discretion." n4

[b] Dwelling House or Usual Place of Abode Is Where Person Resides

A plaintiff using this method of service has the burden to prove that service was effected at defendant's dwelling house or usual place of abode. Although Rule 4 does not define "dwelling house or usual place of abode," n4.1 the courts have generally held that it is the place where a person lives, his or her current residence. n5 A former residence is inadequate for purposes of effecting service, even if defendant receives actual notice of service. n6 A defendant may have multiple dwelling houses for purposes of effecting service of process. n7 A person need not live at one place continuously for it to be considered a dwelling or usual place of abode for purposes of effecting service. n8

Because service on a person of suitable age and discretion must be made at defendant's dwelling house or usual place of abode, service of process at defendant's place of business is improper under this category. n9

[c] Person of Suitable Age and Discretion

Under this method of service, the summons and complaint may be served by leaving it with a person of "suitable age and discretion." n10 The trial court must determine on a case-by-case basis whether the person served with process is of suitable age and discretion. n11 Certain types of individuals have consistently been held as of suitable age and discretion. For example, a spouse of a defendant is generally considered a person of suitable age and discretion. n12 Other adult family members also are typically considered persons of suitable age and discretion. n13

Domestic employees may also qualify as persons of suitable age and discretion, provided they live at the defendant's residence, n14 because the rule provides that the person of suitable age and discretion who accepts service must reside at defendant's residence at the time of service. n15 Note, however, that even a nonresident employee may be a proper recipient of service as an agent of the served person under Rule 4(e)(2)(C). n16

PART II Jurisdiction; Venue; Removal
CHAPTER 6 PERSONAL JURISDICTION AND SERVICE OF PROCESS
PART IV. SERVICE OF PROCESS

1-6 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 6.69

§ 6.69 Proof of Service of Processn*

[1] Method of Proof of Service in United States

A party that is required to make service of process in the United States must file proof of the service with the court. n1 Except when service has been made by a United States marshal or deputy marshal, n2 the serving party must make proof of service by filing the server's affidavit that service has been completed in the prescribed manner. n3 The plaintiff bears the initial burden of proving that service of process was properly effected. n4 Once the plaintiff meets that burden, a mere allegation by the defendant that process has not been served, without some additional evidence, is insufficient to refute the validity of an affidavit of service. Thus, after plaintiff files proof of service, a defendant refuting the validity of service bears the burden of proof to overcome prima facie evidence of proper service. n5

[2] Method of Proof of Service Outside United States

A plaintiff making service of process outside the United States pursuant to the provisions of an international treaty or convention must make proof of service pursuant to the provisions of the treaty or convention. n1 If service is made outside of the United States by permissible means not specifically set forth in an international treaty or convention, n2 or as directed by the court, n3 proof of service must be made by a receipt signed by the addressee, or by other evidence that satisfies the court that the summons and complaint were delivered to the addressee. n4

[3] Requirements of Proof of Service

The party initiating service of process must file with the court proof that service was properly effected in all cases except when formal service of process has been waived by the defendant. n1 If the process server submits proof of service in writing, the submission establishes prima facie evidence that service was properly effected. n2 If the server is not a United States marshall, the server must submit an affidavit of service, which must be signed by the person effecting service. n3

The affidavit of service or any other proof of service must indicate the date service was effected. Proof of service must also indicate that service was effected within 120 days after plaintiff filed the complaint n4 and the location where the summons was served and the identity of the person served. n5 If the plaintiff has not met all of the requirements of proof of service, the plaintiff may amend the proof of service to cure technical defects raised by the defendant, provided that the defendant is not prejudiced. n6

[4] Effect of Failure to File Proof of Service

If service of process has been properly executed, it will not be rendered defective by plaintiff's failure to file proof of service with the court. n1 Rather, failure to file proof of service merely deprives plaintiff of prima facie evidence that service has properly been effected. n2 Failure to provide proof of service may justify dismissal without prejudice only when the defendant was prejudiced n3

§ 6.70 Dispensation With Service Fee Payment for Indigent Plaintiffn*

If a plaintiff cannot afford to pay court costs and fees, the plaintiff may with the permission of the court commence an action without paying the costs and fees, n1 including the costs of service of process. Thus, when the plaintiff commences an action in forma pauperis, the court clerk must issue a summons and court officers must assist the plaintiff in serving process without a fee. n2

Congress has made several amendments to the in forma pauperis statute for the express purpose of curbing perceived abuses in civil litigation by inmates. n3 The amended statute includes several additional requirements that apply only to prisoners, n4 including the requirement that, although an indigent prisoner may defer prepayment of filing fees, the prisoner must ultimately repay the fees. n5 Additionally, a prisoner is barred from bringing a civil action in forma pauperis if he or she has brought three or more prior actions or appeals that were dismissed as frivolous, malicious, or for failure to state a claim. n6

For further discussion of these requirements, see Ch. 25, Judgment.

PART II Jurisdiction; Venue; Removal
CHAPTER 7 VENUE
PART I. FUNDAMENTALS GOVERNING VENUE

1-7 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 7.01

§ 7.01 Nature of Venuen*

[1] Definition of Venue

"Venue" in the federal court system is the court's determination of the location of the district court or courts where it is proper to hear a particular claim or action. n1 A statute prescribes the general rule for the proper district: where the defendant lives, where the cause of action arose, or where the property is located. n2 The purpose of this statutorily defined venue is to protect the defendant against the risk that a plaintiff will select an unfair or inconvenient location for trial. n3 However, the principle of venue does not restrict a court's power over a particular person or property, or the court's competence to adjudicate a particular matter. n4 Venue statutes are primarily concerned with the convenience of the parties, n5 and are designed to direct claims to the appropriately convenient court based on the subject matter of the claim and the parties involved in an action. n6

Venue rules do not involve the court's power either to decide a particular type of case, as do subject matter jurisdiction rules, or the power to bind the parties before the court, as personal jurisdiction rules do; n7 therefore, no constitutional rights are implicated by the venue statutes; and consequently, any rights conferred by the federal venue statutes may be waived by the parties. n8

[2] Distinction Between Subject Matter Jurisdiction and Venue

The attorney for a defending party should ensure that objections to the location of trial are properly and distinctly made because an objection to subject matter jurisdiction does not necessarily preserve an objection, for venue purposes, to the location of the court. n1 Subject matter jurisdiction statutes require a court to determine whether that court has the ultimate constitutional or statutory power to adjudicate a particular type of claim. n2 On the other hand, the essence of venueis a matter of litigational convenience regarding the location of the proceedings; accordingly, venue is waived if not timely raised. Because subject-matter jurisdiction concerns a court's competence to adjudicate a particular category of cases, it is a matter far weightier than venue, and subject-matter jurisdiction must be considered by the court on its own motion, even if no party raises an objection. n3

[3] Distinction Between Personal Jurisdiction and Venue

Personal jurisdiction is the authority of a court to hear a case regarding a particular defendant--any court within that territory may be able to exercise personal jurisdiction over the defendant. n1 Venue, on the other hand, is the designation of which court is the proper court to hear a particular claim or action. Venue rules generally provide that the action be brought in the county or district where the defendant lives, where the cause of action arose, or where the property is located. n2 Thus, although personal jurisdiction answers the question of who (or what property) is subject to adjudication of the court, venue answers the question of where is it proper for the case to be heard. n3

Both personal jurisdiction and lack of venue may be waived. n4 This is important because an objection to venue will not preserve an objection to a personal jurisdiction defect, and vice versa. n5 Furthermore, while a defendant may challenge personal jurisdiction in a separate proceeding known as a collateral attack, a defendant may not object to venue in a separate proceeding. n6

CHAPTER 7 VENUE
PART I. FUNDAMENTALS GOVERNING VENUE

1-7 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 7.02

§ 7.02 Law Controlling Venue of Actionsn*

[1] Federal Statutes Control Transitory Actions

Venue is a procedural matter; therefore, pursuant to the Erie Doctrine, federal law controls venue even in diversity cases in which substantive matters are generally governed by state law. Federal venue statutes n1 control venue of "transitory actions" in the federal courts, which are actions that historically had their venue determined by residence of parties rather than location of property. "Local actions" are those that involved the protection or recovery of real property or an estate in real property; if the action centers on real property, it is a local action, which must be brought in the district where the realty is located. n2 Thus, the traditional distinction between transitory actions and local actions is the same as the distinction between in personam and in rem jurisdiction, because to provide in rem relief, the court must have jurisdiction over the real property at issue, and a local action must therefore be brought in the jurisdiction in which that real property is located. n3 On the other hand, the action is transitory, even though it may affect land, if the type of relief requested is personal in nature so that the court acts on the defendant's person or personal property and requires only in personam jurisdiction over the defendant. n4

Although there have been conflicting case decisions regarding the question of whether to apply state or federal law to determine if an action is local, n5 the current view is that federal law controls, because of the overriding doctrine that procedural matters in the federal courts are governed solely by federal law. n6

[2] General Venue Statute Controls for Most Kinds of Actions

The federal venue statutes are of two kinds. A "general venue statute" n1 is applicable to all types of actions unless a "special venue statute" specifies that the special statute controls for an action of a particular subject matter specified in the statute. n2 The general venue statute governs venue of actions in federal court, including federal question and diversity actions, except as otherwise provided by law. In other words, the general venue statute applies except when it is superseded by a venue statute which has been enacted to control a particular type of action. n3 The types of special venue statute are discussed in [3], below.

[3] Special Venue Statute May Be Exclusive or Supplemental

Special venue statutes apply to many different types of action, such as copyright cases, n1 government contract disputes, n2 and employee retirement income security cases. n3 For a complete list of venue statutes, see 17 Moore's Federal Practice, § 110.60 (Matthew Bender 3d ed.). Each special venue statute may be categorized as either exclusive or supplemental to the general venue statute provisions. An exclusive special venue statute is the sole provision governing venue for the type of action covered by that statute--the provisions of the general venue statute do not also apply to such action. n3.1 For example the Supreme Court has held that for patent infringement actions, the special venue statute n4 is the sole and exclusive provision governing venue in such actions. n5 On the other hand, when a special venue statute is supplemental, it expands venue choices in addition to those existing under the general venue statute. n6

The resolution of the question of whether a special venue statute applies depends on analysis of the precise language of the statute and whether the history and function of the statute indicate a congressional intent to either expand or to limit venue choice under the statute. Generally, special venue statutes have been considered to be supplemental, rather than exclusive, if the statute is read as originally intended to expand rather than contract venue. n7 In the area of antitrust, for example, the courts have read the special venue provisions applicable to antitrust as supplementing the general venue statutes. n8

PART I. FUNDAMENTALS GOVERNING VENUE

1-7 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 7.03

§ 7.03 Plaintiff Has Initial Choice of Venue of Actionn*

In the typical case, there is more than one proper venue available under the applicable venue statute, including the general venue statute. n1 In such circumstances, the plaintiff is generally entitled to choose the location in which to file the action, n2 provided the choice meets the minimum criteria specified in the venue statute. n3 However, the plaintiff's initial choice of forum may be denied based on several considerations that further the purposes of the venue statutes, which are to protect the defendant against the risk that a plaintiff will select an unfair or inconvenient location for trial, n4 and to protect the defendant from being forced to defend lawsuits in a court remote from the defendant's residence or from where the acts underlying the controversy occurred. n5

A plaintiff even has a right to choose a relatively inconvenient forum for strategic reasons provided that the venue choice was otherwise proper under the standards of the applicable venue rule. The plaintiff may initiate an action in a proper venue without fear that sanctions will be imposed, regardless of the plaintiff's motivation for filing there; however, the plaintiff's motivations may be considered in whether the court gives deference to the plaintiff's choice. n5.1 Furthermore, if the plaintiff chooses an inconvenient forum, the defendant may be able to have the action transferred to a more convenient forum under the transfer statute, n6 or dismissal under the forum non conveniens doctrine. n7 These topics are discussed in Part IV, Change of Venue. n8

CHAPTER 7 VENUE
PART I. FUNDAMENTALS GOVERNING VENUE

1-7 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 7.04

§ 7.04 Forum Selection Clausesn*

The parties to an agreement may include a provision, known as a forum selection clause, which specifies the forum in the event litigation arises regarding the agreement. n1 When litigation does result regarding the agreement, two scenarios may arise. First, a plaintiff may file an action in a district specified in the forum selection clause although that district is not a proper venue under the applicable venue statute. Courts will generally enforce a forum selection clause provided for in an agreement freely negotiated by the parties because the clause constitutes a waiver of the protection of the venue statute. n2 However, there are exceptions to this rule: courts will not enforce the clause if it is establishedthat enforcement would be unjust or unreasonable, the provision is contrary to public policy, the provision is invalid for some reason, such as fraud or undue influence, n3 or the agreed forum is so inconvenient as to deprive the party of his or her day in court. n4

The second scenario occurs when the defendant moves to enforce a forum selection clause after the plaintiff has chosen a different, but otherwise proper, forum under the applicable venue statute. When raised in the context of a motion to transfer, the court must consider the existence of the clause as only one factor in the many factors related to convenience enumerated in the transfer statutes. n5 However, if the issue of the forum selection clause is raised in a motion to dismiss it becomes a matter of contract law and the appropriate federal or state law will apply. If the federal or state law generally upholds such clauses, the action should be dismissed when the plaintiff brings the action in a venue other than specified in the clause, even if in a proper venue under the statute. n6

PART I. FUNDAMENTALS GOVERNING VENUE

1-7 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 7.05

§ 7.05 Pleading and Burden of Proofn*

Unlike the case with subject matter jurisdiction, the plaintiff does not have to plead the basis for filing an action in a particular district court. Venue is not a matter that must be raised by the proponent of the forum because venue involves a privilege personal to the defendant, and the purpose of venue statutes is to prevent litigation from being conducted in a forum that is inconvenient to the defendant or unfair because the forum lacks a sufficient connection with the events giving rise to the claim. n1 Therefore, a defendant that fails to make a timely objection to venue waives the objection. n2 However, if the defendant challenges venue in a timely manner, the plaintiff bears the burden of establishing that venue is proper. n3 Then, on a motion to transfer venue based on convenience of the parties, the burden shifts back to the defendant to show that the applicable factors favor the transfer of venue. n4

PART II Jurisdiction; Venue; Removal
CHAPTER 7 VENUE
PART I. FUNDAMENTALS GOVERNING VENUE

1-7 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 7.06

§ 7.06 Effect of Joinder on Venuen*

[1] Joinder of Claims

When multiple claims are joined in an action, venue must technically be proper for each separate claim. n1 This requirement is not strictly enforced, however, because courts have interpreted the meaning of "claim for relief" and "cause of action" broadly, and because courts have allowed liberal venue over joined claims by relying on a theory of "pendent venue" analogous to the pendent jurisdiction doctrine, n2 now referred to supplemental jurisdiction. n3 Whether to apply the principle of pendent venue in any given case thus depends on whether the court may exercise supplemental jurisdiction, n4 which in turn depends on whether the claims arise out of a common nucleus of operative fact. When determining whether to permit "pendent venue," courts traditionally also have considered whether the exercise of jurisdiction furthers the goals of judicial economy, convenience, avoidance of piecemeal litigation, and fairness to the parties. n5 It remains to be seen whether the district court's power to decline to exercise "pendent venue" has been limited by the supplemental jurisdiction statute, and what impact the supplemental jurisdiction statute may have over how courts determine whether "pendent venue" should be allowed. n6

[2] Joinder of Parties

The venue statutes control the initial location of the court at the time the suit is filed by the plaintiff. It has been held that the venue statutes have no application to new claims against existing parties, including counterclaims, cross-claims, or claims in intervention. This interpretation is based on the language of the venue statutes, which commonly use the expression of where an action "may be brought." n1 In a similar way, when a third-party claim joins new parties, the newparties do not need to meet venue requirements because they are regarded as ancillary to the existing suit. n2 If the plaintiff files an amended complaint which adds additional parties, however, venue rules must be satisfied for that amended complaint. An amended complaint is treated as a new action, except under the relation back doctrine in some cases for statute of limitation purposes, and therefore a determination must be made as to whether the chosen district is one where the action "may be brought." n3

For class actions, the court must determine venue under the statutes in the same manner that would apply if the action were not a class action, according to an application of the statutory requirements to the named parties. Members of the class other than the named representative party or parties should not be considered. n4

CHAPTER 7 VENUE
PART I. FUNDAMENTALS GOVERNING VENUE

1-7 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 7.07

§ 7.07 Effect of Removal on Venuen*

When an action is removed from a state court, on the grounds that original jurisdiction over the action exists in the federal district courts, it must be removed by the defendant or defendants to the federal district court for the district and division embracing the place where the state action is pending. n1 Thus, the removal statute itself contains a venue provision, and the venue statutes that would have applied if the action been brought originally in federal court are not applicable. n2

Because there is only one federal venue into which the state court action may be removed, the defendant may challenge venue if it was removed to any other district. n2.1 Thus, after removal, the defendant may challenge whether venue was proper in the state court, because the right to challenge state court venue is not waived by the removal. n3 Furthermore, the defendant may challenge removal in the federal district court when the defendant asserts removal was incorrectly brought by making a motion for transfer of venue to the district where removal should have occurred. However, when a defendant asserts improper removal venue, the defendant may not challenge venue in the court where removal should have occurred, nor in the district court where venue would be brought if the case had originally been brought in federal court, rather than removed to federal court. n4 Finally, if the plaintiff files an amended complaint in federal court adding new claims or new defendants after removal, venue must be proper with respect to the new claims or new defendants under the applicable general or special venue provision, because an amended complaint is considered a new action, and if appropriate the defendant may make a motion for a discretionary transfer to that district court forum under the transfer provision. n5

CHAPTER 7 VENUE
PART II. DETERMINATION OF VENUE UNDER GENERAL VENUE STATUTE

1-7 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 7.20

§ 7.20 General Venue Statute Controls Both Federal Question and Diversity Casesn*

The general venue statute n1 has been given that designation by the courts because it generally governs venue of actions in federal court, including federal question and diversity actions, n2 except as otherwise provided by law. The general venue statute applies unless it is superseded by a venue statute that has been enacted to control a particular type of action. n2.1 The latter type of statute is referred to as a "special venue statute," n3 and is discussed in § 7.40 et seq.

Unless another federal statute provides otherwise, the general venue statute provides that a civil action based on diversity of citizenship jurisdiction may be brought only in a judicial district in which (1) any defendant resides, if all defendants reside in the same state, (2) a substantial part of the events or omissions giving rise to the claim occurred, or a substantial part of property that is the subject of the action is situated, or (3) any defendant is subject to personal jurisdiction at the time the action is commenced, if there is no other district in which the action may be brought. n4 A civil action that is based on a federal question (not founded solely on diversity of citizenship) may be brought only in a judicial district in which (1) any defendant resides, if all defendants reside in the same state, (2) a substantial part of the events or omissions giving rise to the claim occurred, or a substantial part of property that is the subject of the action is situated, or (3) any defendant may be found, if there is no district in which the action may otherwise be brought. n5 Thus, the general venue statute treats diversity cases and non-diversity cases differently, in that Section 1391(a) prescribes venue for actions based solely on diversity, and Section 1391(b) prescribes those cases involving any other kind of case within federal jurisdiction, such as federal question cases, except for cases for which Congress has specially provided venue. n6

CHAPTER 7 VENUE
PART II. DETERMINATION OF VENUE UNDER GENERAL VENUE STATUTE

1-7 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 7.21

§ 7.21 Possible Venue Under General Venue Statuten*

Both subsections of the general venue statute, which govern diversity and nondiversity actions, respectively, have three clauses. The first two clauses are identical, but the third has minor differences. n1 When read together, n1.1 the two general venue statute provisions provide that venue is proper only in the following places:

1. Whether jurisdiction is founded on diversity or federal question jurisdiction, an action may be brought in a judicial district where any defendant resides, if all defendants reside in the same state. n2

2. Whether jurisdiction is founded on diversity or federal question jurisdiction, an action may be brought in a judicial district in which a substantial part of the events or omissions giving rise to the claim occurred, or a substantial part of the property that is the subject of the action is situated. n3

3. In cases in which jurisdiction is founded only on diversity of citizenship, if there is no district in which the action may otherwise be brought under items (1) or (2), above, venue is proper in a judicial district in which any defendant is subject to personal jurisdiction at the time the action is commenced. n4 This provision is a "fall-back" venue provision only. Consequently, the court should not consider the terms of this provision unless it has determined that venue is not proper under paragraph 1 and 2, above. n4.1

4. In cases in which jurisdiction is founded on a federal question, if there is no district in which the action may otherwise be brought under items (1) or (2), above, venue is proper in a judicial district in which any defendant may be found. n5

CHAPTER 7 VENUE
PART II. DETERMINATION OF VENUE UNDER GENERAL VENUE STATUTE

1-7 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 7.22

§ 7.22 Residence of Defendantn*

[1] Residence of Party Based on Status

The general venue statute provides that venue is proper in both diversity or federal question jurisdiction actions where any defendant resides, if all defendants reside in the same state. n1 Thus, for example, under Section 1391(a)(1) or (b)(1),venue would be proper in the judicial district of the United States District Court for the Western District of Washington when all defendants reside in the State of Washington and at least one resides in the judicial district judicial district ofthe Western District of Washington. n2 The issue of where a party resides is dependent on the status of the party, as discussed in [2]-[6], below. The residence of a party is determined according to the facts as they exist at the time the action is commenced. n3 Therefore, a change in residence after filing does not affect venue. n4 However, if a party is added or joined after the action is originally filed, the party's residence must be determined as to that defendant as of the time the party is joined. n5

[2] Individuals

For all venue purposes, the residence of an individual is deemed to be the person's permanent residence or legal domicile. n1 Therefore, an individual's mere current residence in a location is not enough for purposes of establishing the propriety of venue there. n2 A person's domicile is the place of the person's fixed and permanent home, and to which the person has the intention of returning in the future when presently absent from that place. Domicile thus contains a physical element and an element of the subjective factor of intent. n3 Determination of domicile is a question for the trier of fact. n4

Domicile has also been equated with citizenship for diversity of citizenship jurisdiction purposes, and diversity cases discussing domicile may be used as precedent to determine domicile for venue purposes. In other words, courts consider the same factors to ascertain domicile when determining "residence" for purposes of venue as they do when determing "citizenship" for purposes of jurisdiction. n5

[3] Corporations

[a] Residence Generally Based on Amenability to Personal Jurisdiction

For purposes of determinations under the general, and most special, venue statutes, a corporate defendant is a resident of any district where it is subject to personal jurisdiction at the time the action is commenced. n1 This means that a corporation is a resident for venue purposes of each federal district within which its contacts would be sufficient to subject it to personal jurisdiction if that district were a separate state. n1.1 Thus, a corporation's residence is determined with reference to the minimum contacts due process analysis developed under International Shoe and its progeny. n1.2 Generally, this definition of corporate residence applies to defendants in all of the types of actions specified in Title 28, Sections 1391-1412, n2 and has also been held to apply to some other special venue provisions, such as the venue provisions governing Jones Act cases. n3 If a court finds that a corporation is not covered by one of these statutes, the residence of a corporation for venue purposes is limited to the state or states of its incorporation, which is the common law concept of corporate residence for venue purposes. n4

[b] Corporate Residence in Multidistrict States

When a state has more than one federal judicial district, a corporation is a resident for venue purposes of each district within which it has contacts that would be sufficient to subject it to personal jurisdiction if that district were a separate state. If there is no such district, but the corporation is subject to personal jurisdiction in the state as a whole, the corporation's residence is in the district in the state within which it has the most significant contacts. n5

[4] Unincorporated Associations

The residence of unincorporated associations such as partnerships have not been expressly defined in the general venue statutes. n1 In the absence of the express statutory directive, courts have most often treated unincorporated associations as analogous to corporations for the purposes of venue, and havedetermined proper venue according to the applicable statutory provision pertaining to residence of corporations. n2 Courts have given this treatment to various types of unincorporated associations, including labor unions, partnerships, limited partnerships, joint ventures, and trusts. n3 Therefore, it appears that unincorporated associations by analogy should also be treated as corporations pursuant to Section 1391(c), and therefore reside for venue purposes anywhere they are subject to personal jurisdiction. n4 Other courts courts take a different approach and look to where the individual members or partners reside, as well as where the unincorporated association does business. n4.1 Residence of corporations under Section 1391(c) is discussed further in [2], above.

In contrast to the general venue statute, some special venue statutes, do establish where venue is proper against unincorporated associations in the actions governed by the special statutes. For example, the Labor Management Relations Act provides that actions against labor unions governed by the Act may be brought in any district court having jurisdiction over the parties; that is, any district where the union maintains its principal office or in which its duly authorized officers or agents are engaged in representing or acting for employee members. However, residence is not a standard under this statute. n5

[5] Aliens

The general venue statute provides that an alien may be sued in any district. n1 The general venue statute does not refer to the residence of an alien because the venue statutes are based on a concept of residence dependent on citizenship, and because an alien is not considered a resident of a state or a judicial district in a state, and is not a citizen of a state. Therefore, even if an alien actually lives in a state or district, the alien is not considered a resident there for venue purposes. n2 Furthermore, nonresident aliens, clearly do not reside in any district. n3

[6] Public Officials

When a public official is sued in an official capacity, rather than as an individual, the public official is deemed to be a resident for venue purposes in the district of his or her official residence, which means where he or she performs his or her official duties. n1 This rule applies to state as well as federal officials, and an official may have more than one residence under this rule. n2 The residence of an official is significant because when sued in his or official capacity, the action may be brought in any judicial district in which the official defendant in the action resides. n3

PART II. DETERMINATION OF VENUE UNDER GENERAL VENUE STATUTE

1-7 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 7.23

§ 7.23 Determination of District Where Substantial Part of Events or Omissions Occurredn*

Pursuant to the general venue statute, venue is proper in any district in which a substantial part of the events or omissions giving rise to the claim occurred. n1 This determination is a federal issue whose answer depends on federal law. n2 Substantiality for venue purposes is more a qualitative than a quantitative inquiry, determined by assessing the overall nature of the plaintiff's claims and the nature of the specific defendant's events or omissions in the forum, and not by simply adding up the number of contacts. If material acts or omissions within the forum bear a close nexus to the claims, they are properly considered substantial. n3

Under this standard, the court must determine the location of a substantial part of the events or omissions based on only those facts related to the claim n4 and must make the determination based on the activities of the defendant, not the plaintiff. n5

In making its "substantial part" determination, a court does not need to find that a "majority" of the events take place in the forum, or that the challenged forum is the best forum for the lawsuit to be venued, because the statute only requires a substantial part of the events to have occurred in the forum. n6 Thus,the statute does not restrict venue to the district in which the "most substantial" events or omissions giving rise to a claim occurred. Rather, the statute contemplates that venue may be appropriate in more than one district and permits venue in multiple judicial districts, provided that a "substantial part" of the underlying events took place in those districts. However, the substantial events or omissions requirement does limit the forums available to plaintiffs, because the purpose of statutorily defined venue is to protect the defendant against the risk that a plaintiff will select an unfair or inconvenient place of trial. n7

§ 7.24 Determination of District Where Defendant May be Foundn*

In a federal question case controlled by the general venue statute, if venue may not be based either on the residence of the defendant, a place where a substantial part of the events or omissions giving rise to the claim occurred, or where a substantial part of property that is the subject of the action is situated, venue is proper in any judicial district in which any defendant may be found. n1 The courts have interpreted the phrase "in which any defendant may be found" to mean a location where the defendant is subject to personal jurisdiction, n1.1 including jurisdiction pursuant to long-arm statutes. For example, in one copyright case, the defendant was "found" in the district where he was subject to personal jurisdiction under the Wisconsin long-arm statute. n2

§ 7.40 Admiralty and Maritime Suitsn*

[1] Admiralty Claims in General

An admiralty or maritime claim may not be considered a civil action for the purposes of the general venue statute. n1 Some special venue statutes control certain types of admiralty actions, such as actions under the Limitation of Liability Act, n2 proceedings to enforce fines, penalties, and forfeitures, n3 and actions against the United States under the Suits in Admiralty Act and the Public Vessels Act. n4 However, when no special statute is applicable, venue is proper for admiralty or maritime claims in any district in which the court has jurisdiction over the defendant or subject matter of the claim. n5 It has been held that Rule 82, which provides that Sections 1391 and 1392 do not govern admiralty actions, does not refer to the venue transfer provisions, Sections 1404 and 1406. Therefore, admiralty actions may be transferred in the same manner as other actions. n6

[2] Suit by Seaman for Personal Injury or Death

The Jones Act provides for an action by a seaman against an employer for personal injury or death, as an alternative to an action brought under general maritime law. A seaman may bring a Jones Act lawsuit in the district in which the employer resides or in which the employer's principal office is located. n1 When the employer is a corporation, the residence of the corporate employer is in any district in which it is subject to personal jurisdiction at the time the action is commenced. n2 Thus, when the employer is a corporation, the second part of the Jones Act provision, referring to where "the employer's principal office is located" has no application. n3 3 Partnerships and other unincorporated associations are treated in the same manner as corporations. n4 Residence of corporations and associations under Section 1391(c) is discussed in § 7.22[3],[4]. If the employer is an individual, he or she resides where domiciled n5

§ 7.41 Suits Against Aliensn*

By statute an alien may be sued in any district. n1 This statute is a codification of the historical rule followed in the federal courts that suits against aliens are not subject to the general or special venue statutes. n2 The statute applies to both alien corporations as well as alien individuals. n3 It should be noted the statute by its terms applies only to suits against alien defendants; venue in suits brought by aliens are governed by the general venue statute or other applicable statutes. n4 Although contained in the general venue statute, the alien rule is not a restriction or adjustment of the general venue rules, but a broad, independent principle that takes precedence over venue statutes that otherwise might apply to actions against aliens because of the subject matter of the action. Therefore, suits against aliens are generally free from venue restrictions, and subject only to the requirements of service of process. n5 However, if a plaintiff relies on a special statute for liberalized service, such as worldwide service of process under the Clayton Act, n6 the plaintiff must also rely on that special statute for venue restrictions. n7

CHAPTER 7 VENUE
PART III. DETERMINATION OF VENUE UNDER SPECIFIC VENUE STATUTES

1-7 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 7.42

§ 7.42 Antitrust Suitsn*

Venue is proper for actions under the federal antitrust laws in any district in which the defendant resides or is found or has an agent. n1 If the defendant is acorporation, the plaintiff may bring an antitrust action against the corporate defendant not only in the judicial district where it is incorporated, but also in any district in which it may be found or transacts business. n2 Furthermore, these special venue statutes are considered non-exclusive; therefore, an antitrust action may also be brought under the general venue statute. n3 The Clayton Act also provides for nationwide or worldwide service of process on corporations in antitrust cases. n4 However, an antitrust plaintiff relying on the worldwide service of process provisions of the Clayton Act must also meet the venue provisions of that statute. Thus, a party seeking to take advantage of the liberalized service provisions of the Clayton Act is restricted to following the dictates of the venue provisions of the Clayton Act. Therefore, an antitrust plaintiff may not use the venue provisions of Section 1391(b), (c), or (d) when relying on the Clayton Act's worldwide service of process provision. n5 For example, if a plaintiff relies on nationwide service of process under the Clayton Act, the action only may be brought in the district where the defendant resides, is found, or transacts business, even if the defendant is an alien. The plaintiff is not allowed to rely on the provisions of § 1391(d), which ordinarily allows venue against an alien in any district. n6

§ 7.43 Arbitration Suitsn*

Under the Federal Arbitration Act, n1 a party may bring a motion or other proceeding to confirm, vacate, or modify an arbitration award in the United States District Court for the judicial district in which the arbitration award was made. n2 The Supreme Court has expressly held that this special venue statute only supplements, and does not supercede, the general venue statute, and therefore the moving party may bring such a proceeding under any district available under the special or general venue statute. The court's conclusion was based on the fact that the special Federal Arbitration Act provisions consistently use the permissive word "may" in establishing venue in the district court for the judicial district in which the award was made. In its decision, the court noted that the special venue provisions in the Act had an obviously liberalizing effect, free of any suggestion that Congress intended to foreclose the district where the defendant resided as a proper venue. The Court concluded that attention to practical consequences thus pointed away from a restrictive reading of the venue provisions of the Act, and confirmed the view that the liberalizing effect of the provisions required treating them as permitting and not limiting venue choice. n3

CHAPTER 7 VENUE
PART III. DETERMINATION OF VENUE UNDER SPECIFIC VENUE STATUTES

1-7 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 7.44

§ 7.44 Bankruptcy Suitsn*

[1] Venue in General

The federal district courts have exclusive jurisdiction of all bankruptcy cases, n1 and venue of bankruptcy cases is governed by special venue statutes in Title 11, Sections 1408 through 1412. n2 Therefore, a debtor may commence a bankruptcy case in the district in which the debtor's domicile, residence, or principal place of business in the United States has been located for the 180 days prior to commencement of the proceeding, or in the district in which the debtor's principal assets in the United States have been located during the 180 day period. If the debtor has moved his or her domicile, residence, principal place of business, or location of principal assets during the 180-day period, the longer period during the 180 days controls. n3

For venue purposes, a corporation's residence is its place of incorporation. n4 For partnerships and unincorporated associations, venue is controlled by the principal place of business or location of principal assets. n5 Venue will always be proper in some district, because bankruptcy may be filed only by a person who resides or has a domicile, a place of business, or property in the United States. n6

The location of a debtor's principal place of business for purposes of venue in bankruptcy cases is a question of fact to be resolved by the bankruptcy court after considering all the relevant facts and circumstances. In this regard, the principal place of business is the most important, consequential, or influential place where the entity conducts business. This is typically the place where the entity's management decisions are made but in some cases may be where day-to-day operations are conducted. n7

[2] Venue of Related Proceedings

A proceeding arising in or related to a bankruptcy case may be commenced in the district court in which the main case is pending. n1 Furthermore, a trustee in a bankruptcy case may bring a proceeding as statutory successor to the debtor or creditors in the district where the debtor or creditors, as the case may be, could have brought such an action under applicable nonbankruptcy venue provisions. n2 A proceeding based on a claim arising from the operation of the debtor's business after the commencement of the bankruptcy case may be brought against the representative of the estate in the district where the party commencing the suit could have brought such a claim under applicable nonbankruptcy venue provisions. n3

The bankruptcy laws also permit the commencement of a proceeding ancillary to a foreign proceeding to have the United States court enjoin certain types of conduct regarding the property that is the subject of the foreign proceeding. n4 A case to enjoin the commencement or continuation of an action or proceeding in a state or federal court, or the enforcement of a judgment, may be commenced only in the district court for the district where the state or federal court sits in which the action is pending against which the injunction is sought. A case to enjoin the enforcement of a lien against property, or to require the turnover of property of an estate, may be commenced only in the district court for the district in which the property is found. Any other cases may be commenced only in the district court for the district where the principal place of business in the United States, or the principal assets in the United States, of the estate that is the subject of the case is located. n5

§ 7.45 Suits Involving National Banksn*

Most actions by or against national banks 28 U.S.C. § 1348, are governed by the general venue statute. However, an action against a national bank for which the FDIC has been appointed a receiver, or an action directly against the FDIC as receiver for the bank, must be brought in the district in which the bank has its principal place of business. State court proceedings against these parties must also be brought where the bank has its principal place of business. n1 It has been held that this special venue statute is mandatory and controls over other, more general venue statutes, although like other venue provisions it may be waived. n2

When a national banking association commences a civil action to enjoin the Comptroller of the Currency, it may be commenced in the district where the association is located. n3 It appears from the permissive language ("may") and from the history of the statute that it is intended to supplement the general venue statute, and that it is not exclusive. Therefore, a much wider choice of venue in suits to enjoin the Comptroller will be available under Title 28, Section 1391(e), governing actions against U.S. officials in their official capacity. n4

§ 7.46 Suits for Civil Fine, Penalty, or Forfeituren*

[1] Venue in General

The district courts have original jurisdiction over suits or proceedings to recover or enforce any fine, penalty, or forfeiture incurred under any federal statute, n1 with the exception of matters within the jurisdiction of the Court of International Trade. n2 A civil proceeding for the recovery of a pecuniary fine, penalty, or forfeiture may be brought in the district where the fine, penalty, or forfeiture accrues or where the defendant is found. n3 Additional venue possibilities are available in forfeiture proceedings, as discussed in [2], below. Furthermore, a proceeding in admiralty for the enforcement of fines, penalties, and forfeitures against a vessel may be brought in any district in which the vessel is arrested. n4

A fine, penalty, or forfeiture accrues in the district where the actions took place on which the fine, penalty or forfeiture is based. Thus, the accrual takes place when the act or omission constituting the violation takes place. n5 For purposes of the statute, a defendant is generally considered to be "found" where he or she is subject to personal jurisdiction. n6

[2] Additional Venues in Cases of Forfeiture

The statute providing for subject matter jurisdiction over forfeitures, n1 also has a venue provision which states that venue is allowed where any of the acts oromissions giving rise to the forfeiture occurred. n2 A civil proceeding for the forfeiture of property may also be prosecuted in any district where the property is found (that is, seized) or, if the property was seized outside any judicial district, in any district into which the property is brought. n3 When property subject to forfeiture is located in a foreign country or has been detained or seized pursuant to legal process or competent authority of a foreign government, an action or proceeding for forfeiture may be brought in the District of Columbia. n4 Finally, property related to or involved in certain criminal offenses is subject to civil forfeiture, and such a forfeiture proceeding may be brought in the judicial district in which the defendant owning the property is found or in the judicial district in which the criminal prosecution is brought. These venue provisions explicitly apply in addition to any other applicable venue statutes. n5

PART II Jurisdiction; Venue; Removal
CHAPTER 7 VENUE
PART III. DETERMINATION OF VENUE UNDER SPECIFIC VENUE STATUTES

1-7 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 7.47

§ 7.47 Civil Rights Suitsn*

The Civil Rights Act known as Title VII provides for suits to redress racial or sexual discrimination in employment and contains its own venue provision for actions brought under the Act. Under Title VII, venue may be laid only: n1

1. Where the unlawful employment practice is alleged to have been committed.

2. Where the employment records relevant to such practice are maintained and administered; n2

3. Where the aggrieved person would have worked but for the alleged unlawful employment practice.

4. If the defendant is not found in any of the places specified in items 1 through 3, an action may be brought within the judicial district in which the defendant has his or her principal office.

It has been held that the special venue statute contained in Title VII is the exclusive venue provision applicable to suits under the Act. Therefore, the provisions of the general venue statute are not applicable. The Act shows a congressional intent that venue be limited to district courts with a connection to the alleged discrimination. n3 If the defendant is an officer, employee, or agency of the United States, however, venue may also be proper under Section 1391(e), governing actions against U.S. officials in their official capacity. n4

The Title VII special venue provision is not applicable to claims under other federal statutes regardless of the similarity of language or purpose. For example, the Title VII provision is not applicable to the Age Discrimination in Employment Act. Because the ADEA contains no venue provision, the general venue statute governs. n5 It has been held, however, that when a Title VII action is joined with claims under another type of action, which are governed by the general venue statute, the more restrictive special Title VII venue statute will control, unless the doctrine of "pendent venue" is inapplicable. n6

CHAPTER 7 VENUE
PART III. DETERMINATION OF VENUE UNDER SPECIFIC VENUE STATUTES

1-7 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 7.48

§ 7.48 Intellectual Property Suitsn*

[1] Copyright

If a plaintiff institutes a civil action or proceeding arising under any federal statute relating to copyrights or exclusive rights in mask works or designs the suit may be instituted in the district in which the defendant or the defendant's agent resides or may be found. n1 For purposes of venue, an individual defendant "resides" in the district of his or her domicile. n2 A corporate defendant, under Section 1391(c), resides in any district where it is subject to personal jurisdiction at the time the action is commenced. n3 which applies under the copyright special venue statute. n4 For a discussion of corporate residence as defined by Section 1391(c), see § 7.22[3] For venue purposes, an individual or corporate defendant is "found" where it is subject to personal jurisdiction, including jurisdiction under applicable state long-arm statutes. n5 Some courts have extended this rule by holding that for venue purposes a defendant is "found" in any district in which jurisdiction may be exercised under minimum contacts standards, even though the state long-arm statute does not extend to the full constitutional limits. n6 Under either the "resides" or "may be found" language, the issue is essentially the same: whether the defendant is subject to personal jurisdiction in the district. Thisdetermination for venue purposes differs from the usual jurisdictional analysis in that in multidistrict states it must be made with respect to the district, not with respect to the state as a whole. n7 To determine where a defendant "may be found," a court must focus on contacts with the particular federal judicial district in which the copyright action has been filed. For venue purposes, it is irrelevant that the individual defendant would be subject to personal jurisdiction under the state long-arm statute by virtue of contacts with another district in that state. n8

[2] Patent

Venue for a patent suit depends on the nature of the suit. Patent infringement actions are governed by Section 1400(b), which provides that any civil action for patent infringement may be brought in the district where the defendant resides, or where the defendant has committed acts of infringement and has a regular and established place of business. n1 This special venue statute applies only to infringement actions, not to other actions arising under the patent laws or to related actions under state law. n2 Section 1400(b) is the sole and exclusive provision governing venue in patent infringement actions and not the general venue statute. n3

An individual defendant is considered to reside for venue purposes in the district in which he or she is domiciled. n4 A corporate defendant resides in any district where it is subject to personal jurisdiction at the time the action is commenced. n5 It has been held that this definition of "where the defendant resides" in § 1400(b) must be determined according to the guidelines set out in Section 1391(c), which provides that a corporate defendant shall be deemed to reside in any judicial district in which it is subject to personal jurisdiction at the time the action is commenced. Therefore, a district court should find that venue is proper if it finds it properly maintains personal jurisdiction over a corporate defendant in a patent infringement suit. n6

Only actions for patent infringement are governed by Section 1400(b). A declaratory judgment action alleging that a patent is invalid is governed by the general venue statute, not by Section 1400(b), even though it is the mirror-image of a patent infringement suit and involves the same questions of law and fact. n7 Similarly, a patent interference suit is governed by the general venue statute. Such an action is brought to determine the priority of invention with respect to conflicting patents or applications and may be brought against the real parties in interest. n8 If there are defendants residing in districts not embraced within the same state, or an adverse party resides in a foreign country, the district court for the District of Columbia has jurisdiction and may issue summons against the adverse parties directed to the marshal of any district in which any adverse party resides. Summons against adverse parties residing in foreign countries may be served by publication or otherwise as the court directs. n9

Finally, if an applicant for a patent is dissatisfied with the decision of the Board of Patent Appeals and Interferences, the applicant may bring a civil action against the Commissioner of Patents in the district court for the District of Columbia. n10

[3] Trademark

The district courts have original jurisdiction, concurrent with the state courts, over trademark cases arising under federal law. n1 There is no special venue statute for trademark cases tried in the federal courts. Therefore, the general venue statute applies. n2 Because a trademark suit is a federal question action, this means that in a trademark suit venue is proper in a judicial district in which: n3 (1) any defendant resides, (2) a substantial part of the events or omissions giving rise to the claim occurred, or a substantial part of property that is the subject of the action is situated; or (3) the defendants are subject to personal jurisdiction, if there is no other district in which the action could be brought. For example, pursuant to Section 1391(b)(3), it was held that venue for a trademark infringement suit arising out of the defendant's Internet domain name was proper in the Central District of California, when the plaintiff's principal place of business was located in that district. n4 The general provisions of Section 1391(c) (regarding residence of corporations) n5 and 1391(d) (regarding venue involving aliens) n6 are also applicable to trademark suits. In a suit by a trademark owner against a cybersquatter alleging infringement and dilution, for example, venue was properunder section 1391(d) in any district because the defendant was an alien, regardless of the fact that the defendant had a residence in New Jersey. n7

§ 7.49 Suits in Interpleadern*

Interpleader is a process in which a nominal plaintiff, who may be subject to multiple liability with respect to two or more claimants to the same money or property, joins the claimants in a single suit, deposits the money or property with the court, and allows the claimants to determine their claims with respect to one another. Interpleader is available in the federal courts by two processes: a procedure specified by statute n1 and a procedure by Rule 22. n2 A special venue provision governs interpleader under the statute, providing that the statutory interpleader action may be brought in the judicial district in which one or more of the claimants reside. n3 Residence for purposes of venue statutes is discussed in § 7.22.

Because under Section 1391(c) corporate defendants are deemed to reside where they are subject to personal jurisdiction, and Section 2361 provides for nationwide service of process, it appears that interpleader involving a corporate stakeholder may be filed in any district. n4

In contrast to statutory interpleader, it has been held that the special interpleader venue provision does not apply to Rule 22 interpleader, which is therefore governed by the general venue statute. n5

§ 7.50 Civil Suit Involving Order of Interstate Commerce Commissionn*

The Interstate Commerce Commission is an agency of the United States government that may make various orders to regulate interstate commerce, as provided in the Interstate Commerce Act. n1 Unless otherwise provided by statute, the district courts have jurisdiction over any civil action to enforce an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission and to enjoin or suspend any order of the Interstate Commerce Commission for the payment of money or the collection of fines, penalties, and forfeitures. n2 Venue in such a civil action is proper only in a judicial district in which any of the parties bringing the action resides or has its principal office. n3 In the absence of a statute to the contrary, a corporation resides for venue purposes where it is incorporated. n4

When a district court refers a question or issue to the Interstate Commerce Commission for determination, the referring court has exclusive jurisdiction over a civil action to enforce, enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend any order arising out of the referral, n5 and venue of such an action is proper only in the court that referred the question or issue. n6 Other provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act contain their own venue provisions. n7 Because section 1398 applies "except as otherwise provided by law," it does not apply to actions suits brought pursuant to any section that contains its own venue provision. n8

§ 7.51 Stockholder Derivative Suitsn*

A civil action by a stockholder on behalf of the stockholder's corporation may be prosecuted in any judicial district where the corporation might have sued the same defendants. n1 When, for example, an action was brought in the federal district court in Michigan by three directors and a minority stockholder of a Ohio corporation against five directors and the corporation for a declaration that resolutions adopted at a meeting of the board of directors were void, the suit constituted a stockholder's derivative suit, and venue was proper in Michigan under Section 1401. n2 Section 1401 deals strictly with venue and does not enlarge the subject matter jurisdiction of a district court. Consequently, the statute is of no import unless requisite diversity of citizenship or federal question jurisdiction is found first. n3 Derivative actions on behalf of a corporation are discussed in Ch. 14A, Class Actions; Derivative Actions.

CHAPTER 7 VENUE
PART III. DETERMINATION OF VENUE UNDER SPECIFIC VENUE STATUTES

1-7 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 7.52

§ 7.52 Suits Against United Statesn*

[1] Venue Depends on Nature of Claim

In suits against the United States, the venue of the suit generally depends on the nature of the claim. n1 The most common types of suits against the Unitedstates are discussed in [2] and [3], below. It should be noted that suits against the United States government are limited by the doctrine of sovereign immunity and may be brought only when the government has expressly waived its sovereign immunity. n2 It should also be noted that the United States, like other defendants, may waive improper venue. n3 For a discussion of tax suits against the United States, see § 7.53. For a discussion of suits against the United States regarding real property, see § 7.54.

[2] Contracts

The district courts have jurisdiction to hear contract claims against the United States, n1 and such an action may be brought only in the judicial district where the plaintiff resides. n2 Generally, a corporate plaintiff resides in the district in which it is incorporated, and an individual plaintiff resides in the district where the individual is domiciled. n3 Courts have held that in actions with multiple plaintiffs, venue must be satisfied with respect to each plaintiff. Thus, plaintiffs residing in different districts must bring separate actions in the districts in which they reside or, if they wish to combine their claims, bring the action in the Court of Federal Claims. n4

[3] Torts

The federal courts are granted jurisdiction to decide tort claims against the United States under the Federal Tort Claims Act. Under the Act, the district courts have exclusive jurisdiction over civil actions or claims against the United States for money damages for injury or loss of property, personal injury, or death, caused by the negligent or wrongful act or omission of any government employee while acting within the scope of office or employment, under circumstances in which the United States, if a private person, would be liable to the claimant in accordance with the law of the place where the act or omission occurred. n1 Venue under the Act is proper only in the district where the plaintiff resides or where the act or omission complained of occurred. n2 Generally, a corporate plaintiff resides in the district in which it is incorporated, and an individual plaintiff resides in the district where the individual is domiciled. n3 The district where "the act or omission complained of occurred" is the district in which the act or omission constituting negligence allegedly took place, not the district in which the resulting injury occurred. n4

§ 7.53 Tax Suitsn*

Venue in tax cases depends on the type of tax suit involved. Venue in suits by the United States to collect internal revenue taxes may be brought in the district (1) where the tax liability accrues, (2) where the taxpayer resides, or (3) where the return was filed. n1 This venue provision has been drafted broadly to ensure that there will be a convenient forum in which the IRS may bring suit. n2 The first two venue possibilities are substantially the same as those available under the general venue statute. n3 The third choice provides an easily identifiable alternative in cases in which the liability could have arisen in several districts. This venue statute does not proscribe a tax collection action in other than the enumerated districts when a special statute provides an independent basis for venue. n4

A suit by a taxpayer for a refund n5 may be brought in the judicial district where the plaintiff resides if the plaintiff is an individual. n6 An individual resides in the district where he or she is domiciled. n7 A corporation may bring an action for a tax refund under Section 1346(a)(1) in the district in which the principal place of business or principal office or agency of the corporation is located. If the corporation has no principal place of business or principal office or agency in any judicial district, the action may be brought in the judicial district in which the office is located to which the tax return was made. If no return was made, the action may be brought in the judicial district for the District of Columbia. n8

For suits by a taxpayer against the United States to challenge a tax levy, n9 venue is proper only in the district where the property is situated at the time of levy or, if no levy is made, in the judicial district in which the event occurred that gave rise to the cause of action. n10 For challenges to jeopardy levies orassessments, the action may be commenced only in the judicial district described in Section 1402(a)(1) or (2). n11 Thus, venue for such challenges is controlled by Section 1402(a) rather than Section 1402(c), and is the same as for tax refund cases, as discussed above. n12

[1] Partition Suits

The district courts have original jurisdiction over a civil action by a tenant in common or joint tenant for the partition of real property when the United States is one of the tenants in common or joint tenants. n1 Venue for such an action is proper only in the judicial district where the real property is located. If the real property is located in different districts in the same state, venue is proper in any of those districts. n2

[2] Quiet Title Suits

A civil action to quiet title to an estate or interest in real property in which an interest is claimed by the United States n1 must be brought in the district court of the district where the property is located or, if located in different districts, in any of those districts. n2

[3] Condemnation Suits

The district courts have original jurisdiction over proceedings to condemn real estate for the use of the United States or its departments or agencies, n1 and venue is proper in such suits where the land is located or, if located in different districts in the same state, in any of those districts. n2

PART II Jurisdiction; Venue; Removal
CHAPTER 7 VENUE
PART III. DETERMINATION OF VENUE UNDER SPECIFIC VENUE STATUTES

1-7 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 7.55

§ 7.55 Suits Against United States Officials in Their Official Capacityn*

[1] Special Venue Statute Applicable to Suits Against United States Employees Acting in their Official Capacity

A special venue statute applies to civil actions in which a defendant is an officer or employee of the United States or of a U.S. agency acting in an official capacity or under color of legal authority, or is an agency of the United States, or is the United States itself. n1 The purpose of this provision is to make it easier for persons claiming injury because of the acts or omissions of a federal officer to file actions seeking mandamus or injunctive relief to compel the official to perform a legal duty. n2 Therefore, it has been held that this venue provision is not applicable in suits for money damages against a present or former federal officer or employee. n3 This special venue provision is designed to facilitate review by the federal courts of administrative actions. Congress intended this provision to apply solely to the executive branch of the federal government. It does not provide a basis for venue or personal jurisdiction against members of Congress or congressional employees n4 or against the federal judiciary or judicial employees. n5

[2] Proper Venue

A civil action described in [1], above, may be brought in any of the following places:

1. A district in which a defendant in the action resides. This provision is different from the general venue provision because it makes venue appropriate in the district where "a defendant" resides, whereas, Section 1391(a)(1) and (b)(1) make venue proper only in the district in which a defendant resides if all the defendants reside in the same state. For purposes of this provision, a federal agency sued in its own name is considered to be a resident of the District of Columbia only. Congress did not intend an expansive definition of residence that would permit suit anywhere the agency might have an office. n1

2. A district where a substantial part of the events or omissions occurred that form the basis of the claim. For discussion of issues involved in determining where a substantial part of the events or omissions giving rise to the claim occurred, see § 7.23.

3. If property is the subject of the action, a district in which a substantial part of the property is situated. n2 Originally, this portion of the statute applied when property was "involved" in the action, but the provision was amended to apply only when property "is the subject of the action," thus explicitly narrowing the scope of the provision. n3

4. If no real property is involved in the action, a district in which the plaintiff resides. n4 The residence of a corporate plaintiff for purposes of this section is restricted to the place of incorporation. The broad definition of corporate residence provided by Section 1391(c) explicitly applies only to defendant corporations and not plaintiff corporations. n5 Thus, courts have held that the traditional definition of corporate residence (that is, a corporation's residence was only the place of incorporation) applies to this special venue provision, rather than Section 1391(c). n6 An individual defendant resides in his or her place of domicile. n7

§ 7.56 Suits Against Foreign Statesn*

[1] Special Venue Statute Applicable to Suits Against Foreign States

A special venue statute applies to civil suits against a "foreign state," n1 which includes a political subdivision of a foreign state or an agency or instrumentality of a foreign state. n2 It must be remembered that as a matter of reciprocity, several federal statutes grant immunity from suit to foreign states. Generally, a foreign state is immune from the jurisdiction of United States courts except under certain conditions set out by statute. n3 For example, the foreign state is not immune when the suit is based on a commercial activity carried on in the United States by the foreign state, or on an act outside the territory of the United States in connection with a commercial activity of the foreign state elsewhere, and that act causes a direct effect in the United States; n4 or when a suit is based on rights in property taken in violation of international law, and that property or any property exchanged for that property is present in the United States in connection with a commercial activity carried on in the United States by the foreign state. n5

[2] Proper Venue

A civil action described in [1], above may be brought in any of the following places:

1. A district in which a substantial part of the events or omissions giving rise to the claim occurred, or a substantial part of property that is the subject of the action is situated. n1 The language "in which a substantial part of the events or omissions giving rise to the claim occurred" is identical to that used in the general venue statute, Section 1391(a) and (b). n2 This concept is discussed further in § 7.23.

2. A district in which a vessel or cargo of a foreign state is situated, n3 if the claim is asserted under a statute which allows a suit in admiralty brought to enforce a maritime lien against a vessel or cargo of a foreign state, when the maritime lien is based on a commercial activity of the foreign state. n4

3. When a suit is against an agency or instrumentality of a foreign state, a district in which an agency or instrumentality is licensed to do business or is doing business. n5 An "agency or instrumentality of a foreign state" is any entity that (1) is a separate legal person, corporate or otherwise, and (2) is an organ of a foreign state or political subdivision, or a majority of whose shares or other ownership interest is owned by a foreign state or political subdivision thereof, and (3)

is neither a citizen of a U.S. state (that is, is not incorporated in and does not have its principal place of business in any U.S. state), nor created under the laws of any third country. n6

4. The United States District Court for the District of Columbia, when the suit is against a foreign state or political subdivision of a foreign state, rather than against an agency or instrumentality of a foreign state. n7

PART IV. TRANSFER OF CASE TO NEW VENUE
A. GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS REGARDING TRANSFER TO NEW VENUE

1-7 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 7.70

§ 7.70 Types of Transfers or Dismissal Available When Venue is Inconvenient or Impropern*

The courts and parties have several procedural devices to use to rectify the situation when the original venue of an action is inconvenient or improper:

1. Statutory transfer due to inconvenience. The court may transfer an action based on the statutory convenience transfer statute n1 when a plaintiff has chosen to file a civil action in a federal district court in which venue is proper but which is inconvenient to some or all of the parties and witnesses involved. For example, the plaintiff may choose to file an action in a proper but inconvenient federal district court because he or she believes that the result that would be obtained there would be more favorable for choice of law reasons or other considerations. The liberalized provisions in the general venue statute, and even under special venue statutes, usually allow the plaintiff several venue choices. Thus, Congress has provided a statutory convenience-based transfer procedure to use when the plaintiff has chosen an inconvenient venue. n2 Rather than dismiss the action, which would have been the remedy under the common-law doctrine of forum non conveniens, the district court may under the statute grant a motion to transfer the action from the district court in which the action was filed to one in which it might have been brought in the first place. n3 For a discussion of statutory transfer due to inconvenience, see Part IV(B), § 7.80 et seq.

2. Statutory transfer or dismissal because of improper original venue. When an action is brought in a district court in which venue is improper, the court may either dismiss the action or transfer it to a federal district or division in which it could have been brought. n4 The appropriate cure when a plaintiff files in a district court in which venue is improper is within the district court's discretion. n5 For a discussion of statutory transfer due to improper original venue, see Part IV(C), § 7.100 et seq.

3. Statutory transfer because of lack of subject matter jurisdiction. If a plaintiff files in a federal district court that lacks subject matter jurisdiction because a federal statute vests exclusive subject matter jurisdiction over a particular category of cases or appeals in a different federal court, the court may transfer the case to the proper federal court. n6 For a discussion of miscellaneous statutory transfers, see Part IV(D), § 7.120 et seq.

4. Dismissal under the common-law doctrine of forum non conveniens when a forum is available in a foreign venue.

Because of the scope of statutory venue, this doctrine is now applicable only when an alternative forum is located in a foreign sovereign. n7 Under the doctrine, a district court may decline to exercise its jurisdiction, even though the court has the required jurisdiction and proper venue, when the convenience of the parties and the court and the interests of justice indicate that the action should be tried in the foreign forum. n8 Dismissal on forum non conveniens grounds has the practical effect of requiring the plaintiff to file the complaint in a more convenient forum elsewhere. n9 For a discussion of the common-law doctrine of forum non conveniens, see Part IV(E), § 7.140 et seq.

PART II Jurisdiction; Venue; Removal
CHAPTER 7 VENUE
PART IV. TRANSFER OF CASE TO NEW VENUE
A. GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS REGARDING TRANSFER TO NEW VENUE

1-7 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 7.71

§ 7.71 Determination of Whether Venue is Inconvenient or Improper Controls Applicability of Statuten*

[1] Applicability of Statute Depends on Propriety of Original Venue

When a party requests a transfer, the court must determine whether venue initially was proper. Although both transfer statutes were broadly designed to allow transfer instead of dismissal, Section 1406(a) provides for transfer from a forum in which venue is wrongly or improperly laid, while Section 1404(a) operates on the premise that the plaintiff has properly exercised the plaintiff's venue privilege. n1

[2] Court's Determination of Whether Venue is Inconvenient or Improper

Section 1404(a), the convenience transfer statute, applies if venue is proper in the original court, n1 while Section 1406(a), the improper venue transfer statute, applies if a district in which the case was filed lays venue in the wrong division or district. n2 The inquiry as to which statute properly applies is simple if venue is technically improper--in other words, if the district in which the plaintiff brought the action does not satisfy the requirements of the general venue statute n3 or a special venue statute if one is applicable. n4 In this situation, Section 1406(a) alone governs, and the court must either dismiss or transfer, if transfer is in the interest of justice. n5 Some courts, however, have held that venue is also "wrong" under Section 1406(a), and therefore section 1404(a) convenience transfer is inapplicable, if a lack of personal jurisdiction over the defendant would prevent the action from proceeding further in that court n6 or if there are other procedural obstacles to the case proceeding in that court. n7 For example, some courts have held that violation of a statute of limitation may make venue "wrong" in a particular court and, therefore, make Section 1406(a) the only proper vehicle for transfer. n8 Additionally, some courts have held that if a plaintiff brings an action in a venue other than the one designated in a valid forum selection clause, venue is "wrong," even if it complies with the requirements of the applicable venue statute. Therefore, these courts use Section 1406(a) analysis to transfer such an action; other courts rely on Section 1404(a), on the ground that only the applicable venue statute, and not a forum selection clause, makes venue proper or not. n9

[3] Importance of Distinction Between Two Primary Types of Statutory Venue Transfer

Depending on whether the court uses Section 1404(a), n1 the convenience transfer statute, or Section 1406(a), the improper venue transfer statute, n2 many procedures and standards controlling the transfer may differ, including the following important differences:

1. If a transfer is denied under Section 1404(a) (convenience transfer), the court may not generally dismiss the action but must retain the action except in rare circumstances. n3 On the other hand, one of the characteristics of an action under Section 1406(a) (improper venue transfer) is that the court may freely dismiss the action if it denies transfer. n4

2. After the case is transferred, the substantive law that the transferee court will apply may vary depending on which of the two statutes is used to effect the transfer. In general in diversity cases, if the court relies on Section 1404(a) to transfer the action, the transferee court must apply the substantive law, including the choice of law rules, that the transferor court would have applied had the action remained there. n5 On the other hand, if transfer is pursuant to Section 1406(a), the transferee court must apply the law it would have applied had the action been brought there initially. n6

3. The two statutes have different results regarding waiver of the right to move for transfer. Generally, waiver of an objection to improper venue does not preclude a Section 1404(a) motion to transfer for the convenience of the parties and witnesses. n7 On the other hand, a defendant waives the right to obtain a transfer or dismissal of an action for improper venue under Section 1406(a) unless he or she preserves this defense by making a timely and sufficient objection to improper venue and by avoiding conduct that might be considered an implicit waiver. n8

PART IV. TRANSFER OF CASE TO NEW VENUE
A. GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS REGARDING TRANSFER TO NEW VENUE

1-7 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 7.72

§ 7.72 Procedure for Court on Motion to Transfern*

[1] Determination of Motion

Frequently, a defendant will file a motion to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction pursuant to Rule 12(b)(1), and in the alternative, a motion to transfer the case to the another district under Section 1404(a), n1 and possibly an additionalalternative motion under Section 1406(a) for dismissal due to improper venue. n2 In such cases, the trial court should proceed, for organizational purposes, as follows: First, the court should decide whether venue is technically proper, that is, whether it satisfies the requirements of the applicable venue statute. If venue is technically improper, Section 1406(a) alone applies, and the court only has the option to dismiss, or if it is in the interest of justice, transfer the action, and may do so without deciding personal jurisdiction. n3 Although the Supreme Court has stated that personal jurisdiction should generally be decided before venue, venue should be decided first when there is a sound prudential reason for doing so, for example, when venue is technically and clearly improper. Such a finding pretermits an unnecessary decision on personal jurisdiction, and is especially useful if a determination of personal jurisdiction issue is difficult. n4 If venue is technically proper, then the court should determine whether or not it has personal jurisdiction, because that determination may dictate either which statute properly applies or, if transfer is permissible under either statute, such a determination may govern the applicable choice of law rules. n5

[2] Court Should State Basis of Determination

When a district court decides a motion regarding transfer or dismissal of an action on venue grounds under 1404(a) and 1406(a), the court should for reasons of judicial economy and facilitation of appellate review explicitly state which of the two statutes is the grounds for its decision. n0.1 If venue is technically improper, Section 1406(a) properly applies, and the inquiry ends there. If venue is technically proper, however, as part of the transfer decision it is advisable for the court to make a further determination as to whether it has personal jurisdiction over the defendant. Although the majority of courts agree that the power to transfer exists under both statutes whether or not the court has personal jurisdiction over the defendant and, therefore, courts may order a transfer without stating this determination, n1 it appears the proper procedure is for the court to articulate its position. Because the question of the substantive law to be applied following transfer often depends on these determinations, if the transferor court has failed to specify which statute it used to effect transfer and whether or not it had personal jurisdiction, the transferee court may be forced to second-guess the statutory basis for the transfer, n2 or the appellate court must either remand the case so that the lower court may determine whether the transferor court had personal jurisdiction or not, n3 or must itself determine whether the action was transferred under Section 1404(a) or Section 1406(a)--it would be more efficient for the transferor court to make and state these determinations as part of the transfer decision. n4

A. GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS REGARDING TRANSFER TO NEW VENUE

1-7 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 7.73

§ 7.73 Distinction Between Statutory Convenience Transfer and Common-Law Forum Non Conveniens Dismissaln*

The common-law doctrine of dismissal on forum non conveniens grounds is no longer applicable to cases in federal court except when there is no federal forum to which the action may be transferred and the more convenient forum is in a foreign country, n1 primarily because the common-law doctrine has been substantially replaced by statutory transfer under Section 1404(a). n2 In contrast to the common-law doctrine of forum non conveniens, Section 1404(a) does not provide for the option of dismissal of an action and, instead, authorizes the court to transfer the action to a more convenient federal court. n3 Under the doctrine of forum non conveniens, the district court has the power to dismiss an action, even though the court had jurisdiction and venue, when the plaintiff's choice of forum would cause oppressiveness to a defendant out of all proportion to plaintiff's convenience or when it would impose a heavy burden on the court. n4 The court's dismissal of the action has the practical effect of requiring the plaintiff to refile the action in a more convenient forum in the foreign country. Rules governing subject-matter jurisdiction, personal jurisdiction, and venue, all limit a plaintiff's choice of forum. Furthermore, the rules for allocating burdens of proof usually make the plaintiff's case harder to prove than the defendant's, and the limits on personal jurisdiction often force a plaintiff to litigate on the defendant's home ground. All of these reasons justify the fact that the showing necessary to prove that the forum is indeed non conveniens is considerable greater than that required for obtaining a change of venue from one district court to another under Section 1404(a). n5

Thus, rather than dismissing and requiring a plaintiff to file in a foreign country,Section 1404(a) merely authorizes the district court to transfer the action to a more convenient federal district court forum. n6 Consequently, even though the factors to be considered in deciding whether to transfer an action under Section 1404(a) are generally the same as those previously used to determine whether to dismiss under the doctrine of forum non conveniens; n7 under Section 1404(a), the district court has broader discretion to allow a transfer than it has to dismiss under the forum non conveniens doctrine. Similarly, a lesser showing of inconvenience is required for transfer than is required for a dismissal. n8 Finally, the plaintiff's choice of forum is given less weight under Section 1404(a) than it receives under forum non conveniens analysis. n9

§ 7.74 Transfer or Dismissal Involving Forum Selection Clausen*

A forum selection clause is a provision in a contract that specifies the forum in the event litigation arises regarding the contract. n1 A forum selection clause issue commonly arises when a plaintiff opposes a transfer motion made by the defendant on the ground that the forum in which the action is pending is more convenient, even though the plaintiff brought the action in a forum other that the forum designated in the forum selection clause. When the forum specified in the clause is a federal district, a motion to transfer to the specified district, pursuant to Section 1404(a), is a correct procedural vehicle for the defendant to enforce the forum selection clause. When the issue of a forum selection clause is raised in a motion to transfer, it has generally been held that the district court must utilize the balancing test in Section 1404(a), and the forum selection clause is considered as one factor among the other factors related to convenience specified in the transfer statute. n2

The issue of the forum selection clause also arises when a defendant moves to transfer to an allegedly more convenient federal forum where venue is proper, notwithstanding a forum selection clause that specifies the federal district in which the plaintiff brought the action. n3 Because initial venue is proper in such cases, a motion to transfer to the contractual forum under Section 1404(a), rather than Section 1406(a), is the proper motion to transfer and most courts hold that the defendant should file a motion to transfer and that the case is governed by the standard specified in Section 1404(a). n4

On the other hand, when the plaintiff brings an action in a federal court contrary to a clause specifying a particular state court, or a foreign court, as the exclusive forum, the majority of federal courts hold that the clause renders venue improper and a motion to dismiss for improper venue is the appropriate vehicle to enforce the clause, either under Section 1406(a) or Rule 12(b)(3). n5

§ 7.80 Purpose of Statutory Transfer Based on Conveniencen*

The purpose of Section 1404(a), which authorizes a district court to transfer a case to any other district where venue is proper for the convenience of the parties and witnesses and the interests of justice, n1 is to avoid wasting time, energy and money and, in addition, to safeguard parties, witnesses and the public against avoidable inconvenience and expense. n2 Congress intended that Section 1404(a) rectify problems caused when the permissive and broad venue provisions in the federal acts result in inconvenient forums, by authorizing simple transfer of actions to a more convenient federal forum. n3

Section 1404(a) allows a district court where a claim for relief has been made to transfer the action to another district court if two basic requirements are met: n3.1

1. The moving party demonstrates the following: (1) that venue is proper in both transferor and transferee court; (2) that transfer is for convenience of parties and witnesses; and (3) that transfer is in interest of justice. n4

2. The proposed transferee district court must be one where the action could have been brought originally under the general or special venue statutes. n5

§ 7.81 Requirements to Establish Convenience and Interest of Justicen*

[1] Discretion of Court to Transfer After Consideration of Factors

The trial court which has proper venue over a case has wide discretion whether or not to transfer a case to another proper venue for the convenience of the partiesand witnesses and the interest of justice, n1 and the trial court may be reversed on appeal only when there has been an abuse of discretion. When it makes a determination of a transfer motion under Section 1404(a), the court must make a flexible and individualized analysis n2 and must balance a number of case-specific factors to determine whether the proposed transferee district would be a more convenient forum for the litigation. While derived in part from the common-law doctrine of forum non conveniens, a Section 1404(a) transfer is broader and grants district courts more discretion to transfer. n3 In exercising this discretion, a district court must consider certain factors in two groups: n4 those relating to the private convenience of the parties n5 and those affecting the public interest in the fair and efficient administration of justice. n6

[2] Factors Relating to Private Convenience

[a] Summary of Private Factors

In exercising its discretion in determining whether to grant a motion to transfer pursuant to Section 1404(a), the court must consider a number of private and public factors. Private factors include: n1

1. The plaintiff's forum preference. n2

2. The defendant's forum preference. n3

3. The location where the claim arose. n4

4. The convenience of the parties as indicated by their relative physical and financial condition. n5

5. The convenience of the witnesses to the extent that the witnesses may be unavailable for trial in one of the fora. n6

6. The location of evidence, including books and records. n7

7. Any applicable forum selection clause. n8

[b] Plaintiff's Forum Preference

The court should give considerable weight to the plaintiff's original choice of forum--it has been stated that the choice should not be disturbed unless the other factors weigh substantially in favor of transfer. n9 Some courts have stated that the burden of proof rests with a party seeking transfer because there is a strong presumption in favor of the plaintiff's choice of forum. n10 The amount of weight given to the plaintiff's choice of forum ranges from considering it the "paramount" concern, n11 to considering it merely one of the many relevant factors. n12 Courts, however, have consistently held that Section 1404(a) motions to transfer venue although derived from the common-law doctrine of dismissal for forum non conveniens require that less weight be given to the plaintiff's choice of forum than was received under the common-law doctrine. n13 The weight given to a plaintiff's choice of forum may also depend on other circumstances. For example, the plaintiff's choice is given added weight if the plaintiff resides in the chosen forum. n14

[c] Defendant's Forum Preference

Although court's have not given it as great weight as plaintiff's choice, the defendant's choice of forum is entitled to consideration whenever there is a motion for transfer. n15 The defendant's choice of forum is entitled to weight because the court determines a motion to transfer based on the convenience of the parties, not just of the plaintiff. n16

[d] Location Where Claim Arose

An important private interest factor considered by the court in its decision on a motion to transfer is the location of the operative events that form the basisof the lawsuit. If the operative events took place in the district in which the action was originally filed, a motion to transfer to the district in which the events occurred is given considerable weight. n17 This factor overlaps with several of the other factors, and transfer to the place where the operative events occurred is often justified because many of the significant witnesses and the physical evidence is located where the operative events occurred. n18 It should be noted for purposes of the Section 1404(a) analysis that the alleged wrongful acts or omissions may have taken place in more than one district, or it may be impossible to conclude that the operative facts took place in one district as opposed to another. n19 In determining where the operative events took place, the court should consider both the plaintiff's theories of liability and the defendant's defenses. Thus, in a routine tort claim, the site of the accident is likely to be where the operative events took place. n20 On the other hand, in a products liability action alleging negligent design and manufacture, the place where the injury occurred may be relatively unimportant in comparison to the location of the design and manufacture of the product. n21

[e] Relative Convenience of Parties

One of the factors expressly stated in the statute is the convenience of the parties, and courts have considered many aspects related to this factor. n22 Some courts have noted that a logical starting point for analyzing the convenience of the parties is a consideration of their residences in relation to the district chosen by the plaintiff and the proposed transferee district. n23 Residence is such a strong factor that courts presume that the most convenient district for a party to litigate in is the district of or near his or her residence. n24

Thus, when the plaintiff resides in the chosen forum and the defendant resides in the proposed transferee district, one or the other unavoidably will be inconvenienced whether or not the court grants a transfer. In such a case, the weight given to the plaintiff's choice of forum will tip the balance against transfer, unless some other relevant factors, such as the convenience of witnesses or the interest of justice, weigh strongly in favor of transfer. n25 If, on the other hand, the plaintiff does not reside in the district in which he or she brought the action, this fact weighs in favor of a transfer to the district where the defendant resides, because the plaintiff will be inconvenienced by having to travel whether the action is transferred or not. n26

Similarly, when the defendant seeks transfer to a district other than the one in which he or she resides, the defendant's claim that the proposed transferee district is more convenient for the defendant will probably be disregarded, because travel will be necessary regardless of whether the action is transferred or not. n27 Also, if the defendant moves for transfer to the district in which the plaintiff resides, the plaintiff's claim that this district is inconvenient will probably be disregarded by the court. n28 Finally, when a proposed transferee district is in close proximity to the original district, some courts have denied transfer on the ground that it would not appreciably increase the convenience of the parties or witnesses. n29

Residence and travel distance is not the only aspect of convenience considered by the court. In considering the convenience of the parties, the court may also take into account the relative financial resources of the parties, n30 and other financial considerations such as disruption to a party's business caused by the prolonged absence of key employees having to attend a trial in a district away from the place of business. n31

[f] Convenience of Witnesses

[i] Importance of Factor

Many courts have called the convenience of witnesses the most important factor controlling the decision to transfer a case. n32 In this regard, it has also beensaid that if the witness is a key witness who will likely directly testify to the facts surrounding the occurrence in question, the convenience of the key witnesses is even more important. n33 The convenience of the witnesses is determined by reference to their residence in relation to the district in which the action is pending and to the proposed transferee district. n34 Therefore, when most of both parties' material witnesses are located in the district to which transfer is sought, the court will probably grant the transfer even though the transfer may cause the plaintiff some inconvenience by having to litigate in a forum outside the plaintiff's home district. n35

Conversely, if the majority of key witnesses reside in the district chosen by the plaintiff, transfer likely will be denied. n36 Similarly, if most of the defendant's witnesses are in the proposed transferee district while most of the plaintiff's witnesses are in neither district and, thus, will have to travel regardless, transfer to accommodate the convenience of the defendant's witnesses may be granted. n37 If both parties' witnesses are dispersed throughout states not in either district, or are evenly divided between the two districts, this factor will be considered neutral, and a balancing of other factors will determine the transfer motion. n38 The materiality of the prospective witnesses testimony, and not merely the number of prospective witnesses, will also determine the extent to which their convenience will be weighed. n39

[ii] Weight Accorded Types of Witness

When considering convenience, the court will not give the same weight to all witness. Key witnesses are considered most important. n40 In analyzing the convenience of the witnesses (see [i], above), many cases distinguish between party witnesses (and those closely aligned with a party, such as employees), who are presumed to be willing to testify in either forum despite the inconvenience that one of the forums would involve, n41 and non-party witnesses, who may not be willing to testify at all and may not be compelled to do so if they reside more than 100 miles from the court at which the trial is held. n42

Consequently, unwilling non-party witnesses are given more weight in the transfer analysis than party witnesses and their employees. n43 Therefore, the location of the majority of non-party witnesses in one of the two districts may tip the balance in favor of that district, regardless of where the party witnesses and their employees reside. n44 On the other hand, non-party witnesses who do not reside in or near either the transferor or the transferee district (and therefore are not amenable to process in either district) are not given any weight in the transfer analysis. n45

Many courts hold that the residency of expert witnesses does not affect the court's analysis regarding transfer because expert witnesses are paid for their time and are within the control of the party calling them. Thus, this factor weighs neither in favor of transfer nor of retention. n46 Other courts have stated the convenience of expert witnesses is of little or no significance on a motion to transfer. n47 The relative cost of transporting them to the respective districts may be considered, however, in connection with the factor regarding where the action may be tried more inexpensively and expeditiously. Even though this expense may be considered, the use of videotaped testimony of expert witnesses in lieu of live testimony may avoid travel costs. n48

[g] Location of Evidence

One important factor in the transfer convenience analysis is the location of documents and other physical evidence relevant to the dispute. n49 Although thisfactor is usually considered in the context of obtaining documents for trial, it is also relevant in terms of the ease of conducting discovery. n50 The mere location of documents (as opposed to obtaining them) is a relatively less important consideration in the transfer convenience analysis, given the comparatively low cost of transporting documents. n51 If, however, the documents at issue are extensive and numerous, n52 or in the possession of non-party witnesses beyond the reach of the transferor court's subpoena power, n53 transfer to the district in which the documents are located may be appropriate. n54 If a viewing of immovable physical evidence by the fact-finder is necessary, this will weigh in favor of transfer to the forum in which the evidence is located, unless viewing photographs or videotapes of the property is deemed sufficient. n55

[h] Forum Selection Clauses

When considering whether to grant a transfer, the court should place great weight on valid forum-selection clauses, whether the forum selection clause specifies the original venue or the forum that is the subject of the transfer request. While a valid forum-selection clause is not dispositive, it is entitled to substantial consideration. Where the forum selection clause is valid, the plaintiffs bear the burden of demonstrating why they should not be bound by their contractual choice of forum. n56

The Supreme Court has directly considered the issue of the proper weight to be given a forum selection clause in the context of a Section 1404(a) convenience transfer motion. The Court first noted that the weight to be given a forum selection clause in a diversity case should be determined by federal law, specifically the standards contained in Section 1404(a) itself, using a "flexible and individualized" analysis. Therefore, a valid forum-selection clause that represents the parties' agreement as to the most proper forum must be treated as only one of a number of factors that the district court must weigh in deciding whether a transfer is warranted by considerations of convenience and fairness. Thus, a forum selection is not dispositive. n57

[3] Factors Relating to Public Interest

[a] Summary of Public Interest Factors

In exercising its discretion in determining whether to grant a motion to transfer pursuant to Section 1404(a), the court must consider a number of private and public factors. Public factors include: n1

1. The enforceability of the judgment. n2

2. Practical considerations that could make the trial simple, expeditious, or inexpensive. n3

3. The relative administrative difficulty in the two fora resulting from court congestion. n4

4. The local interest in deciding local controversies at home. n5

5. The public policies of each district. n6

6. The familiarity of the trial judge with the applicable state law in diversity cases. n7

7. Other factors regarding the interest of justice. n8

[b] Enforceability of Judgment

A significant public interest factor that must be considered by the trial court is the relative enforceability of a judgment in the respective forums. n9 This factor was originally taken into account under the common-law doctrine of forum non conveniens, in which the proposed alternative forum often was outside the United States. In such cases, the plaintiff conceivably might have difficulty enforcing a judgment rendered in a foreign forum against a defendant's United States assets. In Section 1404(a) convenience transfers, when both forums are federal district courts, this factor has little relevance because it is unlikely that there would be any significant difference in the difficulty of enforcing a judgment rendered by one federal forum or the other. n10

[c] Practical Considerations That Could Make Trial Expeditious or Inexpensive

A factor commonly considered by the courts is the existence of any practical considerations that could make the trial simple, expeditious, or inexpensive. n11 This factor is separate from the factor of court congestion. For example, a party may argue that a transfer of venue out of one district to a district in another state would result in the party's losing the benefit of an expeditious and cost-efficient manner that the original court had for handling cases, including the advantage of a court's shorter trial track that is well below the average of other courts. n12 This factor may be considered with respect to witnesses, because even when witnesses are willing to travel to distant districts to testify, if transfer would obviate the need for such travel and the attendant expense on the witnesses or the party calling them, courts may weigh this factor in favor of ordering a transfer. n13

The "judicial economy" factor in the convenience transfer analysis may arise when two separate actions involving the same or similar issues and parties are proceeding in different districts. In this regard, most courts find judicial economy is served by having the two actions in the same district (through transfer) even though actual consolidation of the actions may not be possible. n14 The fact that a related action is pending in the proposed transferee district is an important consideration that may override the plaintiff's choice of forum, because transfer of the second action will promote judicial economy and avoid the possibility of inconsistent results. n15 On the other hand, the fact that an action presenting the same or similar legal and factual issues is pending in the district where the action was originally brought weighs against transfer of the second action to a different district. n16

The first-filed rule has also been considered in relation to the transfer issue. Under the "first-filed rule," the first-filed action will be given priority and be allowed to proceed in favor of the later action, n17 unless other special circumstances dictate departure from the rule. n18 The first-filed rule is designed to advance the inherently fair concept that the party who commenced the first suit should generally be the party to attain its choice of venue. However, the courts do not apply the first-filed rule mechanically, n19 and if other convenience factors under Section 1404(a) weigh in favor of the second-filed action, the courts may disregard the first-filed rule. n20

[d] Court Congestion

Another factor that could influence the court in favor or against transfer is whether the court in which the action originally is brought is more congested than the district to which transfer is sought. n21 However, the mere possibility that trial will be held sooner in the original court does not justify denial of transfer when transfer is otherwise supported by the convenience of the parties and the witnesses. n22

[e] Local Interest in Deciding Local Disputes at Home

When an action involves an incident occurring in a particular locale, there is an interest in having the controversy adjudicated in that locale, rather than in a remote forum. n23 Thus, for example, if one of the locations has developed a strong community interest in resolving protracted litigation in the community, this factor favors that locale. n24

[f] Public Policies of Each District

In its determination of a Section 1404(a) transfer issue, the district court may consider the relative importance of any public policies to be advanced in eachforum. n25 For example, in a suit by a California franchisee against a Pennsylvania franchisor, the trial court correctly considered California's strong public policy to provide a protective local forum for local franchisees when it denied a motion to transfer venue to Pennsylvania for the convenience of the parties and witnesses. n26 However, a strong public policy promulgated under state law is not dispositive; a state's public policy is but one factor to consider in a Section 1404(a) analysis, even though it is an important factor. n27

[g] Familiarity of Trial Judge with State Law in Diversity Cases

In diversity actions, federal courts favor adjudication by the court that sits in the state whose substantive laws will govern the case--a court may use this factor in its evaluation of whether to grant a motion to transfer. n28 Therefore, if the choice of law rules of the transferor state dictate that another state's laws apply to the action, this will favor transfer to the federal courts of that state. n29 Conversely, if the transferor state's choice of law rules make its law applicable, this favors the original court's retention of the action. n30 However, if the action does not involve significant or complex analysis of another state's law, this factor will be given little weight in the transfer decision. n31

[h] Interest of Justice

As a catch all factor, the court must consider any other aspects of a proposed transfer that bear on the "interest of justice." n32 In this regard, the court may consider anything related to the efficient administration of the court system, such as, the interest of conserving judicial resources, avoiding overburden to a particular court, and the difficulties of applying another state's law. n33 Thus, the court may consider whether litigating a matter in a particular forum would squander judicial resources or would run the risk of inconsistent judgments. The court may also consider whether one court has already expended substantial time and effort to become familiar with the subject matter and facts of the case, such as, the technology underlying disputed patents and the legal issues related to the patents' alleged validity and infringement, and whether one court is more familiar with the same parties and issues or related issues than other courts. n34

If transfer of an action would eliminate the necessity of having two actions involving the same or similar issues proceeding in different districts, the "interest of justice" will be served by transfer. n35 Similarly, if the issue of whether the transferor court has personal jurisdiction over the defendant is a difficult issue, transfer to a district where jurisdiction is certain may be in the interest of justice because it may conserve judicial resources by allowing the transferor court to avoid addressing the personal jurisdiction issue. n36

It should be noted that some courts do not treat the interest of justice component as a separate factor but, rather, simply consider the aggregate of all the other relevant factors to determine whether the transfer either is or is not in the interest of justice. n37

[4] Burden Is on Movant to Establish Greater Convenience of Other Forum

Because there is a strong presumption in favor of the plaintiff's choice of forum, the burden of proof rests with the party seeking transfer to show that the proposed transferee forum is more convenient than the original forum. n1 The district court may transfer the action only if a balancing of the relevant factors n2 clearly shows that the proposed transferee forum is more convenient. n3 Thus, if transfer to another district would merely shift the balance of inconvenience to the nonmoving party, rather than eliminate or reduce inconvenience, transfer is not warranted. n4

B. STATUTORY TRANSFER TO NEW VENUE ON GROUNDS OF CONVENIENCE

1-7 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 7.82

§ 7.82 Transferor Court Must Have Subject Matter Jurisdictionn*

A district court's power to transfer an action under Section 1404(a) depends on the existence of subject matter jurisdiction, whether diversity, federal question, or some other basis for federal subject matter jurisdiction over the action. n1 Therefore, if the district court lacks subject matter jurisdiction, it must generally dismiss the action. n2 If the court lacks subject matter jurisdiction because a federal statute vests exclusive jurisdiction over a particular category of action or appeal in another federal court, transfer to that court may be available under another federal transfer statute. n3 In most cases, if there is subject matter jurisdiction in the transferor court, there will also be subject matter jurisdiction in the transferee court. This may not be the case, however, if a special jurisdictional statute applies to confer exclusive jurisdiction in a particular court. n4

While all courts agree that the transferor court needs subject matter jurisdiction, the courts are split regarding whether a district court has the power to transfer an action under Section 1404(a) if the transferor court lacks personal jurisdiction over the defendant. The majority rule is that a Section 1404(a) transfer may be granted absent personal jurisdiction. n5 The courts holding that a Section 1404(a) transfer may be made despite a lack of personal jurisdiction in the transferor court reason that the transferor court's lack of personal jurisdiction over the defendant does not affect its power to transfer. n6 These courts rely by analogy on a Supreme Court decision that when venue in the original court did not comply with the applicable venue statute, the district court had the power to transfer the action under Section 1406(a), the improper venue transfer statute, despite lacking personal jurisdiction over the defendant. n7 Some circuits however, have held that a court may not grant transfer under Section 1404(a) if it does not have personal jurisdiction over the defendant. n8

§ 7.83 Requirements for Transferee Courtn*

[1] Transferee Court Must Have Proper Venue and Subject Matter and Personal Jurisdiction

A district court may transfer an action under Section 1404(a) only to any other district or division where it "might have been brought." n1 This means that the proposed transferee district must be one in which the plaintiff properly could have filed the action initially. n2 Consequently, the transferor court may not transfer an action unless it first determines that, at the time the action was originally filed n3 (1) venue would have been proper in the proposed transferee district; n4 (2) the transferee court would have had subject-matter jurisdiction; n5 and (3) the transferee court could have exercised personal jurisdiction over the defendants. n6 With respect to personal jurisdiction, it is not enough that the defendant, as part of defendant's transfer motion, is deemed to have consented to the jurisdiction of the transferee court; rather, the transferee court's right to exercise jurisdiction must exist entirely independent of the defendant's consent. n7

As with the other requisites for convenience transfers, the party seeking transfer has the burden of clearly establishing that the action properly could have been brought in the first instance in the transferee district. n8

[2] Requirements Determined as of Time Action Commenced in Original Court

The court may order a transfer pursuant to Section 1404(a) only if the venue and jurisdictional requirements in the transferee court n1 have been met at the time the action was commenced in the original court. n2 Thus, if there has been a change of circumstances after the action is filed in the original court, such as the defendant's change of residence, a transfer may not be made to that district if the action could not have been filed there originally. n3 Similarly, a defendant maynot obtain transfer over a plaintiff's objection to a district that would not have had proper venue and personal jurisdiction when the plaintiff initially filed the action, by later agreeing as part of the transfer motion to waive any objections to lack of proper venue and personal jurisdiction in the district to which the defendant wants a transfer. n4

PART IV. TRANSFER OF CASE TO NEW VENUE
B. STATUTORY TRANSFER TO NEW VENUE ON GROUNDS OF CONVENIENCE

1-7 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 7.84

§ 7.84 Initiation of Motion for Statutory Transfer Based On Conveniencen*

[1] Plaintiff or Defendant May Bring Motion

Either the plaintiff or the defendant may move to transfer venue on convenience grounds under Section 1404(a). n1 Because the plaintiff has the first opportunity to choose the venue initially, however, in most cases it will be the defendant who is seeking a transfer. n2

There are circumstances in which the plaintiff may to want to seek a transfer. Given Section 1404(a)'s broad remedial purpose of allowing simple transfer of venue so that the litigation may proceed in a convenient forum, the plaintiff may choose a proper but inconvenient forum to take advantage of a favorable rule of law that would be applied by that court. The plaintiff may then move to transfer under Section 1404(a), and, if successful, take the favorable rule of law along. n3 Such forum shopping is permissible.

To preclude harassment of defendants and to ensure appropriate use of Section 1404(a) transfers, however, the plaintiff has a higher burden of persuasion in seeking the transfer over the objection of the defendant than would the defendant in the same situation; this higher burden is justified because the plaintiff is seeking a transfer out of a district that he or she has chosen. Some courts even require that a plaintiff show that circumstances have changed since the action was filed. n4

[2] Court May Transfer Sua Sponte

A district court may transfer an action pursuant to Section 1404(a) on its own motion. n1 A sua sponte transfer is especially appropriate when factors weigh heavily in favor of a transfer. n2 Some courts have stated that sua sponte transfers on convenience grounds should be reserved for exceptional circumstances, such as a pending related action in another district with which the transferred action could be consolidated. n3 Most courts, however, follow the ordinary analysis of whether the "convenience" and "interest of justice" factors warrant transfer of the case to a district other than that originally selected by the plaintiff. n4 Before transferring venue on its own motion, the court should give the parties notice and an opportunity to be heard. n5

[3] Parties May Not Stipulate to Transfer

Generally, the district court may not transfer an action under Section 1404(a) based on a stipulation of the parties. However, the court may order a transfer after a stipulation if it makes an independent assessment of the Section 1404(a) factors. n1 The courts have adopted this rule because Section 1404(a) does not expressly permit inter-district transfer by stipulation; by contrast, Section 1404(b) expressly permits inter-division transfer by stipulation. The juxtaposition of the two provisions, one silent on the possibility of transfers by stipulation and the other expressly authorizing transfers by stipulation, strongly implies that the inter-district transfers by stipulation are not permitted. n2 Transfers by stipulation would also contradict a Supreme Court ruling that, prior to a convenience transfer, the district court must make a case-specific determination as to whether a transfer is proper under the statute. n3 Thus, the court's duty to make a pre-transfer weighing of factors other than the mere preference of the parties precludes an interpretation of Section 1404(a) that could accommodate transfers by stipulation. n4 Furthermore, refusing to allow transfers by stipulation is consistent with a Supreme Court decision that a defendant may not waive personal jurisdiction objections to facilitate transfer to a district in which the action could not have been brought in the first place. In the case, the Court held that the parties may not, by agreement modify the statutory requirements. n5

§ 7.85 Time for Motion for Statutory Transfer Based On Conveniencen*

There is no time limit within which a motion to transfer under Section 1404(a) must be made, n1 and the court may not deny a motion for transfer merely because it is filed some time after the suit has been commenced and some progress has been made on the pre-trial phase of the case. n2 Even the entry of a judgment does not preclude a subsequent transfer of venue. n3

If the defendant was aware of circumstances supporting a change of venue on convenience grounds from the start, however, the motion should be made before or with the defendant's answer. n4 Making such a motion early in the action may save the court and the parties time and judicial resources on a case that belongs in a different forum. Furthermore, making the motion at an early date prevents the party opposing the motion from arguing that a delay should weigh against transfer. Thus, a delay in moving to transfer, although not dispositive by itself, is properly among the variety of factors considered by the court as weighing against transfer. n5 Whether the delay will result in denial of the motion to transfer depends on the particular circumstances of each case, including the following: the length of the delay, n6 whether delay was avoidable, any prejudice to the opposing party, n7 and, most important, the extent to which the other relevant factors weigh in favor of transfer. n8

§ 7.86 Court May Not Dismiss Case When Transfer is Deniedn*

The convenience transfer statute under Section 1404(a) does not provide for dismissal by the court but, rather, gives the court discretion only to transfer if venue in the original court is proper but inconvenient, provided there is another proper federal forum to which the action may be transferred. n1 Therefore, since its enactment, courts have held that if venue in the original forum is proper but inconvenient, the remedy is transfer of the action, not dismissal. n2 If the court in its discretion decides that the proposed transferee court is not more convenient or that transfer is inappropriate for some other reason, and therefore denies the Section 1404(a) transfer motion, it must generally deny the motion and retain the action for further litigation. n3

There is an exception, however, to this general rule. Although dismissal of the action generally is not proper under Section 1404(a), the convenience transfer statute, the fact that a transfer motion has been made does not deprive the court of the power or discretion to dismiss on independent grounds, and these sometimes may be related to the transfer motion. For example, the transferor court may dismiss the action if transfer pursuant to Section 1404(a) would be "futile" for other reasons, for example, when the action is time-barred by the applicable statute of limitation that the transferee court must apply to the action following transfer. n4 Furthermore, in some circuits if the transferor court decides that it lacks personal jurisdiction, the court may then dismiss the action under Section 1406(a) if it decides that transfer is not in the "interest of justice" because personal jurisdiction is lacking. n5 The courts reason that a plaintiff should not be rewarded with a transfer when he or she originally chose an obviously improper forum. Similarly, if the party moving for transfer fails to satisfy the other prerequisites for transfer, transfer will be denied and the action will be dismissed for lack of personal jurisdiction. n6

B. STATUTORY TRANSFER TO NEW VENUE ON GROUNDS OF CONVENIENCE

1-7 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 7.87

§ 7.87 Law Applied Following Statutory Transfer Based On Conveniencen*

[1] Diversity Cases

Following a Section 1404(a) transfer based on convenience or the interest of justice, the general rule is that the transferee court must apply the same state law, including any applicable choice of law rules, that the transferor court would have applied had the action remained in the transferor court. n1 Under the Erie doctrine the transferor court generally would have applied the law, including the choice of law rules, of the state in which it is sitting. n2 The Supreme Court's holding regarding the law applicable after transfer was intended to ensure that the plaintiff was not deprived of the law he or she expected to be applied by filing the action in the transferor court. n3 Furthermore, the Court reasoned thata Section 1404(a) convenience transfer should not deprive the plaintiff of the plaintiff's venue privilege, n4 because the statute deals with the placement of litigation in the federal courts and merely authorizes a change of courtrooms, not a change in applicable law. n5

It is important to note that the Van Dusen rule does not necessarily result in application of the law of the state in which the transferor court sits. Rather, Van Dusen requires the same choice of law analysis that would have been applied in the transferor court to be conducted by the transferee court, which may require the transferee court to apply the law of the state of the transferee court, the law of the state of the transferor court, or some other state's law because the law applied includes the choice of law rules of the transferor state. n6 It should also be noted that the Erie doctrine also requires the federal courts in diversity actions to apply the "substantive" law of the state in which it sits but federal "procedural law." n7

[2] Federal Question Cases

Following a Section 1404(a) convenience transfer in a federal question case, the majority of courts and more recent cases hold that the transferee court must apply the law as interpreted by its own circuit--the transferee court is not bound by the precedent of the transferor circuit. n1 These courts have reasoned that the logic behind Van Dusen case--reflecting the need to ensure that federal and state courts uniformly apply the same state law to diversity cases regardless of where the cases are tried--does not apply to a case brought under federal law because federal law is supposed to be unitary. n2 In older case, some circuits have held that the law of the transferor court should be applied even in federal question cases. n3

[3] Transfer Based on Forum Selection Clause

Some courts have held that, after a Section 1404(a) convenience transfer to give effect to a forum selection clause, the transferee court should apply the law of the state in which it sits if the transferor state's law would have required dismissal of the action on the basis of the forum selection clause. In so holding, the court carved out an exception to the Van Dusen rule, n1 noting that Van Dusen expressly excepted application of the transferor state's law when the state court in the transferor forum would have dismissed the action. n2 On the other hand, if the transferor state would not have dismissed the action, the transferee court must follow the Van Dusen rule and apply the law of the transferor state. n3

§ 7.100 Purpose of Statute Allowing Transfer When Original Venue Is Impropern*

By statute, a district court may either transfer or dismiss an action when the plaintiff has chosen improper venue, that is, has filed the case in the wrong district. n1 Section 1406(a) was intended to allow the court the option of transferring an action when venue is wrong, rather than requiring the court to automatically dismiss the action, which was the rule under the common-law convenience doctrine. The statute was enacted to avoid the injustice which had often resulted to plaintiffs from dismissal of actions merely because they had made an erroneous guess with regard to the existence of some elusive fact that controls whether venue is proper. Therefore, Section 1406(a) follows the modern purposes and direction of legislative changes affecting federal court procedure to remove obstacles that impede the expeditious and orderly adjudication of cases and controversies on their merits. n2 Prior to the enactment of Section 1406(a), if the plaintiff lay venue in the wrong district, the district court's sole option was to dismiss the action. Although the dismissal was without prejudice, it nevertheless often had the harsh result of precluding the pursuit of the plaintiff's cause of action, if for example, a statute of limitation had expired while venue was being sorted out. n3

C. STATUTORY TRANSFER WHEN ORIGINAL VENUE IS IMPROPER

1-7 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 7.101

§ 7.101 Requirements for Transferor or Dismissing Courtn*

[1] Initial Venue is Wrong

The statute expressly provides that a court may not transfer pursuant to Section 1406(a) procedures unless the plaintiff has filed a case laying venue in the wrong division or district. It is clear that venue is wrong for purposes of Section 1406(a) if the case has been filed in a district or division that is not specified in the applicable general or special venue statute. n1 Additionally, some courts define venue as "wrong" in circumstances when, although venue is in the proper location technically under the venue statutes, there is some other impediment to the action from proceeding further in the transferor court, such as a lack of personal jurisdiction over the defendant. n2 Under this view, other examples of "wrong" venue allowing application of section 1406(a) include venue laid where there is a violation of a statute of limitation n3 or a valid forum selection clause. n4

Courts have also held venue to be "wrong" when a defendant mistakenly removes an action filed in state court to the wrong district or division of the federal court. n5 These courts have noted that such an error in the venue of a removed action does not deprive the district court of subject matter jurisdiction requiring remand of the case. Thus, in the interest of justice, the court may transfer the case to the district court of proper venue. n6

[2] Subject Matter Jurisdiction

A district court has no power to transfer an action under Section 1406(a) unless it has subject matter jurisdiction; therefore, it may transfer only if it has diversity jurisdiction, federal question jurisdiction, or some other basis for subject matter jurisdiction over the action. Instead, a court must dismiss the action if jurisdiction is lacking. n1 If, however, the original court lacks subject matter jurisdiction because a federal statute vests exclusive jurisdiction over a particular category of actions or appeals in another federal court, transfer to that court may be available under another transfer statute, such as 28 U.S.C. Section 1631. n2

[3] Personal Jurisdiction

When venue is wrong in the district in which the plaintiff has originally brought the action, n1 a district court may transfer the action to another district under Section 1406(a) whether or not the transferor court has personal jurisdiction over the defendant. n2 If, however, the transferor court concludes that the lack of personal jurisdiction over the defendant should have been apparent to the plaintiff, the court may deny transfer as not "in the interest of justice," and may, instead, dismiss the action. n3

§ 7.102 Transferee Court Must Be One Where Case Could Have Been Broughtn*

When a claimant initially files a case laying venue in the wrong district, if the district court decides transfer is in the interest of justice, the court may transfer the case to any district or division in which it could have been brought. n1 Courts have interpreted the term "in which it could have been brought" to mean that the proposed transferee forum must have been one in which it would have been proper to file the action initially; in other words, the transferee court must have had proper venue, subject matter jurisdiction, and personal jurisdiction over the defendant. n2 This meaning is the same as the meaning attributed to the phrase "might have been brought" in the convenience transfer statute, Section 1404(a). n3

The party moving for transfer (usually the defendant) may not meet these requirements by waiving them. Venue and personal jurisdiction must have been proper in the transferee forum at the time the action was originally filed and not as a result of subsequent actions taken by the defendant as part of the transfer motion. n4 The burden of proving that the proposed transferee district is a districtin which the case "could have been brought" is on the party moving to transfer for improper venue. n5

1-7 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 7.103

§ 7.103 Initiator of Motion for Transfer or Dismissal on Improper Venuen*

[1] Defendants

A defendant is typically the party to initiate a motion for transfer or dismissal on the grounds of improper venue. n1 Because venue must be proper as to each defendant, any defendant may object that venue is improper as to that defendant, n2 and the court must either dismiss the action against that defendant or transfer it to a district with proper venue, assuming that the particular defendant has not waived the objection to improper venue. If there are other defendants as to whom venue is proper, the court may retain the action as to these defendants unless the dismissed defendant was an indispensable party. n3

The defense of improper venue is personal to the party to whom it applies. Therefore, a defendant may not move to dismiss or transfer an action under Section 1406(a) on the ground that venue is improper as to another defendant, n4 unless the defendant as to whom venue is improper is an indispensable party. n5 Therefore, if the court dismisses the action against any defendant on the ground of improper venue, it should then determine whether that defendant was an indispensable party; if the dismissed defendant is indispensable, then the court must dismiss or transfer the action with respect to all defendants. n6 Conversely, if the defendant as to whom venue is improper is not an indispensable party, the court should sever the claims against that party n7 and dismiss or transfer them and retain the claims against the defendants with respect to whom venue is proper. n8

[2] Plaintiffs

In general, if a plaintiff brings an action in a district or division where venue is wrong, the plaintiff automatically waives the right to object to improper venue in that district or division. n1 However, if the action was filed in the wrong district or division through no fault of the plaintiff, for example, through a mistake as to the residence of the defendant, the plaintiff has not necessarily waived its right to object to improper venue in the original district and may move to transfer the action under Section 1406(a) when the plaintiff discovers the proper venue, for example, when he or she discovers the defendant's true residence. n2

[3] Court's Own Initiative

The district court may properly raise, sua sponte, the issue of lack of proper venue at any time before the defendant has waived the objection to improper venue n1 and may dismiss or transfer the action on that ground, provided the court first gives the parties adequate notice and an opportunity to be heard on the issue. n2 Additionally, if the defendant moves only to dismiss an action the court on its own initiative may order transfer if it is otherwise appropriate. n3 Some courts, however, have held that the district court should not raise a venue objection sua sponte absent extraordinary circumstances, n4 and if the defendant has already waived the objection to improper venue, the court may not under any circumstances dismiss the action on this ground. n5

§ 7.104 Court's Discretion to Transfer or Dismiss on Improper Venuen*

[1] Transfer Is Preferred Procedure for Improper Venue

When a plaintiff has laid venue improperly in a district court, the court has discretion either to transfer the case or to dismiss it without prejudice. n1 Even if the defendant has moved only for dismissal for improper venue under Section 1406(a), the court may order the action transferred, if transfer is otherwise appropriate. n2 The court may transfer to another court with proper venue whenever the transfer would be in the interest of justice. n3 The "interest of justice" is not a precise standard and is highly discretionary. Transfer will ordinarily be in the interest of justice because dismissal of an action that could be brought elsewhere is time consuming and justice-defeating. The purpose of the improper venue transfer statute is to avoid the harsh result of dismissal of the action merely because the plaintiff made an erroneous guess with regard to the existence of some elusive fact on which venue statutes often turn. Some courts, however, in practice seem to prefer to dismiss rather than transfer, even when a statute of limitation has run and will bar a new action filed in the proper district. n4

[2] Court Has Discretion to Dismiss Without Prejudice

The court may dismiss an action pursuant to a Section 1406(a) when venue is wrong and transfer is not in the interest of justice. n1 It has been held that a transfer would not be in the interest of justice, for example, if the plaintiff brought the action in the wrong district for some improper purpose, such as, in an attempt to circumvent an adverse ruling in a related action pending elsewhere, n2 to harass the defendant with litigation in a remote forum, n3 or if forum shopping was the clear motivation in bringing the action in an improper district in the first instance. n4 It should be noted that the fact that a statute of limitation will bar the refiling of the action in the proper district does not require the conclusion that transfer is in the interest of justice. n5 It should also be noted that once a district court selects the dismissal option, it loses the power to take further action and may not later transfer the case. n6

A dismissal under the Section 1406(a) must be "without prejudice," which means that the dismissal does not bar a subsequent action in the proper forum on the same claim. The courts have adopted this rule because a determination of improper venue does not go to the merits of a case. n7 However, if a statute of limitation has since run on a claim, even a dismissal without prejudice (rather than transfer) will have the effect of barring a subsequent claim. n8

§ 7.105 Waiver of Objection to Improper Venuen*

A defendant waives the right to obtain a transfer or dismissal of an action for improper venue under Section 1406(a) unless the defendant makes a timely and sufficient objection to improper venue. n1 The defense of improper venue may be waived in several ways. n2 For example, the defense of improper venue is waived unless it is included in the defendant's first response to the complaint, n3 whether that response is a motion to dismiss, an answer to the complaint, or in an amendment to the answer made under Rule 15(a). n4 Thus, the defense of improper venue is waived if the defendant makes a pre-answer motion to dismiss on any of the other grounds specified in Rule 12(b) and does not specifically raise improper venue as a grounds for dismissal in the same motion. n5

Even if the defendant complies with Rule 12 by including the objection to improper venue in his or her first response to the complaint (see [2], above), the objection may still be waived by other conduct that may be viewed as an implicit submission to the court's jurisdiction. n6 Furthermore, if a defendant defaults in an action by not responding to the complaint within the applicable time limits, the objection to improper venue is waived. n7

It should be noted, however, that waiver of improper venue does not preclude a Section 1404(a) motion to transfer on the basis of convenience of the parties or the witnesses. n8

§ 7.106 Law Applied Following Statutory Transfer Based On Improper Venuen*

Following a transfer under Section 1406(a), the transferee court must apply whatever law it would have applied had the action been properly commenced in the transferee court, n1 including, in diversity cases, the choice of law rules of the state in which the transferee court sits. n2 The rationale for this rule is to preclude improper forum-shopping. If the plaintiff were allowed to benefit by obtaining the law of a forum by filing an action in such forum despite improper venue in that forum, and then moving to transfer to a proper venue, it would allow plaintiffs to forum shop by filing actions wherever state law was most favorable, regardless of whether venue was proper in that district or not. By contrast, the law applied following a Section 1404(a) convenience transfer is that of the transferor court, because in that transfer, the initial venue in the transferor court was proper. n3

D. MISCELLANEOUS STATUTORY TRANSFER PROVISIONS

1-7 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 7.120

§ 7.120 Transfer to Court with Exclusive Subject Matter Jurisdictionn*

[1] Purpose of Statute

Generally, a district court must dismiss an action if it lacks subject matter jurisdiction, based either on diversity, federal question, or some other basis. n1 If, however, the district court lacks subject matter jurisdiction over particular classifications of actions because a federal statute vests exclusive subject matter jurisdiction in a specified court, the district court without subject matter jurisdiction may transfer the action under Section 1631 to the court that does have that specialized subject matter jurisdiction. n2 Section 1631 was enacted to authorize a federal court that determines that there is a lack of jurisdiction regarding a civil action filed with it to transfer the action to any other court in which the action could have been brought at the time it was filed in the original court. n3

Courts routinely transfer actions under Section 1631 to the particular court having exclusive subject matter jurisdiction in a particular area, due primarily to the creation of specialized federal courts to which Congress granted exclusive subject matter jurisdiction over certain actions, such as petitions for habeas corpus, and the types of cases that must be filed in the Court of Federal Claims or bankruptcy courts. n4

There is a split among circuits over whether a particular claim or claims may be transferred or whether the entire action must be transferred under Section 1631. The text of Section 1631 refers to the transfer of an "action" rather than the transfer of a "claim." Consequently, the District of Columbia Circuit takes the view that the entire case must be transferred. n5 Other courts of appeals have found that Section 1631 permits transfer of particular claims. n6

[2] Transfer to Cure Defects Other Than Subject Matter Jurisdiction

Although all courts agree that Section 1631 allows transfer rather than dismissal of an action mistakenly filed in a federal court without subject matter jurisdiction, some courts have held that section 1631 also applies to transfers to cure other defects. Thus, some courts have held transfer under Section 1631 is proper when the transferor court lacked personal jurisdiction, n1 proper venue, n2 or (3) in rem admiralty jurisdiction. n3

These courts' reasoning may be based on various grounds. For example, several courts have concluded that Section

1631 was designed to clear up the courts' confusion over which of the other transfer statutes, Section 1404(a) or Section 1406(a), applied when venue was technically proper in the original court, but when that court lacked personal jurisdiction over the defendant, and which state's law properly applied following transfer in such a situation. n4 Other courts rely on the plain language of Section 1631, which authorizes transfer for "want of jurisdiction" without restricting it to any type of jurisdiction. n5

Other courts disagree, finding that transfer under Section 1631 properly may be used only to correct a lack of subject matter jurisdiction in the transferor court. n6 These courts interpret Section 1631's phrase "want of jurisdiction" to refer only to a lack of subject matter jurisdiction in the transferor court and rely on its legislative history, which refers exclusively to transfer for the express purpose of remedying a lack of subject matter jurisdiction in the original court. n7

[3] Transfer in Interest of Justice

Section 1631 requires the court to make the transfer of the action to the proper court with jurisdiction if the transfer is in the "interest of justice." n1 Transfer rather than dismissal ordinarily will be deemed in the interest of justice n2 unless the action or appeal is frivolous, n3 the action was prematurely filed, n4 the action was untimely filed in the original court, n5 or the party moving for transfer delayed too long before making the motion. n6

The "interest of justice" requirement ordinarily will be satisfied if the statute of limitation has expired after the time of the original filing, so that only transfer rather than dismissal will preserve the plaintiff's cause of action. n7 Even if application of the statute of limitation would not bar the plaintiff from refiling the action in the correct court, transfer rather than dismissal ordinarily is in the interest of justice because it would save the plaintiff the time, expense, and effort of having to refile the action. n8

On the other hand, courts will deny transfer under Section 1631 if the claim will clearly lose in the proposed transferee court which has jurisdiction. In such cases, the court determining the motion for transfer should dismiss the case rather than grant a motion to transfer. Even though the motion to transfer is dependent only on the district court's lack of subject matter jurisdiction over the case, Section 1631 confers on the district court jurisdiction to engage in a limited review of the merits. Because it must determine whether it is in the interest of justice to transfer the case to the federal court with subject matter jurisdiction, the court implicitly also has the power to dismiss the case before it. n9

[4] Law Applied Following Transfer to Court With Exclusive Jurisdiction

Following a transfer due to lack of jurisdiction, the action must proceed as if it had been filed in or noticed for the court to which it is transferred on the date on which it was actually filed in the court from which it is transferred. n1 Courts have interpreted this to mean that even in diversity cases the law of the transferee state, including its choice of law rules, governs the action as of the date the action was filed in the original court. Thus, Section 1631 requires that (1) the transferee court apply the choice of law rules of the transferee state to determine which state's statutes of limitation properly apply and (2) it treat the action as having been filed in the transferee court as of date of the original filing. n2

§ 7.121 Transfer Between Divisions of Same Districtn*

[1] Right to Transfer

By statute, a district court in one division of a district has discretion to transfer an action to another division within the same district. n1 It has been held thatbecause Section 1404(b) on its face authorizes only a transfer from one division to another division within the same district, n2 it does not permit a transfer to another district or to a division in another district. n3

Even though Section 1404(b) does not expressly have the same requirement as Section 1404(a) that the transfer must be "for the convenience of the parties and witnesses" and "in the interest of justice," courts have applied these same requirements to Section 1404(b) transfers. n4 Some courts have stated that the showing required under Section 1404(b) with respect the two requirements is less rigorous than that required under Section 1404(a). n5 Therefore, the traditional acquiescence given to plaintiff's choice of forum under Section 1404(a) is correspondingly less under Section 1404(b). n6

[2] Interdivisional Transfer Procedure

The initiation of an interdivisional transfer under Section 1404(b) must be made on motion, consent, or stipulation of all parties. n1 This requirement has been construed as precluding a sua sponte transfer over the objection of any party. n2 The rule is in contrast to the interpretation of Section 1404(a) and Section 1406(a) transfers, which allow the court to order transfers on its own motion. n3 Additionally, while it has been held that under Section 1404(a) the parties may not have an inter-district transfer by stipulation, n4 the statutory language in Section 1404(b) expressly authorizes the parties to transfer a matter between divisions by stipulation. n5

Furthermore, if there is no timely objection to or opposition to a motion to transfer between divisions, the effect is the same as a stipulation. The failure to present a timely objection results in a waiver of the objection and precludes subsequent objections to the transfer. n6 Finally, there may be a stipulated transfer between divisions even if one of the parties, the United States, refuses to consent. The second sentence of Section 1404(b) provides that in rem proceedings brought by or on behalf of the United States may be transferred without the consent of the United States where all other parties request transfer. n7

By statute, a district court may order any civil action to be tried at any place within the division in which it is pending. n1 If a district has no divisions, it is treated as a district with a single division, and thus Section 1404(c) allows the court to select any location within that district as the place of trial. n2 As for the other subdivisions under Section 1404, the decision to transfer under Section 1404(c) is within the district court's discretion, n3 and even though Section 1404(c) does not expressly provide the requirements, courts have interpreted Section 1404(c) as requiring that the decision to transfer must be further governed by the convenience of the parties and witnesses and the interest of justice. n4

E. COMMON-LAW DOCTRINE OF FORUM NON CONVENIENS

1-7 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 7.140

§ 7.140 Nature and Purpose of Doctrinen*

"Forum non conveniens" is a common-law doctrine in federal court which allows the district court discretion to decline to exercise jurisdiction, even though the court has jurisdiction and proper venue, when it appears that the convenience of the parties and the court and the interests of justice would be better served if the action were tried in an alternative, available forum in a foreign country. n1 If a court dismisses an action on forum non conveniens grounds, it has the practical effect of forcing the plaintiff to file the complaint in the more convenient, alternative forum in the foreign country. n2 Although a court typically does not do so, n3 a court may retain some claims in an action and dismiss others on forum non conveniens grounds. n4

E. COMMON-LAW DOCTRINE OF FORUM NON CONVENIENS

1-7 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 7.141

§ 7.141 Doctrine Limited to Situations When Alternative Forum is in Foreign Sovereignn*

The Supreme Court has held that the common-law doctrine of forum non conveniens has continuing application in federal courts only in cases where the alternative, more convenient forum is in another country. This principle has developed because, for the federal court system in the United States, Congress has codified the common-law doctrine in Sections 1404(a) and 1406(a). n1 Those statutes provided for transfer, rather than dismissal, in cases when another federal court is the more convenient place for trial of the action than the court where the action is currently pending. n2 In other words, Sections 1404(a) and 1406(a) serve as statutory substitutes for common-law forum non conveniens for application in domestic federal courts; that is, when the alternative forum is within the territory of the United States, rather than abroad. n3

The doctrine of forum non conveniens has been held inapplicable to cases arising under a few federal statutes providing for venue in the district courts of the United States. Thus, it has been held that forum non conveniens dismissal is inapplicable if the language and legislative purpose of the venue statute reveal a Congressional intent to vest in the plaintiff an absolute power to choose a United States forum, and thus implicitly to deprive the court of its discretionary power to defeat the plaintiff's venue choice by application of the doctrine of forum non conveniens. For example, such an intent has been found in actions pursuant to the Federal Employers' Liability Act. n4 For a discussion of the effect of special venue statutes on the doctrine of forum non conveniens, see 17 Moore's Federal Practice, § 111.76 (Matthew Bender 3d ed.).

E. COMMON-LAW DOCTRINE OF FORUM NON CONVENIENS

1-7 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 7.142

§ 7.142 Court Must Apply Federal Law of Forum Non Conveniensn*

When a party files a motion in federal court requesting to dismiss based on forum non conveniens, a determination of the motion is governed by federal law in all cases, n1 and not any state law counterpart. Federal law applies even in a diversity case n2 because the forum non conveniens doctrine is a rule of venue, not a rule of decision. Therefore, the Erie doctrine does not require the application of state forum non conveniens rules. n2.1 Additionally, the fact that there are strong federal interests to ensure that a federal court has the ability to manage the decisions before the court, which may have foreign policy implications weigh in favor of applying federal law to the issue of forum non conveniens. n3

§ 7.143 Dismissal Under Doctrine is Within Discretion of Courtn*

The doctrine of forum non conveniens is a flexible doctrine that gives the court considerable discretion n1 to weigh many factors relating to fairness and convenience, n2 and to decide the motion based on the particular facts of the case. n3 Therefore, theSupreme Court has cautioned the district courts not to place central emphasis on any one factor, otherwise the forum non conveniens doctrine would lose much of the very flexibility that makes it so valuable. n4 However, one of the drawbacks of the doctrine for parties is that the doctrine's flexible nature makes uniformity and predictability of outcome difficult. n5

E. COMMON-LAW DOCTRINE OF FORUM NON CONVENIENS

1-7 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 7.144

§ 7.144 Requirements for Dismissal Under Doctrinen*

[1] Dismissal Requires Two Elements

There are two essential elements that the party moving for forum non conveniens dismissal must demonstrate: n1 (1) the existence of an adequate, alternative forum, n2 and (2) that the balance of certain private and public interest factors favors dismissal. n3

[2] Alternative Foreign Forum Must Be Adequate

[a] Finding of Inadequacy is Rare

When a party makes a motion to dismiss based on forum non conveniens, the court must first decide whether there is an "adequate alternative forum" available to adjudicate the case. n1 If there is no adequate alternative forum available, the court may not dismiss the case but must retain the case for further proceedings. n2 An adequate alternative forum is considered available if all of the claims and all of the parties to the case are capable of adjudication within the subject matter and personal jurisdiction of the alternative forum. n2.1 The Supreme Court has stated that in rare circumstances the alternative forum may not be an adequate alternative if the remedy offered by the other forum is clearly unsatisfactory. n3 A court making a dismissal must articulate the grounds for dismissal and specify the factors that make the alternative forum adequate. n4

[b] Circumstances in Which Alternative Forum is Inadequate

Courts have found inadequacy in the following circumstances:

1. The alternative forum does not permit litigation of the subject matter of the dispute at all. n5 For example, when a foreign forum totally disregard American courts' custody orders, that forum is an inadequate forum for an action alleging custodial interference. n6

2. The plaintiff demonstrates significant legal obstacles to conducting litigation in the alternative forum. These are obstacles so severe that essentially they deprive the plaintiff of any remedy. n7 Furthermore, significant legal obstacles do not exist merely because there is no identical cause of action in the other forum nor because there are no identical remedies. n7.1

3. Fear of persecution, bias, corruption, or political unrest may make an alternative forum inadequate. n8 However, general allegations of corruption or bias on the part of the foreign forum does not automatically establish inadequacy, n9 nor will political unrest in the foreign jurisdiction, unless it is established that the unrest has an adverse effect on the judicial system there. n10

[c] Circumstances in Which Alternative Forum is Adequate

Courts usually find that the alternative forum is adequate in the following circumstances:

1. The defendants are amenable to service of process in the alternative forum, and it provides some potential avenue for adjudication of the claims. n10.1 The possibility that the foreign tribunal will apply law that is less favorable to the plaintiff or that the damages awarded may be smaller is a consideration but, in itself, does not make a forum inadequate. n10.2 Thus, for example, the possibility that the alternative forum would not recognize a strict liability theory did not make the forum inadequate because the plaintiff would still be able to pursue negligence claims in that forum. n11 Only if all potential recovery is meaningless would the alternative forum be inadequate. n11.1

2. A forum is usually adequate despite less favorable procedural law. Thus, a foreign forum is not rendered inadequate by the unavailability of beneficiallitigation procedures similar to those available in the United States, including federal district courts, n12 such as the lack of jury trial. n13

3. Ordinarily, the alternative forum will be deemed both "available" and "adequate" if all defendants are amenable to process in the other jurisdiction. n14 However, in some circumstances an alternative forum will be held inadequate even despite the fact that the defendants are amenable to process in the forum, n15 for example, if the alternative forum does not permit litigation of the subject matter of the dispute at all. n16

[3] Convenience of Parties and Interests of Justice Served by Dismissal

[a] Discretion of Court to Make Determination Based on Private and Public Factors

The district court has discretion to dismiss an action based on inconvenience and the interests of justice only after considering and balancing n1 any relevant private factors n2 and public factors. n3 The Supreme Court has stated that dismissal is appropriate either when litigation in the original forum would cause oppressiveness and vexation to a defendant out of proportion to the plaintiff's convenience or when considerations affecting the original forum court's own administrative and legal problems make the original forum inappropriate for litigation. n4

[b] Private Factors

The private factors that a court must consider include the following: n5

1. The location of operative events and the relative ease of access to sources of proof. n6

2. The relative availability of compulsory process to secure the attendance of unwilling witnesses. This is considered the most important factor by many courts because the presentation of live testimony often is essential to a fair trial. n7

3. The cost of obtaining attendance of witnesses, assuming that witnesses located in a foreign location are willing to testify at trial in the district court. n8

4. The extent to which a view of the premises at issue in the action is necessary. n9 The adequacy of other alternatives, such as a filmed or videotaped view, may also be considered by the court. n10

5. The enforceability of judgments in the alternative forum, n11 considering especially where the assets of the defendants are located. n12

6. All other factors that render trial of the case expeditious and inexpensive, n12.1 such as, the defendant's inability to implead a necessary third party; n13 the cost of obtaining or translating evidence; n14 and the plaintiff's financial hardship that would be incurred if the action is brought in the alternative forum. n15

[c] Public Factors

The public factors that a court must consider include the following: n16

1. The administrative problems and expense caused by court congestion. n17

2. The unfairness of burdening citizens in an unrelated forum with jury duty. n18

3. The interest in having localized controversies decided at home. n19

4. The interest in trying the case in a forum familiar with the applicable law. n20 Therefore, if there is a strong need for the district court in the United States to analyze and apply the law of a foreign country, that need weighs heavily in favor of dismissal. n20.1

5. The interest in avoiding unnecessary conflicts of laws. n21

E. COMMON-LAW DOCTRINE OF FORUM NON CONVENIENS

1-7 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 7.145

§ 7.145 Preference for Plaintiff's Choice of Forumn*

[1] Courts Give Deference to American Plaintiff's Choice of Forum

When the plaintiff is an American citizen or resident, the court will grant significant deference to the plaintiff's choice of forum, which should rarely be disturbed by dismissal of the action on forum non conveniens grounds. n1 This preference is not some jingoistic attitude on the part of American courts but is based on the recognized principle that there is a strong presumption in favor of a domestic plaintiff's choice of forum. n2 However, an American plaintiff's choice of a United States forum is not immunized against forum non conveniens dismissal when the defendant establishes such oppressiveness and vexation as to be out of all proportion to the plaintiff's convenience. n3 Thus, the burden on the defendant is heightened because of the countervailing public interest in providing a United States forum for an action in which all parties are United States citizens and residents. n4

[2] Courts Give Less Deference to Foreign Plaintiff's Choice of Forum

When a foreign plaintiff is concerned, his or her choice of forum generally is entitled to less deference than an American plaintiff. n1 This rule is not based on a desire to disadvantage foreign plaintiffs but rather on the assumption that a United States forum is not the most convenient forum when a foreign plaintiff is concerned, n2 and also that in comparison to a domestic plaintiff's forum choice, a foreign plaintiff's choice deserves less deference. n3 Furthermore, the court should consider whether a foreign plaintiff's choice of forum springs from disfavored motives, such as a desire to obtain the benefit of more favorable United States law, n4 or to harass the defendant. n5

When the defendant has a substantial presence in the chosen forum, the defendant must still overcome the presumption (although less) in favor of the foreign plaintiff's choice of forum by showing that the balance of convenience favors trial in the foreign forum. n6 Furthermore, some courts have held that a provision found in many United States treaties with foreign nations requires that citizens of such nations be given the same degree of deference that a United States citizen would receive with regard to its choice of a United States forum. n7 Such a provision expressly provides that foreign nationals be given national treatment with respect to access to United states courts or access to our courts on terms no less favorable than those applicable to United States citizens. n8

§ 7.146 Effect of Forum Selection Clausen*

If the parties' contract has a valid forum selection clause, which is the parties' agreement that any dispute arising out of their contractual relationship will be held in a specified foreign forum, it may alter the analysis governing forum nonconveniens motions. For example, if contrary to a mandatory clause designating a foreign forum, the plaintiff brings the action in a district court in the United States, the defendant may, based on the clause, move to dismiss the action on forum non conveniens grounds. In such a case the usual forum non conveniensanalysis which ordinarily gives strong deference to the plaintiff's choice of forum does not apply. n1 Rather, the forum selection clause controls unless there is a strong showing that it should be set aside and will be enforced unless the plaintiff can clearly show that enforcement would be unreasonable and unjust or that the clause was invalid by reason of fraud or overreaching. n2 In other words, when there is a forum selection clause, the proper analysis begins with each side on an equal footing, n3 rather than with the strong presumption that the plaintiff should be denied its choice of forum only when the factors weigh heavily in favor of dismissal. n4 When the forum selection clause is permissive rather than mandatory, the normal forum non conveniens analysis applies. n5

§ 7.147 Burden of Proofn*

The defendant who is seeking a dismissal has the burden to show that a forum non conveniens dismissal is justified. n1 In other words, the defendant has the burden of persuasion in proving all elements necessary for the court to dismiss a claim based on forum non conveniens: n2 that there is an adequate alternative forum and that in light of the relevant public and private interest factors the balance of convenience tilts strongly in favor of the foreign forum. n3 The amount of factual detail that the defendant must show depends on the particular facts of each case. For example, if it would be an extreme burden for the defendant to obtain the affidavits detailing the witnesses and documents which would be unavailable to the defendant if the action were to proceed in the district court, the court may dispense with the need for such affidavits. The showing of the burden would be sufficient. n4

1-7 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 7.148

§ 7.148 Procedural Considerationsn*

[1] Effect of Delay in Making Motion for Dismissal

A defendant's motion to dismiss based on forum non conveniens should be filed in a timely manner, n1 which means that it should be made within a reasonable time after the defendant has become aware of the facts that form the basis for the motion. n2 The court may weigh delay in making a timely motion against granting the dismissal. n3 Even if the defendant has moved in a timely fashion, however, if extensive discovery on the merits has taken place or if the court has expended significant resources on the case, considerations of judicial economy weigh in favor of retaining rather than dismissing the action. n4

[2] Use of Expert Affidavits to Show Adequacy

The most effective way to establish the adequacy or inadequacy of the alternative foreign forum is ordinarily through affidavits or declarations from experts. n1 When the parties have submitted conflicting expert affidavits, the court must decide which expert's opinion to give the greatest weight, based such factors as the expert's experience and comprehensiveness of the affidavit. n2 When evidence is less conclusive than expert evidence, such as newspaper articles or other reports, the court will give the evidence less weight. n3

[3] Effect of Forum Non Conveniens Dismissal

If a court grants a dismissal on forum non conveniens grounds, the plaintiff is barred on claim preclusion grounds from bringing a second action in federal court unless he or she can show some objective facts that materially alter the considerations underlying the previous resolution. n1 However, a state court dismissal on forum non conveniens grounds is not preclusive as to a second forum non conveniens motion if the action was refiled in federal court, because the federal court must apply federal forum non conveniens law. n2

F. APPELLATE REVIEW

1-7 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 7.160

§ 7.160 Appeal of Order Regarding Statutory Transfer of Venuen*

[1] Statutory Transfer Orders Generally Not Immediately Appealable

As a general rule, orders granting or denying transfer under any of the transfer statutes, Section 1404 (transfer of action when venue proper but convenient), Section 1406 (transfer of case in which venue is improper laid), or Section 1631 (transfer when subject matter jurisdiction or personal jurisdiction is lacking), are not immediately appealable because these orders do not ordinarily end the litigation, and therefore are not "final decisions" for the purpose of appellate jurisdiction. n1 Furthermore, orders granting or denying transfer do not fall within the collateral order exception to the final judgment rule, n2 which permits immediate review if the interlocutory order would be "effectively unreviewable" after a final judgment is entered in the case. n3

There is one statutory exception: an order granting or denying a motion to transfer an action to the United States Court of Federal Claims under Section 1631 is immediately appealable. n4 Additionally, the losing party to a motion to transfer venue may request that the district court certify the transfer order as one qualifying for immediate appeal. Although certification has been granted to allow immediate review of transfer orders, n5 it is rare because transfer decisions are discretionary and do not usually involve controlling questions of law; therefore, they are not generally appropriate for certification. n6

[2] Mandamus Review Possible

An appellate court has the authority to grant mandamus relief to review transfer orders. Mandamus is only available when the losing party has no other adequate means of obtaining relief from the adverse order, n1 and in some circumstances mandamus review is available because most courts recognize that it is almost impossible to correct an erroneous transfer order by appellate review after trial, and even if the order ultimately is reversed, the expense and inconvenience of retrying the case would be extremely burdensome. n2 However, because mandamus is considered an extraordinary remedy, the petitioner generally must show an error on the part of the district court of a higher magnitude than "mere error." For example, the order must be a gross abuse of discretion, n3 or at least clearly erroneous n4 or a clear-cut abuse of discretion. n5

[3] Appeal After Final Judgment

A party losing the transfer motion may include it in any appeal after a final judgment, n1 but it is difficult to win on appeal, n2 because the transfer order will be reviewed only for abuse of discretion. n3 Additionally, most appellate courts require a showing that a different result would have been reached, absent the erroneous transfer decision, n4 or that the transfer order prejudiced the losing party. n5

[4] Proper Appellate Court for Appeal

If the motion to transfer is denied, the losing party may seek appellate review by certification or mandamus in the circuit court embracing the district court in which the action is pending. This is generally the same circuit in which any appeal from a final judgment would be taken. n1 If the motion to transfer is granted, and the transfer is to a district court within another circuit, certain steps must be taken to preserve the ability to obtain appellate review. The losing party may file a mandamus petition or seek certification in the transferor circuit, but only in the time period before which the record is physically transferred to the transferee court. This rule applies because generally the transferor court, including the circuit court, loses jurisdiction as soon as the files in the case are transferred and docketed in the transferee court. n2 By statute, the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit has exclusive jurisdiction over orders granting or denying transfer to the United States Court of Federal Claims. n3

PART II Jurisdiction; Venue; Removal
CHAPTER 7 VENUE
PART IV. TRANSFER OF CASE TO NEW VENUE
F. APPELLATE REVIEW

1-7 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 7.161

§ 7.161 Appeal of Order Regarding Forum Non Conveniensn*

[1] Grant of Dismissal Is Appealable as Final Order

If the court enters an order granting a motion to dismiss on forum non conveniens grounds, the order is appealable as a final judgment. n1 Furthermore, a dismissal is still considered final even if the district court makes the dismissal conditional on the fulfillment by the defendant of certain terms, and therefore retains jurisdiction which could be reasserted in the event that the defendant fails to comply with such conditions. n2

[2] Limited Appeal for Denial of Dismissal

[a] Denial Not Immediately Appealable

A district court's denial of a motion to dismiss on forum non conveniens grounds is not appealable as a final order and does not fall within the collateral order doctrine; therefore it is not immediately appealable. n1 For an interlocutory order to come within the collateral order exception, it must decide an issue that is completely separate from the merits of the action. n2 Because balancing the various factors necessary to determine whether a particular forum is so inconvenient as to warrant dismissal generally entangles the district court in the merits of the underlying dispute, allowing automatic interlocutory review of the denial of the motion would waste judicial resources by requiring repetitive appellate review of substantive questions. n3

[b] Certification

The district court has considerable flexibility in deciding a forum non conveniens motion, and therefore, in certain cases the court may be able to decide that dismissal is appropriate without extensive inquiry into the merits of the underlying dispute. n4 In such a case, immediate review might save both the court and the parties substantial time and expense, and the district court may certify the order for interlocutory review. n5 The court of appeals, in its discretion, may then accept the order for immediate appeal. n6

[c] Mandamus

An appellate court may use mandamus to review the denial of a motion to dismiss on forum non conveniens grounds, although at least one circuit has suggested that it is only available if certification has been denied. n7 Additionally, although mandamus relief theoretically is available, it is difficult to show entitlement to the remedy, because the movant must show a "clear cut" abuse of discretion. n8 However, there have been cases when the writ of mandamus has issued. n9 For example, one circuit granted mandamus when it determined that the court's denial of transfer was a clear abuse of discretion because the court (1) applied too strict of a standard to demonstrate transfer, (2) misconstrued the weight of the plaintiff's choice of venue, (3) treated choice of venue as a § 1404 factor, (4) misapplied the forum non conveniens factors, (5) disregarded circuit precedent, including the 100-mile rule, and (6) disregarded the fact that not a single relevant factor favored the plaintiff's chosen venue. n10

[d] Appeal After Final Judgment

The denial of a forum non conveniens motion may be appealed after a final judgment in the case. However, appellate review of a forum non conveniens decision is subject to an extremely limited standard of review and may be reversed only if the district court has clearly abused its discretion. n11 One court has stated that after a trial has taken place, to establish an abuse of discretion, the defendant must show that he or she was greatly prejudiced by the fact that the trial occurred in the particular forum selected by the plaintiff, for example, by showing that key evidence or witnesses were unavailable at trial or that bias on the part of the forum deprived the defendant of a fair trial. n12

[3] Appellate Review is for Abuse of Discretion

A forum non conveniens determination is based in the sound discretion of the trial court and may be reversed only when there has been a clear abuse of discretion. A district court may abuse its discretion by relying on an erroneous view of the law, by relying on a clearly erroneous assessment of the evidence, or by striking an unreasonable balance of relevant factors. n1 When the district court has considered all relevant public and private interest factors, and where its balancing of these factors is reasonable, its decision deserves substantial deference. n2 Even though the district court's decision is accorded substantial deference, however, the appellate court must still conduct a meaningful review of the decision based on the standard stated above. n3

CHAPTER 8 REMOVAL FROM STATE COURTS
PART I. GENERAL PRINCIPLES CONTROLLING REMOVAL

1-8 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 8.01

§ 8.01 Nature of Removaln*

Removal is a federal procedure that allows a party to remove a claim from state to federal court when the federal court would have had original jurisdiction if the case had initially been brought there. n1 The removal procedure changes the forum in which the case will be tried. n2 Thus, in contrast to a transfer of a case from one federal district court to another district court within the federal court system, n3 the removal statutes allow a case to be taken from a proper trial forum in the state judicial system to the federal trial judicial system. n4

The removal statutes are designed to provide defendants with an opportunity similar to that of a plaintiff when filing a claim n5 to have a federal forum litigate the claim when federal subject matter exists. n6 Removal jurisdiction in federal question cases was designed to ensure that the tribunal better informed on questions of federal law will adjudicate the matter. n7 In diversity cases, removal jurisdiction was designed to protect nonresident defendants from any perceived prejudice or preference of the state court regarding the resident plaintiffs. n8

Removal requires that, at the time the notice of removal is filed, the transferee federal court have "original jurisdiction" as if the complaint had been initially filed there; such jurisdiction must consist of either federal question or diversity jurisdiction. n9 Therefore, removal is one of three ways of invoking federal jurisdiction. The other two ways are to initiate an action by filing a complaint in federal court n10 or by appealing a state court judgment in a federal court of appeals. n11 Because it is an invocation of federal jurisdiction, the defending party must establish federal jurisdiction over the suit currently in state court; federal courts, therefore, must resolve close cases against removal. n12

PART I. GENERAL PRINCIPLES CONTROLLING REMOVAL

1-8 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 8.02

§ 8.02 State Law May Not Restrict Removal to Federal Courtn*

Although providing a federal forum for the defendant is the primary goal of removal, the ultimate effect of removal is to deprive the state court of an action properly within its jurisdiction, which raises federalism concerns. n1 It has consistently been held, however, that the states may not restrict the right of removal, or either directly or indirectly withhold, condition, or restrict the unfettered exercise of right of removal specified in Section 1441. n2 For example, a state may not condition the issuance of a license to do business in the state on an agreement not to remove any action to federal court. n3 Similarly, when a foreign corporation grants consent to be sued in the courts of a state as a condition on its right to do business in the state, the consent does not operate to deprive such corporation of its right to remove when otherwise appropriate. n4

One exception to the principle that a state may not restrict removal is based on the Eleventh Amendment. If a state has consented to suit in its own courts, but not in federal courts, any action brought against the state must be litigated in the state court and may not be removed to federal court under the general removal statute. n5

CHAPTER 8 REMOVAL FROM STATE COURTS
PART I. GENERAL PRINCIPLES CONTROLLING REMOVAL

1-8 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 8.03

§ 8.03 Relation of Removal to Original Subject Matter Jurisdictionn*

The right of a party to remove is based entirely on statute. n1 Under the general federal removal statute, n2 an action brought in state court may be removed by the defendant to the federal district court encompassing the state court if that federal district court would have had original jurisdiction over the action. This means that before a case is removed from a state court to federal court the party requesting removal must show the existence of either diversity jurisdiction or federal question jurisdiction at the time the notice of removal is filed. n3 Therefore, removal jurisdiction is considered to be coextensive with federal subject matter jurisdiction to the same extent as if the complaint had originally been filed in federal court. n4

The removing party has the burden of proving the existence of federal subject matter jurisdiction. n5 If the removing party meets this burden, the burden shifts to the plaintiff to show an express exception to removal. n5.1 The following are some of the exceptions that apply to removal jurisdiction:

1. A one-year limit applies to removal of diversity cases, from the date of the commencement of the action. n6

2. Under the statute, n7 a case may not be removed on the basis of diversity jurisdiction if one of the defendants is a resident of the state in which the action was brought. n8

3. If the party seeking to remove to federal court fails to strictly comply with the statutory removal procedure, n9 the court may send the case back to state court by a process known as remand. n10

4. Certain cases involving concurrent jurisdiction are exempt from removal, such as cases arising under the Jones Act. n11

5. A removal to federal court need not always be based on the general removal statutes. Thus, there are several special removal statutes that authorize removal in particular situations that are not dependent on the federal court having original jurisdiction. n12 For example, certain civil rights actions commenced in a state court may be removed by the defendant to the district court of the United States for the district and division embracing the place where the action is pending. n13

PART II Jurisdiction; Venue; Removal
CHAPTER 8 REMOVAL FROM STATE COURTS
PART I. GENERAL PRINCIPLES CONTROLLING REMOVAL

1-8 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 8.04

§ 8.04 Controlling Lawn*

There was no right to removal from state to federal court under the common law, so the right is entirely dependent on the statutes expressly specifying the procedure. n1 It is important to note in this regard, however, that the statute allows removal based on a "federal question" n2 which in turn may be based on federal common law. n3 Therefore, provided that an action could have originally been filed in federal court because the action was based on federal common law, the action qualifies under the removal statute based on federal question jurisdiction. n4

The primary source of the removal right is the federal "general removal statute," n5 which provides that a civil action brought in state court may be removed by the defendant to the federal district court encompassing the state court if that federal district court would have had original jurisdiction over the action. n6 In addition to the general removal statute, there are several special removal statutes that authorize removal in particular situations that are not dependent on the federal court having original jurisdiction. n7 For example, these statutes provide for the removal of civil rights cases, n8 cases involving federal officers, n9 and bankruptcy cases. n10

Because removal is entirely statutory and because removal statutes and the cases decided under them are intended to have uniform nationwide application, whether an action is removable is governed exclusively by federal law, n11 and state decisions regarding the various parameters of removal are not controlling. n12 For example, the federal courts are not bound by the a state's categorization of the type of state proceeding for purposes of removal, n13 but have looked to the nature of the right asserted to decide whether a proceeding is civil or criminal in nature. n14

PART I. GENERAL PRINCIPLES CONTROLLING REMOVAL

1-8 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 8.05

§ 8.05 Strict Construction of Removal Statutesn*

Removal is a procedure created by federal statute that allows defendants in state court actions to move the action to federal court, provided that the plaintiff's action could have been properly filed in federal court if done so initially. n1 The entitlement to removal is very narrowly construed because it is a purely statutory right, n2 and because of the concerns of federalism, n3 a clear congressional intent to limit removal jurisdictional, n4 and the traditional preference to allow a plaintiff to choose the forum for litigation. n5 It is also important to note that the statutes establishing federal question or diversity jurisdiction, on which removal depends, must be strictly construed, and all doubts must be resolved against federal jurisdiction. n6

As a corollary to the principle of strict construction of the removal statutes, there is a presumption against removal jurisdiction in a suit originally filed in state court, n7 and the court must resolve all doubts against removal and in favor of remand to the state court. n8 This presumption is the result of the principle that the courts must enforce Congress's intent to restrict federal jurisdiction in controversies between citizens of different states. n9 Furthermore, because of the presumption against removal jurisdiction, the burden is on the party requesting removal to establish that removal is proper. n10

CHAPTER 8 REMOVAL FROM STATE COURTS
PART I. GENERAL PRINCIPLES CONTROLLING REMOVAL

1-8 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 8.06

§ 8.06 Actions That May Not Be Removedn*

[1] Types of Actions Not Subject to Removal

Any civil action brought in a state court that is subject to the original jurisdiction of the federal district courts may be removed by the defendant, except as otherwise expressly provided by an act of Congress. n1 The United States Supreme Court has stated that even though the removal statute is strictly construed, n2 this requirement for an "express" exception to the rule means that Congress must at least clearly state in its legislation the circumstances in which removal is not permitted. n3

By statute, Congress has made such an express prohibition against removal in the following circumstances:

1. A civil action in any state court against a railroad, or against its receivers or trustees that arises under the Federal Employers' Liability Act (FELA) may not be removed to any district court of the United States. n4 Furthermore, Jones Act cases are not removable because the Jones Act incorporates the general provisions of the FELA, including the bar on removal. n5 Federal law determines whether an action arises under FELA. n6

2. A civil action in any state court against a common carrier, or against its receivers or trustees, to recover damages for delay, loss, or injury of shipments, arising under federal statutes regulating carriers n7 may not be removed to any federal district court unless the matter in controversy exceeds $10,000, exclusive of interest and costs. n8

3. A civil action in any state court arising under that state's workers' compensation laws may not be removed to any federal district court. n9 This prohibition against removing workers' compensation claims is based on congressional intent that each state may administer its own workers' compensation system. n10 The exclusion precluding the removal of a state court action arising under the workers' compensation laws is a federal jurisdiction statute with nationwide application; consequently, federal law and not the law of the state in which the action is brought governs its interpretation. n11 The exclusion applies only to workers compensation "statutes." Thus, an action against a workers' compensation insurance carrier for breach of its duty of good faith and fair dealing arises under common law, not the state workers' compensation scheme, and is removable. n12 The bar against removal of workers' compensation claims is nonjurisdictional and may be waived because a statutory restriction against removal is not a matter of substantive jurisdiction, but rather, it is a procedural defect that may be waived. n13

4. A civil action in any state court arising under Section 40302 of the Violence Against Women Act n14 may not be removed to any federal district court. n15 Although the state and federal courts share concurrent jurisdiction over civil actions alleging gender-based violence, the action is expressly nonremovable, so that the plaintiff's choice of forum controls.

5. A civil action arising under the Securities Act of 1933 and brought in any state court of competent jurisdiction may not be removed to any court of the United States. n16

6. A civil action arising under the Interstate Land Sales Full Disclosure Act and brought in any state court of competent jurisdiction may not be removed to any court of the United States, except when the United States or any officer or employee of the United States in his or her official capacity is a party. n17

7. A civil action arising under the Condominium and Cooperative Abuse Relief Act of 1980 and brought in any state court of competent jurisdiction may not be removed to any court of the United States, except when any officer or employee of the United States in his or her official capacity is a party. n18

[2] Plaintiff May Waive Prohibition

The statutory prohibition against removal n1 is not absolute because the courts have held that a removal, despite a statutory prohibition, is a procedural defect and is not jurisdictional. Such a removal may be waived by a defendant. n2 For example, improper removal under the statute may be waived by the plaintiff either by failing to make a motion in the federal district court to remand the case to the state court, or by failing to raise the matter on appeal, provided that the federal district court would have had jurisdiction if the case originally had been filed in the district court. n3

PART II Jurisdiction; Venue; Removal
CHAPTER 8 REMOVAL FROM STATE COURTS
PART I. GENERAL PRINCIPLES CONTROLLING REMOVAL

1-8 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 8.07

§ 8.07 Waiver by Defendant of Right to Removen*

[1] Conduct or Failure to Act Constituting Waiver

If a defendant takes certain actions in state court or fails to comply with removal procedures in a timely manner, after it is apparent that the case is removable, the defendant waives the right to remove a state court action to federal court. An affirmative act constitutes a waiver if it manifests the defendant's intent to (1) have the case adjudicated in state court and (2) abandon the right to a federal forum, n1 provided it is apparent that the case is removable. n2 The intent to waive the right to remove to federal court and to submit to state court jurisdiction must be clear and unequivocal, and the defendant's actions must be inconsistent with the right to remove. n3

Thus, the following acts taken by a defendant have been held to constitute a waiver of the defendant's right to remove to federal court:

1. Participating in the state court proceedings when the defendant is not compelled to take the action, such as seeking some form of affirmative relief, such as an injunction n4 or moving in state court to compel arbitration. n5

2. Making a request for a continuance in state court, without notifying the plaintiff or state court of the intention to remove the case in the interim. n6

3. Filing a motion to dismiss the state court complaint. n7

4. Contesting a motion in state court, because removal would operate as an appeal of an adverse state court decision. n8

5. Participating in the state court trial after the time it becomes apparent that the case is removable early in the proceedings. n9

A defendant may also waive the right to remove a state court action to federal court by failing to perform a required act. This type of waiver commonly occurs when all required defendants fail to file the removal notice within the statutory time limits. n10

On the other hand, a waiver occurs only when the defendant's intent to waive the right to remove to federal court and to submit to state court jurisdiction is clear and unequivocal, n11 and the defendant's actions are inconsistent with the right to remove. n12 For example, a defendant does not waive the right to remove by filing a motion for judgment against a third-party defendant in state court, after the defendant has already filed proper removal papers, n13 appointing an agent for service of process in the state where the action is pending, n14 or by filing a motion before it becomes unequivocally apparent that the case is removable. n15 Furthermore, an action taken in state court by one defendant does not constitute a waiver by another defendant of the right to remove the case. n16

[2] Waiver by Forum Selection Clause

[a] Requirements for Waiver

If the parties have executed a valid contractual forum selection clause, n1 which is a clause that specifies a state court in which the parties must litigate a dispute that may arise between them, the clause is enforceable and constitutes a waiver of the defendant's right to remove the suit, n2 provided that the clause is clear and unequivocal n3 and contains mandatory language that requires a particular forum as the exclusive forum for the resolution of any dispute between the parties. n4

Other courts have held that to constitute the predicate for a waiver, a forum selection clause in a contract must explicitly refer to right of removal, and if the clause does not have such a reference, violation of the clause by the defendant does not waive the right to remove. n5

[b] Clause Required to Be Valid and Enforceable

A defendant may waive the right to remove a case from state to federal court by contract only if the "forum selection clause" is valid. n6 Forum selection clauses are prima facie valid and enforceable, but the defendant may rebut the validity by showing that enforcement would be unjust or unreasonable, n7 or that the clause is invalid because of fraud, undue influence, overreaching, or undue negotiation power. n8 In a diversity case, state law governs the enforceability of a contractual forum selection clause with respect to removal jurisdiction; it should be noted that the factors governing whether a forum selection clause controls a motion for change of venue under Section 1404 do not apply. n9

To establish that a forum selection clause is invalid--for example, that it is unreasonable--the party seeking removal has the burden of showing that a trial in the selected forum would be so difficult and inconvenient that the party would effectively be denied a meaningful day in court. n10 Mere allegations of serious inconvenience are insufficient to prevent enforcement of the forum selection clause, if the contract meets the test of fundamental fairness or was freely negotiated in an international commercial transaction. n11 If the defendant does present evidence that the forum selection clause is invalid, the plaintiff alleging waiver has the burden of proof on all material provisions of the agreement containing the form selection clause. n12

[c] Consent to Jurisdiction Clause

A "consent to jurisdiction clause" is also known as a "service of suit clause," and is a clause that specifies that a party agrees to submit to jurisdiction of any court of competent jurisdiction within a particular territory specified by another party. A consent to jurisdiction clause does not in itself constitute a waiver of the right to remove to federal court. n13 Courts have recognized, however, that such a clause with additional language may be sufficient to constitute a waiver n14 if it manifests a clear and unequivocal intent to waive removal rights. n15 Thus, consent to jurisdiction clauses in insurance contracts have been held to waive the insurer's right to remove from the state forum selected by the insured. n16

PART II Jurisdiction; Venue; Removal
CHAPTER 8 REMOVAL FROM STATE COURTS
PART I. GENERAL PRINCIPLES CONTROLLING REMOVAL

1-8 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 8.08

§ 8.08 Effect of Removaln*

[1] Federal Court Assumes Control of Case

[a] Effect of Removal on Filing of Notice of Removal

Removal is automatically effected by the filing of a notice of removal with the district court, the state court, and the parties. n1 The federal court need not issue any specific order to complete removal. n2 After the notice of removal is filed, the federal district court assumes control of the case n3 and may issue all orders necessary to advance the litigation of the removed case. n4 For example, after removal occurs and a party files a renewed summary judgment motion, the federal court may grant the motion for summary judgment, even if it had previously been denied in the state court action. n5

[b] Service of Process After Removal

After the filing of the notice of removal, federal procedural rules control service of process regarding any defendants who were not served in the state court action. n5.1 Service already completed in state court, however, is not invalidated or otherwise affected by the removal. n6 Thus, if one or more of the defendants has not been served with process or the service has not been perfected prior to removal, such process or service must be completed or new process issued in the same manner as in cases originally filed in such district court. n7 For example, any defendants not served with process at the time of removal must be served with process in accordance with the federal rules applicable to cases originally filed in federal court. n8 Therefore, a federal summons must be obtained after removal, n9 and summons must be served within 120 days after the filing of the complaint. n10

[c] Venue After Removal

The general federal venue provisions n11 do not apply to removed cases. Rather, removal venue is determined by the removal statute, n12 which provides that venue is automatically proper when the case is removed to the federal district and division embracing the place where the action is filed in state court. n13 If the case is removed to the wrong district or division, however, the federal court may dismiss or transfer the case to the proper federal district. n14 Also, even after proper removal, a case may be transferred to another district for the convenience of the parties and the witnesses.

n15

Under the transfer statute, the transferee district must be one in which the action "might have been brought." n16 When a case was not originally removable because of lack of diversity, but subsequent events have rendered it removable, courts have held that the diversity determination should by made as of the time of the removal to federal court, and not at the time of the original filing of the case in state court. n17

[d] Pleading After Removal

If a defendant has not answered a claim before removal, the defendant either must answer or must present other defenses or objections under the Civil rules within the longest of any of the following applicable periods: n18

- 21 days after receiving, through service or otherwise, a copy of the initial pleading stating the claim for relief; n19
- 21 days after being served with the summons for an initial pleading already on file at the time of service; n20 or
- 7 days after the notice of removal is filed. n21

Any other pleadings filed after removal are controlled by the usual federal civil rule which specifies content and filing time for that type of pleading. n22

The appropriate time period from the list above may be extended under the provisions of Rule 6(b). For example, even if the time period has already expired, the district court may extend the time for good cause if the party failed to act because of excusable neglect. n23

[e] Effect of Removal on Required Jury Demand

If a party expressly demanded a jury trial in accordance with state law before removal, it need not renew the demand after removal. n24 In determining whether the original state court complaint satisfied state law, the federal court will consider every reasonable interpretation against the waiver of the jury trial right. Thus, even if a complaint did not contain a jury demand that satisfied all technical standards, if the complaint provides sufficient notice to the court and opposing counsel that plaintiff wanted a jury trial on particular claims, the federal court will acknowledge the jury right on those claims. n25 If a case is removed from a state that does not require an express jury demand, no demand is required in federal court unless the federal court directs that an express jury demand will be required. n26

If neither party made a jury demand in the state court proceeding, the party seeking a jury in federal court must file a jury demand under the federal civil rules governing removal in accordance with the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. n27 and any applicable local rules. n28 Thus, the demand must be in writing and must be served on the other parties. n29 The deadline for filing a jury demand depends on which party is demanding the jury. A defending party must serve a jury demand within 14 days after it files a notice of removal. n30 The party making the claim for relief must serve a jury demand within 14 days after it is served with a notice of removal filed by a defending party. n31

[f] Supplemental Jurisdiction in Removed Cases

Although not expressly provided by the statute, n32 the Supreme Court has ruled that the supplemental jurisdiction statute, which defines the federal district court's supplemental jurisdiction, applies with equal force to cases removed to, and cases initially filed in, the district court. n33 This case agrees with the rationale for supplemental jurisdiction that permits defendants in federal court to assert claims that are not independently supported by federal subject matter jurisdiction because they are being asserted out of a defensive position and that the assertion of such claims should apply whether the case is brought in federal court originally or removed there. It is logical to apply the statute the same way to defendants in removed cases as in cases originally brought in federal court. As for plaintiffs in removed cases, it is also logical to apply the supplemental jurisdiction statute slightly more expansively in removed cases. n34

[g] Law Applied by Federal Court After Removal

Until the time of removal, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure do not govern the case, and the prior rulings made under state procedural law remain in effect. n35 However, after the removal becomes effective on the filing of the notice of removal, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure become effective to govern the procedural aspects of the removed case. n36 Additionally, when the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure grant discretion to the federal courts, a district court may look to state court rules to assist in determining appropriate federal law. n37 If removal jurisdiction is based on diversity of citizenship, however, the substantive legal issues are governed by state law. n38

[2] Effect of Removal on State Court Action

[a] State Court Loses Jurisdiction

After a copy of the notice of removal is filed with the clerk of the state court in which the action is pending, the state court is divested of jurisdiction and must cease and suspend all proceedings unless and until the case is remanded. n1 Any action taken by the state court after the filing of the removal notice is void, even if the case is subsequently remanded because the initial removal was improper. n2 Furthermore, the state court has no authority to act after a federal court dismisses rather than remands a case. n2.1

Despite these restrictions, some cases have held that the "proceed no further" language of the statute does not extend to prohibit state courts from performing ministerial acts that do not affect the merits of the dispute between the parties. If the contrary were true, state courts would be forever prohibited from taking any act regarding a removed case. This bar would include actions such as the routine destruction of obsolete files, allowing parties to justifiably remove evidence and documents for proper legal purposes, or any similar action that requires a court order, n3 for example, to assess and collect accrued court costs after removal from a plaintiff who signed a cost bond, when the state court's action is not inconsistent with the federal statute mandating that the state court proceed no further. n4 However, the state court may not take any action after removal regarding the substance of the litigation between the parties, such as the imposition of sanctions. n4.1

[b] Effect of State Court Orders Prior to Removal

When a case is removed to federal court, the federal district court takes the case on removal precisely as the case stood in state court. n5 Consequently, the state court pleadings, any discovery had, orders entered, or proceedings will be presumed valid by the district court. n6 For example, interlocutory orders for preliminary relief entered by the state court remain in effect, such as injunctions, attachments, and sequestrations. n7 Furthermore, all state court orders remain in effect unless they are modified or superseded by the federal court. n8 Therefore, the district court is free to dissolve or modify the state court orders because state court orders are not considered to be the law of the case in the federal court. n9 Additionally, the validity and enforcement of an existing state orders are governed by federal law after removal. n10 For example, the duration of an ex parte temporary restraining order issued by a state court in effect at the time of removal is governed by federal law. n11

A notice of removal is effective when filed in the respective courts. Consequently, when a defendant files a notice of removal in federal court and sometime thereafter files a notice in state court, the two courts share concurrent jurisdiction until the notice is filed in state court, which divests the state court of jurisdiction. For example, in a case where the state court granted a default judgment in the interim between the filings, the default judgment was a valid state court order that came to federal court on removal. The judgment was, however, subject to a motion to vacate in federal court under the federal standard. n12

§ 8.20 Summary of Requirements for Removal Under General Statuten*

The general removal statute provides that any civil action brought in a state court of which the district courts of the United States have original jurisdiction may be removed by the defendant or the defendants, to the district court of the United States for the district and division embracing the place where such action is pending. n1 When analyzed according to its components, there are four basic requirements for proper removal under the general removal statute: n2

1. The action desired to be removed must be one over which the district courts of the United States have original jurisdiction. n3

2. Only the defendant or the defendants may remove an action. n4

3. Only a "civil action" may be removed, and only if the action has been filed in a state court. n5

4. The action may only be removed to the district court for the district and division embracing the state court action. n6

It should be noted that even if all of these requirements under the general removal statute are not met, a state court action may nevertheless be removed under a special removal statute, which is a statute in which Congress specifies the particular circumstances allowing for removal. n7 For a discussion of these special removal statutes, see § 8.40 et seq.

PART II. RIGHT TO REMOVAL JURISDICTION UNDER GENERAL REMOVAL STATUTE

§ 8.21 District Court Must Have Grounds for Original Jurisdiction Over Removed Actionn*

[1] Nature of Original Jurisdiction

An action brought in a state court may be removed to federal court only if the action is one that is subject to the original jurisdiction of the district courts of the United States. n1 This means that an action is removable to federal court only if, had the action originally been brought in federal court, the district court would have had original jurisdiction over the action because either (1) the action was founded on a claim or right arising under the Constitution, treaties, or laws of the United States, including the federal common law, or (2) complete diversity existed between the parties. n2 In other words, a federal court has original jurisdiction over any case for removal purposes provided that Congress has provided for original subject matter jurisdiction for such a case in general. n3 An action is thus removable only if a right or immunity created by the Constitution, treaty, or some other federal law, including the diversity statute or federal common law, is an essential element of the plaintiff's properly pleaded claim for relief. n4 Most removed cases involve federal questions, n5 or diversity of citizenship. n6 Removal may, however, be entirely based on federal common law. n7

Removal is entirely governed by statute, and a party may not remove without compliance with the statutory requirements. The primary requirement is that the court have original jurisdiction over the action in order for it to be removed from a state court. n8 Consequently, the Supreme Court has held that, because the supplemental jurisdiction statute n9 is not a source of original jurisdiction and is not a proper basis for removal, n10 removal may not be based on a supplemental or ancillary claim alone; there must be an independent basis for original jurisdiction. However, when the court has original jurisdiction that supports removal, supplemental claims may be removed with the claim that supports the original jurisdiction n11 and may be heard by the federal court even if the original jurisdiction claim is later dismissed. n12

In the same way that the supplemental jurisdiction statute may not in itself provide the basis for original jurisdiction necessary for removal, the All Writs Act, which provides federal courts with the power to issue all writs necessary to aid their jurisdiction, n13 does not in itself provide an independent basis for removal. n14 A court could not, for example, order removal of a claim over which the court had no original jurisdiction merely because a related state court case might conflict with the federal court's jurisdiction of the related matter. n15

The Supreme Court has indicated that if one claim in an action provides the proposed federal removal court with original jurisdiction, an action based on such a claim may be removed to the federal court, even if any other claims in the action are not jurisdictionally supported in federal court, for example, because of a state's sovereign immunity or if the other claims do not otherwise fit within the original or supplemental jurisdiction of the federal courts. In such circumstances, the action may be removed, but the district courts must dismiss or remand the claims that are not supported by federal jurisdiction and may retain jurisdiction over the claims that are supported by original or supplemental federal jurisdiction. n16

[2] Federal Question Jurisdiction as Basis of Removal

[a] Federal Question Described

The scope of "federal question" jurisdiction necessary for removal under the general removal statute n1 is identical to the scope of federal question jurisdiction under Section 1331. This is because removal jurisdiction is only possible when the federal district court would have had original jurisdiction over the suit and because the "arising under" language of the two statutes is almost identical. n2 Consequently, this chapter describes the highlights of a federal question necessary for removal of an action. For a complete discussion of the nature and requirements of federal question jurisdiction in general, see Ch. 5, Original Jurisdiction Over the Subject Matter.

The district courts have original federal question jurisdiction if a civil action arises under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States. n3 If a case involves a federal question, the case is removable without regard to the citizenship of the parties. n4 Any action in which an issue of federal law forms an essential ingredient of the original cause is a case arising under federal law, even if other questions of law are involved in the case. n5 To determine whether the claim arises under federal law, the court must examine the "well pleaded" allegations of the complaint as filed by the plaintiff and must ignore potential defenses. n6

Furthermore, the federal law must be a significant and essential element of the plaintiff's cause of action. Removal is not proper due to the mere presence of a federal issue in a state cause of action. n7 The "arising under" clause gives federal courts jurisdiction over cases governed by state substantive law if necessary to protect important federal interests, and recognizes that federal courts perform an important function in providing expert, impartial, and uniform interpretation of federal law. n8

Federal question jurisdiction is not exclusive: state courts also have jurisdiction to hear federal question cases, n9 except when Congress has specifically denied state courts jurisdiction over particular federal questions. n10 Thus, certain statutes confer exclusive original jurisdiction on federal district courts of actions involving specific federal laws. For example, state courts have no jurisdiction to adjudicate patent cases. n11

[b] Removal and Well-Pleaded Complaint Rule

[i] Statement of Rule

Whether a sufficient federal question exists is governed by the well-pleaded complaint rule, which provides that federal jurisdiction exists only if a federal question is affirmatively and distinctly presented on the face of the plaintiff's properly pleaded complaint. This rule makes the plaintiff the master of the claim; n12 the plaintiff may avoid federal jurisdiction and ensure that the claims are heard in state court by refraining from making claims based on federal law and by relying exclusively on state law, n13 unless the state law claims have been completely preempted by federal law. n14

The federal law under which a claim arises must be a direct and essential element of the plaintiff's cause of action to establish federal question jurisdiction. n15 Therefore, if a plaintiff's well-pleaded complaint filed in state court does not allege any federal question, the defendant ordinarily may not remove the case to federal court, even if his or her defense or counterclaim is based on federal law. n16 A plaintiff may not defeat removal, however, simply by omitting to plead a necessary federal question in the complaint, because such a complaint is not "well-pleaded"; in such a situation, the necessary federal question will be deemed to be alleged in the complaint. n17 A case may not be removed to federal court on the basis of a federal defense, including the defense of preemption, n18 even if the defense is anticipated in the plaintiff's complaint and both parties concede that the federal defense is the only dispute actually at issue. n19 Additionally, a case may not be removed to federal court on the basis of a federal question counterclaim; a counterclaim, which appears as part of the defendant's answer and not as part of the plaintiff's complaint, may not serve as the basis for "arising under" federal question jurisdiction. n20

[ii] Complete Preemption Exception

The "complete preemption doctrine" is a narrow exception to the well pleaded complaint rule. The doctrine provides that even a complaint that purports to plead only a state law claim may be removable to federal court when that state law is "completely preempted" by federal law. n21 Whether federal jurisdiction exists for removal purposes depends on the nature and scope of the preemption of state law. n22 To determine whether federal law completely preempts state law to the extent the preemption requires removal of a state court claim to federal court because of a federal defense, the district court must consider whether: (1) Congress intended federal law to occupy the entire regulatory field; n23 (2) the federal judicial power properly extends to actions originally filed in state courts to the extent that they affect that field; and (3) the exercise of federal power does not offend principles of federalism. n24

[c] Plaintiff is Generally Master of Claim

In some cases the plaintiff may have various theories of recovery, some under state law and others under federal law. Subject to the "well-pleaded complaint" rule and the complete preemption doctrine, n25 the plaintiff is the master of the claim and may choose to allege only state law claims, only federal law claims, or both, in state court. n26 If the plaintiff alleges only the state law claims, the action is not removable as a federal question case. If the plaintiff alleges the federal claims, or both federal and state claims, the action is removable. n27 Subject to the restrictions noted above, when a plaintiff selects only a state cause of action, the selection is controlling and the end of the removal inquiry. n28 If the plaintiff amends a state court claim to add a federal claim, the time for removal begins when the defendants receive the amended complaint that contains a federal claim on its face. n29

A plaintiff by "artful pleading" may not avoid federal jurisdiction over the complaint when all the state claims in the complaint are preempted. n30 This means that a federal district court may take removal jurisdiction if the real nature of the claim asserted in the complaint is essentially a federal question in nature, such as when state causes of action are completely preempted by ERISA or the Labor-Management Relations Act, even if by artful pleading the complaint purports to allege no federal causes of action. n31 The artful pleading doctrine may be invoked only in exceptional circumstances, because it raises issues of federalism. n32 Furthermore, the artful pleading doctrine applies only in cases of complete federal preemption. n33

[d] Action Not Removable Based Only on Federal Defense

Removal jurisdiction is not available unless the federal district court has concurrent original jurisdiction over the case with the state court. Consequently, a defendant generally may not remove a nondiverse case in which federal subject-matter basis is lacking, if the federal issue is first raised in the defendant's pleadings. n34 Thus, a defendant may not remove a case to federal court if the removal is based only on a federal counterclaim or a federal defense, including the defense of preemption, n35 even if the defense is anticipated in the plaintiff's complaint, and even if both parties concede that the federal defense is the only question truly at issue. n36 As a general rule, in the absence of diversity jurisdiction, a case will not be removable if the complaint does not affirmatively allege a federal claim. For example, even if a defense relies on the preclusive effect of a prior federal judgment, the defense does not in itself provide a basis for removal, unless a claim has been made by the plaintiff that is based on federal law. n37

[e] Removal Jurisdiction Not Derivative of State Court Jurisdiction

In contrast to prior law, courts now uphold otherwise proper removal jurisdiction even if there was a defect in jurisdiction or venue in the state court. In this regard, Congress has eliminated the doctrine of "derivative jurisdiction" for cases removed under Section 1441. n38 This means that the federal court to which the action is removed under Section 1441 is not precluded from hearing and determining any claim merely because the state court from which the action was removed did not technically correct jurisdiction over that claim. Courts now recognize that jurisdiction is proper in the federal court on removal even though it may not have been proper in the state court in which the action originally was brought, because the defendant is effectively waiving any objection to the state court defect by effecting removal to a proper federal court. n39

[f] Counterclaim by Defendant Generally Not Basis for Removal Jurisdiction

A defendant may not remove to federal court a case brought in state court under state law simply by raising a federal counterclaim. Such a removal would defeat the plaintiff's choice of forum. A counterclaim, which appears as part of the defendant's answer and not as part of the plaintiff's complaint, may not serve as the basis for "arising under" federal question jurisdiction. The basis of this rule is the principle that the plaintiff is the master of the complaint, and that the well-pleaded complaint rule enables the plaintiff to have the cause heard in state court when the plaintiff avoids making any claims based on federal law. n40 On the other hand, if the plaintiff fails to object in a timely manner to an improper removal and the defendant has asserted a federal counterclaim, the district court may not, on its own motion, inquire into the propriety of the removal. n41 Rather, because there is federal jurisdiction over the counterclaim, the court has subject matter jurisdiction and may enter judgment. n42

[3] Diversity Jurisdiction as Basis of Removal

[a] Nature of Diversity Jurisdiction

[i] Removal Diversity Requirements

The general removal statute provides in relevant part that any civil action brought in a state court of which the district courts of the United States have original jurisdiction, may be removed by the defendant, or the defendants, to the district court of the United States n1 in diversity actions provided that none of the parties in interest properly joined and served as defendants is a citizen of the state in which the action is brought. n2 Diversity jurisdiction for removal purposes is coextensive with ordinary diversity jurisdiction under the general jurisdiction statute, Section 1332. Thus, a case originally filed in state court may be removed to federal court if the traditional requirements of diversity jurisdiction, complete diversity of citizenship between all the parties and an amount in controversy exceeding $75,000, are satisfied. Even if the jurisdictional requirements are met, however, an action is not removable on the basis of diversity unless the defendants overcome an additional hurdle not applicable when a complaint is filed in the first instance in federal court: none of the defendants may be a citizen of the forum state. n3 For a complete discussion of the nature and requirements of federal diversity jurisdiction in general, see Ch. 5, Original Jurisdiction Over the Subject Matter.

An action may be removed on the basis of diversity jurisdiction if the amount in controversy exceeds the sum or value of $75,000, exclusive of interest and costs, and the action is between any of the following: n4

1. Citizens of different states; n5

2. Citizens of a state and citizens or subjects of a foreign state. n6

3. Citizens of different states, with foreign citizens or subjects as additional parties; n7

4. A foreign state as plaintiff and citizens of a state or of different states as defendants. n8

[ii] Exceptions for Family Law and Probate Suits

The Supreme Court has imposed a prohibition on the federal courts' diversity jurisdiction in two areas that it has determined are appropriate only for state court jurisdiction, rather than federal jurisdiction:

1. Certain domestic relations claims. A federal court may not exercise diversity jurisdiction in a narrow range of domestic relations issues; these issues are divorce, alimony, and child custody. On the other hand, the Supreme Court has held that the federal courts may take domestic relations related claims which allege the commission of torts. n9 For example, this exception does not preclude diversity jurisdiction over an action alleging that a parent's tort against children resulted in damages. Furthermore, the fact that an alleged violation of constitutional rights arises in a domestic relations context does not bar review of those constitutional issues. n10

2. Claims in probate proceedings. A federal court may not exercise diversity jurisdiction to probate a will, annul a will, or administer a decedent's estate. However, the probate exception does not bar federal courts from adjudicating matters such as claims of creditors, legatees, heirs, and other claimants against a decedent's estate provided that the federal court does not interfere with the probate proceedings. n11

[b] Determination of Citizenship

The rules to determine the citizenship of individuals, representative parties, permanent resident aliens, corporations, and partnerships, for diversity purposes n12 are the same for removal jurisdiction as for original federal diversity jurisdiction. n13 The following is a general summary of those rules; the determination of citizenship for diversity purposes is discussed in detail in see Ch. 5, Original Jurisdiction Over the Subject Matter.

1. An individual who is a citizen of the United States is a citizen of the state in which he or she is domiciled. n14

2. A corporation is a citizen of any state in which it is incorporated and of the state where its principal place of business is located. n15

3. Partnerships and other unincorporated associations are citizens of each state in which any partner, limited partner, or member resides. n16

4. A trustees' citizenship, rather than that of trust beneficiaries, determines citizenship of a trust for diversity purposes. n17

5. Representative parties, such as executors and conservators, are citizens of the same state as the represented party. n18

6. Permanent resident aliens, that is aliens legally admitted for permanent residence, are deemed citizens of the state in which they are domiciled. n19

The determination of a litigant's state citizenship for diversity purposes is governed by federal law rather than state law. n20 Federal courts may look to state law, however, for guidance in defining terms, formulating concepts, or delineating policies to reach the proper decision. n21

[c] Requirement of Complete Diversity

Removal based on diversity of citizenship is permissible only if there is no plaintiff and no defendant who are citizens of the same state. n22 Thus, diversity jurisdiction requires "complete diversity," n23 which means that none of the defendants may be a citizen of the same state as any of the plaintiffs. n24 If any plaintiff and any defendant share citizenship of the same state, diversity is incomplete and the federal court lacks jurisdiction. n25 The complete diversity requirement applies to each defendant named in the complaint. n26

When the court makes a determination whether complete diversity exists for purposes of removability, the determination is made according to the citizenship of the parties as alleged in the state court complaint. The plaintiff is the master of the complaint and has the option of naming only those parties the plaintiff chooses to sue, subject only to the rules of joinder of necessary parties. n26.1 Consequently, the court should not consider in the diversity determination persons who are merely potential defendants; furthermore, the named defendants are not required to negate the existence of potential defendants who could destroy diversity. n26.2

Diversity must exist as of the time the complaint is filed and removal is effected. If the plaintiff has made mistaken allegations about the citizenship of any named defendants, their actual citizenship controls. Once jurisdiction attaches, a party may not thereafter, by its own change of citizenship, destroy diversity. n27 Diversity is determined regardless of service or non-service on co-defendants. Thus, whenever federal jurisdiction in a removal case depends upon complete diversity, the existence of diversity is determined from the fact of citizenship of the parties named in the complaint and not from whether or not they have been served. n27.1 Unserved defendants may be disregarded if the complaint fails to state a plausible cause of action against them, or if the plaintiff voluntarily abandons the suit against them. n28 Additionally, the court will disregard the citizenship of defendants sued under fictitious names, such as "Doe" defendants, when the named defendants attempt to remove the case to federal court. n29 The general removal statute was amended to permit removal, even when the citizenship of "Doe" defendants is uncertain, to overrule the decision in a case that had held that the presence of Doe defendants destroys diversity and precludes removal. n30

[d] Removal Not Prevented by Fraudulently Joined Parties

Although removal jurisdiction generally requires that all defendants join in the notice of removal, if the plaintiff has named defendants who are nominal, unknown, sham, or fraudulent, it does not prevent removal, and the existence of such defendants is disregarded for purposes of determining diversity. n31 Fraudulent joinder occurs when a nondiverse party is added by the plaintiff solely for the purpose of depriving the federal courts of jurisdiction. n32 In other words, in determining whether there is diversity of citizenship, the court must disregard nondiverse parties that are fraudulently joined. n33 The term "fraudulent joinder" is slightly misleading, however, because the doctrine requires neither a showing of technical fraud nor technical joinder. n34 Rather, when a party seeking removal alleges fraudulent joinder, the removing party has the burden of proving the intent of the plaintiff to join the defendant solely to defeat jurisdiction. n35

A claim of fraudulent joinder must be pleaded with particularity and supported by clear and convincing evidence. n36 To establish that a defendant has been fraudulently joined, the removing party must show either that (1) there is no possibility that the plaintiff would be able to establish a cause of action against the defendant in state court, or (2) there has been outright fraud in the plaintiff's pleadings of jurisdictional facts. n37 The determination of whether a defendant was fraudulently joined to defeat diversity is a question of law, specifically requiring the court to interpret the underlying state law, and is subject to de novo review. n38

[e] Realignment of Parties

In making a determination of diversity of citizenship for purposes of removal, the designation and alignment of the parties made by the plaintiff when filing the action is not binding on the court. The court itself is responsible for aligning the parties according to their actual, substantive interests in the litigation. n38.1 However, a defendant effecting removal may bring the issue to the court's attention by requesting that the court preserve diversity, either in a motion to the court for realignment or in the defendant's response to a plaintiff's motion for remand to state court. n38.2 If, after proper alignment or realignment, there is no longer complete diversity, removal is improper for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. n39 A federal court will determine the true interests of the parties to ascertain whether a bona fide controversy exists between citizens of different states. n40 In this regard, in determining whether to realign the parties, federal courts are not bound by the manner in which a plaintiff formally aligns parties in the original pleading. n41 The federal courts must look beyond the pleadings and align the parties according to their respective positions in the dispute. n42 Thus, the realignment of parties should put them in a position so that their rights are the same as they would have been had they not been artificially aligned by the plaintiff as co-defendants. n43 For further discussion of realignment, see Ch. 5, Original Jurisdiction Over the Subject Matter.

[f] Removal Prohibited If Any Defendant Is Citizen of State Where Action Was Filed

The court may not allow removal if any of the parties in interest properly joined and served as defendants is a citizen of the state in which the action was filed. n44 Thus, even if complete diversity exists, removal is precluded if a local defendant is served. n45 The rationale for this rule is that because the purpose of diversity jurisdiction is to provide litigants with an unbiased forum by protecting out-of-state litigants from local prejudices, n46 it would not be consistent to allow an in-state defendant to take advantage of the removal procedure. n47 The courts are not in agreement whether the prohibition on local defendants is procedural or jurisdictional, and the Supreme Court has not addressed the issue. n48 Most courts hold that the ban is procedural and, assuming complete diversity, that the defect is waived if the plaintiff fails to move to remand on this ground within 30 days of the notice of removal. n49 Other courts hold that the presence of a local defendant constitutes a jurisdictional defect that may be raised at any time. Construction of the requirement as jurisdictional is consistent with the general principle of strict construction of the right of removal and with the local prejudice justification for diversity jurisdiction. n50

[g] Requirement of Amount in Controversy

[i] Amount Required

Diversity of citizenship jurisdiction exists only if the amount in controversy exceeds $75,000 exclusive of interest and costs. n51 The amount in controversy is determined based on the plaintiff's complaint at the time that the notice of removal is filed. n52 Although the value of the matter in controversy for purposes of federal jurisdiction must generally determined by applying federal standards, n53 in diversity cases the federal court must examine state law to determine the nature and extent of the damages to be awarded. n54

When making the determination of the amount in controversy, the court is not bound by the amount that is ultimately and actually awarded to the plaintiff but only by the amount that is demanded by the plaintiff when the complaint is filed. n55 When the amount in controversy is in doubt, the Supreme Court has drawn a distinction between original jurisdiction and removal jurisdiction. For cases originally brought in federal court, it must appear to a legal certainty that the plaintiff's claim is really for less than the jurisdictional amount to justify dismissal. n56 When, however, a party requests to remove a case instituted in state court, there is a strong presumption that the plaintiff has not claimed an amount large enough to confer jurisdiction on a federal court and that parties have not colluded to obtain federal jurisdiction. n57

Uncertainty as to the amount in controversy may arise, if the state court complaint does not allege the amount of damages sought. Such uncertainty may be eliminated by a determination of damages through discovery. Also, some state courts have jurisdictional limits that preclude a state court from awarding damages greater than specified amounts and that may serve as a basis for ascertaining the maximum amount in controversy for removal purposes. n58

When a suit requests only equitable relief, such as, injunctive relief, it may be difficult to evaluate monetarily its value.

For example, an action for injunctive relief may have far less monetary value to a plaintiff than to a defendant, who may be required to spend in excess of $75,000 to comply with an injunction ultimately imposed by the court. n59 Although there are cases permitting an inquiry from the defendant's point of view, the general rule is that the value of the cause of action or the amount in controversy is determined from the plaintiff's point of view, that is, what the plaintiff will recover or avoid losing if the suit is successful. This rule is consistent with the general principle of strict construction of the right of removal, and it protects the plaintiff's initial choice of forum. n60

[ii] Burden of Proof

The defendants have the burden of establishing that removal is proper, including proving that the amount in controversy requirement is satisfied. n61 Ordinarily, this burden is satisfied if the plaintiff claims a sum greater than the jurisdictional requirement. n62 If the state court complaint is uncertain or silent as to the amount of the plaintiff's claim, however, the defendant bears the burden of actually showing facts to support jurisdiction, including the jurisdictional amount. n63 To determine whether the defendant has satisfied this burden, the court will consider first whether it is facially apparent from the complaint that the jurisdictional amount is in controversy. If it is not, the court may consider facts alleged in the notice of removal, judicial admissions made by the plaintiffs, letters submitted to the court, or other summary judgment evidence that may reveal that the amount in controversy requirement is satisfied. n64 A conclusory allegation in the notice of removal that the jurisdictional amount is satisfied is insufficient to meet the defendant's burden. What the defendant must do is set forth the underlying facts supporting the assertion of the jurisdictional amount. n65 Therefore, when the plaintiff's complaint does not specify the total amount of damages demanded, a defendant seeking removal based on diversity jurisdiction must prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the amount in controversy exceeds the $75,000 jurisdictional requirement. n66 The best practice is for the defendant set forth the jurisdictional facts in the notice of removal or, when necessary, to use affidavits or other documentation similar to that used on motions for summary judgment. n67

In the determination of the amount in controversy for removal purposes, there is a strong presumption that the amount alleged in the complaint is correct, n68 because as officers of the court, attorneys have a duty of candor to the court, and if it is specific and drafted by an attorney, the plaintiff's complaint deserves deference and the presumption of truth. n69 As noted above, a defendant seeking removal has a heavy burden to show that the plaintiff's express claim to an amount less than the jurisdictional minimum amount in controversy is erroneous. n70 However, a defendant is entitled to remain in federal court on removal, despite a contrary amount claimed by the plaintiff, if the defendant can show that the preponderance of evidence shows that the claim has a value worth more than the complaint amount. For example, a defendant may avoid remand by proving that, under the applicable law, judgments in excess of the demanded amount are more likely than not. n71

[h] Time for Determination of Diversity and Amount in Controversy

For removal purposes, the court must generally determine diversity of citizenship at the time that the action is commenced and again at the time of removal. n72 Furthermore, diversity must be maintained throughout the proceeding, because the addition of a nondiverse party after removal may require remand. n73 The Supreme Court has made a narrow exception to the general rule described above, holding that a district court's failure to grant the plaintiff's motion to remand a case improperly removed on diversity grounds is not fatal to the adjudication of the case, provided that federal jurisdictional requirements are satisfied by the time the judgment is entered. n74 With respect to the requirement that the amount in controversy must exceed $75,000, the amount must be determined based on the plaintiff's complaint at the time that the notice of removal is filed. n75

A case that is not removable based on the plaintiff's initial pleading may become removable if the plaintiff takes some voluntary action that changes the nonremovable status of the case, such as by dismissing a nondiverse defendant. n76 For example, an action becomes removable when the plaintiff voluntarily settles the claim against the only nondiverse defendant and amends the complaint accordingly. n77 In this regard, even if a case as stated in an initial pleading is not removable, it becomes removable if the defendant subsequently receives notice of an amended pleading, motion, or other paper which makes apparent that the case has become removable, provided that the defendant files a notice of removal within 30 days of receipt of such paper. n78 As a practical matter, the effect of the statute is that successive attempts at removal are permissible when the grounds for removal become apparent only later in the litigation, such as after initial discovery. n79 If a defendant has not developed enough information to meet its burden for removal within the 30 day initial period after the filing in state court, the defendant's right to remove is preserved in the event the plaintiff later reveals that it is making a federal claim. n80

However, for diversity jurisdiction cases, there are two limitations to this rule. First, a case may not be removed more than one year after commencement of the action in state court, n81 except for interstate class actions covered by the Class Action Fairness Act. n82 Second, under the "voluntary involuntary rule," when a case is not removable at the time it is filed, but becomes facially removable at a later date because of the dismissal of a non diverse defendant, removal is authorized only if diversity results from a voluntary act of the plaintiff, and not by a defending party. n83

[4] Removal Jurisdiction on Separate and Independent Claims

Whenever a separate and independent claim based on federal question jurisdiction n1 is joined with additional otherwise nonremovable claims or causes of action, the entire case may be removed. n2 Removal of an "entire case" means that all of the claims filed in the state court, including both state law claims and federal law claims, may be heard in the federal court after removal. n3 The district court then has the discretion to either determine all the claims in the removed case or remand any claims in which state law predominates. n4 It is important to note that this authority for removal is expressly limited to cases in which the separate and independent claim forming the basis for removal is a federal question claim, and does not apply to diversity jurisdiction claims. n5

A claim is "separate and independent" from other nonremovable claims if it arose from a different set of acts or omissions, or if it resulted in a different type of harm to the plaintiff. If the plaintiff has incurred only a single type harm which arose from an interrelated series of transactions, there is no separate and independent claim. n6 This means that to be "separate and independent" from the main action the claim (1) must be susceptible of adjudication separate and apart from claims raised in the main action; and (2) could have originally been brought in federal court. n7 In the application of this provision regarding the remand of state-dominated claims, the focus is on the composition of individual claims. Thus the court may remand any one or more claim in which state law predominates, and retain jurisdiction of all the other claims. n8

CHAPTER 8 REMOVAL FROM STATE COURTS
PART II. RIGHT TO REMOVAL JURISDICTION UNDER GENERAL REMOVAL STATUTE

1-8 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 8.22

§ 8.22 Defendants Only Entitled to Remove Actionn*

[1] Option of Defendant to Remove

The general removal statute provides for removal by the defendant or the defendants, n1 and the procedure set forth in the statute requires a defendant or defendants to file a notice of removal. n2 Consequently, only a "defendant" or "defendants" are entitled to removal under the statute; no statutory provision permits plaintiffs to remove an action. n3 In restricting the right of removal to those who have no choice in the original selection of a forum. n4 This interpretation coincides with the general purposes of removal jurisdiction which is to allow the defendant an opportunity to initiate removal from state court to federal district court for the district in which the state court action is pending. n5

The plaintiff is generally not entitled to removal, because the removal jurisdiction of federal courts is entirely a creature of statute and is strictly construed. n6 Thus, a plaintiff who originally chose state court jurisdiction when filing the complaint may not subsequently remove the action to federal court, even if a counterclaim would treat the plaintiff as a defendant under state law. n7 Special removal statutes, however, based on either the nature of a party or a specific type of action, may permit plaintiffs to remove actions. For example, federal corporations such as the Resolution Trust Corporation and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporations may remove counterclaims filed against those entities. n8 In a similar way, any party may remove a bankruptcy claim or cause of action, provided that the federal district court has jurisdiction over the case. n9

[2] Determination of Status of Defendant

The determination whether a party is a defendant is controlled by federal law, which thus prevails over a state court's characterization of the parties or alignment of the parties. n1 As used in the general removal statute, n2 the word "defendant" means the person aligned opposite the original plaintiff. Thus, a party who was not a defendant in the plaintiff's original suit will generally not be recharacterized as a "defendant" by reason of the filing of later claims against that party in answers, third-party complaints, or claims in intervention. Furthermore, as a general rule, parties may not remove based on such multiple party claims. n3 Similarly, a non-party, even one that claims to be a real party in interest, may not remove or participate in the removal of a case. n4

In determining whether a party is a "defendant," the federal courts apply a functional test. Under the test, courts are not required to look solely to the party which initiates a claim but, instead, must determine which party is attempting to achieve a particular result and which party is resisting that party's claims. n5 For example, if the plaintiff brings an action in state court, but the action has been brought for only some secondary purpose, such as to seek discovery, and the defendant files a counterclaim that is within federal jurisdiction, the plaintiff may remove the action on the theory that the counterclaim is the actual initiation, or mainspring, of the action. n6

Subject to this functionality test, a plaintiff may generally not remove an action based on a counterclaim, even if the plaintiff would be characterized as a defendant under state law. n7 Similarly, a plaintiff defending against a cross-claim by a co-plaintiff is not a "defendant" for removal purposes. Nor is a defendant/third party plaintiff considered a "defendant" for removal purposes, with respect to the original claim. n8 Finally, a plaintiff intervenor may not remove as a "defendant" on the basis of claims it asserts or on the basis of claims asserted against it. n9

[3] All Defendants Must Join in Removal

[a] Defendants Required to Join

Because of the statutory phrase "may be removed by the defendant or defendants," n1 courts have consistently held that when there are multiple defendants in the state court action, the right of removal under the general removal statute is jointly held by all of the defendants, and removal is precluded if one of the defendants does not join in the notice. n2 However, joinder for removal purposes does not mean formal joinder under the federal rules; rather it means consent to the removal, which should be accomplished by an unequivocal written consent directed to the court where the notice of removal is filed. n3 If a notice of removal is filed by fewer than all the named defendants, the petition is defective if it fails to explain the absence or nonjoinder of a codefendant. n4 For example, it has been held that the joining requirement is not satisfied when the agreement to join is filed after the Section 1446(b) 30-day period, even when the delay is based on mistake. n5 The Supreme Court rejected such strict formalities, however, when it held that a defect in subject matter jurisdiction cured prior to entry of judgment did not warrant reversal or remand to state court. n6

All defendants are not required to sign the notice of removal. Defendants who do not sign the notice should submit a written statement to the court stating that they agree to the removal; it is insufficient for the removal notice to state that the codefendants do not oppose removal. n7

There are exceptions to the rule requiring joinder of all defendants. First, the rule of unanimity applies only to the general removal statute and is not required by all of the special removal statutes. n8 Second, because nominal or formal parties are neither necessary nor indispensable, they are not required to join in the notice. n9 For example, persons named as defendants by the plaintiff solely to prevent removal need not join in the removal. n10 Whether a defendant is a nominal party depends on the facts of each case, and the determination typically depends on whether the defendant's role in the lawsuit is that of a depository or stakeholder. n11

Additionally, any defendant that was not served with state court process need not join in the notice of removal. Thus, the rule requiring joinder has been held by some courts to apply only to properly joined and served defendants. n12 This rule appears correct in view of a Supreme Court case holding that a defendant may not be required to take any action in a civil case until proper service has been made. This holding suggests that no procedural burden may be imposed on a defendant unless proper service has been made, including a requirement that the defendant be forced to consider whether to join in the notice of removal. n13

[b] Effect of Failure of All Required Defendants to Join

Because the right of removal is jointly held by all the defendants, the failure of one defendant to join in the notice of removal generally precludes removal. n14 The failure of all defendants to join in the removal notice constitutes a procedural defect rather than a jurisdictional defect; n15 therefore, if the defect is not objected to within 30 days, most courts hold that the plaintiff has waived the defect. n16 Furthermore, the existence of subject matter jurisdiction at the time of judgment ordinarily cures any defect in removal procedure. n17 When the trial court's judgment must be reversed on the merits and the case remanded to the trial court for further proceedings, the rationale of efficiency, judicial economy, and the interest in finality of judgments that underlies that rule does not apply, and the case should be remanded to state court. n18

PART II. RIGHT TO REMOVAL JURISDICTION UNDER GENERAL REMOVAL STATUTE

1-8 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 8.23

§ 8.23 Only Civil Actions Originally Filed in State Court Qualify for Removaln*

[1] Nature of Required State Court Proceeding

Under the general removal statute, n1 a defendant may remove to federal court only actions originally filed and pending in a "state court." n2 The term "state court" has a uniform meaning for all provisions of the general removal statute. The statute provides that the term "state court" includes the superior court of the District of Columbia, and the term "state" includes the District of Columbia. n3

Whether a particular state tribunal is a state court for removal purposes depends on the tribunal's function, not on the name of the tribunal. n4 For example, if a tribunal is labeled as an administrative board, but the proceeding before it is judicial in nature, such as a contract action, the proceeding is removable as one from a state court. n5 On the other hand, if the body does not have the attributes of a court and is performing an administrative function in the case, it may not be considered a state court under the federal removal statute. Judicial attributes of a court include disinterestedness, separation from the executive, and legal acumen. n6 Whether the court has limited or general jurisdiction is irrelevant to the question of whether a state judicial body is a state court for removal purposes. For example, a justice of the peace court is a state court. n7 The courts have consistently held that the court must have some connection to a state, however, and the term "state court" must be interpreted strictly and does not mean any and all nonfederal trial courts. n8

[2] Nature of Required Civil Action

A defendant may remove to federal court only those actions that are "civil actions." n1 The term "civil action" as used for removal purposes means a civil lawsuit, as opposed to an administrative body determination that is only concerned with making rules or policy. n2 The characteristics of a civil suit are that the body may provide or deny relief to the litigants, such as make an award of damages or provide equitable relief such as the issuance of an injunction. n3 Federal and not state law determines whether a state court action is a "civil action" within the meaning of the general removal jurisdiction statute. n4 The term "civil action" does not include proceedings that are supplementary or incidental to another action. n5

CHAPTER 8 REMOVAL FROM STATE COURTS
PART II. RIGHT TO REMOVAL JURISDICTION UNDER GENERAL REMOVAL STATUTE

1-8 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 8.24

§ 8.24 Location of Removaln*

A civil action in state court may be removed only to the district court of the United States for the district and division embracing the place where the action is pending in the state court. n1 Furthermore, a defendant seeking to remove an action from state court must file a notice of removal in the federal district court for the district and division within which the state action is pending. n2 These statutes are considered venue provisions that specify the proper location for removal of each action. n3 Consequently, the general venue statutes that control venue of actions originally filed in the federal courts n4 have no applicability to removed actions. In other words, whether venue would be proper or improper under the general venue statutes has no bearing on the proper district for removal of an action. n5 On removal, however, any party may seek a transfer under the change of venue statutes. n6

Removal of a case to the wrong district court is a procedural defect that does not deprive the district court of subject matter jurisdiction, and the court may make orders regarding the case if there is no objection from the plaintiff. n7 When the case is removed to the wrong district or division, the federal court may either dismiss the case or transfer the case to the proper federal district. n8 Even in cases when removal has been made to the proper district, a case may be transferred to another district for the convenience of the parties and the witnesses. n9

PART III. REMOVAL JURISDICTION PURSUANT TO SPECIAL REMOVAL STATUTES

1-8 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 8.40

§ 8.40 In Generaln*

Depending on the type of case, or the defendant in the case, removal to federal court is not always based on the general removal statute, Section 1141. There are several special removal statutes authorizing removal in particular situations that are not dependent on the federal court having original jurisdiction. Certain civil rights actions commenced in a state court, for example, may be removed by the defendant to the federal district court for the district and division embracing the place where the action is pending. n1

The primary significance of the special removal statutes is that when a particular requirement of the special removal statute is met, it is not necessary that the requirements of the general removal statute be met. If the person requesting removal qualifies as a "federal officer" under Section 1442, n2 for example, it is irrelevant whether the person qualifies as a "defendant" under the general removal statute, n3 Section 1441(a). n4 Another important distinction is that, while the general removal statute is strictly construed against removal, strict construction does not apply to special removal statutes because for such statutes Congress has created special removal rights to channel cases into federal court. n5

Part III of this chapter will point out the differences in the requirements for the special removal statute and the general removal statute. As an example, the federal statute that grants the court discretion to award costs and expenses incurred in opposing an improper removal applies only to actions removed pursuant to the general removal statute, not to lawsuits removed under the special removal statute based on a party's filing of petition for bankruptcy relief. n6

The discussion in this Part summarizes the removal requirements for the more frequently litigated special removal statutes. for a complete discussion of all special removal statutes, see 16 Moore's Federal Practice, § 107.15 (Matthew Bender 3d ed.).

1-8 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 8.41

§ 8.41 Claims Related to Bankruptcyn*

[1] Right to Remove of Claims Related to Bankruptcy

If the district court has jurisdiction over a claim or cause of action under the bankruptcy jurisdictional statute, n1 any party may generally remove any other civil action claim in the state court that is related to bankruptcy to the district court for the district in which the civil action is pending. n2 Unlike the general removal statute, which authorizes only defendants to remove, n3 the bankruptcy removal statute authorizes any party to remove. n4

The federal district court has nonexclusive jurisdiction over civil proceedings that arise under the Bankruptcy Code, or arise in or are related to cases under the Bankruptcy Code. n5 The question of whether a case arises under the bankruptcy jurisdiction statute n6 is analogous to the arising under language of the general "federal question" jurisdiction statute. n7 Consequently, the court in a bankruptcy jurisdiction determinations may draw freely from authorities discussing the circumstances under which a case arises under federal law as a federal question. n8

Under the removal statute, a court has bankruptcy removal jurisdiction whether the claim is a bankruptcy core proceeding claim, which is a claim that directly arises under or in a bankruptcy claim, or is merely a claim related to bankruptcy under Title 11. n9 Courts have traditionally broadly defined when an action involves a claim related to bankruptcy under Title 11. n10 An action involves a claim related to bankruptcy under Title 11 whenever the outcome of the lawsuit could conceivably have an effect on an estate being administered in bankruptcy. n11

Although the claim that provides the basis for removal does not need to be against the debtor or the property in the debtor's estate, removal must be supported by a description of the manner in which the claim may have an impact on the estate, and not just on the debtor. n12 State law claims against the bankruptcy trustee and the trustee's agents, for example, that are first asserted after the notice of removal are related to conduct inextricably intertwined with the trustee's sale of property belonging to the bankruptcy estate; thus, they constitute core proceedings subject to federal jurisdiction and removal jurisdiction. n13

It should be noted that bankruptcy removal jurisdiction is subject to the well-pleaded complaint rule, which requires that the basis of federal jurisdiction be perceivable from matters alleged in the complaint. n14

If bankruptcy related claims have been removed to federal court, and the underlying bankruptcy case is dismissed after removal, the court has discretion to retain or remand the related claims. Typically, these related claims are remanded. n15 It has been held by some courts, however, that when the underlying bankruptcy case is dismissed, the removal court no longer has jurisdiction, and the related claims must be remanded to state court. n16

[2] Exceptions Regarding Removal of Claims Related to Bankruptcy

There are two exceptions to the rule permitting removal of claims related to bankruptcy described in [1], above. First, the rule does not apply to a proceeding before the United States Tax Court, or to a civil action by a governmental unit to enforce that unit's police or regulatory power. n1 Second, the federal court must abstain from exercising its jurisdiction, on timely motion by any party, if all four of the following are shown: n2

1. The state court action is based on a state law claim.

2. That claim is a claim related to bankruptcy proceeding but (1) is not a bankruptcy core proceeding and (2) does not arise in a bankruptcy core proceeding. n3

3. The federal courts would not have jurisdiction but for the bankruptcy claim.

4. The matter may be adjudicated in a timely manner in a state court of appropriate jurisdiction.

If all requirements are met, abstention is mandatory, and therefore the federal court lacks removal jurisdiction and must remand the removed case. n4 For example, judicial foreclosure proceedings filed in state court on property in a bankruptcy estate are not core proceedings; these proceedings, although related to bankruptcy, must be remanded under the mandatory abstention rule. n5 If the district court determines that a case must be remanded because it is subject to mandatory abstention as a non-core proceeding, the bankruptcy court still has the power to determine whether to deny relief from the automatic stay provisions of the bankruptcy code. n6

If abstention is not mandatory, the federal court has discretion to abstain in the interest of justice, or in the interest of comity with state courts or respect for state law.

[3] Requirements Regarding Notice of Removal

[a] Contents of Notice of Removal

The party that is initiating the bankruptcy removal must file a verified notice in the bankruptcy court in the district where the civil action is pending. The notice must contain the following: n1

1. A short, plain statement of the facts that entitle the party to remove.

2. A statement of whether the proceeding is a core or non-core proceeding; if the proceeding is merely related to bankruptcy, rather that a bankruptcy core proceeding, whether the applicant consents to the entry of final orders by the bankruptcy judge.

3. A copy of all process and pleadings in the action. Promptly after filing the notice with the district court, the party initialing removal must serve a copy of the notice on all parties and on the state court. n2

[b] Deadline for Filing Notice of Removal

The time for filing a removal notice depends on whether the bankruptcy or the related civil action was filed first. If the bankruptcy action was filed first, the notice must be filed before the earlier of (1) 30 days after receipt of the initial pleading that contains the civil claim or cause of action that is the subject of the removal; or (2) 30 days after receipt of the summons, if the initial pleading was filed with the court but not served with the summons. n3 If the civil action was filed first, the notice must be filed before the latest of (1) 90 days after the order for relief in the bankruptcy action; (2) 30 days after the order terminating the stay, providing that the civil action was stayed under the Bankruptcy Code; or (3) in a Chapter 11 reorganization, 30 days after a trustee is qualified, but no more than 180 days after the order for relief. n4

[c] Response Permitted to Notice of Removal

Any party, other than the removing party, who has filed a pleading regarding the removed claim or cause of action must file a verified statement within 7 days of the filing of the removal notice with the district court. n5 The statement must (1) admit or deny any allegation in the removal notice as to whether the proceeding is core or non core, and (2) give or withhold consent to the entry of final orders by the bankruptcy judge in non-core proceedings. n6

[4] Discretionary Remand of Claims Related to Bankruptcy

After removal, the district court sitting in bankruptcy has considerable discretion to remand the removed claim or cause of action based on any equitable ground. n1 Furthermore, a federal court has discretion to abstain from hearing the claims and remanding in the interest of justice, or in the interest of comity with state courts or respect for state law. n2 There are many equitable factors that a court may consider in its determination of whether to remand. These factors are based on matters that indicate what is reasonable, fair, or appropriate, n3 and include: to remand include whether remand would prevent duplication or expensive use of judicial resources; the effect of the remand on the administration of the bankruptcy estate; whether the case involves questions of state law better addressed by a state court; comity; efficient utilization of judicial resources; prejudice to involuntarily removed parties; the effect of bifurcating the action, including whether remand will increase or decrease the possibility of inconsistent results; the predominance of state law issues and non-debtor parties; and the expertise of the court in which the action originated. n4 Any party may make a motion for remand to the bankruptcy court. n5 An order granting or denying remand based on bankruptcy removal is not reviewable by appeal or in any other manner. n6

PART III. REMOVAL JURISDICTION PURSUANT TO SPECIAL REMOVAL STATUTES

1-8 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 8.42

§ 8.42 Civil Rights Claimsn*

[1] Nature of Civil Rights Removal

The civil rights special removal statute provides for removal of two types of cases: (1) a civil or criminal case in a state court against a defendant who is denied or cannot enforce in the courts of the state a right under any law providing for the equal civil rights of a United States citizen; n1 (2) a civil or criminal case in a state court against a defendant based on an alleged act of the defendant under color of authority derived from any law providing for equal rights, or for refusing to do any act on the ground that it would be inconsistent with such an equal rights law. n2

Removal under the special civil rights removal statute was specifically designed to protect persons against state actions instituted to hamper the enforcement of federal civil rights laws. n3 Thus, removal under Section 1443(2) was enacted to provide a federal forum only to state officers who uphold equal protection rights in the face of strong local disapproval. n4 Consequently, removal under the statute is strictly limited to the two types of cases described in the statute. When a complaint underlying a state court action alleges other violations of rights under any federal civil rights laws, however, the defendant still has the option to remove the case under the general removal statute, based on federal question jurisdiction. n5

[2] Cases Against Defendant Who is Denied or Cannot Enforce Civil Rights

A defendant that alleges that he or she has been denied or cannot enforce his or her civil rights in state court under a law providing for the equal rights for United States citizens or persons under United States jurisdiction may remove a state criminal or civil action to the federal district court for the district and division embracing the place where the action is pending. n1 It should be noted that this right of removal is quite restricted. To support removal, the defendant must satisfy a two part test, showing that (1) the right allegedly denied the defendant arises under a federal law providing for specific civil rights stated in terms of racial equality, and (2) the defendant is denied or cannot enforce the specified federal rights in the state court. n2 In other words, it must be apparent that a defendant's civil rights will inevitably be denied by virtue of the defendant's trial in state court, and the civil rights law relied on must be construed to mean a law providing for specific civil rights stated in terms of racial equality. n3 Furthermore, removal is unavailable if the defendant did not rely on the federal civil rights law in performing the act, or if the defendant's conduct is not protected by the federal law. n4

[3] Acts Under Color of Authority Derived From Civil Rights Laws

If a case in state court alleges that a defendant has performed acts under color of authority derived from any civil rights laws, or with refusing to perform an act because it would be inconsistent with civil rights laws, the defendant may remove the state action to the federal district court for the district and division embracing the place where the action is pending. n1 This removal authority is distinct from actions to enforce civil rights n2 because its purpose is to protect officers who are attempting to uphold equal protection rights in the face of strong local disapproval n3 and state actions instituted to hamper the enforcement of federal civil rights laws. n4 Section 1443(2) applies only to federal officers or agents performing their duties under federal civil rights laws, as well as to persons authorized to assist them in affirmatively executing those duties. If the defendant is sued for refusing to act, the section also applies to state officers and those authorized to act under them. n5 Both Section 1443(1) and Section 1443(2), however, are limited to federal laws providing civil rights defined in terms of racial equality. n6

PART II Jurisdiction; Venue; Removal
CHAPTER 8 REMOVAL FROM STATE COURTS
PART III. REMOVAL JURISDICTION PURSUANT TO SPECIAL REMOVAL STATUTES

1-8 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 8.43

§ 8.43 United States, Agency, or Officern*

[1] United States Entities and Officers Are Entitled to Removal

The United States, any federal agency, and any officer of the United States or of any federal agency may remove a state civil action or a state prosecution brought against such a defendant. n1 The special removal statute for federal agencies and officers is broader than the general removal statute n2 in two primary ways: first, under the special removal provision, both civil and criminal actions may be removed; and second, there is no requirement that the state action be one that could have been originally filed in the federal courts. n3

The purpose of providing the right of removal to federal entities and agencies, officers of entities and agencies, and those acting under federal officers is primarily to provide them with the protection of a federal forum which is capable of evaluating the complexities of federal officer immunity. Removal also ensures a trial free of any local prejudice against the federal government and its officers. n4 The statute also permits the removal of those actions commenced in state court that could expose a federal official to potential civil liability or criminal penalty for an act performed in an official federal capacity. n5

The removal authority under this provision is available to the United States, any federal agency, any officer of the United States or of a federal agency, and any person acting under such an officer. n6 The right to remove may be exercised in any case in which such agency, officer, or person is sued in an official or individual capacity for any act committed under the color of office or on account of any right, title, or authority claimed under any federal legislation for the apprehension or punishment of criminals or the collection of revenue. n7 The removal authority also extends to a property holder whose title is derived from any federal officer, provided that the state court suit affects the validity of a federal law; n8 any officer of the courts of the United States for any act under color of office; n9 and any officer of Congress for any act in the discharge of the officer's official duty. n10 A court-appointed bankruptcy trustee is considered an officer of the court for removal purposes. n11

With respect to United States officers, Section 1442 requires neither a prior determination of the defendant's employment status as a United States employee by the Executive Branch nor an appearance by the United States Attorney General for a proper removal. Rather, Section 1442 allows direct removal by any person who is in fact an officer of the United States and who was acting under color of such office, provided the removal is based on a plausible federal defense, such as a substantive immunity defense. n12 This rule is in contrast with some specialty federal removal statutes that provide removal for federal employees, such as the Federally Supported Health Centers Assistance Act, which predicates removal on either an affirmative deeming by the Secretary that the defendant is a federal employee, or the United States Attorney General's failure to appear in the state court case. n13

Under the federal officer removal statute, the entire case is removed to federal court provided that the defendant or some defendants qualify, even if the action involves other defendants that are not "federal agencies or officers," and not otherwise eligible to remove the case. n14 When federal agency or officer removal is proper, the district court generally has discretion to retain jurisdiction and adjudicate the case, even if the federal agency or officer is dismissed. n15 The court will usually exercise its discretion in such circumstances to remand the case to the state court in the absence of compelling reasons to retain the state claims. n16

[2] Persons Acting Under Federal Officers Entitled to Remove

Any person acting under an officer of the United States or of a federal agency may remove a state civil action or a state prosecution against the person for any act committed under color of office. n1 To remove, the person must (1) establish that he or she was acting under the direction of a federal officer, (2) raise a plausible federal defense to the plaintiff's claims, and (3) show a causal nexus between the plaintiff's claims and the acts performed under color of office. n2 This right of removal applies whether the person is sued in an official capacity or in an individual capacity. n3 It is not necessary for removal that the person acting under the federal officer have an employment relationship with the United States, nor that the Attorney General appear in the case. Rather, Section 1442 allows direct removal by any person if the person shows that he or she is in fact acting under an officer of the United States for any act under color of that office, n4 and that the removal is based on some plausible federal defense, such as a substantive immunity defense. n5

The relevant relationship necessary for removal is that of a private person "acting under" a federal officer or agency. The private person must be engaged in some conduct that is lawfully assisting the federal officer in the performance of his or her official duty. Consequently, the fact that a federal regulatory agency closely directs, supervises, and monitors a company's activities in considerable detail does not bring that company within the scope of the relationship required by the statute, and does not permit removal. n6

[3] Requirements for Defendant to Remove

[a] Defendant Must Raise Federal Defense

To qualify for removal, federal officers, federal agencies, and persons acting under federal officers must raise a plausible federal defense to the action that has been filed in state court. The federal agency's or officer's substantive immunity defense or other plausible defense arising under federal law provides the constitutional basis for removal jurisdiction when the civil or criminal case against the defendant rests on state law. n1 Therefore, a state court suit raising only state law claims against a federal officer or agency is not removable unless the officer asserts some plausible federal defense. Once a defendant raises a plausible federal defense, removal is appropriate so that the federal court may resolve that defense. n2

In construing the plausible federal defense requirement, the Supreme Court has expressly rejected a narrow interpretation of the statute, recognizing that one of the most important reasons for removal is to have the validity of the defense of official immunity tried in a federal court. Therefore, federal officers need not prove their case regarding a defense before their case is removed. To establish removability, the claim to a federal defense must be colorable but not necessarily ultimately successful on the merits. n3

[b] Defendant's Act Performed Under Color of Law

To qualify a claim for removal, the federal officer must show that the case involves acts committed by the officer, or the person acting for the officer, under color of office. n4 The "under color of office" component requires that the conduct or omission complained of by the plaintiff must have been taken under asserted official federal authority to enforce federal law, n5 and that there be a causal connection between that act and the state lawsuit. The officer need not prove the case but must only show some causal connection. n6

When a defendant federal official removes a state action, the notice of removal must be clear, specific, and positive in alleging the facts providing the bases for removal. This does not mean that the officer must admit the conduct charged by the plaintiff; however, merely alleging that he or she was acting under color of office is insufficient. Therefore, the officer has the burden of alleging that the facts complained of are related to the officer's official duties, and the specificity required depends on whether the removed case is a civil case or criminal case. n7

[4] Federal Jurisdiction Derivative of State Court Jurisdiction

The statutory authorization for removal by federal agencies and officers is independent of general removal jurisdiction and does not require that the federal court have original federal jurisdiction apart from the statute. n1 This removal jurisdiction is derivative of the state court jurisdiction. n2 This means that if the state court lacks jurisdiction, the federal court should dismiss the action against the federal agency or officer n3 and remand any other claims against other defendants. n4 In such circumstances, the federal courts are required to dismiss the claims against the federal officials, rather than remand to the state court and require the officials to move to dismiss there. n5 Additionally, the federal courts refuse to provide relief that the state court could not have provided. n6

§ 8.44 Members of Armed Forcesn*

A member of the armed forces may remove a case based on acts committed under color of office or concerning which he or she claims any right, title, or authority under federal law respecting the armed forces or under the law of war. n1 For example, it was held that a member of the armed services was acting under federal authority when ordered to drive a military truck in a convoy and given specific orders as to route, destination, and time of arrival. n2 On the other hand, if the service person was not driving under direct authority of the military there would be no removal allowed for an action arising from automobile collision. n3 The scope of removal jurisdiction applicable to members of the armed forces is closely analogous to that applicable to federal officers; for discussion of the scope of removal applied to such federal personnel, see § 8.43.

1-8 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 8.45

§ 8.45 Foreign Statesn1

Ordinarily, because of the principle of sovereign immunity, a private person may not maintain a lawsuit against a foreign state in either state or federal court. However, the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act of 1976 (FSIA) n2 provides exceptions to sovereign immunity in certain cases, including cases in which rights in property taken in violation of international law are in dispute. No action may be maintained in any district court against a foreign state unless the court determines that one of the exceptions applies. n3 For these excepted case, the FSIA grants federal courts jurisdiction over civil actions against foreign states and contains removal provisions allowing a foreign state defendant to remove a state court action to federal court. n4

A foreign state may remove any civil action brought in a state court against the foreign state to the district court for the district and division embracing the location where the action is pending. n5 The foreign state defendant may remove to federal court regardless of whether any other defendant in the case wants to remain in state court--removal by a foreign state encompasses the entire action, including claims not otherwise removable. n6 After removal, the action must be tried without a jury, n7 even if a right to a jury trial existed in state court. n8

For purposes of this removal provision, an "agency or instrumentality of a foreign state" is also entitled to removal, n9 and includes any entity that (1) is a separate legal person, corporate or otherwise, (2) is an organ of the foreign state or political subdivision, or a majority of whose shares or other ownership interest is owned by the foreign state or political subdivision thereof, and (3) is neither a citizen of a U.S. state nor created under the laws of any third country. n10 For purposes of this definition, the Supreme Court has held that a corporation is an "instrumentality of a foreign state" only if the foreign state has a majority ownership in the corporation; the degree of control that the foreign state has over the foreign corporation is immaterial for the determination of instrumentality status. The Supreme Court also held that instrumentality status must be determined at the time suit is filed. n11

The foreign state removal statute also provides that a defendant who is the alter ego of a foreign country is entitled to remove an action filed against the defendant in state court. n12 The alter ego doctrine provides generally that one entity is deemed to actually take on the identity of another entity when there is such unity between the first and second entities that the separateness of the two has ceased. n13 A defendant entity is deemed the alter ego of a foreign country for purposes of the removal statute when, at the time of the initiation of the suit, the defendant was performing acts normally within the exclusive province of the foreign country, and the foreign country had a direct financial interest in the defendant. n14

When a defendant is initiating removal based on this special removal statute, the 30-day limitation for filing a notice of removal n15 may be extended for cause shown. n16 Factors to be evaluated include the purpose of the removal statute, the extent of any prior activity of the defendant in state court, likelihood of prejudice to the parties, and the relative equitable circumstances. n17

§ 8.46 Foreclosure Against United Statesn*

If a private party brings an action in state court that requests quiet title to, foreclosure of a mortgage or other lien on, or partition or condemnation of real or personal property on which the United States claims a mortgage or other lien, the United States may remove the action to federal court. n1 The United States must specifically invoke this statutory authorization for removal in the notice of removal. n2 If the action on the claimed mortgage or lien involves multiple defendants, the United States may seek removal without the consent or joinder of the other defendants. n3 Furthermore, provided that the United States claims a mortgage or lien in the property, such as a tax lien, the United States is entitled to removal regardless of the procedural posture of the case in state court. The United States may remove even if it is not a named defendant, for example, if the case is in state court on an interpleader action by a private party to determine the proper distribution of a surplus pool of money that had been obtained after a foreclosure on a piece of property. n4

PART III. REMOVAL JURISDICTION PURSUANT TO SPECIAL REMOVAL STATUTES

1-8 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 8.47

§ 8.47 Interstate Class Actions May Be Removed to Federal Court Under Class Action Fairness Act

[1] Applicability of Act for Removal From State Court

[a] Removal of Class Actions That Are Not Covered by Class Action Fairness Act

Even before the Class Action Fairness Act of 2005 (the Act) n1 was enacted, a defendant could remove an action from state court to federal court if the action could have been brought in federal court originally, n2 that is, if the defendant could establish the requisite federal question jurisdiction n3 or diversity jurisdiction. n4 Furthermore, removal of class actions has been governed by the same procedures applicable to other civil actions. n5 These provisions are still applicable for removal of a class action that does not meet the jurisdictional requirements of the Act, which are discussed in Ch. 14A, Class Actions; Derivative Actions.

[b] Removal of Class Actions That Are Subject to Class Action Fairness Act

The Class Action Fairness Act of 2005 n6 became effective for class actions commenced on or after the date of its enactment, February 18, 2005, n7 which was February 18, 2005. It has been held that the term "commenced" means the initial filing of an action in either a state or federal court. Consequently, if an action is filed in a state court prior to February 18, 2005, the provisions of the Act do not apply, even if the action is refiled or removed to federal court after that date. n8 However, the courts are not in agreement whether an amendment to a pleading made after February 18, 2005, brings the claim within the Act, and therefore allows a defending party to remove based on the Act. The courts have taken three positions for such amendments filed after the effective date of the Act, when the original pleading date was prior to the effective date: (1) an amendment does not affect the pre-Act "commencement" date of the case; (2) the amendment affects the "commencement" date (and thus makes the Act applicable) only if the amendment does not relate back to the time of the original filing; or (3) the amendment affects the "commencement" date (and thus makes the Act applicable) if it either does not relate back or if it adds new defendants to the case. n8.1

The Act has made it easier to remove class actions from state to federal court in two ways. First, the Act makes it easier to establish diversity of citizenship subject matter jurisdiction over class actions, n9 which is a necessity before a defendant may remove a class action under the Act. n10 Second, the Act has made several modifications to the removal procedures themselves that apply particularly to class actions. n11

These new removal provisions under the Act apply generally to any "class action," which is any civil action filed under Rule 23 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, or filed under a similar state statute or rule of judicial procedure authorizing an action to be brought by one or more representative persons as a class action. n12 The Act specifically excludes certain types of class actions from its removal provisions, however. For instance, the special removal provisions do not apply to certain actions related to securities, intracorporate and business organizations, or the internal affairs or governance of a corporation or other form of business enterprise that arise under or by virtue of the laws of the state in which the corporation or business enterprise is incorporated or organized. n13

[c] Class Action Fairness Act Removal Provisions Apply to Mass Actions

In addition to class actions under Rule 23 and state law, n14 the Class Action Fairness Act provides that the new removal provisions under the Act also apply to any "mass actions," which are considered to be class actions for purposes of the act and are removable in the same manner as a true class action. n15 A "mass action" is any civil action, other than a class action, in which monetary relief claims of 100 or more persons are proposed to be tried jointly on the ground that the plaintiffs' claims involve common questions of law or fact. n16 Whether an action qualifies as a "mass action" is determined as of the time that it is properly removed under all of the jurisdictional requirements. The fact that individual remands to state court bring the action below the 100 plaintiff or $5 million monetary threshold does not deprive the court of mass action jurisdiction. n16.1 Any mass action that is removed to federal court under the provisions of the Act may not later be transferred to another court for consolidated pretrial procedures under Title 28 Section 1407, unless a majority of the plaintiffs in the action request transfer. n17 This anti-transfer provision applies only to mass actions, not to certified class actions or actions proposed for certification. n18

[2] Defendant's Local Citizenship Does Not Preclude Removal

In the ordinary class action that is not subject to the special procedural provisions of the Class Action Fairness Act, the defendants may remove the action from state court to federal court on the basis of diversity of citizenship only if none of the defendants is a citizen of the state in which the action was originally brought. n19 This restriction has been removed with respect to class actions governed by the Class Action Fairness Act, which may be removed to state court without regard to whether any defendant is a citizen of the state in which the action is brought. n20

[3] Any Lone Defendant May Remove Class Action

Class actions covered by the Class Action Fairness Act may be removed by any defendant without the consent of the other defendants. n21 In ordinary class actions not subject to the special procedural provisions of the Class Action Fairness Act, all of the defendants must join in the notice of removal or the case is not removable. n22

[4] One Year Statute of Limitations on Removal Does Not Apply Under the Act

The procedure for removing a class action under the Class Action Fairness Act is essentially the same as for other class actions, but the one-year absolute limitation on removal does not apply. n23 The elimination of the one-year limitation period means that if a class action becomes removable at the later stages of an action, the defendant may still remove the action. Under the proper circumstances, a defendant may remove the action at any time, even several years after commencement, provided that notice of removal is filed within 30 days after receipt of a pleading or other paper from which the defendant first may determine that the action has become removable. n24

[5] Accelerated Appellate Review Available If Court Remands Removed Class Action to State Court

[a] Remand Order is Appealable

If a class action is governed by the Class Action Fairness Act, a court of appeals has discretion to consider an appeal from an order of a district court which either grants or denies a motion to remand if the defendant makes application to the court of appeals not more than 10 days after entry of the order. n25 In the exercise of its discretion, the court should consider the following factors, which weigh in favor of immediate appeal: the issue is related to an important question regarding the Class Action Fairness Act; the issue presented is unsettled; the issue is consequential to the resolution of the particular case; the issue arises from a decision or order that is sufficiently final to allow intelligent review of the issue; and the balance of relevant harms weighs in favor of the grant of immediate review. n26

If the court of appeals accepts an appeal of a remand order, the appellate court must complete all action on the appeal, including rendering judgment, not later than 60 days after the date on which the appeal was filed, unless an extension is granted. n27

[b] Extension of Time for Judgment On Appeal

The court of appeals may extend the 60-day period to render judgment on the appeal in two circumstances. First, if all the parties to the proceeding agree to an extension the court of appeals may extend the 60-day period for any period of time specified in the agreement. n28 Second, if good cause is shown and if it is in the interests of justice, the court of appeals may extend the 60-day period for an additional period of up to 10 days. n29 If the court fails to render a final judgment on the appeal before the end of the 60-day period, or within the specified period of extension, the appeal is denied automatically by the terms of the statute. n30

CHAPTER 8 REMOVAL FROM STATE COURTS
PART IV. PROCEDURES TO EFFECT REMOVAL

1-8 Moore's Manual--Federal Practice and Procedure § 8.60

§ 8.60 Notice Requirementsn*

[1] Notice of Removal

[a] Contents of Notice

A removal does not become effective until proper notice of removal is filed in the federal district court and in the state court where the action is pending, and is served on the adverse parties. n1 The notice of removal must contain a short and plain statement of the grounds for removal. n2 The notice of removal must clearly indicate that the requirements for federal jurisdiction are satisfied. n3 Thus, in a case removed on the basis of diversity jurisdiction, the removal notice must allege complete diversity of citizenship, at the time the case was filed in state court and at the time of removal, n4 and the notice must allege facts showing that the minimum amount in controversy requirement is met. n5 A conclusory allegation in the notice of removal that the jurisdictional amount is satisfied is insufficient to meet the defendant's burden. The defendant must set forth the underlying facts supporting the assertion of the jurisdictional amount. n6 If nondiverse defendants are voluntarily dismissed or abandoned before the filing of the removal notice, however, the notice need only allege diversity as of the filing of the removal notice. n7

In a case removed on the basis of federal question jurisdiction, the removal notice must allege the Constitution, statute, or treaty of the United States that form the basis of federal question jurisdiction, n8 or the federal common-law ground for the federal question jurisdiction, if applicable. n9

Mere technical or typographcal errors do not invalidate a removal notice, provided that it is capable of being understood and contains the required specification of the grounds for removal. Thus, a mistaken citation is not grounds for rejection. n10

[b] Signature Requirement and Written Consent to Removal

The notice of removal must be signed pursuant to Rule 11, n11 which provides that the court may impose sanctions if documents are filed containing statements that are not well grounded in fact and warranted by law. n12 In 1988, the requirement that the removal papers include a verified petition was replaced with the requirement that the notice of removal be signed pursuant to Rule 11. The deterrent effect of the potential for imposition of Rule 11 sanctions was deemed an adequate substitute for the former requirement of verification. n13

Generally, all defendants must join in the notice of removal, n14 unless the defendants (1) are unknown or nominal parties, n15 (2) have been fraudulently joined, or (3) are nonresidents that have not been served at the time of removal. n16 However, a particular removal statute may provide that not all defendants need join in the notice of removal. For example, one statute provides that a defendant with an independent right of removal, such as a federal agency or officer, may remove the entire case without the consent of other defendants. n17

The phrase "join in removal" means that all defendants must agree to removal. This "rule of unanimity," as it is referred to, does not require all of the defendants to sign the notice of removal; however, it does require that each defendant officially and unambiguously consent to the notice of removal. n18 Some courts require written statement of consent. n19 Other courts have held that, provided that at least one defendant files a notice of removal signed pursuant to Rule 11 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, other defendants may join in the removal by expressly consenting to the notice. n20

[c] Notice Must be filed with State Court Documents

The defendant must file with the notice of removal a copy of all process, pleadings, and orders served on the removing defendant in the action. n21 These state court pleadings, orders entered, any discovery completed, and other state court proceeding documents will be presumed valid by the federal district court on removal. n22

[d] Amendment of Notice

The defendant may make any desired amendment to a notice of removal within the 30-day period in which the notice must be filed. Furthermore, a court may allow an amendment after the 30-day period to correct technical defects in the jurisdictional allegations of the notice. However, the court will not allow a party to assert new grounds for removal jurisdiction. For example, a party may not assert diversity jurisdiction in the amendment, after inaccurately asserting federal question jurisdiction in the original notice of removal. n23

[2] Notice to Other Parties and to State Court

Promptly after filing a notice of removal, the defendant or defendants must give written notice of the filing to all adverse parties and must file a copy of the notice of removal with the clerk of the state court where the case was filed. n1 These notice procedures are the final steps necessary to effect the removal of the case; once the state court receives notice that the case has been removed, it may not proceed unless and until the case is remanded. n2
