Article 17 of the National Association of Realtors Code of Ethics provides that a realtor "shall not engage in activities that constitute the unauthorized practice of law and shall recommend that legal counsel be obtained when the interest of any party to the transaction requires it." n9 Courts have held that state licensing agencies may discipline brokers who have engaged in the unauthorized practice of law where adequate evidence of such practice is presented. n10

Although the bulk of authority dealing with the unauthorized practice of law by real estate brokers consists of case law, there are a number of statutes that explicitly refer to real estate brokers and outline their rights. Minnesota's statute, for example, allows a broker to draw papers incident to a sale, trade, lease or loan of property. n11 In Utah, it is provided by statute that brokers may "fill out any documents associated with the closing of a real estate transaction," while sales agents may fill out forms (1) prepared by buyer's or seller's legal counsel, or (2) approved by specified state agencies or, (3) where a necessary form has not been so approved, by any legal counsel. n12 Important to keep in mind, is that even where a broker derives explicit rights by statute, the statute may be struck down by a court as invading the province of the judiciary. n13

The amount of freedom allowed to brokers in the various phases of a real estate transaction to draft documents or to fill in blanks varies greatly from jurisdiction to jurisdiction. Even the most restrictive jurisdictions allow brokers to draft or prepare their own listing agreements. A party to a contract always has the right to draft or complete the instrument that embodies the underlying agreement. n14 The mere filling in of blanks on an offer and acceptance form also seems to be lawful, or at least to be tolerated, virtually everywhere. Litigated claims against brokers based solely upon such conduct have rarely been reported. n15

A broker's act of providing a copy of recorded restrictive covenants affecting a parcel of land does not constitute the unauthorized practice of law. n15.1

The various jurisdictions also generally permit the agent to fill in the blanks of a real estate sales contract, preferably consisting of a form approved by the local bar association, or at least an attorney. n16 That such conduct is approved is not surprising since the sales contract is the consummation of the broker's function: the bringing together of a buyer and seller. Note, however, that a broker must exercise caution when complex legal questions arise prior to the preparation of the offer form or sales contract. Courts have ruled a number of times that the judicial authority generally extended to brokers to fill in contract blanks does not protect brokers where the filling in of blanks requires the application of complex legal knowledge. n17 One court has ruled that a broker's insertion of detailed terms into an offer form constitutes the practice of law where the insertion requires "the exercise of legal expertise." n18 A broker handling a transaction involving complicated legal issues should refer contract-related matters to an attorney. n18.1

A few jurisdictions allow the broker to actually draft the contract of sale. n19 Most do not, however. A broker, n20 or other lay person, n21 who drafts the full text of a real estate contract is generally held to be practicing law. Some courts have ruled that the drafting of contracts in combination with other wrongful conduct constitutes the practice of law. n22 It should be noted that an executed offer form frequently constitutes a binding contract of sale. The offer form may constitute a contract even where the form provides that the parties will, in the future, negotiate and execute a more detailed agreement. n23 For this reason, brokers who are prohibited by local law from drafting contracts, and are not specifically authorized by law to draft offers of purchase, should avoid drafting the latter.

Buyers and sellers frequently rely on their real estate brokers to explain contract provisions and may believe that their brokers will advise them regarding the advantages and disadvantages of certain provisions. This point is illustrated by Snyder v. Lovercheck n23.1 where the Supreme Court of Wyoming addressed the duty of a buyer's broker to advise the buyer of the presence of and failure to strike a disclaimer clause in a sales contract. The buyer had asserted that his broker's failure to so advise and strike the disclaimer clause constituted an actionable breach of duty. The court relied upon a Wyoming statute which provides that "[f]ailing to advise the buyer and seller of all terms of the proposed sale at the time an offer is presented including estimated discounts and closing costs" is a breach of the broker's duty to his client. n23.2 The court found that a broker's statutory duty to advise his client of the terms of a proposed contract is fulfilled when an explanation commensurate with the client's sophistication has been made. Clearly, some would consider the rendering of this type of advice to be the unauthorized practice of law. n23.3

In regard to the post-contract stage of a real estate sales transaction, which encompasses deed preparation and contemplation of the actual passage of title, the courts are divided as to permissible action by the broker. A number of courts that have authorized document preparation or completion of the sales contract stage n24 have refused to extend the privilege to post-contract forms such as deeds. An Illinois court has stated in this regard that when the broker has secured the signatures on the usual form of preliminary contract or offer to purchase, completed by the insertion of necessary factual data, he has fully performed his obligation as broker. The drawing or filling in of blanks on deeds, mortgages and other legal instruments subsequently executed requires the peculiar skill of a lawyer and constitutes the practice of law. Such instruments are often muniments of title and become matters of permanent record. They are not ordinarily executed and delivered until after title has been examined and approved by the attorney for the purchaser. Their preparation is not incidental to the performance of brokerage services but falls outside the scope of the broker's function. n25

Other courts, however, have allowed the filling in by brokers of printed post-contract documents, including simple deeds, provided that such documents are completed by the broker without compensation by the customer and that the completion was incidental to the broker's handling and consummation of the real estate transaction. n26 Moreover, a number of courts have even allowed realtors to draft deeds and other related documents in the regular course of their business, where such preparation has been without charge and has been at the request of the broker's customer in connection with the transaction handled by the broker. n27

The authority to draft all documents relating to a real estate transaction appears to be expressly stated only in statutory form. n28

A broker or other lay person is clearly prohibited by both statute and common law from rendering an opinion concerning title based upon an examination of title documents. n29

Brokers, however, may not hold themselves out to be attorneys-at-law, but must confine their actions to serving their clients in relation to the special transaction (such as drawing a contract of sale) in which the broker has a financial interest for payment of his services, and must not charge for these incidental services. In the instant case, the broker went beyond these limits into the zone of unauthorized practice by adding detailed terms of a purchase money mortgage to a purchase order form. See text accompanying ns.4-9 in § 7.04, infra , for a detailed discussion of the Duncan case.

In *Dayton Bar Ass'n v. Such usage, without more, would not constitute the unlawful practice of law. The same was held to be true for use of such terminology in appraisals.

Code 30-40-26(f) states that a licensee's duties include making "certain that all the terms and conditions of a real estate transaction are contained in any contract prepared by the licensee." This provision cannot be read in a vacuum so as to impose a blanket duty on a licensee to include any and all possible terms and conditions in a real estate sales contract. Activities normally performed by a lawyer are not included in the capacity of a real estate salesperson.

The court stated that these documents were far from fill in the blank standardized forms; these forms called for complex and sophisticated consideration of legal issues. The court also stated that the need for such consideration was demonstrated by the fact that the promissory note drafted by the broker was payable to the individuals involved even though the seller was a corporation.

(4) the forms shall be used only in connection with real estate transactions actually handled by such brokers as a broker;

(5) the broker shall make no charge for filling in the blanks; and

(6) the broker shall not give advice or opinions as to the legal rights of the parties, as to the legal effects of instruments to accomplish specific purposes or as to the validity of title to real estate.

Minnesota: In Cardinal v. Merrill Lynch Realty/Burnet, Inc., 433 N.W.2d 864 (Minn. 1988) , the court held that the broker's practice of performing closing services and charging a separate flat fee was not, without any other evidence, the unauthorized practice of law. In this case, Merrill Lynch, a licensed real estate broker, maintained a closing department that provided "closing services" to clients who retained

Merrill Lynch to sell real property. The supervisor of the closing department, although a licensed real estate agent, was not licensed to practice law. Merrill Lynch charged a separate flat fee of $250 in every transaction in which it performed closing services. This fee was charged whether or not Merrill Lynch performed all of the closing services and irrespective of whether it prepared any of the closing documents.

The sellers in this case entered into an exclusive listing agreement with Merrill Lynch. At the closing of the sale of their property, the closer prepared certain pre-printed closing documents. One of the sellers, a lawyer, drafted the deed and requested that Merrill Lynch waive the $250 fee in return for his preparing all the closing documents. Upon Merrill Lynch's refusal, the seller paid the $250 at the time of closing and Merrill Lynch paid an $8.00 closing fee. The sellers brought suit, claiming that Merrill Lynch's practice of charging and collecting a fee for closing services in connection with the sale of real property was the unauthorized practice of law in violation of Minn. Stat. § 481.02(3).

The district court awarded the seller the $250 closing, less the cost of recording. The Supreme Court of Minnesota, however, held that Merrill Lynch's practice of charging a fee for the services it provided at the closing did not "convert a practice not otherwise unlawful into the unauthorized practice of law." In so holding, the court noted that charging a fee was, nevertheless, "relevant to and a factor in ... the decision whether the service constituted the unlawful practice of law."

PART III Public Regulation

CHAPTER 7 The Real Estate Broker and the Unauthorized Practice of Law *

10A-7 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 7.03

§ 7.03 Policy Decisions

Courts have, in varying degrees, employed several rationales as justification for the chosen restraints, or lack thereof, imposed upon real estate brokers in regard to their completion and preparation of real estate documents.

Both the attorney and the broker claim to be proponents of what is best for the public. Perhaps the most popular theory in support of allowing brokers to engage in instrument preparation as part of their real estate business is the "public-convenience" argument, n1 under which are urged the advantages of having one person, the broker, complete and control all aspects of the sale. Such advantages, it is contended, include: the convenience of having one agent in one location, avoidance of duplicative procedures and paperwork, reduced cost, and familiarity of the agent with the needs of both buyer and seller. n2

The legal profession has contended, on the other hand, that for the public's protection, only those licensed to practice law should attempt to control a real estate conveyance. n3 Attorneys have warned that there is the possibility that a conveyance will be mishandled by a self-serving, far from disinterested agent, who is not versed in legal technicalities, obligations and consequences. Mistake and oversight, it is argued, are likely from one untrained and unqualified to deal in legal complexities. n4 In sum, expediency should not be promoted at the expense of effective and fully competent representation.

Other arguments on behalf of the attorneys' viewpoint are that it is "customary" for lawyers to fill in legal forms, n5 the broker's function must not include consideration of complex legal questions, n6 and brokers should be permitted to deal in only "simple" documents. n7

Some courts have supported the right of brokers to prepare documents on the basis of an "incidental to" exception, i.e., that brokers' services are so intertwined with the sales contract that to deny them the privilege of preparing forms that are incidental to the brokers' function of bringing together the buyer and seller will deny brokers their livelihood and subject the public to needless expense and bother. n8 At least one court has suggested that the bar and judiciary waive their right to object to the selection and completion of standard forms by brokers where there has been acquiescence to the custom over a lengthy period. n9

PART III Public Regulation

CHAPTER 7 The Real Estate Broker and the Unauthorized Practice of Law *

§ 7.04 The Regulation of Real Estate Brokers: Selected Approaches

The extent of real estate broker participation in the preparation and completion of real estate transaction documents has generally been controlled by statute or case law or a combination thereof. n1 A few states, however, have attempted to regulate brokers through more novel means, including a constitutional amendment n2 and through authorization (in Washington State) for "closing officers," lay practitioners who are authorized to complete specified legal documents incident to the closing of real estate transactions. n3

New York is an example of a jurisdiction that has sought to regulate the unauthorized practice of law through case law and statute. New York Judiciary Law Section 484 provides that no one but an attorney, duly admitted to practice, may receive compensation for preparing deeds, mortgages or any other instruments affecting real estate. n4 In addition, a broker is guided by court decisions. A 1978 appellate decision summarizes the New York position as allowing brokers "to prepare simple purchase and sales contracts," i.e., to fill in the blanks. In Duncan & Hill Realty, Inc. v. Department of State, n5 the broker modified a standard purchase offer form by inserting detailed terms for a purchase money mortgage to be given to the seller to secure a substantial part of the purchase price. After the deal fell through, a complaint was brought against the broker and his license was suspended. On review of that determination, the court found that the broker had engaged in the unauthorized practice of law. The court recognized that from time immemorial, real estate brokers and agents have drafted "simple" contracts between [buyer and seller] as a part of their professional work, in expediting the progress of their business and the affairs of their clients. As long as real estate brokers and agents have not held themselves out to be attorneys-at-law, have confined their actions to serving their clients in relation to the specific transaction (such as drawing a contract of sale) in which the broker has a financial interest for payment of his services, and have made no charge for these incidental services, such acts have been held by our courts to be proper and not to constitute the unlawful practice of law. n6

The court noted that while New York holds to the rule, followed in many states, that grants to real estate brokers the privilege of preparing purchase offer contracts in real estate transactions, "[t]he line between such permitted acts by real estate brokers and the unauthorized practice of law has been recognized as thin and difficult to define and, at times, to discern." n7 Although the practical considerations that justify completion of simple purchase and sale documents are not to be ignored, "[t]he insertion into such documents of provisions respecting the legal rights of the parties without a lawyer's advice may produce ill-conceived, ambiguous and unintended terms out of which may arise dissension and litigation," n8 as was the case here. Therefore, the court concluded real estate brokers and agents must refrain from inserting in a real estate purchase offer or counter offer any provisions which require the exercise of legal expertise. Thus it is not proper for such a broker to undertake to devise the detailed terms of a purchase money mortgage or other legal terms beyond the general description of the subject property, the price and the mortgage to be assumed or given. A real estate broker may readily protect himself from a charge of unlawful practice of law by inserting in the document that it is subject to the approval of the respective attorneys for the parties. Moreover, a real estate broker or agent who uses one of the recommended purchase offer forms referred to above, or one recommended by a joint committee of the bar association and realtors association of his local county, who refrains from inserting provisions requiring legal expertise and who adheres to the guidelines agreed upon by the American Bar Association and the National Association of Real Estate Brokers ... has no need to worry about the propriety of his conduct in such transactions. n9

Arizona has embraced a somewhat different approach to the unauthorized practice of law question: a constitutional amendment. Real estate brokers in that state were able to bring the issue to the electorate, in reaction to a court decision which prohibited a broker from even filling in the blanks of real estate forms. n10 The constitutional amendment entitles brokers to draft instruments pertaining to real estate transactions provided no extra fee is charged. n11 This display of public dissatisfaction with such broad restrictions on brokers gives credence to the "public convenience" argument, n12 especially since the referendum passed by a four-to-one margin.

A still different approach to the problem of unauthorized practice by real estate brokers has been taken by the Supreme Court of Washington, which, in 1983, promulgated "Rule 12." n13 The Rule provides for a new group of lay-practitioners, known as closing officers, who are allowed to select, prepare, and complete certain legal documents incident to the closing of real estate transactions. Specified documents include deeds, promissory notes, guaranties, deeds of trust, mortgages, and Uniform Commercial Code documents.

Closing officers are supervised by a "Limited Practice Board" made up of bar and business representatives appointed by the State Supreme Court, which supervises all aspects of admission to "closing officer" status and performance of "closing officer" duties. Conceptually, closing officers are members of a profession practicing law in a limited area, and thus do more than is normally permitted a real estate broker with respect to document preparation. However, the closing officers' activities are closely circumscribed by the Rule. First, all parties must agree in writing to the basic terms and conditions of the transaction prior to the performance of the services. Thereafter, all parties must be advised by the closing officer of the limited nature of the services rendered, and then be advised in writing that: (1) the closing officer is not acting as the advocate or representative of any party; (2) the documents prepared will affect the legal rights of the parties; (3) the parties' interests in the documents may be different; (4) the parties have the right to be represented by attorneys of their own choice; and (5) the closing officer is not permitted to give legal advice as to the manner in which the documents affect the parties. Finally, the Rule specifies that existing law is not affected with regard to: (1) the fiduciary relationship between a closing officer and a client; (2) conflicts of interest that may arise between a closing officer and a client; (3) the right of a party to act pro se, including the right of a lender to prepare documents of title to property in which it takes a security interest; (4) the lack of authority of a closing officer to give legal advice without being licensed to practice law; and (5) the standard of care which a closing officer must observe in carrying out the duties prescribed by the Rule.

It remains to be seen whether Rule 12 will be an effective means of solving the unauthorized practice dilemma, and whether Washington's lead will be followed elsewhere. The Washington approach, however, provides a means to accommodate both the concern of the judiciary with the maintenance of high ethical standards and acceptable competence by those who practice law, and the desire of the public for efficient and low cost conveyancing. n14

A number of Western states other than Washington have allowed virtually all legal aspects of real estate transactions to be handled by non-lawyer escrow agents, or title company or lender representatives for decades. n15 These lay persons have not generally been closely supervised by government officials.

CHAPTER 7 The Real Estate Broker and the Unauthorized Practice of Law *

10A-7 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 7.05

§ 7.05 Realtor(R) Code of Ethics and the Model Definition of the Practice of Law

The National Association of Realtors(R) has addressed the issue of the unauthorized practice of law by its members in Article 13 of its Code of Ethics and Standards of Practice of the National Association of Realtors(R) (Jan. 1, 2010) which states:

REALTORS(R) shall not engage in activities that constitute the unauthorized practice of law and shall recommend that legal counsel be obtained when the interest of any party to the transaction requires it.

The American Bar Association Task Force on the Model Definition of the Practice of Law has drafted a definition of the practice of law which describes actions that constitute the practice of law. This definition includes exceptions and exclusions. This definition has received much criticism. Both the U.S. Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission have voiced their concern about efforts to prevent nonlawyers from competing with attorneys in the provision of certain legal services. n1 This attempt to define the practice of law has been considered unsuccessful. n2

One resource for readers concerned about the unauthorized practice of law is the survey performed by the American Bar Association Standing Committee on Client Protection. The 2009 Unauthorized Practice of Law Survey contains charts showing state-by-state listings addressing enforcement against the unauthorized practice of law. This letter concludes, "By including overly broad presumptions of conduct considered to be the practice of law, the proposed Model Definition likely will reduce competition from nonlawyers. Consumers, in turn, will likely pay higher prices and face a smaller range of service options. The Task Force makes no showing of harm to consumers from lay service providers that would justify these reductions in competition." CHAPTER 7 The Real Estate Broker and the Unauthorized Practice of Law *

§ 7.06 The Role of Paralegals and Legal Technicians

In the nineteen eighties, a new category of law office personnel arrived on the scene, namely the "paralegal." The underlying concept was that simple documents (or complex documents that were routinely executed as part of a transaction) could be explained to the non-lawyer, who, in turn, would then carry out a legal transaction (such as a mortgage loan or closing) under the supervision of the lawyer. The latter would be available for consultation, to answer any questions that arose, to handle any new or different problems that might arise, and to review the finished documents prior to the conclusion of the deal. Within a decade, the use of paralegals grew geometrically, particularly in such areas as conveyancing and mortgage lending. There is now a movement underway to expand the role of paralegals to enable them to handle simple or routine matters on their own and without direct supervision by an attorney. California is in the forefront of this movement that is predicated upon the need to make such services cheaper and more accessible to the average citizen.

The Public Protection Committee of the California State Bar Association conducted hearings on proposed legislation to facilitate this type of practice by paralegals. The pros and cons developed at the hearings were summarized by one commentator as follows:

The committee acknowledged the potential for consumer fraud by legal technicians, but it found that "the overwhelming need to provide better access to legal services justifies some risk of individual harm."

The committee noted that lawyers cannot provide or don't want to provide better legal access for low- and middle-income persons, especially in landlord-tenant, immigration, family and bankruptcy law.

There is no doubt that certain legal services, such as uncontested divorces, name changes, uncontested adoptions, simple wills, the preparation of income tax returns, certain real estate matters, simple personal bankruptcies, collections, and the incorporation of a small business are often standardized and routine and can be competently performed by financial advisors, escrow agents, paralegals and--in some instances--even typing services.

On the other hand, critics of the recommendations raise some valid concerns about the proposed legislation. It does not require minimum educational requirements for, or impose ethical restrictions on, legal technicians. A client's confidences would not be protected by the attorney-client privilege. n1

The position that stringent legal controls on the practice of law by non-lawyers should continue to be maintained has been championed by one of the authors of this publication, Bernard H. Goldstein, Esq. He recently argued that brokers should not be authorized to advise sellers or purchasers of the legal implications of any legal document pertaining to conveyancing. Goldstein was opposed to the proposed regulations of the New York Secretary of State that, by inference, would enlarge the scope of the real estate broker's powers and liabilities. He argued that only a legislative enactment, not mere regulations, could expand the powers of the broker to such an extent. Reviewing and explaining contract documents, he stated, is a skill that is particularly acquired by the lawyer as a result of the lawyer's professional education and training, and that skill should not be diluted by allowing it to be exercised by those having a tangential relationship with the discipline of the law. Further, to issue such regulations would give the public the impression that a broker or salesperson has expertise in a field different from that of the broker's discipline. Rather than mandating the conduct called for by the proposed regulations, Goldstein proposed that the legislature require the broker to deliver to the party using the broker's services a written memorandum informing the party that the broker gives no legal advice, and that the party should consult a lawyer for such advice. Moreover, to recover any compensation in such a transaction, the broker must allege and prove the timely delivery of the memorandum to the party. n2

In 1992, the ABA created the Commission on Non-Lawyer Practice to study the prevalence of unauthorized practice and its impact on the public and the legal profession. The Commission's final report is expected in 1995. State legislatures are increasingly interested in non-lawyer practice. Since 1990, the number of legislative bodies considering laws which would modify or clarify common law or administratively imposed limitations on unauthorized practice has grown from 7 to 21. n3

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. Despite the interest shown by some consumers and legislative committees in the creation of a type of lay, legal practitioner, the California state legislature has rejected (or has failed to act on) a number of proposals advanced since the early 1990's which would have allowed licensed "legal technicians" to provide direct services to the public in limited areas of practice or, alternatively, would have created licensing for paralegals. See Samborn, So What Is a Lawyer, Anyway?, N.J.L., June 21, 1993, at 1. A number of paralegal organizations continue to view paralegals as fully capable of representing the public and continue to press for a law which would allow them to do so.

For a case illustrating the malpractice pitfalls that a real estate broker faces in giving incorrect legal advice, or in discouraging the client from seeking legal counsel, see Crutchley v. First Trust & Sav. Bank, 450 N.W.2d 877 (Iowa 1990). The opinion in the Crutchley case also contains a valuable discussion of the appropriate charge to a jury passing upon real estate broker malpractice issues. See also Kunz v. Warren, 725 P.2d 794 (Colo. Ct. App. 1986).

Preparation of real estate contracts by real estate brokers was held to constitute the unlawful practice of law, even in situations in which the agreements contained an escape clause based upon the parties' right not to be bound if an attorney acting on their behalf rejected the agreement. Wheatly v. Myung Sook Suh, 207 N.J. Super. 539, 504 A.2d 792 (1985), rev'd in part on other grounds, 217 N.J. Super. 233, 525 A.2d 340 (1987). The broker in that case was denied the right to recover a commission on this basis, as well as on the ground that the real estate contracts drafted by the broker violated the state's "plain language law," N.J. Stat. Ann. § 56:12.

The Connecticut State Department of Banking has published rules authorizing real estate brokers (who act as mortgage brokers) to participate in "Computer Loan Origination Systems" (called "CLOs"), provided they undertake to obtain the best possible mortgage for the vendee. It is authoritatively reported that HUD is in the process of issuing similar regulations under R.E.S.P.A., authorizing mortgage brokers to collect a modest fee for this service. The broker is also required to offer the potential borrower a choice of multiple lenders, i.e., they cannot restrict their offering to mortgages supplied by a single lending source. See Valvo, Dual Fiduciary Brokers-- Realtors to Work for Both Buyers and Sellers, 7 Mortgage Journal 1 (Nov. 7, 1990).

CHAPTER 7 The Real Estate Broker and the Unauthorized Practice of Law *

§ 7.07 Conclusion

The current state of the law regarding "unauthorized practice" by real estate brokers is not always readily discernible. Clearly, however, a real estate broker will best serve his principal (and protect himself) if he abstains from dispensing legal advice to the parties, and declines additional compensation for document preparation or assistance. Beyond these simple admonitions, the broker must be aware of the particular rules in his jurisdiction regarding the drafting of legal documents and the filling in of pre-prepared forms. The ideal for both attorneys and brokers would be uniform guidelines that are clear and easily applied. Considering the historical animosity between brokers and attorneys, however, as well as the conflicting theories employed by the courts in the various jurisdictions, the development of uniform rules seems difficult to achieve. Yet broker-lawyer cooperation is necessary. The public interest requires it. n1

Scope

SCOPE

Chapter 8 discusses the application of antitrust law to the real estate brokerage industry and explains why real estate brokers and their counsel must make antitrust compliance a high priority. Beginning with an introduction addressing the historical background of antitrust law and the real estate brokerage industry (§ 8.01), this chapter discusses the severe penalties that have been applied to real estate brokers who are found to violate antitrust law (§ 8.02). The basics of antitrust law and its application to real estate brokerage are discussed (§ 8.03). The concepts of monopoly (§ 8.03[2]), restraint of trade (§ 8.03[3]), boycotts (§ 8.03[4]), and tying agreements (§ 8.03[5]) are discussed. Application of antitrust law to specific industry practices is discussed in § 8.04. Industry practices discussed include:

- fixing of commissions (§ 8.04[2]),
- group boycotts that are alleged to have arisen in response to "discount" brokers (§ 8.04[3][a]),
- multiple listing services and their potentially anti-competitive effect on the relevant market (§ 8.04[3][b][i]),
- real estate trade association's ethical standards and their potentially anti-competitive effect on the relevant market (§ 8.04[3][b][ii]), and
- list-back agreements as possible tying violations (§ 8.04[4]).

Chapter 8 concludes with practical suggestions on implementing a compliance program to avoid running afoul of antitrust laws (§ 8.05).

§ 8.01 Historical Background

Prior to the 1970s the conventional wisdom was that the antitrust laws did not apply to the real estate brokerage profession, or most of the service sector of the economy. Judges and lawyers presumed either that the sale of real estate was not "interstate" commerce, or the profession was exclusively regulated by state licensing laws. Based upon these assumptions, and the relative dearth of any antitrust cases dealing with the real estate brokerage business, n1 real estate brokers and their trade associations (1) routinely promulgated recommended fee schedules, (2) severely restricted who could participate in multiple listing services, and (3) agreed upon "codes of ethics" that strictly regulated a broker's business solicitations, office hours, and salesperson hiring policies. All of these practices have now been abandoned by reason of the widespread application of federal and state antitrust laws to the real estate brokerage industry.

(n1)Footnote 1. Prior to 1970, the only reported antitrust case against real estate brokers or their trade associations was United States v. National Ass'n of Real Estate Boards, 339 U.S. 485 (1950) in which the Supreme Court held that enforceable commission rate schedules promulgated by local real estate boards violated Section 1 of the Sherman Act. On December 18, 1969 the United States Department of Justice Antitrust Division filed the second case ever initiated against a real estate board in United States v. Prince George's County Board of REALTORS(R), Inc., 1971 Trade Cas. (CCH) P 73, 393 (D. Md. 1970). In the Prince George's case, the government challenged a fee schedule promulgated by the defendant association that was merely recommended, and not mandatory.

CHAPTER 8 Real Estate Brokers and Antitrust Laws *

10A-8 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 8.02

§ 8.02 Potential Liability Under Antitrust Laws

No other body of commercial law has a broader reach, harsher penalties, or more variety of potential enforcers than the antitrust laws. The number of government enforcement agencies, and "bonuses" (treble damages and attorneys fees) available to private plaintiffs, make it very unlikely that an antitrust violation will remain undetected or unchallenged during the four-year statute of limitations under the federal antitrust laws. ⁿ² This is especially true in an industry that is as visible and publicly scrutinized as the real estate brokerage business. These factors all make antitrust compliance a high priority for real estate brokers and their counsel.

The Sherman Act of 1890, ⁿ³ which is the primary federal antitrust law, contains some of the most severe sanctions of any law regulating commercial conduct. The United States Justice Department can seek criminal indictments for Sherman Act violations, and a court can sentence a guilty defendant to a jail sentence of up to three years, as well as fines not to exceed $350,000.00 for an individual and $10,000,000 for a corporation. ⁿ⁴ The Justice Department can also bring civil actions to secure injunctions against Sherman Act violations. ⁿ⁵

Private plaintiffs who have been injured in their business or property by anything forbidden in the antitrust laws may also sue. A prevailing plaintiff may receive three times their actual damages and recover their reasonable attorneys fees from the defendant. ⁿ⁶

Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act (FTC Act), ⁿ⁷ which prohibits "unfair methods of competition," provides a basis for injunctive relief. The FTC Act is enforced by the Federal Trade Commission (FTC). Private plaintiffs do not have any cause of action under the FTC Act. Any violation of the Sherman Act is also a violation of the FTC Act; therefore, the FTC may challenge Sherman Act violations as well as a broad range of other anti-competitive conduct that could be found to be an "unfair" method of competition. The FTC is, however, empowered only to issue cease and desist orders. Damages and criminal sanctions are not available under the FTC Act.

Recently, Section 5 has been applied to prohibit restrictions on price-related advertising promulgated by professional associations. ⁿ⁸

Finally, state attorneys general may bring "parens patriae" suits to enforce the Sherman Act on behalf of the citizens of their state. ⁿ⁹ Most states also have state antitrust laws or "little FTC Acts." ⁿ¹⁰ These statutes can be enforced criminally and civilly. n11 They also typically allow prevailing plaintiffs to recover double or triple damages and reasonable attorneys fees from defendants. n12 Some state statutes have been interpreted by state supreme courts to require less proof to support a violation than is required under the federal antitrust laws, or to permit a broader class of plaintiffs to have standing to sue. n13

§ 8.03 Basic Antitrust Law

An understanding of how the antitrust laws apply to real estate brokerage requires a basic understanding of the structure and operation of these laws as interpreted by the United States Supreme Court during the Twentieth Century. When Congress passed the Sherman Act in 1890 it was targeting the massive trusts and cartels that had come to dominate many major industries at the end of the nineteenth century. The Sherman Act reflects the twin goals of Congress in 1890.

Section 1 of the Sherman Act prohibits "[e]very contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations." n14 Section 2 of the Sherman Act punishes "[e]very person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several states, or with foreign nations." n15 In short, Section 1 is directed against monopolies in their "incipiency," while Section 2 is directed at monopolies that have already formed, or are about to be formed.

[1] Interstate Commerce: A Threshold Requirement

A threshold requirement to any suit or prosecution under the Sherman Act is a showing that the conduct of which the plaintiff or the government is complaining is "in" or "affecting" the "commerce among the several States or with foreign nations." This is commonly known as the "interstate commerce" requirement or "interstate commerce nexus." Until the 1970's it was generally assumed that real estate brokerage did not have any interstate commerce nexus because real estate, by definition, did not move across state lines. The Supreme Court has held since 1945, however, that the scope of the Sherman Act is coextensive with Congress's authority to regulate under the Commerce Clause, and Congress is empowered to regulate not only conduct that is "in" interstate commerce, but also conduct that "affects" such commerce. n16

In 1980 in McLain v. Real Estate Board of New Orleans, Inc., n17 the Supreme Court laid to rest any suggestion that the business of real estate brokerage was beyond the interstate commerce jurisdiction of the federal antitrust laws. McLain was a class action price-fixing case brought under Section 1 of the Sherman Act against the New Orleans Real Estate Board and several of its individual broker members. The Fifth Circuit had held that the plaintiffs' claims should be dismissed for lack of interstate commerce jurisdiction. The Supreme Court granted certiorari and reversed.

The Court held that an antitrust plaintiff must allege facts sufficient to show that the conduct of which the plaintiff is complaining is in a stream of interstate commerce, or has an effect on some other business that is in interstate commerce. n18 As far as the alleged fixing or stabilizing of real estate commissions in the New Orleans real estate marketplace is concerned, the Supreme Court noted that a real estate commission is a cost of consummating a real estate transaction. A real estate transaction, in turn, often involves mortgage loans and title and mortgage insurance that are secured from out-of-state lenders and insurers. These streams of interstate commerce are affected by the costs of consummating real estate transactions. As transaction costs rise, fewer transactions will occur and fewer loans or insurance policies will be written. n19

It is important to note, however, that McLean simply held that the plaintiff in that case alleged a sufficient nexus between the real estate brokerage business and interstate commerce to survive a motion to dismiss under Rule 12 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Antitrust plaintiffs suing real estate brokers must prove at trial that the brokers' conduct was in or affecting interstate commerce. A failure to do so will result in a directed verdict. n20

[2] Monopolization: Section 2 of the Sherman Act

Section 2 prohibits the offense of "monopolization," "attempts to monopolize," or "conspiracies to monopolize." By definition, monopolization means to acquire and maintain nearly all of the output in a particular relevant market. Section 2 is intended to eliminate monopolies that have been formed by attacking conduct by a monopolist that has the effect of perpetuating the monopoly. n21

[a] Relevant Market Definition

Any seller of a product or service has a monopoly over the specific product or service he or she produces and sells. The offense of monopolization does not extend this far. n22 A violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act requires proof that the defendant monopolized a particular "relevant market." While the concept of a "relevant market" is fundamental to an analysis of whether a defendant has acquired a "monopoly," so-called "market definition" is a necessary and, often, outcome-determinative inquiry in nearly all antitrust cases.

"Relevant markets" for the purpose of the antitrust laws have been defined by the Supreme Court as the alternatives available to a customer seeking a supply of a particular product or service. n23 Relevant markets, therefore, have two dimensions: a product market and a geographic market.

[i] Product Market: Cross-Elasticity of Demand. A "product market" is defined by the sources of supply for a particular product or service, or interchangeable substitutes for the product or service. Substitutability is sometimes referred to as "cross-elasticity of demand." Cross-elasticity is high when an increase in price of one product causes consumers to shift their purchases to another product. The Supreme Court used this test in United States v. E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., n24 to determine whether du Pont had monopolized the market for cellophane plastic wrap. The Court examined the cross-elasticity of demand between cellophane and other flexible wrappers, such as waxed paper and aluminum foil. Noting that consumers of flexible wrapping material readily switched from one product to another in response to price changes, the Court concluded that all such products should be included in the "relevant product market." By defining the product market so broadly, the Court rejected the monopoly claims against du Pont, even though du Pont had a monopoly in the domestic production of cellophane.

[ii] Geographic Market. A "relevant market" also has a geographic dimension. A relevant geographic market has been defined by the Supreme Court as the territory to which consumers can effectively turn for supplies of a particular product or service. n25 Geographic markets can be national or even world-wide in scope, or can be confined to a single city or part of a city. n26

[b] Offense of Monopolization

Section 2 of the Sherman Act condemns "monopolization": it does not condemn a "monopoly." In United States v. Grinnell Corp.,ⁿ²⁷ the Supreme Court held that "monopolizing" conduct is the "willful acquisition or maintenance of [monopoly] power as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of superior product, business acumen, or historic accident." n28 Therefore, it is not illegal to have a monopoly on a product or service so long as that monopoly was not acquired or maintained by "exclusionary" conduct toward competitive rivals.

[i] First Prong: Definition of Market Power. Only defendants that have sufficient "market power" within the relevant market are deemed monopolists under Section 2 of the Sherman Act. "Market power" is the ability of a seller to control the price that will prevail in the relevant market. n29 A monopolist has complete control over prices and can therefore raise its price and not suffer a corresponding reduction in sales volume to suppliers of other competing products or services.

Courts have typically required a defendant to possess a relevant market share in excess of seventy percent (70%) before being considered a monopolist. n30 Somewhat lesser market shares have supported allegations that the defendant has "attempted" to acquire a monopoly, or has "conspired" to monopolize. n31

[ii] Second Prong: Exclusionary Conduct. The second issue in a monopolization case is whether the defendant acquired or maintained its monopoly by "exclusionary" conduct. Exclusionary conduct that can support a monopolization claim includes predatory pricing, n32 exclusive dealing contracts, n33 and refusals to deal with a competitor. n34

[c] Statute Rarely Applied to Real Estate Brokerage Cases

Monopolization cases will rarely be filed against a real estate broker because the real estate brokerage markets in most metropolitan areas are highly de-concentrated. With numerous competitors in most markets, it is highly unlikely that any individual real estate brokerage company will possess market power anywhere near monopoly proportions.

Real estate trade associations, however, could possess market power, and, therefore, could be susceptible to monopolization claims, especially if they operate multiple listing services. Most real estate brokerage markets support only one, or at most two, multiple listing services. If the real estate trade association that owns and operates the only multiple listing services in the market engages in exclusionary conduct designed to prevent the formation of a competing multiple listing service, the dominant multiple listing service could be liable for monopolization in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act. n35

[3] Combinations in Restraint of Trade: Section 1 of The Sherman Act

While Section 2 of the Sherman Act condemns monopolization, Section 1 of the Sherman Act prohibits "contracts, combinations, or conspiracies in restraint of trade." Defendants in suits brought under Section 1 need not be monopolists; however, plaintiffs in Section 1 cases must prove that the defendants engaged in "concerted action" that restrained trade.

[a] Proof of Conspiracy

A "contract, combination or conspiracy" under Section 1 of the Sherman Act requires concerted action by two or more separate business entities. In American Tobacco Co. v. United States,ⁿ³⁶ the Supreme Court defined a conspiracy for antitrust purposes as "a unity of purpose or a common design and understanding or a meeting of minds in an unlawful arrangement." n37 In Monsanto v. Spray-Rite Service Corp.,ⁿ³⁸ the Supreme Court defined the standard of proof necessary to prove a conspiracy under Section 1 of the Sherman Act as "evidence that tends to exclude the possibility of independent action." n39

Cases brought under Section 1 of the Sherman Act often turn on whether the plaintiff has succeeded in proving that the challenged conduct was the result of a joint undertaking by two or more entities. The Monsanto case, however, makes clear that a Section 1 conspiracy is not proven simply by evidence that two or more firms engaged in the same conduct when faced with the same set of circumstances.

Forty-five years prior to Monsanto, the Supreme Court held in Interstate Circuit, Inc. v. United States,ⁿ⁴⁰ that a conspiracy under Section 1 could be proven by evidence that the defendants engaged in "consciously parallel" conduct that would not be rational unless the parties were acting pursuant to common plan or understanding.ⁿ⁴¹ Monsanto made clear that mere "conscious parallelism" alone is not sufficient to establish that the challenged conduct was undertaken pursuant to a "conspiracy." To survive a motion for summary judgment, or for a directed verdict, after Monsanto, a plaintiff must introduce evidence that "tends to exclude the possibility" that the challenged conduct was the result of unilateral independent decision making by the respective firms.ⁿ⁴² More recently in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly^{n42.1} the United States Supreme Court held that an antitrust plaintiff must plead enough facts to show that an agreement was made to support a claim under Section 1 of the Sherman Act. According to the Court, allegations that the defendants engaged in parallel conduct and a conclusory assertion that the defendants acted pursuant to a conspiracy is not sufficient to withstand a motion to dismiss. The Supreme Court's Twombly decision was cited by the federal district court in Hackman v. Dickerson, Realtors(R), Inc.^{n42.2} when that court granted the motions to dismiss of the Illinois Association of Realtors(R), the Rockford Area Association of Realtors(R), and numerous individual brokerage companies in a case in which the plaintiff alleged that the defendants conspired to eliminate the plaintiff as a competitor in the Rockford, Illinois real estate brokerage market because the plaintiff was offering discounted brokerage commissions.

The plaintiff alleged that the Illinois and Rockford Associations participated in the alleged conspiracy by adjudicating ethics complaints brought against the plaintiff by other defendant brokers. Relying on Twombly, the court dismissed the claims against the Illinois and Rockford Associations because the plaintiff failed to allege any facts showing that the two Associations participated in any conspiracy to refuse to deal with the plaintiff or boycott his services. The court further relied on Twombly to dismiss the plaintiff's antitrust claims against a number of the broker defendants because the plaintiff failed to allege more than parallel conduct and a conclusory assertion of a conspiracy. In Home Quarters Real Estate Group v. Michigan Data Exchange d/b/a MIRealSource, et al^{n42.3} magistrate judge issued a Report and Recommendation that held that plaintiff did sufficiently state an antitrust claim under the Twombly standard against two Detroit area multiple listing services that terminated the plaintiff's access to the services' databases allegedly because the plaintiff was operating an online brokerage business and offering discounted commissions to sellers and commission rebates to buyers. The court found that the plaintiff's specific allegations that the two services acted within twenty-four hours of each other in terminating the plaintiff's access privileges, and each cited similar, but allegedly baseless violations of the services' rules as grounds for the terminations, constituted sufficient specificity to satisfy the Twombly pleading standard.

The Supreme Court's Twombly decision nevertheless, imposes a much greater burden upon antitrust plaintiffs seeking to sustain claims under Section 1 of the Sherman Act. Plaintiffs must not only adduce evidence to prove the existence of a conspiracy beyond mere parallel conduct by the defendants to avoid summary judgment, but they now must plead such facts to avoid a motion to dismiss.

The Supreme Court has also held that shareholders in a corporation may engage in a "conspiracy" subject to Section 1 of the Sherman Act if the shareholders are otherwise competing enterprises and operations of the corporation reduce competition among the shareholders. This is the holding of American Needle, Inc. v. National Football League, et al.^{n42.4} In American Needle, the Court considered whether National Football League Properties, Inc. (NFLP) constituted a "conspiracy" for the purposes of Section 1 of the Sherman Act, or a "single firm" that is not engaged in "concerted action" for antitrust purposes pursuant to the Supreme Court's previous holding in Copperweld Corp. v. Independence Tube Corp.^{n42.5} In Copperweld the Court held that a corporation and its wholly owned subsidiaries are considered to be a "single entity" that are not engaged in "concerted action" for antitrust purposes when they are carrying out the mission of the corporate enterprise as a whole.

NFLP was organized by the thirty-two (32) teams that compose the National Football League (NFL). NFLP's purpose is to grant licenses to third parties to manufacture and distribute products bearing the trademarks and logos of the NFL teams. NFLP enters into license agreements and collects royalties for the use of the team's intellectual property and distributes the profits to the teams or for other purposes authorized by the teams. The plaintiff, American Needle, Inc., (American Needle) manufactured and distributed apparel bearing the NFL team trademarks under a license agreement with NFLP. NFLP later entered into an exclusive license agreement with Reebok International, Inc. (Reebok) for the manufacture and distribution of NFL team branded apparel. American Needle then sued NFLP contending that the exclusive license with Reebok constituted a conspiracy in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act. The trial court granted the NFLP's motion for summary judgment finding that the NFLP was a "single entity" under the Copperweld doctrine, and the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed. The Supreme Court granted American Needle's petition for certiorari and reversed and remanded the case to the Seventh Circuit.

The Court noted that the NFL teams were each independent business that separately owned the intellectual property rights in their trademarks and logos. In the market in which American Needle competed, each NFL team was a competing source of trademark and logo rights for use on shirts, hats, or other apparel. The Court acknowledged that the NFL was an enterprise that could not exist but for cooperation and coordination among the independent NFL teams on team composition, competitive balance, and the scheduling and playing of games. But such necessary cooperation and coordination for the purpose of operating the NFL as a viable sports league did not automatically extend to the teams' separate exploitation of their respective independently owned trademarks and logos. According to the Court, the collective licensing of intellectual property rights in team trademarks and logos was not a function essential to operation of the NFL. Rather, the NFLP was akin to a "cartel" through which the independently owned and operated NFL teams eliminated the competition that previously existed among the teams in the relevant market for the licensing of the intellectual property rights to their team trademarks and logos.

The Court made clear, however, that it was only holding that the NFLP was a joint venture that constituted "concerted action" for the purposes of Section 1 of the Sherman Act. It remained to be determined on remand whether the NFLP's exclusive license with Reebok constituted an unreasonable restraint of trade that violated the Sherman Act. American Needle and Copperweld make clear that whether a joint venture among competitors will be treated as a "single entity" or a "conspiracy" for antitrust purposes must be determined by analyzing the substance of the venture, and not the form of business entity through which the venture operates. American Needle holds that competitors may not insulate their cartel from the antitrust laws by carrying out their purposes through a corporation owned by the cartel members. On the other hand, Copperweld holds that a corporation and its legally separate subsidiaries that act as a single economic enterprise are do not engage in a "conspiracy" for the purposes of the antitrust laws when the corporation and its subsidiaries coordinate their activities to achieve a common corporate objective.

[b] Rule of Reason

Not only must a plaintiff in a Section 1 case prove that the challenged conduct was the product of concerted action, but the plaintiff must also prove that the concerted action "restrained trade" that is in or affecting interstate commerce. At the turn of the century, the Supreme Court recognized that the Sherman Act, read literally, would prohibit all commercial contracts. Every contract between two businesses is joint action that "restrains" the trade of the contracting parties. The Court, therefore, concluded that Congress' intent when it passed the Sherman Act in 1890 was to prohibit only those trade restraints that had been judged to be "unreasonable," and thus illegal, at common law. n43

[i] Common Law Roots. The common law of many states in 1890 prohibited business conduct that constituted a "direct" restraint of trade, such as price-fixing. n44 On the other hand, so-called "ancillary" restraints that may "restrain" participants in a market, but also result in a more competitive marketplace as a whole were considered legal and enforceable. n45 The consequence, however, of a state court determination that a restraint was "direct," and therefore illegal, was simply to declare the restraint unenforceable much the same as a contract term that is found to be "contrary to public policy." n46 There was not any cause of action for treble damages or the possibility of a criminal conviction as there is under the Sherman Act.

[ii] Supreme Court's Formulation Emphasizes Pro-Competition. The Supreme Court's declaration that the Sherman Act only prohibits conduct that restrains trade "unreasonably" has come to be known as the "Rule of Reason." In 1918 in Chicago Board of Trade v. United States, n47 Justice Brandeis enunciated the following oft-quoted formulation of the Rule of Reason:

The true test of illegality is whether the restraint imposed is such as merely regulates and perhaps thereby promotes competition or whether it is such as may suppress or even destroy competition. To determine that question the court must ordinarily consider the facts before and after the restraint, the evil believed to exist, the reason for adopting the particular remedy, the purpose or end sought to be attained, are all relevant facts. This is not because a good intention will save an otherwise objectionable regulation or the reverse; but because knowledge of intent may help the court to interpret facts and to predict consequences. n48

In Chicago Board of Trade, the Court upheld the legality of a Board of Trade rule that any commodity trades made after the exchange closed must be made at the last prevailing price on the exchange. Construed literally, the Board's rule was price-fixing; yet the Court upheld the rule because the rule, when examined in its total context, ensured that farmers and others who consummated transactions after the exchange closed were able to do so at competitively determined market prices. Since the Board rule enhanced and protected a competitive market for grain, the rule was "reasonable" and therefore legal under the Sherman Act.

[iii] Analysis of Rule of Reason Inquiry. The Chicago Board of Trade case demonstrates how broad and far-reaching a Rule of Reason inquiry can be. First, the relevant market must be defined. Then the purpose and effect of the challenged restraint must be examined to determine if its effect, on balance, is pro-competitive, and therefore, reasonable and lawful, or anti-competitive, and therefore, unreasonable and illegal. A full scale Rule of Reason inquiry is highly fact-intensive, and generally includes expert economic testimony or evidence.

[c] The Per Se Rule

Not long after Chicago Board of Trade, the Supreme Court declared that, in appropriate circumstances, a trade restraint will be so complete in its elimination of competition and so devoid of any pro-competitive justification that it will be judged to be unreasonable "per se." The first type of restraint that the Court declared to be subject to this truncated "per se" analysis is price-fixing.

In 1927 in United States v. Trenton Potteries, n49 the Supreme Court forcefully condemned a price-fixing agreement at issue in the following words:

The aim and result of every price-fixing agreement, if effective, is the elimination of one form of competition. The power to fix prices, whether reasonably exercised or not, involves the power to control the market and to fix arbitrary and unreasonable prices. The reasonable fixed price today may through economic and business changes become the unreasonable price of tomorrow. Once established, it may be maintained unchanged because of the absence of competition. ... Agreements which create such potential power may well be held in themselves unreasonable or unlawful restraints, without the necessity of minute inquiry, whether a particular price is reasonable or unreasonable. n50

However, the Supreme Court did not establish that price-fixing is per se unreasonable until 1940 in its decision in United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co.: n51

Thus for over forty-years this Court has consistently and without deviation adhered to the principle that price-fixing agreements are unlawful per se under the Sherman Act and that no showing of so-called competitive abuse or evils which those agreements were designed to eliminate or alleviate may be interposed as a defense. n52

The Socony Vacuum Court stated that the consequence of the determination that a restraint is unreasonable "per se" is that the defendant is barred from introducing any evidence to show that the restraint is, on balance, reasonable.

In articulating the operation of the per se rule, the Court made plain that its application is to be reserved to those types of restraints with which the courts have had considerable experience, and have concluded that the likelihood that the patently anti-competitive effects of the restraint could ever be offset by any pro-competitive effects is so remote as to render any inquiry into such pro-competitive effects a waste of judicial resources. n53 In addition to price-fixing, the Supreme Court has held since Socony-Vacuum that the per se rule should be applied to the following types of restraints; (1) horizontal territorial allocations; n54 (2) tying agreements n55 and (3) certain types of group boycotts. n56

[4] Group Boycotts: Applying Per Se Analysis and Rule of Reason

Group boycotts, or "concerted refusals to deal" have been condemned under both the per se rule and the Rule of Reason, depending upon whether an anti-competitive intent is established. The per se rule against group boycotts is limited to those "naked boycotts" that have no purpose or effect other than the elimination of a competitor. On the other hand, "concerted refusals to deal" that are ancillary to broader pro-competitive objectives are tested against the more rigorous analysis of the Rule of Reason.

In Associated Press v. United States, n57 the Supreme Court struck down a set of rules adopted by the Associated Press that limited access to Associated Press news only to newspapers who were members of the Associated Press news gathering and dissemination cooperative, and also barred Associated Press membership to any newspaper that was in competition with an existing Associated Press member. The combined effect of the two rules deprived access to Associated Press news to any newspaper that competed with another Associated Press member.

While the two Associated Press rules in combination were held to be illegal, the Supreme Court affirmed that a single rule that limited access to Associated Press news only to Associated Press members was necessary to maintain the value of the Associated Press network. n58 So long as any newspaper could join Associated Press on reasonable terms, a rule forbidding Associated Press members from conveying Associated Press news to non-members was a reasonable "group boycott" that was essential to the preservation of the Associated Press, which itself served a pro-competitive purpose in the market for news of current events.

[a] Market Power of Parties Not Relevant in Per Se Cases

Group boycotts among competitors carried out through professional associations that are clearly intended to achieve a result through the elimination of competition are per se illegal. For example, In FTC v. Superior Court Trial Lawyers Ass'n, n59 the attorney members of the Superior Court Trial Lawyers Association of the District of Columbia attempted to gain an increase in the hourly rates paid by the D.C. City Council to defend indigent criminal defendants. The Association members passed a resolution agreeing not to accept any further appointments to represent criminal defendants unless the City Council raised the authorized hourly rate of compensation. Rejecting arguments that the Association's conduct was antitrust exempt as a collective effort to influence governmental policy-making, n60 the Supreme Court declared the Association's action to be a per se illegal group boycott designed to affect price. Significantly, the Supreme Court held that the Association's boycott was per se illegal without regard to whether the Association possessed market power because the Association's action was a "naked restraint" on price and output. n61

Other examples of per se illegal group boycotts are a trade association persuading manufacturers not to sell products to non-member distributors in Montague v. Lowry,ⁿ⁶² and a trade association's circulating a "black list" of lumber wholesalers who sold their products at retail in Eastern States Retail Lumber Dealers' Ass'n v. United States.ⁿ⁶³

In Klor's, Inc. v. Broadway-Hale Stores, Inc.,ⁿ⁶⁴ the Supreme Court held that the competitive impact of the elimination of the plaintiff on the relevant market was not to be considered where the defendant's conduct was so obviously intended to destroy competition that it would be declared illegal per se. In Klor's, a large appliance retailer persuaded leading appliance manufacturers not to sell appliances to a small appliance retailer that competed with the defendant. The record showed that the relevant market was highly deconcentrated and that the elimination of the plaintiff would not have any perceptible impact on competition in the relevant market.

The Klor's case made clear that the per se rule applies to concerted action that has the purpose and effect of denying the "target" of the concerted action access to goods or facilities that the target needs in order to compete. It also dispelled any suggestion a prior decision, Fashion Originators' Guild of America v. FTC.,ⁿ⁶⁵ may have created that group boycotts by organizations without market power would not be illegal. The Fashion Originators' Guild was an association of women's dress designers. The Guild members became concerned about "style pirates" who created inexpensive imitations of the Guild members' "original" designs. The Guild adopted an ethical rule that prohibited Guild members from selling dresses to any retail store that also carried the dresses of "style pirates." The Supreme Court determined the Guild's ethical rule to be an illegal group boycott in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act. In doing so, however, the Court relied upon the fact that the Guild's members constituted nearly all of the leading women's dress designers, and, therefore, the Guild's refusal to deal with retailers had a highly coercive effect upon these retailers.

[b] Rule of Reason Analysis Applies to "Pro-Competitive" Boycotts

The Supreme Court has expressly recognized that concerted action that restricts the freedom of certain competitors in a relevant market can also have a pro-competitive impact on competitive conditions as a whole. These types of "group boycotts" are to be judged by the Rule of Reason, and not the per se rule announced in Klor's. For example, in Broadcast Music, Inc. (BMI) v. Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc.,ⁿ⁶⁶ the Supreme Court confirmed the application of the Rule of Reason to Broadcast Music, Inc.'s pricing policies on blanket copyright licenses to musical compositions. In National Collegiate Athletic Ass'n v. Board of Regents,ⁿ⁶⁷ the Supreme Court held that the Rule of Reason applied to the NCAA's rules restricting the rights of member universities to license television rights to inter-collegiate football games. Finally, the Court in Northwest Wholesaler Stations, Inc. v. Pacific Stationary & Printing Co.,ⁿ⁶⁸ affirmed the right of a retail stationers' cooperative to expel a member without notice when membership did not constitute a competitive advantage.

In *Chicago Board of Trade*ⁿ⁶⁹ Court upheld a rule adopted by the Board that required Board members to "refuse to deal" except at prices that last prevailed on the floor of the Board's exchange. The Court stated that the rule was as necessary to preserve the pro-competitive impact of the Board's open bidding process for establishing grain prices, and to prevent fraud on traders not privy to the latest prevailing prices.

[5] Tying Agreements Are Per Se Illegal: Three Elements of Claim

In Northern Pacific Railway Co. v. United States,ⁿ⁷⁰ the Supreme Court held that tying arrangements are per se illegal when their purpose is to extend a seller's market power in tying product market to a second relevant market for the tied product. A tying arrangement occurs when a seller who has market power in one product or service refuses to sell that product or service to a buyer unless the buyer also agrees to purchase a different and less desired product or service from the same seller. The seller has therefore "tied" the sale of one product or service to the purchase of a second product or service. When the seller has market power in one of the products or services ("the tying product") he is able to use that power to coerce purchases of the second product or service ("the tied product"), which the consumer may not want at all, or may prefer to purchase from a different source.

In Northern Pacific, the railroad sold land adjacent to its tracks to manufacturers on the condition that goods produced at the site be shipped using the railroad's facilities. The Court in Northern Pacific articulated the following three elements of a per se illegal tying arrangement:

- two separate and distinct products or services must be tied together by an express contract or course of dealing between two parties
- the seller of tying product must have sufficient market power in the tying product market to restrain competition in the tied product market
- the amount of commerce restrained in the tied product markets must be not insubstantial n71

[a] "Two Product Requirement": Functional Test

The first issue in any tying case is whether the seller has in fact tied together two separate products or services. The "two product" requirement is not interpreted literally. Otherwise, the sale of three piece suits, salt and pepper shakers, or automobiles with tires would be considered to be tying arrangements. In determining whether two products and services are "separable" for the purpose of tying analysis, the Supreme Court has announced a test based upon the separate functions served by the allegedly separate products, and not whether the products are invariably sold as a combination.

In Jefferson Parish Hospital v. Hyde, n72 the Supreme Court considered whether a hospital's exclusive contract with one anesthesiology practice group illegally tied the use of the anesthesiology group to the use of the hospital's general surgery facilities. The Court held that general surgical services and anesthesiology services were two separate products even though surgery was not performed without anesthesia, and anesthesia was not administered to a patient except as incident to a surgical procedure. The Court noted that surgeons often selected specific anesthesiologists for specific procedures and that hospitals billed for anesthesia services separately from other surgical services. These factors supported a conclusion that anesthesia was a "product" separate from general surgical services.

[b] Market Power Need Not Rise to "Monopoly Power"

The second issue in a tying case is whether the seller has market power in the tying product market. Market power in a tying case is measured in much the same fashion as monopoly power is measured in a case under Section 2 of the Sherman Act. See § 8.03[2] supra. Market power, however, in a tying case need not rise to the same level as "monopoly power." To have market power a seller must have the power to impose a price increase of indefinite duration and not lose market share.

A leading case on whether a tying product seller has "market power" in the tying product market is United States Steel Corp. v. Fortner Enterprises, Inc. n73 In Fortner, U.S. Steel offered below-market financing to purchasers of U.S. Steel's prefabricated houses. A buyer of prefabricated houses challenged U.S. Steel's requirement that its inexpensive financing was only available for purchases of U.S. Steel's prefabricated houses. The attractive financing was alleged to be the "tying product" and U.S. Steel's prefabricated houses were alleged to be the "tied product." The Supreme Court rejected the plaintiff's claims because U.S. Steel was not shown to have any market power in the market for credit. Many other lenders were willing to finance sales of prefabricated homes, but not at U.S. Steel's low rates. As the Court concluded, U.S. Steel was simply offering cheap credit as an inducement to buy expensive houses.

A seller that does not have market power, but who attempts to impose a tying arrangement, is in the same position as a farmer who refuses to sell his wheat unless the buyer also buys the farmer's corn. Those buyers who do not want to buy corn along with wheat will simply buy their wheat from the other farmers who do not require buyers to buy corn.

The third element of a tying violation is that the tying arrangement restrain a "not insubstantial" volume of commerce in the tied product market. This element is of no practical significance since the Supreme Court has held that an arrangement that affects less than $200,000.00 in tied product sales is a "not insubstantial" amount of commerce in the tied product market. n74

In *United States v. (n17)Footnote 30. In his seminal decision on monopolization in United States v. Aluminum Co. of Am., 148 F.2d 416 (2d Cir. 1945) , Judge Learned Hand found that Alcoa produced 90% of the "virgin" aluminum produced in the United States, 64% of the aluminum fabricated and sold in the United States including imported "virgin" aluminum and "secondary" aluminum made from scrap aluminum, and 33% of the non-fabricated aluminum sold as ingot, including "virgin" and "secondary" aluminum. Concerning the question of whether Alcoa possessed a monopoly in any of these markets, Judge Hand held that a 90% market share is clearly a monopoly, a 64% market share is "doubtful," and a 33% market share "certainly is not" a monopoly. 148 F.2d at 424 .

CHAPTER 8 Real Estate Brokers and Antitrust Laws *

10A-8 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 8.04

§ 8.04 Application of the Antitrust Laws to the Real Estate Brokerage Profession

[1] Defining Relevant Market in Real Estate Brokerage Cases

Relevant market definition is often the critical inquiry in an antitrust case. If the market is defined too broadly, the defendant's market power will be understated, and the anti-competitive effects of the defendant's conduct will be minimized. Correspondingly, if the relevant market is defined too narrowly, a defendant's market power will be overstated, and the anti-competitive effects of the defendant's conduct will be magnified.

In defining the relevant market in real estate brokerage cases, it is necessary to examine carefully the product or service impacted by the allegedly illegal restraint of trade or monopoly. That product or service could be real estate brokerage, memberships in real estate trade associations or participation in a multiple listing service, sales of products or services to real estate brokers and their trade associations, or sales of new home construction, existing homes, or commercial, industrial or investment real estate. Furthermore, the market could be national or local in geographic scope, or could involve a few or many competitors.

[a] Product Market Includes Property Owners and Other Brokers

Relevant market definition in a real estate brokerage context is particularly elusive. From a "product market" definition standpoint, see § 8.03[2][a][i], real estate brokers are always in competition with property owners themselves ("for sale by owners" or "FSBOs") who are free to sell their own property without the aid of a real estate broker. "Full service" brokers compete with "limited service" brokers, or even non-licensed companies, who, for a lesser fee, offer property owners only certain services, such as yard signs, classified advertising, contract forms, or phone-answering services.

The product market in real estate brokerage is characterized by a large number of competitors, and closely analogous to a perfectly competitive market. This feature is the cornerstone of the argument that one broker alone could not possess "market share" for a particular relevant market, and therefore no violation of antitrust laws occurred.

[b] Geographic Market Definition Depends on Focus of Business

Practitioners must also define the geographic market. See § 8.03[2][a][ii]. In practice, few real estate brokers market property statewide, although they are licensed to engage in real estate brokerage within an entire state. An individual real estate agent's "market" is usually defined by the properties reachable in a twenty-minute drive from the agent's office or home.

Real estate brokerage companies, on the other hand, may compete in a much broader marketplace. Brokerage firm expansion usually occurs through the opening of a "branch" or "satellite" office in an adjoining market area. The territorial jurisdictions of local real estate trade associations also are indicators of "natural market areas" for real estate brokers.

Brokers may also confine their "markets" to specific types of real estate or neighborhoods within a larger metropolitan area. In Thompson v. DeKalb Board of REALTORS(R),ⁿ⁷⁵ the Eleventh Circuit stated that different parts of Atlanta could each be "relevant markets" for real estate brokerage because the high-priced properties in one part of Atlanta did not compete with the lower priced properties in another part of Atlanta, even though Atlanta-based real estate brokers were licensed to market property throughout the state of Georgia.

Re/Max International, Inc. v. Realty One, Inc.^{n75.1} illustrates the difficulties in defining geographic markets in the real estate brokerage business with sufficient precision to meet market definition standards under the antitrust laws. In the Realty One case, several Re/Max franchises doing business in Northern Ohio sued Realty One, Inc. and another major independent brokerage firm, Smythe-Cramer, Inc., under the federal and Ohio antitrust laws alleging, among other things, that the defendants had monopolized various local real estate brokerage markets.

To meet their burden of defining appropriate relevant markets, the plaintiffs relied upon testimony of an expert economist who analyzed market shares of the defendants within the 161 different suburbs that were identified in the regional multiple listing service that served Northern Ohio. The plaintiffs' expert simply presumed that each one of the suburbs constituted a distinct geographic market since real estate brokerage markets are "very local."

The district court rejected the expert's presumption as without factual support. The court noted that the 161 different communities included municipalities that ranged in population from less than 1,000 to 71,000. The court also noted that there was not any evidence adduced to show that the residents of these communities only sought real estate brokerage services from real estate brokerage firms with offices in the specific community. The court further observed that there was not any evidence that real estate brokerage firms in the communities did not compete for listings in areas outside the community.

In conclusion, the court determined that there is not any reason to conclude that political boundaries necessarily conform, as a matter of law, to commercial real estate brokerage markets.

[2] Price-Fixing of Commission Rates Is Per Se Illegal

Agreements among real estate brokers to fix commission rates are "per se" violations of Section 1 of the Sherman Act, as well as a felony. Prior to the 1970's real estate trade associations promulgated "recommended" commission schedules as a matter of course. The conventional wisdom prior to 1970 was that professional association fee schedules that were merely "recommended" and not enforced as a matter of professional ethics were not Sherman Act violations.ⁿ⁷⁶ The Supreme Court in 1975 flatly rejected this conventional wisdom in Goldfarb v. Virginia State Bar Association.ⁿ⁷⁷ In Goldfarb, the Supreme Court declared that the recommended fee schedule promulgated by the Virginia State Bar Association was per se illegal price-fixing. The Court rejected the notion that fee schedules that were merely "recommended" were permissible under the Sherman Act. The Court in Goldfarb also rejected the proposition that professional fees were not "in" or "affecting" interstate commerce, foreshadowing the Court's holding six years later in McLain v. New Orleans Real Estate Board.ⁿ⁷⁸ its member associations of Realtors from maintaining any fee schedules, whether mandatory or merely recommended. As a result of NAR's efforts, fee schedules promulgated by real estate trade associations have been eliminated, and any vestiges of their effects have long since been dissipated.

Even before the Supreme Court's decision in Goldfarb, the National Association of REALTORS(R) (NAR) prohibited

[a] Agreement Found in Conduct, Writing or Speech

An "agreement" for antitrust purposes can be established by conduct, as well as by oral or written agreements. In United States v. Foley,⁷⁹ the Fourth Circuit upheld the criminal conviction of a real estate broker who announced his intention at a trade association meeting to increase his firm's commission rates due to financial losses he was suffering. Within a few weeks, all other brokers who attended the meeting had also increased their commission rates to match the rate announced by the defendant. The court concluded that the defendant's statement at the meeting was an invitation to agree on price, which the other competitors accepted by raising their commission rates shortly thereafter. The court presumed that none of the real estate brokers could have successfully raised his or her rates had not the rest of the competitors followed suit. If the defendant's competitors had not gone along with the price increases, the defendant who raised his rates would simply have lost even more business to his competitors.

[b] Argument that Uniform Prices Are Result of Competitive Market

In analyzing potential price fixing claims against real estate brokers, it is important to keep in mind the teaching of the Supreme Court's decision in Monsanto v. Spray-Rite Service Corp.,⁸⁰ that "parallel" conduct by competitors is not sufficient to prove that competitors "agreed" to engage in the parallel conduct. An antitrust plaintiff must prove facts that tend to eliminate the possibility that the competitors' uniform conduct is the result of individual unilateral decision-making.

Real estate brokerage markets frequently contain a large number of competitors all charging the same commission rate. Of course, an equilibrium price, or commission rate, in a real estate brokerage market could be the result of a common agreement as reflected in a recommended fee schedule. Uniform prices, however, are also a characteristic of a perfectly competitive marketplace.

[i] Agricultural Market Is Prototypical Perfectly Competitive Market. The hallmarks of perfectly competitive markets are large numbers of sellers, a fungible or "commodity" product or service, and widespread knowledge of prevailing market prices. A market that approximates perfect competition is the market for most agricultural products, such as wheat, corn or soy beans. These markets are characterized by a large number of farmers who produce products that are essentially interchangeable (bushels of corn). Farmers taking their products to market will "charge" the same price for their bushels of corn as every other farmer selling corn on that day. If a farmer tried to charge more than the market price, no buyers would pay the higher price if they could buy the same bushel of corn from another farmer at the lower market price. Likewise, farmers would have no reason to sell their corn at a lower price than the prevailing market price as long as they can sell all of their production at the higher market price, which will maximize the revenues from their crops.

[ii] Real Estate Market: Attributes of Perfectly Competitive Market. The typical real estate brokerage market also has a large number of broker competitors. No single broker generally has the power to raise his or her commission rates above the prevailing market rate and not lose business. Similarly, most real estate brokers will not profit by lowering their commission rates to gain more listings because they will not gain revenue from an increase in listing volume unless those listings are sold before they expire. In their efforts to sell listed property, most brokers face fairly uniform and fixed costs, including the cost of advertising, office overhead, and compensation paid to their sales agents, or to cooperating real estate brokerage firms who may find the buyer for the listed property. If the broker cannot reduce these fixed costs, a lower commission rate will simply reduce his or her net profit. Thus, a strong argument can be made that the uniform commission rates that predominate in most markets are the result of competition and not collusion. As a result of these economic forces confronting real estate brokers in most markets, a uniformity of commission rates within those markets is almost certain to occur. Applying antitrust price-fixing principles to these markets, such uniformity will not be sufficient to support a price-fixing claim unless the plaintiff has clear evidence of collusion among brokers to maintain a uniform commission rate. Given the antitrust awareness of most real estate brokers, such evidence of collusion will rarely be present.

For all of the same reasons that listing commission rates reach an equilibrium point, so also do the rates of cooperative compensation that listing brokers offer to cooperating brokers. These offers of cooperative compensation are typically extended through multiple listing services operated by local real estate trade associations. Listing brokers generally offer the same compensation to cooperating brokers as all other listing brokers are offering. If the listing broker offers a lesser cooperative "split" he runs the risk of discouraging cooperation on his listings as cooperating brokers focus their efforts on listings offering a higher split. On the other hand, a broker has little incentive to offer a greater split if a split at the market rate will generate sufficient efforts by the other cooperating brokers. n81

Uniform commission splits that are common in most markets are therefore most likely the result of competitive forces, rather than inter-broker collusion. Clearly, if real estate brokers collude on the amount of cooperative compensation they will offer or accept, that collusion would be subject to attack as per se illegal price-fixing. The NAR long ago established policies governing the operation of affiliated associations of Realtors that forbid these associations from having any policy or procedure that fixes, suggests, or recommends rates of cooperative compensation between or among real estate brokers. n82

A typical regional multiple listing service is a corporation owned by several local associations of Realtors(R) that previously operated their own separate multiple listing service. The regional multiple listing service corporation operates a computerized database compilation that consists of the aggregation of the separate multiple listing service databases that the local associations of Realtors(R) operated individually prior to the formation of the regional multiple listing service. Hence, after the regional multiple listing service is formed, a real estate broker may belong to any one of the various associations of Realtors(R), or multiple listing services, that own the regional database corporation, and, by virtue of that single membership and participation fee, gain access to the aggregated database compilation containing properties listed for sale throughout the entire metropolitan market area served by all of the associations of Realtors(R) that own the regional multiple listing service database compilation.

In the late 1990s, at the same time that regional multiple listing services were forming or expanding at a rapid rate throughout the United States, the National Association of Realtors(R) amended its membership policies to abandon the rule that a real estate broker who wished to join an association of Realtors(R) or participate in a Realtor(R) association-owned multiple listing service had to join the association of Realtors(R) that had been assigned by the National Association of Realtors(R) the territorial jurisdiction over the location of the broker's office. As a result of this membership policy change, a real estate broker is free to "shop around" for association of Realtor(R) membership services, including multiple listing service participation, among all of the association of Realtors(R) in the metropolitan area, and not simply the one association that has jurisdiction over the location of the broker's office. This freedom of a real estate broker to select the Realtor(R) association and multiple listing service he or she wishes to join is referred to by the National Association of Realtors(R) as its "Board of Choice" policy.

The Board of Choice policy creates an environment in which associations of Realtors(R) in a metropolitan area are in competition with each other for Realtor(R) members and multiple listing service participants. Each association independently determines the "bundle" of membership benefits it offers to real estate brokers in the marketplace, and likewise independently sets its association dues and multiple listing service participation fees at levels necessary to provide this bundle of membership benefits to those brokers who choose to join. As competitors for real estate broker members and multiple listing service participants, associations of Realtors(R) are subject to the antitrust laws to the same extent as any other group of competing businesses in a relevant market.

The status of associations of Realtors(R) as competitors creates antitrust risks when these competing associations decide to form a regional multiple listing service. Typically, the existing associations of Realtors(R) in a market area are of various sizes, and have very different dues and fee structures. On the other hand, if a regionalized multiple listing service database compilation is formed, the multiple listing service participants of each of the shareholder associations of Realtors(R) will be utilizing the exact same database compilation as the participants of every other shareholder association. Consequently, as a result of the Board of Choice policy, the shareholder association of Realtors(R) of a regional multiple listing service are competing among themselves on the terms and conditions upon which they make access to the same database available to real estate brokers in the relevant market.

This price competition for access to the regional multiple database compilation, as well as the other non-multiple listing services benefits that associations of Realtors(R) offer to attract members, can threaten the survival of smaller associations of Realtors(R) who might otherwise be inclined to become a shareholder in a regional multiple listing service database corporation. These smaller associations typically charge higher per capita association dues because they have fewer members over which to spread the cost of association operations. If a broker member of the small association can acquire access to the exact same multiple listing database compilation from a larger neighboring association of Realtors(R) at a lower price, the smaller association may suffer significant membership losses to the point of dissolution.

This competitive threat to smaller or medium-sized associations of Realtors(R) posed by the potential formation of a regional multiple listing service database corporation has led to the adoption of regional multiple listing service corporate structures designed to achieve pricing uniformity among all of the association shareholders for access to the regional multiple listing service corporation database. To the extent these corporate structures have the purpose and effect of creating a single price charged by each shareholder association for access to the regional multiple listing database compilation, these structures are, in all likelihood, per se illegal price fixing in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act.

This is the holding of Freeman v. Sandicor, Inc. n82.1 In Freeman, the eleven associations of Realtors(R) in San Diego County, California decided in 1991 to create a single regional multiple listing service database for the entire county. The associations formed a corporation named Sandicor, Inc. in which each association was a shareholder. Prior to the formation of Sandicor, each association operated its own independent multiple listing service database. By forming Sandicor, the members of each of the associations of Realtors(R) in San Diego County could gain access to an aggregated multiple listing service database for the entire County at a per capita cost that was significantly less than the cost of participating in each of the associations' individual multiple listing services.

The associations of Realtors(R) in San Diego county varied dramatically in size from the large San Diego Association of Realtors(R) to the very small Valley Center Association of Realtors(R). To protect the smaller associations from the risk of membership losses as a result of the formation of the regional multiple listing service corporation, the Sandicor shareholders agreed among themselves on a corporate structure that insured that all multiple listing service participants that accessed the Sandicor database compilation paid a uniform price for such access without regard to the Sandicor shareholder through which the participant gained such access.

First, the associations of Realtors(R) formed the Sandicor corporation for the purpose of operating the single county-wide centralized multiple listing service database compilation. Sandicor's cost of the database hardware and software, executive and administrative staff, rent, telephone, and other overhead expenses required to operate the centralized database would be spread on a per capita basis among all of the multiple listing service participants of all of the Sandicor shareholders.

Second, the Sandicor shareholders entered into a shareholders' agreement that required each Sandicor shareholder to enter into a "Service Center Agreement" with Sandicor. Pursuant to the Service Center Agreement, each shareholder agreed to perform certain "local" services for the multiple listing service participants who accessed the Sandicor database through that particular shareholder. The Sandicor shareholders' agreement and the Service Center Agreements set a uniform fee to be paid by Sandicor to each of the shareholders for the performance of the "service center" functions. The Sandicor governing documents also prohibited each of the shareholders from rebating any of the service center fee it received to its multiple listing service participants.

Each month the Sandicor shareholders billed the brokers who received access to the Sandicor database compilation through that shareholder an amount equal to the per capita cost of providing the "core" Sandicor services, plus the amount to be paid to the shareholder for performing the "service center" functions. Again, each shareholder charged its multiple listing service participants the same monthly fee for access to the Sandicor database as every other shareholder. Every month, each Sandicor shareholder remitted to Sandicor the total amount it collected from its multiple listing service participants, and Sandicor then returned to the shareholder the amount represented by the "service center" component of the fees paid by that shareholder's participants.

This pricing structure resulted in the multiple listing participants of the larger San Diego Association of Realtors(R) paying fees for access to the combined Sandicor database that were significantly more than they had been paying for access to the San Diego Association of Realtors(R) multiple listing service prior to the formation of Sandicor. On the other hand, the multiple listing service participants of the smaller Valley Center Association of Realtors(R) paid significantly less for access to the centralized Sandicor database than they had paid for access to the Valley Center Association of Realtors(R) multiple listing service prior to the formation of Sandicor. The Sandicor governing documents, however, prohibited the San Diego Association of Realtors(R) from agreeing with Sandicor to perform "service center" functions for the San Diego Association multiple listing service participants at a lesser price than the uniform price set for all of the Sandicor shareholders. Likewise, the San Diego Association of Realtors(R) was prohibited from rebating to its multiple listing service participants any portion of the "service center" fee it received from Sandicor. Either of these actions would have enabled the San Diego Association of Realtors(R) to offer its multiple listing service participants access to the Sandicor database at a lesser price, and thereby attract to it multiple listing service participants from other Sandicor shareholders.

In 1998, two brokers who accessed the Sandicor database through the San Diego Association of Realtors(R) sued Sandicor and each of its shareholders alleging that the Sandicor pricing structure was per se illegal price fixing in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act. The federal district court granted the defendants' motions for summary judgment holding that the Sandicor pricing policy was "intra-corporate" conduct that did not satisfy the "concerted action" requirement of Section 1 of the Sherman Act.

On appeal, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals reversed the district court's summary judgment in favor of the defendants and entered summary judgment in favor of the plaintiffs. The Ninth Circuit held that the Sandicor shareholders did not engage in protected "intra-corporate" conduct by agreeing upon the Sandicor pricing structure because the Sandicor shareholders maintained their separate corporate existence and continued to compete among themselves for Realtor(R) members in San Diego County. Through the Sandicor structure, however, they successfully eliminated price competition among themselves for access to the centralized Sandicor database. According to the Ninth Circuit, the Sandicor shareholders' agreement and the Service Center Agreements that prohibited individual negotiation between Sandicor and a shareholder for the price of performing the service center functions, or any rebates by a shareholder to its multiple listing service participants of the service center fees received from Sandicor, was per se illegal price fixing as a matter of law. The case was remanded to the district court for a determination of the amount of the plaintiffs' damages and whether the plaintiffs could represent a class of similarly situated brokers who accessed Sandicor as multiple listing service participants of the Sandicor shareholders.

After remand, the claims of the two original Sandicor plaintiffs were settled. Several additional plaintiffs filed similar complaints against the original Sandicor defendants. These plaintiffs also sought to certify a class of similarly situated brokers. The claims of these plaintiffs were resolved by a class wide settlement approved by the district court in a final judgment in early 2005. Certain objectors to the class wide settlement have appealed this judgment to the Ninth Circuit.

The lesson of the Freeman case is that associations of Realtors(R) as well as real estate brokers can engage in illegal price fixing in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act. Prior to Board of Choice, associations of Realtors(R) did not compete for members. A broker who wished to become a Realtor(R) or participate in a Realtor(R)-owned multiple listing service had to join the association of Realtors(R) or participate in the multiple listing service that had been assigned the territorial jurisdiction by the National Association of Realtors(R) that included the location of the broker's office. After Board of Choice, each association of Realtors(R) in a metropolitan region is a competitor of every other association of Realtors(R) in that market. The Freeman holding makes clear that agreements among competing associations of Realtors(R) to eliminate price competition among themselves are just as illegal as agreements among real estate brokers to fix the amount of real estate commissions. The Freeman case further establishes that the corporate structure of a regional multiple listing service cannot immunize what is otherwise an agreement among competing associations of Realtors(R) to fix the fees they charge to their members or multiple listing service participants.

As a result of Freeman, associations of Realtors(R) that are shareholders of regional multiple listing service corporations must insure that they preserve the shareholders' ability individually to set the price for access through each shareholder to the corporation's centralized database, or, alternatively, remove the shareholders completely from the delivery of multiple listing services to the individual real estate brokers in the market place. If the regional multiple listing service corporation were the sole entity delivering database services to the real estate brokers who participate in the multiple listing service, then the corporation is free to set a uniform price to all brokers who utilize its services. On the other hand, if the association of Realtor(R) shareholders of the regional multiple listing service corporation wish to "mark up" the cost of the service to their members, the associations are prohibited by the Freeman holding from agreeing among themselves on a uniform "mark up" to be charged by each shareholder association.

[3] Group Boycotts and Issues of Proof

Both the per se and Rule of Reason theories of group boycott analysis apply to the real estate brokerage industry. If real estate brokers collude to foreclose competitive opportunities to a rival real estate broker, such collusion will almost certainly be tested under the per se rule.

Group boycott claims under Section 1 of the Sherman Act require proof of concerted action to the same extent as price-fixing cases. Therefore, plaintiffs in a group boycott case cannot rely solely on parallel, or consciously parallel, conduct to prove a conspiracy. Similar to a price-fixing plaintiff, a group boycott plaintiff must introduce evidence that excludes the possibility that the defendants' conduct was the result of unilateral business decision-making.

[a] Presumption of Unilateral Conduct Applies to Individual Defendants

In the real estate brokerage industry, competitors tend to base their actions on what other competitors do. Thus, the real estate brokerage industry is characterized by a high degree of consciously parallel conduct. But this conduct, standing alone, is not sufficient to establish a "conspiracy" for purposes of Section 1 of the Sherman Act. A plaintiff must introduce evidence that overcomes a presumption that the defendants' conduct is not collusive if the defendants have a rational non-collusive explanation for their actions.

Thus, the outcome often turns on the quality of proof that the brokers in fact colluded to inflict competitive injury. In Park v. El Paso Board of REALTORS(R), n83 the Fifth Circuit affirmed a jury verdict against several real estate brokers who were found to have conspired to frustrate the marketing efforts of a so-called "discount" broker who entered the El Paso market. The defendant real estate brokers were found to have:

- (1) disparaged the discounter to buyers and sellers,
- (2) attempted to coerce the discounter to pay higher commission splits to the defendants, and
- (3) refused to pay commission splits to the discounter if he sold one of the defendants' listings.

By contrast, in Market Force, Inc. v. Wauwatosa Realty, Inc., n84 the Seventh Circuit dismissed the case against the defendants where plaintiffs did not offer evidence that rebutted a presumption that the defendants' conduct could be explained by unilateral conduct. n85 In Market Force, the defendants were accused of conspiring to offer a so-called "buyers' broker" less cooperative compensation than the defendants were offering to so-called "traditional" brokerage firms. The evidence showed that the defendants each elected to pay the plaintiff substantially less cooperative compensation than the defendants paid to other cooperating brokers. Certain defendants elected to offer the plaintiff less cooperative compensation only when they became aware that other defendants had already done so. The defendants justified their conduct on the grounds that "buyers' brokers" disclaim any fiduciary duties owed to the defendants or their seller clients. Therefore, the defendants contended that they should not pay "buyers' brokers" cooperative compensation equal to the amount paid to other brokers who act as subagents of the listing broker. Other than the defendants' consciously parallel conduct, the plaintiff did not have any other evidence of collusion among the defendants.

In Re/Max International, Inc. v. Realty One, Inc. n85.1 the federal district court granted summary judgment for two defendant real estate brokerage firms who were sued for allegedly conspiring to impose so-called "adverse commission splits" upon certain real estate franchisee competitors. The Realty One court noted that consciously parallel conduct alone is insufficient to prove a conspiracy; rather, the plaintiffs were required to produce evidence of "plus factors" that tended to negate an inference that the defendants acted independently.

The court observed that these "plus factors" could be evidence of

- (1) common motive;
- (2) exchange of price information; and
- (3) opportunity to meet to collude.

According to the court a "common motive" meant evidence that the defendants' parallel conduct would not be economically rational unless each defendant knew the other defendant would take the same action. The court noted, however, that the plaintiffs' own expert confirmed that each defendant would achieve their objectives in imposing the adverse commission splits on the plaintiffs whether or not the other defendant did the same thing. Since the defendants introduced evidence that their adverse commission split policy was "a sensible business response" to the competitive practices of the plaintiffs, the court found that the plaintiffs had failed as a matter of law to prove an antitrust conspiracy.

[b] Presumption of Concerted Action Applies to Trade Associations

Because the "conspiracy" element of Section 1 of the Sherman Act will be presumptively satisfied in a case involving the policies of a real estate trade association, the association's conduct will be construed to be a "concerted refusal to deal" to the extent the association requires its members to conform to certain behavioral standards under penalty of membership expulsion. Furthermore, real estate brokers may be individually liable when they act collusively through their trade associations. As a result, the policies and practices of real estate trade associations or multiple listing services will, by definition, be construed to be concerted action by the association members. n86

Whether these association policies will be considered illegal per se, or tested under the Rule of Reason, will depend upon whether the policies at issue are shown to have a purpose of inflicting competitive injury, or whether the policies are "ancillary restraints" that support broader pro-competitive objectives.

[i] Anti-Competitive Effects of Multiple Listing Services. Real estate trade associations that operate multiple listing services must be particularly sensitive to the competitive effects of their membership criteria and ethical standards. In most real estate brokerage markets, access to the association and its multiple listing service will be found to be competitively significant, if not essential, to effective participation in the residential brokerage market. n87 The more important association membership is to effective participation in a relevant market, the more scrutiny will be accorded to the competitive effects of the association's policies on that relevant market.

Since real estate trade association policies are almost always based upon a stated purpose of improving market efficiencies through the operation of a multiple listing service, or raising the industry's professional standards through a Code of Ethics, the policies of the association will typically be judged under the Rule of Reason. In United States v. Realty Multi-List, n88 the Fifth Circuit held that the membership criteria established by a local multiple listing service should be judged under the Rule of Reason rather than the per se rule. Under the Rule of Reason, the Fifth Circuit first concluded that access to the service was essential for effective competition in the local brokerage market. The Fifth Circuit next examined the membership criteria of the service to determine whether the criteria advanced a legitimate pro-competitive objective, and did so without unnecessarily excluding otherwise qualified industry participants. The court ultimately held that the service's membership criteria requiring a "favorable" credit rating and business reputation could be interpreted to permit the exclusion of a broker who was unpopular, or viewed as "slow to pay," but who had never violated the law or defaulted on a debt. The court applied a similar analysis and struck down the service's initiation fees that did not bear any relation to the costs of operating the service, and a requirement that a member have an office open during normal business hours.

The Realty Multi-List case addressed whether a multiple listing service's membership criteria were overly restrictive when access to the service was essential to effective competition in the relevant market. Most multiple listing services in the country are owned and operated by local real estate trade associations. In many cases, the associations require real estate brokers to join the association before they are eligible to participate in the association's multiple listing service. This association membership requirement raises the additional issue of whether an association can impose a membership requirement as a condition of access to association services, even when membership is available to any real estate broker who chooses to join.

Real estate trade associations that require association membership as a condition of access to the association's multiple listing service justify the requirement as necessary to ensure that service participants are bound by the association's Code of Ethics that includes an inter-broker arbitration requirement and a requirement that participants refrain from soliciting other participants' clients.

In Pope v. Mississippi Real Estate Comm'n, n89 the Fifth Circuit affirmed a trial court's award of summary judgment to the defendant association on the antitrust legality of the association's requirement of membership in the association as a condition of participation in the association's multiple listing service. In Thompson v. DeKalb Board of REALTORS(R), Inc., n90 however, the Eleventh Circuit took the opposite view. The Eleventh Circuit held that the association could have incorporated its ethical standards into its multiple listing service rules and regulations and achieved the same purpose as requiring service participants to subscribe to the association's Code of Ethics by joining the association. Therefore, the association's membership requirement was overly restrictive and a Sherman Act violation if evidence could be introduced at trial that the association's multiple listing service was competitively significant. n91 The Thompson case was subsequently settled after the Eleventh Circuit issued its order.

Challenges have also been made to the ability of associations of REALTORS(R) to limit other services used by real estate brokers in the course of their business to members of the association. One recent case has challenged an association of REALTORS(R)' rules that limit access to the association's lock box system and to "comparable" information about properties that have been sold to brokers who are members of the association. n91.1

The Antitrust Division of the United States Department of Justice is also scrutinizing the operations of multiple listing services. In May of 2008 the Division filed suit against the Consolidated Multiple Listing Service located in Columbia, South Carolina. The Division challenged under Section 1 of the Sherman Act various provisions of the Service's membership requirements and rules of operations. Among the Service's practices challenged by the Division were a rules (1) prohibiting Service members from using any listing forms other than the form prescribed by the Service, (2) requiring the members to be "actively involved" in the marketing, sale, and closing of all listed property, (3) prohibiting members from operating from "home offices", (4) requiring members to have a place of business in the Columbia metropolitan area, and (5) assessing potential members a non-refundable application fee of $5,000, which far exceeded the Service's actual costs of adding a new member to the Service. On May 4, 2009 the Service and the Division agreed to a Stipulation and proposed Final Judgment in which the Service agreed to eliminate the rules and policies challenged by the Division. n91.2

[iii] Anti-Competitive Effects of Ethical Standards. The principles of Realty Multi-List and Thompson also apply to challenges to a real estate trade association's ethical standards. If access to the association is competitively significant, the association's ethical standards must be shown to advance competition in the marketplace as a whole. The association cannot defend its ethical standards by arguing that competition must be suppressed in order to advance some other public purpose. This is clear from the Supreme Court's holding in National Society of Professional Engineers v. United States. n92 In Professional Engineers, the Society had an ethical rule that prohibited members from engaging in price competition to secure an engineering assignment. The Society justified its rule on the ground that engineers who competed on price might be induced to take less care in performing their work resulting in unsafe buildings. The Supreme Court rejected this defense, and held that the only justification that can be advanced to support an ethical rule that suppresses competition is a showing that the rule has a countervailing pro-competitive effect. Reliance upon some other public policy such as health and safety was foreclosed by Congress when it passed the Sherman Act in 1890 and declared free competition as the country's method of allocating economic resources.

The Supreme Court more recently imposed Sherman Act liability upon an association member who manipulated the association's standard setting process in a manner that benefitted the member's product and correspondingly disadvantaged a competitor's product. In Allied Tube & Conduit Corp. v. Indian Head, Inc., n93 the Court condemned the efforts of a manufacturer of steel conduit to pack a meeting of the National Fire Prevention Association (NFPA) with new Association members whose sole purpose was to vote against a proposal to amend the NFPA National Electric Code to allow the use of plastic conduit in building construction.

Six years earlier in American Society of Mechanical Engineers v. Hydrolevel Corp., n94 the Supreme Court imposed antitrust liability upon the professional association itself when the association allowed a member to deny the association's certification to a competitor's product in violation of the association's policies and procedures. The Indian

Head and Hydrolevel cases illustrate that antitrust liability can be imposed upon both association members, and the association itself if the association's self regulatory power over members or their products or services are manipulated for anti-competitive purposes.

[4] "List Back Agreement" May Constitute Tying Violation

While tying arrangements are not common in the real estate brokerage business, an example of a possible tying violation is a so-called "list back" agreement. A "list back" agreement occurs when a real estate developer also owns or controls a real estate brokerage company. The developer then conditions the sale of homesites in a development on the home builder's agreement to "list back" the finished house for sale with the developer's real estate brokerage subsidiary. When challenged, "list back" agreements have been declared illegal. n95

A "list back" agreement should not be confused, however, with a builder's including in the sale price of a new home an amount equal to a real estate broker's commission. So long as the real estate broker's services were rendered to the homebuilder, there is not any requirement that the home buyer purchase a second product (real estate brokerage services) that he or she does not want. The builder is simply passing along as part of the price of the house the fee the builder owes to the real estate broker who marketed the property. n96

This principle was affirmed in by Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals in Blough et al, v. Holland Realty, Inc., et al. n96.1 In this case, various buyers of newly constructed homes in Boise, Idaho sued several real estate brokers contending that the brokers tied the sale of undeveloped lots to the brokers' services for the home builders who constructed homes on the lots for the plaintiffs. The homebuyers contracted with home builders to construct homes on vacant lots in subdivisions controlled by a developer. The developers had entered into marketing agreements with certain real estate brokers in which the developers paid the brokers a flat fee for the sale of the lot to the builders. The builders in turn agreed to pay the brokers a "referral fee" of three percent (3%) of the price paid by the homebuyers for the improved lot. The builders passed on the three percent "referral fee" to the homebuyers as part of the purchase price of the improved lot.

The homebuyers filed a complaint alleging that the "referral fee" was an illegal tying violation because the homebuyers were required to pay for brokerage services rendered to the home builders as a condition of purchasing a newly constructed home from the home builders. The trial court granted the brokers' motion of summary judgment, which was affirmed by the Ninth Circuit.

The Court held that the homebuyers had failed to prove that the brokers' conduct resulted in any reduction in competition in the market for the "tied" product, which was the brokers' service to the home builders on the sales of the developed lots to the homebuyers. The Court observed that the anticompetitive effects that the prohibition on tying agreements was meant to prevent a foreclosure of competition for the tied product caused by a seller's conditioning of purchase of the tying product on the buyer purchasing the tied product from the tying-product seller rather than from a competing seller. Such "market foreclosure" does not occur, however, when the buyer would not have purchased the tied product under any circumstances from any seller. If the buyer would not have purchased the tied product from any seller, there has not been any foreclosure of another seller's opportunity to make a sale of the tied product, and there has not been any "foreclosure" of competition that is required to establish a tying violation.

Here, the homebuyers did not offer any evidence that they would have engaged the services of another real estate broker had they not been required to pay for the defendants' services to the homebuilder. According to the Court, the fee paid by the home builders to the brokers simply increased the price that the homebuyers had to pay for the houses and the lots that they purchased. The brokers' fee was simply a cost to the home builders that they passed onto the buyers. So long as the buyers would not have purchased the brokerage services from another supplier there was not any foreclosure of competition in the brokerage services market, and therefore not any violation of the antitrust laws.

[a] No Tying Issue If Seller Has No Economic Interest

Tying issues can also arise when the sale of a condominium is conditioned on the unit owner's agreement to accept a lease to other facilities such as a swimming pool or parking lot. n97 A tying arrangement does not occur, however, unless the seller of the tying product also has an economic interest in the sale of the tied product. In Carl Sandburg Village Condominium Association No. 1 v. First Condominium Development Co., n98 the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals rejected a plaintiff's tying challenge to a condominium developer's requirement that the unit owners retain a particular management company. The court held that an illegal tie-in could not exist because the condominium developer did not have any economic interest in the management company the unit owners were required to utilize.

[b] Conflicting Decisions on Membership Requirements

Courts have reached conflicting conclusions on whether tying claims may be successfully asserted against real estate trade associations' requirement that brokers become association members before they can participate in the association's multiple listing service. The association's multiple listing service is alleged to be the tying product and association membership is alleged to be the tied product. In Thompson v. DeKalb Board of REALTORS(R), n99 the Eleventh Circuit held that a tying claim could be asserted against the association's membership requirement because the association's multiple listing service and association membership were two separate products, and the association could have market power in the market for multiple listing service access.

The First Circuit, however, rejected a tying challenge to a similar rule requiring association membership as a condition for multiple listing service access in Wells Real Estate Company v. Greater Lowell Board of REALTORS(R) n100 The court in Wells held that association membership and multiple listing service participation were not two separate products because the association was not a "seller" of association memberships in the traditional sense that has been applied in tying cases. Association memberships is not a "product" that is sold separately from the benefits and services that are available to association members.

Three cases decided in 2006 suggest that courts are likely to construe the Thompson case narrowly. In Reifert v. South Central Wisconsin MLS Corporation, the plaintiff, a participant in the defendant multiple listing service, claimed that the defendant's rule requiring membership in the association of REALTORS(R) as a condition of participating in the association's multiple listing service is an illegal tying arrangement. The district court recently denied the plaintiff's motion to certify him as a representative of a class of similarly situated brokers. n100.1 The district court then granted summary judgment to the defendants, and the Seventh Circuit affirmed. n100.2 The Seventh Circuit held that Reinfert's tying claim failed because he could not show any loss of competition in the market for the tied product (Realtor Association memberships) by reason of the MLS's requirement that its participants belong to an Association of Realtors(R) as a condition of MLS participation. Reifert could not show any loss of competition in the tied product market because the Realtor Association of South Central Wisconsin was the only real estate brokerage professional association operating in the relevant market; therefore, competition in the tied product market was not affected in any way by the MLS's participation requirements. The Seventh Circuit also affirmed the district court's dismissal of Reinfert's group boycott claim on the ground that Reifert could not identify any real estate broker who was prevented from joining the Association of Realtors(R).

Federal district courts in Washington and Kentucky had earlier reached similar conclusions. In Prencipe v. Spokane Board of Realtors n100.3 the plaintiffs were Realtor members of the Spokane Board of Realtors, but alleged that the only reason they joined the Board was to gain access to the Board's MLS, which required Board membership as a condition of MLS participation. The plaintiffs claimed that the Board's MLS participation requirements were illegal under the antitrust laws as a tying agreement and a group boycott. The trial court entered summary judgment for the defendants on all of the plaintiffs' claims. On the tying claim, the court found that the plaintiffs failed to show any harm to competition in a market for the "tied product" (Board memberships) because the plaintiffs did not adduce any evidence of any competition in the tied product market that was foreclosed by the Board's MLS participation requirement. The court also dismissed the plaintiffs' group boycott claim because the plaintiffs did not introduce any evidence to show that any broker was unable to join or participate in the Board's MLS by reason of the Board's MLS participation rule. Indeed, the plaintiffs themselves were Board members who were participating in the Board's MLS.

The Kentucky federal district court reached the same result in Buyer's Corner Realty, Inc. v. Northern Kentucky Association of Realtors.ⁿ¹⁰⁰ In this case, the managing broker of the plaintiff brokerage firm was a member of the Northern Kentucky Association of Realtors and a participant in the Association's MLS. The plaintiff's broker alleged that the only reason she joined the Association was because the Association required such membership as a condition of MLS participation. The plaintiff alleged that the Association's requirement that MLS participants must be Realtor members of the Association constituted an illegal tying agreement and a group boycott in violation of the Sherman Act. The Association moved for summary judgment on both claims, which the court granted. On the plaintiff's tying claim, the court found that the plaintiff had failed to show that it had suffered any antitrust injury by reason of the Association's MLS participation requirements. The plaintiff contended that the Association's MLS participation rule foreclosed brokers from joining other real estate professional associations that competed with the Association for broker members. The plaintiff, however, failed to adduce any evidence of any other professional association that lost, or could not recruit, members because of the Association's MLS participation rule. The court found the plaintiff's failure to demonstrate how the Association's MLS participation rule harmed competition in any relevant market was also fatal to the plaintiff's group boycott claim.

The Reinfert, Precipe and Buyer's Corner cases all suggest that the courts are becoming much stricter in analyzing antitrust challenges to participation requirements of MLSs owned by Associations of Realtors that require MLS participants to first become Realtor members of an Association of Realtors. Courts reviewing these cases are increasingly limiting the Eleventh Circuit's Thompson decision to its precise facts. In Thompson, the plaintiffs included the Empire Real Estate Board who alleged that the MLS's participation rule caused it to lose a substantial number of members who were compelled as a matter of practical economics to join the Realtor Association rather than the Empire Board in order to be able to participate in the Association's MLS, which was essential to their business. In Reinfert, Precipe and Buyers Corner there was not any competing association as a plaintiff, and the failure of the plaintiffs to show how the Association's MLS participation rule harmed the ability of any other real estate association to compete for members resulted in the dismissal of the plaintiffs' tying and group boycott claims.

Agreements among competitors that are not classifiable as price-fixing, group boycotts, or tying agreements are also potential Sherman Act violations if the effect of the agreement is to restrain trade unreasonably. For example, agreements among real estate brokers to restrict certain types of advertising have been held to violate the Sherman Act.ⁿ¹⁰¹ Real estate trade associations have been held to violate the antitrust laws by discouraging members from accepting "exclusive agency" listings that allow sellers to sell their property themselves without owing a commission to the listing broker.ⁿ¹⁰² Other trade associations have been subjected to antitrust attack when they have attempted to regulate their members' employment practices.ⁿ¹⁰³

While not a basis for an antitrust claim against any individual broker or Realtor Association, many State Associations of Realtors throughout the country beginning in 2004 have urged their legislatures or real estate regulatory agencies to adopt rules that establish "minimum service" levels that all licensed real estate brokers must provide to consumers with whom they enter into exclusive listing agreements.ⁿ¹⁰⁴ These state regulations are targeted at so-called "limited service" brokerage companies who offer to list property and place the listing in the MLS for a minimal flat non-refundable fee. In return for the flat fee, the "limited service" broker typically provides the seller with a yard sign, contract forms, advertising flyers, and an answering service that responds to inquiries from potential buyers. Sellers who list with "limited service" brokers are typically required to conduct their own showings and negotiations with potential buyers, and attend to the details required to close a sales contract. Supporters of these "minimum service" regulations contend that they are necessary to protect consumers from unwittingly retaining a broker believing that the broker will be performing certain functions for the seller, when in fact such services will not be performed. Supporters also argue that these laws are necessary to protect cooperating brokers who may find buyers for these "limited service" listings who find that they must perform functions to consummate a sale on behalf of their buyer client that ordinarily would have been performed by a "full service" listing broker; yet the cooperating broker is only earning a portion of the commission they would ordinarily earn had they both listed and sold the property without cooperation from another broker.

When these statutes have been considered by state legislatures or real estate regulatory agencies, the Federal Trade Commission or the Antitrust Division of the United States Justice Department, or both, have submitted written comments to the state officials urging that these statutes or regulations not be adopted because they will result in competitive harm to the market for real estate brokerage services in the particular state. ⁿ¹⁰⁵ The federal antitrust agencies argue that there is not any evidence of any consumers who have been harmed by being unaware that the "limited service" broker they engaged will not be performing certain functions customarily performed by a real estate broker in an exclusive listing relationship. Any such harm, should it come to pass, could be addressed by full and complete disclosures to consumers at the time they enter into a "limited service" listings. On the issue of cooperative brokers representing buyers compelled to do more work when the seller engages a "limited service" broker, the federal agencies contend that consumers should be free to purchase "unbundled" real estate brokerage services, and brokers should be free to offer such services on an "a la carte" basis. The market place will then determine the extent consumers opt for one service package and pricing system over another.

To date, the federal agencies have been distinctly unsuccessful in persuading state legislatures and regulatory agencies not to adopt "minimum services" requirements for real estate licensees. The trend is towards the adoption of these statutes or regulations, largely because of the enormous political power wielded by State Associations of Realtors who are urging the adoption of these types of regulations.

[6] Antitrust Implications of E-Commerce and Access to Multiple Listing Service Databases

[a] Availability of Electronic Data from Real Estate Multiple Listing Services

In the 1980s and 1990s, real estate multiple listing services converted from printed publications to electronic databases maintained on computers. Multiple listing participants directly input into computerized databases information about new listings taken by their offices, and also update listing information as listing prices or other terms change, and properties are placed under contract and ultimately sold and closed. Likewise, brokers working with prospective buyers access the multiple listing service database via computers and search the database for properties on the market that meet the buyer's needs and wants. These computerized multiple listing service databases also typically include computerized access to public real estate transfer data, and property tax information. Brokers can also secure current mortgage rate information, down payment and monthly payment calculators, and other productivity-enhancing applications through their multiple listing services.

During the late 1990s, computerized multiple listing services began another evolution from databases maintained on computer servers accessible only through dial-up connections over separate telephone lines to computer servers accessible via the Internet. Users of an Internet-based multiple listing services connect to the multiple listing service database using whatever Internet connection and browser serves their real estate office computer network.

While most real estate multiple listing services now operate accessible computer databases, the basic "core" function of the multiple listing service has not changed. The service is still intended, fundamentally, to provide a means for real estate brokers to exchange data for the purposes of cooperatively marketing the listed property. Multiple listing services continue to treat the listing data as proprietary data accessible only to legitimate participants in the service. Most multiple listing services also have registered copyright claims in their computerized real estate data compilations.

At the same time that multiple listing services were developing Internet-accessible computer databases to maintain information on listed and sold property, other companies were developing Web sites on the World Wide Web for the purpose of displaying information to consumers about property for sale throughout the country, and about other services necessary to consummate a real estate transaction, such as mortgage financing, insurance, and escrow services. The largest of these "national aggregators" of real estate listing information on the Internet are "Realtor.com" operated by Move, Inc.

These companies depend on a continuing supply of comprehensive and current listing data about real estate available for sale. To secure this listing data, they enter into licensing agreements with real estate multiple listing services to post the listing data from the service on the company's Website. The Internet Website operators depend on the availability of this listing data to attract visitors to their Website. The volume of visitors to the Website in turn determines the amount of fees the Website can charge for banner advertising that appears on the Website.

[b] MLS Exclusive Data License Agreements with National Internet Listing Data Aggregators

Some Internet-based national listing aggregators have entered into exclusive agreements with many multiple listing services serving major metropolitan markets. These exclusive agreements preclude the multiple listing service licensor from entering into any data licensing agreement with any other national Internet listing data aggregator.

These exclusive licensing agreements raise the issue of whether the agreements restrain competition unreasonably among national Internet aggregators. Securing listing data from the largest, or perhaps only, multiple listing service in a major market area is plainly the most efficient means of acquiring listing data about property for sale in that market. The only alternative is to enter into separate licensing agreements with each and every individual real estate brokerage firm in the market served by the multiple listing service. Hence, an exclusive licensing agreement between a national Internet aggregator and a multiple listing service serving a major metropolitan market can effectively foreclose access to listing data from that market to other competing national Internet aggregators.

This potential anti-competitive effect on competition among national Internet aggregators has caused the Antitrust Division of the United States Department of Justice in 2000 to open an investigation into the lawfulness of the exclusive licensing agreements entered into by Homestore.com, Inc., the predecessor of Move, Inc., and the operator of "Realtor.com," the largest national Internet aggregator, with the multiple listing services serving most major metropolitan areas. The Division's investigation was closed after Realtor.com made the decision to abandon its exclusive licensing program. More recently, in Klickads, Inc. d/b/a Brokers NYC v. Real Estate Board of New York, et al n106 the plaintiff alleged that the Real Estate Board of New York (REBNY) conspired with several of the larger brokerage firms doing business in Manhattan and certain third party technology vendors in violation of the Sherman Act by adopting rules that effectively required REBNY members to use the systems of the defendant vendors to comply with REBNY's newly adopted policy mandating that members share listings with each other. The Manhattan real estate brokerage market has never been served by a traditional multiple listing service. Prior to 2002, Manhattan brokers did not cooperate with each other in the sale or rental of residential property.

In 2002, REBNY adopted rules mandating that its members share listings with each other on a cooperative basis. In 2005, REBNY adopted another rule mandating that members use the defendant vendors' automated listing dissemination software. The plaintiff was another technology vendor who provided a software product that performed the same automated listing dissemination function as the defendant vendors' products. Plaintiff alleged that the defendants' conduct constituted an illegal conspiracy to boycott the plaintiff's product. The defendants filed a motion for summary judgment claiming that plaintiff had not adduced evidence sufficient to permit a finding of a Sherman Act violation. The court denied the defendant's motion finding that questions of fact existed concerning whether the efficiencies cited by the defendants that resulted from a single interface for the dissemination of REBNY members' listings required that only two technology vendors be allowed to access the single interface. The Klickads case teaches that real estate broker trade associations can violate the antitrust laws whenever they exercise market power in a manner that excludes competitors from a relevant market, and the excluded competitors with standing to sue can include technology vendors or other service providers.

PART III Public Regulation

CHAPTER 8 Real Estate Brokers and Antitrust Laws *

10A-8 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 8.05

§ 8.05 Program for Compliance

The economic consequences of an antitrust judgment against a real estate brokerage company, or real estate trade association, can be the business equivalent of capital punishment. Treble damages, attorneys fees, and possible jail terms and criminal fines are more that most businesses can withstand. Antitrust compliance for real estate brokers must begin with education of the brokers, and perhaps more importantly, education of the broker's sales agents. Brokers must make clear to their sales agents that antitrust compliance is high priority and failure to adhere to the firm's antitrust compliance policies can, and will, lead to discipline and potential dismissal.

Brokers and agents must clearly understand that any collusion with competitors on matters relating to the commission rates or other economic terms of a listing agreement are strictly forbidden. The same is true of any collusion or agreements relating to otherwise lawful and ethical business practices, such as non-deceptive advertising, office hours, or hiring of sales agents. Once basic antitrust principles are understood, compliance should not be overly difficult. Antitrust awareness and compliance by real estate brokers should also ensure that the real estate markets in the United States remain among the most liquid and efficient in the world.

[1] Comments to Be Avoided

Antitrust plaintiffs typically rely on circumstantial evidence of the defendants' allegedly collusive conduct. Rarely does an antitrust plaintiff have a letter or tape recording of a conversation in which the defendants' memorialize their agreement to restrain trade. Circumstantial evidence consists of statements by the defendants orally or in writing that are consistent with the existence of an agreement to restrain trade. Since actual agreements to restrain trade rarely occur in the real estate industry, brokers and agents must take care to express themselves to competitors, clients, and other participants in a real estate transaction, in terms that reflect the absence of any collusion among competitors. For example, the following phrases, or others like them, should never be used:

- "Everyone else charges the same rates as we do."
- "Why did you agree to lower your commission? If you do that again, the rest of us will have to do something about it."

- "Did you hear about that new discount firm that just opened? They won't last long if no other firm cooperates with them."

Each of these comments permits the inference that competitors have colluded to achieve a common objective. While each statement is capable of being explained in non-collusive terms, these statements may be sufficient to allow and antitrust plaintiff to overcome a summary judgment motion and have his or her case decided by a jury.

Real estate brokers should also be vigilant in their dealings with the trade associations. Antitrust enforcers view trade association meetings as fertile ground for evidence of collusion among competitors. This is true because competitors come together at trade association meetings to discuss issues of general concern to the industry as a whole. Conversations at these meetings can easily turn to concerted action to increase industry profits by fixing prices or eliminating other types of competition that industry participants may view as "destructive" or "ruinous."

[2] Document Objections to, or Explanations for Anti-Competitive Conduct

Real estate brokers who are present at meetings of competitors where these forbidden topics are raised or discussed must take immediate and unambiguous steps to disassociate themselves from any participation in a possible conspiracy to restrain trade. If official minutes are kept, a broker or agent should be sure that the broker's or agent's objections to any anti-competitive conduct be noted in the record. If a formal record of the meeting is not kept, the broker or agent should immediately communicate in writing his renunciation of any collusive behavior to the other participants in the meeting. Finally, the broker or agent should ensure, to the extent possible, that his or her own conduct is not consistent with any agreement among competitors to restrain trade.

Not only should real estate brokers and agents avoid any participation, or the appearance of participation, in collusive behavior with competitors on matters relating to price or other terms, conditions, or methods of doing business, but brokers and agents should also take positive steps to ensure that they can document that their decisions relating to their firm's commission structure or other business practices were made unilaterally. For example, when brokers decide to change their firm's commission rate structures, or their offers of cooperative compensation to other brokers, they should document their reasons for doing so through memoranda to the file, or to their sales agents. The memorandum should indicate that the decisions were based upon the firm's costs and expenses, and prevailing competitive conditions in the marketplace. Distribution of the memorandum should be confined solely to members of the broker's own firm.

[3] Avoid Sharing Correspondence with Competitors

Brokers should also avoid sharing their business correspondence to one broker with other brokers in the marketplace. It is not uncommon for a broker to write to another broker to advise that broker that the cooperative compensation offered to that other broker will be lower than the amount appearing in the local multiple listing service compilation. Sometimes a broker will copy other brokers in the marketplace on such a letter. The other brokers may then be motivated to send the same type of letter to the recipient of the original letter. The other brokers may even duplicate the words nearly verbatim from the original letter. Proof that the original letter was also sent to other brokers, and that, within a short time, the recipient of the first letter also received virtually the same letter from the other brokers, raises a strong inference that the recipient of the original letter is the target of a group boycott. Simply put, sharing business correspondence with competitors who do not have a direct interest in the subject matter of the correspondence is extremely dangerous.

CHAPTER 9 The Broker And Discrimination *

10A-9 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice Scope

Scope

SCOPE

Chapter 9 addresses discriminatory housing practices and laws designed to prohibit such practices. Major legislation is first examined to familiarize the reader with the statutes being discussed throughout the chapter (§ 9.01). Prohibited acts of discrimination are then addressed and include:

- Discrimination in the sale or rental of housing (§ 9.02[1][a]).
- Discrimination in advertising for sale or rental (§ 9.02[1][b]).
- False representations of unavailability (§ 9.02[1][c]).
- Blockbusting and steering (§ 9.02[1][d]).
- Discrimination in brokerage services (§ 9.02[2][a]).
- Interference, coercion, or intimidation (§ 9.02[2][b]).
- Discrimination based upon familial status (§ 9.02[3][a]).
- Discrimination based upon handicap or disability status (§ 9.02[3][b]).
- Discrimination based upon gender (§ 9.02[3][c]).

Those properties, persons, and activities exempted under the Fair Housing Act are then discussed (§ 9.03). Enforcement and penalties under the Fair Housing Act are then examined (§ 9.04), with an examination of the parties to a civil housing discrimination lawsuit (§ 9.04[1], [2]), a broker's right to intervene (§ 9.04[3]), and the types of damages and related relief allowed under the Fair Housing Act (§ 9.04[4]).

Major means of proving a housing discrimination case are examined (§ 9.05[1]), as are major bases of defense (§

9.05[2]). A separate subsection is devoted to the impact of Daubert and its progeny on the admissibility of opinion testimony in housing discrimination cases (§ 9.05[3]).

As almost all federal housing discrimination complaints are processed through the United States Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD), the practices and procedures one will encounter in dealing with HUD, whether one is the complainant or the respondent, are examined (§ 9.06). For ease of reference, state laws specifically intended to prohibit discriminatory housing practices are listed (§ 9.07).

The National Association of Realtors(R) and HUD have entered into a Fair Housing Partnership Agreement to foster a cooperative approach in promoting fair housing in all communities throughout the United States. This landmark agreement is discussed in § 9.08. Because of its potential impact upon brokers regarding certain properties accessible to the public, the requirements of the Americans with Disabilities Act are briefly examined (§ 9.09).

Discrimination against real estate licensees is briefly discussed in § 9.10.

CHAPTER 9 The Broker And Discrimination *

10A-9 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 9.01

§ 9.01 Prohibiting Discrimination--Major Legislative and Judicial Developments

[1] Civil Rights Act of 1866

The Civil Rights Act of 1866, as passed by Congress, guaranteed to all United States citizens the same right as white citizens to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold and convey real property. n1

[a] Continued Discrimination Under the Civil Rights Act of 1866

The Civil Rights Act of 1866 provided little relief from racial discrimination, as evidenced by decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court:

- In 1883 the U.S. Supreme Court held that the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution (the equal protection clause) did not prohibit private acts of discrimination but only prohibited acts of discrimination that were the result of government action. n2
- In 1896 the U.S. Supreme Court held that enforcement of racial segregation for private or public facilities did not violate the United States Constitution if the separate facilities were "equal." n3

[b] Major Anti-Discrimination Developments Through 1968

The U.S. Supreme Court withdrew from its support of discriminatory practices in two landmark decisions:

- In 1948 the U.S. Supreme Court held that state enforcement of a private racially restrictive covenant constituted sufficient government involvement to violate the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. n4
- In 1954 the U.S. Supreme Court reversed the "separate but equal" position espoused in 1896, prohibited segregation in schools and rejected legalized segregation. n5

The executive branch of the government followed the trend and in November 1962 President Kennedy signed an executive order prohibiting discrimination in housing zoned, operated, or assisted by the federal government. Two years later Congress enacted Title VI to the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which prohibited discrimination in programs receiving federal financial assistance.

In June 1968 the U.S. Supreme Court held that the Civil Rights Act of 1866 prohibited private racial discrimination in housing in addition to racial discrimination by the government. n6 Specifically, the Supreme Court found that the plaintiff, who had been denied the right to purchase a home because of his race, could seek judicial relief under 42 U.S.C. § 1982, which provides that "all citizens in the United States shall have the same right as is enjoyed by white citizens to ... purchase, lease, sell, hold and convey real and personal property." This decision, rendered during the same year as the Civil Rights Act of 1968, was the first by the U.S. Supreme Court to prohibit discrimination in the private housing market. Though § 1982 only offers protection on racial grounds, in the appropriate case it remains a viable alternative or supplement to the Fair Housing Act.

[2] Fair Housing Act of 1968

The Fair Housing Act was enacted by Congress as Title VIII of the Civil Rights Act of 1968. n7 The Fair Housing Act (also commonly referred to as "FHA" and as "Title VIII") prohibited discrimination on the basis of race, color, religion, and national origin. It provided remedies for public housing discrimination and for private housing discrimination.

The Fair Housing Act was amended in 1974 to prohibit discrimination on the basis of gender.

[3] Major Anti-Discrimination Developments Through 1988

Discrimination based on gender in housing zoned, operated, or assisted by the federal government was prohibited by an executive order entered by President Carter during 1980 that expanded President Kennedy's executive order of November 1962. The 1980 executive order also granted additional authority to the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) to issue regulations to encourage fair housing.

The U.S. Supreme Court rendered two major decisions regarding those who had standing to sue for violations of the Fair Housing Act:

- In 1972 the U.S. Supreme Court upheld the right of fair housing organizations and other residents to sue persons or municipalities that violated the Fair Housing Act. n8
- In 1982 the U.S. Supreme Court determined that fair housing organizations and "testers" had standing to sue in racial steering cases. n9

[4] Fair Housing Amendments Act of 1988

The Fair Housing Amendments Act of 1988 (commonly referred to as "FHAA") expanded the classes of persons protected from housing discrimination to include families with children and handicapped persons. n10 Simultaneously, it created exemptions from the Act for maximum occupancy limitations and housing for older persons. The Fair Housing Amendments Act also increased the amount of civil damages available under Title VIII and expanded the types of discriminatory practices regulated by Title VIII to include:

- real estate loans for repairs and improvements,
- certain secondary market activities, and
- real estate appraisals. n11

The Fair Housing Amendments Act was signed into law by President Reagan during 1988 and became effective on March 12, 1989.

[5] HUD Regulations Implementing the Fair Housing Amendments Act of 1988

Pursuant to the mandate of the Fair Housing Amendments Act of 1988, the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) issued sweeping regulations to implement the provisions of the FHAA. Many of those regulations affect the daily activity of real estate brokers.

Under the 1988 amendments, HUD received new enforcement authority. The Fair Housing Act, as amended, provides that:

(1) HUD must prepare a final investigative report and determine whether reasonable cause exists to believe that a discriminatory housing practice has occurred. n12

(2) If HUD makes a sufficient reasonable cause determination it must issue a charge against the respondent on behalf of the aggrieved person, and the charge initiates legal proceedings before an administrative law judge; or, n13

(3) After such a charge, either party may elect to have the claims adjudicated in a federal civil action, n14 and if such an election is made, HUD must authorize the Attorney General to commence and maintain a civil action on behalf of the aggrieved person. n15

The right of the government to file a cause of action on behalf of the aggrieved party was a new development under the 1988 amendments. No longer was the government limited to filing a traditional "pattern or practice" lawsuit. To prove a practice or pattern of discrimination the government was formerly required to show that the defendant engaged in discriminatory activity as a matter of standard operating procedure. n16 Isolated or sporadic acts of discrimination were insufficient to prove a pattern or practice under the FHA. n17 The government could now step into the shoes of the aggrieved party and file suit for any individual act of discrimination, while the aggrieved party retained the absolute right to intervene. n18

Regulations were enacted in addition to those establishing procedures for the investigation of complaints of discriminatory housing practices and for administrative proceedings involving discriminatory housing practices. Other HUD regulations describe the nature of conduct made unlawful with respect to the sale, rental and financing of dwellings or in the provision of services and facilities in connection with such dwellings.

The FHAA also made it unlawful to design or construct certain multi-family dwellings for first occupancy after March 13, 1991 in a manner that makes them inaccessible to persons with disabilities. Section 100.205 of HUD's regulations implements the FHA's design and construction requirements (also referred to as "accessibility requirements"). n19 HUD published final Fair Housing Accessibility Guidelines to provide builders and developers with technical guidance on how to comply with the accessibility requirements. n20

The regulations issued under Title VIII have been revised to reflect the expanded coverage of the Fair Housing Act. Finally, HUD amended regulations providing for the recognition of substantially equivalent state and local fair housing laws to provide for the certification procedure established by the FHAA. n21

[6] All Legislative and Regulatory Sources--Federal, State, and Local--Should Be Examined to Ensure Compliance

In addition to the Fair Housing Act, other civil rights authorities may apply regarding a discriminatory housing practice. Certain discriminatory housing practices are prohibited by many federal laws, including the following:

- Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964; n22
- section 109 of the Housing and Community Development Act of 1974; n23
- section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act; n24 and
- the Age Discrimination Act. n25

There are also myriad national, state, and local regulations intended to define and eliminate discrimination in housing. The same activity may be regulated at all three levels and all legislative and regulatory sources should be examined to ensure compliance. For example, in New York City one will find that blockbusting is prohibited by federal law, n26 is prohibited by state law, n27 and is prohibited by local law. n28 Further, conduct that is exempt under federal law may still be prohibited by state statute. For example, federal law regarding discriminatory housing practices contains an exemption for sale by an "owner" of a single-family dwelling. n29 Maryland state law regarding discriminatory real estate practices in Baltimore City does not follow the federal exemption. The Maryland law applies to any building intended to be occupied as a residence. n30

Real estate brokers are subject to regulation at all three levels and are protected at all three levels. If there is a question of whether an activity is lawful, all legislative sources should be considered before one engages in the activity. Similarly, if a broker has suffered a loss due to an unlawful discriminatory housing practice, he or she should examine all levels of legislation and regulation for possible relief.

CHAPTER 9 The Broker And Discrimination *

10A-9 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 9.02

§ 9.02 Prohibited Acts of Discrimination Under Federal Legislation

[1] Discriminatory Housing Practices

It is the purpose of the Fair Housing Act (Title VIII or FHA) to provide for fair housing throughout the United States. n1 The Fair Housing Act of 1968 prohibited discrimination in the sale or rental of housing on the basis of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin. The scope of protection was enlarged by the Fair Housing Amendments Act of 1988 (FHAA) n2 and by regulations promulgated by the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD).

It is now unlawful under the Fair Housing Act, as amended and supplemented, to discriminate in any aspect relating to the sale, rental, advertising, or financing of dwellings based on seven protective classifications, specifically: race, color, religion, national origin, sex, handicap, or familial status. n3 "Dwellings" are defined to include any building, structure, or portion of any building or structure that is occupied as, or designed or intended for occupancy as, a residence by one or more families, and any vacant land offered for sale or lease for the construction or location of any such building or structure. n4 A "family" may consist of a single individual. n5

[a] Discrimination in the Sale or Rental of Housing

One may not refuse to sell or rent after a bona fide offer has been made, nor may one refuse to negotiate for the sale or rental of, or otherwise make unavailable or deny a dwelling to any person because of race, color, religion, national origin, sex, handicap, or familial status. n7 This prohibition is commonly violated when one refuses to rent or sell a dwelling to an individual who falls within one of the seven protective classifications. Such an individual is referred to as a member of a protected class.

To make out a prima facie discriminatory housing refusal case, a plaintiff must show that he or she is a member of a statutorily protected class who applied for and was qualified to rent or purchase housing and was rejected although the housing remained available. n8 A plaintiff stating a claim under the FHA need allege "only discriminatory effect, and need not show that the decision complained of was made with discriminatory intent." n9

Similarly, one may not discriminate against any person in the terms, conditions or privileges of sale or rental of a dwelling because of race, color, religion, national origin, sex, handicap, or familial status. One may not discriminate in the types of services or facilities provided incident to the sale or rental of a dwelling because of race, color, religion, national origin, sex, handicap, or familial status. n10 This is known as discrimination in terms or conditions. A common example of a violation of this prohibition is when one charges additional monies to a member of a protected class to dissuade or prevent that individual from purchasing or renting a property.

Regulations promulgated by HUD list four activities that are prohibited if they are based on any of the seven protected classifications:

- Using different provisions of the sales or lease contract for different individuals;
- Failing or delaying in the maintenance or repairs to sale or rental dwellings;
- Failing to process or accurately communicate an offer for the sale or rental of a dwelling; or
- Limiting the use of privileges, services, or facilities associated with the building because of the protected classification of the owner, tenant, or person associated with the owner or tenant. n11

Similarly, it is unlawful to discriminate in the sale or rental of a dwelling because of the buyer's or lessee's refusal to provide sexual favors. n12

[b] Discrimination in Advertising for Sale or Rental

An advertisement in any form that indicates any preference, limitation, or discrimination based on race, color, religion, national origin, sex, handicap, or familial status, or that indicates an intention to make such a preference, is prohibited. n13 Congress concluded that the regulation of advertising practices was warranted because of the key role housing advertisements play in potential real estate transactions. n14

The Fair Housing Act's prohibition against discriminatory advertising applies to the publisher of the advertisement as well as to the party who places the advertisement. n15 The prohibition extends to all advertisements regardless of the medium used, including all written statements and oral statements. n16

In determining whether an advertisement or statement "indicates" impermissible discrimination, the court determines whether the advertisement for housing suggests to an ordinary reader, viewer, or listener that a person of a particular race or other characteristic is preferred or that a member of a protected class is not preferred for the housing in question. n17 Claimants may establish violations of section 3604(c) by proving an actual intent to discriminate. n18 A claimant, however, is not required to establish discriminatory intent or establish discriminatory effect to recover on a claim of discriminatory advertising. n19 A claimant may establish a prima facie case by showing by oral testimony that she or he was exposed to the advertising that indicated impermissible discrimination and was substantially insulted or distressed by one or more advertisements, with the nature and extent of the claimant's injury to be reflected in the amount of damages awarded. n20

Following are a few examples of what courts have found to constitute discriminatory advertising prohibited by the Fair Housing Act:

- A rental ad specifying that an apartment was in a "white home"; n21
- A landlord's statement to a white tenant that she should send her friends over to see a vacant apartment but to "make sure her friends are whites"; n22 and

- The exclusive use of Caucasian models in advertisements appearing in newspapers and on the sides of buses. n23

In contrast, the single publication of an advertisement that uses a small number of all-white models does not, without more, state a cognizable claim for discriminatory advertising under the Fair Housing Act. n24

Further, an affirmative marketing program with advertising efforts directed toward a predominantly white audience with the intention of promoting racial balance in an area of predominant interest to black home buyers has been upheld under the FHA. n25 The decision was based on the goal of the Fair Housing Act to eliminate segregated housing coupled with the facts that limited race-conscious marketing was utilized, the intent was to promote racial balance, there were no racial quotas or other provisions that made race a factor in deciding who would be allowed to see or purchase a home, and members of the protected classes (referred to as minorities) were not excluded. n26

HUD has enacted regulations specifically prohibiting the following discriminatory advertising practices:

- The use of any catch words or phrases implying that dwellings are or are not available to a member of a protected class. n27
- The selection of particular media for advertising locations that effectively discriminates against a protected class by denying them housing market information. n28
- The refusal to publish sale or rental advertising because of a protected classification, or charging different rates for such advertising based upon the classification. n29

[c] False Representations of Unavailability

One may not falsely represent to any person because of race, color, religion, national origin, sex, handicap, or familial status that a dwelling is not available for inspection, sale, or rental when that dwelling is available for inspection, sale, or rental. n30 This prohibition creates an enforceable right to truthful information for every person. n31 A misrepresentation made about the availability of properties for sale or rental is the most common means used to ensure segregation by "steering" a member of a protected class away from a segregated building, area, or community. n32 Section 3604(d) is commonly violated when one refuses to rent or sell a dwelling to an individual who falls within one of the seven protective classifications. Such an individual is referred to as a member of a protected class.

The following are examples of facts upon which courts have upheld plaintiffs' rights to pursue claims under 3406(d) for false representations of unavailability:

- A black prospective tenant was informed that no apartments were available. Upon investigation, a black tester was informed that apartments were not available, and a white tester was informed that apartments were available. n33
- An apartment manager refused an application from a family receiving income from the Federal Aid to Families with Dependent Children program. During an investigation a tester who claimed to receive welfare payments was told no apartments were available for inspection until the following week. Later that day another tester who did not claim to receive federal assistance and did not report children was shown an apartment. n34
- The manager of an apartment complex told a black prospective tenant that no apartments were available and her requests to see floor plans or to view a model unit were refused. The next day a white prospective tenant, after being told that apartments were available immediately, was allowed to inspect a model and several available units. n35

[d] Blockbusting and Steering

Blockbusting and steering are two primary techniques that were utilized by real estate professionals to perpetuate integration and wrongfully profit from the threat of integration. Though the overwhelming number of cases addressing these practices arise out of racial discrimination, there are many cases involving national origin and the discriminatory practices and the considerations discussed within this subsection apply to all protected classifications. Extensive legislation exists at federal, state, and local levels, prohibiting blockbusting and steering.

[i] Blockbusting

Blockbusting is specifically prohibited under section 3604(e) which makes it unlawful for one to induce or try to induce any person to sell or rent any dwelling by making a representation regarding the entry or prospective entry into the neighborhood of one or more persons of a particular race, color, religion, sex, handicap, familial status, or national origin. n36

Blockbusting has long been identified as a process through which individuals (typically real estate brokers) stimulate and prey on racial bigotry and fear by initiating and encouraging rumors that blacks are about to move into a given area, that whites will leave, and that the market values of properties will descend to panic prices with residence in the area becoming undesirable and unsafe for individuals who are not black. n37 Real estate agents artificially stimulate sales of residential property by making representations to homeowners regarding the migration of a particular racial, ethnic, religious, or social group into the neighborhood. The brokers then use frenzied solicitation practices, known as "churning," as a means of increasing the number of real estate transactions. As a result, brokers gain the benefit of commissions generated by increased sales while "homeowners and communities suffer the detriment of declining property values and neighborhood instability brought on by panic selling, the fanning of racial tensions and promoting of ethnic stereotypes." n38 The practice of blockbusting has been recognized as a fundamental element in the perpetuation of segregated neighborhoods and racial ghettos. n39

Blockbusting techniques used by brokers have included the following:

- Door-to-door solicitation;
- Dissemination of literature stating that a member of a minority group has purchased a home nearby;
- Racial steering;
- Telephone solicitations;
- Obtaining numerous listings in an area and placing "For Sale" signs on the properties to frighten local residents into selling;
- "Wrong number" telephone calls in which the callers claim to have believed they were calling the black family that just moved in;
- Purchasing a home in the area and selling it on contract to a minority buyer;
- Telling owners that the FHA has inspected certain property, implying that it would be sold to a black or to a Hispanic;

- Implying that the police can no longer patrol the area effectively; and
- Telling homeowners that the influx of minorities will adversely affect the schools. n40

The concern, as stated by one court, is that if the real estate industry were "allowed to operate unchecked, the pace of racial transition will be manipulated in a way that will irreparably distort any chance for normal and stable racial change." n41 In that case the plaintiffs were a multiracial group of homeowners and the defendants were a group of incorporated and unincorporated real estate agencies and a number of individual real estate salespersons. Testimony was presented that some of the real estate agents had approached the residents at their homes, although none of them had expressed an interest in selling. The homeowners were warned of impending racial changes in the neighborhood and advised to sell as soon as possible so as to get a good price. The brokers conducted a massive solicitation campaign "involving flyers, telephone calls and door-to-door canvassing." The court stated that the issue was not whether the process by which white families are replaced by black families is either irrational or inevitable, but was whether the real estate industry should be allowed to enter into the process and, for commercial advantage, artificially hasten or at least accelerate the rate of population turnover and the pace of racial change. n42

The transitional nature of the involved area is a key factor in establishing illegal blockbusting. The prohibitions of Section 3204(e) have, therefore, been found applicable to overt blockbusting and other uninvited solicitations in racially transitional neighborhoods. Plaintiffs are required to establish that:

- the solicitations are made for profit;
- the solicitations are intended to induce the sale of a dwelling, and
- the solicitations would convey to a reasonable man, under the circumstances, the idea that members of a particular race are, or may be, entering the neighborhood. n43

Not every uninvited solicitation into a transitional area constitutes illegal blockbusting or unlawful solicitation. A racially neutral solicitation directed to an area experiencing racial transition does not necessarily violate Section 3604(e). n44

[iii] Steering

Steering is a practice used by real estate brokers and agents to preserve and encourage patterns of racial segregation by "steering" or directing members of racial or ethnic groups to buildings or areas occupied primarily by members of their own racial or ethnic group and away from buildings and neighborhoods inhabited by members of other races or groups. n45 Steering is the practice of directing prospective home buyers interested in equivalent properties to different areas according to their race. n46

Though not specifically prohibited under the Fair Housing Act, the means through which steering is most commonly accomplished are prohibited. Those means include:

- unlawful refusals to sell or rent under Section 3604(a),
- discrimination in terms or conditions under Section 3604(b),
- discriminatory publications and advertisements under Section 3604(c),
- false statements of unavailability under Section 3604(d), and

- blockbusting activities prohibited by Section 3604(e).

For example, illegal steering was established when a real estate agency responded differently to testers of different races, with similar rental profiles. The agency directed the white testers to look at apartments in primarily white neighborhoods but directed the African-American and Latino testers to look at apartments in primarily minority neighborhoods or informed the minority tester that no apartments were available. n47

To recover on a claim of steering one must establish that a challenged statement or conduct would have a discriminatory effect on a reasonable person under the circumstances who is seeking housing. Additionally the plaintiff must establish that the challenged statement or conduct was made with the intent to steer. n48

[2] Other Prohibited Acts of Discrimination Under the FHA

[a] Discrimination in Brokerage Services

Section 3606 of the Fair Housing Act makes it unlawful to deny any person access to, or membership or participation in, any multiple listing service, real estate brokerage organization, or facility relating to the business of selling dwellings. n49

[b] Interference, Coercion, or Intimidation

Section 3617 of the Fair Housing Act makes it unlawful to coerce, intimidate, threaten, or interfere with any person who on his or her own behalf or to aid another has exercised rights granted or protected by Sections 3603 through 3606. n50 The language "interfere with" has been applied to reach all practices that have the effect of interfering with the exercise of rights under the Fair Housing Act. n51

Types of conduct found to constitute unlawful interference under Section 3617 include the following:

- racially motivated firebombing; n52
- exclusionary zoning; n53 and
- insurance redlining. n54

Economic competition, however, does not constitute actionable interference, as when one group of purchasers outbid a prospective purchaser who intended to use a property to provide a residential group home for mentally disabled students. n55 Yet, economic consequences may constitute actionable interference, as when a city reduced the amount of rent a mobile park owner could charge after the owner terminated an "adults only" policy to provide housing for families with children. The court, finding that it could not attach value to unlawful discrimination, rejected the city's argument that the rent reduction simply reflected the reduced value of housing services and found that the rent reduction constituted interference under Section 3617.

To state a prima facie claim for retaliation under the Fair Housing Act it must be shown that one was engaging in a protected activity under the Act, that subsequent action was taken against the individual that was causally linked with one's exercise of protected activities, and that some resulting damage was suffered. n56

For example, when hotel owners planned to sell their hotel for development of housing primarily for the mentally disabled, the defendant city and an individual council member interfered with their plans by failing to recommend for approval a loan required by the purchasers to complete the housing project. When the hotel owners threatened to sue the city to obtain approval that had been wrongfully withheld, the city retaliated by citing them for numerous building code violations. The hotel owners spent $40,000 to make repairs and, when the loan was still not approved, filed suit against the city and an individual councilman. In retaliation, the city found that there had not been substantial progress in response to the previous citations and charged the owners with criminal slum offenses. Though the loan was ultimately approved and the housing project proceeded, the hotel owners pursued their Section 3617 claims for retaliation under the FHA. The Ninth Circuit reversed the dismissal of the hotel owners' claims, holding that they had standing to sue under the FHA and that they had stated a prima facie case of retaliation under the Act. The court also held that the councilman was not protected by immunity from the owners' retaliation claim. n57

[3] Discrimination Based Upon Certain Protected Classifications

[a] Discrimination Based Upon Familial Status

The Fair Housing Act has, since its amendment in 1988, prohibited discriminatory housing practices based upon familial status. n58 "Familial status" is defined to mean one or more minors domiciled with a parent or legal custodian, or the designee of a parent or custodian. n59

The fact that adults stay in a dwelling with minors is not sufficient to establish that the minors are domiciled with those adults. For that reason, familial status protection was not extended to a single-family dwelling acquired to house ten troubled adolescents who would be supervised by adult professionals who would stay with them at various times. n60 The court reasoned that a domicile is one's fixed and permanent home and, traditionally, an individual has only one domicile at a time. Adults establish a domicile by their physical presence in a place and by their intent to remain there. The fact that one stays there or spends the night is not sufficient. To establish a dwelling as one's domicile the adults must make it their "home."

Discrimination on the basis of familial status was found, recovery of compensatory damages was affirmed, and punitive damages should have been submitted to a jury in a case where a family with eight children was discriminated against in the following ways:

- it was told the property was rented and unavailable;
- it was told there were no properties available that were "suitable for the family's size"; and
- it was told there were no properties large enough to accommodate the family.

The rent for the property was $1,000 per month. After offering to pay a full year's rent in advance, the real estate broker agreed to lease the property if the family would pay a $3000 security deposit--though the property was offered to the public for monthly rent of $1,000 and a security deposit of $600. n61

The prohibition against discrimination on the basis of familial status often comes into conflict with legitimate limitations on occupancy. For that reason the Fair Housing Act includes an exemption permitting reasonable local, state, or federal restrictions regarding the maximum number of occupants permitted to occupy a dwelling. n62 Therefore, even though limitations on occupancy may have an adverse impact upon families with children, that adverse impact is not sufficient to establish discrimination if the limits are reasonable and apply equally to all occupants. n63 For more information concerning occupancy limits, see § 9.03[4], Limitations on Occupancy.

[b] Discrimination Based Upon Handicap or Disability Status

The Fair Housing Act makes it unlawful to discriminate against any person in the terms, conditions, or privileges of sale or rental of a dwelling, or in the provision of services or facilities in connection with such dwelling to:

10A-9 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 9.02

- (1) any buyer or renter based on the handicap of the renter or buyer;
- (2) a person who lives with or intends to live with the handicapped renter or buyer; or
- (3) any person associated with the handicapped renter or buyer. n64

A person with a handicap is defined as a person who:

- (1) has a physical or mental impairment which substantially limits one or more of that person's major life activities;
- (2) has a record of having such an impairment; or
- (3) is regarded as having such an impairment. n65

The Department of Housing and Urban Development has clarified the foregoing definition. "Has a record of such an impairment" means that the individual has a history of, or has been misclassified as having, a mental or physical impairment that substantially limits one or more major life activities. "Is regarded as having an impairment" means that the individual:

- (1) has a physical or mental impairment that does not substantially limit one or more major life activities, but that is treated by another person as constituting such a limitation;
- (2) has a physical or mental impairment that substantially limits one or more major life activities only as the result of the attitudes of others toward such impairment; or
- (3) has none of the impairments previously defined but is treated by another person as having such an impairment. n66

There are three exclusions to the prohibition on discrimination based on handicap status:

- (1) current, illegal use of or addiction to a controlled substance; n67
- (2) direct threat to the health or safety of other individuals, or individuals whose tenancy would result in substantial damage to the property of others; n68 and
- (3) conviction by any court of competent jurisdiction of the illegal manufacture or distribution of a controlled substance. n69

Discrimination prohibited by the Fair Housing Act includes the refusal to make reasonable accommodations in rules, policies, practices, or services when such accommodations may be necessary to allow handicapped individuals an equal opportunity to use and enjoy a dwelling. n70 Landlords have an affirmative duty reasonably to accommodate the needs of handicapped persons. n71 Accommodations required under the Fair Housing Act must be both reasonable and necessary. An accommodation is reasonable when it imposes no "fundamental alteration in the nature of a program" or "undue financial and administrative burdens." n72

The duty to provide accommodation is not absolute. Providing reasonable accommodation does not mean doing "everything humanly possible to accommodate a disabled person." n73 The duty to provide accommodation does not require a local governmental entity to waive a neutral zoning regulation to allow expansion of facilities housing handicapped individuals. n74

It is the burden of the plaintiff to establish that an accommodation was reasonable and necessary. Finding that it was not reasonable to expect a landlord to evict other tenants to accommodate the screaming and slamming of a tenant suffering from schizophrenia and depression, it was held that the plaintiff had failed to meet his burden and that the landlord's decision to evict the handicapped individual did not violate the Fair Housing Act. n75

Upon cost benefit balancing that takes both parties' needs into account, it is a reasonable and necessary accommodation to allow a person who is deaf to keep a "hearing dog" (a dog that is trained to assist those who are hearing-impaired). Consideration must be given to the degree to which a hearing dog aids individuals in coping with their disabilities and though "professional credentials" from a recognized training facility may be considered, they are not required. n76

Defining "handicapped" when a person does not have an obvious physical handicap has presented some difficulties for the courts. Despite that fact, it has been found that people in the following situations were entitled to handicap status protection:

- People with AIDS are considered handicapped under the Fair Housing Act, and refusal to issue a special permit for AIDS patients has been held to violate the Act. n77
- People in the re-entry phase of a drug rehabilitation program are considered handicapped under the Fair Housing Act--the court reasoning that the inability to obtain an apartment was on par with the inability to obtain a job and, therefore, created an impairment substantially limiting a major life activity. n78 Regarding the "current, illegal use of or addiction to a controlled substance" exclusion set forth at 42 U.S.C. § 3602(h), the court held that the Fair Housing Act does not per se exclude from its coverage every person who would be considered a drug addict. The court found, instead, that Congress intended to recognize that addiction is a disease; through rehabilitation efforts a person may recover from addiction; and an individual who makes an effort to recover should not be subject to housing discrimination based on society's accumulated fears and prejudices associated with drug addiction. While drug addicts are exempted from FHA protections, recovering drug addicts are not.
- People considered mentally retarded or who are the subject of a psychological disorder or disease are considered handicapped under the Fair Housing Act. n79

For guidance in defining handicapped individuals under the Fair Housing Act, and guidance in determining the types and extent of accommodations required under the Act, one can refer to Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, n80 and cases decided under that Act. For example, in holding that a landlord was not allowed to evict a tenant from an apartment in a federally subsidized housing complex without first reasonably accommodating the individual to minimize the risk the tenant posed to others, the court relied upon a Supreme Court case n81 decided under Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act. The accommodation requirement was held to apply even though the tenant exhibited erratic behavior and threatened other tenants in the complex. n82 In the aftermath of the Supreme Court's decision, the Fair Housing Act was amended to exclude from its protections those individuals who "would constitute a direct threat to the health or safety of other individuals or whose tenancy would result in substantial physical damage to the property of others." n83

Housing for handicapped individuals is often opposed based upon the fear of nearby property owners that it will cause depreciation in housing values. Such fear is what the Fair Housing Act is intended to redress and it will not excuse unlawful discrimination on the basis of handicap. n84 A neighboring property owner can be sued for violation of the Fair Housing Act based on an attempt to enforce restrictive covenants to prevent mentally handicapped individuals from residing in the neighborhood. n85

Yet, neighbors opposed to a particular property use are still allowed to avail themselves of their First Amendment rights to protest and to petition the government. For example, it was found the HUD officials wrongly chilled the First Amendment rights of neighbors opposed to the conversion of a motel into a multi-family housing unit for homeless persons by attempting to prevent their activities protesting the conversion. This was true despite the fact that the neighbors' concern stemmed from their belief that the building's conversion would result in an influx of people who would be considered handicapped under the Fair Housing Act, people who were mentally disabled or who were disabled due to substance abuse. The neighbors' protest activities in the form of writing newspaper articles, writing letters, and passing out leaflets were protected activities not prohibited by the Fair Housing Act. n86

[c] Discrimination Based Upon Sex

Discrimination on the basis of sex, as a gender qualification, is prohibited under the Fair Housing Act. n87 The duty of a property owner to not discriminate on the basis of sex is non-delegable. n88

Discrimination on the basis of sex often arises in the context of sexual harassment during one's tenancy. For example, a plaintiff was allowed to pursue an action for discrimination on the basis of sex against the manager and part-owner of the apartment building in which she had resided. The defendant subjected her to numerous unwanted sexual advances and ultimately engaged in conduct that led to his conviction for assault. The defendant retaliated by threatening the plaintiff with eviction, interfering with the equipment and services provided to her unit, and attempting to have her arrested on a false report of theft. n89

Similarly, a landlord who leased a property and then persistently sought sexual relations in lieu of rent from the tenant, a woman with two children, was found to have violated the Act's prohibition against discrimination based on sex. The landlord was required to pay a civil fine and damages for alternative housing costs and for emotional distress and inconvenience. n90 However, in accordance with the guidelines utilized in Title VII employment discrimination cases, an isolated incident may not support an action under the Act. n91

PART III Public Regulation
CHAPTER 9 The Broker And Discrimination *

10A-9 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 9.03

§ 9.03 Exemptions from the Fair Housing Act

The Fair Housing Act generally exempts from its coverage:

- Rentals and sales of certain single-family houses; n1
- Rentals and sales of certain dwellings of four or less units; n2
- Rentals and sales of dwellings or lodgings owned, operated, supervised, or controlled by religious organizations or private clubs; n3
- Reasonable governmental limitations on occupancy; n4 and
- Certain housing for older persons. n5

When properly invoked, the statutory exceptions provide absolute exemption from FHA's governance. The exceptions to the Fair Housing Act are, therefore, construed narrowly in order to preserve the primary purpose of the Act to provide within constitutional limitations for fair housing throughout the United States. n6 Further, the party claiming the exemption has the burden of proving its eligibility for the exemption. n7

[1] Single-Family Houses

The sale or rental by an owner of a single-family house (sometimes referred to as an "SFH") is exempted from coverage under the Fair Housing Act if the private individual owner does not own more than three single-family houses at any one time. Also, if the sale is of a single-family house that the owner did not reside in or that the owner was not the most recent resident of, the exemption applies only regarding one such sale within any 24-month period. Finally, the sale or rental of such a property will be excepted only if the facilities or services of a real estate broker or other person in the business of selling or renting dwellings was not involved in the sale or rental of the dwelling and if the owner did not use any discriminatory advertisement, notice, or other publication in violation of Section 3604(c) of the FHA. n8

In determining whether the exemption applies, the current or primary residence of the private individual owner is included in calculating the number of single-family houses owned. n9 Seasonal residences are also included. n10 If a real estate broker is involved in the rental or sale, the exemption will not apply. If any other person in the business of selling or renting houses was involved in the sale or rental of the single-family house, the exemption will not apply. A person "in the business of selling or renting dwellings" is defined as:

- (1) a person who has participated in three or more sale or rental transactions in the past 12 months; or
- (2) a person who has participated as an agent in two or more sale or rental transactions in the preceding 12 months excluding the sale of the seller's personal residence; or
- (3) a person who owns any dwelling designed or intended for occupancy by five or more families. n11

[2] The "Mrs. Murphy" Exception

Though the prohibitions against discriminatory advertising apply, the sale or rental of a room, unit, or dwelling is otherwise exempt from the Fair Housing Act if the dwelling is occupied by no more than four families and the owner maintains and actually occupies one of the units as the owner's residence. n12 This exemption is commonly referred to as the "Mrs. Murphy" exception and is available only to individual owners of private dwellings.

[3] Religious Organizations and Private Clubs

Religious organizations, associations, or societies and nonprofit institutions or organizations that are operated, supervised, or controlled by such religious organizations, associations, or societies are allowed to limit the sale, rental, or occupancy of dwellings to members of the same religion and are allowed to give preference to persons of the same religion unless membership in the religion is restricted on account of race, color, or national origin. n13 The exemption only applies to dwellings not owned or operated for commercial purposes.

The defendant bears the burden of showing that it fits within the "religious organizations" exemption. To do so, it "must prove that it is either: (1) a religious organization, or (2) a non-profit organization 'operated, supervise or controlled by or in conjunction with' a religious organization." n14 A mere association with a religious organization is not sufficient for purposes of the exemption. There must be a mutual, formal, or legal relationship between the religious organization and the non-profit organization that it operates, supervises, or controls. n15

Similarly, private clubs that are not open to the public are allowed to limit the rental or occupancy of lodgings to their members and are allowed to give preference to their members. n16 This exemption does not apply to dwellings, such as those occupied by their owners seasonally, and does not apply to sales.

A defendant must meet five conditions to qualify for the "private club" exemption. The defendant must:

- (1) be a private club not open to the public;
- (2) provide lodgings; and
- (3) only limit the rental or occupancy of such lodgings.

The lodgings provided by the defendant must be:

- (4) provided incident to a primary purpose of the defendant; and
- (5) must be owned or operated for other than a commercial purpose. n17

This exemption does not apply to dwellings, such as those occupied by their owners seasonally, and does not apply to sales.

[4] Limitations on Occupancy

Nothing in the Fair Housing Act limits the applicability of any reasonable local, state, or federal restrictions regarding the maximum number of occupants permitted to occupy a dwelling. n18

Section 3607(b)(1) removes from the FHA's scope only total occupancy limits--numerical ceilings intended to prevent overcrowding in living quarters. n19 Maximum occupancy limitations cap the number of occupants per dwelling, typically in relation to available floor space or the number and type of rooms. The purpose of maximum occupancy restrictions is to protect health and safety by preventing dwelling overcrowding.

The burden is on the governmental entity to establish that its occupancy limit is reasonable. If the governmental entity meets its burden by showing that the occupancy limits apply to all residents of all dwelling units, the exemption applies. n20

Limitations on occupancy frequently conflict with the prohibition against discriminating on the basis of familial status. Congress, prompted by fears that landlords would be forced to allow large families to crowd into small housing units, enacted the exemption for maximum occupancy restrictions at the same time that it expanded the FHA to ban discrimination on the basis of familial status. Such cases are scrutinized to ensure that limitations of occupancy are not, in fact, intended to unlawfully discriminate on the basis of familial status. n21

[5] Housing for Older Persons

To prevent the Fair Housing Act prohibition against discrimination based on familial status from eliminating the "adults only" and "no children" housing policies in force in many retirement housing communities, Congress created three exemptions. In addition to an exemption for HUD-approved housing programs designed and operated to assist elderly persons, Section 3607(b)(1) and (2) allows a housing community to discriminate on the basis of familial status if (1) 80% of the dwellings are occupied by at least one person 55 years old or older, or (2) the housing community is reserved exclusively (100%) for persons age 62 or older. n22

As enacted in 1988, the exemption applicable if 80% of the dwellings were occupied by at least one person 55 years old or older required that "significant facilities and services" be provided to meet the needs of older persons. Due to numerous lawsuits and complaints regarding the meaning of "significant facilities and services," Congress enacted the Housing for Older Persons Act of 1995 n23 (HOPA) and eliminated the requirement during 1995. n24 HOPA's modifications, however, are not applied retroactively. n25

The burden remains on the party asserting the exemption to establish that the housing qualifies as "housing for older persons." Real estate brokers should exercise caution to confirm that the dwelling qualifies for the exemption under the Fair Housing Act and the Department of Housing and Urban Development Guidelines. If they do not ensure application of the exemption, brokers may expose themselves to liability by engaging in conduct that would otherwise be illegal, such as by refusing offers from families with children.

PART III Public Regulation
CHAPTER 9 The Broker And Discrimination *

10A-9 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 9.04

§ 9.04 Enforcement and Penalties Under the Fair Housing Act

Prohibitions against illegal discrimination in housing may be enforced in federal court actions, may be enforced in state court actions, and may be enforced through administrative actions under the jurisdiction of federal authorities, state authorities, and local authorities. This section addresses civil lawsuits. Federal court actions alleging housing discrimination almost always begin with a complaint filed with the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD). For further information concerning practices and procedures before HUD, see § 9.06.

There are many penalties that may be imposed against a broker who engages in a discriminatory act or practice, including exposure to an award of damages, fines, imprisonment, and suspension or revocation of a broker's license. Conversely, a broker who sustains damage because he or she engages in anti-discriminatory practices as required by law may recover for that loss. n1

[1] Standing to Sue

Claims brought under the Fair Housing Act are judged under a very liberal standing requirement. The plaintiff need not allege that he or she was a victim of discrimination. For standing under the Fair Housing Act, the plaintiff need only allege that as a result of the defendant's discriminatory conduct the plaintiff has suffered a distinct and palpable injury. n2 Under the Fair Housing Act, any person harmed by discrimination, whether or not the target of the discrimination, can sue to recover for his or her own injury. n3 This is true even where no housing has actually been denied to members of a protected class. n4

The following cases provide examples of standing upheld under the Fair Housing Act:

- An African-American resident and a Caucasian resident of a large apartment complex in San Francisco had standing to challenge their landlord's exclusion of nonwhites from the complex. They complained that the landlord's discriminatory housing practices stigmatized them as residents of a "white ghetto" and deprived them of the social and professional advantages of living in an integrated community. n5
- Caucasian homeowners in a suburban neighborhood had standing to challenge the intentional segregation of their community attributable to the steering practices of two real estate brokerage firms and some of their employees. They complained that the target area was losing its integrated character due to the defendants' illegal conduct, thereby depriving them of the benefits of living in an integrated society. n6

- A corporation that provided community living arrangements for the mentally ill had standing to bring suit under the Fair Housing Act for a county's alleged discriminatory refusal to assume its leases. n7

- Hotel owners had standing to seek recovery against the City of Los Angeles for its alleged retaliatory interference with a loan required by purchasers who wanted to convert the property into housing for mentally ill individuals. n8

- A minority resident of an apartment building had standing to seek recovery against her landlords on the basis of a statement made by the landlords' agent that "The owners don't want to rent to Blacks." Standing was also allowed as a result of the owners' unsuccessful attempt to evict the plaintiff after the plaintiff made a complaint to the local Fair Housing Council. n9

- A non-profit corporation whose mission is eliminating discrimination in housing had standing to challenge racial steering by brokers on the basis that the brokers' discriminatory practices caused it to divert its resources to counteract and combat the effects of the defendants' illegal racial steering programs. n10

- Freshmen and sophomores at Yale College had standing to challenge Yale's requirement that all unmarried freshmen and sophomores under the age of 21 pay to reside in the college's co-educational dormitories. Plaintiffs were Orthodox Jews who claimed that the co-educational living requirement conflicted with their religious convictions and duties. n11

Non-profit corporations created to eliminate discrimination in housing (often referred to as "fair housing organizations") have been adjudged injured and standing has been granted based upon the diversion of their resources to counteract discriminatory housing practices and investigate discriminatory housing practices. The resources were typically found to have been diverted away from the organization's counseling and educational programs designed to inform, protect, and ensure that people benefit from equal housing opportunities. Yet, the expense of litigation without more is not sufficient to establish damage or injury, a prerequisite to standing to sue. n12

A fair housing organization has standing to recover certain types of damages on its own to the extent that it suffers injury proximately caused by defendant's unlawful conduct. n13 A fair housing organization is still entitled to seek its damages proximately caused by the defendants' unlawful discrimination towards its testers, even if none of the individual plaintiffs prevail on their claims. n14

[2] Broker's Right to Intervene

Commissions lost by real estate brokers attributable to the unlawful discriminatory conduct of others are properly recoverable as damages under the Fair Housing Act. n15 Additionally, brokers have standing to sue under the Fair Housing Act and have the right to intervene as plaintiffs in a Title VIII action. n16

The opportunity to intervene arises under Rule 24 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Upon timely application anyone may intervene in a federal lawsuit when an applicant's claim or defense and the main action have a question of law or fact in common. In deciding whether to permit intervention, the court must consider whether the intervention will unduly delay or prejudice the adjudication of the rights of the original parties. n17 A "timely application" is one that does not cause undue delay in the lawsuit, and it is axiomatic that multiple parties attempting to recover from the same wrongdoers for the same discriminatory act under the same federal law (in this case the Fair Housing Act) have questions of law and fact in common.

In addressing a case where white sellers refused to consummate a sale to black purchasers, the Seventh Circuit considered the following factors in permitting brokers to intervene in an action under the Fair Housing Act:

(1) The brokers' claim was based upon the seller's refusal to pay the real estate commission, as required in the real estate sales contract, because the brokers aided the plaintiff-buyers in the exercise of their right to buy real estate.

(2) The Fair Housing Act makes it unlawful for anyone to coerce, intimidate, threaten, or interfere with any person who encourages any other person in the exercise or enjoyment of their right to obtain a dwelling. n18

(3) The Fair Housing Act provides for enforcement by "appropriate civil action." n19

The court concluded that the Fair Housing Act provided the brokers with a cause of action if they were intimidated or interfered with when aiding a buyer in the buyer's right to buy or sell a house. The court also found that the claims of the brokers and the plaintiffs-buyers shared common questions of law and fact as both actions related to the sellers' refusal to sell their house in violation of the Fair Housing Act. Both the brokers and the buyers, therefore, could trace the cause of their injury to the sellers' illegal conduct.

The court found that the general purpose of Title VIII, to encourage the transfer of real estate regardless of race, "is well served by allowing brokers who follow the law to join aggrieved buyers in enforcing their rights." n20

[3] Persons and Entities Exposed to Liability

Property owners are generally liable for all unlawful acts of discrimination regarding the properties owned by them because the duty to not engage in unlawful discrimination is a non-delegable duty. It has, therefore, been held that the discriminatory conduct of an apartment manager or rental agent is, as a general rule, attributable to the owner and apartment manager of the complex both under the doctrine of respondeat superior and because the duty to obey the law is non-delegable. n21

Similarly, real estate brokers should exercise caution regarding the actions of their subordinates because under the Fair Housing Act a corporation and its officers are responsible for the acts of a subordinate employee, even if the acts were neither directed nor authorized. The statutory duty to not discriminate is non-delegable and the rule imposing liability is followed, therefore, even where it seems harsh to punish innocent and well-intentioned employers. n22

[4] Damages and Related Relief Under the Fair Housing Act

In a civil action to enforce the Fair Housing Act, if the court finds that a discriminatory housing practice has occurred or is about to occur it may award to the plaintiff compensatory damages ("actual" damages) and punitive damages. The court may grant other relief, including an injunction or temporary restraining order, and may allow to the prevailing party, other than the United States, a reasonable attorney's fee and costs. n23

[a] Compensatory and Nominal Damages

It has generally been found that the compensatory damages provision of the Fair Housing Act is mandatory. n24 If plaintiffs prove unlawful discrimination and actual damages, they are entitled to judgment for that amount. n25

Compensatory damages include lost profits, the commissions payable to real estate brokers, and syndication fees. For example, at the conclusion of a case seeking damages for a city's unlawful discriminatory conduct, a jury awarded plaintiffs damages in the amount of $3,040,439. Plaintiffs had organized to purchase and develop low-income housing at a mobile home park in the City of Desert Hot Springs. The plaintiffs' efforts to obtain financing with bonds to be issued by the county failed because the city withheld its consent for the issuance of the bonds. The plaintiffs' efforts to obtain financing from the state failed because the city counsel denied approval. The plaintiffs were then unable to pursue the project and sued the city under the Fair Housing Act. The trial court ordered a remittitur to $348,146.20. In ordering reinstatement of the original verdict awarding damages of $3,040,439, the Seventh Circuit found that lost profits were not too speculative to form the basis of a compensatory award and found that the brokers who would have been paid commissions and the individual who would have been paid a syndication fee were not "marginally affected individuals" and that their losses were compensable under the Act. n26

Further, regarding mitigation, the court found that to the extent that one who is harmed by another's unlawful discriminatory conduct has a duty to mitigate damages, that duty requires the plaintiff to do no more than is reasonable to avoid damages. Because of the city's refusals to consent or approve financing from the county or state, the partnership no longer had access to a favorable mortgage and there was no evidence that they had any other source of financing to purchase the project. n27

Compensatory damages may be awarded for emotional harm and distress, including that resulting from one's lack of stability and security in having a dwelling, and including that resulting from hostile, coercive, intrusive, and intimidating tactics used by local officials to close boarding houses catering to the disabled. Such damages are not restricted to members of a protected classification. n28 For example, the seller of a home intended to be used as a group home for physically and mentally handicapped adults was permitted standing to sue as an "aggrieved person" under the Fair Housing Act and was allowed to recover actual compensatory damages for emotional distress based upon specific instances of "cool treatment and social shunning" by the defendants. n29

Even absent proof of actual injury, nominal damages are to be awarded to recognize violation of a constitutional right. n30 Though this applies to cases brought under the Fair Housing Act, it is the responsibility of the plaintiffs to bring their entitlement to mandatory nominal damages to the attention of the trial judge. n31

[b] Punitive Damages

The Fair Housing Act provides for the recovery of punitive damages by victims of discriminatory housing practices. n32 Federal law governs the assessment of punitive damages under Title VIII. n33 Punitive damages are appropriate in a federal civil rights action "when the defendant's conduct is shown to be motivated by evil motive or intent, or when it involves reckless or callous indifference to the federally protected rights of others." n34

The standard applied regarding punitive damages in a Title VII case is the same that is applied in a case brought under the Fair Housing Act. n35 In the context of a Title VII case, the Supreme Court has stated that malice or reckless indifference relate to a defendant's knowledge that the defendant may be acting in violation of federal law. Malice or reckless indifference does not require that the defendant be aware that it is engaging in discrimination. n36 Further, though conduct justifying a punitive damage award is often referred to as "egregious" or "outrageous," defendants need not engage in conduct with an independent egregious quality before being subject to a punitive award. To be liable for punitive damages it is sufficient that a defendant discriminate in the face of a risk that its actions will violate federal law. n37

Recklessness and malice may be inferred when an individual responsible for showing and renting apartments repeatedly refuses to deal with members of a protected class and misrepresents the availability of the apartments. n38

The Fair Housing Amendments Act of 1988 removed the prior cap of $1,000 on punitive damages. Federal courts are seriously divided, however, regarding whether punitive damages can be awarded absent an award of nominal or compensatory damages. n39

[c] Injunctive Relief

When plaintiffs have established the defendants' liability under the Fair Housing Act, they are not required to establish a reasonable likelihood of future violations of the Act in order to be entitled to injunctive relief. Since the plaintiffs established that the defendants violated the Act, future violations should be presumed. Further, the plaintiffs are not required to show irreparable injury. n40

An injunction may be issued that polices the defendant to ensure that he or she does not persist in or initiate further unlawful discriminatory practices. For example, the following provisions in an injunction issued against a real estate agent who discriminated on the basis of gender were upheld:

- (1) That he would engage in no further discriminatory conduct to plaintiff and would not retaliate against plaintiff;
- (2) That he would quarterly submit copies of written rental applications to HUD for two years;
- (3) That he would keep records of the gender of oral applicants and of persons who inquired orally about rentals, the dates of the communications, whether the applicant was accepted as a tenant and, if rejected, the reason for rejection;
- (4) That he would keep a list of occupants and vacancies with the gender of the departed tenants noted, the dates of departure, when the units were again rented and the gender of the new tenants; and
- (5) That he would, during the two-year period, provide HUD with copies of advertisements, copies of written rental applications, and sample leases made and used during that period. n41

[d] Attorneys' Fees and Costs

The Fair Housing Act allows the court, in its discretion, to award to the prevailing party its reasonable attorneys' fees and costs. n42 Though attorneys' fees are awarded in the majority of cases, such fees are subject to limitations.

That plaintiffs obtain a judgment that defendants engaged in some act of illegal discrimination is not always sufficient to have them viewed as prevailing parties for the purpose of obtaining an award of attorneys' fees. This is in accord with the general federal position that the prevailing party, when allowed to do so by statute, should recover attorneys' fees unless special circumstances would render such an award unjust. n43 An insignificant, technical victory may be insufficient to support "prevailing party" status for fee-shifting purposes. n44

An award of attorneys' fees is committed to the trial court's discretion and will rarely be disturbed unless the trial court abused its discretion. Attorneys' fees are subject to judicial review as to "reasonableness." A court's determination of reasonable attorneys' fees in a case incorporates subjective and objective factors, including:

- the court's appraisal of the difficulty of the case;
- the time the court considered necessary for the case;
- the number of motions;
- the number of witnesses;

- the length of the trial;
- the number of attorneys involved; and
- the number of plaintiffs represented in the action. n45

Additionally, Rule 68 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure applies to awards of attorneys' fees made under the Fair Housing Act. n46 Rule 68 states that if a timely pretrial settlement offer is not accepted and if the judgment finally obtained by the party that rejected the offer is not more favorable than the offer, the person who rejected the offer must pay all costs incurred after the making of the offer. The purpose of Rule 68 is to encourage settlement and to avoid litigation. The "costs" contemplated by Rule 68 include attorneys' fees. n47

[e] Civil Fine

In a civil action brought by the Attorney General, courts are empowered to impose a civil penalty in addition to compensatory damages, punitive damages and costs for violations of the Fair Housing Act. The maximum fine permitted for a first-time offense is $50,000, and may not exceed $100,000 for any subsequent violation. n48

PART III Public Regulation
CHAPTER 9 The Broker And Discrimination *

10A-9 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 9.05

§ 9.05 Housing Discrimination--Proof and Defenses

[1] Proof of Claims of Discrimination

[a] Pattern or Practice of Discrimination

The Fair Housing Act empowers the Attorney General to bypass administrative procedures and to file a civil action against any person engaged in a "pattern or practice of resistance to the full enjoyment of any of the rights granted" under the Act. n1 Private parties may intervene in a "pattern or practice" case initiated by the Attorney General.

Any plaintiff under the Fair Housing Act may succeed upon proof of a pattern or practice of discrimination. Proof that defendants discriminated against several people, without more, is insufficient to prove a pattern or practice of discrimination. Proof of isolated or sporadic acts of discrimination does not suffice to prove a pattern or practice. Evidence must be presented that establishes that discrimination was the defendants' standard operating procedure. Plaintiffs must present evidence from which the fact-finder can reasonably conclude " 'that ... discrimination was the [defendants'] standard operating procedure--the regular rather than the unusual practice.' " n2

[b] Disparate Treatment

Plaintiffs in Fair Housing Act cases can prove their cases by establishing disparate intent or disparate impact. Disparate intent requires that the defendants were denied a housing opportunity or were allowed housing under discriminatory terms and conditions for reasons that were discriminatory. Disparate impact intends to provide a remedy for "practices that are fair in form, but discriminatory in operation." n3 To establish disparate impact, plaintiffs must show that the defendants' conduct had a discriminatory impact upon housing for members of a protected class, or upon the terms and conditions on which the housing was offered. n4

A prima facie case of disparate impact is established by showing that the defendants' facially neutral practice actually or predictably results in discrimination against members of a protected class. n5 To state a prima facie claim, plaintiffs must allege a causal connection between a facially neutral policy and the resultant proportion of members of a protected class in the population at issue. n6

FHA disparate impact cases are evaluated in accordance with the standards established in Title VII employment discrimination cases. In most jurisdictions the following factors will be considered in determining whether conduct that produces a discriminatory impact will violate section 3604(a) of the Fair Housing Act:

- (1) the strength of plaintiff's showing of discriminatory effect,
- (2) the defendant's interest in taking the challenged action, and
- (3) whether the plaintiff seeks to compel the defendant to affirmatively provide housing for members of a protected class or merely to restrain the defendant from interfering with individual property owners who wish to provide such housing. n7

In some jurisdictions proof of discriminatory effect alone will satisfy the prima facie burden for disparate impact claims under the Fair Housing Act. n8

When plaintiffs establish a prima facie case of disparate impact, the burden passes to the defendants to avoid liability by establishing a legitimate justification for the challenged practice. If defendants can show that the practice was reasonably necessary to achieve an important social objective (such as to provide for the public health, safety, or welfare) or business objective, plaintiffs then must show that the defendants unreasonably refused to adopt an alternative housing practice that would serve the defendants' legitimate objective with less discriminatory impact. n9

[2] Defenses to Claims of Discrimination

[a] Business Necessity Defense

A genuine business need for a challenged practice can overcome a prima facie case of disparate impact. The business necessity standard to be applied in Title VIII cases is that utilized in employment discrimination cases under Title VII. n10

When the plaintiff has established a prima facie case of disparate impact, the burden shifts to the defendant to produce evidence of a genuine business need for the challenged practice. n11 Yet the burden to prove that discrimination against a protected group has been caused by a specific practice always remains with the plaintiff. For that reason, when the defendant has produced evidence that its practices are based on legitimate business reasons the burden shifts to the plaintiff to show that other policies without a similarly undesirable effect would also serve the plaintiff's legitimate interest. n12

To successfully assert the defense of business necessity the defendant must demonstrate that the discriminatory practice has a manifest relationship to the housing in question. An insubstantial justification will not suffice because such a low standard would permit discrimination through the use of deceptive, outwardly neutral practices. Yet the plaintiff is not required to establish a "compelling need or necessity," a burden almost impossible to meet. n13 For example, a trailer park occupancy limit of three persons per trailer attributable to sewer capacity limitations and concern over quality of park life was upheld as a business necessity despite its discriminatory impact upon families with children. n14

[b] Mixed Motive Defense

When a decision that appears unlawful and discriminatory was motivated by a legitimate reason, a defendant may present a mixed motive defense. The defendant is required to present sufficient evidence for a jury to conclude that the defendant's adverse actions against the plaintiff were motivated by a legitimate reason. n15 When evidence has been introduced of both permissible and impermissible motives, a defendant will be held liable unless the defendant can show that he or she would have taken the same action against the plaintiff regardless of the improper motive. n16

Though applicable in a case brought under the Fair Housing Act, the defendants are not entitled to a mixed motive jury instruction unless they have provided sufficient evidence of a legitimate motive for the adverse decision. Defendants' verbal assertions, without other corroborating evidence or testimony, are not sufficient evidence of a legitimate motive.

[3] Opinion Evidence in Fair Housing Act Cases

The testimony of "testers" utilized by HUD and fair housing organizations, and the opinion testimony of others premised upon information gathered, compiled, or generated by "testers," have been the mainstay of many cases successfully pursued under the Fair Housing Act. An extensive review of Fair Housing Act cases establishes that, historically, challenges to the admissibility of such opinion testimony were rarely pursued. Plaintiffs' key litigation tool may now be in jeopardy.

Rule 702 of the Federal Rules of Evidence governs the admissibility of opinion evidence in a federal action:

If scientific, technical or other specialized knowledge will assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue, a witness qualified as an expert by knowledge, skill, experience, training or education, may testify thereto in the form of an opinion or otherwise.

Rule 702 fails to set forth guidelines to assess the reliability of expert opinions. The United States Supreme Court set forth four factors to be considered in determining the reliability of a scientific theory or technique and imposed a "gatekeeping" obligation upon trial judges to determine whether expert testimony is admissible under Rule 702 in the case of Daubert v. Merrill Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc. (Daubert). n18 Six years later the Supreme Court expanded the scope of its holding in Daubert to encompass opinion testimony based on technical and other specialized knowledge. n19 Factors enunciated in Daubert are, therefore, relevant to a determination of reliability regarding all types of expert testimony.

The four factors set forth in Daubert are:

- (1) whether the expert's testimony has been tested;
- (2) whether the technique has been subjected to peer review and publication;
- (3) whether the technique has a known or knowable rate of error; and
- (4) whether the technique has been generally accepted in the proper scientific community.

In response to a Daubert motion challenging the admissibility of opinion testimony from plaintiffs' experts in a racial steering case, the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Missouri rejected plaintiffs' contention that "tester evidence" had always been accepted by the courts and "should simply be accepted at face value" once again. n20 The court found, by a preponderance of the evidence, that the testing protocol utilized by the testers was seriously flawed and unreliable, and therefore inadmissible. The court further concluded that plaintiffs' experts were not qualified to render opinions regarding defendants' alleged steering practices and that their expert opinions were, therefore, inadmissible.

In determining the reliability of the data and information gathered by the testers employed by the fair housing organization, the court examined the testers' depositions, the agents' depositions, the test forms completed by the testers, the debriefing forms and excerpts from the depositions of plaintiffs' proffered expert witnesses. In determining that "the testing protocol of both the 1996 and 1997 tests was seriously flawed and lacked any reasonable indicia of reliability" the court adjudged the methodology utilized in the creation and execution of the tests--not the credibility of the testers or agents. Though recognizing "the fact that tester evidence is probably the best means by which to demonstrate fair housing violations," the court rejected the proffered evidence because its production was not done under standards "which assure a reasonable level of validity and reliability." n21 The court was influenced by the following factors:

- Neither test coordinator had an extensive background in fair housing matters, particularly not regarding fair housing testing.
- Neither test coordinator was familiar with the protocol established in the HUD audit studies or with the manner in which that protocol was judicially modified, and neither used the HUD protocol.
- There were ambiguities and inconsistencies in the test instructions used, in the test forms used, and in the debriefing forms and procedures (one tester was never debriefed).
- There were significant inconsistencies in the execution of the tests. Several testers failed to follow the fabricated script, some failed to complete all or part of the test forms, and some exercised their own discretion regarding follow-up telephone calls and visits to additional homes.
- The tests were not part of an effort to gather evidence of housing discrimination based upon an individual's complaint, but were, instead, tests commissioned to investigate and study possible fair housing discrimination taking place in a city.
- Plaintiffs failed to articulate a set of standards that govern the validity and reliability of an enforcement test, and plaintiffs' experts opined that there are no standards that govern the validity and reliability of fair housing tests.

In rejecting nearly all of the expert opinion testimony offered by the plaintiffs, the court concluded as follows:

- An executive director of a fair housing organization was not permitted to testify that race could be conclusively identified over the telephone because she was not a linguist, and was not trained in voice analysis, there are no written reports linking voice analysis with fair housing testing, she published no work regarding her voice identification theory, she conducted no standardized testing for racial voice identification, she had not spoken to the testers to ascertain if any of their voices were strongly indicative of race, and she was vague as to what constitutes the characteristics of a black voice and of a white voice.
- An executive director of a fair housing organization was not permitted to testify that the defendants' experts applied the wrong standards in reviewing plaintiffs' test data because she "did not review a single test report form, tester deposition, agent deposition or tester debriefing report" in the matter and "could offer no standard by which to adjudge the validity and reliability" of the tests.
- An executive director of a fair housing organization for more than 25 years was not permitted to testify that the defendants' experts approach to the plaintiffs' test data was "mistaken" because he had no formal degree in sociology and is not a statistician or a lawyer, there is no recognized written authority for the standards he espoused for an enforcement test, and he admitted that he was not an expert.
- A man with a doctorate degree in urban geography who had been involved in several fair housing issues involving discriminatory lending practices was not allowed to testify that the defendants had engaged in racial steering because he had no experience regarding fair housing tests on real estate agents, he relied solely on plaintiffs' conclusions and did not review any of the underlying data (such as the tester depositions, the agent depositions, the test report forms or the debriefing forms), he assumed that the testing protocol had isolated race as the variable factor, he conceded that he applied his first statistical test inaccurately, his second test was never tested or subjected to peer review or publication, and he admitted that his third test could not be used to determine the existence of racial steering.

Conversely, defendants' expert witnesses were allowed to testify regarding the design, execution, and data derived from the plaintiffs' tests because they demonstrated by a preponderance of the evidence that their methods for evaluating the tests were scientifically valid and reliable. Defendants' experts possessed genuine expertise and the trial court had ensured that it was "dealing with an expert, not just a hired gun."

PART III Public Regulation
CHAPTER 9 The Broker And Discrimination *

§ 9.06 Practices and Procedures Before HUD

The Secretary of the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) has the authority to administer and enforce the Fair Housing Act. n1 HUD has established procedures for the investigation and conciliation of complaints under the Administrative Enforcement Provisions of the Fair Housing Act. n2 Those real estate brokers charged with violations of the Fair Housing Act, and those real estate brokers seeking recovery under the Fair Housing Act attributable to the unlawful and discriminatory conduct of others, usually will be required to deal with HUD.

[1] HUD Complaints

An "aggrieved person" with standing to file a housing discrimination complaint with HUD includes any person who claims to have been injured by a discriminatory housing practice or any person who believes that he or she will be injured by a discriminatory housing practice that is about to occur. n3 Any aggrieved person or the Assistant Secretary for Fair Housing and Equal Opportunity in HUD ("Assistant Secretary") may file a complaint no later than one year after an alleged discriminatory housing practice has occurred or terminated. n4

If a complaint alleges a discriminatory housing practice that is within the jurisdiction of a substantially equivalent certified state or local agency, the Assistant Secretary will notify that agency of the complaint and refer the complaint to that agency for processing before HUD takes further action with respect to the complaint. n5 The complainant will be notified of the referral and will be advised of his or her right to proceed with a civil action in an appropriate U.S. District Court not later than two years after the occurrence or termination of the discriminatory housing practice. n6 The complaint may be reactivated for processing by HUD under the Fair Housing Act, however, if the state or local agency fails to begin proceedings within 30 days or otherwise fails to proceed with reasonable promptness. n7

[2] HUD Investigation Procedures

After a complaint is filed, an investigation is initiated. The purposes of the HUD investigation are:

- (1) To obtain information regarding the alleged discriminatory housing practice identified in the complaint;
- (2) To document the policies and practices of the respondent involved in the alleged discriminatory housing practice raised in the complaint; and

(3) To develop factual data necessary to determine whether reasonable cause exists, or does not exist, to believe that a discriminatory housing practice has occurred or is about to occur. n8

Within ten days of the filing of a complaint or amended complaint, a notice will be served on each respondent by personal service or certified mail. If a person is not named in the complaint but is, in the course of HUD's investigation, identified as someone engaging in illegal activity relating to the discriminatory housing practice alleged in the complaint, that person will be notified within ten days of his or her identification. n9 "The Assistant Secretary will also serve notice on any person who directs or controls, or who has the right to direct or control, the conduct of another person who is involved in a fair housing complaint." n10 The respondent may file an answer, affirmed under the penalties of perjury, within ten days after receipt of the notice from HUD. The respondent may assert within the answer any defense that might be available to a defendant in a court of law. n11

HUD's investigative powers are expansive. While conducting an investigation, HUD is allowed access to premises, access to records, access to documents and access to individuals. It may examine, record, and copy documents. HUD may take and record testimony or statements of persons it believes reasonably necessary for the furtherance of the investigation. n12 If a person does not comply with HUD's request for "voluntary cooperation," the Assistant Secretary has the authority to issue subpoenas that require compliance. n13 Additionally, HUD can utilize the services of other federal, state, or local agencies. n14

The investigation will remain open until a determination is made as to whether reasonable cause exists to believe that a discriminatory housing practice has occurred or is about to occur ("reasonable cause determination") or a conciliation agreement has been reached and approved. "Unless it is impracticable to do so," the investigation will be completed within 100 days of the filing or reactivation of the complaint. If the investigation is not completed within 100 days, HUD will notify the aggrieved person and the respondent of the reasons for the delay. n15

A final investigative report will be prepared at the end of each investigation. n16 The investigative report will contain:

(1) The names and dates of contacts with witnesses. Though the report will not disclose the names of witnesses that request anonymity, HUD may be required to disclose their identities in the course of an administrative hearing or a civil action under the Fair Housing Act.

(2) A summary and the dates of correspondence and other contacts with the aggrieved person and the respondent.

(3) A summary description of other pertinent records.

(4) A summary of witness statements.

(5) Answers to interrogatories (written questions that are required to be answered in writing and under oath).

The aggrieved person and the respondent will be notified when the final investigative report is complete. The aggrieved person and the respondent are entitled to receive a copy of the final investigation report and are entitled to other information derived from the investigation. n17

[3] Conciliation of the HUD Complaint

During the period from the filing of the complaint to the filing of a charge or the dismissal of the complaint, the Assistant Secretary will, if possible, attempt to conciliate the complaint. n18 In conciliating a complaint, HUD will attempt to resolve the complaint and receive assurances that the respondent will satisfactorily remedy the violations of the rights of the aggrieved person. HUD will take action to assure that discriminatory housing practices are eliminated and that their occurrence is prevented in the future. n19

Incident to the conciliation process, the aggrieved person may seek monetary relief in the form of damages, including damages attributable to humiliation or embarrassment, and attorneys' fees. The aggrieved person may also seek equitable relief, such as access to the dwelling at issue or to a comparable dwelling, the provision of services or facilities, or other specific relief. The aggrieved person may also seek injunctive relief to eliminate the discriminatory housing practices complained of. n20

If the matter can be settled, the terms of the settlement of the complaint will be reduced to a written conciliation agreement. The agreement must be executed by the respondent and the complainant and is subject to the approval of the Assistant Secretary. The Assistant Secretary will approve or execute a conciliation agreement only if:

- (1) The complainant and respondent agree to the relief accorded to the aggrieved person;
- (2) The provisions of the agreement adequately vindicate the public interest; and
- (3) If the Assistant Secretary is the complainant, all aggrieved persons named in the complaint are satisfied with the relief provided to protect their interests. n21

Provisions that may vindicate the public interest include those that would eliminate discriminatory housing practices and those that would prevent future discriminatory housing practices. Other provisions could require remedial affirmative activities to overcome discriminatory housing practices, could impose reporting requirements, or could subject a person to other monitoring and enforcement activities. n22

As occurs in the context of most civil settlement negotiations, nothing done or said as part of the conciliation process can be used in a subsequent administrative hearing or civil lawsuit without the written consent of the persons involved. n23 Conciliation agreements shall be made public unless the aggrieved person and respondent request nondisclosure and the Assistant Secretary determines that disclosure is not required to further the purposes of the Fair Housing Act, though a description of the results of the conciliation may be published. n24 The conciliation agreement may provide for binding arbitration of the dispute arising from the complaint. n25

HUD may review conciliation agreements. If there is reasonable cause to believe that a respondent has breached a conciliation agreement a civil action to enforce the terms of the agreement may be filed under the Fair Housing Act. n26

[4] Reasonable Cause Determination by HUD

When HUD's investigation has been completed, and if a conciliation agreement has not been reached and approved, the Assistant Secretary must determine whether reasonable cause exists to believe that a prohibited discriminatory housing practice has occurred. This decision is to be based upon the totality of factual circumstances known at the time of the review. n27 In making the determination the Assistant Secretary must consider whether the facts concerning the alleged discriminatory housing project are sufficient to warrant the filing of a civil action in federal court n28

A determination of reasonable cause or no reasonable cause must be made within 100 days of the filing or reactivation of the complaint. If the reasonable cause determination is not made within that period, the Assistant Secretary will notify the complainant and the respondent of the reasons for the delay. n29

[a] Determination of No Reasonable Cause

If the Assistant Secretary determines that no reasonable cause exists to believe that a discriminatory housing practice has occurred or is about to occur, the Assistant Secretary must:

- issue a statement of facts upon which the no reasonable cause determination was based;
- dismiss the complaint; and
- notify the aggrieved person and the respondent of the dismissal.

The fact of the dismissal and the names of the parties are public information. n30

[b] Determination of Reasonable Cause

If the Assistant Secretary determines that reasonable cause exists to believe that a discriminatory housing practice has occurred or is about to occur, the Assistant Secretary shall, with the agreement of the General Counsel:

- issue that determination;
- direct that charges be issued on behalf of the aggrieved person; and
- notify the complainant and respondent of the determination. n31

If the aggrieved person has initiated a civil action and trial has begun, the Assistant Secretary may not issue a charge.

[c] Zoning Exception to Reasonable Cause Determination

If the Assistant Secretary determines that the matter involves the legality of local zoning or land use laws or ordinances, instead of making a determination as to reasonable cause he or she shall refer the investigative materials to the Attorney General for appropriate action. The complainant and respondent will be notified of that decision. n32

[5] Issuance of Charge by HUD

The charge is based upon the final investigative report and should contain a short and plain statement of facts upon which the Assistant Secretary found reasonable cause to believe that a discriminatory housing practice had occurred or was about to occur. The charge can include allegations that were not set forth in the underlying complaint if the respondent was given notice of the allegations and was given a chance to respond during the investigative process. n33

Within three business days after the charge is issued, the charge must be filed, the charge must be served, and a hearing date must be scheduled before an administrative law judge. n34 The affected parties (complainant, respondent, or aggrieved person), however, are not required to proceed before an administrative law judge. Any of the affected parties may, within 20 days of service of the charge, elect to have the claims asserted in the charge decided in a civil action. n35 If a civil action is not elected, the administrative action will proceed.

[6] Judicial Determinations Unfavorable to HUD

The following are examples of recent cases in which HUD met with judicial displeasure:

- In refusing to grant qualified immunity to HUD officials and holding that they were subject to personal liability for their violations of plaintiffs' first amendment rights to free speech, the Ninth Circuit stated, "When government officials violate citizens' clearly established first amendment rights we will not apply a doctrine of qualified immunity to defeat a remedy of damages to which the citizens are entitled." n36

■ When called upon to enforce the terms and conditions of a conciliation agreement against a real estate agent who violated the agreement, the Seventh Circuit--though construing the agreement as an enforceable contract--refused to enforce its terms and conditions, specifically refusing to require the agent to relinquish her real estate license. n37

■ In reversing a decision that a neutral numerical occupancy restriction utilized by private landlords violated the FHA as illegally discriminating against families with children, the Ninth Circuit went on to state, "Furthermore, we admonish HUD for its heavy-handed conduct in his case." n38

■ The previously unchallenged use by fair housing organizations of data collected by testers was dealt a severe blow when a federal district court excluded all test data and all proffered expert opinions associated with that data because it failed to meet the guidelines of reliability set forth by Daubert n39 and its progeny. n40

§ 9.07 State Legislation Prohibiting Discriminatory Housing Practices

Most states have enacted legislation designed to eliminate discrimination in housing. These laws may impose requirements upon real estate brokers that exceed those set forth in the federal laws or that differ from the requirements set forth in federal law. Further, state laws may expose real estate brokers to potential liability that differs from their exposure under federal law. Specifically, many states allow for or require surrender of a broker's license upon a judicial determination that the broker has engaged in unlawful discriminatory housing practices. n1 The statutes of each state must be carefully scrutinized.

The following is a list of state laws specifically intended to prohibit discriminatory housing practices:

- Alabama Code § 24-8-1, et seq., Alabama Fair Housing Law.
- Alaska Statutes § 18.80.240. Unlawful practices in the sale or rental of real property.
- Ariz. Rev. Stat. § 41-1491, et seq., Fair Housing.
- Arkansas Code § 16-123-204. Conduct prohibited in real estate transactions--Exception.
- Cal. Gov. Code. § 12921, Employment and housing without discrimination as civil right, and § 12955, et seq., Housing Discrimination.
- Colorado Revised Statutes § 24-34-502. Unfair housing practices prohibited.
- Connecticut Statutes § 46a-64c. Discriminatory housing practices prohibited.
- Delaware Code, 6 Del. C. § 4603. Discrimination in sale or rental of housing and other prohibited practices.
- District of Columbia Code § 2-1402.21. Unlawful discriminatory practices in real estate transactions.

CHAPTER 9 The Broker And Discrimination *

§ 9.08 Fair Housing Partnership Agreement

The National Association of Realtors(R) (NAR) and the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) entered into a Fair Housing Partnership on December 5, 1996. The Fair Housing Partnership replaces the Voluntary Affirmative Marketing Agreement (VAMA), which terminated. By its terms, the partnership is slated to last five years. In contrast with the VAMA's focus on monitoring compliance with fair housing laws, the partnership emphasizes a cooperative approach between Realtors(R) and HUD.

The purpose of the Fair Housing Partnership between NAR and HUD is to jointly identify, address and promote fair housing in all communities throughout the United States. The Fair Housing Partnership recognizes the role of Realtors(R) in promoting fair housing. The Fair Housing Partnership establishes a national model for discussion, planning, and action that can be utilized in individual communities. The Fair Housing Partnership Agreement emphasizes the development of collaborative strategies and measurable actions to address fair housing issues.

The Partnership relaxed requirements that Realtors(R) abide by a prescribed set of association-wide or company-wide fair housing plans and procedures. Instead, Realtors(R) are encouraged to develop their own consistent fair housing procedures.

The Fair Housing Partnership should alleviate the stress and worry of real estate brokers who, despite their best efforts and commitment to fully comply with fair housing laws, have been continually scrutinized through testing by local fair housing organizations. Brokers, especially those associated with large firms, had cause to be fearful of an employee mistake. The approach of the Fair Housing Partnership casts Realtors(R) and fair housing organizations in the roles of allies instead of adversaries, encouraging Realtors(R) to turn to their partners for authoritative answers when they are faced with complicated fair housing questions. It is the expectation of HUD and NAR that a large number of complicated or difficult fair housing questions will be resolved through discussion rather than through litigation.

The partners, HUD and NAR, developed a fair housing declaration for use by Realtors(R). The declaration outlines a series of affirmative fair housing principles that Realtors(R) are encouraged to incorporate into their daily business practices. The declaration provides as follows:

Realtor(R) Fair Housing Declaration

I agree to:

Provide equal professional service without regard to the race, color, religion, sex, handicap, familial status, or national origin of any prospective client, customer, or of the residents of any community.

Keep informed about fair housing law and practices, improving my clients' and customers' opportunities and my business.

Develop advertising that indicates that everyone is welcome and no one is excluded, expanding my client's and customer's opportunities to see, buy, or lease property.

Inform my clients and customers about their rights and responsibilities under the fair housing laws by providing brochures and other information.

Document my efforts to provide professional service, which will assist me in becoming a more responsive and successful Realtor(R).

Refuse to tolerate non-compliance.

Learn about those who are different from me and celebrate those differences.

Take a positive approach to fair housing practices and aspire to follow the spirit as well as the letter of the law.

Develop and implement fair housing practices for my firm to carry out the spirit of this declaration.

n1

Recognizing that the goals of the partnership will be best achieved at the local level, and to ensure the success of the partnership and replicate their efforts at the local level, both HUD and NAR encourage state and local associations and HUD field offices to voluntarily enter into local partnerships and to jointly address the fair housing concerns of a community through collaborative strategies and joint action.

PART III Public Regulation
CHAPTER 9 The Broker And Discrimination *

10A-9 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 9.09

§ 9.09 Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA)

The Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) is a broad civil rights law guaranteeing equal opportunity for individuals with disabilities. The Department of Justice is the lead federal agency for implementation of the ADA.

The ADA was enacted July 26, 1990, n1 and went into effect July 26, 1992. n2 The ADA generally provides access requirements for and prohibits discrimination against people with disabilities in public accommodations, state, and local government, transportation, telecommunications, and employment. The Americans with Disabilities Act covers anyone who has a physical or mental impairment that interferes with a major life activity, or who is perceived as having such impairment.

The ADA affects the commercial real estate brokerage industry in a manner similar to how the Fair Housing Act affects the residential real estate business. One must approach the ADA with caution as the Act is very detailed and several areas lack clear interpretation.

A commercial real estate broker must determine whether the building, shopping center, or other commercial structure that the broker is selling, managing, or leasing is in compliance with the ADA. If the building is not in compliance with the federal law, the broker may subject himself or herself to a claim of negligent misrepresentation by holding it out to the public as suitable and fit for commercial purposes.

[1] Title III of the ADA

Title III n3 of the ADA addresses accessibility requirements for public accommodations. Strictly residential facilities are not considered places of public accommodation and are not subject to Title III of the ADA, nor are amenities provided for the exclusive use of residents and their guests. However, common areas that function as places of public accommodation within residential facilities are considered places of public accommodation if they are open to persons other than residents and their guests. Rental offices and sales offices are, therefore, places of public accommodation and must comply with the ADA requirements in addition to all requirements of the Fair Housing Act.

Title III applies to both the owner and the operator of public accommodations and commercial facilities. Title III of the ADA has the greatest potential impact upon real estate brokers as it broadly expands the concept of "disability" and imposes regulations on existing buildings.

The anti-discrimination and the removal of barrier requirements of the ADA apply to "places of public accommodations." The accessibility requirements of the ADA regarding new construction and alterations apply to public accommodations and "commercial facilities."

"Places of accommodation" encompass twelve categories of retail and service businesses, including places of lodging, food and drink establishments, places of exhibitional entertainment, places of public gathering, sales and rental establishments, services establishments such as law firms, accounting firms and banks, public transportation stations, places of public display or collection, places of recreation, educational facilities, social service center establishments, and exercise clubs. It is presumed that this definition includes services establishments such as brokerage offices, even if they are located in private homes.

"Commercial facility" is defined as a facility whose operations affect commerce, that is intended for non-residential use, and that is not a facility expressly exempted from coverage under the Fair Housing Act.

The ADA contains a broad provision prohibiting discrimination against those with disabilities in the full and equal enjoyment of goods, services, facilities, privileges, advantages, and accommodations of any place of public accommodation. Facilities need to be usable by persons with disabilities.

[2] New Construction

All new construction coming available for occupancy after January 26, 1993 must meet structural requirements for disability access. The ADA requirements apply only to construction that becomes available for first occupancy. Department of Justice regulations therefore specifically exclude from the ADA's coverage those projects for which a completed building permit application was certified and received by the appropriate government agency before January 26, 1992. If a building permit was issued after January 26, 1992, but has a certificate of occupancy on or before January 26, 1993, it is exempted from the requirements of the ADA. Otherwise, the construction requirements apply to all commercial facilities.

Special barrier removal requirements became effective January 26, 1992, and apply only to facilities that are "places of public accommodations" as defined under the Act. The ADA requires removal of architectural and communications barriers that are structural in nature, where such removal is readily achievable (easily accomplishable and able to be carried out without much difficulty or expense). Barrier removal includes ramp installations, curb cuts in sidewalks and entrances, repositioning shelving, rearranging tables and chairs, repositioning telephones, adding raised markings on elevator control buttons, installing flashing alarm lights, widening doors, eliminating turnstiles, and providing for alternate paths of travel.

All commercial facilities must be made accessible to the maximum extent feasible whenever alterations are being performed on a facility. Alteration is defined as any change that affects the feasibility of a facility. If alterations are made to a lobby or work area of a public accommodation, an accessible path of travel to the altered area and to the bathrooms, telephones, and drinking fountains serving that area must be made to the extent that the added accessibility costs are not disproportionate to the overall cost of the original alteration.

Disproportionate cost is defined for the purpose of the ADA as a cost that exceeds 20% of the original alteration. The cost of alteration includes all costs of renovation to the facility incurred in a three-year period.

[4] Other Modifications

The ADA requires modifications to procedures so that disabled individuals are not excluded from regular programs. Places of public accommodations must make reasonable modifications to their policies and procedures to accommodate individuals with disabilities and not create restrictions that tend to screen out individuals with disabilities, such as not allowing more than one person in a clothes-changing area when a disabled person required the assistance of another person.

The ADA also requires auxiliary aids and services to ensure effective communication for individuals with hearing, vision, or speech impairment. Such aids and services include interpreters, listening headsets, television closed caption decoders, telecommunication devices for the deaf, video tech displays, Braille materials and large-print materials.

[5] Defenses

There are several defenses and exclusions available under the ADA, but most are extremely narrow in scope. They include:

[a] Threat to Health and Safety

Refusal to serve a disabled person or to offer equipment, goods or services if such an individual poses a direct threat to the health and safety of others (e.g., amusement park rides, rafting exhibitions, or difficult swimming maneuvers).

[b] Private Clubs

Private clubs are excluded under Section 307 of the ADA. n4 The ADA defines a private club as being in accordance with Title II of the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

[c] Religious Organizations

Religious organizations are also exempt. The exemption applies even if it involves a church that operates a day care center, nursing home, or private school.

[d] Not Readily Achievable

Barrier removal is not required of the public accommodation if it is not readily achievable. Readily achievable means easily accomplishable and able to be carried out without much difficulty or expense.

[e] Structural Impracticability

Structural impracticability is a defense if the circumstances are such that incorporating excessive disability features in to the structure would destroy the structural integrity of the facility.

[f] Technical Infeasibility

Technical infeasibility applies to something that has little likelihood of being accomplished because of existing structural conditions that would require removing or altering a load-bearing member, such as a structural frame.

[g] Residential Structures

Residential structures are generally not subject to the requirements of the ADA unless they accommodate the public. In that case they would fall within the ambit of the public accommodations portion of the statute. Similarly, owner-occupied boarding houses and "bed-and-breakfast" establishments are not subject to the ADA if they have five rooms or less.

[h] Asbestos Removal

Asbestos removal projects do not trigger the "alterations" requirements under the ADA.

[i] Historic Structures

Qualified historic structures need not comply with the requirements of the ADA if compliance would threaten or destroy the historic significance of the building or facility.

[6] Responsibility for Compliance

The ADA generally imposes the obligation of compliance upon the building owner instead of the tenant or the property manager. A real estate agent, however, is exposed to liability under the ADA. An agent may be found negligent if the agent, as a professional, knew or should have known of the owner's noncompliance with the ADA or if an agent fails to inform a potential future owner of the building's noncompliance. Many leases make tenants responsible for all of the compliance expenses incurred due to federal, state, or local law. In such cases, the realtor's duty of disclosure is enhanced.

The Department of Justice has suggested different formulas or standards for allocating compliance costs between landlords and tenants. The suggestions have been criticized on the grounds that they are arbitrary.

[7] Foreclosure

In the event of foreclosure on a building not exempted by the ADA, such as an office building, one may find that though it may not be required to comply with the ADA prior to foreclosure, it may be required to comply with the ADA after foreclosure. This could cause the cost of barrier removal to fall upon the lender who initiated the foreclosure because of the change in use or ownership of the building. It has been suggested that lenders do an ADA audit of a building prior to foreclosure, similar to that done regarding toxic waste or an environmental assessment.

[8] Enforcement

The Department of Justice and private individuals may maintain a cause of action to enforce Title III against commercial building owners. The Department may seek monetary damages or injunctive relief, but private individuals are only entitled to seek injunctive relief under the ADA. It is possible, however, that a tort claim could create a cause of action for monetary damages.

[9] Department of Justice Enforcement

The Department of Justice enforces the provisions of Title III of the ADA by establishing a pattern or practice of discrimination, or by establishing a failure to comply, or by establishing that any person or group of persons has been denied any of the rights granted by Title III and that such denial raises an issue of general public importance.

Civil penalties may be imposed in the amounts of $50,000 for the first violation and $100,000 for each subsequent violation. The Attorney General may also seek monetary damages on behalf of aggrieved individuals. Any individual who believes that he or she has been the object of discrimination prohibited by the ADA may request that the Department of Justice investigate the claim.

[10] Private Cause of Action

An individual has a right to bring suit for injunctive relief if that individual has reasonable grounds to believe that he or she has been subjected to discrimination or is about to be subjected to discrimination. The private suit may be brought in court without first pursuing administrative remedies, and the individual may be entitled to a court-appointed attorney if, under the circumstances, the court deems such an appointment to be just.

CHAPTER 9 The Broker And Discrimination *

§ 9.10 Discrimination Against Real Estate Licensees

Most real estates agents and other licensees are employed by brokers as independent contractors. Consequently, discrimination statutes aimed at protecting employees will not protect a licensee who is an independent contractor.

Licensees have sued alleging that they were employees even though the contract with their supervising broker defined the relationship as being that of an independent contractor. In resolving the status of a licensee, courts usually look to the common law test of the master-servant relationship. Factors considered are the employer's right to control the details of the employee's work, the method of payment, the skill required in the particular occupation, whether the employer supplies the tools, instrumentalities and place of work, as well as the parties' own belief as to whether they are creating a master-servant relationship. n1

It appears that as a general rule, Title VII of the Equal Employment Opportunities Act n2 and similar state laws do not cover real estate licensees acting as independent contractors. n3 It also appears that as a general rule, that licensees acting as independent contractors will not be covered by the Americans with Disabilities Act (42 U.S.C. § 12101 et seq.), the Age Discrimination in Employment Act (29 U.S.C. § 621 et seq.), or any similar state law. n4

Selling real estate without using the Internet today is the equivalent of doing business without a fax machine, cell phone, or photocopier a decade ago. This chapter examines the following legal issues raised by the impact of the electronic commerce on the real estate brokerage business:

- Where can website operators be sued? (§ 10.02)
- Advertising real estate on the World Wide Web (§ 10.03)
- Who owns real estate data gathered by real estate agents and posted on the Internet? (§ 10.04)
- Use of multiple listing data by "virtual" real estate brokerage companies (§ 10.05)
- Liability risks of "linking" or "framing" other websites (§ 10.06)
- Consumer "privacy" breaches (§ 10.07)
- Extraterritorial reach of state real estate license laws (§ 10.08)
- E-mail liability (§ 10.09)

§ 10.01 Real Estate Brokers Cannot Ignore E-Commerce Issues

Incorporation of the Internet into the marketing of real estate is not optional for real estate brokers and salespersons. In 2000, the number of unique visitors to real estate web sites increased seventy-five percent (75%) from the previous year, while overall Web traffic only increased twenty-two percent (22%). In addition, almost thirty percent (30%) of consumers who access the Internet are in the market to buy a new property, or have been in the market in the last six months. n1 Surveys conducted by the National Association of Realtors(R) show that more and more buyers are searching the Internet for available listings before they ever contact a real estate agent. n2 Sellers are insisting that their agents advertise their properties on the Web, often at multiple national and local web sites. Buyers and sellers can research the sales price of comparable properties on the Web. Mortgage loan, homeowner's insurance, and title insurance applications can be submitted by consumers over the Web. Recorders of deeds and local tax assessors are making real estate public records accessible online in electronic formats. Lenders, insurance companies, Fannie Mae, and Freddie Mac can use automated valuation model software, linked to electronic real estate databases, to secure estimates of value of real estate parcels totally online in a matter of seconds.

Competition is intense for the patronage of the electronically sophisticated consumer. Sellers of products and services on the Internet are rapidly developing "data mining" techniques that enable them to "target" consumers who are most likely to buy their products and services based on the consumer's prior web surfing habits and purchasing history.

Real estate brokers cannot ignore these developments. The use of the Internet and e-commerce must be included in every broker's strategic business plan. To sell real estate without using the Internet today is the equivalent of doing business without a fax machine, cell phone, or photocopier ten years ago.

Not surprisingly, the law has not kept pace with advances in computer technology. Applying legal concepts developed before the invention of the touchtone telephone to electronic commerce creates confusing and numerous traps for the unwary. Examples of legal issues raised by the impact of the Internet on the real estate brokerage business are set forth below.

CHAPTER 10 The Impact of Electronic Commerce on the Real Estate Brokerage Business *

10A-10 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 10.02

§ 10.02 Personal Jurisdiction or "Where Can Website Operators Be Sued?"

[1] Long-Arm Statutes

Every state has a "long arm statute." n1 These statutes provide that a company "doing business" in a state can be required to defend itself in the courts of that state. Long-arm statutes are constitutional so long as the defendant has "minimal contacts" in the forum state. n2 These decisions are premised upon business transactions being consummated between parties from fixed locations within state territorial borders. When a vendor interacts with a consumer from a "virtual" location at an address on the World Wide Web, the issue arises whether the vendor is "present" in every state (or nation) from which the vendor's web site can be accessed.

[2] Long-Arm Statutes Can Be Used to Sue Foreign Operators of Interactive Web Sites If Sites Are Accessible to Web Users Located in the State

[a] If Web Site Is "Passive," Personal Jurisdiction Over the Web Site Operator Probably Will Not Attach

If the web site simply displays information to an Internet user, much like a billboard on a highway, the site probably will not be viewed as being "present" in a forum state. n3 Courts analogize to advertisements in magazines, which generally do not, standing alone, confer jurisdiction upon the advertiser in every state in which the magazine is sold or distributed.

Courts also decline to assert personal jurisdiction over non-resident web site operators who express purely non-commercial messages on their sites. In Jerry L. Falwell v. Gary Cohn and God.Info, n4 the plaintiff, a well-known evangelical minister based in Virginia, sued the defendant, an Illinois resident, in a Virginia federal court alleging that the defendant's web site on which the defendant published various statements critical of the plaintiff contained defamatory material and violated the Anti-Cybersquatting Consumer Protection Act. The court granted the defendant's motion to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction in Virginia. The court concluded that the defendant's messages on his website were not targeted at residents of Virginia because the plaintiff, while a Virginia resident, was a national figure.

A different result was reached in Tamburo d/b/a Man's Best Friend Software v. Dworkin, et al. n4.1 There, the plaintiff was an Illinois resident who designed and marketed a software program that provided users with access to information about dog pedigrees. Tamburo's software program scanned the Internet and indexed data accessible on public websites about dog pedigrees. In his complaint, Tamburo alleged that the defendants falsely accused him of "stealing" their proprietary data, and engaging in an aggressively Internet based campaign to encourage other dog enthusiasts to boycott Tamburo's products and to send him emails and other messages complaining about his conduct. In the course of promoting their boycott of Tamburo the defendants published Tamburo's Illinois address in their various communications.

The defendants were four operators of public websites from which Tamburo acquired data for his software program. The individual defendants were residents of Colorado, Michigan, Ohio, and Ottawa, Canada. An additional defendant was WildSystems Pty, Ltd., an Australian software company that operated a private only Yahoo email listserve for customers of its software that also information about dog pedigrees. Wildsystems is alleged to have posted messages from the other defendants on its Yahoo email listserve. Tamburo alleged that all of the defendants violated federal and state antitrust laws, and committed common law defamation by organizing a boycott campaign against his business. All of the defendants moved to dismiss Tamburo's complaint for lack of personal jurisdiction. The trial court granted the defendants' motion, which the Seventh Circuit reversed in part and affirmed in part.

The Seventh Circuit held at the outset that Tamburo had failed to allege facts to state a claim under the federal or state antitrust laws against any of the defendants. The Court then found that Tamburo alleged sufficient facts to establish personal jurisdiction over the individual defendants for the purposes of this common law claims. The Court found initially that the trial court could not assert general personal jurisdiction over any of the defendants because none of them had any continuous and systematic contacts with Illinois. On the other hand, the Court found that the trial court had specific personal jurisdiction over the individual defendants because, based on the facts alleged in Tamburo's complaint, they engaged in specific conduct targeted at Tamburo and with the intent to inflict injury upon him in Illinois. The Court then held that Tamburo had not alleged sufficient facts to establish specific personal jurisdiction over the Australian software company because the company merely posted messages from the other defendants on its listserve. Tamburo did not allege that the company knew Tamburo was a resident of Illinois or participated in any conduct intended to inflict injury upon Tamburo in Illinois.

The teaching of the Tamburo case is that persons who use internet communication media to intentionally inflict injury on another person may be subject to personal jurisdiction in the plaintiff's state of residence whether or not the defendants had any other contacts with the forum state.

[b] Advertising "Plus" May Well Confer Jurisdiction

In Minnesota v. Granite Gate Resorts n5 Minnesota courts asserted jurisdiction over a Nevada corporation that solicited sports bets over the Internet when 248 Minnesota residents placed such bets. Illinois courts asserted jurisdiction over a power boat manufacturer who operated a web site on which consumers could communicate with the defendant about their intentions to attend upcoming boat shows. n6

More recently, in Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios v. Grokster, Ltd, n7 the court held that an Australian company that distributed from its website the Kazaa peer-to-peer software that allows users to share files of recorded music was subject to the jurisdiction of California courts even though it did not have any connections to the state other than operating a site on the World Wide Web from which California residents could download the software for subsequent use in the state. In a suit brought against the company for contributory copyright infringement, the court found that the defendant purposely availed itself of the privilege of doing business in California by permitting California residents to download its software. The court rejected the defendant's argument that it did not purposely avail itself of the privilege of doing business in California because it did not know the domicile of the persons who downloaded its software. The court concluded, alternatively, that since the company did not dispute that as many as two million California residents downloaded the company's software, and that the company offered the free downloads to drive visitors to its website on which it sold advertising, that the company was engaging "commercial contacts" with California residents at its website.

[c] Sales of Products or Services via Internet to State Residents Will Most Likely Confer Jurisdiction in Purchaser's Home State

In CompuServe, Inc. v. Patterson,ⁿ⁸ a Texas defendant entered into an agreement with CompuServe to distribute defendant's software through CompuServe's Internet distribution system. Using CompuServe's system, the Texas defendant sold $650.00 of software to Ohio residents, which the court found sufficient to confer personal jurisdiction over the defendant in Ohio. In Euromarket Designs, Inc. v. Crate & Barrel, Ltd.,ⁿ⁹ an Irish company created a web site that featured the trademark of Crate & Barrel, a well-known Illinois-based retailer. The Irish firm's web site accepted orders and solicited consumers to place their names on a mailing list. One sale was made to an Illinois resident. This sale, together with the court's finding that the Irish firm's use of the Crate & Barrel trademark was "targeted" at the Illinois company, was sufficient to permit the Illinois court to assert personal jurisdiction over the Irish defendant.

Courts are willing, however, to enforce forum selection provisions of online Terms of Use Agreements pursuant to which goods and services are provided to online customers and clients. In Robert Novak, d/b/a Pets Warehouse and Petswarehouse.com v. Overture Services, Inc.,ⁿ¹⁰ the plaintiff sued Google, Inc. when Google sold preferred search engine placements that appeared in response to searches that included the terms "pets" and "warehouse," which constituted the plaintiff's trade name and web site domain. The court granted Google's motion to dismiss the case based upon the "forum selection" paragraph in Google's Terms of Service agreement, which the defendant had accepted by clicking the "I Accept" button on the Google site. The Google Terms of Service specified that all suits arising from Google's services had to be brought in California, rather than New York. The court declined, however, to dismiss the claims against another defendant based on lack of personal jurisdiction. The court concluded that the New York Long-Arm Statute conferred jurisdiction upon New York courts over this defendant because it sold approximately $6000 a year in products to residents of New York from its web site that appeared in response to users' Google searches using the plaintiff's trade name as a search term.

[d] How Much "Plus" Is Enough to Confer Jurisdiction?

Set forth below are examples of other types of "interactivity" on a web site that have been deemed sufficient to confer personal jurisdiction in the plaintiff's home state.

(a) Advertisement of toll free telephone number on the Internet.ⁿ¹¹

(b) Compiling a mailing list of interested users.ⁿ¹²

In addition to the question of where a web site operator can be sued by reason of products and services available from the operators' web site, there is the related question of whether the web site operator is subject to any regulatory or licensing requirements of other jurisdictions if the activity occurring on the operator's site is of the type regulated by state agencies. This is particularly true of real estate brokers. In Stroman Realty, Inc. v. Antt,ⁿ¹³ a real estate brokerage company filed a declaratory judgment action against the California and Florida real estate commissions challenging their right to require the broker to possess a California or Florida real estate brokerage license to engage in the sale of time share interests using a web site. The plaintiff was a real estate broker licensed in the state of Texas. The plaintiff specialized in the sale of "interval ownership" interests or "time shares." The two states with the largest percentages of time share properties in the United States are Florida and California. The plaintiff operated from a single office outside of Houston, Texas. From that office, plaintiff advertised its services through the mail and in print media. It also operated a website that displayed properties from around the world, and maintained toll free telephone numbers that interested persons may call to inquire about time share interests for sale, or to list an interest for sale with the plaintiff.

The plaintiff's sellers and buyers could be located throughout the world, and more often than not the buyers and sellers would be located in a state or country other than where the time share property is located. California and Florida regulators sent the plaintiff letters demanding that the plaintiff secure California and Florida real estate licenses as a precondition of participating in any transactions involving residents of either state as buyers or sellers of time share interests. Rather than acquiesce in the demands of the state regulators, the plaintiff filed suit seeking a declaratory judgment that the state regulators' demand for a license under these circumstances constituted a burden on interstate commerce in violation of the Commerce Clause of the United States Constitution. The district court agreed with the broker and entered the declaratory judgment. The court found that the market for time share interests was a "national" market. The time share interests were almost exclusively used by their owners for vacation purposes, and therefore properties located in one state competed with properties located in other states at potential vacation destinations for buyers of time share interests. The court determined that the states' demands that the plaintiff submit to regulation in their states, in addition to the state of Texas, unduly burdened this "national market" without a sufficiently countervailing interest on the part of the states. The California and Florida regulators stated their intention to file an appeal of this decision with the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals.

Practice Note:

More and more real estate brokers, and agents as well, are creating web sites that permit potential buyers and sellers to search electronic databases of listings available for sale, and maintain electronic portfolios of these listings in personal "files." It is highly likely that these web sites will be found to have sufficient "interactivity" to confer personal jurisdiction over the broker in the consumer's home state.

PART III Public Regulation

CHAPTER 10 The Impact of Electronic Commerce on the Real Estate Brokerage Business *

§ 10.03 Advertising Real Estate on the World Wide Web

With certain exceptions (see Regulation of Internet Advertising in § 6.02[3][b] above), using the Internet to advertise real estate for sale is not treated under the law any differently than advertising in any other format. All of the basic rules still apply.

[1] Statutory Shield to Internet Service Providers for Third Party Postings

While advertisers themselves are liable for the content of the advertising they disseminate, Congress enacted in 1996 Section 230 of the Communications Decency Act n1 for the purpose of immunizing Internet Service Providers (ISPs) from liability for content posted by third parties through their services. Section 230(c) of the Act provides in part that "[n]o provider ... of an interactive computer service shall be treated as the publisher or speaker of any information provided by another information provider." The federal Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals construed Section 230 of the Act as applied to real estate advertising in Chicago Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights Under The Law v. Craigslist, Inc. n2 Craigslist is a widely used site at which individual members of the "community" post advertisements for various products or services, including apartments for rent. Some of the advertisements posted on the site contained expressions of preferences for housing occupants based on race, gender, sexual preference or religion. Such expressions of a preference violate Section 804 (c) of the Federal Fair Housing Act., n3 and newspapers that publish such advertising are liable under the Fair Housing Act. n4

The Seventh Circuit affirmed the trial court's dismissal of the plaintiff's complaint against Craigslist based on Section 230 of the Communications Decency Act. The Seventh Circuit concluded that Section 230 immunizes an "interactive computer service," such as Craigslist, from any action premised on Craigslist being deemed a "publisher" of the content appearing on the site. The court then construed Section 804(c) of the Fair Housing Act as imposing liability upon the "publishers" of discriminatory housing advertisements. For that reason, the court held that Section 230 of the Communications Decency Act immunized Craigslist from the Fair Housing Act claims asserted by the plaintiff. A different result was reached, however, by the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals in Fair Housing Council of San Fernando Valley, et al. v. Roommates.com, LLC. n5

In this case, Roommates.com required its members to complete questionnaires that solicited information about the members' housing preferences, including information about, among other things, a potential roommates familial status or preferred sexual preference. The questionnaires were used to create profiles of the members, and the members' profiles were used to determine what postings for roommates they were shown. For example, a member with children would not be shown a posting indicating a preference for a roommate without children. The Ninth Circuit held that Roommates.com was not entitled to any immunity under Section 230 of the Communications Decency Act because, by soliciting information from its members, using the information to prepare member profiles, and using the profiles to screen the postings provided to the members, Roommates.com assumed responsibility for the information provided by the members, and the uses to which the information was put. As an "information content provider" itself, Roommates.com was not entitled to Section 230 immunity.

The court did hold, however, that Roommates.com was entitled to immunity under Section 230 for dissemination of "additional comments" submitted by members. In the "additional comments" portion of the profile form, members were invited to compose a narrative about the particular characteristics they were seeking in a future roommate. Because these comments were composed entirely by the member and disseminated in an unedited form, Roommates.com was entitled to immunity under Section 230 for the content of the comments, many of which contained explicitly discriminatory remarks. A further case that defines the scope of the immunity afforded to "interactive computer services" by Section 230 of the Communications Decency Act is Doev. Friendfinder Network, Inc., et al. n6

In the Friendfinder case, the defendants operated a number of affiliated "web communities," one of which promoted itself as the largest "sex and swinger personal community." At the defendants' site a profile of a female member was posted that included birth date, height, build, hair and eye color that matched the plaintiff, together with a photo, under the user name "petra03755." Upon learning about the profile on the defendants' site, the plaintiff demanded that it be removed, which the defendants did. The plaintiff then filed a multi-count complaint against the defendants that included claims for invasion of her "intellectual property rights", defamation, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and false designation of origin under the federal Lanham Act. The plaintiff's Lanham Act claim contended that the defendants falsely advertised that the plaintiff was available for the type of encounters promoted on the defendants' websites. The defendants filed a motion to dismiss all of the plaintiff's claims based on Section 230 of the Communications Decency Act. The court agreed that Section 230 immunity was available to the defendants for all of the plaintiff's tort based claims that were not grounded in an infringement of the plaintiff's "intellectual property rights."

Section 230(e)(2) of the Communications Decency Act n7 provides that "[n]othing in this section shall be construed to limit or expand any law pertaining to intellectual property." The court held that this limitation on Section 230 immunity included state law claims based on infringement of intellectual property rights. The court construed plaintiff's complaint as making a claim of invasion of the plaintiff's right of "publicity." The court held that the right to "publicize" one's likeness was an "intellectual property right" that was excluded from Section 230 immunity by Section 230(e)(2). The court reached the opposite conclusion concerning the plaintiff's claim for invasion of privacy. The court treated an invasion of privacy claim as a violation of a "personal right" and not a "property right." The court further held that the plaintiff successfully plead a claim for "false designation of origin" and "false advertising" in violation of Section 43(a) of the Lanham Act. n8 The court found that the plaintiff had adequately plead her claims under the Lanham Act by alleging that the defendants had falsely represented that she was a member of the defendants' sites, that she was available for the types of encounters promoted on the sites, and that consumers were deceived into believing that they could engage in such encounters with the plaintiff by availing themselves of the defendants' services.

The Craigslist, Roommates.com and Friendfinder cases demonstrate the scope of the immunity, and the limits thereon, available under Section 230 of the Communications Decency Act. Section 230 immunity is available to "interactive computer services" only to the extent they do not create the content posted on the site. While the Friendfinder case does not involve real estate advertising, it does illustrate that Section 230 immunity is not available to an "interactive computer service" for claims alleging an infringement of rights in "intellectual property," which can include common law claims of infringement of a right to publicity. More and more real estate brokers, and real estate listing aggregators, are expanding the functionality on their websites to permit consumers to post information or commentary about themselves, their neighborhood, their dealings with other real estate agents or brokers, or about particular property listings. As the use of this functionality expands, website operators must be sure that they operate these features of their sites in manner that permits them to rely on Section 230 immunity, and create procedures to minimize the risk that this functionality can be used to invade a third party's "intellectual property rights" under state or federal law.

[2] Advertising May Not Be False or Misleading

Real estate brokers have always been held liable for false or misleading advertising of real estate available for sale. This liability will continue to attach to any such conduct that occurs on a broker's web site. Such conduct is prohibited by:

- the Federal Trade Commission Act,
- state consumer fraud acts,
- real estate license laws, and
- the common law of misrepresentation. n9

[3] Brokers or Agents May Not Advertise Property for Sale or Lease Without Permission of Owner or Owner's Agent

Real estate brokers and agents routinely display their own listed properties on their publicly accessible web sites. Real estate brokers are prohibited, however, under most real estate license laws and the Realtors(R) Code of Ethics from advertising property listed with another broker without the express permission of the other broker, or of the seller.

Because of this general rule, the National Association of Realtors(R) added a new provision to its Multiple Listing Policy in May of 2000 designed to enable brokers to advertise listings of other brokers on publicly accessible web sites. This policy states that, unless a broker has expressly withheld such consent, a broker's submission of a listing to a Multiple Listing Service that is owned and operated by an association of Realtors(R) constitutes the broker's implied consent to allow other participants in the Service to display the broker's listing on the other brokers' publicly accessible web sites.

The listing broker may, however, "opt out" of the Internet display of the broker's listings, either on a company-wide or listing-by-listing basis. If the listing broker elects to "opt out" on a company-wide basis, then that broker may not display the listings of other brokers on the broker's web site. The National Association of Realtors'(R) policy on Internet display of listing information is clearly intended to enable Realtors(R) to serve the increasing number of home buyers who use the Internet to research available properties for sale before they actually contact a brokerage company. The National Association of Realtors(R) Internet display policy supplies the consent of the listing broker, which is required by law to enable a broker to advertise another broker's listing. The value to home buyers of a broker's web site that displays all of the listings in the local Multiple Listing Service is greatly enhanced over a site that only displays the broker's own listings.

[4] Laws of Defamation and Invasion of Privacy Apply to Internet Communications

The use of the Internet to disseminate information that is defamatory or invades an individual's personal privacy is just as actionable as if the offending material were disseminated in any other medium.

[5] Intellectual Property Rights Can Be Infringed on the Internet

In Religious Technology Center v. Lerma n10 the court granted summary judgment in favor of the Church of Scientology whose copyrighted texts were posted by an infringer on the Internet. Courts have also held that the manner in which real estate data is displayed in Multiple Listing Service compilations, as well as certain narrative material in the compilation, is protected under the Federal Copyright Act, and persons who copy a Multiple Listing Service's compilation infringe upon the Service's copyright rights. n11

An increasing number of Multiple Listing Services are utilizing Internet-accessible database management software to deliver multiple listing services to their real estate broker participants. Brokers contact the Service's address on the Internet and enter a user ID and password to gain access to the Service database. Accessing the Multiple Listing Service database via a browser and an Internet Service Provider (ISP) is significantly less expensive than utilizing direct "dial up" telephone connections to a mainframe computer. The accessibility of the Multiple Listing Service database on the Internet, however, requires Multiple Listing Services to take additional measures to protect their copyright and other intellectual property rights in their real estate databases. Many Multiple Listing Services require their participants to sign separate participation agreements that include terms that specifically acknowledge the Service's intellectual property rights in the Service database compilation. An increasing number of Multiple Listing Services also require computer vendors and consultants who construct and manage brokers' and agents' web sites and internal data management systems to sign license agreements that establish limitations on the consultants' access to the Service database.

The Internet can also be a vehicle through which a real estate broker's trademark rights can be infringed. This is illustrated by the case of Edina Realty, Inc. v. The MLSOnline.com. n12 The plaintiff, Edina Realty, Inc., is a large real estate brokerage firm headquartered in Minneapolis, Minnesota. The defendant operated a website at themlsonline.com at which it generated potential purchasers of Minneapolis residential real estate who were serviced by the defendants' licensed agents. Edina Realty received a federal trademark registration for its name, "Edina Realty" in mid 2002. Edina invested considerable resources in promoting its trade name and operated its own website at edinarealty.com. The defendant purchased Edina's trademark "Edina Realty" as a keyword from Google and Yahoo. The defendant also inserted "Edina Realty" into the meta tags on its own website. As a result of these two actions, if users of these search engines search for the term "Edina Realty" they will receive search results that include a "sponsored link" to the defendant's site at the top of the search results page. Edina's site is listed below the sponsored links. The defendant's site is also shown further down the search results list. According to the Google and Yahoo statistics, users clicked on the defendant's link nearly forty percent of the time a search for "Edina Realty" was conducted. Edina sent the defendant a letter demanding that it cease and desist from using Edina's trademark as a purchased keyword or as a meta tag. When the defendant refused, Edina sued the defendant for trademark infringement and various unfair competition violations. After discovery the parties filed cross motions for summary judgment. The court denied Edina's motion for summary judgment on its trademark infringement claims holding that there were disputed issues of material fact on the likelihood that consumers are, or will be, confused by the appearance of a link to the defendant's website in the search results returned to a consumer who searches for the term "Edina Realty."

The court also denied the defendant's motion for summary judgment. The defendant contended that it was entitled to the defense of "nominative fair use." Nominative fair use is available as a defense to a trademark infringement action when the defendant can show that it used the plaintiff's mark as a means of describing its own goods or services. In this case, the defendant contended that it was making a "fair use" of the plaintiff's mark because it displayed Edina Realty listings on its website by reason of its participation in the local multiple listing service's IDX program. The court declined to find that the defendant's use of the Edina mark was nominative fair use as a matter of law. The court noted that the defendant was not required to use the Edina trade mark to describe the services available at its website. It could just as easily have stated that it displays "real estate listings from all firms in the Twin Cities." The court also found that the defendant could have purchased search terms that referred to "Twin Cities real estate" generally, as opposed to Edina Realty specifically. As a result the court rejected the defendant's nominative fair use defense to plaintiff's trademark infringement claim. The court did, however, grant the defendant's summary judgment motion on Edina's trademark dilution claim. The court noted that a trademark dilution claim requires proof that the plaintiff's mark was "famous" and that the defendant used the mark in a manner that diluted the distinctive quality of the plaintiff's mark by causing consumers to associate plaintiff's mark with the goods or services of other suppliers. The court found that Edina's mark was "famous" but that Edina had not produced any evidence that the defendant had used Edina's mark in a manner that reduced its effectiveness as an indicator of real estate brokerage services provided by Edina. The Edina case shows that a real estate broker's Internet marketing practices can be the basis for trademark infringement claims, especially when one broker attempts to use another broker's trade name as a means to attract Internet traffic. The Edina case serves as a warning that the use of another broker's mark will not be excused simply because the broker operates an IDX site on which listings of the other broker appear.

After the Edina case was decided, the Second Circuit court of appeals in Rescuecom Corp. v. Google, Inc. n13 considered whether Google committed trademark infringement by offering the to sell other companies' trademarks as part of its "AdWords" and "Keyword Suggestion Tool." As part of its paid search advertising program, Google offered "keywords" for sale to potential advertisers. Under the Google "AdWord" program, if a company purchased a "keyword" from Google, then whenever a consumer typed that word into the Google search engine, the name of the purchaser's company and a hypertext link to the purchaser's website would appear at the top of the search results presented to the consumer. Through its "Keyword Suggestion Tool," Google counseled potential advertisers on the keywords that would be most appropriate for them to purchase based on the nature of their business. Often Google would suggest that a company purchase as keywords the trademarks of the company's competitors. Rescuecom was in the business of franchising computer servicing and sales companies. Rescuecom had federally registered its name as a trademark. Google in turn sold the Rescuecom trademark to a Rescuecom competitor, and, as a result, the competitor's name and website link appeared at the top of the search results when a person typed "Rescuecom" into the Google search engine. Rescuecom sued Google for trademark infringement in violation of the federal Lanham Act.

The district court dismissed Rescuecom's complaint for failure to state a cause of action under Rule 12(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. The district court interpreted the Second Circuit's previous decision in 1-800 Contacts v. WhatU.com, Inc. n14 as holding that the use of trademark as a hidden website "metatag" was not a use of the trademark "in commerce", which is required element of a Lanham Act trademark infringement claim. The Second Circuit, however, distinguished its 1-800 decision and reversed and remanded the case to the district court. In 1-800, the defendant provided software that computer users could download. The software, in turn, generated "pop up ads" for "contextually relevant" advertisers when ever a computer user typed a particular search term into a browser or visited a particular website. The "pop up ads" appeared in a completely separate browser window and were clearly branded in the name of the advertiser so as not to cause any confusion to the consumer concerning the source of the services or products being advertised in the pop up ad. Furthermore, the triggering event that caused the ad to "pop up" was not a company's trademark, but its website address. On these facts the Second Circuit held in 1-800 that the defendant did not use the plaintiff's trademarks "in commerce."

In Rescuecom, however, the Second Circuit noted that Google sold use of the plaintiff's trademark as a "keyword" component of its AdWord program, and through its Keyword Suggestion Tool, it affirmatively counseled potential keyword purchasers to purchase as keywords the trademarks of their competitors. The court concluded that this use of company trademarks was materially different that the lack of use in 1-800. Accordingly, the court held that Rescuecom sufficiently alleged that Google had used the plaintiff's trademarks "in commerce" to satisfy the threshold requirement of the Lanham Act. The court further held that the plaintiff sufficiently alleged that the manner in which Google displayed the names and websites of competitors who purchased Rescuecom's trademark as a keyword created consumer confusion concerning whether the competitor's site was in fact operated by, or affiliated with, Rescuecom.

The lesson of the Second Circuit's Rescuecom decision, as well as the Edina, is that use of registered trademarks as website "metatags" for the purpose of redirecting internet users searching for the trademark owner's site to another site can lead to infringement liability under the Lanham Act.

infringement claim against a computer bulletin board operator whose bulletin board was used to post material that infringed upon the plaintiff's copyright. The court reached its conclusion because:

- there was not any evidence that the operator controlled the conduct of the infringer, and
- the operator did not receive any economic benefit from the infringement.

To clarify a web site operator's vicarious liability for copyright infringement that might occur on the operator's web site, the United States Congress passed in 1999 the Digital Millennium Copyright Act (DMCA). n16 Section 512(c) of the DCMA contains a "safe harbor" for web site operators from damage liability for copyright infringement, provided that the web site operator did not have any actual knowledge of the infringing nature of the material posted to the site by a web site user. To take advantage of the "safe harbor," web site operators must identify a designated agent that aggrieved copyright owners may contact if they believe infringement is occurring on the site. The operator may remove the allegedly infringing material pending an investigation of the merits of the copyright owner's claims. If the terms of the "safe harbor" are met, the web site operator is not vicariously liable for any monetary damages arising from copyright infringement that occurs on the site.

A court defined the limits on the "safe harbor" provision of the Digital Millennium Copyright Act (DCMA) in Perfect 10, Inc. v Cybernet Ventures, Inc. n17 In this case, the defendant operated an age verification "adult check" system that was intended to ensure that visitors to adult web sites were in fact over the legal age for permissible access to such sites. Websites using the defendant's services inserted script into the code for their sites that directed first-time visitors to the defendant's site from which the defendant sold the visitors an access code that granted the visitors free access for a limited period of time to the adult websites that participated in the defendant's service.

As a condition of participation in the defendant's service, the defendant required website operators to submit the content of their sites to defendant for review to determine that the content is appropriate and not illegal. The defendant also published "reviews" of the participating websites to the defendant's subscribers. The defendant, however, does not procure any of the images or other content that appears on its participants' websites. Each site is operated by an independent third party who is responsible for procuring content and advertising its site.

The plaintiff published a magazine and operated a website containing photographs of nude women in which it owned the copyrights. The plaintiff sued the defendant for contributory and vicarious copyright infringement liability when it discovered that the websites that participated in the defendant's service contained over 10,000 images in which the plaintiff held the copyright. The court held that the plaintiff was likely to prevail on its claim, and the defendant was not likely to be entitled to the "safe harbor" of the DMCA because

- (1) the defendant failed to adopt any policy to permit copyright holders to pursue allegations of copyright infringement occurring on the participants' sites, or to deter repeat infringers;
- (2) the defendant received a financial benefit derived from the infringing conduct of the sites that participated in the defendant's service; and
- (3) the defendant exercised a degree of control over the content of sites that participated in defendant's service through its evaluation and review process.

In a later decision in Corbis Corporation v. Amazon.com, Inc., n18 Amazon.com, Inc. was found to be entitled to protection from the "safe harbor" provision of the DMCA when copies of infringing photographs were sold on Amazon's website. At its web site, Amazon permits unaffiliated third parties to sell products through its "zShops" program. Amazon charges a fee to sellers to create "listings" at the "zShop" page. Amazon's agreement with vendors using its "zShops" program includes a provision in which the vendors agree not to sell any material that infringes upon another party's intellectual property rights. According to its procedures, if Amazon receives notice that a product on its site is infringing another's intellectual property rights, Amazon cancels the listing of the alleged infringer. When the plaintiff discovered photographs for sale on the Amazon site for which the plaintiff claimed a copyright, it commenced suit against Amazon without first informing Amazon of the existence of the allegedly infringing material on the Amazon site. Upon receipt of the plaintiff's lawsuit, Amazon cancelled the listings of the vendors who were promoting the allegedly infringing material. On Amazon's motion for summary judgment, the court dismissed Amazon from the lawsuit on the grounds that it was entitled to the protection of the DMCA "safe harbor."

Courts have also held that the DCMA does not preempt other defenses that may be available to an Internet Service Provider (ISP) alleged to have engaged in copyright infringement. In CoStar Group, Inc., et al, v. LoopNet, Inc. n19 the court held that the defendant was not liable for copyright infringement when third parties posted on its site infringing photographs of commercial real estate properties. The court found that the defendant, which operated a listing service for commercial real estate, was not liable for copyright infringement based upon the acts of third parties, even though the defendant was entirely "passive" in its handling of the infringing material. The defendant did screen material posted on its site for obvious infringements or material that did not relate to the properties listed for sale or lease. When alerted by the plaintiff of the existence on the site of the infringing photographs, the defendant deleted the material from its site. The court held there was not sufficient "volitional" conduct by the defendant to hold the defendant liable for direct copyright infringement. The decision does not, however, address the defendant's liability for contributory or vicarious copyright infringement based upon knowledge of the infringing material and the defendant's financial interest in the illegal copying.

PART III Public Regulation

CHAPTER 10 The Impact of Electronic Commerce on the Real Estate Brokerage Business *

10A-10 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 10.04

[1] Raw Facts Are Not "Owned" by Anyone

Confusion continues among real estate brokers and Multiple Listing Service operators over the "ownership" of the data about real property listed for sale, or that has been sold, that is contained in the Service's database compilation. This debate has its origin in the United States Supreme Court's decision in Feist Publications v. Rural Telephone Service Co. n1 In Feist, the Supreme Court held that a telephone book "white pages" that contained an alphabetical list of names, addresses, and telephone numbers is not entitled to copyright protection. According to the Court, the Copyright Clause of the Constitution mandates that only works that demonstrate "creativity" in the expression of an idea or concept are entitled to copyright protection. The alphabetical arrangement of names, together with addresses and telephone numbers, was too obvious and devoid of creativity to rise to the level of an "original" work entitled to copyright protection.

As a result of Feist, a person who compiles data cannot claim copyright rights in the database compilation simply by reason of having expended the effort to create the compilation in the first instance. The Supreme Court in Feist expressly rejected the "sweat of the brow" as a basis for copyright acquisition. Hence, the mere act of compiling facts into a database compilation does not confer any copyright right in the compiler in the raw facts that are contained in the database compilation. Nor does the compiler enjoy any copyright protection in the database compilation if the manner in which the data is arranged and displayed is devoid of a minimal degree of creativity or originality.

The Feist decision makes clear that the data about properties for sale, or that have been sold, contained in a Multiple Listing Service database compilation is not subject to copyright protection under any circumstances. Accordingly, real estate data, per se, is not "owned" in a proprietary sense by anyone, including the listing broker, or the property owner. This is not to say, however, that listing brokers or Multiple Listing Services do not have any control over access to the data contained in the Service's database, or over the uses to which the database compilation shall be put by those persons who are granted access to it.

For example, certain components of the content contained in a multiple listing service database are, in and of themselves, "works" of creativity, and therefore separately copyrightable. One of these "works" is any image or photograph of the listed property. Photographs or videos that depict a property are defined as a copyrightable work in the federal Copyright Act. n2 The copyright in the photograph or image is owned initially by the photographer who took the photograph or video. Most multiple listing service rules and regulations provide that rights to the photographs or images submitted by a multiple listing service participant are conveyed to the multiple listing service.

The case of Dawes-Ordonez v. Realtors Association of Greater Fort Lauderdale, n2.1 addresses a multiple listing services rights to redisplay property photos submitted on listed property in the event the property is subsequently relisted with another broker. In Dawes-Ordonez, a listing agent hired the plaintiff photographer to photograph the agent's listed property. The engagement agreement between the agent and the photographer stated that the photographs could be used for a variety of marketing purposes, including submission to the multiple listing service to which the agent subscribed. The agent entered the photographs into the multiple listing service database, with the full knowledge and consent of the photographer, although the photographs did not include a copyright notice from the photographer. The listing agent then sold the property.

Some time later the property was relisted for sale by another agent who subscribed to the same multiple listing service. The new listing agent had access through the multiple listing service's historical database to the photographs taken by the plaintiff. The new listing agent included the photographs taken by the plaintiff when she entered data about the property as part of the new listing. When the plaintiff discovered that the photographs have been included as part of the subsequent listing of the property she notified the new listing agent that she owned the copyrights to the photographs and that the agent did not have permission to display the photographs as part of the new listing filed with the multiple listing service. The new listing agent promptly removed the photographs from the listing data about the property in the multiple listing service's active database. The plaintiff did not at that time notify the multiple listing service of her copyright claims to the photographs.

Notwithstanding the new listing agent's removal of the photographs from the property listing data, the plaintiff photographer filed a copyright infringement claim against the new listing agent, her brokerage firm, and the multiple listing service. In response to the plaintiff's complaint, the multiple listing service filed a motion for summary judgment contending that it did not infringe upon the plaintiff's copyrights, and, alternatively, that the plaintiff granted the multiple listing service an implied license to use the plaintiff's photographs and make them available to its participants, including the new listing agent for their use on marketing listed property.

The court granted the multiple listing service's motion holding that the plaintiff had granted an implied license to the multiple listing service to include the photographs in the multiple listing service's database. The court found that a copyright holder grants a implied license to use a copyrighted work when a party (1) creates work at another's request, (2) delivers the work to the other party, and (3) intends that the other party copy and distribute the work. The court then noted that the original listing agent contracted with the plaintiff to take photographs of the property. The plaintiff took the photographs and delivered them to the original listing agent. The plaintiff also knew that the original listing agent would disseminate the photographs in the course of marketing the property, including submitting the photographs to the multiple listing service database. The court held that the plaintiff's delivery of the photographs to the original listing agent constituted constructive delivery to the multiple listing service. The court concluded that the multiple listing service's use of the plaintiff's photographs were within the scope of the implied license that the plaintiff granted to the multiple listing service.

The court also granted summary judgment to the multiple listing service on the plaintiff's claim the multiple listing service had engaged in "contributory infringement." The court noted that a party is liable for contributory infringement if it intentionally induces, or contributes to, the infringing conduct of another person. The court found that the plaintiff had not introduced any evidence to show that the multiple listing service had intentionally induced anyone to infringe upon the plaintiff's copyright rights.

While this court found that on the record before it that the plaintiff photographer had granted the multiple listing service an implied license to disseminate the photographer's works, the case still underscores the importance of establishing a clear "chain of title" to all copyrightable works that are submitted to an multiple listing service database, and that either an assignment or a license has been granted by the original copyright owner to use the works for the purposes intended by the multiple listing service.

Another creative work that is a typical component of the property records in a multiple listing service database compilation is the "remarks" written by the listing agent describing the positive features of the property. These "remarks" are the creative work of the agent who composed them, and the agent is the "author" who owns the copyright right in the "remarks" unless and until those rights have been assigned or conveyed through operation of the multiple listing service's rules and regulations or other participation agreement.

There is also the possibility that the "list price" at which a property is offered for sale is a creative work. This argument is based on cases that have found that "blue book" prices of automobiles are "works" that are copyrightable. n3 The "blue book" case found that the automobile values published in the "blue book" were the result of the author's research and were offered as opinions of fair market value based upon the condition and age of the vehicle. An analogy is to a real estate appraisal report. There is little doubt that an appraiser's report and opinion of value is a "work" in which the appraiser who created the report has a copyright right. n4 A list price, however, is not an appraisal. It is simply the price that the seller is willing to accept in return for a deed to the property. While some "analysis" may have been undertaken to arrive at the listing price, the list price is no different than the price on the windshield of a car on a used car lot. In this respect, it is likely that a "list price" will be considered to be a "fact" not any different from the number of bedrooms and bathrooms in a house, which is not entitled to copyright protection under the Feist decision. Once the property is sold, the actual sales price is a "fact" that is not copyrightable.

[2] Ownership of "Data" Is Separate from Ownership of Real Estate or Ownership of a Listing Agreement

While the listing broker "owns" the listing, and the owner "owns" the house, neither "own" factual data about the house, even if both have gathered some or all of the data. A person who compiles, or even discovers, a "fact" does not acquire ownership of the "fact" simply by being the first to do so. The Supreme Court in Feist made clear that "creativity," not effort, is the touchstone of copyright entitlement. Nevertheless both the listing broker and the owner have the right to control how information about the owner's property will be used for the purpose of marketing the property. These rights derive from the contractual relationship between the broker and the owner.

A listing broker who secures an exclusive listing agreement from a property owner owns the contractual right to earn compensation from the owner if the broker's efforts to market the property to a ready, willing, and able buyer n5 are successful. The exclusive listing agreement also confers upon the listing broker the exclusive right to determine the manner and methods through which the property will be marketed on the owner's behalf, subject only to the owner's power to limit the scope of that right. To this extent the listing broker controls how the data about the listing that is contained in the Multiple Listing Service's database compilation will be used by the Service, or by other brokers who utilize the Service, for the purpose of marketing the property to potential buyers.

The listing broker's right to control the use of information about the property for marketing purposes is, nevertheless, subordinate to the instructions of the owner. As the broker's principal, the owner always has the power to set limitations on the marketing methods that the broker may employ on the owner's behalf. This power to control the broker's marketing methods includes the power to control how the broker uses information about the owner's property in the course of the broker's marketing efforts.

But the power to control the manner in which information about the property will be used for marketing purposes does not include the power to control the use of information about the property for all purposes. To the extent the Multiple Listing Service makes the non-copyrightable data components available for purposes other than marketing of the listed property, the Service alone has the right to control access to the real estate data contained in the Service's compilation. Among these "non-marketing" purposes for which the Service's database can be put include:

- property valuations,
- real estate research and consulting, and
- lender portfolio risk assessments.

A Multiple Listing Service that chooses to license access to the non-copyrighable components of its database compilation to third parties for such non-marketing purposes need not secure the consent of listing brokers, or property owners, before entering into such licensing agreements. This is true because no one owns the factual data, and the broker's and owner's right to control the use of the property data is limited solely to efforts to sell the listed property. As the owner of the database compilation, however, the Multiple Listing Service has the power to control access to the compilation, even if the Service does not "own" the individual data in the compilation.

A useful analogy is to water distribution companies. Water exists naturally in the environment. No one "owns" the chemical combination of hydrogen and oxygen atoms commonly known as water. On the other hand, companies exist that bottle and distribute water. These companies extract the water from naturally occurring aquifers or other sources, treat it, bottle it, and distribute it to consumers. These companies have the right to be paid for their efforts to bottle and distribute an otherwise naturally occurring chemical compound. Real estate data is the functional equivalent of water. The data are facts that occur naturally and are not owned by anyone. But companies, such as Multiple Listing Services, may compile the facts into a common database and control and sell access to the data that is maintained in their database. But these Multiple Listing Services do not own the data to the extent that they can prevent others from compiling the same facts into a different database compilation.

It should be noted that state law may affect the resolution of some disputes involving property subject to a copyright. In re Valdez n5.1 involved a real estate salesman who alleged that he held the copyright to certain photographs of real estate which he had listed with the broker prior to termination of his association with that broker. While considering federal copyright law, the court also considered N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 19, § 175.14 which provided that:

A real estate salesman shall, upon termination of his association with a real estate broker, forthwith turn over to such broker any and all listing information obtained during his association whether such information was originally given to him by the broker or copied from the records of such broker or acquired by the salesman during his association.

The court found that the photographs were listing information and that the salesman was required to relinquish ownership of the photographs when he was required to turn them over to the broker upon his termination. This court also found that this regulation was not preempted by the Copyright Act since there was no inconsistency between the Copyright Act and state law. n5.2

[3] Database Compilation of Facts Can Be Copyrighted If "Creativity" Is Shown in Selection and Categorization of Data

Although the Supreme Court in Feist held that a database arranged alphabetically cannot be protected under the Federal Copyright Act, the Court did state that the degree of creativity that must be shown to confer a copyright on the creator of a work is quite minimal. Federal courts of appeals since Feist have sustained the copyright claims of database compilers when the compiler has shown a degree of creativity in the manner in which the data in the database is arranged and displayed to database users. n6

The copyright protection afforded to a compilation, however, is limited to the "original" components of the compilation, and not to the purely factual data in the compilation or to methods of arranging the data in the compilation that are devoid of the requisite creativity for copyright protection. These distinctions between the factual data and "originality" are illustrated in the decision of the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals in BellSouth Advertising & Publishing Corp. v. Donnelley Information Publishing, Inc. n7

In BellSouth, Donnelley decided to compete with BellSouth in the marketing of Yellow Pages telephone directories in the Greater Miami area. To create its competing Yellow Pages directory, Donnelley employees extracted from BellSouth's copyrighted directory the names, addresses, telephone numbers, and business types of the companies listed in the directory. From this data that was admittedly "copied" from the BellSouth copyrighted directory, Donnelley created "contact lists" for its sales staff. Donnelley also classified the businesses identified in the BellSouth directory according to a system of headings that Donnelley independently created. There were, however, numerous overlapping business headings in the Donnelley and BellSouth directories.

In an en banc decision, the Eleventh Circuit reversed the district court's finding that Donnelley had infringed upon BellSouth's copyright in its Yellow Pages directory. The Eleventh Circuit held that the data extracted by Donnelley from the BellSouth directory was purely factual data, which was not entitled to any copyright protection. The Eleventh Circuit further held that any similarity between the business headings in the Donnelley and BellSouth directories was not the result of Donnelley's copying of the protected elements of the BellSouth directory. Rather, the overlapping headings were the result of both companies' use of certain headings that were patently obvious. BellSouth's use of patently obvious business headings was not a component of the copyright protection afforded to BellSouth's directory. Therefore, BellSouth's copyright in its own directory did not permit BellSouth to prohibit Donnelley from duplicating such obvious headings from BellSouth's directory, together with the other factual information Donnelley extracted about the names, addresses, and telephone numbers of the businesses listed in the BellSouth directory. So long as Donnelley did not copy any components of the BellSouth directory that reflected BellSouth's original works, Donnelley was free to use the BellSouth directory to construct its own competing directory. The BellSouth decision illustrates that the degree of protection afforded by the Federal Copyright Act to database compilations is in fact quite minimal.

[4] Extent of Copyright Protection

To claim intellectual property rights in its real estate database compilation, the Multiple Listing Service must "add value" to the data by arranging and categorizing the data in a "creative" manner. While copyright protection is available for Multiple Listing Service database compilations that demonstrate originality in the arrangement and presentation of the data in the compilation, this protection does not protect the Service from others who may extract the raw data from the Service and recompile the data into another compilation with a distinctly different method of data presentation.

This limitation on the scope of a multiple listing service's copyright protection in its database compilation is illustrated by the case of American Massage Therapy Association v. Maxwell Petersen Associates, Inc. n8 In this case, the American Massage Therapy Association maintained and distributed a directory of its members. The directory arranged the members' names and addresses by geographic area. The information included in the directory about a particular therapist included the therapist's name, address, telephone number, membership category, and the type of therapy performed. The directory also had a "membership category" section that listed each member by name and category of membership, and a cross reference to the page of the geographical section at which the member's address and telephone was listed.

Maxwell Petersen Associates, Inc. published a magazine targeted at massage therapists, and marketed other goods and services to the massage therapy profession. The Maxwell Petersen employee responsible for maintaining its mailing list procured a copy of the American Massage Therapy Association's directory. Using the directory, the employee extracted over 17,000 names and addresses of massage therapists and added them to the Maxwell Petersen mailing list. Maxwell Petersen used its mailing list for its own purposes, and also sold and rented its list to other companies.

When the Association learned about the use to which Maxwell Petersen put its directory, the Association filed a suit against Maxwell Petersen alleging, among other things, that Maxwell Petersen violated the Association's copyright in its directory. On the parties' cross motions for summary judgment, the court granted summary judgment to Maxwell Petersen. Relying on the Supreme Court's decision in Feist Publications v. Rural Telephone Service Company,ⁿ⁹ the court held that copying names and addresses from the Association directory was not copyright infringement because the Association could not claim copyright protection for the names and addresses of its members, which were "raw facts" not capable of being copyrighted. The court concluded that the raw facts did not become "original" for the purposes of copyright protection simply because the facts may have been arranged in an original manner. The original arrangement may be protected by copyright, but the facts themselves are not.

The American Massage Therapy Association case underscores the limited protection that the copyright laws afford to databases containing raw facts, such as real estate multiple listing services. So long as a third party does not copy the manner in which the raw facts are arranged by the database compiler, the compiler cannot rely on the copyright laws to deter others from copying the raw facts contained in the database.

Extending the principle of the American Massage Therapy Association is *Nautical Solutions Marketing, Inc. v. Boats.com*ⁿ¹⁰ decided in 2004 by the federal district court for the Middle District of Florida. In Nautical Solutions, Boats.com operated a yacht listing service at a website known as Yachtworld.com. Yacht brokers could post their listed yachts on the Yachtworld website. Nautical Solutions created a website known as Yachtbroker.com that competed with the Boats.com site. Both sites included factual information about the yachts for sale, including list price, manufacturer, and features of each yacht.

Nautical Solutions employed Internet "spider" software that searched the World Wide Web for websites containing information about yachts for sale. The "spider" would copy the webpage, extract facts about the yachts on the page, and discard the copied page, all in a matter of seconds. The facts about the yacht were then inserted into the Nautical Solutions Yachtbroker.com website. Nautical Solutions also offered on its site a "valet service" through which it would move yacht listing information from one site to another at the direction of the yacht owner.

Nautical Solutions sued Boats.com for defamation and for a declaration that its use of its "spider" did not violate any copyright rights of Boats.com. After finding Boats.com liable for defaming Nautical Solutions business, the court granted Nautical Solutions petition for a declaratory judgment that its business did not infringe on any of Boats.com's copyright rights. The court found, based on Feist, that "facts" as such were not entitled to any copyright protection. The court concluded that the "momentary" copying of the Boats.com webpage, which might be copyrightable, was a "fair use" and not an actionable infringement. The court applied the same rationale to conclude that the "valet service" was not an act of infringement to the extent it extracted factual information from the Boats.com site.

The court also rejected Boats.com's argument that it had a copyrightable interest in the headings under which it organized the facts about a yacht. The court concluded that the Boats.com headings were too obvious to qualify for copyright protection under the Feist case. The court also rejected Boats.com's contention that Nautical Solutions had copied the "look and feel" of the Boats.com site. The court noted that the Boats.com and the Nautical Solutions sites had very different appearances. Because the differences in the sites predominated over any similarities, the court concluded that Boats.com's "look and feel" argument did not have any merit.

The court also rejected Boats.com's final argument that Nautical Solutions had infringed Boats.com's copyright in its "compilation" of yacht data. The court characterized the copyright right in a "compilation" as a "weak" copyright right. For an owner of copyright in a compilation to establish infringement, it would have to prove that the infringer's compilation was an identical copy of the original compiler's work. Since Nautical Solutions did not present the data on its site in the same manner as the Boats.com site, there was not any infringement of the Boats.com "compilation" copyright.

The Eleventh Circuit substantially limited the holding of Nautical Solutions in BUC International Corp. v. International Yacht Council Limited.ⁿ¹¹ In BUC, the plaintiff published a used boat price guide listing used boats and yachts for sale along with relevant market values. In the mid-1980s the plaintiff automated the guide and promoted it as a centralized directory of yacht listings for use by yacht brokers. The plaintiff's directory, in effect, acted as a multiple listing service for yachts. Participating brokers signed a license agreement with the plaintiff pursuant to which they were provided with a password that enabled them to access, search, view, print and copy the listings contained in the plaintiff's database. The plaintiff also developed a standardized listing format for the information about a particular yacht. Participating brokers were to use the plaintiff's standardized format unless some other arrangement would better portray the yacht being offered for sale. Over ninety percent of the listings in the plaintiff's database were presented in the standardized format. In 1997 the plaintiff registered his copyright claims in the "compilation, selection and organization" of his yacht listing database, as well as accompanying text. The plaintiff also placed a copyright notice on each yacht listing appearing in the database.

In June of 2000, the defendant Florida Yacht Brokers Association formed the defendant International Yacht Council Limited for the purpose of creating an online multiple listing service for yachts listings. In early 2001 the defendant engaged the co-defendant software developer, MLS Solutions, Inc., to assist in the creation of its MLS. Unlike the plaintiff's MLS, the Yacht Council's MLS had a private section limited to yacht brokers, and a public section accessible to potential yacht purchasers. When the Yacht Council launched its MLS, it solicited brokers to send their yacht listings to MLS Solutions by fax or email. Most yacht brokers were also subscribers to the plaintiff's system, and they simply copied their yacht listings as they appeared in plaintiff's database and sent them to MLS Solutions. By early 2002, the Yacht Council database contained 4,100 listings of which 2,700 were derived from the plaintiff's database. Others were also acquired from plaintiff's database by MLS Solutions' employees who acquired passwords to the plaintiff's MLS from plaintiff's participating brokers. Upon discovery of this practice, the plaintiff placed "markers" on the listings in its database to identify those listings if they appeared in the Yacht Council's database. The plaintiff eventually identified 4,400 listings in the Yacht Council database that had originated from the plaintiff's database. The plaintiff sued the Yacht Council and MLS Solutions for copyright infringement in June of 2002, and secured a preliminary injunction prohibiting the defendants from "copying descriptive expressions" from the plaintiff's database, and ordering the removal of such copied listings from the Yacht Council database. The case was tried to a jury in March of 2004, after which the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff and awarded the plaintiff $1,598,278 in actual damages.

On appeal, the defendants contended that (1) the plaintiff's listings were not entitled to copyright protection on the ground that the plaintiff needed to register each individual listing to assert a copyright claim in such listing, (2) the plaintiff's listing database did not qualify as a "compilation" under the Copyright Act, and (3) the plaintiff's compilation could not be copyrighted because it lacked originality. Finding that the defendants had failed to preserve the first two arguments for appeal, the Eleventh Circuit then rejected the defendants' third argument.

The Eleventh Circuit cited the Supreme Court's Feist decision, and its own Bell South decision for the proposition that a compiler's "selection, arrangement and coordination" of data, if original, is protectable under the federal Copyright Act. On the issue of "originality" of the plaintiff's selection, arrangement and coordination of the data in its database, the court considered and rejected the defendants' argument that it was the brokers and not the plaintiff who were the "authors" of the compilation since they had the freedom to disregard the plaintiff's standardized format of data presentation. The Eleventh Circuit noted that only two percent of the listings in the plaintiff's database varied from the plaintiff's standardized format. The Eleventh Circuit then rejected the defendants' argument that the plaintiff's database compilation was not "original" because of the "merger doctrine" in which protectable creative expression is "merged" with non-protectable "ideas" if there is only one or two ways an idea can be expressed. The defendants argued that there are so few ways a yacht can be described that the plaintiff should not be accorded protection for its standardized format. The Eleventh Circuit determined that the "idea" that was excluded from copyright protection was the idea of creating a method of delivering relevant yacht information to brokers and not, as defendants argued, the idea of how to divide a yacht into features of interest to brokers and potential buyers. According to the Eleventh Circuit, to find for the defendants, it would have to conclude that there was only one meaningful way of presenting useful information about a yacht for sale. Rejecting the argument, the Eleventh Circuit cited the evidence in the record that before the plaintiff created its MLS, the yacht listing data then available in print and elsewhere varied dramatically in the information presented and how it was arranged and coordinated.

The Eleventh Circuit then disposed of the defendants' third argument that the plaintiff's compilation lacked the minimal degree of creativity required for copyright protection. On this point the Eleventh Circuit again relied on the evidence that prior to plaintiff's offering of its MLS, the available data on yachts for sale was presented in a "hodge podge" fashion and that plaintiff's standardized format was a creative method of presenting the relevant information in a uniform and meaningful manner. The Eleventh Circuit then addressed and rejected the defendants' final argument that they should be awarded a new trial because the trial court instructed the jury that it could return a verdict for the plaintiff if the jury found "substantial similarities" between the listing formats of the plaintiff and the defendants, rather than "virtual identity" between the listing formats as held in the Nautical Solutions case. Notwithstanding its conclusion that the defendants had failed to preserve their objections to the trial court's jury instructions, the Eleventh Circuit found that "substantial similarity" is the proper standard for determining whether an infringing copy of the plaintiff's work had been made, citing as authority its Bell South decision and its later holding in Warren Publishing, Inc. v. Microdos Data Corp. n12 The BUC case is directly applicable to copyright protections available to real estate multiple listing services. While the BUC case should make it easier for multiple listing services to prevail on such claims, the BUC and Nautical Solutions cases underscore the limited nature of the copyright protection available to a multiple listing service for its real estate database compilation. For example, the BUC case does not extend protection to the "raw facts" in a multiple listing database. Therefore, the use of "spiders" to extract non-copyrightable data from these databases is a potential risk to the integrity of the databases for which the copyright laws do not provide meaningful protection.

A more recent case illustrating the extent of copyright protection for database compilations is Tennessee Walking Horse Breeders' and Exhibitors' Association v. National Walking Horse Association. n13 In this case, the Tennessee Walking Horse Breeders' and Exhibitors' Association (TWHBEA) created and maintained a registry through which owners of Tennessee walking horses could register the pedigrees of their horses. The TWHBEA published the registry in the form of a book, and also designed a "registration certificate" that was provided to each horse owner. TWHBEA filed copyright registration applications and received registration certificates for both the registry database and its registration certificate form. In 1998 the National Walking Horse Association (NHWHA) was organized and in 2004 the NHWA launched its own registry on its website. When it launched its registry, the NHWA invited horse owners to register their horses with the NHWA by tendering to the NHWA the owners' registration certificates issued by the TWHBEA. The NHWA issued registration certificates to horse owners who used its registry that were nearly identical in form and content to the certificates issued by the TWHBEA. The TWHBEA sued the NHWA for copyright and trademark infringement. The court granted summary judgment to the TWHBEA on its copyright infringement claim and held a bench trial on its trademark infringement claims. At the conclusion of the trial it awarded damages to the TWHBEA on its copyright infringement claim, but dismissed the TWHBEA's trademark infringement claims. The court acknowledged that under the Supreme Court's Feist decision, the TWHBEA could not claim any copyright rights in the factual information about a horse's parentage. The court concluded, however, that TWHBEA was entitled to copyright protection for the originality it exercised in deciding what horses to include in its registry and the choices about the types of horses that will be considered "pure bred" walking horses, and the markings and colorings associated with such horses. When NHWA copied into its registry the copyright-able components of the TWHBEA's registry and registration certificates, it infringed upon TWHBEA's copyright rights. The court enjoined NHWA from any further infringement of TWHBEA's copyrights and awarded TWHBEA statutory damages for NHWA's "willful" infringement.

The copyright protection that extends to the a database compiler's creativity in the selection, arrangement and coordination of the factual information contained in the database does not necessary extend to the format used to present the information. This is the holding of Utopia Provider Systems, Inc. v. Pro-Med Clinical Systems, LLC. n13.1 There, the plaintiff created a software program for the creation of electronic health records for treatments administered in hospital emergency rooms. The plaintiff's software consisted, in part, of charts and forms into which the emergency room physicians or staff would enter information about a patient's condition, diagnosis and treatment. The plaintiff licensed the rights to the defendant to market the plaintiff's software as part of the defendant's suite of products in return for the payment of royalties. The defendant later developed an alternative software product that incorporated the same template forms used in the plaintiff's product. The plaintiff sued the defendant for copyright infringement. The district court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment on the plaintiff's copyright infringement claim and the Eleventh Circuit affirmed. The Eleventh Circuit cited prior precedent under the Copyright Act holding that copyright protection does not extend to "blank forms which do not convey information or contain original pictorial expression." Examples of such unprotected forms are time cards, graph paper, account books, diaries, bank checks, scorecards, address books, report forms, or order forms. The Court determined that the templates incorporated in plaintiff's software that provided the format into which information about the patient would be entered by the emergency room physicians or staff were forms that in and of themselves did not contain any information or original expressions, and therefore were not entitled to copyright protection.

Other cases have discussed the extent to which the "fair use" doctrine protects the ability of web sites operators to use web indexing software or "robots" to make copies of material from web pages for other uses, including the operation of general and specialized "search engines." Two of these cases involve Google, Inc., which operates one of the most widely known and used Internet search engines at Google.com. In Field v. Google Inc.,ⁿ¹⁴ Field, an author who is also an attorney, created a website on which he posted various works of authorship. Using its "spider" software, Google indexed Field's site and displayed it in response to search inquiries using key words that matched words on Field's site. Google also "cached" the web pages from Field's site that it indexed. When Google, or any other search engine, "caches" a web page, it makes a literal copy of the page and stores the page on its server for archival purposes. When a Google user receives the results of an Internet search, the user can be linked to the indexed web page, or the user can open the cached page on Google's server, and view the page as it was indexed by the search engine spider. The cached page also highlights the user's search terms as they were found on the web page.

Field sued Google contending that Google's indexing and caching of his web page containing his copyrighted work infringed upon his copyright rights. Field sought statutory damages. Shortly after filing his initial complaint, Field posted fifty additional copyrighted works at his web site. He then amended his complaint to add the additional fifty claims of copyright infringement and sought statutory damages of $2,500,000 or the maximum of $50,000 in statutory damages for each of his copyrighted works.

The parties filed cross motions for summary judgment. The court granted Google's motion and denied Field's. The court noted that Google observed a standard protocol in use by all Internet search engines through which web page operators can block search engine spiders by entering certain codes into the web site meta tags. Web site operators can also enter meta tag codes that will allow the web pages to be indexed by Google, but not cached. Field testified that he was well aware of these techniques for blocking Google's search robots altogether, or only preventing Google from caching his web pages. Based on this testimony, the court found that Field had granted Google an "implied license" to index and cache the pages of his web page. The court held that if an owner of a copyrighted work knows of the copying of his work and has the power to stop the copying if he so chooses, the copyright owner has granted an implied license to copier.

The court also held that Google's indexing and caching of Field's web pages constituted a "fair use" of Field's copyright. The Copyright Act provides that persons can make "fair use" of others' copyrights without liability for copyright infringement.ⁿ¹⁵ In determining whether a use of a copyrighted work is a "fair use," courts are to consider (1) the purpose and character of the use; (2) the nature of the copyrighted work; (3) the amount and substantiality of the copied portion of the work in relation to the work as a whole; and (4) the effect of the copying on the potential market for the owner's copyrighted work. Applying these criteria, the court found that Google provided an enormously valuable service to Internet users in cataloguing and making accessible the huge array of information accessible on the Internet. Google's caching function is integral to Google's ability to perform this function in that it enables users to see a copy of the page of a web site as indexed by Google to determine the extent of any changes that may have been made to the page since Google last indexed it. The court also found that Google's cached pages did not significantly interfere with Field's ability to commercialize his works. Google takes several steps to ensure that its cached pages cannot substitute for a visit to the actual web page it indexed. The court concluded that Google's copying and caching of Field's web page was a fair use of Field's copyright in his works contrasting the use to which Google was putting the cached pages with whatever commercial use Field was attempting to make of his works. The court further concluded that the fact that Google itself was a commercial, rather than a not-for-profit or charitable, enterprise did not undermine its holding that Google's use of Field's copyrighted works was a "fair use."

Another case in which Google was a party reached an opposite result on the issue of "fair use." In Perfect 10 v. Google, Inc.,ⁿ¹⁶ Perfect 10 published an adult-oriented magazine in which it displayed numerous copyrighted photographs. Infringing copies of these copyrighted photographs routinely appeared on other websites. Google introduced a function as part of its general search engine that enabled users to search the Internet for particular images, as opposed to text. Users of Google's "image search" function would receive search results in the form of "thumbnails" of images responsive to the searcher's request. A thumbnail was a low resolution granular version of the image that was not a meaningful substitute for the full scale image as it appeared on a web site indexed by the Google search engine. When a Google user received image search results the user could be linked to the web site on which the full scale image of the site could be viewed.

Perfect 10 sued Google for direct copyright infringement based upon its display of "thumbnails" of its copyrighted images, and for contributory infringement for linking users to infringing copies of its images appearing on unauthorized websites. Google asserted a "fair use" affirmative defense in response to Perfect 10's suit. When considering Google's fair use defense, the court noted that Perfect 10 offered a service of its own through which, for a fee, it would transmit "thumbnails" of its copyrighted images to a subscriber's cell phone. The court found that Google's image search directly competed with this commercialization by Perfect 10 of its copyrighted images. In this sense, Google's use was duplicative use of Perfect 10's images rather than a "transformative" use that would have qualified for the fair use defense. This factor was sufficient in the court's view to tip the balance of the fair use analysis to Perfect 10.

The court went on to find that Google was not liable for contributory infringement. The court held that Perfect 10 did not show that Google had specific knowledge that the images it returned to its users from non-Perfect 10 sites were in fact infringing upon Perfect 10's copyrights. Google may have had general knowledge that some of the images were infringing, but it did not have knowledge of the infringing nature of any given image.

The Ninth Circuit later affirmed in part and reversed in part the district court's holding.ⁿ¹⁷ The Ninth Circuit agreed with the district court that Google did not directly infringe upon Perfect 10's copyrights in the full-size version of its copyrighted photographs by "in line framing" of those images as they appeared on third-party web sites, but that Google did make a "copy" for copyright infringement purposes of the thumbnail versions of the Perfect 10 images that were stored on Google servers. The Ninth Circuit, however, reversed the district court, and held that Google was likely to prevail on its fair use defense with respect to the thumbnails of the Perfect 10 images. The Ninth Circuit concluded that Google's use of the thumbnails was sufficiently "transformative" in nature to outweigh any contention by Perfect 10 that the thumbnails reduced the economic value of Perfect 10's cell phone distribution of thumbnail images of its copyrighted photographs. The Ninth Circuit, however, reversed and remanded the district court's holding that Perfect 10 could not show that Google was liable for contributory infringement. The Ninth Circuit applied the Supreme Court's test for contributory infringement announced in *Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Inc. v. Gronkster, Ltd.*ⁿ¹⁸ The Ninth Circuit held that Google could be liable for contributory infringement under the Supreme Court's Gronkster test if it had knowledge that its search engine was being used to enable infringement of Perfect 10's copyrights in its photographs and failed to take relatively simple steps to prevent the infringement. The Ninth Circuit concluded that the district court failed to resolve the factual disputes over the adequacy of Perfect 10's notices to Google of the use of its search engine to link users to infringing copies of Perfect 10's copyrighted photographs, and Google's response to those notices. The Ninth Circuit also held that the resolution of this factual dispute would determine the outcome of Google's argument on appeal that it was entitled to the protection of the safe harbor in the Digital Millennium Copyright Act.ⁿ¹⁹

The Field and Perfect 10 cases have implications for a new group of companies that have entered the online real estate industry, known as "vertical" search engines. Examples of these companies are Trulia, Inc. and PropSmart, Inc. These companies operate search engines that focus only on searching for real estate listing information found on publicly accessible websites, as opposed to "general" or "generic" search engines, such as those operated by Google, Yahoo, or AOL. These real estate vertical search engines use the same "robot" technology as Google or Yahoo. Using this technology, they index listing information that appears on the publicly accessible web sites of the listing broker. When a consumer uses a real estate vertical search engine, the search engine returns to the user indexed "snippets" of information about the listed property as it appears on the listing broker's website. These "snippets" of information also include a "thumbnail" of the listing image as it appears on the listing broker's site. Using the same search engine protocols that apply to Google or Yahoo search engines, a real estate broker can block the vertical search engine robots from searching the broker's site if the broker does not want its listings being made accessible to consumers who use the vertical search engines to locate properties of interest to them. The Field case in particular stands for the proposition that a broker will not likely succeed in a case of copyright infringement against a vertical search engine, since the broker has the ability on its own to prevent its site from being indexed. The broker's failure to block the search engine robots will likely be construed, as in Field, to constitute an implied license to the search engine operator to index and return information about the listing broker's listings to the search engine's users. The Ninth Circuit's holding in the Perfect 10 case also confirms that courts will apply the fair use doctrine to any minimal copying of the listing broker's content that might occur to facilitate the operation of the search engine.

Website operators must still be cautious when accessing the sites of other operators using automated devices. In Ticketmaster, L.L.C. v. RMG Technologies, Inc., n20 the court considered Ticketmaster's claims that RMG used automated devices to purchase event tickets using Ticketmaster's online ticket sales system in a manner that violated Ticketmaster's "terms of use" agreement, and therefore RMG is liable for breach of contract and infringement of Ticketmaster's copyright rights in its website. Ticketmaster sells tickets to sporting and entertainment events on its website. Ticketmaster adopted a policy that limits the number of tickets any individual user may purchase to any event. RMG created software that it markets to ticket brokers that is able to overcome Ticketmaster's security systems designed to distinguish between purchases made by actual individuals and those made by automated devices. By using the RMG software, ticket brokers can acquire large quantities of tickets to events promoted by Ticketmaster, all in violation of Ticketmaster's "terms of use agreement" that all users of its site must accept as a condition of making ticket purchases on the site. Upon filing its complaint, Ticketmaster sought a preliminary injunction to prevent RMG from permitting its software to be used to purchase tickets at the Ticketmaster site. The court granted Ticketmaster's preliminary injunction petition. On Ticketmaster's copyright infringement claim, the court noted that when a user views a webpage the user's computer makes a copy of the page on the random access memory (RAM) of the user's computer. According to the court, this "cache" of the webpage is a "copy" of the page for the purposes of the Copyright Act. The court further found that RMG had to have viewed, and therefore "copied" pages of the Ticketmaster site in order to create its automated tool that enables RMG users to circumvent the limits on purchases of Ticketmaster tickets. Ticketmaster argued, and the court agreed, that RMG's copying of the Ticketmaster webpages in violation of the authorization contained in the terms of use agreement constituted direct infringement of Ticketmaster's copyright rights.

The court then rejected RMG's contention that it was not aware of Ticketmaster's terms of use agreement, and that in any event, the agreement is too ambiguous to be enforced. The court cited sufficient evidence that RMG was well aware of Ticketmaster's terms of use agreement and found the terms of the agreement to be sufficiently clear to put users on notice that the site can only be used for non-commercial uses and that the use of automated devices to purchase tickets at the site is prohibited. The court further found that Ticketmaster was highly likely to succeed on its claim that RMG engaged in contributory copyright infringement by providing its clients with technology that was specifically designed to violate Ticketmaster's terms of use agreement and thereby infringe upon Ticketmaster's copyright rights.

The Ticketmaster case makes plain that courts will enforce terms of use agreements that website operators require users to accept as a condition of accessing and using the functionality available at the operators' sites. Use of a website in breach of the operator's terms of use agreement can also constitute copyright infringement based upon the "copying" of webpages that occurs when a user visits a website.

[1] "Virtual" Real Estate Brokerage Companies As Participants in Regional Multiple Listing Services

With the rapid expansion of Internet access by consumers, and the equally rapid expansion of Internet access to real estate listing information stored on computer servers, more and more real estate brokerage companies, and individual agents, have incorporated the World Wide Web into their company business strategies.

These strategies include the creation of Websites that promote individual brokerage companies. These brokerage company Websites also incorporate the display of current listing information. The real estate license laws of most states, however, forbid a real estate broker from advertising property listed with another broker unless the advertising broker has the permission of the listing broker. Consequently, most real estate company Websites are limited to displaying only properties listed with that individual company.

As Internet access has become more widespread, some real estate brokerage companies have introduced the concept of a "virtual" real estate office. The "virtual" office consists of a company Website on which visitors to the Website are invited to "register" as a client of the company. The "client relationship" is arguably formed when visitors indicate their acceptance of an online agreement in which the visitors appoint the company as the visitors' agent for the purpose of searching for property in a particular marketplace.

These "virtual" real estate companies also join local real estate associations and become participants in regional multiple listing services. As bona fide multiple listing service participants, the brokers and agents of "virtual" real estate companies are granted the right to access and use the real estate data in the multiple listing service's computerized database. These virtual offices, however, typically place the entire multiple listing service database of current listing information on the company's Website and make access to the listing data available to their "clients" who have registered with them by clicking "I agree" on a representation agreement displayed on the Website.

[2] Brokers Displaying Each Other's Listings on Websites

At least one real estate association contended that this display of an entire database of multiple listing service listing data on a "virtual" brokerage company Website violated the service's rules and regulations and, specifically, infringed upon the association's copyright in its multiple listing service database compilation. The association contended that the real estate company was disclosing the multiple listing service database to the general public. This type of widespread disclosure of data about property listed with all companies participating in the service exceeded the limited authority the service grants to participants to display the data to "bona fide" home purchasers, and, as such, infringed on the association's copyright right to control the manner, and terms and conditions on which its copyrighted multiple listing service database compilation is displayed.

The association ultimately threatened to expel the "virtual" real estate company from its multiple listing service unless the company removed the multiple listing service database from the company's Website. When the company refused, the association filed suit in federal court against the company, alleging copyright infringement. n1 The company, in turn, filed an antitrust counterclaim against the association, and sought a preliminary injunction against the association to prevent its expulsion from the multiple listing service. The court granted the company's request for the preliminary injunction.

The company contended that the association's attempt to expel it from the multiple listing service constituted a boycott against it because it has chosen to operate a "virtual" real estate office, and also because the company's commission rate structure was significantly lower than the rates charged by other "traditional" companies in the market. The company contended that its "clients" who enter into online brokerage agreements are legally and functionally indistinguishable from clients of "bricks and mortar" real estate firms who meet and communicate with their clients through more traditional means of face-to-face meetings, telephone, facsimile machine, or by mail. A traditional brokerage firm regularly and routinely displays listing data from the multiple listing service database to its clients about properties listed with other multiple listing service participants.

The district court agreed with the real estate company that it had a substantial likelihood of success in showing that the association violated the federal antitrust laws by prohibiting the company from displaying the full multiple listing service database to its "clients" on its Website.

Shortly after the court entered its preliminary injunction against the association, the National Association of Realtors(R) adopted a policy requiring that all multiple listing services owned or operated by local associations of Realtors(R) must adopt rules that allow individual participants to grant each other blanket consent to display their listing data on other multiple listing participants' Websites. Listing brokers retain the right to "opt out" of the program on a general basis, or on a listing-by-listing bases. On the other hand, if most, or all, participants in a multiple listing service agree to participate in the blanket consent program, then participants will be allowed to display each other's listings on their individual company Websites.

After this policy was adopted by the local association of Realtors(R), the district court granted the association's motion to dissolve the preliminary injunction because the "virtual" company was now able to display other brokerage companies' listings on its Website without regard to whether visitors to the Website were "bona fide" clients of the company. n2 The parties eventually reached a negotiated settlement of their dispute.

[3] Use of Multiple Listing Service Listing Data for Internet Advertising

As part of the settlement, however, the National Association of Realtors(R) General Counsel issued a written opinion that the brokerage company's "virtual office" was not subject to the association's rules that governed a participant's advertising of another participant's listings on the participant's publicly accessible web site. n3 Rather, because visitors to the company's site created a "brokerage relationship" with the company by accepting the company's Terms of Use agreement before the visitor could view any multiple listing service information, the company was not "advertising" the listings of other brokers. Instead, the company was simply using the Internet and browser-based technology to deliver listing data to its bona fide customers and clients in the same manner as "traditional" brokers used other offline media (facsimile, hand delivery, or mail) to perform the same function.

Therefore, since the company was using the listing data for cooperative marketing purposes rather than general advertising, the National Association of Realtors(R) General Counsel opined that the company's use of the multiple listing service's listing data was governed by the association's multiple listing service rules that apply to participants' delivery of listing information to bona fide customers and clients. These rules permit participants to deliver non-confidential information about a "reasonable number" of properties contained in the multiple listing service database. n4 When using the multiple listing database for cooperative marketing, rather than "advertising," purposes, a participant may deliver information about any property in the multiple listing service database compilation. The National Association of Realtors(R) Multiple Listing Policy

- requires participants to make "blanket" offers of cooperation to other participants on all of the listings that the participant submits to the multiple listing service, n5 and
- does not permit participants to withhold (or "opt out") their listings from use by other participants for cooperative marketing purposes (in contrast to "opt out" provisions relating to virtual offices and to advertising, described in § 10.05[5] below).

While participants may vary the amount of compensation that they offer to other participants who succeed in finding a ready, willing and able buyer for the listed property, participants may not prevent another participant from receiving information about a participant's listing that is contained in the multiple listing service database compilation, or delivering that information to the participant's customers or clients.

[4] Delivery of Multiple Listing Service Data to Brokers' Customers or Clients through the Internet.

In early 2002, certain real estate brokerage companies that operated so-called "virtual office websites" or "VOWS" formed marketing alliances with Yahoo!, Inc., a major Internet search engine, or "portal." Under these alliances, Yahoo would link a visitor to its Real Estate Page to the VOW of a real estate brokerage company in the market in which the visitor indicated an interest in acquiring property. The development of these strategic alliances between Internet portals, such as Yahoo, and real estate brokers with VOWS caused the National Association of Realtors(R) to reexamine its Multiple Listing Policy as applied to the use of the Internet and browser-based technology to deliver multiple listing service listing information to a participant's customers and clients.

After over a year of deliberations, the National Association of Realtors(R) in May 2003 substantially amended its Multiple Listing Policy to add new regulations designed specifically to regulate participants' delivery of multiple listing service listing information to customers or clients through a VOW. n6 These new Multiple Listing Service Rules and Regulations are known as the National Association of Realtors(R) Virtual Office Website Policy, or VOW Policy. The National Association of Realtors(R) VOW Policy requires all multiple listing services owned or operated by associations of Realtors(R) to adopt local multiple listing service rules and regulations that conform to the Policy by January 1, 2004. This deadline has since been extended to January 1, 2006.

The National Association of Realtors(R) VOW Policy requires all Realtor(R) association multiple listing services to permit participants to use multiple listing service information on a VOW. On the other hand, the VOW Policy requires local multiple listing services to impose specific restrictions on the operation of a VOW on which multiple listing service information is delivered to the VOW operator's customers or clients. First, VOW operators must require visitors to register online by providing a verifiable email address, and execute a Terms of Use agreement by mouse clicking on an "I accept" button, before they may view any multiple listing service information. n7 Second, the Terms of Use Agreement must require registrants, among other things, to represent and warrant that they are bona fide potential buyers of property of the type they view at the participant's VOW, and that they will use the multiple listing service information provided to them solely for non-commercial purposes. n8

The VOW Policy also prohibits VOW operators from providing any information about a registrant to any other entity for compensation. n9 The debate leading to the National Association of Realtors(R)' adoption of its VOW Policy made clear that the purpose of this provision is to prevent a participant from operating a VOW on which multiple listing service listing information is displayed for the primary purpose of capturing information about persons who may be interested in purchasing a home (a "lead"), and then referring the leads to other brokers in return for a referral fee.

The VOW Policy further requires Realtor(R) association multiple listing services to allow individual listing broker participants to prohibit other participants from using a VOW to deliver information about the listing broker's listings to the VOW operator's customers or clients. n10 This provision of the VOW Policy is known as the listing broker's "opt out" right. While the VOW Policy "opt out" provision is analogous to the "opt out" provision of the National Association of Realtors(R) Information Data Exchange ("IDX") Policy, n11 which deals with the use of multiple listing service information for advertising to the general public on the publicly accessible portion of a participant's website, the VOW Policy "opt out" right is quite different.

Under the National Association of Realtors(R) IDX Policy, a listing broker may elect to "opt out" of the local multiple listing service's IDX Program, either on a company-wide basis, or on a listing-by-listing basis. If the participant elects to "opt out" on a company-wide basis, none of the company's listings are available to other participants for advertising purposes on the other participants' publicly accessible websites. Likewise, the company that opts out of the IDX Program on a company-wide basis may not display the listings of any other participants on the company's publicly accessible website. A participant may also elect to withhold, or opt out, individual listings from the IDX Program. If a listing participant elects to withhold an individual listing from a multiple listing service's IDX Program, then that listing is not available for advertising display on the publicly accessible websites of any other participants in the IDX Program.

The National Association of Realtors(R)' VOW Policy, however, allows a listing broker to withhold listings from use by other participants on their VOWs on a "selective" basis. For this reason, the "opt out" right that is included in the VOW Policy is called a "selective opt out." A listing broker exercising the VOW Policy "selective opt out" privilege may elect to withhold one or more of its listings from the VOW operated by one participant, but allow its listings to be used on the VOWs of any other of the participants in the multiple listing service. n12 Hence, unlike the IDX Policy "opt out" provision, the VOW "opt out" provision permits a listing broker to "pick and choose" the participants who can use the broker's listings for delivery to customers or clients via a VOW. The National Association of Realtors(R) added this "selective opt out" provision to its VOW Policy at the urging of large brokerage companies and real estate franchisors who insisted on the right to preclude individual competitors from using the companies' listings for purposes that the listing companies deemed disadvantageous to their competitive interests. n13

[5] Antitrust Implications of the National Association of Realtors(R) Policy on Virtual Office Websites.

[a] Antitrust Litigation

The National Association of Realtors(R) VOW Policy for the first time grants participants in multiple listing services the unfettered right to prevent other participants from using browser-based technology for the delivery of information about the participants' listings to the customers and clients of the other participants. Such a right to dictate how other participants may deliver listing information to customers and clients is not afforded to the listing broker when other participants use "offline" communication methods, such as facsimile, hand delivery, or the postal system, for similar purposes.

The National Association of Realtors(R)' Multiple Listing Policy has long permitted listing participants separately to advise another participant that the listing participant would pay to the other participant a cooperative compensation that was less than the compensation offer shown in the multiple listing service compilation, or that the listing participant would not pay any compensation at all to the other participant, if that participant found a buyer for the listing participant's listing. n14 So long as listing participants do not collude among themselves in their decisions when, and if, to make a "discriminatory" compensation offer to another participant, such variations in compensation offers do not raise antitrust concerns.

The National Association of Realtors(R) Multiple Listing Policy governing the "offline" use of listing information, however, does not permit a listing broker to preclude another participant from delivering information about the listing participant's listing to the other broker's customers or clients. The "offline" Policy simply provides that the listing participant is free to offer compensation to the other participant that is less than the amount offered in the multiple listing service compilation, or no cooperative compensation at all, if the other participant should find a buyer for the listed property. The other participant, on the other hand, is still permitted to offer the listing participant's listing to customers or clients. If the compensation offered by the listing participant is deemed to be inadequate, the other participant must seek any additional compensation from other sources (such as the buyer).

The National Association of Realtors(R) VOW Policy does not alter the listing participant's right to vary the terms of its cooperative compensation offer to other participants who operate VOWS. The VOW Policy, however, also permits a listing participant to instruct another participant that it may not deliver to its customers or clients information about the listing participant's listings via its VOW. This added power granted to listing participants to dictate the communication media chosen by other participants to deliver multiple listing information to customers and clients is an erosion of the fundamental purpose of a multiple listing service, which is to provide a mechanism through which brokers make "blanket" offers of cooperation and compensation to all other participants in the multiple listing service.

The National Association of Realtors(R) VOW Policy is susceptible to antitrust attack because it creates a "two tier" regulatory system for the delivery of multiple listing service listing information to potential property purchasers. One tier regulates the delivery of such information through "offline" media, and does not permit listing participants to "pick and choose" which other participants may share information about the listing participant's listings with customers and clients. The second tier regulates the "online" delivery of listing information, and under this regulatory framework, a listing broker is allowed, not only to offer a VOW operator a lesser amount of cooperative compensation, but also to prevent the VOW operator from using its VOW to deliver to its customers or clients any information about the listing participant's listings. A listing participant is permitted to exclude its listings from one participant's VOW, while allowing its listings to be available on other VOWS, including the listing participant's own VOW.

For the purposes of antitrust analysis, it is significant that VOWS increase the efficiency of the real estate marketing process for the benefit of brokers and agents, and the buying and selling public. A VOW enables registered customers or clients of a broker to retrieve "real time" information about properties on the market in seconds on an around-the-clock basis. A customer or client does not have to telephone or email a real estate agent requesting listing information and wait for it to be delivered by facsimile or by hand. A customer or client who uses a broker's VOW is likely to physically inspect far fewer properties before making a purchasing decision because that customer or client has used the broker's VOW to eliminate properties that are not appropriate. A broker or agent who offers a VOW to customers and clients is also able to spend time on functions for which a real estate professional's expertise and judgment is truly required by a potential purchaser. All of these features of a VOW result in a more efficient real estate transaction. Such efficiencies in turn result in lower costs per transaction. For this reason, many brokers who operate VOWS also pass on the resulting efficiencies in the form of lower brokerage fees.

The National Association of Realtors(R) VOW Policy, on the other hand, is clearly designed to enable listing participants to exercise leverage over their control of the listings in the multiple listing database compilation to minimize the competitive threat posed by other participants who have been quicker to adopt the web-based technology upon which VOWS are based. This power granted by the VOW Policy to thwart VOW operations does not have any apparent justification in the administrative requirements of the multiple listing service. Such a justification is required if the VOW Policy is to be sustained under the antitrust laws as a regulation that advances the legitimate requirements of the multiple listing service in the least restrictive manner.

Significantly, multiple listing services themselves use browser-based technology to deliver the multiple listing service data to the brokers who participate in the services. Hence, it is difficult to contend that the Internet or browser-based technology is itself antithetical or threatening to the legitimate operations of a multiple listing service. Furthermore, real estate information supplied by multiple listing services is widely available on the Internet from, among other sources, Realtor.com, the national website operated on behalf of the National Association of Realtors(R) by Move, Inc. (see ch. 8, § 8.04[3][b][i]).

For all of these reasons, it would seem that there are numerous "less restrictive alternatives" through which any legitimate concern could be addressed about the safety and security of multiple listing service listing information made available over the Internet to the customers and clients of a multiple listing service participant. The availability of these less restrictive alternatives, in turn, suggests that the only justification for the "selective opt out" provision of the National Association of Realtors(R) VOW Policy is to enable large listing companies to use their market leverage to retard the growth of efficiency-enhancing business models that threaten to exert downward pressure on brokerage fees. Courts have not previously found this type of justification sufficient to offset the anticompetitive impact of a multiple listing service rule or regulation.

Shortly after the National Association of Realtors(R) adopted its VOW Policy, the Antitrust Division of the United States Department of Justice commenced an investigation of whether the Policy violated the federal antitrust laws by unreasonably restricting the application of web-based technology to the real estate brokerage industry. During the pendency of the Department's antitrust investigation, the National Association of Realtors(R) continuously extended the deadline by which local multiple listing services must adopt rules implementing the National Association of Realtors(R) VOW Policy. In May 2005, the National Association of Realtors(R) amended its Internet Data Exchange Policy to incorporate into that Policy various features of its VOW Policy. The stated purpose of these amendments is to create a single "unified" Policy that would govern all methods of delivering multiple listing service information using browser-based technology, using the Internet Data Exchange Policy as the basis for this "unified" policy. The National Association of Realtors(R) has also indicated that it intends that such a "unified" policy be a framework for a negotiated settlement with the Department of Justice over the Department's concerns that the National Association of Realtors(R) VOW Policy violates the federal antitrust laws.

In September 2005, negotiations between the National Association of Realtors(R) and the Department of Justice broke down. Negotiations between the parties had continued throughout the summer of 2005. In early September, however, NAR unilaterally announced the repeal of its VOW policy and the substitution of a new "Internet Listing Display" or ILD policy. According to NAR, the ILD policy replaces both its VOW policy and its IDX policy, and is intended to be a single "unified" policy governing the use and display on individual broker websites of listing information originating from MLS database compilations. The ILD policy eliminated the "selective opt out" provision of the VOW policy, but retained the "blanket opt out" provision. The ILD policy also eliminated the provision of the VOW policy that prohibited listing brokers who operated VOWs from referring persons who registered as customers at their VOW to other service providers for a fee. This provision that is not found in the ILD policy is known as the "anti-referral" provision of the VOW policy. The net result of the NAR ILD policy is to require brokers who operate IDX or VOW sites to conform to a set of regulations that contain a "blanket opt out" provision that implicitly presumes that any display of listing information on a broker's web site is "advertising" that requires the consent of the listing broker, even if the VOW registrant has signed an engagement agreement with the VOW operator to the same extent as any other client of the broker who engages the broker using offline communication methods.

At the same time that it announced the replacement of its VOW and IDX policies with its new ILD policy, NAR also announced that it was redefining the definition of "participant" in an MLS found at Section 7.9 of NAR's Handbook on Multiple Listing Policy. The former Section 7.9 provided that any licensed real estate broker who was "capable" of listing property, or working with a buyer of real estate, was eligible to participate in an MLS operated by an Association of Realtors(R). The practical meaning of NAR's former definition of MLS participant was that any persons or firms that possessed a real estate broker's license could participate in an MLS because such licensure rendered the persons or firms "capable" of listing or selling real estate whether or not their business model actually included such activity.

NAR amended Section 7.9 to require that persons or firms eligible to participate in MLSs must "actually" list, sell or appraise real property. It is no longer sufficient merely to be "capable" of engaging in such activity. In explaining the rationale behind the amendment to Section 7.9 to require MLS participants to "actually" list and sell, NAR stated that certain companies were acquiring real estate brokerage licenses or affiliating with otherwise inactive brokers solely for the purpose of being eligible to join a local Association of Realtors and participate in the Association's MLS. Once these companies became MLS participants, they were entitled to access and use the MLS's database compilation, potentially for purposes other than the cooperative sale of the listed property that appears in the MLS database compilation. At the time NAR announced its amendment to Section 7.9 of this MLS Policy, LendingTree, Inc., which operates a web site at realestate.com, announced its intention to acquire brokerage licenses in several jurisdictions and then join the local Association of Realtors(R) and participate in its MLS. Since NAR amended Section 7.9, Zillow, Inc. launched its web site at Zillow.com in early 2006. Zillow has acquired a database of information available from public assessors and recorders offices about the valuations of nearly all of the homes in the United States. At Zillow.com, persons can enter a property address and receive an automated estimate of the value of the property. Zillow has since acquired real estate brokerage licenses in many states and announced its intention to join local Associations of Realtors(R) and their wholly owned MLSs for the purpose of acquiring access to the MLS data that Zillow intends to use to enhance the quality of the automated valuations that it offers to users of this web site. In more recent commentary, NAR has stated that Zillow is not an appropriate participant in an MLS operated by an Association of Realtors(R) because Zillow, by its own admission, is not in the business of listing, selling, or formally appraising real property. Therefore, the amendment to Section 7.9 of NAR's MLS Policy is essential to exclude companies such as Zillow from acquiring access to MLS listing information.

On the same day that NAR announced its ILD policy and its amendment to Section 7.9 of its MLS Policy, the Department of Justice filed an antitrust lawsuit against NAR challenging NAR's VOW Policy. n15 Shortly thereafter, the Department amended its complaint to include an attack on both the NAR VOW policy and its new ILD policy and amended Section 7.9. NAR has since filed a motion to dismiss the United States's complaint under Rule 12 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure contending that the court does not have subject matter jurisdiction over the challenge to the NAR VOW policy on the ground that the VOW policy has since been repealed. NAR is also contending that the United States's complaint does not state a cause of action because any "opting out" that may occur as a result of either the VOW or ILD policy is the unilateral action of individual real estate brokers, and as such, cannot support a claim for a violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act.

The court denied NAR's motion in late 2006. n16 The court began by rejecting NAR's contention that it lacked subject matter jurisdiction to consider the Department's claims directed at NAR's initial VOW Policy, the repeal of which NAR announced on the day the Department filed its complaint. The court found that the Department had sufficiently alleged continuing anti-competitive effects derived from NAR's initial VOW Policy that required an injunction to remedy. The court noted that the Department alleged that NAR's initial VOW Policy and its subsequent ILD Policy are part of a single ongoing contract, combination or conspiracy in restraint of trade. The court further cited the Department's allegations that over two hundred NAR-affiliated multiple listing services had adopted the initial VOW Policy and that various individual brokers had exercised their opt out rights under the Policy. The court also observed that the Department had alleged that by reason of NAR's initial VOW Policy the real estate brokerage industry was less competitive than it otherwise would have been and that the subsequently adopted ILD Policy fails to remedy those anti-competitive effects. The court additionally determined that it had subject matter jurisdiction to consider, and if necessary, enter injunctive relief addressing NAR's initial VOW Policy because of the reasonable threat that NAR would resume its prior alleged misconduct. The court observed that one of the criteria a court is to consider in determining the likelihood that a defendant will resume its illegal conduct is the extent to which the defendant has acknowledged that its past conduct was in fact improper. In this case, the court noted that NAR did not abandon its initial VOW Policy until after the Department notified it of its intention to file suit, and that NAR continues to maintain that its initial VOW Policy is entirely lawful under federal antitrust laws. The court went on to find that NAR's initial VOW Policy could still be the basis of injunctive relief based upon the Department's complaint given the scope of the court's power to remedy the effects of NAR's current ILD Policy. The court stated that if the Department proves that NAR's VOW and ILD Policies violate the Sherman Act, the court is empowered to enter an injunction that can go beyond a prohibition on those practices that were shown to constitute illegal conduct. The court cited cases holding that when the defendant has shown a clear purpose to restrain trade, the relief that can be entered is not limited to a restoration of the status quo ante, but the relief must be directed to curing the ongoing and future effects of the illegal conduct. The court next turned to NAR's argument that the Department failed to state a claim in its challenge to NAR's initial VOW Policy. The court found that the Department had alleged a conspiracy among NAR and its members to restrain competition from brokers who use the Internet to deliver MLS information to their customers and clients, and that NAR retained the power to sanction members and multiple listing services that did not comply with NAR's policies to that effect. The court also found that the Department had adequately alleged relevant markets in which NAR's conduct had adverse effects on competition and that NAR had market power in those relevant markets. The court further noted the Department's allegations that NAR's policies were developed with anti-competitive animus towards brokers who used the Internet as a substantial part of their brokerage business and such policies could harm American consumers. Citing United States v. Realty Multi-List,ⁿ¹⁷ the court observed that, while a multiple listing service can have significant pro-competitive effects upon a real estate brokerage market, it also has the potential to stifle competition. The court then cited favorably the holding in *Austin Board of Realtors v. e-Realty, Inc.*ⁿ¹⁸ which also relied upon Realty Multi-List to hold that multiple listing service restraints imposed on brokers using the Internet that were not likewise imposed on brokers using off-line brokerage methods were sufficiently likely to violate the Sherman Act to warrant the issuance of a preliminary injunction. The court concluded its opinion by rejecting NAR's contention that the Department had failed to allege any anti-competitive effects flowing from NAR's VOW or ILD Policies. NAR argued that all of the alleged anti-competitive effects in the Department's complaint were based on the now repealed initial VOW Policy. The court found, however, that the Department's complaint adequately alleged anti-competitive effects resulting from both the "selective" and "blanket" opt out provisions of the NAR initial VOW Policy and that the blanket opt out provision was still a feature of the more recent ILD Policy. In summary, the court made clear that if the Department can prove the allegations in its complaint attacking the NAR initial VOW Policy and the subsequent ILD Policy, the Department will have proven that NAR's policies violate the Sherman Act and the court is empowered to enter injunctive relief sufficient to eliminate the present and future effects of such policies.

[b] US v. NAR Settlement

On May 27, 2008, the Department and NAR filed with the court a proposed final judgment that sets forth terms upon which the Department and NAR have agreed to resolve the Department's amended complaint.ⁿ¹⁹ Pursuant to the proposed final judgment, NAR has agreed to repeal its ILD Policy and replace that Policy with a "Modified VOW Policy," and to require all multiple listing services affiliated with its member Associations of Realtors(R) to adopt the Modified VOW Policy within ninety (90) days after the final judgment is entered by the court. The Modified VOW Policy is, for all practical purposes, NAR's former VOW Policy challenged by the Department, but without any right of a listing broker to "opt out" its listings from display on other MLS participants' VOWs.

The Modified VOW Policy also requires MLSs to provide specific data feeds available to their participants to facilitate the operation of VOWs. This "VOW-specific" data feed must include all of the non-confidential data about a listed property that a participant could otherwise provide to a potential purchaser in an offline context. Furthermore, this data feed must also include "sold data" about the prices at which properties have sold if such sales price information is otherwise available on the public records in the market in which the MLS operates. The Modified Policy does include a provision permitting sellers to affirmatively direct their listing brokers to withhold their listing or property address from display on the Internet. The seller, however, must sign a acknowledgement form in which the seller acknowledges that by withholding their listing or address from display on the Internet their property will not be exposed to consumers who use the Internet to search for a home. The purpose of the acknowledgement form is to require the seller to affirmatively acknowledge that withholding the listing from Internet display will negatively affect the marketing of the property.

The proposed final judgment permits NAR to amend the definition of "MLS Participant" in NAR's Multiple Listing

Policy to provide that an MLS participant must not only have a real estate license, and therefore be "capable" of making and accepting offers of cooperation and compensation to and from other MLS participants, but also must "actively endeavor" to list property of the type listed in the MLS, or to accept offers of cooperation and compensation made by brokers who have listed property in the MLS. The purpose of the amendment to NAR's definition of MLS Participant is to limit MLS participation only to those licensees who are actually attempting to practice real estate brokerage, as opposed to companies who have acquired a real estate license for no purpose other than becoming an MLS participant to secure the MLS data for purposes other than listing and selling real estate. By operation of this amended definition of "MLS Participant", NAR and its constituent MLSs are able to exclude companies such as Zillow and LendingTree from securing access to MLS information unless those companies actually enter and engage in the real estate brokerage business.

The proposed final judgment also contains strict enforcement provisions. NAR is required take affirmative steps to insure that its constituent MLSs adopt and adhere to the Modified VOW Policy. NAR is obligated to report to the Department any MLS that fails meet its obligation to adopt the Modified VOW Policy, or after adoption to comply with the terms of the Policy. If NAR determines that a constituent MLS has not complied with the Modified VOW Policy, NAR is required to report the MLS to the Department. Further, NAR is required to file quarterly reports with containing any communications with any person alleging that a constituent MLS has not complied with its obligations under the Modified VOW Policy.

The Department is also permitted to conduct audits of NAR's business records pertaining to compliance with the final judgment. These compliance obligations are in force for ten (10) years following the entry of the final judgment.

On November 18, 2009, the court entered a Final Judgment that, for all practical purposes, is identical to the proposed final judgment filed by the Department and NAR on May 18, 2009. n20 During the intervening period between the filing of the proposed final judgment and the entry of the Final Judgment, the Department complied with the Antitrust Administrative Procedures Act by filing a Competitive Impact Statement concerning the proposed final judgment and publishing the proposed final judgment in the Federal Register for public comment. Based on the comments that were filed, the Department filed a Response to the comments on October 23, 2008 in which it made a number of clarifications to the proposed final judgment and stated how it was to be interpreted. First, the Department agreed to a minor modification to the judgment that made clear that registered users of VOW accounts could distribute copies of listings from the MLS database to family members, friends, or mortgage lenders of those properties in which they had a serious interest in acquiring without violating the prohibition on a registered VOW user's retransmission of the MLS Data to third parties.

Second, the Department clarified that if a seller directed that her property address be withheld from internet display that the address would nevertheless be included in the MLS data feed provided to the VOW operator to permit the operator to provide the seller's address to VOW registered users by email or other non-internet means when a registered user initiated a search that returned the seller's listing. The proposed judgment was not clear that a VOW operator could transmit seller addresses by email when the seller directed that her address be withheld from internet display to the same extent that a VOW operator could transmit a full listing record by email when the seller directed that the entire listing record be withheld from internet display.

Third, the Department made clear that MLSs had the obligation to include in any MLS data feed provided to VOW operators the full inventory of currently listed property, including the property records and addresses of listings that sellers had directed be excluded from internet display. The VOW operator was obligated to suppress the identified listings or addresses from display to registered users through a browser. But the MLS was required to include the suppressed data in the VOW data feed to enable the VOW operator to deliver the suppressed data to registered users through email or other non-internet means as permitted by the Final Judgment.

Fourth, the Department interpreted the provision of the Final Judgment that permitted sellers to require the disabling of any VOW features that enable registered users to access automated valuation analyses of the seller's property, or post comments about the seller's property on a VOW, to apply to all VOW websites to which the seller's listing data may be sent. Hence, the Final Judgment does not permit a seller to target selectively only certain VOWs when exercising her right to prohibit the display of automated valuation analyses or third party commentary about the seller's property.

Fifth, the Department interpreted the provision of the Final Judgment prohibiting NAR from adopting or endorsing any policy that discriminates against VOWs as prohibiting an MLS from assessing fees to a web services provider (or Affiliated VOW Partner or "AVP" as referenced in the Final Judgment) that provides VOW hosting services for multiple brokers in a market served by a single MLS for an MLS data feed for each of the AVP's customers when a single feed is sufficient to support all the VOWs operated by the AVP in the MLS' service area. The Department later clarified that an MLS may spread its fixed costs of supplying MLS data feeds to VOW operators among all of its participants who operate VOWs, whether they use an AVP or host their VOW themselves. But the MLS cannot require a VOW operator or AVP to pay fees reflecting the MLS' variable costs of providing MLS data feeds to VOWs unless the service actually incurs the variable cost for a particular VOW. Therefore, when an AVP with multiple VOW customers can support all of its customers with a single MLS data feed, the MLS cannot impose a fee to recover its variable costs for feed more than once.

The Final Judgment also required NAR affiliated MLSs to adopt by February 15, 2009 local rules and regulations that implement the revised VOW Policy set forth in the Final Judgment. During period prior to the implementation deadline, the issue arose whether the VOW Policy provision requiring MLSs to provide "VOW-specific data feeds". to VOW operators and AVPs also required the MLSs to provide VOW operators with a data feed of the MLS data from other neighboring MLSs that the MLS made accessible to its participants through "data-sharing" agreements among two or more MLSs. A typical "data sharing" agreement permits the participants of the MLSs that are parties to the agreement to access the MLS databases of the other MLSs on a "read only" basis through a separate access point and log in function on the MLS' web page. One of the most expansive MLS "data sharing" system is operated by the Florida Association of Realtors, in which nearly all of the MLSs in Florida participate. Through this system a MLS participant in any subscribing MLS can access MLS data from the MLS databases of all of the other subscribing MLSs throughout the State. The data sharing system, however, only permits "read only" access to the other MLS databases. An MLS participant a subscribing MLS is not permitted to upload a listing to the other MLS databases. The participant can only upload a listing to the MLS(s) in which the participants has MLS participation rights.

Notwithstanding the limited functionality that is available through MLS "data sharing" agreements, both NAR and the Department interpreted the Final Judgment to require an MLS that subscribes to a data sharing consortium to make a MLS data feed available to VOW operators that includes not only MLS data from that MLS, but also from all of the other MLSs that are parties to the MLS data sharing consortium. According the Department and NAR, if the MLS data from the data sharing consortium is accessible to an MLS participant in its "bricks and mortar" office, the same data must be provided, on request, to an MLS participant that operates a VOW. It remains to be seen if the imposition of this duty on MLSs in data sharing consortiums will cause them to withdraw from such consortiums, or alternatively, encourage MLSs to consolidate their databases into a single unified data base that covers an even broader, or potentially state wide coverage area.

While NAR does not admit liability in the Final Judgment and the Judgment does not have precedential value in any subsequent litigation, the Department has clearly succeeded, through the Final Judgment, in enjoining NAR from imposing any heightened burdens on the use of MLS information in the operation of VOWs that are in excess of the burdens otherwise imposed on the use of MLS information in a broker's "bricks and mortar" business. This result should remove the disincentives to brokers' creation and operation of VOWs. If VOWs become more widespread by reason of the Department's settlement with NAR, there is the potential for VOWs to bring about efficiencies in the practice of real estate brokerage similar to the efficiencies that the Internet has brought about in other service industries. If these efficiencies are realized there is also the potential for a reduction in the real estate commission rates and a corresponding reduction in the number of persons and companies engaged in the real estate business. If these development in fact occur, the more efficient competitors who remain in the industry will realize profits higher than presently realized even if the commissions collected in any individual transaction may be reduced.

[c] Other Challenges in Attempt to Expand Real Estate Listing Information

In addition to the United States Justice Department's challenge to NAR's initial VOW Policy and its ILD Policy, the Federal Trade Commission has also been active in challenging local multiple listing policies that have allegedly adversely impacted the use of the internet to disseminate real estate listing information. The issue of particular concern to the Commission is a policy recommended by NAR and adopted by many multiple listing services that excluded "exclusive agency" listings from IDX data feeds and from display on public websites operated by the multiple listing services themselves, or by third parties, such as Realtor.com. An exclusive agency listing is a listing in which the seller owes the listing broker a commission if the listing broker or any other real estate broker procures a buyer for the listed property, but the seller is not obligated to pay any commission to the listing broker if the seller procures a buyer for the property without the aid of any real estate broker. Exclusive agency listings are commonly used by brokers offering reduced brokerage services for reduced fees. These fees would often take the form of a non-refundable flat fee paid at the time the seller lists her property with the "limited service" broker. The limited service broker places the listing into the local multiple listing service, but the seller is expected to show the property and negotiate any offers that may be forthcoming. The FTC many years ago secured consent orders from several multiple listing services prohibiting them from excluding exclusive agency listings from the multiple listing service in the first instance.ⁿ²¹ Extending the principle derived from these consent orders, the Commission opened a series of investigations in 2006 of multiple listing services throughout the country to determine whether the multiple listing services' policies of excluding exclusive agency listings from IDX data feeds or from display on the services' public websites, or Realtor.com, violated Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act. In mid 2006 the Commission threatened to sue several multiple listing services affiliated with NAR unless they agreed to consent orders in which the services abandoned their rules prohibiting the inclusion of exclusive agency listings in IDX feeds and display on other publicly accessible websites. Nearly all of the targeted multiple listing services accepted the consent orders rather than litigate with the Commission.ⁿ²²

In November 2006, NAR amended its Multiple Listing Policy to preclude, for all practical purposes, multiple listing services from excluding exclusive agency listings from IDX data feeds and publicly accessible websites. Specifically, NAR repealed the provision of its IDX Policy that allowed an MLS, at its option, to exclude exclusive agency listings from an IDX data feed. NAR further added a new Statement of Multiple Listing Policy, which provides that a multiple listing service need not operate a publicly accessible website or transmit Participants' listings to publicly accessible websites operated by third parties. But if they do offer those services, the multiple listing services must include exclusive agency listings in such feeds, unless the property address of the exclusive agency listed property will be included in the data feed and the seller displays a "For Sale By Owner" sign on the listed property. The rationale for NAR's Statement of Multiple Listing Policy is that a multiple listing service should not be forced to provide advertising support for an exclusive agency listing that the seller is also promoting as a "For Sale By Owner" property. To require otherwise would constitute a form of "free riding" that the antitrust laws permit individual competitors to discourage or prohibit.

Notwithstanding these consent orders, and NAR changes to its Multiple Listing Policy, RealComp II, the NAR-affiliated multiple listing service serving the greater Detroit metropolitan area, declined to agree to a Commission consent order, and chose instead to litigate with the Commission over the legality of its policy of excluding exclusive agency listings from its IDX data feed and from any publicly accessible websites to which it transmits its participants' listing data.ⁿ²³

In its Complaint against RealComp II, the Commission alleged that RealComp II responded to competition from non-traditional discount brokers by (1) excluding exclusive agency listings or other listings taken by discount brokers from RealComp II's IDX data feed, the data feeds RealComp II provides to third party Internet listing aggregators such as NAR's official site at Realtor.com, and from the data RealComp II displays on its own publicly accessible website, "MoveInMichigan.com", and (2) configuring the search functionality used by RealComp II's participants to search the RealComp II private database to exclude exclusive agency listings or discount brokers' listings from the "default" search results. RealComp II did accept exclusive agency listings and listings from discount brokers, but as a result of the "default" search functionality, these listings would be displayed in response to a participant's search query only if the participant specifically requested that the search include these types of listings. Without the participant's affirmative request to include exclusive agency or other types of listings from discount brokers, the only listings returned by "default" would be exclusive right to sell listings of traditional full service participants. The Commission alleged that RealComp II's policies restrained trade in the market for residential real estate brokerage services in southeastern Michigan in violation of Section 5 of the FTC Act.

The Commission's complaint against RealComp II was tried before a Commission Administrative Law Judge (ALJ) who issued an Opinion on December 10, 2007. In his Opinion, the ALJ found that, while RealComp II had market power in the southeast Michigan markets for real estate brokerage services and multiple listing services, and that the Real Comp II's policies had an adverse effect on competition in those markets, RealComp II offered sufficiently compelling justifications for the policies that outweighed their anticompetitive effects. Therefore, the ALJ found that RealComp II's policies did not violate Section 5 of the FTC Act. The Commission's complaint counsel appealed the ALJ's decision to the full Commission, and in an Opinion rendered on October 30, 2009, the Commission reversed the ALJ. n23.1

The Commission found initially that consumers rely increasingly on the Internet as a source of information about homes for sale. In response to this development, certain brokers offered to "unbundle" the traditional package of brokerage services and allow consumers to select the types of services they desired in return for non-refundable flat fees that were substantially less than the fees payable under a typical six percent (6%) sales commission. These non-traditional discount brokers also offered to list properties under exclusive agency listings that allowed the homeowner to avoid any brokerage fee if the homeowner found the eventual buyer without the efforts of the listing broker or any cooperating broker. The Commission noted that the business models of these discount brokers put significant downward pressure on the fees charged by traditional brokers. The Commission further cited the ALJ's findings that RealComp II conceded that it possessed market power in the southeast Michigan market for the delivery of multiple listing services to real estate brokers, and that RealComp II's policy of excluding exclusive agency and discount broker listings from its data feeds to publicly accessible websites was "likely anticompetitive."

In analyzing the antitrust legality of RealComp II's policies, the Commission determined that the policies should be judged under an analytical framework recognized by the United States Supreme Court in California Dental Ass'n v. FTC. n23.2 According to the Commission, the Supreme Court has held that level of analysis necessary to determine whether a restraint is anticompetitive under the Rule of Reason is on a continuum. If the restraint at issue is "inherently suspect" then the defendant must offer a cognizable justification for the restraint even in the absence of a showing that the defendant possessed market power. A restraint is "inherently suspect" if by its very nature it withholds from consumers a particular service that they desire. The Commission stated that the United States Supreme Court had endorsed this "inherently suspect" Rule of Reason framework in FTC v. Indiana Federation of Dentists, n23.3 and the Commission itself had adopted this framework in its decision in Polygram Holding, Inc., which was affirmed by the District of Columbia Circuit. n23.4

The Commission also interpreted the California Dental decision as endorsing an additional Rule of Reason framework that finds a restraint that is not "inherently suspect" to be illegal without a need for a market power analysis if there is direct evidence that the restraint caused actual, as opposed to potential, anticompetitive effects in the relevant market, and the defendant failed to offer a convincing justification for the restraint. The Commission found that, in addition to the two forms of Rule of Reason analysis endorsed by the Supreme Court in Indiana Federation of Dentists and California Dental that did not require an inquiry into whether the defendant possessed market power, the market power analysis, a restraint could also be analyzed under the full Rule of Reason analysis in which the court defines a relevant market, determines the extent of the defendant's market power in that market, and the potential that the restraint will reduce competition in the market.

The Commission then analyzed the RealComp II policies and found them to be a violation of Section 5 of the FTC Act under both an "inherently suspect" analysis, in which it was necessary to determine if RealComp II possessed market power, and under the full Rule of Reason analysis. The Commission determined that the RealComp II policies of discount broker and exclusive agency listings from RealComp II's data feeds to publicly accessible websites and from the "default" search results were "inherently suspect" because the policies penalized discount competitors by restricting the accessibility to consumers of information about the properties listed with the discount competitors. The Commission noted that similar restraints on consumers' access to non-deceptive advertising had been condemned summarily by the Commission and other courts. n23.5

The Commission then considered and rejected RealComp II's proffered justifications for its policies. RealComp II urged that its policies were justified as a means to prevent "free riding" by sellers under exclusive agency listings from using RealComp II's facilities at no charge to promote their property for sale, but avoid paying a commission to a RealComp II participant if the seller found a buyer through the seller's own efforts. The Commission noted that prevention of "free riding" can legitimize a policy that otherwise restrains trade. The Commission, however, summarily rejected RealComp II's contention that home sellers using exclusive agency listings were "free riding" on RealComp II's services. The Commission noted that home sellers do not have any power to submit listings directly into RealComp II's database. Only RealComp participants who pay participation fees to RealComp II may submit listings. Therefore, RealComp II is paid fees for all listings submitted to its database, whether they are exclusive right to sell listings or exclusive agency listings. The Commission also rejected RealComp II's argument that cooperating brokers were being "free ridden upon" because under an exclusive agency listing a cooperating broker who found a buyer could be denied compensation if the seller sold the property to a buyer found by the seller. The Commission found this argument to be unavailing because the cooperating broker who finds a buyer for an exclusive right to sell listing is even more likely to be denied a commission when the eventual buyer is found by the listing broker, who is able to keep the entire commission if she finds the buyer for her own listing.

The Commission also rejected RealComp's argument that its policies were justified because they prevented sellers under exclusive agency listings from enjoying a "bidding advantage" when considering an offer from a buyer they procured as opposed to an offer procured from a real estate broker for which the seller would be obligated to pay a commission if the broker procured buyer bought the property. The Commission characterized this "bidding advantage" as simple competition and not "free riding." The Commission stated that RealComp II's efforts to insulate broker represented buyers from a price advantage enjoyed by an unrepresented buyer was an effort by RealComp II to protect a commission structure that raises the cost of selling a home, and therefore is not cognizable under the antitrust laws. According to the Commission, rather than saving RealComp II's policies from condemnation under the antitrust laws, RealComp II's justification reinforces the Commission's conclusion that the policies have an anticompetitive effect.

The Commission concluded by analyzing RealComp II's policies under a traditional Rule of Reason analysis and found that the policies failed under this analysis as well. The Commission emphasized that RealComp II conceded, and the ALJ found, that it had market power in the southeast Michigan market for multiple listing services. The Commission then found that as a result of RealComp II's market power, its policies were not only likely to have an anticompetitive effect on the competition for real estate brokerage services in the relevant market, but that the policies had an actual anticompetitive effect. The Commission cited a study performed by complaint counsel's economic expert that showed a significant reduction in exclusive agency listings in RealComp II's database after RealComp II adopted its policies disadvantaging exclusive agency listings and listings of non-traditional discount brokers.

The Commission's RealComp II Opinion signals that the FTC, and presumably courts and other antitrust enforcement agencies, will treat as "inherently suspect" any policies of multiple listing services that adversely affect the ability of Internet based business models to compete with the traditional full service commission based business model. These types of policies are likely to be condemned using a truncated Rule of Reason analysis that dispenses with any need to inquire into the multiple listing services' market power in a relevant market. The Commission's RealComp II Opinion also makes clear that multiple listing services cannot justify their policies that adversely impact non-traditional brokers' Internet based business models on the ground that such policies are necessary to insulate the multiple listing services' full service participants from competition from Internet based non-traditional discount brokers.

RealComp II has filed a timely notice of appeal from the Commission's Opinion to the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals. Given the Commission's use of the truncated Rule of Reason analysis to find that RealComp II's policies violated Section 5 of the FTC Act, the Sixth Circuit's opinion will be further indication of the willingness of federal courts to embrace the notion that a full market power analysis under the Rule of Reason need not be employed when the evidence shows that a restraint has a clear and direct adverse impact on competition.

[d] Report on Competition in the Real Estate Industry Issued by FTC and DOJ

In addition to their respective enforcement initiatives targeted at reducing restrictions on the use of the Internet to make the real estate brokerage industry more competitive and efficient, the Federal Trade Commission and the United States Department of Justice issued in April 2007 a jointly authored Report on Competition in the Real Estate Industry. ⁿ²⁴ The Report is based in substantial part on a Public Workshop sponsored by the agencies in October 2005, at which industry participants, critics, and scholars made presentations. ⁿ²⁵

The Report provides an overview of competitive relationships within the real estate brokerage industry and how the industry is characterized by simultaneous competition and close cooperation among competitors. The Report then discusses the impact of the Internet on the real estate brokers and home buyers and sellers who use their services, and the potential of the Internet to make the industry more efficient, which in turn should reduce the cost of brokerage services to consumers. The Report also includes analyses of economic literature discussing the extent of the flexibility of real estate commission rates and that the amount spent by consumers on real estate brokerage commissions tends to increase in direct proportion to the increase in housing prices. The economic analyses further observe that the high commission levels paid to brokers and agents has led to a rapid increase in the number of agents competing for listings. This competition, however, has not led to lower commission rates, but rather to increasing amounts spent by agents on marketing efforts designed to procure listings and buyer clients. These expenses, in turn, reduce broker and agent net profits to the extent that broker and agent income levels remain stagnant despite a dramatic increase in the aggregate amount spent by consumers on brokerage services.

The Report then discusses obstacles to more robust competition in the real estate brokerage industry. The Report devotes considerable attention to state laws and regulations mandating minimum levels of service that real estate brokers must accord to home buyers and sellers, as well as state laws prohibiting brokers from paying commission rebates to their customers and clients. Both agencies have lobbied vigorously in opposition to such state legislation, but have been generally unsuccessful in persuading state legislatures not to enact these proposals. The Report also details the enforcement actions by the Federal Trade Commission against multiple listing services' exclusion of exclusive agency listings from IDX and public website data feeds, and the Department of Justice's suit against NAR's VOW and ILD Policies. Finally, the Report lists a series of actions designed to improve competition in the real estate brokerage industry. First, the agencies should continue to pursue enforcement actions against collusive conduct that unreasonably lessens competition. Second, the agencies should continue to press state legislatures to decline to adopt, or repeal, legislation that restricts competition among real estate brokers and restricts consumer choice of brokerage services. Third, the agencies and state regulators should initiate programs to ensure that consumers are aware of commission rate negotiability and the range of service options available to them from participants in the real estate brokerage industry. Lastly, the agencies and state regulators should undertake a new empirical analysis of the real estate industry using better and more detailed data on the strength of the correlation between commission rates and housing prices. If nothing else, the Report reveals the analytical framework the Federal Trade Commission and the United States Department of Justice will employ when evaluating potential enforcement actions against the various businesses and organizations that participate in the real estate brokerage industry.

CHAPTER 10 The Impact of Electronic Commerce on the Real Estate Brokerage Business *

10A-10 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 10.06

§ 10.06 "Linking" or "Framing" Other Websites Can Create Liability Risks

The software used to maintain a web site permits an operator of one site to create a hypertext "link" to another web site. When an Internet user "clicks" on the highlighted terms, the user is transported to the "linked" site. As a general rule, "linking" to another website is not viewed as a copyright infringement or unfair competition because:

- websites themselves are "public" displays,
- the "link" alone does not involve any copying of material on the "linked" site, and
- most website operators welcome the referral of Internet users to their sites.

Issues can arise, however, when a web site operator employs so-called "deep linking" in which a web site operator links to an "inside" page of another web site, as opposed to the web site's "home page." Many web sites display banner advertising or other promotional material on their opening page or "home page." The value of this advertising is determined by the number of visitors that the web site operator can document have viewed the site. A "deep link" allows a visitor from another web site to bypass the "home page," and, likewise, the advertisements that appear on that page. This dilution of the value of the advertising on the linked site's home page has lead to challenges to "deep linking" on grounds of unfair competition. n1

"Framing" occurs when one website operator displays another website within a border or "frame" of the original website. "Framing" another entity's website can lead to claims of copyright and trademark infringement, or unfair competition, when the "framing" site permits an Internet user to avoid the "framed" site's home page, or blocks banner advertisements appearing on the "framed" site's pages.

Caution dictates that web site operators who wish to "link" to, or "frame" another operator's web site should do so only after securing the permission of the other web site operator. Many Multiple Listing Services, however, operate "public" web sites on which the Service's listing data is accessible. These Multiple Listing Services typically permit participants to link to, or frame, the Service's public site from the participant's company web site.

§ 10.07 Consumer "Privacy" Breaches Can Lead to Liability

Display of real estate data on a web site rarely leads to claims of "privacy" breaches. This is true because consumers cannot assert credible claims of any expectation of privacy concerning the characteristics or value of the real property that they own. Real estate ownership, conveyancing, and taxation are dependent upon publicly recorded information about real estate ownership and values. Consumers cannot reasonably claim that such data is "private." On the other hand, consumers do have expectations of privacy about their individual Internet usage patterns. A web site operator's collection of personal data about people who visit a web site can lead to "privacy" issues depending upon whether consumers are informed about the collection of such data, and how such data is subsequently used.

Available technology permits web site operators to gather data on those who visit their sites, including visitors' e-mail addresses, frequency of visits to the site, and the pages visited within the site. Many web site operators use "cookies," which are computer files placed on the user's computer that record the user's visits to the site, and the pages viewed by the user while on the site. Other web sites require users to "register" with the web site operator by providing the users' name, a verifiable e-mail address, and telephone number.

This information allows web site operators to compile data about customers' web site usage, which can be used for targeted marketing, or can be sold to other entities. The Federal Trade Commission (FTC) is becoming increasingly aggressive in attacking perceived breaches of consumers' right to privacy on the World Wide Web. Major FTC concerns are:

- (1) gathering data from or about children; and
- (2) use of consumer personal data for purposes other than those approved by the consumer.

Web site operators should establish and publish a "privacy policy" on their site that clearly informs visitors to the site about the types of data, if any, that is collected about the visitors, and what uses may be made of that data. Web site visitors should be allowed to "opt out" of any use of their personal data for purposes for which they do not consent. For web site operators engaged in the "financial services" industry, Title V of the Gramm Leach Bliley Financial Services Modernization Act of 1999 includes specific limitations on the use by financial services providers of personal non-public information about consumers. n1 The Federal Trade Commission has promulgated regulations that further refine the duties of financial service providers concerning the collection and use of personal non-public information about consumers. n2 Real estate brokerage is not defined as a "financial service" under the Gramm Leach Bliley Act; however, if a real estate broker engages in real estate appraising, or mortgage brokerage or lending, through an affiliated company, the Gramm-Leach-Bliley privacy regulations would apply to that activity.

§ 10.08 Extraterritorial Reach of State Real Estate License Laws

The Internet and e-mail allow real estate brokers to solicit buyers and transmit offers to buy or sell real estate worldwide. This technology arguably allows a real estate broker or agent to engage "in the business of real estate brokerage" in all fifty (50) states. State real estate regulators could take the position that if a broker or agent disseminates electronic real estate advertising to consumers in the state, the broker becomes subject to the rules and regulations of that state's license law. The assertion of jurisdiction by state real estate commissions over the Internet activities of out-of-state brokerage companies is a corollary to the state's assertion of personal jurisdiction over out-of-state defendants pursuant to the state's "long arm" statute (discussed in § 10.02 above).

E-mail can be used to commit fraud, infringe upon copyright rights, violate federal laws governing interstate commerce (anti-gambling and anti-obscenity laws), and engage in common-law defamation. E-mail can also be used to reveal trade secrets and to sabotage corporate records. To avoid company liability for misuse of e-mail by employees or agents, and to create a basis to sue a disgruntled employee or agent who uses e-mail to undermine the company, a company should adopt an employee e-mail policy. Before addressing the content of such policies, certain features of e-mail communications must be recognized.

First, e-mail is permanent. E-mail is more permanent than paper records. Paper can be shredded or burned. E-mail messages exist on a computer hard drive and are not removed when the "delete" key is tapped on a keyboard. Hence, one of the first pieces of "evidence" seized in a civil or criminal investigation is a company's computers to search for incriminating e-mail messages.

Second, e-mail is public. E-mail messages can be forwarded to hundreds of recipients with the tap of a key on a keyboard. E-mail is the electronic equivalent of a postcard.

Companies should make clear to employees and agents the rules that apply to use of the company e-mail system. Companies have very broad latitude in developing an e-mail policy. Examples of e-mail policy provisions are:

- (1) E-mail may be used only for business purposes.
- (2) E-mail messages may be shared only with other persons in the company.
- (3) Company reserves the right to monitor all employees' or agents' e-mail messages.
- (4) Unless necessary for business purposes, attachments of photographs are not permitted on the company system.
- (5) All e-mail messages are the property of the company.

(6) The e-mail system may not be used to transmit obscenity or profanity, threats, abusive language, or messages containing racist, sexist, or bigoted references.

§ 10.10 Conclusion: Implications for the Future

The Internet is here to stay, but courts and state regulators have yet to address the breadth, speed, and interactivity of the Internet. Consequently there is little definitive case law upon which to rely when counseling your real estate industry clients. One can assume, however, that traditional rules prohibiting fraud, defamation, and protecting intellectual property rights, will apply with equal force to web site operations and Internet communications.

The Internet will almost certainly lead to a more efficient and less time-consuming real estate transaction, with the likely advent of a "paperless transaction" in the next decade. The challenge for real estate brokers is to harness the power of the Internet to allow them to better serve their clients, or risk being rendered obsolete.

Scope

SCOPE

Chapter 11 discusses the mortgage broker's role in real estate transactions. Mortgage brokers function as the retail outlet for many lenders and are able to offer borrowers a variety of mortgage products. In their role as an intermediary between mortgage lenders and borrowers, mortgage brokers facilitate the placement of mortgage loans. The increasing use of mortgage brokers, particularly by residential borrowers, has resulted in greater regulation of this industry.

Chapter 11 discusses the licensing and regulation of mortgage brokers (§ 11.02), whether payment of a mortgage broker's commission can cause a loan to be considered usurious (§ 11.03), a mortgage broker's right to compensation (§ 11.04), the duties owed by a mortgage broker to the borrower, the lender and others (§ 11.05), and whether the activities of mortgage brokers fall within the ambit of blue sky laws (§ 11.06). Chapter 11 also includes mortgage brokerage forms (§ 11.07).

CHAPTER 11 Mortgage Brokers *

§ 11.01 The Role of Mortgage Brokers in the Real Estate Market

The mortgage broker's role in real estate transactions, few of which are consummated without financing, has become more significant as the industry has grown. While commercial mortgage brokerage has changed little over the years, the function of the mortgage broker in residential real estate financing has evolved from one analogous to that of the real estate broker in the realm of real estate conveyancing and leasing to one more closely aligned with the role of a lender. n1 This is largely a result of the expansion of the residential mortgage delivery system in recent years to include the "wholesale" method of lending.

The traditional "retail" method of residential mortgage lending is illustrated by a savings and loan (S & L) branch office of the 1970s, where a customer in need of a home mortgage submitted a loan application to the branch manager or loan officer. The processing of the loan--that is, the process of obtaining the verifications of deposit and employment, credit report, appraisal and other information necessary to making a determination to lend--was performed in the branch office. Upon completion of the file, the home office underwriters made the loan decision. If the underwriters deemed both the borrower and the property to be worthy, the loan was consummated or "closed" at the branch office. The S & L then serviced the loan for the customer. Servicing generally consists of collecting monthly payments from the borrower; paying property taxes, insurance premiums and other escrowed items; working with borrowers who are in default; and, when necessary, foreclosing on the mortgage.

With the S & L debacle of the 1980s came massive changes to the mortgage delivery system, including the downsizing of S & L's, growth of mortgage banks and the secondary market, securitization of residential mortgages and an acknowledgment that the constant expansion and contraction of mortgage banks during the "boom and bust" cycles was costly and inefficient. Out of these changes was born the new residential mortgage broker. n2

Many out-of-work S & L employees opened their own small mortgage brokerage businesses, developed relationships with a number of mortgage lenders and used their business contacts and marketing experience to attract borrowers. Once the prospective borrowers were in the office, the mortgage broker learned their particular needs, took loan applications, provided requisite disclosures, processed the loans, and submitted completed loan packages to one of typically many lenders with which it had a relationship. The mortgage lender made the credit decision based on the lender's or the ultimate investor's underwriting guidelines. The loan package was returned to the mortgage broker to facilitate the loan closing.

One court explained the evolution of the residential mortgage delivery system in the following way:

Traditionally, residential mortgage lenders made loans to borrowers directly from offices maintained with employees of the lender that originated, processed, and underwrote such loans. In recent years, a number of wholesale mortgage lending programs have evolved whereby mortgage lenders purchase loans from other lenders or from mortgage brokers who have completed all of the origination work. Mortgage lenders regularly purchase wholesale closed loans made by other mortgage lenders.

In addition to buying closed loans at wholesale, mortgage lenders also acquire loans through mortgage brokers. Mortgage brokers originate and process loans that the mortgage lender then purchases from the mortgage broker. The arrangement between the mortgage lender and the mortgage broker varies, but generally the closing of the loan is arranged by the mortgage broker in the name of the mortgage lender. n3

The growth of wholesale lending brought with it another practice called "table funding." Known in some areas of the country as "concurrent funding," a table-funded transaction is one in which the mortgage broker makes the loan in the mortgage broker's name and concurrently sells the mortgage to a mortgage banker. The Smith court also described this practice as follows:

Under this arrangement, the mortgage broker or correspondent lender performs all of the originating functions and closes the loan in the name of the mortgage broker with funds supplied by the mortgage lender. The mortgage broker depends upon "table funding," the simultaneous advance of the loan funds from the mortgage lender to the mortgage broker. Once the loan is closed, the mortgage broker immediately assigns the mortgage to the mortgage lender. The essence of the table funding relationship is that the mortgage broker identifies itself as the creditor on the loan documents even though the mortgage broker is not the source of the funds. n4

Some state statutes specifically acknowledge the practice of table funding. Arizona's statute, for example, states that "[a] person who funds a mortgage loan which has been originated and processed by a licensee," is, under certain conditions, exempt from the mortgage broker act. n5 The next subsection clarifies that " 'originate' includes loans closed in a name other than that of the licensee." n6 New Jersey regulations define a table funding agreement as "an agreement between an investor and a licensee whereby the investor agrees to purchase specified mortgage loans from a licensee immediately after the closing of the mortgage loans, and which permits the licensee to close loans with funds of the investor."

Correspondent lending is another practice that developed with the wholesale lending market. A correspondent lender typically has a "warehouse line of credit" from which it funds the loans; closes the loans in its own name; immediately sells the closed loans to an investor, often another lender; and repays the warehouse lender. Correspondent lenders do not service the mortgages they sell. The New Jersey legislature defined the term "correspondent mortgage lender" as "A residential mortgage n7 lender who: (1) in the regular course of business, does not hold any mortgage loans in its portfolio, or service mortgage loans, for more than 90 days; and (2) has shown to the department's satisfaction an ability to fund mortgage loans through warehouse agreements, table funding agreements or otherwise." n8 n9

With the growth of wholesale lending came efforts to define the activities of a mortgage broker. The United States Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) first defined the term in 1992, when it issued final regulations, long-awaited by the mortgage finance and real estate industries, in the Real Estate Settlement Procedures Act (RESPA). n10 make loans and sell them to an institutional investor or other secondary market entity. The secondary market, another phenomenon that developed rapidly, improved the flow of capital across the United States from capital-rich areas to capital-poor areas, but certain secondary market practices have been cited as a major factor contributing to the recent financial crisis. ⁿ¹²

The two largest and most well-known secondary market agencies are Freddie Mac (the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation) and Fannie Mae (the Federal National Mortgage Association), also known as government-sponsored enterprises (GSEs). A smaller GSE, the Government National Mortgage Association, or Ginnie Mae, was created concurrently with Fannie Mae and securitizes government mortgages. Freddie Mac and Fannie Mae do not purchase loans directly from mortgage brokers; rather, they deal with mortgage bankers who have been approved as "Sellers" and "Servicers" by meeting specific requirements set out by the GSEs in the "Sellers/Servicers Guides" or in negotiated contracts. These Sellers and Servicers either buy completed loan packages from other lenders or mortgage brokers, or originate loans themselves and sell them to Freddie Mac and Fannie Mae.

Mortgage bankers are better capitalized than mortgage brokers and have higher net worth requirements under the Freddie Mac and Fannie Mae guidelines, and also under state laws and regulations. ⁿ¹³ Mortgage bankers, unlike mortgage brokers, are often retained by investors to service the loan. In some states a mortgage banker must obtain an additional license or endorsement to service mortgage loans, which can impose an even higher net worth requirement. ^{n13.1}

Mortgage brokers generally receive a fee or commission for services from the borrower, and may also receive fees from the lender. In this case, the state may require the mortgage broker to disclose the fee arrangement to both parties. ⁿ¹⁴ Regulation X, promulgated pursuant to RESPA, also requires the disclosure of all fees received by a mortgage broker in a federally related transaction, ⁿ¹⁵ whether paid by the borrower or the lender. ⁿ¹⁶

Clearly, mortgage brokers perform an important function in the real estate market. Like the GSEs, they help facilitate the redistribution of available investment capital among the various geographical regions of the United States. They are the retail outlet for many lenders, offering borrowers a variety of mortgage products; they facilitate the placement of mortgage loans; and they act as an intermediary between mortgage loan consumers and lenders.

As the field of mortgage brokerage has gained greater prominence, and more borrowers have sought mortgage brokerage services, the amount of regulation, both state and federal, has significantly increased. This chapter discusses the rights, duties and compensation of mortgage brokers, and the growing bodies of statutory, regulatory and case law, which are evolving with respect to this segment of the mortgage industry.

Prior to the 1980s, mortgage brokerages were generally associated with niche lending, such as commercial loans, other types of income-producing property loans, second mortgages, and non-investment quality hard money and private money loans. The reason for this was that the traditional portfolio lenders, thrifts and savings banks, were so predominant that there was little room for brokers. As a result, they focused on filling the slots left behind by the traditional lenders.

CHAPTER 11 Mortgage Brokers *

10A-11 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 11.02

§ 11.02 Licensing and Fee Regulation

[1] Licensing

While all states require that to act as a real estate broker one must obtain a real estate broker's license, n1 until recently there were few comprehensive regulatory schemes governing mortgage brokers. However, with the growth of wholesale lending and the mortgage brokerage industry has come increased legislation and regulation, particularly in the area of residential mortgage finance. n2 As of March 1, 2009, all fifty states and the District of Columbia regulated the conduct of mortgage brokers, or required their licensing or registration, or both. n3 Furthermore, all states were required to enact a law requiring appropriate licensing and/or registration for loan originators pursuant to the federal S.A.F.E. Mortgage Licensing Act of 2008 as of July 1, 2009. n4

In an effort to streamline and standardize the licensing process, the conference of State Bank Supervisors and the American Association of Residential Mortgage Regulators (AARMR) collaborated to launch the National Mortgage Licensing System (NMLS), an online system designed to manage multi-state applications, amendments, updates and renewals of state mortgage lender, broker, and loan originator licenses. The system, which went live on January 2, 2008, is intended to increase regulatory efficiency for regulators and industry alike by creating a single record for each licensee, which can be accessed by any state that regulates that licensee. The NMLS does not replace the decision-making authority of an individual state's regulator; rather, it is a processing center and secure content database that assists regulators in performing their duties more efficiently. As of December 31, 2010, all but three states (Florida, Minnesota and Nevada) will have transitioned their licensing procedures to the NMLS system. n5

Whereas in the past it was common to include mortgage brokerage activities within the scope of the statutory definition of real estate brokerage, many mortgage broker licensing laws now contain exemptions for real estate licensees only to the extent the real estate licensee is acting within the scope of that license and does not receive compensation for engaging in mortgage broker activities. Thus, in many states a licensed real estate broker may not receive a fee for acting as or for a mortgage broker without a separate mortgage broker's license. n6 However, now that the S.A.F.E. Mortgage Licensing Act of 2008 requires licensing for mortgage loan originators, several states have chosen to remove the real estate broker exemption from the mortgage broker licensing statute and instead exempt real estate brokers from licensing as mortgage loan originators. As a result, the exemption is generally applicable unless the real estate broker is compensated by a mortgage lender, mortgage broker or mortgage originator. n6.1

The state statutes vary greatly in scope. California, for example, requires the real estate mortgage broker to prepare and deliver to both the prospective lender and the prospective borrower a comprehensive disclosure statement. n7 Idaho, Iowa and Missouri, on the other hand, have minimal requirements. n8

As the mortgage industry continues to change and grow, state regulators will continue to seek ways to protect the consumers in their state. Generally, state legislatures are charged with setting policy, with enforcement power granted to state agencies. AARMR, a trade group with member-regulators from many states, was formed in 1989 to provide direction to a rapidly burgeoning number of state regulators. AARMR, working with an Advisory Council of industry representatives, created the AARMR Compendium of Mortgage Activity (Lending, Brokering and Servicing) Statutory Provisions (the AARMR Act) with the expectation of promoting some consistency to regulations affecting the mortgage industry. The AARMR Act covers such topics as:

- Licensing Procedures;
- Net Worth, Bonding, Escrow Funds, Record Keeping Requirements, and Prohibited Practices; Disclosure Requirements;
- Powers and Duties of the Regulator; and
- Investigation and Enforcement. n9

The AARMR Act begins with a statement that expresses the need for laws and regulations of the mortgage industry, a need echoed by many government officials and people within the industry:

Section 1-2 Policy and Purpose

The activities of mortgage lenders, mortgage brokers, and mortgage servicers and the offering of financing for residential real property have a direct, valuable and immediate impact upon this State's consumers, this State's economy, the neighborhoods and communities of this State, and the housing and real estate industry. The (Legislative body) finds that accessibility to mortgage credit is vital to the state's citizens. The (legislative body) also finds that it is essential for the protection of the citizens of this State and the stability of the State's economy that reasonable standards for licensing and regulation of the business practices of mortgage lenders, mortgage brokers, and mortgage servicers be imposed. The (legislative body) further finds that the obligations of mortgage lenders, mortgage brokers, and mortgage servicers to consumers in connection with the making, brokering, and servicing of mortgage loans are such as to warrant the regulation of the mortgage lending process, including the making, brokering, and servicing of mortgage loans. The purpose of this Act is to protect consumers seeking mortgage loans and to ensure that the mortgage lending industry is operating without unfair, deceptive, and fraudulent practices on the part of mortgage lenders, mortgage brokers, and mortgage servicers. n10

The AARMR Act is a conceivable basis for much of the statutory language governing mortgage broker licensing or registration.

[2] Fee Regulation

Many of the reported cases on mortgage brokers are in the commercial context, and are often the result of disputes over commissions. In both commercial and residential transactions, plaintiffs' allegations often include fraudulent activity or breach of fiduciary duty. n11

Residential mortgage transactions fall generally into three categories:

- government loans (loans insured by the Federal Housing Administration or guaranteed by the Veterans Administration, neither of which will be discussed here);
- conforming mortgage transactions (those that conform to the underwriting guidelines of Freddie Mac or Fannie Mae and benefit from an implicit government guarantee); and
- non-conforming mortgage transactions (mortgages that do not fit into either of the other two categories).

In conforming transactions, mortgage brokers typically charge the borrower a fee of from one to two percent of the face amount of the loan for services provided. n12 However, the market for non-conforming mortgages cannot be so easily classified. Varying market conditions, the perception that non-conforming mortgages are riskier, and the lack of a government guarantee may justify the higher fees charged in non-conforming transactions.

While a competitive marketplace ordinarily leads to self-regulating of fees, a 1994 lawsuit n13 was the first in a succession of class action suits directed at the practices of mortgage brokers. The 1994 suit indicated a growing concern about what some plaintiffs have alleged are fraudulent practices surrounding fees paid to residential mortgage brokers, particularly in the non-conforming or high-risk context. The parties to the lawsuit reached a settlement before the court could render a verdict on the numerous issues. n14 However, the disputes over mortgage broker fees rages on fueled in part by the passage of the Home Ownership and Equity Protection Act (HOEPA) in 1994, n15 amendments to RESPA that brought refinancings and subordinate liens under its auspices, n16 the controversy over "yield spread premiums" and how they are to be disclosed to consumers, n17 the subprime mortgage meltdown, and recent amendments to Regulation Z regarding "Higher Priced Mortgage Loans." n18 HOEPA was seen by consumer groups as an attempt to stem a tide of perceived abuses, n19 defining what in early drafts was referred to as a "high-cost" mortgage, n20 providing for additional disclosures to borrowers, n21 adding limitations for mortgages that fall under the "high-cost" definition, n22 and giving the Federal Reserve Board discretionary authority to exempt certain products or categories of mortgages. n23

Only a few states currently regulate the dollar amount of fees and commissions a mortgage brokerage may charge. Maryland limits "finders fees" to 8% of the amount of the loan or advance. n24 Minnesota limits the aggregate of "lender fees," which include fees paid to mortgage brokers by borrowers or lenders, to a maximum of 5% of the loan amount. n25 Florida, through its comprehensive Mortgage Brokerage and Mortgage Lending Act, puts a ceiling on the maximum fees or commissions which may be charged for any mortgage loan depending upon the net proceeds of the loan to the borrower, up to $250 plus ten percent of the "entire mortgage loan." n26

California, in contrast, limits the total dollar amount of all fees charged in connection with real estate secured loans (including mortgage broker fees) but does not apply these limitations to first mortgage loans of thirty thousand dollars or more, and junior loans of twenty thousand dollars or more. n27 Thus, the broker's commission in the bulk of California mortgage transactions is, as in most jurisdictions, whatever the market will bear.

n28 n29 n30 However, in California, a broker licensed under the real estate law who charges more than the statute allows will have to refund the excessive charges, and will forfeit its entire commission unless it can show that the violation was "not intentional and resulted from a bona fide error notwithstanding the maintenance of procedures reasonably adapted to avoid any such error." n31 While many state statutes exempt licensed attorneys, while acting in that capacity, from the purview of the broker licensing laws, n32 this exemption typically applies only where the attorney/mortgage broker does not accept compensation for his mortgage broker activity or is not actively and principally engaged in the business of negotiating mortgage loans. For example, in Florida a mortgage broker who is also a licensed attorney may not receive compensation for title insurance he wrote for the same loan in which he acted as mortgage broker because in such transactions he would be "actively and principally engaged" in business as a mortgage broker. n33

CHAPTER 11 Mortgage Brokers *

10A-11 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 11.03

§ 11.03 Factors Affecting Whether Mortgage Broker's Commission Might Cause Loan to Be Considered Usurious

It is well established that a mortgage loan transaction is not made usurious by the mere fact that a mortgage broker commission is paid by the borrower. n1 As a Nevada court stated: "[W]here one negotiates a loan through a broker with a money lender, and the latter bona fide lends the money at a legal rate of interest, the transaction is not made usurious by the fact that the broker charges the borrower a commission for his services." n2

On the other hand, it is equally recognized that "the exaction of a broker's fee by the lender or his agent will be considered in computing interest to determine whether the transaction is usurious." n3 Thus, where the broker is also the lender, n4 or the lender requires as a condition of the loan that a commission be paid to the lender's agent, n5 the loan may be subject to a charge of usury if the effective rate of interest to the borrower (including payments to the lender or his agent in the form of brokerage fees) exceeds the rate allowed by law. n6

Violation of the Virginia usury statute n7 was alleged in a 1994 class-action lawsuit against Fleet Finance, Inc. (Fleet) and some mortgage brokers who originated loans for Fleet. n8 Plaintiffs claimed that fees paid to mortgage brokers by the lender were "unlawfully hidden brokers' fees on loans involving first mortgages within the meaning of Va. Code Section 6.1-330.70" and were "not 'reasonable and necessary' charges in connection with the making of first mortgage loans." n9

Counsel for defendant mortgage broker Crosstate Mortgage and Investments, Inc., responded as follows:

There is no prohibition in any Virginia statute governing first mortgage loans on the amount of payments by lenders to brokers in connection with such loans. The interest charged is by agreement of the lender and the borrower and, therefore, there is no requirement that the interest and points charged by Fleet to a borrower be "reasonable." Reasonableness is a function of the market. Moreover, the reasonableness limits on non-interest charges in Va. Code § 6.1-330.70 apply only to certain types of charges "in addition to those permitted by § 6.1-330.69." n10

The parties reached a settlement before trial, leaving the legal issues, including the usury charge, unresolved. Yet the case remains instructive, as since that time at least 150 class action lawsuits have been filed challenging the legality of such payments under RESPA § 8. n11

Other courts have had to confront thorny questions of agency in determining whether the mortgage broker's fee has, in fact, been exacted by the lender or the lender's agent. The mere fact that the mortgage broker and lender have executive officers or corporate directors in common is usually not itself sufficient to sustain the borrower's burden of proving that the broker and lender are either "one entity" or principal and agent. n12 For example, in Swanson v. Gulf West International Corp., n13 the borrower contended that because the chief executive officer of the brokerage firm was also president of the corporate lender, the broker was an agent of the lender and the broker's commission should have been deemed interest for the purpose of determining whether the loan was usurious. Rejecting this claim, the court stated:

As to the question of the brokerage commission, there was sufficient evidence to support the trial court's determination that the brokerage commission was a legitimate brokerage charge, was not paid to the lender or an agent of the lender, and was, therefore, not interest. For example, except for Mr. Barrish who was president of both corporations, the two companies had no officers in common; they had no common stockholders, the [borrower's] loan application was taken by an employee of the brokerage corporation and was submitted to several other lenders before being accepted by [the lender]; and Mr. Barrish testified that lenders other than [Gulf West International Corporation] made about 95 percent of the loans brokered by Gulf West Financial Corporation. n14

However, where there is a close connection between the lender and broker, including stockholders in common, and there is proof that the lender intends that a brokerage commission be received by its agent, courts have held that the brokerage fee constitutes interest on the mortgage loan. n15

The issue of whether a brokerage fee constitutes a "finance charge" on a mortgage was addressed in two separate amendments to Regulation Z (Reg. Z) issued by the Federal Reserve Board. n16 Reg. Z, which implements the Truth in Lending Act (TILA), n17 has as its stated purpose "to promote the informed use of consumer credit by requiring disclosures about its terms and cost." n18 The first Reg. Z amendment stated that a broker's fee paid by a borrower is a finance charge only if the lender required the borrower to use the broker. n19 The second Reg. Z amendment, which is currently in effect, specifically provides that all mortgage broker fees paid by the borrower are to be considered to be finance charges under the Truth in Lending Act. n20

A 1993 Georgia case, Johnson v. Fleet Finance, Inc., n21 demonstrated the confusion surrounding the cost-of-consumer-credit issue before adoption of this last Reg. Z amendment. In Johnson, the court framed the issue as "whether a loan broker's fee constitutes a finance charge under the federal Truth in Lending Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1605(a), when the lender neither receives part of the fee nor requires the borrower to use a loan broker." n22 The plaintiffs acknowledged that all fees and charges were disclosed on the disclosure documents, but alleged that the fee paid to a mortgage broker was shown "as part of the 'amount financed' rather than as a separate 'finance charge' " n23 giving the impression that "the cost of the loan was lower than it actually was." n24 The court, relying on the official staff commentary to Reg. Z, n25 opined that because the plaintiffs sought the services of the mortgage broker on their own, the lender did not require the use of the mortgage broker, n26 and the disclosure was correct.

In determining whether the broker is an agent of the lender for purposes of the usury statutes, courts weigh the various factors but do not always agree as to their significance. Some courts attach little significance to the fact that the broker services the loan for the lender after closing, n27 while others see this same factor as tending to establish an agency relationship. n28 Courts seem to agree, however, that the disclosure of brokerage commissions required under TILA and Reg. Z are not probative on the question of agency. n29

A number of courts have taken the view that the mortgage broker may perform various services for the lender without becoming the lender's agent. n30 The broker may obtain and transmit to the lender information relating to the financial condition of the borrower, the state of the borrower's title to the property, and may even prepare all the essential mortgage loan documents without being deemed the lender's agent. Consequently, an Illinois court has stated:

Needless to say, a loan broker gets no fee unless the borrower successfully negotiates the loan. The broker may understandably perform any number of accommodations for the lender in an effort to induce him to make the loan. But those acts of accommodation are based on self-interest and not on any desire to further the interests of the lender. n31

This view, however, is not universally accepted. Sometimes a court will find an implied agency relationship between broker and lender despite their intentions to the contrary. For example, in Busk v. Hoard, n32 a sharply divided Supreme Court of Washington inferred an agency relationship and found the mortgage transaction in a foreclosure action to be usurious. In Busk, after the borrowers had approached the mortgage broker and entered into a written brokerage contract, the lender, a private individual with no prior real-estate experience, responded to the broker's newspaper advertisement and agreed to make the loan. He was told the broker would service the mortgage without charge and would secure title insurance. The lender neither saw the property nor met the borrowers and left everything to the broker, including the preparation of the mortgage documents and the recording of the lien, all of which was done after the lender had turned the loan funds over to the broker. Later, when the borrower defaulted, the broker sent foreclosure notices which characterized the lender as the broker's client. n33 These facts, concluded the court, created an agency relationship between the lender and broker as a matter of law; knowledge of the brokerage commission, which when added to the principal and interest due on the mortgage rendered the loan usurious, was imputed to the lender. n34

Another question that has confronted the courts is whether fee-splitting between the mortgage broker and lender renders the transaction usurious. The answer to this question depends, in many jurisdictions, upon whether the mortgage lender requires the borrower's mortgage broker to split its commission. n35 If fee splitting is required as a condition of the loan, and the lender thereby receives more than the legal rate of interest on the loan, the transaction is generally seen as usurious. n36 However, to the extent that the broker voluntarily offers part of its fee to the lender as an inducement to make the loan, and there is no sufficient proof that the broker is also the lender's agent, courts hold that the commission was not "exact" by the lender, and the fee-splitting does not subject the loan to a charge of usury. n37

There is dicta in some cases stating the even more permissive view that, as long as the parties act in good faith without intent to circumvent the usury laws, and the borrower is not further burdened by the sharing of the commission, the mere fact that the lender makes fee-sharing a condition of the loan does not make the transaction usurious. n38

In the case at bar, Jones engaged a broker to obtain refinancing of a trust deed. The initial broker contacted another licensed broker, Johnston, who referred the matter to his partner, Kallman, a licensed real estate salesman. Kallman arranged for a loan and later arranged for a forbearance on the loan. After repaying the loan, Jones brought an action against the lender and Kallman, charging that the loans were usurious. The court held that the record supported the trial court's finding that the loans were not usurious, since they fell within the exception for loans "arranged" by licensed real estate brokers. The court found that Johnston arranged the loan, since Johnston determined the interest rate, set the terms of forbearance and reviewed the documents. The court also held that Johnston received compensation for his services, which was sufficient to trigger the exception clause, even though Kallman received all the commissions. The court reasoned that since courts traditionally give a liberal interpretation to the term "compensation," the fact that Kallman contributed some of his commission to the expenses of his partnership with Johnston amounted to compensation for Johnston.

PART IV Specialized Fields of Brokerage

CHAPTER 11 Mortgage Brokers *

10A-11 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 11.04

§ 11.04 Mortgage Broker's Right to Compensation

[1] Employing the Mortgage Broker

A fundamental prerequisite to the mortgage broker's right to compensation is the employment of the broker for the purpose of seeking financing for acquisition, refinancing or development of real estate. Most states require an employment contract, either express or implied, before a mortgage broker can claim compensation. n1 A number of states have codified this requirement for residential mortgage brokers. n2 The burden of proof is on the mortgage broker, who must establish by competent evidence that it was in fact retained by the borrower as a mortgage broker. n3 The fact that the party claiming to have been retained as a mortgage broker has had a previous business relationship with the borrower is not, standing alone, sufficient proof of employment. For example, in a commercial real estate case, n4 a lawyer who had represented a real estate developer for more than twenty years claimed mortgage brokerage commissions in connection with the financing of a shopping center built by his client. The proof at trial showed that the plaintiff-attorney, while seeking financing for a shopping center of his own, had shown the proposed site of his client's project to an officer of a bank that ultimately financed the client's project. Beyond this, there was no proof of further contact between the plaintiff and the bank in regard to the client's mortgage, and it was shown that the plaintiff took no part in the mortgage negotiations, the preparation of documents for the transaction or any other aspect of the financing of his client's project. Rather, the proof showed that the client had dealt directly with the bank and never made any mention of plaintiff as broker or that any commission had ever been paid to him.

On these facts, the Appellate Division reversed a judgment awarding the plaintiff-attorney the value of services rendered as a mortgage broker and dismissed the complaint, stating:

[W]e hold that plaintiff failed to meet the burden of proof that he was retained by the [defendant] to act in the capacity of mortgage broker. During their long professional relationship, plaintiff performed services and received compensation solely as [defendant's] attorney. Neither before nor after the instant mortgage application was any claim asserted by plaintiff against the [defendant] in any other capacity. There is no competent evidence that plaintiff was especially retained by the [defendant] as a mortgage broker. In fact he had never been so employed by anyone. In our opinion, it is highly unlikely that the parties intended plaintiff's proffered services to be other than incidental to their long-time and ongoing attorney-client relationship. n5

One who volunteers his or her services as a mortgage broker but who obtains no authorization to act in that capacity is not entitled to compensation for his or her efforts. n6 This is so, even when there has been a prior brokerage agreement between the parties but the agreement has terminated. n7 In Arizona, n8 a commercial mortgage broker had been retained to arrange for a "refinancing loan" for a hospital. The mortgage broker obtained a proposed loan offer from an institutional lender which the hospital declined to accept. Later, the broker saw a newspaper report announcing a large expansion program at the hospital and offered his brokerage services to the hospital administrator, who declined his offer. Despite this, the broker contacted the lender from whom he had obtained the earlier "refinancing" offer. When the hospital, through direct dealing, ultimately financed its building program with the same lender, the broker sued for a two percent commission, claiming breach of brokerage agreement. Rejecting the claim, the court found that the original agency relationship had been terminated by the refusal of the earlier "refinancing" proposal and that the broker had never been employed by the hospital to seek financing of the hospital expansion. The court found the broker's efforts in contacting the lender after his services were refused to be the acts of a volunteer and, therefore, not compensable. n9

[2] Effect of Licensing Laws

As stated in § 11.02 above, mortgage brokers must be licensed in order to be compensated as such. n10 Some states even make it a criminal offense for anyone to compensate an unlicensed broker for performing acts for which a license is required. n11 A claim of illegality is a defense to the unlicensed mortgage broker's suit for a commission. Despite the existence of statutes prohibiting an unlicensed broker from charging a commission, n12 some courts have deemed the defense an affirmative one which, if not properly pleaded by the defendant, is waived. n13 Thus, the practitioner should be aware that in some jurisdictions the public policy behind the statutes barring recovery of commissions by unlicensed mortgage brokers may not be deemed weighty enough to protect a borrower who fails to assert a timely defense of illegality in a broker's suit for commissions.

In Waller v. State n14 the court determined that a rule of the Florida Department of Banking and Finance disallowed compensation to Mr. Waller, who was both a licensed attorney and mortgage broker. Waller did closings for a bank, and in that capacity sometimes issued mortgage title insurance. He would also, while acting as a mortgage broker, sell some of the mortgages to a second bank. In these transactions, Mr. Waller expected to be paid a reasonable attorney's fee, a mortgage broker fee and a premium for issuing the title insurance policy. The relevant administrative rule stated that "[a] licensee or registrant may not receive or accept any monetary consideration or inducement in connection with the issuance of a title insurance policy in a transaction in which he was involved." n15

The Agency stated that Waller could not collect both the mortgage brokerage fee and the title insurance premium on the same transaction, but that he could be compensated for selling the title insurance in cases where he was not acting as a mortgage broker. However, Mr. Waller claimed that he was exempt under Fla. Stat. § 494.03(1)(c), n16 which says that "[a]ny person licensed to practice law in this state, not actively and principally engaged in the business of negotiating loans secured by real property, when such person renders services in the course of her or his practice as an attorney at law," is exempt from the mortgage broker law. Because he was "actively and principally engaged in the business of negotiating loans secured by real property," that is, acting as a mortgage broker, he was not rendering services primarily as an attorney, and was not entitled to the statutory exemption.

[3] Statute of Frauds

Absent a special statute requiring real estate brokerage commission agreements to be in writing, such contracts would not fall within the traditional statute of frauds. n17 This policy has also developed in the case of mortgage brokerage commission agreements. Most states now have statutes requiring that an agreement to pay a commission for or upon the sale of an interest in real estate be in writing. n18 Similarly, many states have codified the requirement that there be a written agreement between the parties in order for a mortgage broker to be compensated by a borrower. n19

The Michigan courts, for example, interpret their real estate brokerage commission statute of frauds to encompass mortgage brokerage commission agreements on the theory that "[a]n agreement to obtain a mortgage upon real estate is an agreement concerning an interest in real estate." n20 Furthermore, under Michigan law, a mortgage broker who renders services pursuant to an oral brokerage agreement will also be barred from recovering compensation in quantum meruit for the value of the services rendered pursuant to the unenforceable agreement. n21 On the other hand, in the states that do not require real estate brokerage agreements to be in writing, n22 oral mortgage brokerage agreements have been found to be enforceable, barring contrary legislation or regulations. n23

Another aspect of the statute of frauds, of which the commercial mortgage broker in particular must be aware, is the typical provision that requires any agreement that cannot be performed within one year to be in writing. n24 Accordingly, when a mortgage brokerage agreement contemplates that the mortgage broker will help secure financing for several phases of development over a period of more than one year, the agreement should be in writing. n25

[4] When Commission Is Earned

For many years the general rule was that, unless the parties agreed otherwise, the mortgage broker was deemed to have fully performed its obligation to its principal and was entitled to its commission when it produced a lender who was ready, willing and able to make the loan on the borrower's terms. n26 This rule, derived by analogy from the majority view that a real estate broker earns a commission upon production of a ready, willing and able purchaser of its principal's real estate, n27 is, like all "general rules," subject to qualification. Ultimately, it is the brokerage agreement itself which will determine what the mortgage broker must do to earn its commission.

While the emerging trend is toward a policy of compensating the real estate broker only if the transaction is consummated, unless the client has willfully breached the agreement, n28 in mortgage brokerage the reviews are mixed. Some states do require that the transaction close before the mortgage broker can collect a fee. n29 Of course, the question of when the mortgage broker becomes entitled to a fee generally arises only when the borrower's mortgage loan is not consummated. In these circumstances, the borrower often resists paying the commission, arguing that the loan commitment offered does not meet the terms of the brokerage agreement; or, when it does meet the terms of the agreement, or the borrower agrees to the lender's counter-offer, the borrower argues that the broker was hired to provide a consummated loan, not merely a loan commitment.

A borrower is entitled to reject a proposed loan commitment which differs from the terms contemplated by the brokerage agreement without incurring liability for the mortgage broker's commission. n30 Thus, where the lender sought to add a term to the loan commitment which required the borrower to complete a street which was not necessary for access to a proposed development, the Supreme Court of Texas n31 found that the broker had not procured a lender ready, willing and able to lend on the borrower's terms, but rather, one who had made a counter-proposal that the borrower was entitled to refuse. This is also the result where the mortgage broker fails to inform the borrower of numerous modifications and conditions required by the lender and represents to the borrower that the brokerage fee has been earned. Here, the broker has not produced a ready, willing and able lender and cannot collect a commission. n32

Where the loan commitment procured by the broker does meet the terms initially proposed by the borrower, it is usually no defense to a suit for brokerage commissions that the borrower refused to accept the loan commitment. Absent a contractual provision giving the borrower the right to back out of the deal, the courts agree that the mortgage broker has earned his commission even though the loan is not consummated. n33 The courts will not find an implied condition in the brokerage agreement which would allow the borrower to defeat the broker's right to compensation by an arbitrary refusal to proceed with the loan. In brief, as stated by the Supreme Court of Nebraska, "[a] broker does not, in the absence of a contractual provision providing otherwise, lose his right to an earned commission because the loan is not consummated on account of the unjustified failure or refusal of the principal to complete the transaction." n34 Moreover, once the borrower accepts a loan commitment procured by the broker which meets the original terms, the borrower cannot, absent a contractual provision which justifies such an argument, n35 refuse to complete the transaction and then claim that acceptance of the commitment was conditional n36 or that payment of the commission was

If the mortgage broker procures a mortgage loan commitment which deviates from the terms contemplated by the brokerage agreement, the borrower is free to refuse the counter-offer. n38 On the other hand, the borrower is equally free to agree to the lender's counter-proposal, and if the borrower does so agree, he or she may be deemed to have accepted or ratified the performance tendered by the mortgage broker. In this instance, the mortgage broker will have earned a commission despite the fact that the loan is never consummated. n39 And, where the loan is consummated, the same result could be reached on a theory of waiver, i.e., by accepting the benefit of the broker's performance, the borrower has waived any defects in that performance and cannot refuse to pay the brokerage commission on that basis. n40

The general rule with respect to when the mortgage broker earns his or her commission contemplates that the parties to the brokerage contract are entitled to decide by mutual agreement that the mortgage broker's obligation extends beyond merely procuring a loan commitment acceptable to the borrower. n41 Consequently, litigation arises over whether the contract between the broker and borrower calls for the broker to procure a loan commitment or to procure a loan.

When the brokerage agreement does not contain express language making the borrower's obligation to pay a commission conditional upon consummation of the loan, the courts will usually find that the broker's only obligation is to procure a loan commitment. n42 However, when the brokerage agreement is deemed ambiguous as to whether brokerage commissions are contingent upon closing the loan, courts will admit extrinsic evidence to establish the true intent of the parties. n43 For example, where the brokerage agreement provided: "This is your authority to arrange for me ... a mortgage loan ... upon the facility I operate Upon delivery to me and acceptance by me of this commitment, I agree to pay you a fee," a court concluded that the contract was ambiguous and that " 'this commitment' could reasonably refer to 'an arranged loan'." n44 Therefore, where the broker procured a loan commitment which was later withdrawn by the lender through no fault of the borrower, it was proper to admit extrinsic evidence which showed that the parties intended that the broker's commission be contingent upon securing an unequivocal commitment to make a loan. n45

Typically, questions of the exact nature of the broker's obligation under the agreement arise in the context of financing commercial real estate projects, where lenders often impose conditions precedent to actual consummation of the loan. A common condition is that the borrower secure certain leases with commercial tenants. n46 In this context, the question arises whether the broker is owed his fee if the borrower accepts the conditional commitment but is unable to fulfill the conditions despite good faith efforts to do so. Some courts take the view that, in the absence of express language in the brokerage agreement making payment to the broker contingent upon successful consummation of the loan, "the conditions imposed on the loan commitment have no bearing on the [borrower's] duty to pay the broker's fee." n47 On the other hand, a court may find that the brokerage agreement is ambiguous and admit extrinsic evidence which establishes that the parties intended the broker to earn its fee only when the loan, not merely the commitment, was obtained. For example, in Don J. McMurray Co. v. Wiesman, n48 a mortgage broker sued for its commission after the loan commitment expired without the borrower having secured a lease by a designated major corporation of one of the properties involved in the development, a precondition imposed by the lender. The court found that the brokerage agreement was ambiguous as to whether the broker's fee was earned upon securing the loan commitment or upon closing the loan, because the agreement stated, "you [the borrower] would be given full credit for [the good faith fee] at the time of the final loan closing at the 2% fee which is our charge for handling the loan." n49

By employing the words, "handling the loan" instead of "securing the commitment," the meaning of the contract was put in doubt. "It is apparent ... that no 'loan' is made unless the transaction is consummated." n50 Looking to the extrinsic evidence admitted below, and noting that the language of an ambiguous contract is generally to be construed against the party who prepared it, the court found that the trial court was justified in interpreting the brokerage agreement to require actual closing of the transaction as a condition of the mortgage broker's right to a fee. n51 Here, where the delay was caused only by the good faith efforts of the borrower to negotiate the terms of the lease with the corporation designated by the lender, there could be no claim that the borrower acting in bad faith had prevented the occurrence of the condition precedent to the broker's performance of the agreement. n52

The borrower owes a duty to the mortgage broker not to prevent the broker's performance of the terms of the brokerage contract or the occurrence of any preconditions to the broker's right to compensation. This is merely an application of settled principles of contract law to the brokerage contract. n53 For example, the borrower may not usually avoid the obligation to compensate the broker by wrongfully revoking the broker's authority, n54 by failing to file a timely loan application, n55 by encumbering the property so as to preclude performance by the broker, n56 or by engaging in secret direct dealings with the lender procured by the broker and consummating the transaction upon different terms and without the participation of the broker. n57 This same principle applies where the parties agree that the broker's right to compensation is dependent upon actual consummation of the loan. Absent a contract provision containing language to the effect that the borrower will not have to pay a commission if the loan is not consummated for any reason whatsoever, courts generally agree that the borrower may not escape liability by an arbitrary or willful default. n58 It is worth noting, however, that there is at least one mortgage brokerage case n59 holding that where payment of the commission was expressly contingent upon "the actual loan consummation," the borrower was not liable for the commission even though he had prevented consummation of the loan by arbitrarily refusing to provide the proposed lender with information necessary to make the loan commitment firm. n60

Aside from making the broker's commission contingent upon consummation of the loan, another condition to the broker's entitlement to his fee may arise by operation of law in those situations in which the broker is hired to procure a "loan package," the whole of which is necessary to go forward with the project. Such a brokerage contract will be treated as entire and indivisible, and if the broker is unable to procure all segments of the loan contemplated by the parties, it has not earned a fee. Thus, in a Florida case, n61 the borrower employed the broker to obtain both a condominium conversion loan to be used to acquire the property and a permanent end loan with which to develop the property. When the broker could only obtain permanent financing, but not the loan needed to buy the property, the borrower cancelled the agreement and requested the return of its good faith deposit. The broker sued for its commission and lost. On appeal, the court found that the contract was indivisible and that to earn its fee the broker had to procure commitments for both the conversion loan and permanent financing. n62

[a] Procuring Cause

One aspect of any action brought by a mortgage broker seeking compensation from the borrower who employed her that cannot be overlooked is the requirement that, to earn a commission, the mortgage broker must show that she was the procuring cause of the loan commitment or, where required by the agreement, the consummated loan. In brief, the broker must show that it was through the broker's efforts that the transaction contemplated by the brokerage agreement took place. n63 The fact that the borrower obtained the loan which he or she sought does not, absent an agreement to the contrary, entitle the broker to a fee if the broker had nothing to do with inducing the lender to make the loan. n64 Thus, where the broker's efforts to obtain financing have failed, and the borrower employs a second broker who is successful in obtaining the loan, the first broker has not successfully performed its obligations under the brokerage agreement. n65

In Vandever v. Goetee, n66 a Texas court, interpreting loan brokerage contracts that gave the broker the exclusive right to submit loan applications n67 to lending institutions or investors during a specified time, concluded that the mortgage broker must prove it was the procuring cause of a loan commitment that met the borrower's terms in order to recover where the borrower obtained financing through a source other than the broker. This was the result despite dicta in real estate brokerage cases stating that a real estate broker with an exclusive right to sell listing need not be the procuring cause of the sale to be entitled to a commission. n68 Absent proof that he or she was the procuring cause, the mortgage broker has not shown full or substantial performance of the terms of the agreement. n69

[b] Exclusive Mortgage Brokerage Agreements

As stated above in § 11.04[4][a], it is not uncommon for the commercial mortgage broker to seek with the borrower an exclusive brokerage agreement granting the broker exclusive authority to obtain financing. Under such an agreement, the broker who obtains a loan commitment on the borrower's terms earns its commission even if the borrower refuses to deal with the lender procured by the broker and later obtains his or her own financing from another source. n70 Grants of exclusive authority are often limited to a specified time period. n71 Once the agreement terminates by its terms, the broker who has failed to procure the loan contemplated by the agreement cannot recover upon the contract. n72 Like any brokerage agreement, an exclusive contract that does not expire by its own terms may be terminated on notice after the broker has been given a reasonable time to perform but has been unsuccessful. If, after termination of an exclusive contract, the borrower re-engages the broker, the new agreement will not automatically be deemed an exclusive one; its nature will depend upon the manifested intent of the parties. n73

[5] Broker Recovery in Quantum Meruit

As discussed in § 11.04[4] above, the mortgage broker must procure a loan commitment on terms acceptable to the borrower or, where stipulated by the brokerage contract, a consummated loan, in order to earn its agreed-upon commission. However, where the mortgage broker is unable to fully perform its obligation under the agreement because of a wrongful act on the part of the borrower, n74 and is therefore not entitled to recover under the contract for full performance, it will have a cause of action in quantum meruit to recover the reasonable value of its services.

In a Florida case, the United States Bankruptcy Court held that a real estate broker who worked as an independent contractor for, rather than employee of, a Chapter 11 debtor, played no meaningful role in the ultimate success of debtor in pursuing a construction loan, and thus the broker was not entitled to compensation on a quantum meruit basis from the Chapter 11 estate. In this case, the broker entered into a contract with Corkscrew Golf Property Land Trust (Trust), in which the broker agreed to assist the Trust in obtaining necessary financing for the development of a golf course construction project. The broker made efforts to procure financing, none of which were successful in producing a loan. Finally, the Trust successfully negotiated a loan with a Miami lender in which the broker played no part whatsoever. However, the broker argued that his labor benefited the trust, thereby entitling the broker to compensation.

The court found that the agreement was a nonexclusive service contract entitling the broker to payment only if, in fact, he procured a loan. The court held that the broker was not entitled to any commission under the agreement but should be given opportunity to show if any of his work produced a benefit for the trust, particularly to the extent his labor assisted the trust to ultimately obtain the loan from the Miami Bank. However, since the broker was an independent contractor and not an employee of the trust, was one of several who attempted to obtain the financing, and played no meaningful role whatsoever in the ultimate success in obtaining the loan, the court concluded that the broker could not recover on a quantum meruit basis. n75

Recovery in quantum meruit may also be available when the brokerage contract has expired by its own terms or is otherwise validly terminated, and the borrower accepts the benefits of the mortgage broker's services. n76 In those jurisdictions that do not require the mortgage brokerage agreement to be in writing (see § 11.04[3] above) the broker will be able to recover the reasonable value of its services, even though the parties failed to enter into an express contract. n77

The attorney for a mortgage broker suing for compensation must be familiar with local pleading requirements because some jurisdictions, such as Florida, n78 hold that the failure to allege a quantum meruit cause of action in a suit on a brokerage agreement is fatal where the broker is unable to prove full performance under the express agreement. Other states, such as New York, n79 take a more liberal view and allow recovery on a quantum meruit basis in an action based upon an express contract even though no quantum meruit theory of recovery is pleaded. Another question upon which the states differ is the measure of recovery in quantum meruit where there is no enforceable underlying brokerage contract. For example, Florida allows an invalid or otherwise inadmissible express contract into evidence on the question of the value of the broker's services, n80 while New York holds an unenforceable contract irrelevant on the issue of damages in a quantum meruit action. n81 Thus, in New York, the broker must be prepared to present independent evidence as to the value of the services he has rendered. Finally, the mortgage broker seeking the reasonable value of its services must be able to prove that the services actually conferred a benefit on the borrower. n82

[6] Tortious Interference with Mortgage Broker's Contract by Third Parties

Just as wrongful interference by third persons in the employment relationship between a real estate broker and its principal will give rise to a cause of action for tortious interference with contractual relations, so will interference with the contract between the mortgage broker and borrower similarly afford the broker the right to seek tort damages from the interfering third party. n83 Moreover, when the borrower breaches the brokerage agreement as a result of the third party's conduct, the broker will be able to pursue a claim for tortious interference with the contract against the third person concurrently with a claim for breach of contract against the borrower. n84

Tortious interference with the mortgage broker's contract may occur, for example, where the lender seeks to deprive the mortgage broker of its commission by secretly negotiating the deal on different terms without the participation of the procuring broker, n85 or where the lender makes it a condition of the loan that the broker receive a lesser commission than was stipulated in the brokerage contract. n86 Both of these fact patterns satisfy the elements of the tort of interference with contractual relations which, as stated by a Florida court, is established by proof that

(1) the acts were intentional and willful; (2) said acts were calculated to cause damage to the [broker] in his or her business; (3) that the acts were done with the unlawful purpose of causing damage and loss, without right or justifiable cause on the part of the defendant (constituting malice); and (4), that actual damages and loss resulted. n87

It is important to note that "[i]t is not necessary to prove that the [interfering party] acted with ill will, hostility or an intent to injure. It is only necessary to show that [such person] acted intentionally and without just cause." n88 In the context of mortgage brokerage, it has been held that "economic self-interest alone is not a defense to interference with contractual relations... ." n89 Something more than a benefit to the interfering party must be shown before inducement to breach of contract will be deemed justified. n90

Idaho: Salazar v. Tilley, 716 P.2d 1356, 1359-60 (Idaho Ct. App. 1986) . The Idaho Court of Appeals, in deciding a dispute over the terms of an oral agreement concerning a mortgage broker's commission, upheld the agreement after it was breached by the defendant when its terms were unclear as to what constituted full performance. In Salazar, the broker delivered a letter of commitment which was similar to one which the borrower had indicated would be an acceptable promise. When the borrower learned from a third party that the letter would not be acceptable as proof of a commitment by a bank, the borrower stopped payment on the broker's commission check. The court upheld the broker's right to a commission in finding that he had lived up to his obligation to provide valid financial funding despite missing terms in the oral agreement.

Colorado: Fisher v. 1st Consumers Funding, Inc., 160 P. 3d 321, 323-324 (holding that a mortgage broker is not a creditor, so an action based upon an oral agreement to obtain a loan for a consumer could not be dismissed based upon the statute of frauds because the statute protects only creditors and debtors).

Nebraska: In a case of first impression, the Nebraska Court of Appeals held that the statute of frauds is inapplicable to a contract with a mortgage broker. Thus, an oral agreement between a property owner and a mortgage broker to obtain refinancing for a loan does not constitute a contract for the sale of land within the statute of frauds and is enforceable. Where a "loan procured" was not the "loan prescribed," a borrower is not required to accept it, nor may the mortgage broker recover a commission for services in procuring the loan. Where, however, the prospective mortgagor agreed to be bound by the mortgagee's "usual terms and conditions," and the objected to condition (repair/escrow provision) was among its "customary" closing requirements, the mortgagors could not complain that the term of the loan deviated from the loan the mortgage broker was hired to obtain. (n37)Footnote 37. See Freiwald v. Fidelity Interstate Cas. Co., 138 A.2d 146 (Pa. Super. Ct. 1958) . In Freiwald, the court stated:

[A] mortgage broker earns his commission, as a rule, when he secures a commitment for the mortgage even though the transaction is not completed, especially when the failure of completion is due solely to the fault of the proposed mortgagor as in this case. If the seller wants to relieve himself of liability for a commission to a broker, who had brought to him a purchaser acceptable to him, it must be so stipulated categorically in unmistakable terms. If the defendant's breach occasioned the cancellation, the defendant cannot take advantage of its wrong-doing to escape liability. 138 A.2d 146, 148 (citations omitted).

This does not mean, however, that the borrower is free to terminate his broker's agency merely because the broker presents a loan proposal which deviates from the brokerage agreement. Generally speaking, where there is no termination date in the agreement, the broker must be given a reasonable time to perform. See Landow-Luzier Co. v. Grey, 232 N.Y.S.2d 247, 252, 1962 N.Y. Misc. LEXIS 3127 (Sup. Ct. 1962) . And where the broker has expended time and effort pursuant to the agreement the borrower may not revoke the broker's authority with impunity. If he wrongfully revokes, the borrower will be liable to the broker in damages for breach of contract. See Sunshine v. Manos, 496 S.W.2d 195 (Tex. Civ. App. 1973) for an extensive discussion of the borrower's right to revoke a broker's authority and the measure of damages upon breach of the brokerage contract where the broker has not fully performed.

New Jersey: Abeles v. Adams Eng'g Co., 35 N.J. 411, 173 A.2d 246 (N.J. 1961) (acceptance of a lender-imposed condition that the loan be secured by a five-year term $500,000 life insurance policy on an officer of the corporate borrower).

Texas: Stuckey v. Union Mortgage & Inv. Co., 383 S.W.2d 429, 433-434 (Tex. Civ. App. 1964) (where borrower took delivery of a loan commitment which deviated from terms contemplated by an oral brokerage contract, told broker he had submitted it to a bank, waited two weeks to inform broker he would not accept the commitment, and successfully procured on his own a loan on similar terms from another lender in the interim, evidence supported a jury verdict that borrower accepted and ratified broker's performance).

The extent to which acceptance by the borrower of a loan commitment, which deviates from the brokerage agreement, obligates the borrower to pay the brokerage commission is graphically illustrated by a Florida case in which, after the borrower agreed to the lender's counter-proposal, the lender insisted on changing the terms of the loan on the eve of closing to provide for additional security for the loan in the form of a $300,000 letter of credit. The borrower refused to close and obtained financing elsewhere without a brokerage fee. The broker sued for his commission and won. The court held that the brokerage agreement appointing the plaintiff-broker exclusive agent to procure "a conversion/construction loan commitment" was "a binding contract, entitling the plaintiff broker to a commission as of the execution of the loan commitment, regardless of the conduct of the lender subsequent to executing the agreement." S & D Enters. Inc., v. Sonnenblick-Goldman Southeast Corp., 310 So. 2d 343, 344 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1975). The court went on to say that "if the lender has violated its commitment, then [the borrower] has recourse against the lender, by specific performance or damage or both," including the brokerage fee the borrower was obligated to pay on the broken contract. Id. at 344-45. But see Ieracitano v. Shaw, 815 So. 2d 787, 788 (Fla. Ct. App. 2002) (absence of express provision indicating that the broker will earn his commission upon the execution of a loan commitment is open to the interpretation that the broker will earn his fee upon the closing of the loan). See also N.J.A.C. 3:1-16.2, -16.10 (residential mortgage broker can only collect discount points at closing).

(n40)Footnote 40. See First Capitol Mortgage Corp. v. Talandis Constr. Corp., 365 N.E.2d 66 (Ill. App. Ct. 1977), where waiver and ratification theories were rejected because they were raised for the first time on appeal. In Talandis, the dissenting justice would have awarded the broker his commission on a waiver theory where, after expiration of a sixty-day exclusive brokerage agreement, the borrower accepted a mortgage loan which varied from the terms of the original agreement. Id. at 71-72 (Jiganti, J., dissenting).

(n41)Footnote 41. In fact, according to a Texas court, the parties are free, if they so choose, to reduce the broker's obligation to less than that required by the generally accepted rule. Thus, in MacArthur Park Corp. v. Sunshine, 589 S.W.2d 538 (Tex. Civ. App. 1979), the court interpreted a brokerage agreement which provided that the "sole obligation" of the broker was to "seek to find a lender ready, willing and able to consider making a loan commitment to [the borrower]" to mean that procurement of a written loan commitment was not a condition precedent to the payment of the brokerage fee. Id. at 541 (emphasis in original). The MacArthur court went on to say, however, that "[a]ssuming arguendo that a written loan commitment is a condition precedent to payment, then [the borrower's] failure to promptly file a formal application excused the alleged nonperformance by [the broker]." Id. This is, of course, a classic application of the "prevention" doctrine of contract law, which prohibits a party to a contract from using his own frustration of the other party's performance as a defense. See generally Restatement (Second) of Agency § 445, cmt. d (1957).

(n42)Footnote 42. In Wilson v. John Frantz Co., 723 S.W.2d 189 (Tex. Ct. App. 1986), the court held that the language in an agreement which required that "loan approval" be "delivered" by the mortgage loan broker in "21 working days" on terms acceptable to the real estate developer should have been left to the jury to interpret in the light of the evidence presented. Frantz sought a loan to finance the construction of an industrial warehouse in Houston, and Wilson agreed to assist Frantz in procuring such a loan. Frantz signed an application for a loan, and the controversial language was inserted in a commission agreement executed at the same time. The dispute arose when Frantz denied that a condition of the loan commitment was that he contribute his own equity to the project. He also disagreed about the form of delivery used. The court reasoned that since the parties did not dispute the existence of a contract, the only disagreement resulted from whether Wilson's performance satisfied the terms of the contract. The court stated that whether a party has performed is a question of fact for the jury. Accordingly, since there was some evidence to support the jury's answer to the special issue before them, the trial court should have rendered judgment on behalf of the mortgage broker. Id. at 194.

App. 1975) (where conditions in a commitment were inserted at borrower's request, the court held that the broker earned his commission despite cancellation of the loan commitment, because the brokerage agreement was not expressly contingent upon the consummation of the loan).

Note, however, that in California, which defines a ready, willing and able lender as one who makes an unconditional commitment to lend the money, a condition in the loan commitment will operate as a condition precedent to the broker's entitlement to a fee because the lender is not ready, willing and able until the condition precedent occurs.

App. 1967) (where the lender conditioned the loan commitment on the borrower obtaining a non-cancelable lease with a specified third party at a specified rent, the court held that the borrower, who failed to obtain leases which were preconditions to loan commitment despite good faith and diligent effort, was not liable to pay the broker's commission).

Kagan*, 343 So. 2d 1353, 1355-56 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1977) . The Florida court's reading of the brokerage agreement to, in effect, allow the borrower to walk away from the deal without liability may find some support in a New York Court of Appeals decision involving real estate brokerage commissions. In Graff v. Billet, 477 N.E.2d 212 (1985) , the New York Court of Appeals held that when the brokerage agreement expressly provides that the commission is due when "title passes," the seller's arbitrary refusal to enter into a contract of sale with a prospective purchaser produced by the broker is not a willful default which makes the seller liable for the broker's commission. Id. at 213 . Only if the seller enters into a contract of sale with the purchaser and then refuses to complete the transaction will he be liable to the broker. On parallel reasoning, it could also be argued that when the mortgage broker's fee is contingent upon actual consummation of the loan, unless the broker protects himself by inserting an express provision that an arbitrary refusal to go forward with the proposed loan that meets the borrower's terms is a default which entitles the broker to his commission, the borrower is under no duty to accept a proposed loan procured by the broker. Absent such a provision, only if the borrower accepts the loan commitment and then refuses to go forward would he be liable, despite the fact that the fee is contingent upon closing the loan.

PART IV Specialized Fields of Brokerage

CHAPTER 11 Mortgage Brokers *

10A-11 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 11.05

§ 11.05 Mortgage Broker's Duties

[1] Generally

With established supervision of mortgage brokers has come codification of the mortgage brokers' duties. In some states, statutes stipulate that the mortgage broker functions specifically as an agent of one of the parties to the transaction, therefore owing to that party certain fiduciary duties. n1 In most of these jurisdictions, the common-law fiduciary duties of mortgage brokers have been embedded in the statutes. Among the common-law duties are the duties of loyalty, good faith, fair dealing, full disclosure of all material facts and avoidance of self-dealing in the subject matter of the agency relationship. n2 In those states where mortgage brokers must be licensed as real estate brokers, the mortgage broker's common-law duties are supplemented by the real estate broker licensing laws. n3 Additionally, one must be aware that in some situations, the mortgage broker may be deemed to be in a quasi-fiduciary relationship with the persons whom it solicits to lend monies to its customers, that is, private investors and wholesale mortgage lenders. n4 Florida has codified duties owed by the mortgage broker to both the borrower and the lender. n5

The question of whether a mortgage broker has a fiduciary duty to a borrower arose in a class action lawsuit brought in United States District Court in Virginia. n6 In an article explaining the settlement reached in that case, the attorneys representing one of the mortgage brokers wrote:

In Virginia, unlike many other states, there is no statute providing that a broker has a fiduciary duty to a borrower. No decision of Virginia's highest court has imposed such a duty by common law. If such a duty exists, how is it discharged? Does a broker have a duty to get the lowest cost loan? How many lenders does a broker have to contact? If a broker does not have a relationship with the lowest cost lender, must the broker refer a borrower to another broker with the lender relationship? Is a mortgage broker a "middleman"--one who brings together borrowers and lenders, but not a fiduciary owing a duty to any one side of the transaction? n7

These questions remain at the crux of many of the concerns held by consumers and their lawyers. At the present, the key to resolving issues of fiduciary duty appears to be in disclosure of fees paid to mortgage brokers. n8

[2] Duties to Borrower

[a] Common-Law Duties

The borrower who hires a broker to obtain financing for a commercial project must often rely on the common-law duties imposed on an agent for protection against improper broker conduct. The broker who fails to disclose material facts to the borrower has breached its common-law fiduciary duty and thereby forfeits its commission and becomes liable for damages, both actual and punitive. n9 A Georgia mortgage broker who failed to disclose that he knew nothing of the proposed lender's financial status or whether the lender had ever actually closed a loan for anyone breached his fiduciary duty to the borrower. n10 So too did a Washington broker who obtained the borrower's signature on a mortgage by trick and misrepresented and concealed the nature and extent of his fees. n11

Another of the mortgage broker's common-law duties that should not be overlooked is the duty to use diligence and due care in carrying out the obligations of the brokerage agreement. n12 A broker who negligently fails to place a client's mortgage loan and then affirmatively acts to secure an expensive interim loan, which would have been totally unnecessary had the broker acted diligently, is liable to the borrower in negligence. n13 Moreover, if the broker, by charging the borrower for a service (such as conducting a well pump test to determine whether the property to be purchased has an adequate domestic water supply) takes on an implied contractual obligation to ensure that the service is performed, the negligent failure to perform the contractual obligation may render the broker liable for damages. n14

When the mortgage broker has fully performed its obligation under a brokerage agreement that requires only the procurement of a loan commitment on terms acceptable to the borrower, the broker's agency relationship with the borrower is usually terminated. n15 Once the borrower accepts the commitment the broker, at most, owes his principal "a duty to assist it, when requested in meeting its contract obligation, and ... a duty not to prevent or hinder, by affirmative act, the execution of the [loan] contract." n16 However, if at the request of the borrower, the broker undertakes, with or without compensation, further negotiations with the lender, a special agency may be created giving rise to the same fiduciary duties to which a paid agent is subject. n17

A striking example of this principle is found in Armstrong v. Republic Realty Mortgage Corp., n18 in which the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, applying Missouri law, sustained a jury verdict of compensatory and punitive damages against a mortgage broker. In Armstrong, the broker had successfully obtained, and the borrower had accepted, a permanent loan commitment for the borrower's commercial real estate development. The loan was to be closed in three stages: a floor loan of $900,000 and two further stages as tenant leases reached specified annual dollar totals. The first stage of the loan was successfully closed, but because of construction problems the borrower sought, through the broker, an extension of time for the succeeding stages. The broker who, for a fee, was also going to service the permanent end loan for the institutional lender and who had insisted that all contacts with the lender take place through him, agreed to seek the extension, which was granted. Thereafter, the borrower continued its leasing efforts to qualify for full funding of the loan. However, the lender decided it would fund only the second stage of the loan, forcing the borrower to prepay the floor loan and be released from the lender's first mortgage so it could seek other first mortgage long-term financing. The borrower, faced with a very restrictive prepayment penalty clause in the first mortgage loan it would have to prepay, turned again to the broker. The broker agreed to contact the lender to request that either the loan be fully funded or, if the lender refused, that the lender permit prepayment of the existing mortgage without penalty. However, when the lender agreed to allow prepayment with a one percent penalty fee, the broker urged the lender to charge a prepayment penalty of four percent. The broker and lender then agreed to split whatever monies were obtained from the borrower. The broker then informed the borrower that the lender would require a prepayment penalty of four percent. The borrower, through direct negotiations with the lender, finally paid a two percent penalty, half of which was secretly paid by the lender to the broker. Subsequently, the borrower sued the broker for breach of fiduciary duty and won both compensatory and punitive damages ($125,000) at trial.

In sustaining the jury verdict, the Eighth Circuit found that the evidence was sufficient to support the finding that the broker had become the special agent of the borrower concerning the loan prepayment negotiations and was, therefore, subject to all the fiduciary duties of loyalty and good faith that an agent, even a gratuitous one, owes his principal. n19

The court also noted that the broker, who stood to lose the loan servicing fee it would receive from the lender if the borrower prepaid, had an interest potentially adverse to the borrower, which ripened into an actual adverse interest when the borrower requested the broker to negotiate for prepayment. n20 Despite this conflict of interest, the court stated:

[The broker] ... agreed to do as [the borrower] requested, remaining silent about its own adverse interest in the subject of the agency. ... [The broker], when it accepted the special agency, had a strong motive to want [the lender] either to refuse prepayment, or to permit it only if conditioned on a high prepayment penalty. Under the circumstances, [the broker] should not have accepted the special agency at all but, having done so, its subsequent conduct must be measured against the fiduciary duty to [the borrower] implicit in the special agency [the broker] knowingly assumed.

Because of [the broker's] conflict of interest, and because of its secret competition with and disloyalty towards its principal, its claim of non-liability because of a mere "middleman" status cannot stand, nor will the evidence permit its claim of a lawful dual agent status. n21

[b] Common-Law Duties Supplemented by Statute

Perhaps the most extensive judicial discussion of the mortgage broker's fiduciary duties to the borrower is found in Wyatt v. Union Mortgage Co. n22 There, the Supreme Court of California applied the common law of agency and the state's real estate/mortgage broker licensing legislation to broadly define the broker's fiduciary obligations.

In Wyatt, the borrower responded to the broker's television advertising campaign promoting inexpensive second mortgage financing. When the borrower asked about the rate of interest, late payments and the size of balloon payments due at the end of the loan period, the broker responded with materially misleading and incomplete information which grossly understated the financial obligations the borrower would bear under the loan. Thereafter, the borrower was unable to pay as agreed and had to borrow additional sums through the broker to satisfy the substantial late charges and balloon payments required. Faced with foreclosure of his home, the borrower sued the broker for damages, alleging that the broker's advertising, misrepresentations about the terms of the loan, failure to tell the borrower about the very unfavorable provisions buried in the loan papers and exaction of unjustified late charges on the loans, breached the fiduciary duty owed by the broker to its clients. The broker answered, claiming that it had fully met its duty of disclosure when it gave the borrower written loan documents containing the information required by the California statutes n23 governing real property loans.

In sustaining a jury verdict awarding damages to the plaintiff-borrower, the court noted that:

A mortgage loan broker is customarily retained by a borrower to act as the borrower's agent in negotiating an acceptable loan. All persons engaged in this business in California are required to obtain real estate licenses. Thus, general principles of agency combine with statutory duties created by the Real Estate Law to impose upon mortgage loan brokers an obligation to make a full and accurate disclosure of the terms of a loan to borrowers and to act always in the utmost good faith toward their principals. "The law imposes on a real estate agent 'the same obligation of undivided service and loyalty that it imposes on a trustee in favor of his beneficiary.' This relationship not only imposes upon him the duty of acting in the highest good faith toward his principal but precludes the agent from obtaining any advantage over the principal in any transaction had by virtue of his agency." A real estate licensee is "charged with the duty of fullest disclosure of all material facts concerning the transaction that might affect the principal's decision." n24

By giving materially misleading and incomplete information to the borrower in response to his questions about the terms and conditions of the loan, the broker did not satisfy its fiduciary obligation of disclosure and good faith toward its principal, even though the loan documents themselves accurately disclosed all the terms. n25 As the court noted, "the existence of a confidential relationship may justify reliance upon oral misrepresentation of the terms of a contract." n26

The Wyatt court found an additional reason for holding that the broker had breached its fiduciary duty to the borrower by analogy to insurance law cases which "recognized that a fiduciary's duty may extend beyond written disclosure of the terms of a transaction to duties of oral disclosure and counseling." n27 The court noted that

The reasoning of these [insurance law] cases applies to transactions with mortgage loan brokers as well. Here, the record discloses that respondents were persons of modest means and limited experience in financial affairs, whose equity in their home was their principal asset. They retained a mortgage loan broker to negotiate for them highly complex loan terms and they may be assumed to have justifiably relied on the latter's expertise. Against such a backdrop, the broker's failure to disclose orally the true rate of interest, the penalty for late payments or the swollen size of the balloon payment clearly constituted breach of the broker's fiduciary obligations. It is noteworthy also that the provisions regarding interest rate, late charges and balloon payment were highly unfavorable to the borrower and yet the broker made no attempt to draw his clients' attention to these matters. n28

As Wyatt indicates, California is a leader in holding the mortgage broker accountable to the mortgage loan consumer. Other California cases have found that both the fiduciary duties of the broker created by general principals of agency and statutory duties peculiar to mortgage brokers extend at least to the time of the funding of the loan, n29 and that mortgage brokers must disclose to a borrower who indicates the need for a loan within the monetary limits below which the compensation of the broker is statutorily limited, that if the borrower accepts the broker's suggestion that he seek a loan exceeding these statutory limits, the statutory ceiling on brokerage commissions will no longer obtain. n30

[c] Role of Consumer Protection Legislation

Another way to hold the mortgage broker accountable to the borrowing public, even in jurisdictions which already regulate mortgage brokers through special licensing or by requiring that they hold a real estate broker's license, is the use of state consumer protection legislation as a vehicle for public or private redress. Thus, the Michigan courts sanctioned both public n31 and private n32 law suits against mortgage brokers under the Michigan Consumer Protection Act, holding that although mortgage brokers were at that time regulated by the real estate licensing laws, they were not exempt from claims under the consumer protection statutes. n33 The Supreme Court of South Dakota upheld a judgment which ordered a mortgage broker to refund advance fees obtained from mortgage loan consumers, imposed a stiff civil penalty payable to the state for engaging in deceptive trade practices and enjoined the broker from doing business within the state unless it was in full compliance with the state's Deceptive Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Law. n34 In that case, the broker had failed to comply with a statute requiring that consumer contracts contain cancellation provisions in bold face type and had misrepresented, among other things, the availability of long-term financing when it knew that the only type of financing it could secure was short-term, which would have been totally unacceptable to the small agricultural borrowers it solicited.

An Arizona court n35 determined that the state could sue under both the Arizona Consumer Fraud Act and Mortgage Brokers Act where a state-licensed mortgage broker was alleged to have engaged in fraudulent business practices. The broker had unilaterally increased the discount rate (a "discount point" system whereby cash payments, normally made by the sellers in Arizona real estate transactions, are required by lenders as a condition to making an FHA or VA guaranteed loan) despite having offered a commitment that specified the discount rate to be charged and stated that the loan was subject to "renegotiation" in the event of an interest rate change. The Arizona Attorney General claimed that the use of the term "renegotiation" in the loan commitment was misleading and deceptive because of the broker's conduct in raising the discount rate on a "take it or leave it" basis and that the broker concealed material information by failing to inform sellers that discount rates frequently were subject to change. The court observed that the Mortgage Brokers Act did not provide direct relief to consumers and concluded that "[b]ecause the Mortgage Brokers Act is not comprehensive and detailed legislation designed to provide omnibus consumer protection, the action against [the broker] based on the Consumer Fraud Act is not preempted by the Mortgage Brokers Act." n36

Prior to the enactment of the Alabama Mortgage Brokers Licensing Act, Ala. Code §§ 5-25-1 through -18, the state's Consumer Finance Act n37 was relied upon to regulate the conduct of mortgage brokers. In Smith v. First Family Financial Services, n38 the mortgage broker/correspondent lender had received a "yield spread premium" from the lender, a fee that was not disclosed to the borrowers. The plaintiffs maintained

(1) that the defendants committed legal fraud and conspired to commit legal fraud against them in regard to undisclosed mortgage broker fees and charges incurred by them in the loan transaction; (2) that [lender's] correspondent lender program was a scheme to avoid the letter and spirit of the 5% cap on mortgage origination fees under Alabama Code 1975, § 5-19-4(g); that [lender] was required to disclose the material facts in that it violates the Alabama Deceptive Trade Practices Act and that, further, [lender] was under a duty to disclose because of the particular circumstances of this case; (3) that [lender's] correspondent lender program was a combination between [lender] and its broker to do the wrongs alleged, which combination constituted a civil conspiracy under Alabama Law; and (4) that the defendants breached their fiduciary duty by seeking a loan for the plaintiffs that contained terms and conditions that would benefit themselves to the detriment of the plaintiffs. n39

Claiming that the "yield spread premium" was in addition to the five percent origination fee that was disclosed, the plaintiffs alleged that the yield spread premium resulted in the mortgage broker receiving more than the five percent origination fee allowed under the Consumer Finance Act, or "Mini-Code." n40 "Indisputedly, [sic] the yield spread premium was a part of the cost of the loan borne by the borrowers." n41 In reaching a decision in favor of the borrowers, the court relied on the then-current version of RESPA:

RESPA admittedly does not apply to the transaction that is the basis of this litigation Nevertheless, RESPA and the regulations promulgated under RESPA are instructive with regard to material disclosures required of mortgage lenders and mortgage brokers or correspondent lenders under similar or identical facts. Regulation X ... expressly requires that loan correspondents and loan brokers disclose their fees to borrowers. Disclosure requirements, referred to by HUD as "mortgage broker disclosures," apply to any transaction in which the loan either is closed in the wholesale lender's name or is originated under a "table funding" arrangement in which the wholesale lender provides the funds for the loan closing. If the loan closes in the broker's name, the disclosure must be made, whether the broker's fees are in the form of a yield spread premium (sometimes referred to as a "market gain") or a servicing release premium or other fee. RESPA Regulation X requires disclosure of all broker's fees, by whatever name, just as the Mini-Code requires disclosure of all finance charges, by whatever name. n42

[3] Duties to Lenders and Others

In the absence of a statute which imposes on the mortgage broker duties of good faith and fair dealing toward persons other than his principal, n43 what duties, if any, does the broker owe to the mortgage lenders with whom he deals and other persons who are affected by the real estate loan transactions he seeks to promote?

The leading cases on the subject of the broker's duties toward the lenders whom he solicits on behalf of his principal are from the Supreme Court of Washington. In two cases n44 decided in the 1960s, that court held in favor of private persons who claimed they had been defrauded into making unsafe mortgage loans by mortgage brokers who falsely represented the safety and security of the loans and the status of title to the property which was to secure the loans. Furthermore, the brokers concealed documents from the lender which would have shown not only that the proposed borrowers were contract vendees rather than owners, but also that the property was already encumbered by mortgages or tax liens. Indeed, in one case, the broker failed to inform the lender, who was to make a $5,500 mortgage loan, that if the borrower defaulted, an expenditure of over $100,000 might be necessary to protect his investment. n45

In these cases the court found that the mortgage broker had a duty to disclose the information [he] possessed and of which [the lender] was ignorant. Here, because of the superior business acumen and experience of [the broker] as compared with [the lender], because of the superior factual knowledge of the one as against the factual ignorance of the other, and because [the broker] knew [the lender] was relying on his superior knowledge, experience and judgment, there existed a quasi-fiduciary relationship, if not an actual one, that brings the case within the rule that "a party to a business transaction is under a duty to exercise reasonable care to disclose to the other before the transaction is consummated ... such matters as the other is entitled to know because of ... a relation of trust and confidence between them." n46

Nor could the broker defend on the ground that, had the lender searched the public record instead of relying on the broker, he would have discovered the true state of facts. " '[W]rongdoers cannot shield themselves from liability by asking the law to condemn the credulity of their victims.' " n47

The idea articulated by the Washington court that the mortgage broker may, under certain circumstances, owe a duty of disclosure to persons other than his principal has also found expression in an Alabama case n48 in which a property owner sued a mortgage broker for damages resulting from the loss of approximately nineteen acres of its land in foreclosure of development loans arranged by the broker for the holder of a ground lease. It turned out that an officer of the corporate mortgage broker had a secret partnership interest in the apartment projects to be constructed on the property, and that the broker and the others misapplied large amounts of the loan proceeds for their own benefit, thereby causing the project to founder and the loan to go into default.

While the Supreme Court of Alabama agreed with the trial court that there was no proof of a fiduciary relationship arising out of any employment relationship between the owner and mortgage broker, it determined that a trial on the merits was required on the owner's claim that the broker owed it a duty to disclose the material fact that an officer of the broker and others had hidden equity interests in the projects and had made secret profits from the construction loan proceeds at the owner's expense. The question, said the court, was whether the broker was under an obligation to disclose under the particular circumstances of the case. n49 The court found that

[t]he facts alleged ... properly state a claim of actionable fraud based upon a duty to disclose or communicate ... where the defendant has special knowledge or means of knowledge not open to the plaintiff and is aware that the plaintiff is acting under a misapprehension as to facts which would be of importance to him and would probably affect his decision. n50

As illustrated by these Washington and Alabama decisions, when confronted by mortgage broker misconduct toward those to whom no traditional fiduciary duties are owed, the courts have moved the law in the direction of providing a remedy for the injured party, whether couched in terms of quasi-fiduciary duties or fraud. The judicial trend in favor of mortgage broker accountability will, in all likelihood, continue. This premise also applies to civil rights suits, but the mortgage broker may not be liable when the origin of the discrimination lies with the lending institution and not with the broker. n51

When the borrower breached the lease by failing to make certain rent payments, the lender sought possession of the realty. In a suit by the lender to quiet title, the borrower sought reformation of the transaction from a sale-leaseback to a conventional mortgage loan, and also sued the broker for breach of fiduciary duty. In affirming the trial court's finding that the broker had committed numerous breaches of the fiduciary duties outlined in Wyatt, the Court of Appeal noted that the trial court had found that the broker had failed to advise its clients that their interest in the property, as lessee, could be terminated upon abbreviated notice; failed to advise its clients that the statutory right of redemption existing in loan agreements does not exist in sale-leaseback transactions; failed to disclose that the anti-deficiency provisions which statutorily exist in traditional loans secured by interests in real property do not exist in sale-leaseback transactions; and failed to advise [the borrower] that the final transaction documents contained provisions which could be interpreted as granting to [the lender] an immediate future interest in the building. [The broker] further affirmatively misrepresented that the sale-leaseback financing gave [the borrower] the same flexibility as a conventional loan, and would accomplish the same result.

CHAPTER 11 Mortgage Brokers *

§ 11.06 State Securities Regulation

Lawyers interested in mortgage brokerage law ought to be aware of the assertion by several state securities commissions that some or all of the activities of the mortgage broker fall within the ambit of state "Blue Sky" laws. n1 While there are as yet few decided cases on the subject, the possibility of criminal prosecution for state securities law violations counsels caution on the part of mortgage brokers and those advising them as to the applicable law.

Some states have addressed the securities question in their mortgage broker licensing laws. n2 Michigan's Mortgage Brokers, Lenders and Servicers Licensing Act, for example, goes into great detail. A licensee can be found guilty of a misdemeanor and fined up to $5,000, or receive a prison term of up to three years, or both, if the licensee:

(c) Transfers or assigns a mortgage loan or a security representing an interest in 1 or more mortgage loans to an individual investor unless 1 or more of the following apply:

(i) The transfer or assignment is made through a broker-dealer which is a member of the New York stock exchange.

(ii) The transfer or assignment is made through a broker-dealer who meets all of the following criteria:

(A) The broker dealer is registered under the uniform securities act, 1964 PA 265, MCL 451.501 to 451.818, or the Uniform Securities Act (2002), 2008 PA 551, MCL 451.2102 to 451.2703.

(B) The broker-dealer is not an affiliate of the mortgage lender unless the person acquired the broker-dealer registration, directly or indirectly, prior to September 1, 1987, under Act. No. 265 of the Public Acts of 1964, was affiliated with a mortgage lender before September 1, 1987, and has continuously maintained that registration subsequent to September 1, 1987. ...

(C) The broker-dealer acquired the mortgage loan or security on a firm commitment.

(iii) The transfer or assignment is made to a person who the transferor or assignor believes, or has reasonable grounds to believe, is 1 of the following:

(A) A business entity having either net income from operations after taxes in excess of $100,000.00 in its last fiscal year or its latest 12-month period, or a net worth in excess of $1,000,000.00 at the time of purchase.

(B) An individual who, after the purchase, has an investment of more than $50,000.00 in mortgage loans or securities representing an interest in 1 or more mortgage loans, including installment payments to be made within 1 year after purchase by the individual, has either personal income before taxes in excess of $100,000.00 for his or her last fiscal year or latest 12-month period and is capable of bearing the economic risk, or net worth in excess of $1,000,000.00, and has the knowledge and experience in financial and business matters that he or she is capable of evaluating the merits and risks of the prospective investment, or has obtained the advice of an attorney, certified public accountant, or investment advisor registered under the investment advisors act of 1940, or an investment advisor registered under the Uniform Securities Act, 1964 PA 254, MCL 451.501 to 451.808, or the Uniform Securities Act (2002), 2008 PA 551, MCL 451.2101 to 451.2703 with respect to the merits and risks of the prospective investment. n3

One attempt to assert jurisdiction over mortgage brokers by a state securities department took place in Oklahoma. n4 In response to complaints from the public about a broker's business activities, the Administrator of the Oklahoma Department of Securities concluded that a mortgage broker who receives advance fees from homeowners for obtaining mortgage loan commitments is "selling unregistered securities in the form of advanced fees charged to prospective borrowers in consideration for the promise to loan money in the future, or to provide lenders of money at a future date." n5 These alleged advance fee loan contracts were asserted to be "evidence of indebtedness" as defined in the state securities act. n6 The Supreme Court of Oklahoma, however, remanded the matter for administrative determination of the issue, so no definitive judicial pronouncement on the subject has yet been made in Oklahoma.

On the other hand, a California appellate case n7 sustained an indictment against a mortgage broker for violations of the state corporate securities law. There, the mortgage broker funded loans to borrowers by issuing to many different individual lenders fractional interests in a promissory note and related mortgage secured by the borrower's real property, and agreed to (1) service the loans; (2) advance funds to investors when borrowers were in arrears; and (3) bid on the property in a foreclosure sale. In holding that the instruments used in the broker's loan transactions constituted non-exempt corporate securities, the unregistered sale of which is a felony offense, the court conceded that the instruments in question did not qualify as securities under the "risk-capital" approach usually used by the California courts. n8 However, the court found it appropriate to look to federal decisions interpreting the term "security" as defined in the Securities Act of 1933 because the California statute was modeled on the federal act. n9 Applying the test articulated by the Supreme Court of the United States in SEC v. W.J. Howey Co., n10 and United Housing Foundation, Inc. v. Forman, n11 the California court found that the transactions in question involved an investment of money in a common enterprise with profits to come solely from the entrepreneurial or managerial skills of others. n12 These transactions, stated the court, fit squarely within the federal test: specifically, that ordinary individual investors--many committing relatively modest sums--relied upon the skill, services and solvency of [the broker] to protect their investments. [The broker] selected the borrowers, provided collection services, agreed to advance funds to investors when borrowers were in arrears and bid on the property in a foreclosure sale. n13

The court went on to say that the "risk capital" test was only applicable to cases of institutional commerce, where sophisticated institutional lenders exercise greater control over the transaction. n14 Moreover, the court discerned a legislative intent that a secured transaction involving a series of promissory notes, as opposed to a single note, be governed under the state securities law. n15 Therefore, the defendant mortgage broker was subject to criminal prosecution for non-compliance with the securities statute. To date, there has been no final word on the subject from the California Supreme Court. In the meantime, California mortgage brokers, and perhaps their colleagues elsewhere, must take care lest they run afoul of the blue sky laws. Where possible, counsel for a mortgage broker seeking to use innovative business methods which might conceivably subject the client to securities regulation should seek a "no-action" letter from the appropriate governmental authority.

CHAPTER 11 Mortgage Brokers *

10A-11 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 11.07

§ 11.07 Mortgage Brokerage Forms

[1] Mortgage Lender/Mortgage Broker Agreement Mortgage Lender/Mortgage Broker Agreement

This Mortgage Lender/Mortgage Broker Agreement (Agreement) is entered into by and between ABC Corporation, a corporation (Lender), and XYZ Company, a Corporation (Broker) this day of(Month), ... (Year).

RECITALS

I. Lender and Broker want to establish a nonexclusive relationship in which Broker will submit loan packages (Loan Packages) to Lender on behalf of Broker's customers (Borrowers) for possible funding.

II. Lender and Broker want to set out the terms of their relationship in this Agreement.

NOW, THEREFORE, Lender and Broker agree as follows:

AGREEMENT

1. Broker Responsibilities: At Broker's expense, Broker will perform the following functions:

1(a) submit to Lender complete Loan Packages under the programs, procedures, and fee schedules established by Lender. A completed Loan Package shall consist of all credit, financial, and other Borrower information required by Lender, and, if Lender requests, information that will help Lender to market the Loans to secondary market investors.

1(b) perform other services required by Lender for closing of Loans.

1(c) provide a written explanation to Lender of why any approved Borrower failed to close a Loan.

All Loan Packages shall become the property of Lender upon funding.

2. Loan Approval: Loan approval shall be at Lender's sole discretion. Broker shall not represent that Lender has approved or will approve any Loan until Broker is so informed by Lender in writing. All loans shall close in Lender's name.

3. Broker's Warranties: Broker represents and warrants the following to Lender:

3(a) The statements and information in the Loan Package are true, accurate, and understandable, and no material facts have been withheld from Lender.

3(b) Except as previously disclosed by Broker to Lender in writing, there is no pending or threatened legal, administrative, or other investigation against Broker or its current or former owners, agents, or employees which could have an adverse effect on Lender.

3(c) No Borrower shall have had in its possession or control any verification document submitted to Lender in the Loan Package.

3(d) Broker possesses all necessary licenses and authority to engage in the mortgage brokerage activities required under this Agreement. If applicable, Broker's license number and its expiration date appear below the relevant signature line of this Agreement.

3(e) Except as otherwise disclosed by Broker to Lender in writing prior to funding of the Loan Package, Broker has no ownership interest in the property which is the security for the Loan Package.

3(f) Broker has complied and will comply with all applicable state and federal laws and regulations that apply to Broker, including but not limited to, the Real Estate Settlement Procedures Act, the Truth in Lending Act, the Equal Credit Opportunity Act, the Fair Credit Reporting Act, the Home Mortgage Disclosure Act, and the Flood Disaster Protection Act, with respect to the Loan Package.

4. Status of Broker: Nothing in this Agreement shall be construed to make the Broker a joint venturer, partner, representative, employee, or agent of Lender. Broker shall not hold itself out as such, nor shall it use the Lender's name in any advertising. Broker is an independent contractor, and Broker shall determine the method, details, and means of performing Broker's services described in this Agreement.

5. Broker's Indemnification: Broker shall indemnify and hold Lender and its employees, officers, directors, shareholders, successors, and assigns harmless from and against all loss, damage, liability, and expenses, including reasonable attorney's fees, resulting from or in connection with (a) a breach of representation or warranty contained in paragraph 3 above; and (b) Broker's failure to perform any of its obligations under this Agreement; provided, however, that this indemnification shall not apply to any of the foregoing caused solely by Lender's failure to perform its duties and obligations under this Agreement, or by Lender's breach of any representation given under this Agreement. This indemnification shall survive the termination of this Agreement.

6. Lender's Responsibilities: At Lender's expense, Lender will perform the following functions:

6(a) subject to Lender's written programs, procedures, and fee schedules established periodically by Lender, pay Broker its fees, including fees owed by Borrower from the proceeds of the Loan Package, contemporaneously with the funding of each Loan Package without deduction or offset for any reason. Lender will deduct its fees and charges from the proceeds of the Loan Package.

6(b) make only reasonable requests for additional information and documentation, which shall be in writing.

6(c) promptly deliver approvals and material terms of Loan Packages to Broker in writing.

6(d) at Lender's expense, return to Broker any original documents submitted by Broker, if Broker's requests their return any time before to funding of a Loan Package.

6(e) if a Loan Package is not approved by Lender, provide reasons for the denial will in writing to Broker, including the name, address, and phone number of the source of the credit information on which Lender relied in making its decision.

7. Lender's Warranties: Lender represents and warrants the following to Broker:

7(a) Lender is duly organized, validly existing, and in good standing under the laws of the state of its incorporation and of the state of and has all required licenses to conduct business.

7(b) Lender is in compliance with all federal and state laws and regulations that are necessary to make loans in accordance with the terms of this Agreement and that apply to Lender, including but not limited to, the Real Estate Settlement Procedures Act, the Truth in Lending Act, the Equal Credit Opportunity Act, the Fair Credit Reporting Act, the Home Mortgage Disclosure Act, and the Flood Disaster Protection Act. If Broker requests, Lender shall deliver evidence of compliance to Broker immediately.

7(c) Lender has full power and authority to execute and deliver this Agreement and to perform Lender's obligations in accordance with this Agreement.

7(d) This Agreement contains no false statements or representations, nor have any material facts been omitted.

7(e) Lender's origination and closing practices are, and will be in all respects, legal, proper, and prudent.

7(f) There is no pending or threatened legal, administrative, or other investigation against Lender or its current or former owners, agents, or employees which could have an adverse effect on Broker, or which could impair the ability of Lender to carry out the terms of this Agreement.

8. Lender's Indemnification: Lender shall indemnify and hold Broker and its employees, officers, directors, shareholders, successors, and assigns harmless from and against all loss, damage, liability, and expenses, including reasonable attorney's fees, resulting from or in connection with (a) the failure of Lender to perform its duties and obligations under this Agreement; and (b) Lender's breach of any representation or warranty contained in paragraph 7 above; provided, however, that this indemnification shall not apply to any of the foregoing caused solely by Broker's failure to perform its duties and obligations under this Agreement, or by Broker's breach of any representation given under this Agreement. This indemnification shall survive the termination of this Agreement.

9. Termination of Agreement. Lender or Broker may terminate this Agreement at any time upon written notice to the other party; provided, however, that the obligations contained in paragraphs 3 through shall survive termination.

10. Governing Law: This Agreement shall be governed by law.

11. Notices: All notices required under this Agreement shall be in writing.

12. Assignment: This notice may not be assigned by either Lender or Broker.

Agreement made (Date), by and between, City of, County of, State of (the Client) and of, County of, State of (the Broker).

Whereas, the Broker is engaged in negotiations for the benefit of the Client, and in consideration of the mutual covenants set forth below, the parties agree as follows:

SECTION ONERIGHT TO NEGOTIATE MORTGAGE LOAN

The Client grants to the Broker the right to negotiate on behalf of the Client the mortgage loan described below (the Mortgage Loan), to be secured by the Client's premises located at

SECTION TWOAMOUNT OF MORTGAGE LOAN

The Mortgage Loan is to be in the amount of ($.....) Dollars and is to bear interest at the rate of percent (.... %) per annum and amortized over a period not to exceed years (but payable in not less than years).

SECTION THREEEARNED PLACEMENT FEE

The Client agrees to accept a loan in the stated amount and with this agreement delivers to the Broker the Client's check in the amount of ($.....) Dollars as evidence of good faith. This will be an earned placement fee to the Broker when a commitment is issued for the Mortgage Loan and will be applied against the Broker's fee as set forth below.

If the Broker is not successful in obtaining a mortgage loan according to these conditions, good faith deposit of (.....) is to be returned to the Client.

If the commitment is issued for an acceptable amount, but less than the requested amount, it is agreed that the Broker's fee will be (..... %) percent of the mortgage loan amount.

If the commitment is issued for the terms contained in Section Two, it is agreed that the Broker's fee will be ($.....) Dollars. The fee shall be deemed earned upon the issuance of a commitment. The balance of the fee shall be payable upon the funding of the Mortgage Loan or upon default of Client. The Client shall be deemed in default when, for any reason whatsoever, the Client does not accept the funding of a whole or a part of the Mortgage Loan or if Client fails to meet any condition of the commitment as accepted by Client.

SECTION FOUR

PERIOD OF AGREEMENT

Broker is granted the exclusive right to negotiate the Mortgage Loan for a period of days from the date of this Agreement.

SECTION FIVE

FINDER'S FEE

By the execution of this Agreement, Client acknowledges that in connection with a loan commitment obtained in accordance with the terms set forth in this agreement, Broker may receive a finder's fee or other form of remuneration from the lender upon the issuance of a commitment loan from the lender as compensation for the servicing of the loan after closing or for any other reason, and Client expressly consents to any such contractual arrangement between the Broker and the lender.

SECTION SIX

RESTRICTIONS

The Client agrees that for a period of years from the date the Mortgage Loan is funded or should have been funded, Client will not, without the Broker, go directly or through another Broker to the mortgage lender issuing the commitment for any other loan whether or not for the same property as that referred to in this agreement. Client, for the purposes of this section, shall mean the Client or any affiliate of the Client, including any partnership, organization, corporation or other business with which Client is affiliated.

SECTION SEVEN

DEFINITIONS

(a) Affiliate: A person or entity that (1) directly or indirectly through one or more intermediaries, controls, or is controlled by, or in common control with, Client; or (2) any spouse of Client, or any corporation or other organization in which Client is the beneficial owner of ten percent or more of any class of equity interest; or (3) any trust or estate in which Client collectively owns ten percent or more of the total beneficial interests or of which Client shall serve as trustee, executor, or in any similar capacity.

(b) Mortgage Lender: Party issuing the commitment and funding a part of or all of the Mortgage Loan.

[3] Affiliated Business Arrangement Disclosure

The affiliated business arrangement disclosure statement format is set out as part of the RESPA discussion in chapter 14 of this treatise. See 14.02[12] below.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. Exclusive mortgage brokerage agreements are discussed in § 11.04[4][b] above.

Note that under this agreement, the broker's fee is deemed earned upon the issuance of a loan commitment on the terms sought by the borrower or acceptable to the borrower. For discussion of when the mortgage broker's commission is earned and the effect of contract language on the accrual of the right to a commission, see § 11.04[4] above.

Of special concern to the borrower (and his or her attorney) is the provision in Section Three of the agreement that requires the borrower to pay the commission if it is unable, despite good faith efforts, to meet any condition of the loan commitment it has accepted. For discussion of this problem, one that often arises in the context of commercial real estate financing because lenders often impose conditions precedent to actual consummation of the loan in such transactions (for example, that the borrower secure certain leases with commercial tenants), see § 11.04[4] above.

Note also that under Section Six of the agreement, the borrower binds himself for a period of years to the broker with respect to any future financing from the particular lender involved, whether or not for the same property covered by the agreement. As in all brokerage agreements, the inclusion of such provisions will be a function of the relative bargaining strengths of the parties.

Finally, it bears mention that a mortgage broker who is also acting as a real estate broker in the particular transaction, must comply with any applicable state regulations prohibiting him from taking both a real estate brokerage commission from the seller and a fee from the buyer for obtaining the necessary financing.

CHAPTER 11 Mortgage Brokers *

§ 11.08 The Legality of Yield Spread Premiums

A yield spread premium is a payment made by a lender to a mortgage broker in return for the broker placing a mortgage with a lender at an interest rate that is above "par." n1 Par is the lender's lowest interest rate at which it will make a loan without charging the borrower discount points.

One commentator has stated, "From a pure business perspective, there is nothing sinister or unique about the payment or receipt of overages." n2 Nonetheless, the payment of yield spread premiums has generated controversy. This is partially due to the fact that some members of the public believe that a mortgage broker's job is to obtain the best possible loan for the borrower. This is particularly true in those few states in which the laws give a mortgage broker a "fiduciary duty" to a borrower.

This industry practice came under attack beginning in April 1994, when public interest lawyers in Virginia filed a class action lawsuit against Fleet Finance, Inc. and two mortgage brokers, challenging the payment of yield spread premiums. n3 Since then, numerous class action lawsuits have been filed challenging the legality of such payments under RESPA § 8, and many federal District Courts and one Circuit Court of Appeals have considered the legality of these payments.

The Culpepper Saga

Culpepper I. In the absence of guidance from HUD, the task of providing the industry with the necessary guidance initially fell to the courts. The United States Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit considered the payment of yield spread premiums in Culpepper v. Inland Mortgage Corporation (Culpepper I), n4 a case of first impression that would come to haunt the lending industry. The court reversed a district court's grant of summary judgment in favor of the lender. The district court had determined that the lender's payment of a yield spread premium to the broker constituted reasonable compensation for "goods furnished," namely, the loan itself, and not for the mere referral of settlement service business. n5 The circuit court disagreed, finding that, on the facts presented, the payment could have been neither

(1) in return for a "good," since the lender, not the broker (who closed the loan in its own name with funds supplied by the lender), owned the loan from the outset, nor

(2) in return for "services actually performed," since the broker expends the same effort and provides the same quantity of services whether it originates a loan at an interest rate that will provide it with a yield spread premium at closing or at a lower interest rate that will not generate such a payment. n6

While some courts besides the Eleventh Circuit have intimated in dicta that yield spread premiums as a general matter may violate RESPA, no court has so held. n7 On the other hand, several courts have held that yield spread premiums do not violate RESPA. n8

The National Association of Mortgage Brokers, in its position paper on the subject, cites the following example of why mortgage brokers have become so popular with consumers:

Many consumers today want to conserve their cash when obtaining a mortgage by paying low or no closing costs. Many first time borrowers do not have enough cash to pay all their closing costs. They are currently able to choose to pay such costs over time with a slightly higher interest rate. The cash the borrower doesn't have to pay at closing is his or hers to use at their discretion. Mortgage brokers... have popularized these loans because they are able to get their compensation from the lender instead of the borrower. n9

The Federal Reserve's View. To give added weight to this perspective, the Federal Reserve Board has stated that the disclosure of a yield spread premium is duplicative. The 1995 Amendments to Regulation Z stated that, beginning September 30, 1996, mortgage broker fees paid directly by the borrower must be included in the finance charge. n10

Then, in the Final Official Staff Commentary, published March 6, 1997, and effective February 28, 1997, the Board stated:

Section 226.4--Finance Charge

4(a) Definition.

4(a)(1) Charges by third parties.

4(a)(3) Special rule; mortgage broker fees.

3. Compensation by lender. The rule requires all mortgage broker fees to be included in the finance charge. Creditors sometimes compensate mortgage brokers under a separate arrangement with those parties. Creditors may draw on amounts paid by the consumer, such as points or closing costs, to fund their payment to the broker. Compensation paid by a creditor to a mortgage broker under an agreement is not included as a separate component of a consumer's total finance charge (although this compensation may be reflected in the finance charge if it comes from amounts paid by the consumer to the creditor that are finance charges, such as points and interest). *****

Clearly, the Federal Reserve Board takes the position that yield spread premiums are legitimate. n11 But confusion reigns regarding RESPA, and the proliferation of lawsuits has been of great concern.

HUD Steps In/Policy Statement I. At the insistence of Congress, n12 HUD issued a formal Statement of Policy (Policy Statement I) on March 1, 1999 in an attempt to end the confusion. n13 HUD took the position in Policy Statement I that it considers yield spread premiums not to be illegal per se, and to be legal if it is shown (1) that goods or facilities were actually furnished or services were actually performed for the total compensation paid to the mortgage broker; and (2) the compensation was reasonably related to the value of those goods, facilities, or services. n14

HUD further stated that in determining whether goods or facilities were furnished or services were provided by the broker in return for the total compensation received by the broker, it "may be useful" to refer to its February 14, 1995 letter to the Independent Bankers Association of America (IBAA letter).ⁿ¹⁵ The IBAA letter, which is essentially replicated in Policy Statement I, provides that HUD will not pursue enforcement action under RESPA if it is satisfied that sufficient origination work was performed to justify compensation. In HUD's view, this requires the broker to take the loan application information and perform at least 5 other origination services (at least one of which is something other than a "counseling-type" activity) from a list of fourteen origination-type services identified by HUD.ⁿ¹⁶

HUD also indicated in Policy Statement I that, in determining whether the total compensation received by the broker was reasonably related to the value of the goods or facilities furnished or the services performed, the total compensation received by the broker must be commensurate with the amount normally charged for similar services, goods or facilities. This, in turn, requires consideration of fees paid in relation to price structures and practices in similar transactions and in similar markets.ⁿ¹⁷ HUD further indicated that, in undertaking this analysis, any "volume-based" compensation paid by a lender (compensation based on the volume of loans the broker delivers to the lender over a fixed period and which is paid in the form of either cash rebates on the amount of loans delivered in excess of a "threshold" or "floor amount" or a lower "start rate") must be considered as part of the total compensation received by the broker.ⁿ¹⁸

Finally, Policy Statement I provided additional guidance to lenders and brokers as to how best to disclose yield spread premium payments to customers. HUD indicated that such a payment would be appropriately disclosed as "Mortgage Broker fee from lender to XYZ Corporation (P.O.C.)," and suggested that other fees or payments from the borrower to the broker should identify that they are mortgage broker fees from the borrower. HUD also recommended that brokers disclose, during their initial discussions with the customer, the nature of the broker's services and the various methods of compensation the broker can receive.ⁿ¹⁹ In a letter dated December 17, 1999 to Congressman Bruce F. Vento, HUD indicated that it did not intend for Policy Statement I to create a new legal standard, change existing law or weaken the prohibitions contained in Section 8 of RESPA.

Unfortunately for the industry, Policy Statement I did not prove to be the end of the story. Plaintiffs' counsel argued in many of the cases that the test formulated in Policy Statement I for determining whether or not the payment of a yield spread premium was legal under section 8 of RESPA was the same as the Eleventh Circuit's test in Culpepper I or, if different, was arbitrary and capricious and thus outside HUD's authority.

Plaintiffs' counsel raised this argument most often in the context of a motion for class certification, in an attempt to counter defendants' argument that the RESPA yield spread premium issue was inappropriate for class treatment because its resolution was dependent on the particular circumstances underlying each loan. Several courts, mostly in Alabama, accepted plaintiffs' argument and, as a consequence, granted class certification.ⁿ²⁰ Most courts, however, rejected the argument, deferring instead to HUD's interpretation of the statute.ⁿ²¹ As of year-end 2000, appeals from some of these class certification decisions were pending, most notably in the Eleventh Circuit, where four of these decisions were under review.ⁿ²²

Culpepper II. On June 15, 2001, the mortgage lending industry suffered a serious blow when the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals issued its long awaited decision in Culpepper v. Irwin Mortgage Corporation (Culpepper II).ⁿ²³ This decision affirmed the Alabama district court's prior order granting class certification.ⁿ²⁴

The Eleventh Circuit's decision addressed the issue concerning how to interpret the first part of the HUD Test as stated in Policy Statement I, namely whether goods or facilities were actually furnished or services were actually performed for the compensation paid.ⁿ²⁵

The Eleventh Circuit interpreted the first part of the HUD Test to mean that a YSP is illegal if there is not a direct link between the payment of the YSP and the performance of specific services by the broker; i.e., if it can be demonstrated that the YSP, considered apart from any other compensation the broker might receive in the transaction, was not paid in return for specific services performed by the broker. Plaintiff argued that such a result can follow from evidence, common to all class members, suggesting that whether a YSP is paid and how much of a YSP is paid depends entirely on whether the loan is above par and by how much. The court agreed with plaintiffs on this point, and concluded that class treatment was appropriate.

In reaching this conclusion however, the court failed to consider HUD's own explanation of the first part of the HUD Test.

In the determination of whether payments from lenders to mortgage brokers are permissible under Section 8 of RESPA, the threshold question is whether there were goods or facilities actually furnished or services actually performed for the total compensation paid the mortgage broker [64 Fed. Reg. 10085] .

Under this statement of the test, it would seem that a court would have to inquire what services the broker provided with respect to each loan made to a borrower in the class and whether those services exceeded the threshold level of services identified elsewhere in Policy Statement I as necessary to justify any compensation to the broker. The second part of the HUD Test would then require the court to additionally inquire as to whether the total compensation received by the broker was reasonable in relation to all the services provided by the broker on behalf of the borrower or the lender.

Policy Statement II. Four months after Culpepper II was decided, HUD issued a Clarification of Statement of Policy 1999-1 Regarding Lender Payments to Mortgage Brokers, and Guidance Concerning Unearned Fees Under Section 8(b) (Policy Statement II).ⁿ²⁶ In Policy Statement II, HUD took clear exception to the Eleventh Circuit's interpretation of Policy Statement I.

The Eleventh Circuit read Policy Statement I to mean that each component of broker compensation (including a YSP) must be tested separately to determine (1) whether it was paid in return for some specific service, and (2) whether it was reasonable in amount in relation to that specific service. In Policy Statement II, HUD confirmed that the Eleventh Circuit's approach was incorrect; rather, a YSP is not illegal under Section 8 of RESPA if it can be shown that (1) (at least a threshold level of) services were performed in return for the total compensation received by the broker (from all sources) and (2) the total compensation was reasonable in relation to those services:

HUD's position is that in order to discern whether a yield spread premium was for goods, facilities or services under the first part of the HUD test, it is necessary to look at each transaction individually, including examining all of the goods or facilities provided or services performed by the broker in the transaction, whether the goods, facilities or services are paid for by the borrower, the lender, or partly by both.

[N]either Section 8(a) of RESPA nor [Policy Statement I] supports the conclusion that a yield spread premium can be presumed to be a referral fee based solely upon the fact that the lender pays the broker a yield spread premium that is based upon a rate sheet, or because the lender does not have specific knowledge of what services the broker has performed.ⁿ²⁷

Recognizing, however, that in certain circumstances (particularly in uncompetitive markets) YSPs can be used in a way that is harmful rather than helpful to consumers' interests, HUD specifically recommended in Policy Statement II, as a "best practice," that meaningful disclosure concerning YSP payments be given to borrowers before they apply for a loan.ⁿ²⁸ HUD further indicated that it would consider such disclosure favorably when determining whether or not to pursue enforcement action in cases involving mortgage broker fees.ⁿ²⁹ In HUD's view, "meaningful disclosure" includes disclosure of the specific services the broker will perform, the amount of the broker's total compensation for performing those services (including any YSP to be paid by the lender), whether or not the broker has an agency or fiduciary relationship with the borrower, and an explanation of the borrower's options (including monthly payment options) vis-a-vis paying less to the broker up front in exchange for a higher interest rate on the loan and vice-versa. n30

The Culpepper Saga Ends. Nine months after Culpepper II was decided, the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals in Glover v. Standard Federal Bank n31 reversed a district court grant of certification that had been based on the Culpepper II rationale. According deference to Policy Statement II, the Eighth Circuit determined that class action treatment of a YSP complaint is inappropriate given the individualized inquiry that must be made under the HUD Test. The court stated:

[a] lender's reliance on a rate sheet to uniformly offer and calculate a YSP payable to a broker does not, without more, mean that class certification is appropriate. Nor does it mean that you can presume that each payment reflects payment of a prohibited referral fee simply because the lender does not have specific knowledge of the nature and amount of service the broker performs in conjunction with a particular loan or group of loans. n32

The court indicated, however, that the Glovers' individual action alleging that a YSP constitutes an illegal referral fee under RESPA § 8 can still succeed, so long as they can establish that some part of the total payment to the broker, including the YSP, is excessive:

If total compensation paid by the lender to the broker in a given transaction exceeds a reasonable amount for the goods, services and facilities provided, it is likely that a RESPA violation has been established. American courts have accurately and fairly determined reasonability in similar situations since their inception, and, they will do so in the Glovers' case, if necessary. n33

Other circuit courts that have considered this issue after HUD came out with Policy Statement II, including, most significantly, the Eleventh Circuit in Heimmerman v. First Union Mortgage Cor., n34 have adopted the rationale expressed by the Eighth Circuit in Glover.

Following Heimmerman, the Culpepper district court granted the defendants' motion to de-certify the class and for summary judgment, n35 and plaintiffs appealed. The Eleventh Circuit affirmed the district court's decision, thereby finally putting an end to the Culpepper Saga and the class action challenge to the practice of lenders paying mortgage broker yield spread premiums. n36

§ 11.09 RESPA Reform Effort

While the class action challenge to the practice of lenders paying brokers yield spread premiums appears to be over, it has had a lasting impact. Specifically, it helped to convince HUD that RESPA and Regulation X needed an overhaul.

RESPA REFORM I

This conviction led HUD, on July 29, 2002, to propose significant measures to improve Regulation X for the benefit of consumers, including measures addressed to yield spread premiums ("Proposal I"). One such measure would require that all yield spread premiums be disclosed on the HUD-1 Uniform Settlement Statement (HUD-1) and the Good Faith Estimate (GFE) as payments from the lender to the borrower. (The HUD-1A version of the Uniform Settlement Statement would no longer be able to be used in connection with refinance or subordinate-lien loans in which a yield spread premium payment is made.) For a mortgage broker to receive a yield spread premium, the mortgage broker would have to disclose on its GFE a direct "origination fee" which includes any anticipated yield spread premium payment (and which therefore will represent the mortgage broker's entire compensation in connection with the loan). The result will be that the broker would no longer collect indirect fees from the lender, only direct fees from the borrower.

A second proposed measure would prohibit mortgage brokers from retaining any portion of any points paid by the borrower to obtain a lower interest rate (discount points) from the lender. Any such payment would have to be disclosed as a payment by the borrower to the lender.

A third proposed measure would change HUD's model form GFE to require disclosure of the following additional information:

- A description of the nature of the services that the lender and/or mortgage broker (defined in the proposal as "loan originators") will provide so as to "disabuse borrowers of the notion that brokers or other loan originators are acting as their agents."
- A statement indicating that borrowers have the option to pay settlement costs (1) using their own funds at settlement, (2) using additional borrowed funds, or (3) using a yield spread premium they receive from the lender in exchange for agreeing to pay an above par interest rate. (The GFE would also have to disclose that the borrowers may lower the interest rate [and the monthly payment] by paying discount points to the lender.)

- The total origination charges of the mortgage broker and the lender, as a consolidated figure, and, on a new GFE attachment (A-1), a breakdown of the charges that are included in that figure, grouped according to whether they are charges of the broker or the lender.

These proposed changes were intended by HUD to insure that "brokers will have no incentive to seek out lenders paying the largest yield spread." However, they will not affect lenders who close loans with their own funds and thereafter sell those loans at a profit in the secondary market.

Proposal I attracted numerous comments from the settlement services industry and consumer groups alike, and generated Congressional opposition as well. In the end, HUD was forced to withdraw the proposal.

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD PROPOSES YSP RESTRICTIONS

In January, 2008, the Federal Reserve Board proposed to revise Regulation Z primarily to deal with the aftermath of the subprime mortgage loan crisis and prevent further abuses. n1 One of the most significant and controversial changes contained in this proposal was a requirement that a mortgage broker make an upfront disclosure to any customer seeking a closed-end loan to be secured by his/her principal dwelling. This upfront disclosure would state the total amount of compensation the broker will receive in the transaction, both from the borrower and the lender. The proposal would also prohibit creditors from paying any compensation to the mortgage broker that would cause the mortgage broker's total compensation to exceed the amount so disclosed. n2 These provisions, however, were withdrawn by the Board when adopting the final rule, although the Board indicated that it would continue to examine options for addressing potential unfairness to consumers associated with broker compensation arrangements, such as yield spread premiums, and continue to consider possible disclosure or other remedies to such potential unfairness in connection with its ongoing comprehensive review of Regulation Z. n3

During the next year or so, the Board continued to work on this issue, culminating in the publication, on August 26, 2009, of a new proposal that would among other things prohibit payments to a mortgage broker or the creditor's loan officer based on the loan's interest rate or other terms and prohibit a mortgage broker or loan officer from "steering" consumers to a lender offering less favorable terms in order to increase the broker's or loan officer's compensation. n3.1 This proposal has not yet been adopted and remains under consideration by the Board.

RESPA REFORM II

After withdrawing Proposal I, HUD indicated its intent to publish a new reform proposal. It followed-up by holding a series of invitation-only RESPA Reform Roundtables to obtain input from a cross-section of representatives of industry, consumer organizations and other interested parties. n4 It then digested what it learned from those discussions, developed and tested new forms which it hoped would improve the process and, on March 13, 2008, published its second RESPA Reform proposal ("Proposal II"). n5

Proposal II is both a scaled-back version of Proposal I--it does not include a "packaging" element--and an aggressive foray into several new areas. Briefly, Proposal II would, among other things: (1) dramatically change the form of Good Faith Estimate ("GFE") that has been in use since 1992 and establish consequences for underdisclosures on that form (which exceed specified tolerances); (2) modify the HUD-1/1A Uniform Settlement Statement forms ("HUD-1") in several regards; (3) create a new "Closing Script" to be read aloud by the closing agent to the borrowers at settlement; (4) expand the definition of a prohibited "required use" in connection with a referral to an affiliated business arrangement (to make builder incentives to use affiliated settlement services providers more problematic under section 8); and (5) clarify that average-cost pricing and volume discounts that satisfy certain conditions will not be deemed to violate the Section 8 referral fee prohibition.

Proposal II also attempts to deal with the issue of how best to disclose yield spread premiums paid by lenders to brokers in return for above par loans. The new GFE will require lenders and mortgage brokers to disclose (i) their total compensation, labeled as "Our service charge," and (ii) any yield spread premium the mortgage broker expects to receive, labeled as "[t]he credit ... for the interest rate you have chosen [, which] is included in 'Our service charge'" or which will "reduce[s] your upfront charges." The amounts listed as "Our service charge" and the yield spread premium "credit" may not change once the borrower's interest rate has been locked. Borrowers who wish to obtain a below par loan, rather than receiving a yield spread premium credit, will have to pay discount points to the lender, which will be labeled on the new GFE as "[t]he ... charge for the specific interest rate chosen."

"Our service charge" is supposed to be the sum of all non-third party, loan origination-related charges imposed by the lender and the mortgage broker (if any), including application fees, processing fees, underwriting fees, origination fees, mortgage broker fees, points, etc. Proposal II would thus force lenders and brokers to lump all of their direct charges into a single all-encompassing originator fee.

RESPA REFORM BECOMES A REALITY

On November 17, 2008, HUD adopted a final rule amending Regulation X which it hoped would achieve meaningful RESPA reform (the "New Rule").⁶ The New Rule

- dramatically changes the form of Good Faith Estimate ("GFE") that has been in use since 1992 and establishes consequences for inaccurate disclosures on that form,
- modifies the HUD-1 and HUD-1A Uniform Settlement Statement forms in several regards so that they better coincide with the new GFE,
- clarifies that average cost pricing that satisfies certain conditions will not violate the Section 8 referral fee prohibition,
- creates a new "simplified" servicing disclosure statement to be provided at application, and
- revises the definition of a prohibited "required use" in connection with a referral to an affiliated business arrangement.

Details concerning these changes are discussed below.

The New Expanded GFE

Description. HUD has traded in its old, one-page model form GFE for a brand new three-page model (which is one page fewer than proposed).

First Page. The first page is the most critical one, with HUD envisioning consumers using it to comparison shop for a mortgage loan. While the GFE previously focused solely in settlement costs, and not loan terms, the revised form discloses on the first page what HUD believes are the essential loan terms and attendant costs that a lender is obligated to offer to a loan applicant unless "changed circumstances" dictate otherwise.

The first page of the new GFE must show the initial loan amount, term, initial interest rate, initial monthly payment amount, whether the interest rate can increase, and whether the loan allows for negative amortization or provides for a prepayment penalty or a balloon payment. These are all new disclosures for a GFE form, and some observers feel these items duplicate or conflict with the information on the Truth-in-Lending Act early-disclosure statement. The new GFE must also tell the consumer what the total origination charges and the charges for other settlement services are likely to be. Lenders and mortgage brokers (dubbed "Loan Originators" in the New Rule) may not force the customer to pay a fee to obtain the GFE, other than the cost of the credit report.

HUD expects consumers to take the first page of the new GFE to other Loan Originators to attempt to negotiate better deals. Under the New Rule, the consumer is given at least 10 days to shop, during which the "offer" encapsulated on the GFE must remain open and "fixed," i.e., within prescribed tolerances, unless there are "changed circumstances." If the consumer accepts the offer, the terms and costs are then fixed through the closing, again within the same prescribed tolerances and absent "changed circumstances."

Second Page. The second page of the new GFE gives a breakdown of the origination charges and the charges for the other settlement services. Rather than being itemized, as on the old GFE, these charges are grouped into categories, including "Our origination charge," "Required services that we select," "Title services and lender's title insurance," and "Required services that you can shop for." The origination charge on the second page is adjusted to reflect any credits or charges for the interest rate chosen. ("Credits" would include that the lender will pay to a mortgage broker (if one is involved) or any discount points that the borrower may choose to pay to lower the interest rate. The theory of the "adjusted origination charge" may be difficult for a borrower to grasp.

Third Page. The last page of the GFE gives general information to consumers as to how best to use the form. It also provides consumers with a "tradeoff table" on which the Loan Originator may set forth two loan options—one that describes a loan for which the consumer would pay a higher interest rate but less in settlement charges, and another that describes a loan for which the consumer would pay a lower interest rate but more in settlement charges. (The Loan Originator need not list any options, but for any option it chooses to list, it must be willing to provide the borrower with a GFE based on the same information it relied on to provide the current GFE.) Lastly, it provides a space where consumers may insert and compare relevant data concerning other loan offers that they receive.

GFE Timing. The New Rule says that a GFE must be provided within three business days following receipt of a consumer's "application." In this respect, the New Rule is the same as the old one. However, the New Rule redefines the term "application." Under the New Rule, Loan Originators receive an "application" when potential borrowers submit financial information to them in anticipation of a credit decision, including, at minimum, their name, monthly income, social security number, property address, estimate of the value of the property, and the amount they wish to borrow, plus whatever other information the Loan Originator deems necessary. Loan Originators may require additional information as a condition of providing a GFE, but may not require borrowers to submit verifying information or documentation as part of an "application."

Fee Tolerances. To prevent "bait or switch" scenarios, HUD has made the GFE less of an "estimate" and more of a "promise." As indicated above, the terms and costs disclosed on a GFE (except for the initial interest rate and the fees that are dependent on the interest rate), once given, must remain open and "fixed" for at least 10 business days. If "accepted" by the borrower, those same terms and costs must remain in place until closing, absent "changed circumstances." By "fixed," HUD means within the applicable tolerances described below. (The initial interest rate, unless locked, must remain "fixed" only for whatever period of time the Loan Originator chooses to keep it open, which must be disclosed on the first page of the GFE.)

The first tolerance is zero percent. This tolerance applies to all lender and mortgage broker origination fees, all transfer fees, and, if the interest rate has been locked, any discount points or YSPs. This means that none of these items may exceed by any amount the number disclosed on the GFE. (The initial interest rate listed on the GFE is also subject to a zero percent tolerance, but only during whatever time period the Loan Originator indicates on the GFE that it will remain fixed—which can be less than 10 days—unless the consumer locks in that rate.)

The second tolerance is 10 percent. This tolerance applies to the total of (1) all lender-required settlement services paid to providers selected by the lender, (2) all lender-required settlement services paid to providers selected by the borrower from lender-provided lists, (3) premiums for optional owners' title insurance selected by the borrower from lender-provided lists, and (4) government recording fees. This means that the sum of the actual charges for these items cannot exceed by more than 10 percent the sum of the charges disclosed on the GFE for these items.

Finally, any other charges disclosed on the GFE would be permitted to change at closing by any amount, so long as the estimate for the charge was offered in "good faith."

Changed Circumstances. The New Rule defines "changed circumstances" that can obviate a tolerance as: (1) Acts of God, war, disaster, or other emergencies; (2) application information that the lender relied on in providing the GFE but which subsequently changes or is found to be inaccurate; (3) information on the borrower's credit report obtained before providing the GFE that subsequently changes; (4) new information particular to the borrower or the transaction that was not relied on by the lender in providing the GFE (excluding any of the items of financial information that at minimum are deemed to constitute an "application"); and (5) other circumstances particular to the borrower or the transaction, such as boundary disputes, the need for flood insurance, and environmental problems. Within three business days after learning that "changed circumstances" exist, the Loan Originator may deny the loan or issue a new GFE showing different terms and/or costs.

Post Settlement Cure. A lender may cure a tolerance violation within 30 calendar days after settlement by reimbursing to the borrower the excess amount. Currently, there is no private right of action for a GFE violation, but HUD plans to ask Congress to change that.

Effective Date. Loan Originators must begin using the new GFE beginning January 1, 2010. Loan Originators may use the new GFE before January 1, 2010 but, if they do, they must also use the HUD-1/1A forms as modified by the New Rule and be subject to all of the other requirements in the New Rule that pertain to the new GFE.

The New HUD-1/1A Forms

The New Rule also revises the existing two-page HUD-1 by making certain changes to the second page and adding a third page. It similarly revises the existing one-page HUD-1A by making changes to the first page and adding a second page.

The changes consist primarily of the following: (1) Replacing the fee terminology that appears on the existing HUD-1/1A with the terminology that is used on the new GFE, specifically, "Our origination charge," "Your credit or charge for the specific interest rate chosen," "Your adjusted origination charge," "Title services and lender's title insurance," and "Required services that you can shop for"; (2) including after each such fee the line number on the GFE at which the same charge appears; and (3) providing a breakdown of the portion of the total title insurance premium that goes to the title underwriter and the title agent.

The page that the New Rule adds to the HUD-1/1A replaces the "Closing Script" that HUD, in its March proposal, would have required the closing agent to read aloud to the borrower at closing. This page compares the loan terms and attendant costs disclosed on the GFE that the borrower received at time of application (or subsequently, where there were changed circumstances) with the terms and costs of the actual loan being closed, and specifically informs the borrower whether the 10 percent tolerance limit on the sum of all fees to which it applies has been exceeded. If the borrower has questions about the settlement fees or the loan terms, the form, at the bottom of this page, directs the borrower to "please contact your lender."

effective January 1, 2010.

Required Use

"Affiliated business arrangements" ("AfBAs") are exempt from scrutiny under RESPA § 8 and its criminal prohibition against referral fees. This exemption applies so long as three conditions are met: (1) The consumer is given an AfBA disclosure statement at the time of the referral, which informs the consumer about the nature of the relationship between the person who is making the referral, and the AfBA and the cost of the goods or services provided by the AfBA; (2) with certain exceptions, the consumer is not required to use the AfBA; and (3) the only thing of value that is received from the AfBA, other than payments that are otherwise permitted by RESPA, is a return on ownership interest.

With respect to the second of these three conditions, HUD has long taken the position that offering an incentive to a consumer to use an AfBA is not a "required use," whereas imposing a penalty upon the consumer for refusing to use an AfBA is a required use. In addition, Regulation X has long stated that providing a package of settlement services to a consumer at a discount is not a "required use" so long as the package is optional to the consumer, and the discount "is a true discount below the prices that are generally available" and are not made up by higher costs elsewhere in the settlement process. n7

Had this aspect of the New Rule not been subsequently withdrawn by HUD, it would have changed the current definition of a "required use" in significant ways. First, it states that a "required use" now includes offering an economic incentive to use an AfBA, as well as imposing an economic disincentive not to use an AfBA. Second, it indicates that the offering by a "settlement services provider" of a discounted package of settlement services provided by one or more AfBAs is not a "required use" of those companies so long as (i) the discounted price is less than the sum of the market prices of the individual settlement services included in the package, (ii) use of the package is optional to the consumer, and (iii) the discount is not made up by higher costs elsewhere in the process.

One key effect of these changes is to prohibit homebuilders from offering buyers incentives (such as upgrades) or discounts for agreeing to use the homebuilders' affiliated settlement service provider (such as mortgage lenders and title insurance companies). A builder is not a "settlement services provider." This effect is most clearly spelled out in the Regulatory Impact Analysis attached to the New Rule:

Under the final rule, builders will not be allowed to offer positive economic incentives for the homebuyer to use an affiliated lender or settlement service provider. An incentive would have to be general, i.e., applicable to any lender or settlement service provider. It would be allowable for a builder to pay a portion of the buyer's closing costs, but that offer could not depend on whether the buyer uses an affiliated lender or settlement service provider. n8

HUD's stated rationale for taking this action is its belief that "the average consumer will gain by formally separating the home purchase and loan decisions." In this regard, HUD assumes that the average consumer is unable to accurately value builder incentives and that most builders will "offset the cost of the incentive by charging a higher interest rate, home price or closing costs" (despite the fact that the current rule prohibits them from doing so). HUD thus seems to be saying that, because it is unable to take effective enforcement action against those builders who offer incentives but who raise prices elsewhere in the process to make up for the incentive, it will simply prohibit all builders from offering incentives.

Effective Date. This part of the New Rule was originally scheduled to become effective on January 16, 2009. Facing a lawsuit filed by the National Association of Builders, n9 HUD first delayed the effective date of this portion of the New Rule until April 16, 2009; then until July 16, 2009; and finally, withdrew it altogether. n10 Subsequently, however, HUD revisited the issue when it published an Advance Notice of Proposed Rulemaking aimed at "Strengthening and Clarifying RESPA's 'Required Use' Prohibition." n10.1

In the Notice, HUD asks interested persons to provide: (1) information focused on tailoring the "required use" definition "to reach abusive incentive schemes but not beneficial discounts or packages," (2) information relating to forward loan commitments obtained by homebuilders for use by their customers, and (3) various other items of information concerning home sellers use of discounts or upgrades as an incentive to use an affiliated provider. Comments are due by September 1, 2010.

Average Cost Pricing

The price that a settlement service provides another settlement service provider for a particular settlement service, such as for a credit report, often varies from one loan to another. While many providers would have liked to charge all of their customers an average price for such a service, they were discouraged from doing so by fears that such a practice would be construed as a violation of RESPA § 8; i.e., that borrowers could assert an illegal overcharge or unearned fee if the average price exceeded the actual cost of their particular service. In the New Rule, HUD made it clear that average cost pricing does not violate Section 8 so long as the provider charges the same average price for every transaction within the class of transactions defined by the provider (based on the period of time, type of loan and geographic area), and recalculates the average price at least every six months. (HUD had proposed a more rigid formula, but backed off in the face of critical comments.) Average cost pricing, however, may not be used for settlement services, the price of which is based on the loan amount or the value of the property. This provision of the New Rule took effect on January 16, 2008.

Simplified Servicing Disclosure Statement

Since 1990, Regulation X has required lenders to provide borrowers, within three business days after receipt of their loan application, with a servicing disclosure statement that generally discloses whether the lender expects to service the loan. A suggested format for such statement was provided in Appendix MS-1. In 1996, Congress simplified this requirement. The New Rule finally implements this 1996 simplification by creating a new model servicing disclosure statement.

Aftermath

The New Rule has generated a significant amount of controversy. As indicated, the National Association of Builders sued HUD to overturn the new "required use" definition. The National Association of Mortgage Brokers also filed suit against HUD, challenging the new disclosure regime created by the New Rule, particularly with respect to its required disclosure of yield spread premiums as borrower credits. And various industry groups have lobbied Congress to force HUD to withdraw or postpone the effectiveness of the New Rule to allow for coordinated and comprehensive mortgage reform involving not only HUD but also the Federal Reserve Board, which has rule-making authority under the Truth-in-Lending Act. Despite lawsuits n11 and lobbying efforts n12 by industry groups to invalidate or postpone the effective date of the new disclosure regime, the New Rule became effective on January 1, 2010.

With regard to the industry lobbying effort, members of the United States House of Representatives at least appear to be listening. On May 12, 2009, they passed and sent to the United States Senate for consideration H.R. 1728, the "Mortgage Reform and Anti-Predatory Lending Act." Section 106 of this bill would force HUD to suspend implementation of its new GFE/HUD-1/1A requirements pending development of a joint proposal with the Federal Reserve Board.

HUD FAQs

As expected, numerous implementation issues have arisen as a result of the New Rule. HUD has attempted to provide guidance to the industry with respect to many of these issues by publishing on its website a series of answers to

"frequently asked questions" ("FAQs"). See http://www.hud.gov/offices/hsg/ramh/res/respa_hm.cfm (last visited June 2010). The most recent version of these FAQs, now 62 pages long, is dated April 2, 2010.

Most of the FAQ's address questions regarding the new GFE. Among these questions are:

- How to fill in the blanks on page 1 in the "Important Dates" section related to rate locks if you do not offer rate locks?
- How to fill in the blanks on page 1 in the "Summary of your loan" section with respect to loans with nontraditional features (e.g., interest-only loans, bi-weekly payment loans, loans with conditional preferred rate features)?
- How to disclose originator charges on page 2 in connection with loans for which the borrower will pay "discount points" and the lender will pay a "yield spread premium?"
- How to disclose "title services and lender's title insurance" when the borrower is permitted to shop for some but not all of those title services?
- Whether transfer taxes need be disclosed where state law and/or custom obligates the seller to pay those taxes?
- How many providers must be included on the list of providers supplied by the Loan Originator with regard to services for which borrower may shop?
- What specific circumstances will qualify as "changed circumstances?"
- What constitutes "origination services" that will be included in Block 1?
- What is a "no cost" loan and how must it be disclosed?
- May Loan Originators provide pre-approvals without having to give a GFE?
- Are lenders bound by GFEs provided by a mortgage broker?

The New HUD-1/1A has also drawn its share of questions, such as the following:

- How should a tolerance violation "cure" be disclosed on the HUD-1/1A.
- How should borrower charges that are paid by the Loan Originator, the seller or a third party be reflected on the HUD-1/1A?
- When a mortgage broker closes a loan in its own name using funds supplied by a table-funding lender, in whose name must the HUD-1/1A be completed?
- If state law so requires, may fees be itemized that the New Rule requires be aggregated?
- How to differentiate on the HUD-1/1A deductible origination points from other origination charges?

The FAQs should be consulted whenever there is a question concerning how a particular loan term or fee should be disclosed on the new GFE or HUD-1/1A form.

CHAPTER 11 Mortgage Brokers *

§ 11.10 The Legality of Mark-Ups/Overcharges

While the YSP class actions ground to a halt, another Section 8 claim against mortgage brokers (and other settlement service providers) began to take hold. Specifically, plaintiffs in several class actions alleged that the practice of some settlement service providers in (i) charging their customer more than it cost them to obtain a particular settlement service from a third-party provider ("marking-up" a charge for a settlement service) or (ii) charging their customer an "unreasonable" amount for a settlement service which they perform themselves ("overcharging" for a settlement service), violated section 8(b) of RESPA. Section 8(b) states that "no person shall give and no person shall accept any portion, split or percentage of any charge ... for ... a settlement service ... other than for services actually performed. n1 In Policy Statement II, HUD indicated that it considered Section 8(b) to be violated in both of the above scenarios. n2 Courts, however, have disagreed.

With respect to the practice of marking-up a settlement service, the Fourth, Seventh and Eighth Circuit Courts of Appeal have indicated that such a practice is not actionable under Section 8(b); n3 the Second and Third Circuits have said that it may be actionable; n4 and the Eleventh Circuit has said that it may be actionable but indicated in dicta that merely ordering the settlement service from the third-party provider constitutes the rendering of a service upon which a mark-up can be justified. n5 The U.S. Supreme Court may eventually be called upon to definitively decide this issue.

With respect to the practice of "overcharging" for a settlement service, all courts that have specifically addressed this issue to date are in agreement that Section 8(b) provides no cause of action. n6

A New Wrinkle

In Cohen v. JP Morgan Chase, n7 the plaintiff alleged that Chase had charged her a "post closing fee" but had not provided any services in return for that fee. The district court dismissed plaintiff's complaint for failure to state a claim under RESPA section 8(b) because: (i) the fee was analogous to an "overcharge" which was not actionable under section 8(b); and (ii) the plaintiff failed to allege that the fee had been split with a third party. On appeal, the Second Circuit Court of Appeals reversed, finding that section 8(b), in addition to prohibiting splits of fees between two parties where one party performs no services and mark-ups of third-party fees, can reasonably be read, n8 as HUD has read it, to prohibit a charge by a settlement service provider where "no, nominal or duplicative work is done." n9

PART IV Specialized Fields of Brokerage

CHAPTER 11 Mortgage Brokers *

10A-11 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 11.11

§ 11.11 Mortgage Brokers and the Subprime Mortgage Crisis

The origins of the subprime crisis, the initial indicators of which surfaced in 2007, can be traced back to the long refinance boom which ended only a few years earlier when mortgage interest rates began their steady climb from record low levels. During the boom, industry players (investment banks, mortgage lenders and mortgage brokers alike) profited handsomely from unprecedented origination activity, and, no doubt, expected those levels of profitability to continue. As interest rates inched higher, however, originations (and profits) declined.

To reverse this decline, keep up the flow of originations to the secondary market and increase home ownership (at the urging of government agencies), lenders and brokers began to aggressively market more exotic loan products. These included interest-only and payment-option adjustable rate mortgages ("ARMs"), originally intended for use by sophisticated real estate investors and professionals ("Nontraditional mortgage loans" or "NTMs"); reduced documentation loans, originally intended for use by self-employed borrowers and other borrowers who possessed the necessary income and/or assets to qualify but, for one reason or another, had difficulty being able to document that ability consistent with Fannie/Freddie underwriting standards ("stated income" loans); "2/28" or "3/27" ARM loans, ARM loans with an initial 2- or 3-year period during which the interest rate would remain fixed; and so-called "80-20 piggyback" loans, 80% loan-to-value ("LTV") first-lien loans combined with 20% LTV second-lien loans, designed to eliminate the need for expensive private mortgage insurance.

Marketing efforts concerning these more exotic loan products were often directed to borrowers for whom these loans may not have been a good fit and were boosted by the use of below-market "teaser" rates that would be in effect, typically, for only a short initial period. Moreover, the features of these various types of loans were often combined to make the loan "work," i.e., so that the loan could close. The result was as desired--more originations. But this increase in originations also sowed the seeds for the current crisis.

Speculation and fraud also contributed to this crisis. Real estate speculators used these exotic products to purchase properties without having to put up a lot of their own money or prove income and assets. Borrowers (and/or loan officers in some cases) exaggerated income on stated income loans (dubbed by some, for this reason, as "Liar's loans") in order to obtain loans for which they would not otherwise have qualified. And criminals found that many of the features of these loans made it easier to perpetrate property-flipping and other illegal schemes.

Efforts to deal with this crisis have been and are being made at both the federal and state level, with increased scrutiny over mortgage brokers being a focus of many of these efforts. At the federal level, Congress enacted the "Secure and Fair Enforcement for Mortgage Licensing Act of 2008" (the "SAFE Act"), Title V of the "Housing Economic Recovery Act of 2008," H.R. 3221, P.L. 110-289, on July 30, 2008. The SAFE Act mandates a uniform nationwide licensing system for all loan originators, including originators who work for state- and federally-chartered depository institutions and independent mortgage bankers and mortgage brokers. Required elements of the system include the establishment of a national mortgage loan originator database and the assignment of a unique identifier to each originator to facilitate tracking; and, for loan originators who work for independent mortgage bankers and brokers, individual licensing testing and continuing education requirements that meet specified standards. The SAFE Act requires this uniform licensing system to be accomplished by the passage of legislation enacted at the state level and determined by HUD to be consistent with the federal mandates contained in the SAFE Act or, in states which fail to enact such legislation, through the adoption of a federal licensing regime established and administered by HUD. HUD issued a proposed regulation to implement the SAFE Act mandates on December 15, 2009 n1

On May 20, 2009, Congress also enacted the Fraud Enforcement and Recovery Act of 2009, P.L. 111-10) (the "FERA"). The FERA, among other things, makes it a crime for a mortgage broker to knowingly make a false statement or report to a person in the mortgage lending business or to any person that makes in whole or in part a federally related mortgage loan as defined in RESPA. And Congress continues to consider placing additional anti-predatory lending restrictions on mortgage lenders and mortgage brokers. n2

States have been active in the area of loan originator licensing to fulfill the SAFE Act mandates. n3 In addition, state regulators are increasingly cooperating with both federal regulators and each other (by agreement or through AARMR) to leverage their ability to supervise mortgage lenders and mortgage brokers, particularly those who do business in multiple states. This trend appears likely to continue.

CHAPTER 12 Business Brokers, Business Opportunity Brokers and Finders *

10A-12 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice Scope

Scope

SCOPE

Chapter 12 discusses business opportunity brokers and their relationship to real estate brokerage law. A business opportunity broker is a person who brings together sellers and buyers of businesses (§ 12.01[2]). Numerous issues arise as to whether such brokers must be licensed as real estate brokers since many business sales involve real estate. An all-too-frequent occurrence is for a business broker to have to sue for his or her commission pursuant to the brokerage agreement after having successfully brought a buyer and seller together. Often, sellers take advantage of the fact that the business sale involved real estate and argue that no commission is due because the business broker was not licensed as a real estate broker. Courts have generally reacted to this dilemma in one of four ways:

- a majority of courts have denied the unlicensed business broker compensation if the business sale included real estate unless the brokerage agreement stated that the real estate interest was divisible from the personal property portion of the sale (§ 12.02[2]);
- The New York rule allows an unlicensed business broker to recover a commission if the real estate transfer was not the dominant purpose of the sale (§ 12.02[3]).
- The Mississippi rule allows the unlicensed business broker to recover a commission only on the personal property, but only if the transfer of real estate was not the dominant purpose of the transaction (§ 12.02[4]).
- The modified New Jersey rule allows the unlicensed business broker to recover a commission based upon the value of the personal property of the transaction, regardless of the relative value of the real estate. This rule also allows the broker to prove the value from surrounding circumstances (§ 12.02[5]).

Chapter 12 also discusses obstacles presented when a business broker's contract is oral and the effect of the statute of frauds when the business includes real estate (§ 12.03). Brokers in this situation have sometimes been able to recover their commission under theories of quantum meruit (§ 12.03[2]) and estoppel (§ 12.03[3]). This chapter also discusses the legislative response to this issue which has been to expand the definition of a broker under real estate brokerage licensing laws to include business brokers. The result is that many states have integrated business brokerage activities into the real estate brokerage licensing scheme (§ 12.04). The chapter concludes with a standard listing agreement form (§ 12.05[1]) and a standard buyer's fee agreement (§ 12.05[2]).

CHAPTER 12 Business Brokers, Business Opportunity Brokers and Finders *

10A-12 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 12.01

§ 12.01 Introduction

[1] Scope of the Chapter

This chapter is concerned with the regulation and conduct of business opportunity brokers, business brokers, and finders, who negotiate contracts and bargain on behalf of others for the sale, transfer or lease of personal property, assets and ongoing businesses, for a fee, commission or the expectation of a fee or a commission. The chapter focuses on the four basic approaches that the courts take when interpreting the business broker's or business opportunity broker's right to collect commissions. In addition, the problems of recovery of compensation for business brokers and business opportunity brokers under oral and written employment contracts are analyzed, and the statutory framework under which the business broker and business opportunity broker operates is examined.

Some statutes define what interests qualify as a business opportunity. For example, California Business & Professions Code § 10030 defines a business opportunity as including "the sale or lease of the business and goodwill of an existing business enterprise or opportunity." When the seller is a corporation, this provision has been interpreted to mean that there is no requirement that the sale include every business in which a corporation is engaged. n0.1 It is generally held that the sale of a business opportunity includes the transfer of "goodwill" n0.2 which has been defined to mean the expectation of public patronage. n0.3

Several states have enacted laws aimed at protecting purchasers of new businesses or franchises. These laws have a different purpose and thus define the term business opportunity in that context. n0.4 Though there may be overlap, these definitions typically are not the same. A business opportunity in the context of real estate licensing laws typically refers to the sale of an existing business or the sale of a portion of an existing business.

[2] Brokers and Finders Generally

A broker (engaged in what is commonly called "brokerage") acts on behalf of other parties in negotiating contracts relative to property beyond his or her possession or control in matters of trade, commerce and navigation for compensation. n1 The term encompasses almost every branch of business, real estate, as well as personal property, and involves individuals or entities whose purpose it is to bring together buyer and seller. A finder, middleman, or business opportunity broker is one who acts as an intermediary for the purpose of finding, introducing and bringing together parties to some business opportunity, leaving the ultimate negotiation and consultation of the business transaction to the principals. n2

There is a well-defined distinction between the finder, the business opportunity locator and the middleman on the one hand and the broker on the other. n3 The middleman or finder is not subject to the rules governing brokers, but is employed merely to bring together parties who desire to exchange, buy or sell property. The parties thereafter make their own contracts, without representation by the middleman or finder, and may or may not pay a commission for the work done.

The finder's employment is based solely on his or her ability to find a prospect to buy particular property or businesses. The finder owes no fiduciary duty to an employer, as the finder's only obligation is to introduce the principals to each other. n4 A right to compensation attaches only if a sale results from the negotiations between the principals the finder has brought together. n5 In contrast, it is generally recognized that brokers owe fiduciary duties to their employers, and have generally earned their commissions when they provide a ready, willing and able buyer pursuant to the terms of their listing agreement, whether or not the buyer and seller subsequently consummate the transaction. n6 It happens on occasion that a finder participates more actively than merely introducing the parties, and when the finder undertakes the role of a broker, he or she will be treated as a broker and will be subject to the fiduciary obligations and licensing requirements of a broker. n6.1

[3] State Licensing Generally

Whether a business broker will be required to have either a business broker's license or real estate broker's license depends upon the applicable state statutory regulations and the judicial interpretations of these statutes. n7 Judicial interpretations and opinions cover a broad spectrum of decisions, and the scope of the opinions relate directly to whether or not the particular state has a licensing requirement, the language utilized in the various statutes and regulations, and the judicial opinions in that state interpreting the language of those regulations.

Several rules or approaches have emerged from these judicial decisions, including:

- (1) the so-called "Majority Rule," which denies any compensation to the unlicensed business broker in the sale of a business that includes real estate unless, according to the terms of the commission agreement, that real estate interest was divisible from the personalty portion of the sale; n8
- (2) the "New York rule" minority approach which allows the unlicensed business broker to collect his or her fee on the entire transaction if the transfer of real estate is not the dominant purpose of the sale; n9
- (3) the "Mississippi rule" which allows the unlicensed broker to recover a commission on the personalty alone, but only if the transfer of real estate is not the dominant purpose of the transaction; n10 and
- (4) the modified "New Jersey rule" which allows recovery by the unlicensed business broker based upon the value of the personalty portion of the transaction, regardless of the relative value of the real property, and further, allows the unlicensed business broker to prove such value from surrounding circumstances. n11

All fifty states and the District of Columbia require the licensing of persons who act as real estate brokers or otherwise offer their services as real estate agents. n12 The same is not true of business brokers and business opportunity brokers. However, the sales of most ongoing businesses generally include either real estate owned by that business, or a leasehold interest for the premises occupied by the business. As a result, most sales of business assets and sales of ongoing businesses involve some type of transfer or conveyance of real estate interest, and based upon the jurisdiction in which the transaction takes place various regulations and licensing requirements relate to the regulation of duties owed, obligations incurred, and the payment of commissions on all or a part of the sale.

Some states define the term real estate broker to include those who sell or negotiate the sale or exchange of a business, business opportunity, or the goodwill of a business. n12.1 Under such a statute an unlicensed individual involved in the sale of a business may be unable to sue to collect on any agreed upon commission. n12.2

The trend in most states appears to be integration of business brokerage activities into the real estate broker licensing scheme. Some states, like Oregon, separately license and regulate business opportunity brokers. n13 Under the Oregon statute, an unlicensed individual who engages in an isolated business brokerage transaction requires neither a business broker's license nor a real estate broker's license if he or she did not "intend" for the transaction to result in the sale of real estate. n14 Similarly, in California, it has been held that an intermediary who merely introduces two parties in a real estate transaction is not a "broker" for the purposes of the state's licensing laws. n15 While these approaches allow an unlicensed person to recover a commission in some circumstances, there are states that disallow any compensation if the transaction involves any real estate. n16

The subject transaction may be covered by a state's securities laws if corporate stock is being sold. The purchase of a business through a stock transaction may fall under the regulations for a securities transaction and license rather than for a real estate or property transaction and license. n17

10A-12 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 12.02

§ 12.02 Business Broker's Entitlement to Commission

[1] In General

Courts in the various jurisdictions have applied four distinct analyses to determine when a business broker, who is not licensed as a real estate broker, may recover a commission or finder's fee for bringing parties together. The "majority rule" focuses on the divisibility of the real and personal property in the sale of a business. The "New York rule" examines whether the sale of the business as a going concern predominates in the transaction. Under the "Mississippi rule," a commission is recoverable unless the real estate is the dominant feature of the sale. Finally, the "modified New Jersey rule" permits a business broker to be compensated as long as separate value can be proven, by agreement or otherwise, for the non-real estate aspects of the transaction.

Some business brokers enter into contracts with prospective purchasers in order to protect their commissions. In Plaza Properties, Ltd. v. Prime Business Investments, Inc., n1 in return for the broker providing certain information regarding a laundry, n1.1 the broker and the prospective purchaser signed a contract whereby the purchaser agreed to negotiate only through the broker for the purchase of a laundry. The purchaser agreed that if he violated the terms of the contract, he would be liable to the broker for any lost commission. Subsequently, the purchaser acquired the laundry using the services of another broker who received less than one-third of what the first broker would have been entitled to under its listing agreement with the seller. The broker sued the purchaser for its commission. n1.2 One defense asserted by the purchaser was lack of consideration. The court found that the contract clearly provided that the consideration consisted of the information provided to the purchaser regarding the business. The purchaser was found to be liable for the broker's commission and the broker's attorneys fees. n1.3

Some courts distinguish between a sale of assets and a sale of corporate stock for purposes of applying statutes regulating the activities of real estate brokers. Courts recognizing this distinction hold that a sale of corporate stock is exempt from real estate broker licensing laws. n1.4 However, other courts have held that sales of corporate stock are covered by real estate broker licensing laws. n1.5

[2] The Majority Rule

[a] Divisibility of Value of Realty and Personality

In most jurisdictions, the rule followed is that the unlicensed broker will receive no commission if any real estate is involved in the sale of the business unless, according to the terms of the commission agreement, the real and personal property values are divisible. n1.6 The majority rule n2 (also known previously as the "New Jersey rule") is based on the 1933 New Jersey Decision in Kenney v. Patterson Milk and Cream Company, n3 which denied recovery of a commission to the unlicensed broker who negotiated the sale of the dairy's real and personal property. The plaintiff lost his suit because the sales contract provided that the consideration was to be paid in a lump sum amount and was therefore incapable of being divided. The court reasoned that the business broker could only recover if the portion of the contract involving the sale of realty could be severed from the portion of the contract which involved the sale of personalty. n4

Most agreements involving the sale of a business by an unlicensed broker do not separate the sale into real and personal property. Instead, the agreement typically is for the sale of "the business." The majority rule thus outright bars any compensation for the unlicensed broker. The rationale for the majority rule is that the transaction is viewed as a whole and the sale would not have occurred but for the sale of the real estate. n4.1 Thus, under the majority rule, the unlicensed broker is not entitled to any commission from the sale of business assets which include an interest in real estate no matter how de minimis. n4.2

[b] Requirement of Real Estate Broker's License

A court's determination, under the majority rule of whether a real estate broker's license is required in the sale of a business which appears to involve both realty and personalty may depend upon the characterization given to certain property interests under state law. While it is generally held that a leasehold interest is real property, n5 it has been held in some instances that leasehold interests were instead personal property. n6

[c] Restrictiveness of Statutory Definition of "Broker"

Another factor a court may consider in a determination to follow the majority approach is the relative restrictiveness of the particular state's statutory definition of a real estate broker. Courts in states with restrictive statutory definitions of "real estate broker" may follow the view that a real estate broker's license is not required, n7 while a court in a state following a broad statutory definition of the term would most likely follow the view that a real estate broker's license is required. n8 In Thomas v. Jarvis, n9 the Kansas Supreme Court held that the plaintiff, a specialist in the field of corporate mergers and acquisitions, who had negotiated the sale of three corporations controlled by the defendants, was required to be licensed under the Real Estate Broker Statute. The court observed:

There are many cases throughout the United States on the question of whether or not a business broker is required to obtain a real estate brokers license. The determination of the necessity for real estate brokers license where the sale is of both real and personal property is usually held to depend upon the language of the particular statute under consideration. In some cases a business broker has been deemed to be a real estate broker within licensing statutes, but in other cases under other statutes a contrary conclusion has been reached. The plaintiffs rely upon those cases which hold that the business brokers are not real estate brokers within the statutory definition. The plaintiff's position, in substance, is that it was not the intent of the legislature to extend K.S.A. 1972 supp. 58-3002, to a situation such as is presented in this case, where the intention of the parties was to sell a going business and where the real estate sold was only incidental to the sale of the going concern. In support of their position the plaintiffs rely on decisions in New York, Arkansas and Colorado, which follow what is usually referred to as the New York rule. It is the minority rule in the United States ... the statutory definition of real estate broker in these states is more restrictive than are the statutory definitions in Kansas under 58-3002 and in those states which adopt the contrary position.

The majority rule adopted in the United States is based upon Kenney v. Patterson Milk & Cream Co., 110 N.J.L. 141, 164 A. 274 ... in those states which follow the majority rule and require a business broker to have a real estate brokers license, the statutory definition of a real estate broker is comparable to the broad statutory definition provided in 58-302.

We believe that the statutory language used in K.S.A. 1972 supp. 58-3002, is determinative of the issues in the present case. The sale of assets of Salina Manufacturing and Jarrett Electric to Butler fits squarely within the category of, "any transaction which does ... result in the sale ... of any real estate" n10

[3] The New York Rule

[a] Sale of Business as Going Concern

In 1926, the New York Court of Appeals ruled in the case of Weingast v. Rialto Pastry Shops, Inc. n11 in what has become known as the "New York rule" that the business broker is not required to be licensed as a real estate broker where the dominant or central feature of the agreement is the sale of a business as a going concern as opposed to the sale of real property. n12 The court relied on two major factors to allow the business broker to recover his commission despite the fact that he had no real estate broker's license. First, holding that the business broker had to be licensed would result in harsh punishment: not only is one who engages in the acts of a real estate broker without a license not entitled to recover a commission, but he is also subject to criminal prosecution. n13 Second, the court found that the legislature had not intended that the statutory definition of "real estate broker" cover the type of individual before the court. The court reasoned that while the lease of the restaurant was an important part of the total agreement, the most significant element was the transfer of the business with all of its equipment and accompanying "good will" as an integrated whole rather than as separate purchases of realty and personalty. n14

The New York statute that was the subject of the Weingast case provided that the term "real estate broker" meant "any person, firm, or corporation, who, for a commission or other valuable consideration, lists for sale an "interest in real estate." n15 The Weingast court observed that the provision was not broad enough to cover, nor was it intended to cover, every transaction in which an interest in real estate may be part of the subject of the transfer. The court reasoned that the statute would not apply to one who exercises the calling of selling or exchanging businesses as going concerns, although as part of the good will, such sale may include the right to continue business in particular location, in this case a lease of the store or building. The court reasoned that a person who makes a specialty of procuring purchasers for restaurants, drug stores, grocery stores, and the like as going concerns, where a lease simply facilitated the continuance of the business under new ownership at a new location, did not make that individual a real estate broker within the law. n16

This same view was followed and restated in Dodge v. Richmond, n17 wherein the court held that the mere inclusion of an item of real estate in a sale involving the transfer of assets of a business would not be sufficient to bar an action for the recovery of a commission. The court emphasized that the inclusion of real estate in a business, without more, does not establish that a person is carrying on the business of a real estate broker so as to bring him within the purview of the statute that prohibits unlicensed brokers from receiving a commission. The court found that the statute was not broad enough to cover every transaction which an interest in real estate was involved, and the court asserted that in looking to the nature of the transaction as well as the purpose of the statute, if an item of real estate or an interest in real estate is a mere incident or incidental feature to the transaction, the statute requiring licensure should not apply. This rule would apply even though the cost of the real estate could be a significant feature in the transaction, so long as it was not deemed to be the dominant feature in the sale.

Under the New York rule, if the transaction's dominant feature is the transfer of real property, a party who does not have a real estate broker's license will be barred from collecting a fee for endeavors in the nature of brokerage services. n17.1

[b] Application of the Rule in States Other than New York

Similar views have been reached by courts in other states. In Atlanta Realty Company v. Sloan, n18 a Georgia court asserted that the term "business" did not mean "property," but rather connoted the activity, the energy, the capacity, and the opportunities by which results are reached. Without alluding to the real property as an incidental portion of the sale, the court concluded that it could not, as a matter of law, hold that a business broker necessarily sells interests in real property when a business is sold. The court therefore concluded that it was unnecessary for a broker to secure a real estate broker's license in order to operate as a business broker.

Prior to the enactment in Colorado of a broker licensing statute in 1965, Colorado courts had also adopted the New York rule. In the 1963 case of Cary v. Borden Company, n19 an action was brought to recover a commission and fee as a finder and business broker because of services rendered by the plaintiff in aiding the first defendant to acquire a dairy from the second defendant. The plaintiff sued to recover his commission and the court ruled that the plaintiff's lack of a real estate broker's license would not prevent him from recovering a commission even though realty was involved. The court applied what it called the "dominant feature" rule holding:

As we view it, the fact that realty, if separately considered, would fall within the descriptive words of the statute, cannot justify the isolation of it for the purpose of treating it as the subject of a separate sale; the realty must be regarded as constituting an essential part of the exceptional and unitary subject matter of the sale--the sale of a going concern in which the realty involved was "not a dominant feature." We will not extend the statute by implication so as to make the conduct of "the plaintiff" criminal. n20

The court cited Weingast v. Rialto Pastry Shop n21 and Dodge v. Richmond n22 in holding that, "he, who pursuant to an agreement, negotiates or aids in the transfer of a going business may recover a commission despite the fact that real estate forms an incident of the transaction and he has not a real estate broker's license. This is true even though such item may be a significant though not a dominant feature of the transaction." n23

The case contrasted its holding to the majority rule. It cited Kenney v. Patterson Milk & Cream Co., Inc. n24 as holding that, "if a contract be in its nature entire, and one part of it satisfies the statute, and in others it does not, then it is altogether void." n25 It found supporting views in California, Ohio and Washington. As stated earlier, the Cary case was decided prior to the passage of the Colorado licensing statute.

Some years after the Cary case, Broughall v. Black Forrest Development Company n26 was decided by the Supreme Court of Colorado, sitting en banc. In Broughall, the plaintiff brought an action against the seller of a radio station to recover a fee for finding a buyer. When the case was dismissed in favor of the seller, the plaintiff-finder appealed. The court held that where the sale involved the change of ownership or interest in a business owning a leasehold interest, the transaction came within the ambit of the real estate statute and, thus, the plaintiff was precluded from recovering any finder's fee because he was not a currently licensed real estate salesman or broker. This later case relied on the fact that the applicable Colorado statute n27 defined a "real estate broker" as "anyone who negotiates or attempts or offers to negotiate the listing, sale, purchase, exchange or lease of a business or business opportunity, or ... includes the act of a finder who brings two parties together." n28 The court found that it was the intent of the statute to align the state with the rule requiring a finder or a broker to have a real estate broker's license if the sale of a business included any interest in real estate.

The court cited the Cary v. Borden Company n29 case and specifically noted that subsequent to the Cary decision the legislature amended the Colorado statute n30 evidencing the legislative intent to align Colorado with the majority rule.

In Lieff v. Medco Professional Services Corporation, n30.1 the court addressed the issue of whether Colorado's licensure requirements applied to the sale of a business where immediately after the closing the seller's leasehold was terminated and the buyer entered into a substitute lease. The unlicensed broker in this case assisted in the sale of all the stock of the defendant's company. The broker subsequently sued for the unpaid portion of his commission. The defendant contended that the brokerage contract was void and unenforceable because the plaintiff was not a licensed real estate broker. Resolution of this case centered around the issue of whether the sale involved an interest in real property. When the brokerage contract was entered into, the broker and seller believed that a lease existed prior to the sale between the business and its landlord. The court found that the business possessed an interest in real estate consisting of, at the very least, a tenancy at will. It was undisputed that contemporaneously with the transfer, a long-term lease was substituted for the tenancy at will.

With the exception of licensed securities brokers, Colorado law requires a real estate license for anyone:

[n]egotiating or attempting or offering to negotiate the listing, sale, purchase, exchange, or lease of a business or business opportunity or the goodwill thereof or any interest therein when such act or transaction involves, directly or indirectly, any change in the ownership or interest in real estate, or in a leasehold interest or estate, or in a business or business opportunity which owns an interest in real estate or a leasehold ... n30.2

This provision had previously been held to apply to the sale of a business where an interest in real estate was transferred. n30.3 The broker argued that the statute required licensure only where the seller's leasehold interest is actually transferred as part of the transaction. The broker distinguished his case on the basis that no interest in real estate passed to the buyer as part of the transaction. The court rejected these arguments and found that this sale was subject to the licensure requirements. It stated:

We conclude that there is no requirement that real estate or a leasehold be transferred from one legal entity to another to trigger the licensure requirements. Rather, where, as here, the corporation whose entire stock is sold holds a leasehold that becomes the buyer's leasehold as a result of the sale, whether by transfer from the seller or otherwise, an indirect change in a leasehold interest [sic], and therefore, the licensure requirements apply. (emphasis in original) n30.4

The holding in Lieff effectively requires that anyone acting as a broker in the sale of a business in Colorado must have a real estate broker's license. It is difficult to envision any business that can operate without occupying real estate either as a tenant or owner. n30.5 Even businesses that only conduct business on the World Wide Web must have an earth-based location where their computers, personnel, and inventory are located. The court's interpretation of this statutory provision extends real estate brokerage licensure requirements to anyone acting as business broker in Colorado.

Lieff illustrates that business brokers are best protected by obtaining licensure as real estate brokers. It seems to be an all-too-common occurrence for business sellers to attempt to avoid paying a commission by asserting that a business broker should have been licensed as a real estate broker.

[4] The Mississippi Rule

[a] Recovery of Commission on Personality

The so-called "Mississippi rule" allows the business broker to recover a commission on the personality alone, provided that the transfer of the real estate is not the dominant purpose of the sale. n31 The rule derives from the 1970 case of Quick Shop of Mississippi, Inc. v. Bruce. n32 In that case, the plaintiff was a licensed real estate broker in Georgia but not in Mississippi. He sued to recover a commission in connection with the sale of an ongoing business. The defendant-corporation defended the suit by contending that the plaintiff-broker was barred from recovering a brokerage commission because he was unlicensed and the transaction involved a real estate lease.

The plaintiff contended, however, that although he was not a licensed real estate broker in Mississippi, he was principally a business broker and that the sale in question was of an ongoing business which involved as its dominant feature, not real estate, but the established reputation, good will and other elements of the going enterprise (all of which are personality). He sought recovery based on the value of these items only and not on the value of the defendant's nonrenewable lease, lot or fixtures.

The jury found for the plaintiff-broker on the court's instructions that the plaintiff was neither entitled to nor claimed a commission on the value of the real estate, and that the plaintiff could not recover anything if "the predominant feature of the contract involved the sale of real estate." n33

On appeal, the Mississippi Supreme Court sustained the jury verdict. Like the New York court, the Mississippi court analyzed the statute requiring licensure of real estate brokers, and found it to be penal in nature. Under that analysis, the Mississippi court concluded that the application of the statute could not be extended by implication. Since the statute did not expressly contemplate barring an unlicensed broker from a commission on anything other than real estate, the jury verdict would be enforced. n34

[b] Statutory Construction

Under the Mississippi rule, courts tend to narrowly construe real estate brokerage licensing statutes that are penal in nature, thereby leaving the business broker able to recover a commission on only the non-real estate value of the sale, provided that there is a factual showing that the real estate portion of the transaction does not constitute a dominant part of the sale. The court in Quick Shops n35 did not establish any specific criteria or rules to make this determination and the matter is left in each case to the trier of fact.

[5] The Modified New Jersey Rule

[a] In General

As stated earlier, the majority rule is based on the 1933 New Jersey decision in Kenney v. Paterson Milk and Cream Company. n36 The basis for the decision has been previously cited as the New Jersey rule. The New Jersey Supreme Court, however, revisited and modified this rule in 1982 in the case of Kazmer-Standish Consultants v. Schoeffel Instruments Corp. n37 In Kazmer-Standish, the plaintiff-broker sued for a commission from the sale of an ongoing business that included an interest in real estate. The business had substantial real estate holdings, and the court held that:

(1) a business broker is not included within the definition of a real estate broker under the New Jersey Statute; and

(2) a broker in the sale of an ongoing business may recover a commission in the sale of the personalty not only when the personalty is separately valued in the commission agreement, but also when the valuation appears in the sales agreement or can be proven from the surrounding circumstances.

South Carolina has adopted the modified New Jersey rule. In Roberts v. Gaskins, n37.1 the Court of Appeals of South Carolina stated this rule as follows:

[A] business broker unlicensed as a real estate broker may enforce a commission contractually earned on the sale of the personal property of a business, irrespective of the form of sale, even though the sale may include real estate; provided, of course, no commission can be based either directly or indirectly on the value of the real property involved. n37.2

[b] Construction of Broker's Statute

In determining whether business brokers should be treated like real estate brokers under the state's statutes, the Kazmer-Standish court noted that unlike some jurisdictions, the New Jersey statute did not expressly apply to the brokerage of business opportunities. n38 Further, the court noted that the purpose of the legislation was to "protect consumers by excluding 'undesirable, unscrupulous, and dishonest persons ... from the real estate business.'" n39 Based upon this stated purpose, the court reasoned that there was nothing in the legislative text or history which would indicate that the licensing statute was "intended to protect businessmen from business brokers." n40

[c] Agreement to Apportion Commission

The court in Kazmer-Standish noted that while New Jersey courts had been somewhat uncritical in their consistent adherence to the Kenney rule, that rule did not preclude any commission to an unlicensed broker if the sale of the business included real property. Kenney, stated the court, "permits a broker to recover a commission on the personalty in the sale of a business that also includes real estate if the listing agreement apportions the commission between the personalty and realty." n41

While acknowledging that Kenney represented the prevailing majority rule in the United States, the court noted that the rule has been criticized for: (1) failing to recognize that broker licensing acts are intended to protect consumers of residential properties and not businessmen; (2) depriving the broker of money he has "truly" earned; and (3) failing to take into account modern economic conditions. n42

The Kazmer-Standish court went on to distinguish its new rules from those adopted in other minority rule jurisdictions. The court noted that both the New York and Mississippi Rules deny a commission to a business broker unless the personal property is the dominant feature of the transaction. The New Jersey Court stated that it felt the broker should not be deprived of a commission merely because the value of the real estate was greater than the value of the other assets in the going concern. The court recognized that the personalty of an ongoing business could be substantial and provide the basis for a significant commission and still be less valuable than the real property involved in the sale. The court felt that it was more equitable and reasonable to permit recovery on that part of the sale of an ongoing business represented by personal property, regardless of the relative values of the real and personal property, where there was an absence of legislative direction prohibiting recovery. The court reasoned that brokers should be paid when they perform in accordance with their agreements and held that honest brokers should not be deprived of commissions on the sale of personal property, because of the state's regulation of real estate brokers. n43

CHAPTER 12 Business Brokers, Business Opportunity Brokers and Finders *

10A-12 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 12.03

§ 12.03 Oral Compensation Agreements

[1] Application of the Statute of Frauds Generally

No matter which approach a particular state chooses to follow, there is an additional obstacle that the unlicensed finder or business broker will have to overcome: that is, that the commission agreement must satisfy the statute of frauds if any interest in real property is involved. n1 The commission agreement must be in writing to satisfy the statute of frauds, unless the sale involves only personal property and not an interest in real estate.

Further, even though the statute of frauds generally has no application in the case of personal property, there may be other statutes preventing the recovery of a fee under an oral employment agreement. In McCooey v. Forstmann Leff Associates, Inc., n1.1 the New York Appellate Division held that the statute of frauds (New York General Obligations Law Section 5-701(a)(10)), barred an oral promise "to pay compensation for services rendered in negotiating ... a business opportunity." n2

[2] Quantum Meruit Under the Statute of Frauds

The case of Minichiello v. Royal Business Funds Corp. n3 specifically addressed the question of whether the business opportunity broker could recover in quantum meruit despite the lack of a writing as required by the New York statute of frauds. The Minichiello court examined the New York Law Revision Commission's comments on the amendment to the statute of frauds to determine whether recovery of a fee or commission, the business opportunity broker or finder depended upon a written agreement, and whether the legislature intended to bar any recovery in quantum meruit in the absence of a writing. n4

The court noted at the outset that the statute of frauds had been amended in 1964 to specifically provide that "negotiating" included "procuring in introduction to a party to a transaction or assisting in the negotiation of a transaction" and was made applicable to "a contract implied in fact or in law". n5 Construing the meaning of the statute as originally enacted in 1949 as it applied to the case, the Minichiello court cited the recommendation of the New York Law Revision Commission in proposing the 1964 amendment. The Commission had noted that:

In recent years there have been a substantial number of reported cases of claims for commissions for services rendered in the sale of a going business or business opportunity. Under existing law there is no requirement that business broker's contracts for commissions be in writing. The nature of the transaction is such that, in the absence of a requirement of a writing, unfounded and multiple claims for commissions are frequently asserted, and employers often seek to escape liability by denying the fact of employment. These controversies are commonly resolved by juries on conflicting testimony, with the consequent danger of erroneous verdicts. n6

Thus, the Commission believed that the danger of erroneous verdicts in allowing a jury to determine a finder's fee case on oral testimony warranted a requirement that the commission agreement be in writing.

The Minichiello decision was cited in the 1993 case of Fidelity Business Brokers, Inc. v. Gamaldi n7 where licensing was an important factor. In Gamaldi, the plaintiff brought an action to recover real estate and business broker's commission pursuant to an alleged oral agreement made with the defendant. The plaintiff-broker sought to recover a commission for services rendered in connection with procuring a buyer for certain grocery stores and real property owned by the defendant. The court allowed the recovery of the commission under the theory of quantum meruit by holding that licensed real estate brokers are expressly exempt from the requirements of the statute of frauds. The court held that neither recovery of damages for breach of contract, nor recovery for quantum meruit, was precluded by the absence of a signed writing evidencing the party's agreement. n8

An interestingly contrary result can be reached, however, if the plaintiff is able to show that although unlicensed, his actions were merely those of a "finder" and that he did not engage in "negotiations" as contemplated by the statutes. In Loyd v. Saffa, n9 the Court of Appeals of Oklahoma allowed the plaintiff to recover his fee based on an oral agreement, in the face of the fact that the plaintiff had no license whatsoever. A most striking aspect of the case was that the transaction did not involve the sale of the business but was solely a real estate deal. The plaintiff-finder located a purchaser who he introduced to the plaintiff-seller, and the transaction was completed. The finder sued for his agreed-upon fee, and the seller objected on the grounds that the finder was not a licensed real estate broker. Upon appeal from a grant of judgment to the seller, the Court of Appeals held that a finder did not act as a broker within the meaning of the applicable statute if he did not participate in the negotiation process and that the seller could not disavow the existence of an oral agreement after admitting it in connection with a motion for summary judgment. Stating that although Saffa did agree to pay a finder's fee as alleged, Loyd negotiated or attempted to negotiate a transaction which made him a real estate broker within the meaning of the definition under the Oklahoma statute. Remanding the case, the Court of Appeals stated that the issue to be tried was whether the finder performed the contractual role of a "middleman" and put "the parties in a position where they could and did make their own deal." n10 If such was the case, Loyd was entitled to recover his commission, notwithstanding the fact that he was not licensed.

Soon after Minichiello was decided, the Second Circuit, in a diversity case involving a New York business broker and a Florida paper corporation, applied the New York rule in a quantum meruit suit for services rendered to the company in its negotiations for acquisition of a foreign corporation. In Lee v. St. Joe Paper Company, n11 the plaintiff was an industrial and management consultant who acted as both a broker and salesman of raw materials and machinery to be used in the production of paper. The plaintiff-broker suggested to the defendant company that it should invest overseas. The defendant-investor told the plaintiff to gather information about a factory in Ireland, which the plaintiff did. After a series of meetings between the defendant and the Irish company, an investment agreement was made.

When the broker's demand for commission was refused, he brought an action in quantum meruit since he had no written employment contract with the defendant. The court based its decisions solely on Minichiello and denied the plaintiff any recovery. The Second Circuit found it unnecessary to analyze the case any further than to say that the New York Court of Appeals decision "made it clear that the statute [of frauds] does indeed bar [the finder's] action." n12

[3] Estoppel as Basis for Recovery

While the New York approach embodied in Minichiello appears to foreclose any recovery by an unlicensed finder or business broker under an oral agreement where the applicable statute of frauds requires a writing, the Supreme Court of California has held that although there is no finders exception to that state's statute of frauds, an unlicensed finder faced with a statute of frauds defense to his claim for a fee is entitled to invoke the doctrine of estoppel against that defense, and may also assert an action for fraud even though the allegedly fraudulent promise is unenforceable as a contract by reason of the statute of frauds. n13

In Tenzer v. Superscope, Inc., n14 the plaintiff sued the defendant for a finder's fee, claiming that the chairman of the board of directors had asked him to help save the company from bankruptcy by finding a cash purchaser for the corporate headquarters. The plaintiff, Tenzer, asserted in his complaint that he was orally promised a fee of ten percent of the $16 million sales price for "finding, referring and assisting in reaching the eventual transaction with the buyer of [Superscope's property]." n15 Tenzer claimed that he had in no way been involved in any of the specific negotiations which lead to the consummated sale. In addition to his claim for breach of contract and unjust enrichment, Tenzer asserted causes of action for estoppel and fraud.

The court noted that although California case law held that a finder in a real estate transaction need not be licensed as a real estate broker to collect his finder's fee, n16 the cases do not indicate any finders exception to the statute of frauds. However, the court found that Tenzer was entitled to a trial on his claims of unjust enrichment and fraud despite the bar of the statute of frauds. They ruled that Tenzer had alleged facts sufficient to invoke the estoppel doctrine and thus foreclose Superscope from relying upon the statute of frauds as a defense. They concluded that the allegations that Superscope had received the benefit from Tenzer's performance but relied on the statute of frauds to avoid paying the commission suggested a case of unjust enrichment. In such cases, said the court, the doctrine of estoppel to plead the statute of frauds may be applied in the interests of fairness.

The court made a further distinction between real estate brokers and finders, who need not be licensed brokers. In citing Keeley v. Price, n17 the court noted that licensed real estate brokers cannot assert equitable remedies to avoid the bar of the statute of frauds. The rationale for the strict application of the statute of frauds to bar claims by licensed real estate brokers was that real estate brokers are licensed only after they have demonstrated a knowledge of the laws relating to real estate transactions. This rationale, however, was held inapplicable to finders and the court therefore declined to extend the scope of Keeley to unlicensed finders such as Tenzer. Thus, the court was able to overcome the statute of frauds through the estoppel claim of Tenzer.

[4] Fraud and the "Kroeger" Rule

The Tenzer case also considered the issue of fraud. Tenzer alleged that Superscope defrauded him of his fee by falsely promising to pay him for his services as a finder without any intention of keeping its part of the bargain, and that Tenzer had acted in reliance upon the false promise to his detriment. The court took the opportunity to disapprove the so-called "Kroeger" rule, which had derived from a line of cases beginning with Kroeger v. Baur n18 that had held that an action for fraud cannot be maintained where enforcement of the allegedly fraudulent promise is barred by the statute of frauds.

The court felt that the Kroeger approach was inconsistent with the general rule "that the statute of frauds, having been enacted for the purpose of preventing fraud, shall not be made the instrument of shielding, protecting or aiding the party who relies upon it in the perpetration of a fraud or in the consummation of a fraudulent scheme." n19

The result in Tenzer prevents the use of the statute of frauds as a means to defraud the finder out of his commission.

CHAPTER 12 Business Brokers, Business Opportunity Brokers and Finders *

10A-12 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 12.04

§ 12.04 Statutory Regulation

The prevailing trend has been to expand the definition of "broker" under the various state real estate licensing acts to include business brokers and/or business opportunity brokers. Other states, that previously had followed the New York rule, have amended their statutes to either expressly include business brokers within the meaning of "real estate broker" or have included the functions of a business broker within the definition of real estate brokerage. Twenty-one states currently legislate business brokerage through the real estate licensing act. n1

The Washington statute defines the term "business opportunity" to include "business, business opportunity and goodwill of an existing business or any combination thereof." n2 Under this definition, all business brokers are subject to the state's licensing requirements, regardless of whether an interest in real estate is involved in the business transaction. Other states, such as Massachusetts, have included within the scope of their real estate brokerage statutes the negotiation or closing of any transaction which does or is calculated to result in the sale ... of any real estate. n3 Substantially similar language has been held by the Supreme Court of Kansas to be sufficiently descriptive for courts to find appropriate legislative intent to regulate business brokers. n4

It is also quite common in statutory definitions of real estate brokers, to provide that any single act, transaction, or sale (meaning those within the definition) shall constitute engaging in business within the meaning of the real estate licensing act. n5 Although this provision does not deal directly with business brokers, when it is combined with other clauses, such as those already mentioned, it has a cumulative effect which results in the coverage of such brokers. This type of statute is actually aimed at those who seek to escape the licensing requirements by arguing that such statutes were intended to regulate only professional real estate brokers and not individuals who just negotiate or close a single isolated real estate deal. It has been said that even standing alone, the broad impact of the statutory language at least partially neutralizes the business brokers argument that he is not engaged in the business of a real estate broker and that a particular business transaction on incidentally involves the transfer or sale of real estate.

Although the statutes in most jurisdictions do not include all three provisions, most contain at least one, and some contain even two. n6 Thus, even without express language bringing the business broker or finder within the ambit of the legislation regulating real estate brokers, courts, depending upon their view of public interest in regulating such individuals, may well see such statutory language as a mandate to require the business broker or finder to comply with the statutory scheme for the licensing and regulation of real estate brokers.

§ 12.05 Business Brokerage Forms

[1] Standard Listing Agreement Standard Listing Agreement

STANDARD LISTING AGREEMENT n1

This Agreement (herein so called) is entered into on this date between (hereafter called "Broker") and the owner(s) or authorized representative of the owner(s) and/or of the legal entity which owns the Business (herein so called) described below (hereafter called "Seller", whether one or more, or authorized representative).

In consideration of the mutual covenants contained in this Agreement and for other good and valuable consideration, the receipt and sufficiency of which is hereby acknowledged, the parties hereby agree as follows:

Seller hereby grants the Broker the EXCLUSIVE RIGHT TO SELL and authority to act as agent to arrange the sale of the Business or part thereof described as follows:

A. Name:

B. Location:

C. Form of Ownership (check one): ☐ Sole Proprietorship; ☐ Corporation; ☐ Partnership; ☐ Limited Partnership; ☐ Other (specify, e.g. Trust, etc.)

D. Owned by the following:

F. Liabilities to be Assumed:

.....

G. Real Estate Included in Sale:

.....

H. Sale Price: $

....

(Subject to adjustment for variation in asset value at closing. Above Sale Price is based upon inventory on hand, at cost, value of $

..... and other value(s), if any of

.....).

Payable as Follows:

(1) Cash at Closing

(2) Assumption of Existing Indebtedness

(3) Seller Financing

(4) Other (Specify)

SALE PRICE $.....

I. Of the total Sales Price, $

..... is apportioned to the real estate interest to be conveyed or assigned and $

..... is apportioned to the non-real estate assets to be conveyed or assigned. n2

2. Seller hereby grants the EXCLUSIVE RIGHT TO SELL to Broker for a primary period of months from the date of this Agreement. After the primary period, this Agreement shall continue until terminated by operation of law or upon ten (10) days written notice of termination delivered by one (1) party to the other by certified mail, return receipt requested. If not otherwise terminated, this Agreement shall terminate on, 19....

3. If the Seller effects the sale of a Related Business during the existence of this Agreement or within two (2) years after the termination of this Agreement and such sale is made by any purchaser or prospective purchaser with whom Broker or any cooperating broker had any contact regarding the sale of the Business during the existence of this Agreement, Broker shall be entitled to a commission on the sale in accordance with paragraph 10 hereof. (The term "Related Business" shall mean and include any property and/or Business that is directly related to the Business described above, e.g., Real Estate or other property connected with the Business, etc., and that is owned in whole or part by the same persons or legal entities that own the Business. "Related Business" shall also mean and include other businesses and/or other locations if such business and/or other locations are engaged in the same general business activities as such Business described above.) n3

4. In any sale hereunder, Broker is expressly authorized to represent and to receive compensation from any and all parties to the sale or exchange of the Business and the receipt or accrual of any such compensation to Broker from such parties, other than Seller, shall not diminish Seller's obligation under this Agreement. If Broker is engaged to represent or receive compensation from any party to the sale of the Business, other than Seller, Broker will disclose such relationship to Seller, in writing within a reasonable time after such relationship arises.

5. At all times during the existence of this Agreement, Seller shall cooperate with Broker in showing the Business, providing information to prospective purchasers and furnishing prospective purchasers reasonable information within Seller's knowledge or subject to Seller's control concerning all aspects of the Business. Seller shall refer to Broker all inquiries he may receive or be aware of concerning sale of the Business.

6. Seller represents and warrants that all information previously or hereunder furnished to Broker is true and correct and/or complete and accurate in all material respects. Seller understands and acknowledges that all information supplied to Broker as described above, will be relied on by Broker when promoting the Business to prospective purchasers. Broker will make no independent investigation with respect to any and all claims, demands, causes of action or liability whatsoever, including costs, expenses and reasonable attorney's fees, arising out of a breach of the warranty to supply information as described above.

7. In the event Broker procures a purchaser for the Business under the terms described above or any other terms acceptable to Seller, Seller agrees to thereupon execute a written letter of intent or an offer to purchase with the purchaser, which document shall contain the essential terms and conditions of the proposed sale. Thereafter, Seller shall cause to be executed and delivered to the purchaser such documents as shall be necessary to vest in the purchaser good and marketable title to the Business.

8. In connection with the sale of the Business, the Seller, at the request of purchaser, shall execute a Covenant Not to Compete in a form reasonably acceptable to the purchaser.

9. Upon the execution of this Agreement, Seller shall pay to Broker a non-refundable retainer in the amount of $ In the event a commission is earned and payable upon the occurrence of any event as described in paragraph 11 of this Agreement, the retainer shall be applied as a credit to such commission. If no commission is due or earned by Broker, then Broker shall keep the retainer as compensation for services hereunder. However, in the event a commission is due or earned by Broker hereunder, neither the retainer, nor the retention thereof by Broker, will be considered liquidated damages payment, waiver, estoppel, accord and satisfaction, release or other discharge of Seller's obligation to pay the commission otherwise due or earned by Broker hereunder. n4

10. For services rendered by Broker under this Agreement, Seller shall pay broker a commission in cash equal to a certain percent or percentages of the Sales Price of said Business or Related Business, such percentage of the Sale Price to be on a scale as follows:

B. In no event shall the commission payable to Broker be less than $

..... (minimum commission).

11. The commission described in paragraph 10 shall be earned and payable, in cash, to Broker at Broker's office in County, Texas upon the occurrence of any of the following events: n5

A. The sale of the Business during the existence of this Agreement.

B. The sale of the Business at any time within two (2) years after the termination of this Agreement, if such sale is made to any purchaser or prospective purchaser with whom the Broker (or any cooperating broker), Seller, or any agent or employee of Seller had any contact regarding same during the existence of this Agreement.

C. Broker obtains an offer to purchase the Business upon terms and conditions specified in Paragraph 1 or upon other terms and conditions acceptable to Seller from a ready, willing and able prospective purchaser.

D. Seller accepts in writing an offer from a prospective purchaser and Seller then fails to complete the sale of the Business.

E. Seller violates the terms of this Agreement and/or breaches any material warranty or representation made herein, or withdraws the Business from the market and/or otherwise attempts to terminate this Agreement prior to its expiration date.

F. The sale of a Related Business as described in Paragraph 3.

12. The term "sale" is defined as any transfer, conveyance, merger, consolidation, exchange, creation of partnership, franchise, indenture or disposition of the Business, including, without limitation, the sale, consignment, assignment, lease or hypothecation of the Business or a Related Business, its capital stock, assets or any portion thereof (other than in the ordinary course of business), or the employment of a prospective purchaser with whom Broker, any cooperating Broker or Seller had any contact during the existence of this Agreement.

13. The term "Sale Price" shall mean any and all amounts of money or other consideration paid or conveyed to Seller, or for Seller's benefit, or paid or conveyed by a purchaser in connection with a sale of the assets or capital stock of the Business or a Related Business plus all liabilities and/or obligations assumed by a purchaser. This shall include, without limitation, cash, stocks, bonds, indentures, debentures, promissory notes, negotiable instruments, real or personal property, letters or lines of credit, loans, payments under employment and consulting agreements, non-competition agreements, partnership agreements, rental agreements, or lease agreements, options, payments pursuant to option agreements, capital investments, the assumption or discharge of liabilities, or any combination of the above or any other consideration or things of value. In addition, Sale Price shall specifically include any and all payments made or to be made by a purchaser that are contingent upon future events, such as a license, franchise, or royalty agreements, payments based on future sales or profits and all other items of a contingent nature. Any portion of the Sale Price that is dependent upon contingent payments shall be negotiated in good faith by the parties hereto and shall be based on reasonable expectations of payments to the benefit of the Seller. n6

14. Seller represents and warrants that Seller is duly authorized to represent all owners, direct or indirect, of the Business, and all such owners are bound by the terms and conditions of this Agreement. Further, Seller represents and warrants that Seller, the principals of Seller, or Seller's agents or representatives will not take any action which will impair the salability or marketability of the property or Business that is subject to this Agreement.

15. Seller represents and warrants that, except for Broker, Seller has not employed or agreed to compensate, or shall not employ or agree to compensate, any other broker, dealer, salesman or agent with regard to the subject sale for or during the term of this Agreement.

16. Seller hereby indemnifies and holds harmless Broker and its agents, employees, officers, directors, shareholders, co-brokers and affiliates against any and all losses, claims, damages expenses or liabilities whatsoever, joint or several, which may arise out of or in connection with the performance of this Agreement, or the performance of Broker in connection with this Agreement. This indemnification and hold harmless agreement of Seller shall not apply to any intentionally wrongful acts of Broker or the gross negligence of Broker, its agents, employees, officers, directors, shareholders, co-brokers, and affiliates. Further, the indemnity shall be cumulative and shall be in addition to any other liability which may be imposed upon Seller.

17. Seller agrees to notify broker of the closing date, time and location at least three (3) days prior to such closing.

18. In no event shall Broker be required to participate in any evaluation of the Business, including, without limitation, any accounting, inventory, appraisal, audit, verification or other similar evaluation either for Seller or for a prospective purchaser, and Seller hereby expressly releases and discharges Broker from any responsibility or liability in connection with any such evaluation. Seller hereby accepts sole and final responsibility for the evaluation of the Business. Further, Seller hereby expressly releases and discharges Broker from any responsibility or liability in connection with the integrity, creditworthiness or actions of any prospective purchaser or purchaser of the Business.

19. The parties agree that any claim or action brought concerning this Agreement shall be brought in County, ... and agree to forebear from filing a claim in any other county or jurisdiction. The performance and construction of this Agreement shall be governed by the laws of the State of Any amount due which is not timely paid shall bear interest at the maximum rate permitted by law from the date due until paid.

20. This Agreement shall be binding upon all parties to this Agreement, their heirs, executors, successors, administrators, representatives or assigns.

21. If any terms, provision or condition of this Agreement shall be held to be invalid, void or unenforceable, the remainder of the provisions hereof shall remain in full force and effect and this Agreement shall be construed as if such invalid, void or unenforceable provision had not been contained herein.

22. In any litigation arising under the terms and conditions of this Agreement, the prevailing party shall be entitled to reasonable legal fees and expenses in addition to any amount of the judgment.

23. By signing below, the Seller represents and warrants that Seller has read and understands this Agreement. Further, if this Agreement is signed by more than one (1) person or representative, it shall constitute the joint and several obligation of each.

24. Seller acknowledges that Broker has not guaranteed the sale of the above Business. Broker will use best efforts to represent Seller as its exclusive agent with EXCLUSIVE RIGHT TO SELL the Business until this Agreement is terminated.

25. This Agreement sets forth the entire Agreement and understanding between the parties and cannot be modified, amended, supplemented or rescinded except in writing and executed by the parties hereto.

26. The parties hereby agree that a facsimile copy of this Agreement will be deemed an original for all purposes, and each hereby waives the necessity of providing the original copy of this Agreement to bind the other.

27. Seller hereby grants Broker an interest in the proceeds from the sale of Business to secure the payment of Broker's commission due under this Agreement. Seller authorizes and instructs any person or entity who may be handling the closing of the Business to pay and disburse out of the sale proceeds directly to Broker, an amount equal to the commission due under the terms of this Agreement. Such person or entity handling the closing of the sale of the Business is entitled to rely on the written instructions and directions of the Broker for the payment of the commission due hereunder as long as he person or entity handling the closing is given a copy of this Agreement. Seller and Broker, jointly and severally, covenant and agree to indemnify and hold harmless the person or entity handling the closing of and from any claim arising from or relating to the authorization contained in this paragraph. n7

5. The term "Purchase Price" shall mean any and all amounts of money or other consideration paid or conveyed to a Seller, or for a Seller's benefit, or paid or conveyed by the Buyer or for the Buyer's benefit in connection with the Purchase of assets or capital stock of a Business, plus all liabilities and/or obligations assumed by the Buyer. Purchase price shall include, without limitation, cash, stock, bonds, indentures, debentures, promissory notes, negotiable instruments, real or personal property, letters or lines of credit, loans, payments under employment and consulting agreements, non-competition agreements, partnership agreements, rental or lease agreements, options, payments pursuant to option agreements, capital investments, the assumption or discharge of liabilities, or any combination of the above or any other consideration or things of value. In addition, Purchase Price shall specifically include any and all payments made or to be made by the Buyer that are contingent upon future events, such as license, franchise, or royalty agreements, payments based on future sales or profits and all other items of a contingent nature. A portion of the Purchase Price that is dependent upon such contingent payments shall be negotiated in good faith by the parties hereto and shall be based on reasonable expectations of payments to be paid by the Buyer to a Seller.

6. Buyer warrants that Buyer has or will have $ as an equity investment to be made for the Purchase of a Business. Buyer will immediately notify Broker of any developments which adversely effect the equity investment of Buyer for the Purchase. n11

7. In no event shall Broker be required to participate in any evaluation of a Business, including without limitation, any accounting, inventory, appraisal, audit, verification or other similar evaluation either for Buyer or for a Seller and Buyer hereby expressly releases and discharges Broker from any responsibility of liability in connection with any such evaluation. Buyer hereby accepts sole and final responsibility for the evaluation or valuation of a prospective Business to be Purchased. Further, Buyer hereby releases and discharges Broker from any responsibility or liability in connection with the financial information given to the Buyer by the Seller through the Broker, or the integrity or other actions of any Seller of a Business.

8. Buyer hereby indemnifies and holds Broker and Broker's agents, employees, officers, directors, shareholders, Cooperating Brokers and affiliates harmless against any and all losses, claims, damages, expenses or liabilities whatsoever, joint or several, which may arise out of or in connection with the performance of a Broker in connection with this Agreement. This indemnification and hold harmless agreement of Buyer shall not apply to any intentionally wrongful acts of Broker or the gross negligence of Broker, its agents, employees, officers, directors, shareholders, Cooperating Brokers or affiliates. Further, the indemnity shall be cumulative and shall be in addition to any other liability which may be imposed on the Buyer.

9. This Agreement shall be binding on all parties to this Agreement, their heirs, executors, successors administrators representatives or assigns.

10. If any term, provision or condition of this Agreement shall be held to be invalid, void or unenforceable, the remainder of the provisions hereof shall remain in full force and effect and this Agreement shall be construed as if such invalid, void or unenforceable provision had not been contained herein.

11. This Agreement sets forth the entire Agreement and understanding between the parties and cannot be modified, amended, supplemented or rescinded except in writing and executed by the parties hereto.

12. Buyer agrees to notify Broker of the closing date, time and place for any prospective Purchase for which Broker shall be entitled to a commission pursuant to this Agreement, at least three (3) days prior to the actual date of closing.

DATED this day of, 199.....

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. This exclusive business brokerage agreement gives the broker exclusive authority to find a buyer for an ongoing direct sales business. As in an exclusive right to sell real estate listing contract, the principal is foreclosed from competing with the broker by selling the business himself during the life of the agreement (see paragraph 11A). Also, under the extension period of two years provided for in Paragraph 11B, the broker will be entitled to a commission should the owner, subsequent to termination of the agreement, actually sell to a party as the result of negotiations initiated by the broker during the life of the agreement.

Ordinarily the brokerage commission under this agreement is earned only upon consummation of the sale of the business to a prospect first submitted, directly or indirectly, by the broker during the life of the agreement. Under Paragraph 11 of the agreement, the broker will earn his commission if a proposed sale is not consummated due to the fault of the principal, but "fault" is defined such that the principal can back out of any deal that does not completely satisfy its specifications.

It should be noted that the sale contemplated by this agreement does not require the broker to have a real estate license, but does apportion the sale price between the non-real estate interests and any interest in real estate. The business broker who is not a licensed real estate broker should still be entitled to recover a commission on such a sale, despite any real estate licensing statute which includes business brokers within its definition of real estate brokers and the judicial interpretation of the applicable statute.

(n2)Footnote 2. For the broker's protection, the listing agreement carefully apportions the value of the real estate versus the non-real estate assets in keeping with the majority rule requirements.

(n3)Footnote 3. This Standard Listing Agreement contemplates the situation where the creative Seller might attempt to circumvent the payment of the Broker's commission by restructuring an asset sale into a corporate sale of stock, or, structuring a sale of the real estate with a long term lease of the business assets and thereby denying brokerage commissions because the "business" itself did not sell. This paragraph is also intended to pre-empt the Seller from putting the Buyer in business without the sale of his assets, and otherwise attempt to circumvent the broker's commission.

(n5)Footnote 5. Ordinarily the payment of the commission is conditioned upon the successful closing of the transaction. The sections of this paragraph however, go beyond the closing to provide for a protection period for the broker's commission in the event the Seller sells the business to one of the broker's prospects after the termination of the listing period (§ 11b); provides for a commission to the broker upon presentation of a ready, willing and able purchaser even if the Seller defaults in his performance (§ 11c and d); and further provides for the payment of a commission in the event Seller wishes to withdraw the business from the market (§ 11e); this last section and provision does not render the listing agreement irrevocable, but rather, provides for liquidated damages in the event the Seller wishes to terminate the listing agreement prior to its expiration.

(n6)Footnote 6. The definition of "sales price" is an important inclusion in any listing agreement. Sellers often have a different interpretation of the total amount paid for the business versus their understanding of the value upon which the brokerage commission will be based. Ordinarily, the brokerage commission is expressed in the listing agreement as a percentage of the sales price. Many Sellers consider inventory of the business sold at cost to be additional to the sales price and not an item to be included in the total upon which the brokerage commission is computed. Further, through the apportioning of the sales price under IRS Form 8954, funds allocated to covenants not to compete are not only depreciable but are also considered to be compensation paid to the individual rather than the selling entity, and are therefore not considered part of the sales price by most Sellers.

(n7)Footnote 7. This section of the listing agreement is intended to give the broker some control over the payment of his commission in the event there is a successful closing of the business sale. By assigning the broker an interest in the proceeds, it is contemplated that the escrow agent or other entity handling the transaction then has a fiduciary duty not only to the Seller and Buyer but also to the broker giving the broker some leverage in the event of a dispute with the Seller regarding his commission.

(n8)Footnote 8. In keeping with current trends toward dual agency and Buyer's brokerage, a standard Buyer's fee agreement has been included for those instances wherein the broker contracts with the Buyer to present various business opportunities for a commission or fee to be paid by the Buyer. By use of this agreement, the broker insulates himself from creating an agency with the Seller and thereby negates any fiduciary duties that may be owed to the Seller.

(n9)Footnote 9. For the broker's protection, the listing agreement carefully apportions the value of the real estate versus the non-real estate assets in keeping with the majority rule requirements.

(n10)Footnote 10. Ordinarily the payment of the commission is conditioned upon the successful closing of the transaction. The sections of this paragraph however, go beyond the closing to provide for a protection period for the broker's commission in the event the Seller sells the business to one of the broker's prospects after the termination of the listing period (§ 11b); provides for a commission to the broker upon presentation of a ready, willing and able purchaser even if the Seller defaults in his performance (§ 11c and d); and further provides for the payment of a commission in the event Seller wishes to withdraw the business from the market (§ 11e); this last section and provision does not render the listing agreement irrevocable, but rather, provides for liquidated damages in the event the Seller wishes to terminate the listing agreement prior to its expiration.

Scope

SCOPE

Chapter 13 discusses real estate brokerage issues that are unique to cooperatives, condominiums, and time-shares. Some states impose special licensing or registration requirements upon brokers who deal in these common interest communities. In particular, some states require that brokers who represent the developer in the initial sale of a unit must have special licensure or registration. Issues as to whether these forms of real estate ownership are securities are discussed (§ 13.02[2]). Various tests are applied to determine whether a condominium offering is actually a securities offering (§ 13.02[2][b] and [c]). Time-share units are subject to similar scrutiny with respect to the securities issue (§ 13.02[3]). If a condominium offering is found to be a security, numerous disclosure and registration issues arise with respect to the unit itself and the broker. Many cooperative and condominium projects impose a right of first refusal which inures to the benefit of the other unit owners. This aspect of these property regimes affects a unit owner's ability to sell his or her unit (§ 13.03). Sample provisions granting a right of first refusal are included in this chapter (§ 13.04).

§ 13.01 Brokers Must Follow Different Rules for Co-ops, Condominiums, and Time-Shares

Within the past three or four decades, new concepts in property ownership have developed, bringing with them distinct types of brokerage problems. Cooperatives have an older history, but a generation ago few, if any, consumers would have been familiar with such concepts as the condominium or time-sharing. Today, however, there is hardly a member of the public who is not familiar with these terms or who is not personally acquainted with someone who owns a cooperative, condominium, or time-share unit.

This chapter is devoted to an analysis of the brokerage problems that are peculiar to cooperatives, condominiums, and time-sharing, with particular emphasis placed on the special broker licensing or registration requirements these types of ownership entail (§ 13.02 below) as well as the broker's role in overcoming or complying with restraints upon the transfer of condominium or cooperative units (§ 13.03 below).

CHAPTER 13 Cooperatives, Condominiums, and Time-Sharing *

10A-13 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 13.02

§ 13.02 Brokers May Be Subject to Special Licensing Requirements Depending on Form of Real Estate

[1] Sales of Cooperatives, Condominiums, and Time-Sharing Interests May Be Subject to Securities Regulations

Ordinarily, a person selling or leasing any type of residential, commercial, or industrial property on behalf of a client needs no additional authorization to act beyond a brokerage license. n1 However, such an individual may have to file for additional authority when the subject property consists of any of the following:

- cooperative housing;
- condominiums; or
- time-sharing interests.

All states have adopted condominium and/or cooperative enabling statutes, n1.1 and some have issued extensive regulations governing public offerings of this type of real estate. Although a broker's license is all that is needed to act as broker for the seller or purchaser of isolated condominium units that are being resold by an individual unit owner, some states require additional forms to be completed and filed if the broker is acting as the selling agent (sometimes referred to as a "broker-dealer") because of the securities implications involved in the offering of the unit for sale. n2 This is true irrespective of whether the condominium project that is being marketed consists of new construction or involves the conversion of existing rental structures to condominium status.

Practice Note

Individuals who purchase multiple apartments from the original sponsor may be deemed sponsors in their own right, and are therefore subject to the same securities marketing restrictions that apply to the original sponsor (including the requirement that the sales staff file for additional authorization as broker-dealer).

While cooperatives and home owner association projects are not as commonplace as condominiums, some states subject these types of real property interests to the same requirements as are applied to condominiums, including the special licensing of brokers who are acting on behalf of the sponsor or developer. n3 Shares in a cooperative housing corporation representing units occupied by purchasers under proprietary leases have been held by the U.S. Supreme Court to be the acquisition of a residence and not securities subject to federal regulation. n4 Thus, brokers involved in isolated sales of stock in cooperative housing corporations, as with condominium units, are not required to register under federal law. n5 When a purchaser is motivated exclusively by a desire to occupy or develop the land personally, no security is involved. n6

[2] Sale of Condominium or Cooperative May Be Classified as Sale of Securities

[a] Securities Sales Subject to State Regulation

The term "investment contract" is interpreted broadly, extending to "[n]ovel, uncommon, or irregular devices" employed to promise profits from the use of another's money. n7 The Securities and Exchange Commission classifies an investment contract as a sale of securities if it is offered with any one of the following three specified rental arrangements:

- (1) Economic benefits to the purchaser: The condominiums, with any rental arrangement or other similar service, are offered and sold with emphasis on the economic benefits to the purchaser to be derived from the managerial efforts of the promoter, or a third party designated or arranged for by the promoter, from rental of the units.
- (2) Rental pool arrangement (RPA): The condominium offering includes participation in a rental pool arrangement. An offering that includes the mere offer of an option to participate in an RPA, regardless of whether the offeree chose to participate, triggers the application of securities laws. n8
- (3) Material restrictions: the offering of a rental or similar arrangement requires that the purchaser (a) hold his or her unit available for rental for any part of the year; (b) use an exclusive rental agent; or (c) otherwise acquiesce to material restrictions on the occupancy or rental of his or her unit. n9

The sale of condominium or cooperative units may be classified as sales of securities and therefore be subject to state regulation if the sales are defined as "investment contracts." There are three tests commonly used in the condominium, cooperative and time-share context to determine whether a particular transaction constitutes an investment contract:

- (1) the federal test (also known as the Howey test);
- (2) the risk capital test (also known as the California and Hawaii tests); and
- (3) the evidence of indebtedness definition.

[b] Federal Test Looks for Expectation of Profits Through Third Party's Efforts

At its core, an investment contract under federal securities law has three elements; it is:

- (1) an investment in a common venture;
- (2) premised on a reasonable expectation of profits; and
- (3) to be derived solely from the entrepreneurial or managerial efforts of others. n10

An offer of an investment contract must involve an investment of money and a common enterprise (horizontal commonality describing a common enterprise among several investors, or vertical commonality describing a common enterprise between the investor, seller, promoter or some other party). n11 RPAs fit this definition because they create a horizontal commonality with other parties and satisfy the "third party efforts" requirement. Thus, any condominium sold with an RPA option is subject to securities regulations. n12 Generally, individual sales of cooperative or condominium apartments do not constitute investment contracts. This is true even though the purchaser intends to make some profit from the acquisition and the marketability of the unit depends to some degree upon the conduct of the management and other owners and tenants. Courts have held that these attributes "do not convert what is in reality a real estate asset into a federal 'security.'" n13 While the federal test purports to focus upon economic realities by examining the substance rather than the form of a transaction, n14 as a practical matter the test has generated confusion and criticism for its failure to do so. For example, the test does not clarify under what circumstances non-cash values, such as services or goods, are recognized as consideration for a security. n15 In addition, the federal test takes "an unduly restrictive view" of what constitutes profits. n16 Profits consist either of the appreciated value of invested capital or of earnings received for invested capital. Cost savings apparently do not qualify as profits. n17 This narrow definition has been criticized as economically unrealistic. n18 Finally, the federal test does not clarify whether an investment contract exists when profits result substantially, but not solely, from the efforts of someone other than the investor. The test, as originally conceived, required that the efforts be made "solely" by third parties. n19 Subsequent U.S. Supreme Court cases have de-emphasized this aspect of the original formulation without blatantly revising the third prong. n20 Subsequent decisions discussing the federal test have interpreted these Supreme Court opinions in divergent ways. n21 These are the primary criticisms of the federal test.

[c] Risk Capital Test Requires Investment to Be Subject to Risk of Enterprise

[i] Hawaii Risk Capital Test Widely Accepted

The Hawaii risk capital test provides that an interest will be found to constitute an investment contract when:

- (1) An offeree furnishes initial value to an offeror;
- (2) A portion of this initial value is subject to the risks of the enterprise;
- (3) The furnishing of the initial value is induced by the offeror's promises or representations which give rise to a reasonable understanding that a valuable benefit of some kind, over and above the initial value, will accrue to the offeree as a result of the operation of the enterprise; and
- (4) The offeree does not receive the right to exercise practical and actual control over the managerial decisions of the enterprise. n22

As compared to the federal test, the Hawaii risk capital test has several advantages. The Hawaii test:

- (1) uses the term "value," clearly contemplating the exchange of both cash and non-cash consideration;
- (2) applies the term "benefits" broadly to include a wider array of returns than simply profits;
- (3) focuses on the practical and actual investment control, weighing both the quality and the quantity of the parties' managerial efforts; n23 and
- (4) arguably does not restrict its application to start up capital. n24

The Hawaii risk capital test has been accepted favorably and at least one commentator has suggested that this test might eventually replace the federal test in a majority of jurisdictions. n25

[iii] California Risk Capital Test Uses Flexible Analysis

The California test defines risk capital as that which is invested by a person, acting upon a solicitation, in order to obtain a benefit. n26 This risk capital test does not require that benefits come "solely" through the efforts of others, a controversial component of the federal test. n27 As compared to the Hawaii test, the California risk capital test focuses not so much on whether the investors derive their profits solely from the efforts of others, but rather on whether the promoter is relying on the investors for a substantial portion of the initial capital necessary to launch the enterprise. n28 The California risk capital test uses a loose definition of the term "benefit." The risk capital test rejects the concept of expected financial profit as determinative; instead, it asks whether persons risking capital expect some form of benefit or return. A benefit need not be material. n29 Thus, the test gives courts greater flexibility in assessing the quality as well as the quantity of each party's efforts.

Despite the advantage of this greater flexibility as compared to the federal test, the California risk capital test has been criticized. The courts are unsettled about whether the risk capital test deals only with original "start-up" capitalization or whether it also encompasses transactions involving subsequent capitalization by existing enterprises. n30 This limitation seems to unnecessarily defeat at least one purpose of the test. n31

[d] Evidence of Indebtedness Subject to Regulation

Evidence of indebtedness has been defined as a security subject to regulation. n32 "The term 'evidence of indebtedness' is not limited to a promissory note or other simple acknowledgment of a debt owing." n33 It encompasses all contractual obligations a party may have to pay in the future for consideration presently received. n34 The construction given to the term "security" in the Stolen Property Act, 18 U.S.C. § 2311, includes this term.

[3] Time-Sharing Interest Classified as Sale of Securities

Based on the tests outlined above, the sale of time-sharing interests or "interval ownership" interests constitutes a security sale subject to state regulation. n35 In such transactions, the investor purchases the right to use a condominium for a period of time with reliance on the seller to maintain the property. The format of such interests varies greatly from project to project. In some ventures of this type, the individual purchaser receives either a fee or a leasehold interest, while in others the interest may be as ephemeral as a club membership or "vacation license." In many of the early time-share ventures, the purchaser's interest lasted indefinitely whereas sponsors of more recent programs have tended to limit the duration of the purchaser's interest to a specified period of time (such as twenty years).

Time-sharing arrangements meet the requirements of the three tests outlined above for the following reasons:

1. The required expectation of profit is present even though the profit to be realized is in the form of benefits to be derived from the use of the property and not a tangible form of profit such as capital gains. n36
2. The risk capital test is met because the investor (a) assumes the risk that the venture will succeed; (b) expects the benefit of the use of the unit over a specified period of time; and (c) has no control over the investment. n37
3. The sale of a time-sharing interest is an evidence of indebtedness because the investor, by contractual obligation, is promised future benefits and rights in exchange for presently paid consideration. n38

The increasing variety and complexity of these interests are due, in part, to the efforts of sponsors or promoters to avoid classification as a security (and the resulting duty to register with the S.E.C. or state Blue Sky Law administrator). These efforts, however, have not proven successful. A number of jurisdictions have already classified time-shares as a security, thereby necessitating compliance with local securities laws that mandate, among other things, the qualification of the promoter's broker as a broker-dealer. n39 Aside from the other securities, many states have adopted special licensure for time-share agents. The states simply require a real estate broker or agent licensure. However, some states will require a separate broker licensure. n40 Other states require a separate license only, not requiring the real estate brokerage licensure. n41

CHAPTER 13 Cooperatives, Condominiums, and Time-Sharing *

10A-13 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 13.03

§ 13.03 Rights of First Refusal May Restrict Seller's Ability to Transfer Unit

[1] Right of First Refusal Grants Board Degree of Control Over Ownership

By definition, a right of first refusal requires a unit owner, when he receives an offer to purchase (or lease) that unit, to give the other co-owners (generally, through the management group) the right to purchase (or lease) the unit or to furnish a purchaser (or lessee) on the same terms offered by the prospective purchaser or lessee. Thus, if the other co-owners do not, for whatever reason, desire to have the prospective purchaser or lessee as a neighbor, they may exclude him by purchasing (or leasing) the unit on the same terms. n1 This, of course, gives the control that the owners of condominium units demand.

Some state statutes contain provisions with respect to rights of first refusal which limit the application or exercise of such rights. n2

The control of occupancy of condominium units by the "right of first refusal" device may be understood by comparing and contrasting this device and problems encountered in its use with the same device in the ordinary stock-cooperative.

[2] Restrictions on Sales May Not Apply to Leases

Some state statutes mention only restrictions on the sale of a unit and make no mention of leasing. Such provisions do not "appear to preclude a unit owner from leasing his unit without first offering the unit to his neighbors." n3 Assuming that a condominium's documents impose restrictions on the leasing of a unit, it is unclear whether such restrictions would be invalidated by the broad property interests created by other state statutes, such as those providing that each unit and its companion common interest constitutes real estate with all rights incidental to real property separate from the other units. n4

[3] Validity of Restraints on Alienation May Depend on Form of Real Estate

[a] Rights of First Refusal Are Valid Restraints on Alienation in Cooperative Context

Right of first refusal provisions raise two questions:

(1) whether they constitute restraints on alienation and, thus, are unenforceable; and

(2) whether they involve the possibility of a violation of the rule against perpetuities. n5

The stock cooperative has no great difficulty in controlling the transfer of individual leaseholds by the imposition of a right of first refusal or preemptive option. n6 If an individual owner wishes to sell his apartment subject to such a provision, he must offer it to the corporation which has a specified period of time in which to decide whether to purchase the interest or not. If the corporation does not desire to exercise its option, then the individual tenant is generally free to sell to his prospective purchaser.

Such restraints are upheld in most states on the theory (more fully explained below) that the social value of the restraint outweighs the public-policy arguments against it. n7 Not all writers and courts agree, however, on whether a right of first refusal is such a restraint. It has been said alternatively that rights of first refusal:

- are direct restraints on alienation;
- are only partial restraints on alienation (on the theory that a unit owner is not restricted altogether from selling, but rather is only prevented from selling at a price that the other unit owners are willing to pay); and
- are not restraints on alienation at all (on the theory that the purpose of such restraints is not to prevent the sale of a unit, but rather to allow a particular person or persons to buy). n8

But whether or not viewed as restraints, or only as partial restraints, the law is quite well settled that such provisions are valid and enforceable in the cooperative area. Whether they will be held valid and enforceable in the condominium area is another matter.

[b] Rights of First Refusal on Condominium Sales May Be Invalid

Whether rights of first refusal are considered valid restraints on alienation in the condominium context is unclear. If the whole body of law pertaining to restraints on the alienation of a fee were applied to determine the legality of a condominium's right of first refusal, the restraint would probably be held invalid. Restraints on the alienation of a fee have, in general, been held invalid. In cases involving merely a lease (as in the cooperative area), such restraints are upheld if reasonable and applied even-handedly without reference to race, creed or color.

The following suggestion by one writer should form the backbone of decisions in the condominium field in the area of control by restraints on alienation by the device of right of first refusal:

[T]he reasonableness of a restraint ought not to depend on a mechanical distinction between freeholds and leaseholds. The proper function of a court is to balance the legitimate benefits to be derived from the restriction against the inconvenience, possible economic loss, and impairment of free choice that it is likely to cause. If the burden of providing an alternative sale were left on the unit owner after his customer had been turned down, a court would probably find on balance that the restraint was unreasonable. The balance is more nicely drawn when the venture is bound to match the offer that it refuses to sanction. Because this resembles the garden-variety right of first refusal, a court is likely to give approval, unless its demonstrable purpose be to facilitate discrimination. n9

At least one court has applied a balancing test to such restrictions. Gale v. York Center Community Cooperative n10 provides a useful analysis of the problem of rights of first refusals in the condominium context because, as one author noted, "the [cooperative housing] association [in Gale] was as close to a condominium as one could get without actual division of fee title interests." n10.1 In Gale, seventy-two families were living in a subdivision, and all were members of a nonprofit corporation organized for the purpose of establishing and maintaining a cooperative-housing community. Legal title to the real estate was held by the association. The individual members built their own homes and obtained their own financing. Under the agreement, when a member wished to withdraw from the nonprofit corporation, he was required to give written notice to the board of directors. The board then had a specified period in which to exercise its options to purchase the membership at a price determined according to a method set forth in the agreement or one of the following would occur:

- If the option was not exercised within that period, the member had the right to sell the membership on the open market. If so sold, the association had the right to redeem the membership within a specified number of days.
- If this right was not exercised, the purchaser could then request and would receive membership within a specified number of days.

The agreement further provided that a member could, upon written request, obtain a deed from the association for the purpose of obtaining a loan secured by a mortgage on the premises he occupied. After obtaining the loan, the agreement required the member to reconvey the premises to the association.

In Gale, such conveyances were made to members who then refused to reconvey the premises to the association per the agreement. The association brought an action to compel reconveyance. The lower court directed the recalcitrant members to reconvey the premises to the association. The members appealed on the ground that the above-mentioned restrictions on their right to transfer their memberships constituted a violation of the rule against restrictions on alienation and were therefore void. In upholding the lower court decision that the restraints were not void as violating the rule against restraints on the alienation of real property, the court applied a balancing test, weighing the utility of the restraint with the injurious consequences that would flow from its enforcement and concluded that "the restrictions on transfer of a membership are reasonably necessary to the continued existence of the cooperative." n11 In evaluating restrictions on a seller's right to transfer interests, the court reasoned as follows:

[T]he crucial inquiry should be directed at the utility of the restraint as compared with the injurious consequences that will flow from its enforcement. If accepted social and economic considerations dictate that a partial restraint is reasonably necessary for their fulfillment, such a restraint should be sustained ... [T]he law of property ... is not a mathematical science but takes shape at the direction of social and economic forces in an ever changing society, and decisions should be made to turn on these considerations. n12

If the rule applied in the cooperative context is carried into the condominium area, rights of first refusal in condominium declarations will be upheld (if reasonable and non-discriminatory), and the dual aims of such provisions (to reduce the risk of financial interdependence by excluding the economically undesirable, and to promote the project's inner harmony by bringing together compatible members) will be achieved. n13 The Gale agreement in the condominium area would probably be held invalid, the association not being bound to purchase. As Professor Berger has stated, if the burden of providing an alternative sale were left on the unit owner after his customer had been turned down, a court would probably find on balance that the restraint was unreasonable. The balance is more nicely drawn when the venture is bound to match the offer that it refuses to sanction. Because this resembles the garden-variety right of first refusal, a court is likely to give approval unless its demonstrable purpose be to facilitate discrimination. n14

[4] Broker Must Obtain Waiver of Right of First Refusal

The broker representing either the purchaser or the seller of a condominium or cooperative unit on resale is usually the one who must bear the burden of complying with the requirements of the project governing transfer of a unit owner's interest. In the case of a condominium, the burden is two-fold:

- (1) to secure a written waiver of the board of manager's "right of first refusal"; and
- (2) to secure a written statement from the board certifying either that the outgoing seller has paid all common charges for which he was responsible or, in the alternative, setting forth the amount the seller will owe the condominium as of the closing date.

The various state condominium statutes invariably mandate that the incoming purchaser take the unit in question subject to the lien of the seller's unpaid common charges if no "estoppel letter" has been obtained from the board of managers.

Processing the resale of a cooperative apartment requires many of the same steps as the resale of a condominium unit. The broker processing the application must take the action necessary to induce the cooperative housing board of directors not to veto the proposed sale (or sublease as the case may be). This usually requires submission of the following documents:

- the contract of sale between the parties;
- substantial personal and financial references of the purchaser; and
- an appearance before the cooperative's board of directors by the prospective purchaser for a personal interview.

An additional step that must be taken in processing the resale of a cooperative (that is not found in the case of a condominium resale) is that of inducing the board of directors to approve the "recognition agreement" submitted to it by the institutional lender that is financing the purchaser's acquisition of the apartment in question and that is taking back a security interest in the stock and lease.ⁿ¹⁵ Execution of a recognition agreement is necessary because of the nature of the interest being transferred in the sale of a cooperative unit. Unlike the condominium situation, where the lender is financing an interest in real property with the property itself serving as the security for the loan, a lender financing the purchase of shares in a cooperative corporation takes a security interest in the stock and proprietary lease subject to the board of directors' acceptance of the financing of the stock purchase.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. Except, of course, for purposes of unlawful discrimination. Irrespective of the desirability of having the closely confined community of a condominium consist of compatible people, the use of discriminatory practices to restrict occupancy on the basis of race, creed, color, religion, or national origin is against public policy and is generally unenforceable. Some of the condominium enabling acts contain express provisions to this effect. See, e.g., N.Y. Real Prop. L. § 339-V(2), expressly authorizing condominium bylaws to contain provisions governing the alienation, conveyance, sale, leasing, purchase, ownership, and occupancy of units, provided ... that the by-laws shall contain no provision restricting the alienation, conveyance, sale, leasing, purchase, ownership and occupancy of units because of race, creed, color or national origin.

In many of the states where condominium legislation exists but does not contain an express prohibition on discrimination, the same result will be obtained because of other legislation or case law prohibiting discrimination in the development and transfer of housing. It is clear in most of these jurisdictions that no discriminatory practices can be upheld, and it should make no difference that the practice is not expressed in writing but is simply followed. Similarly, it would seem that even in those jurisdictions where there are no fair-practice housing statutes, the employment of a right of first refusal or other protective device to achieve discriminatory purposes would be unenforceable.

(n2)Footnote 2. See, e.g.,

Georgia: Ga. Code Ann. § 44-3-110 (providing that any right of first refusal or other restraint on free alienability of the condominium units is void unless the condominium instruments provide for the furnishing to any unit owner requesting the same a statement certifying the association's waiver of or refusal to exercise its right of first refusal).

The court further stated that:

[E]nforcement of the restraints in question would not appear to produce injurious consequences to the public. They would not tend to keep the property in the same family and concentrate wealth (reasons often given for the rule), but would seem to some extent to prevent retention of one family. The member is not prevented from liquidating his interest and therefore consuming the property (another reason often given for the rule being that such restraints would prevent such liquidation and consumption). Creditors are not prevented from satisfying their claims (another reason often given for the rule). Members are encouraged to improve their homes (another reason often given for the rule is that restraints on alienation may deter the improvement of the property) and the value of any improvement will be realized when they liquidate their interest. Cooperative ownership of residential property in this country seems to be increasing in popularity, and the extent to which these partial restraints would keep property out of commerce is entirely problematical.

The reasoning applied to cooperatives in the above quotation is equally applicable to right of first refusal provisions in condominium documents.

(n16)Footnote 15. A "recognition agreement" is essentially an agreement between the lender and owner of the cooperative apartment building (the board of directors acting on behalf of the other cooperators designated the lessor in the agreement) under which the lessor recognizes that the loan to the purchaser (the lessee) is secured by a mortgage on the proprietary lease and by a security interest in the lease and the stock in the cooperative corporation. The recognition agreement provides for the following:

- the lessor's consent to the mortgage and security interest taken by the lender;
- the lessor's consent not to recognize any further mortgage on or assignment of the lease or pledge of the stock;

- the lessor's promise not to terminate the lease;
- the lender's rights upon lease default or default on the loan;
- the lender's option to require maintenance payments through the lender;
- the lender's right to surrender or assign the proprietary lease and stock; and
- the lender's liability to the lessor arising out of claims by the lessee.

CHAPTER 13 Cooperatives, Condominiums, and Time-Sharing *

10A-13 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 13.04

§ 13.04 Sample Right of First Refusal Provisions

Following are examples of right of first refusal provisions. The first is adapted from the declaration of a Florida condominium.

Restriction on conveyancing. In order to assure a community of congenial residents and thus protect the value of the units in this condominium project, the sale, leasing, and mortgaging of units shall be subject to the following provisions until this declaration is terminated or until the building is no longer tenatable, whichever occurs first.

(1) No apartment owner may dispose of a unit or any interest therein by sale or by lease without approval of the board of governors of the association of unit owners, which approval shall be obtained in the manner provided in this subsection of the condominium Declaration.

(a) A unit owner intending to make a sale or a lease of his apartment or of any interest therein shall give notice to the owner's association of such intention together with:

- (i) the name and address of the intended purchaser or lessee;
- (ii) such other information as the association reasonably may require; and
- (iii) the terms of the proposed transaction.

The giving of such notice shall constitute a warranty and representation by the unit owner to the owner's association, and any purchaser or lessee produced by the association as provided in this subsection of the condominium Declaration, that the unit owner believes the proposal to be bona fide in all respects.

(b) Within [insert number of days] days after receipt of such notice, the board of governors of the association shall give notice to the person desiring to sell or lease his unit of either of the board's decision to either:

(i) approve the transaction or

(ii) furnish a purchaser or lessee approved by the association who will accept the transaction upon terms as favorable to the seller as the terms stated in the notice, except that a purchaser or lessee furnished by the association may have not less than [insert number of days] days subsequent to the date of approval within which to close the transaction.

(c) The approval of the board of governors of the association shall be in recordable form, signed by any [insert number] members of the board, and shall be delivered to the purchaser or lessee.

(d) The failure of the board to act within such [insert number of days]-day period shall be deemed to constitute approval, following which, nevertheless, the association shall prepare and deliver written approval in recordable form, as aforesaid. The unit owner giving such notice shall be bound to consummate the transaction with such purchaser or lessee as may be approved and furnished by the association. n1

The following covenants and restrictions on the sale, leasing, or other alienation of a unit in a condominium--another example of this type of provision from a residential condominium--are adapted from Dunbar's Fountain View Condominium Development in Chicago.

Covenants and Restrictions as to Sale, Leasing and Other Alienation

(1) Sale or Lease. (a) Any owner who wishes to sell or lease his unit (or any lessee of any unit wishing to assign or sublease such unit) to any person not related by blood or marriage to the owner shall give to the association of apartment owners (hereinafter called the association) no less than [insert number of days] days' prior written notice of the terms of any contemplated sale or lease, together with the name and address of the proposed purchaser or lessee.

(b) The association shall at all times have the first right and option to purchase or lease such unit ownership upon the same terms, which option shall be exercisable for a period of [insert number of days] days following the date of receipt of such notice.

(c) If said option is not exercised by the association within said [insert number of days] days, the owner (or lessee) may, at the expiration of said period and at any time within [insert number of days] days after the expiration of said period, contract to sell or lease (or sublease or assign) such unit ownership to the proposed purchaser or lessee named in such notice upon the terms specified therein.

(2) Gift. (a) Any owner who wishes to make a gift of his unit ownership or any interest therein to any person or persons who would not be heirs at law of the owner under the laws of intestate succession of this state were he or she to die within [insert number of days] days prior to the contemplated date of such gift, shall give to the association not less than [insert number of days] days' written notice of his or her intent to make such gift prior to the contemplated date thereof, together with the name and address of the intended donee and the contemplated date of said gift.

(b) The association shall at all times have the first right and option to purchase such unit ownership or interest therein for cash at fair market value to be determined by arbitration as herein provided, which option shall be exercisable until the date of expiration as provided herein.

(c)(i) Within [insert number of days] days after receipt of said written notice by the association, the association and the owner desiring to make such gift shall each appoint a qualified real estate appraiser to act as arbitrators.

(ii) The two arbitrators so appointed shall, within [insert number of days] days after their appointment, appoint another qualified real estate appraiser to act as the third arbitrator.

(iii) Within [insert number of days] days after the appointment of said arbitrator, the three arbitrators shall determine, by majority vote, the fair market value of the unit ownership to interest therein which the owner contemplates conveying by gift, and shall thereupon give written notice of such determination to the owner and the association.

(iv) The association's option to purchase the unit ownership or interest therein shall expire [insert number of days] days after the date of receipt by it of such notice.

(3) Devise. (a) In the event any owner dies leaving a will devising his unit or any interest therein to any person or persons not heirs at law or his descendants under the laws of intestate succession of this state, and said will is admitted to probate, the association shall have an option (to be exercised in the manner hereinafter set forth) to purchase said unit ownership or interest therein either from the devisee or devisees thereof named in said will or, if a power of sale is conferred by said will upon the personal representative named therein, from the personal representative acting pursuant to said power, for cash at fair market value which is to be determined by arbitration.

(b) Within [insert number of days] days after the appointment of a personal representative for the state of the deceased owner, the association shall appoint a qualified real estate appraiser to act as an arbitrator, and shall thereupon give written notice of such appointment to the said devisee or devisees or personal representative, as the case may be.

(c) (i) Within [insert number of days] days thereafter said devisee or devisees, or personal representative, as the case may be, shall appoint a qualified real estate appraiser to act as an arbitrator.

(ii) Within [insert number of days] days after the appointment of said arbitrator, the two so appointed shall appoint another qualified real estate appraiser to act as the third arbitrator.

(iii) Within [insert number of days] days thereafter, the three arbitrators shall determine, by majority vote, the fair market value of the unit or interest therein devised by the deceased owner, and shall thereupon give written notice of such determination to the association and said devisee or devisees, or personal representative, as the case may be.

(iv) The association's right to purchase the unit or interest therein at the price determined by the three arbitrators shall expire [insert number of days] days after the date of receipt by it of such notice if the personal representative of the deceased owner is empowered to sell, and shall expire [insert number of months] months after the appointment of a personal representative who is not so empowered to sell.

(v) The association shall be deemed to have exercised its option if it tenders the required sum of money to said devisee or devisees or to said personal representative, as the case may be, within the said option periods.

(vi) Nothing herein contained shall be deemed to restrict the right of the association or its authorized representative, pursuant to authority given to the association by the owner as hereinafter provided, to bid at any sale of the unit or interest therein or any deceased owner which is held pursuant to an order or direction of the court having jurisdiction over that portion of the deceased owner's estate which contains his unit or interest therein.

(4) Consent of Voting Members. The association shall not exercise any option set forth in this Agreement to purchase any unit or interest therein without the prior written consent of [insert percentage] percent of the voting members. The association may bid to purchase at any sale of a unit or any interest therein of any deceased owner which is held pursuant to an order or direction of a court upon the prior written consent of [insert percentage] percent of the voting members of the association, which consent shall set forth a maximum price which the association is authorized to bid and pay for said unit or interest therein.

(5) Release or Waiver of Options. Upon the written consent of [insert number or percentage] of the members of the association any of the options contained in this article may be released or waived and the unit or any interest therein which is subject to an option set forth in this article may be sold, conveyed, leased, given, or devised free and clear of the provisions of this article.

(6) Proof of Termination of Option. A certificate executed and acknowledged by the acting secretary of the association stating that the provisions of this article as set forth in this Agreement have been met by an owner, or duly waived by the association, and that the rights of the association hereunder have terminated, shall be conclusive upon the association and the owners in favor of all persons who rely thereon in good faith, and such certificate shall be furnished to any owner who has in fact complied with the provisions of this article or in respect to whom the provisions of this article have been waived, upon request.

10A-13A Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice Scope

Scope

SCOPE

Chapter 13A addresses a real estate broker's involvement in lease transactions. While a broker's procurement of a tenant is similar to finding a purchaser, there are differences between these transactions (§ 13A.01). Nearly all jurisdictions require that those who for compensation act on behalf of a landlord in renting or leasing real property must be licensed (§ 13A.02).

Chapter 13A discusses the duties that real estate brokers owe to their leasing clients as well as the role brokers play in lease transactions (§ 13A.03). The chapter also discusses the broker's compensation for participating in a lease transaction (§ 13A.04) and addresses the dispute that arises when a client refuses to pay the broker's compensation or otherwise defaults on the agreement with the broker (§ 13A.05). Sample commission provisions (§ 13A.06), an illustrative brokerage agreement for an office lease (§ 13A.07), and an illustrative rental inspection form (§ 13A.08) are included in this chapter.

CHAPTER 13A Leases (Including Leases with Options and Rights of First Refusal) *

10A-13A Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 13A.01

§ 13A.01 Unique Characteristics of Lease Transactions

Brokers involved in sale/purchase transactions have similar duties and responsibilities as those involved in lease transactions. However, lease transactions have their own unique characteristics and provisions that complicate the brokerage relationship. Sale/purchase transactions usually reach a certain point when compensation is owed the broker. This typically occurs at closing. Even when the transaction does not close, there is commonly some other terminating event that triggers the right to receive compensation or aborts the transaction with no right to compensation accruing.

In a lease transaction, on the other hand, timing issues are less clear. Compensation may be earned upon the execution of a lease and the occupancy of the property, and also upon future events, depending upon the lease document. The brokerage agreement may provide for additional compensation in the event that a renewal option, purchase option or right of first refusal contained in the lease is exercised by the lessee. The brokerage agreement may provide for an adjustment to compensation in the event the lessee adds or surrenders space. Thus, the broker must continuously monitor the transaction long after the initial lease is executed. These complicating factors make it even more imperative that the brokerage services agreement in a lease transaction be complete, anticipating all potential situations and providing a means for ongoing monitoring and verification.

§ 13A.02 Broker's License Requirement

With the exception of Vermont, n1 all states and the District of Columbia require any person or entity who acts for or on behalf of another and for or in the expectation of receiving compensation with regard to the advertising, offer or negotiation of the rental or lease of real estate be licensed by the appropriate state authority. n2 Some states do provide an exemption from this general rule for individuals who are employed by the owner of the real estate and who rent, offer or negotiate the rental of that real estate as part of their usual and customary employment duties. n3

Concession agreements are generally construed to create only licenses rather than an interest in land, and thus those who negotiate such agreements typically do not need to be licensed as a real estate broker. It has been held that the negotiation of a license was not the negotiation of a listing, sale, exchange, purchase, rental, or leasing of real estate. n4

10A-13A Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 13A.03

§ 13A.03 Brokers' Roles and Duties Toward Client

[1] Fiduciary Duties of Fair Dealing and Best Efforts

Commercial leasing is an area in which real estate brokers have traditionally taken an aggressive role, representing both lessors and lessees. As in any brokerage transaction, the broker serves a central part by bringing the parties together, negotiating a mutually satisfactory agreement and bringing the entire transaction to closure.

Over time, the dollar value of lease transactions has increased and continues to escalate; the types of entities involved have changed and continue to evolve to reflect the development of new ways to maximize tax benefits while minimizing liability exposure. Nonetheless, the broker's role and basic responsibilities to the parties remain unchanged. A lessor has a property that the lessee wants to use and is willing to pay for. The broker can provide a valuable service by bringing these parties together and negotiating the details of the arrangement.

The broker's function is to work in its client's best interest in carrying out the duties assigned to the broker in the brokerage services agreement. The broker also owes its client the traditional duties of loyalty, confidentiality, obedience, disclosure, reasonable care and diligence and accounting. The broker also has a responsibility of fair dealing toward the non-client party. The broker must use its best efforts to accomplish its client's goals under the terms most favorable to the client.

[2] Representing the Lessor

[a] Identifying the Lessor's Goals

The broker's duty towards the lessor is to use his or her best efforts to procure a ready and willing lessee to enter into a lease agreement in accordance with the terms specified by or acceptable to the lessor. In order to do this, the broker must first identify exactly who the lessor is. The owner may be organized as any one of a number of entity types. The broker must ascertain who the legal owner of the property is and who has the authority to execute agreements on behalf of that entity.

The next step is to identify the lessor's goals for the transaction. One of the major considerations is what kind of lessee the lessor is interested in. Depending upon the lessor's level of sophistication, the broker may have to help the lessor formulate these goals. The broker must be ready to educate the lessor with regard to the current market situation and conditions. The broker may have to enumerate various options available to structure an agreement that maximizes the benefits to the lessor.

[b] Structuring the Lease Agreement: Basic Considerations

The leasing broker structures the basic outline of the lease agreement. Basic areas that must be addressed by brokers before they can begin to do their jobs and professionally represent their clients in a lease transaction include:

- length of term the lessor wants to be tied to and what amount of net rent the lessor wants to realistically receive
- whether to include additional charges, such as real estate tax, insurance or common area maintenance kickers
- acceptability of provisions such as renewal or purchase options and rights of first refusal
- the lessor's willingness to subdivide the space and the smallest area the lessor is willing to lease to a single lessee
- what allowances the lessor is willing to extend and under what circumstances
- whether the lessor has any special requirements such as personal guarantees when certain types of entities are used

Additionally, the broker must identify any restrictions on the use of space. These restrictions may be due to covenants and restrictions of record affecting the real estate, zoning or other municipal regulation or the provisions of other leases the lessor has entered into.

The foregoing information is pivotal in enabling brokers to carry out their duties. However, brokers must keep in mind that during the initial phase of the relationship they are acting as information gatherers and providers, not legal counsel. In most jurisdictions, brokers may not dispense legal advice.

[3] Representing the Lessee

[a] Broker's Role and Initial Inquiries

The function of a broker representing the lessee in a lease transaction is not fundamentally different from representing a lessor. The broker must use his best efforts to identify space acceptable to the lessee and to negotiate a lease agreement in accordance with terms specified by or acceptable to the lessee. The lessee's broker must identify how the lessee is organized and who has the authority to execute agreements on behalf of that entity. The broker must also clearly identify the lessee's goals. The broker should be ready to assist the lessee by identifying relevant market conditions and other factors that the lessee can utilize as information and guidance in the lease negotiating process in order to maximize its benefits.

[b] Special Considerations

Geographic factors, parking and space issues, and provisions for future needs are important issues that are of particular importance to the lessee's broker. The lessee's broker should identify and determine the provisions that will be of importance to the lessee in the lease agreement.

[i] Geographic Factors. The broker must determine the geographic factors that are important to the lessee, such as availability and proximity to transportation services (both commuter and freight), and accessibility for employees and customers/clients. Other relevant basics include the amount of space desired, whether the client is interested in completed space or is willing to undergo a buildout, the type of space required, the design of the desired space, the term of the agreement and the gross rental the lessee is realistically willing to pay.

[ii] Options for Future Needs. Other provisions that the lessee may want to incorporate for future flexibility include an option to renew in order to lock in possible future costs and to guaranty future stability without obligating itself to a present long-term commitment. The lessee may also want a purchase option, or perhaps a right of first refusal, to ensure the possibility of future stability.

The lessee may want to provide for future needs by negotiating for anticipated or potential future space requirements. The lessee may want to incorporate provisions into the lease that grant it the right and privilege to add additional space or surrender occupied space at some unknown time during the term of the lease. This may require an additional right to relocate other tenants in the lessor's property to enable the lessee's contiguous expansion or provide for the lessee's relocation so that each party may maximize the efficient use of the property. If this right is procured, the lease agreement must also provide for who will pay the costs associated with any exercised relocation right.

A lessee's broker must identify the various allowances the lessee expects, whether for buildout of the existing space or relocation and moving allowances in the event a relocation right is exercised by either party.

[iii] Obtaining a Guarantor. Depending on the identity of the lessee, the lessor may require a personal guaranty. The broker must determine if the notion of a personal guaranty is acceptable to the lessee, and if so, who will act as guarantor. Any limitations to the guaranty, such as a dollar limit or time limits different from the lease term must also be formalized.

CHAPTER 13A Leases (Including Leases with Options and Rights of First Refusal) *

10A-13A Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 13A.04

§ 13A.04 Compensation Is Based on Contract Provisions

[1] Application of General Contract Principles

A real estate broker's right to compensation is based on contract, n1 namely the brokerage services agreement. The general provisions of contract law apply to real estate brokerage services agreements. Generally, a commercial real estate broker who finds a lessee ready, willing and able to lease the subject premises on the owner's terms is entitled to a commission pursuant to the provisions of the valid listing agreement. n1.1

The broker can only demand compensation from the party with whom he or she has a contractual relationship. n2 That compensation is earned only when the broker fulfills all of his or her duties under the terms of the real estate brokerage services agreement. n3 As a general rule, a broker earns a commission when he or she procures a lessee or lessor who is ready and willing to enter into a lease. n4 The contract can be oral or written, express or implied. n5 The contract must comply with the provisions of the statute of frauds if relevant in a particular jurisdiction. n5.1 The individual fact situation will determine if a contract is implied from the action of the parties. n6

It is also possible for the terms of the broker's compensation to be incorporated in the lease itself through a provision or incorporation of the brokerage agreement as an exhibit attached to the lease. n6.1 In one case where the lease contained a provision addressing the broker's compensation and the brokerage agreement was an exhibit to the lease, the parties failed to sign the brokerage agreement. When the landlord refused to pay the balance due on the broker's commission, the court found that all parties to the unexecuted brokerage agreement had assented to its terms and the brokerage agreement was a binding contract under which the broker could recover its unpaid commission. n6.2

The terms of the broker's compensation should be clearly stated. However, in Vision Realty, Inc. v. Kohler, n6.3 the listing agreement provided that the broker was due a 6% commission on the lease, but the agreement did not state the rent amount sought for the property. The broker and owner had verbally discussed what the property's rental rate would be. The property owner refused to pay the broker's commission on this ground when a tenant was procured through the broker's efforts. The court found that the essential terms in a real estate listing agreement include an adequate description of the property sufficient for identification and a reasonably certain expression of the amount of a commission to be paid. The agreement at issue was the listing agreement, not the lease. The failure to include the lease terms in the listing agreement did not affect the validity or the enforceability of the listing agreement.

If an ensuing lease agreement contradicts the brokerage agreement with respect to the broker's commission by decreasing or eliminating the broker's compensation, the owner will bear the burden of proving that the brokerage agreement was modified or extinguished by the subsequent lease agreement. n6.4 This will be difficult to prove unless the broker or the broker's authorized agent agreed to such a modification. The property owner should not assume that any agent employed by the broker has such authority.

It is crucial that the agreement between the broker and the broker's principal clearly indicate when the broker's commission is payable. The broker's preference will be to be paid as soon as possible. Ideally, the broker wants the commission to be paid in full upon execution of the lease. The argument for this position is that the broker has been hired to locate a tenant and not to ensure the tenant's performance of its lease obligations. If the tenant subsequently fails to perform, the landlord can pursue its legal remedies for breach of contract. However, the landlord would prefer to pay the commission after the tenant has taken occupancy of the premises and started paying rent. n6.5

Problems can arise if the lessor intends to pay the commission on a monthly basis as the rent is received and the lessee stops paying rent. In such a case, the broker often wants his or her commission even if the lessee has defaulted. Depending upon the facts of the case, the broker may still be entitled to receive his or her monthly commission payment. In Hildebrandt v. Anderson, n6.6 the lessor and lessee had entered into an earnest money agreement. The lessor and lessee subsequently executed a lease and the lessee took possession. At this time the lessor signed a promissory note as payment for the broker's commission and the lessor also executed a rent assignment assigning to the broker the amount due on the note payment. This note called for monthly payments. When the lessee subsequently stopped paying rent, the lessor stopped making the monthly payments due to the broker on the promissory note. The lessor argued that the commission was not payable until the rent had been paid. The court rejected this argument, stating that the broker earned his commission when the lessor-lessee transaction closed. The earnest money agreement was analogous to a contract to purchase, earnest money, or escrow agreement in a sales transaction. The earnest money agreement was completed by execution of the lease, and broker was entitled to payment in full at that time. The recital in the rent assignment that the note was issued "as and for broker's fee due and owing" correctly stated the status of the debt for which the note was issued as payment. Since the claim underlying the promissory note was a valid claim, the broker was entitled to continue receiving payments on the note despite the fact that the lessor had defaulted. n6.7

However, there are many lease transactions that do not fit neatly into the general rule. There are many circumstances in which compensation may not be due in its entirety when a lease transaction is executed by the parties or when additional commission payments are due the broker long after the original lease has been executed. For these instances, a careful drafting of the brokerage services agreement is invaluable.

[2] Protection Provisions

The brokerage services agreement must provide for notification and verification as well as procedures in the event of default.

For the protection of the parties, the contract must state how long the brokerage services agreement is in effect and specify if there are any protection periods. The protection period provides for payment of compensation to the broker if the lessor/lessee reaches an agreement with a party introduced to the lessor/lessee or the property by the broker during the term of the agreement but the transaction is not entered into by the parties until after the brokerage services agreement expires.

The agreement should also contain any exclusions from the brokerage services agreement. The exclusions provide protection for the lessor/lessee from paying compensation to a broker if one party enters into an agreement with a party or for property they originally had dealings with prior to entering into the brokerage services agreement.

[3] Methods of Payment

Compensation may be calculated on the stated net rent, a factor of rent received, adjustments for changes in rental rate during the term of the lease and additional amounts owed upon execution of options. The method of payment of compensation for procuring a lease may be in the form of a lump sum payable upon execution of the lease, or as a structured payment plan at specified times throughout the term of the lease. Even a lump sum payment can become more complicated depending upon the wording in the brokerage services agreement. n7

[4] Refunding Commission Payments

Depending on the agreement, the broker may have to refund part of a commission payment in the event of early termination of the lease. n8 Refunds may be required where compensation is based on the amounts paid by the lessee and the commission was paid in a lump sum when the lease was executed. The brokerage services agreement should contain a provision specifying what steps should be taken in the event of an early termination of the lease. No refund may be necessary if the commission were based instead on the amount payable by the lessee.

[5] Additional Compensation Under Renewal or Purchase Options[a] Broker Must Monitor as to Whether Lessee Exercises Options

Depending upon the brokerage services agreement, the broker may be entitled to receive additional compensation at various times in the future. If the lease contains renewal or purchase options, a right of first refusal or the right to add space the broker may be entitled to additional commission payments if the lessee exercises those options. The parties' brokerage agreement will determine whether a commission is due on the sale of a purchase option. The fact that there is a commission due on a sale of the premises does not mean that there is a commission due on the sale of a purchase option unless so provided for by the parties' agreement. n8.1

This potential future right to compensation requires that the broker continue to monitor the lease relationship possibly for years after the initial commission payment was received. If the lease contains a provision for early termination or surrender of space, the broker may be faced with the problem of refunding a commission payment years after it is spent.

[b] Courts Divided on Valid Exercise of Renewal Clause

Courts are divided over what constitutes a valid exercise of a renewal clause in a lease.

Some courts hold that if the same parties continue a lessor/lessee relationship originally brought about through the efforts of a broker, that broker is entitled to additional commission payments provided for in the brokerage services agreement. It is a reflection of the intention of the parties. n9 Other courts have strictly construed the language of both the lease and the brokerage services agreement and have denied any additional compensation where the parties negotiated a new lease instead of exercising a renewal clause. n10 And some courts hold that a broker is not entitled to a commission on a lease renewal or extension unless express language provides such a right. n10.1

Amerus Property Brokers v. Hicklin n11 represents a moderate approach. The listing agreement in that case provided in pertinent part that the landlord would pay the broker "a five percent (5%) commission on the gross lease (including negotiated renewals, exercised options or extensions by the Tenant) or one months rent--whichever is greater, payable when the Lease is executed." The plaintiff broker had located a tenant who executed a seventeen-month lease containing an option to renew for one three-year period. If the tenant exercised its option to renew, the rental was to be adjusted annually to reflect changes in the Consumer Price Index number. The tenant was responsible for general maintenance while the defendant landlord was responsible for improvements and repairs. A commission was paid to the broker upon execution of the lease.

The tenant was not totally satisfied with the premises, which affected its negotiations with the landlord concerning a subsequent lease term. The tenant and landlord eventually agreed to a second lease commencing at the expiration of the original seventeen-month term. This second lease called for reduced lease payments, but the tenant agreed to spend a certain amount making improvements to the premises. There was no C.P.I. escalator clause in this second lease. When the broker learned of the continued tenancy, it billed the landlord for its five percent commission. The landlord refused to pay, insisting that the second lease was a new lease, not a negotiated renewal. The issue before the court was whether this second lease was a "negotiated renewal" qualifying for a commission under the parties' listing agreement or whether it was a totally "new" lease that was beyond the parties' agreement.

In coming to a decision, the Supreme Court of Iowa stated that it was guided by the cardinal principle that the parties' intent controlled, and that, except in cases of ambiguity, the parties' intent was determined by what was stated in the contract. n12 The court found that the lease was a negotiated renewal. It stated that there was no serious dispute that the essentials of the lease agreement in the original and subsequent leases were the same: same parties, same property, and substantially the same rent. The reduction in the square footage rental price in the subsequent lease was directly proportional to the amount the tenant agreed to spend on maintenance and improvements. The court found that the variance in terms between the original and subsequent leases merely reflected the owner and the tenant's negotiations. Since the landlord's and tenant's enduring relationship was the product of the broker's initial efforts in procuring the tenant, the court concluded that the landlord had to be held to the bargain it memorialized in the initial agreement. The broker was entitled to its commission on the subsequent lease. n13

[c] Renewal Option Implied Where Same Parties Broker New Lease

At least one court has even attributed a renewal option into a lease based on language contained in the brokerage services agreement. In Board of Regents of University System of Georgia v. A. B. & E., Inc., n14 the brokerage services agreement provided for additional compensation for renewals and extensions of the lease to be entered into. The lease that was eventually executed did not contain a renewal option. Upon the expiration of the original lease, the parties entered into a new lease. The court interpreted "renewals and extensions" to include "new" leases between the same parties and containing substantially the same terms. Therefore the broker was entitled to additional commission payments.

[d] The Obligation to Pay Commissions May Survive a Transfer of the Premises n15

A provision requiring the payment of a lease commission to an agent can survive a transfer of the leased property as illustrated by Pollard & Bagby, Inc. v. Pierce Arrow, L.L.C., III. n16 The property involved in this case was an apartment building. Pollard & Bagby, Inc. (Pollard) acted as the leasing agent for Willard R. Simmons (Simmons), the former owner of the property. Each lease was identical in form and contained a provision providing that the lessor would pay the agent 6% per month of the rental received from the lessee during the lease term and during any renewal and extension thereof or during the term of any new lease or by the holding over of the lessee with the lessor's permission. This provision also stated:

No sale, transfer or assignment by Lessor shall affect Agent's right to receive commissions, provided that in the event Lessor sells the premises, then upon Lessor's furnishing Agent with an agreement signed by the purchaser assuming Lessor's obligation to the Agent under this Lease, Agent will release the original Lessor from any further obligation to the Agent hereunder. n17

Simmons sold the property to Pierce Arrow, L.L.C., III (Pierce), but did not obtain from Pollard a release from further obligations under the leases. After Pierce acquired the property, it retained the services of a different leasing agent, but continued to pay commissions to Pollard until the term of each existing lease expired. As each lease expired, Pierce entered into a new lease with the same tenant and stopped paying commissions to Pollard on the rent paid by that tenant under the new lease.

Pollard filed a declaratory judgment action against Pierce and Simmons seeking a declaration that under the terms of the leases, Pollard was entitled to continue receiving commission on rents paid by any tenants who were initially procured by Pollard. Pierce and Simmons alleged in defense that their obligation to pay commissions to Pollard ceased when that tenant's lease with Simmons expired and the tenant entered into a new lease with Pierce. The trial court found that the term "new lease" as used in the commission provision did not include a lease entered into between a tenant and a new lessor. It granted summary judgment in favor of Pierce and Pollard. n18

The Supreme Court of Virginia reversed. It found the language of this commission provision to be unambiguous and that the plain language of its terms obligated the lessor to pay commissions to Pollard on all rental payments received from tenants procured by Pollard. It stated that Simmons was obligated to pay commissions as long as a tenant procured by Pollard continued to be a tenant of the leased premises. This obligation remained unchanged if an existing tenant executed a new lease for the premises. Since Simmons failed to obtain a release from the obligation as permitted by this provision, he remained liable for the performance of that obligation because the assignment of the leases to Pierce had no effect on Simmon's privity of contract with Pollard. Pierce, as an assignee "standing in the shoes" of Simmons, was also liable for Simmon's obligations to pay commissions under the leases. n19

The court also addressed Simmon's and Pierce's argument that the purchase agreement which provided that the property would be conveyed free and clear of management agreements at settlement. The court found no merit in this contention since the leases provided for commissions that were paid in consideration of Pollard's services rendered in procuring the lease and not as payment for management services. n20

In New Jersey, a purchaser incurred liability to the seller's broker for commissions on leases when the purchaser affirmatively assumed the seller's obligation to pay the commissions. n20.1 While an express promise to pay these commissions will satisfy this standard, determining whether there has been an affirmative assumption of this obligation requires an analysis of the facts and circumstances surrounding the assignment. n20.2 Such an affirmative assumption was found to exist where a schedule of lease commissions accompanied the brokerage agreement which listed the property for sale. The brokerage agreement stated that this schedule would be binding on the seller's heirs, successors, and assigns. In addition, the brokerage agreement was part of the sales contract and, pursuant to the sales contract, the seller assigned all of the leases for the properties existing tenancies to the purchaser, and the purchaser agreed to assume and perform the seller's obligations. n20.3

Not all lease provisions calling for the payment of a commission will survive a transfer of the property. In Brannen/Goddard Company v. PNC Realty Holding Corporation of Georgia n21 the court found that the commission agreement entered into by brokers and the property's original owner was a personal covenant binding only the original owner and any party assuming the original owner's obligation. When the property was transferred to a creditor upon the owner's default on his loan obligations, the agreement between the owner and lender specifically provided that the creditor did not assume any obligation of the owner that arose out of events occurring before the transfer. n22 It also appears that a transfer in the course of a lessor's bankruptcy proceeding will result in the transferee receiving the property free and clear of any contractual obligation to pay a broker's commission on the debtor's leases. n23

[6] Compensation Based on Quantum Meruit

Even without a continuing contractual relationship, a broker may prevail in a compensation claim based on a quantum meruit theory. n24

The following showing is required:

- the brokers provided a valuable service to the clients; and

- the clients availed themselves of the brokers' services to their benefit. n25

In general, however, courts are disinclined to grant relief under quantum meruit. As one court stated, "[a] real estate broker is not entitled to payment even on a quantum meruit basis when he has no express or implied contract with the party from whom he seeks commission." n26

A broker has been allowed to pursue compensation based on quantum meruit where the written listing agreement covered the sale of the property. In this case, after the nature of the transaction shifted, the resulting lease acknowledged that the broker was due a commission on the lease transaction. n27

If a broker is allowed to pursue compensation based on a theory of quantum meruit and the compensation is for services rendered over a period of time, it has been held that the statute of limitations begins to run when the final services have been performed. n28

[7] Careful and Inclusive Drafting

All brokerage services agreements should be as inclusive as possible to avoid questions of interpretation or intention in the future. The contract must provide a protection period and duration provisions, see § 13A.04[2]; rules on when compensation is earned and method of payment, see § 13A.04[1], [3]; and entitlements for additional compensation, see § 13A.04[5]. In general, entitlement issues and problems involving performance of the contract by the lessor, lessee or broker can be avoided with careful drafting of the brokerage services contract. The possible triggering events for earning and payment of compensation should be meticulously enumerated.

Provisions regarding the payment of a commission upon the lessee's exercise of an option to purchase should also be carefully drafted. Is compensation due the broker when a purchase option included in a lease is executed during the lease term? Or must the option be exercised during the listing agreement term? n29 Careful drafting is necessary to preserve a broker's right to receive a commission should the lessee exercise an option to purchase the demised premises since this determination will depend on the wording of the parties' agreement.

However, even with the most careful drafting, all problems cannot be avoided. There is no way to draft around persons who intentionally scheme to avoid their responsibilities, but the agreement can provide a roadmap of what everyone's responsibilities are, a method of determining if someone is in compliance with the terms of the contract and a procedure for redressing damage caused by non-compliance.

Terry*, 110 S.W.2d 838 (1937) , the court held that the lessor was entitled to a refund of part of the commissions paid to the broker when a ninety-day termination provision in the lease was exercised. The brokerage services agreement provided that the commission was based on the "gross amount of rentals." The court interpreted this clause to mean that the commission should be calculated on the amounts the lessee was bound to pay. Since the lessee exercised its termination option, it was not required to pay further rent and the commission owed had to be reduced proportionately.

But see Cumming v. Putnam Realty, Inc., 80 Ark. App. 153, 160 (Ark. Ct. App. Dec. 8, 2002) (pursuant to the parties' listing agreement, the broker was due a commission on the rent due for the initial lease term of 25 years even though the lessee could terminate the lease after a five-year period on six-months' notice).

PART IV Specialized Fields of Brokerage

CHAPTER 13A Leases (Including Leases with Options and Rights of First Refusal) *

10A-13A Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 13A.05

§ 13A.05 Default

[1] Remedies Generally

No matter how much time is spent drafting the brokerage services agreement, all possible scenarios cannot be anticipated. Since the right to receive compensation generally is based on contract, the remedies available to an aggrieved party are recoverable through an action for breach of contract. Although there is usually privity between the broker and only one of the other parties, the brokerage services agreement should address possible defaults by any of the three parties involved in the lease transaction: the lessor, the lessee and the broker. The remedies available depend upon who the defaulting party is and, to some extent, the nature of the default.

In addition to a contract cause of action, relief based on quantum meruit n1 may also be available.

[2] Lessor's Default

[a] Refusal to Pay Commission

There are several ways the lessor can be in default under the brokerage services agreement. The most obvious default is a failure or refusal to pay the agreed upon commission when a lease is executed. The remedy available for this and other types of default is money damages sought in a straight breach of contract action.

It is the broker's responsibility to monitor the status of the lease relationship to determine if an event occurs that triggers the broker's right to receive additional compensation.

In some instances a listing agreement will state that the broker earns a commission if during the term of the agreement a contract for the sale, transfer, or lease of the property is entered into by the property owner. In such a case, even though the property owner desires a sale of the property, the broker should be entitled to a commission by successfully procuring a lessee for the property. n1.1

[b] Refusal to Sign Contract

When the broker procures a ready and willing lessee and the lessor refuses to enter into the lease, the broker must prove that the lessee met all of the lessor's requirements and that the lessor's rejection was arbitrary. n2

[c] Exercise of Renewal or Lease Option

Discovery of default may be difficult because of the fault of one of the parties, or because of the wording of the agreement. Often, the lessor does not inform the broker that the option has been exercised and an additional commission is owed.

Or, the lessee attempts to exercise his option but the lessor refuses to accept or acknowledge the exercise. n3 Option rights can mature years after the original lease transaction and may also be comprised of a series of options stretching over an extended period of time. In addition to the required pleading of proof in a contract action, the broker in this scenario will also have to prove that the option right existed, that an attempt to exercise that option was made and that the exercise of the option was timely made, in proper form and made to the proper parties.

For these reasons, the broker must assume the responsibility of continuously monitoring the status of the lease relationship.

[d] Possible Fraud Claim

A lessor who intentionally tries to avoid incurring liability for additional commission amounts may be liable to the broker under a fraud cause of action, in addition to a breach of contract claim. This can occur when the lessor induces the lessee not to exercise its option rights, n4 or when it attempts to avoid the additional compensation by canceling the original contract and entering into a "new" lease. In Consolidated Realty Co. v. Graves, n5 the lessor attempted to evade the commission obligation of a lease with a five-year renewal option by canceling the original contract and entering into a new lease for continued occupancy of the same space. In finding that the broker was entitled to receive a commission, the court was influenced by the bad faith of the lessor. This case supports a possible action in fraud if the broker can show that the lessor's actions were based on an intent to deprive the broker of his compensation.

[3] Lessee's Default

[a] No Compensation Prior to Taking Possession

If the lessee defaults prior to taking possession of the real estate the broker may not be entitled to receive compensation. If the prospective tenant is unable to meet its financial obligations, for example, the broker may not have fulfilled its obligations under its contract of employment. The default may be evidence that the broker did not procure a ready and willing lessee. n6

[b] Agreement Dictates Methods of Payment of Commission

If the lessee defaults on the lease after taking possession of the real estate, the broker's right to commission depends upon how the commission is calculated in the brokerage services agreement.

If the commission is based on the gross rental amount and the brokerage services agreement is silent on the procedure for a lessee default, the broker is entitled to retain the commission in full. However, if the commission calculation is based on the rental amounts received by the lessor, the broker's commission depends upon how payment was received. If the broker had received a lump sum payment, the broker would be required to refund a portion of that commission prorated over the remaining term of the lease. If commission payments were made in installments as rent was received, the broker's right to receive future installments would terminate.

[c] When Agreement Is Silent on Commission

The brokerage services agreement must reflect the parties' intentions regarding the compensation of the broker in the event of a lessee's default. The absence of a provision is a factor indicating the duty to pay is unconditional, and has been held to warrant payment of compensation. n7 If the lessor wants protection in the event of a lessee's default, the lessor should make a specific provision for that eventuality in the brokerage services agreement.

[4] Broker's Default

The broker owes the client the traditional fiduciary duties of loyalty, confidentiality, obedience, disclosure, reasonable care and diligence and accounting. The broker also owes any additional duties and obligations it specifically contracts for in the brokerage services agreement. If the broker breaches any of its duties, the client has a number of remedies available to it. The broker may lose all entitlement to compensation for a breach of its duties. The broker is also subject to money damages for breach of contract. The injured party may be entitled to a rescission of the transaction and restitution. Finally, since most jurisdictions require the broker to be a licensed real estate broker, the aggrieved party may seek sanctions against the broker from the appropriate regulatory authority. n8

When examining a broker's duty to disclose in the context of a commercial lease transaction, courts consider the fact that commercial property landlords and tenants are expected to be more sophisticated than a consumer. Even though there may be a statutory duty for a broker to deal honestly and fairly with all parties in the transaction, this does not mean that all nondisclosures will constitute a breach of a broker's duty, particularly when the breach concerns the duties of a broker representing a party other than the plaintiff. n9

10A-13A Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 13A.06

§ 13A.06 Sample Commission Provisions for Brokerage Services Agreements

[1] Flat Fee

This form can be used when the lessor contemplates leasing a single identified space to a single tenant. The advantage to the lessor is a known cost regardless of the value of the lease. The disadvantages to the lessor include assuming the risk for lessee default and agreeing to pay an amount that may not be reflective of market conditions; the lessor may overpay for the lease or not get the best deal possible because of the broker's zeal to conclude the deal as quickly as possible.

Real Estate Broker's Commission. As compensation for providing the services outlined in this Agreement lessor agrees to pay broker as follows:

- (a) _____ upon procuring a ready and willing lessee in accordance with the terms and provisions contained in this Agreement.
- (b) The commission will be paid to broker by lessor upon the execution of a lease and delivery of possession to lessee.
- (c) In the event of a subsequent default by lessee, Broker shall not be required to refund to lessor any amounts paid in accordance with Subparagraph (a), above.

[2] Percentage of Net Rental

This form can be used when the lessor has more than one space or is willing to subdivide space. It can also be used for a single transaction. The advantage to the lessor is that the payment will reflect current market conditions. Brokers will be encouraged to aggressively market the real estate for the best deal possible in order to maximize their own return. The lessor assumes the risk for lessee default.

Real Estate Broker's Commission. As compensation for providing the services outlined in this Agreement, lessor agrees to pay broker as follows:

- (a) _____ % of the net rental amount of any lease which complies with the terms and provisions contained in this Agreement.

(b) The "net rental amount" is the total amount due from lessee less the amounts paid by lessee for real estate taxes, insurance premiums and common area maintenance expenses.

(c) The commission will be paid to broker by lessor upon the execution of each lease and delivery of possession to lessee.

(d) In the event of a subsequent default by lessee, broker shall not be required to refund to lessor any amounts paid in accordance with subparagraph (a), above.

[3] Percentage of Rent Collected

This form can be used when the lessor has more than one space or is willing to subdivide space. It can also be used for a single transaction. The advantage to the lessor is that the payment will reflect current market conditions while sharing the risk of a tenant default with the broker. It can also be used to spread out the payments to the broker over the term of the lease.

Real Estate Broker's Commission. As compensation for providing the services outlined in this Agreement, lessor agrees to pay broker as follows:

(a) _____ % of the net rents actually collected by lessor from any lease which complies with the terms and provisions contained in this Agreement.

(b) The "net rents actually collected" is the amount received by the lessor as a rental payment less the amounts paid by lessee for real estate taxes, insurance premiums and common area maintenance expenses.

(c) The commission will be paid to broker by lessee annually, in advance, commencing upon the execution of each lease and delivery of possession to lessee and every annual anniversary date (the "lease year") thereafter.

(d) In the event of a subsequent default by lessee, or other event which terminates the lease, broker shall refund to lessor the amount of commission paid for the current year, prorated from the date of default/termination to the last day of the lease year and any entitlement to future installments of the commission shall terminate.

[4] Renewal Option

This provision can be used when it is anticipated there may be a renewal option or extension provision in a lease to be entered into. It provides what additional compensation amount will be due and when it is payable. Since the final form of any lease that will be accepted by the owner cannot be predicted with certainty when the brokerage services agreement is negotiated, it is prudent to include this provision in all brokerage services agreements.

Additional Compensation. In addition to the compensation enumerated in the preceding section of this Agreement, if the lease executed by lessor contains a renewal option which is exercised by lessee, or the term of the lease is extended by lessor, lessor agrees to pay broker as follows:

(a) One-half of the amount of the commission enumerated in the preceding section of this Agreement.

(b) The additional commission will be paid to broker by lessor on the lease anniversary date following the renewal election or extension.

[5] Purchase Option/Right of First Refusal

This provision can be used when it is anticipated there may be a purchase option or right of first refusal in a lease to be entered into. It provides what additional compensation amount will be due and when it is payable. It is prudent to include this provision in all brokerage services agreements, because the final form of any lease that will be accepted by the owner cannot be predicted with certainty when the brokerage services agreement is negotiated.

Purchase Option/Right of First Refusal. In addition to the compensation enumerated in the preceding section of this Agreement, if the lease executed by lessor contains a Purchase Option or Right of First Refusal to Purchase, and lessee exercises that Option or Right, lessor agrees to pay broker as follows:

(a) _____% of the purchase price.

(b) This commission will be paid to broker by lessor at the closing of the sale of the real estate. If the sale does not close for any reason, no additional compensation will be owed to broker.

CHAPTER 13A Leases (Including Leases with Options and Rights of First Refusal) *

10A-13A Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 13A.07

§ 13A.07 Illustrative Form: Brokerage Agreement for Office Lease

Illustrative Form: Brokerage Agreement for Office Lease

BROKERAGE AGREEMENT FOR OFFICE LEASE

Agreement made this _____ day of _____, 19 _____, between _____ hereinafter referred to as the "Owner" and _____ hereinafter referred to as the "Broker".

W I T N E S S E T H:

WHEREAS, Owner owns approximately _____ square feet of vacant space in the building known as _____, shown on the diagram attached hereto as Exhibit A; and

WHEREAS, Owner wishes to retain the services of Broker to represent it in the negotiation and leasing of the vacant space.

NOW, THEREFORE, in consideration of the following and other good and valuable consideration, the receipt and sufficiency of which is hereby acknowledged, it is agreed:

1. The vacant space may be leased in units no smaller than _____ square feet.
2. Broker shall market the vacant space. "Marketing" shall include but not be limited to: displaying appropriate signage, placing advertising in print media and the Internet, and listing the vacant space in any multiple listing service in which Broker participates.
3. Owner shall reimburse Broker _____ for signage and advertising costs.
4. Broker shall negotiate the lease of the vacant space with Prospective Tenants in accordance with the guidelines and specifications attached hereto as Exhibit B.

Broker acknowledges that Owner has had dealings/negotiations with the following parties and that if Owner enters into a lease with any of the listed parties, no commission will be earned by Broker: _____.

5. Broker shall present all lease offers along with Prospective Tenants' financial statements, credit reports and references for Owner's review. Approval of the Prospective Tenant shall be in Owner's sole discretion. If Owner approves the Prospective Tenant, Owner will have a lease prepared for the Prospective Tenant's execution.

6. If and when, as a result of Broker's negotiations, (a) a written lease satisfactory in all respects to the Owner is entered into between and executed and delivered by the Prospective Tenant and Owner, or its assignee, as Landlord, or (b) if Owner enters into a lease with any Prospective Tenant to whom the Property was shown during the term of this Agreement within _____ days after termination of this Agreement, unless the Owner has entered into a Brokerage Agreement for Office Lease with another real estate broker, Owner will pay Broker one leasing commission based on the actual rents payable to the Owner under the Lease (irrespective of any commencement date set forth in the Lease) in accordance with the Schedule of Leasing Rates for the space in five (5) equal installments payable at the following times and in the following manner:

(a) the first installment, constituting twenty percent (20%) of the commission, shall be paid one-half (1/2) upon the execution and delivery of the Lease, and one-half (1/2) upon the date when, under the terms of the Lease, Prospective Tenant obtains possession or is obligated to commence the payment of rent on a regular and continuous basis, whichever shall be earlier;

(b) the next installment of twenty percent (20%) shall be paid one year after the date of the complete payment of the first installment; and

(c) the subsequent equal installments of twenty percent (20%) each shall be paid at one year intervals thereafter.

Owner shall have the privilege of accelerating the payment of any and all installments.

[OR]

6. If and when, as a result of Broker's negotiations, (a) a written lease satisfactory in all respects to the Owner is entered into between and executed and delivered by the Prospective Tenant and Owner, or its assignee, as Landlord, or (b) if Owner enters into a lease with any Prospective Tenant to whom the Property was shown during the term of this Agreement within _____ days after termination of this Agreement, unless the Owner has entered into a Brokerage Agreement for Office Lease with another real estate broker, Owner will pay Broker _____ as a flat fee [OR] _____ % of the base rent payable during the initial term of the lease.

7. In computing any commission due under this Agreement, the following rules govern:

(a) The following shall be excluded from the rental used to compute the leasing commission:

(i) Any increase in rent pursuant to any escalator provision contained in the Lease whereby Prospective Tenant pays a share of Owner's increase in taxes, costs or expenses or any "Cost of Living" increase and any Percentage Rentals payable by the Prospective Tenant in excess of fixed minimum (base) rent.

(ii) Rent upon any portion of the demised premises payable or credited by Owner to Prospective Tenant by reason of Owner's retaining as subtenant or otherwise any portion of the demised premises.

(iii) Rent payable by Prospective Tenant allocated specifically or otherwise in payment for utilities, electricity, services, heat and/or air-conditioning furnished or paid for by the Owner.

(iv) Rent payable by Prospective Tenant in payment for tenant improvements, decorations or installations constructed by or for Owner and reimbursed to Owner by way of additional rent under the Lease or by separate agreement.

(b) If the Lease between the Owner and Prospective Tenant or any agreement collateral to or affecting such Lease shall provide that the Owner, its parent corporation or any of its subsidiary or affiliated corporations, shall be required to assume Prospective Tenant's obligations under any lease covering any space occupied by Prospective Tenant (hereinafter referred to as "Present Space") or shall be required to indemnify Prospective Tenant as to any obligations respecting such Present Space then, in calculating the actual rentals involved in the Lease, there shall be deducted therefrom the total dollar amount of the obligations so undertaken pursuant to the assumption or indemnification agreement, and the commission shall be computed on the rentals remaining after the deduction. Thereafter, when the obligations shall be finally ascertained, Owner shall pay to the Broker the adjusted amount, if any, computed after deduction of the rent, brokerage commission, redecorating costs and all other expenses and obligations actually paid or reimbursed by Owner in connection with the Present Space, the computation to be according to the average rate of commission payable for the full term of the Lease.

(c) No commissions shall be paid to the Broker as a result of any renewal or extension of the Lease between Owner and Prospective Tenant, nor on renewals or extensions which result from the exercise of an option to renew or extend contained in the Lease.

[OR]

(c) In the event the Lease contains a renewal option and that option is exercised, Owner will pay Broker an additional commission in the amount of

_____ as a flat fee [OR]

_____ % of the base rent payable during the option period.

(d) If the Lease between Owner and Prospective Tenant shall provide that the Prospective Tenant shall have the right to cancel the Lease or surrender space at any time prior to the commencement of the term, then in the event that Prospective Tenant shall in fact so cancel the Lease or surrender space, no commission shall be deemed due or earned by the Broker, and the Broker shall repay promptly any sums which may have been previously paid by the Owner to the Broker. Moreover, if the Lease shall provide that Prospective Tenant may cancel the Lease upon a date which shall be after the commencement thereof but prior to the expiration of the term therein provided, then, any commissions shall be deemed due or earned only upon the uncancelable portion of the term (and on the termination penalty, if any) until Prospective Tenant's right to cancel expires without exercise and the balance (less the commission previously paid on the termination penalty, if any) of such commission shall then be paid by Owner to Broker following the last day on which the Prospective Tenant may exercise the right to cancel. If the commission is paid for the period prior to the beginning of the period for which rent actually commences to accrue, then Broker will refund any amount paid by Owner based upon rentals for the period from the commencement date set forth in the Lease to the date upon which rent actually commences to accrue.

(e) If for any reason, including Owner's failure to complete the premises demised by the Lease because of inability to finance construction, acts of God, strikes or other labor difficulties, governmental restrictions, acts of public enemy, casualty or causes beyond Owner's control, Prospective Tenant does not commence the payment of rent, then no portion of the balance of the commission remaining unpaid shall be deemed to be due or earned, or will be paid to Broker by Owner, and Owner is and will be relieved from liability for the payment of any portion of the remaining balance of the commissions, and the Broker shall refund to the Owner all amounts previously paid hereunder.

(f) If the Prospective Tenant enters into a lease and subsequently defaults under the terms of the lease, the commission payable in accordance with Paragraph 6, above, will be recalculated based upon the base rent actually paid by the Prospective Tenant and Broker will refund all amounts previously paid in excess of the recalculated commission.

8. If for any reason whatsoever, including but not limited to, acts, omissions, negligence or the willful default of the Owner, its agents, employees or representatives, a Lease shall not be entered into between Owner and Prospective Tenant, no commission or brokerage or any portion thereof, will be deemed to be due or earned, or will be paid to Broker by Owner, and Owner is and will be relieved from liability for the payment of any and all commissions, claims or charges whatsoever. It is expressly agreed that Owner shall have the unqualified right, in its sole and absolute discretion, to refuse to enter into any Lease with Prospective Tenant for any reason whatsoever without incurring any obligation to the Broker for the payment of commissions or otherwise.

9. Broker may, in its discretion, cooperate and compensate other brokers in procuring Prospective Tenants. In the event of a claim for brokerage commissions by any other broker, then, upon final determination by a court or an arbitration that such other broker is entitled to commissions on the Lease, Broker will indemnify and save and hold the Owner harmless against all damages and costs (including reasonable attorney's fees) suffered by the Owner, but only to the extent of the commissions received or receivable by Broker.

10. This Agreement shall terminate on _____, 19 ____.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, the parties have caused these presents to be signed and sealed the day and year first above written.

CHAPTER 13A Leases (Including Leases with Options and Rights of First Refusal) *

10A-13A Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 13A.09

§ 13A.09 Illustrative Form: Exclusive Subleasing Agreement

EXCLUSIVE REAL ESTATE SUBLEASE LISTING AGREEMENT

1. Property. In consideration of the terms of this Agreement and the listing for sublease of the real property commonly known as _____ as shown in the diagram attached hereto as Exhibit A (the "Property") with _____ ("Broker"), and Broker's agreement to use its best efforts to effect the sublease of the Property, the undersigned ("Lessee"), as lessee under a certain lease dated _____ (the "Primary Lease"), with _____ as lessor (the "Lessor"), a copy of which is attached hereto as Exhibit B, hereby grants Broker the exclusive right to sublease the property "as is, where is," subject to the Primary Lease and other matters of record, for a period commencing on the date hereof and ending at midnight on the _____ day after the date hereof (the "Term"), at rental terms as indicated on Exhibit C.

2. Sublease Defined. For purposes of this Agreement, the term "sublease" shall include a sublease under this agreement, an assignment of the Primary Lease and/or Lessor entering a lease directly with any prospective tenant.

Broker acknowledges that any sublease must be consented to by Lessor.

3. Commission. Subject to the terms hereof, Lessee agrees to pay Broker a lease commission in accordance with Broker's Schedule of Lease Commission, a copy of which is attached hereto as Exhibit D and incorporated herein by reference. The lease commission shall be earned and paid for services rendered if, during the Term, all, or any portion, of the Property is subleased to a tenant, whether or not the tenant was introduced to the Property by Broker.

Lessee shall pay Broker the lease commission upon Broker submitting a written offer from a qualified prospective tenant to sublease the Property in accordance with the terms contained in Exhibit C or upon Lessee or Lessor accepting a sublease within the Term, or within 180 days after the expiration of the Term, or any extension thereof, to a person or entity whose name appears on the list of prospective tenants submitted by Broker to Lessee no later than ten business days following the expiration of the Term.

Notwithstanding anything contained in this Agreement to the contrary, a commission shall not be payable with respect to any sublease to _____ or any entity owned, controlled or affiliated with the excluded party.

4. Non-discrimination. It is understood that it is illegal for either Lessee or Broker to refuse to display or lease the Property to any person because of race, color, religion, national origin, sex, marital status or physical disability.

5. Lessee's Responsibilities. Lessee warrants that it has authority to sublease the Property and that all documents supplied to Broker are true and complete copies and are in full force and effect.

Lessee agrees to immediately refer to Broker all inquiries from anyone interested in the Property. All negotiations are to be through either Broker, Lessee or Lessee's legal counsel, as determined by Lessee, but keeping the other fully informed. Broker shall, at Broker's cost and expense, advertise the Property, including without limitation: preparation and distribution of Broker's standard brokerage informational package (provided Broker shall first obtain Lessee's approval of the substance of any package and other advertising, but may make reasonable variations thereafter to accommodate presentation needs) and Lessee may authorize Broker, at Broker's cost and expense, to place a sign on the Property.

Lessee will promptly disclose to Broker and any prospective tenant any and all material information known to Lessee regarding the condition of the Property, including but not limited to, the presence and location of asbestos and other toxic, hazardous or contaminated substances, and underground storage tanks in, on or about the Property. Lessee has not been notified by any municipal or governmental authority of any uncured violation of any zoning or other applicable governmental regulation, including but not limited to federal and state EPA regulations respecting environmental hazards.

Lessee has not been notified by Lessor of any uncured event of default under any provision of the Primary Lease.

Lessee shall promptly notify Broker upon receipt of any notice during the Term regarding violations and acts of default covered by this paragraph.

Upon reasonable notice, Lessee shall grant Broker and prospective tenants access to the Property.

Lessee acknowledges that Broker is relying upon Lessee's warranties and statements contained herein and all materials supplied by Lessee and hereby indemnifies and agrees to hold Broker harmless from any action brought against Broker, including Broker's attorneys' fees, due to the information supplied by or withheld by Lessee.

6. Broker's Responsibilities. Broker agrees to make an inspection of the Property, to compile and have readily available all lease information, to professionally show the Property to prospective tenants and to continuously use its best efforts to Lease the Property.

Broker agrees to represent only Lessee and not prospective tenants. Broker agrees that it will work with and cooperate with all licensed real estate brokers in the geographic area in which the Property is located on the usual and customary participation basis used by real estate brokers in the area. Notwithstanding anything contained in this Agreement to the contrary, if a cooperating broker is or claims to be involved in any sublease of all or any portion of the Property (unless the claim is not a good faith legitimate claim), Broker shall be liable and responsible for payment of the cooperating compensation to that cooperating broker.

Broker shall have no authority to bind Lessee in any respect as to the Property or otherwise. Broker shall offer the Property for sublease only at the rental and other terms first approved by Lessee.

Broker shall advise Lessee, at least monthly, of all sublease prospects and contacts with whom Broker is in communication.

Broker shall have no responsibility with respect to the Property, its management or care.

7. Notices. All notices required herein shall be in writing and delivered (i) by personal service; (ii) sent by certified mail, postage prepaid, return receipt requested; (iii) sent by commercial delivery service; or (iv) sent by facsimile transmission with a confirmation copy by first class mail.

8. Entire Agreement. This Agreement, and all Exhibits attached hereto, constitutes the entire agreement between Lessee and Broker and supercedes all prior discussions, negotiations and agreements, whether oral or written. This Agreement may not be amended or altered unless in writing and signed by both Lessee and Broker. Any purported amendment, modification or withdrawal not in writing is void and of no effect. This Agreement is binding upon the parties, their heirs, successors and assigns. Notwithstanding the foregoing, this Agreement may not be assigned by Broker without Lessee's prior written consent.

EXHIBIT D

Schedule of Lease Commission

Subject to the terms and provisions of the Exclusive Real Estate Sublease Listing Agreement to which this Schedule D is attached, the lease commission shall be _____ percent (_____%) of the aggregate amount of the "base rent" payable under the terms of the Sublease for the sublease term without extensions. For purposes of this Agreement, "base rent" excludes (i) any percentage or other types of additional rent payable by a sublessee and (ii) any portion of the based rent which is, as determined by Lessee or Lessor, based on providing the Lessee or Lessor with a recovery of contribution toward the cost of Lessee improvements, fixtures and other costs of the tenancy or payable by the Lessee or Lessor for improvements provided by the Lessee or Lessor.

In lieu of the foregoing commission rate, a commission rate of _____ percent (_____%) shall be used if the base rent shall be absolutely net to Lessee or Lessor, so that the sublease shall yield, net to the Lessee or Lessor, the specified base rent in each month and year during the Term, and the Sublessee shall bear each and every item of expense or imposition of every kind and nature whatsoever, (including, but not limited to, insurance, real estate taxes, assessments and other impositions, burdens and levies, maintenance, repair, replacement and common area maintenance) for the payment of which the Lessee or Lessor is, shall or may become liable by reason of its rights, estate or interest in the Property and in the common areas which may be used by the Sublessee, or in or under the Sublease, or by reason of or arising from the ownership, operation, management, maintenance, repair, rebuilding, remodeling, renovation, use or occupancy of the Property, including without limitation buildings or improvements thereon, and such common areas.

All leasing commissions are due and payable upon sublease execution.

PART V Other Issues Affecting Brokers

CHAPTER 14 Federal Laws Affecting Real Estate Brokers *

10A-14 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice Scope

Scope

SCOPE

Chapter 14 discusses major federal laws that affect the real estate brokerage industry. For an overview of federal disclosure requirements affecting real estate brokers, see Ch. 3A above. The statutory schemes discussed in this chapter include:

- The Real Estate Settlement Procedures Act (§ 14.02),
- The Foreign Investment in Real Property Tax Act of 1980 (§ 14.03),
- Federal Truth-in-Lending Legislation (§ 14.04),
- Land use legislation (§ 14.05),
- Reporting requirements for brokers under the Tax Reform Act of 1986 (§ 14.06),
- The Americans with Disabilities Act (§ 14.07),
- The Fair Housing Act (§ 14.08),
- The Condominium and Cooperative Conversion Protection and Abuse Relief Act (§ 14.09),
- The Agricultural Foreign Investment Disclosure Act (§ 14.10),
- The Federal Trade Commission Act (§ 14.11),
- The Flood Disaster Protection Act of 1973 (§ 14.12),
- The Copyright Act of 1976 (§ 14.13),
- Federal asset forfeiture laws (§ 14.14),

- Interstate Land Sales Full Disclosure Act (§ 14.15) (all new 2010).

It is crucial that brokers have at least a rudimentary understanding of these laws and how they affect their clients and the brokerage industry.

For additional discussion on these and other issues see the following other publications:

- Condominium Law and Practice, Ch. 21, Federal Regulation of Sales and Marketing (Matthew Bender).
- Cooperative Housing Law and Practice, Ch. 3, Federal Law Affecting Cooperatives (Matthew Bender).

CHAPTER 14 Federal Laws Affecting Real Estate Brokers *

10A-14 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 14.01

§ 14.01 Introduction

The law has moved in the direction of imposing legal liability on real estate brokers, particularly where residential properties are involved, for nondisclosure of matters that cause damage to purchasers of real property. This is true even if there is not a fiduciary relationship between the broker and purchaser. Traditionally, real estate brokers have been faced with purchaser claims of misconduct where, for example, a purchased building is discovered to suffer from structural defects, n1 is subject to flooding, n2 or is infested by termites or other pests. n3 Other claims for liability against brokers have arisen out of health and safety code or building code violations filed against the property purchased. n4

With the explosion of case and statutory law governing virtually every aspect of the real estate sales transaction, and the almost bewildering proliferation of land use control legislation, real estate brokers, more than ever before, must keep abreast of legal developments that may impose new or potential legal duties and liabilities. This chapter highlights, for both real estate brokers and legal practitioners, the expanding federal legislation which now affects real estate licensees. The liability imposed upon real estate brokers extends to negligence, negligent misrepresentation, innocent misrepresentation, fraud, conspiracy, failure to exercise due diligence to inform or disclose information to the purchaser, and maintaining federal, state, and local standards imposed by the real estate brokerage business and the law of agency.

PART V Other Issues Affecting Brokers

CHAPTER 14 Federal Laws Affecting Real Estate Brokers *

10A-14 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 14.02

§ 14.02 The Real Estate Settlement Procedures Act (RESPA)^{n*}

[1] In General

Since 1974, the vast majority of residential real estate transactions have been subject to the provisions of the Real Estate Settlement Procedures Act (RESPA). ⁿ¹ Additional transactions became subject to RESPA in 1992, when Congress added refinancings and second mortgages to coverage that previously applied primarily to first mortgages. ⁿ² RESPA was enacted to educate consumers about the real estate settlement process and to correct what were perceived to be abusive practices that caused unnecessarily high real estate settlement (closing or consummation) costs to be incurred by consumers. ⁿ³ Real estate brokers come within the scope of RESPA by providing a "settlement service," ⁿ⁴ and thus are subject to the anti-kickback provisions of RESPA. ⁿ⁵ RESPA has been called the principal federal statute regulating the activities of real estate brokers. ^{n5.1}

[2] Applicability of the Act

RESPA applies to any "federally related mortgage loan," ⁿ⁶ which by definition includes loans secured by residential properties designed for one- to four-family occupancy. ⁿ⁷ The Housing and Community Development Act of 1992 added subordinate liens and refinancings to the types of loans covered by RESPA. ⁿ⁸ Specifically exempted in RESPA are transactions involving extensions of credit (1) primarily for business, commercial, or agricultural purposes; or (2) to government or governmental agencies or instrumentalities. ⁿ⁹ Regulation X (Reg. X), the regulation that implements RESPA, lists more specific exceptions to RESPA coverage:

- (1) temporary financing (such as a construction loan);
- (2) lenders who make or invest in residential real estate loans aggregating $1,000,000 or less per year;
- (3) loans on properties of 25 acres or more;
- (4) loans made for a business, commercial, or agricultural purpose, as defined by Regulation Z; ⁿ¹⁰
- (5) loans made on vacant land or unimproved property, unless the loan proceeds will be used to construct or place a structure or manufactured home on the property within 2 years from the date of settlement;

- (6) loans secured by residential property that is not located in a State; n11
- (7) conversions of federally related mortgage loans to different terms that are consistent with the provisions of the original mortgage instrument, as long as a new note is not required and even if a fee is charged;
- (8) secondary market transactions; and
- (9) assumptions of existing federally related mortgage loans in which the lender does not have the express right to approve a subsequent person as the borrower. n12

Thus, RESPA coverage generally applies to home purchase loans and refinances of home purchase loans, home equity loans, home improvement loans, and loans for condominiums, cooperatives, time-share interests, and manufactured homes.

[3] Anti-Kickback Provisions

Real estate brokers should be aware that Section 8 of RESPA (Section 8) n12.1 prohibits, in connection with a federally related mortgage loan, the giving or acceptance of any fee, kickback, or thing of value in return for the referral of settlement service business and the giving or accepting of any part of a settlement service charge except for services actually performed. n13 The intent of Section 8 is to eliminate higher costs to the borrower resulting from the inflation of loan origination and settlement charges by referral fees, kickbacks, rebates, and like payments that are used as inducements to those, such as real estate brokers, who are in a position to refer settlement business. n14 Real estate brokers are thus prohibited under Section 8 from receiving a fee or other thing of value for referring a person to another settlement service provider, such as a mortgage lender, mortgage broker, title insurance company, title insurance agent or appraiser. n14.1 Although an exception to Section 8 would permit a real estate broker who owns all or part of another settlement service provider, subject to certain conditions, to receive a return on his/her ownership interest in such provider and thus benefit from referrals to that provider, this exception requires that the "affiliated business arrangement" (AfBA) be legitimate, and not simply a sham designed to evade the Section 8 referral fee prohibition. n15

Both HUD and state officials have taken enforcement action in connection with AfBAs that they determined were not legitimate. In March 2005, for example, HUD entered into a settlement agreement with a real estate broker (Broker), a limited liability company the members of which were Broker's individual real estate agents (LLC), and a closing and escrow company (Escrow Company), who together formed an AfBA that provided title and closing services. HUD essentially determined that this AfBA was not legitimate because, among other things, it allowed LLC: (1) to acquire its ownership interest in the AfBA for less than fair market value, and (2) to redistribute its earnings from the AfBA to its real estate agent-members based on the volume of business each referred to the AfBA. n15.1 Also, in March 2005, the Commissioner of Insurance for the State of Colorado entered an Order against three title insurance companies for compensating "captive title re-insurance companies" that the Commissioner viewed as illegitimate. These captive re-insurance companies were owned by mortgage lenders and real estate brokers which were in a position to, and did, refer business to the title insurance company. n15.2 The Commissioner determined that the compensation paid to the captive re-insurance companies far exceeded the risk of loss that was transferred to them under the arrangement.

[4] Disclosures of Assignments, Sale, or Transfer of Loan Servicing

Amendments to RESPA in 1991 provided for disclosures to applicants relating to assignments, sale, or transfer of loan servicing. n16 The statute requires a person who makes federally related first-lien mortgage loans to disclose to each applicant at the time of loan application, or within 3 days after submission of the application: (1) whether the servicing of the loan may be assigned, sold, or transferred to any other person at any time while the loan is outstanding; (2) at the lender's choice, for each of the most recent three calendar years completed, either the percentage of loans made by the person for which servicing has been assigned, sold, or transferred at the end of the most recent calendar year completed, or, if the person who makes the loan does not service any federally related mortgage loans, that there is a present intent on the part of the person to assign, sell, or transfer the servicing of the loan to another person. n17 The servicing disclosure must also contain the percentages of mortgage servicing loans originated by the lender in calendar year for which servicing has been assigned, sold, or transferred for the calendar year. n18 Compliance with this requirement is not required if the lender includes the language "[and have not serviced mortgage loans in the last three years.]" n19 Also required is an estimate of the percentage of loans that the lender anticipates it will make during the 12-month period following the closing of the loan. n20

A servicer of any federally related first-lien mortgage loan must notify the borrower in writing of any assignment, sale, or transfer of the servicing to any other person not less than fifteen days before the effective date of the transfer. n21 The new servicer must notify the borrower within 15 days after the effective date of the transfer. There is a general exception, however, if the notice is given to the borrower at the settlement. n22 The 2 notices may be combined into 1 if it is sent to the borrower at least 15 days before the transfer. The provisions also require the loan servicer to respond to inquiries from the borrower (qualified written request) within twenty days, and to make timely corrections to escrow accounts. n23 See Appendix MS-1 to Reg. X for a suggested form.

The Economic Growth and Regulatory Paperwork Reduction Act of 1996, n24 in a paragraph titled "Unnecessary Disclosure," made the following amendment to RESPA:

(a) Disclosure to Applicant Relating to Assignment, Sale, or Transfer of Loan Servicing. Each person who makes a federally related mortgage loan shall disclose to each person who applies for the loan, at the time of application for the loan, whether the servicing of the loan may be assigned, sold, or transferred to any other person at any time while the loan is outstanding.

This disclosure requirement replaces the more involved disclosure discussed above, which had previously been required to be given at the time of loan application, or within three days after submission of the application. In 1997, HUD proposed an amendment to its servicing disclosure rule to effect this new provision of the statute, but never adopted that proposal. n25

[5] Escrow Accounting

Section 10 of RESPA n26 establishes the statutory limits on the amounts that mortgage servicers n27 may require a borrower to deposit into an escrow account if the servicer chooses to establish one. (RESPA does not require the use of escrow accounts.) Section 10(a)(1) prohibits a servicer, at the time the escrow account is created, from requiring the borrower to make payments to the escrow account that exceed the maximum amounts calculated in accordance with the statute. These maximum amounts are calculated by analyzing how much money will be needed to cover disbursements for the mortgaged property, such as taxes and insurance, and to maintain a cushion of no more than one-sixth of the estimated total annual disbursements from the account.

Section 10(a)(2) prohibits the lender, over the life of the escrow account, from requiring the borrower to make payments to the escrow account that exceed allowable amounts. The maximum monthly amount that may be collected is equal to one-twelfth of the total annual escrow disbursements that the lender reasonably anticipates paying during a year, plus the amount necessary to maintain the cushion. No provision of Section 10 requires a servicer to collect the maximums allowable under the statute; the servicer may always collect less and is not required to collect any cushion at all.

Section 10 and section 6(g) of RESPA n28 govern the timing of disbursements from escrow accounts. Section 10 requires the servicer to follow "normal lending practices of the lender and local custom, provided that the selection of each such date constitutes prudent lending practice." Section 6(g) requires servicers to "make payments from the escrow account for such taxes, insurance premiums, and other charges in a timely manner as such payments become due." n29

A final rule implementing sections 6(g) and 10 of RESPA and changes to RESPA made in section 942 of the National Affordable Housing Act n30 was published on October 26, 1994. n31 The effective date of this rule was extended to May 24, 1995, as a result of a February 15, 1995, rulemaking, n32 which also modified and clarified the October 1994 rule, because of questions on the rule. HUD issued further clarifications and corrections on December 19, 1994; n33 March 1, 1995; n34 May 9, 1995; n35 and January 21, 1998; n36 and published a notice of software availability on April 4, 1995. n37 To further confuse the RESPA situation, HUD streamlined Reg. X on March 26, 1996 n38 to comply with the Administration's regulatory reform initiatives.

The general consensus among courts considering the issue is that section 10(a) of RESPA does not afford consumers a private right of action for redress of violations of these escrow accounting rules. n38.1

[6] Disclosure of Fees

[a] Introduction

The requirement to disclose fees was greatly expanded under a regulation adopted by HUD in 1992. This regulation mandated that mortgage broker fees, however denominated, whether direct or indirect in regard to who pays, must be disclosed on both a good faith estimate and a HUD-1 settlement statement. n39 Mortgage brokers who are not exclusive agents of a lender and receive a loan application are also required to give a good faith estimate. n40

Since the early 1990s, class action attorneys have filed well over 150 lawsuits against mortgage bankers and mortgage brokers, alleging that the mortgage broker fees, particularly "yield spread premiums," n41 were illegal kickbacks under RESPA. These charges were made in spite of the HUD example of a yield spread premium in Reg. X. Following is the example:

"A" is a mortgage broker who provides origination services to submit a loan to a lender for approval. The mortgage broker charges the borrower a uniform fee for the total origination services, as well as a direct up-front charge for reimbursement of credit reporting, appraisal services or similar charges.

HUD's comments:

The mortgage broker's fee must be itemized in the good faith estimate and on the HUD-1 settlement statement. Other charges which are paid for by the borrower and paid in advance are listed as P.O.C. on the HUD-1 settlement statement, and reflect the actual provider charge for such services. Also, any other fee or payment received by the mortgage broker from either the lender or the borrower arising from the initial funding transaction, including a servicing release premium or yield spread premium, is to be noted on the good faith estimate and listed in the 800 series of the HUD-1 settlement statement. (Emphasis added.) n42

HUD has also indicated in its special information booklet, revised effective June 11, 1997, that "Your mortgage broker may be paid by the lender, you as the borrower, or both." n43 And, in a proposed rule governing mortgage broker fees, HUD, although indicating that it had never taken the position that yield spread premiums or any other class of back-funded or indirect fees are per se legal, did not take the position that such fees were per se illegal. Rather, HUD indicated that the issue in each case is whether the total compensation paid to a broker in a RESPA-covered transaction is or is not reasonably related to the value of the goods furnished or services performed. n44

The Federal Reserve Board interprets the payment of fees from a lender to a mortgage broker differently, saying that the disclosure of the yield spread premium is duplicative. Section 106(a)(6) of the Truth in Lending Act (TILA) n45 requires the disclosure of borrower-paid mortgage broker fees in the finance charge. Note that there is no mention of lender-paid fees.

Paragraph 4(a)(3) of Reg. Z requires that all fees charged by a mortgage broker and paid by the consumer be included in the finance charge, whether the fee is paid to the broker or to the lender for delivery to the broker. A fee charged by a mortgage broker will be excluded from the finance charge only if it is the type of fee that would also be excluded when it is charged by the creditor. Fees paid by the funding party to a broker as a yield spread premium "are already included in the finance charge, either as interest or as points," and should not be double counted.

[b] Yield Spread Premium Controversy

Courts that have examined the issue of whether or not the payment by a lender to a mortgage broker of a yield spread premium or similar payment (for delivering a loan at a rate above the lender's "par rate") constitutes a prohibited referral fee under RESPA § 8 have reached different conclusions. In Culpepper v. Inland Mortgage,ⁿ⁴⁶ the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals reversed a district court's grant of summary judgment in favor of the lender. The district court had determined that the lender's payment of a yield spread premium to the broker constituted reasonable compensation for "goods furnished," namely, the loan itself, and not for the mere referral of settlement service business.ⁿ⁴⁷ The circuit court disagreed, finding that, on the facts presented, the payment could have been neither

(1) in return for a "good," since the lender, not the broker (who closed the loan in its own name with funds supplied by the lender), owned the loan from the outset, nor

(2) in return for "services actually performed," since the broker expends the same effort and provides the same quality and quantity of services whether it originates a loan at an interest rate that will provide it with a yield spread premium at closing or at a lower interest rate that will not generate such a payment.

In an earlier decision, Barbosa v. Target Mortgage Corp., a Florida U.S. district court reached the opposite conclusion, finding that the payment of a yield spread premium by a lender to a broker did not constitute payment for a "referral" as defined in RESPA and, even if it did constitute such a payment, was an exempt payment on the basis that it was either reasonable compensation for goods furnished or for services actually performed.ⁿ⁴⁸

The court viewed the payment as not being for a "referral" based on evidence that the broker regularly referred loans to the lender at or below par, as well as above par, leading to a finding that the YSP payment was not made to "affirmatively influence" the broker to place the loan with the lender. The court also viewed the payment as being for services rendered by the broker to the borrower, finding it "entirely conceivable that the parties might structure the mortgage transaction to permit the borrowers and the lenders to share in paying the broker's commission."ⁿ⁴⁹

Another decision reaching essentially the same result as in Barbosa is McWhorter v. Ford Consumer Finance, in which a U.S. district court in Georgia granted the lender's motion for summary judgment.ⁿ⁵⁰

Many in the lending industry feared the lawsuits would keep coming until HUD took an even clearer stand on the legitimacy of mortgage broker fees, and published a rule to that effect. In October 1997, HUD proposed a new rule to deal with the issue of direct and indirect broker fees.ⁿ⁵¹ This proposal, if adopted, would have created a limited "safe harbor" by which lenders could pay and brokers could accept back-end compensation (including yield spread premiums and similar payments), and brokers could accept direct compensation from borrowers, free from any claim that the payments violate RESPA § 8. To qualify, the broker would have to:

- execute with the borrower a written mortgage broker contract in a form prescribed by HUD,
- adhere to all provisions in the contract,

- be properly licensed or registered in the state in which the secured property is located, and
- not receive total compensation (including compensation received from both the lender and the borrower) in excess of a level or amount to be determined by HUD and prescribed in the final rule.

The proposal drew substantial comment, and was not adopted. In April 1997, a Maryland Congressman introduced a bill that would place a moratorium on the class action lawsuits. n51.1 A companion bill was introduced in the Senate in June 1998. n51.2

While neither of these two bills moved through Congress, Congress did act on another front to resolve the controversy. In the conference report accompanying the Department of Veterans Affairs and Housing and Urban Development, and Independent Agencies Appropriations Act, 1999, n51.3 enacted October 21, 1998, n51.4 House and Senate conferees indicated that "Congress never intended payments by lenders to mortgage brokers for goods or facilities actually furnished or for services actually performed to be violations of [RESPA § 8]." n51.5 The conferees then directed HUD, with the help of industry representatives, federal agencies, consumer groups and other interested parties, "to clarify its position on lender payments to mortgage brokers within 90 days after the enactment of this appropriation Act." n51.6 HUD issued a Policy Statement on March 1, 1999 (Policy Statement I). n51.7

HUD took the position in Policy Statement I that it considers yield spread premiums not to be illegal per se, and to be legal if it is shown (1) that goods or facilities were actually furnished or services were actually performed for the total compensation paid to the mortgage broker; and (2) the compensation was reasonably related to the value of those goods or facilities or services. n51.8

HUD further stated that in determining whether goods or facilities were furnished or services were provided by the broker in return for the total compensation received by the broker, it "may be useful" to refer to its February 14, 1995 letter to the Independent Bankers Association of America (IBAA letter). n51.9 The IBAA letter, which is essentially replicated in the Policy Statement, provides that HUD will not pursue enforcement action under RESPA if it is satisfied that sufficient origination work was performed to justify compensation. In HUD's view, this requires the broker to take the loan application information and perform at least five other origination services (at least one of which is something other than a "counseling-type" activity) from a list of fourteen origination-type services identified by HUD. n51.10

HUD also indicated in Policy Statement I that, in determining whether the total compensation received by the broker was reasonably related to the value of the goods or facilities furnished or the services performed, the total compensation received by the broker must be commensurate with the amount normally charged for similar services, goods or facilities. This, in turn, requires consideration of fees paid in relation to price structures and practices in similar transactions and in similar markets. n51.11 HUD further indicated that, in undertaking this analysis, any "volume-based" compensation paid by a lender (compensation based on the volume of loans the broker delivers to the lender over a fixed period and which is paid in the form of either cash rebates on the amount of loans delivered in excess of a "threshold" or "floor amount" or a lower "start rate") must be considered as part of the total compensation received by the broker. n51.12

Finally, Policy Statement I provided additional guidance to lenders and brokers as to how best to disclose yield spread premium payments to customers. HUD indicated that such a payment would be appropriately disclosed as "Mortgage Broker fee from lender to XYZ Corporation (P.O.C.)," and suggested that other fees or payments from the borrower to the broker should identify that they are mortgage broker fees from the borrower. HUD also recommended that brokers disclose, during their initial discussions with the customer, the nature of the broker's services and the various methods of compensation the broker can receive. n51.13 Following a subsequent decision by the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals finding Policy Statement I to be ambiguous (and reinterpreting it to justify affirmance of a lower court's grant of class certification in a YSP case), n51.14 HUD issued a clarification of Policy Statement I on October 18, 2001 (Policy Statement II). n51.15 Policy Statement II was then relied upon and found controlling in decisions issued by the Eighth,

Ninth, and Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals, seemingly ending this litigation saga. n51.16

[c] RESPA Reform Efforts

Regulatory developments, however, continued. On July 29, 2002, HUD proposed a massive overhaul of Regulation X which included proposed amendments to deal with the disclosure of mortgage broker fees, including yield spread premiums. n51.17

One of the amendments would require that all yield spread premiums be disclosed on the HUD-1 Uniform Settlement Statement (HUD-1) and the good faith estimate as payments from the lender to the borrower. (The HUD-1A version of the Uniform Settlement Statement would no longer be able to be used in connection with refinance or subordinate-lien loans in which a yield spread premium payment is made.) For a mortgage broker to receive a yield spread premium, the mortgage broker would have to disclose on its good faith estimate a direct "origination fee" which includes any anticipated yield spread premium payment (and which therefore will represent the mortgage broker's entire compensation in connection with the loan). The result will be that the broker would no longer collect indirect fees from the lender, only direct fees from the borrower.

Another amendment would prohibit mortgage brokers from retaining any portion of any points paid by the borrower to obtain a lower interest rate (discount points) from the lender. Any such payment would have to be disclosed as a payment by the borrower to the lender.

In addition, the proposal would amend HUD's model form good faith estimate to require disclosure of the following additional information:

- A description of the nature of the services that the lender and/or mortgage broker (defined in the proposal as "loan originators") will provide so as to "disabuse borrowers of the notion that brokers or other loan originators are acting as their agents."
- A statement indicating that borrowers have the option to pay settlement costs (1) using their own funds at settlement, (2) using additional borrowed funds, or (3) using a yield spread premium they receive from the lender in exchange for agreeing to pay an above par interest rate. (The good faith estimate would also have to disclose that the borrowers may lower the interest rate [and the monthly payment] by paying discount points to the lender.)
- The total origination charges of the mortgage broker and the lender, as a consolidated figure, and, on a new good faith estimate attachment, a breakdown of the charges that are included in that figure, grouped according to whether they are charges of the broker or the lender.

These changes were intended by HUD to insure that "brokers will have no incentive to seek out lenders paying the largest yield spread." However, they would not have affected lenders who close loans with their own funds and thereafter sell those loans at a profit in the secondary market.

The HUD proposal attracted numerous comments from the settlement services industry and consumer groups alike, and generated Congressional opposition as well. In the end, HUD was forced to withdraw the proposal. Subsequently, HUD indicated that it intends to publish a new reform proposal, and followed-up by holding a series of invitation-only RESPA Reform Roundtables to obtain input from a cross-section of representatives of industry, consumer organizations and other interested parties. n51.18 By mid-2006, however, no new reform proposal had surfaced.

While the YSP class actions ground to a halt, another Section 8 claim began to take hold. Specifically, plaintiffs in several class actions alleged that the practice of some settlement service providers in (i) charging their customer more than it cost them to obtain a particular settlement service from a third-party provider ("marking-up" a charge for a settlement service) or (ii) charging their customer an "unreasonable" amount for a settlement service which they perform themselves ("overcharging" for a settlement service), violated section 8(b) of RESPA. Section 8(b) states that "no person shall give and no person shall accept any portion, split or percentage of any charge ... for ... a settlement service ... other than for services actually performed." n51.19

In Policy Statement II, HUD indicated that it considered Section 8(b) to be violated in both of the above scenarios. n51.20 Courts, however, have disagreed. With respect to the practice of marking-up a settlement service, the 4th, 7th and 8th Circuit Courts of Appeal have indicated that such a practice is not actionable under Section 8(b); n51.21 the 2nd and 3rd Circuits have said that it may be actionable; n51.22 and the 11th Circuit has said that it may be actionable but indicated in dicta that merely ordering the settlement service from the third-party provider constitutes the rendering of a service upon which a mark-up can be justified. n51.23 The U.S. Supreme Court may eventually be called upon to definitively decide this issue. With respect to the practice of "overcharging" for a settlement service, all courts that have specifically addressed this issue to date are in agreement that Section 8(b) provides no cause of action. n51.24

[7] Affiliated Business Arrangements

Another amendment to RESPA permitted "controlled [now "affiliated"] business arrangements" (AfBAs) under certain conditions. n52 In 1983, Congress enacted the "controlled business arrangement" amendment to RESPA. This amendment, codified under section 461 of the Housing and Urban-Rural Recovery Act of 1983 (HURRA) n53 established that controlled business arrangements do not violate RESPA under certain conditions. A controlled business arrangement is one in which

- (1) a person who is in a position to refer business incident to or a part of a real estate settlement service involving a federally related mortgage loan, or an associate of the person, has either an affiliate relationship with or a direct or beneficial ownership interest or more than 1% in a provider of settlement services, and
- (2) one of the persons directly or indirectly refers business to that provider or affirmatively influences the selection of that provider. n54

A controlled or affiliated business relationship is permissible if the following three conditions are met:

- (1) a disclosure of the relationship between the parties giving and receiving the referral, with estimated charges for the referred business, is made at or prior to the time the referral is made (or, in the case of telephone referrals, up to three business days following the referral so long as the customer is told during the telephone conversation of the existence of the AfBA and that he/she would receive the disclosure within three business days thereafter n54.1);
- (2) use of a particular provider is not required; n54.2 and
- (3) nothing of value is received by the referring party beyond a return on ownership interest, return on franchise relationship, or payments otherwise permissible under Section 8(c) of RESPA. n55

Disclosures should be made in the format of the recommended statement set forth in Section 14.02[12] infra . While RESPA does not permit a person referring business to receive fees directly for referrals to such a provider, a person may receive a return on that investment. n55.1 Under RESPA's AfBA exception, a person who refers business to a settlement service provider in which the referring person has an ownership interest may receive compensation, albeit indirectly, based on the financial growth of that provider. n55.2

The AfBA exemption is available only where referrals are made to a bona fide provider of settlement services, and not to shell entities or sham arrangements. n55.3

An entity receiving referrals must "provide" settlement service business. If the entity is not a bona fide provider of settlement services, then the arrangement does not meet the definition of an AfBA. If an arrangement is not an AfBA, it cannot qualify for the AfBA exemption, even if the three conditions are met. Therefore, an entity must be a bona fide provider of settlement services to be exempt.

When assessing whether an entity is a bona fide provider of settlement services, or a sham arrangement used as a conduit for referral fee payments, HUD initially asks these questions:

(1) Does the new entity have sufficient initial capital and networth, typical in the industry, to conduct the business for which it was created?

(2) Is the new entity staffed with its own employees?

(3) Does the new entity manage its own business affairs?

(4) Does the new entity have a business office separate from the parents? If it is located at the same business address as one of the parents, does it pay a general market value rent for the facilities?

(5) Is the new entity receiving a fee for providing substantial services? Does it incur the risks and receive the rewards of any comparable enterprise?

(6) Does the new entity perform all the substantial services itself? If not, how much work does it contract out?

(7) If the new entity contracts out some of its essential functions, does it contract services from an independent third party, or from a parent or affiliate? If the latter, does the new entity provide any functions that are of value to the settlement process?

(8) If the new entity contracts out work to another party, does payment for services or facilities provided bear a reasonable relationship to the value of the services or goods received? Or is the new entity receiving a "thing of value" for referring settlement service business to the party performing the service?

(9) Is the new entity actively competing in the market place for business from settlement service providers other than its parent, an affiliate, or the entity that created it?

(10) Is the new entity sending business exclusively to one of the settlement service providers that created it? n55.4

A negative response to any one of the following questions by itself may not be enough to determine whether the AfBA is a sham. Even if an entity is a bona fide provider, HUD wants to know if the three conditions of an AfBA have been met: (1) Did the consumer receive a written disclosure about the relationship and an estimate of the charges at the time of the referral? (2) Is the referring party requiring the consumer to use the controlled entity? (3) Is the only thing of value that comes from the arrangement, other than payments for services rendered, a return on ownership interest or franchise relationship?

In answering question number (3), HUD will consider additional questions:

- (1) Has each participant made an investment of its own capital, or has it received a "loan" from a recipient of the referrals?
- (2) Have the participants received an ownership interest based on a fair value contribution? Or is compensation based on the expected referrals?
- (3) Are distributions made in proportion to the ownership, or does the payment reflect the amount of business referred?
- (4) Are the ownership interests free from tie-ins to referrals of business, or have there been adjustments based on the amount of business referred?

If an entity does not meet the conditions of the AfBA exception, then any payments given or accepted in the arrangement may be subject to further analysis under RESPA. n55.5

[8] Computerized Loan Origination

In the age of computerized loan origination (CLO), many real estate brokers may also act as mortgage brokers. RESPA permits such arrangements so long the person providing the CLO service applies with other applicable laws and requirements. The broker may, for example, be required to provide a good faith estimate of closing costs. Additionally, almost all states require mortgage brokers to be licensed or certified. Real estate brokers with CLOs who are acting as mortgage brokers must comply with the laws of these states.

CLOs that provide services to consumers may charge them for services performed. n55.6 All charges for settlement services must be reported on the Good Faith Estimate and the HUD-1 or HUD-1A, including payments made outside of closing for CLO servicers. Providers whose products are made available on CLOs may reimburse consumers for any fee charged them by the CLO.

RESPA prohibits payments for the referral of a consumer to a service provider; however, payments for goods or facilities actually furnished or for services actually performed are permitted. Any payment must bear a reasonable relationship to the value of the goods, facilities, or services provided. A charge for which no services are performed or for which duplicative fees are charged is an unearned fee. For example, if a CLO lists only one service provider and only presents basic information on the provider's products, it appears that no compensable services are provided by the CLO, only a referral; and any payment for the CLO listing could be considered a referral fee in violation of RESPA. A company may not pay any other company for the referral of business.

There are no restrictions on the pricing of CLOs if the payments are not referral fees and are reasonably related to the value of the services provided. However, the value of a referral is not to be taken into account in determining whether the payment exceeds the reasonable value of the goods, facilities, or services. If these requirements are met, CLOs may charge settlement service providers a fee for each closed transaction arising from the use of the CLO. If a CLO charges different fees to different providers in similar situations, an incentive may exist for the CLO to steer the consumer to the provider paying the highest fees. HUD may scrutinize these circumstances to determine if the differentials constitute referral fees.

When a CLO is used in connection with an AfBA (affiliated business arrangement), the AfBA regulations apply. n55.7 Separate entities are a necessary component of the AfBA definitions. For example, if a real estate brokerage firm uses a CLO within its own business structure and there is no separate affiliated business entity involved, then the CLO is not being used in an AfBA with the real estate brokerage firm, and the AfBA rules do not apply.

Displays of information on settlement service providers should be neutral. Favoring one settlement service provider over others may influence the selection of a service provider. This could constitute an illegal referral under RESPA.

An agreement or understanding for the referral of business may be established by a practice, pattern, or course of conduct. If there is an affiliate relationship between the CLO and a favored service provider, the non-neutral presentation of information could constitute a required use violation. CLOs can, however, help consumers determine which products are most advantageous. If a CLO consistently ranks lenders and their mortgage products on the basis of some factor relevant to the borrower's choice of product, such as APR, HUD would consider this a neutral display of information. n55.8

[9] Additional Policy Statements

[a] Rental of Office Space

After the publication of the 1992 RESPA rule, HUD received numerous complaints alleging that settlement service providers, particularly lenders, were leasing desks or office space in real estate brokerage offices at higher than market rent in exchange for referrals of business. High rent payments for the desk or office space may be disguised kickbacks to the real estate broker for the referral of business to the lenders.

Although Section 8 of RESPA prohibits a person from giving or accepting any fee, kickback, or thing of value for the referral of business, RESPA does permit payments for goods or facilities actually furnished or for services actually performed. A thing of value includes a rental payment that is higher than that ordinarily paid for the facilities. When faced with a complaint that a lender is paying a high rent and getting referrals of business in return, HUD analyzes whether the rental payment is bona fide or is really a disguised referral fee.

The market value of the rental space may include a proportion of the cost for secretarial services, utilities, telephone, and other office equipment actually provided to the tenant. To distinguish between rental payments that include a payment for referrals, and a payment for the facility and equipment actually provided, HUD applies a "general market value" standard as the basis for the analysis. n55.9

The "general market value" is what a non-settlement service provider would pay for the same amount of space and services in the same or a comparable building. This standard allows payments for facilities and services actually furnished, but does not take into account any value for referrals. Some settlement service providers pay a higher rent than the general market value to reflect the value of referrals of business. Any excess is considered a referral fee. HUD will also look at whether the rent is based on the referrals made. If it is, HUD will consider it to be for the referral of business. Both cases represent violations of RESPA.

One "bogus" rental arrangement involved a title insurance company that paid a real estate broker $100 for the "per use rental" of a conference room for closings. The "rental fee" was greater than the general market value for the use of the space. Also, the room was rarely actually used for closings. The "rent" was really a disguised referral fee in violation of RESPA. n55.10

[b] Lockouts

Lockouts most often occur where a real estate brokerage company leases space to a lender, then prevents other lenders from entering the company's space. Without other factors, this is probably not a RESPA violation. It does raise a question of whether the rental payment is bona fide. n55.11

HUD has indicated that it does not have the authority to regulate access to the offices of settlement service providers, nor can it require a company to assist another company in its marketing activity. n55.12 Real estate brokers should consult an attorney to determine if state consumer or antitrust laws apply to lockout situations in their state.

[c] Retaliation

HUD also received many complaints about retaliation practices. In one complaint, financial service representatives in a real estate broker's office were given quotas of referrals and were threatened with the loss of their jobs if they did not meet them.

RESPA prohibits giving incentives for the referral of settlement service business, but is silent as to *dis*incentives. However, retaliatory actions against employees are more appropriately governed by State labor, contract, and other laws.

[10] Examples

HUD provided examples of how to apply the new RESPA rules in the rule that became effective on October 7, 1996. Following are summaries of three of them:

[a] Example 1

An existing RE broker and an existing title insurance company form a joint venture title agency (JV). Each participant contributes $1000 towards the creation of JV, which will be an exclusive agent for the title company. The title company enters into a service agreement with JV to provide title search, examination, and title commitment preparation work at a charge lower than its cost. The title company also provides management for JV. JV is located in the title insurance company's office space. One employee of the title insurance company, who continues to do the same work she did for the title company, is "leased" to JV to handle closings and prepare policies. The RE broker participant is JV's sole source of business referrals. Profits of JV are divided equally between the RE broker and title company.

HUD Analysis. The JV is not a bona fide provider of settlement service business. The payments flowing through the arrangement are not exempt under RESPA. JV is undercapitalized for a full service title agency. Although there is an equal contribution of capital, the title company provides office space, much of the title insurance work, and management oversight for JV. JV has an employee, but she is leased from, and continues to be supervised by, the title company. JV receives all the referrals of business from the RE broker participant and does not compete for business in the market place. JV provides a few essential functions, but contracts many core title agent functions to the title company. Also, since the title company provides the search, examination, and title commitment work at less than its cost, it is providing a "thing of value" to the referring title agent, which is passed on to the RE broker participant in a return on ownership. This violates RESPA.

A lender and a real estate broker form a joint venture mortgage broker (MB). The real estate broker does not require prospective home buyers to use MB and provides the required AfBA disclosures at the time of the referral. The real estate broker is the sole source of MB's business. The lender and real estate broker each contribute an equal amount of capital towards MB, a sufficient initial capital investment typical in the industry. MB, using its own employees, prepares loan applications and performs all other functions of a mortgage broker. When it gets very busy, MB contracts out some of the loan processing work to third parties, including the lender participant. In these cases, MB pays all third parties a similar fee, reasonably related to the processing work performed. MB manages its own business affairs and rents space in the real estate broker's office at the general market rate. MB submits loan applications to numerous lenders; only a few go to the lender participant.

HUD Analysis. HUD would consider MB to be a bona fide provider of settlement service business. MB has sufficient capital to perform the services of a mortgage broker. The participants' interests are based on a fair value contribution and free from tie-ins to referrals of business. MB has its own staff, manages its own business, and pays a fair "general market value rent" for its space. The outsourced work is not a substantial portion of the mortgage brokerage services provided by MB, and MB pays all third party providers a similar fee for similar services.

While the real estate broker participant is the sole source of referrals to MB, MB sends only a small percent of its business to the lender participant, and actively refers loan business to other lenders. MB meets the AfBA exemption requirements: the real estate broker provides the AfBA disclosure; does not require the use of MB; and the only return is based on the profits and not on referrals. This is a bona fide AfBA.

[c] Example 3

A mortgage banker sets up a limited liability mortgage brokerage company (LLC). The mortgage banker sells shares in divisions of the LLC to real estate brokers and agents. For $500 each, the real estate brokers and agents may purchase separate "divisions" within the LLC to which they refer customers for loans. Ownership distributions are based on the business each real estate broker or agent refers to his/her division, and not on his or her capital contribution to the entity as a whole. The LLC provides all the substantial services of a mortgage broker; it does not contract out any processing to its mortgage banker owner; and it sends loan packages to its mortgage banker owner as well as other lenders.

HUD analysis. Although the LLC is a bona fide provider of mortgage brokerage services, the CBA fails to meet the third condition of the CBA exception: ownership interests vary based on referrals made and not on the amount contributed to the capitalization of the LLC. These payments are not bona fide returns on ownership interest, but instead are an indirect method of paying a kickback based on the number of referrals.

[11] Penalties

Violation of Section 8 of RESPA is a federal misdemeanor, punishable by up to a year in prison and a $10,000 fine, and will subject the violator to a civil action for treble damages plus costs and attorney's fees. n56

For a violation of Section 10 of RESPA (escrow accounts), the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development can assess a civil penalty of $50.00 for each failure unless it is an intentional disregard for the requirement, in which case the penalty imposed is $100.00. In neither case can the penalty exceed $100,000.00 in any twelve-month period. n57

Finally, violations of Section 6 of RESPA (servicing transfers) will provide consumers with a private right of action for actual damages plus, in the case of a pattern or practice of non-compliance, court-awarded damages of up to $1,000 (with aggregate limits for class actions), plus court costs and attorneys fees. n58

(n19)Footnote 15. 12 U.S.C. § 2607(c)(4) provides in pertinent part:

Nothing in this section shall be construed as prohibiting ... (4) affiliated business arrangements so long as (A) a disclosure is made of the existence of such an arrangement to the person being referred and, in connection with such referral, such person is provided a written estimate of the charge or range of charges generally made by the provider to which the person is referred (i) in the case of a face-to-face referral or a referral made in writing or by electronic media, at or before the time of the referral (and compliance with this requirement in such case may be evidenced by a notation in a written, electronic, or similar system of records maintained in the regular course of business); (ii) in the case of a referral made by telephone, within 3 business days after the referral by telephone, (and in such case an abbreviated verbal disclosure of the existence of the arrangement and the fact that a written disclosure will be provided within 3 business days shall be made to the person being referred during the telephone referral); or (iii) in the case of a referral by a lender (including a referral by a lender to an affiliated lender), at the time the estimates required under section 5(c) are provided (notwithstanding clause (i) or (ii)); and any required written receipt of such disclosure (without regard to the manner of the disclosure under clause (i), (ii), or (iii)) may be obtained at the closing or settlement (except that a person making a face-to-face referral who provides the written disclosure at or before the time of the referral shall attempt to obtain any required written receipt of such disclosure at such time and if the person being referred chooses not to acknowledge the receipt of the disclosure at that time, that fact shall be noted in the written, electronic, or similar system of records maintained in the regular course of business by the person making the referral), (B) such person is not required to use any particular provider of settlement services, and (C) the only thing of value that is received from the arrangement, other than the payments permitted under this subsection, is a return on the ownership interest or franchise relationship.

For certain exemptions applying to cooperative brokerage and referral arrangements as well as to agreements between real estate brokers, see 24 C.F.R. § 3500.14(g)(1)(v).

Issues sometimes arise with respect to RESPA and the concept of preemption. RESPA's general preemption provision (12 U.S.C. § 2616) provides in pertinent part:

This Act does not annul, alter, affect, or exempt any person subject to the provisions of this Act from complying with the laws of any State with respect to settlement practices, except to the extent that those laws are inconsistent with any provision of this Act, and then only to the extent of the inconsistency. The Secretary is authorized to determine whether such inconsistencies exist. The Secretary may not determine that any State law is inconsistent with any provision of this chapter if the Secretary determines that such law gives greater protection to the consumer. In making these determinations the Secretary shall consult with the appropriate Federal agencies. [Emphasis added.]

RESPA also contains a separate preemption provision with respect to its affiliated business arrangement exemption. See 12 U.S.C. § 2607(d)(6). For a discussion of the issue of preemption, see Mortgage Banker's Ass'n v. New Jersey Real Estate Comm'n, 102 N.J. 176, 506 A.2d 733 (N.J. 1986). CHAPTER 14 Federal Laws Affecting Real Estate Brokers *

§ 14.03 The Foreign Investment in Real Property Tax Act of 1980 (FIRPTA)

The Foreign Investment in Real Property Tax Act of 1980 (FIRPTA) n1 was enacted to eliminate the tax advantages foreign investors had long enjoyed over their domestic counterparts with respect to capital gains realized from the disposition of United States real estate. n2 This controversial statute was amended in 1984 to require withholding by the purchaser of ten percent of the proceeds of the sale of a United States real estate interest by a foreign person or entity. n3

The law also requires a real estate broker representing a foreign seller to notify the purchaser and the IRS that withholding of taxes may be required. n4 If the broker knows the seller is a foreign corporation, he or she is required to provide notice of that fact. Moreover, if the broker is acting on behalf of a foreign corporation, the statute creates a conclusive presumption that the broker knows that it is a foreign corporation. n5

Failure to provide the purchaser and the IRS with the required notice subjects the broker to the duty to withhold taxes, and the broker is liable for the tax up to the amount of the compensation he or she is to receive. Furthermore, the broker may also incur civil liability for failing to properly notify the purchaser, and may be subject to criminal sanctions under the conspiracy laws. n6

There are exemptions from the requirements if:

- (1) the seller furnishes to the purchaser an affidavit stating, under penalty of perjury, the seller's United States taxpayer identification number and that the seller is not a foreign person;
- (2) if the domestic corporation furnishes to the transferee an affidavit by the domestic corporation stating, under penalty of perjury, that the domestic corporation is not and has not been a United States real property holding corporation, or as of the date of the disposition, interests in the corporation are not United States real property interests;
- (3) the transferee receives a qualifying statement from the Secretary of the IRS as prescribed by regulations;

(4) the property is acquired by the purchaser for his or her use as a residence, and the amount realized for the property does not exceed $300,000; or

(5) the disposition is of a share of a class of stock that is regularly traded on an established securities market. n7

The statute also provides limitations on the amount required to be withheld: n8

(1) the amount cannot exceed the transferor's maximum tax liability; or

(2) the Secretary of the Treasury has prescribed a reduced amount.

CHAPTER 14 Federal Laws Affecting Real Estate Brokers *

10A-14 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 14.04

§ 14.04 Federal Truth-in-Lending Legislation*

[1] Introduction

Since most real estate sales are financed, real estate brokers should be familiar with the Federal Truth-in-Lending Act (TILA), n1 which is administered by the Federal Reserve Board of Governors. In general, TILA and Regulation Z n2 (Reg. Z) require mortgage lenders to disclose to consumers the total dollar payments for the life of the loan and the total finance charge. n3 TILA affects transactions in which (1) credit is offered or extended to consumers, (2) the creditors regularly extend credit, (3) the loans are to be repaid in more than four installments, and (4) the loans are intended primarily for personal, family, or household purposes. TILA also deals with certain elements of real estate broker advertising and the disclosure of the assumability of loans. n4

[2] Required Disclosures

For an average closed-end mortgage transaction, where a mortgage on real estate is taken as security, the following are among the items that must be disclosed:

- (a) the identity of the creditor;
- (b) the amount financed;
- (c) the notice of a right to receive a written itemization of the amount financed;
- (d) the finance charge;
- (e) the finance charge expressed as an annual percentage rate (APR);
- (f) additional disclosures if the loan has an APR that increase after consummation;
- (g) the total of payments;
- (h) a payment schedule;

- (i) a demand feature, if the loan has one;
- (j) the "total sale price;"
- (k) descriptions of specified terms, including, but not limited to, "amount financed" and "finance charge";
- (l) late charges;
- (m) a description of the security property; and
- (n) the assumption policy for residential mortgage transactions. n5

Disclosures must be given before consummation of the transaction. Some must be given within 3 business days of application, while others are typically given prior to or at the closing when the consumer becomes obligated on the credit transaction. Special rules apply to the timing of disclosures required for "residential mortgage transactions" n6 that are subject to the Real Estate Settlement Procedures Act. n7 For these loans, the disclosures required by TILA and Regulation Z must either be given at consummation or delivered or placed in the mail not later than three business days after the creditor receives the consumer's written application, whichever is earlier. n8 If a good faith estimate of finance charges (required by RESPA) is given, the lender need not provide an itemization of the amount financed. n9

Real estate brokers may be required to make the disclosures if the broker regularly extends consumer credit more than five times a year and the extension of credit involves a security interest in a dwelling. n10

In addition to the above disclosure requirements, certain mortgages are subject to "The Homeownership and Equity Protection Act of 1994" (HOEPA), contained in the Riegle Community Development and Regulatory Improvement Act of 1994 (Community Development Act). n11 HOEPA also imposed new disclosure requirements to assist consumers in comparing the cost of reverse mortgage transactions. This product provides periodic advances primarily to elderly homeowners and relies principally on the home's value for repayment.

Section 152 of the HOEPA added a new section 129 to TILA. HOEPA governs all mortgage transactions having rates or fees above a certain percentage or amount ("Section 32 mortgages," as found in Sec. 226.32 of Regulation Z). n12 Section 32 mortgages must comply with the following additional requirements:

- (1) The creditor must give the borrower the following notice: "You are not required to complete this agreement merely because you have received these disclosures or have signed a loan application. If you obtain this loan, the lender will have a mortgage on your home. You could lose your home, and any money you have put into it, if you do not meet your obligations under the loan." n13
- (2) The creditor must allow the borrower a three-day "cooling off" period (in addition to the three-day rescission period which must be allowed to consumers who refinance their mortgage) between the time a consumer is furnished with special disclosures about a Section 32 mortgage and the time the consumer becomes obligated under the loan. n14
- (3) The creditor must provide new Section 32 mortgage disclosures if, after giving the disclosures to the consumer and before consummation, the creditor changes any terms that make the disclosures inaccurate. n15
- (4) No "balloon" payments on Section 32 mortgages with a term under 5 years. n16

- (5) No negative amortization provisions. n17
- (6) No more than two periodic payments paid in advance from the proceeds. n18
- (7) No prepayment penalties, with certain exceptions. n19
- (8) A notice to assignee that the assignee could be liable for all claims and defenses that the borrower could assert against the creditor. n20
- (9) No refinancing within 12 months of a Section 32 mortgage with another Section 32 mortgage by the holder or the creditor of the Section 32 mortgage being refinanced. n20.1
- (10) No documenting closed-end loans as open-end loans in order to evade the Section 32 mortgage restrictions. n20.2
- (11) No "due-on-demand" or call provisions. n20.3
- (12) The creditor must verify and document the borrower's repayment ability or be presumed to be engaging in a pattern or practice of making loans without regard to the borrower's repayment ability. n20.4

In 1996, Congress directed the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System and the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development to take whatever action is necessary to simplify and improve the disclosures applicable to transactions subject to the Truth in Lending Act and the Real Estate Settlement Procedures Act, and to provide a single format for disclosures to satisfy the requirements of the two Acts. n21 A proposed regulation was published in the Federal Register on April 2, 1997, n22 indicating that legislative changes needed to be made before HUD and the Board could comply with the Congressional mandate.

Thereafter, HUD and the Board, in July 1998, submitted a report to Congress containing numerous recommendations for reform (FRB-HUD Report). n22.1 Among its more important recommendations were that:

- (1) the finance charge and Annual Percentage Rate (APR) concepts in TILA be retained, with the definition of finance charge being expanded to include virtually all costs the consumer is required to pay to close the loan;
- (2) creditors be required either to offer borrowers a package of settlement services at a guaranteed price, in which case the creditor would be exempt from RESPA section 8, or to provide a good faith estimate of closing costs that is accurate within a prescribed tolerance;
- (3) initial disclosures be provided either at borrower's first contact with the lender or broker and before they pay any significant fee, as recommended by HUD, or no later than three days after application, as recommended by the Board; and
- (4) additional substantive protections be established to protect consumers against abusive lending practices.

With regard to the last of these recommendations, HUD and the Board recommended that:

- (a) TILA "Section 32" limitations on balloon loans be expanded,

- (b) collection of lump-sum credit insurance premiums be outlawed, and
- (c) minimum standards for pre-foreclosure notices be prescribed.

Additionally, HUD recommended that:

- (a) Section 32 thresholds be lowered,
- (b) prohibitions against "loan flipping" and other abusive tactics be established,
- (c) foreclosure prevention strategies be ordered,
- (d) education and pre-closing counseling be required, and
- (e) Congress establish federal private remedies for victims of "unfair and deceptive acts and practices."

Almost immediately after its issuance, the FRB-HUD Report met with substantial criticism. Hearings were held in July and September, 1998, at which Congressional representatives expressed disappointment with the FRB-HUD recommendation for a dual-disclosure system, and that they did not attempt to resolve the RESPA section 8 YSP issue or address the issue of paperwork reduction. n22.2 Thereafter, efforts to achieve comprehensive RESPA/TILA reform went underground, with various interest groups continuing to engage in a dialogue with the FRB and HUD; and did not resurface until July 29, 2002 when HUD proposed a comprehensive overhaul of Regulation X which included many of the recommendations in the FRB-HUD Report. n22.3

Besides addressing the issue regarding disclosure of yield spread premiums, n22.4 this proposed overhaul would have made significant changes to the existing form of good faith estimate, the manner in which it is used and the consequences of using it incorrectly. HUD's intent was to convert the good faith estimate into something that consumers could and would use to shop for a mortgage loan. HUD recognized that the current form is inadequate for this purpose since

- (i) it is given too late (typically after the consumer has selected a loan originator and paid a significant fee) to be of any real value in shopping for a loan;
- (ii) it does not provide all of the information a consumer needs to effectively shop;
- (iii) the fee estimates included in it often do not correlate to the actual fees charged; and
- (iv) there is no mechanism to force lenders and brokers to provide more realistic estimates. n22.5

HUD's proposal would have also permitted lenders, and others,

- (1) to offer borrowers a "Guaranteed Mortgage Package" (GMP) of required settlement services at a fixed price, and
- (2) to enter into referral fee arrangements with those settlement service providers who participate in the GMP, free from Section 8 constraints. n22.6

The comment period for the proposal ended on October 28, 2002. n22.7 In March 2004, HUD withdrew its proposed RESPA reform rule, citing concerns expressed by members of Congress and key members of consumer and industry groups. n22.8

[3] Other Recent Changes

On September 30, 1995, the Congress enacted the Truth in Lending Act Amendments of 1995 (1995 Amendments). n23 The 1995 Amendments addressed the concerns of mortgage lenders after a 1994 court decision, Rodash v. AIB Mortgage Co. n24 In the Rodash case, the U.S. Court of Appeals affirmed a district court opinion that allowed a consumer to rescind a home mortgage loan. The consumer was allowed to recover all fees and finance charges that had been paid, based in part on errors in the creditor's Truth in Lending Act disclosures. After the Rodash decision, a number of class action lawsuits were filed, involving thousands of mortgage loans, alleging similar violations, and seeking the remedy of rescission.

In response to mortgage lenders' concerns about their potential liability for finance charge violations that they viewed as minor, the Congress enacted a temporary moratorium on the litigation. The moratorium was replaced by the 1995 Amendments. The 1995 Amendments established new liability rules for loans consummated before and after September 30, 1995, established a new rule that includes all mortgage broker fees in the finance charge disclosure, and clarified the proper treatment of other fees. In May 1996, the Board published proposed regulations to implement the amendments with respect to loans made after September 30, 1995. n25

More recently, certain sections of TILA were amended by the "Economic Growth and Regulatory Paperwork Reduction Act of 1996." n26

In 2001, the Federal Reserve Board created a new Subpart F in Regulation Z (12 C.F.R. § 226.36) establishing rules that apply to all "electronic communication" provided under Regulation Z. "Electronic communication" is defined as an electronic message delivered between a creditor and a consumer in a format that allows visual text to be displayed on equipment such as a personal computer monitor. n27 Consistent with the Electronic Signatures in Global and National Commerce Act, 15 U.S.C. § 7001 et seq. (the "E-Sign Act"), electronic disclosures may only be given if:

- (1) the creditor has disclosed the requirements for accessing and retaining the disclosures in that format,
- (2) the consumer has demonstrated the ability to access the information electronically and affirmatively consents to electronic delivery, and
- (3) the disclosures are provided in accordance with certain requirements. n27.1

Amendments to Regulation Z in 2002 had the following effects:

- Lowered the APR trigger for first-lien loans from 10% to 8%; n27.2
- Effectively lowered the "points and fees" trigger ("points and fees" that exceed 8% of the "total loan amount") by including in the definition of "points and fees" any amounts paid at closing for optional credit life, accident, health, or loss-of-income insurance, and other debt-protection products written in connection with the loan. (Such amounts, if financed by the creditor, must also be deducted from the amount financed in calculating the "total loan amount."); n27.3
- Prohibited "due-on-demand" or call provisions in HOEPA loans; n27.4 and
- Enhanced the HOEPA 3-day "cooling off" disclosure to require disclosure of the "total amount borrowed" (with a $100 tolerance) and to specify whether it includes the cost of any optional insurance. n27.5

Additionally, Section 226.34 prohibits creditors from performing certain acts or practices in connection with HOEPA loans, such as:

- Except in limited circumstances, refinancing within 12 months of a HOEPA loan with another HOEPA loan by the holder or the creditor of the first HOEPA loan; n27.6
- Wrongfully documenting closed-end loans as open-end loans in order to evade the HOEPA restrictions; n27.7 and
- Engaging in a pattern or practice of making loans without regard to the borrower's ability to repay. There is a presumption that a creditor violates this prohibition if the creditor generally does not verify and document the borrower's repayment ability. n27.8

In 2004, in addition to electing not to finalize an earlier proposed modification of the definition of "clear and conspicuous," the Federal Reserve Board made the following changes:

- Clarified that where Regulation Z requires a creditor to an "amount," the creditor is required to disclose a "numerical amount"; n27.9
- Amended the Official Commentary to provide "bright-line" guidance that where a creditor fails to provide the consumer with an address for sending the notification of rescission, the consumer may deliver such notice to the person or address to which the consumer has been directed to send payments; n27.10 and
- In circumstances where a transaction has been rescinded, clarified that although a court may modify the procedures for tendering money and property under section 226.15(d), such modification cannot affect a consumer's substantive right to rescind. Thus, where a consumer's rescission right is challenged by a creditor, a court will normally establish the consumer's rescission right and determine the amounts owed before establishing the procedures for the parties to tender any money or property n27.11

In 2005, several amendments to TILA were made by the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005. n27.12 These amendments require new disclosures to be given in connection with closed-end mortgage loans and home equity lines of credit. Monthly billing statements for home equity lines of credit will need to include a "minimum payment warning" which informs the consumer that making the minimum payment will increase the interest the consumer pays and the time to repay the balance, together with other minimum payment information. In addition, such billing statements will need to include the payment due date, or if different, the earliest date on which a late fee may be charged and the amount of any late fee that would be charged if payment is made after such date.

The 2005 TILA amendments also require new disclosures advising the consumer of the nondeductibility of interest on the portion of a mortgage loan or home equity line of credit that exceeds the property's fair market value. For home equity lines of credit, this disclosure must appear in the disclosures required to be given at application. For closed-end mortgage loans, this new disclosure must be given at application. In addition, for both types of credit, a new nondeductibility disclosure must be included in advertisements for loan programs where the credit amount can exceed the property's fair market value.

The Federal Reserve Board is directed by the 2005 TILA amendments to prescribe regulations to implement the amendments. None of the amendments will be effective earlier than 12 months after the Federal Reserve Board publishes final regulations. Also, in 2005, the Federal Reserve Board issued a second advance notice of proposed rulemaking regarding the open-end (revolving) credit rules in Regulation Z. n27.13 An initial notice of proposed rulemaking had been published by the Federal Reserve Board in 2004 to solicit comment on the open-end rules. n27.14 However, the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 became law shortly after the close of the comment period on the 2004 proposal. Accordingly, the Federal Reserve Board issued the second notice in order to reopen and extend the closed comment period and obtain comments on implementing the TILA amendments contained in the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005.

[4] Offer or Extension of Credit

The statute requires disclosure for those who "offer or extend" credit. n27.15 If a real estate broker regularly offers or extends credit out of commissions advanced to assist in completion of closings, TILA applies because the conduct would clearly constitute the extension of credit for personal, family, or household services. n28

A creditor includes a person originating, during any 12-month period, two or more Section 32 mortgage loans, or one or more such mortgage loans through a mortgage broker. A person that originates one Section 32 mortgage during a 12-month period is not covered. A person that originates three home-secured loans, two of which are secured by Section 32 mortgages, will be required to comply for the latter two transactions. Persons making fewer than five home-secured loans during a calendar year--that do not meet the definition of a Section 32 mortgage--are not subject to the act. n29

[5] Credit Advertising

TILA also provides for requirements applicable to advertisements made to promote or assist a loan subject to TILA. n30 These requirements apply to real estate brokers who advertise in the newspaper, offering properties for sale with financing available.

Only those credit terms that are actually available may be advertised, n31 and the rate must be disclosed as an annual percentage rate (APR) as defined by TILA. n32 If the APR is subject to variation after consummation of the transaction (as in the case of variable rate mortgages), this must also be disclosed. n33

The advertising terms that require additional disclosures include (1) the amount or percentage of any downpayment; (2) the number of payments or period of repayment; (3) the amount of any payment; and (4) the amount of any finance charge. n34 If any of these terms are used, the creditor must also include the following additional disclosures: (1) the amount or percentage of any down payment; (2) the terms of repayment; (3) the APR; and (4) any variable rate feature. n35

[6] Enforcement

TILA is enforced by either the regulatory agency charged with the enforcement against that particular creditor, or through a private cause of action, creating both civil and criminal liability. Criminal liability is imposed only for a willful and knowing violation of TILA, n36 and there is a broad exemption if the creditor notifies the consumer of the error and takes necessary corrective action. n37 Civil liability allows the consumer to recover not only actual damages but also a statutory penalty. n38 The statutory penalty in the case of an individual action is twice the amount of the finance charge, with a minimal recovery in the case of an individual action relating to a credit transaction not under an open end credit plan secured by real property or a dwelling of not less than $200 or greater than $2000. n39 The creditor may also be liable for damages under both federal and state statutes, n40 and for attorneys' fees. n41

PART V Other Issues Affecting Brokers

CHAPTER 14 Federal Laws Affecting Real Estate Brokers *

10A-14 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 14.05

§ 14.05 Land Use Legislation

[1] In General

There are several federal laws restricting land use. For example, the National Flood Insurance Program n1 restricts development in flood hazard areas, and the Federal Endangered Species Act n2 restricts development in designated critical habitats or other areas in which endangered species may be present. Under the Safe Drinking Water Act, n3 land use restrictions are enacted in counties located atop any aquifer recharge areas and wellhead protection areas. The Clean Water Act n4 creates a well preservation program by restricting development in wetlands areas.

Based on the activities they regulate, federal environmental laws can be categorized as pertaining to: (1) pollution control; (2) chemical regulation; or (3) environmental review and protection. Pollution control statutes regulate the discharge of contaminants in the air, the land, and the water. n5 They also create liability for the remediation of inactive waste disposal sites. For example, The Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation and Liability Act (CERCLA) n6 creates restrictions on land use by prohibiting the deposit of hazardous materials on property and requiring clean up programs to remediate contaminated sites. n7

Chemical regulation statutes address the handling, use, manufacture, and transportation and distribution of material. n8 Environmental review and protection statutes impose substantive and procedural rule, in connection with other environmental programs. n9

[2] Historic District and Landmarks Preservation Laws

The National Historic Preservation Act was enacted in 1966. It requires consultation between federal agencies and the Advisory Council on Historic Preservation. n10 The Secretary of Interior is authorized under the Act to expand and maintain the National Register of Historic Places, composed of districts, sites, buildings, structures, and objects significant in American history, architecture, archeology, engineering, and culture. n11 The Secretary may accept a nomination from any person or local government for inclusion of a property in the National Register. n12 However, if the owner or owners of any privately owned property, or the majority of the owners of such properties within an historic district, object to the inclusion or designation, the property shall not be included in the National Register or designated as a national historic landmark until the objection is withdrawn. n13

Once a property is designated as a national historic landmark, the responsibility for preserving the property lies with the Secretary of the Interior. n14 Predictably, this impacts the ability to redevelop an area, district, or even a specific site. Real estate brokers are advised to check the National Register to determine whether a property is a national historic landmark.

[3] Air Rights

Air rights, separate units of real property created by the horizontal subdivision of real estate, may be defined as rights to occupy the space above, over, beneath, or on a designated parcel of land. n15 In recent years, there has been a growing interest in air rights projects throughout the United States. n16

It is important that real estate brokers determine the status of air rights to particular properties they are trying to sell, especially in large metropolitan areas. The possibility that a commercial property's air rights were previously transferred by a long-term lessee of the premises should always be considered. Appropriate inquiries should be made before a broker makes any representations to prospective purchasers with respect to the availability of development rights. n17

[4] Building Moratoria

To effectively service both sellers and buyers of real estate, real estate brokers also need to keep abreast of local zoning ordinances that may affect the right to develop particular pieces of real estate. One type of ordinance that is especially problematic is the building moratorium, sometimes referred to as an interim development control. n18

Moratoria are used to protect the overall land development plan by forestalling development until comprehensive plans for a new zoning ordinance can be finalized. The intent of the moratorium is to preserve the status quo of a district pending the adoption of permanent regulation. n19 Because the fundamental purpose of a moratorium is to prevent the vesting of property rights that may adversely affect the permanent zoning plan, land subject to a moratorium cannot be developed during the effective period of the ordinance. Therefore, the broker needs to be aware of the limitation in dealing with prospective purchasers of the property.

[5] Laws Pertaining to Waterfront Property

[a] Zoning Criteria

A real estate broker interested in selling waterfront property ought to be aware of several problems that might arise as to the use and development of such land. One factor of increasing significance is the "federal navigation servitude" n20 which allows the federal government to compel the removal of any obstruction to navigation without paying "just compensation" ordinarily required by the Fifth Amendment to the United States Constitution. The navigation servitude has been held to apply to all waters up to the high-water mark that are "navigable in fact," whether tidal or non-tidal. Moreover, it has been held to apply even to unnavigable tributaries of navigable waters. n21 The impact of the servitude on waterfront property may take several forms. It may result, for example, in the inability of the owner to construct a dock. In the extreme, it may even constitute a cloud on title that makes it impossible to develop the land because the developer will not be able to obtain financing. Lenders, of course, will decline to mortgage property when title cannot be insured.

Another issue of interest to real estate brokers with respect to waterfront properties is the question of the public's right to access to beaches and navigable waterways. This issue has been the subject of litigation in several jurisdictions. In these cases, the "public trust doctrine," which has been used to support the public's interest in protecting the environment, has also been applied to protect the right of public access to beaches and public waterways. n22

The public trust theory, with its origins in Roman law, flowed from the common law principle that the tidelands are held by the sovereign in trust for the public. Such lands could be conveyed, but these conveyances were always subject to the public trust. n23

[b] Recent Cases

While a number of jurisdictions have recognized public rights in land related to public waterways, n24 New Jersey courts, in response to numerous suits against its shore communities by citizens claiming right to beach access, have given considerable attention to the public trust doctrine. In Neptune City v. Avon-by-the-Sea, n25 the New Jersey Supreme Court made clear that:

The public rights in tidal lands are not limited to the ancient prerogatives of navigation and fishing, but extend as well to recreational uses, including bathing, swimming and other shore activities. The public trust doctrine, like all common law principles, should not be considered fixed or static, but should be molded and extended to meet changing conditions and needs of the public it was created to benefit.

The Neptune City court struck down an ordinance that discriminated against non-residents in terms of the fee required for use of a municipal beach. In holding that the ordinance was in violation of the public trust, the court noted that municipalities had legislative authority to charge users of the beach a fee for revenue purposes. n27 The court found, however, that the statute merely delegated to a municipality having a dedicated beach the state's police power over that area and the tide-flowed area seaward of the mean high water mark. The court noted that the proviso in the statute "indicated an affirmation of the state's paramount interest and inherent obligation to insure that such seaward land be equally available for the use of all citizens." n28

California courts, in a series of cases, have also considered the scope and effect of the public trust doctrine. n29 The state has been said to hold a trust interest on behalf of the public in tidelands n30 and in lands between high and low water in non-tidal navigable lakes. n31 It has been held that the public may use property for purposes such as commerce, navigation and fishing, as well as for environmental and recreational purposes. These lands may be conveyed to private persons only to promote trust uses, and grants not made for that purpose remain subject to the rights of the public. n32

In State v. Superior Court of Placer County, n33 the California Supreme Court held that riparian owners may use the shore zone (land between the low and the high-water marks) for "any purposes which are not incompatible with the public trust." n34 The court added, however, that if the state determined the use to be inconsistent with the public trust, the landowners would have to be compensated for the constructed improvements. n35

In a severe modification of prior lower court holdings, the U.S. Supreme Court in Nollan v. California Coastal Commission n36 and Lucas v. South Carolina Coastal Council n37 defended real property rights as they pertained to water. In Nollan, the Court held that a taking occurs when a land use regulation is imposed which fails to substantially advance the same legitimate state interest which the permit process was designed to advance. The lessees in this case had leased a beachfront lot with an option to purchase. Before acquisition, the California Coastal Commission granted a permit subject to the condition that the lessees grant an easement laterally along the beachfront of their lot to prevent the house from blocking the view of the ocean. The Court found that the essential nexus between the purpose of the permit condition and the permit process itself was lacking to support enforcement, and therefore constituted a taking.

In Lucas, a purchaser paid $975,000.00 for two single-family residential beachfront lots in 1986. In 1988, the South Carolina Legislature adopted a statute that prevented new construction on beachfront sites along the state's Atlantic coastline. The South Carolina Supreme Court had held that it was within the state's police power to enact land use restrictions to prevent serious harm to beaches, recognizing a long line of cases holding that the government has the power to prohibit "noxious uses" of property. Relying on the precedent established in Pennsylvania Coal Company v. Mahon, n38 the South Carolina Supreme Court held that the government's power to redefine the range of interest included in the ownership of property was necessarily constrained by constitutional limits.

The U.S. Supreme Court named two discreet categories of regulatory actions compensable: (1) regulations that compel the property owner to suffer a physical "invasion" of his or her property; and (2) regulations that deny all economically beneficial or productive use of the land. n39 The Court stated that when the owner of real property has been called upon to sacrifice all economically beneficial uses in the name of the common good (i.e., to leave the property economically idle), he or she has suffered a taking. n40

[6] Wetlands Legislation

[a] In General

Wetlands legislation refers to the provisions of the Clean Water Act n41 that authorize the program that regulates activities in wetland areas. The program is conducted by the United States Corps of Engineers with oversight by the Environmental Protection Agency. Specifically, sections of the Clean Water Act require permits for discharging dredged or fill material from a point source into navigable waters. n42 "Navigable waters" is defined in the regulations as:

waters of the United States, including the territorial seas, which includes adjacent wetlands of rivers and harbors, tributaries of navigable waters and their adjacent wetlands; other interstate waters, their tributaries, and adjacent wetlands; and all other waters of the United States, which may include isolated lakes and wetlands, intermittent streams, prairie pot holes, and other waters. n43

The regulatory definition defines "wetlands" as those areas that are inundated or saturated by surface or ground water at a frequency or at a rate sufficient to support, and that under normal circumstances do support, a prevalence of vegetation typically adapted for life in saturated soil conditions. Wetlands generally include swamps, marshes, bogs, and similar areas. n44

The Federal Interagency Committee for Wetland Delineation has developed the Federal Manual for identifying and delineating jurisdictional wetlands. The manual attempts to clarify whether a particular area is a wetland by reference to three factors: (1) the presence of wetland vegetation; (2) the presence of hydric soils; and (3) the presence of wetland hydrology. Courts have held that adjacent wetlands, isolated wetlands, and man-made artificial wetlands are within the jurisdiction of the wetlands legislation because the areas affect the flow on interstate commerce. n45

[b] Regulated Activity

The Clean Water Act regulates only one activity, which is the discharge of a pollutant into "navigable waters" from a point source without a permit. n46 A "point source" is any discernible, confined, and discrete conveyance. n47 The "discharge" refers to the discharge of dredged or fill material, which is a pollutant under the Act. "Dredged material" is defined as material that is excavated or dredged from waters of the United States. n48 "Fill material" is any material used for the primary purpose of replacing an aquatic area with dry land or changing the bottom elevation of a body of water, n49 which includes dirt, rocks, sand, cement, rubble, and virtually any other item that can be deposited.

For a discharge to be regulated under the Act, the fill material must be discharged from a point source. Point sources include bulldozers, back hoes, and dump trucks. n50 Therefore, any kind of levees, grating, paving, road construction, and utility lines would be regulated activities.

[c] Exceptions

The Act provides for exemptions for de minimis or small discharges of dredged material that are incidental to dredging operations. n51 Land clearing is also exempt if it does not involve the discharge of dredged or fill material. n52 There is also some indication that draining, without discharge, may not be regulated. n53

[d] Violations

Permits are required by anyone wishing to undertake any construction or development or any proposed development in an area that may be construed to be wetlands. If a permit is not obtained, the violator is subject to compliance orders, injunctive relief, and civil, criminal, and administrative penalties. The civil penalties can be as high as $25,000.00 for each day of violation and for each day the violation occurs or continues. n54

The criminal violation subjects the individual or responsible corporate officer to a fine of not less than $2,500.00 and not more than $25,000.00 a day for each day of the violation, and imprisonment for not more than one year. n55 Willful violations of the Act subject the individual or responsible corporate officer to fines of not less than $5,000.00 and no more than $50,000.00 a day, or imprisonment for not more three years, or both. n56 Similarly, knowingly making false statements on a permit application results in a fine of not more than $10,000.00 and imprisonment for not longer than two years. n57

The Corps can impose an administrative penalty of up to $10,000.00 a day, without providing a hearing, for each day a violation occurs or continues, up to a maximum of $25,000.00. n58 With a full hearing under the Administrative Procedures Act (APA), an administrative penalty can be assessed for $10,000.00 a day for each day the violation occurs or continues up to a maximum of $125,000.00. n59 Another method of enforcement available to the Corps or the EPA is to seek an injunction to restore the wetlands area to its original condition. n60

[7] The Endangered Species Act

[a] In General

In 1973, Congress enacted the Federal Endangered Species Act. n61 A "species" includes any species of animal or plant life as well as any subspecies of fish, wildlife, or plant. n62 The species must be federally listed to be entitled to protection n63 and critical habitats n64 may also be designated. n65 The Act vests authority in the Secretaries of Commerce, Agriculture, and Interior (along with the latter's Endangered Species Committee), n66 depending on their respective jurisdictions. The Secretaries may designate the critical habitats and make provisions regarding those habitats on the basis of the best scientific data available, after taking into consideration the economic impact, and any other relevant impact, of specifying a particular area as a critical habitat. n67 When designating a critical habitat, the Secretaries must comply with the National Environmental Policy Act. n68

The Act also protects individual animals, n69 and prohibits the "taking" of the habitat, which includes any activity which would harass the animals or disturb their environments so they do not want to occupy the area. n70

[b] Procedure for Designation

The procedure for designation begins when the Interior Secretary receives a petition to place a species on, or remove a species from, the endangered species list as established by the Secretary. The Secretary can then include either the plant life or animal life on his list of all species determined by him to be endangered species. The Secretary must review, at least once every five years, the list which is published pursuant to the Act. n71

The Secretary has the authority to treat any species as endangered even though it is not listed if he or she finds that: (1) the species so closely resembles in appearance a species which has been listed that enforcement personnel would have substantial difficulty in attempting to differentiate between a listed and unlisted species; (2) the substantial difficulty is an additional threat to an endangered or threatened species; and (3) such treatment of a non-listed species will substantially facilitate the enforcement and further the policy of the Act. n72 The Secretary then will develop plans for the conservation and survival of the endangered and threatened species that are listed. n73

[c] Violations

Prohibitions under the Federal Endangered Species Act are applicable to all persons, whether or not there is federal agency involvement with the project. The Act prohibits the removal and reduction of any endangered species from the area of federal jurisdiction, maliciously damaging or destroying any such species on any such area, or removing, cutting, digging up, damaging, or destroying any such species in knowing violation of any federal or state law or regulation. n74

The Act contains specific restrictions on the activities of all federal agencies. These federal agencies are required to use their authority to further the purposes of the Act by carrying a program for the conservation of endangered and threatened species which are listed. Each federal agency is required to insure that any action authorized, funded, or carried out by such agency is not likely to jeopardize the continued existence of any endangered or threatened species or result in the destruction or adverse modification of habitats of such species, as determined by the Secretary. n75

To enable compliance with the Act, federal agents are also required to conduct a biological assessment for the purpose of identifying any endangered or threatened species which is likely to be affected by their action, virtually assuring that some sort of biological profile will have to be established for every federal agency funded project. n76

[d] Penalties

Penalty and enforcement provisions of the statute are severe. Any person who knowingly violates any provision of the Act may be assessed a civil penalty by the Secretary of not more than $25,000.00 for each violation, and each violation is considered to be a separate offense. No penalty can be assessed, however, until that person has given notice and an opportunity for a hearing with respect to the violation. n77

The criminal violations are equally severe. They provide for a fine of not more than $50,000.00 or imprisonment for not more than one year, or both. Any person who knowingly violates any other regulation issued under the Act shall be fined not more than $25,000.00 or imprisoned for not more than six months, or both. n78

§ 14.06 Reporting Requirements for Brokers Under the Tax Reform Act of 1986

The Internal Revenue Service (IRS) promulgated regulations implementing the provisions of the Tax Reform Act of 1986, which imposed a new reporting requirement on the person responsible for closing real estate transactions. n1 Pursuant to the regulations, the "real estate reporting person" n2 is required to file with the IRS an information return on Form 1099-S and to provide the same information to the transferor. n3 A "real estate broker" may be subject to a monetary penalty for failure to comply with the reporting requirements. n4 The regulations apply only to certain real estate transactions and broadly define the concept of "real estate broker" such that a person may be deemed to be a real estate broker for purposes of the reporting requirements, even if that such person is not licensed to perform real estate brokerage services for a fee or commission.

The regulations define "reportable real estate" as including improved and unimproved land, any inherently permanent structure, including any residential, commercial, or industrial building, any condominium, and any stock in a cooperative housing corporation. n5 A return of information is not required on the following: gifts; sales by governmental units; transfers in full or partial satisfaction of any indebtedness secured by the property, including a foreclosure, a transfer in lieu of foreclosure, or abandonment; a transaction in which the money, services, or property is valued at less than $600; and corporate and government transferors are exempt from the reporting requirements. n6

The "real estate broker" under the regulations, absent a specific designation in a designation agreement, n7 is generally the person listed as the settlement agent on the HUD-1 Uniform Settlement Statement prescribed under the Real Estate Settlement Procedures Act of 1974. n8 If no person is designated in the Uniform Settlement Statement, the person who prepared the settlement statement must fulfill the reporting requirements. n9 If there is not a statement providing for a written disposition of the gross proceeds, the regulations provide additional rules to determine who must comply with the reporting requirements. Thus, the regulations provide that the person subject to the reporting requirements is the first listed of the following persons who participate in the transaction as:

- (1) the attorney for the transferee who is "present at the occasion of the delivery of either the transferee's note or a significant portion of the cash proceeds to the transferor, or who prepares or reviews the preparation of the document(s) transferring legal or equitable ownership of the real estate";
- (2) the attorney for the transferor if he or she fulfills the requirements of 1 above; or

(3) the "disbursing title or escrow company that is most significant in terms of gross proceeds disbursed."
n10

If, under the above rules, more than one attorney would be deemed the real estate broker, then the attorney whose involvement in the transaction is most significant will be deemed to be the person subject to the reporting requirements. n11 If no person is responsible for closing the transaction, the real estate broker shall be the first listed of the following persons who participates in the transaction: (1) the mortgage lender; (2) the transferor's broker; (3) the transferee's broker; or (4) the transferee. n12

The real estate broker must report the following information pursuant to the regulations, in addition to any other information required by Form 1099-S:

- (1) the name, address, and taxpayer identification number (TIN) of the transferor;
- (2) a general description of the real estate transferred;
- (3) the closing date;
- (4) the entire gross proceeds, to the extent required by Form 1099;
- (5) an indication that the transferor received property or services as part of the consideration for the transaction, or may receive property (other than cash) or services in satisfaction of an obligation having a stated principal amount, or may receive, in connection with a contingent payment transaction, an amount of gross proceeds that cannot be determined with certainty and is therefore not included in the gross proceeds; and
- (6) the real estate reporting person's name, address, and TIN. n13

The regulations provide for magnetic media reporting for covered real estate transactions. However, there is an exception for persons who reasonably expect fewer than 250 transactions for a calendar year or persons who actually reported fewer than 250 transactions for the preceding calendar year. n14 In cases of undue hardship, the IRS may authorize the reporting on the prescribed paper Form 1099-S. n15

A TIN must be solicited from the transferor at or before closing. The solicitation may be made in person or in a mailing that includes other items. The transferor must furnish the TIN and certify that it is correct. n16 A solicitation must be made in writing, and explain that the person may be subject to civil or criminal penalties for failing to furnish a correct TIN. n17 The following is an example of how a solicitation may be worded:

You are required by law to provide [insert name of reporting person] with your correct taxpayer identification number. If you do not provide [insert name of reporting person] with your correct taxpayer identification number, you may be subject to civil or criminal penalties imposed by law. n18

The solicitation must contain space for the name, address, and TIN of the solicited person, as well as the certification that the TIN is in fact the correct one. n19 The solicitation must be retained by the reporting person for four years following the close of the calendar year that includes the date of closing. n20

A real estate broker or other reporting person must provide a written statement of the information to the person furnishing the TIN. The written statement must bear either the information shown on a completed Form 1099, or the following:

This is important tax information and is being furnished to the Internal Revenue Service. If you are required to file a return, a negligence penalty or other sanction may be imposed on you if this item is required to be reported and the IRS determines that it has not been reported. n21

The statement must be furnished before February 1 of the calendar year following the closing. n22

PART V Other Issues Affecting Brokers

CHAPTER 14 Federal Laws Affecting Real Estate Brokers *

10A-14 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 14.07

§ 14.07 The Americans with Disabilities Act

[1] In General

The Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), n1 which became effective on July 26, 1992, provides access requirements for, and prohibits discrimination against, people with disabilities in public accommodations, state and local government, transportation, telecommunications, and employment. The primary focus for real estate licensees is Title III, n2 which broadly expands the concept of "disability" and imposes regulations on existing buildings. Title III applies to both the owner and the operator of public accommodations and commercial facilities. The Act specifically affects the real estate brokerage industry in that real estate licensees need to determine whether or not the product the licensee is selling is in compliance with the Act. A licensee should always be cautioned, however, that the statute is very detailed, and there are a number of gray areas in the statute that lack clear interpretation.

[2] Scope of Title III of the Act

The ADA's anti-discrimination provisions and requirements for the removal of barriers apply to "places of public accommodation," n3 and the accessibility requirements of the ADA with respect to new construction and alterations apply to "public accommodation" and "commercial facilities." n4

"Places of public accommodation" refers to twelve categories of retail and service businesses:

- (1) places of lodging;
- (2) food and drink establishments;
- (3) places of exhibitionary entertainment;
- (4) places of public gathering;
- (5) sales and rental establishments;
- (6) services establishments such as law firms, accounting firms, and banks;

- (7) public transportation stations;
- (8) places of public display or collection;
- (9) places of recreation;
- (10) educational facilities;
- (11) social service center establishments; and
- (12) exercise clubs. n5

This definition also includes real estate brokerage offices, even if they are located in private homes. n6

"Commercial facility" is defined as a facility

- (1) whose operations affect commerce;
- (2) intended for non-residential use; and
- (3) not expressly exempted from coverage under the Fair Housing Act of 1968. n7

The ADA prohibits discrimination against those with disabilities. Discrimination results in the denial of full and equal enjoyment of goods, services, facilities, privileges, advantages, and the facilities of any place of public accommodation. n8

[3] New Construction

[a] In General

Under the ADA, all new construction which becomes available for occupancy after January 23, 1993, must meet new structural requirements for disability access. The Act deals only with construction which becomes available for "first occupancy." Therefore, the Department of Justice regulations exempt projects for which a completed building permit application is certified as received by the appropriate government entity before January 26, 1992. If a building permit was issued after January 26, 1992, but had a certificate of occupancy before January 26, 1993, it is exempt from the Act's requirements. The new construction requirements apply to all commercial facilities. n9

Special barrier removal requirements came into effect on January 26, 1992, and apply only to facilities which are "places of public accommodation" as defined by the Act. n10 The Act requires removal of architectural and communication barriers that are structural in nature, where removal is readily achievable (easily accomplishable and able to be carried out without much difficulty or expense). n11 Barrier removal includes the installation of ramps, curb cuts in sidewalks and entrances, repositioning shelving, rearranging tables and chairs, repositioning telephones, adding rays to marking on elevator control buttons, installing flashing alarm lights, widening doors, eliminating turnstiles, and providing for alternate paths of travel. n12

[b] Alterations

All commercial facilities must be accessible to the maximum extent feasible whenever alterations are being performed on the facility. n13 Alteration is defined as any change that affects the feasibility of a facility. n14 If the alterations are made to a lobby or work area of the public accommodation, an accessible path of travel to the altered area, and to the bathrooms, telephones, and drinking fountains serving that area, must be made accessible to the extent that the added accessibility is not disproportionate to the overall cost of the original alteration. Disproportionate cost is defined for the purposes of the Act as costs which exceed twenty percent of the original alteration. The "cost of alteration" means all costs incurred in renovating a particular portion of the facility within a three-year period. n15

[c] Other Modifications

The Act requires modifications to procedures so that disabled individuals are not excluded from regular programs. Places of public accommodation must make reasonable modifications to policies and procedures in order to accommodate individuals with disabilities and not create restrictions that tend to screen out individuals with disabilities (e.g., requesting that a blind person produce a driver's license as the sole means of identification or not allowing more than one person in a clothes-changing area when a disabled person needs the assistance of another). n16

The Act also requires that "auxiliary aids and services" be made available to insure effective communication with individuals with hearing, vision or speech impairments. These "auxiliary aids and services" include interpreters, listening headsets, television closed caption decoders, telecommunication devices for the deaf, video tech displays, Braille materials, and large print materials. n17

[d] Defenses

[i] In General. There are several defenses and exclusions available under the Act, but most are extremely narrow in scope.

[ii] Threat to the Health and Safety of Others. It is a legitimate defense under the Act to refuse to serve a disabled person or offer equipment, goods and services if such individual poses a direct threat to the health or safety of others (e.g., amusement park rides, rafting exhibitions or difficult swimming maneuvers). n18

[iii] Private Clubs. Private clubs are excluded under the Act. A private club is defined in the ADA as being in accordance with Title II of the 1964 Civil Rights Act. n19

[iv] Religious Organizations. Religious organizations are also exempt, even churches that operate day care centers, nursing homes or private schools. n20

[v] Not "Readily Achievable." Barrier removal is not required of public accommodation if it is not readily achievable. Readily achievable means "easily accomplishable and able to be carried out without much difficulty or expense." n21

[vi] Structural Impracticability. Structural impracticability is a defense if the circumstances are such that incorporating excessive disability features into the structure would destroy the structural integrity of the facility. n22

[vii] Technical Infeasibility. Public accommodations need not comply with the Act if it is technically infeasible to do so. Technical infeasibility refers to the existence of structural conditions requiring the removal or alteration of an essential part of the structural frame to make the facility comply with the requirements of the Act. n23

[viii] Residential Structures. Residential structures are normally not included in the Act unless they accommodate the public, in which case they would fall under the public accommodation portion of the statute. Similarly, owner-occupied boarding houses or bed and breakfast establishments are also not covered by the Act if they have five rooms or less. n24

[ix] Asbestos Removal. Asbestos removal projects do not trigger the "alterations" requirements of the Act. n25

[x] Historic Structures. "Qualified historic structures" need not comply with the requirements of the Act if compliance would "threaten or destroy the historic significance of the building of facility." n26

[4] Responsible Parties

In general, the ADA imposes the plans and building compliance obligations on the building owner, rather than the tenant or manager. n27 However, many landlords' leases require that all of the compliance expenses required by federal, state, or local law be borne by the tenant. In that case, it is presumed that the landlord could pass the cost on to the tenant.

The Department of Justice has suggested different formulas or standards for allocation of cost between landlords and tenants, but received comments criticizing these arbitrary standards. n28 The Department of Justice has indicated, however, that the time remaining on the lease should not be a factor in the allocation of responsibility. Rather, the term of the lease is irrelevant in determining what is readily achievable for the tenant. n29

It may be helpful to address the issue in the "compliance with laws" provision of the leases, particularly in situations where the building's occupancy is such that only one or two tenants may be responsible for complying with the ADA, while other tenants may be exempt.

An office building may not be required to be in compliance with the ADA prior to foreclosure. After foreclosure, however, when it becomes part of the lender's portfolio, it may become a place of public accommodation. The cost of barrier removal now will fall on the lender because of its change in use of occupancy or ownership. Prior to foreclosure, it may be wise for lenders to do an ADA audit of the building, similar to a toxic waste or environmental assessment audit.

[5] Enforcement

Both the Department of Justice and private individuals may maintain a cause of action to enforce Title III against commercial building owners. The Department of Justice may seek monetary damages or injunctive relief. n30 Private individuals are entitled to seek only injunctive relief under the statute, although a tort claim may create a cause of action for monetary damages. n31

The Department of Justice enforces the provisions of Title III by establishing a "pattern or practice" of discrimination, failure to comply with the provisions of the Act, or "that any person or a group of persons has been denied any of the rights granted by Title III and such denial raises an issue of general public importance." n32 The civil penalties imposed are $50,000.00 for the first violation and $100,000.00 for each subsequent violation. The Attorney General may also seek monetary damages on behalf of aggrieved individuals. Individuals who believe that they have been subjected to discrimination prohibited by the ADA can request the Department to investigate. n33

An individual has a right to bring a suit for injunctive relief if that individual has "reasonable grounds for believing that he or she is about to be subjected to discrimination." The private suit can be brought in court without pursuing the administrative remedies, and the individual may even be entitled to a court appointed attorney "if the court deems such appointment to be just under the circumstances." n34

CHAPTER 14 Federal Laws Affecting Real Estate Brokers *

10A-14 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 14.08

§ 14.08 The Fair Housing Act

[1] In General

The Fair Housing Act, based on Title VIII of the Civil Rights Act of 1968, n1 seeks to provide, within constitutional limitations, fair housing throughout the United States. It is unlawful to discriminate in any aspect of the sale, rental, or financing of dwellings based on race, color, religion, national origin, sex, handicap, or familial status. n2

A housing transaction, for purposes of the Fair Housing Act, generally includes the sale or rental of a dwelling. n3 It also includes the inspection of a dwelling by a person engaged in a residential real estate transaction, and the making or purchasing of loans for, or the selling, brokering, or appraising of, residential real estate. n4

[2] Exceptions

[a] In General

The following types of housing transactions are exempted from the enforcement provisions of the Fair Housing Act: (1) certain sales of single-family homes; (2) certain rentals and buildings of four or less units; (3) most rentals by private clubs and religious organizations; (4) housing within reasonable governmental limitations on occupancy; and (5) certain housing for older persons. n5

[b] Single-Family Homes

There is a general exception for the sale or rental of real estate by an owner of a single-family home. n6 The following conditions must be satisfied in order to maintain an exception from the provisions of the Fair Housing Act:

- (1) the owner must not own or have an interest in more than three single-family houses at any one time;
- (2) if the owner was not the most recent occupant prior to the sale, the owner may not have made any similar sale within the preceding twenty-four months; and
- (3) the housing unit must be sold and rented only by the owner and without the services of a real estate broker or agent, or any person in the business of selling or renting dwellings. n7

With respect to the third requirement, the phrase "in the business of selling or renting dwellings" is defined as:

- (1) participating in three or more sale or rental transactions within the preceding twelve months;
- (2) participating as an agent in two or more sale or rental transactions during the preceding twelve months, except in the sale of the seller's personal residence; and
- (3) owning any dwelling designed or intended for occupancy by five or more families. n8

This is commonly referred to as the "Mrs. Murphy" exception, and is available only to private individual owners of dwellings.

[c] Rental of Apartments and Small Complexes

Except for advertising, the prohibitions against discrimination of rental of rooms or units and dwellings do not apply if the dwelling is occupied by no more than four families, and the owner of the dwelling maintains and actually occupies one of the units as the owner's residence. n9

[d] Private Clubs and Religious Organizations

The exemptions for religious organizations allow them to limit the sale, rental, or occupancy of a non-commercial dwellings that they own or operate to persons of the same religion. This exemption is lost if the organization discriminates on the basis of race, color, sex, or national origin. n10

The exemption is not available to clubs that discriminate in the selection or admission of its members. The final interpretation, however, may be governed by local law. If the state law prohibits the private club status, it would logically result in the loss of the Fair Housing Act exemption. n11

Control, however, is important, and the restriction must have some basis related to the organization. In United States v. Columbus Country Club, n12 the court determined that the relationship between the Catholic Church and the club was not sufficient to support the exemption.

[e] Occupancy Limitations

The 1988 amendments to the Fair Housing Act contain a subsection that specifically states that nothing supersedes the applicability of any reasonable local, state, or federal restrictions regarding the maximum number of occupants permitted to occupy a dwelling. n13 This permits state and local governments to continue to impose reasonable limitations on maximum occupancy, so long as limitations apply to all occupants and do not result in discrimination on the basis of race, color, religion, sex, national origin, handicap, or familial status.

[f] Housing for Older Persons

The 1988 amendments to the Fair Housing Act added provisions that prohibit the denial of housing based on familial status, n14 thereby rendering illegal the "adults only" and "no children" policies of housing facilities. However, Congress included three specific exemptions from the familial status rules to reduce the impact of the familial status provisions on housing for older adults: (1) HUD-approved housing programs under a state or federal program; (2) housing for persons aged sixty-two or older; and (3) housing for persons aged fifty-five or older. n15 n16 Vacant units do not count in the overall calculation. The Act appears to apply to a married couple if at least one of the spouses is over age sixty-two. Resident employees are also exempt from the age requirement. n17

A cooperative apartment building was found to be a "dwelling" within the meaning of the Fair Housing Act. n18 The cooperative apartment complex violated the Fair Housing Act by discriminating against children. The complex allowed no more than two persons in studio and one-bedroom apartments. Evidence showed that the provision would exclude 92 to 95% of all families with children, but only 19 to 21% of families without children.

If the housing is for persons aged sixty-two or older, it must be intended for, and solely occupied by, persons who are aged sixty-two or older. n19

[3] Discriminatory Activities

[a] In General

Of particular interest to real estate licensees is the prohibition of discriminatory activities on the basis of race, religion, color, sex, handicap, familial status or national origin in the sale, rental or advertising of dwellings.

[b] Sales or Rentals

[i] In General. Section 804(a) of the Fair Housing Act states that it is unlawful to refuse to sell or rent after the making of a bona fide offer, or to refuse to negotiate for the sale or rental of, or otherwise make unavailable or deny, a dwelling to any person because of race, color, religion, familial status or national origin. A common violation is the refusal to rent or sell property to minorities. In these cases, the plaintiff can establish a prima facie case by showing that:

- (1) the plaintiff is a member of a protected class, which can include testers; n20
- (2) the plaintiff applied for and was qualified to rent or purchase the property;
- (3) the offer was rejected by the defendant;
- (4) the housing opportunity remained available after the rejection. n21

Real estate brokers should be cautioned that the playing field is not level, since the plaintiff is not required to prove that the defendant intended to discriminate. Once the plaintiff has made a prima facie case by proving that the conduct was discriminatory, the burden shifts to the defendant to show that the challenged practice could be justified on non-discriminatory grounds n22 or that the defendants were unaware that the plaintiff was a member of a protected class. n22.1 The effect of discrimination may also be referred to as "disparate impact," which is established by showing that the practice of the defendant will predictably result in racial discrimination or that it has a discriminatory effect. n23 One court, however, modified the disparate impact test, holding that discriminatory allegations could be defended with a lesser burden of proof. n24

Conduct such as steering, exclusionary zoning, redlining, and other actions by either individuals or governmental units that directly impact the availability of housing to their protected classes are prohibited under the Act. Special efforts to attract buyers, however, apparently do not fall within the prohibition. For example, in South-Suburban Housing Center v. Greater South-Suburban Board of Realtors, n25 a broker agreed to make special efforts to attract white buyers in a predominately African-American neighborhood. The Seventh Circuit held that this did not violate the Fair Housing Act, but merely provided additional information to white home buyers concerning the property they might not ordinarily know about or consider, and involved no lessening of efforts to attract African-American home buyers.

[ii] Steering. "Steering" is the practice of directing prospective home buyers interested in equivalent properties to different areas according to their race. n26 The conduct applies to rental situations and can occur for reasons other than race. The nature of the conduct of real estate agents makes them more likely defendants than almost any other party to a real estate transaction.

There is also a practice called "benign steering," which is the intentional steering or restricting of housing for the express purpose of fostering integration rather than discrimination. A conflict was noted in United States v. Starrett City Associates.ⁿ²⁷ The Second Circuit said that quotas promote the Fair Housing Act Immigration Policy, which is designed to promote "immigration maintenance," but they contravene the anti-discrimination policy,ⁿ²⁸ designed to prevent "tipping." Tipping occurs when a neighborhood population reaches a certain level of minority concentration, resulting in the abandonment of the neighborhood by the majority.ⁿ²⁹

[iii] Redlining. Lenders and appraisers who delineate geographical areas on a map of a community as poor-risk areas solely because of the concentration of minorities and low-income households are engaged in a prohibited practice referred to as "redlining." Redlining is not directly applicable to real estate brokers.

[c] Discrimination Based on Terms or Conditions

The Fair Housing Act prohibits the imposition of discriminatory terms, conditions, or treatment on a sale or rental that is proposed or completed.ⁿ³⁰ This includes violations such as a request by the owner for a higher price because the buyer is foreign. The HUD regulations list four activities that are prohibited if they are based on any one of the seven protected classifications listed in subsection [a] above: (1) using different provisions of the lease or sales contract; (2) failing or delaying maintenance or repairs to sale or rental dwellings; (3) failing to process or accurately communicate an offer for the sale or rental of a dwelling; or (4) limiting the use of privileges, services, or facilities associated with the dwelling because of the protected classification of an owner, tenant, or person associated with the owner or tenant.ⁿ³¹ A similar prohibition applies to the denial of a sale or rental of a dwelling because of the refusal of the prospective buyer or tenant to provide sexual favors.ⁿ³²

[d] Discrimination in Advertising for Sale or Rental

Advertisements that indicate preference, limitation, or discrimination based on one of the seven protected classes are also prohibited.ⁿ³³ The prohibition includes all written or oral statements, regardless of the medium employed in the advertisement.ⁿ³⁴ The regulations specifically prohibit:

- (1) the use of any catch words or phrases implying the dwellings are or are not available to a member of a protected class;ⁿ³⁵
- (2) the selection of particular media for advertising locations that effectively discriminates against a protected class by denying them housing market information;ⁿ³⁶ and
- (3) the refusal to publish sale or rental advertising because of a protected classification, or charging different rates for such advertising based upon the classification.ⁿ³⁷

Several cases have alleged discriminatory advertising based on the lack of minority models in advertising. One case held that an advertisement can violate the Fair Housing Act if it "suggests to an ordinary reader that a particular race is preferred."ⁿ³⁸ The court went on to say that "the creator of an ad may not make choices or models that create a suggestion of a racial preference."ⁿ³⁹

In contrast, however, the court in *Housing Opportunities Made Equal, Inc. v. Cincinnati Enquirer, Inc.*ⁿ⁴⁰ held that the single publication of an advertisement which used a small number of all-white models did not, without more, violate the Fair Housing Act. Liability arises only if an advertiser had the opportunity, based upon either the large number of models, to use minority models in an advertisement, or if the advertisement was socially or intentionally discriminatory.ⁿ⁴¹ The court held that to construe the Fair Housing Act otherwise would violate the First Amendment.

[e] False Representations of Unavailability

Section 3604(d) of the Fair Housing Act makes it unlawful to provide inaccurate or untrue information about the availability of dwellings for sale or rent. These representations include falsely informing a minority that housing is not available in a majority neighborhood. n42

[f] Blockbusting

"Blockbusting" is generally defined as any profit-motivated effort to induce or attempt to induce a person to sell or rent a dwelling by representing to that person that there is an entry or possible entry into the neighborhood of persons of a protected class, while generating commissions for real estate agents. This occurs, for example, if a real estate agent represents that there is an influx of a minority group into a neighborhood that ultimately results in the flight of property owners out of that neighborhood and the generation of profits for the brokers. n43 Blockbusting has also been called panic peddling. n43.1

[g] Discrimination in Brokerage Services

Section 3606 of the Fair Housing Act makes it unlawful to deny any person access to, or membership or participation in, any multiple listing service, real estate brokerage organization, or facility relating to the business of selling dwellings. n44

[h] Interference and Intimidation

The Fair Housing Act states that it is unlawful to coerce, intimidate, threaten, or interfere with any person related to the enjoyment of any rights granted or protected by the Act. n45

[i] Discrimination Based on Familial Status

The Act prohibits discrimination on the basis of familial status, defined as a minor being domiciled with a parent, a person having legal custody of the minor, or the designee of such parent or legal custodian. n46 In Gorski v. Troy, n47 the court upheld a foster parent's right as a designee of a child's legal custodian, even though the foster parent had not yet achieved familial status.

[j] Discrimination Based on Handicapped Status

The 1988 amendments to the Fair Housing Act make it unlawful to discriminate on the basis of the sale or rental of a dwelling to: (1) any handicapped buyer or renter, based on the person's handicap; (2) a person who lives with or intends to live with the handicapped renter or buyer; or (3) any person associated with the handicapped renter or buyer. n48 There is also significant authority that an AIDS patient is handicapped, and refusal to issue a special use permit for AIDS patients violates the Fair Housing Act. n49 Some states have passed laws that shield an "owner or agent of real property" from liability for failing to disclose that an occupant or former occupant was afflicted with, or died from, AIDS. n50

Another exception involves drug abusers. Although drug abuse is not considered a handicap under the Act, the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals in United States v. Southern Management Corp. n51 held that the refusal to rent to an individual because of former substance abuse was a violation of the Act.

[k] Exploitation

Housing discrimination claims can also be based upon an exploitation theory. To base a claim of discrimination on an exploitation theory, the plaintiffs must claim that as a result of racial residential segregation, a dual housing market exists and the defendants have taken advantage of the situation by demanding unreasonable prices and terms in excess of prices and terms available to citizens of a different racial background for comparable housing. n51.1

[4] Enforcement

The 1988 amendments to the Act provide a comprehensive system of rules and procedures to enforce the Fair Housing Laws. n52 The rules establish a formal process by which the government must investigate all complaints filed with HUD, including a procedure for HUD to investigate activities on its own initiative. The amendments did not materially affect the rights of private persons to sue for violations, but did extend the statute of limitations from 180 days to two years to file a lawsuit in either federal or state court based on an alleged discriminatory housing practice. n53

The United States Supreme Court has held that the Fair Housing Act provides for vicarious liability. n54 However, this Act imposes liability without fault upon the employer in accordance with traditional agency principles in that it normally imposes vicarious liability upon the corporation but not upon its officers or owners. n55 Consequently, the right to control an employee is insufficient, by itself, to impose vicarious liability upon an officer of the corporation. n56 While the Court found that the right to control was insufficient by itself under traditional agency principles to establish a principal/agent relationship, it left the application of traditional vicarious liability rules to the lower courts. n57

10A-14 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 14.09

§ 14.09 The Condominium and Cooperative Conversion Protection and Abuse Relief Act

[1] In General

The mid-to-late 1970s saw an expansion of condominium and cooperative housing development. Developers discovered that state enabling legislation (passed generally in the mid- 1960s in response to the National Housing Act of 1961), coupled with demand for low-cost housing, created a growing market for condominiums and cooperatives. Developer abuses began to appear, primarily from four sources: (1) forfeiture of deposits when condominium projects were not completed; (2) failure to disclose important information to purchasers; (3) self-dealing management contracts by developers, which allowed them to manage projects in perpetuity; and (4) forcing tenants out of their apartments in order to create condominiums, thereby causing significant problems for low-income or elderly residents. n1 While several states have passed statutes to prevent this type of abuse, the federal response to these problems was the Condominium and Cooperative Abuse Relief Act of 1980. n2

[2] Scope

The Act applies to all condominium and cooperative projects (1) created by conversions from rental properties; (2) where the real estate has five or more residential units in each residential structure, and the remaining real estate is designated for common ownership solely by the unit owners; and (3) the units or cooperative interests are offered for sale or lease, or are sold or leased by direct or indirect use of any means of instruments or transportation or communication of interstate commerce or the mails. n3

In a "condominium," portions of the real estate that are not designated as residential units are designated for common ownership solely by the owners of those units, with each owner having an undivided interest. n4 In a "cooperative," the individual interests are evidenced by membership in a cooperative association and a lease for the residential unit. n5

[3] Exemptions

The Act does not apply to the sale of a condominium unit or an interest in a cooperative by the federal, state, or local government or agency. n6 The Act also exempts projects in which all units are restricted to non-residential use. n7

[4] Prohibitions Under the Act

The Act primarily provides for termination of self-dealing contracts by the developer and declares certain types of leases in favor of the developer unconscionable. Unit owners are permitted to terminate certain management contracts or portions thereof that were created while the developer was in control of the project. To be eligible for termination, the contract must meet six requirements:

- (1) the contract must have been entered into after the effective date of the Act; n8
- (2) the project involved must be a conversion project; n9
- (3) the contract must be for operation, maintenance, or management of the project, the association, or the property serving the project; n10
- (4) the contract must be between the unit owners and the developer, or an affiliate of the developer; n11
- (5) the contract must have been entered into while the developer or affiliate controlled the unit owners' association or executive board; n12 and
- (6) the term of the contract must be more than three years, including a renewal period that can be exercised at the sole option of the developer or the affiliate of the developer. n13

Courts are divided on what types of self-dealing contracts are covered and how they may be terminated. Apparently, regardless of how the contracts are couched (as leases or other alternative contract arrangements), all contracts on the property that serve the unit owners can be terminated under the self-dealing contract provisions. n14 The issues center on whether or not a contract "serves the unit owners" and whether or not the beneficiary of that contract is an "affiliate of the developer." n15 An "affiliate of the developer" is a person who either controls a developer, is controlled by a developer, or is under common control with a developer. n16

The termination of the contract must occur within a two-year period beginning with the date on which any special developer control is terminated or the date on which the developer owns twenty-five percent or fewer of the units in the project, whichever is earlier. n17 Termination is accomplished by an affirmative vote of at least two-thirds of the unit owners other than the unit owned by the developer or an affiliate of the developer. n18

The theory of self-dealing contracts also includes developer reimbursement clauses (i.e., clauses obligating unit owners to reimburse the developer for costs, attorneys' fees, judgments or any other fees incurred as a result of the management contract), which the Act declares to be against public policy and void. n19

[5] Remedies

The Act provides that any person aggrieved by a violation of the Act may sue in state or federal court. 15 U.S.C. § 3611(a). It expressly permits recovery of damages and any other relief deemed fair, just, and equitable. n20

CHAPTER 14 Federal Laws Affecting Real Estate Brokers *

10A-14 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 14.10

§ 14.10 The Agricultural Foreign Investment Disclosure Act

[1] Purpose

The Agricultural Foreign Investment Disclosure Act (AFIDA) became effective on February 2, 1979, in response to growing concern that foreign investment was resulting in higher taxes and driving up the cost of agricultural property. The purpose of AFIDA was to insure the collection of data to gauge the effect of foreign investment on the United States. n1

[2] Application of the Act

The disclosure requirements of AFIDA are generally applicable to transactions involving the acquisition or transfer of interest in agricultural land by foreign persons. n2 The term "foreign person" is defined as individuals who: (1) are not citizens of the United States or certain of its possessions; (2) do not have permanent resident status; or (3) are not paroled into the United States. n3 The term also includes a foreign government and, even if an entity is not an individual or government, a legal entity falls under the definition of a foreign person if it (1) is created under the laws of foreign government, (2) has its principal place of business outside the United States, or (3) is organized under the law of any state, has significant interest or substantial control, directly or indirectly, by a foreign individual, foreign government, or other foreign legal entity, or any combination thereof. n4

[3] Agricultural Land

Agricultural land is defined under AFIDA as any land within the United States used for agricultural, forestry, or timber production. n5 It includes both farming and ranching, n6 although no disclosure needs to be made if the agricultural land aggregates no more than ten acres and if the gross annual receipts from the sale of the farm, ranch, forestry, or timber products produced on the land do not exceed $1,000.00. n7

[4] Disclosure Requirements

The disclosure must be made by any foreign person holding, acquiring, or transferring United States agricultural land. n8 The following information must be supplied to the Agricultural, Stabilization and Conservation Service (ASCS), and must be filed within ninety days of the transaction that triggers the reporting requirement:

- (1) the legal name and address of the foreign person making the report;
- (2) if the foreign person is an individual, the citizenship of such individual;
- (3) if the foreign person is not an individual or a government, the name of the entity and its nature, the country in which it was created or organized, and its principal place of business;
- (4) the type of interest held or required;
- (5) the legal description and acreage of the land;
- (6) the purchase price or other consideration of the land involved, and any purchase price or other consideration still to be paid;
- (7) if the reporting person is a transferor, the legal name and address of the transferee, the transferee's citizenship, if she or he is an individual, the nature of the entity if it is neither individual nor a government, the country in which the entity was created or organized, and its place of business;
- (8) the agricultural purpose, as of the date of the report, for which the foreign person intends to use the land;
- (9) if an agent is making the report, its name, address, and relationship to the foreign person;
- (10) the method of acquisition or transfer of land in any relationship with a foreign person to the previous owner, producer, manager, tenant, or sharecropper, as well as the nature of the rental agreement; and
- (11) the date the interest was acquired or transferred. n9

If the foreign person neither an individual nor a government, it must include additional information about the entity of ownership. n10

[5] Filing Requirements

The disclosures are generally required to be filed on Form ASCS-153 and filed in the ASCS County Office where the agricultural land is located. n11 If the land is located in more than one county, the disclosure may be made directly with the ASCS office in Washington, D.C. n12 If a responsible party fails to submit a report, file updated material, or knowingly submits incomplete, false, or misleading reports, the ASCS can impose of penalty of twenty-five percent of the fair market value of the interest owned by the foreign person as computed by the ASCS, n13 although the penalty may be reduced based on a variety of factors such as the nature of the information not reported and the method of discovery of the violation.

CHAPTER 14 Federal Laws Affecting Real Estate Brokers *

10A-14 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 14.11

§ 14.11 The Federal Trade Commission Act

[1] In General

The Federal Trade Commission Act (FTCA) was originally passed in 1914, ⁿ¹ but it was not until the 1970s that there was a renewed emphasis by the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) on consumer protection, which fostered involvement of the FTC in real estate activities. Section 5 of the FTCA makes unlawful "unfair methods of competition." In real estate matters, the Act emphasizes the prevention of unfair and deceptive practices on the sale of land, new homes and mobile homes.

The scope of enforcement of the FTCA is undeniably broad, and has also been applied to regulate brokerage services, where enforcement has concentrated on broker misrepresentation and advertising. ⁿ² As discussed in Section 14.04 supra, the FTC also has a proportionate power under the Federal Truth and Lending Act involving the extension of credit.

[2] FTC Enforcement

In 1976, the FTC entered into a consent agreement with a broker who offered rental housing in a vacation area and represented that it had apartments available when it did not. ⁿ³ The FTC ordered the broker to cease and desist from such conduct and further ordered that additional disclosures be made in all future advertising. ⁿ⁴

The FTC also engaged in a industry-wide investigation of practices in the residential real estate brokerage industry. ⁿ⁵ The FTC concluded in its report that there was a high level of interdependence among brokers that caused a uniformly high commission rate, and that buyers and sellers were uninformed about who the agent represented. The report also found, however, that the interdependence among brokers provided benefits to the consumers.

The FTC has also been active in obtaining consent orders prohibiting price fixing by Multiple Listing Services (MLSs), and prohibits certain boycotting activities because of the refusal by an MLS to allow certain types of brokers to be included in its organization. ⁿ⁶

[3] Brokerage Services

Real estate licensees have organized over the years to form a number of trade associations, the largest and most notable being the National Association of Realtors (NAR). Under NAR there have been local boards organized as independent operations, although in most circumstances the board members are required to be members of NAR as well as the state association of realtors. All fifty states have some procedural mechanism for regulating real estate licensees.

The first opening for federal jurisdiction over the real estate brokerage industry was in 1950, when the Supreme Court in United States v. National Association of Real Estate Boards n7 held that price-fixing for real estate commissions was a per se reasonable restraint of trade. In a later case, n8 the Supreme Court determined that a real estate broker's conduct can invoke Sherman Act (antitrust) jurisdiction by demonstrating merely "a substantial affect on interstate commerce" generated by brokerage activity, rather than requiring proof that the broker was actually engaged in interstate commerce activity.

The primary focus of the FTC in regulating the real estate brokerage industry has been boycotting Multiple Listing Service (MLS) membership in Realtor trade associations. The function of the MLS is to provide a multiple listing service for its members. MLS members obligate themselves to attempt to obtain from sellers exclusive listings of real estate and to pool their exclusive listings through MLS, which serves as a central processing and distributing point for its members' listings. The MLS compiles the listings it receives into a member's listing book or computerized listing base. It updates the listing book at least monthly, and provides members with a daily update of new listings and new data on old listings. Using the information provided by the multiple listing service, member brokers are able to cooperate in bringing together buyers and sellers. The selling broker and listing broker then determine by their own agreement how the commission of the sale will be divided. In essence, the service serves as a trade exchange for the purchase and sale of real estate. n9 With the rapid expansion of internet services, many local and state Realtor associations list their inventory on the World Wide Web, diminishing the value of the MLS.

MLS, while requiring membership standards which must be reasonably related to the services provided, n10 has, of course, long recognized its pro-competitive effects. n11 In 1978, the FTC announced an industry-wide investigation of practices and maintains jurisdiction over interstate activity of broker services. Most FTC complaints have resulted in consent orders rather than litigation, which is generally pursued by the Department of Justice.

[4] Regulation of Leasing Activity

The FTC was particularly active in the 1970s concerning the anti-competitive potential of shopping center developers and their tenants. This activity resulted in a number of consent decrees against both developers and major tenants. n12 Some of the prohibitions contained in the orders included the following:

- (1) the prohibition of certain types of classes of tenants; n13
- (2) the right to approve the locations of other tenants and/or their store hours; n14
- (3) limitation of merchandise on other tenants; n15
- (4) types of advertising; n16 and
- (5) rights of first refusal to operate similar stores. n17

[5] Educational Correspondence Courses

The FTC has had been active in monitoring misrepresentations of correspondence courses relating to real estate. The seminal case involved misrepresentations as to earnings potential and job opportunities. n18 Similar actions have been instituted in subsequent cases involving representations relating to correspondence courses in real estate appraisals. n19

CHAPTER 14 Federal Laws Affecting Real Estate Brokers *

10A-14 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 14.12

§ 14.12 The Flood Disaster Protection Act of 1973

[1] In General

A real estate broker's ability to list and effectively market property can depend greatly on whether the property is in a special flood hazard area (SFHA). Designation of a property as a SFHA may affect the purchaser's ability to obtain building permits and financing. If the property is damaged by flooding after consummation of a purchase transaction, questions may arise as to whether the broker should have known that the area was subject to flood hazards and whether or not the broker's failure to ascertain the flood hazard status amounts to fraud, misrepresentation, or deception. Recent changes to the flood laws offer more protection, as most lenders now must require flood hazard insurance on properties in a SFHA. n1

[2] Purpose of the Act

The National Flood Insurance Act of 1968 (1968 Act) was enacted to

- (1) authorize a flood insurance program by means of which flood insurance could be made available on a nationwide basis through the cooperative efforts of the federal government and the private insurance industry;
- (2) provide flexibility in the flood insurance program so it may be based on workable methods of pulling risks, minimizing costs, and distributing burdens equally among those who would be protected by flood insurance and the general public;
- (3) encourage state and local governments to make appropriate land use adjustments to constrict the development of land which was exposed to flood damage and minimize flood damage cost by flood losses;
- (4) guide the development of proposed future construction, where practicable, away from locations which were threatened by flood hazards;
- (5) encourage lending and credit institutions, as a matter of national policy, to assist in furthering the objectives of the flood insurance program;

(6) assure that any federal assistance provided under the program would be related closely to all flood related programs and activities of the federal government; and

(7) authorize continuing studies of flood hazards in order to provide for a constant re-appraisal of the flood insurance program and its effect on land use requirements. n2

The Act was amended in 1969 to provide similar protection against damage resulting from mudslides caused by accumulations of water on or under the ground. n3 The Flood Disaster Protection Act of 1973 (1973 Act) provided for protection against damage and loss resulting from the erosion and undermining of shorelines by waves or currents in lakes or other bodies of water exceeding anticipated cyclical levels. n4 The 1973 amendments

(1) substantially increased the limits of coverage authorized under the national flood insurance program;

(2) provided for the expeditious identification and dissemination of information concerning flood-prone areas;

(3) required states or local communities, as a result of future federal financial assistance, to participate in the flood insurance program and to adopt adequate flood plain ordinances to effect enforcement provisions to reduce or avoid future flood losses; and

(4) required the purchase of flood insurance by property owners who are being assisted by federal programs or by federally supervised, regulated, or insured agencies or institutes in the acquisition or improvement of land or facilities to be located in identified areas having special flood hazards. n5

[3] The Flood Insurance Program

The National Flood Insurance Program (NFIP) is administered primarily under the 1968 Act and the 1973 Act. n6 The 1968 Act made Federally subsidized flood insurance available to owners of improved real estate or mobile homes located in special flood hazard areas if their community participates in the NFIP. An SFHA is an area within a flood plain having a one percent or greater chance of flood occurrence in any given year. SFHAs are delineated on maps issued by the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) for individual communities. A community establishes its eligibility to participate in the NFIP by adopting and enforcing floodplain management measures to regulate new construction and by making substantial improvements within its SFHAs to eliminate or minimize future flood damage.

The 1973 Act required the Comptroller of the Currency (OCC), Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System (Board), Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC), Office of Thrift Supervision (OTS), and National Credit Union Administration (NCUA) to issue regulations governing the lending institutions they supervise (regulated lenders). These agencies' regulations directed lenders to require flood insurance on improved real estate or mobile homes serving as collateral for a loan if the property was located, or was to be located, in a SFHA in a participating community. To implement statutory amendments enacted in 1974, the regulations required lenders to notify borrowers that their property is located in a SFHA and of the availability of Federal disaster assistance with respect to the property in the event of a flood.

The National Flood Insurance Reform Act of 1994 (Reform Act) revised the Federal flood insurance statutes. n7 The purpose of the Reform Act was to increase compliance with flood insurance requirements and participation in the NFIP in order to provide additional income to the National Flood Insurance Fund and to decrease the financial burden of flooding on the Federal government, taxpayers, and flood victims. n8 The Reform Act requires the OCC, Board, FDIC, OTS, and NCUA to revise their current flood insurance regulations and requires the Farm Credit Administration (FCA) to promulgate flood insurance regulations for the first time. Also, for the first time, the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation (Freddie Mac) and the Federal National Mortgage Association (Fannie Mae) are required by the Reform Act to ensure that flood insurance requirements are met for the loans they purchase. n9

The joint final rule establishes new escrow requirements for flood insurance premiums, adds references to the statutory authority and the requirement for lenders and servicers to "force place" flood insurance under certain circumstances, enhances flood hazard notice requirements, sets forth new authority for lenders to charge fees for determining whether a property is located in a special flood hazard area, and contains various other provisions necessary to implement the National Flood Insurance Reform Act of 1994. n10

[4] The National Flood Insurance Reform Act of 1994

The Reform Act was passed to strengthen and enhance the NFIP. Depending on the location and activities of a regulated lending institution, a lender may want adequate flood insurance coverage from a safety and soundness perspective as a component of prudent underwriting and as a way to protect the lender's interest in its collateral.

[a] Escrow of Flood Insurance Payments

A regulated lender must require the escrow of flood insurance premiums for loans secured by residential improved real estate if the lender requires the escrow of funds to cover other charges associated with the loan, such as taxes and premiums for hazard or fire insurance. n11 The escrow provision applies to loans secured by residential improved real estate. The Reform Act applies to mobile home loans whether or not they are secured by real estate.

"Residential improved real estate" is defined in the Reform Act as improved real estate for which the improvement is a residential building. n12 This definition does not distinguish between mortgage loans secured by 1- to 4-family residential buildings and commercial loans secured by residential buildings. Thus, the Reform Act's escrow provisions can apply to both home mortgage loans and commercial loans. However, it will not apply to commercial loans unless the lender requires the escrow of other charges for those loans. n13

[b] Forced Placement

A regulated lender cannot make, increase, extend, or renew any loan secured by improved real property located in a SFHA unless the security property is covered by the minimum amount of flood insurance required by the statute. n14 The insurance must be in place at the time a lender makes a loan that is secured by improved real property located in a SFHA. n15 Additionally, a regulated lender or a servicer must purchase or "force place" flood insurance for the borrower if the lender or the servicer determines that adequate coverage is lacking. n16 Forced placement authority is designed to be used if, over the term of the loan, the lender or its servicer determines that flood insurance coverage on the security property is deficient under section 102(e) of the 1973 Act. These provisions apply to all loans outstanding on or after September 23, 1994. n17

A regulated lender must initiate procedures to force-place flood insurance whenever the amount of coverage in place is not equal to the lesser of the outstanding principal balance of the loan or the maximum stipulated by statute for the particular category of property securing the loan. The amount that must be force-placed is equal to the difference between the present amount of coverage and the lesser of the outstanding principal balance or the maximum coverage limit. n18

The agencies were not required to develop a specific form of notice to borrowers for use with the forced placement procedures. For example, a lender, or servicer acting on the lender's behalf, may choose to send the notice directly. n19 Others may decide to use the insurance company that issues the forced-placement policy to send the notice. n20 FEMA has developed the Mortgage Portfolio Protection Program (MPPP) to assist lenders in connection with forced placement procedures. For information concerning the contents of the notification letters used under the MPPP, lenders should consult FEMA's MPPP Notice. n21

[c] Portfolio Review

The 1968 and 1973 Acts, as amended by the Reform Act, do not prescribe portfolio review as the means that a lender or servicer acting on its behalf must use to determine whether security property is adequately covered by flood insurance. The flood statutes do not require that determinations be made at any particular time, other than in connection with making, increasing, extending, or renewing a loan. Nonetheless, a regulated lending institution and servicer acting on its behalf may find it prudent to develop policies and procedures to ensure that, when a determination has been made that property securing a loan is located in a SFHA, they satisfy the requirements of the Reform Act's forced placement provision.

[d] Determination Fees

A lender, or servicer acting on the lender's behalf, may charge a reasonable fee for the costs of making a flood hazard determination under the following circumstances: (1) if the borrower initiates the transaction (making, increasing, extending, or renewing a loan) that triggers a flood hazard determination; (2) if the determination reflects FEMA's revision of flood maps; or (3) if the determination results in the purchase of flood insurance by the lender or servicer under the forced placement provision. n22

The statutory authority to charge a borrower a reasonable fee for a flood hazard determination extends to a fee for life-of-loan monitoring by either the lender, or servicer acting on behalf of the lender, or by a third party, such as a flood hazard determination company. n23 A determination fee may include, among other things, reasonable fees for the costs of an initial flood hazard determination, as well as reasonable fees for a lender, servicer, or third party to monitor the flood hazard status of a security property during the life of a loan. Thus, a determination fee may include, but is not limited to, a life-of-loan monitoring fee. Because the authority to charge a life-of-loan monitoring fee is based on the authority to charge a determination fee, the monitoring fee may be charged only if one of the specified events in the statute occurs.

[e] Notice Requirements

Borrower. Written notification of special flood hazards must be given to borrowers within a reasonable period before completion of the transaction. "Reasonable" notice will vary according to the circumstances of particular transactions. However, a borrower should receive notice timely enough to ensure that (1) the borrower has the opportunity to become aware of his or her responsibilities under the NFIP; and (2) where applicable, the borrower can purchase flood insurance before completion of the loan transaction. In light of these considerations, the joint final rule does not establish a fixed time period during which a lender provides notice to the borrower, although regard ten days is generally regarded as a "reasonable" time interval. n24

Appendix A to the joint final rule provided a sample form of notice, found at § 14.12[5] infra. Use of the sample form is not mandatory. However, lenders who want to revise and individualize the form must provide the borrower at a minimum with the information in the sample form of notice.

Servicers. Under the Reform Act, loan servicers must be notified of special flood hazards. n25 Since the servicer may not be identified prior to closing, the joint final rule requires notice to the servicer as promptly as possible after the lender provides notice to the borrower. Notice to the servicer must be given no later than the other loan data concerning hazard insurance and taxes is given. The lender may use the same notice for both the borrower and servicer. The notice to the servicer may be transmitted in written or electronic form.

Director of FEMA. When making, increasing, extending, renewing, selling, or transferring a loan secured by improved real estate or a mobile home located in a SFHA, regulated lenders must notify the Director of FEMA or the Director's designee of the identity of the loan servicer and of any change in the servicer. n26 The notice will enable FEMA to provide notice to the servicer 45 days before the expiration of a flood insurance contract, as required by section 1364(c) of the 1968 Act, as amended. The insurance provider is FEMA's designee to receive notice of the servicer's identity and of any change.

A regulated lender must use the standard flood hazard determination form (SFHD form) developed by FEMA n27 to determine whether the building or mobile home offered as security property is or will be located in a SFHA in which flood insurance is available under the 1968 Act. Any electronic format used by lenders must contain all mandatory fields indicated on the SFHD form. n28

Lenders may rely on third-party flood hazard determinations only if the third party guarantees the accuracy of the information provided to the lender. n29 The Reform Act also permits a lender to rely on a previous determination as to whether the security property is located in a SFHA. A lender is exempt from liability for errors in the previous determination if the previous determination is not more than seven years old and the basis for it was recorded on the SFHD form mandated by the Reform Act. However, there are two instances where a lender may not rely on a previous determination: (1) if FEMA's map revisions or updates show that the security property is now located in a SFHA, or (2) if the lender contacts FEMA and discovers that map revisions or updates affecting the security property have been made after the date of the previous determination.

A regulated lender may not rely on a previous determination unless the determination was made on FEMA's SFHD form. Section 1365 of the 1968 Act, as amended by the Reform Act, 42 U.S.C. 4104b, states that a person increasing, extending, renewing, or purchasing a loan secured by improved real estate or a mobile home may rely on a previous determination if the basis for the previous determination was set forth on FEMA's SFHD form. n30

[f] Recordkeeping Requirements

The Reform Act made two recordkeeping requirements: (1) retention of a copy of the completed SFHD form, in either hard copy or electronic form, for the period of time the regulated lender owns the loan; and (2) retention of the record of the receipt of notice to the borrower and the servicer for the period of time the regulated lender owns the loan. Lenders must notify FEMA in writing of the identity of the loan servicer and/or of a transfer in servicing rights. However, lenders do not have to keep copies of the notice to the borrower and the servicer, as the Reform Act does not require it. n31

Lenders must also retain a record of the receipt of the notices by the borrower and the servicer for the period of time the lender owns the loan. The record of receipt should contain a statement from the borrower that the borrower has received the notification.

[g] FEMA Flood Hazard Determination Appeals

FEMA's final rule entitled "Review of Determinations for Required Purchase of Flood Insurance" and the preamble to that final rule n32 clarified that a request for a review of whether the subject property is actually in a SFHA must be submitted jointly by the lender and the borrower. FEMA is currently developing a "sample letter" with filing instructions for use by lenders and borrowers in submitting an appeal to FEMA.

The party who requests the appeal of a flood determination generally will bear the cost of the appeal. An appeal is typically initiated at the request of a borrower who believes the property securing the loan is, in fact, not located in an SFHA, despite a flood determination to the contrary. The appeal fee is not charged by the lender as an incident to or condition of the credit. Generally, under the 1973 Act, n33 the mandatory flood insurance requirement is temporarily delayed until FEMA responds to an appeal. If FEMA fails to respond before the later of 45 days or the closing of the loan, the mandatory flood insurance purchase requirement is delayed until FEMA provides a response.

A second mortgage or a home equity loan that is secured by a building or mobile home is covered by the flood insurance requirements, unless one of the statutory exemptions specifically applies. n34

[5] Sample Form of Notice of Special Flood Hazards and Availability of Federal Disaster Relief Assistance

This form is found at 12 C.F.R. Part 22 Appendix A.

We are giving you this notice to inform you that:

The building or mobile home securing the loan for which you have applied is or will be located in an area with special flood hazards.

The area has been identified by the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) as a special flood hazard area using FEMA's Flood Insurance Rate Map or the Flood Hazard Boundary Map for the following community: _____. This area has at least a one percent (1%) chance of a flood equal to or exceeding the base flood elevation (a 100-year flood) in any given year. During the life of a 30-year mortgage loan, the risk of a 100-year flood in a special flood hazard area is 26 percent (26%).

Federal law allows a lender and borrower jointly to request the Director of FEMA to review the determination of whether the property securing the loan is located in a special flood hazard area. If you would like to make such a request, please contact us for further information.

_____The community in which the property securing the loan is located participates in the National Flood Insurance Program (NFIP). Federal law will not allow us to make you the loan that you have applied for if you do not purchase flood insurance. The flood insurance must be maintained for the life of the loan. If you fail to purchase or renew flood insurance on the property, Federal law authorizes and requires us to purchase the flood insurance for you at your expense.

- Flood insurance coverage under the NFIP may be purchased through an insurance agent who will obtain the policy either directly through the NFIP or through an insurance company that participates in the NFIP.

- Flood insurance also may be available from private insurers that do not participate in the NFIP. At a minimum, flood insurance purchased must cover the lesser of:

(1) the outstanding principal balance of the loan; or

(2) the maximum amount of coverage allowed for the type of property under the NFIP.

Flood insurance coverage under the NFIP is limited to the overall value of the property securing the loan minus the value of the land on which the property is located.

- Federal disaster relief assistance (usually in the form of a low-interest loan) may be available for damages incurred in excess of your flood insurance if your community's participation in the NFIP is in accordance with NFIP requirements.

_____Flood insurance coverage under the NFIP is not available for the property securing the loan because the community in which the property is located does not participate in the NFIP. In addition, if the non-participating community has been identified for at least one year as containing a special flood hazard area, properties located in the community will not be eligible for Federal disaster relief assistance in the event of a Federally-declared flood disaster.

CHAPTER 14 Federal Laws Affecting Real Estate Brokers *

§ 14.13 The Copyright Act of 1976

The Copyright Act of 1976 n1 enables authors and talented creators to exercise exclusive control over their creations and the economic awards they generate. n2 The Act provides for both civil n3 and criminal n4 relief.

At first glance, it appears that real estate brokers have little reason to be concerned with copyright laws, unless they are authors or publishers. The value of the copyright in protecting the MLS interest, however, was the primary conflict in Supermarket of Homes v. San Fernando Valley Board of Realtors, n5 in which the Board of Realtors compiled the traditional multiple listing book containing descriptions of various properties for sale in their region. The Board limited access to the compilation by restricting the use of the book to licensed brokers. It could be shown to customers only in the presence of a broker. Sale or distribution of the copies by the broker was strictly prohibited. A real estate broker chose to copy certain pages and sell them to various customers. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals, however, upheld the copyright protection. The basic thrust of this decision is to make real estate brokers cautious in dealing with multiple listing information; simply misusing the information can result in both civil and criminal liability.

In M.C.A.R. v. Realty Photo Master Corp., n6 the Realtors' association brought an action against a photographic service, alleging copyright infringement, unfair competition, unauthorized wiretapping, and misappropriation of trade secrets. The defendant counterclaimed for tortious interference with contractual relations, defamation, and breach of contract. The defendant provided photographic services to MCAR members, and used an MCAR customer access code to access the association's database of real estate listings. After photographing the properties, defendant fed the photos into its own computer, then provided its customers with software that combined its photos with the MCAR database.

The court determined that the Realtor database was entitled to copyright protection because it contained "marketing puffery" as well as factual information about the listed properties, thus possessing some degree of creativity. The court also found that the defendant had not misappropriated trade secrets. To be protected under Maryland law, a trade secret must be secret, its value must derive from the secrecy, and the owner of the information must use reasonable efforts to safeguard the confidentiality of the information.

In re Valdez n7 involved a real estate salesman who alleged that he held the copyright to certain photographs of real estate which he had listed with the broker prior to termination of his association with the broker. The court found that the salesman had proven ownership of the photographs through his certificates of registration from the U.S. Copyright

Office. The court also found that the photographs did not meet the statutory requirements to be considered work made for hire. The salesman was the author of the photographs and retained sole ownership of the copyrights. n8 However, the court also considered N.Y. Comp. Codes R. & Regs. tit. 19, § 175.14 which provided that:

A real estate salesman shall, upon termination of his association with a real estate broker, forthwith turn over to such broker any and all listing information obtained during his association whether such information was originally given to him by the broker or copied from the records of such broker or acquired by the salesman during his association.

The court found that the photographs were listing information and that the salesman was required to relinquish ownership of the photographs when he was required to turn them over to the broker upon his termination. This court also found that this regulation was not preempted by the Copyright Act since there was no inconsistency between the Copyright Act and state law. n9

PART V Other Issues Affecting Brokers

CHAPTER 14 Federal Laws Affecting Real Estate Brokers *

10A-14 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 14.14

§ 14.14 Federal Asset Forfeiture Laws

[1] In General

A dramatic rise in drug-related crimes has resulted in increased law enforcement and the enactment of the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984, n1 which provides for civil forfeiture of real property, and the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO), n2 which provides for criminal forfeiture of real property. Both statutes give the government the power to seize and take control of real estate. A real estate licensee working with listings and management contracts needs to be aware of these statutes to avoid their enforcement against properties with which the licensee associated. This discussion is about the two statutes as they apply to real property.

[2] The Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984

If real property is used or intended to be used in any manner or part to commit to facilitate the commission of a violation of the Act, the real property is subject to forfeiture. However, no property shall be forfeited if the act was committed without the owner's knowledge or consent. n3 The language of the Act is extremely broad, subjecting to forfeiture all real property as well as any specific right, title, or interest in the real property. The Act has been applied to the joint tenancy interest of a spouse, a judgment lien, or mortgagee's interest, n4 as well as to tenancy in common interests n5 and fee simple title. n6 The Act has also been applied to residential property for small violations (e.g., the sale of 12.8 grams of cocaine). n7

Regardless of the scope of the illegal activity, the entire tract upon which the lender has a mortgage may be subject to forfeiture even if the illegal activity occurred on only a small portion of the land, n8 and the value of the property subject to the severity of the violation is irrelevant. n9 In addition, an owner, lender, or lessor of property may forfeit its interest upon proof that the property is negligently entrusted to a tenant, borrower, or occupant who uses the property to commit illegal acts. n10 This puts a heightened duty of care on a real estate broker who manages a property, but who may not be doing all that a managing agent could do to prevent the premises from being used unlawfully. n11 The Act also provides for forfeiture of real property acquired in exchange for an illegal substance or as proceeds of an illegal drug transaction, n12 and applies to real property that is purchased with proceeds that are traceable to an illegal transaction. n13

Three standards exist for determining whether property is subject to forfeiture:

- (1) the substantial connection test;
- (2) the minimal connection test; and
- (3) the probable cause standard.

The "substantial connection" test requires the government to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that a substantial connection existed between the property and the criminal activity. n14 The minimal connection test is easier for the government to meet, as use of the property in any manner connected with an illegal drug transaction is sufficient to justify the forfeiture. n15

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals has adopted a probable cause standard, under which the government must present evidence that shows more than mere suspicion, but less than prima facie proof that the property was used to facilitate an illegal transaction. n16

[3] The Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO)

[a] In General

The Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO) requires divestiture of legitimate businesses involved in racketeering. n17 Any person who is convicted of investing, acquiring control of, or conducting an enterprise with, money derived from a pattern of racketeering activity is subject to the provisions of the Act. The term "enterprise" is construed to include virtually everybody and every type of business. n18 To establish a "pattern" of racketeering activity, the government must show at least two years of racketeering activity that occurred within ten years of each other. n19 The forfeiture provision applies to any interests in property that a RICO defendant may possess. n20 The entity itself may be a legitimate business, but if it is operated "directly or indirectly" as a criminal enterprise, then all of its assets may be subject to forfeiture. n21

[b] Standards for Forfeiture

Under RICO, the standard for forfeiture of property is whether or not the property is part of a criminal enterprise. n22 In addition, the government employs a relation-back doctrine under the Act. Once the government proves that the property was used to further an illegal drug transaction or that the property was purchased with funds from an illegal transaction, the government is deemed to have title to the property interest from the date of the illegal transaction. This doctrine serves to cut off the mortgagee, owner, or lessor who acquired the lien or ownership interest after the date of the illegal transaction. n23

[c] Defenses to Forfeiture

Under RICO, a statutory defense is provided for any owner in the subject property who establishes that the illegal activity occurred without the knowledge or consent of the owner. n24 The word "owner" includes virtually anyone who owns an interest in the property. n25 In a civil forfeiture, an innocent owner need not be a bona fide purchaser for value. n26

The "innocent owner" defense is available to an owner who can show (1) that it "was uninvolved in and unaware of the wrongful activity," and (2) that it "had done all that reasonably could be expected to prevent prescribed use of the property." n27 The owner is not innocent if the owner simply chose to ignore the use of the property; the owner must prove that it lacked actual knowledge of the misconduct. n28 Therefore, the owner, lender, lessor, or an agent of one of these should investigate its borrower or lessee and the property in order to satisfy the first prong of the ownership defense.

The second criterion for the ownership defense is that the defendant must show that it did all that reasonably could be expected to prevent the illegal use of the property. Therefore, owners and lessees should establish procedures for the investigation of borrowers and lessees and follow them faithfully in order to prevent illegal use of the property, if possible, and to establish a record that would enable it to claim the innocent owner defense. n29

While the "innocent owner" defense offers some comfort to real estate professionals and mortgage lenders, the costs of defending a forfeiture suit can be great. RICO provides that an owner's interest in real property will not be forfeited to the government if the owner is a transferee of the property from the criminal defendant and establishes that it is a bona fide purchaser for value of such property who, at the time of the purchase, was reasonably without cause to believe that the property was subject to forfeiture under RICO. n30 Therefore, it is suggested that owners, owner's agents, lenders, lessors and managing agents should take similar steps to investigate tenants.

[4] Rights of Mortgagees

Mortgage lenders may unknowingly finance property that has been, or will be, used for an illegal act. The Takings Clause of the 5th Amendment to the United States Constitution n31 has been utilized in cases where a mortgagee's interest becomes unenforceable. n32

The mortgagee must be an "innocent owner" n33 and must convince the court that a "taking" has occurred. The court must then determine the fair market value of the mortgage at the time of the taking. Some courts allow interest to accrue until the sale date, n34 while others cut off the interest accrual date as of the first illegal act, reasoning that to do otherwise would adversely affect the government's interest. n35 If the mortgage documents allow, some courts have awarded attorneys' fees and court costs to prevailing mortgagees. n36 An unsecured creditor has no standing to challenge a forfeiture. n37

[5] Forfeiture Procedures

The U.S. Attorney's office may bring an action for forfeiture under the Comprehensive Crime Control Act by filing a complaint in the United States District Court. n38 If the court finds probable cause to support an action against the identified property, the court will issue an order authorizing a warrant for the arrest (seizure). n39 The government must also provide public notice of the action and arrest in a newspaper for general circulation in the district. The claim must be filed within ten days after the warrant is served for the arrest of the property or within the time specified in the public notice. If the claim is not filed timely, the interest in the property may be lost. n40

Under RICO, the government commences a criminal procedure by filing an order for forfeiture with the federal district court in which the defendant was convicted of a RICO violation. n41 After the entry of the order, the government will publish a notice of its intent to dispose of the property. n42 The claimant must petition the court for a hearing to adjudicate the validity of its alleged interest in the property within thirty days of the final publication notice or its receipt of actual notice, whichever is earlier. n43 Failure to timely petition may result in loss of all interest in the property.

[6] Broker Guidelines

Real estate brokers may want to protect themselves when they act as agents for an innocent owner, lender, or landlord. Following are some guidelines for achieving this goal:

- (1) substantiate sources of income of the tenant or prospective purchaser;
- (2) note whether or not a proposed tenant or purchaser has a large income and little experience, education, or skills;

(3) search the chain of title by obtaining a report from a title company and investigate any unusual conveyances, particularly property held for a short period of time;

(4) inquire about the source of any downpayments, deposits, or large pre-payments of rent;

(5) note cash payments for real property and the source of that cash;

(6) check two of the premises periodically to determine whether or not the property is operated as a "front" for criminal activity when possible;

(7) when possible, interview employees of the premises and discuss business with the employees of the premises;

(8) obtain financial statements from all prospective tenants and, if possible, purchasers; and

(9) investigate tax returns from three years prior.

PART V Other Issues Affecting Brokers

CHAPTER 14 Federal Laws Affecting Real Estate Brokers *

10A-14 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 14.15

§ 14.15 Interstate Land Sales Full Disclosure Act

[1] Purpose of the Act

The Interstate Land Sales Full Disclosure Act n1 (the ILSFDA or the Act) was enacted as part of the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1968. n2 This Act addressed wholesale interstate land fraud during the 1960s, in which unscrupulous promoters sold undesirable real estate such as Florida swampland, onto unsuspecting and ill-informed investors and consumers. n3 The Act is a consumer protection statute designed to prohibit and punish fraud in land development enterprises. n4

ILSFDA requires that developers provide disclosures in advance of a purchaser signing the sales contract. n5 Similar to the securities laws, n6 this Act is an anti-fraud statute that uses disclosure as its primary tool to protect purchasers from unscrupulous sales of undeveloped home sites. n7 Congress intended to ensure that prior to purchasing certain types of real estate, a buyer was apprised of the information needed in order to make an informed decision. n8 Courts have held that the Act should be liberally interpreted in order to prohibit and punish fraud in certain land development enterprises. n9 Exemptions to the Act are narrowly construed in order to further the Act's purpose of consumer protection. n10

The Act applies to any developer who directly or indirectly uses any means or instrument of transportation or communication in interstate commerce. n11 Arguments that ILSFDA applies only to raw, undeveloped land have been rejected. The Act's legislative history indicates that Congress was concerned with the sale of undeveloped lots pursuant to a common promotional plan. While Congress may have been primarily concerned with the sale of raw land, this Act applies to all lots, but provides an exemption for improved land on which a residential, commercial, condominium, or industrial building exists or where the contract of sale obligates the seller to erect such a structure within two years. n12 As discussed in § 14.15[7], below, there are several other exemptions.

Purchasers can pursue actions against the developer or the developer's agent. n13 This section will refer to the seller or developer. It should be understood, however, that agents are likewise subject to potential liability under the Act. n14

An ILSFDA claim does not require evidence of a duty. n15 Instead, a purchaser must show that the Act applied to the transaction in question and that the developer did not meet the ILSFDA's specific reporting, notice, or conduct requirements. n16 The consumer can unconditionally rescind the purchase and receive a refund of any monies paid for some ILSFDA violations. n17 This is a powerful remedy. This particular remedy makes the Act of particular interest to consumers who have purchased a covered property during a period when real estate prices are declining. n18 Some consumers suffering from buyer's remorse during the recession which began in December 2007, have sought to rescind their purchase contracts due to a developer's carelessness in not complying with this Act.

Lenders who finance subdivisions should also be concerned with borrower compliance with the Act. A failure to comply with the Act which leads to multiple rescissions of purchase agreements can jeopardize loan repayment. During a recession, the developer may be unable to resell these lots. Even if the developer is able to resell the lots in a reasonable time period, the price may be greatly reduced from the price in the rescinded sales contract. When a lender's borrower is relying upon the two-year exemption, the lender should be aware of the consequences of its borrower failing to qualify for this exemption. The lender should also realize that the developer may allege that the lender was responsible for the developer's failure to timely complete the project.

Developers are advised to determine their duties and obligations under this Act, if any, prior to marketing or selling any "lot" in a "subdivision" through interstate commerce. n19 Each of these terms is defined under the Act. These terms are discussed in the next subsection. Building and selling a large number of residential buildings does not ensure that a developer knows of this Act. Real estate licensees should not assume that an experienced developer is aware of this Act. n20

Although the ILSFDA applies to the sale or lease of non-exempt lots, this section will usually refer only to the sale of lots. Readers should remember, however, that lease transactions are also covered by the Act. The regulations under the Act provide that the term "sale" "means "any obligation or arrangement for consideration to purchase or lease a lot directly or indirectly." The regulations also state that the terms "sale" or "seller" include in their meanings the terms "lease" and "lessor." n21

[2] Defined Terms

These eleven terms are defined in the ILSFDA at 15 U.S.C. § 1701: (1) Secretary, (2) person, (3) subdivision, (4) common promotional plan, (5) developer, (6) agent, (7) blanket encumbrance, (8) interstate commerce, (9) State, (10) purchaser and (11) offer. Each term is a term of art under the Act. Some additional terms are defined by regulation. n22

This Act is administered by the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD). The term "Secretary" refers to the Secretary of HUD. n23 Within HUD, there is an Office of Real Estate Settlement and Procedures Act (RESPA) & Interstate Land Sales. n24

The term "developer" means "any person who, directly or indirectly, sells or leases, or offers to sell or lease, or advertises for sale or lease any lots in a subdivision." n25 Despite this broad definition, not all sellers of lots will fall within this definition. Lenders are often excluded from this definition. n26 However, the term developer has been found to include a lender whose involvement with a developer had exceeded the lender's ordinary course of business. For example, a commercial bank that held itself out as a financial backer of a subdivision development exceeded its ordinary course of dealing. When a financial institution allows its name to be used in advertisements or announcements for a development, it is lending its prestige and good name to the sales effort. Such conduct is participation to an unacceptable degree in the marketing of the project. n27

When the developer is a corporation, officers and directors of the corporation can be considered developers under the Act when they are personally involved in the sale of the lots. However, simply being a corporate officer or director does not result in liability under the Act; the corporate officer or director must be personally involved in the fraud which gives rise to the liability. n28

A "subdivision" is "any land which is located in any State or in a foreign country and is divided or is proposed to be divided into lots, whether contiguous or not, for the purpose of sale or lease as part of a common promotional plan." n29

ILSFDA provisions repeatedly refer to the sale or lease of "lots." This term is defined by regulation as "any portion, piece, division, unit, or undivided interest in land located in any State or foreign country, if the interest includes the right to the exclusive use of a specific portion of the land." n30

Although the Act does not define the term "condominium" or explicitly state that condominiums are covered by the Act, HUD and the courts have consistently interpreted this Act's reach to include the sale of condominium units. n31 Courts that have addressed this issue hold that the plain vanilla residential condominium falls squarely within the definition of "lots" under the Act. n32 These courts have relied on the fact that the Department of Housing and Urban Development has long considered condominium units to be "lots" within the meaning of the Act. n33

While condominium units are generally considered "lots" within the meaning of the Act, not all real estate subjected to the condominium form of property ownership will qualify as a lot under the Act. For example, nonresidential condominium hotel units were found not to qualify as lots under the Act, because these hotel interests were different from traditional condominium units. The unit owners had occupancy rights for fourteen days per year and the units were encumbered with use restrictions which made it clear that the owners were dedicating their units for use as rental hotel rooms. Given the use restrictions and the nonresidential, business purpose of the hotel units, these condominium units were not properly considered condominiums, and therefore they were not "lots" within the meaning of the Act. n34

The relevance of lots sold pursuant to a common promotional plan is that such lots are considered to be a subdivision under the ILSFDA. n35 The HUD guidelines state that a common promotional plan is any plan undertaken by a single developer or a group of developers acting together to offer lots for sale or lease. A common promotional plan is presumed to exist if land is offered by a developer or a group of developers acting in concert and the land is contiguous or is known, designated, or advertised as a common development or by a common name. n36 The number of lots covered by each individual offering has no bearing on whether or not there is a common promotional plan. n37

The HUD guidelines advise that these are the characteristics that are evaluated in determining the existence of a common promotional plan: a 10% or greater common ownership; same or similar name or identity; common sales agents; common sales facilities; common advertising; and common inventory. These are not exclusive factors. The presence of one or more of the characteristics does not necessarily denote a common promotional plan. Conversely, the absence of a characteristic does not demonstrate that there is no common promotional plan. n38

In one case, a common promotional plan was found even though the lots were located in non-contiguous subdivisions. The lands were known collectively by one or two common names, were offered in aggregate newspaper advertisements, and were sold through one sales office by salesmen who had authority to sell parcels from any of the various developments and who frequently showed parcels from several developments to a single purchaser. The court found that this sales scheme fell "easily" within the Act's regulation. n39

Common ownership or developers acting in concert are essential elements of a common promotional plan. However, common ownership alone would not constitute a common promotional plan. HUD considers the involvement of all principals holding a 10 percent or greater interest in the subdivision to determine whether there is a thread of common ownership. If there is common ownership or if the developers are acting in concert, and there is common advertising, sales agents or sales office, a common promotional plan is presumed to exist. n40

The HUD guidelines observe that the phrase common promotional plan is misunderstood by those who believe that promotion implies an enthusiastic sales campaign. Instead, any method used to attract potential purchasers is a promotional plan. These guidelines state that direct mail campaigns and free dinners may be the promotional plan of one developer while another developer's promotion may be limited to classified advertisements in a local newspaper. n41

The guidelines also state that brokers selling lots as an agent for any person who is required to register under the Act are also required to comply with the Act's requirements for those sales. Brokers selling lots for different individuals who do not own enough lots to come within the Act's jurisdiction generally would not be considered to be offering lots pursuant to a common promotional plan as long as they are merely receiving the usual real estate commission for such sales. n42 If the broker has an ownership interest in the lots or is receiving a greater than normal real estate commission, the broker may be offering lots pursuant to common promotional plan and may be required to comply with the Act's requirements. n43

[3] Anti-Fraud Provisions

ILSFDA's anti-fraud provision states in relevant part that with respect to the sale of any lot not exempt under 15 U.S.C. § 1702(a), n44 it is unlawful for any developer or agent, directly or indirectly, to obtain money or property in connection with a development by fraud or by means of a material false statement or any omission of a material fact necessary to make the statements made not misleading. n45 The regulations that implement the anti-fraud provisions are found at 24 C.F.R. Part 1715, subpart B.

Pursuant to 15 U.S.C. § 1711(a)(2), a three-year limitations period applies to actions brought under the anti-fraud provisions. The limitations period begins to run from the date of discovery of the violation, or the date on which discovery should have been made by the exercise of reasonable diligence. n46

Statements that are opinions or exaggerations concerning the qualities of a developer's project constitute non-actionable puffery rather than fraud. n47

[4] Regulations and HUD Guidelines

The Department of Housing and Urban Development is the agency responsible for administration of this Act. n48 HUD has been granted authority to promulgate rules and regulations relating to the ILSFDA. n49 Regulations implementing the Act are found at 24 C.F.R. Parts 1710, 1715 and 1720.

In 1979, the HUD Secretary published an interpretive rule regarding ILSFDA entitled "Guidelines for Exemptions Available under the Interstate Land Sales Full Disclosure Act." n50 That rule was superceded in 1984 n51 and rescinded in 1996, as part of a streamlining process. n52 This information is currently found on the HUD website where it is titled, "Full Disclosure Act Exemptions." n53 These Guidelines state that they are intended to clarify HUD policies and positions with regard to the statutory exemptions, and that the Guidelines are an interpretive rule and not a substantive regulation.

Courts accord deferential treatment to HUD's ILSFDA regulations. n54

[5] Subdivision Registration and Disclosures

When a developer's project is covered by ILSFDA, the developer must produce extensive material about contracts, the homeowners association and a detailed printed property report. n55 Developers must register their subdivisions with the Secretary of the Department of Housing and Urban Development. n56 Registration is accomplished by filing a statement of record which meets the Act's requirements. n57 The developer must also pay a fee to the HUD Secretary with this registration. n58

The Act specifically requires that land developers engaged in certain interstate sales or leases file a public statement of record for subdivisions of 100 or more lots with the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) unless the lots are subject to an exemption. n59 A copy of a printed property report must be provided to the purchaser

prior to the purchaser signing a sales contract with respect to a nonexempt lot. n60The printed property report is a condensed version of the statement of record filed with HUD. n61 It is unlawful for the developer of a covered subdivision to make use of interstate commerce or the mails to sell or lease any lot in a covered subdivision unless a statement of record with respect to such lot is in effect and a printed property report is furnished to the purchaser in advance of the signing of any contract or agreement for sale or lease by the purchaser. n62

Pursuant to 15 U.S.C. § 1705, the statement of record must contain the following information and be accompanied by these documents:

- (1) the name and address of each person with an interest in the lots in the subdivision to be covered by the statement of record and the extent of such interest;
- (2) a legal description of, and a statement of the total area included in the subdivision and a statement of the topography, together with a map showing the division proposed and the dimensions of the lots to be covered by the statement of record and their relation to existing streets and roads;
- (3) a statement of the condition of the title to the land comprising the subdivision, including all encumbrances and deed restrictions and covenants;
- (4) a statement of the general terms and conditions, including the range of selling prices or rents at which the developer proposes to dispose of the subdivision lots;
- (5) a statement of the present condition of the subdivision access, the existence of any unusual conditions relating to noise or safety which affect the subdivision and are known to the developer, the availability of sewage disposal facilities and other public utilities (including water, electricity, gas, and telephone facilities) in the subdivision, the proximity in miles of the subdivision to nearby municipalities, and the nature of improvements to be installed by the developer and the estimated schedule for completion;
- (6) in the case of any subdivision or portion thereof against which there exists a blanket encumbrance, a statement of the consequences for an individual purchaser of a failure, by the person or persons bound, to fulfill obligations under the instrument(s) creating such encumbrance and the steps, if any, taken to protect the purchaser in such eventuality;
- (7) (A) copy of its articles of incorporation, with all amendments, if the developer is a corporation; (B) copies of all instruments by which the trust is created or declared, if the developer is a trust; (C) copies of its articles of partnership or association and all papers pertaining to its organization, if the developer is a partnership, unincorporated association, joint stock company, or any other form of organization; and (D) if the purported holder of legal title is a person other than developer, copies of these documents for such person;
- (8) copies of the deed or other instrument establishing title to the subdivision in the developer or other person and copies of any instrument creating a lien or encumbrance upon the title or copies of the opinion or opinions of counsel in respect to the title to the subdivision in the developer or other person or copies of the title insurance policy guaranteeing such title;
- (9) copies of all conveyance forms to be used in selling or leasing lots to purchasers;
- (10) copies of instruments creating easements or other restrictions;
- (11) certified and uncertified financial statements of the developer as the Secretary may require; and

(12) other information and documents and certifications as the Secretary may require as being reasonably necessary or appropriate for the protection of purchasers. n63

The ILSFDA provides that if a developer fails to furnish the property report to the purchaser in advance of the latter's execution of the purchase agreement, the contract may be revoked at the purchaser's option within two years from the date of such signing, and the contract must clearly provide notice of this right. n64 The purchaser's option to rescind in this situation has been called an "absolute, unfettered right." n65

HUD's website allows users to search for approved subdivisions and developers by name and state. n66

[6] Purchaser's Right of Revocation

Pursuant to 15 U.S.C. § 1703(b), the purchaser of a non-exempt lot may, at his or her option, for a limited time revoke the sales contract. This right generally runs until midnight of the seventh day following the signing of the contract. The contract must clearly advise the purchaser of this right.

Pursuant to 15 U.S.C. § 1703(c), this right of revocation is extended to two years from the date a sales contract was signed and the purchaser incurs an obligation, if the seller was required to provide the purchaser with a property report and the seller failed to do so prior to the signing of the contract.

A buyer's revocation of a purchase agreement need not be done in writing. n67 A developer's attempt to contractually require a written revocation will not be enforced. n68 However, HUD recommends that the buyer who cancels the contract in person or by telephone, "immediately confirm the cancellation by certified mail." n69

The moment a purchaser signs a sales contract and incurs obligations is the moment when a purchaser should receive ILSFDA protection, either in the form of the developer's obligations to provide information before that moment, or alternatively, in the form of purchaser rights that exist as of that time. n70

Section § 1703(d) provides a two-year period in which a purchaser can revoke a contract for a lot which is not exempt under 15 U.S.C. § 1702, when the contract omits certain terms intended to act as safeguards for the purchaser. n71 These safeguards require a specific description of the lot being purchased and require that the purchaser be informed as to the consequences and remedies of default by either the buyer or the seller. n72 These disclosures must be made prior to the execution of a sales contract. n73 The language, "not exempt under section 1702" has been held to mean that this two-year right of revocation does not apply to the sale of any lot that is exempt from any provision of the Act under § 1702. n74 Thus, if the sale of a lot is exempt from any ILSFDA provision under § 1702, then the sale is also exempt from the right of revocation granted in § 1703(d). n75

When a purchaser revokes a contract pursuant to the Act, the purchaser is entitled to receive all money the purchaser paid under the sales contract. n76 In order to exercise this right of revocation, the purchaser must tender to the seller an instrument conveying his or her rights and interests in the lot. The lot must be in a condition which is substantially similar to the condition in which it was conveyed to the purchaser. n77

One court has held that a purchaser was entitled to receive a refund of all monies paid to the seller, including amounts paid for option upgrades to the lot. n78 If the purchaser has lived in the lot, the purchaser is still entitled to a refund of all monies paid to the seller; the seller is not due any setoff for the rental value of the lot. n79

[7] Exemptions

[a] Introduction

Not every lot sale is subject to the Act. n80 The ILSFDA provides several exemptions to its registration and disclosure requirements. n81 The statutory exemptions are found in subsections (a) and (b) of § 1702. A developer cannot avail itself of these exemptions if the method of disposition is adopted for purposes of evading the Act. n82 A developer must act pursuant to a legitimate business purpose when seeking to fall within an exemption to the Act. n83

These are the exemptions under subsection (a) of § 1702:

- (1) the twenty-five lots exemption;
- (2) the improved lot exemption;
- (3) the evidence of indebtedness exemption (involving the sale of evidences of indebtedness secured by a mortgage or deed of trust on real estate);
- (4) the securities exemption (involving sale of securities issued by a real estate investment trust);
- (5) the government sales exemption (involving the sale or lease of real estate by any government or government agency); n84
- (6) the cemetery lots exemption;
- (7) the sale to builders exemption; and
- (8) the industrial or commercial development exemption.

These are the exemptions under subsection (b) of § 1702:

- (1) the one hundred lot exemption;
- (2) the twelve lot exemption;
- (3) the scattered site exemption;
- (4) the twenty-acre lot exemption;
- (5) the single-family residence exemption;
- (6) the mobile home exemption;
- (7) the intrastate exemption; and
- (8) the Metropolitan Statistical Area (MSA) Exemption.

There is an important difference between the exemptions listed in 15 U.S.C. § 1702(a) and the exemptions found in § 1702(b). The exemption provisions in § 1702(a) create an exemption from the ILSFDA in its entirety, including the anti-fraud provisions found in § 1703(a)(2). The exemption provisions in § 1702(b), however, only create an exemption from the ILSFDA's registration and disclosure requirements. n85 Lots covered by a § 1702(b) exemption are subject to the anti-fraud provisions. Section 1702(a) has been described as providing full statutory exemptions, while § 1702(b) has been described as providing partial statutory exemptions which discharge a developer from ILSFDA's disclosure and registration requirements, but not its anti-fraud provisions. n86

In addition to these statutory exemptions, HUD has the authority to create rules or regulations exempting lots from provisions of the Act. n87

A developer who is uncertain as to whether a project qualifies for an exemption can seek an Exemption Order pursuant to 24 C.F.R. § 1710.16. A developer can also seek an Advisory Opinion which is a formal written opinion of the Secretary as to jurisdiction in a particular case or the applicability of an exemption under 24 C.F.R. §§ 1710.5 through 1710.15, based on facts submitted to the Secretary. The instructions and format for obtaining an Advisory Opinion are contained in 24 C.F.R. § 1710.17 n88 and in part VIII of the HUD guidelines. n89 Another option is for a developer to seek a No Action Letter. The regulation addressing a No Action Letter states in part, "If the sale of lots is subject to the registration requirements of the Act but the circumstances of the sale are such that no affirmative action to enforce the registration requirements is needed to protect the public interest or prospective purchasers, the Secretary may issue a No Action Letter." n90

[b] Non-Binding Reservation Agreements and Undivided Interests

HUD guidelines indicate that non-binding reservation agreements do not trigger the Act's requirements. The HUD guidelines define a reservation agreement as "a non-binding agreement used to gauge market feasibility for a developer through which a potential purchaser expresses an interest to buy or lease a lot or unit at some time in the future." n91 A reservation agreement that can become a sales contract by virtue of some future event occurring at the seller's discretion will not qualify as an exempt non-binding reservation agreement. n92 An option agreement will not qualify as a non-binding reservation agreement since an option agreement is an arrangement for consideration in which a potential purchaser could forfeit money. n93

Also excluded from the Act's reach are the sales of undivided interests that do not carry with them the right of exclusive use of a specific lot. The HUD guidelines give this example of a sale of an undivided interest: a camping subdivision is sold as 400 undivided interests to tenants in common, where purchasers have a co-extensive, non-exclusive right to the use and enjoyment of all campsites on a space available basis and no purchaser has an expressed or implied exclusive right to repeatedly use or occupy any specific campsite. This camping subdivision would not be covered by the Act. n94

[c] Exemptions under 15 U.S.C. § 1702(a)

The following subsections will consider the two exemptions under 15 U.S.C. § 1702(a) which are used by developers.

[i] Twenty-Five Lot Exemption

The twenty-five lot exemption is found in 15 U.S.C. § 1702(a)(1). The HUD guidelines state that this subsection exempts the sale of lots in a subdivision that contains fewer than 25 lots. If a subdivision contains 25 or more lots, but fewer than 25 of those lots are offered for sale under a common promotional plan, those sales would be exempt. The guidelines give this example: in a subdivision of 28 lots in which 4 lots are not offered for sale because they are permanently dedicated to the public for a park, the sale of the remaining 24 lots is exempt. n95

If fewer than 25 lots are acquired in a larger subdivision, the offer of these lots may be subject to the Act if the acquiring party is acting in concert with the previous or current developer of the balance of the subdivision. Correspondingly, if fewer than 25 lots are acquired in a larger subdivision, the offer of the lots may be exempt if there is neither an identity of interest between the acquiring party and the previous or current developer nor any form of concerted action that constitutes a common promotional plan. n96

Since the fewer than 25 lots exemption is based upon the number of lots as opposed to the number of sales, resales of a lot are not counted toward the fewer than 25 lots limit. n97

[ii] Improved Lot Exemption

The improved lot exemption is found at 15 U.S.C. § 1702(a)(2). n98 This exemption applies: (1) to the sale of any improved land on which there is a residential, commercial, or industrial building, or (2) the sale of land under a contract obligating the seller to erect such a building thereon within a period of two years. For purposes of the ILSFDA, a sale occurs when the purchaser signs the contract and incurs an obligation. n99

The purchaser's signature on a contract and incurrance of an obligation commences the two-year period for purposes of the improved lot exemption. n100 The developer's subsequent signature or ratification of the contract does not extend this two-year time period under the improved lot exemption as it is not the triggering event which commences the mandatory two-year building requirement. n101 The seller is not allowed to specify in the contract the date from which the two-year period is to commence. n102

Under the two-year completion exemption, the developer must have an unconditional commitment to complete construction within two years. n103 This is the prevailing view which has been applied uniformly by the courts which have addressed this issue. n104 Any qualification of this obligation or limitation on the consumer's remedies which renders the obligation illusory will disqualify the sale from the protection of this exemption. n105 The HUD guidelines state:

The contract must not allow nonperformance by the seller at the seller's discretion. Contracts that permit the seller to breach virtually at will are viewed as unenforceable because the construction obligation is not an obligation in reality. Thus, for example, a clause that provides for a refund of the buyer's deposit if the seller is unable to close for reasons normally within the seller's control is not acceptable for use under this exemption. Similarly, contracts that directly or indirectly waive the buyer's right to specific performance are treated as lacking a realistic obligation to construct. HUD's position is not that a right to specific performance of construction must be expressed in the contract, but that any such right that purchasers have must not be negated. For example, a contract that provides for a refund or a damage action as the buyer's sole remedy would not be acceptable.

Contract provisions which allow for nonperformance or for delays of construction completion beyond the two-year period are acceptable if such provisions are legally recognized as defenses to contract actions in the jurisdiction where the building is being erected. For example, provisions to allow time extensions for events or occurrences such as acts of God, casualty losses or material shortages are generally permissible. Also permissible, in the case of multi-unit construction, is a clause conditioning the completion of construction or closing of title on a certain percentage of sales of other units. The presale period cannot exceed 180 days from the date the first purchaser signs a contract in the project or, in a phased project, from the date the first purchaser signs a sales contract in a phase. Such a clause may not extend the overall two-year obligation to construct. n106

Typically a developer's obligation will be considered illusory if the purchase agreement denies the buyer basic contractual remedies such as specific performance. n107 One court stated that the issue in examining the provisions of the sales contract is whether the contractual language in question eviscerates the seller's obligation to complete construction within the two-years within the meaning of the Act. n108 Such an evisceration can occur through language excusing the developer's delay in performance or language which limits the buyer's remedies.

While federal law governs the interpretation of ILSFDA, state contract law determines whether the seller is obligated to complete construction within two years. n109 In determining whether an obligation to build within a two-year period is real or illusory, courts distinguish between recognized defenses to nonperformance and limitations of remedies; the former typically will not render the obligation illusory while the latter may result in a finding that the obligation is illusory. n110 The requirement that this obligation be real does not require that the seller provide an unconditional guarantee which imposes strict liability for noncompliance since strict liability for completion is not necessary to prevent the fraud the Act is intended to prevent. n111 The fact that there are limited defenses for the developer's non-performance does not render the developer's obligation to perform within two years a nullity and hence illusory. n112

While the doctrine of impossibility of performance may prevent a developer's obligation to perform from being considered illusory, n113 if knowledge of the facts making performance impossible were available to the promisor before execution of the contract, the defense of impossibility is unavailable. n114 A legal impossibility exists only if the supervening event is not foreseeable. n115

Courts have strictly enforced the requirement that an obligation to build not be illusory. For example, a contract which limits the consumer's sole remedy to the return of his or her deposit eliminates the consumer's ability to enforce the developer's promise to complete construction within two years. n116 A developer who uses this type of provision will not qualify for the improved lot exemption. n117 A force majeure clause which limits exclusions to events beyond the seller's control and not within the seller's discretion, should result in a contract which "obligates" the seller to complete construction within the two-year period for purposes of the Act. n118

In considering the obligation to complete construction within the two-year period for purposes of compliance with the Act, it is irrelevant that construction is actually completed within the two-year period. n119 The issue is whether the obligation in the parties' contract was an unconditional obligation. n120

Not all restrictions on remedies will render an obligation illusory. For example, a limitation on recovering punitive damages would not render the obligation illusory because punitive damages are usually not recoverable for a breach of contract. A limitation on the recovery of special damages, however, would render the obligation illusory. n121 Furthermore, in some cases, contract provisions which have stated a remedy, but which have not limited the buyer to that remedy have been found to be acceptable in the context of the Act's improved lot exemption. n122

A savings clause will not prevent a contract with an illusory obligation provision from violating the act. One court to consider this issue stated that giving effect to developer's purported savings clause would encourage other developers to include the broadest list of potential all-encompassing excuses to extend completion dates beyond two years, and simply tack on a savings clause to avoid losing the exemption in the event the developer's contractual obligation was challenged under the Act. n123

[i] One Hundred Lot Exemption

The one hundred lot exemption is found in 15 U.S.C. § 1702(b)(1). Regulations addressing this exemption are found at 24 C.F.R. § 1710.6. The sale of lots in a subdivision is generally exempt from the Act's registration requirements if the subdivision contains fewer than 100 lots. The HUD guidelines indicate that the 100 lot count for purposes of the exemption excludes lots that are exempt from jurisdiction under 24 C.F.R. § 1710.5 (b) through (h). These other exemptions can be "piggybacked" onto the 100 lot exemption. n124 However, the 25 lot exemption discussed at § 4A.09[7][c][i], above, cannot be used in connection with the 100 lot exemption. n125 The HUD guidelines give the following example:

[A] developer of a subdivision containing a total of 129 lots ... qualifies for this exemption if at least 30 lots are sold in transactions that are exempt because the lots had completed homes erected on them.

The 30 exempt transactions may fall within any one exemption or a combination of exemptions noted in § 1710.5 (b) through (h) and may be either past or future sales. ... [T]he developer also could qualify if twelve lots had been sold with residential structures already erected on them, nine lots had been sold to building contractors and at least nine lots were reserved for either the construction of homes by the developer or for sales to building contractors. The reserved lots need not be specifically identified. n126

The 100 lot exemption applies to the number of the lots as opposed to the number of sales. Consequently, resales of a lot will not count toward the 100 lot limit. However, any sale or resale of a lot must comply with the anti-fraud provisions. n127

Developers who intend to piggy-back or stack another exemption onto the one hundred lot exemption must ensure that the requirements of both exemptions are met. Developers should also realize that there is a conflict of authority with respect to piggy-backing these exemptions. In 200 East Partners, LLC v. Gold, n128 the court stated that because the developer failed to "perfect" an exemption for all units of its 115 lot project prior to the plaintiffs executing their purchase agreements, the developer had violated ILSFDA by failing to provide the plaintiffs with a printed property report. n129 The developer in this case had obtained an Advisory Opinion from HUD approving of its piggy-back plan to use both the improved lot exemption and the one hundred lot exemption. This court appeared to believe that the developer had acted to evade the Act. n130

The perfection approach of the court in 200 East Partners, LLC v. Gold with respect to the piggy-backing or stacking of exemptions involving the one hundred lot exemption was criticized and rejected by the court in Bodansky v. Fifth on the Park Condo, LLC. n131 This court considered a 157-unit project. This developer knew nothing about ILSFDA when it began the project and thus the court found that this developer could not have had a plan to evade the Act. When the purchasers attempted to rescind their purchase agreements, the developer claimed that its sales were exempt from the Act under § 1702(a)(2) (improved lot exemption) and § 1702(b)(1) (one hundred lot exemption). This court found that the plain meaning of § 1702(b)(1) was that as long as the subdivision contained fewer than one hundred non-exempt lots, then the Act's registration and disclosure requirements did not apply to the sale of lots in that subdivision. The court found that the hundred lot exemption can still apply to a subdivision containing one hundred or more lots as long as all lots sold above the ninety-nine non-exempt lots maximum will be covered by a § 1702(a) exemption. The buyers in this case had argued that the one hundred lot exemption applied only if when the purchase agreement was signed, fewer than one hundred non-exempt lots were offered for sale in the subdivision. This court concluded that a violation of ILSFDA occurs when a developer sells one hundred or more non-exempt units in a condominium development, rather than when a developer offers for sale more than one hundred non-exempt units. n132

With respect to "perfecting" an exemption, the Bodansky court stated:

[T]he 200 East court's interpretation of § 1702(b)(1) is unsupported by the text of the statute. The court's decision in 200 East does not explain how the text of § 1702(b)(1) justifies a rule that a developer must "perfect" an exemption "prior" to the signing of any purchase agreement, much less what "perfecting" an exemption under ILSA would require. The notion that an exemption must be "perfected" at the time any particular purchase agreement is executed misapprehends the self-determining nature of the ILSA exemptions. See 24 C.F.R. § 1710.4(d). Furthermore, despite the issue being a matter of first impression in Florida ... the court did not closely examine the text of § 1702(b)(1) or 24 C.F.R. § 1710.6. Although the court read HUD's Guidelines as not permitting a developer "to wait until the sale of a unit in excess of the first ninety-nine to qualify for an exemption for the remaining units," id., the court provided no textual support (or otherwise) for this interpretation. The 200 East court's interpretation of § 1702(b)(1) is thus unpersuasive. n133

The Bodansky court also concluded that a developer does not evade the ILSFDA by consciously acting to ensure that its subdivision meets the requirements of one or more exemptions. n134

The HUD guidelines state that if fewer than 100 lots are acquired in a larger subdivision, the offer of these lots will not be exempt if the acquiring party is acting in concert with the previous or current developer of the balance of the subdivision so as to create a common promotional plan for 100 or more lots unless sales of the other lots are otherwise exempt. However, if fewer than 100 lots are acquired in a larger subdivision, the offer of the lots may be exempt if there is neither an identity of interest between the acquiring party and the previous or current developer nor a form of concerted action constituting a common promotional plan. n135

The 100 lot exemption does not cap or otherwise limit the date of delivery, unlike the improved lot exemption found in 15 U.S.C. § 1702(a). n136

[ii] Twelve Lot Exemption

The twelve lot exemption is found in 15 U.S.C. § 1702(b)(2). Regulations for this exemption are found at 24 C.F.R. § 1710.7. The HUD guidelines state that this section exempts the sale of lots from the registration requirements of the Act if, beginning with the first sale after June 20, 1980, no more than twelve lots in the subdivision are sold in the subsequent 12-month period. Thereafter, the sale of the first twelve lots each period is exempt from the registration requirements if no more than twelve lots were sold in each previous 12-month period that began with the anniversary date of the first sale after June 20, 1980. The HUD guidelines give this example:

[I]f a developer's first lot sale after June 20, 1980 occurred on August 5, 1980 and no more than eleven additional lots in the subdivision were sold through August 4, 1981, the sales would be exempt. During the second year of operation under this exemption (beginning on August 5, 1981 in the example) at least the first twelve lot sales would be exempt. However, if lot sales exceed twelve in the second or any subsequent year, the exemption would terminate on the sale of the thirteenth lot. n137

Once eligibility has been terminated, the exemption is unavailable and cannot be recaptured by the same developer for the same subdivision even if there are fewer than twelve lots sold in subsequent years. n138 Thus, if there are more than 12 sales of lots in the second or any subsequent year, the exemption terminates on the sale of the 13th lot and may not be reinstated.

The HUD guidelines state that a developer may apply to the Secretary to establish a different twelve-month period for use in determining eligibility for the exemption, and the Secretary may allow the change if it is for good cause and consistent with the purpose of the exemption. n139

In determining eligibility for this exemption, all lots sold in the subdivision are included in the count, whether or not the lot is registered or the transaction is otherwise exempt, such as the sale of a home and lot package. This exemption extends to twelve lots, not twelve sales. Each lot would be counted in the sale of multiple lots. n140

[iii] Scattered Site Exemption

The scattered site exemption is found at 15 U.S.C. § 1702(b)(3). Regulations for this exemption are found at 24 C.F.R. § 1710.8. The HUD guidelines state that this section exempts from the Act's registration requirements the sale of lots in a subdivision consisting of noncontiguous parts if: (1) each noncontiguous part of the subdivision contains twenty or fewer lots; and (2) each purchaser or purchaser's spouse makes a personal, on-the-lot inspection of the lot purchased before signing a contract. n141

This exemption relieves the developers of small, scattered offerings of the requirement to register their subdivisions. The exemption may also apply to real estate brokers who have an ownership interest in more than one site, each containing 20 or fewer lots. Developers who rely on this exemption must understand the Act's definition of a subdivision, how a common promotional plan is determined and what constitutes a site. n142

Lots that are contiguous when they are originally platted or developed are considered to remain contiguous. For purposes of this exemption, interruptions such as roads, parks, small bodies of water or recreational facilities do not serve to break the contiguity of parts of a subdivision. n143

[iv] Twenty Acre Lots Exemption

The twenty acre lot exemption is found at 15 U.S.C. § 1702(b)(4). Regulations for this exemption are found at 24 C.F.R. § 1710.9. The HUD guidelines state that this section exempts the sale of lots in a subdivision from the registration requirements of the Act if, since April 28, 1969, each lot in the subdivision has contained at least twenty acres. In determining eligibility for the exemption, easements for ingress and egress or public utilities are considered part of the total acreage of the lot if the purchaser retains ownership of the property affected by the easement. n144

This exemption applies to the entire subdivision. Each lot in the subdivision must be twenty acres or larger in order for the subdivision to qualify. If a single lot offered in the subdivision is less than twenty acres in size, no lot in the subdivision qualifies for the exemption. If a developer has two sites which comprise the subdivision and only one of the sites contains lots that are all greater than twenty acres in size, the offering of these lots would not be exempt under this provision. All lots offered pursuant to a common promotional plan must be considered. n145

[v] Single-Family Residence Exemption

The single-family residence exemption is found at 15 U.S.C. § 1702(b)(5). Regulations for this exemption are found at 24 C.F.R. § 1710.10. The HUD guidelines state that this section provides an exemption for the sale of lots that are limited to single-family residential use. The guidelines advise developers to carefully review the eligibility requirements for this exemption. n146

Under this exemption, lots offered under the same common promotional plan must comply with these two eligibility requirements:

- (1) The subdivision must meet all local codes and standards.
- (2) In the promotion of the subdivision, there cannot be offers, by direct mail or telephone solicitation, of gifts, trips, or dinners or the use of similar promotional techniques to induce prospective purchasers to visit the subdivision or to purchase a lot. n147

To meet this exemption, the lot must be located within a municipality or county where the local government or the State specifies minimum standards in the following areas for the development of subdivision lots within its boundaries: lot dimensions; plat approval and recordation; roads and access; drainage; flooding; water supply; and sewage disposal. n148 Each lot must be either zoned for single-family residences or, in the absence of a zoning ordinance, limited exclusively by enforceable covenants or restrictions to single-family residences. Manufactured homes, townhouses, and residences for one-to-four family use are considered single-family residences for purposes of this exemption. n149

The lot must be on a paved street or highway which has been built to applicable state or local government standards. If the roads are to be public roads they must be acceptable to the local government that will be responsible for maintenance. If the street or highway is incomplete, the developer must post a bond or other surety acceptable to the municipality or county in the full amount of the cost of completing the street or highway to assure completion to local standards. n150

The local government or a homeowners association must have accepted or be obligated to accept the responsibility for maintaining the street or highway upon which the lot is located. If a homeowners association has accepted maintenance responsibility, the developer must, prior to signing of a contract or agreement to purchase, provide the purchaser with a good faith written estimate of the cost of carrying out this responsibility over the first ten years of ownership. n151

At closing, potable water, sanitary sewage disposal, and electricity must have been extended to the lot or the local government must be obligated to install the facilities within 180 days following closing. For subdivisions without a central water or sewage disposal system, there must be assurances that an adequate year-round potable water supply is available and that the lot is approved for the installation of a septic tank. n152

Under the single-family residence exemption, the sales contract must require delivery within 180 days after the signing of the sales contract of a warranty deed, which at the time of delivery is free from monetary liens and encumbrances. n153 At closing, a title insurance binder or title opinion reflecting the condition of title must be issued or presented to the purchaser showing that, subject only to exceptions which are approved in writing by the purchaser at the time of closing, marketable title to the lot is vested in the seller. n154 In addition, the purchaser or purchaser's spouse must make a personal, on-the-lot inspection of the lot purchased prior to signing a contract or agreement to purchase. n155

In order to qualify for this exemption, the sale must also comply with the Act's anti-fraud provisions. n156

[vi] Mobile Home Exemption

The mobile home exemption is found at 15 U.S.C. § 1702(b)(6). Regulations for this exemption are found at 24 C.F.R. § 1710.11. The HUD guidelines state that for purposes of this exemption, a mobile home is a unit receiving a label in conformance with HUD Regulations implementing the National Manufactured Housing Construction and Safety Standards Act of 1974. n157 This section exempts the sale of a mobile home lot from the registration requirements of the Act when certain eligibility requirements are met.

[vii] Intrastate Exemption

The intrastate exemption is found at 15 U.S.C. § 1702(b)(7). Regulations for this exemption are found at 24 C.F.R. § 1710.12. The HUD guidelines for this exemption state that the lot must be free and clear of all liens, encumbrances and adverse claims. Lots must meet six eligibility requirements in order to qualify for this exemption. n158

[viii] The Metropolitan Statistical Area Exemption

The Metropolitan Statistical Area (MSA) exemption is found at 15 U.S.C. § 1702(b)(8). Regulations for this exemption are found at 24 C.F.R. § 1710.13. This exemption covers the sale or lease of lots in a subdivision located in a MSA. The eligibility criteria for the MSA Exemption are similar to those of the intrastate exemption. n159

[e] Regulatory Exemptions

The Secretary has established several regulatory exemptions from the Act's registration and full disclosure requirements. These exemptions are self-determining and do not require a submission to HUD. If a sale meets any one of the regulatory exemptions, the sale qualifies for exemption from the Act's registration requirements. However, qualifying sales must comply with the anti-fraud provisions. n160

A developer must satisfy the eligibility criteria at all times in order to qualify for a regulatory exemption. Exempt status ends when a developer fails to immediately comply with the eligibility criteria. The Secretary may deny the use of the exemption by an otherwise eligible subdivision, site or lot if there are reasonable grounds to believe that the use of any of these regulatory exemptions is not in the public interest in a particular case. In such a case, the developer will be given notice and an opportunity for hearing before a final determination is made. The proceedings would follow the requirements stated in the regulations at 24 C.F.R. § 1720.105, et seq. and are patterned after the notice and time requirements of a proceeding pursuant to 24 C.F.R. § 1710.45(b)(1). n161

These regulatory exemptions are listed in 24 C.F.R. § 1710.14. Subsection (a) states that the following transactions are exempt from the Act's registration requirements unless the Secretary has properly terminated the exemption:

- (1) The sale of lots, each of which will be sold for less than $100, including closing costs, if the purchaser will not be required to purchase more than one lot.
- (2) The lease of lots for a term not to exceed five years if the terms of the lease do not obligate the lessee to renew.
- (3) The sale of lots to a person who is engaged in a bona fide land sales business.
- (4) The sale of a lot to a person who owns the contiguous lot which has a residential, commercial or industrial building on it.
- (5) The sale of real estate to a government or government agency.
- (6) The sale of a lot to a person who has leased and resided primarily on the lot for at least the year preceding the sale.

With respect to the regulatory exemption for the sale of lots to a person engaged in a bona fide land sales business, the HUD guidelines state that in order for a transaction to qualify for this exemption, the purchaser must be a person who plans to subsequently sell or lease the lot(s) in the normal course of business. The term business refers to an activity of some continuity, regularity and permanency, or means of livelihood. The sale or lease of lots to an individual who is buying the property for investment, to be sold at some unforeseeable time in the future, would not be exempt under this provision. This exemption is available on a lot-by-lot basis, although most transactions would include more than one lot. The entire subdivision need not qualify for this exemption. n162

[8] Remedies

ILSFDA provides courts with broad discretion to award a variety of remedies. The Act creates a private right of action for purchasers against developers who fail to comport with the disclosure and anti-fraud provisions of the Act. n163 In an ILSFDA action, in addition to revoking the contract, the court may order damages, specific performance, or such other relief as the court deems fair, just, and equitable. n164 When considering a remedy, the court may consider the contract price of the lot, the amount the purchaser actually paid, the cost of any improvements to the lot, the lot's fair market value when the relief is determined and the lot's fair market value at the time of purchase. n165 The court may also award interest, court costs, and reasonable amounts for attorneys' fees, independent appraisers' fees, and travel to and from the lot. n166

With respect to attorney's fees, the Act authorizes an award of reasonable attorney's fees to a purchaser or lessee. The award of such fees is not to the prevailing party. However, if state law requires the enforcement of a contract provision awarding attorney's fees to the prevailing party and the developer is the prevailing party under ILSFDA, the developer should be entitled to such an award. n167

[9] Statute of Limitations

The statute of limitations for ILSFDA claims is generally three years. n168 The commencement of the statute of limitations period depends on the type of violation being alleged. For some violations, the three-year period commences with the date of signing of the sales contract. For other violations, the three-year period commences upon discovery of the violation or after discovery should have been made by the exercise of reasonable diligence. n169

Some buyers who have failed to timely exercise their right of rescission within the two-year period of 15 U.S.C. § 1703(c) and (d), have tried to argue that the three-year statute of limitations period applies to this right of rescission when the developer failed to warn these buyers of their right to rescind. These arguments are generally unsuccessful. n170 Nothing in the Act states that a developer's failure to disclose the right to rescind in the purchase agreement obviates, tolls or extends the two-year deadline for rescission. n171 However, courts appear willing to consider the possibility that in certain circumstances, a developer's failure to provide the required notice of rescission rights might support a viable equitable tolling argument. n172

[10] Jurisdiction

United States District Courts and state courts are both granted jurisdiction over ILSFDA cases. n173 However, ILSFDA provides that if a case is brought in a State court of competent jurisdiction, the case cannot be removed to a federal court except where the United States or an officer or employee of the United States in his official capacity is a party. n174 Consequently, removal of most ILSFDA cases from a State court to a federal court is barred. n175

[11] Certification of Substantially Equivalent State Law

ILSFDA does not prevent or limit the authority of any State or local government to enact and enforce laws regarding land sales so long as those laws do not conflict with the Act. n176 There is no preemption in this area. n177

ILSFDA allows HUD to certify, and thereby adopt, a State law which is substantially equivalent to the federal act. n178 The Act's State law certification provision was designed to eliminate the burden on developers of duplicative State and federal registration requirements where the State standards equaled or exceeded the federal requirements. n179

ILSDA contains a procedure for obtaining State law certification. The State must apply to HUD, and a notice of the State's application must be published in the Federal Register for a thirty-day comment period. n180 The Secretary reviews the State's laws, regulations, and administrative procedures to determine if they meet the disclosure and protection provisions of the Act. n181 If a State fails to meet the standards for certification, the Secretary must notify the State in writing of the changes in State law, regulation, or administration that are needed in order to obtain certification. n182

After the Secretary has certified a State, the Secretary must accept for filing under ILSFDA, disclosure materials found acceptable, and any related documentation required by State authorities in connection with the sale or lease of lots located within the State. The Secretary may accept for filing, and declare effective as the Federal statement of record and property report, such materials and documentation found acceptable by the State in connection with the sale or lease of lots located outside that State. n183

The Secretary must periodically review the State's laws, regulations, and administrative procedures to determine if they continue to meet the federal requirements. If they do not, the Secretary must withdraw certification. n184

A developer still must pay filing fees to HUD even if the State has had its laws certified as being substantially equivalent. n185

Regulations concerning the certification of substantially equivalent State law are found at 24 C.F.R. §§ 1710.500 through 1710.559.

As of September 5, 2009, HUD's website indicated that there were four States which had obtained certification. They are Arizona, California, Florida, and Minnesota. n186

CHAPTER 14 Federal Laws Affecting Real Estate Brokers *

10A-14 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 14.16

§ 14.16 Civil Rights and Franchises

As discussed in § 2.01[3][c], above, many brokerages are franchisees. Issues regarding civil rights can arise in the granting of a brokerage franchise. A civil right is an enforceable right or privilege, which if interfered with by another gives rise to an action for injury. Civil rights include freedom of speech, press, assembly, the right to vote, freedom from involuntary servitude, and the right to equality in public places. Discrimination occurs when the civil rights of an individual are denied or interfered with because of their membership in a particular group or class. The federal and state governments have enacted laws to prevent discrimination based on a person's race, sex, religion, age, previous condition of servitude, physical limitation, national origin, and in some instances sexual preference. The most prominent civil rights legislation since the reconstruction era is the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Section 1981 of Title 42 (Equal Rights Under the Law) prohibits racial discrimination in the making and enforcement of private contracts. n1 This section was enacted as part of the Civil Rights Act of 1866. n2 Section 1981 ensures, among other rights, that persons of all races shall have equal rights to make and enforce contracts.

Section 1981 proscribes only discriminatory conduct at the time of the initial formation of a contract and discriminatory conduct that impairs the right to enforce contract obligations through legal process. n3 Postformation conduct relating to contract terms and conditions, however, is not actionable under section 1981. Since discriminatory postformation conduct, including breach of contract, concerns the performance of existing contractual obligations, it is more appropriately governed by state contract law and Title VII. n4

Plaintiffs can use § 1981 to vindicate their civil rights when the acts of intentional discrimination prevent them from entering into contracts or from enforcing established contract rights. Impediments to enforcement arise only when a plaintiff is prevented from enforcing rights that are specifically enumerated in the contract. A plaintiff asserting a § 1981 claim may prove intentional discrimination through either direct or circumstantial evidence. n5

The denial of a real estate franchise on racially discriminatory grounds is a violation of § 1981. n6 In Tyler v. Re/Max Mountain States, Inc., n7 the plaintiff alleged that he had been discriminated against on the basis of his race (African American) by denying him his franchise application. The jury found in the plaintiff's favor. The appellate court affirmed, finding that the plaintiff has sufficiently satisfied the requirements of the general rule applied in § 1981 cases which required that the plaintiff proffer evidence that the defendant's justifications were pretextual.

PART V Other Issues Affecting Brokers

CHAPTER 15 Real Estate Brokers and Environmental Laws *

10A-15 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice Scope

Scope

SCOPE

Chapter 15 discusses environmental laws and their effect upon the real estate brokerage industry. Courts are often faced with claims made by purchasers who allege that a broker should have disclosed an environmental problem or hazard (§ 15.01[2]). This chapter discusses cases involving such claims, other information related to real estate brokerage and the presence of various environmental hazards affecting real estate for sale or lease, and the significance of mandatory seller-disclosure requirements as they relate to environmental hazards. (§ 15.01[3]).

A broker's liability for failing to disclose depends on the standard of care. This standard and how it has been defined by various courts and legislatures is discussed (§ 15.02). Specific environmental hazards discussed in this chapter include:

- asbestos (§ 15.03[2]),
- Chinese Drywall (§ 15.03[2A]) (new!)
- radon (§ 15.03[3]),
- urea-formaldehyde foam insulation (§ 15.03[4]),
- lead-based paint (§ 15.03[5]),
- electromagnetic fields (§ 15.03[6]),
- chlordane (§ 15.03[7]),
- underground storage tanks (§ 15.03[8]),
- mold (§ 15.03[9]),
- methamphetamine (15.03[10]).

Other less common environmental hazards are also discussed (§ 15.03[11]).

This chapter considers the management of environmental hazard risks in nonresidential realty (§ 15.04). Included in this discussion is coverage of environmental audits which are fairly routine in the purchase of commercial properties by sophisticated purchasers (§ 15.04[3]).

The primary federal legislation in this area is the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation and Liability Act which is discussed in the context of brokers incurring liability under this Act (§ 15.05). CERCLA is a complex act which has spawned many court cases. For additional discussion on these and other issues surrounding environmental hazards see the following other publications:

CHAPTER 15 Real Estate Brokers and Environmental Laws *

10A-15 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 15.01

§ 15.01 Environmental Liability in Real Estate Transactions

[1] The Growth of Environmental Awareness

The last several decades have been a time of growing awareness by Americans of the presence of environmental hazards in their homes and workplaces. The public's sensitivity to these hazards in every day life has intensified due to coverage in the media, renewed interest by state legislatures in dealing with contaminated sites, and a growing number of lawsuits linking numerous products found in the daily environment with human health problems. An influential component of this environmental awareness, at least in commercial transactions, has been the reluctance of lenders to make loans to purchasers of contaminated property. Even a purchaser who is willing to assume the environmental risk potentially associated with a property may be unable to obtain financing in this climate of environmental sensitivity.

When an environmental problem is discovered prior to the closing of a real estate transaction, the buyer may choose to abandon the transaction, seek to negotiate a price modification, or enter into an agreement with the seller allocating the cost of eliminating any hazard or taking other remedial action. Unfortunately, in too many cases the buyer is unaware that environmental problems and potential health hazards exist until after closing. At that time, the buyer's remedy may be limited to taking legal action against the seller, and possibly the real estate agents involved, for contribution to the cost of correction of the problem or other damages. This chapter provides an overview of the environmental problems and issues involved in real estate transactions and the resulting potential environmental liability of brokers and agents.

[2] Potential Environmental Liability of Sellers' and Buyers' Agents

The cases addressing a claim that a real estate broker or agent should be held responsible for an environmental problem discovered on property after the buyer has taken title readily reveal that such litigation has not developed a new jurisprudence. Instead, and not unexpectedly, such cases are resolved on the basis of familiar, existing principles of law that have evolved concerning the liability of real estate brokers for damages suffered by purchasers who discovered their property to be afflicted with more common defects, such as leaky basements and roofs. For that reason, it is useful to briefly review such traditional bases of the broker's or agent's liability.

The basis for such liability is premised on the broker's failure to satisfy a tort duty owed or a duty established by the contract between the client or customer and the broker. The nature and extent of such duty, in turn, is in part defined, or at least impacted, by the relationship, if any, between the broker and the party making the claim. In so-called "traditional" real estate practice, the listing broker establishes an agency relationship with the seller, and a selling agent (that is, an agent other than the listing agent who introduces the buyer to the property) is generally thought to be an agent of the listing broker and thus a subagent of the seller. Both such agents, therefore, have agency obligations only to the seller of the property. n1 These agents' duties--of obedience, care, skill and disclosure of information--run only to the seller. Despite the absence of an agency relationship between either the listing or selling broker and the buyer, courts have repeatedly held that brokers and their sales associates nevertheless owe buyers an obligation of fairness and honesty. n2 Brokers also commonly act as "buyers agents" pursuant to an explicit contractual agency relationship with the buyer. In such status, the broker becomes a fiduciary of the buyer which, in some cases, has caused some courts to elevate the usual disclosure responsibilities imposed on them beyond the simple standard of fairness and honesty. n2.1 Some brokers also enter into non-agency relationships with buyers or sellers to provide to them real estate services. Even where the relationships between buyers, sellers and brokers are different than the traditional model, however, for the most part, plaintiffs, and thus courts, rely on the same legal theories commonly asserted against listing brokers and their agents (although the factual (agency) context in which those principles are applied differ and may therefore occasionally produce different results.) These theories include:

- fraud, n3
- strict liability, n4
- negligence, n5
- negligent misrepresentation, n6 and
- statutory liability. n7

These same theories are asserted by buyers making claims against brokers and agents when environmental hazards are the defects alleged. Buyers may also assert claims against brokers and agents based on alleged breach of statutory or regulatory duties to provide disclosures or refrain from misrepresentation.

[3] The Impact of Mandatory Seller Disclosure Requirements

EDITOR'S NOTE:

See Chapter 3A in volume 10 for a discussion of federal and state disclosure requirements affecting real estate brokers.

[a] Seller's Superior Knowledge

The seller usually has the most knowledge about the condition of his or her property offered for sale. In particular, the scope of the seller's knowledge is usually superior to that of the broker or buyer in this regard, since a person who has occupied the premises for any length of time will likely be more familiar with its condition than a person who has made a cursory inspection.

Recognizing the seller to be the best source of information about the condition of the property, at least 35 states and the District of Columbia have adopted laws expressly requiring the seller to disclose specified information about the features or condition of the property. n8 In other jurisdictions where seller disclosure is not mandated by law, many real estate professionals nevertheless require their seller-clients to submit written statements describing the physical condition of the property and its various features and systems. Such documentation, signed by a seller, provides the listing broker and cooperating agents, whether acting as subagents, buyer's agents or in another capacity, with a clear record of the information that the seller provided to the broker, should the broker's knowledge of the property's condition be placed in issue at a later date.

Some observers assert that seller disclosure statutes have limited applicability and value. One recent commentator, however, carefully analyzed such forms and their use, and concluded that "buyers, sellers and brokers have benefited from the widespread use of property condition disclosure forms." He also predicts that such forms are "likely to become longer, more carefully worded, and indispensable in residential home sales throughout the country." n8.1 In general, such statutes apply to residential sales in structures including up to four units. The disclosure statement usually must be provided to the buyer either before the signing of a sales contract or within a specific number of days thereafter. Some statutes provide that if the disclosure document reveals a material defect, the buyer may terminate the transaction within a specified time. n9

Brokers recognize, however, that some sellers are simply not knowledgeable about the condition or all aspects and features of the property offered for sale. In some cases, the seller may never have occupied the property or for other reasons may be unable to provide up-to-date, accurate information. For that reason brokers should be cautious against overreliance on sellers as the exclusive source of all information about a property. Brokers should also be alert for, and investigate, any inconsistencies between the representations made by a seller in the seller's disclosure statement and the broker's own observations of the property.

[b] Nature of Disclosure Required

An important issue raised by the seller property condition disclosure statement concept is the nature and extent of the defects the law requires a seller to disclose. Although a few states may cling to the principle of "caveat emptor" in realty sales, a seller's affirmative duty to disclose latent material defects is well established. n10

As a general rule, the disclosure requirement applies to material matters--those matters that might affect a reasonable buyer's decision to buy, or the terms and conditions of the buyer's purchase offer. Notably, most seller disclosure forms promulgated by law or regulation in the various states specifically reference--and thus require disclosure of--a variety of recognized residential environmental conditions and hazards, commonly including radon, lead-based paint, nearby "Superfund" sites, underground storage tanks, mold, urea-formaldehyde foam insulation, and others.

A related issue--whether a broker must disclose conditions located off the property site but which the buyer may nevertheless consider relevant--was addressed in Strawn v. Canuso. n11 In Strawn, new homebuyers were not told of the close proximity of an abandoned dump site which had, in fact, attained considerable notoriety as a highly contaminated site. The Supreme Court of New Jersey held that a builder-developer of residential real estate and a broker representing such a builder is "liable to a purchaser for nondisclosure of off-site physical conditions known to the broker and unknown to and not readily observable by the buyer if the existence of those conditions is of sufficient materiality as to affect the habitability, use, or enjoyment of the property and, therefore, to render the property substantially less desirable or valuable to the objectively reasonable buyer." n12 In response to the Strawn decision, the New Jersey Legislature enacted the New Residential Construction Off-Site Conditions Disclosure Act. n13

The Act requires sellers of new residential construction to provide buyers notice that lists of certain conditions and their location are available at city hall, and further provides the buyer five days to cancel a contract, presumably in light of information learned from such lists. Providing the notice satisfies the seller's duty under Strawn to disclose off-site conditions. The extent to which courts may apply Strawn to brokers involved in marketing existing, as opposed to new homes, and the geographic scope of the off-site defects that must be disclosed, remains to be fleshed out by subsequent cases. n13.1

One such case is Ribak v. Centex Real Estate Corporation. n14 In that case, also involving the sale of new rather than existing homes, the court appeared to rely on Strawn in holding that the materiality of how the defendant-sellers described a certain off-site condition (a wastewater treatment plant adjacent to the property) was a question for the jury. The clear inference of the court's conclusion is that although the condition was off the site it was one that the jury could conclude ought to have been disclosed by the sellers.

[c] Benefits of Mandatory Seller Disclosure

The most obvious and indeed the intended benefit of mandatory seller disclosure laws is to cause sellers to affirmatively reveal adverse property features of which they are actually aware. Doing so allows the prospective buyer to make a purchase offer and acquire the property with full awareness of the positive as well as negative information known about the property. Disclosure may also eliminate litigation over whether or not a particular condition was disclosed, since the disclosure form serves as a clear record of the information provided to the buyer by the seller. n15

A shortcoming of seller disclosure statutes is that they are likely to have little or no effect with regard to problems that are wholly unknown to any party. Another concern is that explicit identification of environmental problems on (or even near) the property may result in buyers experiencing difficulty in obtaining financing for property. Some lenders who have foreclosed on polluted commercial properties have been threatened with potential liability for environmental cleanup costs. As a result, lenders may scrutinize residential loan applications more carefully when, prior to issuance of a loan commitment, the seller has disclosed that the property contains lead paint, asbestos or other toxic substances that may require remediation or removal. Of course, given the choice, most buyers would probably prefer to be advised of any environmental problems with or concerns about the property before, rather than after, the transaction is consummated, even if that means financing for purchase of a contaminated property is difficult, or even wholly unavailable.

The court concluded that, in general, the New Residential Construction Off-Site Conditions Disclosure Act did operate to bar a purchaser from bringing a Consumer Fraud cause of action. Because the transactions at issue in that case occurred prior to the passage of the Act, however, it was necessary for the Court also to address whether the Act could be applied retroactively to preclude the Consumer Fraud Act claim. Despite the section of the Act providing for retroactive application, the court held that under the facts presented it would be "manifestly unjust" to bar the purchaser's claim because the transaction occurred without disclosure to the purchaser but before the notification process required by the Act had been implemented. Thus, the purchasers were allowed to proceed with their Consumer Fraud Act claims.

PART V Other Issues Affecting Brokers
CHAPTER 15 Real Estate Brokers and Environmental Laws *

10A-15 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 15.02

§ 15.02 Duty of Care

[1] Liability Depends Upon Standard of Care

In assessing the potential liability of real estate professionals for environmental hazards discovered on the property after the purchase, a key question is the standard of care to which brokers will be held in connection with the discovery or disclosure of the hazard. A buyer who discovers an environmental problem on the property and seeks to hold the broker or agent legally responsible must show that the broker or agent failed to satisfy this duty of care. This standard of care is established by the statutory and/or case law of each jurisdiction.

[2] The Duty to Inspect

[a] California: Easton v. Strassburger

While it is generally well understood that brokers and agents are obligated to disclose environmental hazards of which they are actually aware, it is less clear whether they have a duty to investigate or inspect property for such hazards, or indications that such hazards might be present. Perhaps the first and probably most well-known case addressing the duty of a real estate professional to examine the condition of a property being offered for sale is Easton v. Strassburger,ⁿ¹ decided by a California appellate court in 1984. In that case, which involved the failure to disclose soil erosion problems and resulting cracks in the foundation, the court held that a real estate agent had a duty not only to disclose material facts, but also "to conduct a reasonably competent and diligent inspection of the residential property listed for sale and to disclose to prospective purchasers all facts materially affecting the value or desirability of the property that such an investigation would reveal."ⁿ²

In Easton, the agents had observed uneven floors in the home and netting on a slope that had been placed there to repair damage caused by a landslide, but they failed to suggest further testing or inform the buyers of the past problem with earth slides. The court said the uneven floors and the netting were "red flags" (i.e., readily observable indicators of potential problems) that the agents should have brought to the attention of the purchasers. The court concluded that an action against the broker could be based on negligence in failing to inspect the property and disclose any problems identified, in which case the purchaser need not allege or prove the broker had actual knowledge of the problem or that the facts were available only to the broker.

The court also reasoned that limiting a broker's obligation to disclose only those facts of which the broker has actual knowledge would provide a "disincentive" for the broker to seek out defects that are readily discoverable. The court pointed out that in residential transactions the buyer frequently relies on the broker's professional expertise, and that: "[i]f a broker were required to disclose only known defects, but not also those that are reasonably discoverable, he would be shielded by his ignorance of that which he holds himself out to know." n3 After the Easton decision, brokers in California were legally obligated to conduct an inspection of the property that included "more than a casual visual inspection and a general inquiry of the owners." n4

Subsequent to the decision in Easton, the California legislature codified the standard of care established in that decision for residential transactions for brokers acting as listing or cooperating agents. n5 California Civil Code Section 2079(a) provides:

It is the duty of a real estate broker or salesperson, licensed under ... the Business and Professions Code, to a prospective purchaser of residential real property comprising one to four dwelling units, ... to conduct a reasonably competent and diligent visual inspection of the property offered for sale and to disclose to that prospective purchaser all facts materially affecting the value or desirability of the property that an investigation would reveal, if that broker has a written contract with the seller to find or obtain a buyer or is a broker who acts in cooperation with that broker to find and obtain a buyer.

The duty to inspect under Section 2079 is limited by Section 2079.3, which provides that the inspection obligation "does not include or involve an inspection of areas that are reasonably and normally inaccessible to such an inspection" In the case of certain types of residential property, such as a condominium, cooperative or planned unit development, the duty to inspect is limited to the unit being offered for sale.

The California legislature further provided that the standard of care owed by a broker in carrying out its duties to the prospective purchaser "is the degree of care that a reasonably prudent real estate licensee would exercise," and that the standard of care will be measured by the knowledge a broker would be expected to possess in light of the education and experience requirements for licensure. n6

Subsequent California decisions address the limits of the duty established by Section 2079 and the applicability of that duty. A 1993 decision by the court that decided Easton offers real estate licensees an important limitation on their statutory duty under California law to make an inspection and disclose defects in residential property offered for sale. Wilson v. Century 21 Great Western Realty, n7 holds that any "red flags" on the property must be both evident and observable to a nonexpert in order for the broker's failure to disclose to be actionable. This is good news with regard to disclosure of problems of an environmental nature, because in most cases such problems are not readily discernible.

In the Wilson case, the purchaser sued a listing office alleging fraud and negligent misrepresentation based on the agent's failure to follow up on a conversation with a neighbor, who had suggested that the home might have foundation problems. The plaintiff, a general contractor, noticed sloping of the floors during a walk-through of the premises, but waived his right to a property inspection and was given a roofing and termite report done at the seller's expense.

The court found that the agent made no false positive assertions, and that the conversation with the neighbor was not sufficiently "factual" because the neighbor was interested in purchasing the property and may have mentioned a foundation problem as a means of getting a price reduction. Since the foundation problems were not discernible by a "visual inspection," the court held that the plaintiff's expectations of the agent exceeded that required by California's statutory duty to inspect. That is, the plaintiff sought to impose on the agent the duty to perform too intrusive an inspection, and to investigate comments that were too speculative. n8

An attempt by a purchaser to extend a broker's statutory duty to inspect to commercial property failed in Smith v. Rickard. n9 This case involved the purchase of a 50-acre commercial parcel containing an avocado orchard and a residence. The court held that the presence of a residence on the property was insufficient to invoke the duties imposed with respect to residential sales in the Civil Code. In another case, Murray v. Hayden, n10 the California Court of Appeal declined to extend the inspection duty imposed on listing (seller's) brokers by Easton and California Civil Code § 2079 to apply also to a broker hired by and acting as the agent of the buyer. The court held that a buyer's broker owes no duty to inspect residential property and to disclose to the buyer all facts materially affecting the value or desirability of the property that a reasonable investigation would reveal, reasoning that the seller's broker is in a better position to conduct an inspection and there would be a duplication of effort were the same duty imposed on the buyer's broker. Finally, in Robinson v. Grossman, n11 the court held that while Easton and California Civil Code § 2079 require a broker to make the requisite inspection in good faith and not convey the seller's representations without a reasonable basis for believing them to be true, the broker is not required to "independently verify and confirm the accuracy of the seller's representations."

Later, the California Legislature provided for the distribution to consumers by real estate agents of a consumer information booklet that discusses common environmental hazards. A broker that provides the booklet is not required to provide additional information concerning such hazards, and the booklet is deemed adequate disclosure of potential environmental problems. The statute provides, however, that it does not in any way change "the duty of a seller or broker to disclose the existence of known environmental hazards on or affecting the real property." n12

[b] The Duty to Inspect in Other Jurisdictions

Notwithstanding this comprehensive and explicit duty imposed on brokers and agents in California, only a few other states have followed the California approach of defining the standard of care to impose on brokers the obligation to inspect and disclose adverse features of the property, which could include environmental problems. In Gouveia v. Citicorp Person-to Person Financial Center, Inc., n13 the broker represented the townhouse he had listed for sale as in "All Top Shape" despite the fact that there were significant construction defects. The court relied directly on Easton and held that in New Mexico brokers "may have a duty to disclose defects that an inspection would reveal." n14

In Wisconsin, the Department of Regulation and Licensing used language similar to that of the Easton court in establishing its standard of disclosure for the real estate profession:

RL 24.07 INSPECTION AND DISCLOSURE DUTIES. (1) Inspection of Real Estate. (a) General Requirement. A licensee, when engaging in real estate practice which involves real estate improved with a structure, shall conduct a reasonably competent and diligent inspection of accessible areas of the structure and immediately surrounding areas of the property to detect observable, material adverse facts ...

(2) DISCLOSURE OF MATERIAL ADVERSE FACTS. A licensee may not exaggerate or misrepresent facts in the practice of real estate. A licensee, when engaging in real estate practice, shall disclose to each party, in writing and in a timely fashion, all material adverse facts that the licensee knows and that the party does not know or cannot discover through a reasonably vigilant observation, unless the disclosure of the material adverse fact is prohibited by law ... n15

This section of the Wisconsin Administrative Code was relied on by the court in Grube v. Daun, n16 where the court reversed the trial court's dismissal of a negligence claim brought by a purchaser against a real estate broker. The purchaser had discovered certain property contamination arising from a leaking underground storage tank on the property, and alleged in his complaint that the broker had "failed to investigate, discover and disclose the...contamination..." The trial court dismissed the negligence and other claims stated against the broker because the contract of sale contained an "as is" clause, but the Court of Appeals of Wisconsin reversed and held that the broker's failure to perform an inspection to discover might nevertheless have been negligent, in light of RL 24.07. In Witt v. Coldwell Banker First United Realty, n17 the Wisconsin Court of Appeals reversed the dismissal of a buyer's claim against a broker for the broker's failure to investigate as required by RL 24.07 and discover and disclose the presence of asbestos wrap on heating pipes. In Fulton v. Vogt, n18 the court similarly concluded that the broker did not violate any of his legal duties by failing to discover and disclose an underground gas storage tank on property, since his duties did not include "a duty to discover hidden and not readily observable defects."

The broad disclosure obligation in the above-quoted rule was affected by a 1990 revision of the Wisconsin licensing statute, n19 which provides that a licensee need not disclose any information relating to the physical condition of the property "if a written report that discloses the information has been prepared by a qualified 3d party" and been furnished to the buyer, unless the broker has information that contradicts the report. Conell v. Coldwell Banker Premier Real Estate, n20 confirms that this provision "operates to relieve the broker from liability for disclosures related to the physical condition of property covered by" a third-party inspection. In Conell, a professional home inspector failed to discover a basement water problem and the buyer sued the broker for negligence, strict responsibility for misrepresentation and negligent misrepresentation. The trial court granted and the appellate court affirmed summary judgment in favor of the broker, based on Wis. Stat. § 452.23.

On the other hand, courts in several states have considered the inspection duty imposed on listing brokers under Easton and expressly or implicitly rejected adoption of a similar duty in their state. A particularly clear example of this is Kubinsky v. Van Zandt Realtors, n21 where the buyer of a home claimed that a listing broker had a duty to inspect the listed property over and above asking the seller if defects exist. In that case the property had certain problems in the foundation which the buyer discovered after occupying the home. The buyer relied on Easton as authority for the assertion that a duty of inspection should apply, but the court declined to follow that case, holding that "the imposition of such liability... should be left to the Texas legislature." n22 Hagans v. Woodruff, n23 reaches the same conclusion, citing Kubinsky. Likewise, the 4th Circuit in Herbert v. Saffell, n24 declined to extend Maryland law to embrace "the particularly broad theory of liability" announced in Easton, "leaving it to Maryland courts to effect such a sweeping change in Maryland law." n25 Herbert involved a claim that the broker should have discovered and disclosed to the buyer certain soil conditions and other terrain problems that precluded installation of a conventional septic system, making the property essentially uninhabitable. The West Virginia Supreme Court, in another case involving undiscovered foundation problems, also considered and rejected the inspection duty of Easton: "We decline to hold that a broker has an independent duty to inspect and uncover latent defects on residential premises." n26 Finally, while not explicitly referring to Easton, the Illinois Appellate Court has held that a listing broker has no obligation to conduct an inspection sufficient to discover defects such as a basement flooding problem. In Munjal v. Baird & Warner, n27 the court was "...unwilling to find a duty on the part of a real estate broker to discover latent material defects on property which a seller has not disclosed to him prior to sale... [W]e do not think that [seller's] broker...was obligated to make a full investigation as to whether there was an actual flooding problem in the house without clear evidence of same or without disclosure by the seller." n28 This result was subsequently confirmed in Harkala v. Wildwood Realty, Inc. n29

The decision in Wilson v. Century 21 Great Western Realty, n30 discussed above, the change in approach taken by the Wisconsin legislature, and the other cases cited above indicate there is not uniform support for imposing on brokers an affirmative and comprehensive duty to inspect for property defects, including environmental problems. Case law and developing legislation will undoubtedly continue to evolve to address each jurisdiction's approach on this important question.

The court relied in part on the Code of Ethics of the National Association of Realtors(R), which states: "REALTORS(R) shall avoid ... concealment of pertinent facts relating to the property or the transaction He has an affirmative obligation to discover adverse factors that a reasonably competent and diligent visual investigation would disclose." National Ass'n of Realtors(R), Code of Ethics, art. 9. In 1986, in order to clarify the intent of that provision of the Code of Ethics (which was later renumbered as Article 2), NAR deleted the last quoted sentence and added the following additional language: "Realtors(R) shall not, however, be obligated to discover latent defects in the property, to advise on matters outside the scope of their real estate license, or to disclose facts which are confidential under the scope of their agency duties owed to their clients." PART V Other Issues Affecting Brokers

CHAPTER 15 Real Estate Brokers and Environmental Laws *

10A-15 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 15.03

§ 15.03 Environmental Hazards

[1] Overview

Some products previously thought to be "miracle products" (e.g., urea-formaldehyde foam insulation, chlordane, lead-based paint, asbestos and others) have later been determined to also have unfortunate negative health implications for persons exposed to them. Because some of these products found their way into our homes, schools, offices and shopping centers, they have become the headaches of today's real estate professional. Prudent real estate professionals will become familiar with these environmental conditions and concerns and establish office policies that will help to limit their legal exposure to buyers who claim they unwittingly purchased property that suffers from one or more environmental problem.

This section provides an overview of the most commonly found environmental hazards as well as court decisions that have addressed the issue of the potential liability of real estate brokers involved in the sale of property afflicted with an environmental hazard. As indicated above, these cases generally apply the principles developed in connection with property defects other than environmental matters, as described above, in determining whether or not brokers, agents, and owners are to be held liable for environmental hazards found to affect the property. Thus, issues of primary importance are typically the defendant's actual knowledge of the presence or existence of the environmental problem or whether the defendants should have been aware of it, and whether the plaintiff acted reasonably in investigating for such concerns and/or relying on statements made by the broker or agent.

[2] Asbestos

Probably the most common environmental hazard found in existing buildings is asbestos. Due to its fire retardant quality and strength, asbestos was added to many products used in the construction industry, including insulation, vinyl floor tiles, roofing, siding and pipe wrapping. In 1964, Irving Selikoff published a definitive workⁿ¹ linking exposure to asbestos and lung diseases. Both the asbestos industry and the medical community had evidence at least thirty years prior to that study of the danger of industrial exposure to asbestos.ⁿ² Because it takes many years after exposure to asbestos before any diseases attributed to such exposure become manifest, researchers have had difficulty determining a dose-response relationship. As a result, the federal government has been reluctant to completely ban the use of asbestos or control exposure to it.

Asbestos poses a health risk because when it ages or is disturbed it may become "friable"--breaking off into microscopic particles that become airborne and can be breathed into the lungs of persons exposed. Current studies indicate that the risk of asbestos-related diseases, such as lung cancer, asbestosis and mesothelioma, is dependent upon the type of friable asbestos found on the property, as well as the size and concentration of the fibers. n3 Most of the asbestos used in building products appears to be "chrysotile" asbestos, which is least likely to cause lung disease. However, the public fear of asbestos exposure may make a building or home containing asbestos products difficult to sell or lease. At least one plaintiff has been able to convince a jury that an asbestos-related disease was acquired while working as a word processor in a federal office building. n4

Because of the health risks presented by friable asbestos, remedial measures may have to be taken. Once asbestos is found on a property, the parties generally have three possible responses:

- removal of the asbestos-containing products;
- enclosure of the space in which the asbestos is located; or
- encapsulation of the asbestos with another material.

The best approach to take will depend on the current condition of the asbestos, the possibility that the asbestos will be disturbed in the near future by renovation or decay, and the likelihood that, if disturbed, the asbestos would enter the building's air system. Removal is extremely costly because federal law requires asbestos to be disposed of as a hazardous material. n5 Removal costs are also higher because of the precautions that must be taken during the removal process to prevent release of asbestos fibers into the open air. Although in most states brokers do not have an affirmative obligation to inspect to discover environmental hazards like asbestos, prudent brokers will be alert for "red flags" indicating the possible presence of asbestos, and will inform potential buyers of the conditions observed.

The presence of asbestos on real property that is available for sale or lease has proven to be troublesome in both residential and commercial real estate transactions. For example, the potential purchaser of an older home may anticipate replacing the furnace, which would require removal of asbestos insulation and pipewrap on the old furnace in accordance with federal regulations. n6 It would not be uncommon for the estimated cost of this project to double due to the asbestos removal costs. Similarly, the purchaser of an office building in need of a complete refurbishing due to the age of the building may find that the cost of asbestos removal makes the purchase of the building prohibitive. Prior to approving loans on commercial buildings most lenders attempt to ensure that their investment will not lose value and avoid potential environmental liability by requiring environmental inspections that will identify the presence of hazardous substances, including asbestos.

Case law addressing claims against brokers for failing to disclose asbestos in a property is limited. In Witt v. Coldwell Banker First United Realty, Inc., n7 the buyers alleged that the broker, who in this case was also the owner, failed in his duty to inspect the property and disclose the presence of asbestos-containing pipe insulation. The broker-owner claimed that he was not aware of the asbestos and so represented in the Seller's Real Estate Condition Report. The trial court granted summary judgment for the broker but the appellate court reversed, holding that the broker's failure to inspect and discover and disclose the asbestos may have been sufficiently negligent to sustain a claim for negligent misrepresentation. In addition, although not directly related to brokerage practice, many commercial brokers also act as building managers and thereby may be covered by a 1995 OSHA rule requiring owners and managers to disclose to building tenants that are employers any known asbestos or materials presumed to contain asbestos. n8 In Olean Associate, Inc. v. Knights of Columbus, n9 the plaintiffs discovered that the property they had purchased in 1990 contained considerably more asbestos than had been previously disclosed to them. An inspection report done for the sellers prior to the sale had indicated the full extent of the asbestos present, but that report was not provided to the purchasers. Plaintiffs learned of the more extensive asbestos in 1991 when a local government agency inspected the property. The parent company of plaintiffs brought suit in 1996 within the 5-year statute of limitations period, but when that case was dismissed plaintiffs brought suit in their own name in 1997. The Missouri Court of Appeals held that plaintiffs' claims did not "relate back" to the earlier complaint filed by the parent, and affirmed dismissal of the case based on the statute of limitations. The court also held that claims with respect to additional areas of asbestos discovered in 1997 were also subject to dismissal as outside the statute of limitations. The court held that because the 1991 inspection revealed there to be more asbestos than previously believed the fraud was known much earlier and the newly discovered asbestos was "capable of ascertainment" in 1991, starting the running of the 5-year limitations period.

In Salinas v. Skelton,ⁿ¹⁰ the plaintiff alleged that the seller was aware of asbestos insulation on an enclosed boiler unit within the condominium purchased by the plaintiff, and that the seller intentionally failed to disclose such asbestos in response to a question about "Toxic Substances" on the seller's property condition disclosure statement. The court held that there was sufficient evidence for a jury to conclude that the seller had intentionally withheld such information from the purchaser and reversed a summary judgment ruling in favor of the defendant seller. With respect to the purchaser's claim against the seller's real estate agent, however, the court found no misrepresentation by the agent and noted that the property condition disclosure statement contained representations of the seller only, and not of the agent. For that reason, the court affirmed summary judgment in favor of the agent. Finally, in Beshada v. Millard Realty,ⁿ¹¹ the court had little trouble concluding that neither the real estate agent nor the seller were liable under theories of negligence, silent fraud and innocent misrepresentation, or for violation of the Michigan Consumer Protection Act for various problems with a home purchased by the plaintiff, including "asbestos in the basement," where the plaintiff had offered no evidence that either the seller or agent knew of the problems. In particular, the court specifically noted that the broker had not actively concealed any material information and served only as a conduit of information without an independent duty to disclose or confirm. The court's conclusion was also influenced by the fact that the purchaser had been put on notice of certain potential problems but took no action to identify or address them, and that in fact there had been no misrepresentation of fact by either defendant. And in Kearns v. Huckaby,^{n11.1} the court concluded that a real estate broker acting as a dual agent in a transaction had not been negligent or breached its contract with the buyers for representing that the roof of the home purchased by plaintiffs was slate, when in fact it was asbestos. The court noted that although the agent's representation was inaccurate, there was no evidence offered to show that the agent made that representation with knowledge that it was not true or with reckless disregard for the truth. The court also acknowledged that it was not possible to determine by observation whether the roof was slate or asbestos, and that the buyer had inspected the property and confirmed in the contract for sale that it he was relying on that inspection rather than any representations by the broker or agent of the broker.

[2A] Chinese Drywall

In December, 2008 the federal Consumer Product Safety Commission began to receive complaints related to drywall installed in residential homes. The complaints appeared to arise out of a "building boom" in the southeast United States following substantial hurricane activity in 2004 and 2005, including hurricanes Katrina and Rita. These complaints by consumers included a "rotten egg" smell, health concerns such as irritated and itchy eyes and skin, difficulty in breathing, persistent cough, bloody or runny noses, recurrent headaches, sinus infection, and asthma attacks apparently unrelated to other causes. Also reported were blackened and corroded metal components in homes and the frequent need for replacement of components in air conditioning units. Ultimately many of these problems were traced to, or at least suspected to be caused by, drywall installed that was marked as produced in China. The CPSC reports receiving nearly 3,300 complaints, primarily from residents in Florida but from 36 other states as well,^{n11.2} the District of Columbia, American Samoa, and Puerto Rico. These consumers expressed the belief that their health symptoms or the corrosion of certain metal components in their homes are related to the presence of such Chinese drywall. State and local authorities have also received similar reports.

The CPSC initiated an investigation and has now established a "Drywall Information Center"^{n11.3} including various reports and information about the problem. Although consulting with a professional home inspector is the best way to determine whether or not a home contains problematic drywall, homeowners may do a self-inspection prior to hiring an expert to look for indications of the presence of Chinese drywall. Those include a sulfuric acid or rotten egg odor, or unexplained corrosion or blackening of internal wiring and air conditioning coils or air conditioning units. Another indication of Chinese drywall may be found on the source itself, which may display "Made in China" or the logo of a Chinese drywall manufacturer such as Knauf Plasterboard Tianjin or Taishan Gypsum.

On April 2, 2010 the CPSC issued guidance recommending that consumers remove all possible problem drywall identified in their homes, and that they check and also replace any damaged electrical, gas service, or other home systems or components n11.4 The CPSC has also issued technical guidance regarding identifying problem drywall in homes n11.5 as well as detailed guidance on repairing homes with problem drywall n11.6 and continues to investigate and provide information and advice to potentially affected homeowners. The costs of removing and replacing affected drywall depend on the extent and location of use of affected drywall in a home, but can range well into the tens or even hundreds of thousands of dollars. HUD has also announced efforts to assist adversely affected homeowners, including directing FHA to instruct mortgage lenders to provide temporary payment forbearance and relief from certain fees and penalties for homeowners required to remove and repair affected drywall. HUD is also providing Community Development Block Grants to assist states and local communities address rehabilitation efforts related to such drywall. n11.7

No litigation involving claims against real estate brokers or agents and affected drywall has yet been reported, but a series of lawsuits have been filed against manufacturers, distributors, and suppliers of Chinese drywall. All such federal cases have been consolidated in the Eastern District of Louisiana, and that court has already issued one decision awarding damages to seven plaintiffs against one drywall manufacturer totaling in excess of $2.6 million. n11.8 That manufacturer defaulted, but the court nevertheless permitted extensive discovery and concluded there was evidence supporting the conclusion that the drywall had caused such extensive damage as to make the homes uninhabitable, and that correcting the problem caused by the drywall required removing drywall and all affected components, including all electrical wire, HVAC systems, appliances, carpets, cabinets, and flooring. Other claims against other defendants remain.

[3] Radon

Radon is a colorless, odorless naturally occurring radioactive gas that has been associated with lung cancer and is perhaps the most commonly inquired-about environmental hazard in residential home sales. Radon results from the decaying of uranium and radium occurring in the ground. The gas enters the home through openings in basement walls, floor cracks, unsealed sump pumps, and open sewer drains. Efforts to make homes more air-tight, such as by installing weatherproofing and/or new windows, have increased the concentration of radon gas found indoors because the gas has a more difficult time escaping.

Scientists have long been aware of the dangers of occupational exposure to radon in uranium mineworkers. Because the risk of lung diseases attributable to radon exposure depends on both the level of radon in the air and the length of the period of radon exposure, however, scientists have had difficulty establishing a dose-response relationship. n12

The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) has established 4 picoCuries of radon per liter of air ("pCi/l") as the threshold level at which remedial action should be taken to lower the radon levels in a home. EPA is careful to acknowledge, however, that radon levels below 4pCi/l pose some level of risk also. n13 While the risks of lung cancer arising from long-term exposure to high levels of radon are well accepted, a number of researchers have considered and continue to examine the question of the magnitude of risk associated with exposure to lower levels, such as those that may be found in residential circumstances. The results remain inconclusive.

Radon is a prevalent problem, particularly in certain areas of the country. For example, radon screening tests performed by the Illinois Department of Nuclear Safety in 2,300 homes across the state showed that forty-five percent had radon levels in the basement above 4 pCi/l. n14

Testing for radon has become a familiar part of home inspection procedures in some areas of the country, while radon testing in other areas may be unusual and unfamiliar. Testing is required by many relocation services when they acquire a property and it is not uncommon to see clauses in sales contracts allowing for the test to be performed.

Indoor concentrations of radon depend on such factors as the method of building construction used, the concentration of radon in the soil, and the ventilation system in the building. Corrective action to remedy a radon problem involves sealing cracks and other openings in the basement and increasing ventilation. An "active mitigation system" may also be used. Such a system involves installation of a pipe that runs from below the foundation slab to above the roof line, into which is installed a fan to draw out the soil gases. Repairs usually are not expensive, and often range from $500-$2,500. Thus, the presence of radon in a property available for sale or lease will generally not cause the transaction to fall through. Real estate agents must anticipate the possibility that a property contains elevated radon levels and should be prepared to provide buyers and sellers information about radon, including the health implications and testing and mitigation procedures. Such information is easily obtained from U.S. EPA, or from state or local environmental or public health agencies. n15 A wealth of other information and publications about radon and its effects is available at US EPA's website. n15.1

Contracts for the sale of real estate may include specific provisions that address the parties' opportunity or obligation to test for and remedy any elevated radon levels. In some states, seller disclosure laws (discussed in § 15.01[3] above) explicitly address radon and require disclosure of any knowledge about radon levels in a home. In the case of most seller disclosure laws, the form that the seller is required to complete and provide to the purchaser simply includes radon as an item to be disclosed by the seller if any information is available. A few states impose a specific requirement that the seller or broker give an informational or "warning" statement to purchasers concerning radon or the potential health implications of elevated radon levels. n16 Montana's statute provides that sellers and seller's (real estate) agents who comply with this disclosure duty may not be held liable "based on the presence of radon gas or radon progeny in the building." n16.1

Only a few reported cases have involved radon, and, of those, only one involves a claim against a real estate broker. In Snyder v. Roach Brothers Realtors, n17 the plaintiffs had entered into a contract to purchase a home in which a radon mitigation system had already been installed. At the time of listing the seller had provided the broker with information about the system and had encouraged the broker to disclose it to prospective purchasers. The broker did in fact disclose to the plaintiff purchasers the results of the radon test that had been performed after installation of the system (which showed radon levels below 4 pCi/l), but did not disclose the system itself or the fact that before the system had been installed a test of the premises showed radon levels as high as 77 pCi/l. At a pre-closing inspection the purchasers noticed and inquired about the system, and as a result of learning of the system and the pre-mitigation radon levels the purchasers refused to complete the transaction. The purchasers demanded return of their earnest money deposit and this litigation followed when the sellers refused. The court held that the mitigation system should have been disclosed to the purchasers by the broker and that nothing about the physical appearance of the system would have drawn it to their attention. The court awarded the purchasers damages in the amount of their earnest money deposit and the expenses they had incurred in connection with seeking a mortgage loan for the purchase. Because the sellers had advised the broker to disclose the system to prospective purchasers, however, the court held that it was the failure of the broker, and not the seller, to make such disclosure and ordered the broker to indemnify the seller for the damages awarded to the purchasers.

One other case involved a real estate broker as a defendant, but it resulted in a jury verdict only and is not reported. The plaintiffs in Radakovich v. Fila n18 were the buyers of a Pennsylvania house who were told that the radon level in the home was 1.6 pCi/l. Two years after purchasing the house the buyers tested the home and found radon levels of 44 pCi/l, and upon further investigation discovered that earlier tests by the seller revealing elevated radon levels were never disclosed to the buyers. The buyers sued and recovered a judgment of $30,000 against the sellers and broker on grounds of fraud, negligent misrepresentation, and violation of the state's consumer fraud act.

Other cases have addressed radon issues arising in the context of an inspection clause allowing the purchaser to perform a radon test and cancel the contract of sale or require remediation by the seller if elevated levels were found. For example, in Pine Hill Development, Inc. v. Peterson,ⁿ¹⁹ the court held that the defendant buyers could without penalty terminate a contract to purchase property where radon testing of the premises showed radon levels in the air of 5.7 pCi/l and 9536 pCi/l in the water. The contract specifically provided that "the sale was contingent on a radon air and water 'inspection' which was 'satisfactory to Buyer.' " The court found that the tests showed that remediation was required and that the defendant purchaser was permitted to terminate the contract because the seller refused to perform the necessary remediation. In Wong v. Mercado,ⁿ²⁰ a real estate broker and the seller prevailed in their suit against buyers who failed to go through with a home purchase because of the presence of radon gas at a level of 2.9pCi/l. The buyers were concerned about the radon level because their children were to occupy bedrooms in the basement of the home. The court rejected the buyers' attempt to be relieved of their contractual obligation to complete the purchase. The court concluded that the purchaser was "objectively unreasonable" in failing to go forward at the closing due to the radon level. The court further concluded that the sellers should have been given an opportunity by the buyers to take corrective action to reduce the radon level. The court awarded damages to both the broker and the seller of the property. In Tanner v. Adams,ⁿ²¹ the plaintiff had purchased a home and had it inspected pursuant to a contract provision allowing cancellation for "substantial structural, mechanical, electrical, plumbing, roofing, water or sewer defects." Although a radon test showed levels in excess of the EPA action level, the court refused to permit the purchaser to cancel the contract because of the radon since it was not a defect of the type contemplated in the inspection clause. In Pannone v. Grandmaison,ⁿ²² the court permitted a purchaser to cancel a contract for sale pursuant to a clause making the offer contingent on "Purchaser's approval of the result of ... a radon gas inspection." Although the radon levels were well below the EPA action level, the purchaser offered evidence of his personal sensitivity to radioactivity as a result of radiation exposure suffered during the Korean war. The court allowed him to cancel because he sought to do so in good faith based on a subjective rather than objective standard, taking into account his personal history.ⁿ²³ In Kotkin v. Aronson,ⁿ²⁴ the New Jersey Supreme Court similarly strictly construed a home inspection clause that gave the buyers the right to inspect the dwelling for "possible environmental conditions affecting the property such as presence of radon gas, ..." (Emphasis in original.)ⁿ²⁵ The contract gave the buyers the right to terminate the contract if any defects were discovered unless the sellers agreed to "repair and/or replace (the defect) ... at the Seller's own cost and expense." The sellers mitigated the radon discovered by the buyers to a level considered by the sellers to be safe, but because they did not completely eliminate all the radon the buyers nevertheless sought to terminate the contract. Noting that the parties could have but did not negotiate and establish in the contract a specified "safe" level of radon, the court affirmed the lower court's grant of summary judgment in favor of the buyers, canceling the sales contract and ordering the sellers to return the buyers' deposit. Finally, in Pais-Built Homes, Inc. v. Beckett,ⁿ²⁶ the court affirmed a judgment ordering a purchaser's down payment forfeited to the seller despite the purchasers' claim that they had been fraudulently induced into signing the contract by the seller's failure to disclose the level of radon on the property. The court held that claim was barred by the provision in the purchase contract that "all prior understandings, agreements, representations and warranties, oral or written, between Seller and Purchaser are merged in this contract; it completely expresses their full agreement and has been entered into after full investigation, neither party relying upon any statement made by anyone else that is not set forth in this contract." The court also acknowledged that "the level of radon present in the house was not a matter peculiarly within the [seller's] or the broker's knowledge," and that they had not shown that they could not ascertain the truth "through the exercise of due diligence."ⁿ²⁷

[4] Urea-Formaldehyde Foam Insulation

Urea-formaldehyde foam insulation (also commonly known as UFFI), was one of the miracle products of a decade intent on insulating an aging housing stock due to ever-increasing energy costs. UFFI is a mixture of a urea-formaldehyde-based resin, compressed gas and a foaming agent that is pumped into the cavity between the interior and exterior walls of a home, through holes in the exterior wall that are later patched. It is estimated that approximately one-half million homes nationwide contain UFFI. Many of these residences were later sided with aluminum or other materials to cover the holes used to install UFFI.

In 1982, the U.S. Consumer Product Safety Commission (CPSC) banned the sale and installation of UFFI in residences and schools because it contended that formaldehyde gas emitted by the insulation posed an unreasonable risk of causing certain health problems, including a variety of respiratory ailments or irritations, and even cancer. In 1983, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit overturned the CPSC's ban. n28 The court held that while the evidence presented by the CPSC did indicate the possibility of a link between UFFI and acute irritant effects as well as cancer, and that the CPSC's studies did suggest that "UFFI is not completely innocent," n29 the ban could not be justified because there was not substantial evidence that UFFI was carcinogenic. The CPSC never responded to the court's challenge by accumulating additional evidence. Massachusetts and Connecticut are the only states that prohibit the sale of UFFI. Because of the controversy, however, UFFI was rarely used after the mid-1980s. A CPSC publication entitled An Update on Formaldehyde, 1997 Revision, describes the health effects of formaldehyde gas, both from UFFI and other materials.

When the CPSC's ban on UFFI became effective, the National Association of Realtors(R) advised its members that the existence of a potential health hazard from UFFI was a material fact that should be disclosed to purchasers. Brokers were advised to obtain from sellers any information about the presence of UFFI in a home being sold, and to provide that information to purchasers, using a form for the buyers to sign to acknowledge that disclosure. The form also included a space for sellers to indicate that they had no knowledge whatsoever about the presence or absence of UFFI in the home.

UFFI became less of a concern after the Fifth Circuit overturned the CPSC ban. Despite the withdrawal of the ban, however, in October 1987, the Superior Court of Pennsylvania, in Roberts v. Estate of Barbagallo, n30 found a real estate agency liable to the purchaser for fraudulent concealment of UFFI and rescinded a sale. The home in question was sold after the CPSC banned the use of UFFI but before the Fifth Circuit overturned the ban. Four days after closing, the purchaser had a contractor inspect the premises in contemplation of renovating the property. Upon being told that the home was insulated with UFFI, the purchaser had the indoor air analyzed. It was found to contain 0.1 parts per million (ppm) formaldehyde fumes, an amount that the county health department found might cause irritation in normally healthy people. The purchaser's mother, who intended to reside in the home, suffered from a sinus condition and allergies.

The real estate agency had received information from the Board of Realtors(R) informing of the dangers of UFFI and advising that purchasers should be told when a home contains UFFI. The agency's listing agent was advised by the seller that insulation had been blown into the walls but the seller did not know if the insulation used was UFFI.

The court found no evidence that the formaldehyde fumes created an unreasonable risk or that the formaldehyde levels in the home were attributable to the insulation. However, it found the real estate agency liable for fraudulent concealment of a material fact for failing to disclose the potential presence of UFFI in the home. Thus, the basis for the court's holding appears to be that the broker failed to disclose general information about UFFI and the possibility that it might be present, rather than the failure to disclose the UFFI itself, which in fact the broker did not know about. Such a duty to advise purchasers of all potential environmental problems a property may suffer is a burdensome and onerous standard for brokers to satisfy, and has not been applied in other cases. The court appears to have been influenced in reaching this conclusion by the fact that the Board of Realtors(R) to which the broker belonged had recommended to its members that information concerning UFFI be disclosed to both buyers and sellers, and despite this recommendation the brokerage firm had adopted a policy of not making such disclosures. The court granted the purchaser her elected remedy--rescission of the sale. n31

In Brock v. Tarrant, n32 a Washington case, a listing broker prevailed in a suit alleging nondisclosure of UFFI to the purchaser. The facts indicated that the sellers had quite clearly concealed the presence of UFFI from the broker and the purchaser, and that the broker had no knowledge of the presence of UFFI. The purchasers sued the sellers, the listing broker and the selling broker for rescission or damages. The purchasers settled their claims against the sellers and the selling agent and the sale was rescinded. The purchasers assigned their claim against the listing broker to the sellers, and the matter proceeded to a bench trial where the listing broker prevailed. The court awarded the listing broker $22,279 in costs and attorneys' fees and the sellers unsuccessfully appealed. The sellers had failed to disclose to the listing broker their knowledge that the home contained UFFI, that they had suffered certain adverse health effects, and that there was a pending lawsuit against the installer regarding the insulation. Furthermore, the sellers had initialed a provision stating they knew of no material structural defects and that nothing on the property required attention or repair. The court found that the sellers had induced the listing broker to unknowingly list and sell defective property and affirmed the trial court's award. Finally, in Catucci v. Lewis, n33 the New Hampshire Supreme Court affirmed a jury verdict in favor of a seller and his real estate agent for failing to disclose UFFI in the home bought by the plaintiffs. Although the affirmance is on grounds unrelated to the broker's disclosure responsibility, there is no indication that the broker knew about the problem, and that appears to be the likely basis for the jury's conclusion that the broker was not liable to the purchaser for nondisclosure.

Although UFFI is no longer in use, it continues to be of concern when found in a building. When used, UFFI was mixed on the site by the contractor. Thus, there was no guarantee that manufacturers' guidelines regarding the amount of formaldehyde were followed. Theoretically, therefore, formaldehyde gas would be emitted from UFFI in different amounts and at different rates for each home containing UFFI, thereby presenting different degrees of risk. After UFFI hardens in the wall cavity, it is quite difficult to remove.

Indoor air pollution caused by formaldehyde vapors will continue to be a concern as long as building products are made with materials containing urea formaldehyde. For example, building trades are increasingly relying on particleboard and hardwood plywood in the construction of homes and buildings. Both products are bonded with urea-formaldehyde resins and can emit formaldehyde gas in the same way UFFI does. Since the Roberts case appears to be an anomaly and to be based on the specific facts there, the few cases discussed above seem to suggest that the risk of potential liability a real estate agent may face in the sale of residential housing that has urea-formaldehyde or other potentially toxic substances is small so long as the agent discloses all hazards that are actually known. Formaldehyde and/or UFFI are also items expressly indicated on many of the seller disclosure forms promulgated by states pursuant to their seller disclosure statutes or regulations. See § 15.01[3] above. Massachusetts further requires a seller of a residence containing UFFI to test for formaldehyde gas and to provide the test results, as well as the location of the UFFI and certain information prepared by the Department of Public Health, to any prospective purchaser. n34

[5] Lead Paint

EDITOR'S NOTE:

Real estate brokers have a duty to ensure compliance with federal disclosure requirements related to the actual or potential presence of lead-based paint in connection with the sale or rental of residential housing built before 1978. See Chapter 15A below an overview of the federal disclosure requirements as they affect brokers as well as sample forms conforming to federal disclosure requirements.

The ubiquitous presence of lead-based paint in our older housing stock is another insidious environmental flaw that poses severe health risks, particularly in children. It is estimated that seventy-five percent of housing built before 1980 contains some lead-based paint.

Lead poisoning affects the brain and kidneys and may cause nerve damage. Children are the most vulnerable victims of lead poisoning, which can occur when they eat lead-containing paint chips that have peeled or flaked off the walls or inhale dust particles containing lead. These particles are released into the air by the friction caused by opening windows and doors coated with lead-based paint. Homeowners who undertake renovations of older homes may disturb surfaces coated with lead-based paint and may release dangerous particles of lead dust into the air.

An additional source of lead in older homes is lead-containing pipes in the plumbing system. Lead enters the water supply through the corrosion of water pipes made from lead materials and containing lead-based solder.

Pursuant to the Residential Lead-Based Paint Hazard Reduction Act ("Federal Act"), n35 Federal regulations were adopted and became effective in September 1996 requiring owners of residential property built before 1978 being sold or leased, and brokers representing such owners, to disclose information about lead-based paint hazards to purchasers and tenants of the property. (For a more detailed discussion of these regulations, see Chapter 15A below.) Purchasers are also entitled to a ten-day period in which to conduct a lead-based paint risk assessment or inspection. n36 The law also requires a warning statement to be placed in all contracts to purchase such housing. See discussion of language requirements for sales contracts in § 15A.03[5][a] below. A similar warning statement must be provided to tenants leasing property built before 1978. See discussion of language requirements for leases in § 15A.03[5][b] above. These federal regulations do not, however, preempt any other applicable state or local requirements related to lead-based paint or disclosure thereof. Consequently, property owners and brokers must comply with these regulations include the duty of sellers to provide specified disclosures to residential real estate purchasers requirements discussed a laws or regulations. These requirements are the seller disclosure require § 15.01[3] above, almost all of which explicitly refer to lead-based paint. The seller disclosure laws and forms of virtually all states that have adopted them include a reference to and requirement that the known presence of lead-based paint be disclosed, and at least four states also impose on the owner and/or the owner's agent the duty to provide specific notification to prospective purchasers of the possible presence of lead-based paint or hazards. n37 In Rhode Island, the existence of a state statutory scheme requiring lead-based paint disclosure, similar to the Federal Act, was held to make a seller exempt from a claim under the state Deceptive Trade Practices Act (DTPA) notwithstanding the seller's alleged failure to disclose the presence of lead-based paint. n38 The DTPA provides an exception for "actions or transactions permitted under laws administered by the department of business regulation or other regulatory body or (state) officer... ." Another important decision applying Rhode Island law is Wallace v. United States, n39 where the court held that the Federal lead-based paint disclosure regulations "may establish a standard of care resulting in negligence liability (under Rhode Island law) if breached." Thus, under that decision, a violation of the Federal regulations could result in damages awarded for state common law tort (negligence) liability in addition to the possible civil penalties and damages provided for in the Federal Act.

The seriousness of penalties that may be imposed on a seller or the seller's broker for misrepresenting that a home is free of lead-based paint is demonstrated in Piers v. Wheeler & Taylor. n40 In that case the plaintiffs had specifically advised the real estate agent that they were aware of and concerned about the hazards of lead-based paint, and would not consider purchasing any homes that had not been delead. The home they purchased had been completely rehabilitated by an employee of the defendant real estate firm, but the work in the home was done without specific attention to or removal of the lead-based paint it contained. Another agent of the firm assisted the plaintiffs and expressly represented that it had been delead, when in fact it had not been. The owner, the real estate agent, and the firm were each held to have violated a Massachusetts statute that makes unlawful "unfair or deceptive acts or practices in the conduct of any trade or commerce... ." n41 Because of the conduct in affirmatively representing the home as delead when it was not, the plaintiffs were awarded double their damages against the seller and treble damages against the real estate agent and the firm, the latter on the basis of respondeat superior.

Another case also involved a claim against a real estate broker arising out of the broker's involvement in the sale of a residence containing lead-based paint, but with a different result because the nature of the broker's knowledge and conduct was fundamentally different. Farrar v. Acker n42 includes claims against a home seller, a real estate broker, and the broker's firm, asserting a variety of causes of action including failure to disclose, delead, and inspect for lead-based paint; negligence; misrepresentation; breach of implied warranty of habitability; and a claim under the Connecticut Unfair Trade Practices Act. The court granted the broker's motion to dismiss as to all counts, holding that the plaintiffs' complaint against the seller as well as the broker was deficient because the plaintiffs had failed to allege that they did not know or have reason to know of the condition or risk involved and [the seller] knew or had reason to know of the condition and that [the seller] realized or should have realized the risk involved and that [the seller] had a reason to believe that the plaintiffs would not discover the condition or realize the risks. n43

The court also held that the complaint was factually insufficient to support any duty on the part of the broker "to warn [the buyers] of conditions that their own inspection of the property could have uncovered," n44 and that the seller and broker "could reasonably expect that the [buyers] would make their own examination and draw their own conclusions..." n45 The court rejected the plaintiffs' claim that there was an implied warranty of habitability made by the seller and broker, and also that the broker had misrepresented the property. The court found that the broker had not made any affirmative representations regarding the existence or nonexistence of lead-based paint on the premises, and that a claim for misrepresentation based on nondisclosure would have to be based on a duty to disclose, but that the court had already rejected any such duty by the broker. n46

Although the Farrah case represents only a decision on a motion to dismiss by a trial level court, the court's analysis represents a substantial departure from the broker disclosure responsibilities imposed by the Federal lead-based paint regulations and even those suggested in Roberts v. Estate of Barbagallo. n47 Each of those suggests a duty by the broker to warn prospective purchasers of the possible presence and dangers of hazards such as lead-based paint. Farrah, however, appears to not only relieve the broker of the duty to investigate for such hazards or even to advise the buyer of their possibility, but instead to place the obligation to understand the importance of and need for such investigation squarely on the shoulders of the buyer alone. Similarly, Nunez v. J.L. Sims Company, Inc. n48 held the seller and the seller's broker and agent not liable under the federal lead-based paint disclosure regulations and a multitude of common law claims where there was substantial if not complete compliance with the requirements of the regulations. Both the seller and agents n49 had also made considerable efforts to advise the purchasers of the possible existence of, and health hazards presented by, lead-based paint, and to afford the purchasers the opportunity to investigate and inspect the property. The seller and his agent had no knowledge of lead-based paint in the home, and they had not failed to disclose facts of which they had actual knowledge or of which they should have been aware in the exercise of reasonable skill and care. Thus, the court rejected the purchasers' common law claims for fraud, breach of contract, breach of fiduciary duty, and negligence per se. In ruling on the negligence per se claim, the court held that even if the agents had violated the federal lead-based paint disclosure regulations, a charge rejected by the court, such a violation could not under Ohio law provide a basis for application of negligence per se. On the other hand, a Federal District Court applying Maine common law allowed a claim for negligence based on allegations that a buyer's broker failed to comply with a Maine statute requiring brokers and agents to "[D]isclos(e) to the buyer material facts of which (the agent) has actual knowledge or, if acting in a reasonable manner, should have known concerning the transaction." n50 In that case the buyer alleged that the agent failed to comply with the federal lead-based paint regulations, and also alleged the agent was liable for "professional negligence" for failing to "warn [the buyers] of the risk that there would be lead paint in the home and the dangers thereof, a risk that they knew or should have known existed." n51 Flowers v. ERA Unique Real Estate, Inc. n52 involved a similar claim against both the sellers and the real estate agents involved in the sale of an apartment building purchased by the plaintiffs. Plaintiffs alleged that the sellers and agents were liable for negligent misrepresentation because they knew, or should have known, that the building contained lead-based paint. The court denied defendant real estate agents' motion to dismiss the latter claim, holding that the duty to disclose material facts imposed under the Illinois Real Estate License Act n53 allows real estate brokers and agents to be liable "for failing to disclose a latent defect to the buyer if the real estate broker or agent 'knew or should have known' of the latent defect." n54 In Ayers v. United States n54.1 the plaintiff sued the seller, the federal government (HUD), as seller of the property purchased by the plaintiff, and HUD's agent in selling the house, after learning that the house contained lead-based paint. The court held that no damages were available to the plaintiff from HUD under the Toxic Substances Control Act (TSCA) n54.2 or the Residential Lead-Based Paint Hazard Reduction Act (RLBPHRA), n54.3 or against the government's agent under TSCA or the Lead-Based Paint Poisoning and Prevention Act, n54.4 but the District Court held that it had jurisdiction over a claim for damages against HUD's agent under the RLBPHRA.

In Chapman v. Mutual Service Casualty Insurance Company, n55 the buyers sued a number of parties, including the real estate broker, involved in their purchase of a home containing lead-based paint that injured their young son. In ruling on the broker's motion for summary judgment, the court held that the "as is" clause in the contract of sale barred claims against the broker for misrepresentation or failure to warn the buyers about the dangers of or possible presence of lead-based paint. The court also held, however, that the broker might be liable for other acts of negligence if the buyer could show a breach of the broker's duties to investigate and disclose as set forth in Wisconsin statute or regulation.

Another lead-based paint case involving a real estate broker but not presenting the question of the broker's liability for failing to disclose lead-based paint hazards is the decision of the Massachusetts Supreme Court in Underwood v. Risman, n56 where the defendant was the owner of the property, but was also a residential real estate broker. The court ruled that the owner was not liable under a Massachusetts statute making unlawful "unfair or deceptive acts or practices in the conduct of any trade or commerce" n57 for not disclosing the possibility of lead-based paint in a residential dwelling rented to a childless couple. The couple later had a child and sued the owner when it was discovered that the apartment had high amounts of lead-based paint and the child suffered from elevated levels of lead in his bloodstream. The owner had no knowledge of any lead-based paint or hazards in the unit, although he did testify that he was aware of the hazards associated with lead-based paint and that lead-based paint was more likely in older houses such as that rented. Nevertheless the court held that one cannot be liable "for failing to disclose what one does not know." And in Dyer v. Criegler, n58 the Maryland Court of Appeals held that a real estate agent who lists and promotes residential property for rent is not an "owner" within the meaning of the Maryland Lead Paint Act. The court therefore affirmed the trial court's dismissal of the plaintiff's complaint against the agent for failure to state a claim. The Court of Appeals noted that although the Act imposed on "owners" a duty to take protective measures to prevent lead poisoning and defined owner to include "leasing agents," such agents were within the scope of the definition of owner only if they also "own, hold, or control the whole or any part" of the property. The court further noted that this conclusion was consistent with the intent of the statutory scheme to impose duties regarding lead-based paint on those with the right to control the property, and that a real estate agent acting only to list, promote, and effect a sale or rental of property is without such control. n59 Moreover, in a comment that is interesting but clearly dicta, the court also described its conclusion as consistent with the "general law governing liability of real estate agents and brokers" because "there is no duty imposed on agents or brokers, acting for a seller, to investigate and ascertain if any defects exist on the property in question and to disclose any such defects to a buyer" (citations omitted). In Dixon v. South Boston Corporation, n59.1 the court interpreted and applied a Virginia statute that provides that real estate agents under contract with a seller or lessor to market property are immune from liability from lead poisoning arising from the condition of a residential dwelling if the agent complies with the requirements of the Federal Lead-Based Paint Hazards Reduction Act. The statute further provides that if the agent also maintains the property, he or she must maintain the premises in fit and habitable condition and otherwise comply with Virginia law to enjoy such immunity. And in Price v. Hickory Point Bank & Trust n59.2 the court held that whether or not an agent had knowledge of lead-based paint in the premises was not relevant to whether the agent could be liable for allegedly negligently failing to disclose lead paint, since a prima facie case of common law negligence was established by the agent's acknowledged violations of the federal lead-based paint disclosure regulations and a municipal code provision designed to protect human life or health.

Other litigation arising out of the presence of lead-based paint in residential dwellings frequently involves claims against landlords or property management agents, including public housing authorities, alleging liability for injuries suffered as a result of exposure to lead-based paint. These suits allege a variety of legal theories, including:

- common-law negligence, n60
- breach of the covenant to repair, n61
- breach of the warranty of habitability, n62
- violation of state consumer protection laws, n63
- statutory negligence, n64 and
- strict liability. n65

The result in some cases turns on whether the landlord had actual notice of the problem. In Brown v. Wheeler,ⁿ⁶⁶ for example, the landlords were not liable because there was no evidence that they knew or had reason to know of chipping, peeling or flaking lead-based paint on the premises, or that such a condition was hazardous. Subsequently the Maryland Court of Appeals held that actual notice to the landlord of the problem is not an element of a prima facie case of negligence where the plaintiff has shown a violation of a municipal ordinance and injury proximately caused by the violation.ⁿ⁶⁷ Similarly, *Juarez v. Wavecrest Management Team Ltd.*ⁿ⁶⁸ holds that the New York City lead abatement law allows a landlord to be charged with notice of lead-based paint hazards in a unit being rented, but not with notice that a child under the age of 7 resides there and is exposed to such hazards. Moreover, in Antwaun v. Heritage Mutual Insurance Company,ⁿ⁶⁹ the Supreme Court of Wisconsin held that "by 1989 the danger of lead paint in residential housing was so extensively known" that whenever the landlord knows or should know of peeling or chipping paint "it is foreseeable that lead paint may be present which, if accurate, would expose the inhabitants to an unreasonable risk of harm." Thus, the court held "that a landlord has a common law duty to test for lead paint when the landlord knows, or, in the exercise of ordinary care, should have known that the residence contained peeling or chipping paint." The Maryland Court of Appeals held likewise in Brown v. Dermer.ⁿ⁷⁰ Jury awards in cases against landlords have often been substantial.ⁿ⁷¹

In addition, two other cases recognize a broker's duty to disclose to purchasers known lead-based paint hazards in a home. In Byrd v. Riley^{n71.1}, the plaintiffs claim for fraud or negligence against the defendant for failing to disclose the lead-based paint in the property was dismissed based on defendant's assertion that he was functioning as a mortgage broker but not a real estate broker. The defendant asserted that acting as a mortgage broker he had no duty to disclose anything about the condition of the property, and in any event did not hold a real estate license. On appeal, the court noted the plaintiff's allegations that he was also acting as a real estate broker in finding and showing them possible homes to purchase. The court held that if the defendant was, in fact, functioning as a real estate broker (although not licensed to do so) he could be liable for fraudulent or negligent misrepresentation of the condition of the property, and in particular, the fact that the property contained lead based paint. The case was remanded to the trial court for a determination of whether defendant's role in the transaction was both as a mortgage and real estate broker, and if the latter, whether he had failed to fulfill any duty to disclose the lead-based paint.

In Stanfill v. Mountain^{n71.2} the plaintiff buyer alleged that a real estate broker acting as a "facilitator" in the transaction failed to disclose a number of defects in the property, including lead-based paint, underground storage tanks, and so-called "mold contamination." The court cited a Tennessee statute^{n71.3} that imposes on brokers a duty to disclose to each party to a transaction any adverse facts of which the broker has actual notice or knowledge. But the broker filed an affidavit affirming that he had no knowledge of the alleged defects and the plaintiff offered no evidence to rebut the broker's statement, and on that basis the trial court granted and the appellate court affirmed summary judgment in favor of the broker.

[6] Electromagnetic Fields

Another source of potential environmental concern that has been suggested is electromagnetic fields (EMFs), which many people fear may cause or exacerbate health problems, including cancer. Opinions vary even in the scientific community regarding whether any health risks are posed by EMFs. To date, no study has conclusively established that EMFs cause cancer or any other disease. A study published by the National Research Council (NRC) in 1996 concluded that "no conclusive evidence shows that exposure to residential electric and magnetic fields produce cancer, adverse neurobiological effects, or reproductive and developmental effects."ⁿ⁷² Moreover, scientists have not developed a theory as to how electromagnetic fields might affect biological systems. The NRC report acknowledges, however, that there remains a weak statistical correlation between "wire codes" and childhood leukemia. Another study published in 1997 likewise produced "little evidence that living in homes characterized by high measured time-weighted average magnetic-field levels or by the highest wire-code category increases the risk of acute lymphoblastic leukemia in children."ⁿ⁷³ Studies such as these are generally careful to point out that the possibility of a link between exposure to EMFs and illness has not yet been excluded. A study released in June 1999 by the National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences, a division of the National Institutes of Health, concluded that "the scientific evidence suggesting that ELF-EMF exposures pose any health risk is weak," although "ELF-EMF exposure cannot be recognized as entirely safe because of weak scientific evidence that exposure may pose a leukemia hazard." The report further concludes that aggressive regulatory concern is "unwarranted," but calls for "passive" activity such as "educating both the public and the regulated community on means aimed at reducing exposures." n74 Although no other published studies yet conclusively link EMF exposure with adverse health effects, some public perception that there is or may be a danger persists.

Overhead high tension utility lines are an obvious source of EMFs. These lines are easily seen, giving concerned potential buyers of properties adjacent to such lines notice of their presence, so that they can make their own inquiries and assessment regarding any danger the high voltage lines may present. However, a utility may have announced plans to install such lines near the property at a later time, a fact that a potential buyer may not know.

Utility companies continue to insist that high tension wires and transformers pose no health hazard, leading one to believe that the only problem with residing within viewing distance of utility towers is an aesthetic one. However, a study released by the Swedish government, in October 1992, suggests that a connection exists between exposure to power lines and cancer, particularly in children. n75 A study released by the EPA was reluctant to state definitively what type or length of exposure was detrimental to health. n76 Other epidemiological studies have failed to find a conclusive connection. Thus, juries are left to decide, on a case-by-case basis, in claims against utility companies whether a plaintiff's cancer or other illness is caused by exposure to electromagnetic fields.

Until a clear dose-response relationship is found by the governmental agencies that monitor utility companies, many communities are adopting a policy of prudent avoidance. It is increasingly common to see lobbying efforts against utilities that wish to place high voltage towers near schools, parks or residential communities. n77 Because of the wide range of opinion by experts regarding the danger of electromagnetic fields, a prudent real estate agent should refrain from making any representation on this issue. Furthermore, real estate agents who list or sell properties contiguous to utility rights of way may even wish to consider obtaining acknowledgments from buyers that they recognize the uncertainty about the health implications of EMF exposure, the proximity of the utility wires, and perhaps even that they will not seek recourse from the broker should the property appear to be devalued at a later date.

An eminent domain case in New York state, Criscuola v. Power Authority, n78 held that the owners of the condemned property were not required to show the reasonableness of the public's fear or perception of health risk from exposure to high voltage power lines in order to recover damages attributable to that fear. The condemnees argued that they should not have to prove the "reasonableness" of the public perception as a separate and additional element of diminished market value. The court agreed, stating:

Whether the danger is a scientifically genuine or verifiable fact should be irrelevant to the central issue of its market value impact. Genuineness and proportionate dollar effects are relevant factors ... [that] should be left to the contest between the parties' market value experts, not magnified and escalated by a whole new battery of electromagnetic power engineers, scientists or medical experts. n79

This reasoning could lessen the burden of purchasers of homes near utility lines seeking damages for the reduced market value of their homes, especially as public awareness heightens and a course of prudent avoidance becomes more common.

Several courts have rebuffed property owner's claims that they suffered physical or economic injury as a result of nearby power lines. In Reiss v. Consolidated Edison Company of New York, n80 the plaintiff's property abutted a right of way carrying a high voltage transmission line. Fearing harm to their child's health from the EMFs emitted by the line they sought to sell their home. They then sued the power company claiming that the sale price was 30% below comparable homes in the area not affected by EMFs due to the public perception of harm caused by EMFs. The court rejected that claim because there was no proof offered that the reduction in the sale price, if any, was caused by the EMFs, and also because there was no proof that EMFs caused a health hazard that would render the property safe and uninhabitable. Similarly, in Borenstein v. Consolidated Edison Company of New York,ⁿ⁸¹ the court rejected the plaintiff's claim for damages based on the alleged reduction in the value of plaintiff's property because of an adjacent power line. That conclusion was based on the fact that the power line was pre-existing when the plaintiffs purchased the property, as well as the court's conclusion that science is unable to yet conclude whether or not harm results from EMFs. In Jordan v. Georgia Power Co.,ⁿ⁸² the plaintiffs sought damages against a power company operating power lines on an easement next to the plaintiff's property. The complaint set forth counts for trespass, nuisance, negligence, negligent misrepresentation, conducting an inherently dangerous activity, and battery, and also alleged that the EMFs emitted were the cause of the non-Hodgkins lymphoma developed by one of the owners. Certain of the counts were dismissed by the court and the case was tried to a jury on the issue of causation. The jury's verdict concluded that the magnetic fields from the transmission lines were not the source of the plaintiff's non-Hodgkins lymphoma, and the court dismissed the remaining claims. The Court of Appeals reversed the verdict because of certain evidentiary errors in admitting expert testimony on the issue of EMFs as the cause of the plaintiff's non-Hodgkins lymphoma, but refused to reverse dismissal of the trespass, nuisance and property damage claims because "[T]he scientific evidence regarding whether EMFs cause harm is inconclusive; the invasive quality of these electric fields cannot presently cause a trespass."ⁿ⁸³ Finally, the plaintiffs in *San Diego Gas and Electric v. Covalt*ⁿ⁸⁴ claimed that power lines adjacent to their property caused cancer and produced emotional distress engendered by a fear of contracting cancer, and that the value of their property was diminished by the power lines. The court dismissed the personal injury claims for "fear of future illness" because there was no reliable medical or scientific opinion that it was more likely than not the plaintiffs would develop cancer in the future due to EMF exposure. The property damage claims were dismissed as being within the exclusive jurisdiction of the state Public Utilities Commission. That conclusion was later affirmed by the California Supreme Court.ⁿ⁸⁵

The appropriate course of action for real estate brokers and agents in disclosing the possibility of EMF dangers remains unclear. The considerable uncertainty, perhaps even unlikelihood, of whether EMFs cause physical injury, coupled with these cases and the very obvious nature of the usual source of EMF exposure--power transmission lines--may provide a basis for brokers to persuasively assert that they have no legal duty to disclose EMFs or the potential problems with EMFs.ⁿ⁸⁶

Yet another environmental hazard that may be present in residential housing is the pesticide chlordane. A popular termiticide in use from the late 1940s to the late 1980s, chlordane was applied to the soil around the outside of a house as a means of treating subterranean termites. However, the pesticide often leached into the home through crevices in the foundation. Its use was banned in April 1988 after studies showed traces of chlordane remained in the air of treated homes and posed a potential health risk to occupants. Studies also showed that even one year after treatment detectable levels of chlordane were still present in homes. Chlordane was also found in soil treated thirty years earlier. Because of its prevalent use, any home treated for termites prior to the early 1980s probably was exposed to chlordane.

In Smith v. Renaut,ⁿ⁸⁷ a home buyer sought damages from a real estate agent and the brokerage firm for failing to disclose the presence of chlordane in the well water of the home purchased. The buyer, after learning of the contamination of the well water, sold the house for $6,000 less than she paid for it. A jury awarded her compensatory damages in the amount of $20,270, to be paid largely by the brokerage firm and the real estate agent, and the rest by the seller. It also awarded punitive damages in the sum of $22,500 payable only by the agent and the brokerage firm. The appellate court reversed that verdict, holding that the agent and firm could not be liable for misrepresenting the presence of chlordane since there was no evidence that they had any knowledge that chlordane had been used, that a residue of chlordane remained in the well water, or even that chlordane is a carcinogen.

[8] Underground Storage Tanks

It was previously common practice to bury under ground the tanks used to store petroleum products, heating oil and chemicals used in building operations or activities. Not only did burying the tanks minimize the risk of fire, it also removed an eyesore. Placing tanks underground made it difficult, however, to check on the condition of the tank and repair any leaks that occurred. As a tank ages, the probability of leaks increases if it still contains liquid. While the cost of removing and replacing a leaking tank can be substantial, the cost of remediating the contamination the leak has caused in the groundwater or surrounding soil can be devastating.

Abandoned underground tanks are often not discovered until after a sale closes. Sometimes the property has changed hands many times since a tank was abandoned, with the result that succeeding buyers are never notified of its existence. A water or soil contamination problem is often the first sign of the existence of a leaking underground tank. The current owner of a property may be unwittingly saddled with the responsibility for cleaning up the resulting contamination without having known at the time of purchase that an underground tank was present on the property. Many states require that tanks be registered with the state fire marshal or other designated agency,ⁿ⁸⁸ but these laws are not always followed, especially by farmers and small business owners who may be unaware that such a requirement exists.

The growing concern about the environmental damage that underground tanks can cause resulted in federal law governing certain size tanks and those containing certain products.ⁿ⁸⁹ This federal law does not apply to farm or residential tanks of 1,100 gallons or less used for storing motor fuel, tanks containing heating oil for the premises where stored, or septic tanks. Most states have also enacted laws regulating underground storage tanks, which in some cases apply to tanks excluded from coverage under the federal regulatory regime.ⁿ⁹⁰ All tanks covered by federal law were required to be equipped with leak detection systems by 1993, and to meet rigorous requirements for corrosion, spill and overflow protection, or to be taken out of service completely, by December 1998.ⁿ⁹¹ Tanks covered by the federal rules must be registered with the appropriate state agency and any leaks must also be reported. Federal law and that of states generally applies to owners of the property where the tank is located, or to the operator of the tank, or both. It does not apply to real estate brokers involved in transactions where a tank is or may be located. Nevertheless, brokers should be alert to the possibility that a tank may be present on a property with which they are involved so that the purchaser does not unknowingly take on the obligation to upgrade or remove the tank.

One appellate court has held that a farm purchaser who was not told of the existence of an abandoned tank that had leaked into the groundwater could seek damages for cleanup costs from the seller's broker involved in the sale. In Grube v. Daun,ⁿ⁹² the broker argued that it was protected from liability for misrepresentations and failure to investigate because the purchase contract contained an "as is" clause. The trial court accepted this argument, but the appellate court reversed and remanded the case for a new trial. It held that a broker could be liable for any positive misrepresentations made about property sold on an "as is" basis. In this case the plaintiffs alleged that the broker made factual misrepresentations by stating that the property would be suitable for business, residential, recreation and family uses, and the court found those allegations sufficient to allege claims for misrepresentation. The court also held that once the seller or the seller's agent has made an affirmative representation about an aspect of the property, the buyer may rely on that statement and expect full and fair disclosure regarding that aspect. The broker also allegedly told the plaintiffs that he would find out and advise them about the depth of the wells, and the court found that this representation was sufficient to require full and complete disclosure about the wells. The court found that the "as is" provision in the sales contract afforded the broker no protection from the plaintiffs' misrepresentation claims, although it could be used as evidence in a trial that the plaintiffs did not or should not be permitted to rely on the broker's statements. In Fulton v. Vogt,ⁿ⁹³ the court held that the broker was not liable for failing to disclose an underground gas storage tank. The court reached that conclusion in part because the "as is" clause imposed on the purchaser the responsibility to ascertain the condition of the property, and also because, the court concluded, the broker's duties to inspect the property did not extend to include "a duty to discover hidden and not readily observable defects." In Foss v. Madison Twentieth Century Theatres, Inc.,ⁿ⁹⁴ the plaintiff sought from the prior owner and its real estate broker damages for the expenses he incurred in cleaning up contaminated soil resulting from leakage from an underground tank. The broker had prepared and the sellers had signed and provided to the purchaser a form that incorrectly but inadvertently stated that they had no knowledge of any underground storage tanks on the property, when in fact they knew of a tank. Despite that unintentional misrepresentation, a survey secured by the buyer revealed the presence of the tanks. The buyer did not undertake any further investigation or inquiry about the status of the tanks, and proceeded to close on the transaction. When he was compelled to remove the tanks and clean up the contamination, he sought reimbursement from the sellers and broker. The court denied the claim, however, holding that the buyer had not relied on the seller's and broker's representations, and that they had no independent obligation to perform the cleanup or contribute to the new owner's cleanup costs.

In Binette v. Dyer Library Association, n95 the court reinstated claims for negligence and violation of the Maine Unfair Trade Practices Act against a broker who failed to disclose to a buyer the presence of a 3000-gallon underground tank on a property purchased. The court noted the broker's obligation was to disclose material defects of which he had knowledge or in the exercise of reasonable care should have knowledge. The broker was not aware of the tank, but the court also noted administrative regulations that require a broker to inquire of the owner as to any hazardous materials on or in the property, including underground storage tanks, and to convey what he learned to the buyer. The court thus reversed and remanded a summary judgment award in favor of the broker for consideration of the reasonableness of what the broker had done to discover the tanks and disclose the presence of the tanks to the buyer.

In Smith v. Hauer, n96 the sellers and their real estate broker and agent disclosed to the purchaser the presence of an underground oil storage tank on the property, but the purchasers nevertheless sued them when home heating oil was discovered in the home's water well some time after the purchasers occupied the property. The sellers and real estate agent had called the tank to the purchaser's attention and provided evidence that it had been tested and found not to have leaked, and that it was insured. The tank was also identified by the purchaser's inspector, who also provided notice that tanks may leak and testing is the only way to ascertain whether there is leakage. Moreover, it appeared that the oil contamination in the well did not come from the tank but from an oil supplier. The court concluded that neither the sellers nor the broker or agent had negligently, intentionally, or fraudulently misrepresented, omitted or concealed material facts and entered judgment in their favor.

Ramsden v. Farm Credit Services of North Central Wisconsin, ACA n97 involved a claim against a seller, the seller's agent acting as the auctioneer of the property, and the entity that financed the purchase of the property. The court held that although the agent in this context may not have had an obligation to affirmatively disclose that an underground storage tank on the property had leaked and contaminated the soil with benzene, once the agent undertook to make any representations he was obligated to do so truthfully. Because the agent was alleged to have knowledge of the contamination and to have made statements about that condition that were either false or that omitted material facts relevant to the condition about which he spoke, he could be liable to the purchaser for intentional or negligent misrepresentation. But in Stanfill v. Mountain n97.01 the broker's un rebutted disclaimer of any knowledge about the underground tanks was sufficient to allow him to defeat the buyer's claim for concealment or failure to disclose the underground storage tank on the property. Brandt v. United States Liability Insurance Group n97.1 addresses the related and important issue of whether a real estate firm and its agents are entitled to coverage under an errors and omissions liability insurance policy for claims alleging a failure to disclose contamination that was caused by the prior presence of an underground heating oil storage tank on the premises. The court held that policy language excluding from coverage "any claim, damages, claims expenses, loss, cost or expense arising out of...or in any way related to ...[t]he actual or alleged presence...of...contaminants [or] pollutants" was clear and unambiguous, and therefore the defendant real estate firm and its agent were not entitled to coverage under the policy. Finally, the buyers in Russo v. DeWolfe Co., Inc. n97.2 were told by their home inspector that it was likely that there was or had been an underground storage tank on the property. Their real estate broker told them he would find out more about it and prior to closing responded to their inquiry about the matter by indicating that it had been "taken care of." After closing the buyers discovered that there was, in fact, an underground tank on the property, and they sued the broker on a variety of theories based on those statements. The broker contended that it had not knowingly made a false statement because his statements were "too vague" and insufficient to sustain plaintiff's cause of action. The court held that whether or not those statements were vague or were representations on which the buyer was entitled to rely involved issues of fact, and denied the broker's motion for summary judgment.

The prudent real estate agent will guard against claims like those advanced in these cases by asking the seller about underground tanks on the property, either at the present time or in the past, and by looking for signs of underground tanks when viewing the property. These signs include pipes protruding from the ground, odors of solvents or gasoline, staining of soil or water that appears oily. Such efforts to identify any underground tanks will protect the broker and agent and will also provide the parties an opportunity to address issues raised by the presence of the tank prior to entering into a transaction.

[9] Mold

Mold is a more recently recognized environmental concern that can afflict real estate use, occupancy, and real estate transactions. As a result of a very few highly publicized incidents where residents suffered adverse health effects attributed to the presence of various kinds of mold growth in homes and obtained substantial judgments in their favor, n98 many people have developed a new awareness of the potential effects that certain molds may have on human health.

[a] Mold Basics

Mold has been recognized as a potential health problem since biblical times. n99 Molds and mold spores are pervasively present throughout indoor and outdoor environments. Many, perhaps even most, molds are not harmful to humans, and some, such as those involved in producing some cheeses and antibiotics, are affirmatively beneficial. A few are believed to be quite harmful, the most well-known and recognized of which is stachybotrys chartarum, or so-called "black mold." Mold is quite prolific: spores spread easily through the air and can begin to develop tangible mold growth almost anywhere there is access to a moisture source and organic material as a food source. Such sources in or around the household commonly include wood, paper, or other fibrous material, such as that in carpeting or furniture. Household moisture sources, such as flooding, window, roof or plumbing leaks, high humidity or other dampness from household activities such as laundry, cooking, or showering, or basement dampness, create potential sources of mold growth. As a result, the most effective method to control or prevent mold growth in homes or other buildings is to monitor and eliminate sources of moisture where mold growth can propagate.

[b] Health Effects of Mold

Science has not yet developed a comprehensive understanding of the effects of mold on human health, but research has been done and more is ongoing. The National Academy of Sciences Institute of Medicine, sponsored by the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services and the Center for Disease Control and Prevention undertook "a comprehensive review of the scientific literature regarding the relationship between damp or moldy indoor environments and the manifestation of adverse health effects, particularly respiratory and allergic symptoms" n100 and on May 25, 2004 issued its report ("IOM Report.") n101 The news release announcing issuance of the IOM Report asserts that "[S]cientific evidence links mold and other factors related to damp conditions in homes and buildings to asthma symptoms in some people with the chronic disorder, as well as to coughing, wheezing, and upper respiratory tract symptoms in otherwise healthy people," but went on to acknowledge that "the available evidence does not support an association between either indoor dampness or mold and the wide range of other health complaints that have been ascribed to them." n102

Consistent with its charge, the IOM committee surveyed existing research and literature addressing the relationship between dampness, mold and other microbial growth in indoor environments and adverse human health outcomes of residents in such environments. The committee found sufficient evidence of an association between damp indoor environments and/or the presence of mold or other microbiologic agents and certain respiratory symptoms, but found inadequate or insufficient evidence to determine the existence of an association between such indoor environments and more serious adverse health effects, such as cancer, fatigue, reproductive effects, lower respiratory illness in otherwise healthy individuals, skin symptoms, and neuropsychiatry symptoms. The committee also found insufficient evidence of a causal relationship between adverse health outcomes and such indoor environments. Nevertheless, the committee concluded that "excessive indoor dampness is a public-health problem." The committee identified a wide array of research needs related to making a more specific determination of whether, to what extent, and how adverse human health outcomes can result from dampness and microbial agents in indoor environments, and how such environments can be prevented and remediated.

Information and research about damp indoor environments and mold and their corresponding health effects continues to develop and is readily available on the Internet and from federal, state and local environmental or health agencies. In addition to the information and analysis provided in the CDC Report, other websites that address mold issues include the following:

[c] Mold and Real Estate

The characteristics of mold described above make it a particularly vexing concern for real estate owners, operators, and real estate professionals. As noted above, and unlike other environmental concerns such as radon, lead-based paint or asbestos, there is not yet a well-developed understanding of the effects of mold exposure on human health, and what is understood suggests that a multitude of factors affect whether any particular individual will experience any symptoms if exposed to mold. These factors include the type of mold, the "amount" of mold, and the particular susceptibilities and health condition of the individual exposed to mold. Another difficulty is that mold spores, from which mold growth develops, are everywhere and easily spread, and they can begin to create mold growth and additional spore generation wherever there is access to moisture and organic material. Thus, the customary "disclose, test, and fix, if necessary" protocol that is often employed with respect to other environmental hazards simply does not readily apply to molds. Testing does not yield useful reliable results since it is unclear what "level" of mold spores cause health effects. Moreover, mold growth can occur quickly under favorable conditions, so mold growth could occur promptly after a test suggested the absence of a mold "problem." The prudent approach of most real estate owners and occupants, as well as parties to real estate transactions and their agents, will probably be limited to looking for signs of visible mold growth, taking action to eliminate it when found, and being alert to potential sources of moisture where mold growth is likely to occur. Indeed, a number of pamphlets and brochures published by state health agencies recognize that mold may pose some health concerns but acknowledge that the type and severity of those health effects are unpredictable and specific to particular individuals. Such pamphlets also commonly advise against "testing" because of its unreliability and uncertain benefits. n103 Several states (CA, NY, TX) have convened legislative task forces to consider the feasibility of developing mold testing or remediation standards and protocols, health effects, exposure limits, and the like, but none has so far achieved any success in doing so.

[d] Litigation and Legislation

[i] Litigation

Some commentators had predicted a "litigation explosion" of cases involving claims based on mold, and it is indeed the case that cases involving claims arising out of the presence of mold in homes are becoming more common. Despite the uncertainties about the health implications of mold exposure discussed above, in many cases the parties appear to accept at face value and without challenge the plaintiffs' claims of adverse effects resulting from mold in their purchased or leased residence. n104 Duman v. Campbell n105 involved claims against both the seller and the seller's real estate agent arising out of the buyer's discovery of water leakage in a bathroom and water leakage and mold in the basement. The court upheld summary judgment in favor of the seller and agent with respect to leakage in the bathroom because it found that the buyer had an inspection performed and a sufficient opportunity to inspect. With respect to leakage and mold in the basement, however, the court reversed and held that summary judgment in favor of the seller was not appropriate because the seller's personal items prevented the buyer from conducting a suitable inspection, and the home inspector's report was ambiguous on the issue. With respect to the agent, the court noted that the agent could be liable for relaying to the buyers the seller's statement regarding the "dry basement" only if the agent had actual knowledge that the seller's representation was not true or the seller acted with "reckless disregard" for the truth. Since there was some evidence that a prior inspection of which the agent was aware had revealed wet/damp areas in the basement, the court held that summary judgment in favor of the agent was also inappropriate, and reversed the lower court's order of summary judgment in the agent's favor as well. In Jeffries-Baxter v. Incognito n106 however, the court granted summary judgment in favor of both the listing and selling real estate agents on the buyers' fraud claim because the buyer failed to offer any evidence that either real estate firm knew that mold existed on the property. The court declined to grant summary judgment to the sellers, though, holding that the buyers had advanced evidence from which a jury could reasonably conclude that the sellers knew that mold existed and failed to disclose same to the buyers. FSR Brokerage, Inc. v. Superior Court of Los Angeles County n107 involved a buyer's claim against both the buyers' and sellers' agents. The plaintiff buyers asserted that the sellers and their real estate agent fraudulently failed to disclose known defects, including that the wooden subsurface (below the dirt line) of the home was in contact with the soil, leading to mold growth within the home and mold-caused health problems suffered by residents.

Many cases involving real estate agents and mold reflect the recognition, as reflected in the IOM Report, that not simply mold but indoor moisture and dampness is an adverse property condition to be avoided, and about which disappointed purchasers seek remedies from sellers and agents. In Clark v. Allen, n108 in the regular course of living in their home the sellers had noted certain dampness problems in the crawl space and had repairs performed that they believed had corrected them. When they sold the home they checked a box on the disclosure form indicating that they knew of "current water leakage, water accumulation, excess dampness or other defects with the basement/crawl space," but without providing further detail. After closing, the purchasers discovered standing water, dampness, mold and rotted beams in the crawl space and sued the sellers, but the court denied their claim because there was no indication the sellers knew of those problems or that the work they had performed had not corrected the conditions they had previously identified. The court also held that the sellers were not liable for the affirmatively false statements made by their real estate agent that the crawl space had been treated with silicone (including a lifetime warranty), and that there would never be any water in the crawl space. That conclusion was based on a provision of Ohio law that precludes liability of a principal for misrepresentations by a real estate licensee unless the principal has actual knowledge of the misrepresentation. n109

In Bynum v. Prudential Residential Services, n110 the sellers had performed bathroom remodeling which the subsequent purchasers discovered to have been done improperly, leading to a variety of problems. Those included sewer water leaking into the backyard, sewer water collecting under the master bath, areas outside the hall bath being "soggy," and a leak in the attic believed to be responsible for allowing allegedly toxic stachybotrys mold to grow there. Because neither the sellers nor the agents were aware of these problems or the requirement that performing the bathroom remodeling work may have required municipal building permits, and because of the "as is" clause in the contract, the court rejected the various claims of the purchasers against the sellers and agents. In Bryant v. Bulach, a case involving the seller and buyer of a home in which water leakage and mold growth was discovered by the buyer after moving in, the court affirmed summary judgment for the seller based on caveat emptor. n111 The court applied the doctrine of caveat emptor to exonerate the seller because the water leakage and mold growth was discoverable upon reasonable inspection, the buyer had an unimpeded opportunity to inspect, and there was no evidence or allegation that the seller knew of the leakage or mold or otherwise committed fraud.

Larson v. Safeguard Properties and Chase Manhattan Mortgage Corp. n112 involved a claim against the seller (Chase) that it fraudulently failed to disclose the presence of mold in a home purchased by the plaintiffs. The contract for sale contained a "Mold Addendum" advising about the possible health effects of mold in the home, imposing on the buyer the risks of the presence of mold, providing for the buyer to hold the seller harmless, and suggesting the buyer conduct " 'due diligence using appropriate qualified experts.' " The contract also contained an "as is" clause. Despite those provisions, the court denied the seller's motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, concluding that the "as is" clause does not bar a claim for intentional or fraudulent misrepresentation, and that the reasonableness of the buyers' inspection, their ability to discover the mold, and Chase's knowledge of the presence of the mold, were all questions of fact for trial. In Coldwell Banker Residential Brokerage Company, Inc. v. Salazar, n113 the plaintiff was a minor who claimed he had developed asthma caused by toxic mold in the house in which he lived with his mother, who purchased the house. The plaintiff alleged the seller and his agent had breached various duties of care, and, in particular, that the agent was negligent for failing "to conduct a reasonably competent and diligent inspection of the property and to disclose known or reasonably ascertainable defects, including the presence of dangerous microbial contamination," n114 had actively and intentionally concealed a defective and dangerous condition, and had committed fraud and misrepresentation. Ignoring the considerable uncertainty regarding the effects of exposure to mold on human health, the court noted that "An environmental test showed a dangerous level of mycotoxins and mold spores." n115 The court sustained the defendants demurrer, however, holding that the duty imposed under Cal. Civil Code § 2079 is owed to the prospective purchaser, and because plaintiff was the minor child of the purchaser the defendant owed no such duty to him. Likewise, the court rejected plaintiff's other claims for relief based on the conclusion that the defendants owed him no duty as one not a party to the transaction or one who was entitled to rely on any alleged misrepresentations by the defendants.

Several cases from Michigan confirm the value of sellers and agents acting proactively to protect themselves contractually against claims based on the presence of mold. In Hall v. Small n116 the court affirmed summary disposition against the real estate agents involved in the sale based on the "Statement of Mutual Satisfaction" executed by the parties at closing. That statement provided for the buyers to hold the real estate agents harmless for "any condition that may occur... ." To the same effect is Huhtasaari v. Stockemer and Meck Realty, Inc., n117 where the court dismissed the buyers' claim against the real estate agents due to mold in the home, holding that the release of such claims executed by the buyers in favor of the real estate firm was clear, unambiguous, and therefore valid. The court also affirmed dismissal of claims against the sellers for concealment and fraud, as well as innocent misrepresentation, based on the fact that the sellers made no representations about the presence or absence of mold except with respect to mold that had been previously identified in, but remediated from, the attic. The court further noted that the representations regarding mold in the attic had not been shown to be false.

In two other Michigan cases, releases signed by the purchasers in favor of the real estate agents representing the sellers were held to defeat the plaintiff-purchasers' claims for misrepresentation of conditions in the home sold, including the presence of mold due to water intrusion or dampness. n118 In Crandall v. Grbic, n119 the defendant real estate agent was held not to be liable under various theories where the buyer discovered roof and basement leaks, as well as mold growth in the basement, after moving in. The court held that the agent had not failed to satisfy his duty where he had recommended a professional inspection, which the plaintiff had performed but which did not reveal all the later-discovered problems, and because the agent had not withheld or misstated any information about the property of which he was aware. In Werderman v. Liberty Ventures, LLC, n120 the plaintiffs claimed that as soon as they moved into the house they purchased they discovered that it "exhibited an unsafe and unhealthy mold infestation, the effects of which forced (them) almost immediately to move out of the house." The court found that there was sufficient evidence presented to demonstrate that the brokers had but failed to disclose their actual knowledge of the mold that was present in the house to justify the trial court's denial of the broker's motion for directed verdict and judgment notwithstanding the verdict as to punitive damages.

More recent cases involving failure to disclose mold problems essentially assume that health hazards are associated with mold without citation, analysis, or even discussion. These include Dube-Foreman v. D'Agostino n121, where a real estate purchaser sued the seller, who was also acting as the purchaser's exclusive buyer's representative, for fraudulent concealment of mold in the basement of the home purchased. The purchaser refused to close the transaction and terminated the contract when, on the day of closing, she discovered mold and standing water in an area of the basement that had been obscured from view both when the purchaser first viewed the property and during an inspection of the home. Although the purchaser had not attended the inspection and the contract for sale contained a clause explicitly stating that the purchaser had examined the property and agreed to accept it "AS IS," the court denied the seller's motion for summary judgment.

The court held that where the agent had fiduciary duties to the purchaser the specific disclaimer and AS IS language did not defeat a claim of fraud as a matter of law, since the agent could breach his fiduciary duty by "failing to disclose any information that could reasonably bear on ... consideration [of the transaction]." Thus, the court reversed the summary judgment because the agent had a duty to disclose the mold if she was aware of it, and there were questions of fact regarding the agents knowledge of the mold and the actions she may have taken to conceal it. In Taylor v. Panico, Dopkin, et al. n121.1 the Taylors contacted real estate agent Dopkin for assistance in purchasing a property and specifically advised her that a medical condition required that the property be free of any mold contamination. After entering into a contract to purchase property owned by the Panicos, the Panicos provided a property disclosure report that disclosed, among other things, a prior water leak. The Taylors requested Ms. Dopkin to arrange for an inspection of the property, and Dopkin facilitated the Taylors contracting with an inspection company which did not include a specific determination of the presence or amount of mold. The inspector's report identified certain concerns not including water leakage or mold.

A copy was provided to the Taylors by Dopkin, who indicated that the report was "acceptable." Upon inspecting the property herself Taylor noted concerns, including an allergic reaction, and initially indicated she wanted to cancel the contract. After discussion with Dopkin she elected to proceed with the closing, but upon discovering significant mold contamination, water leakage, and rodent infestation several months later, she sued Dopkin for fraudulent misrepresentation. The court granted summary judgment in favor of Dopkin. Taylor argued that Dopkin falsely stated that the inspection was "thorough and professional" and that the results were "acceptable." As Taylor had reviewed and signed the inspection contract which expressly advised that the inspection did not cover mold, and also had the opportunity to review the report and inspect the property before proceeding with the transaction, the court found that Taylor had not reasonably relied on either or those statements, which reliance was an essential element of her fraud claim.

Interestingly, some other recent cases involving water leakage in a variety of contexts not specifically involving claims against real estate professionals also note the presence of mold as a result of the leakage. Those cases also appear to infer concerns about negative health impacts of mold without inclusion of or reference to any specific factual allegations to that effect, n122 even though the essence of the plaintiffs complaints are water intrusion and flooding into a home not disclosed by the seller, and corresponding damage to the home. Presumably the allegations of mold growth are intended to make the damages claims more forceful, but the presence of other tangible (property) damage allows plaintiffs to avoid the difficulties associated with proving adverse health effects resulting from the mold. n123 An unusual case is Williams v. Abrams, n124 where a home inspector brought an action against a real estate agent alleging that injuries suffered as a result of exposure to "toxic mold" because the agent allegedly knew but failed to disclose to the inspector that there was such mold in the property. Two counts of the complaint alleged only vaguely "intentional misconduct" by the agent, and in response to the defendant's motion to strike those counts the plaintiff relied on a theory of battery as described in the Restatement of Torts (Second) § 16(1). The court noted that battery as defined by the Restatement required the defendant's intent to cause harm, and because there was no allegation of such intent, the court dismissed those counts.

n125 Claims against insurers for failure to provide coverage for property damage resulting from mold growth, and in some cases for personal injury attributed to mold growth after the insurer refused to provide coverage for the expense of mold remediation or prevention, have also been reported. Probably the most "infamous" of these was the lower court decision in Ballard v. Fire Ins. Exchange n126 ($32 million jury verdict for plaintiff, reduced on appeal to just over $4 million). n127 Another reported decision is Cooper v. American Family Mutual Ins. Co., n128 where the court held that the exclusion for mold applied to relieve the insurer from the obligation to pay a mold damage claim even though the mold was believed to be the result of water damage, which was not excluded from coverage. Another insurance issue is whether real estate professionals are entitled to coverage under errors and omissions insurance policies carried by such professionals, a question addressed in Droegkamp v. Langdon. n129 In that case, the plaintiffs had purchased a home from the defendants and later discovered that the garage roof and windows leaked and that the basement wall got wet. They sued the sellers and the real estate firm and agent that had listed the home for sale, alleging that the sellers and agents had intentionally or negligently misrepresented or failed to disclose those defects and seeking damages for diminished value, repair costs, personal injury, "mold problems," and loss of use. The errors and omissions carrier for both the listing firm and its agent sought a declaration that it was not obligated to provide coverage under the policy because of exclusions of claims for "intentional acts," bodily, physical or tangible property injury, or because of "pollution." The court held that the policy exclusion for intentional acts applied to allow the carrier to avoid providing coverage for the claims for breach of contract, intentional misrepresentation (common law and statutory), and statutory fraudulent misrepresentation. On the other hand, the policy exclusions did not apply to avoid coverage for the monetary and pecuniary damages sought for the claims based on strict liability misrepresentation, negligent misrepresentation, negligence, and rescission/restitution. The court noted that those claims did not allege intentionally wrongful conduct, and did not allege damage arising out of "pollution." Although only dicta, the court also expressed doubt that mold was a "pollutant" under the policy language, citing certain authority in Wisconsin to that effect. n130 Likewise, in Eddy v. B.S.T.V. Inc. n131 the Wisconsin Court of Appeals held that an exclusion in a real estate broker's professional liability insurance policy applied to negate the insurer's obligation to cover a broker against claims alleging the broker's failure to discover and disclose that the home being sold was "contaminated by mold." The policy excluded from coverage claims for "Bodily injury, property damage, personal injury, or advertising injury due to rendering or failure to render any professional service (including) services while ... acting (as) Real Estate Agents." The court held that broker's sale of the home "was in the course of 'rendering ... professional services' as real estate agents," and thus squarely within the cited coverage exclusion.

[iii] Legislation

In 2001 California took legislative action to address mold by adopting Senate Bill 732, signed into law on October 5, 2001 and effective January 1, 2002. That legislation deals with mold in several ways. First, it amended Cal. Civil Code Section 1102.6 to add a question about mold to the property condition disclosure form which transferors of residential real estate are required to complete and deliver to the proposed transferee.

Second, the bill amended the California Health and Safety Code to add a new Chapter 18, known as the Toxic Mold Protection Act of 2001. n132 This Act directed the State Department of Health Services (DHS) to consider the feasibility of adopting permissible exposure limits (PELs) to mold in indoor environments, and if so, to adopt such PELs. DHS was also directed to consider and if possible adopt mold identification and remediation guidelines. Finally, the Act required sellers or transferors of commercial or industrial real property to provide written disclosure of any known presence of mold that exceeds the prescribed PELs. Residential property landlords must provide similar written disclosures to prospective and current tenants. These disclosure requirements do not apply, however, unless and until PELs are adopted.

The first of those tasks—the feasibility of adoption of permissible mold exposure levels, was addressed in a report issued by DHS (now the California Department of Public Health) in the CDPH report titled Implementation of the Toxic Mold Protection Act of 2001, issued in 2005. As noted on the CDPH website, its scientists "concluded that although recent studies have strengthened the evidence between living or working in a damp environment and increased risk for respiratory symptoms, the role of mold growth in these complex environments is still unclear. Damp buildings also encourage the growth of bacteria, dust mites and cockroaches, as well as degradation of wet building materials that can also release irritant chemicals indoors. Some or all of these chemicals or biological organisms may contribute to occupant illness. For these and other reasons detailed in the report, science-based PELs for indoor molds cannot be established at this time." n133 Thus, the effectiveness of the disclosure provisions of the Act depends acutely on whether CDPH is actually able to adopt PELs. n134

CDPH's ability to complete the balance of its responsibilities is, however, hampered by a lack of financial resources to do so, in response to which the California legislature established, pursuant to AB 442, the Public Health Protection from Indoor Mold Hazards Fund. Once necessary funding is obtained, CDPH anticipates completing the work required by SB 732 at a cost of $1,164,000 in approximately 4.5 years. Of particular interest and benefit to real estate professionals, California, Civil Code section 2079.7 provides that disclosure of environmental hazards by a seller or broker to a prospective transferee is adequate if a consumer information booklet published by the California Department of Real Estate is provided to the transferee. A chapter on mold is included in that booklet, so that California real estate professionals can satisfy any duty they may be deemed to have with respect to disclosure of mold by providing that booklet. In Nevada, Kentucky, South Dakota and Michigan the mandatory seller property condition disclosure forms now specifically reference disclosure of mold known to be in the home. Louisiana has adopted legislation providing for a "mold information pamphlet" to be developed by the Real Estate Commission. The pamphlet may but is not required to be distributed by agents to buyers or tenants, but the law provides that if it is provided that must occur before a lease or contract for sale is entered into. The law also provides that an agent who provides the pamphlet to a buyer or tenant has no obligation to deliver any additional information regarding mold. n135 Montana adopted the "Montana Mold Disclosure Act" n136 that permits but does not require a "Mold Disclosure Statement" to be included in leases and sales contracts for inhabitable real property. The Act further provides that sellers, landlords and their agents shall disclose any knowledge of the presence of mold in a dwelling being sold or leased, but in the event the Disclosure Statement is included and any known mold disclosed, the seller, landlord and any agents have no liability in any action based on the presence of mold. In South Carolina real estate brokers and agents are required to disclose truthfully any known material defects, including specifically "moisture or mold problems and conditions." n137 Washington has enacted legislation requiring landlords to provide to tenants a mold information publication. n138 Some real estate firms and/or real estate associations have modified, or are considering modifying, their "form" listing and sales contract forms to include an item designed to elicit any known information about the presence of a mold or mold-producing moisture concern in property being offered for sale.

Various states have from time to time considered legislation that addresses various mold-related issues, such as licensing mold inspectors and remediators, remediation requirements or guidelines, mold health studies, the availability of insurance coverage for mold-related injuries or damages, disclosure requirements, and the like.

[10] Methamphetamine

Methamphetamine is an increasingly popular but dangerous illegal drug. The U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency has indicated that in some states it trails only marijuana and alcohol as the drug most often used, and some forms are believed to be more addictive than heroin. Because methamphetamine, or "meth" can be relatively easily manufactured, users or those who want to provide the drug to users are able to "cook" meth at home. Unfortunately, not only is the drug itself extraordinarily dangerous to users, but the chemicals and processes used in the manufacture of the drug may emit noxious fumes and leave a toxic residue throughout the home or location where it is made. That residue can seep in carpets, walls, HVAC systems and other components of the structure where meth is made and pose a serious health risk to subsequent occupants until that residue is eliminated.

These problems associated with use of a home as a meth production facility suggest that sellers and real estate agents should be alert to the fact or possibility that a residence being sold or leased may have been used for the purpose manufacturing meth. One case has held expressly that a listing (and selling) agent's knowledge of the former use of a home for meth production and failure to disclose that fact to the buyer constituted unlawful failure to disclose a material fact, negligent misrepresentation, and violation of the Washington consumer protection act. n139 In another case a broker and its agent were held not liable to the buyer for damages for failure to disclose the fact that the home had been used as a meth lab where the broker offered evidence that it was not aware, and the seller had not disclosed to him, such prior use. Summary judgment in favor of the broker and agent was affirmed on appeal because the buyer failed to present evidence to controvert the brokers claim that it had no knowledge of the use of the property as a meth lab. n140 Moreover, although the state property disclosure form to be completed by the seller and provided by the broker specifically addressed whether the house may have been used in the manufacture of methamphetamine lab, the statute requiring the form to be provided allowed the buyer to recover against the broker only if the broker failed to disclose defects of which the broker was actually aware. A few states prohibit subsequent occupancy of a residential unit used as a meth production facility until the property has been "remediated" to remove the hazard, although there are not yet generally accepted, well-defined standards by which a property can be said to have been remediated so that there are no longer hazards in the property.

Because of the hazards associated with prior meth production on a property, sellers and agents in most jurisdictions are likely to be required to disclose any actual knowledge they may have that the property was previously used to produce meth. A few states have codified a duty to provide a specific written disclosure of known prior use of the property to produce meth. n141 Several other states include meth as an item on the disclosure form that sellers must complete and deliver to prospective buyers; n142 one state provides that prior use of property as a meth lab is "not material" to a transaction if the property has been cleaned up or deemed safe for habitation by a government entity; n143 and two others provide for property that has been used to manufacture methamphetamine to be clearly identified or listed on a public website and provide further that the owner has no obligation to disclose such prior use once the property has been sufficiently remediated and such listing or identification removed. n144 Yet another state provides that real estate owners, landlords, or agents are not required to report or otherwise disclose prior contamination of an inhabitable property that has been sufficiently remediated to allow it to be removed from the list of properties that had been reported as contaminated. n144.1

[11] Other Hazards

Several other cases involve environmental hazards or conditions not capable of being neatly categorized. As described in § 15.01[3][b] above, in Strawn v. Canuso n145 it was alleged that a real estate broker marketing a new home development had failed to adequately disclose to purchasers of those homes a nearby abandoned dump site which had attained considerable notoriety as a highly contaminated site. The Supreme Court of New Jersey held that a builder-developer of residential real estate and a broker representing such a builder is "liable to a purchaser for nondisclosure of off-site physical conditions known to the broker and unknown to and not readily observable by the buyer if the existence of those conditions is of sufficient materiality as to affect the habitability, use, or enjoyment of the property and, therefore, to render the property substantially less desirable or valuable to the objectively reasonable buyer." n146 Subsequently, the New Jersey Department of Environmental Regulation adopted rules imposing on real estate agents a duty to provide purchasers with notice of off-site conditions disclosed in recorded "deed notices" designed to provide notice that certain environmental remediation had been performed, and to compile lists of off-site conditions, but those rules were held to conflict with the New Jersey Disclosure Act and held unconstitutional. n147 Haberstick v. Gundaker Real Estate Company, Inc. n148 is similar to Strawn. In that case, agents for the defendant real estate company were engaged in marketing homes in a new home development immediately adjacent to a Federal Superfund National Priorities List site. The site was known to be seriously contaminated with "pesticides, dioxin, oils, solvents, unknown quantities of buried drums, waste buried in pits and contaminated soil." The agents were directed not to disclose the presence of such hazards but only to produce a "scientifically worded" report, and to do so only if asked about the hazards, in order to not "wave a flag" to potential buyers about the nature of the property next door." The Missouri Court of Appeal held that the agents had fraudulently misrepresented the property and were liable in damages to the purchasers because they had "falsely represented the nature of the surrounding area in a manner calculated to deceive Buyers and obtain an undue advantage over them." n149

In Sheehy v. Lipton Industries, Inc., n150 the court reversed a summary judgment entered in favor of the broker and seller in a case brought by the purchaser of a property found to be contaminated by hazardous materials. The parties to the transaction were aware of contamination of areas nearby and even adjacent to the property, and possible contamination of the property being sold had been an issue before the sale. In response to the plaintiff's inquiry about any hazardous materials on the property, however, the broker advised "Don't worry about it." The court noted that the statement could be deemed a false statement of fact "in the context of the whole (property negotiation and sale) situation," thereby raising a triable issue of fact. In Kezer v. Mark Stimson Associates, n151 the buyers had obtained several water test reports prior to closing which identified contaminants in the water although in amounts considered safe for human consumption. The broker was aware that the area was being monitored by the Maine Department of Environmental Protection because of an auto recycling yard located in the neighborhood and that a neighbor had complained that his well was contaminated, but did not advise the buyer of those facts. A Maine statute requires a broker to disclose "all material defects pertaining to the physical condition of the property," and a Real Estate Commission regulation requires a broker to ask the seller about any "current or previously existing known hazardous materials on or in the real estate." Since those requirements relate to disclosure of conditions on the property, however, the Supreme Court of Maine rejected the plaintiff's claim that a broker must disclose to a buyer information about environmental hazards in the neighborhood of the property being sold. The court further noted that another Real Estate Commission regulation requires a broker to ask a seller for specified information about a private water supply, and because the broker had failed to ask for that information he did not learn of or disclose to the buyer another test showing trace amounts of contaminants. The court held that the broker breached his duty to inquire as to unsatisfactory tests even though the test was subsequently provided to the buyers. But because the buyers were unable to demonstrate that they were harmed by the nondisclosure, in part because they elected to close on the sale after obtaining information about the prior test, the court affirmed summary judgment for the broker. The Court of Appeals of Arkansas reversed a summary judgment order entered in favor of the sellers and their real estate agent and against the purchasers in Randles v. Cole, n152 Purchasers discovered that the property they had purchased had been previously used as a landfill, but did not bring suit until more than three years after the purchase. The defendants moved for summary judgment based on the three-year statute of limitations for fraud claims, which the trial court granted. On appeal, the appellate court reversed, noting that plaintiffs alleged that the sellers and the agent had committed fraud by delivering a false disclosure form. That alleged fraudulent act created a disputed question of fact as to when the purchasers discovered, or reasonably should have discovered, the property's prior use as a landfill, which would start the running of the three-year statute of limitations. And in Tanpiengco v. Tasto, n153 the court affirmed a judgment holding a real estate firm and its agent liable for damages and attorneys fees under the Connecticut Unfair Trade Practices Act for the agent's knowing misrepresentation regarding a landfill adjoining and partly on the property purchased by the plaintiff.

In Parker v. Shaker Real Estate, Inc., n154 the court affirmed a directed verdict entered by the court in favor of the defendant real estate brokers at the close of the plaintiffs' case. The plaintiff purchasers' claims against the real estate brokers involved in the transaction alleged fraudulent misrepresentation and failure to disclose, as well as innocent and negligent misrepresentation. The evidence showed that the property the plaintiffs purchased had been the site of a gasoline station in the 1930s and 1940s, but there was no evidence that the brokers had made any representations about the prior use of the property or even that they had knowledge of that prior use and history. The court also noted that the plaintiff had not offered any evidence that:

- (1) the brokers had failed to exercise reasonable care or competence in obtaining or communicating information regarding the prior use of the property, or that
- (2) the plaintiffs had relied on or otherwise were induced to purchase the property as a result of any representations by the defendants regarding the prior uses or even that
- (3) the purchasers had suffered any damage as a result of the prior use.

Coleman v. Watts n155 involved plaintiffs' claim that the former owners of the property had violated the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act n156 (RCRA) because the property purchased by plaintiffs contained hazardous substances as a result of jewelry-making operations conducted by the defendants on the property. Plaintiffs also alleged various state law claims against the former owners and their brokers for nondisclosure of the presence of those substances and other adverse features of the property. The court granted defendant prior owners motion for summary judgment on the RCRA claim because the concentrations of hazardous substances on the property did not exceed the regulatory thresholds under RCRA. The court denied the defendant broker and owners motion for summary judgment on state law claims for fraud and intentional misrepresentation, negligence, and negligence per se, holding that there was some evidence that the broker and owner were aware or should have ascertained and disclosed the waste on the property (and certain other problems), but in fact concealed or failed to disclose those problems. First Realty, Ltd. v. Frontier Insurance Company n157 addressed whether the insurer had a duty to defend a realty firm alleged to have fraudulently or negligently failed to disclose the presence of a former municipal solid waste disposal site and hazardous materials identified on the seller's disclosure statement. The insurer had relied on a policy exclusion for "claims arising out of, relating to or based upon the ...presence of storage tanks, ..., hazardous materials, radon, gases or other material, irritant, contaminant, [or] pollutant." The court held that the insurer was obligated to provide coverage for the claim for failure to disclose the solid waste disposal site because the exclusion applied to claims related to "hazardous" materials but not necessarily those arising out of "solid waste," which could also include "innocuous rubbish." In Jablonski v. Rapalje, n158 the court declined to grant summary judgment to a real estate agent alleged to have failed to disclose an infestation of bats in the attic of a home. The court explicitly acknowledged that caveat emptor applies in New York unless there is "active concealment," but found that there was a triable issue of fact as to whether the real estate agent had knowledge of the bat infestation and had acted to thwart the plaintiff's ability to discover the infestation by advising the plaintiff that certain evidence of the infestation came from birds. Finally, in a case involving an environmental "condition" rather than a "hazard," the Supreme Court of Rhode Island in Kennett v. Marquis n159 affirmed a summary judgment ruling in favor of the seller's real estate agent who was alleged to have failed to disclose wetlands on the property sold to the plaintiffs. The court reached that decision based on its conclusion that there was no evidence that the agent "failed to exercise reasonable care in transmitting the ground water report, ... knew of the presence of the wetlands on the property, or ... delivered false information knowingly and intentionally." n160 Finally, Hess v. Chase Manhattan Bank USA, N.A., n161 is a case where the buyers alleged the owner (Chase) and listing firm and agent failed to disclose that the property purchased by the plaintiff was "under investigation" by USEPA due to the former owners' acts of dumping hazardous waste on the property. The real estate firm and agent settled, and on appeal the Appellate Court reversed the lower court's decision dismissing the buyer's claims that the owner had violated the Missouri Merchandising Act, and entered judgment for the buyer on that claim. The court also affirmed the trial court's ruling denying the owner's motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, where the owner claimed it had no duty to affirmatively disclose the EPA's interest and involvement in the property because the parties had agreed that the owner made no representations, warranties or guarantees regarding the property. The appellate court held the owner had failed to properly raise those as affirmative defenses, and therefore the trial court had correctly denied the motion for judgment NOV.

The court in Wallace also concluded that the statute created disclosure duties only to the purchaser, and not to third parties such as the lessees of the purchaser. Thus, the court granted summary judgment in favor of the real estate agent on the lessees' claim under the civil liability (treble damages) provisions of the Act. Id., 259-60 . Similarly, the court granted a lessor's motion to dismiss in a civil damages proceeding under § 4852(b)(3) of the Federal Act, concluding that the express terms of the Federal Act provided only for such remedies against lessors and purchasers, and not others residing in the premises. *Mason v. (n56)Footnote 46. On remand, the Superior Court granted summary judgment in favor of the seller, the only remaining defendant, holding that the plaintiff had stated neither a claim for negligence nor a claim for misrepresentation. Farrah v. Acker, 1999 Conn. Super. LEXIS 2184 (Conn. Super. Aug. 4, 1999) . The court concluded that even if the defendant had knowledge of the lead-based paint on the premises, he had no duty to disclose it since the buyers could have readily discovered it but elected not to have a professional inspection. The court also rejected the buyers' misrepresentation claim because there was no allegation that the sellers had made any representation about the presence or absence of lead-based paint on or in the home.

(n64)Footnote 54. Flowers also held that the provisions of the federal lead-based paint disclosure regulations that impose duties on real estate agents representing buyers is inconsistent with and exceeds the scope of the authority established by the Residential Lead-Based Paint Hazard Act, 42 U.S.C. § 4852d, statute authorizing promulgation of those regulations, which by its very terms applies only to agents of sellers. Thus, the purchaser's claim that a buyer's agent violated the regulations and Act was rejected. Following the result and reasoning of Flowers is Keegan, 2003 U.S.

Even though the available evidence does not link mold or other factors associated with building moisture to all the serious health problems that some attribute to them, excessive indoor dampness is a widespread problem that warrants action at the local, state, and national levels."

PART V Other Issues Affecting Brokers

CHAPTER 15 Real Estate Brokers and Environmental Laws *

10A-15 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 15.04

§ 15.04 Managing Environmental Risk in the Sale of Nonresidential Property

[1] In General

Many of the environmental problems discussed in the previous subsections are more common in residential transactions. Commercial real estate transactions have their share of environmental concerns, also, however. Indeed, commercial properties may be more likely to have environmental problems, those problems are likely to be much more expensive to correct or alleviate, and they may be less apparent. Given the sophistication of commercial buyers and sellers, however, they may rely less on the agents involved in the transaction than buyers and sellers of residential properties, and it is not uncommon to see courts evaluating the liability of commercial brokers differently than they evaluate the liability of residential brokers. Nevertheless, it is beneficial for commercial brokers to be aware of and alert for signs that a property may be afflicted with environmental concerns, even though few if any environmental laws impose any specific obligations, duties or even potential liabilities on commercial real estate practitioners. n1

[2] Environmental Transfer Laws

Some states have adopted laws specifically directed at requiring disclosure of or otherwise identifying and establishing a record of environmental hazards affecting nonresidential real estate at the time of a transaction involving the real estate. Such legislation may require a seller of certain kinds of property to disclose the environmental hazard to purchasers and/or the state itself prior to purchase, may require actual clean up of the hazard prior to the transaction, or may require recording of notice of the hazardous condition so that subsequent purchasers and others may become aware of the condition. For example, the New Jersey Industrial Site Recovery Act (ISRA) (formerly titled the Environmental Cleanup Responsibility Act) n2 was one of the first such laws passed and one of the most comprehensive. The ISRA applies to the sale or transfer of facilities with operations involving certain defined hazardous substances. It requires a cleanup plan to be developed and implemented in specified circumstances, and if the plan cannot be completed prior to the property transfer an Administrative Consent Order (ACO) allows the transaction to proceed only if an appropriate bond is posted to insure the cleanup is completed. Penalties are provided for noncompliance, which include rescission of the sale or transfer, criminal penalties and personal liability for corporate officers who knowingly participate in a violation.

Under the Illinois Responsible Property Transfer Act, n3 the seller of affected properties must provide the purchaser and its lender with a copy of a statutorily mandated form within thirty days of execution of the sales contract and not less than thirty days prior to the closing. The Act applies to properties with underground storage tanks required to be registered and facilities subject to reporting under the federal Emergency Planning and Community Right to Know Act. A copy of the disclosure form must be recorded with the state environmental protection agency and the county recorder of deeds. If, upon delivery of the disclosure document, facts are revealed regarding environmental problems of which the buyer was unaware, the contract may be set aside. Failure to comply with the Act results in daily penalties up to $10,000 per day.

The Pennsylvania Solid Waste Management Act n4 provides that the seller of property on which hazardous waste is currently being disposed (or has ever been disposed with the seller's knowledge) must state, in the description section of the deed, the specific location and description of the hazardous waste.

Other states that have adopted various kinds of statutory obligations imposed on environmentally contaminated property invoked at the time of transactions involving the property include:

- California, n5
- Colorado, n6
- Connecticut, n7
- Georgia n8
- Iowa, n9
- Indiana, n10
- Kentucky, n11
- Massachusetts n12
- Michigan n13
- Minnesota, n14
- Missouri, n15
- New York, n16
- Rhode Island n17
- South Carolina, n18
- Tennessee n19 and
- West Virginia. n20

[3] Environmental Audits

While property disclosure laws are helpful, only a complete environmental audit is likely to be conclusive as to the condition of the property, and even then an audit may not uncover all the problems that may exist on a property. Real estate purchasers and lenders seeking to limit their liability under federal or state law (see § 15.05 below) mandating cleanup of environmentally contaminated properties have increasingly requested inspection by experts in soil, water, and other environmental problems.

The most commonly performed inspection is known as a "Phase I" audit. This is generally sufficient to identify an environmental problem or condition on a parcel of real estate, or at least to discover signs that a problem may exist and that more comprehensive inspection is required. Discovery of such a problem may lead a buyer or its lender to abandon a transaction or to seek to negotiate further with the seller concerning the obligation to clean up the property or otherwise mitigate the problem. In a typical Phase I audit, the inspector would perform a thorough visual inspection of the property and, to the extent possible, the adjoining sites. The condition of the vegetation, soil characteristics, water condition and hazardous substances used or stored on the premises would all be considered. Interviews would be conducted with present and past owners and occupants of the property to elicit information regarding the past uses in order to uncover any environmental risks. All available property records, including flood plain maps, easements, title documents and even old aerial photographs, would be carefully examined in an effort to evaluate current and past uses of the property. A review of permits and licenses issued pursuant to environmental, safety and/or health regulations, including permits issued to owners or tenants for underground tanks, would be conducted, as well as an evaluation of any tanks, fuel pumps, wells, ponds and wetlands on the premises. The auditor would also consult any available aerial photographs of the property and contiguous areas to determine previous uses and noticeable changes in the topography, drainage or vegetation.

Because a Phase I audit does not include thorough sampling and evaluation of many aspects of the property, it is not a guarantee that the property is without environmental problems. However, in light of the economic infeasibility of such testing, it should provide the next best alternative--a composite evaluation based on the available information and thorough visual inspection by a qualified expert. Obviously, purchasers would then evaluate the results of a Phase I audit to determine if further evaluation and testing is warranted before proceeding with a transaction. A more recent development is the promulgation by the American Society for Testing and Materials of "Transaction Screen" and "Phase 1 Audit" protocols. n21 ASTM, a national private standard-setting organization, developed these standards and also more comprehensive inspection protocols to provide for use by buyers and sellers generally accepted inspection standards and procedures. Those standards are specifically designed to allow property purchasers to take advantage of familiar inspection protocols that, when followed, will allow new purchasers acting in good faith to avoid liability for cleanup costs.

Property managers and owners will also want to conduct periodic audits of their tenants' activities to ensure compliance with environmental laws. Leases should contain standard clauses requiring compliance with all laws and regulations regarding use and disposal of hazardous materials by tenants and clauses holding the owners harmless for non-compliance by tenants.

PART V Other Issues Affecting Brokers
CHAPTER 15 Real Estate Brokers and Environmental Laws *

10A-15 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 15.05

§ 15.05 Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation and Liability Act (CERCLA)

[1] Cleanup Liability Should Be Assumed by Appropriate Party

While real estate brokers and their subagents may have no direct liability under federal laws governing cleanup of polluted sites, their familiarity with the requirements of those laws is becoming increasingly essential. A purchaser (or its lender) who acquires unforeseen liability could claim the environmental condition of the property was a material fact that should have been disclosed prior to the purchase. Sale or lease of vacant land, the neighborhood dry cleaners, the florist shop on the site of a former gas station, a home in a new subdivision, a farm with a pond in which excess fertilizer was occasionally dumped, were once standard real estate transactions, soon forgotten by the broker after the closing. Today they must be viewed as potential environmental catastrophes, which, at the onset of the transaction, must be evaluated for the risks involved. An effort must also be made to assure that the liability for any cleanup is knowingly assumed by the appropriate party. Failure to identify and disclose the environmental condition of a property could result in the real estate agent being asked to contribute to the cleanup costs, should the applicable state environmental agency or the U.S. EPA discover a pollution problem. The following subsection surveys the developments in case law involving claims against current owners and their lenders under the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation and Liability Act (CERCLA).

[2] Basic Structure of CERCLA n1

[a] Statutory Scheme

CERCLA provides for both federal and state governments n1.1 to respond to releases and threatened releases of hazardous substances in order to protect the public health and the environment. n2 The Act provides for the use of the Hazardous Substance Response Trust Fund (the "Fund") to finance cleanups, and authorizes the Environmental Protection Agency ("EPA") to mandate and undertake investigation and remediation actions. n3 The EPA is authorized, upon determination that an "imminent and substantial endangerment to the public health or welfare or the environment" exists due to "an actual or threatened release of a hazardous substance from a facility," either to order the responsible parties to contain the hazardous wastes on the site or to initiate its own cleanup n4 and recover the costs of such cleanup from the responsible parties. n5 CERCLA allows for the imposition of a lien on real property subject to cleanup, in an amount equal to the money expended by EPA for investigation and cleanup. n6 The lien is created when response costs are first incurred by the United States, or when the EPA sends written notice of potential liability to the property owner.

n7 The Fund is available to finance cleanups when no responsible party can be found and held liable, or when the EPA chooses to do the cleanup and recover costs from responsible parties at a later time. n8

CERCLA authorizes the EPA to use the Fund to respond to threatened or actual releases of hazardous substances, pollutants or contaminants that present an imminent and substantial danger to the public health, welfare or the environment. n9 EPA may not, however, utilize the Fund to clean up releases of unaltered naturally occurring substances, releases from business, community and residential structures that result in exposure solely within such structures, and releases within public or private drinking water systems as a result of ordinary deterioration within those systems. n10

CERCLA also established a regulatory framework to govern cleanups. n11 The regulatory scheme, entitled the National Oil and Hazardous Substances Pollution Contingency Plan ("NCP"), n12 creates a system for the identification and ranking of hazardous waste sites by the EPA and for the investigation, evaluation and selection of appropriate action in response to actual or threatened releases of hazardous wastes. The NCP governs the Superfund site investigation and cleanup process and also sets standards that must be satisfied in non-Superfund cleanups for private parties to recover their cleanup costs from others. Thus, Familiarity with the procedural and substantive requirements of the NCP is essential for anyone conducting investigation or remediation work because costs may be recovered from other responsible parties only if they are in substantial compliance with the NCP. n13

One of the most vexing issues under CERCLA is the question of what cleanup standards apply. The statute as originally enacted provided little guidance, leaving it for the courts to adjudicate where the responsible parties, EPA, and the public could not agree. In 1986, Congress passed the Superfund Amendments and Reauthorization Act (SARA), which, besides increasing the fund to $8.5 billion, imposed new reporting requirements and remedial action deadlines on EPA, required increased community participation in selecting remedies, and established more stringent cleanup standards, including a requirement for EPA to consider state environmental standards as applicable legal requirements under CERCLA. These standards required that the cleanup standard selected must assure protection of human health and the environment. n14 Where on-site cleanup occurs, the remedial action must at least attain legally applicable or relevant and appropriate federal and state standards, as set forth in other federal environmental statutes, including the Clean Water Act, the Clean Air Act and the Solid Waste Disposal Act. n15 Any promulgated state requirements that are more stringent than the federal requirements must be met when such state requirements have been identified to the EPA in a timely manner. n16 As a practical matter, the EPA and the states have significant discretion in approving cleanup standards, so the ultimate remedy selected for a site is often a matter of intense negotiation between the responsible party performing the work (or, more commonly, its environmental consultants) and the state or federal project managers responsible for oversight and approval of the work.

If the EPA chooses to clean the site itself, it may recover the cost of its actions from the current "owner and operator" of the waste site, n17 any person who owned or operated the waste site when hazardous substances were disposed of at the site, n18 the generators of the hazardous substances found at the site or who otherwise arranged for its disposal, the generators of the hazardous substances found at the site, n19 and the transporters of the hazardous substances to the site. n20 All four of these categories have been interpreted very broadly by courts.

[b] Liability Provisions

The elements that the EPA must establish in its prima facie case in order to recover the costs of cleanup are set forth in United States v. Maryland Bank & Trust Co.: n21

To establish liability under section 107(a) of the Act, the government must establish the following:

- (1) The site is a "facility;" n22

- (2) A "release" n23 or "threatened release" of any "hazardous substance" n24 from the site has occurred;
- (3) The release or threatened release has caused the United States to incur "response costs;" n25 and
- (4) The defendant is one of the persons designated as a party liable for costs. n26

The fourth element of the prima facie case, the definition of those parties that may be held responsible for the costs of cleanup, is crucial to the determination of lender liability. The Act includes as liable parties:

- (1) the owner and operator of a vessel or a facility;
- (2) any person who at the time of disposal of any hazardous substance owned or operated any facility at which such hazardous substances were disposed of;
- (3) any person who by contract, agreement, or otherwise arranged for disposal or treatment, or arranged with a transporter for transport for disposal or treatment, of hazardous substances owned or possessed by such person, by any other party or entity, at any facility or incineration vessel owned or operated by another party or entity and containing such hazardous substances; n27 and
- (4) any person who accepts or accepted any hazardous substances for transport to disposal or treatment facilities, incineration vessels or sites selected by such person, from which there is a release, or a threatened release which causes the incurrence of response costs, of hazardous substance. n28

[c] Liability for Owners and Operators

The reference to owner "and" operator in subsection 107(a)(1) of CERCLA has been interpreted disjunctively; that is, any person who is a current owner "or" operator may be held liable for response costs. n29

Under the Act, "owner or operator" includes any person owning or operating an onshore or offshore facility. n30 Section 107(a)(1) does not specify when a person must have been an owner of the property in order for liability to attach. The EPA has interpreted Section 107(a)(1) as imposing liability only on the person who is the owner at the time of cleanup. n31 Section 107(a)(2) explicitly imposes liability on those who own or operate a facility at the time of disposal. n32 This interpretation leaves an obvious potential gap: those persons who own property after disposal but prior to cleanup. One court to address this issue adopted the following interpretation: "Since this defendant is not alleged to be an owner at any time when the disposals complained of were made, but is alleged to have merely owned the site after such disposal and prior in time to plaintiff's ownership, it cannot be liable under the Act." n33 These so-called "innocent landowners" must demonstrate, among other things, that at the time of acquisition they undertook "all appropriate inquiry into the previous ownership in accordance with generally accepted good commercial or customary practice in an effort to minimize liability." n33.1 EPA has issued a final rule establishing standards for All Appropriate Inquiries (the "AAI rule") under which innocent landowners, bona fide purchasers and contiguous landowners may claim protection from CERCLA liability. n33.2

One issue of particular concern to developers and lenders is the risk of "owner" liability on account of contamination that has migrated to the subject property from a contiguous property. Although the language of section 107(a)(1) states that liability may be imposed only on the owner of property "from which there is a release" of hazardous substances, suggesting that the release must originate from the defendant's property, the risk of liability on account of migrating contamination has created significant uncertainty. Congress addressed this issue in the 2002 amendments to the statute, n33.3 creating an affirmative defense from liability for owners and operators of property contaminated solely by a release from another property owned by someone else. n34 This provision codified EPA's policy of non-liability for owners of property contaminated with releases that migrated from other properties. To qualify for the defense, the owner or operator must demonstrate that it: (1) did not cause, contribute or consent to the release; (2) is not affiliated with another liable party; (3) took reasonable steps to stop any continuing release; (4) complied with land use restrictions established in connection with response activities at the facility; (5) is in compliance with any demands for information made by regulators; (6) provided all required legal notifications with respect to the contamination; and (7) at the time of acquisition of the property, undertook all appropriate inquiry and did not have reason to know of the contamination. n35

If a facility is owned by a state or local government as the result of bankruptcy, foreclosure, tax delinquency, abandonment, or similar means, the owner or operator is defined as the person who "owned, operated, or otherwise controlled activities" at the facility before ownership was transferred to the government. n36

While the terms "owner" and "operator" are jointly defined under the Act, it is useful to analyze the question of operator liability separately. Section 101(20)(A) of CERCLA excludes from this definition "a person, who, without participating in the management of a vessel or facility, holds indicia of ownership primarily to protect his security interest in the vessel or facility." n36.1 A "security interest" includes a right of mortgage, deed of trust, assignment, judgment lien, pledge, security agreement, factoring agreement, or lease and any other right accruing to a person to secure the repayment of money, the performance of a duty or any other obligation by a nonaffiliated person. n36.2 The limited legislative history under CERCLA provides some guidance in describing the extent of participation in the vessel or facility beyond which a person may become liable as an operator under the Act:

Operators of vessels do not include those individuals who are not totally responsible for the operation of a vessel. To fall within the definition, the individual must have assumed the full range of operational responsibility. For example, a pilot might be in charge of navigation of a vessel for a short duration, yet he does not meet the definition of "operator," since he neither mans nor supplies the vessel. In the case of a facility, an "operator" is defined to be a person who is carrying out operational functions for the owner of the facility pursuant to an appropriate agreement. n37

The scope of the exclusion for lenders was clarified by Congress in the Asset Conservation, Lender Liability, and Deposit Insurance Protection Act of 1996. n38 The Act defines "participate in management" to mean actually participating in the management or operational affairs of a vessel and not merely having the capacity to influence or the unexercised right to control facility operations. n39 A lender will be considered to participate in management if the lender exercises decision-making control over environmental compliance and undertakes responsibility for hazardous substance handling or disposal practices or if the lender exercises control comparable to that of a manager of the facility and assumes or manifests responsibility for day-to-day decision-making with respect to environmental compliance or responsibility for overall or substantially all of the operational functions of the facility. n39.1

The 1996 lender liability amendments to CERCLA were intended to alleviate concerns about the possible broad liability of banks and other financial institutions for the involvement in the business affairs of owners or operators of Superfund sites. The amendments effectively codify the previously invalidated EPA regulation on lender liability. n39.2 By explicitly excluding "capacity to influence" from the definition of "participate in management," the amendments nullify the rationale of previous cases that found lenders liable under CERCLA even if they did not participate in the management or operational affairs of the facility. n39.3

[d] Strict, Joint and Several Liability

Liability under CERCLA is strict, joint, and several. Strict liability has been consistently applied to owners, operators, waste generators, and transporters; fault or culpability need not be proven. n40 The Act states that the standard of liability under the Act should be the same as that which applies under the Federal Water Pollution Control Act (commonly known as the Clean Water Act). Section 311. n41 At the time of CERCLA's enactment it was well established that liability under the Clean Water Act was strict. n42

Liability under CERCLA has also been held to be joint and several, at least to the extent that the cleanup costs cannot be easily apportioned between the defendants. n43 The legislative history of the Act indicates that Congress intended that issues of joint and several liability be resolved by application of the "traditional and evolving principles of common law." n44 Some courts have relied on this language to avoid imposition of a uniform rule of joint and several liability, n45 on the ground that the common law generally provides that where two or more persons acting independently cause a single harm, but there is a reasonable basis upon which to apportion liability, each person will be liable only for that portion of the total harm that she caused. n46 However, where two or more persons cause a single and indivisible harm, each is liable for the entire harm. n47 There are typically a number of contributors of hazardous waste at any site and the harm caused is generally found to be a single and indivisible harm; n48 the trend therefore has been for courts to impose joint and several liability on defendants in CERCLA cases. n49

In a handful of cases, courts have permitted defendants to try to establish that cleanup costs at the site are divisible. In these cases, the defendant bears the burden of establishing a factual basis for apportioning liability. n50 In the event a defendant is held liable for more than its equitable share of cleanup costs, or undertakes to clean up a property without assistance from other co-liable parties, CERCLA provides for a statutory right of contribution. n51

[e] Third-Party Defenses

Once a lender has been determined to be an owner or operator for purposes of liability under the Act, there remains one further argument that it can make in order to avoid liability. It can raise an affirmative defense under section 107(b) of CERCLA. n52

CERCLA provides for three limited affirmative defenses to section 107(a) liability:

There shall be no liability under subsection (a) of this section for a person otherwise liable who can establish by a preponderance of the evidence that the release or threat of release of a hazardous substance and the damages resulting therefrom were caused solely by--

(1) an act of God;

(2) an act of war;

(3) an act or omission of a third party other than an employee or agent of the defendant, or than one whose act or omission occurs in connection with a contractual relationship, existing directly or indirectly, with the defendant... if the defendant establishes by a preponderance of the evidence that (a) he exercised due care with respect to the hazardous substance concerned, taking into consideration the characteristics of such hazardous substance, in light of all relevant facts and circumstances, and (b) he took precautions against foreseeable acts or omissions of any such third party and the consequences that could foreseeably result from such acts or omissions; or

(4) any combination of the foregoing paragraphs. n53

Prior to the enactment of SARA, landowners had to establish three facts in order to prevail on the 1986 amendments to the statute, the third party defense under section 107(b)(3): that the third party's actions were the sole cause of the hazardous condition, that the owner exercised due care with respect to the hazardous substances on the land, and that the act or omission of the third party did not occur in connection with any direct or indirect contractual relationship with the secured lender. n54 Courts have also held that the acts or omissions of the third party must have occurred during the ownership or operation of the defendant and the defense therefore could not be claimed against third parties who were involved in the site before or after the ownership or operation of the site by the defendant. n55

However, present landowners continued to assert the third party defense, arguing that prior owners who generated or disposed of hazardous waste on the property, and not innocent current owners, should be liable under CERCLA, leading to the amendment of the Act to define "contractual relationship." n56

SARA clarified the third party defense for present landowners by defining the "contractual relationship" under which liability may attach, adopting standards which came to be known as the "innocent landowner defense." Under SARA, a current owner of land which acquired property contaminated with hazardous substances could escape liability as an owner if, at the time the defendant acquired the facility, having made appropriate inquiry into the status of the property, the defendant did not know or have reason to know that it was contaminated. n57

Amendments to CERCLA enacted in 2002 by the Small Business Relief and Brownfields Revitalizations Act ("Brownfields Act") n58 revised the "innocent landowner defense" again, this time requiring that the landowner, in addition to not having "reason to know" of the contamination, must provide "full cooperation, assistance, and facility access" to those authorized to address facility contamination, comply with land use restrictions in connection with that cleanup, and not impede the operation of controls connected with the cleanup. n59 The landowner also must take reasonable steps to stop continuing releases, prevent threatened future releases, and prevent or limit exposure to previously released hazardous substances. n60

For many years, real estate developers and their lenders were frustrated by the lack of any explicit guidance in the statute about what was required to meet the "all appropriate inquiry" standard. The Brownfields Act attempts to solve this problem by directing EPA to promulgate, within two years of enactment of the law, regulations defining the standard for what constitutes "all appropriate inquiry." n61 The statute adopted interim standards that applied to properties acquired before EPA promulgated the new rules. For properties acquired before May 31, 1997, courts were directed to take into account the following factors in deciding whether the buyer performed "all appropriate inquiry": (1) any specialized experience or knowledge of the buyer; (2) the relationship between the purchase price and the value of the property; (3) commonly known or reasonably ascertainable information about the property; (4) the obviousness of the presence of contamination; and (5) the ability to detect the contamination by appropriate inspection. n62 For properties acquired on or after May 31, 1997, the statute provided that "all appropriate inquiry" was satisfied by performance of the environmental due diligence standards developed in the mid-1990s by ASTM, a national standards organization. n63

On November 1, 2005, the EPA published its final rule titled "Standards and Practices for All Appropriate Inquiries," to be effective on November 1, 2006 (70 F.R. 66070, codified at 40 C.F.R. Part 312). Through changes included in the Small Business Liability Relief and Revitalization Act of 2002, the AAI standard is made applicable not only to innocent landowners (42 U.S.C. § 9601(35)(B)), but also to owners of properties contiguous to contaminated parcels (42 U.S.C. § 9607(q)) and to bona fide prospective purchasers (42 U.S.C. §§ 9601(40)(B) and 9607(r)). According to the agency's web site (http://www.epa.gov/swerosps/bf/regneg.htm#final_rule),

The new final regulation is not significantly different from the interim standard established by Congress in the Brownfields Amendments to CERCLA. The interim standard was the ASTM E1527-00 Phase I Environmental Site Assessment Process. The final rule differs in such areas as the definition of environmental professional, certain interviewing requirements, and the documentation of data gaps that may affect an environmental professional's ability to render an opinion regarding the environmental conditions of a property. A comparison of the requirements established in the final rule and the requirements of the interim standard are provided in a document titled "Comparison of the Final All Appropriate Inquiries Standard and the ASTM E1527-00 Environmental Site Assessment Standard."

The comparison can be found on-line at http://www.epa.gov/swerosps/bf/aai/compare_astm.pdf. n63.1

Also included in the Brownfields Act are measures intended to encourage the purchase, development, and reuse of so-called "brownfields"; properties contaminated through industrial use, but whose level of pollution is not so severe that they are designated as priority cleanup areas by EPA or statement environmental agencies. To encourage the redevelopment of brownfield properties, the Brownfields Act adopted a new prospective purchaser defense to CERCLA liability, codifying into law practices that the EPA previously had implemented through less formal regulatory guidance. The prospective purchaser defense creates a limitation on liability for persons who buy a contaminated property with knowledge of its existing contamination, provided they meet certain conditions. n64 The Brownfields Act also bars federal CERCLA enforcement against persons who clean up property under state voluntary cleanup programs. n65

The new "bona fide prospective purchaser" defense provides protection from CERCLA liability for new purchasers (and their tenants) of contaminated property. n66 To qualify for the defense, the purchaser must demonstrate that disposal of hazardous substances occurred before the purchase, the purchaser meets the "all appropriate inquiry" standard applicable to the innocent landowner defense, and the purchaser meets certain continuing obligations, such as providing notice or discovery of release of hazardous substances, and complying with government requests for information. n67 In addition, although the "bona fide prospective purchaser" is not required to undertake cleanup in order to qualify for the protection from liability, the new property owner, like the innocent landowner, must take "appropriate care" to prevent or limit exposure from the existing contamination. n68

The Brownfields Act also adopts a bar against enforcement by the federal government under CERCLA against a person who has or is conducting a cleanup at certain eligible brownfield sites in accordance with a state cleanup program. n69 The enforcement bar is not absolute, but EPA is discouraged from using authority to "reopen" a site cleaned-up by requirements that it notify the State and the United States Congress whenever it seeks to enforce against a site cleaned-up under a state program. n70 Excluded from eligibility are sites subject to a response action under CERCLA, or that are subject to a judicial or administrative order under several federal environmental statutes, as well as facilities subject to corrective action under the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act, among other exclusions. n71

[3] Claims for Liability Under CERCLA Brought Against Brokers

As indicated above, CERCLA does not impose on real estate brokers any obligations or liabilities, so long as they are working in the capacity of brokers. In two cases, however, claims for liability under CERCLA were brought against brokers on the basis that their actions made them liable for cleanup costs as PRPs. In Tanglewood East Homeowners v. Charles-Thomas, Inc., n72 subdivision property owners brought an action based on CERCLA and RCRA arising out of the fact that the subdivision had been built on a site upon which toxic waste had accumulated. The defendants included the lender, developers, construction companies and the real estate agents and companies involved in the marketing and sale of the homes. In affirming the trial court's denial of defendant's motion to dismiss, the 5th Circuit concluded that because CERCLA defined disposal, for which one might be liable under CERCLA, as " 'placing of any ... hazardous waste into or on the land', those who move waste about the site may fall within the terms of that provision." n73 Thus, to the extent that the evidence could establish that any of the defendants, including the real estate brokers, were involved in such activities, including filling or grading areas where the waste was located, they might be liable under CERCLA. Of course, real estate brokers acting solely in their capacity as marketing agents would not normally be involved in such development or operational activities, and thus not be liable. In Lentz v. Mason, n74 the plaintiffs were property owners who had listed their property with the defendant real estate brokers for sale or lease. The brokers found a tenant who leased the property with the apparent intention to buy. After five months the owners obtained a Warrant for Removal of the tenant, and upon reentry found the premises in considerable disarray. Among the items remaining on the property were "off-specification basic torpedo tubes," which plaintiff alleged were releasing or had released various substances qualifying as hazardous under CERCLA. Plaintiff sought to hold the defendant real estate brokers liable under CERCLA for the costs associated with cleaning up those substances. The court rejected plaintiffs' claim that the brokers could be liable as operators or arrangers under CERCLA, noting that the brokers did not control the acts of the tenant, nor did they have the power to control or, indeed, any knowledge of the tenant's activities.

In Seats v. Hooper, n75 the purchasers discovered their property to contain pollutants that contaminated the water supply. They brought their action against the seller, the owner of the adjoining property, which was a landfill and the alleged source of the pollutants, and the real estate agents involved in the sale of the property. While the plaintiff purchasers asserted claims under CERCLA against the prior owner and the adjoining property owner, they apparently recognized that CERCLA does not provide a basis for liability by the real estate brokers and limited their claims against the brokers to various Pennsylvania statutory and common-law theories. Those theories included maintaining a public and private nuisance, fraud, latent defect, negligent misrepresentation and negligence, strict liability, ultrahazardous activity, statutory unfair trade practices, and breach of implied warranties and covenants. All but the fraud, negligence, negligent misrepresentation, latent defect and unfair trade practices claims were summarily rejected on the brokers' motion to dismiss.

The term "facility" means (A) any building, structure, installation, equipment, pipe or pipeline (including any pipe into a sewer or publicly owned treatment works), well, pit, pond, lagoon, impoundment, ditch, landfill, storage container, motor vehicle, rolling stock, or aircraft, or (B) any site or area where a hazardous substance has been deposited, stored, disposed of, or placed, or otherwise come to be located; but does not include any consumer product in consumer use or any vessel.

42 U.S.C. § 9601(9). Courts have defined "facility" broadly. "In order to show that an area is a 'facility,' the plaintiff need only show that a hazardous substance, as defined by CERCLA, has been placed there or has 'otherwise come to be located' there." United States v. Conservation Chem. Co., 619 F. Supp. 162, 185 (W.D. Mo. 1985). See also United States v. Conservation Chem. Co., 619 F. Supp. 162 (W.D. (n24)Footnote 23. Section 101(22) of CERCLA provides in part:

The term "release" means any spilling, leaking, pumping, pouring, emitting, emptying, discharging, injecting, escaping, leaching, dumping, or disposing into the environment (including the abandonment or discarding of barrels, containers, and other closed receptacles containing any hazardous substance or pollutant or contaminant), but excludes (A) any release which results in exposure to persons solely within a workplace, with respect to a claim which such persons may assert against the employer of such persons, (B) emissions from the engine exhaust of a motor vehicle, rolling stock, aircraft, vessel, or pipeline pumping station engine, (C) release of source, byproduct, or special nuclear material from a nuclear incident, as those terms are defined in the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 [42 U.S.C. § 2011 et seq.], if such release is subject to requirements with respect to financial protection established by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission under section 170 of such Act [42 U.S.C.A § 2210], or for the purposes of section 9604 of this title or any other response action, any release of source byproduct, or special nuclear material from any processing site designated under section 7912(a)(1) or 7942(a) of this title, and (D) the normal application of fertilizer.

42 U.S.C. § 9601(22). See Vermont v. Staco, Inc., 684 F. Supp. 822 (D. Vt. 1988) (courts have broadly interpreted "release" to include any environmental presence of a hazardous substance originating from a known industrial, manufacturing or storage facility).

(n25)Footnote 24. Section 101(14) of CERCLA provides:

The term "hazardous substance" means (A) any substance designated pursuant to section 1321(b)(2)(A) of Title 33, (B) any element, compound, mixture, solution, or substance designated pursuant to section 9602 of this title, (C) any hazardous waste having the characteristics identified under or listed pursuant to section 3001 of the Solid Waste Disposal Act [42 U.S.C. § 6921] (but not including any waste the regulation of which under the Solid Waste Disposal Act [42 U.S.C. § 6901 et seq.] has been suspended by Act of Congress), (D) any toxic pollutant listed under section 1317(a) of Title 33, (E) any hazardous air pollutant listed under section 112 of the Clean Air Act [42 U.S.C. § 7412], and (F) any imminently hazardous chemical substance or mixture with respect to which the Administrator has taken action pursuant to section 2606 of Title 15. The term does not include petroleum, including crude oil or any fraction thereof which is not otherwise specifically listed or designated as a hazardous substance under subparagraphs (A) through (F) of this paragraph, and the term does not include natural gas, natural gas liquids, liquefied natural gas, or synthetic gas usable for fuel (or mixtures of natural gas and such synthetic gas).

Generators are liable even if title to the hazardous waste is transferred to another person. Moreover, it need not be proven that a particular generator's hazardous waste constitutes the contamination that is the subject of the remedial action, as long as that generator's waste was detected at the site. See Artesian Water Co. v. New Castle County, 659 F. Supp. at 1282 (plaintiff need not prove "that the contaminants found near the Site actually flow from the Site."); *United States v. (n31)Footnote 30. Section 101(20) of CERCLA provides:

(A) The term "owner or operator" means (i) in the case of a vessel, any person owning, operating, or chartering by demise, such vessel, (ii) in the case of an onshore facility or an offshore facility, any person owning or operating such facility, and (iii) in the case of any facility, title or control of which was conveyed due to bankruptcy, foreclosure, tax delinquency, abandonment, or similar means to a unit of State or local government, any person who owned, operated or otherwise controlled activities at such facility immediately beforehand. Such term does not include a person, who, without participating in the management of a vessel or facility, holds indicia of ownership primarily to protect his security interest in the vessel or facility.

(B) In the case of a hazardous substance which has been accepted for transportation by a common or contract carrier and except as provided in section 9607(a)(3) or (4) of this title, (i) the term "owner or operator" shall mean such common carrier or other bona fide for hire carrier acting as an independent contractor during such transportation, (ii) the shipper of such hazardous substance shall not be considered to have caused or contributed to any release during such transportation which resulted solely from circumstances or conditions beyond his control.

(C) In the case of a hazardous substance which has been delivered by a common or contract carrier to a disposal or treatment facility and except as provided in Section 9607(a)(3) or (4) of this title (i) the term "owner or operator" shall not include such common or contract carrier, and (ii) such common or contract carrier shall not be considered to have caused or contributed to any release at such disposal or treatment facility resulting from circumstances or conditions beyond its control.

(D) The term "owner or operator" does not include a unit of State or local government which acquired ownership or control involuntarily through bankruptcy, tax delinquency, abandonment, or other circumstances in which the government involuntarily acquires title by virtue of its function as sovereign. The exclusion provided under this paragraph shall not apply to any State or local government which has caused or contributed to the release or threatened release of a hazardous substance from the facility, and such a State or local government shall be subject to the provisions of this chapter in the same manner and to the same extent, both procedurally and substantively, as any non-governmental entity, including liability under Section 9607 of this title.

CHAPTER 15 Real Estate Brokers and Environmental Laws *

10A-15 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 15.06

§ 15.06 Green Building Issues Affecting Real Estate Brokersⁿ¹

[1] Green Building Defined

The era of green building has arrived. Green building is the practice of increasing the efficiency of buildings and their use of energy, water, and materials, and reducing building impacts on human health and the environment through better siting, design, construction, operation, maintenance, and removal. Conventional buildings use enormous amounts of energy. According to a report by the U.S. Department of Energy (DOE), in 2005, buildings in the United States used 72% of all electricity generated and accounted for 80% of all electricity expenditures. ⁿ² A study by the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) found that buildings account for 39% of total energy use, 12% of total water consumption, 68% of total electrical consumption, and 38% of greenhouse gas (GHG) emissions. ⁿ³ In fact, approximately one-third of all energy generated worldwide is used to power buildings. ⁿ⁴ In the United States, buildings use approximately three-fourths of all electricity generated. ⁿ⁵ Construction and demolition waste in the U.S. accounts for well over half of all non-industrial waste. ⁿ⁶ In addition, buildings emit huge amounts of greenhouse gases. Through the energy they consume, buildings account for approximately 40% of total GHG emissions in the United States. ⁿ⁷ In heavily urban areas, this percentage is much higher. ⁿ⁸ In fact, U.S. buildings emit more greenhouse gases than any country in the world except China. ⁿ⁹ As of December 2009, this number has grown to more than 2,400, and over 35,000 buildings were in the process of achieving some level of LEED certification. ^{n9.1}

The rise of green buildings has paralleled three other important trends. First, there is a growing worldwide consensus that climate change is occurring and is caused primarily by human activities, primarily from the burning of fossil fuels for energy. Similarly, there is a growing consensus that greenhouse gas (GHG) emissions must be reduced dramatically to avert a scenario where average global temperatures rise by 2-4 degrees C or more. ^{n9.2} Such a rise in temperatures could have potentially catastrophic consequences for the world's ecosystems. ^{n9.3} While the United States does not yet have a mandatory cap on GHG emissions, federal legislation will very likely be enacted in the next few years. Thus, GHG emitters will soon have to pay for the privilege of doing so. Second, energy prices, most notably petroleum, have increased in recent years. ^{n9.4} While prices experienced a dramatic decline in 2009 as a result of the worldwide economic crisis, most analysts expect this to be a short-term trend. Although the United States still consumes roughly a quarter of the oil produced worldwide, other nations, particularly China and India, are rapidly increasing the amount of oil they consume. Whether or not the world has reached a point of "peak oil," this growing worldwide demand for oil is unlikely to reverse course over the long term. Third, there is an increasing awareness that buildings consume enormous quantities of energy and materials and are large generators of waste. The combination of these trends has brought two important and related issues to the forefront of public policy discussions: first, how to reduce GHG emissions and decrease demand for fossil fuels and other rapidly diminishing resources, and second, how to save money in the face of rising energy costs. Green buildings provide a compelling answer to both.

Despite their obvious advantages, green buildings are, for now, relatively rare. However, given the twin realities of a world that is rapidly warming and a world where fossil fuels are increasingly expensive, it is likely that green buildings will become the new norm.

[2] Potential to Expand Green Building

The building sector in the United States is enormous and is expected to expand in the near term. Currently, there are more than 82 million residential buildings and approximately 75 billion square feet of commercial floor space in the United States. By 2015, the nation is projected to add over 15 million households and 11 billion square feet of commercial space. n10 Thus, there is enormous potential to reduce energy consumption and greenhouse gas emissions by making residential and commercial buildings more energy efficient and environmentally sustainable. In addition, job growth in the green building industry is expected to increase. In November 2009, the U.S. Green Building Council at Booz Allen Hamilton, a consulting firm, issued a report finding that green building will support 7.9 million jobs from 2009 to 2013 and will add $554 billion to the U.S. economy during this period. n10.1

Building energy efficiency is becoming an increasingly important issue. In 2007, DOE projected that energy use in the United States will increase by approximately 19% by 2025. n10.2 But that is only half of the problem. Not only do buildings in the U.S. use a lot of energy, they do so inefficiently. America uses twice as much energy per unit of economic output as Germany, and nearly three times as much as Japan. n10.3 Much of the energy produced for and used in buildings is wasted in a variety of ways. The culprits are many. For example, many buildings are poorly insulated, allowing heat to escape. In addition, although water heaters, appliances and light bulbs that use 10-75% less energy are available, inefficient, energy-intensive models are still widely used. In addition, buildings are often poorly designed. For example, most buildings do not take advantage of available features such as natural lighting, automatic shut-offs for lights, or individual lighting or thermal comfort controls. As a result, buildings use far more energy than is necessary.

[3] Green Building Trends in the Real Estate Market

[a] Legislation Encouraging Green Building, Including Compliance with LEED Standards

In recent years, several trends have developed. First, state and local governments have passed a variety of legislation either mandating or encouraging public and/or private entities to incorporate green building standards into new and existing buildings. n11 For example, Washington state has passed a law requiring all major public agency facilities with a floor area exceeding 5,000 square feet including state-funded school buildings and any remodeling over 5,000 square feet when the cost is greater than 50 percent of the assessed value, to meet or exceed the "silver" rating established by the U.S. Green Building Council's LEED green building rating system. n12 LEED is the most well-known and widely used green building system in the world. n13 In May 2007, Minnesota passed a bill entitled the "Next Generation Energy Act of 2007," which sets a state goal of certifying 100 commercial buildings as meeting LEED or other building rating systems by December 31, 2010." n14 New York offers a tax incentive program for developers and builders of environmentally friendly buildings through its Green Building Tax Credit (GBTC) program, which was enacted in 2000. n15 Several municipalities have programs that reward projects that meet LEED standards with density incentives. n16 These programs allow developers to request a larger building than is normally allowed under municipal codes if the project receives a specified level of LEED certification.

Cities have also instituted programs to make existing buildings more energy efficient. For example, in December 2009,

New York City passed an energy-efficiency legislative package for government, commercial, and residential buildings in New York City. The bills put into place a city plan announced in April 2009 to improve energy efficiency in existing buildings. In November 2009, the American Institute of Architects released a report finding that the number of mid-sized to large U.S. cities with green building programs increased by 50% to 138 during the past two years. n16.1

Although most of the legislation affecting green buildings has occurred at the state and local level, the federal government has begun to enact legislation that addresses energy efficiency and clean energy in buildings. The most recent example of this is the American Recovery and Reinvestment Act of 2009 (ARRA), which was enacted in February 2009. n17 The ARRA contains unprecedented federal government support for green buildings and related energy initiatives. Although it is unlikely that most real estate brokers will be directly affected by the ARRA, the sheer amount of federal funds available for green buildings makes it clear that encouraging green buildings has become a major federal initiative. Thus, it is worth looking at the provisions of the ARRA that deal with green buildings. These are set forth below.

[b] Marketing Green Buildings and Buyer Demand

Second, real estate developers have begun marketing green buildings as more energy efficient, healthier, and generally more desirable to live in. Developers including Hines, Forest City Enterprises, Louis Dreyfus Property Group, Corporate Office Properties Trust and Liberty Property Trust are building green buildings to satisfy tenant demand, reduce obsolescence risk, and assert market leadership over their competitors. These trends have resulted in a large number of green buildings coming to the market in a relatively short period of time as well as a growing demand from buyers for residential and commercial spaces that incorporate green features.

Several recent studies have confirmed that green buildings are in high demand. In April 2008, the CoStar Group released a report finding that green buildings outperform their non-green peers in key areas such as occupancy, sale price and rental rates, sometimes by wide margins. The study found that buildings that achieved some level of LEED certification sold for an astonishing $171 more per square foot, had rent premiums of $11.24 per square foot, n18 and had 3.8% higher occupancy rates than non-LEED buildings. n19 Another study concluded that buildings that were Energy Star-certified n20 had 3.3% higher rents, although it found a LEED rating had no statistically significant effect on commercial rent rates. n21 In November 2008, McGraw-Hill Construction released a report showing that green building construction starts increased from $10 billion in 2005 to $36-48 billion in 2008. The report estimates that these numbers could increase to $96-140 billion in the next five years. n22 While the recent economic downturn has affected the entire real estate market, these studies suggest that green buildings will continue to be in high demand when the economy rebounds.

Although demand for green buildings is growing, many home buyers still perceive green buildings to be significantly more expensive than traditional buildings. This is sometimes referred to as the "green premium." A 2007 study found that respondents estimated that the additional cost of constructing a green building at 17% above conventional construction, a wildly inflated estimate. n23 To a certain extent, green buildings' upfront costs are greater when compared with traditional buildings. However, these upfront costs are marginal. A 2003 study found that the average premium on green buildings was around 2%, or $3-5 per square foot, substantially lower than what is commonly perceived. n24 The study found that the majority of this increased cost is due to the increased architectural and engineering design time, modeling costs and time necessary to integrate sustainable building practices into projects. The study concluded that the earlier green building features are incorporated into the design process, the lower the cost. Another study in 2004 found that the cost per square foot for buildings seeking basic LEED certification fell into the existing range of costs for buildings of a similar program type. n25 In the fall of 2009, the New York City chapter of the U.S. Green Building Council released a report finding that there was no statistically significant difference in construction costs between LEED and non-LEED projects with respect to residential buildings (LEED projects averaged $440/sf and non-LEED projects averaged $436/sf). The report found that the median cost of LEED design fees were $0.56/sf, the cost of LEED documentation was $0.36/sf, and the commissioning cost was $1.55/sf. However, the report stated that the range in LEED fees was considerable, with some projects adding nothing for LEED design fees, while others added as much as $6.62/sf. n25.1

However, the operating costs for green buildings are significantly less than those of conventional buildings because of reduced energy and water costs, reduced waste, improved indoor environmental quality and lower operations and maintenance costs. According to the 2003 study mentioned above, these savings can be as much as 10 times the initial investment. n25.2 Based on the study's findings, if $40,000 is initially invested to incorporate green features into a $2 million dollar project, the initial investment is repaid within two years. Over a 20-year period (based on a conservative 20-year life cycle of a building), these savings amount to $400,000. There are other economic benefits as well. Green buildings have health benefits such as increased productivity and reduced absenteeism due to illness because of better indoor air quality. While these benefits are not directly tied into the cost of constructing and operating the buildings, they do offer indirect incentives for companies and individuals to purchase or lease space in these buildings.

[c] Green Building Aspects of the American Recovery and Reinvestment Act

The American Recovery and Reinvestment Act of 2009 (ARRA) allocates a large amount of federal money to a number of programs that fall under the rubric of promoting energy efficiency. Since buildings consume approximately 40% of energy used in the United States, President Obama made it clear during the 2008 campaign that making buildings more energy efficient would be a centerpiece of his energy policy in office. The ARRA follows through on that pledge, providing an overall allocation of $16.8 billion to the Department of Energy for energy efficiency and renewable energy programs. n26

First, the law requires that $5.5 billion be deposited in the Federal Buildings Fund (FBF), which is dedicated to the upkeep of federal buildings. n27 Of this money, $4.5 billion is available for the purpose of converting General Services Administration (GSA) facilities to "High Performance Green Buildings," which is a building that, compared to similar buildings, reduces energy and water use, improves indoor air quality, takes greater advantage of natural light, makes use of nontoxic materials and products, and is situated so that public transportation can be used to reach it. n28 The federal government is taking it upon itself to make greater use of green buildings both to save money in building management and to serve as a model for the private sector. High-performance green buildings substantially cut a building's energy consumption and cost, are more reliable through the generation of onsite power, reduce the environmental impacts of the built environment, and provide jobs in the renewable energy and bio-based product industries, thereby reducing the country's reliance on imported oil and ultimately reducing greenhouse gases. n29 In addition, the ARRA contains $3.84 billion in supplemental appropriations spread among the various service branches for Department of Defense operations and maintenance, which is meant to both improve and modernize facilities and barracks and "invest in the energy efficiency of Department of Defense facilities." n30 While not all of these supplemental appropriations will go to energy efficiency, a significant portion will.

The ARRA makes $3.2 billion available to a program known as the Energy Efficiency and Conservation Block Grant (EECBG) program. EISA created this program which provides for federal grants to units of local government, Indian tribes, and States to reduce energy use and fossil fuel emissions, and for improvements in energy efficiency. n31 In addition, $3.1 billion is for the State Energy Program. The State Energy Program was created in 1996 by consolidating two other programs--the State Energy Conservation Program (SECP) and the Institutional Conservation Program (ICP). The SECP provided states with funding for energy efficiency and renewable energy projects, and the ICP provided hospitals and schools with a technical analysis of their buildings, and identified the potential savings from proposed energy conservation measures. Through the consolidated State Energy Program, the Department of Energy provides a wide variety of financial and technical assistance to the states with the goal of improving energy efficiency and renewable energy on a state level. There are certain conditions to the receipt of grants, however, that could make them hard to obtain. For example, the governor of the state has to notify the Secretary of Energy that the governor has obtained assurances that the state utility commission will seek to implement, in formal proceedings, a general policy of what is called decoupling of rates (that utilities get financial incentives for encouraging customers to save energy) and that the state or local government units have the authority to adopt building energy codes meeting the most recent International Energy Conservation Code or equivalent U.S. standards. n32 There are also state cost-sharing requirements.

Also included under the heading of energy efficiency is $5 billion for the Weatherization Assistance Program. Created by the Energy Conservation and Production Act, the Weather Assistance Program enables low-income families to permanently reduce their energy bills by making their homes more energy efficient. n33 The ARRA increases the maximum benefit per dwelling unit from $2,500 to $6,500 and expands income eligibility from 150% of the federal poverty level to 200%.

[4] Green Building Rating Systems

These trends have required that real estate brokers become familiar with green building features such as energy efficient lighting and HVAC systems, improved indoor environmental quality, water efficient fixtures, sustainable and non-toxic building materials, etc. It has also required that brokers have at least a passing familiarity with commercial and residential green building rating systems. Briefly, LEED is a green building-rating system that addresses six major areas:

- sustainable sites,
- water efficiency,
- energy and atmosphere,
- materials and resources,
- indoor environmental quality, and
- innovation and design process.

LEED for New Construction, referred to as LEED-NC, is the most widely used LEED rating system and has four progressive levels of certification: Certified, Silver, Gold, and Platinum. Other LEED rating systems include LEED-EB, which applies to existing buildings, LEED-CI, which applies to commercial interiors, LEED-CS, which applies to building core and shell projects, LEED-Schools, and LEED-Homes. n34 At the end of construction or renovation, a project must submit verification that the particular design elements were actually implemented to receive certification. In addition, project developers must satisfy a number of prerequisites in some of the six categories and achieve a certain number of points before a building can attain LEED certification. Projects are awarded specific ratings depending on the number of points achieved. Different LEED rating systems have varied scoring systems based on a set of required prerequisites and a variety of credits in the six major categories listed above. For example, LEED-NC 3.0 has 100 possible points and buildings can qualify for four levels of certification: (1) Certified (40-49 points); (2) Silver (50-59 points); (3) Gold (60-79 points); and (4) Platinum (80-100 points). n35 n36 Since its inception, LEED has grown to encompass over 14,000 projects in 50 states and 30 countries covering 3.2 billion square feet of development area. n37

Another rating system is Green Globes from the Green Building Initiative (GBI). n38 Green Globes is an online building assessment tool for both residential and commercial structures. Green Globes helps both with the new construction of commercial buildings and with the maintenance and improvement of existing buildings. It is questionnaire driven and is generally acknowledged to be less cumbersome and less expensive to administer than LEED, although not as well known or rigorous. n39 administered by DOE and EPA. n39.1 Energy Star is "a voluntary program to identify and promote energy-efficient products and buildings in order to reduce energy consumption, improve energy security, and reduce pollution through voluntary labeling of, or other forms of communication about, products and buildings that meet the highest energy conservation standards." n39.2 Energy Star began in 1992 as a voluntary labeling program that was designed by EPA to "identify and promote energy-efficient products to reduce greenhouse gas emissions." n39.3 Since that time, the program has been extended to cover new homes and commercial and industrial buildings. In this context, the program rates commercial buildings for energy efficiency and provides Energy Star qualifications for new homes that meet their standards for energy efficient building design. n39.4 EPA has created an on-line energy rating system for commercial buildings, referred to as "Portfolio Manager," which is an interactive energy management tool that allows users to track and assess energy and water consumption across their entire portfolio of buildings and compare them with other buildings of the same type and size across the country. n39.5 As of October 2007, Portfolio Manager also includes greenhouse gas (GHG) emissions factors. If a building achieves an Energy Star rating of 75, meaning that it uses less energy than 74.9% of other buildings in its category, it receives an Energy Star designation and is listed on the EPA web site as a superior user of energy. n39.6

Several building rating systems are focused on residential buildings. For example, in California, Build It Green is a non-profit membership organization whose mission is to promote healthy, energy and resource-efficient buildings in the state. n40 It applies to residential buildings and the organization has developed a rating program called "GreenPoint Rated" which provides an objective, third-party verification system that equips consumers to find green homes, understand green benefits, and recognize green features. Under the program, homes are graded on five categories: energy efficiency, resource conservation, indoor air quality, water conservation, and community. If a home meets the minimum point requirements in each category and scores at least 50 points, it earns the right to bear the GreenPoint Rated label. It also provides a score that allows prospective purchasers to evaluate and compare the environmental performance of different homes. n41 There are a number of similar federal, state and local organizations that encourage green homes, including n42 Built Green Colorado, n43 Built Green Seattle, n44 the California Green Builder Program, n45 and California Home Energy Rating System (HERS) to name a few. Brokers should familiarize themselves with the residential rating systems in their respective locales.

[5] Green Leases

A "green" lease is a lease of space in a green building. Although real estate brokers do not negotiate the terms of these leases, they should have an understanding of what they are and how they operate. Green buildings impact leases in three primary ways. First, green buildings impact the construction and design of the space. A normal lease requires the landlord to construct the core and shell and the tenant to build or pay for improvements to the space. A green lease requires that the landlord and tenant work together in an integrated design process. In addition, the tenant may require the landlord to represent and warrant that the building achieves some level of LEED certification. Second, green buildings impact a lease's economic provisions. Constructing a green building might be more expensive than a normal building. However, the operating costs are usually less. The lease may address how these costs and benefits should be allocated. Third, green buildings impact a lease's provisions relating to operations and maintenance. Green building systems have detailed operating and maintenance requirements. A landlord may prepare an operations manual for the building and require the tenant to comply with it. Conversely, a tenant may want to impose an obligation on the landlord to operate and maintain the building in accordance with certain green standards. Both parties may agree to use environmental friendly cleaning materials. The landlord may condition approval of tenant alterations on compliance with certain green building rating criteria. These requirements should be reflected in the lease.

Sometimes green leases are referred to as light-green, mid-green and dark-green. n46 A light-green lease does not contain commitments for achieving environmental targets. Obligations, if any, tend to be somewhat vague, such as requiring that alterations be performed in an "sustainable" or "environmentally appropriate" manner. A mid-green lease is more concrete in that it can establish such things as tenant reporting requirements relating to energy consumption. However, failure to achieve any agreed targets would not trigger any penalties. A dark-green lease includes such things as energy targets and would require a remedial response if the targets are not met.

Many companies and government agencies require their space to satisfy an applicable LEED certification level for commercial interiors. These entities look to specify that the space will meet such standards. Landlords are not generally in a position to guarantee such certification level. The landlord and tenant should work together to craft a lease that adequately protects each of their respective interests and avoids liability outside of either of their control. Incentives such as free rent periods or rent abatements are good ways to incentivize a property owner to deliver a green space without undue penalty for items outside of his control. The improvements should also be properly insured in the event of a casualty event. A lease should spell out the increased cost when considering the replacement costs of green improvements to a space given that they typically cost more than regular improvements.

The two most prominent green leasing standards currently available are promulgated by the U.S. Green Building Council and the Building Owners and Managers Association (BOMA). USGBC's LEED program utilizes widely accepted standards to certify tenant spaces through its Commercial Interiors certification process.

One of the most common barriers to implementing energy efficient building practices and technology is the split incentive, where the landlord pays for capital improvements but the tenants, who pay the utility bills, get the benefits of energy savings. n46.1 The 2008 version of the Building Owners and Managers Association International Lease Guide (the BOMA Lease Guide) emphasizes that a green lease may help "overcome some of the barriers to investment in energy efficient and sustainable technologies." n46.2 One approach the BOMA Lease Guide recommends to address the conflict between tenants and landlords is to carefully define operating costs so that landlords and tenants agree to share the cost of energy efficiency improvements.

[6] EcoBroker

One of the most important roles of a real estate broker is to provide information about the particular green features of a new home or commercial space to potential buyers or lessees. However, there are as yet few mechanisms available to allow brokers to speak with authority about the sometimes technical features of green buildings. One program, Ecobroker, is attempting to change that. According to its website, EcoBroker is an educational and marketing program "designed to help communities across the United States and internationally take advantage of and encourage energy efficiency and sustainable design in real estate properties." n47 The program provides continuing education credits as a way to educate real estate brokers and industry affiliates about green buildings through a series of courses that allows them to become certified EcoBrokers[(R)] and address buyers' and sellers' increasing sensitivity to building features like energy efficiency and environmental design. The program also assists brokers in working through and providing solutions for issues that may arise in real estate transactions such as mold, radon and poor indoor air quality.

The program, which is available online, addresses environmental issues such as radon, asbestos, lead, water, mold, indoor air quality, and other issues that may arise during real estate transactions. It also covers energy efficiency technologies, sustainable energy options, and green mortgage options for energy efficiency improvements. It explains green home certification programs, such as Built Green[(R)] Colorado, Energy Star Qualified Homes, and LEED.

[7] The Role of Brokers in the Green Marketplace

Although green buildings are becoming more and more popular, there are still relatively few green residences and commercial spaces on the market. According to Chris Bartle, President of Green Key Real Estate, one of the first green real estate companies in the nation, 95% of his company's work involves assisting buyers and sellers in greening their properties either before or after sale. Thus, it is important that brokers, as part of their normal duties, be able to clearly and effectively explain to buyers the relative advantages of greening their properties and how to quickly and cost-effectively do so.

Most of the work of green brokers is currently focused on outreach and education. According to Mr. Bartle, Green agents and brokers are working to add data fields for green features to the various multiple listing services (MLS's) around the country. The California Association of Realtors (CAR) has established a Green Task Force that is working to educate clients about green homes. In addition, Build It Green has a Real Estate Council that is educating agents, brokers, mortgage brokers and appraisers about green homes and providing a means for them to network.

[8] Broker Liability

Because green building is a relatively new phenomenon, there is little analysis regarding the legal obligations and potential liabilities for real estate brokers. One potential pitfall for brokers is to misrepresent the green features of a residential or commercial building. This is relatively easy to do because builders or owners may themselves not fully or accurately understand the various building rating systems or whether certain features are, in fact, green. While it is common for brokers to carry insurance that covers them from such errors and omissions, perhaps the most important thing that brokers can do is to have a clear and complete understanding of a property's green features so they can accurately relay these features to potential purchasers. This requires that brokers independently verify these features before communicating them with potential purchasers.

In addition, brokers should use certified green building experts whenever possible and should clearly communicate that, although they are knowledgeable about these issues, they are not experts and that parties should do their own investigation or engage their own experts if they have any questions.

[9] Green Marketing Claims

Many real estate developers are marketing their buildings as environmentally friendly. In general, developers are prohibited by law from making any false or misleading statements about their buildings. At the federal level, the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) administers Section 5 of the FTC Act, which prohibits "unfair or deceptive" practices.ⁿ⁴⁸ In the environmental area the FTC first issued its "Guides for the Use of Environmental Claims," more commonly known as the "Green Guides," in the early nineties.ⁿ⁴⁹ The Green Guides, which are federal regulations, indicate how the FTC will apply Section 5 of the FTC Act. The most recent version of the Green Guides was released in 1998.

The Green Guides focus primarily on claims such as "recyclable," "recycled" and "biodegradable," although they also lay out some general principles. For example, with respect to claims that a product is "biodegradable," the Green Guides state the following: "An unqualified claim that a product or package is degradable, biodegradable or photodegradable should be substantiated by competent and reliable scientific evidence that the entire product or package will completely break down and return to nature, i.e., decompose into elements found in nature within a reasonably short period of time after customary disposal."ⁿ⁵⁰ The Guides go on to state the following: "Claims of degradability, biodegradability or photodegradability should be qualified to the extent necessary to avoid customer deception about : (1) the product or package's ability to degrade in the environment where it is customarily disposed; and (2) the rate and extent of degradation."ⁿ⁵¹

The Green Guides do not specifically address many of the current environmental, energy and carbon emission claims being made, such as claims that a building or product is carbon neutral. However, throughout 2008 the FTC held workshops on many of the newer types of environmental claims, including claims related to buildings and building materials, and indicated that it planned to release updated Guides.ⁿ⁵² As of April 2010 a revised version of Green Guides had not yet been released.

If the FTC determines that a claim is false or misleading, it can bring an administrative action or it can file an action in federal court.ⁿ⁵³ A number of remedies are available to the agency, the most common of which are injunctive relief, though in rare instances the FTC also seeks corrective advertising. Subsequent violations of any injunctive order can result in civil penalties of up to $16,000 per violation.ⁿ⁵⁴

The FTC typically proceeds against claims made to consumers. In this regard, green claims regarding residential buildings impact consumers directly. However, many green building claims are commercial in nature. The FTC recognizes that many of the newer environmental claims are more commercial in nature and has warned the business community that it will not hesitate to bring cases outside of its traditional consumer framework, particularly in this area.

CHAPTER 15 Real Estate Brokers and Environmental Laws *

10A-15 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 15.07

§ 15.07 Conclusion

The still modest but slowly evolving body of case law addressing a real estate broker's liability to the purchaser for various environmental problems affecting the property purchased generally follows the principles of broker liability established in litigation involving more familiar, commonplace property flaws. Those cases hold brokers liable when misrepresentations are made because of fraudulent or negligent conduct. Courts appear reluctant to impose affirmative duties on real estate brokers to identify each and every potential environmental hazard a property may contain. Nevertheless, real estate professionals should remain diligently alert for indicators of environmental hazards, seek from sellers information about the environmental condition of the property, and share any relevant information with the potential buyers. These actions are likely to reduce substantially the possibility of a lawsuit against the real estate professional that may require the payment of damages for what is really someone else's problem. Lenders and insurance companies have made it clear that they are unwilling to shoulder the financial responsibility of cleaning up environmental problems that they did not create.

CHAPTER 15A Lead-Based Paint Disclosure *

10A-15A Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice Scope

Scope

SCOPE

Federal law mandates that real estate agents representing sellers and lessors disclose the presence of lead-based paint or lead-based paint hazards in residential transactions to buyers and lessees. Such disclosure involves some technical expertise. The terminology used by the administrative agencies that regulate disclosure is found in § 15A.02. In order to be able to carry out their disclosure responsibilities, real estate agents must be familiar with the following:

- the scope of the disclosure rules (§ 15A.03[2]),
- the exceptions to disclosure (§ 15A.03[4]),
- the timing of disclosure (§ 15A.03[6]), and
- all of the disclosure duties imposed on sellers and lessors (§ 15A.03[6]).

In addition, real estate agents must include in all purchase contracts or leases mandatory lead warning statements (set forth in § 15A.03[5]). Real estate agents and their brokerage firms must maintain records that demonstrate compliance with the disclosure requirements for each transaction. § 15A.04 discusses records to be maintained. If real estate agents comply with the disclosure requirements, their liability is limited. However, if they do not comply, they are liable for civil and criminal penalties imposed by administrative agencies, as well as for treble damages in a civil action. Section 15A.05 discusses real estate agents' failure or refusal to comply and § 15A.06 discusses the enforcement by administrative agencies and civil actions. Increasingly, states are enacting their own residential real estate disclosure statutes that are in addition to the federal disclosure requirements. § 15A.07 discusses compliance with state and local law. Federal forms for purchase contracts, provisions applicable to leases, and risk assessment contingency clauses are found in § 15A.08. In addition, interpretive guidance from the federal government for real estate agents to be able to comply with the disclosure requirements are contained in § 15A.09.

PART V Other Issues Affecting Brokers
CHAPTER 15A Lead-Based Paint Disclosure *

10A-15A Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 15A.01

§ 15A.01 Federal Lead-Based Paint Legislation

[1] The Lead-Based Paint Poisoning Prevention Act

Congress addressed lead-based paint poisoning in residential housing by enacting the Lead-Based Paint Poisoning Prevention Act in 1971 (LPPPA) n1 in response to an increased awareness of the effects of lead poisoning in children. The purpose of LPPPA was to assess the nature and extent of the problems of lead-based paint hazards and to establish methods to remove these hazards from areas where children were at risk of exposure. n2 LPPPA focused on existing housing that was receiving federal assistance, was federally owned, and was constructed prior to 1978. n3

However, the implementation and enforcement of LPPPA was ineffectual. In order to force the United States Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) to carry out its own directives, individuals sued both HUD and others to enforce compliance. Plaintiffs were found to have rights under the LPPPA in the following cases:

- A preliminary injunction in Philadelphia was upheld that prohibited HUD from selling any residential property until it had complied with its own regulations and those of the local health department; n4
- HUD was ordered to both monitor and enforce the provisions of LPPPA instead of only acting in an advisory capacity in the District of Columbia; n5
- Residents of New York City brought a successful action to force the local health department to comply with LPPPA's provisions; n6
- Tenants in Philadelphia had a right to sue HUD for failure to enforce regulations to inspect housing for lead-based paint and to take remedial measures; n7
- Tenants in New York housing units owned by Freddie Mac were found to have a cause of action under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and LPPPA for failure to comply with lead-based paint regulations; n8 and
- Tenants in Charleston, West Virginia had a valid claim under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 to assert that their local housing authority had failed to fulfill its obligations under LPPPA. n9

LPPPA applies to housing receiving federal assistance. While initial HUD regulations implementing LPPPA were ineffective, subsequent amendments and regulations have endeavored to put some teeth and organization into the implementation of LPPPA. n10

[2] The Residential Lead-Based Paint Hazard Reduction Act

Congress enacted the Residential Lead-Based Paint Hazard Reduction Act in 1992 (the Act). n11 The intent was to eliminate lead-based paint and its hazards in all residential housing constructed prior to 1978. n12 The Act requires sellers, lessors, or agents in sales or leases of target housing to disclose any evidence of lead-based paint and its hazards to buyers or lessors. n13 HUD and the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) promulgate regulations under the Act. n14 Though this Act was passed in 1992, and, pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 4852d(d), the regulations mandating disclosure under the act should have taken effect in 1995, EPA and HUD did not promulgate the regulations until 1996, and the regulations became effective September 6, 1996, for owners of more than four residential dwellings, and December 6, 1996, in the case of owners of one to four residential dwellings. n14.1

The Act was based on the recognition by Congress that the continuing effects of exposure to lead-based paint hazards in residential housing are pervasive. n15 Lead-based paint poisoning affects approximately 3,000,000 children under the age of six in the United States. n16 Exposure to lead-based paint, even at low levels, can cause children to have intelligence quotient deficiencies, learning disabilities, reduced attention span, hyperactivity, impaired memory, and behavior problems. n17 Exposure at higher levels can even lead to death. n18 Exposure to lead-based paint hazards also poses health risks for pregnant women. n19 The Act recognizes that lead-based paint hazards are a national crisis being faced by our children that demands the full force and effect of the federal government. n20

[3] The Lead Exposure Reduction Act

Congress also enacted the Lead Exposure Reduction Act n21 in 1992. The Lead Exposure Reduction Act sets training and certification standards at both the federal and state level for individuals engaged in lead-based activities. n22 The EPA promulgates regulations under the Lead Exposure Reduction Act that implement and expand the provisions of the disclosure rules found in the Act. Effective June 1, 1999, the regulations were expanded to include disclosure of lead-based paint and its hazards by those performing renovations in target housing. n23

PART V Other Issues Affecting Brokers
CHAPTER 15A Lead-Based Paint Disclosure *

10A-15A Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 15A.02

§ 15A.02 Terminology Used by EPA and HUD Is Defined by Statute or Regulation

Numerous terms used in the disclosure rules for lead-based paint and its hazards are either defined by statute or regulation. An understanding of the effect of the disclosure rules for lead-based paint and its hazards requires an understanding of the terms that are presented below:

Administrator means the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency. n1

Agent means any party who enters into a contract with sellers or lessors, including any party who enters into a contract with a representative of sellers or lessors, for the purpose of selling or leasing target housing. This term does not apply to buyers or any buyers' representative who receives all compensation from buyers. n2

Available means in the possession of or reasonably obtainable by the seller or lessor at the time of disclosure. n3

Certified inspector means an individual who has been trained by an accredited EPA training program and certified by the EPA to conduct inspections. A certified inspector also samples for the presence of lead in dust and soil for purposes of abatement. n4

Common area means a portion of a building generally accessible to all residents/users including, but not limited to hallways, stairways, laundry and recreational rooms, playgrounds, community centers, and boundary fences. n5

Contract for the purchase and sale of residential real property means any contract or agreement in which 1 party agrees to purchase an interest in real property on which there is situated 1 or more residential dwellings used or occupied, or intended to be used or occupied in whole or in part, as a home or residence of 1 or more persons. n6

Deteriorated paint means paint that is cracking, flaking, chipping, peeling, or otherwise separating from the substrate of a building component. n7

Evaluation means risk assessment, inspection, or risk assessment and inspection. n8

Foreclosure means any of the various methods, statutory or otherwise, known in different jurisdictions, of enforcing payment of a debt, by the taking and selling of real property. n9

Housing for the elderly means retirement communities or similar types of housing reserved for households composed of 1 or more persons 62 years of age or more at the time of initial occupancy. n10

Inspection means a surface-by-surface investigation to determine the presence of lead-based paint and a provision of a report explaining an investigation's results. n11

Knowingly means having actual knowledge of, acting with deliberate ignorance of, or reckless disregard of the prohibitions under 42 U.S.C. § 3545. n12

Lead-based paint means paint, or other surface coatings, that contain lead in excess of 1.0 milligrams per centimeter squared or 0.5 percent by weight or (1) in the case of other surface coatings on target housing, such lower level as may be established by the Secretary, or (2) in the case of any other paint or surface coatings, such other level as may be established by the Administrator. n13

Lead-based paint free housing means target housing that has been found to be free of paint or other surface coatings that contain lead equal to or in excess of 1.0 milligram per square centimeter or 0.5 percent by weight. n14

Lead-based paint hazard means any condition that causes exposure to lead from lead-contaminated dust, lead-contaminated soil, lead-contaminated paint that is deteriorated or present in accessible surfaces, friction surfaces, or impact surfaces that would result in adverse human health effects as established by the Administrator. n15

Lessee means an entity that enters into an agreement to lease, rent, or sublease target housing, including but not limited to individuals, partnerships, corporations, trusts, government agencies, Indian tribes, and nonprofit organizations. n16

Lessor means any entity that offers target housing for lease, rent, or sublease, including but not limited to individuals, partnerships, corporations, trusts, government agencies, housing agencies, Indian tribes, and nonprofit organizations. n17

Owner means any entity that has legal title to target housing, including but not limited to individuals, partnerships, corporations, trusts, government agencies, housing agencies, Indian tribes, and nonprofit organizations, except where mortgagees hold legal title to property serving as collateral for mortgage loans, in which case the owner would be the mortgagor. n18

Purchaser means an entity that enters into an agreement to purchase an interest in target housing, including but not limited to individuals, partnerships, corporations, trusts, government agencies, housing agencies, Indian tribes, and nonprofit organizations. n19

Residential dwelling means (1) a single-family dwelling, including attached structures such as porches and stoops or (2) a single-family dwelling unit in a structure that contains more than 1 separate residential unit, and in which each such unit is used or occupied, or intended to be owned or occupied, in whole or in part, as the residence of 1 or more persons. n20

Residential real property means real property on which there is situated one or more residential dwellings used or occupied, or intended to be used or occupied, in whole or in part, as the home or residence of 1 or more persons. n21

Risk assessment means an on-site investigation to determine and report the existence, nature, severity and location of lead-based paint hazards in residential dwellings, including (1) information gathering regarding the age and history of the housing and occupancy by children under age 6; (2) visual inspection; (3) limited wipe sampling or other environmental sampling techniques; (4) other activity as may be appropriate; and (5) provision of a report explaining the results of the investigation. n22

Secretary means the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development. n23

Seller means any entity that transfers legal title to target housing, in whole or in part, in return for consideration, including but not limited to individuals, partnerships, corporations, trusts, government agencies, housing agencies, Indian tribes, and nonprofit organizations. The term seller also includes: (1) An entity that transfers shares in a cooperatively owned project, in return for consideration; and (2) An entity that transfers its interest in a leasehold where it is legally permissible to separate the fee title from the title to the improvement, in return for consideration. n24

Target housing means any housing constructed prior to 1978. However, target housing does not include the following types of residential property: (1) any housing for the elderly, except where a child under the age of six resides or may reside in the future, (2) any housing for the disabled, except where a child under the age of 6 resides or may reside in the future, and (3) 0-bedroom dwellings where the sleeping and living areas are combined, including but not limited to, efficiencies, studio apartments and lofts. n25

0-Bedroom Dwelling means any residential dwelling in which the living area is not separated from the sleeping area. The term includes efficiencies, studio apartments, dormitory housing, military barracks, and rentals of individual rooms in residential dwellings. n26

10A-15A Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 15A.03

§ 15A.03 Mandatory Disclosures in Sale or Lease of Target Housing

[1] Real Estate Agents' Duty to Disclose

The disclosure of the existence of lead-based paint and lead-based paint hazards in target housing, with certain exceptions, is mandatory under the federal statutes in both the sale and leasing of real estate. Real estate agents must be familiar with all of the provisions of residential real estate disclosure law because it is their duty to:

- (1) inform sellers/lessors of their obligations under the disclosure requirements,
- (2) inform sellers of buyers' opportunity to conduct an evaluation, and
- (3) inform sellers/lessors of their responsibility to certify and acknowledge all disclosures in writing.

Further, they must ensure that sellers/lessors have performed all of their obligations or personally ensure sellers' or lessors' compliance with these requirements. n1 Real estate agents must also be aware that states also may have their own lead-based paint disclosure requirements in addition to the federal rules. These must be strictly adhered to as well because liability can attach for a failure or refusal to comply in addition to the federal penalties. In many instances, lead-based paint disclosures are made as part of a state's property condition disclosure requirements. Real estate agents may have additional duties under these state statutes. (See §§ 3A.10[11], 3A.17[2] above .)

In addition, the federal law requires that mandatory lead warning statements must be included in all purchase contracts and leases. All records pertaining to real estate agents' disclosures to sellers/lessors must be strictly maintained in order to be able to prove compliance with the disclosure rules if enforcement by an administrative agency or a civil action is brought for a failure to disclose.

Federal and state residential real estate disclosure may seem ministerial in many respects. However, it must be stressed to real estate agents in their continuing education programs and by their brokerage firms that the enforcement of the disclosure rules is onerous. The fines that can be imposed are substantial, criminal penalties can be imposed, and damages in a civil action are trebled. As a result, real estate agents' careers can be severely damaged, if not destroyed, and brokerage firms' reputations will be harmed in the communities in which they operate. The residential real estate disclosure rules are a serious matter.

The Office of Pollution Prevention and Toxics, the Office of Lead Hazard Control, and the Office of Lead-Based Paint Abatement and Poisoning Prevention issued 2 guides entitled Interpretative Guidance for the Real Estate Community on the Requirements for Disclosure of Information Concerning Lead-Based Paint in Housing dated August 20, 1996 and December 5, 1996 to assist the real estate community with compliance under the disclosure rules. These guides should be recommended reading for real estate agents. See § 15A.09 below for copies of these documents. In addition, the National Lead Information Center, a division of the Office of Pollution Prevention and Toxics, publishes the following documents that can be ordered by calling 1-800-424-5323 or by ordering them online at www.epa.gov/lead/nlicdocs.htm:

- Disclosure of Lead-Based Paint Hazards in Homes;
- Protect Your Family From Lead in Your Home in English and Spanish;

See § 15A.03[2] below for a discussion of the applicability and scope of the disclosure rules; § 15A.03[4] below for a discussion of the exceptions to the disclosure rules; § 15A.03[4] below for a discussion of the timing of disclosure; § 15A.03[5] below for a discussion of mandatory lead warning statements in contracts; § 15A.03[6] below for a discussion of the information that has to be disclosed by sellers/lessors; § 15A.04 below for a discussion of the records to be maintained; § 15A.05 below for a discussion of failure or refusal to comply with disclosure requirements; § 15A.06 below for a discussion of the enforcement of the residential real estate disclosure requirements by the United States Department of Housing and Urban Development, the Environmental Protection Agency, and civil actions; and § 15A.07 below for a discussion of compliance with state and local law.

[2] Applicability and Scope of Disclosure Rules

Sellers, lessors, or sublessors, n2 and their agents n3 if applicable, must disclose to buyers/lessees the presence of lead-based paint and its hazards. n4 Sellers/lessors, n5 buyers/lessees, n6 and any agent n7 must acknowledge all disclosures in writing. These disclosure obligations do not imply a positive obligation on the seller or lessor to conduct any evaluation or reduction activities. n7.1 The federal disclosure law does not affect the validity or enforceability of any other term or provision of contracts of sale/lease or any type of mortgage loan securing an interest in real property. Failure to comply with the disclosure law does not create a defect in title. n8 The effective date for disclosure for sellers of more than 4 residential dwellings was September 6, 1996 n9 and December 6, 1996 for sellers of 1-4 residential dwellings. n10

The disclosure rules impose requirements on the sale or lease of target housing. The language of the statute and regulations imply strongly that the obligations created thereunder run from a seller to a purchaser, or from a lessor to a lessee. Consequently, a broker involved in the sale of target housing cannot be sued by the persons who lease the house from the purchaser. Neither the statute nor the regulations indicate that sellers or lessors must comply with the disclosure obligations with respect to parties unconnected to the real estate transaction with which the seller or lessor was involved. n10.1

Several courts have held that a buyer's agent, even one that is compensated through a commission-sharing agreement with the seller's agent, is not included within the terms of 42 U.S.C. § 4852d(a)(4). n10.2 Section 4852d(a)(4) states in relevant part:

Whenever a seller or lessor has entered into a contract with an agent for the purpose of selling or leasing a unit of target housing, the regulations promulgated under this section shall require the agent, on behalf of the seller or lessor, to ensure compliance with the requirements of this section.

The applicable regulations define an agent as follows:

Agent means a party that enters into a contract with a seller or lessor, including any party that enters into a contract with a representative of the seller or lessor, for the purpose of selling or leasing target housing. This term does not apply to purchasers or any purchaser's representative who receives all compensation from the purchaser. n10.3

These courts' decisions not to impose a disclosure obligation upon a buyer's agent has been based upon the plain language of section 4852d(a)(4).

Practice Note:

Lead-based paint legislation, and subsequent state law cases, have applied traditionally to low-income housing that was poorly maintained. However, since 1996, real estate agents who are involved in any facet of the sale or lease of residential real estate must be familiar with the Act. Real estate agents should assume that buildings constructed prior to 1978 contain lead-based paint and its hazards. Lead-based paint becomes a hazard if it is deteriorated. Real estate agents should in their initial inspection of a home be able to determine if paint is cracking, flaking, chipping, peeling, or separating from the walls or woodwork.

[3] Exceptions to Disclosure Rules

[a] Types of Residential Property

The disclosure rules for sellers/lessors/agents of lead-based paint and its hazards do not apply to the following types of residential property:

- Any housing for the elderly, except where a child under the age of 6 resides or may reside in the future;
- Any housing for the disabled, except where a child under the age of 6 resides or may reside in the future; and
- 0-bedroom dwellings where the sleeping and living areas are combined, including but not limited to, efficiencies, studio apartments, and lofts. n11

[b] Types of Lease Agreements

The following types of leases of residential property are not subject to the disclosure rules:

- Leases of target housing found to be lead-based paint free by a certified inspector; n12
- Short-term leases of 100 days or less, where no lease modification can occur; n13 and
- Renewals of existing leases, whether a renegotiation of an existing lease or a ratification of a new lease, where disclosure has been previously made and no new information is available. n14

[4] Timing of Disclosure

All disclosures of the presence of lead-based paint and its hazards must be made prior to an offer and acceptance of contracts of sale or lease. Sellers/lessors do not have a duty to rectify the presence of lead-based paint and its hazards. Rather, the duty imposed upon sellers/lessors is to make full disclosure of the presence of lead-based paint and its hazards. n15

Buyers/lessees do not become legally obligated under a contract of sale or lease until after sellers/lessors/agents have fully complied with the disclosure rules. n16 If buyers/lessees make an offer prior to the necessary disclosures by sellers/lessors/agents, the disclosures must be made prior to accepting any offer of sale or lease. n17 If the subsequent disclosures reveal the presence of lead-based paint and its hazards after an offer has been made, buyers/lessees must be allowed to both review and amend the original offer of sale or lease. n18

[5] Mandatory Lead Warning Statements

[a] Contracts of Sale

All contracts for the sale of target housing, with the exception of a sale at foreclosure, n19 must contain a Lead Warning Statement printed in large type n20 in the language of the contract, e.g., Spanish or English, on a separate page n21 containing the following language:

Every purchaser of any interest in residential real property on which a residential building was built prior to 1978 is notified that such property may present exposure to lead from lead based paint that may place young children at risk of developing lead poisoning. Lead poisoning in young children may produce permanent neurological damage, including learning disabilities, reduced intelligence quotient, behavioral problems, and impaired memory. Lead poisoning also poses a particular risk to pregnant women. The seller of any interest in residential real property is required to provide the buyer with any information on lead-based paint hazards from risk assessments or inspections in the seller's possession and notify the buyer of any known lead-based paint hazards. A risk assessment or inspection for possible lead-based paint hazards is recommended prior to purchase. n22

Practice Note:

Real estate agents must verify that every residential contract contains an appropriate Lead Warning Statement. In order to avoid potential malpractice liability, all existing residential lease forms must be revised to include this language.

[b] Contracts to Lease

All leases must contain a Lead Warning Statement, either within the body of the contract or on a separate page, written in the language of a contract, e.g., Spanish or English, n23 using the following language:

Housing built before 1978 may contain lead-based paint. Lead from paint, paint chips, and dust can pose health hazards if not managed properly. Lead exposure is especially harmful to young children and pregnant women. Before renting pre-1978 housing, lessors must disclose the presence of lead-based paint and/or lead-based paint hazards in the dwelling. Lessees must also receive a federally approved pamphlet on lead poisoning prevention. n24

Practice Note:

Real estate agents must verify that every residential lease contains an appropriate Lead Warning Statement. In order to avoid potential malpractice liability, all existing residential lease forms must be revised to include this language.

[6] Further Rules of Disclosure

Sellers/lessors/agents must certify in writing that they have:

- Provided buyers/lessees with a lead hazard information pamphlet approved by the EPA, n25 e.g., the pamphlet produced by the EPA, entitled Protect Your Family From Lead in Your Home or an equivalent EPA-approved state pamphlet; n26
- Disclosed to buyers/lessees any known information concerning the presence of lead-based paint and its hazards. n27 A lack of knowledge must also be disclosed; n28
- Provided buyers/lessees with any lead hazard evaluation report or records in the possession of sellers/lessors. n29 A lack of reports or records must also be disclosed; n30
- Disclosed to agents involved in the transaction any knowledge concerning lead-based paint and its hazards and provided agents with any reports or records available to the seller/lessor; n31 and
- Permitted a buyer a 10-day period to conduct a risk assessment or inspection of the property. The time frame can be modified if mutually agreed upon in writing by all parties; however, this provision can be waived by buyers. n32 Lessees do not have the right to conduct a risk assessment or inspection of the property.

With respect to the EPA-approved lead hazard information pamphlet or an equivalent EPA-approved state pamphlet, one court has found that an agent furnishing other information about lead-based paint hazards and the agent's emphasis on the importance of residential property inspections sufficed in fulfilling this obligation. n32.1

All disclosures made by sellers/lessors/agents of lead-based paint and its hazards must include specific information regarding:

- (1) any basis for the existence of lead-based paint and its hazards;
- (2) the specific location of the paint and its hazards; and
- (3) the condition of all painted surfaces found to contain the paint and its hazards. n33

Any records produced by sellers or lessors must include:

- (1) any information concerning common areas and
- (2) any information on individual units in multifamily housing if this information was obtained when the housing as a whole was evaluated. n34

See § 15A.08[1] below for an Addendum to Sales Contract and § 15A.08[2] below for a lead-based paint disclosure addendum to a lease.

Practice Note:

Signatures on the certifications should be acknowledged by a notary public to make it more difficult to allege falsification of a signature. This can easily be done by adding a notary's acknowledgment at the end of all lead-based paint disclosure forms.

[7] Purchase Contracts Containing Contingency Clauses

It has become standard practice for purchase contracts to contain a contingency based on a risk assessment or inspection that reveals the presence of lead-based paint or lead-based paint hazards. In this case, buyers are given a certain amount of time to request that the conditions revealed in a report be corrected by sellers. Sellers then have an option to either correct the problems or to make a counteroffer to sell the property "as is," and buyers are given a certain amount of time to accept a counteroffer or to accept the property "as is." However, a contingency that the validity of a purchase contract is contingent upon each party receiving, signing, and attaching to a completed lead-based disclosure certification form will not be upheld. This language precludes a plaintiff from seeking a remedy under 42 U.S.C. § 4852d and defeats the purpose of the disclosure rules. n35 See § 15A.08[3] below for the sample language for risk assessment contingency.

10A-15A Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 15A.04

§ 15A.04 Records to Be Maintained by Seller/Lessor/Agent

Seller/lessors/agents must keep a copy of all documentation relating to every transaction for a period of up to 3 years from the date of each transaction. For a sales transaction, the period runs from a sale's completion date; and for a lease transaction, the period runs from the commencement of the leasing period. n1 The retention of the documents does not affect buyers'/lessors' ability to pursue their legal remedies for a violation of the disclosure rules. n2

Practice Note:

Although this regulation is ministerial, it is key to complying with the Act. Real estate brokerages must establish and maintain on a regular basis a filing system that is only applicable to lead-based paint. The duty to maintain the lead-based paint filing system should be delegated to a responsible staff member who should also be thoroughly familiar with the rules, as well as the civil and criminal penalties for failing to maintain an adequate filing system.

PART V Other Issues Affecting Brokers
CHAPTER 15A Lead-Based Paint Disclosure *

10A-15A Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 15A.05

§ 15A.05 Liability for Failure to Comply with Disclosure Rules

The burden of ensuring compliance with disclosure rules rests squarely on real estate agents if sellers/lessors contract with them for the sale or lease of residential property. n1 Real estate agents must not only inform sellers/lessors of the disclosure rules, n2 but must ensure that they comply. n3 If real estate agents inform sellers/lessors of their duties under the Act, liability does not attach to them if sellers/lessors fail to disclose the presence of known lead-based paint and its hazards. n4 Also, liability does not attach to sellers/lessors/agents where buyers' or lessees' legal representatives fail to forward disclosure materials to them if all necessary certifications are signed. n5

However, liability does attach if the facts of a case demonstrate that real estate agents have not complied with the disclosure requirements. In Smith v. Coldwell Banker Real Estate Services, Inc., n6 the following facts were important in a determination that the real estate agent and the brokerage firm were liable to plaintiffs for trebled civil damages: n7

- The listing agent suggested that the sellers have a lead-based paint test done on the home that was built in the 1800s;
- The sellers had the test performed, and it revealed the presence of lead-based paint in January 1997;
- The sellers completed the lead-based paint disclosure form indicating the presence of lead-based paint and the report, returned it to the real estate agent, but failed to attach the report to the form;
- The real estate agent did not initial the lead-based paint disclosure form;
- The real estate agent requested the report but did not obtain a copy until 3 weeks before closing;
- The sellers and buyers entered into a purchase contract in the Spring of 1997;
- The buyers were verbally advised that there was lead-based paint in the home and were given a copy of the EPA handbook but were not given a copy of the report;
- The buyers never signed the lead-based paint disclosure form acknowledging receipt of the lead-based paint information; and

- The lead-based paint report was given to the buyers at closing. n8

Clearly the real estate agent dropped the ball in this transaction. The court in finding against the real estate agent and brokerage firm stressed the importance of the timing of the disclosures. Disclosures have to be made prior to the acceptance of a purchase contract in order to allow buyers an opportunity to review the report and amend their offer if lead-based paint or lead-based paint hazards are found. n9

The greater liability for real estate agents and their brokerage firms is for a personal injury or wrongful death action brought under state law for damages caused by the presence of lead-based paint or lead-based paint hazards. A failure or refusal to comply with the federal or state residential real estate disclosure rules would be an element in any of these types of cases. However, in Virginia, sellers/lessors/agents are not liable in a personal injury or wrongful death case if the federal residential real estate disclosures are made. n10

PART V Other Issues Affecting Brokers
CHAPTER 15A Lead-Based Paint Disclosure *

10A-15A Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 15A.06

§ 15A.06 Enforcement of Disclosure Rules

[1] Action by Persons to Force EPA/HUD to Comply

A civil action n1 can be commenced by any person against the United States and any other governmental entity, to (1) restrain a violation of the Toxic Substances Control Act n2 or (2) compel the EPA or HUD to perform any delegated duty n3 found in the Toxic Substances Control Act. Jurisdiction is in the appropriate federal district court (1) where the violation occurred, (2) where the defendant resides, or (3) where the defendant has its principal place of business. n4 Similar cases can be consolidated. n5 Court costs, attorney's fees, and expert witness fees may be awarded in an initial action where appropriate. In a subsequent appeal, court costs and attorney's fees may also be awarded. n6

[2] Unlawful Actions Under 42 U.S.C. § 4852d

It is unlawful to knowingly (1) fail or refuse to comply with the disclosure rules for sellers, lessors, and agents; n7(2) fail or refuse the opportunity to buyers/lessees to conduct a risk assessment; (3) fail or refuse to obtain a certification and acknowledgment of disclosure; and (4) fail or refuse to comply with an agent's responsibilities. n8 If a violation is found, a monetary penalty can be imposed under 42 U.S.C. § 3545. n9

[3] Civil Penalties Under § 42 U.S.C. § 3545--HUD

[a] Civil Penalty and Hearings

A knowing and material violation of any of the disclosure rules will subject violators to a civil monetary penalty of up to $10,000.00. n10 HUD issues a notice of hearing to violators, and a hearing may be requested by a violator after receipt of notice. If a hearing is not requested within 15 days of the notice, the Secretary may impose the civil monetary penalty. The decision by the Secretary under these circumstances is final and unappealable. n11

If a hearing is requested, the following factors are considered in determining the amount of the civil monetary penalty:

- The gravity of the offense;
- The ability to pay the penalty;

- Injury to the public;
- Benefits received;
- Deterrence of future violations; and
- Such other factors as the Secretary may consider appropriate. n12

[b] Appeals of Civil Penalties

An appeal to an appropriate court of appeals can be made no later than 20 days after the entry of an initial order. The only matters that can be heard on appeal are those addressed at the hearing stage. n13 However, upon a showing of extraordinary circumstances, the court of appeals may (1) consider objections that were not raised at an initial hearing or (2) remand the matter to the Secretary for the taking of additional evidence. n14

[c] Payment and Collection of Civil Penalty

The Secretary is authorized to compromise a civil penalty, as well as to collect the full amount. n15 The Attorney General is authorized to recover the amount of a civil penalty, plus any attorney's fees and expenses incurred by the United States, after the judgment becomes final. Jurisdiction for this proceeding is in the appropriate federal district court. n16 The validity or appropriateness of the civil penalty is not subject to review in a collection proceeding. n17

[4] Civil and Criminal Penalties Under 15 U.S.C. § 2615--EPA

[a] Civil Penalty

In addition to the civil penalties under 42 U.S.C. § 3545, a violator may also be subjected to civil and criminal penalties under 15 U.S.C. § 2615. n18 For each day that a violation continues, a civil penalty shall be imposed. n19 The civil penalty imposed by the EPA for each violation committed from July 29, 1997 to the present is $11,000 and $10,000 for each violation committed on or before July 28, 1997. n20

In 1997 the EPA began enforcing the disclosure rule. From 1997 through 1998, the EPA issued 22 Notices of Noncompliance to sellers, brokers, realtors, agents, and landlords for violations of the disclosure rule. n21 On July 28, 1998, the EPA filed 4 civil complaints with penalties of $439,725.00 against the U.S. Department of the Navy, a real estate agency, and other individuals. n22 Another case in September 1998 was filed against a management firm and was settled because the firm voluntarily agreed to disclose and correct violations of the disclosure rule. n23 On February 4, 1999, the EPA issued another 4 civil complaints against landlords with proposed penalties of $56,200. n24

The EPA encourages those affected by the disclosure rule to comply with the rule. There are two such policies:

- (1) the EPA Audit Policy (www.epa.gov/oeca/auditpol.html) and
- (2) the Small Business policy (www.epa.gov/oeca/smbusi.html). n25

Those willing to cooperate with the EPA will be in a better position than those who ignore their responsibilities under the disclosure rule.

The administrator, prior to issuing an order for the imposition of a civil penalty, must give notice of the action to the violator. The violator has 15 days from the date of the notice to request a hearing. n26 A hearing on the merits will determine the amount of the civil penalty. Factors that will either aggravate or mitigate the amount of the civil penalty imposed include:

- The nature, circumstances, extent, and gravity of the violation(s);
- The ability to pay;
- The ability to continue to do business;
- A history of prior violations;
- Degree of culpability; and
- Such other matters as justice may require. n27

An appeal of the civil penalty may be made in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, in the federal district court where the violator resides, or where the violator transacts business. The appeal must be perfected within 30 days of the date of the administrative order. n28

The administrator is authorized to collect the full amount and can also compromise the amount of the civil penalty. n29 The attorney general is authorized to recover the amount of the civil penalty, plus interest, after the judgment becomes final. Jurisdiction for this proceeding is in the appropriate federal district court. The validity, amount, or appropriateness of the civil penalty is not subject to review in a collection proceeding. n30

[b] Criminal Sanctions

A violator who knowingly and willfully violates the disclosure rules in a sale or lease transaction will face the following criminal sanctions. n31

- A fine up to $25,000 for each violation;
- Imprisonment for up to 1 year; or
- Both.

[5] Injunction Proceeding by HUD

In addition to the civil monetary penalties by HUD and the EPA, the secretary may bring an injunction proceeding in the appropriate federal district court to prohibit continuing violations. n32

[6] Civil Damages and Costs Awarded

The Residential Lead Based Paint Hazard Reduction Act of 1992 (RLBPHRA) n33 provides for the imposition of penalties for violations of this Act. n34 A violator shall be jointly and severally liable to the buyer/lessee for treble damages for a knowing violation. n35 And, the court may award the prevailing party court costs, reasonable attorney's fees, and any expert witness fees. n36

The Toxic Substance Control Act (TSCA) n37 authorizes suit against the United States only for injunctive relief, and therefore vests exclusive jurisdiction in the United States District Courts. n38 Section 2619 of the TSCA creates a private right of action against any person, including the United States, for violations of the TSCA, however, 15 U.S.C. § 2619 does not mandate compensation for damages sustained as a result of a violation of any section of the TSCA. n39

Neither the TSCA nor the RLBPHRA n40 award damages for a violation of any section thereof. n41

PART V Other Issues Affecting Brokers
CHAPTER 15A Lead-Based Paint Disclosure *

10A-15A Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 15A.07

§ 15A.07 Compliance with State Lead-Based Paint Disclosure Laws

[1] State Laws Are in Addition to Federal Disclosure Requirements

States and localities are beginning to enact statutes that are applicable to the disclosure by sellers/lessors/agents of lead-based paint and its hazards in residential housing. However, these state or local statutes are not within the jurisdiction of the EPA or HUD. Any state law disclosure requirements must be complied with, in addition to the federal disclosure requirements. n1 The state law requirements add another layer of potential liability for sellers/lessors/agents.

[2] Colorado

The Colorado Real Estate Commission has promulgated two forms for use in lead-based paint disclosure: (1) Lead-Based Paint Obligations of Seller and (2) Lead-Based Disclosure (Sales). See <http://www.dora.state.co.us/Real-Estate/comm.htm> for these forms.

[3] Maryland

Maryland's Lead Paint Act requires registration of rental properties built before 1950. Such properties must be registered with the State Department of the Environment. n1.1 The Act's stated purpose is "to reduce the incidence of childhood lead poisoning, while maintaining the stock of available affordable rental housing." n1.2 The Act also requires that property "owners" take specific precautionary measures, including maintenance and repair, to reduce the risk of tenant exposure to lead-based paint. In exchange for compliance, the Act provides limited liability to "owners" if a tenant suffers from lead poisoning and commences a lawsuit. n1.3

Maryland's high court has held that a leasing agent or real estate broker is not an "owner" under Maryland's Lead Poisoning Prevention Act n1.4 when the agent or broker does not own, hold or control the rental property. n1.5 The court stated that delivering possession to a tenant coupled with an agreement allowing the tenant to purchase the property does not constitute the "control" contemplated by the Act. n1.6 Merely being entitled to receive a commission in the event the tenant purchased the property did not lead to the conclusion that an agent or broker maintained "control" over the property. n1.7

[4] Massachusetts

Massachusetts has standard notification forms and other informational materials that inform buyers of the (1) possible presence of dangerous levels of lead, (2) the symptoms and treatment of lead poisoning, (3) liability for a failure to abate or contain lead hazards, and (4) prohibitions against unlawful discrimination. n2 Sellers must deliver to buyers prior to entering purchase contracts (1) a completed standard form and informational materials and (2) a letter of interim control or a letter of full compliance. Sellers and agents must disclose any knowledge to buyers of the presence of paint, plaster, or other accessible structural materials containing dangerous lead levels. n3 Sellers and agents must advise buyers of the availability of lead inspections, and buyers must be given a 10-day period in which to obtain an inspection. Agents must verbally inform buyers of the provisions of Mass. Gen. Laws Ann. ch. 111, §§ 189A to 199B and obtain a certification that buyers have been notified. n4 Sellers are liable for damages caused by any failure to comply, as well as penalties of up to $1,000.00. Agents who fail to comply are engaged in an unfair and deceptive practice and subject to actions under Mass. Gen. Laws Ann. ch. 93A. n5

[5] Rhode Island

Rhode Island has the most extensive statute applicable to agents and sellers for disclosure of lead-based paint in the country. Agents and sellers must include the federal statutory language in every contract for the purchase and sale of residential real estate. In addition, inspection reports and educational materials must be given to buyers. A failure to include the lead-based paint statutory language or to provide inspection reports and educational materials can subject agents and sellers to a civil penalty ranging from $100.00 to $500.00 per occurrence. Also, buyers can void purchase contracts if not provided with the required lead-based paint information. n6

[6] Utah

The Utah Real Estate Commission has promulgated two forms for use in lead-based paint disclosure: (1) Disclosure and Acknowledgment Regarding Lead-Based Paint and/or Lead-Based Paint Hazards and (2) Lead-Based Paint Addendum to Real Estate Purchase Contract. See <http://www.eq.state.ut.us/eqair/HAPS/lead/index.htm> for these forms.

CHAPTER 15A Lead-Based Paint Disclosure *

10A-15A Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 15A.08

§ 15A.08 Lead-Based Paint Disclosure Forms

[1] Addendum to Sales Contract

Lead Warning Statement

Every purchaser of any interest in residential real property on which a residential building was built prior to 1978 is notified that such property may present exposure to lead from lead based paint that may place young children at risk of developing lead poisoning. Lead poisoning in young children may produce permanent neurological damage, including learning disabilities, reduced intelligent quotient, behavioral problems, and impaired memory. Lead poisoning also poses a particular risk to pregnant women. The seller of any interest in residential real property is required to provide the buyer with any information on lead-based paint hazards from risk assessments or inspections in the seller's possession and notify the buyer of any known lead-based paint hazards. A risk assessment or inspection for possible lead-based paint hazards is recommended prior to purchase.

Seller's Disclosure

- (a) Presence of lead-based paint and/or lead-based paint hazards in the housing (check (i) or (ii) below):
 - (i) _____ Known lead-based paint/and or lead-based paint hazards are present in the housing (explain),
 - (ii) _____ Seller has no knowledge of lead based paint and/or lead-based paint hazards in the housing.
- (b) Records and reports available to the seller (check (i) or (ii) below):
 - (i) _____ Seller has provided the purchaser with all available records and reports pertaining to lead based paint and/or lead-based paint hazards in the housing (list documents below),
 - (ii) _____ Seller has no reports or records pertaining to lead-based paint and/or lead-based paint hazards in the housing,

Purchaser's Acknowledgment (initial)

- (c) _____ Purchaser has received copies of all information listed above.
- (d) _____ Purchaser has received the pamphlet Protect Your Family from Lead in Your Home and has read and understood its contents.
- (e) _____ Purchaser has (check (i) or (ii) below):
 - (i) _____ received a 10-day opportunity (or mutually agreed upon period) to conduct a risk assessment or inspection for the presence of lead-based paint and/or lead-based paint hazards; or

(ii) _____ waived the opportunity to conduct a risk assessment or inspection for the presence of lead-based paint and/or lead-based paint hazards.

Agent's Acknowledgment (initial)

_____ Agent has informed the seller of the seller's obligations under 42 U.S.C. § 4852d and is aware of his/her responsibility to ensure compliance.

[2] Provisions Applicable to Leases

Lead Warning Statement

Housing built before 1978 may contain lead-based paint. Lead from paint, paint chips, and dust can pose health hazards if not managed properly. Lead exposure is especially harmful to young children and pregnant women. Before renting pre-1978 housing, lessors must disclose the presence of lead-based paint and/or lead-based paint hazards in the dwelling. Lessees must also receive a federally approved pamphlet on lead poisoning prevention.

Lessor's Disclosure

- (a) Presence of lead-based paint and/or lead-based paint hazards in the housing (check (i) or (ii) below:
- (i) _____ Known lead-based paint/and or lead-based paint hazards are present in the housing (explain),
 - (ii) _____ Lessor has no knowledge of lead based paint and/or lead-based paint hazards in the housing.
- (b) Records and reports available to the lessor (check (i) or (ii) below:
- (i) _____ Lessor has provided the lessee with all available records and reports pertaining to lead based paint and/or lead-based paint hazards in the housing (list documents below),
 - (ii) _____ Lessor has no reports or records pertaining to lead-based paint and/or lead-based paint hazards in the housing,

Lessee's Acknowledgment (initial)

- (c) _____ Lessee has received copies of all information listed above.
- (d) _____ Lessee has received the pamphlet Protect Your Family from Lead in Your Home and has read and understood its contents.

NOTARY'S ACKNOWLEDGMENT OPTIONAL

[3] Real Estate Contract--Sample Language for Risk Assessment Contingency

This contract is contingent upon a risk assessment or inspection of the property for the presence of lead-based paint and/or lead-based paint hazards at the Purchaser's expense until 9 p.m. on the tenth calendar day after ratification (insert date 10 days after contract ratification or a date mutually agreed upon). (Intact lead-based paint that is in good condition is not necessarily a hazard. See the EPA pamphlet Protect Your Family from Lead in Your Home for more information.) This contingency will terminate at the above predetermined deadline unless the Purchaser (or Purchaser's agent) delivers to the Seller (or Seller's agent) a written contract addendum listing the specific existing deficiencies and corrections needed, together with a copy of the inspection and/or risk assessment report. The Seller may, at the Seller's option, within days after Delivery of the addendum, elect in writing whether to correct the condition(s) prior to settlement. If the Seller will correct the condition, the Seller shall furnish the Purchaser with certification from a risk assessor or inspector demonstrating that the condition has been remedied before the date of settlement. If the Seller does not elect to make the repairs, or if the Seller makes a counteroffer, the Purchaser shall have

_____ Days to respond to the counter-offer or remove this contingency and take the property in "as is" condition or this contract shall become void. The Purchaser may remove this contingency at any time without cause.

§ 15A.09 Guidance Provided by EPA and HUD for Interpreting Lead-Based Paint Disclosure Requirements

[1] Purpose of Guidance Provided by EPA and HUD

Responding to questions from the real estate community about the federal lead-based paint disclosure requirements discussed in this chapter, EPA and HUD have published guidance in the form of questions and answers. Such guidance is available in two guidance documents reproduced below. The second guidance, which was issued December 5, 1996, clarifies some answers that appeared in the first, which was issued August 20, 1996.

Information about forthcoming guidance documents can be obtained from the National Lead Information Clearinghouse at (800) 424-LEAD.

INTERPRETIVE GUIDANCE FOR
THE REAL ESTATE COMMUNITY ON THE
REQUIREMENTS FOR DISCLOSURE OF INFORMATION CONCERNING LEAD-BASED PAINT IN HOUSING

INTRODUCTION

On March 6, 1996, the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) and the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) published a final rule, "Lead; Requirements for Disclosure of Known Lead-Based Paint and/or Lead-Based Paint Hazards in Housing," (61 FR 9064-9088). This final rule requires persons selling or leasing most residential housing built before 1978 to provide purchasers and renters with a federally approved lead hazard information pamphlet and to disclose known lead-based paint and/or lead-based paint hazards. The specific requirements of the final rule are discussed in detail in the March 1996 notice. Other documents used in the development of this rule are included in a public docket available for inspection at EPA.

The requirements of the final rule are applicable as follows: (1) For owners of more than four residential dwellings, the requirements are applicable beginning on September 6, 1996, and (2) For owners of one to four residential dwellings, the requirements are applicable beginning on December 6, 1996.

Subsequent to the publication of the final rule, EPA and HUD have received questions from the real estate community about implementation of the rule. EPA and HUD have developed this "Interpretive Guidance" document to supplement the information presented in the final rule. This guidance will be expanded and updated as necessary.

To assist the general public, EPA and HUD made the document, "EPA and HUD Real Estate Notification and Disclosure Rule: Questions and Answers" available when they published the final rule. This document, EPA-747-F-96-001, March, 1996, and others may be obtained from the National Lead Information Clearinghouse (NLIC) at (800) 424-LEAD, or TDD(800) 526-5456 for the hearing impaired. Requests may also be sent by fax to (202) 659-1192 or by Internet E-mail to ehc @ cais.com.

EFFECTIVE DATE OF RULE

General

1. Q: What part of a sale or rental transaction must occur on or after the effective date for the rule to apply?

A: The rule generally applies if the buyer or renter becomes obligated under a contract to purchase or lease target housing on or after the effective date of the rule (September 6, 1996 or December 6, 1996, depending on the number of dwelling units owned).

2. Q: What is the effective date for sale or rental transactions involving cooperatives ("co-ops") and condominiums ("condos")?

A: EPA and HUD recognize that both the individual unit "owner" and the corporation or homeowner association may have an ownership interest in co-ops and condos (see answer to question # 10). However, EPA and HUD believe that when a co-op or condo unit is sold or rented, the focus of the transaction is the single unit. Therefore, as a matter of policy, EPA and HUD have determined that the effective date will be based on the number of dwellings "owned" (meaning in some cases, the number of co-op shares or condo units owned) by the individual seller or lessor as opposed to the number of units that comprise the co-op or condo. Where co-ops or condos are being directly sold or leased by the corporation (as in a renovated building being newly offered), however, the applicable date would depend on the number of units owned by the corporation.

Sale Transactions

3. Q: Is the rule effective for sales agreements entered into before the effective date, where closing occurs after the effective date?

A: The rule will not apply to target housing transactions where the sales agreement is signed and all contingencies have been removed before the effective date, even if closing occurs after the effective date.

Rental Agreements

4. Q: What is the effective date of the rule for the following situation? A real estate or property management firm represents 40 property owners who own four units each. Each of the 40 property owners' effective date would clearly be December 6, 1996 (four or less units) if they were managing their own properties. However, because the real estate or property management firm is managing 160 rental units (40x4) on behalf of the owners, would they be subject to the September 6, 1996 effective date?

A: The effective dates in the rule refer specifically to the number of residential dwellings owned. Although the property manager is managing more than four properties, each individual owner only owns four properties. Therefore, the effective date for property managers of properties with four units each per owner would be December 6, 1996.

5. Q: In some cases, as in the New York City Rent Stabilization Law, owners must offer renewal leases to rent-stabilized tenants 120 to 150 days before their current leases expire. This 120-150 day period may occur prior to the September 6 effective date, but the renewal lease could start after the September 6 effective date. Must an owner include the disclosure forms with the 120-150 day offer of renewal, even though this occurs before the effective date?

A: The rule applies to obligations made on or after the effective date. Thus, the date upon which a renewal lease is offered is not particularly relevant under the rule. It is the date that the offer is accepted, if such acceptance constitutes an obligation to rent, that determines whether or not the rules apply. For written leases, this would mean that regardless of when the renewal leases are offered to the tenant, the rule would apply to all renewal leases signed by the tenant (and any contingencies have been removed) on or after the effective date. The rule does not apply to cases where the renewal leases have been signed by tenants (and contingencies removed) prior to the effective date, even if the lease does not begin until after the effective date.

APPLICABILITY

Housing -- Pre-1978

6. Q: Target housing is housing built before 1978. Does this include or exclude housing that was started in 1977, but not completed until 1978?

A: EPA and HUD consider "housing constructed before 1978" to mean housing for which a construction permit was obtained (or if no permit was obtained, housing in which construction was started) before January 1, 1978.

0-Bedroom Dwellings

7. Q: Would "0-bedroom dwellings" include college fraternity and sorority houses, dormitory suites, married student housing, and university-owned apartments?

A: The rule excludes "0-bedroom dwellings." The definition of "0-bedroom dwelling" includes "rentals of individual rooms in residential dwellings," and EPA and HUD believe that rentals of rooms in fraternity and sorority houses generally fit that model and would be exempt. The definition of "0-bedroom dwelling" also specifically includes dormitory housing, which would encompass typical dormitory suites. However, married student housing and university-owned apartments typically are not "0-bedroom dwellings" and would be covered by the rule if they meet the other criteria for target housing set out in the rule.

Disabilities

8. Q: What is the definition of housing for persons with disabilities?

A: Housing for persons with disabilities means communities or similar types of housing specifically designed for one or more persons with a physical or mental impairment which substantially limits one or more major life activities at the time of initial occupancy (HUD, Fair Housing Accessibility Guidelines, 56 FR 9472, 3/6/91).

However, the exclusion for persons with disabilities from the definition of "target housing" does not cover housing in which any child who is less than 6 years of age resides or is expected to reside.

Daycare

9. Q: Are daycare centers included in the scope of the final rule?

A: Section 1018 of Title X focusses specifically on residential housing. As such, the rule does not apply to commercial facilities such as daycare centers and nurseries, except where such facilities are part of a residential dwelling.

DISCLOSURE

Co-ops and Condos

10. Q: Who is responsible for disclosure in the case of co-ops or condos? What about common areas?

A: EPA and HUD recognize that co-ops and condos can be structured in a variety of ways. For example, in the case of co-ops, a corporation may be established and this corporation would own all the units and common areas comprising the co-op; individual unit "owners" would own shares in the corporation and might also own occupancy rights or lease a unit from the corporation. In the case of condos, individual condo unit owners may own their unit; all condo unit owners may jointly own the common areas and a homeowners association may be established to represent the interests of all the unit owners.

Under this rule, a person selling or leasing a co-op or condo unit (whether the unit owner owns the unit in its entirety or owns shares in a corporation) would be responsible for complying with disclosure requirements both with respect to the unit itself and to any associated interest in common areas that is transferred. In the case of a corporation or homeowner association owning an interest in all the units or common areas, the corporation or association would be responsible for disclosing information regarding those areas when their interest in them is sold or leased. Additionally, in the case of a corporation or homeowner association which does not have an ownership interest in the co-op or condo but represents the joint interests of all the unit owners, the corporation or association, acting as legal representative of the owners (see also question #11), would be responsible for disclosing information regarding the areas subject to the transaction. In such a case, an individual seller or lessor is responsible for timely notifying the corporation or association before a buyer or lessee becomes obligated, so that the corporation or association has an opportunity to comply with disclosure requirements.

Where the corporation or association is not a seller or lessor and is not a legal representative of the owners, the corporation or association has no disclosure responsibilities. However, in this case, the individual seller or lessor must obtain any information held by the corporation or association and include it in the disclosure to ensure compliance with this rule. Parties with the disclosure responsibilities must also sign the disclosure form certifying accuracy.

Authorized Representatives and Agents

11. Q: May a seller or lessor authorize a representative or agent to discharge the seller's or lessor's responsibilities under the rule, including signing the certification of accuracy required in the contract?

A: Yes. The seller or lessor may authorize a representative or agent to fulfill the seller or lessor's requirements under this rule; however, the seller or lessor is ultimately responsible for full compliance with the requirements of this rule. The representative must disclose the presence of lead-based paint or lead-based paint hazards if known by either the representative or the seller or lessor and disclose and provide records available to the representative and the seller or lessor. The designated representative or agent may sign on behalf of the seller or lessor. If the representative or agent acting on behalf of the seller or lessor is also functioning as an Agent, as defined under 24 CFR 35.86 and 40 CFR 745.103, they are also required to carry out those duties and to sign the certification in that capacity.

12. Q: Given that the selling agent in real estate transactions may be prohibited by State or local law from direct communication with the seller, how can they inform the seller of his or her responsibilities under this rule?

A: Where State or local laws prohibit direct contact, EPA and HUD have determined that the selling agent may inform the listing agent of the seller's responsibilities under this rule and may sign the disclosure form to that effect. Regardless of the actions or involvement of the selling agent, however, the listing agent is still responsible for informing the seller of his or her duties under this rule.

Type of Documents

Summary vs. Reports

13. Q: The rule states that lessors must give each lessee copies of all records or reports relating to lead-based paint hazards in the target housing. But in some cases it may be impractical to give each lessee his or her own report--the document's length may make copying costs prohibitively high. In such situations, what steps may a lessor take to make the document available to a lessee without actually giving the lessee his or her own copy? For example, may the lessor give the lessee a summary of the document and give the lessee an opportunity to read a copy of the full document in the lessor's office?

A: The rule requires lessors to provide lessees with available records or reports pertaining to lead-based paint and/or lead-based paint hazards. However, EPA and HUD recognize that in some cases, the actual transfer of multiple voluminous technical documents may be burdensome for both lessors and lessees.

For lengthy court documents and construction documents, EPA and HUD have determined that these documents may be excerpted, provided that all information regarding lead-based paint and lead-based paint hazards is included along with sufficient background information, so that the context of the excerpt is clear.

For paint inspection and risk assessment reports, EPA and HUD have determined that lessors may provide lessees with a summary of all paint inspection and risk assessment reports, provided that the summary is prepared by a certified paint inspector or risk assessor. Where information about specific units is inconsistent with the conclusions as a whole, this information should be included along with the summary of general conclusions.

In situations where documents are excerpted or summarized, they must be accompanied by a list of all complete records and reports available to the lessee. If the lessor chooses to provide excerpts or summaries and document lists in lieu of complete copies, the lessor must provide the lessee with the opportunity to review the complete documents in a central location on the premises, if feasible, and the opportunity to receive copies of any documents not provided, upon request, and at no cost to the lessee.

In the case of sales transactions, the seller must provide complete documents to the buyer. In order to assure that future buyers have access to complete records and reports, EPA and HUD believe that complete document transfer, rather than excerpts or summaries, is necessary.

14. Q: What methods of distribution are available to a seller or lessor when providing copies of relevant materials to a purchaser or lessee? May records and reports be provided via the Internet?

A: While EPA and HUD recognize that electronic transfer may be acceptable to some purchasers and lessees, the Agencies are concerned that relying exclusively on electronic distribution may deny some purchasers or lessees access to the information, due to the lack of access to the necessary technology. Therefore, EPA and HUD would deem electronic transfer of documents acceptable only if the purchaser or lessee agrees in writing to accept the documents in that format.

Unit vs. Whole Building

15. Q: In cases where there have been building-wide evaluation or reduction activities, must the contents of the reports be disclosed to every prospective purchaser or lessee of individual units that may not have been specifically addressed?

A: EPA and HUD believe that information and reports on other units in the target housing are directly relevant to prospective purchasers and lessees, if the information results from evaluation or reduction efforts in the target housing as a whole. In large multifamily properties, evaluations do not necessarily examine every dwelling unit in the housing. Rather, inspectors or risk assessors examine a representative sample of the dwelling units and apply the findings to the housing as a whole. While such evaluations might not include data on a specific unit, the fact that the evaluation was designed to provide information on the housing as a whole makes the report's findings relevant. If there is unit-specific information that was not part of a building-wide evaluation, such information must be disclosed only during sales or rentals of the specific units that were evaluated.

Timing of Disclosure for Lessors

16. Q: If a renter has a month-to-month lease arrangement, what is the responsibility of the owner (lessor) with respect to providing copies of the booklet and disclosure forms?

A: The rule excludes from its requirements short-term leases of 100 days or less, where no lease renewal or extension can occur. If both parties wish to extend a previously exempted short-term lease beyond the 100-day limit, all provisions of this rule must be satisfied in full before any such "extension" occurs.

In an "open-ended" month-to-month lease arrangement (i.e., an arrangement with no specified termination date), whether written or unwritten, the rule applies at the time of the initial lease agreement, since the parties have not limited the lease term to 100 days or less.

In some cases, leasing arrangements switch to "open-ended" month-to-month arrangements after an initial period of occupancy and may continue indefinitely. Under such circumstances, EPA and HUD interpret renewal to occur at the point when the lessee becomes obligated to this change in the rental period. Another significant change in the lease agreement constituting lease renewal would be a rental rate adjustment. Following any such alteration of terms, either an initial disclosure would be required if no disclosure had been made, or disclosure would be required of any new information obtained subsequent to an initial disclosure.

17. Q: Can an owner send the disclosure forms to all existing tenants at one time, without waiting for the tenants to renew their leases or must the owner wait for each tenant's renewal to come up?

A: Disclosure may be made any time before the lessee becomes obligated under a new lease (see response to question #18). However, if disclosure is made in advance of lease renewal and the owner subsequently obtains new information relevant to disclosure, this new information must be disclosed before the lessee becomes obligated under a new lease.

Signatures on Disclosure Forms

18. Q: Is an original signature required on the disclosure form?

A: No. The signature does not have to be original for purposes of the Federal rule. It may be reproduced, for example, by photocopy, facsimile, autopen or rubber stamp. EPA and HUD note that use of a reproduced signature does not relieve the signatory from its responsibility for compliance with this rule. Sellers and lessors are advised to ascertain whether original signatures are required under State law governing the execution of documents associated with sales or rental transactions.

LEAD-BASED PAINT FREE

19. Q: Can inspectors certified in one State perform inspections for the lead-based paint free exemption in another State?

A: Currently yes. An inspector certified to perform inspections in a State with its own certification and training requirements may perform inspections for the lead-based paint free exemption in that State and in other States. Inspectors are advised, however, that separate State laws may also apply to their activities. Within two years, a Federal program or authorized State program will be in place to certify inspectors. After such Federal or authorized State program takes effect, all inspections for purposes of the lead-based free exemption must be performed by an inspector certified in the Federal or Federally-authorized program applicable in the State where the inspection will take place.

20. Q: What sampling is required to support a determination of lead-based paint free? What sampling criteria should be used when conducting a "surface-by-surface investigation" in multi-family housing? Does Chapter 7 of the HUD Guidelines provide adequate criteria regarding how many and what type of samples need to be taken, or are the criteria to be used established by the State where the individual is certified?

A: The rule defines inspection as a (1) a surface-by-surface investigation to determine the presence of lead-based paint, and (2) the provision of a report explaining the investigation. Before EPA implements the Federal training and certification program and the State authorization program under TSCA, certified inspectors should use the sampling methodology provided by their certifying State for determining what number of units must be inspected to have a representative sample. If the State in which the inspector is certified does not provide a sampling protocol, the inspector should either sample every unit in multi-family housing or use the sampling guidelines provided in Chapter 7 of the HUD's "Guidelines for the Evaluation and Control of Lead-Based Paint Hazards in Housing," (HUD Guidelines), June, 1995 or subsequent updates.

21. Q: Do the States have the authority to alter the definition of lead-based paint in the rule that will be used to apply the lead-based paint free exemption?

A: No. The rule, at 24 CFR 35.86 and 40 CFR 745.103, states that a lead-based paint free finding must demonstrate that the building is free of "paint or other surface coatings that contain lead equal to or in excess of 1.0 milligrams per square centimeter or 0.5 percent by weight." The State standards are not applicable, whether more or less stringent, since a State cannot amend Federal requirements.

22. Q: Will lead-based paint free findings carry over once the EPA section 402/404 rule is implemented or will reinspections be required in States that do not have programs?

A: Prior to Federal or State implementation of section 402/404, reinspections will not be required for target housing that was already inspected and found to be lead-based paint free by a certified inspector. An inspection conducted prior to Federal or State implementation of section 402/404 requirements by a non-certified inspector is acceptable if the past inspection report has been reviewed and approved in writing by a certified inspector.

Once the Federal or authorized State programs take effect, all new inspections for purposes of the lead-based free exemption must be performed by an inspector certified in the Federal or Federally-authorized State program applicable in the State where the inspection will take place. An inspection conducted prior to Federal or State implementation of section 402/404 requirements by a non-certified inspector will be acceptable, if the past inspection report has been reviewed and approved in writing by an inspector certified in the Federal or Federally-authorized State program applicable in the State where the inspection took place.

PAMPHLET ISSUES

Approval

23. Q: Can private groups seek approval under section 1018 for use of alternatives to the Federal pamphlet?

A: The rule provides flexibility for States to obtain EPA approval for use of alternative State information materials in lieu of the Federal Pamphlet "Protect Your Family from Lead in Your Home." However, this pamphlet approval process does not apply to private groups that seek to develop lead hazard information materials.

EPA and HUD specifically included these State pamphlet provisions to minimize the overlap between the Federal program and State laws and regulations that may already require the distribution of State information materials during sales or leasing transactions. While EPA and HUD cannot approve materials developed by a private group as a national alternative to the Federal pamphlet, private groups may ask States to consider using their pamphlets as a State alternative. States interested in developing an alternative pamphlet should contact their EPA regional offices.

Empty Space

24. Q: The back page of the booklet contains an empty rectangular space at the bottom. Is it permissible for an individual or private party, i.e. real estate firm, to place their name, address, company logo or advertising material in this space?

A: In the Notice of Availability for the final pamphlet (60 FR 39168 , August 1, 1995), EPA indicated that to encourage private reproduction of the pamphlet, space was added on the pamphlet's back cover for names and contact information of organizations that reprint and distribute the pamphlet.

Reproduction

25. Q: Do pages 12 (State Health and Environmental Agencies) and 13 (EPA Regional Offices and CPSC Regional Offices) of the Federal pamphlet have to be included? When the pamphlet is developed for use only in one State, the information on pages 12 and 13 may not be necessary.

A: Provided that the State and Federal regional information on the State developing the pamphlet is retained, the printer can reformat the information on page 12 and 13 to omit information on other State and regional offices.

26. Q: If a private-sector party or association wishes to reproduce the pamphlet at its own expense, do the graphic illustrations have to be included?

A: The pamphlet reproduced by a private organization must include all graphics provided in the original.

27. Q: Can the pamphlet be provided in an 8-1/2 x 14 inch format as an attachment to the sale or rental contract?

A: EPA has developed and made available an alternative format of the pamphlet on 8-1/2 x 14 inch legal paper to accommodate sellers or lessors who wish to provide the pamphlet as part of the contract. The attachment includes EPA's and HUD's sample disclosure and acknowledgement forms. Provided that the seller or lessor adds the appropriate regional and state contacts in the space provided, the legal size format may be used as an alternative to the 5-1/2 x 8-1/2 inch version of the pamphlet. The public may also revise the included sample disclosure and acknowledgement forms provided that the forms contain all the elements set out in the content requirements in 24 CFR 35.92 and 40 CFR 745.113. These materials may be obtained from the NLIC (see Information section of this document).

STATE PROGRAMS

28. Q: Can States obtain authorization to administer and enforce their disclosure programs in lieu of the Federal program?

A: No. EPA and HUD have determined that Title X does not provide authority to delegate the administration and enforcement of the section 1018 disclosure requirements to State programs. However, EPA and HUD believe that Title X provides flexibility to EPA to approve State alternatives to the Federal pamphlet. Additionally, the rule does not require the use of a Federal disclosure form as an attachment to sales and leasing contracts. States, sellers, landlords, and agents have flexibility to draft disclosure and acknowledgement attachments to fit their needs, provided that the attachments address the content requirements laid out in 24 CFR 35.92 and 40 CFR 745.113.

REQUIREMENTS FOR DISCLOSURE OF INFORMATION
CONCERNING LEAD-BASED PAINT IN HOUSING
PART II

INTRODUCTION

On March 6, 1996, the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) and the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) published a final rule, "Lead; Requirements for Disclosure of Known Lead-Based Paint and/or Lead-Based Paint Hazards in Housing," (61 FR 9064-9088). This final rule requires persons selling or leasing most residential housing built before 1978 to provide purchasers and renters with a federally approved lead hazard information pamphlet and to disclose known lead-based paint and/or lead-based paint hazards. The specific requirements of the final rule are discussed in detail in the March 1996 notice. Other documents used in the development of this rule are included in a public docket available for inspection at EPA.

The requirements of the final rule are applicable as follows: (1) For owners of more than four residential dwellings, the requirements were applicable beginning on September 6, 1996, and (2) For owners of one to four residential dwellings, the requirements are applicable beginning on December 6, 1996.

Subsequent to the publication of the final rule, EPA and HUD have received questions from the real estate community about implementation of the rule. EPA and HUD developed the first "Interpretive Guidance" document, dated August 20, 1996, containing questions 1-28, to supplement the information presented in the final rule. EPA and HUD have developed this Part II of the "Interpretive Guidance" to answer additional questions received from the real estate community. This guidance will be expanded and updated as necessary.

The August 20, 1996 Interpretive Guidance, and other support documents, may be obtained from the National Lead Information Clearinghouse (NLIC) at (800) 424-LEAD, or TDD(800) 526-5456 for the hearing impaired. Requests may also be sent by fax to (202) 659-1192 or by Internet E-mail to ehc @ cais.com. The Interpretive Guidance documents and other lead information can also be accessed electronically as follows:

EPA's web site at <http://www.epa.gov/opptintr/lead/index.html>

HUD's web site at <http://www.hud.gov/lea/leahome.html>.

EFFECTIVE DATE OF RULE

29. If a contract is signed before the effective date of the rule but contingencies are satisfied after the effective date, would the contract be subject to the disclosure requirements of the rule?

EPA and HUD wish to clarify the discussion of the point of obligation as it relates to contingencies in questions numbered 3 and 5 in the August 20, 1996 document for sellers and lessors. Only contracts or leases signed on or after the effective date are subject to the rule. Contracts signed before the applicable effective date are not subject to the requirements, even if they have contingencies that are satisfied or otherwise lifted after the effective date or the closing occurs after the effective date. This is because the terms and conditions of the contract were negotiated, agreed upon, and endorsed by the parties before the 1018 rule became effective, and the rule cannot be applied retroactively to require a change in those terms and conditions.

APPLICABILITY

Trusts

30. In the rule, the term "owner" is defined to include trusts. However, trustees are not specifically listed as "owners." Are trustees intended to be exempt from the rule requirements? In the case of a trust, which party (the beneficial owner or the trustee) is expected to comply with the rule?

In cases where a trustee has been given authority to sell or lease target housing by a beneficial owner, the trustee would have the responsibility to comply with the requirements of this rule. Otherwise, the responsibility would rest with the beneficial owner. In both cases, the effective date for compliance would be determined by the number of units owned by the beneficial owner involved in the particular transaction.

Gifts

31. Does the rule cover owners who give property away, i.e., there is no sale or exchange of money or other consideration?

No. The rule does not cover a situation where property is transferred as a gift.

Housing in lieu of compensation

32. Is housing that is provided in lieu of monetary compensation included in the rule?

Yes. Housing that is provided in lieu of monetary compensation to employees, pastors, etc. is not exempt.

Mobile homes

33. Are mobile homes included in the definition of "target housing" under the disclosure rule?

Yes. Mobile homes (manufactured housing) built before 1978 are included in the definition of "target housing." Although these units may have been constructed largely of pre-finished materials, some surfaces, both interior and exterior, may have been painted with lead-based paint. Therefore, EPA and HUD cannot exempt mobile homes as a class. Houseboats, recreational vehicles, etc. are not considered "target housing."

Rehabilitated property

34. Is a pre-1978 residential property subject to the rule if the property has been completely rehabilitated, such that all pre-1978 painted components have been removed or replaced after 1977?

EPA and HUD will consider amending the disclosure rule to exempt residential properties in which all interior and exterior architectural components, such as doors, windows, walls and all other painted surfaces (including any outbuildings, fences, signs, etc) that were painted prior to December 31, 1977 have been removed or replaced after December 31, 1977.

DISCLOSUREWho Must Disclose*Co-ops and condos

35. Who is responsible for disclosure in the case of cooperatives or condominiums ("co-ops or condos")? What about common areas?

This question originally appeared as number 10 in the "Interpretive Guidance" document dated August 20, 1996. EPA and HUD recognize that the response to question 10 was confusing and, upon further reflection, now offer the following guidance in lieu of the response to question 10.

Under the final rule implementing Section 1018, the disclosure responsibility rests with the owner(s) of the target housing which is being sold or leased. Generally, the "owners" in co-op and condo arrangements are the persons who purchase shares in the co-op and possess occupancy rights to individual units or purchase a condo unit and a percentage of the common area, or lease individual units from the co-op or condo. The co-op corporation or condo association represents the joint interests of these owners. EPA and HUD believe that, in such situations, the responsibility for disclosure regarding the unit being sold or leased should reside with the individual owners of the unit. This responsibility also includes disclosure of information concerning common areas.

Lead-based paint information, particularly regarding common areas, may not be in the hands of the individual owners. In such cases, it may be administratively more efficient for individual owners to arrange for disclosure of information through the corporation or association. But in no instance should information held by the corporation or association be withheld, as it is considered known information held by the individual owners or reasonably obtainable by the owners, i.e. the corporation or association simply holds such information for the benefit of the individual owners and in no way does the representative arrangement shield the individual owners from disclosure responsibility.

On occasion, a co-op or condo association, rather than an individual unit owner, may possess occupancy rights (however denominated) to a unit being transferred at the point of transfer. In these cases, the co-op or condo association, rather than a unit owner, must comply with the disclosure requirements of the rule.

In co-op arrangements where owners purchase shares and also lease access to individual units from the co-op, EPA and HUD consider the purchase of shares to be the primary transaction for purposes of the disclosure rule. Therefore, in those cases, EPA and HUD do not consider the co-op to be a lessor and the individual unit "owner" to be the lessee and would not impose separate disclosure requirements on the co-op as lessor under this rule.

Timeshares

36. Who must disclose in sales or leases involving timeshares?

Timeshares, like co-ops and condos, can be structured in a variety of ways. Nevertheless, the owner(s) of a timeshare must disclose in any sale or lease of the timeshare, if the unit qualifies as target housing. Thus, as with all sales or leases under the final rule, the disclosure responsibility rests with the owner(s) of the target housing who is selling or leasing a timeshare, and such an obligation is not affected by multiple-ownership arrangements.

Owners who are selling or leasing a timeshare should disclose any information they have about the presence of lead-based paint or lead-based paint hazards in the timeshare. In this case, EPA and HUD would consider "reasonably obtainable" records to include those records retained by the management company for the timeshare.

Owners of timeshares who lease the unit should note the relief from disclosure responsibility provided in 24 CFR § 35.82(c) and 40 CFR § 745.101(c). These provisions exclude short-term leases of 100 days or less, where no lease renewal or extension can occur, from coverage under the final rule. In the case of timeshares, EPA and HUD have interpreted this exclusion to mean leases of 100 consecutive days per visit.

New owners

37. Does the purchase of a rental unit require the new owner (buyer), who has received disclosure, to disclose that information to the current renter?

In this situation, disclosure is required only if there is a new lease or when renewal of the lease takes place. If there is a significant change in the lease, i.e., a new owner decides to change the name on the lease or the amount of rent is changed, this constitutes renewal, and disclosure of any information not previously disclosed should take place at that time.

What Must Be Disclosed

Property

38. Does the disclosure requirement extend to garages, tool sheds, other outbuildings, signs, fences, and mechanical equipment on the property?

Yes, if these items are affixed to the residential portion of the property. The Lead Warning Statement required by the statute states that the purchaser is notified that the residential real property may present exposure to lead. Thus, disclosure of known lead-based paint or lead-based paint hazards associated with any items that are affixed to the property must be made. However, because section 1018 is limited to contracts for sale or lease of housing, the regulations apply only to those items that are located on that part of the real property that is used primarily for purposes associated with residential use. EPA and HUD consider garages for personal vehicles, storage sheds, play areas and play equipment, air conditioners, storage tanks for home fuel, yards, driveways, fences and signs to be examples of items that are associated with residential use, in addition to structures actually used by people as living quarters. For most urban and many suburban residential lots, the entire property is normally considered as being devoted to residential use. In the case of real property that is used for nonresidential as well as residential purposes, a judgment should be made as to which part of the property is used primarily for residential purposes.

Mini-blinds

39. If a home has lead-containing non-glossy vinyl mini-blinds, must this be disclosed to fulfill the 1018 disclosure requirements?

No. For purposes of section 1018, lead-containing mini-blinds in and of themselves are not a lead-based paint hazard and their mere presence need not be disclosed. The lead in lead-containing non-glossy mini-blinds is not a component of paint or any other surface coating and, therefore, does not fall within the definition of "lead-based paint" under 24 CFR § 35.85 and 40 CFR § 745.103. Further, because a "lead-based paint hazard" as defined under 24 CFR § 35.85 and 40 CFR § 745.103 is a condition that causes exposure to lead in paint, or lead-contaminated dust or soil, the lead in mini-blinds could not constitute a lead-based paint hazard by virtue of its presence in the mini-blinds. However, if the lead stabilizer in lead-containing mini-blinds breaks down into dust, it could contribute to lead contaminated dust and, therefore, could become a lead-based paint hazard which would have to be disclosed. Lead-contaminated dust, by definition, means dust with lead above certain levels regardless of the source.

Home test kits

40. EPA's pamphlet "Protect Your Family from Lead in Your Home" states that recent studies suggest that home test kits for lead are not always accurate, and that consumers should not rely on home test kits to assure safety. Therefore, does the use of home test kits for lead constitute knowledge of lead-based paint for disclosure purposes?

Yes. If an owner has information obtained from the use of a home test kit for lead, that information must be disclosed; however, the owner should also disclose information about the reliability of the test kit results.

Information subject to disclosure

41. Must records/reports involving lead-based paint or lead-based paint hazards that no longer exist be disclosed?

Yes. Lessors and sellers are obligated to disclose all known information, including information which shows that the lead-based paint or lead-based paint hazards have been corrected. Section 1018 provides for disclosure of any available lead hazard evaluation reports, and the rule requires the disclosure of the existence of any available records or reports pertaining to lead-based paint or lead-based paint hazards.

Existing summaries

42. When lessors provide a summary of an inspection report or risk assessment, in lieu of a full report, may they use a summary prepared before the effective date of this rule?

Yes. A summary prepared prior to the effective date of the section 1018 rule may be used in lieu of a paint inspection or risk assessment report, since the rule cannot be applied retroactively to summaries done before the rule. In question #13 of the August 20, 1996 Interpretive Guidance Document, EPA and HUD discussed generally how lessors may provide summaries in lieu of complete inspection and risk assessment reports.

Disclosure Process

Disclosure forms

43. May sellers, lessors, and agents develop their own disclosure forms?

Sellers, lessors, and agents may develop their disclosure forms as long as the forms meet the requirements of 24 CFR § 35.92 and 40 CFR § 745.113. Persons developing disclosure forms are advised to determine whether they must meet additional state requirements before finalizing their forms. For example, in some states, licensed real estate agents must have forms which they develop approved by an attorney before any forms may be used as part of a real estate transaction.

Type size

44. How large must the type size be for the Lead Warning Statements included on the disclosure forms?

The type size of the Lead Warning Statements must be as large or larger than the predominant type size on the disclosure form. This is illustrated in the sample disclosure forms included in the preamble to the final rule (60 FR 9074 -75, March 6, 1996).

42 U.S.C. 4852d

45. The regulations at 24 CFR § 35.92(a)(6)(i) and (b)(5)(i) and 40 CFR § 745.113(a)(6)(i) and (b)(5)(i) require agents to sign the disclosure forms, indicating that they have informed sellers or lessors of their obligations under 42 U.S.C. 4852d. What does 42 U.S.C. 4852d refer to?

The citation 42 U.S.C. (United States Code) 4852d is the authority under which the section 1018 disclosure rule was written. Therefore, the agent is certifying that the seller or lessor has been informed of the requirements of the statute as implemented by the final rule.

Some copies of the sample disclosure forms that have been distributed have incorrectly listed the citation as 42 U.S.C. 4582d. EPA and HUD have corrected subsequent versions of the sample disclosure forms, but are aware that some persons may still be using copies of the forms containing the incorrect cite.

Multiple lessees

46. How many lead information pamphlets must be distributed in a lease transaction involving multiple lessees? In college towns, large living units are frequently rented on a yearly basis by groups of students, all of whom are required to sign as lessees. In those cases, must each individual lessee be given a pamphlet, or can one copy be provided per lease transaction?

Lessors must provide one copy of the pamphlet per lease transaction; however, in cases involving multiple lessees, lessors should make additional copies of the pamphlet readily available and offer them to everyone who signs the lease.

Lessee refusal to sign

47. How do lessors fulfill their disclosure requirements when lessees refuse to accept the lead information pamphlet and/or refuse to sign the disclosure forms?

When a lessee is unavailable for signature or refuses to accept the pamphlet and/or sign the disclosure form, lessors may certify attempted delivery of the pamphlet, disclosure information, and disclosure form. This certification may be included on the copy of the disclosure form retained by the lessor or attached to that disclosure form and should indicate exactly how delivery was attempted and what occurred (e.g., sent material certified mail and never heard from lessee; lessee refused to sign disclosure form).

For example, lessors may deliver the pamphlet, disclosure information, and disclosure form by certified mail, return receipt requested. Lessors should then retain the signed certified mail receipt in their records as evidence that the material was delivered to the lessees. In cases where the lessee refuses to sign the disclosure form, lessors may certify in writing that the delivery was attempted and indicate why a signed and dated disclosure form could not be obtained.

LEAD-BASED PAINT FREE HOUSING

Recordkeeping for exemption

48. What type of paperwork should a rental property owner maintain to prove that the property is lead-based paint free? Should the inspector or risk assessor provide a lead-based paint free certificate, or a letter to the owner?

A rental property owner should maintain a copy of the inspection report that is prepared by a certified inspector and indicates there is no lead-based paint in or on the target housing in order to prove that the property is lead-based paint free.

Abatement

49. If I own a number of pre-1978 homes which I lease to the public, and I "abate" them through encapsulation and/or enclosure, can I take advantage of the lead-based paint free exemption?

The regulations at 24 CFR § 35.82(b) and 40 CFR § 745.101(b) exclude from coverage leases of target housing that have been found to be lead-based paint free by an inspector certified under the Federal certification program or under a federally accredited State or tribal program. Lead-based paint free housing is target housing that has been found to be free of paint or other surface coatings that contain lead equal to or in excess of 1.0 milligram per square centimeter or 0.5 percent by weight.

Lead-based paint that has been encapsulated or enclosed would not result in a finding by a certified inspector that the target housing is free of lead-based paint. Therefore, the lead-based paint free exemption would not be available to excuse a lessor from the disclosure requirements under the final rule.

INSPECTIONS

Auctions

50. How does the 10 day inspection period apply to real estate sold at auctions? Real estate auctions take place at a set time and set place. Typically, there is a period of "due diligence" prior to the auction when all potential buyers are permitted to view the property, ask any questions and conduct any testing, such as a termite inspection or a test of structural soundness. Would it be permissible for the seller to give potential buyers any information on lead-based paint and allow lead-based paint inspections during this period as well?

Prior to an auction not associated with a foreclosure proceeding (which would be exempted under the rule), there is typically a period of "due diligence" that allows all potential buyers to view the property, ask any questions and conduct any testing, such as a termite inspection or a test of structural soundness. EPA and HUD have determined that during this due diligence period, the seller may give potential buyers any information on lead-based paint, allow lead-based paint inspections, and otherwise comply with this rule.

EPA and HUD are considering the appropriate way to address auctions lacking a "due diligence" period.

Certified Inspectors

51. Where can I find a certified inspector or information on certified inspections?

HUD has a current list of certified inspectors available electronically. HUD's website address is <http://www.hud.gov/lea/leahome.html>. EPA is in the process of developing a pamphlet entitled "Finding a Qualified Lead Professional for Your Home" (EPA-747-F-96-006), which will assist owners in asking appropriate questions when hiring professional to do this work. This information will be available in the near future from the National Lead Information Clearinghouse (NLIC) (see information in Introduction).

PART V Other Issues Affecting Brokers

CHAPTER 16 The Broker's Role in Property Management *

10A-16 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice Scope

Scope

SCOPE

Chapter 16 discusses the real estate broker's role in managing income-producing property. This specialized industry entails legal duties and responsibilities to both the property owner and the tenants. Some brokers are not involved in property management while others devote most of their energies to this activity. Regardless, in most jurisdictions, property managers usually must be licensed as a broker in the jurisdiction where the property is located.

While sales generally involve short-term relationships between real estate brokers and their clients, property management usually involves a relationship that lasts a year or more. Brokers who manage income-producing property are involved in the budgeting process with their clients. A properly prepared budget functions as a road map and allows both the property owner and the broker-manager to respond to budget areas that do not perform as anticipated.

Chapter 16 discusses the licensing and regulation of professional property managers (§ 16.02), the budgeting process (§ 16.03), the legal aspects of the owner-manager relationship (§ 16.04), the property management agreement (§ 16.05), and the legal aspects of the manager-tenant relationship (§ 16.06). The chapter concludes with illustrative forms for property management (§ 16.07[1]) and hazardous materials testing (§ 16.07[2]), and the Code of Ethics of the Certified Property Manager (§ 16.08).

PART V Other Issues Affecting Brokers

CHAPTER 16 The Broker's Role in Property Management *

10A-16 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 16.01

§ 16.01 Introduction

The professional management of income-producing property by someone other than the property owner is a highly specialized and fast-growing industry. To comply with the relevant licensing laws in most jurisdictions, virtually all professional property managers are also licensed real estate brokers. Many of the skills required to be a successful broker, such as market familiarity, financial training, and strong interpersonal skills, serve the professional property manager equally well.

Property management activities may constitute a small, incidental portion of a broker's business, or may be a broker's primary source of revenue. At either extreme, and in every case in between, however, a property managing broker must be aware of the significant legal differences between selling real estate and managing it. In our increasing litigious society, the prudent broker simply cannot afford to ignore these differences.

One significant difference is the likely duration of the relationship between the property owner and the property manager. Brokers may be accustomed to discrete transactions: find a buyer, close the deal, and move on to the next transaction. In such an environment, a single misunderstanding or contractual difficulty on a single deal is unlikely to be of major significance. What is lost in one deal can perhaps be regained in the next. This, however, is not the case in property management. Once the owner and the property manager have entered into a management agreement, both parties are locked into the terms for the duration of the agreement--often a year or longer. Once the manager/landlord enters into a lease agreement with a tenant, both parties are likewise locked into the terms of the lease for an extended period. For this reason alone, a broker who is considering entering into property management must become familiar with the many important legal issues that present themselves when negotiating a management agreement and entering into tenant leases.

This chapter provides an overview of the legal duties and responsibilities of the professional property manager to the property's owner and to its tenants. The chapter is divided into two sections that reflect these two broad areas of the property manager's duties.

First, the chapter examines the relationship between the property manager and the property owner. As mentioned above, for a real estate broker, accustomed to the temporally limited relationship that typically attends the sale of real estate, the ongoing nature of the property manager relationship may present the greatest single challenge. A second, related challenge will likely result from the level of detail required to properly document the legal and financial relationship. The chapter will examine the legal nature of the relationship, and how the choices the parties make regarding the legal nature can affect the parties' duties and authorities. The chapter will also address the essential elements of a management contract and the budgeting process.

Second, the chapter examines the relationship between the property manager, as landlord, and the tenant(s) of the managed property. Although perhaps superficially similar to a selling broker's relationship with a buyer, the law governing this relationship is quite different from that with which a real estate broker is most likely familiar. The chapter analyzes the various legal forms that a tenant's leasehold estate may take, the essential and discretionary elements of a tenant lease, summarizes the more notable effects of the Uniform Residential Landlord And Tenant Act, and also discusses the changing sources of tort and environmental liability that confront the modern-day landlord.

The chapter includes a form of a property management agreement and the Institute of Real Estate Management's Code of Ethics for Property Managers, which is a useful reference whether the manager is a member or not. The chapter is intended for real estate professionals who desire a practical overview of the law governing the relationships between the property manager, the owner, and the tenant.

PART V Other Issues Affecting Brokers

CHAPTER 16 The Broker's Role in Property Management *

10A-16 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 16.02

§ 16.02 Regulation of Professional Property Managers

[1] General Qualifications

Although the field of property management is not yet subject to the level of regulation of some other professions, a broker who is considering managing property should be familiar with the qualifications required for the job. The Institute of Real Estate Management (IREM) is a subsidiary of the National Association of Realtors and was formed in 1933. Individuals wishing to become IREM members must meet strict educational and experience requirements, and also must pass written examinations given by IREM. Successful candidates become Certified Property Managers (CPM). While IREM membership and designation as a CPM are not legal prerequisites to being a property manager, most sophisticated owners look for a CPM designation in their property managers.

A second, more important qualification is the requirement that property managers be licensed real estate brokers because they manage and collect rents on behalf of a third-party owner. n1 All states have enacted some form of legislation governing the activities and practices of real estate brokers. While these statutes are primarily applied to brokers involved in the purchase and sale of real estate, those who rent or lease property for others are also subject to the real estate licensing statutes.

[2] Broker Licensing Requirements

Broker licensing statutes tend to be broadly construed by courts in light of their remedial purpose to protect the public from unscrupulous practices. n2 In addition to this broad judicial construction, most of these statutes expressly define the term "broker" very broadly. In most states, any individual who acts on behalf of another in connection with the sale or rental of real estate that the individual does not own is a broker and is subject to all relevant regulations. n3 Under virtually any professional property management agreement, the manager will be required to be a licensed broker in the jurisdiction in which the property is located. A full time property manager, who may not be engaged in any of the traditional activities of a broker, cannot permit his license to lapse without risking, at minimum, disciplinary proceedings. n4

CHAPTER 16 The Broker's Role in Property Management *

10A-16 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 16.03

§ 16.03 The Budgeting Process

[1] Introduction

The first step in negotiating a property management agreement is for the property manager and the property owner to clearly identify the property owner's objectives. In today's increasingly complex financial world, property owners range from a single individual to large financial institutions acting in the role of manager or advisor to several pension plans. n1 While all rational property owners seek to maximize the after-tax present value of the profit stream from the property, some owners are more concerned about short-term profitability, others may focus on longer term appreciation and tax related benefits, while still others may seek preservation of the property's value and a reliable, predictable cash flow. The manager must clearly understand the owner's expectations and priorities with regard to the property.

After the manager clearly understands what the owner wants out of the property management relationship, the owner and the manager should jointly develop a detailed base operating budget for the property. A properly prepared budget will operate as a road map of the property and should permit the manager and owner to anticipate and respond to fluctuations in the property's financial performance. A budget should contain sufficient flexibility to permit the manager to respond to inevitable, but unforeseen, variations in the property's financial performance without unnecessary delay caused by requiring the owner's prior review and approval.

[2] Expense Budget Items

The accounting details of forecasting and preparing an expense budget are beyond the scope of this chapter, but the property expense budget should include, at a minimum, the following major items:

[a] Base Rental Income

This is probably the most straight forward component to determine. The manager must carefully review the relevant provisions of all of the tenants' leases to determine the monthly rent during the budget period. If any leases expire during the budget period, the manager must determine, based upon experience and direct contact with the tenant, the likelihood of lease renewal or vacancy. Other factors that should be considered in forecasting base rental income include tenant payment histories and any lease escalation provisions that may become effective during the budget period. In the commercial context, the manager may wish to consider the relative financial health of the tenants and the economic outlook for the tenants' particular businesses or industry groups.

[b] Vacancy Forecast

As part of the projection of base rental income, the manager will have developed a forecast of the number of units that may become vacant during the budget period. Combined with the units that are vacant at the beginning of the budget period, this provides the basis for the vacancy forecast. The manager must forecast both when and how much currently vacant space is likely to be leased, the particular month during which new vacancies will occur, and the likely duration of the new vacancies. The vacancy forecast should consider the likelihood that tenant incentives, such as free rent or an improvement allowance, will be required to economically lease the vacant space. This component of the vacancy forecast will have a direct impact on the expense categories of advertising, repair, and lease-up.

[c] Percentage Rental Income

Percentage rents are common in commercial leasing to retail businesses, such as strip malls and shopping centers, and in office buildings that have some retail space, such as a gift shop or restaurant. Percentage rents are based upon either gross or net sales, and typically contain a minimum or "base" rental to be used in case of poor sales. Percentage rents usually present the manager with some forecasting difficulties because many of the key factors that will determine a particular tenant's rent are wholly beyond the manager's, and in some cases the tenant's, ability to fully predict or control. In addition, some tenants may be unwilling or unable to provide information that the manager needs, such as sales forecasts, future pricing projections, internal personnel changes, and the effects of potential competitors. Nevertheless, the manager should avoid the temptation to simply adjust last year's percentage rent upward or downward by some arbitrary figure.

A second forecasting difficulty associated with percentage rents is attempting to determine monthly fluctuations. Unlike a base rental amount, which is usually fixed during the lease term, percentage rents can and typically do vary widely during a budget period. Perhaps the most familiar source of fluctuation is the effect of holiday shopping on the fourth quarter income of retail operations. On the other hand, a yogurt or ice cream store may receive the majority of its income during the summer months. If an expense budget is to be a truly effective management tool, these monthly fluctuations must be accurately forecasted to alert the owner to months that may require unusual additions of capital far enough in advance so that efficient preparations may be made to obtain the required funds.

[d] Extra Tenant Services

Extra services, such as premium utilities for air conditioning, computer installations or additional security services, should be identified for each particular tenant. The manager should consider potential increases in rent for those tenants that required extra services in the prior period, as well as the potential of existing or new tenants having similar requirements.

[e] Interest Income

Interest may be earned on rental income and tenant security deposits that are placed in a federally insured interest bearing account. The manager should estimate the average monthly balances that will be deposited into these accounts and determine the rate of interest that should be received.

[f] Management Fees

In the residential setting, most management agreements provide that the manager is to be paid a fixed management fee with commissions or other incentives for leasing and re-leasing rental units. Most office and commercial property management contracts provide that the manager is to be paid based on a percentage of the gross rental income from the property. The manager should review the appropriate provisions of the management agreement to determine the exact basis of compensation for purposes of forecasting this item.

[g] Leasing Commissions

As a licensed real estate broker, many property managers also have brokerage agreements with the owner that provide that the manager is entitled to leasing commissions. This component may be estimated by combining the leasing and renewal estimates from the vacancy forecast with the relevant commission provisions of the brokerage agreement.

[3] The Capital Budget

In addition to the expense budget items discussed above, the owner and manager should agree on a budget of capital improvement and acquisition items. A capital expenditure is one that is expected to yield economic benefits to the property beyond the particular accounting period in which the expenditure is made. As a result, the expenditure is properly amortized over the expected useful life of the asset. n3

Unlike expense items, most capital budget items are non-recurring. Therefore, the capital budget typically does not contain specific categories that may be usefully compared from year to year for forecasting purposes. The usual basis for developing a capital budget is the inspection and maintenance records of the property. These documents can be reviewed to determine what improvements will be required during the upcoming accounting period to maintain and enhance the property's long-term rentability and value. The manager should develop a recommended list, in some form of priority order, of the capital expenditures the property will require in the upcoming fiscal year.

Because most capital expenditures are discretionary in any one accounting period, the owner will usually base approval of a capital budget item on some form of return-on-investment calculation. The manager should be aware that there is no bright-line distinction between capital and expense items. The accounting and tax consequences of this choice can be significant, and, in extreme cases, the characterization of an item as expense or capital may be determinative of whether or not the expenditure is approved by the owner.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. While beyond the scope of this chapter, a broker acting as a property manager for an institutional owner that manages and invests employee retirement assets may be impacted by the Federal Employee Retirement Income Security Act (ERISA), 29 U.S.C. § 1001, et seq. ERISA includes as a "party in interest" any person or entity "providing services" to an employee benefit plan, which almost certainly includes the manager of the plan's investment properties. Depending upon the amount of discretion that the management agreement delegates to the property manager, the manager may further be classified as a "fiduciary" under ERISA. See 29 U.S.C. § 1002(21)(A). ERISA contains a number of prohibited transactions and conflicts of interest that affect the property manager. For a more detailed discussion of the impact of ERISA on property management, see Property Management Handbook 66-71 (R. Cushman & N. Rodin eds., Wiley 1985).

(n2)Footnote 2. Several states have specific requirements that interest income on security deposits be returned to the tenant upon termination of the lease. The manager should determine the impact of the appropriate jurisdiction's regulations on this expense item.

(n3)Footnote 3. This method of depreciation for purposes of management accounting differs from the rather arbitrary depreciation schedules associated with depreciation for federal and state income tax purposes.

CHAPTER 16 The Broker's Role in Property Management *

10A-16 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 16.04

§ 16.04 Legal Aspects of the Owner-Manager Relationship

[1] Introduction

In light of the growing number of sophisticated institutional entities either owning or managing property, many important issues arising out of the legal nature of the owner-manager relationship assume added importance. This section will discuss some important legal aspects of the owner-manager relationship.

The manager may be a member of a trade or professional organization that has developed standardized management agreement contract forms. Some form property management agreements simply designate the manager as either the "agent" or "independent contractor" of the owner, without proper concern for whether these broad labels adequately define the legal relationship into which the parties wish to enter. At one end of the spectrum, where the owner is a fully staffed institutional entity, the manager's authority may be limited to daily management of the property with limited discretion. In such a case, the manager would more likely function as an independent contractor, or perhaps even as an employee of the owner, and would be without an agent's authority to act for and bind the owner. In this case, both parties would desire a detailed management agreement, specifically outlining the limits of the manager's authority and specifying those limited circumstances, if any, under which the manager is authorized to act as the owner's agent.

In the more typical owner-manager relationship, the fully staffed professional property manager exercises virtually total discretion in managing the property. The manager acts as an agent, with full authority to act for and bind the passive owner. Such an owner would rely heavily on the manager's expertise, and this owner would want to place provisions in the management agreement to protect his or her ultimate control of the property and to avoid unanticipated risk exposure. The owner and manager, or their legal representatives, must recognize these legal differences and take them into proper account when negotiating the management agreement.

[2] Contractual Issues

One of the major issues that confronts the parties to any management agreement is whether the manager will enter into contracts with third parties on its own behalf, or whether the owner will be in contractual privity with the third-party contractors. In most jurisdictions, the answer to this issue is affected by the level of disclosure to the third-party contractor of the owner's existence and identity as the manager's principal.

Where both the owner's existence and identity are known to the third-party contractor, the owner is a fully disclosed principal. n1 In this situation, the owner and the third-party contractor will be directly liable to each other for all contracts executed by the managing agent, but the managing agent generally incurs no independent contractual liability to the third party. n2 This rule of no agent liability may, of course, be modified by the expression of a contrary intent by the owner and the manager. n3

If the third-party contractor is aware of the owner's existence but not of its identity, the owner is a partially disclosed principal. n4 If the third-party contractor is aware of neither the owner's identity nor the owner's existence, the owner is an undisclosed principal. n5 A managing agent will be liable upon breach of any contract executed on behalf of a partially disclosed or undisclosed owner. n6

In all three cases, the owner, and not the manager, is generally entitled to enforce contract rights against the third-party contractor. n7 In an action against the owner, the third-party contractor may raise any defense to the contract it would have had against the agent and may escape being compelled to specifically perform the contract for the undisclosed principal if the nondisclosure was fraudulent. n8

[3] Practical Considerations

One example of the employment of a third-party contractor is when an owner determines that proper management of the property requires retention of on-site security personnel. To meet this need, the owner may instruct the manager to provide the property with adequate security, leaving the specifics of meeting this directive to the manager's discretion. In this case, the manager would act as the principal to the security contract, and the security company would be the agent of the manager. If this is the intent of the parties, the form of the manager's contracts should be carefully examined. The manager should execute the contract in its own name, with no reference to the owner. Any ambiguous form of signature, such as "Managing Company, Inc., as managing agent for Owner," runs the risk of incorrectly implying that the owner is intending to be a party to the contract.

The more common arrangement, however, is for the owner to expressly designate the manager as the owner's agent, with the owner being the actual contracting party. Under this classic agency relationship, the owner will be legally responsible for the commitments entered into by the manager. The arrangement gives rise to the risk that the owner may be unintentionally bound by the manager acting outside the scope of its real authority. n9 For example, even if the management agreement expressly prohibits the manager from entering into a certain type of agreement (e.g., a lease that permits free subleasing and assignments), the owner may well be bound by the manager entering into such an agreement if the tenant reasonably believed that the manager was acting within its agency authority.

A prudent owner may reduce the risk of being bound under the theory of apparent authority by reserving and enforcing the right to review and approve all form documents, such as leases, contracts, and purchase orders. These documents should include some form of express limitation on the manager's signature authority. For example, a form lease may include a statement such as the following:

Owner may not be bound by any modification to any term or provision of this form of lease unless the modification is expressly agreed to in writing by the Owner; or

The term of this lease, including any right or option to renew, may not exceed one (1) year without the express written consent of Owner.

Similarly, the form of purchase order may include a notation similar to the following:

Any purchase that, in the aggregate, exceeds One Thousand Dollars ($1000) must be approved in writing by Owner.

Other protections that a prudent owner should consider include indemnification from the manager, including some form of bond or personal guarantee, and regular inspections of the lease, contract, and purchase order files. Regardless of these protections, however, the owner must realize that any delegation of signature authority to the manager entails the risk of being bound by the manager's unauthorized acts. If the owner fails to minimize this risk, the value of the property could be significantly compromised by unintended long term obligations and commitments.

[4] Manager Self-Dealing

A second broad area of legal protection with which the owner should be concerned is manager self-dealing. Many managers are sophisticated business persons in charge of integrated property management operations. As a result, they may have financial interests in landscaping, security, construction, or facility maintenance companies. If the manager is permitted to hire these affiliated companies to perform services on the property, the owner risks paying too much for the service. Competitive bidding protections may be compromised, supervision and remedying of inferior performance may be reduced, and the owner may wind up paying for many overhead and profit components twice.

The owner should seek to protect itself by requiring the manager to fully disclose any proposed contractual agreement between the manager and any entity in which the manager has any interest. After full disclosure, the owner should seek to reserve the right to withhold consent to the agreement in the owner's sole discretion. Even if the terms of the written contract are favorable, the owner may wish to avoid the potential future problems that may arise from a less than arm's length relationship. Some management agreements provide that the owner reserves the right to select and terminate all contracts. While this type of provision provides the owner with some protection against manager self-dealing, it has the drawbacks of being an after-the-fact remedy and possibly exposing the owner to liability under an interference with contract theory.

PART V Other Issues Affecting Brokers

CHAPTER 16 The Broker's Role in Property Management *

10A-16 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 16.05

§ 16.05 The Property Management Agreement

[1] Introduction

After the manager and the owner have come to a mutual agreement concerning the objectives of managing the property, the property's projected financial performance and the legal nature of the owner-manager relationship, the best interests of both parties is usually served by reducing the agreement to writing. The term "property management" is not a term of art and may encompass as many, or as few, services as the parties wish. The level of service provided by the property manager will vary with the size and complexity of the property and the sophistication and degree of involvement of the owner.

[2] General Legal Issues

The property management agreement is the legal basis of the contractual relationship between the property owner and the property manager. The agreement should, at a minimum, clearly set forth the manager's duties and obligations, authority to act for the owner, and the basis for the manager's compensation. The manager should pay careful consideration to the drafting of the management agreement. Poor or unartful drafting could expose the manager to unnecessary liability or lead to the unsatisfactory termination of the owner-manager relationship.

Most sophisticated owners or managers will likely begin negotiations by proposing that their form agreement be used. Not surprisingly, these form agreements tend to focus exclusively on the rights and remedies of one party to the exclusion of the other party. The manager should assume that any form agreement provided by the owner will be slanted in the owner's favor, and the manager should be certain to review and understand the operation and effect of each of the agreement's provisions.

One of the first things to consider when drafting a management agreement is the nature of the relationship between the parties. In general, the relationship may be either that of principal and agent, or the manager may be an independent contractor. Most form agreements provide for an agency relationship. Regardless of whether the parties choose to execute an unaltered form agreement or conduct extensive negotiations to reach a customized agreement, the choice of what legal form the relationship will take will affect virtually every aspect of the relationship.

The typical, standard form of a property management agreement creates an agency relationship between the owner and the manager. n1 Absent anything to the contrary in the agreement, standard principles of agency and contract law will govern the relationship. The manager will be held to the fiduciary duties of loyalty, n2 obedience, n3 and due care n4 in his or her relationship with the owner. The owner has the duty to reasonably compensate the manager n5 and to reimburse the manager for expenses reasonably incurred on the owner's behalf, including indemnification from legal liability. n6

[3] Specific Agreement Provisions

[a] Identification of the Property and the Parties

The first issue that must be addressed in the agreement is proper legal identification of the property and the parties. This is an easy area for the manager to overlook. For most residential properties, the street address may be sufficient. For more complex properties, a detailed description of the specific buildings and facilities being covered is generally advisable. The manager's fee will likely be based upon some percentage of gross rent, so the precise extent of the property from which the gross rents are to be calculated is very important.

The correct legal identity of the parties is equally important. The manager should ensure that the owner is a financially viable entity rather than some form of limited liability shell. The owner's name should be styled identically to the way it appears on the conveyance documents of record affecting the property. If the owner is a partnership, the manager should consider having all of the partners sign the agreement. The manager should resist any attempt by the partners to include an exculpation provision. n7 n8- If the owner is a corporation, the manager may wish to consider requiring a statement from the corporate secretary that the individual who is signing on the corporation's behalf is authorized to do so. The broker should be aware of the applicable regulations that may require that the agreement be in the name of and signed by the licensed broker, rather than some legal entity.

[b] Term of the Agreement

As with most contracts, the management agreement may be either for a fixed term or periodic, such as month to month or year to year, unless one party elects to terminate in accordance with the agreement's provisions. A mutually acceptable term of the management agreement is largely determined by the competing desires of the parties. The parties should check the appropriate regulations to determine if the relevant jurisdiction has enacted any such restrictions.

Owners are typically unwilling to enter into long term management agreements that may limit their ability to control the manager's performance or sell the property. Managers, on the other hand, typically desire a substantial guaranteed term, usually at least one year, in light of the significant amounts of time and money required to set up effective property management operations. Regardless of the term to which the parties ultimately agree, the management agreement should include provisions for early termination for uncured breaches of the agreement, suitable notice provisions, and default procedures for renewals in the absence of notice to the contrary.

[c] Manager's Responsibilities

[i] Rent. The agreement should state the manager's authority to bill and collect rents, execute leases, terminate tenancies, and handle security deposits. If the agreement provides that the tenants pay rent directly to the manager, the owner should require a provision in the agreement requiring the manager to maintain separate bank accounts and records for the funds, as well as requiring appropriate bonds for the manager's employees. The separate account requirement is especially important in the case of a manager who manages multiple properties for several different owners. The owner may wish to specify the bank in which the funds must be kept and the manner in which the account is styled.

[ii] Leases. The agreement should require the manager to use its best efforts to efficiently lease the property at rental rates economically acceptable to the owner. The agreement may contain a tenant qualification procedure and guidelines for advertising the property for lease. Given the multitude of federal and local statutes and regulations that govern residential property rental, the owner may wish to provide that certain advertising be reviewed by counsel. n9

The agreement should include an owner-approved tenant lease form as an "Exhibit" and a provision expressly permitting the manager to execute the form lease on behalf of the owner. The owner may wish to provide the manager with additional flexibility by permitting the manager to modify some of the approved terms without the owner's prior approval. For the protection of both the owner and the manager, any such provision should be narrowly drafted. It should clearly specify the exact lease provision(s) to which it is addressed, and it should clearly state the limits of the manager's ability to modify the approved provision. The owner may also wish to prevent the manager from executing leases with terms longer than a certain duration or in excess of a particular dollar amount. The management agreement should also state that the manager may not execute any lease containing any unapproved provisions without the written approval of owner. As discussed in § 16.04[3] supra, the prudent owner will place on the form lease a statement of the limitation of the manager's authority to modify the standard lease provisions.

[iii] Operations.

[A] Inspections. The agreement should specify both the frequency and extent of the manager's obligation to inspect the property. If performed regularly and properly, routine inspections can cost-effectively avoid costly future repairs. This provision should also include a requirement that the manager issue a comprehensive written report of the inspection to the owner within a reasonable time after each inspection. The owner may wish to consider adding a requirement that the current status of any unremedied problem identified on an inspection report must be specifically addressed on all subsequent reports until it is fully remedied. The agreement may also specify that the manager is required to maintain a log of all tenant complaints, along with a record of the corrective actions taken.

[B] Third-Party Contracts. The agreement should specify the manager's authority to execute contracts with third parties, such as security, maintenance, and landscape contractors. Given the variety of needs a property may have, it is probably not practical to include approved forms of service contracts as exhibits to the management agreement. Nevertheless, it is in both parties' interest to have the manager's ability to bind the owner clearly defined. As a general matter, if the manager is responsible for the result, the manager should also be permitted to select and terminate the contractor.

[C] Manager's Employees. At a minimum, the agreement should specify the individual employee(s) of the manager who will be responsible for the daily management of the property. The owner will probably want to provide that the individual devote all of his or her time and efforts to managing the owner's property. Because of the importance of stability in good tenant relations, the owner may also insist on notice and approval rights before the on-site manager can be replaced. Finally, the owner may wish to consider including a provision permitting termination if this individual becomes unavailable to manage the property for any reason.

The agreement should also specify if any of the manager's employees, in addition to the on-site manager, are considered to be "key" by the owner. As with the on-site manager, the owner may wish to provide in the agreement how much of the key employees' time must be devoted to the property and permit termination if the key employees become unavailable.

The agreement should specify the manager's powers to hire, supervise, and fire its own on-site property maintenance personnel. In this area, it is typically in the owner's best interest to have the individuals be employees of the manager, rather than employees of the owner. Such an arrangement gives the manager greater control over the personnel and should save the owner from such potential obligations as tax withholding, workers compensation insurance, and ascertaining and maintaining records of employees' legal status as residents of the United States.

[D] Independent Contractor Considerations. In its dealings with the third parties discussed above, the manager may expose the owner to unintended liability under the theory of respondeat superior. A detailed discussion of the law of respondeat superior is beyond the scope of this chapter, but the manager and owner should bear the following principles in mind during the negotiation of the management agreement. If the owner exercises too much control and places too many restrictions on the details of how the manager is to obtain the desired result, the manager's status as an independent contractor may be lost, and the owner may be subject to joint and several liability for the negligence of the manager and the manager's employees. Courts have generally looked to the following factors in determining whether an agent is an employee or a general contractor for purposes of imputing third-party liability to the owner.

First, is the manager engaged in a distinct business or occupation? In most cases, the answer will be "yes." This will be especially true where the manager manages multiple properties for more than one owner. In the case of a manager who manages a single property, or where the owner also manages properties, the owner should take care that the manager is sufficiently independent so as to be considered a separate business from the owner.

Second, what level of skill is required? If the jurisdiction requires managers to be licensed brokers, this factor should favor a determination of independent contractor. If the particular jurisdiction does not require a license for the particular management arrangement that is being contemplated, the agreement should include a recitation that the manager is being selected in consideration of the manager's skill and experience in the field.

Third, does the manager provide its own tools and facilities? If the owner provides the manager with an office, administrative supplies, or other required items, the manager is more likely to be considered an employee. If the management agreement provides that the manager receives rent-free space from which to conduct its management activities, the owner should consider including a provision specifying that the manager is entitled to exclusive use of the space and is solely responsible for its maintenance and operation.

Fourth, what is the term of the agreement? The shorter or more definite the term, the more likely a court is to find the relationship to be that of an independent contractor. Open-ended agreements that provide for automatic renewal may appear to be employment contracts.

Fifth, how is the manager compensated? In most management agreements, the manager is paid based upon completion of the job of leasing and managing the property, making the manager an independent contractor. The owner should beware of including any compensation provisions that are dependent upon the length of time employed, or other such "employer-employee" type method.

Finally, what is the expressed intent of the parties? Although this factor will not control the determination, in a close case, a property management agreement that expressly states that the manager is an independent contractor could be decisive.

[d] Lawsuits

The agreement should specify the manager's authority to commence and prosecute legal actions against tenants and third-party contractors. Based upon the relative sophistication and experience of the parties, the owner should consider how much latitude the manager should be given in this area. At a minimum, the owner should insist that all judgments and other judicial relief obtained by the manager run to the benefit of the owner. Depending upon the jurisdiction, the agreement may also address the entity that will be the plaintiff in rent-collection suits and forcible detainer actions.

[e] Record Reporting and Maintenance

This is the area of negotiations that typically receives the lion's share of attention from both parties. Larger owners may legitimately require a high degree of standardization in their accounting reports for federal and state tax reporting purposes, and the owner may be dealing with multiple management companies in several different states.

Managers may have a preexisting record-keeping system that is geared toward day-to-day property management. Ideally, the manager's system can accommodate the owner's reasonable record keeping and reporting requirements. The manager should have available for the owner's review an accounting procedures manual, which includes procedures for balancing and reconciling bank accounts, cash management practices, rent collection procedures, delinquent account procedures, payroll procedures, and accounts payable procedures. The owner should be careful, however, of dictating so many accounting details to the manager that the manager begins to resemble more of an employee than an independent contractor.

The owner has to remain constantly apprised of changing market conditions, and the agreement should require the manager to provide reasonably frequent updates about market conditions and recommend responses and action steps. Given the owner's critical need for the property records, prudent owners will ensure that the agreement provides that all property records and reports are the property of the owner, and that the manager will maintain them at a specified location, available for the owner's inspection at all reasonable times.

Regardless of the type of records provided for in the agreement, the owner should insist on periodic outside audits of the manager's records. The auditor should be of the owner's choosing, and the owner should bear the expense of the audit. The manager should agree, upon reasonable notice, to meet and cooperate with the owner's auditors and to provide the owner's auditor with free access to the property's records. The agreement should provide the manager with an opportunity to review and respond to the audit report. If the audit identifies deficiencies in internal controls or documentation, the manager should be responsible for prompt correction of the deficiencies and may also be required to pay an appropriate portion of the audit expense or reimburse the owner for any negative financial impacts of the deficiencies.

[f] Risk Allocation

Risk allocation between the owner and the manager is a critical issue that must be addressed in any management agreement, regardless of its relative complexity. The two primary methods of risk allocation are insurance and indemnity.

[i] Insurance.

Insurance is the decision to transfer by contract the risk of loss from the owner or manager to an insurance company. In all but the simplest of property management situations, an insurance broker or agent will be required to identify and purchase the various types of insurance necessary. As a general matter, the manager should attempt to avoid responsibility for determining what insurance is required for the property or from what entity it should be purchased. These determinations call for expertise that most property managers would have no reason to possess.

The manager should be required to purchase and keep in force throughout the term of the agreement sufficient property, liability, automobile, workers compensation and other forms of insurance as are necessary to protect the owner's property interests from damage by third parties.

[A] Property Insurance. The property insurance agreement should insure the property for full replacement cost against all risk of physical loss, including, where geographically appropriate, water damage, flood, and earthquake. Protection should include full replacement cost, including any costs associated with regulatory compliance, removal of debris prior to reconstruction, loss of rental revenue, and loss of records. The owner should consider the deductible amount carefully in light of its ability to absorb losses and should attempt to obtain a combined single deductible.

[B] Liability Insurance. The liability insurance agreement should insure against any liability to third parties resulting from personal injury or property damage. The protection should extend to host liquor liability, claims for false arrest, libel or slander, and the criminal acts of third parties. n10

[C] Workers Compensation. Workers compensation insurance pays for required benefits to workers who are injured in the course of their employment, and typically preempts any other action for job-related injuries. Failure to maintain required workers compensation insurance may be illegal and expose the employer to financial liability far beyond the relatively low cost of maintaining this coverage. n11

[D] Comprehensive Automotive Insurance. The comprehensive automobile insurance agreement should insure against liability resulting from property damage or personal injury caused by the ownership, use, or maintenance of any motor vehicle. The policy should also include coverage for third party medical payments and for physical damage to the motor vehicle involved.

[E] General Insurance Considerations. In light of the nationwide trend towards joint and several liability, comparative negligence, and lawsuits against deep-pocket defendants, the owner should consider a high-limit umbrella coverage policy. The management agreement should identify whether the manager or the owner is to be the named insured, provide that the unnamed party is to be named as an additional insured, and require the policies to contain a waiver of the insurer's rights of subrogation against the unnamed party.

[ii] Indemnity. Indemnity provisions attempt to allocate the risks inherent in the property management situation by shifting them to one party, rather than to a third-party insurer. Liability to third parties arising out of property management should probably remain with the manager. The manager is in the best position to protect against this liability by proper maintenance of the property and by maintaining good tenant relations. The manager will wish to limit its liability to only those damages that result from the manager's negligence, while the owner will request indemnification for all losses or damage it suffers for any reason other than its own negligence. The manager should have counsel review the indemnification language and require the owner to purchase the appropriate insurance to protect the manager from liability for the acts of third parties not under the manager's control.

[g] Repairs and Maintenance

Minor repairs and day-to-day maintenance should be included in the approved budget. To the extent that required repairs are within the budget, the agreement should permit the manager to proceed without any additional review or approval from the owner. In the event of an unforecasted item, the agreement should be flexible enough to permit the manager to respond appropriately, but should also require the manager to make a full report of the incident to the owner as soon as reasonably possible. Failure to provide sufficient flexibility in this area may result in uncorrected situations that violate the law or tenant lease provisions.

[h] Basic Documents

All easements, covenants, restrictive agreements, and any other documents that place valid restrictions on the use of the property should be included as exhibits to the agreement. The agreement should provide that the manager will familiarize itself with the terms and conditions of these documents and will manage the property so as to comply with their provisions. Depending upon the complexity of the documents, they should be reviewed and summarized by counsel. In addition, the owner should be required to furnish to the manager copies of all required building permits and occupancy certificates.

[i] Termination

The agreement should contain specific, objective grounds for early termination that clearly set forth the remedies of the terminating party. For example, because the manager is a licensed broker, the agreement might provide that the manager will conduct its business on behalf of the owner in accordance with the highest professional and ethical standards. The Code of Ethics of the Real Estate Management Institute, which is included in this chapter as § 16.08 infra, may be a useful reference. Any material failure to adhere to this requirement would be grounds for termination and, if appropriate, resultant damages. The owner may try to preclude the manager from receiving earned, but unpaid, compensation at the time of a for-cause early termination.

Long term property management agreements may adversely affect the property's marketability. As a result, the owner may also insist that the agreement be terminable upon the sale of the property. Because this event is wholly outside of the manager's control and does not necessarily include any malfeasance by the manager, the manager may counter by requesting some extended notice period or liquidated damage provision in return for granting this concession to the owner.

The manager should seek to include early termination provisions for the owner's material breach of the agreement, violation of the law, or insolvency. This provision could likewise provide for the owner to be liable to the manager for damages caused by the terminating event. Before drafting such a provision, the manager should give consideration to the applicable jurisdiction's application of the standard rule invalidating liquidated damages clauses that are, in fact, penalties. n12

A crucial aspect of any termination provision is specifying which, if any, of the management agreement's obligations of the parties survive termination. The owner will require that the manager turn over all property records and vacate any office space on the property at termination. The owner should also include a provision providing for a post-termination audit.

CHAPTER 16 The Broker's Role in Property Management *

10A-16 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 16.06

§ 16.06 Legal Aspects of the Manager-Tenant Relationship

[1] Introduction

The principles that govern the relationship between the manager in its role as landlord and the property's tenants arise from two distinct bodies of law: contract and property. As a contract, the parties to the lease must be legally capable of entering into the lease, the purpose of the lease may not be illegal, and the lease must contain a valid offer, a valid acceptance, and legally sufficient consideration. As a conveyance of real property, the lease gives rise to an exclusive leasehold estate in land in favor of the lessee.

Under common-law principles, which tended to favor the lessor, the conveyance of the leasehold interest to the lessee was viewed as distinct from the contractual covenants of the parties. Therefore, if the landlord failed to maintain the property, the tenant's sole remedy was contractual. The tenant could not withhold rent or break the lease. Recognizing that these common-law principles are largely outdated in modern landlord-tenant relationships, the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws approved the Uniform Residential Landlord And Tenant Act in 1972. n1 This Act places significant limitations on the landlord's common-law rights, but applies only to residential leases. Common-law principles still largely govern all non-residential leases and all leases of any type in jurisdictions that have not adopted the Act or some similar statutory scheme.

[2] Types of Leasehold Estates

The execution of a valid lease gives rise to property rights in the lessee and contractual duties and obligations on the part of both parties. A breach of these rights, duties, and obligations gives rise to certain remedies. This section will examine those rights and remedies.

A lease creates a possessory interest in real property. n2 The tenant obtains the exclusive use and possession of the leased premises for a period of time, after which period possession reverts to the landlord/owner. n3 The common law recognizes four different kinds of leasehold estates. n4 Most landlord-tenant relationships fall into one of the first two categories.

[a] Term Tenancy

A term tenancy is one that expires by its terms at the end of a fixed or readily computable period of time. n5 The common law imposed no limit on the length of time to which the parties could agree, but some states have limited the permissible duration of a lease by statute. n6 A term tenancy expires without notice at the end of the specified term. This feature of the term tenancy can be significant because if the time of termination is uncertain, as it may be in the case of the other leasehold estates, the parties may have rights and remedies that would not be otherwise available. n7

[b] Periodic Tenancy

A periodic tenancy is one that continues indefinitely until one of the parties provides the other with the required notice to terminate the leasehold at the end of a specified period. n8 The primary distinction between the periodic and term tenancies is the method of determining the termination date. n9

[c] Tenancy at Will

A tenancy at will is one that may be terminated by either party, at any time, without notice. n10 This leasehold estate may arise by express agreement, but is more likely to be implied by law from the conduct of the parties. n11 A number of jurisdictions have chosen to ameliorate the harsh common-law rule of no notice by requiring that some notice be given to terminate a tenancy at will. n12 Unlike the previous two tenancies, the tenancy at will is automatically terminated by the death of either the landlord or the tenant. n13

[d] Tenancy at Sufferance

A tenancy at sufferance exists when an individual is in wrongful possession of the land of another without a valid lease. The usual manner in which a tenancy at sufferance arises is by a tenant failing to vacate the leased premises at the expiration of the lease term. n14 The tenant at sufferance is, in most respects, viewed by the law as a trespasser. n15

[3] Elements of a Valid Lease

[a] The Requirement of a Writing

As stated above, a lease is a contract, and therefore must satisfy all of the prerequisites of a valid contract. As a result, leases are generally subject to the Statute of Frauds and leases for terms exceeding one year must be in writing to be effective. n16 As a general matter, the writing must identify the parties to the lease, identify the premises that are being leased, specify the duration and rental rate of the lease, and be signed by the party to be charged. n17 Obviously, the one-year statutory minimum should not be taken to mean that leases for shorter durations need not be reduced to a writing. The prudent landlord and tenant will insist that their agreement be set forth in writing to minimize the chance of honest mistakes and misunderstandings.

[b] Identification of the Parties

The parties to the lease should be identified as clearly as possible. If the tenant and all other necessary parties have not signed the lease in their proper capacities, the landlord will have difficulty in legally enforcing the lease. In the residential setting, the landlord should ensure that both spouses sign and that both have the capacity to contract under the laws of the governing jurisdiction. In the commercial setting, the tenant entity should be given its correct legal description (corporation, limited partnership, limited liability company, etc.) and its state under which laws it exists. In addition, the landlord should consider requiring some form of assurance from a corporation's secretary that the individual who is executing the lease on the corporation's behalf is, in fact, empowered to do so.

[c] Description of the Lease Term and the Premises

The term of the lease should be clearly stated as well. n18 As discussed above, the law raises certain presumptions absent the parties' expression of a contrary intent. If the parties intend the lease to be of a specific type and duration, they must so state, or risk the presumption of being bound by a tenancy other than that which they intended. n19

When providing the description of the leased premises, the landlord should keep the following items in mind. In the residential setting, the apartment and street number should be all that is required to sufficiently identify the leased premises. If the residential lease includes land, the correct legal description, either metes and bounds or a reference to a recorded plat, should be attached as an exhibit to the lease. If the tenant is also entitled to use additional space, such as a parking space or off-site storage, this should be specified in the lease. If a commercial building includes common areas, such as entryways and stairways, the lease should state what rights the tenant has to use and occupy these areas. Finally, the lease should state the rights and obligations of the parties to maintain and improve various portions of the leased premises. This is particularly important in the commercial setting, where tenant improvements are often a key negotiating point between the parties.

[d] Rent

As is the case with all contracts, a lease must be supported by valuable consideration to be enforceable. n20 Rent is the consideration that the tenant pays to the landlord for the use and occupancy of the leasehold property. n21 No particular form of words is required to create the tenant's obligation to pay rent, and in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, the law will imply an obligation to the tenant to pay the reasonable value for the use and occupation of the leased property. n22 Rent is typically a set monthly dollar amount in residential leases, but any condition or covenant performed by the tenant can serve as rent. n23 In the commercial setting, where rental rates often vary with the profitability of the tenant's business, rent can become a relatively complex formula that requires several variables to compute.

[4] Other Standard Lease Provisions

[a] Legal Use of the Premises

One of the landlord's major considerations is what, if any, limits to place upon the tenant's use of the leased premises. Absent any provision to the contrary, the law will generally permit the tenant to use the leased premises for any lawful purpose, n24 provided that purpose does not damage the landlord's reversionary interest. n25 Mere statements of permitted use, such as "leased premises are to be used for a drive-in movie theater," are insufficient to restrict the tenant's use of the premises to that purpose only. n26 To effectively limit the tenant's use of the premises, the lease should contain an affirmative statement that the tenant will not put the premises to the particular use that the landlord wishes to avoid. n27 The commercial landlord must be careful, however, not to include a restrictive provision that, in conjunction with zoning or deed restrictions, prohibits any commercial use whatsoever. n28 Such an overbroad restriction will likely be self-defeating if the landlord seeks legal enforcement, particularly in light of the courts' resolution of any doubts against the party who drafted the restriction. n29

[b] Assignment and Subleasing

As a general proposition of common law, the tenant's leasehold interest is freely assignable by the tenant absent a lease provision to the contrary. n30 Most leases provide that the tenant may sublease or assign n31 only with the landlord's prior written consent, which the landlord may grant in its discretion. n32 There is some disagreement among the state courts as to whether the landlord is required to be reasonable in exercising this discretion. n33 Sophisticated tenants may insist that the assignment provision require the landlord to be reasonable. The landlord should check the rule in the relevant jurisdiction to determine whether this point is moot or worth negotiating.

[c] Security Deposits

Leases commonly provide that the tenant must deposit a sum of money with the landlord that acts as security for the tenant's performance of its lease obligations. One purpose of the security deposit is to provide the tenant with a monetary incentive to properly maintain the leased premises. Absent a lease or statutory provision to the contrary, the security deposit becomes a debt of the landlord, but the landlord may freely use the deposit until termination of the lease, when the debt becomes due. n34 Due in part to the frequency of landlord-tenant disputes in this area, many states have modified the common law to place tenant-oriented restrictions upon the landlord in handling residential tenant security deposits. n35

The security deposit arrangement is personal between the landlord and the tenant. In general, if the landlord transfers the property, the sale agreement will provide that the new owner assumes both the benefit and obligation of tenants' security deposits. n36 The obligation of the landlord to refund a security deposit does not, however, run with the land absent such an assumption. n37 Thus, tenants may not recover their security deposits from a subsequent owner unless the subsequent owner has either assumed the prior owner's obligations or has received credit on the purchase price for the amount of the deposits. n38

[d] Landlord's Obligations

[i] Delivery of Possession. One of the primary obligations of the landlord is to deliver possession of the leased premises in a condition suitable for the contemplated use to the tenant at the beginning of the lease term. n39 As a general matter, if the landlord breaches this duty, the tenant is not liable for any rent during the period of nonpossession and may also be entitled to resulting consequential damages. n40 The landlord may seek to protect against consequential damages, particularly in commercial leases, by including a postponement of possession provision such as the following:

Landlord and Tenant agree that, if for any reason Tenant is unable to take possession of the lease premises at the commencement of the lease term, no term or condition of this Lease shall be affected thereby. Tenant's sole and exclusive remedy shall be Landlord's waiver of rent payments until Landlord is able to provide Tenant with possession of the lease premises.

[ii] Quiet Enjoyment. A second obligation of the landlord under most leases is to provide the tenant with "quiet enjoyment" of the leased premises throughout the term of the lease. Even in the absence of an express covenant, most states will impute this obligation to the landlord. n41 A landlord breaches the covenant of quiet enjoyment by substantially interfering with the tenant's use and enjoyment of the leased premises. n42 To permit the tenant to recover damages, the interference must usually be of such magnitude that it amounts to evicting the tenant, either actually or constructively. n43 Lesser interferences with the tenant's use of the leased premises are not usually sufficient to entitle the tenant to damages. n44 In general, the actions of a third party that substantially interfere with the tenant's use of the leased property will not constitute a breach of quiet enjoyment n45 unless the landlord has the right to control the third party. If the tenant is able to establish that the landlord has breached the covenant of quiet enjoyment, the tenant is entitled to the difference between the rental value of the leased premises and the agreed-upon rent, n46 as well as reasonably foreseeable consequential damages. n47 As is the case in any contract action, however, the tenant bears the burden of establishing its consequential damages with reasonable certainty. n48

[iii] Maintenance and Repair. The third obligation of the landlord under most leases is to maintain and repair the leased premises. n49 Unlike the implied covenant of quiet enjoyment, however, the landlord incurs this obligation only if the lease so provides. n50 If the lease obligates the landlord to make repairs, the landlord should ensure that it retains the right of entry, that the tenant is obligated to promptly notify the landlord of items requiring repair, and that the landlord is entitled to a reasonable period of time following the notice to complete the repairs.

[e] Tenant's Obligations

[i] General. The lease agreement should provide the specific time and place at which the tenant is obligated to make its rental payments, as well as provide for late payment and insufficient funds charges. In addition to standard remedies for nonpayment of rent, the lease should expressly provide the landlord with a lien on the tenant's personal property located on the leased premises. Some states provide for such a lien by statute, n51 but some do not. n52 The landlord should include a clear lien provision in either event, because many states strictly construe the landlord's lien rights against the landlord. n53 The tenant should also be required to comply with all applicable laws and regulations, and should be required to use the leased premises in a reasonable manner and refrain from negligently or intentionally causing damage.

[ii] Removal of Fixtures. One area that should be given particular attention in the commercial lease is the provision governing removal of fixtures. "Fixture" is a legal term of art that refers to any goods that "become so related to particular real estate that an interest in them arises under real estate law." n54 The general rule provides that tenant fixtures remain with the leased property and become the property of the landlord upon termination of the lease. n55 An exception to this general rule is the case of "trade fixtures," which are those items of personal property that are necessary for a commercial tenant to carry on its business. Trade fixtures, absent an agreement in the lease to the contrary, may be removed by the tenant at the termination of the lease. n56 The lease should clearly specify that, if the tenant elects to remove its trade fixtures upon termination, the tenant must return the leased premises to the condition that existed at the time the tenant took possession.

[f] Tenant Indemnity

A number of theories exist under which a landlord may be liable for property damage and personal injuries that occur to tenants and their guests. One way in which the landlord may seek protection against this liability is to place a form of indemnity in the lease agreement. As discussed in § 16.05[f][ii] supra, indemnification is a contractual agreement by which parties allocate risk of loss. Under the general law of indemnity governing contracting parties of equal bargaining power, one party may undertake responsibility for the other party's negligence.

A number of jurisdictions have modified this rule in the landlord-tenant context. Standard exculpatory clauses that purport to release the property manager from liability for its own negligence have been held void as contrary to public policy by courts. n57 In addition, a number of states have enacted legislation that expressly forbids enforcement of such indemnity provisions as contrary to public policy. n58 Nevertheless, particularly in commercial leases, the landlord should consider including some form of tenant indemnity in the lease specifying that the tenant will hold the landlord harmless from losses that result from the tenant's negligence and excluding the tenant's recovery of consequential economic damages.

The following is a landlord-oriented indemnity provision:

Tenant shall defend, indemnify, and hold Landlord fully free and harmless on demand for, from, and against any and all liability, damages, costs, and expenses, including attorney's fees, arising from any negligent, reckless, or intentional act or omission of Tenant, or the officers, directors, contractors, licensees, agents, servants, employees, guests, invitees, or visitors of Tenant in or about the Project. Tenant hereby agrees that Landlord shall not be liable for injury to Tenant's business or any loss of income, or for damage to the goods, wares, merchandise or other property of Tenant, Tenant's employee's, invitees, customers, or any other person in or about the Premises, resulting from fire, steam, electricity, gas, water, or rain, or from breakage, leakage, obstruction or other defects of pipes, sprinklers, wires, appliances, plumbing, air conditioning or lighting fixture, or from any other cause.

[g] Environmental Issues

Many commercial tenants engage in activities that generate hazardous wastes. n59 In 1976, the United States Congress enacted the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act, n60 which regulates the handling of hazardous wastes from "cradle to grave." n61 An often overlooked matter is the landlord's and the property owner's exposure to liability for the costs of cleaning up hazardous wastes that a tenant handled improperly. n62 The landlord should consider obtaining protection from its tenants by including appropriate provisions in the lease.

At a minimum, the lease should require the tenant to strictly comply with all environmental regulations, including all reporting and record-keeping requirements. The lease should specifically provide the landlord the right to enter the leased premises at all reasonable times to inspect the operation. The lease should require the tenant to promptly provide the landlord with copies of any reports or other information that the tenant obtains in connection with the use or clean-up of any hazardous materials on the premises. In the event that the tenant is unable or unwilling to perform required remedial activities, the lease should also give the landlord and its agents the right to enter the premises, conduct the remediation, and bill the tenant for the costs. Finally, the lease should contain a specific environmental indemnity from the tenant to the landlord for any costs or damages arising from environmental contamination of the property.

The flip side of the foregoing discussion is the liability of the landlord to the tenant as the result of environmental contamination existing, but undisclosed, at the time of the lease. The likely form of this action would be breach of warranty, either express or implied. Landlords should certainly resist any attempt by the tenant to include any express environmental warranty in the lease. In addition, the landlord (and its employees) should be careful to avoid making any oral representations concerning the environmental condition of the leased premises. Sophisticated tenants leasing property may insist on performing an environmental inspection. n63

[5] The Uniform Residential Landlord and Tenant Act

[a] Introduction

The Uniform Residential Landlord and Tenant Act (the "Act") is a model law that reflects the general movement of the law to a more favorable view of tenant's rights and attempts to provide cross-jurisdictional uniformity to landlord-tenant law. As of the end of 2005, the Act had been substantially adopted in twenty-one states. n64 The Act is fairly comprehensive and its provisions should be considered by landlords even in the jurisdictions in which it has not been enacted.

The Act is generally viewed as expanding tenant's rights by making the parties' obligations interdependent. n65 The following is a brief overview of the Act's more significant provisions. All jurisdictions that have adopted the Act have altered it to some degree, thereby partially defeating one of the Act's goals. In those jurisdictions that have adopted the Act, the manager must be fully conversant with its provisions as adopted.

[b] Prohibited Provisions

The Act prohibits leases that provide that the tenant waives its remedies under the Act, authorizes any confession of judgment, agrees to pay the landlord's legal fees, or agrees to any limitation of the landlord's liability. n66 In the event that the relevant jurisdiction adopts the Act in the future, the landlord should be aware that at least one state has refused to apply this provision retroactively where both the lease and the alleged violation occurred prior to the Act's effective date. n67

[c] Presumed Provisions

The Act provides that, unless otherwise specified in the lease, the tenant is liable for the fair rental value of the use and occupancy of the leased premises and is considered to have a leasehold estate from month to month. In addition, rent is presumed to be payable on the beginning date of the rental period, at the leased premises, and without demand by the landlord. In the event of a mid-rental period termination, rent is presumed to be equally apportioned from day to day. n68

[d] Unconscionability

Following in the footsteps of the Uniform Commercial Code, the Act provides courts with the discretion to refuse to enforce any part of a lease that it finds, as a matter of law, to be unconscionable. n69 The comments state that the test for determining unconscionability is "whether, in light of the background and setting of the market, the condition of the particular parties to the rental agreement, settlement or waiver of right or claim are so one sided as to be unconscionable at the time of the making of the agreement or settlement." n70

[e] Building Rules

The Act sets forth specific conditions that a landlord must meet before building rules will be enforceable against tenants. To be enforceable, a rule must: (i) be reasonably related to promoting tenant convenience, safety, or welfare; (ii) apply equally to all tenants; (iii) be sufficiently explicit to provide notice of what is required for compliance; (iv) not be designed to evade the landlord's obligations; and (v) be disclosed to the tenant at the time of lease execution. If a rule that significantly changes a tenant's lease agreement is adopted subsequent to the execution of a tenant's lease, that tenant's written consent is required before the rule may be applied to that tenant. n71

[f] Tenant's Obligations and Landlord's Remedies

The Act requires that the tenant comply with all applicable health and safety laws, maintain the leased premises in a clean and safe condition, avoid damaging the premises, and act so as to not disturb other tenants' right to peaceful enjoyment of the premises. n72 If the tenant is in material non-compliance with these obligations, the landlord may deliver written notice of the breach and that the lease will terminate in not less than thirty days. n73 If the tenant fails to remedy the breach within fourteen days, the lease terminates as provided in the notice, and the landlord may recover actual damages, obtain injunctive relief, and recover reasonable attorney's fees. n74 Alternatively, if the breach is one that may be remedied by repair, fourteen days after notice the landlord may enter and repair the premises and bill the tenant. n75

[g] Landlord's Obligations and Tenant's Remedies

The Act limits how much a landlord may demand in security deposits and provides for how deposits must be handled and returned. n76 The Act imposes obligations on a landlord regarding disclosure of the owner and manager, n77 and delivering possession of the leased unit at the commencement of the lease term. n78 The Act also places rather broad maintenance obligations on the landlord. n79 If the landlord is in material non-compliance with any of these obligations, the tenant may give notice and terminate the lease, subject to the landlord remedying the non-complying condition within fourteen days. n80 The tenant may recover actual damages, obtain injunctive relief, and recover reasonable attorney fees, as well as recover all security deposits and prepaid rent. n81

[6] Landlord's Tort Liability

[a] Introduction

At common law, a landlord was not liable to tenants for injuries resulting from dangerous conditions existing on the leased premises. n82 The general rule of non-liability has been substantially modified, and in some cases even turned on its head, n83 and landlords may now be liable to tenants and others based upon the general law of negligence. n84 This shift of liability from tenant to landlord is reflected in the growing number of jurisdictions that have, by statute, implied a warranty of habitability into residential leases. n85 The implied warranty, however, is contractual in nature, and its primary use to date has been as a tenant defense in a dispute concerning nonpayment of rent, rather than as the basis for tort recovery. n86 The following discussion will focus on the areas of potential landlord liability beyond breach of the implied warranty of habitability.

[b] Undisclosed Dangerous Conditions

One significant area of landlord liability arises from failure to disclose concealed, dangerous conditions on the leased premises that are known to the landlord but not to the tenant. n87 The landlord cannot avoid liability by claiming uncertainty about the existence of the danger. If the landlord has enough information from which a reasonable person would conclude that an unreasonable risk of harm exists, the landlord is under an affirmative duty to communicate this information to the tenant. n88 The landlord will not be liable for injury caused by conditions the tenant should have discovered. n89

A New Jersey court has refused to find that a real estate broker and agent had a duty to discover latent defects in residential rental property they managed. That court stated that it could not see how the public interest would be furthered by imposing a duty to search "every nook and cranny of the rental premises to discover latent defects." The court also stated that it specifically declined to impose a duty to inspect for hidden defects upon a broker which had merely agreed to accept the rent on the owner's behalf, pay maintenance fees, and be the contact person for repairs. n89.1

[c] Premises Open to the Public

A second general area of landlord liability is the case of land that is leased for a purpose that involves admission of the public. n90 The landlord must exercise reasonable care to inspect and repair those portions of the leased premises that will be open to the public before transferring the premises to the tenant. The landlord may not escape this liability by having the tenant agree to make the necessary inspection or repair. n91 This is an obvious source of landlord liability in every commercial lease and has been applied by the courts to a wide variety of commercial settings. n92 By its terms, this rule does not apply to dangerous conditions that arise on the leased premises after they have been transferred to the tenant, but the landlord may be liable for failure to timely make subsequent repairs if the landlord has contracted with the tenant to do so. n93

[d] Failure to Maintain Common Areas

A landlord may also be held liable for injuries that occur to tenants and others in common areas over which the landlord retains control. n94 This type of liability can arise from dangerous conditions that the landlord fails to repair in parking lots, stairways, elevators, rest rooms, tenant recreation areas, or any other area of a building that the landlord maintains for the tenants' benefit. n95 Liability will attach if, by the exercise of reasonable care, the landlord could have discovered and repaired the dangerous condition and the unreasonable risk that it created. n96 Whether remedial actions taken by a landlord are reasonable is a question of fact to be judged in light of all of the circumstances. n97

[e] Criminal Activity

In a relatively recent legal development, a landlord may be held liable for tenants' damages resulting from the criminal acts of third parties. n98 In general, liability will arise if the landlord has notice of prior criminal activity and the area in which the crime occurs is under the exclusive control of the landlord. n99 The key to liability is failure to take adequate precautions after notice of criminal activity. Among the steps a prudent landlord may take to mitigate liability for criminal acts of third parties are installing modern security devices, ensuring that lighting is adequate and properly maintained, or hiring professional security personnel. n100 In today's increasingly crime-conscious society, it is not unusual for a prospective tenant to inquire about the occurrence of any prior criminal activity on the premises. If the landlord knows, or should know, that criminal activity has occurred, the landlord must respond truthfully, even though this may result in a lost tenant. n101

An agreement by which a tenant permits third parties non-exclusive access to the leased premises for a fee is not a sublease or an assignment, and therefore does not require the landlord's approval under a lease's sublease provision. See Hilton Head Air Serv., Inc. v. Beaufort County, 418 S.E.2d 849 (S.C. Ct. Supp. 456 (D.D.C. 1991) , in which the trial court had granted a directed verdict for the defendant-landlord because the tenant failed to introduce sufficient evidence of the foreseeability of the tenant's rape. The circuit court ruled that, even though the plaintiff failed to establish that any prior rape had occurred at the leased premises, the "condition of the premises," which the trial court had not considered, was a critical factor in assessing the reasonableness of the landlord's conduct. 963 F.2d at 1560-61 .

CHAPTER 16 The Broker's Role in Property Management *

10A-16 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 16.07

§ 16.07 Forms

[1] Property Management Agreement Property Management Agreement

PROPERTY MANAGEMENT AGREEMENT

(..... APARTMENTS)
(with optional HUD provisions)

This Property Management Agreement ("Agreement") is made and entered into as of, 19 ("Commencement Date"), by and between:

.....

.....

(hereinafter "Owner"); and

.....

.....

.....

(hereinafter "Agent");

concerning the operation and management of that certain unit garden apartment complex described as:

.....

.....

including all fixtures, improvements, and items of personal property used in conjunction with or located on the real property. All of the foregoing are referred to as the "Property."

RECITALS

1. Possession. Subject to the terms, covenants, and restrictions contained in this Agreement, Owner grants Agent possession of the Property with the sole and exclusive right to lease, rent, operate, maintain, and manage the Property.
2. Commencement. The obligations of Agent under this Agreement shall commence on the Commencement Date and shall continue in full force and effect until the complete termination of this Agreement in accordance with the provisions of Paragraph 21.
3. Definitions. As used in this Agreement:
 - a. "HUD" means the United States Department of Housing and Urban Development.
 - b. "Secretary" means the Secretary of the United States Department of Housing and Urban Development.
 - c. A "Mortgage" is an instrument of agreement between the Owner, as mortgagor, and a lender or mortgagee, creating a lien on the Property as security for the payment of debt, which is insured by the United States Department of Housing and Urban Development.
 - d. "Mortgagee" means any holder of the Mortgage.
 - e. "Principal Parties" means the Owner and the Agent.
 - f. "Consenting Parties" means the Secretary and the Mortgagee.
 - g. "Lender" means, a corporation or its successors and assigns.
4. HUD Requirements (OPTIONAL). The Property is subject to a Mortgage which is insured by HUD under Section 223(f) of the National Housing Act, and the Owner has entered into a Regulatory Agreement dated with the Secretary. Under the Regulatory Agreement, the Owner is obligated to provide for management of the Property in a manner satisfactory to the Secretary. The Owner has furnished the Agent with copies of the Regulatory Agreement. In performing its duties under this Agreement, the Agent will comply with all pertinent requirements of the Regulatory Agreement and the directives of the Secretary. In the event of a conflict between this Agreement and the rights and requirements of HUD or the Mortgagee under the Regulatory Agreement, the rights and requirements of HUD or the Mortgagee shall prevail.

5. Rentals. The Agent will offer for rent and will rent the dwelling units, parking spaces, and concessions on the Property. In addition, the Agent will perform the following duties:

- a. The Agent will show the Property and vacant dwelling units at the Property to prospective tenants.
- b. The Agent will accept and process applications for rentals. If an application is rejected, Agent, to the extent legally required, will inform the applicant of the reason for the rejection. A current list of prospective tenants will be maintained.
- c. The Agent will prepare all dwelling leases and permits, and will execute all dwelling leases and permits in the name of, and as the authorized and disclosed agent for, the Owner of the Property. The terms of all leases will comply with the pertinent provisions of the Regulatory Agreement and the directives of the Secretary which are made known by Owner to the Agent. Dwelling leases will be in a form approved by the Owner, but individual dwelling leases and parking permits need not be submitted for the approval of the Owner.
- d. The Owner will furnish the Agent with rent schedules showing basic rents for dwelling units and other charges for facilities and services at the Property. In no event will these rents and other charges be in excess of the "maximum monthly gross for living units" as approved by the Secretary from time to time.
- e. The Agent will collect, deposit, and disburse security deposits, if required, in accordance with the terms of each tenant's lease. Security deposits will be deposited by the Agent, separate from all other accounts and funds, with a bank or other financial institution whose deposits are insured by an agency of the United States government. This account will be carried in the Property's name and designated of record as "....."

6. Trust Account; Assignment of Rents. Any funds collected by Agent on behalf of Owner shall be held by Agent in a bank account or accounts, in trust for the benefit of Owner. Owner grants to Agent the right and authority to withdraw from such bank accounts any or all disbursements which, under this Agreement, are to be made at the expense of Owner, including any compensation or payments to be made to Agent under Paragraph 18. Owner assigns to Agent any and all rents from the Property in an amount equal to any unpaid operating expenses incurred by Agent on behalf of Owner for the Property. This assignment of rents shall be for the purpose of securing any payment due Agent and the performance of all obligations of Owner which have been performed by Agent on behalf of Owner or the Property. From time to time (but not more frequently than monthly), Agent shall remit to Owner any excess funds accumulated in the Property bank accounts. The excess, for purposes of this Agreement, shall be determined by taking the total income collected from the Property on behalf of Owner during the preceding calendar month and subtracting all expenses paid or accrued on behalf of the Property (including all installments of principal and interest due from time to time on the Mortgage or on any other indebtedness secured by the Property and including all real estate taxes and assessments) and further subtracting a reasonable operating reserve equal to Dollars ($.....).

7. Enforcement of Leases. The Agent will use its best efforts to secure full compliance by each tenant with the terms of the applicable lease. Voluntary compliance will be emphasized. The Agent will counsel tenants and make referrals to community agencies in cases of financial hardship or under other circumstances deemed appropriate by the Agent so that involuntary termination of tenancies may be avoided to the maximum extent consistent with sound management of the Property. Nevertheless, the Agent may terminate any tenancy when, in the Agent's judgment, sufficient cause (including, but not limited to, nonpayment of rent) for such termination occurs under the terms of the tenant's lease. For this purpose, the Agent is authorized to consult with legal counsel approved by the Owner to bring actions for eviction and to execute notices to vacate and judicial pleadings incident to such actions. The Agent must keep the Owner reasonably informed of all actions. Subject to the Owner's approval, attorney fees and other necessary costs incurred in connection with such actions may be paid out of the Property bank accounts as Property expenses.

8. Authorization. Owner authorizes Agent to perform the following acts in the name of Agent, Owner, and/or the Property, and Owner assumes and agrees to pay, when due, all expenses and obligations incurred in connection with the performance by Agent of these acts:

a. To do all things necessary to ensure that the Property is maintained in an attractive condition and good state of repair consistent with the general condition of the Property as of the Commencement Date; to make or cause to be made, as needed to properly maintain the Property, repairs, alterations, additions, or replacements; and to purchase materials and supplies to accomplish the foregoing and to purchase necessary operating supplies. Agent shall obtain the approval of Owner for any single capital expenditure in excess of Five Thousand Dollars ($5,000.00).

b. To advertise in any appropriate media the availability for rental of units located on the Property; to sign, renew, or cancel leases and/or rental agreements for said rental units; to collect rents due or to become due and give receipts; to terminate tenancies and to sign and serve such notices as are appropriate; to institute and prosecute actions; to recover possession of premises; to sue for and recover rents and other sums due; and, when expedient, to settle, compromise, or release such actions, suits, or controversies, or reinstate such tenancies.

c. To hire, discharge, and supervise all labor and employees required for the operation and maintenance of the premises, including, without limitation, a resident manager. All employees shall be deemed employees of Agent and not employees of Owner. Charges made to Owner's account for employees' salary and wages shall include all applicable state and federal taxes, insurance premiums, 401K profit sharing contributions (not to exceed% of salary), employees' welfare benefits as may be required by law, and applicable group health insurance premiums under a plan deemed acceptable by Agent. Moreover, Owner also agrees to pay the costs incident to the hiring of employees, including the cost of background checks, employment advertising, administration of polygraph examinations, bond premiums, and employment agency fees, if required. Agent shall not be responsible or liable to Owner or any third party (including tenants at the Property) for the criminal acts or omissions of Agent's employees or any acts or omissions performed or omitted outside the scope of their employment.

d. To make and enter into the name of the Owner any contracts for electricity, gas, water, telephone, pool maintenance, lawn service, cleaning, trash, rubbish hauling, and other services, as Agent shall deem advisable with respect to the Property. To the extent available, all of these contracts shall contain a-day notice of cancellation provision for the benefit of Agent and/or Owner. Owner shall assume the obligations of any such contracts. Agent agrees to use his best efforts to secure such purchase and service contracts at the most favorable prices and terms available. Owner agrees to allow the Property to become a member of the Multihousing Association and to pay all reasonable costs for maintaining membership in this organization.

e. To establish and review, from time to time, with Owner, resident qualifications, the dollar amount of security deposits, security deposit withholdings, nonrefundable redecorating charges, the form of all leases, rental agreements, notices, and any other agreements to be executed by residents.

f. To establish and review, from time to time, with Owner, a rental schedule for all units located in the Property, and to use its best efforts to adhere to such schedules as may be in effect from time to time to ensure the maximum income to Owner from the Property.

Notwithstanding the authorization contained in this Paragraph 8, Agent shall not be obligated to provide any services other than those management services customarily provided in the normal operation of the Property.

9. Budgets. Annual operating budgets for the Property will be approved by the Owner. Agent will use its best efforts to see that annual disbursements for each type of operating expenses itemized in the approved budget will not exceed the amount authorized by the approved budget. The Agent will prepare a recommended operating budget for each fiscal year during the term of this Agreement and will submit the recommended operating budget to the Owner at least (.....) days before the beginning of each fiscal year. The Owner will promptly inform the Agent of any changes from the recommended operating budget prepared by Agent, and the Agent will keep the Owner informed of any actual or anticipated deviation from the receipts or disbursements stated in the approved budget.

10. Records and Reports. The Agent will have the following responsibilities with respect to records and reports:

a. The Agent will establish and maintain a comprehensive system of records, books, and accounts in a manner reasonably satisfactory to the Owner and the Consenting Parties. All records, books, and accounts will be subject to examination at all reasonable hours by any authorized representative of the Owner or either of the Consenting Parties.

b. With respect to each fiscal year ending during the term of this Agreement, the Agent will have an annual financial report prepared on a cash basis by a person reasonably acceptable to the Owner based upon the preparer's examination of the books, records, and accounts of the Owner and the Agent. The report will be certified by the preparer and the Agent and will be submitted to the Owner within (.....) days after the end of the fiscal year for the Owner's further certification and submission to the Secretary and the Mortgagee. Compensation for the preparer's services will be paid out of the Property bank accounts as an expense of the Property.

c. The Agent will prepare a monthly report comparing actual and budgeted figures for receipts and disbursements and will submit each such report to the Owner within (.....) days after the end of the relevant month.

d. The Agent will furnish such information (including occupancy reports) as may be reasonably requested by the Owner from time to time with respect to the financial, physical, or operational condition of the Property.

e. By the (.....) day of each month, the Agent will furnish the Owner with an itemized list of all delinquent rental accounts as of the last day of the previous month.

f. By the (.....) day of each month, the Agent will furnish the Owner with a statement of receipts and disbursements during the previous month, and reconciled bank statements for the Agency Accounts.

g. Except as otherwise provided in this Agreement, off-site bookkeeping, clerical, and other management overhead expenses will be borne by the Agent out of its own funds and will not be treated as Property expenses.

h. Upon request of the Lender, HUD, or Owner, Manager will make available to the Lender or HUD, at a reasonable time and place, its books and records of any "identity-of-interest" companies that supply goods and services to the Property. Records and information shall be sufficient to permit the Lender and HUD to determine the services performed, the date performed, the location, the time consumed in providing the service, the charges made for the services and related materials, and the per-unit and total charges levied for the service.

11. Insurance. Prior to the commencement of Agent's obligations pursuant to this Agreement, Owner shall obtain, with Agent's assistance, all of the following types of insurance with insurance companies and through brokers or agents that it may select:

a. General public liability insurance with minimum limits of $..... for any one person injured, $ for any one accident, and $ for property damage. The insurance policy will name both Owner and Agent as insured parties.

b. Fire and extended coverage hazard insurance in an amount equal to the replacement cost of the Property, net of land cost, or market value, whichever is greater. This insurance policy shall name Owner, Agent, and such other persons as Owner may direct as insured parties, as their respective interests may appear.

c. Any other necessary property, public liability, fidelity, or workmen's compensation insurance adequate to protect the interests of the parties. All of these insurance policies shall name Agent and/or Owner as insured parties, as their interest may appear.

d. The cost of any premiums or policies required and obtained under this paragraph 11 shall be the obligation of Owner.

All of these policies of insurance must be continuously maintained during the full term of this Agreement.

12. Fidelity Bond. The Agent will furnish, at its own expense, a fidelity bond in the principal sum of Dollars ($.....), which is at least equal to the gross potential income of the Property for two months. The fidelity bond is intended to protect the Owner and the Consenting Parties against misappropriation of Property funds by the Agent or its employees. The Owner shall provide a bond of a like kind to cover its on-site personnel (if any); however, the cost of a fidelity bond for on-site personnel shall be paid from Property income as a Property expense. In no event shall any employee be covered by more than one fidelity bond. The other terms and conditions of the bond and the surety will be subject to the reasonable approval of the Owner and the Consenting Parties.

13. Bids, Discounts, Rebates, Etc. The Agent will obtain contracts, materials, supplies, utilities, and services on the most advantageous terms to the Property (as determined after a reasonable investigation), and the Agent is authorized to solicit bids, either formal or informal, for items that can be obtained from more than one source. The Agent will secure and credit to the Owner all discounts, rebates, or commissions obtainable with respect to purchases, service contracts, and all other transactions entered into on the Owner's behalf.

14. Tenant-Management Relations. The Agent will encourage good-faith communications with its residents.

15. On-Site Management Facilities. Subject to the further agreement of the Owner and Agent as to more specific terms, the Agent will maintain a management office within the Property, and the resident manager will reside in one of the dwelling units on the Property.

16. Compliance with Governmental Orders. The Agent, at the Owner's expense but subject to the limitation stated in Paragraph 8(a), will take such actions as may be necessary to comply promptly with any and all governmental orders or other requirements affecting the Property, whether imposed by federal, state, county, or municipal authority. Nevertheless, the Agent shall take no such action so long as the Owner is contesting (or has affirmed its intention to contest) any such order or requirement. The Agent will notify the Owner in writing of all notices of such orders or other requirements, within seventy-two (72) hours from the time of their receipt by Agent.

17. Nondiscrimination. In the performance of its obligations under this Agreement, the Agent will comply with the provisions of any federal, state, or local law prohibiting discrimination in housing on the grounds of race, color, sex, creed, national origin, or disability, including Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (Public law 88-352, 78 Stat. 241), all requirements imposed by or pursuant to the Regulations of the Secretary (24 CFR, Subtitle A, Part 1) issued pursuant to that Title, the regulations issued pursuant to Executive Order 11063, and Title VIII of the 1968 Civil Rights Act.

18. Management Fee; Administrative Charges. Owner agrees to pay Agent as basic compensation for providing the property management services described in this Agreement a monthly fee in an amount equal to percent (.....%) of the gross receipts derived from the operation of the Property ("Management Fee"). For purposes of this paragraph, "gross receipts" shall include all income from apartment rental, furniture rental, laundry income, late charges, contract or deposit forfeitures, redecorating charges, security deposit withholdings, non-refundable security deposits, and any other service income, but shall exclude any applicable sales taxes collected and paid and refundable security deposits collected.

19. Reimbursement. Owner agrees to promptly reimburse Agent for any monies that Agent may advance on behalf of or for the benefit of the Property or Owner if such reimbursement may not reasonably be made from funds held in the Property bank accounts. Notwithstanding the foregoing, Agent shall not be obligated to make any advances to or for the benefit of the Property or Owner. Any amounts advanced by Agent shall bear interest at the rate of percent (.....%).

20. Indemnity. Owner agrees, on demand, to indemnify, defend, and hold harmless Agent for, from, and against any and all losses, damages, liabilities, claims, and costs assessed against, incurred by, or claimed against Agent arising out of any actions brought by third parties in connection with the management of the Property or this Agreement, unless the losses, damages, liabilities, claims, or costs are caused by the sole negligence of Agent.

21. Term. The initial term of this Agreement shall be for a period of (.....) years following the Commencement Date. Upon the expiration of the initial term, this Agreement will automatically renew for additional twelve month periods unless terminated under Paragraph 22 below.

22. Termination. This Agreement shall be in full force and effect throughout the initial term and any extended term, except as provided below:

a. If Owner shall sell or otherwise transfer title to the Property, Owner shall immediately pay to Agent any accrued and unpaid Management Fees and other advances owed to Agent pursuant to this Agreement. If the Owner sells or otherwise transfers title to the Property, this Agreement shall be binding upon the Owner's successor unless Agent elects to terminate the Agreement upon at least (.....) days written notice or unless the Owner's successor elects to terminate this Agreement by giving (.....) days prior written notice and paying the Termination Fee (as defined below).

b. Owner shall have the right to terminate this Agreement during the initial term or any extended term only "for cause" if any material default of this Agreement is not cured by Agent within (.....) days of receipt of written notice of the default. For the purposes of this Agreement, "for cause" shall mean any material default or material breach of this Agreement which constitutes gross negligence, willful malfeasance, or fraud.

c. Agent shall have the right to terminate this Agreement during the initial term or any extended term if the Owner fails to perform any of its duties and obligations under this Agreement within (.....) days after written notice by Agent to Owner.

d. In the event it is alleged or charged that the Property or any equipment on the Property or act or omission of Owner fails to comply with or is in violation of any statute, ordinance, law, or regulation of any governmental body and in the event Agent believes in its good faith discretion that potential damage or liability may result to Agent from Owner's acts or omissions, Agent may immediately cancel this Agreement by giving written notice to Owner.

e. In the event this Agreement is terminated pursuant to Paragraph 22(a) above, Owner shall immediately pay to Agent a fee equal to Dollars ($) per month (without proration) for each full or partial month remaining in the initial term or the extended term, as applicable. This fee shall be called a "Termination Fee." In the event this Agreement is wrongfully terminated, Owner, in addition to any other damages (compensatory or punitive) that may be recoverable, shall pay the Termination Fee.

f. Any cancellation by Agent pursuant to Paragraph 22(a), (c), or (d) shall not release Owner from any indemnities contained in this Agreement, shall not terminate any liability or obligation of Owner to Agent for the payment of any sums due (or that will become due) under this Agreement, and shall not be construed as evidence of or an admission of any fault or liability on the part of Agent.

23. Limitations on Hiring and Contracting. Owner covenants and agrees that Owner shall not hire or contract with any manager or employee of Agent, without Agent's written consent, for a period of six (6) months from the date of termination of this Agreement. Agent covenants and agrees that it will not enter into any contract or agreement for services or materials for the Property with any entity in which Agent possesses any interest whatsoever without first disclosing such interest to Owner and receiving Owner's express written consent to the contract or agreement, which consent may be granted or withheld in the Owner's sole discretion.

24. Assignment. Neither party may assign the benefits or obligations under this Agreement without the prior written consent of the other party; however, Agent may assign its duties and obligations under this Agreement to a property management company controlled by the principals of Agent.

25. Entire Agreement. This Agreement contains the entire agreement of the parties. The parties may not alter, amend, or modify this Agreement except by an instrument in writing executed by all of the parties.

26. Owner Acknowledgment and Disclosure. Owner acknowledges that Agent is in the business of leasing and managing similar properties in the State of and elsewhere and may be offering other properties for rent at the same time. Owner specifically agrees that this shall not be a conflict of interest or cause for termination. Whenever Agent deems it necessary or appropriate, Agent may disclose to any third party the identity of Owner as principal.

27. Governing Law. This Agreement shall be governed by and construed in accordance with the laws of the State of The Parties irrevocably consent to jurisdiction and venue in the state courts of the State of and the federal district court in the District of The Parties agree that they will not attempt to remove or transfer any action properly brought in the State of

28. Notices. All required or permitted notices under this Agreement shall be in writing and, to be effective, shall be delivered by hand delivery, facsimile telecopy, U.S. certified mail/return receipt requested, or overnight express delivery to the addresses and telecopy numbers set forth at the beginning of this Agreement. All notices delivered by hand delivery or facsimile telecopy shall be deemed received on the date of hand-delivery or facsimile transmission. All notices delivered by overnight express delivery shall be deemed received on the next business day after deposit of the notice with an overnight express delivery service. All notices delivered by U.S. certified mail/return receipt requested shall be deemed received on the third day after deposit of the notice in a regular receptacle for U.S. mail.

29. Bank Accounts. All bank accounts for the Property (including the Security Deposit Account) will be maintained at or such other financial institution located in acceptable to Owner and Agent. Agent shall not be responsible for any loss arising out of the insolvency of the approved financial institution.

30. Third Party Conduct. Agent shall not be liable or responsible to Owner or any third party (including tenants at the Property) for the negligent or criminal acts or omissions of any tenant or any other person on the Property with or without the permission of Agent.

31. Waiver. THIS AGREEMENT, ITS TERM, AND THE CANCELLATION RIGHTS SPECIFIED IN THE AGREEMENT ARE NEGOTIATED UNDERSTANDINGS AND AGREEMENTS OF EXPERIENCED AND SOPHISTICATED BUSINESSMEN, AND THIS AGREEMENT IS ENTERED INTO WITH THE KNOWLEDGE AND INTENTIONAL WAIVER OF ANY APPLICABLE STATUTE, RULE OF LAW, OR ADMINISTRATIVE REGULATION TO THE CONTRARY.

The parties have executed this Agreement as of the Commencement Date.

[2] Hazardous Materials Testing Procedures Agreement

HAZARDOUS MATERIALS TESTING PROCEDURES AGREEMENT

In order to determine the existence or presence of any Hazardous Material (as defined below) in or about the Property, Lessee will have the right, at Lessee's sole cost and expense, to conduct additional physical tests, studies, evaluations, audits, or surveys on the Property (collectively, "Lessee Environmental Surveys"), subject to the following terms and conditions:

A. Lessee will have the right to retain a qualified engineer or consultant selected by Lessee and approved by Landlord to conduct Lessee Environmental Surveys on the Property. The engineer or consultant selected by Lessee and approved by Landlord will be referred to as the "Consultant."

B. If Landlord approves the Consultant, Lessee and the Consultant will develop a written plan describing the type of testing to be done, the location of any and all drill holes or wells, and the nature of the borings to be performed. Lessee will deliver the written plan to Landlord for its approval.

C. Landlord will have the right (but not the obligation) to approve, review, and monitor any and all physical tests, studies, evaluations, audits, or studies in or about the Property which are made or implemented in connection with the findings of any Lessee Environmental Surveys, including, without limitation, the review and approval of the number, type, extent, and location of any test or monitoring wells or drillings.

D. Lessee and Lessee's Consultant must not make any contacts or communications to any governmental agency, department, district, or board in connection with the findings of any Lessee Environmental Surveys without the prior written approval of Landlord; however, Lessee and Lessee's Consultant will have the right to contact any governmental agency, department, district, or board for information without the prior approval of Landlord. Landlord's approval to disclosures may be given or withheld in Landlord's sole and absolute discretion.

E. All written reports, evaluations, and surveys produced by any Consultants in connection with any of the Lessee Environmental Surveys (whether preliminary, interim, or final in nature) must be submitted by the Consultant to Landlord concurrently with the submission of the items to Lessee.

F. Prior to the issuance of any final report by any Consultant which will set forth any "baseline" determination for the Property and/or any recommendations relating to the removal, monitoring, cleanup, or containment of any Hazardous Materials, Landlord will be given the opportunity to make comments, ask questions, and offer recommendations to the Consultant preparing the Lessee Environmental Surveys.

G. Lessee and Lessee's Consultant must maintain in strict and complete confidence any and all information, reports, evaluations, and surveys generated in connection with any of the Lessee Environmental Surveys, and Lessee and Lessee's Consultant agree not to make any disclosure of any such information, reports, evaluations, and surveys to any other person or entity without the prior written consent of Landlord (whose consent may be withheld in Landlord's sole and absolute discretion). All Consultants are required to enter into confidentiality agreements with Landlord, in the form prescribed by Landlord, prior to being provided any material information about this Agreement or the Property or performing any work on the Property. Notwithstanding the foregoing, Lessee will have the right to disclose information, reports, evaluations, and surveys generated in connection with any of the Lessee Environmental Surveys to any lender from whom Lessee seeks financing in connection with the Property, so long as Lessee obtains the agreement of the lender to keep confidential the information furnished. Lessee further will be allowed to make disclosures mandated by law. In the event Lessee purchases the Property, then, after close of escrow for the Property, Lessee will no longer have the obligation to keep such information confidential.

H. Unless otherwise specified, any approvals required of Landlord under these Hazardous Materials Testing Procedures will not be unreasonably withheld by Landlord and will be provided on a reasonably timely basis.

I. The provisions of these Hazardous Materials Testing Procedures will apply to all additional or follow-up work performed by the environmental consultant who performs the Environmental Report.

J. As used in this Hazardous Materials Testing Agreement, the term "Hazardous Material" will mean any hazardous or toxic wastes, materials, or substances which, as of the time of testing, is defined as a "hazardous substance" under the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation and Liability Act of 1980 (CERCLA), 42 U.S.C. § 9601 et seq., as amended by the Superfund Amendments and Reauthorization Act (SARA).

Foregoing Terms and conditions are agreed to and approved

CHAPTER 16 The Broker's Role in Property Management *

10A-16 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 16.08

§ 16.08 Code of Professional Ethics of the Certified Property Manager¹

Introduction

To establish and maintain confidence in the honesty, integrity, professionalism, and ability of the professional property manager is fundamental to the future of the Institute of Real Estate Management and its members. This Code and performance pursuant to its provisions will be beneficial to the general public and contribute to the continued development of a mutually beneficial relationship among CERTIFIED PROPERTY MANAGER (CPM) members, candidates for membership, REALTORS, clients, employers, and the public.

The Institute of Real Estate management, as the professional society of property managers, seeks to work closely with all other segments of the real estate industry to protect and enhance the interest of the public. To this end, members of the Institute have adopted and, as a condition of membership, subscribe to this Code of Professional Ethics. By doing so, they give notice that they clearly recognize the vital need to encourage fair and equitable practices and competition among all who are engaged in the profession of property management.

Those who are members of the Institute are dedicated individuals who are sincerely concerned with the protection and interests of those who come into contact with the industry. To this end, members of the Institute have subscribed to this professional pledge:

I pledge myself to the advancement of professional property management through the mutual efforts of members of the Institute of Real Estate Management and by any other proper means available to me.

I pledge to seek and maintain an equitable, honorable, and cooperative association with fellow members of the Institute and with all others who may become part of my business and professional life.

I pledge myself to place honesty, integrity, and industriousness above all else; to pursue my gainful efforts with diligent study and education to the end that service to my clients shall always be maintained at the highest possible level.

I pledge myself to comply with the principles and declarations of the Institute of Real Estate Management as set forth in its bylaws, Regulations, and this Code of Professional Ethics.

Article 1Fiduciary Obligation to Clients

A Certified Property Manager shall at all times exercise loyalty to the interests of the client and shall not engage in any activity which could be reasonably construed as contrary to the best interests of the client. A Certified Property Manager shall not represent any personal or business interests divergent or conflicting with those of the client, unless the client is first notified in writing of the activity or potential conflict of interest, and consents in writing to such representation. A Certified Property Manager, as a fiduciary for the client, shall not accept, directly or indirectly, any rebate, fee, commission discount, or other benefit, monetary or otherwise, which has not been fully disclosed to and approved by the client.

Article 2Disclosure

A Certified Property Manager shall not disclose to a third party any confidential or proprietary information which would be injurious or damaging to a client concerning the client's business or personal affairs without the client's prior written consent, unless such disclosure is required or compelled by law or regulation.

Article 3Accounting and Reporting

A Certified Property Manager shall at all times keep and maintain accurate financial and business records concerning each property managed for the client, which records shall be available for inspection at all reasonable times by the client. A Certified Property Manager shall furnish to the client, at mutually agreed upon intervals, regular reports concerning the client's properties.

Article 4Protection of Funds

A Certified Property Manager shall not commingle personal funds with the funds of a client but shall keep a client's funds in a special account in an insured financial institution or as otherwise directed in writing by the client. A Certified Property Manager shall at all times exert due diligence for the maintenance and protection of the client's funds against all reasonably foreseeable contingencies and losses.

Article 5Relations With Other Members of the Profession

A Certified Property Manager shall not make, authorize or otherwise encourage any unfounded derogatory or disparaging comments concerning the practices of another Certified Property Manager. A Certified Property Manager shall not exaggerate or misrepresent the services offered as compared with the services offered by other property managers. Nothing in this Code, however, shall restrict legal and reasonable business competition by and among property managers.

Article 6Contract

Any written contract between a Certified Property Manager and a client shall be in clear and understandable terms, and shall set forth the specific terms agreed upon between the parties, including a general description of the services to be provided by and the responsibilities of the Certified Property Manager.

Article 7Duty to Firm or Employer

A Certified Property Manager shall at all times exercise loyalty to the interests of the employer or firm with whom a Certified Property Manager is affiliated and shall be diligent in the maintenance and protection of the interests and property of the employer or firm. A Certified Property Manager shall not engage in any activity which could be reasonably construed as contrary to this obligation of loyalty and diligence and shall not accept, directly or indirectly, any rebate, fee, commission, discount, or other benefit, monetary or otherwise, which could reasonably be seen as a conflict with the interests of the employer or firm. A Certified Property Manager shall at all times exercise due diligence for the protection of the funds of the employer or firm against all reasonably foreseeable contingencies and losses.

Article 8Managing the Property of the Client

A Certified Property Manager shall not exaggerate, misrepresent or conceal material facts concerning the client's property or any related transaction. A Certified Property Manager shall exercise due diligence in the maintenance and management of the client's property and shall make all reasonable efforts to protect it against all reasonable contingencies and losses.

Article 9Duty to Former Clients and to Former Firms or Employers

All obligations and duties of a Certified Property Manager to clients, firms, and employers as specified in this Code shall also apply to relationships with former clients and former firms and employers. A Certified Property Manager shall act in a professional manner when, for whatever reason, relationships are terminated between a Certified Property Manager and clients and firm or employer. Nothing in this section, however, shall be construed to cause a Certified Property Manager to breach obligations and duties to current clients and firm or employer.

Article 10Compliance With Laws and Regulations

A Certified Property Manager shall at all times conduct business and personal activities with the knowledge of and in compliance with applicable federal, state, and local laws and regulations, and shall maintain the highest moral and ethical standards consistent with the membership in and the purposes of the Institute of Real Estate Management.

Article 11Equal Opportunity

A Certified Property Manager shall not deny equal employment opportunity or equal professional services to any person for reasons of race, color, religion, sex, familial status, national origin, age, or handicap.

Article 12Duty to Tenants and Others

A Certified Property Manager shall competently manage the property of the client with due regard for the rights, responsibilities, and benefits of the tenant and others lawfully on the property. A Certified Property Manager shall not engage in any conduct which is in conscious disregard for the safety and health of those persons lawfully on the premises of the client's property.

Article 13
Enforcement

Any violation by a Certified Property Manager of the obligations of this Code shall be determined in accordance with and pursuant to the bylaws and rules and regulations of the Institute of Real Estate Management. Disciplinary action for any violation of any portion of this Code shall be carried out by the Institute of Real Estate Management in accordance with the bylaws and rules established by the Governing Council of the Institute. The result of such disciplinary action shall be final and binding upon the affected Certified Property Manager, and without recourse to the Institute, its officers, councilors, members, employees, or agents.

PART V Other Issues Affecting Brokers

CHAPTER 17 Alternative Dispute Resolution Involving Real Estate Brokers *

10A-17 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice Scope

Scope

SCOPE

Chapter 17 examines laws, practices, and procedures as they relate to the involvement of real estate brokers in alternative dispute resolution (ADR). The two primary methods of alternative dispute resolution, arbitration and mediation, are discussed and distinguished (§ 17.01). Against that background, the agreement of many brokers to be subject to binding arbitration, through their membership in the National Association of Realtors(R) (NAR) and their association with local real estate boards, is examined, as is the NAR mediation-based Homesellers/Homebuyers Dispute Resolution System (DRS) (§ 17.01[2]).

This chapter focuses on ADR as it relates to real estate brokers and closely examines issues that repeatedly have been raised in reported cases and disputes involving brokers as parties. Arbitration is covered extensively because arbitration is a fundamental element of the NAR Code of Ethics affecting all member brokers. An overview of statutes and other provisions governing arbitration is presented (§ 17.02).

Often overlooked, many of the shortcomings and risks that brokers have been exposed to in arbitration are identified and discussed (§ 17.04). Requirements for arbitration agreements are addressed and seeming inconsistencies in those requirements are detailed (§ 17.05[1]). The professional requirement that brokers subject themselves to arbitration and the manner in which that often negates the "voluntary" nature of the decision to submit to arbitration is closely examined, as are some of the effects of arbitration compelled through the NAR (§ 17.05[2]).

Principles of arbitral finality and the limitations placed upon judicial review of arbitral awards are discussed (§ 17.07). The chapter concludes with a list of matters that brokers should consider when entering into an agreement to arbitrate (§ 17.08).

PART V Other Issues Affecting Brokers

CHAPTER 17 Alternative Dispute Resolution Involving Real Estate Brokers *

10A-17 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 17.01

§ 17.01 Arbitration and Mediation Are the Two Primary Methods of ADR

The two most popular methods of alternative dispute resolution are mediation and arbitration. Real estate brokers, who frequently encounter arbitration through their local real estate boards, are typically less familiar with mediation.

"Arbitration is the submission of a dispute to one or more impartial persons for a final and binding decision. Through contractual provisions, the parties may control the range of issues to be resolved, the scope of relief to be awarded, and many procedural aspects of the process." n1 Similar to litigation, arbitration is an adversarial process with prevailing parties determined based upon the judgment of one or more arbitrators after all parties to the dispute have been given opportunity to be heard.

Mediation is a form of alternative dispute resolution that has gained in popularity because of its reported success in resolving disputes. Parties to mediation work out a solution to their dispute with the help of a mediator--a neutral third person. The mediator's role is not to decide the issue, like a judge or an arbitrator, but to help each party evaluate goals and options to help in finding a solution that works for everyone.

Both mediation and arbitration are espoused as effective, less costly and less time-consuming alternatives to litigation. Similar types of clauses are used in contracts to invoke arbitration and to invoke mediation. A court will, therefore, apply arbitration case law in deciding issues involving mediation. n2

[1] Arbitration and Mediation Differ in Many Ways

Despite their surface similarities, mediation is different from arbitration in many ways, including:

- An arbitrator usually has the authority to enter a binding decision. A mediator usually does not.
- Parties to arbitration usually forfeit their rights to have their dispute litigated. Parties to mediation usually retain the right to pursue arbitration or litigation should their attempt at mediation fail. n3

Confusion abounds, however, due to the failure of real estate professionals, their legal advisors and even the courts to recognize the difference between "arbitration" and "mediation." For example, an Oklahoma appellate court was called upon to resolve issues relating to the following "mediation" clause that appeared in an agreement between a salesperson (contractor) and a broker (RE/MAX):

MEDIATION.

Contractor agrees that if any dispute regarding commissions or any other matter should arise between contractor and any other RE/MAX Associate, Broker or Sales Office, such dispute will be referred to mediation for determination in the following manner:

A. Contractor will report such dispute in writing to the manager of RE/MAX and will give the manager his or her full cooperation in the manager's efforts to settle the dispute in as simple and amicable a manner as possible.

B. If, after all reasonable efforts, the manager is unable to effect a settlement acceptable to all parties to the dispute, the dispute will be referred to a mediation committee. Such committee will consist of three members of the RE/MAX Organization who shall be selected by RE/MAX Manager/Broker from a representative pool of RE/MAX Sales Agents. Each party to the dispute shall appear personally and state his or her case in as clear and concise a manner as possible. The decision of the mediation committee shall be final and binding upon all parties concerned. n4

The broker terminated the salesperson's/contractor's contract and she sued for damages arising out of several causes of action, including breach of contract. RE/MAX moved the court to compel arbitration. The trial court refused to compel arbitration and held that the selection process for the mediation committee was inequitable as it would subject the plaintiff to a decision by a person selected by the defendant and over whom the defendant exerted control. The trial court rested its decision on the unfairness of the arbitration panel, and the appellate court agreed: "Arbitration is the referral of a dispute by the voluntary agreement of the parties to one or more impartial arbitrators for a final and binding decision as a determination of their dispute." n5 At no point in the reported opinion is the transformation of the "mediation" clause into an "arbitration" clause acknowledged or explained. One assumes that the "final and binding" nature of the decision of the "mediation committee" was sufficient, in the eyes of the court, to justify its interpretation in contradiction of the actual terminology used in the agreement.

[2] ADR Programs in the Real Estate Industry

Parties may specifically agree to participate in alternative dispute resolution. Parties may be compelled to participate in ADR as a result of statutes, rules of civil procedure, or their decisions to become members of professional associations that require agreements to engage in ADR as a condition of membership in the associations.

[a] NAR Requires Arbitration of Contractual Disputes Between Members

The use of alternative dispute resolution (ADR) by members of the real estate industry, as a tool to resolve conflicts, has steadily increased. The National Association of Realtors(R) (NAR) is the largest trade and professional association in the real estate industry. Article 17 of the NAR Code of Ethics requires that members affiliated with different companies arbitrate their contractual disputes instead of taking them to court. n6 When all the parties in a case are members of the NAR, courts faced with an arbitrable dispute will typically dismiss the case. n6.1 Courts often reason that the constitution and by-laws of a voluntary association, when subscribed or assented to by the members, becomes a contract between each member and the association and that when Realtors(R) voluntarily submit to their organizations' authority, they are bound by its rules. n6.2

Real estate brokers usually become involved in arbitration through their local real estate board or, if different members of different boards are involved, through interboard panels under the auspices of their state association. The only disputes subject to arbitration under the regulations of the NAR are those that arise from real estate transactions and concern disputes over money. Though local boards typically do not become involved in disputes between members of the same company, they may do so pursuant to voluntary agreement of the parties. n6.3 Additionally, it is generally accepted that local boards may arbitrate disputes between members and nonmembers if both sides agree in writing to allow the local board to settle the dispute. n7

[b] NAR Dispute Resolution System Based on Mediation

In response to disgruntled home purchasers contacting local real estate associations and boards, the National Association of Realtors(R) developed a mediation program as part of its Homesellers/Homebuyers Dispute Resolution System (DRS) for buyers, sellers, and real estate professionals. DRS, a program offering mediation as a means of resolving disputes arising during the real estate buying and selling process, has been in effect since 1989. Reasons enunciated by the NAR for its decision to utilize mediation instead of arbitration for its Homesellers/Homebuyers Dispute Resolution System include the following:

- Arbitration is adversarial. Mediation is not.
- All parties must accept mediation settlements.
- Real estate practitioners depend heavily on repeat and referral business and it was believed that mediation would more probably allow continued goodwill among the parties.
- Arbitrators render binding decisions and parties would be forced to give up their rights to pursue litigation. It was feared that many buyers and sellers would be reluctant to forfeit their rights to judicial relief.
- Parties displeased with the results of arbitration could claim that their forfeit of recourse to the courts had not been properly disclosed to them. n8

The NAR claims additional benefits attributable to mediation, which include that:

- Mediation is less expensive than litigation and it is faster than litigation.
- Mediation allows parties to identify frivolous claims and valid disputes without requiring a costly court action.
- Parties to mediation actively participate in the mediation process and control the outcome of the mediation.
- Parties, having themselves reached the terms and conditions of a settlement agreement, are more willing to honor and comply with the agreement.
- Parties to mediation have great flexibility regarding the manner in which their dispute can be resolved.
- Mediation is a private process and is usually only open to the mediator, the parties and their legal counsel.
- A condition to mediation may be a confidentiality agreement regarding the proceedings.
- Brokers can offer mediation to their clients.

- The personal, private and informal nature of mediation may allow disputing parties to preserve their business relationship. n9

A party who attempts to escape mediation by filing a court action for a matter covered by the mediation provision may find that this action prevents a return to mediation once that party has pursued litigation. In Santana v. Olguin, n10 the sales contract contained a mediation provision which used the Homesellers/Homebuyers Dispute Resolution System. The parties, by signing the contract, acknowledged receipt of a brochure on this system. The provision called for mediation of most disputes or claims arising out of the sales contract, including disputes against a real estate broker. The trial court had dismissed the buyer's claims against the seller and her Realtor(R), because the buyer failed to submit her claims to mediation prior to filing suit. On appeal, the buyer argued that the trial court had erred in applying this provision. The court disagreed. This court stated that although the provision did not require that submission to mediation precede litigation, this sequence was implied when considering the totality of the provision. The court found that mediation is intended to provide an alternative to litigation and thus creates a condition precedent to litigation requiring that the parties first mediate their disputes. n11

Despite the many benefits of mediation, it is the process of arbitration that is utilized to resolve the majority of disputes involving brokers.

PART V Other Issues Affecting Brokers

CHAPTER 17 Alternative Dispute Resolution Involving Real Estate Brokers *

10A-17 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 17.02

§ 17.02 Statutes and Other Provisions Governing Arbitration

Federal laws, state laws, civil rules of procedure and court rules regarding local practice and procedures may govern arbitration agreements. Additionally, rules, procedures and practices established by professional organizations, such as the National Association of Realtors(R), may require and govern arbitration involving their members. Further, private entities that provide arbitration services, such as the American Arbitration Association, also have myriad assortments of rules, regulations and procedures.

It is important that brokers realize that there are different sources that may govern their agreement to arbitrate in ways that may substantially affect the brokers' rights and responsibilities under arbitration agreements. In the event of significant disputes, it is important that brokers realize that there may be available to them several sources of rights, remedies, and defenses. The following summarizes the major sources providing legal regulation of arbitration agreements.

[1] The Federal Arbitration Act

The Federal Arbitration Act n1 (also referred to by its acronym, "FAA," and as the United States Arbitration Act) appears at Title 9 of the United States Code, Sections 1-16. The FAA governs written arbitration agreements or clauses contained in contracts regarding maritime transactions or commerce. "Commerce" is broadly defined to include "commerce among the several States or with foreign nations, or in any Territory of the United States or in the District of Columbia, or between any such Territory and another, or between any such Territory and any State or foreign nation, or between the District of Columbia and any State or Territory or foreign nation." n2 One example of probable application to a broker would arise if the broker were dealing in transactions involving parties and properties located in different states.

The United States District Courts are empowered to compel arbitration required by agreements governed by the FAA, which action would be brought pursuant to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and applicable local district court rules. The defendant contesting arbitration is entitled to have the issue heard by a jury. n3 In the absence of specific provisions within the arbitration clause or agreement, the district courts have broad powers, including the power to appoint arbitrators, n4 and to compel the attendance of witnesses and production of documents and things. n5

[a] FAA Preempts State Law if There Is Impact on Interstate Commerce

There are times when state law and federal law are in conflict regarding the enforceability of an agreement to arbitrate, and the courts must determine which law applies. For example, Alabama state laws regarding consumer protection prohibit specific enforcement of an agreement to submit a controversy to arbitration. n6 The Supreme Court of Alabama considered that statutory prohibition against enforcement of arbitration agreements in response to a brokerage firm's motion to compel arbitration with a disgruntled homebuyer. The plaintiff had filed suit against the real estate brokers arising out of the plaintiff's purchase of a home. The contract between the parties contained a binding arbitration clause that stated as follows:

IF THERE IS ANY DISPUTE between or among Seller, Buyer, or any brokers concerning this purchase agreement or the subject property, such dispute shall be satisfied by binding arbitration under the American Arbitration Commercial Rules then in effect. All parties waive their rights to commence any action in any court of law, and all parties shall be bound by the decision of the arbitrators. n7

The plaintiff, upon discovering that the home he had purchased was a restructured mobile home with several structural defects, instituted civil suit against the real estate brokerage firm and listing agent for causes of action including fraud, conspiracy and negligence. The brokerage firm's motion to compel arbitration under the Federal Arbitration Act n8 was granted by the trial court. n9 The appellate court reversed, determined that the plaintiff was not bound by the arbitration clause and issued a writ of mandamus requiring the trial court to vacate its order requiring arbitration.

In refusing to compel arbitration, the court determined that the underlying transaction did in not substantially involve or affect interstate commerce in a way that would require application of the FAA. Finding that Alabama law applied to prohibit specific enforcement of the agreement to submit the controversy to arbitration, the Alabama Supreme Court reasoned as follows:

The crucial issue is whether the contract or transaction satisfies the interstate-commerce criterion for the applicability of the Federal Arbitration Act, 9 U.S.C. § 2 , which in pertinent part reads as follows:

"A written provision in ... a contract evidencing a transaction involving commerce to settle by arbitration a controversy thereafter arising out of such contract ... shall be valid, irrevocable, and enforceable, save upon such grounds as exist at law or in equity for the revocation of any contract." ...

The Federal Arbitration Act preempts contrary state law (specifically contrary law based on Ala. Code 1975, § 8-1-41(3) and public policy) and renders enforceable a written predispute arbitration agreement but only if that agreement appears in a contract evidencing a transaction that "involves" interstate commerce. ...

The party seeking to compel arbitration has the burden of proving the effect on, or involvement in, interstate commerce necessary to invoke the FAA. n10

The facts that a percentage of the broker's commission would be paid to another broker from out of state and that monies paid by the plaintiff/homebuyer were drawn from an account at an out-of-state bank were not sufficient to meet the broker's burden and invoke application of the Federal Arbitration Act. n11 However, the Supreme Court of Alabama found that a real estate brokerage transaction affected interstate commerce where the buyers were residents of Texas who relocated to Alabama and purchased the subject property, the buyers financed the purchase with a loan obtained from the mortgagee's Florida office, and the buyers' home warranty was furnished by a business that operates throughout the United States. n11.1

[b] Choice of Law Provision May Avoid Preemption by the FAA

If an agreement affects interstate commerce then the broad enforcement policies of the Federal Arbitration Act may apply because the FAA generally preempts state law on the enforceability of arbitration clauses. If an agreement expressly provides that it is to be governed by state law, however, the enforceability of the arbitration clause will usually be governed by the state law and not by the federal law. An agreement to arbitrate is a matter of contract and an explicit choice of law provision should control. n12

[2] The Uniform Arbitration Act

The Uniform Arbitration Act (UAA) was enacted in 1955 and is considered one of the most successful uniform acts. All fifty states, the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico have some form of general arbitration statute. Of those, 35 states adopted the UAA without change and 14 others adopted substantially similar legislation.

The UAA was instrumental in establishing that arbitration agreements can be valid, binding and enforceable. Contrary to much case law then existing, it gave courts the power to enforce arbitration agreements and the power to enforce arbitration awards.

[3] The Revised Uniform Arbitration Act

The Uniform Arbitration Act was revised during a process involving more than five years of study and drafting. The Revised Uniform Arbitration Act (referred to by some as the RUAA and by others, including the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws, as the 2000 Uniform Arbitration Act or the 2000 UAA) was unanimously passed by the NCCUSL on August 3, 2000. The changes to the UAA of 1955 are pervasive:

The RUAA includes provisions on such matters as utilizing new means of electronic communications in arbitration; whether courts or arbitrators decide arbitrability; provisional remedies; arbitrator disclosure of interests and relationships; immunity of arbitrators and arbitration organizations; the arbitrator's power to order prehearing conferences and decide dispositive motions; discovery; court enforcement of pre-award rulings by arbitrators; punitive damages, attorney's fees, and other remedies; court awards of attorney's fees to arbitrators, arbitration and other prevailing parties in litigation involving arbitration matters; which section of the RUAA are waivable; and a phased-in effective date for when the RUAA will apply to all arbitration agreements. n13

The state case decisions discussed in this chapter, to the extent that they rely upon the Uniform Act, regard the UAA of 1955. One cannot predict with certainty the extent of the impact that the 2000 UAA will have upon brokers involved in arbitration. One may be certain, however, that the 2000 UAA heralds a period of rapid change. State legislatures may adopt the 2000 UAA in its entirety, may make less encompassing amendments to their existing laws, or may continue with their existing laws. Close attention must be paid to changes in state laws and the manner in which those changes will affect arbitration clauses and agreements.

[4] State Laws Regarding Arbitration

All states have laws regarding arbitration. State laws may be titled with reference to arbitration or to alternative dispute resolution. Remaining alert to changes that may result from the revisions to the Uniform Arbitration Act, changes to state laws and the impact of those changes on existing case law should be monitored. In addition to those laws, the cautious broker who is considering use of an arbitration clause or who is involved in an arbitration proceeding should also check state laws regarding consumer protection and relevant real estate transactions.

PART V Other Issues Affecting Brokers

CHAPTER 17 Alternative Dispute Resolution Involving Real Estate Brokers *

10A-17 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 17.03

§ 17.03 Attorneys' Fees and Costs in Arbitration and Mediation

A great motivation in a party's decision to use arbitration or mediation instead of litigation to resolve disputes is the belief that to do so will reduce one's expenses--most notably the amount of attorneys' fees incurred, and that to do so will reduce that amount of time one must devote to resolution of the dispute. Anticipated reductions in fees, expenses and time expended support policy considerations in favor of alternative dispute resolution.

A realistic fact incident to litigation is that the attorneys' fees may often come to exceed the amount of the original claim. For example, as noted by the Supreme Court of Arizona regarding the "third appellate decision in a lawsuit involving a disputed real estate commission in the amount of $6,382.50:" n1

Unfortunately, this case has dragged on because attorneys' fees have overcome the original claim. ... "We recognize that the attorneys' fees in this case have not simply become a case of the tail wagging the dog; the attorneys' fees have become the dog. The attorneys' fees incurred by all parties have exceeded the amounts in issue by such a vast amount that the substantive issues have diminished in intrinsic importance and serve only to direct or deflect the mounting liabilities for attorneys' fees. It would appear to this court that this case would have been ideally suited for binding arbitration." This too is a case that seems suited to arbitration; such an alternative dispute resolution would have saved time, money, and the unwarranted drain on the court system caused by such a lengthy legal battle over a proportionately small amount of money. n2

[1] The Right to Recover Fees in Arbitration and Mediation

Entitlement to attorneys' fees arising out of arbitration is generally governed in the same manner as litigation. Although some courts have permitted an award of fees to the prevailing party in an arbitration proceeding, the American Rule is generally applied so as to allow such recovery only if the award is authorized by the agreement of the parties or a frivolous lawsuit or claim was filed. A frivolous action is one that has no reasonable basis in law or equity and cannot be supported by a good faith argument for the extension, modification or reversal of existing law. It was found, therefore, that a broker was not entitled to an award of attorneys' fees in a dispute arising out of an arbitrator's decision to award 25% of a real estate commission instead of the 50% that had been orally agreed to by the opposing parties, both real estate brokers. n3

Further, attorneys' fees may be specifically excluded by virtue of the specific statute under which arbitration is conducted. For example, the Illinois version of the Uniform Arbitration Act expressly excludes awards of attorneys' fees from the statutory scope of arbitration--though fees could be considered and resolved in arbitration pursuant to a specific contractual agreement to do so. n4

Regarding mediation and as an additional incentive to encourage parties to resolve matters through court-annexed alternate dispute resolution programs, it has been held that a prevailing party may recover fees for time spent in an unsuccessful mediation process. The reasoning of the court was that parties might be reluctant to participate in mediation if they are precluded from recovering their costs. n5

[2] Clauses Allowing Awards of Attorneys' Fees are Strictly Construed

Attorneys' fees are a major factor to be considered in pursuing or defending against any claim--including one subject to arbitration. Receiving a favorable decision from an arbitrator without receiving an award of one's attorney's fees (to which one believed herself or himself entitled) can be considered tantamount to winning the proverbial battle while losing the war.

For example, a purchaser of real property brought a complaint against the sellers and the sellers' broker seeking damages and attorneys' fees. The purchaser alleged five causes of action including negligence, misrepresentation and infliction of emotional distress. Breach of contract was not alleged. The real estate purchase contract that governed the sale included a clause allowing an award of attorneys' fees, as follows: "Should arbitration or suit be brought to enforce the terms of this contract or any obligation herein, including any action by Brokers to recover commissions, the prevailing party shall be entitled to reasonable attorney's fees." n6

Before trial all parties agreed to binding arbitration. The arbitrator found for the defendants, allowed the defendants to recover their costs, but did not award attorneys' fees. Defendants appealed the decision to court and the matter was remanded to the arbitrator to determine whether attorneys' fees were to be awarded and, if so, in what amount. On remand the arbitrator specifically found that the defendants, as prevailing parties, were entitled to their costs but were not entitled to an award of attorneys' fees as the claims regarded torts and did not arise out of a contractual proceeding to enforce the terms of the contract. n7

The real estate brokers may have been awarded their attorneys fees, had the underlying contract included a broader clause that provided "for recovery of attorneys' fees in actions 'arising out of' the agreement or to which the agreement 'gives rise' " instead of the subject provision that specifically limited "fee recovery to proceedings 'brought to enforce the terms of this contract or any obligation herein.'" n8 Additionally, the parties while voluntarily stipulating to be bound by arbitration prior to trial could have included a clause within the stipulation for arbitration that expressly authorized or required an award of attorneys' fees to the prevailing party. n9

PART V Other Issues Affecting Brokers

CHAPTER 17 Alternative Dispute Resolution Involving Real Estate Brokers *

10A-17 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 17.04

§ 17.04 Arbitration Has Shortcomings and Risks

Though widely used and touted as the most effective alternative to litigation, an agreement to arbitrate instead of to litigate may be fraught with significant shortcomings and risks. Like the proverbial wolf in sheep's clothing, arbitration can prove to be risky business for the unsophisticated and the uninformed. Mandatory arbitration clauses have been found to be oppressive, unfair, unconscionable or substantially in derogation of consumer rights. As a result, many state consumer protection measures, including those relating to predatory or abusive home loan lending practices, include prohibitions against the use of mandatory arbitration clauses--though some courts have refused to enforce those provisions as being contrary to the overriding federal policy of the Federal Arbitration Act to encourage the use of arbitration. n1

The Code of Ethics of the National Association of Realtors(R) requires that arbitration be used to settle disputes between member Realtors(R) from different companies whose disputes arise from their relationship as real estate professionals. It is recognized, however, that arbitration has many shortcomings that may directly affect brokers.

Although arbitration is less stressful and expensive than litigation, it can still be time-consuming, stressful, and expensive. You can become engrossed in preparing for the process, which takes valuable time away from listing and selling homes. It's not uncommon for agents to hire attorneys, but often the attorneys may not be familiar with arbitration proceedings or real estate law. The hearings themselves are stressful for the claimant as well as the respondent. The buyer is often asked to appear as a witness in the proceedings and seldom has positive feelings for either party once the arbitration process is over. ... Finally, arbitration may cause hard feelings with the real estate community. n2

As discussed more fully below, specific risks encountered in mandatory and binding arbitration include the following:

- The parties typically relinquish all judicial rights, including their rights to engage in discovery, their rights to a court or jury trial, and their rights of appeal;
- The decision of an arbitrator will almost always be deemed final, even if premised upon errors of fact or errors of law (a concept referred to as "arbitral finality");

- Factual findings made by arbitrators are almost always binding upon the parties to the arbitration, even if erroneous and even if raised in regard to issues or causes of action different from those that were arbitrated (a concept referred to as "collateral estoppel"); and
- Arbitration can become very costly and time-consuming (as costly and time-consuming as litigation).

And so it can be, in the worse case scenario, that a broker may, after expending considerable time and financial resources, be bound in the arbitrated matter and in any future matters arising out of the same operative facts by an erroneous determination made by an arbitrator, without the benefit of any meaningful opportunity of appeal.

[1] Risks Associated with Arbitral Finality and Relinquished Judicial Rights

An arbitrator's decision rendered pursuant to a binding arbitration agreement is almost always deemed final and not subject to reversal or modification by a reviewing court even if the decision was premised upon an error of fact or an error in interpreting the applicable law. This element of arbitral finality is considered a benefit by many in that it purports to avoid the time and expense associated with judicial appeals. Yet, as noted by a California appellate court, arbitral finality can expose one to significant risk:

A party's decision to enter into a contract with an arbitration provision is not without significant risk. Parties entering into arbitration agreements do so with the knowledge that reviewing courts will not overturn an arbitrator's award, even if the arbitrator erred in interpreting the law. Neither will a reviewing court overturn an arbitrator's decision to refuse to award attorney fees to the party claiming to have prevailed, even in disputes subject to an attorney fees provision. n3

The risks inherent in relinquishing one's judicial rights by agreeing to mandatory and binding arbitration have received legislative acknowledgement. As a result, many statutes have been enacted in an attempt to ensure that members of the general public are informed of those rights that they are relinquishing and to ensure that that their agreement is truly voluntary.

Specifically regarding real estate contracts, for example, California provides that any contract conveying real property, or otherwise related to real estate sales transactions between principals and agents, that contains a provision for binding arbitration of any dispute between the principals to the transaction must include a provision clearly titled "ARBITRATION OF DISPUTES." Additionally, to ensure that it is not overlooked in a lengthy, detailed document, the provision for binding arbitration must be set out in bold type, or in contrasting red and, if included in a typed contract, must be set out in capital letters. n4 Each party is required to indicate assent to the arbitration provision on a line appearing immediately before or after the arbitration provision. The arbitration provision must read as follows:

NOTICE: BY INITIALLING IN THE SPACE BELOW YOU ARE AGREEING TO HAVE ANY DISPUTE ARISING OUT OF THE MATTERS INCLUDED IN THE "ARBITRATION OF DISPUTES" PROVISION DECIDED BY NEUTRAL ARBITRATION AS PROVIDED BY CALIFORNIA LAW AND YOU ARE GIVING UP ANY RIGHTS YOU MIGHT POSSESS TO HAVE THE DISPUTE LITIGATED IN A COURT OR JURY TRIAL. BY INITIALLING IN THE SPACE BELOW YOU ARE GIVING UP YOUR JUDICIAL RIGHTS TO DISCOVERY AND APPEAL, UNLESS THOSE RIGHTS ARE SPECIFICALLY INCLUDED IN THE "ARBITRATION OF DISPUTES" PROVISION. IF YOU REFUSE TO SUBMIT TO ARBITRATION AFTER AGREEING TO THIS PROVISION, YOU MAY BE COMPELLED TO ARBITRATE UNDER THE AUTHORITY OF THE CALIFORNIA CODE OF CIVIL PROCEDURE. YOUR AGREEMENT TO THIS ARBITRATION PROVISION IS VOLUNTARY.

WE HAVE READ AND UNDERSTAND THE FOREGOING AND AGREE TO SUBMIT

DISPUTES ARISING OUT OF THE MATTERS INCLUDED IN THE "ARBITRATION OF DISPUTES" PROVISION TO NEUTRAL ARBITRATION. n5

Arbitral finality and the other limitations upon judicial review of arbitration proceedings are discussed more fully at § 17.07.

[2] Risks Associated with Arbitral Finality and Collateral Estoppel

In accordance with the concept of arbitral finality, an arbitrator is almost always deemed the final judge of both law and fact and the arbitrator's conclusions of law and findings of fact are binding, even if they are erroneous. n6 The factual findings made by an arbitrator are not only binding regarding the issue arbitrated, but often will be deemed binding upon the parties in subsequent judicial actions through the doctrine of collateral estoppel. Collateral estoppel prevents a party from again litigating a legal or factual issue that was already litigated in a prior proceeding and that was required for the judgment rendered in that prior proceeding. Collateral estoppel applies even if the subsequent proceeding is based on a different cause of action and even if the first determination was incorrect.

Collateral estoppel is available to preclude an issue when:

- The issue is identical to an issue raised and necessarily determined in a prior proceeding.
- The previous proceeding resulted in a final judgment on the merits.
- The issue was essential to the judgment rendered in the previous proceeding.
- The party against whom collateral estoppel is asserted was a party or was in privity with a party to the prior proceeding.
- The party to be prevented from again raising the issue had a fair opportunity to be heard on the issue in the prior proceeding. n7

An arbitration award constitutes a final judgment on the merits for the purpose of collateral estoppel. n8 For example, in a case arising out of a fee dispute between brokers, plaintiff was required to submit the matter to arbitration because arbitration was a requirement of her involvement in a multiple listing service. An arbitration panel decided that the plaintiff was not entitled to a commission on the sale of a home because she was not the procuring cause of the sale. Subsequently the plaintiff brought a lawsuit alleging breach of contract; wrongful interference with contractual relations, and fraud and misrepresentation. The trial court dismissed the claims for failure to state claims upon which relief can be granted. n9

The Court of Appeals of Minnesota first confirmed that the arbitrator is the final judge of both law and fact and that the arbitrator's conclusions of law and findings of fact are binding, even if erroneous. The court then found that recovery under each of the causes of action asserted was precluded because of the factual finding and legal determination of the arbitrator that plaintiff was not the procuring cause of the sale. Plaintiff was precluded from again litigating the question of whether she was the procuring cause without regard to whether she had presented a different basis of recovery. The trial court's decision to dismiss the claims was, therefore, affirmed. n10

[3] Arbitration Can Be Costly and Time-Consuming

Though arbitration is repeatedly touted as a simplified and expedited alternative to a time-consuming and costly courtroom trial, arbitration can be almost as formal as a court trial. It may include discovery; it may authorize the use of subpoenas; and it may require testimony from and use of expert witnesses.

Arbitration may be completed more quickly than litigation and it is generally believed that formal arbitration procedures involving not only the parties but also others such as their attorneys, witnesses, and court reporters, should be reserved for cases involving large amounts of money or extremely complex issues. Yet, as conceded within the National Association of Realtors(R) Journal of Property Management, arbitration may well cost as much as a trial. n11

[a] Arbitration Procedures May Be Complex and Burdensome

Many of the rules, practices and procedures that have developed regarding arbitration are detailed, voluminous, complex and as difficult to understand and to administer as are the rules of civil procedure relating to litigation. As the conduct of one involved in litigation is governed by a myriad assortment of rules of civil procedure (e.g., state rules, subject matter rules, county rules, and the rules of the specific court in which one is appearing), the conduct of one involved in arbitration is similarly governed by a myriad assortment of rules, regulations and procedures, including those set forth in federal acts, state acts, local acts, administrative rules relating to specific industries or professions, and those "voluntarily" adopted through one's membership in trade associations and through contract.

Rules, regulations and procedures governing alternative dispute resolution and arising from different sources may be inconsistent and contradictory. They may invoke the powers of the courts for enforcement. Additionally, such rules, regulations and procedures are subject to amendment or modification. Parties contemplating alternative dispute resolution, parties involved in alternative dispute resolution, parties challenging alternative dispute resolution, and their respective legal representatives must examine all sources governing the mechanism for alternative dispute resolution that they are considering, or in which they are involved (see § 17.02).

Examples of some provisions that a person contemplating or involved in arbitration instead of litigation would probably not expect to encounter include the following:

1. Arbitrators may have the equivalent of subpoena power--enabling them to issue summonses to compel the appearance of parties or witnesses and enabling them to compel the production of documents or things. If the person served with the summons fails to appear, that person may be punished for contempt by the courts in the same manner as one would be punished for failure to appear before the courts. n12
2. Paradoxically, by appearing at an arbitration proceeding--even for the purpose of objecting to the proceeding--one may waive his or her right to challenge the results of the proceeding. One's failure to appear, however, may be deemed a consent to entry of the arbitrator's award and, by failing to appear, one may lose his or her right to reject an award made by the arbitrators. n13

[b] Arbitration Does Not Preclude Judicial Intervention

Though the scope of a court's review of an arbitral decision is extremely limited, resort to courts regarding arbitration issues is not. From pre-arbitration proceedings to post-judgment relief, the arbitration field provides fertile ground for parties seeking judicial intervention. It is not uncommon to have the parties litigate the issue of whether an arbitration agreement is enforceable. n14 Among the most common actions are those seeking a judicial determination whether arbitration is required--generally in the form of a motion to compel arbitration. Even if arbitration is required, prejudgment remedies such as attachment or emergency judicial relief may be sought. n15 Following arbitration, disgruntled parties may raise judicial challenges to the arbitrator's ruling, most often in the form of an action to vacate the decision. Conversely, a party that prevailed in arbitration may be forced to seek judicial enforcement of the arbitrator's award. Further judicial intervention may be required to resolve issues relating to attorneys' fees. n16

Through such mechanizations, alternative dispute resolution can become the source of even more disputes and, instead of netting savings of expenses and time, can become more costly than if the matter simply proceeded to litigation in the first instance.

[i] Court Enforces Broker's Lien During Arbitration

In assessing the likelihood of whether an arbitration agreement may increase one's exposure to litigation instead of reducing or eliminating it, brokers must carefully examine the interplay between contractual provisions, rights and obligations imposed by virtue of one's professional associations, and matters regulated by statute.

For example, in allowing a broker to bring suit to enforce a lien arising out of an arbitrator's award of commissions due, the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois found that the arbitrator had no power to enforce a lien in favor of the broker against property pursuant to the Illinois Commercial Real Estate Broker Lien Act. In discussing the role of the arbitrator in enforcing a broker's lien, the court noted as follows:

There being no statutory basis for other than judicial enforcement of the broker's lien, no arbitrator is empowered to do so. Of course the arbitrator can (as was done here) determine whether a broker was entitled to a commission to begin with and, if so, how much. But once that has been done, the lien remedy is wholly statutory and thus wholly judicial. n17

[ii] Arbitration as a Condition Precedent to Judicial Relief

Whether arbitration is a condition precedent to judicial relief is determined based upon the intentions of the parties.

Whether an agreement makes arbitration a condition precedent to an action in court depends on the language of the arbitration clause. While it is true that in the absence of express language a provision for arbitration may be construed, by implication, to be a condition precedent to suit, that implication must be so plain that a contrary intention cannot be supposed. It must be a necessary implication. n18

For example, use of the word "shall" in the following language excerpted from a contract for the sale and purchase of residential property, was held sufficient to require dismissal of defendant's motion to dismiss on the basis that mediation was a condition precedent to the bringing of a court action: "Any dispute or claim arising out of or relating to this contract, the breach of this contract or the services provided in relation to this contract shall be submitted to mediation in accordance with the Rules and Procedures of the Connecticut Residential Real Estate Mediation Rules of the American Arbitration Association." n19

Arbitration will typically toll the running of the statute of limitations regarding the precise subject of the arbitration (which in the case of brokers often involves claims for fees in the form of commissions) as between the parties to the arbitration/arbitration agreement. n20

[iii] Multiple Parties Can Result in Multiple Proceedings

Additionally, it is possible that an agreement only binding certain parties to an arbitration agreement, without binding others, can result in having one forced to deal with a complaint in a piecemeal fashion through multiple cases--requiring arbitration with one party and requiring litigation with another. A standard Realtors(R) purchase contract in which buyer and seller agreed that any dispute between them would be decided by binding arbitration while reserving to a broker the right to refuse to agree to arbitration, can force a buyer to file multiple cases. The ultimate result could be two separate proceedings--a trial that could go before a judge and jury, and arbitration, requiring the same witnesses to be called in each and the same evidence to be presented in each. The potential for waste of time and resources is obvious. n21

[4] Mandatory Arbitration Provisions May Be Prohibited or Rejected

Mandatory arbitration provisions may be prohibited as a matter of public policy or law if one party has superior bargaining power over the other, if the provisions are included within an adhesion contract, if the provisions are incident to otherwise illegal contracts or if the provisions are unconscionable.

[a] Arbitration Prohibited Due to Superior Bargaining Power

Various states have enacted laws restricting or prohibiting the use of mandatory arbitration agreements in contracts arising out of certain relationships in which one party almost always has superior bargaining power. For example, the Arkansas Code provides that a written agreement to submit to arbitration any existing controversy is generally valid, enforceable and irrevocable. n22 Such written agreements to submit to arbitration any future or prospective controversy between the parties will not be deemed valid or enforceable if applied to personal injury or tort matters, employer-employee disputes, or to any insured or beneficiary under any insurance policy or annuity contract. n23

The Supreme Court of Arkansas, addressing an appeal from a decision affirming an award made by an arbitration panel of a local board of Realtors(R), applied the statutory prohibition against the enforcement of arbitration in the context of employer-employee disputes. That dispute arose out of a contest between a licensed real estate broker and her former employee over a real estate commission on the sale of a property. n24 The court found that the question of applicability of the Uniform Arbitration Act was a jurisdictional question and that in the case of a claim for fees or commission earned by a broker incident to the sale of property, whether basis for such jurisdiction exists is determined as of the time that the sale is consummated and the commission becomes payable. n25 In that case the instrument through which the sale was consummated was executed after the employer-employee relationship had been terminated and the state law prohibition against arbitration arising out of an employer-employee dispute did not apply. n26

[b] Adhesion Contracts Negate Agreement to Arbitrate

Adhesion contracts are generally defined as form contracts imposed by one party with superior bargaining power upon another party who is not in a position to negotiate the terms but can only "take them or leave them." n27 A California appellate court considered the following factors in determining that an arbitration agreement, within a condominium's declaration of covenants, constituted an adhesion contract and was, therefore, not enforceable:

- The purchasers of units at the condominium complex faced a "take it or leave it" proposition. They had to purchase subject to the declaration of covenants, conditions and restrictions, or they could not purchase at all.
- The purchasers had no opportunity to negotiate the provisions of the declaration of covenants, conditions and restrictions.
- The condominium homeowners could not amend the mandatory arbitration provision of the declaration of covenants, conditions and restrictions. n28

Yet, even provisions in adhesion contracts may be enforced, unless they are unconscionable.

[c] Unconscionable or Illegal Arbitration Provisions Will Not Be Enforced

A two-prong test is applied to determine if an arbitration clause is unconscionable. An arbitration clause that is procedurally unconscionable and substantively unconscionable will not be enforceable.

Substantive unconscionability is generally defined as contract terms that are one-sided and impose terms so harsh as to "shock the conscience." Procedural unconscionability arises out of the manner in which the contract was negotiated and the circumstances of the parties and focuses on oppression and surprise. Oppression typically arises from inequality of bargaining power, the absence of real negotiation and the absence of a meaningful choice. Surprise typically arises when significant terms are hidden in a lengthy, wordy form prepared by the party with superior bargaining power. n29

Additionally, provisions requiring arbitration and arbitration awards will not be enforced if to do so would violate public policy. For example, it is against public policy to enforce an arbitrator's award based upon an illegal contract, such as when an individual seeks a fee for providing services as a real estate broker when he or she was not properly licensed as a real estate broker. n30

PART V Other Issues Affecting Brokers

CHAPTER 17 Alternative Dispute Resolution Involving Real Estate Brokers *

10A-17 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 17.05

§ 17.05 An Agreement to Arbitrate Is Required for Mandatory Arbitration

Arbitration is based on contract. n1 An agreement to arbitrate is generally recognized as an agreement favored by law that is intended to promptly settle disputes and intended to avoid litigation. n2 Yet, when one agrees to binding arbitration, one relinquishes his or her constitutional right to a jury trial. The "right to pursue claims in a judicial forum is a substantial right and one not lightly to be waived." n3 The stated position of most jurisdictions, therefore, is that an agreement to be bound by arbitration must be made voluntarily by a person or entity aware of the rights that are being relinquished.

[1] Express Mutual Agreement Is Required to Compel Arbitration

The general underlying proposition of the law relating to arbitration is that an express mutual agreement is required to compel arbitration. A party cannot be compelled to arbitrate unless there is an agreement requiring arbitration. Courts have reasoned that the right to arbitration depends upon the existence of a contract to arbitrate, and a petition or motion to compel arbitration is simply a means of seeking specific enforcement of the contract. Contract law is applied to determine whether the parties formed a valid agreement to arbitrate. n4 In most situations parties will be required to arbitrate a matter only if there is a written agreement to arbitrate, making the threshold question in any petition to compel arbitration whether there is an agreement to arbitrate. n5

[a] Arbitration Will Be Compelled if the Arbitration Agreement Is Valid

Before compelling a party to arbitrate a court must perform a limited review to ensure that a valid agreement to arbitrate exists between the parties and that the dispute or controversy is subject to mandatory arbitration under the agreement. n6 With consideration of the strong public policy in favor of arbitration, however, a person contending that arbitration does not apply is typically required, by case law or by statute, to notify the other party of that fact so the other party can proceed with a motion to compel arbitration without incurring expense and delay attributable to the arbitration process. n7

If a valid arbitration agreement exists between the parties, a motion or petition to compel arbitration will typically be granted. Sometimes this result is required by statute, such as in California where the Code of Civil Procedure requires that "On petition of a party to an arbitration agreement alleging the existence of a written agreement to arbitrate a controversy and that a party thereto refuses to arbitrate such controversy, the court shall order the petitioner and the respondent to arbitrate the controversy if it determines that an agreement to arbitrate ... exists" unless a specified exception applies. n8

Conversely, if a valid agreement to arbitrate does not exist, as determined under contract law, the petition to compel arbitration must be denied. n9 The contractual requirement that there be a "meeting of the minds" to form a contract often precludes enforcement of contractual provisions requiring arbitration if the provisions are obscure, hidden, or included within boilerplate language contained within an adhesion contract. For example, a binding arbitration clause contained in a "declaration of covenants, conditions and restrictions" would not be applied to prevent homeowners and a homeowners association from seeking relief for construction and design defect damages in a judicial forum. n10

[b] Non-Signatories May Not Compel Arbitration

A party's signature upon a contract or other document containing an arbitration agreement or clause is evidence of that party's consent to be bound by the agreement to arbitrate. In many jurisdictions, therefore, one must be a signatory in order to compel arbitration. n10.1 Exceptions in which an arbitration agreement may be enforced by or against nonsignatories include where a nonsignatory is a third party beneficiary of the agreement and when a nonsignatory and one of the parties to the agreement have a preexisting agency relationship that makes it equitable to impose the duty to arbitrate on either of them. n10.2

In determining whether a party is a signatory, however, the documents pertaining to the transaction should be read in totality. n10.3 It may not be necessary for the party to have signed the one document containing the arbitration clause if it is clear from all the documents that the parties intend for the party who is technically a non-signatory to be covered by the arbitration provision. n10.4

For example, in a case involving the attempts of defendants to compel arbitration pursuant to an arbitration provision contained within a title insurance policy, it was held that only those persons or entities who signed the policy could compel arbitration. n11 Specifically, plaintiffs, who purchased property and subsequently discovered defects in their title to that property, sued the title insurance company, the attorney who represented the title insurance company and the real estate agents. All of the defendants moved to compel arbitration.

The title insurance policy contained an arbitration provision that allowed either the company or the insured to demand binding arbitration pursuant to the Title Insurance Rules of the American Arbitration Association, unless applicable law prohibited such a demand for arbitration. n12 Pursuant to the express terms of the title insurance policy issued by the title insurance company, the Supreme Court of Alabama reversed the lower court's order denying the motion to compel arbitration, as it related to the title insurance company and its attorney (in his capacity as its agent), and held that both were entitled to arbitration. n13 The court narrowly construed the binding arbitration agreement and concluded, however, that the real estate brokers (referred to as "agents") were not permitted to compel arbitration as they had not signed the title insurance policy. n14 However, in a subsequent case, this court stated that it had made clear that in some circumstances where the subject arbitration provision does not specifically limit its reach to signatories, nonsignatories may enforce the arbitration provision. n14.1

[i] Mutual Consent to Arbitration Required to Compel Arbitration

Sellers and brokers may be prohibited from compelling arbitration if they have failed to sign or initial the arbitration clause in a jurisdiction requiring a party's signature as evidence of consent to be bound by the arbitration clause. Though at least one contrary decision has been rendered, n15 the failure of one party to initial an arbitration clause usually negates mutual consent to binding arbitration. Premised upon such reasoning, a petition of a seller, who had not initialed the arbitration clause, to compel arbitration with buyer, who did initial the arbitration clause, was denied. It is generally recognized that to hold otherwise would result in a situation where the seller could refuse to initial such provision after the buyer had done so--making "arbitration" a remedy to be sought at the seller's sole whim and benefit, to the obvious detriment of the buyer. n16 As stated by one appellate court:

We note that if there were no mutuality of remedy requirement, the seller--which is usually the offeree in the real estate sales context--would have absolutely no incentive to initial the arbitration provision and thereby bind itself to arbitrate disputes. This is because ... the offeror (usually the buyer) would be bound to arbitrate all disputes (provided it had initialed the arbitration provision) even if the seller did not agree to do so. Thus, once the buyer initialed this provision, the seller could have its cake and eat it too: the seller could force the buyer to arbitrate if the seller thought it was in its interest to do so, and could refuse to arbitrate if it believed it was disadvantageous to do so. n17

Consider, for example, a case arising out of the sale of an apartment complex. The buyers initiated suit against the sellers of the property alleging misrepresentation and failure to disclose plumbing defects, and against the brokers (who had represented both buyers and sellers) alleging negligent failure to discover and disclose the defects. The buyers dismissed their claim against the brokers, without prejudice, upon discovering that their claim was probably not covered by the brokers' insurance. Most of the sellers then filed claims for indemnity against the brokers and the brokers filed a petition to compel arbitration. The petition to compel arbitration was denied and the appellate court affirmed on the basis that there was no agreement to arbitrate. n18

The brokers claimed the action was subject to arbitration on the basis of an arbitration clause in the purchase agreement between the sellers and buyers which provided that, "If a controversy arises with respect to the subject matter of this Purchase Agreement or the transaction contemplated herein (including but not limited to the parties' rights to ... the payment of commissions as provided herein), Buyer, Seller and Agent agree that such controversy shall be settled by final binding arbitration" n19 As required by law, the arbitration clause included a notice requiring that each party signify by initialing the clause their voluntary acceptance of the arbitration clause. Buyers initialed the arbitration clause. The sellers did not. For that reason, in applying applicable contract law, it was determined that there was no mutual assent by the "Buyer, Seller and Agent" to submit controversies to binding arbitration and there was, therefore, no enforceable agreement to arbitrate.

[ii] Non-Parties to Contracts May Not Compel Arbitration

To compel arbitration, one is typically required to be a party to the contract or agreement containing the arbitration clause. For example, a homeowner whose home was not sold sued real estate brokers. The homeowner claimed that the sale of his home was not consummated and he was not, therefore, able to acquire another property, because of the brokers' breach of fiduciary duty and their negligent failure to disclose a title defect. Both of the transactions were under contract and neither contract closed. The parties to the contract (buyer and seller) had waived mediation and arbitration, yet the brokers sought to compel arbitration. The court found that the brokers could not compel arbitration as they were not parties to the contract between the buyer and seller, nor were they third-party beneficiaries to the contract--but were instead simply incidental participants. n20

[c] Non-Signatories to a Contract May Be Compelled to Arbitrate

Though usually not able to compel arbitration, non-signatories may be bound by an agreement to arbitrate and may, therefore, be compelled to arbitrate if that decision is justified by principles of contract law and agency. Similarly, third-party beneficiaries to contracts may be compelled to arbitrate. This situation often arises in the context of broker memberships in professional associations and multiple listing services.

For example, in considering an appeal from an order compelling arbitration between a real estate company seeking to recover a commission allegedly earned by one of its brokers and another real estate company, a Florida appellate court held that the real estate company challenging arbitration was compelled to arbitrate. The court's decision was based solely upon the agreement made by one of the real estate company's individual brokers to submit the claim for arbitration incident to her application for membership in a local board of Realtors(R). n21 The court set forth the following points in support of its position:

- Any doubt regarding the scope of an arbitration clause will be resolved in favor of arbitration, which is considered a preferred method of dispute resolution.
- Upon applying principles relating to general agency and contract law, a non-signatory real estate company may be bound to arbitrate on the basis of an agreement by one of its brokers to submit the claim to arbitration.
- The non-signatory real estate company received the economic and professional benefits of its broker's membership in the local real estate board and, as a third-party beneficiary was bound by the individual broker's agreement to arbitrate. n22

Principles of agency law may allow a party to compel arbitration even though that party technically did not sign the agreement containing the arbitration clause. In Van Nguyen v. Hung Tran, n22.1 the purchase agreement listed the cooperating brokers as the agents of the buyers. The buyers had signed the purchase agreement, but the cooperating brokers had not signed this agreement. In a subsequent dispute, the cooperating brokers sought to compel the buyers and listing brokers to arbitrate. The court held that cooperating brokers, as agents of one of the parties to the agreement containing the arbitration clause, may compel their principal to arbitrate but they may not compel arbitration against listing brokers, who did not sign the agreement and had no preexisting confidential or contractual relationship with cooperating brokers. n22.2

By contrast, an intermediate Hawaiian appellate court in Sher v. Cella n22.3 considered a similar situation where the purchasers sought to compel the listing broker to arbitrate based on an arbitration agreement in the sales contract. These brokers had not signed the sales contract. The purchasers sought to use agency principles to compel arbitration by the listing brokers. This court stated that the purchasers, as principals were attempting to bind their agents, which was a "manifest reversal of traditional agency rules." The court found that a non-signatory agent may, under certain circumstances, invoke an arbitration provision against an unwilling principal who was a signatory to an agreement containing an arbitration provision. However, the obverse was not necessarily true where the principal who is a signatory to a contract containing an arbitration provision seeks to enforce that provision against a non-signatory agent. The purchasers could not use agency principles to invoke the arbitration clause in this manner. n22.4

With respect to third party beneficiaries of a contract, it is a general rule that a third party beneficiary may not avoid otherwise enforceable contract provisions. Thus, a third party beneficiary of a contract containing an arbitration clause can be subject to that clause and compelled to arbitrate on the demand of a signatory. n22.5 However, in order to compel arbitration by a third party beneficiary, some courts require that the claim sought to be arbitrated be related to the contract conferring the third party beneficiary status. A third party beneficiary will be bound by the terms of the underlying contract if the claims asserted by that beneficiary arise from its third party beneficiary status. In one case, the dispute involved construction defects. Since this claim did not arise out of the commission due to the broker under the sales contract, the broker could not be bound to the arbitration provision in that sales contract. n22.6

[2] Members of Realtor(R) Boards Are Required to Arbitrate

An agreement to arbitrate may be imposed incident to one's membership in a professional association. The majority of real estate brokers are required to arbitrate by virtue of their membership in the National Association of Realtors(R) (NAR) or other real estate boards or associations, and by their membership in multiple listing services. The Code of Ethics of NAR, the largest trade and professional association in the real estate industry, requires that members affiliated with different companies arbitrate their contractual disputes instead of taking them to court. n23

Local Realtor(R) boards require their members to agree to arbitration. For example, all local Realtor(R) boards in New Jersey require their members to abide by the Code of Ethics and fee arbitration and dispute resolution mechanisms promulgated by the National Association of Realtors(R). n24

Further, a written agreement is not required to compel arbitration between brokers. For example, a real estate broker, seeking 50% of the commission for the sale of commercial real estate pursuant to an oral agreement with another broker, was entitled to arbitration pursuant to the terms of the brokers' memberships in the Greater Madison Board of Realtors(R). n25

It has been held, however, that the agreement to submit to arbitration found in the Realtors'(R) Code of Ethics does not apply to disputes, contractual or noncontractual, that arise between Realtors(R) associated with the same brokerage firm. n25.1 In coming to this conclusion, this court stated that although the purpose of the Code of Ethics was to promote ethical behavior of Realtors(R), the court could find nothing in the Code indicating that it was intended to interfere with specific, privately contracted employment-type relationships between members of the same firm. n25.2 This court observed that the National Association of Realtors(R) Arbitration Manual, which accompanied the Code, stated that arbitration between or among members of the same firm was voluntary, and "may proceed only by written agreement of all parties." n25.3

[a] Broker's Decision to Arbitrate May Not Be "Voluntary"

A basic underlying tenet regarding the enforceability of arbitration agreements is that the parties to arbitration agreements voluntarily relinquished their constitutional right to a trial by jury in exchange for the time and cost benefits generally associated with arbitration. The requirement that brokers submit to arbitration or other means of alternative dispute resolution, however, is almost universally imposed as a condition precedent of the broker's involvement with organizations and associations that are critical to the broker's professional success.

In today's national and international markets, access to resources and information provided by professional associations and organizations is often required to ensure a broker's successful management of his or her career. When tools and services necessary to one's career as a broker require arbitration, a claim that a broker voluntarily made an informed choice to arbitrate may be based on little more than illusion. Many brokers never "voluntarily" decided to be bound by arbitration--they just decided to utilize tools and services necessary to their careers.

Consider, for example, New York's industry residential Web site, formed by an alliance of leading brokerages under the auspices of the Real Estate Board of New York (REBNY) and touted as "the most technologically sophisticated and inclusive on the Internet" giving sellers maximum exposure of their properties and offering "buyers the most complete account of Manhattan apartments available for rent or purchase." As a condition precedent of working on the residential Web site, however, each broker is required to subject herself or himself to arbitration: "All brokers working on the industry Web site will be bound to follow the Real Estate Board's Code of Ethics and be subject to REBNY's arbitration procedures." n26

Clearly, the residential Web site multiple listing system is intended to be an indispensable tool for a broker's success. As explained in an earlier edition of Real Estate Weekly:

The New York City real estate industry has joined the rest of the country in creating a listing service that will feature virtually every piece of Manhattan residential property that is being sold or rented.

Over 115 companies--ranging in size from large firms that employ numerous brokers to one-person operations--have agreed to participate in the service by posting 100 percent of their listings within 72 hours of receiving them. Another 40 to 50 firms have expressed interest in joining the service. ...

Multiple listing systems are used throughout the country and are beneficial to buyers, who have access to the maximum number of listings, and sellers, who are assured the maximum number of customers. ...

Brokers who participate in the listing service will be required to adhere to REBNY's code of ethics and to be governed by REBNY's arbitration policy on disputes between brokers. n27

Is this a voluntary agreement to be bound by mandatory arbitration? Or is it a version of an unconscionable adhesion contract?

[b] Realtor(R) Association Members Are Bound by Arbitration

Subject only to very limited exceptions, if parties are required to submit to binding arbitration, they shall be bound by the arbitrator's decision. n28 On appeal from an action filed by a broker to vacate, modify and correct an arbitration award, a Louisiana appellate court was called upon to determine whether the parties were bound by arbitration. The underlying case arose out of the broker's claim for commission on the basis that she was entitled, as the procuring cause, to a commission attributable to a residential real estate sale. All of the parties involved in the commission dispute were members of the New Orleans Metropolitan Association of Realtors(R), a member of the National Association of Realtors(R). All members agreed that:

By becoming or remaining a member and by signing or having signed the agreement to abide by the Bylaws of the Board, every member, where consistent with applicable law, binds himself or herself and agrees to submit to arbitration by the Board's facilities all disputes as defined by Article 17 of the Code of Ethics and ... all disputes with any other member ... n29

The arbitrator's award was affirmed on the bases that:

- All parties in dispute about the commission were members of the real estate board and were, therefore, subject to the provision for mandatory, binding arbitration.
- There is a strong public policy in favor of arbitration and arbitration awards are presumed valid.
- Errors of law or fact are insufficient to invalidate an arbitrator's award. n30

Arbitration of a commission dispute among Realtors(R) has been ordered when the parties to a referral fee agreement had previously consented to arbitrate disputes arising among themselves while each was a member of a Realtors(R) organization. These parties had not rescinded their consents to arbitrate when the disputes between them arose. Each was still a member of the Realtors(R) organization that set forth guidelines and procedures for such arbitration. The court stated that these parties could not defeat the arbitration of transactions and fee disputes that arose during their membership in the Realtor(R) organization by withdrawing from membership after the dispute arose. n31

[c] Arbitration Not Limited to Disputes Arising During Membership

The push for arbitration is so strong that one broker may be allowed to compel arbitration against another broker through membership in a local real estate board by joining the board after the incident underlying the professional dispute between brokers arose. For example, a New York court ruled that one broker was allowed to compel arbitration against another broker despite the following facts:

- Arbitration would not have been required under the Federal Arbitration Act;
- The broker seeking compulsory arbitration reinstated his membership in the real estate board specifically to avail himself of its compulsory arbitration requirement;

- The broker seeking compulsory arbitration was not a member of the real estate board at the time the underlying fee dispute between the parties arose; and
- The defendant broker sought a stay of arbitration claiming that the plaintiff could not compel arbitration by joining the real estate board after the dispute arose. n32

As basis for its decision to compel arbitration, the trial court reasoned that the New York Court of Appeals required that agreements to arbitrate be deferred to and that all doubts were to be resolved in favor of arbitration. The court concluded that arbitration is strongly favored in all situations where an agreement to arbitrate does not expressly preclude it. As nothing in the arbitration provisions of the real estate board expressly precluded arbitration of pre-existing disputes, arbitration was compelled. n33

[d] Nonmembers May Compel Arbitration with Association Members

In addition to requiring arbitration between brokers, a broker's membership in some real estate associations may require that the broker submit to arbitration at the demand of a nonmember. For example, two brokers who were members of the Helena Association of Realtors(R), Inc., upon becoming members of that voluntary trade organization, signed a form consenting to arbitrate disputes between themselves and other members. The form and the association's rules also bound the brokers to arbitrate any matter arising out of a business dispute with a Realtor(R) member rising out of any agency relationship at the insistence of the nonmember client involved. A client of two brokers invoked arbitration of her claim against them and a Montana appellate court affirmed the trial court's decision to compel arbitration despite the fact that there was no contract between the brokers and the client that contained an arbitration clause. n34

[e] Association Members May Not Compel Arbitration with Nonmembers

Though binding and mandatory as between brokers who are members of local real estate boards and associations, a local board's requirement of arbitration between members to resolve commission disputes was found inapplicable to a case instituted by one member broker against defendants who included another member broker, non-member prospective purchasers and non-member sellers. The factual background to the case was somewhat convoluted. Defendants included the sellers of the property involved and the broker with whom they entered into a listing agreement. The property was multiple listed and the plaintiff broker showed the property to its customers. Those same customers then went to a different broker to again see the same property and purchased the property through that broker rather than through the plaintiff. The plaintiff broker sued for tortious interference with contract, breach of contract and for the lost commission. n35

As members of the Long Island Board of Realtors(R) and Multiple Listing Services, both brokers (plaintiff and defendant) had agreed to be bound by the terms of the Code of Ethics and Standards of Practice of the National Association of Realtors(R). Article 14 of the Code provided that, "In the event of a controversy between REALTORS associated with different firms, arising out of their relationship as REALTORS, the REALTORS shall submit the dispute to arbitration in accordance with the regulations of their Board or boards rather than litigate the matter." The defendant broker moved to stay the court proceedings and to compel arbitration. n36

Noting that a court cannot compel arbitration in the absence of a contract provision that expressly and clearly encompasses the subject matter of the dispute, the court refused to compel arbitration. The trial court held that although the code mandated arbitration of commission disputes between brokers, it neither expressly nor impliedly compelled arbitration of tort claims involving both members and non-members. n37

[3] Appeal of Court Decision on Motion to Compel Arbitration

A lower court ruling on a motion to compel arbitration can be immediately appealed as a final judgment. n38 So held Maryland's intermediate appellate court in a case arising out of a brokerage firm's claim to entitlement to a percentage of an 8% commission of the sale of commercial real estate on the basis that it was the procuring cause of the sale.

In that case, the plaintiff, claiming to have been the procuring cause of the sale, filed suit against the purchaser of the property and the listing broker alleging unjust enrichment, interference with business relations, and conspiracy. The defendant, listing broker, moved to compel arbitration pursuant to the NAR Code of Ethics and Arbitration Manual, to which both brokers agreed to be bound by virtue of their membership in the Anne Arundel County Association of Realtors(R). The trial court denied the motion to compel on the basis that this action involved claims in tort while the NAR provision regarded actions arising out of contract n39

It is well settled that when an appellate court reviews a trial court's ruling regarding a motion to compel arbitration, the appellate court applies a de novo standard of review. n40 The Maryland appellate court reversed, finding that the tort claims all required a finding that the plaintiff was the procuring cause of the sale and that the issue of determining whether the broker was the procuring cause was precisely the type of issue subject to mandatory arbitration under the NAR Code of Ethics and Arbitration Manual. n41 Finally, though arbitration of the contractual claims between the brokers would not eliminate plaintiff's tort claims against the purchasers, the arbitrator's decision on the issue of procuring cause would be determinative regarding plaintiff's ability to prevail on its tort claims. n42

That issue was subject to binding arbitration. However, the trial court should have stayed the case pending arbitration of the contractual dispute, both because the buyers were not parties to the arbitration agreement and because the arbitration does not dispose of the tort claims. However, that may be the effect of the arbitration, because how the arbitration is resolved will affect whether the plaintiff will have evidence sufficient to make out prima facie cases in its tort claims.

CHAPTER 17 Alternative Dispute Resolution Involving Real Estate Brokers *

10A-17 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 17.06

§ 17.06 Court Actions Allowed Despite Agreement to Arbitrate

Certain matters are reserved for judicial resolution even if the parties have entered into an arbitration agreement. Court actions are generally required or allowed to determine if an agreement to arbitrate is enforceable, to determine if a contract should be revoked for fraud or similar basis for revocation, to obtain prejudgment remedies, to determine issues regarding attorneys' fees and costs, to enforce arbitration judgments and awards, and for other matters.

[1] Courts Construe Contracts to Determine if Arbitration Agreements Are Enforceable

Arbitration is contractual. n1 If the underlying agreement or contract is unenforceable, whether premised upon statute or case law, the arbitrators are deprived of jurisdiction. Therefore, if a party challenges not only the arbitration clause, but challenges the validity of the entire agreement or contract of which it is a part, it is the role of the court and not of the designated arbitrators to decide the challenge. If it is alleged that fraud permeates the entire contract, including the arbitration provision, that provision is no more enforceable than the rest of the contract and the whole contract's validity becomes a question for the court. n2

[2] Courts May Grant Prejudgment Remedies to Parties Involved in Arbitration

The fact that an arbitration agreement exists should not deter a broker from seeking prejudgment remedies or emergency judicial relief (such as an injunction). An arbitration agreement may not serve as a bar to prejudgment remedies such as attachment of real property or other assets intended to protect the broker's right to ensure the availability of assets to pay an arbitration award if one is granted.

Brokers are frequently involved in disputes over their entitlement to commissions. Fact situations frequently encountered are those in which more than one member works with the same buyer, requiring a determination of which procured the buyer and which, therefore, was entitled to the commission. This is generally referred to as "procuring cause."

To sustain a finding that an agent is the procuring cause of a sale, there must be evidence that [the agent] originated a course of events which without a break in their continuity created a cause of which the sale was the result. It is not enough that [the agent's] services merely contributed to the result. They must be the producing and effective means thereof. n3

Similarly, frequent disputes arise where the broker's services are utilized pursuant to contract to locate property for a prospective purchaser or to locate prospective purchasers for a seller but the deal is not finalized or consummated until after the contract with the broker has terminated. A court may intervene to protect the broker's interest in her or his commission while arbitration proceedings are pending.

For example, a plaintiff real estate broker was retained by the defendant pursuant to a written agreement to negotiate the purchase of a condominium site in Connecticut. In exchange for his services the broker was to receive a commission of 5% of the purchase price. The agreement further provided that it would terminate on a specific date or was terminable at the election of either party upon 30-days notice but even after termination of the agreement the commission would be due if the defendant within six months of termination purchased a property that had been identified by the plaintiff or regarding which the plaintiff had been involved in negotiations on behalf of the defendant. The agreement included an arbitration clause that stated as follows: "Any dispute between us shall be handled by binding arbitration in accordance with the rules of procedure of the American Arbitration Association then in effect." n4 The plaintiff engaged in extensive investigation, research and negotiation regarding a specific property, which was offered for sale to the defendant at $650,000. The defendant rejected that offer, the agreement between the parties was terminated, and the defendant later purchased the same property for $655,000.

Plaintiff filed suit seeking, among other things, that the court issue a prejudgment attachment against the real property, pending resolution of his claim to his commission. Defendant took the position that the agreement to arbitrate deprived the court of all jurisdiction in the matter and moved that the proceedings be stayed pending arbitration.

Though the court generally stayed the proceedings pending arbitration, it also granted plaintiff's request for a prejudgment remedy in the form of an attachment on the defendant's real estate in the amount of $32,750--that being the amount of the disputed commission. n5 In reaching its decision that it had jurisdiction to determine the whether prejudgment relief should be granted, the court first applied the general rule that under the common law an agreement to arbitrate does not serve to defeat the jurisdiction of the courts, which are properly called upon to resolve judicial questions such as those regarding the validity of the contract, the types of issues subject to arbitration and whether the right to arbitrate was waived. n6 Then, in deciding to order prejudgment attachment, the Connecticut appellate court joined the trend established by courts in other jurisdictions (including Oregon, New York, Massachusetts and California) and found no inconsistency between the goal of arbitration as a means to achieve non-judicial resolution of controversies and one's legitimate interest in assuring the existence of resources to satisfy a judgment if one was obtained. n7 The court stated:

The basis of these rulings is that a prejudgment remedy does not interfere with the arbitration of a dispute but assures the availability of assets to pay an arbitration award if one is granted. Thus the granting of a stay of action (to permit arbitration of the controversy) does not preclude the granting of such a remedy. n8

PART V Other Issues Affecting Brokers

CHAPTER 17 Alternative Dispute Resolution Involving Real Estate Brokers *

10A-17 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 17.07

§ 17.07 Judicial Review of Arbitration Proceedings Is Limited

Arbitral awards are presumed valid and judicial review is very limited. Any person who elects to challenge an arbitration award bears a severe burden. Among other things:

- Arbitration awards are construed to uphold their validity whenever it is possible to do so.
- It is presumed that the arbitrator did not exceed his or her authority.
- Judicial review of an arbitrator's award is generally more limited than appellate review of a court decision.
- An award will not be vacated even the arbitrator made gross errors in judgment or gross mistakes of fact, unless the errors or mistakes are apparent on the face of the award. n1

[1] Burden of Proof in Challenging an Arbitration Award

The generally accepted and often voiced position of the courts is that arbitration is strongly favored and generally approved as a less expensive and quicker means of settling litigation and reducing the burden on the courts by relieving some docket congestion. For that reason, the party attempting to overturn an arbitration award bears the burden of proof. n2

The evidence required to meet that burden must be certain and direct. For example, a party attempting to set aside an arbitration award on the basis that the arbitrators on the panel were not impartial bears the burden of proof. Evidence must be presented to show the manner in which partiality was shown. As stated by the Supreme Court of Arkansas in rejecting a claim that an arbitration panel was not impartial in awarding a commission to a real estate broker arising out of the sale of a property, "The interest, partiality, or bias that will suffice to overturn an arbitration award must be certain and direct rather than remote, uncertain, or speculative." n3

Arbitrators are considered the judges of both fact and law and the awards issued by them are presumed valid. Mere errors of judgment are insufficient to overturn an arbitrator's award. n4 Though variations exist, a party challenging an arbitration decision usually must prove his or her case by clear and convincing evidence.

Generally, courts will overturn an award only if it is proven by clear and convincing evidence that the arbitrators:

- Exceeded their authority;
- Dispensed their own brand of justice;
- Issued a perverse misconstruction of the contract;
- Committed positive misconduct;
- Demonstrated a manifest disregard for the law;
- Acted illegally; or
- Acted in violation of public policy. n5

[2] Judicial Standard of Review of Arbitration Award

In keeping with the strong policies supporting arbitral finality, the general rule is that courts may not interfere with an arbitration award. More specifically:

- Courts may not examine the merits of the underlying controversy.
- Courts may not examine that sufficiency of the evidence supporting the awards.
- Courts may not examine the reasoning supporting the decision.
- Courts may not set aside an arbitration award even if the arbitrator made an error of law or fact. n6

A limited exception to this rule exists when the underlying contract calling for arbitration is illegal and, therefore, unenforceable. The power of the arbitrator depends upon the existence of a valid contract. As noted by California appellate courts:

[T]he rules which give finality to the arbitrator's determination of ordinary questions of fact or of law are inapplicable where the issue of illegality of the entire transaction is raised in a proceeding for enforcement of the arbitrator's award. When so raised the issue is one for judicial determination upon the evidence presented to the trial court, and any preliminary determination of legality by the arbitrator ... should not be held to be binding upon the trial court. n7

Such limitations upon a reviewing court's power over an arbitrator's decision may, however, be modified by statute. For example, the New Jersey Alternative Dispute Resolution Act (ADRA) provides that the Chancery Division may vacate an award made by an ADRA arbitrator if the arbitrator committed prejudicial error by erroneously applying the law to the facts and issues presented. The Act does not provide for further appellate review. n8 Yet an appellate court may entertain such an appeal in the absence of a motion to dismiss. n9

[3] Statutory Bases for Vacating or Correcting an Arbitration Award

Judicial review of binding arbitration awards is generally limited to the statutory grounds for vacating or correcting such an award. n10 For example, Title 9 of the California Code of Civil Procedure sets forth specific bases upon which an arbitrator's award will be vacated or corrected, including that:

- The award was the result of corruption, fraud or undue means.
- Misconduct of a neutral arbitrator substantially prejudiced the rights of a party to the arbitration.
- The arbitrators exceeded their powers.
- The arbitrator's refusal to grant a reasonable request to postpone the hearing or to hear material evidence substantially prejudiced a party.
- There was an evident miscalculation of figures.
- There was an evident error in describing a person, thing or property referred to within the award. n11

Arbitrators do not exceed their powers merely by making an erroneous decision on a legal or factual issue so long as the issue was within the scope of the controversy before the arbitrator. The arbitrator's resolution of those issues is precisely what the parties bargain for in reaching an agreement to be bound by arbitration. n12

The scope of arbitration is that agreed upon by the parties. An error of law by an arbitrator will not defeat an award if the award is based on issues raised by the pleadings. For example, an arbitrator's award of damages in favor of a property purchaser and against an individual found by the arbitrator to be a partner of the broker who sold the property was upheld. The decision was solely premised upon the defendant's referral to the selling broker and an oral agreement to share fees--despite the defendant's position that an oral agreement between brokers to share fees does not create a partnership exposing one to liability for the other's wrongdoing and despite the fact that there were no allegations of the existence of a "partnership" in the underlying complaint. n13 The court reasoned that the arbitrator derived his power from the arbitration agreement and the scope of that power would not be deemed limited by the civil complaint that was filed before arbitration was invoked. n14

The court held that it is for the arbitrator, and not for the court, to determine which issues are necessary for the ultimate decision, and to determine the meaning or extent of the arbitration agreement. The arbitrator determined that the existence of a "partnership" and the exposure to liability engendered by the existence of a partnership were among the issues submitted by the parties and, absent corruption, misconduct or other impropriety, the court found that the arbitrator did not exceed his powers. n15

10A-17 Real Estate Brokerage Law and Practice § 17.08

§ 17.08 Matters to Be Considered When Entering Into an Agreement to Arbitrate

A decision to arbitrate can have serious consequences and the language of an arbitration clause merits serious consideration. Arbitration language should not be cavalierly disregarded as "form" or "boiler plate" language and it may be wise to seek informed legal advice before entering into a contract that includes an arbitration clause. Care should be taken to ensure that there is no conflict between the governing laws of different jurisdictions as they apply to a specific agreement to arbitrate. The language and structure of the arbitration agreement should be reviewed to anticipate any potential influence it could have regarding any challenge to the arbitration process or to an arbitration award.

If the language of the agreement to arbitrate does not clearly and accurately state the intent of the parties, their true intentions may be thwarted. Additionally, if one's agreement to arbitrate is truly voluntary, the terms and conditions of an arbitration clause should be subject to negotiation and modification with the intention of avoiding pitfalls and reducing one's risk and exposure to liability.

Questions that a broker should ask and have answered when considering an arbitration agreement or when involved in the arbitration process include the following:

(1) Is the language specific regarding the types of problems or issues that will be submitted to arbitration?

Often the types of issues most appropriate for arbitration are those where the solutions are more readily determined on the basis of factual testimony and expert opinions rather than arguments of law. Issues not specifically included within the scope of arbitration may be excluded from arbitration resulting in multiple actions. Care must be taken to ensure that the scope is as limited or as broad as the parties intend.

(2) Who can compel arbitration and who can be compelled to be a party to the arbitration?

It is important to anticipate the identity of parties who may be involved in a dispute arising under the arbitration agreement. Failure to include all affected parties could result in multiple actions arising out of the same incident, and could subject a party to both arbitration and litigation arising out of the same underlying dispute. Also, have all parties to the arbitration clause or agreement actually signed the document containing the clause or constituting the agreement? A person who has not signed may not be bound by the agreement.

(3) Is the agreement to arbitrate mandatory and binding?

If the agreement to arbitrate is mandatory and binding, be certain that it says so.

(4) What laws will be applied to interpret or enforce the arbitration agreement?

It is probable that there will be conflicting sources of rules, laws, procedures or regulations that may govern the agreement to arbitrate. The parties to the arbitration agreement may choose the law that will be applied to effectuate their agreement. The agreement to arbitrate is contractual and such a provision (commonly referred to as a "choice of law" provision) will generally be enforced.

(5) Who will serve as arbitrator and how is the arbitrator selected?

Arbitrators must be impartial. The parties to an arbitration agreement should confirm that disclosure of the interests and relations of potential arbitrators is provided for; and that the provisions for selection of arbitrators are fair and designed to ensure that impartial arbitrators are selected. Further, as determined by an Oklahoma appellate court in affirming a trial court's refusal to grant a broker's motion to compel arbitration, arbitrator impartiality is very important to the arbitration process and an arbitration clause cannot be enforced if it excludes a party from the selection process. n1

(6) When does the arbitration process begin and what time limits apply to the process?

Does arbitration commence upon demand of any party, or is time to be allowed for the possibility of private settlement negotiations or for the less adversarial alternative dispute method of mediation? Further, though parties to arbitration agreements generally seek expedited resolution of their disputes, care should be taken to ensure that sufficient time is allowed to properly prepare and present one's position in the dispute.

(7) Which procedural rules and practices will govern the arbitration process?

Arbitration practices and procedures are governed by laws, rules, codes and regulations from many sources, including those enacted by the federal government, those enacted by state governments, those enacted by local governments, and those adopted by professional associations (such as the National Association of Realtors(R) and the American Arbitration Association). Because an agreement to arbitrate is contractual, the parties' choice as to the procedural rules and practices that will govern their agreement will usually be enforced. If the procedures to be followed are to be under the auspices of a private association or other entity (e.g., the National Association of Realtors(R) or the American Arbitration Association), state that fact within the arbitration agreement.

(8) How will monetary issues be determined and resolved?

Many monetary issues are encountered in arbitration. How are damages to be awarded? What provisions are made to satisfy an award of damages? Are attorney's fees allowed? If so, to whom and under what circumstances will an award of attorney's fees be made? Is an award of attorney's fees to a prevailing party mandatory or discretionary? Who will bear the costs of the proceeding, and how are those costs defined? How will the arbitrators be paid? Is interest on the arbitrator's award allowed? Interest on the arbitrator's award is typically allowed from the date of the award, n2 and if it is not the intent of the parties that interest be allowed, they must state that fact. In the absence of provisions resolving the monetary issues, parties cannot fairly assess their exposure to liability.

Checklist 1 Client Interview--Facts and Documents

NOTE:

The following checklist provides a reference for matters that should be discussed with an owner who is about to sign a listing agreement with a real estate broker or who wishes to have an attorney draft this type of agreement rather than use the broker's form agreement.

A. Facts

- (1) Names, addresses and telephone numbers of parties.
 - (a) Broker.
 - (b) Salesperson.
 - (c) Owner.
- (2) Type, number and expiration date of license held by broker or salesperson.
- (3) Broker's qualifications, experience and specialties.
- (4) Type of real estate to be listed, such as:
 - (a) Single-family.
 - (i) Owner-occupied.
 - (ii) Rented or leased.
 - (b) Multi-family.

- (c) Commercial or industrial.
 - (d) Unimproved.
 - (e) Other.
- (5) Specific information about property to be purchased, sold, exchanged or leased, including:
- (a) Legal description.
 - (b) Address.
 - (c) Description of improvements and other distinguishing features.
 - (d) Fixtures and other property to be included in sale or exchange.
 - (e) Manner in which title is held.
- (6) Existing defects on premises that might be hazardous to invitees or future occupants.
- (7) Lead-Based Paint Disclosure, if applicable [see Ch. 15A above for discussion of lead-based paint disclosure requirements].
- (8) State-required seller's disclosure, if applicable.
- (9) Type of transaction sought by owner, such as:
- (a) Sale.
 - (b) Exchange.
 - (c) Lease.
- (10) If property is a single-family residence, details such as:
- (a) Number of bedrooms.
 - (b) Number of bathrooms.
 - (c) Total number of rooms.
 - (d) Number of square feet.
 - (e) Size of garage, if any.
 - (f) Size of basement, if any.
 - (g) Type of exterior (e.g., wood siding, stucco, brick).
 - (h) Type of roof (e.g., wood shake, composition shingle, tile).

(i) Amount of annual property taxes.

(11) If income property, details such as:

(a) Number of units.

(b) Gross scheduled income.

(c) Vacancy allowance.

(d) Rent controls.

(e) Operating expenses.

(f) Net operating income.

(g) Loan payments.

(h) Cash flow.

(i) Service contracts.

(j) Laundry leases.

(k) Amenities provided to tenants.

(12) Terms and conditions of lease sought by owner, including:

(a) Term of lease.

(b) Monthly rental amount/percentage lease terms.

(c) Options to purchase/right of first refusal.

(d) Renewal options.

(e) Ability to divide space.

(f) Option to lease additional space/surrender space.

(g) Escalators.

(h) Common area maintenance (CAM) charges.

(i) Services and amenities available to tenant.

(j) Security deposit.

(k) Buildout allowance/rent abatement.

- (l) Tenant exclusivity.
- (13) Terms and conditions of sale or exchange sought by owner, including:
 - (a) Price.
 - (b) Amount of liens and encumbrances on property.
 - (c) Date of transfer of possession.
 - (d) Rent roll.
 - (e) Service contracts.
 - (f) Seller financing availability.
- (14) Defects in title that may not be easily cured.
- (15) Possible deficiencies in estimate of amount of land in particular tract.
- (16) Restrictions that may affect use of land by prospective buyer, such as:
 - (a) Restrictive covenants.
 - (b) Easements.
 - (c) Zoning restrictions.
- (17) Parties excluded from broker's right to earn commission.
- (18) Broker protection periods.

B. Documents

- (1) Appraisals.
- (2) Surveys.
- (3) Title reports.
- (4) Licenses held by brokers and by salespersons, if any.
- (5) Articles of Incorporation and other relevant corporate documents of any party that is a corporation.
- (6) Partnership agreements and other relevant partnership documents of any party that is a partnership.
- (7) Notes for any debt secured by property.
- (8) Deeds of trust (mortgages).

- (9) Inspection reports (including, but not limited to, environmental surveys, engineering reports, building code inspections, lead-based paint surveys, radon surveys, etc.)
- (10) Leases and service contracts.
- (11) Insurance policies.
- (12) Deeds and any other recorded documents.
- (13) Photographs of property.
- (14) Diagrams of property and buildings.
- (15) Books, records, financial statements and balance sheets of property, if commercial property.
- (16) If property is subdivided, copies of plat maps and approvals.
- (17) Certificate of Occupancy or other municipal license.

Checklist 2 Preliminary Determinations

A. Determinations Regarding Broker

- (1) Determine whether client needs broker to accomplish desired transaction.
 - (a) Determine whether owner knows of any interested buyers/tenants.
 - (b) Determine whether owner has time, knowledge and ability to complete each step of transaction.
 - (c) Determine time within which transaction must be accomplished.
 - (d) Determine whether prospective buyers/tenants can be easily reached and method of doing so.
- (2) If broker is needed to consummate desired transaction, determine which of following brokers is best suited for owner's needs:
 - (a) Finder--leaves negotiation to parties.
 - (b) Full service--undertakes negotiations and follows through with transaction.
 - (c) Experienced specialist in particular type of property and area.
 - (d) Member of multiple listing service.
- (3) Determine whether broker or salesperson's license is active and in good standing.

B. Listing Agreement

- (1) Determine which type of listing contract owner should seek.
 - (a) Consider advantages and disadvantages of open listing agreement, including:
 - (i) Broker is not entitled to any commission unless broker is procuring cause of sale/lease.
 - (ii) It may be difficult to find broker who is willing to agree to open listing contract.
 - (b) Consider advantages and disadvantages of exclusive agency agreement, including:
 - (i) Broker is not entitled to commission if property is sold, exchanged, purchased or leased through owner's efforts.
 - (ii) Exclusive agency agreement may lead to conflict if ultimate purchaser/tenant has had contact with both broker and owner and owner arranges sale/lease.
 - (c) Consider advantages and disadvantages of exclusive-right-to-sell agreement, including:
 - (i) Widespread use of this form among brokers makes it easier to find broker willing to enter this type of contract.
 - (ii) Broker is entitled to commission if property is sold, exchanged, purchased or leased through anyone's efforts.
- (2) If broker uses standard contract form, verify that form contains following provisions:
 - (a) Asking price/rental rate of property.
 - (b) Commission amount expected on sale/lease.
 - (c) Payment terms of sale price/rental.
 - (d) Duration of listing contract.
 - (e) Provision defining how and when commission is earned.
 - (f) Description of property.
 - (g) Parties excluded from commission payment.
- (3) Verify that broker's form for exclusive agency or exclusive-right-to-sell listing contract does not include following terms:
 - (a) Term granting broker power to execute signed agreement of sale/lease for owner.
 - (b) Term granting broker option to purchase/lease property covered by listing contract.
 - (c) Term providing duration period that exceeds one year.

(d) Term providing automatic renewal clause.

(e) Term requiring cancellation notice to terminate contract at end of term set forth in contract.

C. Determinations Regarding Broker's Fee

(1) Ascertain whether owner desires to negotiate fee with broker before entering into contract.

(a) Advise owner that high value of readily salable/leasable property may warrant lower fee.

(b) Advise owner that unique property suited for limited number of buyers/tenants may limit broker's expense in finding purchasers/tenants.

NOTE:

If advertising the property would serve no useful purpose due to the limited number of persons who might be interested, the expense saved the broker may furnish a basis for negotiating a lower fee.

(2) Determine basis of broker's compensation, such as:

(a) Percentage of sales price/gross rental.

(b) Flat fee on readily salable/leasable property.

(c) Percentage of sales price/gross rental over specified amount.

(d) Net amount over sales price/gross rental.

(e) Payment of advertising/signage costs.

(3) Ascertain conditions that will entitle broker to commission, for example [see chs. 4 and 5]:

(a) On procuring ready, able and willing buyer/tenant.

(b) On transfer of title/execution of lease.

(4) Ascertain amount due broker on default of buyer or owner.

(5) Determine when commission is earned and payable, such as:

(a) On entering sale exchange or lease agreement.

(b) On consummation of sale/execution of lease.

(c) On procuring buyer/tenant even if no agreement for sale, exchange or lease is reached.

(6) Determine number of days from date listing agreement terminates within which broker is entitled to compensation if property is sold to, exchanged with, purchased from or leased to parties with whom broker had negotiated.

(7) If parties contemplate installment sale/seller financing, determine manner of commission payment, such as:

- (a) Full commission payable at closing.
- (b) Portion of commission payable at closing, with balance represented by promissory note.

(8) Determine whether buyer/tenant, owner or both pay commission.

D. Duties and Authority of Broker

(1) Determine whether listing agreement should require broker to pursue any specific course of action with regard to procuring buyers/tenants, such as:

- (a) Obtaining cooperation of other brokers through multiple listing services, and whether cooperating broker is to act as agent of property owner, listing broker, both or neither.
- (b) Advertising in particular newspapers on particular days of week; number of times per week.
- (c) Placing signs on property.
- (d) Holding "open house" tours.

(2) Determine days and times when agent may show property.

(3) Determine whether broker is to hold funds in escrow.

(4) Determine whether broker has responsibility to ensure compliance with federal lead-based paint disclosure requirements [see Ch. 15A above for discussion of lead-based paint disclosure requirements].

E. Restrictions on Use

(1) Determine whether there are restrictions on use of property that may affect sale/lease, such as:

- (a) Easements.
- (b) Restrictive covenants or equitable servitudes.
- (c) Zoning restrictions.

NOTE:

An early check of the zoning status may be valuable; for instance, the residence owner in an area where spot zoning has occurred which permits commercial establishments may have property that is more valuable for commercial purposes than residential.

- (d) Boundary disputes.
- (e) Quantity and quality of land.

NOTE:

Representations concerning the quantity or quality of land should be qualified by advising the broker to require any prospective purchasers to make their own examination or tests if these are material elements to be considered in the sale.

- (f) Mechanics' liens that might be filed.
 - (g) Other liens on property.
 - (h) Restrictive lease provisions of other tenants.
- (2) Determine whether there are defects in title that may not be easily cured, such as:

NOTE:

The broker should be advised of existing defects that may prevent or delay the seller's ability to furnish marketable title. A seller who fails to warn of title defects may be liable to the broker for a commission if the seller cannot convey title after the broker has found a ready, willing and able buyer [see ch. 5].

- (a) Outstanding tax liens on property.
 - (b) Outstanding judgment liens on property.
- (3) Determine whether sale and broker's fee should be made conditional on clearing any possible clouds on title that might affect sale.

Checklist 3 Drafting Guide for Listing Agreement

NOTE:

The following checklist presents matters that should be considered when reviewing or drafting a listing agreement. An owner's options with respect to a listing agreement are to use the broker's form or request that his or her attorney either draft a listing agreement or modify the broker's form. Brokers typically use a form that is supplied by the broker's local or state Realtor(R)'s association.

A broker's "standard" listing agreement may not meet a client's needs. These forms often contain insufficient blank space to make significant modifications. Should the broker's listing agreement need material modification, one solution is to modify the form through riders. If an attorney opts for using the broker's form with riders, the attorney must ensure that the rider does not conflict with the form and that if there is a conflict that the rider will control. However, modifying the broker's form through riders can become confusing if there will be numerous changes. In this case, it may be best for the attorney to draft a complete listing agreement that addresses the owner's needs.

In reviewing, modifying, or drafting a listing agreement, an attorney should consider the following:

- (1) Put it in writing. Listing agreements should be in writing. Even if an oral listing agreement is valid, a well-drafted agreement can minimize or avoid disputes.
- (2) Comply with applicable statutes and regulations. Review applicable statutes and regulations to determine specific requirements for listing agreements. For example a listing agreement may by statute or regulation be required to contain disclosures regarding brokerage relationships.

- (3) Review the listing form used by the broker. If there is a standard listing agreement form used by a local Realtors(R) association, consider following its provisions where possible as this is the form that is generally interpreted by courts.
- (4) Identify the broker. State the name and address of the broker.
- (5) Identify the owner. The owner's complete name should be spelled correctly. If an individual is conveying the property, the owner's marital status should be stated. If a business entity is conveying the property, the authority for the conveyance should be included..
- (6) Avoid confusing terms. If the owner is using the broker to obtain a tenant, do not use the terms "lessor" and "lessee" as these words are easily reversed. Use "landlord" and "tenant" instead. Other terms that are too similar and may cause confusion should also be avoided.
- (7) Write numbers as words and numerals. Write numbers as both words and numerals (e.g., five (5)). This will reduce the chance for errors.
- (8) Date the listing agreement. The listing should be dated (usually the date on which the agreement is executed). Including a blank for the date in the first paragraph makes it easy to find the date.
- (9) Identify the type of agency. The document should specify what type of listing is being entered into by the parties (e.g., exclusive right to sell, exclusive agency, or open).
- (10) State an expiration date. A definite expiration date for the listing should be included. While the time period of the listing should be stated, it is better to state a definite expiration date rather than risk an argument over when the agreement expired.
- (11) Address cancellation of the agreement. A provision should address possible cancellation of the listing. The provision should state under what conditions the owner may cancel the listing and the consequences.
- (12) Identify the real property. A correct legal description including both a street address and survey reference, if available should be used in the listing.
- (13) Preserve confidentiality. To the extent allowed by the applicable brokerage law, the owner will want the broker to preserve the confidentiality of the owner's private information.
- (14) Address personal property. If the conveyance will include personal property, list each item. Depending on the facts and circumstances, it may be prudent to state that certain personal property will not be conveyed.
- (15) State the purpose. The listing should state whether the broker is seeking a buyer or a tenant for the property.
- (16) State the sales price or rent. The desired price or rental amount the owner seeks should be stated. It is in the owner's interest to make this amount and the payment terms optimal. If the amount is below the fair market value, the owner may have to pay the commission if the broker brings an offer for the listed amount when that offer is rejected by the owner.
- (17) Specify financing terms. Financing terms should be stated including any financing or assistance that the seller is willing to provide (e.g., cash only, cash with seller financing amount and terms, payment of some or all closing costs, provisions for VA or FHA financing, assumption of an existing mortgage).

(18) State the broker's commission. The broker's commission should be stated. Commissions are usually stated as a percentage of the selling price or rent amount. If an exclusive right to sell (or lease) listing is involved, the document should include a statement on its face in bold type that the broker earns a commission on a sale (or lease) when the property is sold (or leased) regardless of who procures the buyer (or tenant)

(19) State when the commission is earned. The agreement should identify when the commission is earned. With a sale, from an owner's perspective the commission should be contingent on title closing. With a rental, from an owner's perspective, the commission should be contingent upon the tenant's payment of rent.

(20) Allocate risks. The parties should provide for contingencies that might cause a deal to fall through and allocate the risks. In a sale, if the commission is contingent on title passing, the risk is on the broker if the buyer cannot obtain financing or breaches the agreement before closing. In a rental, if the tenant cannot pay rent the broker will not be entitled to a commission. The listing agreement should also allocate the risk if the owner cannot convey marketable title.

(21) State the broker's duties. Broker supplied listing agreements usually do not detail the efforts the broker must take in marketing the property. The broker's duties can be stated in greater detail so that if the owner becomes dissatisfied with the broker's efforts, the owner will have an objective basis for terminating the listing agreement.

(22) State the owner's duties. The agreement should state the owner's duties such as allowing the property to be shown, allowing the broker to post signs, and requiring that the owner refer inquiries to the broker.

(23) Provide for subagency. A provision should be included to address subagency or cooperating with other brokers.

(24) Address use of a lockbox. A provision should address whether a lockbox will be used. Risks associated with a lockbox should be allocated.

(25) Retaining an earnest money deposit. A provision should address the retention of an earnest money deposit by the broker and the terms and conditions of disposition of the deposit should the buyer default.

(26) Include an integration clause. An integration clause can avoid disputes where one party alleges that verbal agreements are also part of the parties' agreement.

(27) Preclude illegal discrimination. A provision can state that the broker will not engage in any unlawful discrimination in marketing and showing the property.

(28) Consider a clause for attorney's fees and costs. A provision may address attorney's fees and court costs.

(29) Consider the use of alternative dispute resolution. The parties may opt to resolve disputes through alternative dispute resolution rather than litigation.

(30) Consider including an extension clause. The agreement can contain an extension clause to extend the owner's liability for a commission for a stated period of time beyond expiration of the listing period should the owner convey the property to a buyer (or tenant) identified by the broker. If the agreement contains an extension clause, the agreement also should require that the broker within a short period after expiration of the listing agreement, deliver to the seller a listing of all parties to whom the property has been shown by the broker.

(31) Avoid automatic renewals. Some listing agreements include a stated term, but also provide that the agreement remains in force past the stated term until the owner gives the broker written notice of termination. This clause is often not to the owner's benefit as the owner may mistakenly assume that the agreement has expired. This type of renewal provision is invalid in some jurisdictions.

(32) Allow for renewal. The parties can provide for a voluntary and intentional renewal of the listing agreement.

(33) Address a potential broker's lien. If the jurisdiction statutorily allows a broker's lien, the listing agreement should address this possibility. Often this type of statutory lien is confined to non-residential transactions.

(34) Properly incorporate riders. If a rider is used to modify the broker's listing agreement, the rider should be attached as an exhibit and incorporated into the printed form through appropriate language (e.g., "Attached to this agreement and marked exhibit _____ is a rider consisting of _____ pages each of which has been _____ [signed or initialed] by the parties; the exhibit, by this reference, is incorporated in this agreement as though set forth in full.").

(35) Avoid inconsistencies. When modifying a broker's listing agreement, line out inconsistent portions of the printed form. State in the rider and also on the printed form that provisions of the rider supersede any inconsistent provisions appearing in printed form.

(36) Initial alterations. All parties should initial all deletions or alterations that appear on the printed form.

(37) Obtain signatures. The broker and all parties (including spouses) having an interest in the property should sign the listing agreement.

(38) Include contact information. In addition to having all parties sign, telephone numbers, fax numbers, e-mail addresses, and addresses should be included.

Checklist 4 Drafting Guide for Listing Agreement

NOTE:

Many of the items in the checklist above also apply to a buyer broker agreement

(1) Put it in writing. Buyer broker agreements should always be in writing. Never advise a client to enter into an oral buyer broker agreement.

(2) Comply with applicable statutes and regulations. Review applicable statutes and regulations to determine specific requirements for buyer broker agreements.

- (3) Review the agreement typically used by the broker. If there is a standard buyer broker agreement form used by a local Realtors(R) Association, follow its provisions as closely as possible as this is the form that is generally interpreted by courts. The buyer broker agreements' terms should comport as closely as possible to eliminate any confusion.
- (4) Identify the buyer. The buyer's complete name should be spelled correctly. If an individual is purchasing the property, the buyer's marital status should be included. If a business entity is purchasing the property, the authority for the conveyance should be included.
- (5) Identify the type of agency. The document should disclose what type of buyer agency is being entered into by the parties (i.e., exclusive buyer agency, disclosed dual agency, designated agency).
- (6) State an expiration date. State a definite expiration date. Though the time period of the agreement should be stated, it is preferable to state a definite expiration date rather than risk an argument over when the agreement has expired.
- (7) Address the broker's commission. The agreement should clearly address who pays the commission due a buyer's broker and when the commission is earned. In a residential agreement, the home buyers almost always are planning on the seller paying the commission of the buyer's broker. Identifying the source of the broker's compensation is crucial.
- (8) Describe the desired property. The agreement should describe the property the buyers are seeking to purchase. The geographical search area should also be stated.
- (9) State the buyer's price range. The agreement should state the price range of the property being sought by the buyer.
- (10) State the buyer's duties. The buyer's duties may include an agreement to work exclusively with the broker during the term of the agreement and to provide the broker with necessary financial information to establish the buyer's ability to purchase property. The buyer should agree to contact the broker if the buyer independently learns of a property the buyer may have an interest in.
- (11) State the broker's duties. A buyer should expect loyalty and confidentiality from a buyer's broker. The broker may agree to provide the buyer with available MLS information and to the extent allowed, identify properties that the broker knows to be coming on the market, in advance of this information being made available to the general public. The broker should be expected to negotiate the best deal for the buyer.
- (12) Address cancellation. The agreement should address when and under what circumstances the buyer or the broker can cancel the agreement and the consequences.
- (13) Write numbers as words and numerals. Write numbers as both words and numerals (e.g., five (5)). This will reduce the chance for errors.
- (14) Date the agreement. The buyers broker agreement should be dated (usually the date on which the agreement is executed). Including a blank for the date in the first paragraph makes it easy to find the date.
- (15) Preserve confidentiality. To the extent allowed by the applicable brokerage law, the buyer will want the broker to preserve and maintain the buyer's private information.

(16) Consider an extension clause. The agreement may provide that the broker is due a commission if the buyer subsequently purchases property which was located by the broker while the agreement was in effect.

(17) Properly incorporate riders. If a rider is used to modify the broker's agreement, the rider should be attached as an exhibit and incorporated into the printed form through appropriate language (e.g., "Attached to this agreement and marked exhibit _____ is a rider consisting of _____ pages each of which has been _____ [signed or initialed] by the parties; the exhibit, by this reference, is incorporated in this agreement as though set forth in full.").

(18) Avoid inconsistencies. When modifying a broker's agreement, line out inconsistent portions of the printed form. State in the rider and also on the printed form that provisions of the rider supersede any inconsistent provisions appearing in printed form.

(19) Initial alterations. All parties should initial all deletions or alterations that appear on the printed form.

(20) Include an integration clause. An integration clause can avoid disputes where one party alleges that verbal agreements are also part of the parties' agreement.

(21) Preclude illegal discrimination. A provision can state that the broker will not engage in any unlawful discrimination in locating a suitable property for the buyers.

(22) Consider a clause for attorney's fees and costs. A provision may address attorney's fees and court costs.

(23) Consider the use of alternative dispute resolution. The parties may opt to resolve disputes through alternative dispute resolution rather than litigation.

(24) Obtain signatures. The broker and buyer should sign the agreement.

(25) Include contact information. In addition to having all parties sign, telephone numbers, fax numbers, e-mail addresses, and addresses should be included.

Checklist 5 Related and Subsequent Procedures

A. Completion of Transaction

(1) Draft one of following agreements and have it executed:

(a) Purchase agreement.

(b) Exchange agreement.

(c) Lease.

(2) Draft or, if preprinted forms are used, review financing and security instruments

(3) Arrange escrow and title insurance.

(4) Prepare deeds and related transfer documents.

B. Handling Client's Complaint Against Broker

(1) If owner is dissatisfied with broker's services, determine whether broker has engaged in any of following acts or conduct:
